
This is a reproduction of a library book that was digitized by Google as part of an ongoing effort to preserve the information in books and make it universally accessible.

GoogleTM books

<https://books.google.com>

3 3433 00310061 1

85181
FRIENDS'

INTELLIGENCER AND JOURNAL

1899

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, VOLUME LVI.

FRIENDS' JOURNAL, VOLUME XXVII.

PHILADELPHIA:
FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER ASSOCIATION, LIMITED,
N. W. COR. FIFTEENTH AND CHERRY STREETS.

1899

INDEX.

Abbott, Dr. Lyman, Address by,	53	Bearing One Another's Burdens,	674
Abraham, The Patriarch,	582	Beg Pardon,	645
Acknowledgment of Memorial,	489	Below Deck,	37
Across the Continent,	666	Benevolent Assimilation,	334
Advanced Civilization,	865	Berlin, The Churches of,	215
After 1900 Years,	18	Benson, Robert, on
Aged Friend's Reverie, An,	872	"Colored Farms in the South,"	124
Agricultural Situation, The,	56	Better Way, A	391
Aguinaldo and the Filipinos,	198	Bible, The, as Literature,	81
Aid for Boer Wounded,	977	Bicycling in England,	591
Aiken, S. C., From,	328	Bicycle Riders at Church,	559
Alaska, A Letter from,	666	Bird Class for Children, A,	517
Alaskan Fishermen,	217	Bird Notes in Germany,	374
Alcoholism and Degeneracy,	378	Birdsall, Wm. W., on
Alcohol for Severe Effort,	198	"Courses of Study in Friends' Schools,"	811
Alcohol in Medicine,	46	" The Guarded Education,"	622
Alms-giving, Lights and Shadows,	603	Birds Left, A Good Many,	836
America and Europe: A Military Comparison,	137	Birmingham Summer School, The,	290, 721
American Colony, The, in Jerusalem,	183	Birthdays, Keep the,	720
American Enterprise in Asia,	703	Births, 49, 69, 89, 129, 149, 167, 188, 207, 229,
American Purity Alliance Meeting,	95	289, 306, 327, 348, 366, 388, 429, 448, 469,
Americans and the Boer War,	916	487, 508, 528, 549, 568, 608, 646, 662, 678,
Ambition Expressed in War,	850	696, 711, 728, 744, 758, 790, 828, 846, 887,
Ambition, False,	757	906, 927, 949, 967, 989
Armenian Relief Work,	498	Black as "Mourning,"	977
Annual Conference of Y. F. A.,	830	Blackie, Prof., on Education,	18
Another View,	252	Bloch's Great Book on Modern War, 345, 449,
Answers, Some Real,	479	571, 572, 650
Anthony, Daniel, on		Bond, Elizabeth Powell, on
"A Plea for the Oppressed,"	271	"Building Before Our Own Doors,"	861
Anti-Imperialist Liberals,	315	" He That Overcometh,"	21
Anti-License Campaign in Kentucky,	178	"Making God a Factor,"	739
Anti-Saloon League, The,	50	" The Example,"	221
Anti-Slavery Repository, The,	373	" The Ministry of the Sabbath,"	961
Arab Carriers on Vegetable Food,	158	Bonheur, Rosa, and Unser Fritz,	539
Araucanians, The,	97	Bonheur's, Rosa, Art,	457
Arbitration System, The New,	755	Books,	365
Archbishop of Canterbury for Woman Suffrage,	671	Books of Reference,	513
Arizona's Masked Quicksands,	799	Boy Costs, What a,	916
Armed Peace, Cost of the,	499	Brewer's, Justice, View,	915
Armenian Want, The	337	Brooks, Phillips, A Story of,	136
Arms and Education,	814	Brown, Kirk, on
Around the World in Thirty Days,	258	"Selling Rum to Indians,"	489
Art in Photography,	838	Brown Man's Burdens, The,	157
Art of Seeing Things, The,	976	Browns of Bartonbury, The,	705
Atkinson, Alice M., on		Bucks Boarding Home,	731
"The Bible as Literature,"	81	Bud Variations or "Sports,"	118
Attitude During Public Prayer,	315	Building Before Our Own Doors,	861
Australian Political Experience,	743	Business in the Philippines,	296
Authorship of a Poem,	28	Byrnes, Sarah P., on
Autumn.	835	"Impressions of Normandy,"	734
Bai Bureh, The Story of,	15	Camping Out, The Joys of,	567
Baily, Joshua L., on Prohibition in Maine,	956, 974	Candor in English History,	118
Balloon, Sounds from a,	499	Carlyle Family Letters, The,	321
Baltimore Yearly Meeting,	829, 841	Carpenter, Joseph,	930
Baptist Church of Philadelphia, The First,	541	Carpenter's, Joseph, Sister,	973
Baptism,	547	Carpenter's Work, The,	398
Barton, Clara, on Woman Suffrage,	913	Catamaran, A,	459
Bartram, Bi Centennial, A,	318	Caution, A,	539
Battle, A, as it Appeared to an Eye-Witness,	16	Census Work, The, Not Accurate,	18
Beach St. Mission, Contributions to,	575

Chapman, Mariana W., on
" The London Government Bill,"	635
Charitable Reports,	780, 834,	895
Charity, Large,		597
Charming Old City, A,		598
Chatham's Boldness,		897
Chautauqua,		750
Cheerfulness,		187
Cheerfulness, The Power of,		126
Child Culture,		329
Child Development,	262,	283
Children do in Vacation ? What Shall,		592
Children's Early Impressions,		536
Children Question, The,		916
Child's Right of Secrecy, A,		695
Christian Ideals in Business Affairs,		562
Christmas, The Observance of,		6
Church or Meeting,		981
Cigar, One, a Day,		58
Cigarette, Another Rebuke for the,		478
Circulating the INTELLIGENCER,		952
Civilized Vocabularies,		897
Clear Testimony Needed, A,		251
" Clergy," in the Early Church, No,		756
Clevenger, Charles E., on
" The Growth of the Church,"	922
Clock, the Great Philadelphia,		35
Coale, Elizabeth H., on
"Authorship of a Poem,"		28
" Deeds of Violence,"		511
" Mothers and Fathers,"		281
" The Patriarch Abraham,"		582
College Training, Advan'ages of,		596
College Girls as Debaters,		978
Colonies Unprofitable,		377
Colored Club Women at Hull House,		688
Colored Farmers in the South,		124
Colored Industrial Home, Columbia, S. C.,
Colored People, The,		751
Colored People in the South, The,		835
Colored Women, National Association of,		687
Comly, John, A Paragraph from,		205
Commendable Pastime, A,		661
" Commercial Cultures " in Butter,		98
Common Sense, The University of,		67
COMMUNICATIONS :
Acknowledgement, An,		495
Arctic Weather, A Record of,		255
Beach Street Mission,	615, 701,	834
Beach Street Mission, For,		654
Books Recommended,		875
Burlington Quarterly Meeting Home,		155
Caretaker at Fairhill,		277
Caution Given,		155
Charitable Bequests Suffer, How,		895
Charity, A Worthy,		495
Citizens : Not Fit for Citizens !		417
Colored Schools, Bond Sold for,		417
Comment, A,		551
Conference Program,		277
Contrast of Policies, A,		94
Correspondence Invited,		255
Dante's Gradation of Sins,		635
Directions for Shipping,		314
Diversity of Opinion,		333
Doukhorbor Report,		197
Eastern Question, Two Opinions of the,		474
Epitaph, A Notable,		853
Expression Urged,		373
Franklin, Benjamin, on War,		853
Friendly Mode of Expression,		594
Friends and Others at Athens,		238
Friends' Charities, Giving to,		812
Friends' Home for Children,		175
Friends' Ministers in England,		853
Herrick, Poem by,		215
Idaho Colony, The,		94
International Court, An,		333
Laing School, Endowment for,		334
Last of the Lenapé, The,		575
Liberty of Opinion,		215
Mammon of Righteousness,		295
Ministry, The Standard of the,		594
Morgan's, Appleton, Article, Concerning		635
Mt. Pleasant School, S. C.,		813
Munro, From A. D.,		417
Newspapers, An Inquiry About,		895
Powell's, Aaron M. Reminiscences,		796
Reference Books, Concerning,		654
Registry of Convictions,		256
Reply to an Inquiry,		556
Semi Centenary, Woman's Medical College,		766
Signing Full Names,		238
Southampton, L. I., Museum and Library,		853
Taxes and Honest Use of Them,		373
Taxes on Charitable Bequests,		295
Thankful Feelings,		255
Thou Does,		781
Tribute, A,		277
Tyson, Dr., A Note from,		748
Use Made of the INTELLIGENCER, The		874
War in South Africa, The,		834
Water and Imperialism,		195
Weather, Record of,		195
W. C. T. U. Resolutions,		874
Woolman, John, Descendants of,		796
Conferences, Associations, etc., 14, 30, 51, 92, 93,
113, 132, 153, 173, 195, 213, 235, 254, 276,
293, 311, 330, 353, 370, 393, 414, 434, 452,
473, 493, 513, 535, 554, 573, 594, 613, 636,
653, 702, 718, 732, 748, 779, 796, 811, 833,
852, 873, 893, 911, 933, 955, 971
Conference, Encourage The,		36
Concord Quarterly Meeting, Address by,		227
Concord Q. M. Boarding Home,		875
Congressional Funeral, A,		297
Conscription in Europe, The,		336
Consider Where You'r not Hit,		77
Constitution, The, in Contempt,		78
Contrasts Emphasized at The Hague,		498
Co-operation		87
Co-operation of Parents,		301
Co-operative Stores in Iowa,		458
Cooper, Howard M., on
" Newton Meeting : A Retrospect,"	707, 722,	740
Cordial Word of Welcome, A,		178
Cornell, John J., on
" A Visit to Indiana Friends,"		760
" Visits to Friends in New Jersey,"	190,	208
Corn Farm in Iowa, A,		256
Corn's King, New Conquests,		735
Corrections in " Friends' Almanac,"		75
Courtesy of Speech,		618
Covered Buttons,		336
Cow's Spectacles, A,		558
Cox, William W., on
" The Philippine Crisis,"		252
Cuba After the War,		941
Cuban Women in Mourning,		478
Culled Thoughts of To-day,		83

- | | | | |
|--|----------|--|-----|
| Culture, Dangers of, | 617 | Earle, Dr. Pliny, | 106 |
| Current Events, 19, 39, 59, 79, 99, 119, 139, 158 | | Earliest Writings in France, The, | 157 |
| 159, 178, 199, 219, 239, 259, 278, 298, 318, | | Early Christian Church, The, | 815 |
| 337, 359, 379, 399, 419, 439, 459, 479, 499, | | Early, Robert Morris, on | |
| 520, 540, 560, 580, 599, 619, 640, 656, 672, | | "Philadelphia Q. M. Friends' Home," | 703 |
| 688, 704, 720, 736, 752, 768, 783, 799, 818, | | Earthquake Register, An, | 897 |
| 839, 857, 877, 897, 917, 936, 958, 978, 998 | | "Eastern Shore," A Book on the, | 983 |
| Cycle Tour in Germany, A, | 855 | Editorial Correspondence, 469, 487, 509, 529, 550, | |
| Cyprus Doukhobor Colony, The, | 310 | 569, 589, 609, 629, 647, 663, 679, 697, 711, 729 | |
| Czar, Address to the, | 534 | EDITORIALS : | |
| Czar, An Address to the, | 210 | Announcement, An, | 128 |
| Czar, and the Doukhobors, The, | 90 | Canteens and War, | 366 |
| Czar, and Tolstoy, The, | 79 | Choice Last Year, The, | 206 |
| Czar, England's Reply to the, | 147 | City Administration, A Case of, | 228 |
| Czar's Response to American Addresses, | 336 | Civilization, | 68 |
| Czar, The Addresses to the, | 353 | Civil War, Remembrance of, | 846 |
| Daily Use, Not for, | 838 | Common Human Tie, The, | 166 |
| Darjeerling, The Disaster at, | 914 | Counselling Together, | 348 |
| Date Palms for Arizona. | 559 | Danger Signal, A, | 696 |
| Deaths, 11, 27, 28, 49, 69, 70, 89, 108, 109, 129, | | Doukhobors, Needs, The, | 744 |
| 149, 150, 167, 188, 189, 207, 229, 248, 269, | | Education Among Friends, | 628 |
| 289, 306, 307, 327, 349, 367, 388, 389, 408, | | Evolution Through Effort, | 790 |
| 409, 429, 448, 449, 469, 487, 508, 509, 529, | | Farm Teaching Among the Colored People, | 733 |
| 549, 568, 569, 588, 589, 608, 609, 628, 646, | | Friends, "Olden Time," and Modern, | 966 |
| 647, 663, 678, 696, 711, 728, 744, 759, 777, | | Great Conference, The, | 288 |
| 790, 807, 829, 846, 867, 887, 907, 927, 928, | | Hague Conference, The, | 508 |
| 949, 967, 989 | | Hague Work, The, | 548 |
| Death, The Fear of, | 957 | Leadership, | 678 |
| Decision and Action, | 976 | Long Summer Vacations, The, | 528 |
| Deserted House, The, | 781 | "National Greatness" and "Patriotism," | 806 |
| Desert Simoon, A, | 619 | Nations as Neighbors, | 428 |
| Destitute Children in Cuba, | 684 | Nineteenth Century Afflictions, | 906 |
| Devotion to Science, | 478 | Old Age, Preparation for, | 828 |
| Dialect, | 117 | Old and the New, The, | 10 |
| Disarmament Conference, The, | 29 | Pagan, | 468 |
| Discovery of Valuable Pictures, | 457 | Pastors and "Tent-Making," | 988 |
| Diseases in Puerto Rico, | 258 | Passing of the Faithful, The, | 88 |
| Disownments, Sixty Years Ago, | 991 | Perpetual Watch, The, | 486 |
| Dodge, Hampton, on "Encourage the Conference," | 369 | Plain People Pay, The, | 326 |
| "The Use of a Good Word," | 994 | Powell, Aaron M., | 388 |
| Dog Goes with Foxes, | 856 | Prophecy of Smooth Things, The, | 128 |
| Donation Day, | 95 | President's Attitude, The : The People's Duty, | 148 |
| Doukhobor Colonists, The, | 214 | "Race" Manners, | 306 |
| Exiles in Siberia, | 265 | Repose, The Doctrine of, | 588 |
| Fund, Intelligencer, | 766 | Reverence, Lack of, | 646 |
| Fund, The, | 549, 569 | Rights of Man, The, | 188 |
| Incident, A Pathetic, | 925 | Ritual Leads to Rome, | 926 |
| Immigrants, The, | 71, 91 | Sadducees, | 486 |
| Movement, The, | 170 | Self-government, | 108 |
| Notes, 115, 307, 327, 856, | 949 | Society Membership, Valuing, | 268 |
| Pressing Needs of the, | 815 | Southern "Race Problem," The, | 26 |
| Report, 212, 847, 867, 887, 907, 928, | 967 | Standpoint, Only One Right, | 886 |
| Situation, The, | 291 | "Strenuousness" in Life, | 866 |
| Doukhobors, Acknowledgement from, | 992 | Success of Nations, | 448 |
| as Christians, The, | 305 | Superior "Races," | 568 |
| at Halifax, The, | 151 | Symptom, A, Not the Disease, | 776 |
| at Winnipeg, The, | 272 | Unwise Giving, | 948 |
| Canadian View of the, | 177 | Visiting Meetings Socially, | 662 |
| The, 30, 155, 234, 356, 472, 491, 537, 585, | | What Does it Mean ? | 710 |
| 682, 792, 807, 830 | | "White" Men's Burdens, | 247 |
| The, at St. John, | 116 | Young Friends' Associations, The, | 48 |
| Word from the, | 437 | Educate the Feelings and Emotions Through the In- | |
| Villages, Notes of a Visit to, | 770 | tellect and the Will, How to, | 622 |
| Villages, Visits to, | 824, 844 | Educational Department, 32, 73, 94, 114, 154, | |
| Women, Labors of, | 975 | 172, 194, 211, 233, 253, 275, 292, 311, 331, | |
| Drawing on the Bank, | 37 | 355, 371, 392, 416, 435, 453, 473, 491, 514, | |
| Dreyfus Case, At the Bottom of the, | 816 | 535, 555, 573, 614, 653, 685, 702, 719, 732, | |
| Decision, The, | 752 | 740, 764, 778, 795, 811, 834, 851, 874, 895, | |
| Driving Through Narrow Places, | 325 | 911, 925, 954, 970, | |
| | | Education and Moral Reform, | 1 |

Education and Religion,	802, 821	Friends, Faithful, in Denmark,	226
Education of Women, The,	775	Friends in England,	737, 753, 769, 785, 801, 823
Egg Lemonade for Consumption,	687	Friends in Germany, The Remnant of,	63
Encouragement, A Word of,	193	Friends in New Jersey, Visits to,	190, 208, 231, 249
Engineering Feat,	688	Friends in the West,	389
English Flower Gardens,	598	Friends' Meeting at Oxford, Eng.	989
Friends at The Hague,	503	Friends Moving in Company,	151
Fruit growing Under Glass,	783	Friendly Neighborhoods, Glimpses of,	890
Language, Who Speakes the,	519	Friends of the Century,	542, 564
Minister's Testimony, An,	782	Friends' Principles Applied,	645
Skylarks in Long Island,	642	Friends too Self-Centered? Are,	506, 516
University Feeling,	58	Friends' Tracts in Ireland,	172
Enough Land at Home,	298	Friends' Weddings,	607
Entrance to a Carriage Driveway,	395	Freedom Without Constraint, No,	884
Epileptics, Homes for,	576	Furniture, Old and New,	135
Epistle of London Yearly Meeting,	521
Equal Suffrage, Progress of,	317	Garland, A, of Childhood Lyrics,	42
Equanimity, The Grace of,	607	"Generals" in Congress,	79
Essay on Water, An,	378	German Children Drinking,	418
Evening Meetings Yearly Meeting Week,	413, 433	German Freedom,	703
Everglades of Florida, The,	638	German Friends at Minden, The,	777
Evidence of Ice, The,	916	Gifts, For all Thy,	501
Example, The,	221	Gladstone's Personal Magnetism,	639
Excursion Days in England, 847, 867, 881, 908, 929,	950	Glasgow's Water Supply,	817
Excuse-Making,	864	God a Factor, Making,	739
Exhibition of 1899, The,	398	Golf Raising the Prices of Land,	619
Experience in a Mid-Week Meeting,	583	Good Conscience, A,	527
Ex Presidents' Voices, Two,	298	Good Humor in Cold Weather,	78
		Good Treatment and Confidence,	458
		Good Word, The Use of a,	994
Fables of the Hour,	136	Gospel Ministry,	41
False and Unjust, Theory, A,	377	Graham, John William, on
Famine in India, The,	877	"Education and Religion,"	802
Farm and Farm Home, Love the,	671	Grant's, General, Religious Views,	47
Farmers at Sandy Spring, Md.,	273	Greatness of Simplicity, The,	557
Farm Owners, Hopeful Outlook for,	704	Great Salt Lake Drying Up,	838
Fatalism, Not Yielding to,	266	Great Salt Lake, The,	134
Favorable View, A,	130	Gresham's Forecast, Secretary,	317
Feeble-Minded Children,	316	Grotius, at the Tomb of,	965
Feet, A Plea for the,	335	Growth of the Church, The,	921
Fellowship for all the World,	896	Guarded Education, The,	621
Ferris, David, on
"A Clear Testimony Needed,"	251	Hague Conference, The,	226, 606, 838
"Peace and Imperialism,"	430	Hague, Our Delegation at the,	533
"The War on the Filipinos,"	150	Hague, Progress at the,	618
"Thoughts for the Time,"	993	Hague Conference, Summary of the	661
Filipinos, Government in the,	438	Hall, Lizzie J., on
Filipinos, The War on the,	150	"Bearing one Another's Burdens,"	674
F. D. S. Association, Phila.,	854	Hallock, H. B., on
First-Day Schools, The,	808, 953	"Education and Moral Reform,"	1
Flies, To Banish,	597	Hallowell, Benjamin, on
Flitcraft, Allen, on "The Plain Language,"	204	"The First Day Schools,"	808
Flower Arrangement, The Art of, in Japan,	597	Hammond, Mercy Griffith, on
Fontenelle, Henry,	616	"Woman in the Gospel Ministry,"	523
Foreign Letter, A, on		Harvey's, William B., Doukhobor Notes,	944
"Bicycling in England,"	591	Hawaiian Islands, The,	575
Foreign Correspondence, 552, 611, 632, 652, 665,	683	Hayes, J. Russell, on
Fox, George, A New Life of,	546	"A Garland of Childhood Lyrics,"	42
Franklin, A Letter from,	250	"In Quiet Waters,"	699, 716, 723
Franklin's Religious Views,	227	"West Chester Centennial Ode,"	772
Friendly Man, The,	518	He That Overcometh,	21
Friends Among the Indians in the Northern		Hicks, John D., on
Superintendency, Work of, 1869-1899,	675, 689	"English Skylarks in Long Island,"	643
Friends' Associations Conference,	356	Highlands Creek Meeting,	241
Friends at Pasadena, Cal.	271	History, Shall, Repeat Itself?	78
Friends at Victoria, B. C.	112	Historic Tree, A,	519
Friends Away From Home,	526	Huis ten Bosch, "The House in the Wood,"	606
Friends' Book Association,	414	Holidays in New York,	38
Friends Connected with the Origin of Four		Home and Club,	297
Universities,	763	Home Life in Colonial Days,	425

- | | | | |
|--|----------|---|----------|
| Holmes and Lowell, | 595 | Jenkins, Howard M., on | |
| Holmes, Jesse H., on | | "A Continental Excursion," | 529 |
| "The Anti Saloon League," | 50 | "An Atlantic Voyage Eastward," | 469 |
| Holmes, K. O., on | | "A Walk to Rydal Mount," | 663 |
| "Friends Moving in Company," | 151 | "Days in London," | 589 |
| Hospital Work Among the Indians, | 297 | "Edinburgh and Sir Walter Scott," | 697 |
| Hull House, Conclusions at, | 398 | "Excursion Days in England," 847, 881, 908, | 929, 950 |
| Hunt, Ann, The Life of, | 660 | "From Manchester to Cardiff," | 629 |
| Hurricane in Porto Rico, The, | 751 | "Friends in England," 737, 754, 769, 785, | 801, 823 |
| Hygienic Decalogue, | 671 | "London Yearly Meeting," | 487 |
| Ideal American Citizen, The | 559 | "Manchester and Neighbors," | 609 |
| Ideals of Life, | 59 | "Notes from the Holland Capital," | 509 |
| Idle Plutocrats, | 539 | "Remarks at the White Slave Congress," | 566 |
| Illinois Yearly Meeting, | 727, 741 | "The Birmingham Summer School," | 721 |
| Immigrants at St. John, The, | 97 | "The East Coast of England: Notes," | 729 |
| "Imperialism" Abroad, | 297 | "The English Friends' School at Ackworth," | 569 |
| Imperialism at Home, | 118 | "The Lake Country, Etc.," | 679 |
| Imperialism, Resolutions on, | 78 | "The Mohonk Indian Conference," | 792 |
| Imprisonment for Debt, | 598 | "The Rowntree and Sherwell Temperance | |
| Increased Interest in Our Business Meetings, The | | Book," | 711 |
| Need of, | 901 | "The 'White Slave' Congress," | 550 |
| Indiana Friends, A Visit to, | 760 | "Vacation Days in England," | 867 |
| Indiana Model City, An, | 218 | "Wales and the Welsh Border," | 647 |
| Indiana Yearly Meeting, | 730 | Jersey Cow, The, | 672 |
| Indian Asylum, An, | 579 | Jewish Philanthropists, | 579 |
| Indian History, A Chapter of, | 417 | John and the Stamp, | 397 |
| Indian Lace Makers, The, | 532 | John Griffith, on | |
| Indian Languages, Study of, | 99 | "The Story of Peter Yarnall," 121, 142, 161, | 182, 201 |
| India, Lessons from, | 224 | Jones, William, | 909 |
| Indians, Development Among, | 193 | Jones, William, The Late. | 735 |
| Indian Service, Appointments in the, | 29 | Jump in Prices, | 857 |
| Indians, Manual Training for, | 118 | Kellar's, Helen, Triumph, | 736 |
| Individual Responsibility, | 127 | Kindness Grows Slowly, | 816 |
| Insomnia, Remedies for, | 816 | Kipling Became a Prohibitionist, How, | 559 |
| Insurance a la Chinese, | 752 | Labor not a Curse, | 826 |
| Intemperance Among Women, | 897 | Laing School, Endowment for, | 417 |
| Interesting Insect, An. | 476 | Lake Mohonk Conference, The, | 490 |
| Interesting Suit for Damages, | 258 | Land of Least Happiness, The, | 578 |
| International Agricultural Congress, 1900, | 671 | Lash in the Wrong Place, The, | 997 |
| International Arbitration, | 540 | Last Words, Our Loved Friends', | 467 |
| International Arbitration Plan, | 605 | Length of Meetings, | 778 |
| International Disarmament and Arbitration, | 111 | Life Insurance in 1898, | 76 |
| Invitation, An: Friends' Neighborhood Guild, | 831 | Life's Closing Years, | 865 |
| Iowa, A Word from, | 387 | Lightner, Isaiah, A Letter from, | 761 |
| Irish Flowers of Speech, Some, | 234 | Lincoln, A Word from, | 398 |
| Irish Speech, Gems of, | 751 | Lincoln, President, on War, | 377 |
| Irrigation on a Great Scale, | 97 | Lincoln's Mercifulness, | 817 |
| Isolated Members, | 386 | Liquor and Cigars in New York, | 37 |
| Jackson, Anna M., on | | Liquor, Getting, into Maine, | 998 |
| "A Favorable View," | 131 | Liquor Licenses, Against, | 155 |
| Jackson, Emilie Painter, on | | Literary Notes, 13, 32, 53, 72, 91, 92, 115, 133, | |
| "Henry Fontenelle," | 616 | 152, 174, 194, 212, 237, 253, 274, 293, 314, | |
| Jackson, W. M., Approved, | 762 | 332, 355, 372, 392, 416, 436, 454, 494, 515, | |
| Jackson, William M., on | | 536, 555, 574, 593, 614, 654, 667, 685, 701, | |
| "The Living Present," | 673 | 717, 732, 747, 764, 779, 795, 811, 832, 851, | |
| Janney, Anna C., on | | 873, 892, 910, 933, 954, 970, 991 | |
| "The Relation of 'The Law' to 'The Gospel,'" | 101 | Literature, The Tyranny of, | 757 |
| Janney, John J., on | | Living in England, Cost of, | 337 |
| "Another 'Plea for the Oppressed,'" | 308 | Living Present, The, | 673 |
| "Work of Friends Among the Indians in the | | Livermore, Rev. D. P. and Equal Rights, | 672 |
| Northern Superintendency," | 675, 689 | Lloyds," "The, and Charles Lamb, | 103 |
| Janney, Samuel M., and the Indians, | 476 | London Government Bill, The, | 634 |
| Janney's, Samuel M., Self-Possession, | 456 | Longstreth, Anna W., | 897 |
| Japan, A Glimpse of, | 700 | London Literary News, | 35 |
| Jarrett, Susan H., on | | Lord's Prayer, The; Its Universality, | 562 |
| "The Need of Increased Interest in Our Business Meetings." | 901 | | |

Loubet's Mother, President,	274	Nap, A Short Daily,	518
Lowell, Lines from,	994	National Educational Association, From the,	627
Lownes, Fannie C., on		National Relief Commission, The,	575
"Letter from New Mexico,"	450	Need Continued, The,	66
Magill, Edward H., on		New Member, From a,	131
"Swarthmore Idylls,"	903	New Mexico, Letter from,	450
Malays, The,	51	New Penn Document, A,	458
Managing Children, Two Ways of,	670	NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS: 19, 40, 60, 80, 100,
Mankind One Body,	181	119, 140, 159, 200, 220, 240, 260, 280, 299,
Manners,	876	319, 338, 360, 379, 399, 419, 439, 459, 479,
Manners of College Girls,	558	500, 520, 540, 560, 580, 599, 620, 640, 656,
Manual Training, Moral Value of,	579	672, 688, 704, 736, 752, 765, 768, 784, 800,
Manual Training, The Value of,	671	818, 839, 858, 878, 888, 918, 927, 959, 979,
Man with the Branded Hand, The,	456	999
Marketing, New Method of,	458	NEWS OF FRIENDS: 12, 50, 70, 89, 109, 110, 130,
Marriages, 10, 27, 69, 108, 129, 167, 188, 207, 229,		150, 169, 192, 209, 230, 249, 270, 290, 327,
269, 289, 306, 327, 348, 366, 429, 448, 469,		351, 367, 390, 407, 429, 450, 488, 511, 531,
487, 508, 528, 549, 663, 696, 711, 728, 758,		591, 609, 632, 648, 665, 681, 698, 713, 731,
777, 790, 807, 828, 846, 867, 887, 907, 927,		759, 777, 792, 807, 849, 869, 889, 909, 928,
949, 967, 989		951, 968, 990
Marriages, Canvassing for,	337	Newspaper Publicity,	998
Married Five Times,	336	Newspaper Reading as a Dissipation,	245
Marsh, T. P., on		NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS: 9, 24, 45, 65, 66, 85,
"A Word from Iowa,"	387	106, 123, 124, 145, 146, 164, 186, 203, 223
"Lights and Shadows of Almsgiving,"	603	244, 265, 284, 304, 324, 351, 364, 384, 406,
Maryland, Comes from,	59	427, 447, 466
May, Dr. Joseph, Address by,	356, 374	Newton Meeting: A Retrospect,	707, 722, 740
Meeting, Why Do We Go to,	531	New York Notes,	356
Memorial Service at Plainfield,	490	New Words,	498
Mennonite Minister, Choosing a,	18	Nineteenth Century Ends, When the,	578
Mental Effort, Dislike of,	395	Normandy, Impressions of,	734
Message of Love, A,	478	Notable Life Record, A,	463
Message to the Czar, A,	39	Notes of Sermons,	788
Meteoric Showers, The,	857	Ocean Currents, The,	318
Meteorological Summary for 1899,	39, 138, 238, 295	Ocean Steamer's Larder, An,	656
373, 475, 556, 655, 834, 854, 875,	956	Old Colored Man Dead, An,	782
Mexico, Notes on,	317	Old Colored Woman's Home, An,	915
Mexico To Day,	261	Oldest Family in the World, The,	597
Militarism, The Error of,	957	Oldest Town in the United States,	799
Militarism, The Menace of,	267	Old Testament Prophets, The,	343
Militarism, The Present Growth of,	22	Old-Time Words,	518
Military Display, The,	98	One Man Ministry,	997
Military Gamblers in Germany,	891	Only We Genteel,	337
Military Laws Possible,	253	Original Science by the Children,	137
Miller, Warwick P., on		Our Sorrows,	534
"Sandy Spring Settlers,"	310	Oxford, The Charm of,	677
Miniature Oaks, To Produce,	457	Pansy, The,	457
Ministry of the Sabbath, The,	961	Paret, Bishop, A Word from,	205
Mission Teaching, True,	329	Parkhurst, Dr., Emphatic,	998
Mission Work of Quakerism,	451	Pariahs of India, The,	780
Mistaken Methods,	996	Passing of Friendly Intercourse,	885
Moccasin, Advantages of the,	977	Pastorate Troubles,	965
Modern Paganism, The,	272	Peaceable People in Borneo,	378
Mohonk Indian Conference, The,	792	Peaceable? Why Summon the,	549
Molokians in the Trans-Caucasus, The,	923	Peace and Imperialism,	430
Monaghan, James, on,		Peace Crusade Work in Boston,	397
"An Interesting Insect,"	476	Peace From Peaceableness,	789
Monkey's Picking Cotton,	639	Peace in Norway and Sweden,	79
Monks, The, in the Philippines,	18	Peace Society, Annual Meeting,	973
Monument for Flushing, A,	993	Peace, The Coming Day of,	301
Monument to Indians,	782	Peace Work in Boston,	297
Moral Teaching, Survival of,	498	Pelham, M. M. Centennial,	850
Morley's, John, Views,	396	Pennsylvania Experiment Station, Notes from the,	656
Mother-Made Man, A,	281	Penn's, William, Plan for Peace,	506
Mothers—and Fathers,	147	Penr, William, and Robert Louis Stevenson,	695
Mt. Pleasant School, Appeal from,	358	People in Their Own Homes,	246
Mt. Pleasant "Shelter," Stories from,	817	Perseverance Necessary,	127
Month Names, Unsuitable,	649
Munro, Abby D., Letter from,

Personal and Other Notes, 75, 94, 115, 174, 197, 212, 237, 253, 276, 295, 314, 333, 356, 372, 394, 416, 453, 516, 555, 594, 636, 655, 668, 685, 733, 748, 766, 875, 895, 912, 935, 973, 995		If We But Knew,	705
Peter the Great and the Friends,	204	If We Knew,	455
Peter the Great in Friends' Meeting,	38	I Wonder,	461
Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting Friends' Home,	793	Indian Summer, An,	437
Philadelphia Yearly Meeting,	381	Joy,	737
Philippine Crisis, The,	209, 252	June,	516
Philippine Policy, The,	307	Keeping Lent,	175
Philippine War, Scenes in the,	278	Land of Promise, The,	841
Philippines, Light on the,	158	Landor, Lines from,	769
Physiological Effect of Faith, The,	692	Larger Faith, The,	141
Plain Language, The,	204	Lark, the Waking of the,	668
Plain Language, The Influence of,	324	Letty's Globe,	719
Plain Speech, Significance of,	365	Life's Afterglow,	813
Play is Difficult,	613	Little Yellow Dog, The,	256
Plea for the Oppressed, A,	271	Loom of Life, The,	924
Plea for the Oppressed, Another,	308	Lowell, Lines from,	994
Pleasant Memories,	267	Memoriam, In,	15, 797
Plow or Sword?	3	Memory, A,	655
Plumage of Birds,	598	Morning,	766
Plummer, Hannah, A Letter from,	431	Morning Greeting, A,	595
Plutocracy in England,	418	Mother Heart, The,	115
POETRY :		Mustard Seed, As a,	441
All's Well,	801	New Crusade, The,	394
Archer, The,	703	New Year Melody, A,	981
Autumn Leaves,	797	New Year's Prayer, A,	61
Baby Has Gone to School,	734	Nicholas II., To,	54
Ballad of Berry Brown, The,	95	Night, Day, Eternity,	437
Barnyard's Southerly Corner, The,	256	Nun's Retreat, The,	475
Be Not so Sad,	973	Obedied, If we,	766
Beyond the Sunset,	281	Old Meadow, In an,	537
Birth-day Song,	595	One Arisen, To,	581
Blenheim, The Battle of,	974	One I Miss, The,	781
Books and Freedom,	621	One Refuge, The,	81
Christmas,	961	Our Country,	32
Cinnamon Bun, The,	32	Our Example,	417
Conscience,	753	Overcoming,	668
Content,	201	Pathways of the Holy Land, The,	156
Dawn, At,	657	Peace,	556
Death Song of the Hemlock, The,	733	Peace, The Message of,	516, 896
Desire of Nations, The,	595	Picture of my Mother, A,	475
Devotional Poem,	561	Pity, Yet am I not for,	575
Don't Worry,	421	Powell, Aaron M.,	401
Earnest, In,	921	Powell, Aaron M., To,	541
England, To,	912	Prayer,	101, 301, 641
Fate,	381	Prayer, A,	1, 21, 749
Father,	76	Present, The,	521
Father, To My,	719	Priceless Wealth,	295
Fidelity,	121	Psalm, A,	241
First Spring Bird, The,	277	Put up the Sword,	936
Florence, At,	54	Rawnsley, Canon, To,	813
Flower by the Wall, The,	941	Regret,	341
Flowers Without Fruit,	689	Rest,	15
Frolic of the Winds, The,	156	Returning Home,	785
Gaining Wings,	394	Silent Voices, The,	601
God, Where is,	321	Silent Years, The,	455
Golden Age,	181	Skylark and the Poet, The,	643
Golden Wedding Poem,	76	Skylark, The,	703
Good-night,	615	Skylark, To a,	686, 719
Grandfather's Dream,	685	Sonnet: Life,	361, 556, 876
Grandma Knitting,	854	Something Unusual,	373
Grandmother's Answer,	537	Sparrow's Creed, The,	913
Great Truths,	616	Spring,	221
Growing Old,	134	Spring, The Approach of,	215
He Who for Love,	881	Starlings, The,	175
Human Brotherhood, The,	261	Stars, Address to the,	334
		Still Hour, The,	861
		Sunset,	54
		Surrender of Conscience, The,	797
		Susqueco,	615
		Susquehanna, The,	655

Temples Made With Hands,	75	Recipe for Ground Nut Cakes,	38
Temptation, Not Into,	75	Recent Books, Some,	368
Things that Abide,	636	Reed, Speaker, on French Justice,	817
Thought, A,	481	Reed's, Speaker, Opinion,	258
Two Taverns,	734	Regulars, The 100,000,	98
Two Voices,	901	Relation of "The Law" to "The Gospel," The,	101
Two Wings,	721	Religion and Public Spirit,	805
Vision of the Faithful, The,	673	Religion of the Southern Negroes,	883
Washington Monument, The,	134	Religious Comment, Current,	896
West Chester Centennial Ode,	772	Religious Life in Meetings,	743
What Doth it Matter, Brother?	821	"Remember the 'Maine,'"	38
Wheat-Sheaves,	161	Reports on Alaska,	199
Winner The, of the Race,	14	Repudiating the Declaration,	18
Worship,	495	Rest Necessary,	838
Poets are Practical,	598	Rhode Island Meeting, A,	815
Polygamy, The Revival of,	872	Rhode Island Preacher, An Old,	837
Porto Rico, Letter from,	391	Right Way Out, The,	855
Potato Day, A,	996	Roberts, George W., on
Poverty No Barrier to a College Education,	559	"The Hurricane in Porto Rico,"	751
Powell, Aaron M., A Tribute to,	604	Roberts, Isaac, on on "Charles Thompson on Militarism,"	112	"The President's Duty,"	232
In Memory of,	443	Roberts, John, Stories from,	4
on "Lessons from India,"	224	Robinson, Charles and Sarah, To,	115
Minute,	432	Rogers, Elizabeth A., on
Powell, Joseph, on		"The Philippine Crisis,"	210
"Experience in a Mid-Week Meeting,"	583	Roses, Hints on the Care of,	316
"Isolated Members,"	386	Rum Selling to Indians,	489
"Significance of Plain Speech,"	365	Rural England, The Beauty of,	538
"Week-Day Meeting,"	482	Ruskin, John, A Passage from,	757
"Worship and Religion,"	561	Ruskin to Visit a Turner Exhibition,	538
Power of Belief, The,	267	Russell, Henry R.,	73
Practical Forestry Teaching,	783	Russell, Henry R., at Springdale,	112
Pacification, A,	216	Russian Calendar, The,	817
Praising One's Self,	457	"Sabbath" and First-day in Jerusalem,	997
Prayer,	691	Sabbath Day, Remember the,	601
Present Problem, The,	54	St. Francis' Ideal,	458
President and the Conference, The,	190	Salvation Through Whittier's Poems,	619
President's Duty, The,	232	Samoan Shame, The,	376
Pride and Pride,	136	Sample Business, The,	377
Priest-Ridden Land, A,	579	Sandy Spring Settlers,	310
Prince Hilkoﬀ,	96	San Francisco Notes,	214
Privacy, The Invasion of,	608	Sanitary Value of High Forests,	34
Private Letters, Extracts from,	668, 686	Saunders', William, Doukhobor Visit,	870
Prohibition, A New View of,	585	Schofield, Martha, on in Kansas,	375, 398	"Schools 'on Paper' Only,"	251
in Maine,	761, 956, 974	Schofield School, Appeal from the,	436
Prosperity, Our Short Periods of,	539	Scottish Dialect, The,	398
Protestants Killing One Another,	857	Scott, The Land of,	634
Publications Received, 13, 53, 92, 237, 314, 356,		Scripture Lessons, First-day School,	8
372, 416, 436, 454, 536, 555, 765, 798, 832,		Searching the Mails,	377
873, 893, 933, 954		Sense of the Meeting, The,	964
Public Schools, Pennsylvania,	37	Sense Preferred to Sound,	877
Pullman, End of the Town of,	59	Service, The Joy of,	677
Quaker Toleration,	787	Schofield, Eliza H., on
Queen's Charity, A,	579	"A Visit Among the Shinnecock Hills,"	681
Queer Things Given to Queen Victoria,	479	Schofield School, From the,	952
Quiet Waters, In,	699, 716, 723	Scripture Lesson,	969
Quit the Business, Why He,	58	Scripture Lesson, A Practical,	946
"Race" Troubles, The Southern,	33	Scripture Lessons, First day School, 23, 44, 64,
Railway Train Incident, A,	877	65, 84, 104, 122, 123, 144, 163, 185, 202,
Rawson, E. B., on		222, 242, 263, 284, 303, 322, 349, 363, 384,
"Thou, Thee, You, Ye,"	809	405, 426, 446, 465, 483, 505, 525, 546, 565,
Rawson, Edward B., on		584, 604, 644, 659, 676, 694, 708, 725, 745,
"Where Do We Stand?"	232	754, 774, 786, 804, 827, 843, 863, 888, 904,
Rawso, Eliza F., on		922, 943, 986
"Samuel M. Janney," 341, 361, 382, 403, 423,		Shade Trees, New York's Need of,	137
444, 464, 481		Shaw's, W. Hudson, Lectures,	214
Real Indian, The,	56	Sherman on the Philippines,	519
		Shinnecock Hills, A Visit Among the,	681

Shoemaker, Margaret K., on		Timrod's Henry, Poems,	483
"Visits to Friends in Indiana,"	352	Tired Mothers,	835
Siberia, Life in,	157	Tolstoy's Count, Daughter,	258
Silence, The Empire of,	504	Townsend, Alice Nichols, on
Slavery,	58	"The Scope of Whittier's Bible References,"	61
Smedley, Anna P., on		Training Children,	37
"Friends of this Century,"	542, 564	Traits of the City Poor,	176
Smith, Ely J., on		Transvaal Republic, The, An English Statement,	669
"The Deserted House,"	782	Transvaal War, The,	945
Smith, Henrietta Stewart, on		Trolleys for Freight,	457
"Peter the Great and the Friends,"	204	Trolley in Germany, The,	671
Smith, Mary G., on		Troth, Jacob M., on
"The Gospel Ministry,"	41	"Samuel M. Janney and the Indians,"	476
Social Conditions in England,	156	Troubles Refine Our Grossness,	527
Social Restlessness in Italy,	720	Trueblood's Dr. Observations,
Social Science,	332	Trueblood, E. H. on
Sober Second Thought, The,	376	"Highlands Creek Meeting,"	241
Soldier's Report from Manila, A,	749	True Education,	728
Song in Worship,	50	True Success, What is,	964
Songs of Birds,	597	Truth is Mightier than the Sword,	724
South African Gold Fields, The,	783	Trusts in "Natural Gas Belt,"	137
South African War, The,	837, 933	Trusts, Over-Capitalized,	318
Southern California Climate,	930	Tsar's Manifesto, Support of the,	57
Southern California Scenes,	329	Turner Landscape, On Seeing a,	551
Southern California Trees,	257	Turn on the Dark,	602
Southern France, Friends in,	286	Two Voices from the Past,	187
Southern Quarterly Meeting and its Membership,	963	Tyson, Dr. James, Letters from,	552
Spain, Conquered by,	118	"A Journey to Norway,"	611
Spanish Lasses in Cuba, The,	998	"At the North Cape,"	652
Spiritual Life, The,	865	"Returning South,"	683
Stood his Ground,	767	"The Coast of Norway,"	665
Stanton, Anna M., on		"The Midnight Sun,"	633
"A Virginia School,"	233
Statton, Edwin M.,	282	Underground Railroad, The,	141
State Conference of Religion,	397	Underwood, Isaac, on
Statistics from Baltimore,	968	"Another View,"	253
Statistics, Some Vital,	6	Unique Post Office, A,	703
Stephen, Caroline E., on		University Extension Lectures,	854
"Church or Meeting,"	982	Unseen, Influence of the,	969
Stine, Wilbur M., on		Useless Risks, Folly of,	67
"The Lord's Prayer; Its Universality,"	562
Sting of it, The,	296	Vacation Days in England,	867
Successful Life, A,	501	Vaccination, Value of,	38
Sun and Stars as Time Keepers,	916	Vermont's Abandoned Farms,	39
"Sunday" Newspapers,	559	Victoria's Eightieth Birthday,	437
Sun Dies Out, When the,	335	View Thirty five Years Ago, A,	23
Supreme Issue, The,	278	Village Scenes near Metz, 1870,	987
Surviving Industries of Old-Times,	218	Violence, Deeds of,	511
Swarthmore Commencement, Address at,	484, 496	Virginia Friend, From A,	155
"Swarthmore Idylls,"	903	Virginia School, A,	233
Sympathy for Our Superiors,	693	Visits to Friends in Indiana,	352
		Vore, Wm. H. on
Tallack's, William, Views,	176	"The Philippine Crisis,"	209, 307
Tatum, John: A Memorial,	641
Taxes on Charitable Bequests,	795	"Warder School," The, in Amsterdam,	7
Tax "Expansion,"	19	War and Irrigation,	977
Teachers, Too Many,	378	War and Peace Notes,	138
Teachers' Salaries in Philadelphia,	897	"War Course," A, at Harvard,	118
Tea Inspection, United States,	767	War Influence,	9
Telegraphing Without Wires,	458	The Vampire of,	165
Temperance, An Important Work on,	583	The Waste of,	816
Temperance Speeches,	577	For What is the,	498
Testimony Against War, Bearing,	952	Warmth of Living Rooms,	958
The Cyprus Doukhobors,	328	Washington's House in New York,	799
Things to Learn,	86	Wastefulness,	969
Things to Remember,	395	Watering Plants,	498
Thompson, Charles, on		Water Your Horses Often,	519
" Militarism,"	112	Webster's, Daniel, Oratory,	558
Thoughts for the Time,	993	Week Day Meetings,	482
Thou, Thee, You, Ye,	809	Wesley's, John, Plain Living,	47
Time to Speak, A,	291

INDEX

Westtown Centennial, The,	427, 471	Women and Conservatism,	137
Wharton, Joseph, "Address at Swarthmore College,"	484	and Municipal Taxes,	118
What Kind?	118	in the Gospel Ministry,	523
Wheat, The Price of,	914	Received at Windsor Castle,	557
Where Do We Stand?	232	Speakers, Three,	957
White and Black in South Africa,	799	Women's Degrees in Germany,	767
White, Andrew D., on		Womens' School Vote,	396
"The New Arbitration System,"	755	Women Workers Displacing Children,	598
The Peace Conference,	659	Wordsworth and Others, Memories of,	631
"Control in the Philippines,"	857	that is wanted, A,	916
White, Dr., and the Arbitration System,	637	Working Women and the Ballot,	177
White Men in the Tropics,	477	Worship and Ministry,	583, 657
Whites and Blacks in the South,	797	and Religion,	561
"White Slave" Congress, Remarks at,	566	Worth, Herbert P., on
Whitson, Mary H., on		"Are Friends too Self-Centered?"	506
"Child Development,"	262, 283	Worthy Friends of the Nineteenth Century, 343, 361,
Whittier Poem, A,	51	382, 403, 423, 444, 464, 481
Whittier's Bible References, The Scope of,	61	Wounds in Trees, Covering,	817
Perfect Lines,	198	"Yankee," The Name,	579
Wigham, Eliza, of Edinburgh,	947	Yarnall's, Peter, Acknowledgment,	246
Wilson, Isaac, Letters from, 11, 28, 49, 70, 89, 111,		Yarnall, Peter, The Story of, 121, 142, 161, 182, 201
130, 146, 168, 191, 209, 231, 951, 967, 990		Yearly Meeting Committee Reports,	409
Wireless Telegrapher, The,	995	New York, 421, 441, 455, 461
Woods in Winter, The,	25	Philadelphia,	401
Woolman, John,	563	Young Friends and the Christian Ministry,	543
Woolsey, Prof., on the Treaty,	17	Y. F. A. Building, Philadelphia,	955
Woman Suffrage and Prize-Fighting,	688	"Zero Weather,"	138

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 7. 1899.

Volume LVI.
Number 1.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

I.

I WISH Friends generally would read Friends' books much more than I fear many do. I grieve in the secret of my heart when I go into a Friend's house, and see piles of books on the centre table, and I cannot find a Friends' book among them.

RACHEL HICKS.

From her Memoirs, a letter written in 1872.

A PRAYER.

I ASK not wealth, but power to take
And use the things I have aright ;
Not years but wisdom that shall make
My life a profit and delight.

I ask not that for me, the plan
Of good and ill be set aside ;
But that the common lot of man
Be nobly borne, and glorified.

I know I may not always keep
My steps in places green and sweet,
Nor find the pathway of the deep
A path of safety for my feet ;

But pray that when the tempest's breath
Shall fiercely sweep my way about,
I make not shipwreck of my faith
In the unbottomed sea of doubt ;

And that, though it be mine to know
How hard the stoniest pillow seems,
Good angels still may come and go,
About the places of my dreams.

—Phæbe Cary.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

EDUCATION AND MORAL REFORM.

By a thorough and systematic course of instruction, from the kindergarten to the university, ample provision has been made for the cultivation and development of the intellectual faculties. In this respect at least, our present system of education appears to be very complete.

But what provision has been made for moral and spiritual development ; is that equally thorough and systematic ?

Josiah Strong, in his recently published work entitled "The Twentieth Century City," says : " There should be between the physical, mental, and moral, a parity of growth. If the child grows in body and not in mind, it becomes an idiot. If he develops physically and intellectually, but not morally, he becomes a criminal."

That the criminal classes in this country are largely the result of our failure to maintain this parity of growth, by education, there can be no doubt.

Nicholas Murray Butler, Professor of Philosophy and Education of Columbia University, in an address on Education, says : " The growing tendency towards what is known as the separation of Church and State, but what is more accurately described as the independence of man's political and religious relationship, and concurrently the development of a public educational conscience, which has led the State to take upon itself a large share of the responsibility for education, have brought about the practical exclusion of the religious element from public education, especially in France and the United States. The result of this condition of affairs is that religious teaching is rapidly passing out of education entirely ; and the familiarity with the English Bible, as the greatest classic of our tongue, which every cultivated man owes it to himself to possess, is becoming a thing of the past. Yet the religious element may not be permitted to pass wholly out of education, unless we are to cripple it, and render it hopelessly incomplete."

Jacob Gould Schurman, President of Cornell University, in his recent work entitled, " Agnosticism and Religion," uses similar language. He says : " In this age of brilliant scientific achievement, issuing in manifold conveniences and luxuries, I fear we have all been seduced into worshipping the golden calf of Intellectualism. . . Darwin observed in his own case an atrophy of the poetic and æsthetic sensibilities, and readers of his life feel that his religious faith suffered decay from the same cause. . . It was his failure to comprehend the depths and riches of the human spirit, whose logical operations alone concerned him as a scientist, that led Huxley to the shrine of Intellectualism, whose creed, however fruitful in science, becomes, if applied beyond the domain of science, a desecration and a blight to the whole spiritual and active life of humanity."

When we consider that these are not hastily uttered sentiments, but the deliberate convictions of two of our most distinguished educators, the gravity of the situation becomes apparent.

How then, is this " desecration and blight to the whole spiritual and active life of humanity " to be averted ? There appears to be only one way, and that is by introducing into our system of education, a balancing and complementary element, in the form of religious instruction. Experience has proved that without the aid of such instruction, Christianity is unable to cope successfully with the moral evils which threaten to overwhelm us. Care should be taken, however, that all narrow or sectarian teaching be carefully excluded. The ten commandments, broadly interpreted, from a Christian standpoint, and the fundamental truths of Christianity should be taught. Above all, the character of Jesus Christ in its simplicity and matchless beauty, as illustrated by his life and example, and by the life and example of his apostles, and of other great and good men who have lived and suffered for the cause of truth, should have a prominent place.

It is difficult to overestimate the importance of example and illustration in teaching, whether secular or religious. Our teaching as well as preaching has been too abstract in the past. In this respect we seem to have followed the lead of the Greek philosophers, rather than the example of Jesus, who taught chiefly by parables.

Appropriate and apt illustrations fasten themselves upon the mind, and we remember them long after truth in an abstract form is forgotten. Who that has heard them can ever forget the parables of the Prodigal Son, the Good Samaritan, or the Ten Virgins and the lessons they inculcate? "To try to teach people how to live," says Froude, "without giving them examples, is like teaching to draw by the rules of perspective and of light and shade, without designs, in which to study the effects; or to write verses by the laws of rhyme and metre, without song or poem in which rhyme or metre is exhibited."

But important as this is, it is not all. The child should be instructed not only by precept and example, but he should be taught to look within, to study his own mind, and especially to respect and reverence the monitions of the inward monitor.

Another influence which might profitably be used for the cultivation and development of the child's spiritual faculties is art. There are instances, rare though they be, in which the productions of the artist's pencil are conceived in so reverent a spirit as to be very valuable for this purpose. Such an instance is presented in the works of the French painter James J. Tissot, now on exhibition in this country. These paintings represent the principal events in the life of Jesus, as recorded in the New Testament, and many of them are worthy to be engraved and hung in our homes and halls of learning. They are especially valuable at the present time, as they enable the mind to conceive more vividly events illustrative of the life and character of Jesus, which a passing phase of literary criticism tends to invest with a legendary character.

That there is an incongruity between the religious teachings I have thus briefly alluded to, and that of the ancient classics, it is vain to deny. This fact is too self-evident to require proof, and yet a full and clear comprehension of the truth in regard to this is highly important. That eminent statesman and philanthropist, Charles Sumner, writing on this subject, says: "The Classics possess a peculiar charm as the models, I might almost say the masters, of composition and thought in all ages. In the contemplation of these august teachers of mankind we are filled with conflicting emotions. They are the early voice of the world, better remembered than all the intermediate words that have been uttered, as the language of childhood haunts us when the impressions of later years are effaced from the mind. But they present with unwelcome frequency the tokens of the world's childhood, before passion had yielded to the sway of reason and the affections. They want the higher charm of purity, of righteousness, of elevated sentiments, of love to God and man. . . . For eighteen hundred years, the spirit of these writers has been engaged in constant contest with the Sermon on the Mount, and with those two sublime commandments on which hang all the law and the prophets. The strife is still pending. Heathenism, which has possessed itself of such syren forms, is not yet exorcised. It tempts the young, controls the affairs of active life, and haunts the meditations of age."

Jonathan Dymond, in his Essays on the Principles of Morality (a standard work in the Society of Friends) uses similar language. He says, "The mode in which the writings of the Greek and Latin authors operate is not an ordinary mode. We do not approach them as we approach an ordinary book, but with a sort of habitual admiration, which makes their influence, whatever be its nature, peculiarly strong. . . . They are Pagan books for Christian children. They neither inculcate Christianity, nor Christian dispositions, nor the love of Christianity. But their tendency is not negative merely. They do inculcate that which is adverse to Christianity and Christian dispositions. . . . Propositions have been made to supply young persons with selected ancient authors, or perhaps with editions in which exceptionable passages are expunged. I do not believe this will avail. It is not, I think, the broad indecencies of Ovid, nor any other insulated class of descriptions, that effects the great mischief; it is the pervading spirit of the whole—a spirit and tenor from which Christianity is not only excluded, but which is actually and greatly adverse to Christianity."

In view of these facts the advantages of a scientific over a classical course of study is becoming more and more apparent.

That there would be much opposition to the introduction of religious teaching into our schools there can be no doubt. Conservatism, sectarianism, and materialism would be likely to unite in opposition to such a course. And yet what are all the obstacles that can be presented when compared with those which confronted the early Christian Church? What are they in comparison to those over which Martin Luther triumphed and which rendered his name illustrious? In a good cause no obstacle is insurmountable.

H. B. HALLOCK.

Brooklyn, N. Y.

PLOW OR SWORD?

From the address, by A. B. Farquhar, of York, Pa., at the Convention of Agricultural Implement Manufacturers, Philadelphia, in Tenth month, 1898. He was replying to the sentiment, "The Plowshares of Peace." (See part of this address in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, Eleventh month 19, 1898).

THE Book of Isaiah is full, indeed, of wrath and wailing. We see the present calamities of the house of Jacob and the coming calamities of Damascus and Assyria, the isles and all the enemies of the chosen people, hanging all over it, like a dense cloud, the drear funereal blackness relieved only by lightning flashes from Heaven's throne, hurling vengeance for their luxury, riot, and dissipation, vengeance for their faithlessness to Jehovah, upon hapless multitudes.

But through these baleful clouds, and apart from these terrible flashes, are here and there to be seen some gleams of celestial radiance, of the bright sky that is to follow the gloom and the storm. We see that the prophet's true delight is less in the bloody triumph to which he looks in some passages, or in the exultation of gluttony which runs through some others, than in such visions as these :

"And the wolf shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid ; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together ; and a little child shall lead them. . . . They shall not hurt nor destroy in all my holy mountain ; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea."

Wrathful as Jehovah often appears, in the sixty-six chapters of this book, he yet "shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs in his arm, and carry them in his bosom." And, again, "Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy : I shall dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite ones. For I will not contend forever, neither will I be always wroth." Here we are told "how beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of Him that bringeth good tidings, that publisheth peace," and promised that "violence shall no more be heard in thy land, desolation nor destruction within thy borders." Here, also, we find what kind of man will escape the perils encompassing his brethren : "He that walketh righteously, and speaketh uprightly ; he that despiseth the gain of oppressions, that shaketh his hands from holding of bribes, that stoppeth his ears from hearing of blood, and shutteth his eyes from looking upon evil ; he shall dwell on high ; his place of defence shall be the munitions of rocks." And here we meet the first utterance of that glorious prediction which afterward adorns the Book of Micah :

"Out of Zion shall go forth the law, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And he shall judge between many peoples, and shall reprove strong nations afar off ; and they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning hooks ; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. But they shall sit every man under his vine and under his fig tree ; and none shall make them afraid ; for the mouth of the Lord of hosts hath spoken it."

It is not to the majesty, or ineffable beauty of form, or purity and sincerity, of these passages, that I would now ask your attention, but to the point that they are not poetry only ; they are practical indications of what is possible, and what may be made actual. Is a consummation such as the prophet sets before us worth having ? If so, then it is worth bringing about. If worth having at any time, it is worth having now. This prophecy is not applied to "the latter days," because it is unsuitable for these days, but because that will then be a certainty which is now but a possibility. Yet it does not indicate a state of things that will bring itself to pass by its own force and transcendent merit, but something that must be brought to pass by the work of men—by you and by me—by all who are willing to labor for light rather than darkness. Difficult I find it to repress impatience with those who carelessly cast aside the "millennial prophecies" as though they related only to some Jerusalem of remote futurity, and were without bearing on the conduct of men of muscle and men of mind in America in 1898. We must work for these blessings ourselves, with our mind and muscle ; must see in them not only beauty but duty.

Shall our nation to-day beat its swords into plowshares, attentive to the teaching of my text ? How blind are they who fail to find in that very course the essence of practical wisdom ! We boast in these days of our strength ; but what, pray, has given us that strength, sword or plowshare ? Not only are our triumphs in arms the direct product of capital, which the plow has helped us mightily to store, and which a frequent resort to the sword would have scattered, but the union of hearts and hands that has blessed us at home, and our freedom from all apprehension of attacks from banded enemies abroad, are results that flow straight and true from the general consciousness that we are a peaceful people. If we see in the plow some thing more than merely the labor of the husbandman, regarding it at the same time as an embodiment of mechanical contrivance—a type of mental power applied to material purposes—we may look upon the perfection to which American inventive talent has now brought that venerable implement as a manifestation of that true eye and exact calculation which, in "the man behind the guns," brought to nought the unquenchable courage and desperate daring of the Spaniard before Manila and Santiago. Whatever may be thought of the old saying that we are to win peace by being prepared for war, it is altogether true that even our victories in arms are won for us by diligently following the pursuits of peace. We gather strength by storing, not by wasting—by building, not by burning barns and factories and cities. The sword desolates, the plowshare cultivates and improves. War is destructive, peace is constructive. The sword wastes, the plowshare enriches. War is barbarous, peace is Christian. The plowshare is a symbol of that heavenly promise that seedtime and harvest shall not fail, while the most dazzling exploits of the sword only serve to show that the paths of glory lead but to the grave.

The willingness of patriotic Americans to accept the dread arbitrament of war, a few months ago, in an international disagreement that seemed to have gone too far to be settled otherwise, came only because they thought they saw behind the brutish monster a white-robed angel of mercy. The bloody blade of battle seemed but the surgeon's knife, which alone could remove forever the cancer of Spanish authority and maladministration on this Western Hemisphere. From this belief followed their rejoicing in the extinction of Spanish naval power and the surrender of Spanish fortresses. But such rejoicing is only justified when victories are considered as a means, never as an end—when they are looked upon as steps to an early, honorable, and lasting peace, and when the whole country is content with securing the result for which the war was undertaken. Then only is it right to rejoice over victories. If they serve to kindle or strengthen a martial spirit throughout our land, and to stimulate a desire on the part of our people to conquer and subjugate other peoples, then true lovers of their country must say as was said of old, "A few more such victories and we are lost."

The loud-mouthed jingo in the land is not more fully convinced of and impressed by the greatness of America than I am, and it is the dearest wish of my life that this may be preserved and increased. But let us pause and reflect upon what constitutes it. Such benefit as wars have ever brought us has come in each case from the destruction of a hampering evil and not as a direct positive effect of military strife. We could not have become a nation at all except for the War of Independence, since it was essential that the fetters laid upon us should be broken once and for all; and while the blighting curse of human slavery and the spirit of secession darkened our future and stained our fair fame, it was impossible for us to fulfil our proper mission, so that the Civil War was necessary also. Both of these wars delivered us from bondage and wrong and they in that way helped to make us great. The decision of the jingo is, in effect, that the revolution and the union struggle were glorious; therefore war is glorious. Washington and Lincoln were precious, hence military spirit is precious. But the thought occurs, What would have become of those heroes if they had acted from motives of conquest or military fame? If Washington had wanted to fight England for glory, or if it could have been proved that Lincoln sought to wage the Union war! What poison and ruin to their glory in the very suggestion! Honor so sought is only dishonor.

Only dire necessity, after the exhaustion of every effort to prevent, can become an excuse for war. That any good comes out of it is only from the fact that God rules, who alone can bring good out of evil. War is man's utmost effort to defy and dethrone him, and the best that can be said for it is that it fails of this. Did all the heroism of war ever equal that of the early Christian martyrs at the stake and in the arena, or even now of the engineer holding steadfast to his perilous post, the miner cheering his mates on to escape while suffocating himself, the fireman risking life and limb to rescue others, or the captain freezing on his bridge or going down with his ship while saving his passengers? All these are not urged on by their own boiling passions, but by the simple call of duty. Our country's greatness is not due to military power, but rather is its military power due to its solid greatness in other ways. Our little army of 25,000 men, gallantly as it has served as a sufficient police force for a nation of 75,000,000 people scattered over 3,000,000 square miles, can hardly be credited with the vast increase of power, wealth, and resources this country has enjoyed in the past thirty years. Not the sword and war, but the plowshare and peace have made us the greatest nation on earth.

A MAN is rich in proportion to the number of things which he can afford to let alone.—Thoreau.

STORIES FROM JOHN ROBERTS.

This is a continuation of the conversations of John Roberts, the English Friend, with the Bishop of Gloucester. See the INTELLIGENCER of Eleventh month 5, and Twelfth month 3, 1898.

BISHOP. "John, I thought you dealt very hardly with me to-day, before so many gentlemen, in telling me I came to your house in a Judas-like manner, to betray you hither to send you to prison. For, if I had not done what I did, people would have said I was a encourager of the Quakers."

J. R. "What if they had? That would have been no discredit to thee."

Bishop. "Come, John, now I will burn your mittimus before your face; and now, Mr. Barnett, I have a mind to ask John some questions. John will tell us anything. I have heard Mr. Bull tell strange things of you, John. As, that if anything was lost, you could tell, as well as any cunning man of them all, where to find it. He would have persuaded me to such things as I could not believe of you; but I desire to hear it from your own mouth. 'Twas about a parcel of cows which a poor man in your neighborhood had lost, and could by no means hear of them till he applied himself to you."

J. R. "If thou please to hear me, I will endeavor to tell thee the plain, naked truth of that story as it really was."

Bishop. "Pray do; I shall believe you."

J. R. "There was a poor man (one of my neighbors), who had a wife and six children, and the chief men of the parish permitted him to keep six or seven milch cows on the wast; and his children attended them on lanes and commons; and their milk was a very great help to him in his family, which otherwise must have become chargeable to the parish. And in a very stormy night, after they were milked, they were left in the yard as usual, but in the morning could not be found. Then he and his sons went several ways and sought them with diligence to no purpose; and after they had been lost four days, the poor man's wife came to me in a very sorrowful manner, wringing her hands, saying, 'Ah, Lord! Mr. Hayward, we are undone. My husband and I must go a begging in our old age, for we have lost all our cows, four days ago, and my husband and sons have been round the country, and can hear nothing of them. I will down on my bare knees if you stand our friend.'

"I desired her not to be in such an agony, and told her she should not down on her knees to me, but I would gladly help her in what I could. 'I know,' said she, 'you are a good man, and God will hear your prayers.' 'I desire thee to be still and quiet in thy mind,' said I. 'Perhaps thy husband or sons may hear of them to-day. But if they do not, let thy husband get a fresh horse, and come to me to-morrow morning, as soon as he will, and I think, if it please God, to go along with him to seek them.'

"At which the woman seemed transported with joy, and said, 'then we shall have our cows again.'

"Her faith being so strong brought the greater exercise on me, with strong cries to the Lord, that he would be pleased to make me instrumental in his hand for the help of the poor family. And in the morning early, one knocking earnestly at the door, my eldest son John asked who was there. "'Tis I, Master John," answered one of the old man's sons, 'your father told my mother he would take his horse and go with my father to see if they could find the cows, and I desire you to acquaint your father that I am here.' 'Tis hardly day yet,' said my son. 'Twill soon be day,' answered the young man.

"My son acquainted me, I arose and called my man to get my horse ready. And, soon after, came the old man, and told me where he and his sons had been and of their ill success. 'In the name of God, Master Hayward, which way shall we go to seek them?' said he. I, being deeply concerned in my mind, was not forward to answer him. But when the second and third time he said as before, I answered him thus: 'In the name of God I would go to seek them, and,' said I (before I was well aware), 'we will go to Malmesbury, and in Malmesbury horse fair there we shall have them.'

"When I had spoken these words I was much troubled, lest they should not prove true. When we had taken our breakfast, we set out for Malmesbury, and when we came near the town, riding up a dirty lane, I said to the man, 'look here on the ground. I believe thou mayest track thy own cattle up this lane before thee.' 'You make my heart leap!' said the old man. It being early in the morning, the first man we saw thereabouts had a fork and fothering (foddering) cord on his shoulder, going, as I supposed, to fother his cattle. I asked him if he had lately seen any stray milch cows thereabouts, 'for,' said I, 'here is a neighbor of mine has lost some.' 'What manner of cattle are they?' said the stranger. The old man described the marks and the number of them. 'There are such a parcel of cows,' said the stranger, 'stand chewing their cuds in the place where our horse fair is usually kept. They may be the cattle you speak of, for what I know, although I did not take much notice of them, thinking they might belong to some of my neighbors.' When we came there we found the cows; and the old man, seeing them, knew them to be his own, and was transported with joy beyond measure; insomuch that I was really ashamed of his carriage; for he fell a hollowing, and took his cloth mounteer cap off his head, and threw it up several times into the air, which raised the people out of their beds to know what was the matter. 'Oh!' said he, 'I had lost my cows four or five days ago, and thought I should never see them again, and this honest neighbor of mine told me this morning, by his own fireside, nine miles off, that I should have them here; and here I have them!'—and up goes his mounteer cap again. I begged the poor man to be quiet, and take his cows and be thankful; as indeed I then was, being reverently bowed in my spirit before the Lord, in that he was pleased to put his word of truth in my mouth. And the man drove his cows home, to the great joy of his family."

Bishop. "Well, but this is not all of this kind that Mr. Bull has told me concerning you; for I remember another story concerning a parcel of sheep which one of your neighbors had lost, and you told him where they were."

J. R. "I find my neighbor Bull has done his endeavor to render me as odious to thee as is possible. But if thou please to hear me further, I will also relate to thee the truth of that story."

Bishop. "Do, John, I want to hear it."

J. R. "A neighbor of mine, one John Curtis (who was at the time a domestic servant to this George Bull) kept some sheep of his own; and it so fell out that he had lost his sheep some days; and seeing me, he desired me (knowing I went much abroad) if I should see them anywhere in my travels, to let him know it. It happened that on the morrow, as I was riding to my own fields, my dogs being with me, put up a hare; and I, seeing the dogs were likely to kill the hare, rode to save her, and by mere accident, I saw my neighbor Curtis's sheep in one corner of the field, in a thick briery place of the hedge, where they stood as secure as if they were in a pound; for they could not without help get out of the place, whither I suppose they were driven by the hounds some time before. When I came home I sent him word his sheep were in the Gassons (which is the name of the field). Now this Curtis being a servant to G. Bull, 'tis no wonder this should reach his ear; although it was no more than a common accident, yet I find he has endeavored to improve it to my disadvantage."

Bishop. "This is not all yet, John, for I remember one story more, which he has told me, and that was concerning a horse which a gentleman had lost; and he was directed to you, and you told him where he might find him; and he sought there and did find him."

J. R. "If I shall not tire thy patience, I will also acquaint thee how that was; although this is much like the story of the sheep."

Bishop. "No, 'twill not tire me. I would have you tell us this also, and then we have done with things of this kind."

J. R. "There was one Edward Simons, who came from London to see his parents, who lived at Siddington, and they put his horse to grass with their own in some fields which lay from their house beyond some grounds of mine, called Furzenleases, through which grounds they went with the horse. And when they went to fetch him from grass, they could not find him. And after he had been lost a considerable time and they had had him cried at several market towns, somebody (who 'tis likely might have heard of my being instrumental in helping the poor man to his cows, as stories of this kind seldom lose by carriage), directed Edward Simons to me.

"Accordingly, he came and told me he had lost his horse so long ago, and what means he had used to find him, which proved fruitless. I asked which way they had him to grass. He answered, 'Through the Furzenleases.' 'Then,' said I, 'tis very likely that the horse, being a stranger in the place, might endeavor to beat homeward and lose himself in these furzenleases, either those of mine, or some others of the same kind adjoining to mine; for,' said I, 'there are abundance of acres of ground, called by that name, which are so overgrown with furze bushes that a horse may lye concealed there many weeks and not be found. Therefore,' said I, 'the best advice I can give thee is to get a great deal of company and search those grounds as diligently as though you were beating for a hare. And if thou doest so, I am of the mind thou wilt find thy horse.' The man took my advice and did find him; and where is the cunning of all this? This is no more than their own reason might have directed them to, had they given themselves time to think."

THE OBSERVANCE OF CHRISTMAS.

A paper read by Joe Anna Ross at the Friends' First-day School, Park Avenue and Laurens Street, Baltimore.

DEAR CHILDREN, can you imagine a time in this happy free land of ours when Christmas was not a holiday? Less than two hundred and fifty years ago, when Puritanism was still at its height in Old and New England, laws were passed in both countries for the punishment of "anybody found observing Christmas Day by resting from labor, feasting, or in any other way." Those good sturdy people, the Puritans, disapproved of Christmas observance because they considered its celebration by church-going and feasting a relic of the "Popery," and the worldliness against which they so earnestly preached. And when we consider the origin of many of the Christmas customs of to-day we can perhaps understand why the Puritans disapproved imitation of these ceremonies, although we may sincerely regret their inability to find in these outward symbols those world-old spiritual truths which have been revealed in many different ways to the people of every age.

In the first place, the name Christmas is derived from "the Mass of Christ," a special mass celebrated on that day by the Roman Catholic Church. The Puritans were careful to use the term "Christ-tide," in order to avoid the word mass, but later ages have combined the two terms into Christmastide. For some time after the death of Jesus of Nazareth, "the Christ,"—or "Master," as he was called by his disciples,—the exact date for the celebration of his birth was unsettled. Some of the early Christians celebrated it the last of December, others during the first week in January. About the first half of the fourth century, however, Julius, "Bishop of Rome," fixed December 25 as the day for the celebration of Christmas. This date is coincided with the beginning of, "Yule-tide," when for twelve nights, from December 25 to January 6, the ancient Romans, Celts and Germans celebrated with great feasts, the turning of the sun's wheel during the winter solstice. About this time of the year, you know, the days which have been growing shorter since June begin to lengthen and give promise of spring and summer time when the earth is again filled with fruits and flowers. As an expression of their implicit faith in the power of the sun to bring back the harvest time, the heathen people used to burn huge logs of wood to the sun god and to hang artificial fruits and flowers on evergreen trees.

The early Christian missionaries, in order to convert their barbarian neighbors, invested Christmas time with all sorts of merry-making, and adopted the ancient custom of placing a green bush, gift-laden, at the door of each hut. The custom of decorating churches and houses with evergreens on Christmas eve, some people like to think is a fulfillment of the prophecy in Isaiah, lx., 13: "The glory of Lebanon shall come unto thee, the fir tree, the pine tree, and the box together, to beautify the place of my sanctuary." Dean Stanley, however, traces the origin of church decorations at Christmas to the Druid custom of suspending green boughs and holly about the houses and temples, in order that the wood nymphs and sylvan sprites might find shelter therein until spring time. At the end of the old year, the Druids used to gather mistletoe with great ceremony, and to distribute it among all the people at the beginning of the new year, as it was considered an antidote for poison, and a charm to bring prosperity.

In the early Catholic church, St. Nicholas was a patron saint, the especial friend of children. His festival was kept in Germany with games and ceremonies about December 6. As time went on, however, the celebration of St. Nicholas' Day and of Christmas became merged, until to-day dear old Father Christmas, St. Nicholas, Santa Claus, or Kris Kingle, as the children of England, Germany, and Holland variously personify the kindly spirit of Christmastide, influences many little hearts and hands to loving deeds for others. And so Christmas has come to mean for us a day when we exchange little gifts, as tokens of our love and our endeavor to make as many people happy as possible. Don't you think it seems very appropriate thus to celebrate the birthday of one who told little children to love one another, and that it is more blessed to give than to receive? Yet we must not forget that Christmas day is but a preparation for the glad new year, which is almost here, when we shall have not only one day for kind little acts of love that bring help and joy to others, but three hundred and sixty-five days during which the spirit of God may work within us for the ennobling of our own lives, and for the bringing of more sunshine to those around us.

SOME VITAL STATISTICS.

DURING the year just closed, the INTELLIGENCER published 88 notices of births, 88 notices of marriages, and 449 notices of deaths. Speaking generally, those related to members of the Society of Friends, though a part—probably a tenth, possibly a fifth—of the notices of decease were of non-members.

Comparing the publications of like notices in the INTELLIGENCER during the year 1897, the showing is this:

Year.	Births.	Marriages.	Deaths.
1897	67	70	430
1898	88	88	449

There was an increase, it will be seen, in all classes, the Births making the largest, relatively.

Of the 449 notices of deaths published in the INTELLIGENCER during the year 1897, seventy-one did not give the age of the person deceased,—an omission which we always regret. This left 378 in which the age was given. We have gone over these with some care, and our readers will be interested, we think, to see the ages attained by those whose departure was thus chronicled. There were 22 persons, nearly six per cent. of the whole, who had reached their ninetieth year, or had passed above it, the oldest being ninety-nine. There were 20 persons, over five per cent. of the whole, who were under the age of twenty years. The whole showing was as follows:

	Number.	Per cent.
Under the age of twenty,	20	5.29
20th year and upward,	9	2.38
30th "	7	1.85
40th "	16	4.23
50th "	21	5.55
60th "	55	14.56
70th "	110	29.10
80th "	118	31.22
90th "	22	5.82
Total,	378	100.

We have not attempted to note down separately the ages of all those in the list above, but estimating the averages in each class below ninety years at one-half, (i. e., those "under 20" as averaging 10, those between 20 and 30 as averaging 25, and so on), and counting the actual death year of those above ninety, we find the average of the whole 378 persons to have been as nearly as possible seventy years—69 years and nine-tenths is the exact figure.

LIST OF THOSE IN 90TH YEAR, AND UPWARD.

- 90, John Tyler, Sen., Greenwich, N. J., Second month 4.
 90, Barzillai F. Pitman, Philadelphia, First month 9.
 90, Jonathan Pugh, Eleventh month 22.
 91, Hannah D. Howland, Rochester, N. Y., Ninth month 5.
 91, Josiah Lippincott, Philadelphia, Second month 25.
 91, Henry Sherwood, Waynesville, Ohio, Fourth month 12.
 92, Ann P. Dukehart, Baltimore, Md., Fourth month 18.
 92, Gurdon T. Smith, Macedon Centre, N. Y., Ninth month 16.
 92, Hannah I. Thompson, West Chester, Pa., Twelfth month 9.
 92, Anna Frost Vail, Grandview-on-Hudson, Third month 5.
 93, Charles W. Allen, Carversville, Pa., First month 6.
 93, Mary L. Knight, Somerton, Pa., Fourth month 8.
 93, Matilda J. Palmer, Germantown, Pa., Seventh month 2.
 93, Sarah McMillan, Marshalltown, Ia., Eighth month 30.
 95, Silas J. Leedom, Norristown, Pa., Eighth month 10.
 95, Anna C. Williamson, Plainfield, N. J., Second month 1.
 95, Eliza Sharpless, Catawissa, Pa., Seventh month 7.
 95, Amy Middleton, Philadelphia, Fifth month 28.
 96, Mary Ann Dawson, Wilmington, Del., Seventh month 21.
 97, Ruth Dugdale, Mt. Pleasant, Ia., Ninth month 4.
 97, Ruth Cope, Cadiz, Ohio, Third month 28.
 98, Betty J. Reid, West Chester, Pa., Eleventh month 8.

The average of these twenty-two persons was within a fraction of ninety-three years. Eight of them were men, and fourteen were women. Of the eight who reached ninety-five and over, all but one were women.

GOD knows your need, and listens for the cry to come from your soul, which will draw forth his response. . . . O child, it is strange that you must suffer, and suffer, before the depths are stirred; and in them is God found.—Selected.

361

STAND and shine. Lift up thy face to the divine airs. Reflect the light. Perchance only this is required of thee. Prove thy willingness to serve, and that thy service is a labor of love, and broader opportunities for the more interior action of the spirit will open out to thee.—Trinities and Sanctities.

THE "WARDER SCHOOL" IN AMSTERDAM.

George Vaux, in The Friend, Philadelphia.

BETWEEN 1656 and the close of the seventeenth century fourteen meetings for worship, six monthly meetings, and one quarterly meeting, are said to have been established in Holland, though it is probable some of these may have been in Germany. The meetings for worship were mostly held both on First-days and in the middle of the week. It is said that many of the members ultimately became Mennonites, and in 1770 the Society was reduced so low in those parts that only one meeting remained which was held in Amsterdam. A member of this meeting named Paulus Kripner, who at one time resided at the Cape of Good Hope, and was there convinced of Friends' principles without any outward intervention, after being clerk of the meeting, and occupying other prominent positions, emigrated to Philadelphia and was married here. His grave-stone can be seen at Arch and Fourth streets burial-grounds.

From a very early period, with occasional intermissions London Yearly Meeting corresponded with Friends in Holland. The last communication from them appears to have been read in the yearly meeting in 1787.

London Friends for many years conducted a school in Amsterdam, with funds which came into their hands under rather remarkable circumstances. During the period of the American revolution a certain John Warder, a member of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting, a Philadelphian by birth, but living in London in consequence of his sympathy with the royalist cause, was part owner of a vessel called the Nancy, which sailed from London for New York in 1781, the latter city being then in the hands of the British. The other owners, unknown to Warder as he alleged, took out "letters of marque," and fitted out the Nancy with twelve guns as a privateer. In connection with another British vessel the Nancy on her voyage captured a Dutch East Indiaman. The latter vessel, sailing under the flag of a nation which was an ally of the Americans, was a lawful prize, and proved to be a capture of great value. Upon hearing of the occurrence Warder insured his interest in the prize for £2,000 sterling. On her voyage to London she was totally lost, and he received from the underwriters nearly that sum in cash. London Friends represented to Warder that it was not honest for him to keep the money, and that he was bound to pay it over to the persons who had owned the captured property. Various phases of the case were presented, which are not of sufficient interest to mention, during a period of nearly twenty years, till finally Warder placed the proceeds of his insurance, amounting to about £1,806 sterling, in the hands of Trustees in London, to be appropriated to reimbursing the owners of the prize goods, so far as they could be found. This was a work of much difficulty, extending over a period of almost twenty additional years, during which time the trustees paid to claimants out of the fund (which had greatly accumulated in their hands), in principal and interest nearly double the original sum, and there still remained unappropriated a larger amount than the original fund. Seven years more elapsed, and no other claimants appearing, it was deemed proper to appropriate the assets in hand to some charity in Holland.

Accordingly in 1824 an Infant School was established in Amsterdam, under charge of John Stephen Mollett of that place, which was successfully conducted for many years, and the present writer supposes it still is. At first the school was carried on in a rented building, which was subsequently purchased in 1829. For about thirty years the school was conducted in the same building. Afterwards a new school-house was built on the estate, a handsome structure, which is known as the Warder School-house. A photograph of this building lies before me as I write.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

NO. 3.—FIRST MONTH 15.

CREATION.

GOLDEN TEXT.

The heavens declare the glory of God
And the firmament sheweth his handiwork.

—Psalm xix., 1.

Scripture readings. { Genesis i.;
ii., 1-4.

Supplementary reading.—Genesis ii., 4-25.

A HISTORIAN of our period, wishing to write the history of a nation, would study and digest all records and all accessible information concerning it, and then from the fullness of his knowledge would write a connected account. The historian of the East pursues a different plan. Having collected his materials he proceeds to build them just as he finds them into the structure of his narrative. What slight connecting cement may be needed he supplies. His work is an aggregation, not a growth. So the final editor of the Hebrew Law has embedded into his account a vast amount of material much older than his own time. It is not difficult to detect many of these fragments, and it has been possible in many cases to form some approximate idea of the time and place of their origin. Several such cases will be noted in future lessons.

In the present lesson let us first notice the two distinct accounts of creation given in the first and second chapters of Genesis. That in the first chapter presents a very lofty conception of the Creator, and one which indicates a considerably advanced stage of religious ideas. God is a Creator. His fiat produces order from chaos, light from darkness, and sets on its way the earth and all that it contains. The second account presents a less exalted ideal of God. He is not so much the Creator as the Maker: he makes man out of the dust, animals from the earth, woman from the side of man. We are told by Hebrew scholars that the difference in thought and language is more striking in the original language than in our English version. The Hebrew word in chapter i means create, while that in chapter ii, translated "formed," is the same word used of a builder who makes a house. The writer of chapter i uses the word Elohim, which has been translated "God," while the writer of chapter ii uses the word Jahweh, translated "Lord God." This distinction may be traced through the greater part of the Pentateuch, and also in the book of Joshua, immediately following it. The recognition of these two writers whose works have been joined into a single record may serve to indicate the method by which at least two other writers are recognized as having supplied material for the Hebrew law. Two of these use the word "Elohim" for God, and two the word "Jahweh." The writer of the first chapter of Genesis, and much that follows, is usually indicated by the letter (P), as there is reason to believe that he was a Hebrew Priest. The writer of the second account of creation is indicated by the letter (J), this being the initial of his word for God. Again, the other writer who uses the word Elohim is symbolized by the letter (E), and the fourth of the principal authors by the letter (D), the writer of the book of Deuteronomy being thus distinguished from the others. Students of the oldest documents of the original language claim to find evidence of still other materials than those derived from the four especially distinguished. Some ancient fragments of songs and poems are noted, and others which it would not be worth while to consider here.

The best authorities consider that (J) and (E) wrote about 800 B. C., the former in Judah, the latter in Israel. The period of the writer of Deuteronomy was probably some two centuries later, though some incline to an earlier date. The writings known as the Priest's Code (P) including the first chapter of Genesis did not attain their present form until after the Exile, but doubtless contain material much older. These are the results of the study of careful and reverent scholars, most of them members of "evangelical" churches.

It has added much to the interest of the two ancient stories of creation that the parallel and probably related accounts of a neighboring people, also Semites, have been discovered and deciphered within a comparatively short time. Mention will be made hereafter of the Babylonians and of their relations with the Hebrews. It is sufficient for the present to say that both are of the great Semitic stock and spoke languages nearly allied. The libraries of the ancient Babylonians which have been unearthed in the form of multitudes of books made of baked clay contain many of their religious hymns and ancient traditions. Among those deciphered are several giving accounts of the creation. Prof. A. H. Sayce, of Queen's College, Oxford, says ("Higher Criticism and Monuments"): "The resemblances between the two accounts of creation (i. e., the Hebrew and Babylonian accounts) are too great to be purely accidental. They extend even to words." The seven-day period is Babylonian as well as Hebrew, and may date back to a possibly common ancestry. The word "Sab-bath" is itself Babylonian. But after noting the resemblances we find the differences even more striking. The Babylonian account is polytheistic throughout. It tells of wars among the gods, and abounds in trivial incidents of their contests. It lacks any deep note of religious feeling. How widely different when we turn to the account of the sons of Abraham. "In the beginning, God." God's presence pervades the whole account, and is its chief feature. "Without Him was not anything made." Questions of literal scientific accuracy become trivial when we are dealing with this grand hymn of creation. Men of deep religious feelings but with a false and misleading idea of inspiration have made efforts almost violent to reconcile the observed facts of geology with this majestic record. They have failed to realize that its writer does not aim to teach science and was ignorant of science; while its value consists in the fact that it does teach God and comes from those who deeply felt his presence. Even the account in the next chapter, which we must recognize as far inferior in its moral aspect to the other, is purely monotheistic, and attributes all things to the activity of the one God.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 3.—FIRST MONTH 15.

THE MARRIAGE AT CANA.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And his disciples believed on him.—

John, ii., 11.

Read from Gospel of John, Chapter ii., 1-11.

REVISED VERSION.

The eleven verses taken for this lesson deal simply with the one occurrence, the changing of the water contained in the six stone water pots into wine. This is the first of the "miracles" attributed to Jesus, the "beginning of his signs." It is added (verse 11), that having thus "manifested his glory," his disciples "believed on him."

It is not necessary to dwell upon the circumstance, with the view of proving the divine power of Jesus. Those around him, at Cana, in Galilee, in the day spoken of, were people who craved such evidence of his authority, but we recognize him on other grounds. Later, he sharply reproved the spirit that demanded miracles of him. He said (John 4: 48): "Except ye see signs and wonders ye will in no wise believe." And when "certain of the scribes and pharisees demanded a sign," he reproved them (Matthew 12: 39; 16: 4) by the declaration that it was "an evil and adulterous generation" that believed not without a sign.

Fuller light upon the subject is offered in the same chapter of John (verses 23-24) where it is said that "many believed on his name, beholding his signs which he did. But Jesus did not trust himself unto them, for that he knew all men." The adhesion of his disciples, it seems, depended too much on the exhibition of his "signs," for we see in the scripture of this lesson (verse 12) that apparently not because they had perceived his divine qualities, but because of the miracle at the marriage, they "believed on him."

The marriage at Cana probably took place on the third day after the conversation with Nathanael, of whom Jesus had said, "Behold an Israelite, indeed, in whom is no guile." We infer that Jesus and his Galilean friends had started for their homes, and having been invited to the marriage, had stopped at Cana, which was the native place of Nathanael.

Cana was an inconsiderable town, distant from Nazareth about six miles, and is spoken of as being in Galilee, to distinguish it from a town of the same name in the tribe of Ephraim, though the latter is spelled Kanah. Cana of Galilee was the native place of Nathanael, who, only a few days before, had become a disciple of Jesus. When the place was visited by W. M. Thomson ("The Land and the Book," Vol. II., page 305) there was not a habitable house within its limits; later writers say it is now under the government of a Turkish official, and has about 50 inhabitants.

A marriage among the people of Palestine was usually celebrated in the open air, and the festivities lasted seven days; on some occasions they were prolonged beyond that time. They were held at the home of the bride, and when they were over, the bridegroom conducted her, with much state and ceremony, to his own home, where they were met and welcomed by other friends. When the home-bringing was at night, these friends went out with lighted torches to meet them. It is to this custom that Jesus refers in the parable of the Ten Virgins (Matthew 25).

Referring to the words of Jesus concerning "signs," it may be said that the disciples who "believe on him" do it from their conviction of his divine authority. This is derived not from his ability to turn water into wine, but from the evidence that he was filled with the spirit of the Father. It was this that enabled him to do all things required of him, and this gave him the right and title to be known and loved as the "Captain of our Salvation," since the same struggle with the temptations of the earthly life must in greater or less degree be experienced by each disciple, and the mastery must be gained. As he became one with the Father, we will thus become one with him, and know of that unity which is the enduring bond with the Father and his Beloved Son. In his own earnest petition to the Father, when he knew that his hour had come, he had asked that this condition might be realized, not alone for those who were with him then, but for all who should in the succeeding ages believe on him through their word. (John 17: 20): "That they all may be one, even as thou, Father, art in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us."

THE most truly heroic thing may be the refusal to appear as a hero. To resist a temptation to make a display of energy, courage, or whatever is likely to show itself conspicuously in that which is visible heroism to the world, sometimes calls for the invisible employment of those very forces. It takes courage to be silent, and "strength to sit still." Restraint and self-control are in reality forms of high energy, physical and moral. At their best, they constitute a heroism as noble as it is secret and invisible.—Sunday School Times.

36

"It is the growing soul within the man

That makes the man grow.

Just as the fiery sap, the touch from God,

Careening through the tree, dilates the bark,

So life deepening within us deepens all."

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 7, 1899.

THE OLD AND THE NEW.

IN Athens, says the writer—or a subsequent editor—of the book of Acts, the people, citizens, and strangers, “spent their time in nothing else but either to tell or to hear some new thing.” It was the Athenian passion, this—to learn “something new.”

But the best things are those which are continual, not beginning with one day nor perishing with it, not ending in 1898, nor to be found for the first time in 1899. Paul says of Faith, Hope, and Love (or Charity) that “now abideth these three,” and it is this abiding, this continuing forever, which distinguishes them. Truth knows no passage of time, experiences no loss or decay, is ever fresh and new. Hope “springs eternal in the human heart,” renewed and reviving. It is thus not the things that are merely new, but those which are at once both new and old, that are most precious, and in the highest sense to be desired.

The law of life is like the rule of the voyager in the open sea. He passes by the lights upon the shore, and leaves them behind. These are beacons for the coast only, and they serve each its temporary use. The mariner that seeks the broad ocean looks, as night comes on, to the fixed and unsetting star. This is not new, but it will never be old. Its light descends upon him as in ages past. He knows its fixity, its certainty. There is in it no variableness, neither shadow cast by turning. By it he may safely direct his bark. It is not a new star he seeks, not a meteor, not some sudden and passing light, but the light fixed and known, tried and trustworthy.

The year we enter upon is but the to-day of yesterday. It comes to us as yesterday did, under the same law of being. In the year past men had their opportunity, as in time before. The beneficent system of the universe moved as its Maker had appointed. The seasons rolled. The harvests of the earth did not fail. Man enjoyed his planet in all its fullness. If then the year had its failures, its miseries, to whom but to man himself does the responsibility belong? If it had its crimes and horrors, who is to blame but him? If we must look back upon it sadly or pityingly, upon whom but the human instrumentalities who misused the opportunity divinely offered shall our pity rest? Old laws will hold in the new year. Truth will be true, and evil will be vile. Righteousness will remain the crown of individuals, and of nations, and sin their reproach. This is for 1899, as it was for 1898; as it has been, so it will be.

OUR friend Josiah W. Leeds, whose useful pen is seldom idle, writes to Herbert Welsh's City and State, objecting, and very justly, to the motive of Rudyard Kipling's “Truce of the Bear,” which, as he says, is intended to place the Czar's rescript “under the ban of suspicion,” and so serve the Powers of Darkness. But Josiah takes occasion, and it seems to us quite unnecessarily, to express warm appreciation of Kipling's work. We think his praises over strong. Of Kipling's vigor, his literary skill, his effective phrasing, in prose and in verse, there is no question. But to what purpose? His characteristic work is the laudation of force, of violent and unscrupulous force. As Edmund Gosse says, in the current North American Review, “his whole literary career is one unflagging appeal to the fighting instincts of the race.” Every one who has read after Kipling will recognize this as true. And so again, we ask, “to what purpose?” Considering the present conditions of the world, is he a poet of true note who stimulates to more fighting?

WE sent out to those First-day schools who asked for them slips of the special Lesson Leaves following the “International” Scripture selections. The lessons sent (Twelfth month 28), were five, being those for the present month only. Others will be sent in time to continue the course of study.

We again mention (1) that these are supplied without charge, by arrangement with the First-day School Conference, and (2) that they are intended simply for those schools that believe that they can do better work on the “International” line.

THERE are some admirable thoughts, well expressed, in the portion of the address of A. B. Farquhar that we print in this issue. He presents strongly the fact that the real strength of any country is built up by peaceful industry, and that those who make war are the consumers of this capital. They are literally dependent for their means of waste and destruction upon the toil of the workers. What folly in the workers to permit such a misuse of their product!

MARRIAGES.

HULL—CLOTHIER.—At the home of the bride's parents, Ballytore, Wynnewood, Pa., Twelfth month 27, 1898, under the care of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, William I. Hull, son of T. Burling and Mary D. Hull, of Baltimore, and Hannah H., daughter of Isaac H. and Mary C. Clothier.

LAFAYETTE—WELLS.—At the residence of the bride's mother, Twelfth month 28, 1898, under the care of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, Albert Marshall Lafayette, of Syracuse, New York, son of George G. and Delana Lafayette, of Brookville, Province of Ontario, and Reba Emma, daughter of Mary Emma Sleeper and the late Joseph Wells, of Philadelphia.

NASON—EVES.—By Friends' ceremony, at the home of the bride's mother, in Millville, Pa., Twelfth month 22, 1898, Hannah Blanche, daughter of Sarah E. and the late Chandler R. Eves, and George Mason of Millertown, all of Columbia county, Pa.

VENNEL—PETERSON.—At the residence of the bride's parents, Woodstown, N. J., Eleventh month 9, 1898, under the care of Pilesgrove Monthly Meeting, George E. Vennel, of Camden, N. J., son of George and Mary T. Vennel, and Florence, daughter of Charles L. and Sarah B. Peterson.

WASHBURN—MEKEEL.—At the home of the bride's mother, Amelia Mekeel, in Pleasantville, N. Y., Twelfth month 28, 1898, by Friends' ceremony, Howard R. Washburn, son of Joshua B. and Caroline Washburn, of Chappaqua, and S. Blanche Mekeel.

DEATHS.

BACON.—In Philadelphia, Twelfth month 26, 1898, Joseph Bacon, in his 88th year; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street.

Thus soon after his sister our valued friend has entered into rest. United in life they were not long separated; the shock was too great for one of his age, but he was ready for the change.

For many years he had a responsible position at the Bank of Northern Liberties, and throughout life he has been straightforward and correct, with good judgment and a clear perception. Even in his advanced years, he could decide more quickly and correctly than many who were younger.

He was liberal in his contributions for the good of the Society, and ready by loans or gifts to assist those needing a helping hand. This was done in a quiet, unostentatious manner, and many will have reason to lament his removal.

His father, David Bacon the younger, and James Martin, William Yardley, and David Jones, were four of the Trustees of the "North Meeting," on New street, and when it was sold, about 1838, received $4,500 from the Controllers of the Public Schools as our Friends' share; this sum, a few years later, was used in laying out Fair Hill burial ground. For many years Joseph has been one of the most active members of the committee on the Fair Hill ground. He was also Trustee of Green Street Meeting, and that at Girard Avenue. He was on very many other appointments of his monthly meeting. He and his sister Mary were generally at Fair Hill meeting in the afternoon, and did not feel excused on account of age from the attendance also of both morning meeting at Green Street, and evening meetings wherever held.

The faithfulness and loving spirit of these dear Friends will cause them to be long remembered, and may their example stimulate others to come forward to bear some of the burden which they have laid down! T.

BRADWAY.—On the 9th of Twelfth month, 1898, near Greenwich, Cumberland county, N. J., Jacob Bradway, aged 82 years; a member of Greenwich Monthly Meeting.

HAINES.—At the home of her son, Willis, in Webb City, Mo., Twelfth month 25, 1898, Eunice, widow of William Haines, in the 83d year of her age.

She was laid to rest by the side of her husband who preceded her several years, at Chanute, Kansas. She was a member of Prairie Grove Quarterly and Wapsinonoc Monthly Meeting of Friends.

HEACOCK.—At her home, in Benton, Pa., Twelfth month 25, 1898, after a few days' illness from pneumonia, Susan, wife of Samuel Heacock, in her 69th year; a valued member of the other body of Friends.

Interment at Millville, Pa.

JACOBS.—Twelfth month 31, 1898, Rebecca W., widow of Samuel W. Jacobs, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

She was a granddaughter of the late Isaac and Hannah O. Townsend, and a niece of Ann Wilson, author of "Familiar Letters."

Interment at Fair Hill. *

JOHN.—At Millville, Pa., Eleventh month 22, 1898, Watson I. John, in his 22d year, eldest son of J. Lemuel and S. Edith John; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Millville.

The removal of this young man is especially saddening. In attempting to jump on a moving car he missed his footing and was forced through a very narrow space as the car passed the platform. He was taken home at once, and died about one hour after receiving his injuries, being conscious all the while. He had just entered into partnership with his father, and gave promise of becoming a thorough, conscientious, business man.

His faithfulness in attending meeting, and his loyalty to the Society, are worthy of imitation by old and young.

"We live in deeds, not years." *

THOMAS.—Twelfth month 12, 1898, at Cherry Grove, Montgomery county, Maryland, Samuel P. Thomas, son of the late William and Martha Thomas, in the 83d year of his age; an elder of Sandy Spring Monthly Meeting.

His long and useful life was spent in the home where he was born, and it was characterized by a childlike simplicity and gentleness which endeared him to old and young. As he went about among men so he passed beyond—quietly and peacefully.

"Such men as he was never die!

Like stars that glitter in the sky—

O'er storms and clouds they still shine on,

Their glorious light is never gone."

UPDEGRAFF.—In Fresno, California, Twelfth month 12, 1898, Mary Updegraff Morris, in her ninety-second year.

She was born First month 27, 1807, in York, Pa., moved to Wheeling, when three months old, where she grew up and married, and spent most of her life. She was a member of Ohio Yearly Meeting. She spent several years of her later life in Chicago, Ill., where she was a faithful and beloved elder in Central Meeting of Friends. She retained her faculties until the last, and wrote interesting letters to her friends. She was genial and interested in affairs in general and especially in her beloved society. Just before her death she asked her daughter, A. M. Burns, to have a notice of her death sent to the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, so that her friends might know of it.

She enjoyed reading the INTELLIGENCER, especially while isolated from Friends' meetings. She was buried in Santa Barbara, California. She will be long and affectionately remembered by those who knew and loved her.

H. A. P.

HANNAH M. LEEKE.

In the INTELLIGENCER of last week I notice an inaccuracy in the account of Hannah M. Leeke.

She was the youngest daughter of Isaac and Thamsin (McPherson) Lupton. Her mother died when Hannah was a few months old. Her father married again, and died when Hannah was five years old. She was cared for by an uncle and aunt, John and Rebecca McPherson—and taught school at their home, two miles northwest of Waterford, Loudoun county, Virginia, in 1833-4. I, a little boy of seven, was one of her pupils. My recollection of her was kept pleasant by correspondence and some social intercourse during her later years.

I. S. R.

New Market, Md.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—II.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

OUR last letter left us on Fifth-day morning (Twelfth month 22), at Millville, Pa., just before time for the convening of the first session of the half yearly meeting which met at 10 a. m., and was acknowledged a favored meeting. The routine of business was transacted and the answers to the several questions read, showing but few deficiencies in the fulfilment of their requirements.

We dined at Chandlee Eves's whom we were pleased to find much improved in health since our last visit, a year ago. After a pleasant mingling with the family and others that were there, we spent the evening at the home of Rachel Eves and her sisters, and then went to our lodging at the home of William Masters.

Sixth-day morning, we met a large gathering of Friends and others again, and a favored meeting was enjoyed, after which we rested, and enjoyed the social nature at Joseph S. Eves's until near night, when we went for the evening to the much saddened home of Lemuel John, whose eldest son, (a worthy young man of twenty-one years), was so recently killed at the railroad near by, and the shock seemed almost irreconcilable. Words of comfort and encouragement seemed only feeble helps to cheer the sorrowing ones. Still we were grateful for the privilege of mingling with them in feelings of much love and sympathy.

Seventh-day was spent in making some calls, one of which was upon Uncle James Masters (as all call him) who, in his eighty-seventh year, is remarkably clear and bright in his memory of the pioneer experiences that the ancestry of this Friendly settlement endured, and my own ancestors being among them added to the interest of his account.

On First-day morning, about the meeting hour, we find ourselves in the company of a large and interesting gathering, and the fact realized that at that same hour Christian worshipers, under all names, were commemorating that great event of many centuries ago when (as the inference would be), a Christ that the world had not known before was born. We were impressed with the necessity of a personal acquaintance with that Christ whom he declared to be before Abraham. A most attentive and interested hearing was given to the Friendly presentation of Christ, the living Saviour, and satisfaction was expressed.

We dined at John Eves's, where we enjoyed a pleasant and restful visit, but left quite early to meet an engagement at Sarah Eves's, before the evening meeting, that was to convene at 7 o'clock. Although at first suggested as a parlor meeting, it was decided best to hold it at the meeting-house, in order to have sufficient room. The feeling of timidity that at first suppressed expression was to some extent overcome, and evidences of much enjoyment and appreciation of this and previous gatherings were given utterance to, and what might be called a farewell meeting closed under a deep sense of gratitude for the blessings enjoyed.

Second-day morning found us ready for our departure, and we bade our friends who had so hospitably entertained us farewell, and were soon wending our way among the hills to Watsonstown, where we changed cars, and after a day's ride, reached London Grove and met the usual welcome at the home of our esteemed friends Bennett and T. Walton, where we met our daughter Edith, and cousin from Swarthmore, which added very much to our enjoyment.

On Third-day afternoon we took train for Philadelphia, and soon found ourselves in the midst of many friends, who were going by special train to the home of Isaac H. Clothier, of Wynnewood, to attend the marriage of their daughter Hannah (with whom we have been so pleasantly acquainted) and Professor William I. Hull, of Swarthmore College. And we were once more impressed with the impressiveness of the marriage ceremony as held by Friends,—the profound silence, interspersed by appropriate remarks and prayerful aspirations for the faithful discharge of the newly-assumed obligations of life. We went by invitation to the home of Joseph Haines, of Swarthmore, where we met our daughter from Washington, and enjoyed with her their kind hospitality, going on Fourth-day to Yardley to meet and spend a couple of days with our son and wife, at the home of her mother, where with one-half of our family present, a very enjoyable time is spent, making some social calls in the time, but resting from any public service.

Chester, Pa., Twelfth month 31.

I. W.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

FISHING CREEK HALF-YEAR MEETING.

THE recurrence of a stated time brought about the assembling of Friends in the capacity of a Half-Year's Meeting at Millville, Pa. The first of the meetings included in the semi-annual gathering was held on Fourth-day, Twelfth month 21.

The countenances of those met together seemed to manifest no lack of the old-time interest, which indeed has deepened among many of the younger members, as evidenced by their activity in Society affairs. May such activity extend its effort and continue to seek its object in effective work for the well-being of community and meeting; may it draw its inspiration not merely from the principle of association, which in its place is all right, but also from a higher source, and so insure strength and permanence to everything that relates to the general good.

The silence of the meeting was broken by William U. John, who in a brief discourse called attention to need of a greater degree of spirituality among Friends. After the usual period of quiet, Friends occupied themselves in considering the business before the meeting.

Fifth-day morning. As the Friends took their accustomed seats in the meeting, they were gratified at seeing Isaac and Ruth Wilson among them. R. Anna Kester, in impressive language, began the ministerial labor of the day. She was followed by Isaac Wilson, who proceeded to enlarge upon subjects of the highest importance to man, and in his clear, logical manner made plain the practical truths of Christianity. The business of the meeting was then transacted in the spirit of forbearance and love.

Sixth-day. Isaac was much favored in the meeting to-day. The Scripture quotations, "Come unto me all ye that are weary and heavy-laden and I will give you rest," "Take my yoke upon you, for my yoke is easy, and my burden is light," were considered. They were presented in such a way as to concentrate the thought of the meeting upon them, and lead it along to fully comprehend each inference and application drawn from themes so fruitful in suggestion. The conclusion of the meeting was finally reached and Friends parted in a state of good feeling, showing a spirit of brotherly love.

G. J.

Bear Gap, Pa.

While it is hoped we do not place undue confidence in, or dependence upon outward ministry or instrumentalities, it is a pleasing feature to have visiting Friends remain over First-day, as did Isaac and Ruth Wilson at this time.

Quite a large company assembled at the regular hour for worship, some not members having driven four or five miles, all of whom must have endorsed most if not all the beautiful truths Isaac was favored to present from a consideration of the invitation, "Come and see." Do not be satisfied with hearing or reading about, standing back and looking from afar, but come and see that the Lord is good.

When a soul has been stirred and awakened to the new life, let it not be content to enjoy it alone, but invite and entreat others to come, see, and share the richness of the Father's love.

He invites no less lovingly, and the need of responsive hearts is no less urgent, now than ever to a practical application of universal good will and helpful activity.

An evening meeting of a social, religious character was held in the meeting-house, the object of which was to give any and all who might wish an opportunity for inquiry or expression upon such matters as pertain to the foundation of the higher life.

The attendance was good, several participated through vocal expression, and we believe the unworried offerings of the silent were no less acceptable to the Father's keeping.

The coming up of all ages to these various sessions, and the beautiful order attendant, are surely evidence that the Christ-spirit is alive and prompting to further attainments.

S. J. K.

Friends at Millville, Pa., were favored to have the presence and ministry of Watson Tomlinson at their meeting, Eleventh month 26.

SPEAKING of the increasing use of various kinds of coca wine, Modern Medicine says: "The active principles of coca wine are alcohol and cocain. Whatever other virtues the drugs possess, they certainly do not possess the power to give either health or strength. Both alcohol and cocain have the property of benumbing nerve sensibility, so that the wearied man, taking a dose of cocain wine, may be relieved of the sense of fatigue, just as he might be if he swallowed a dose of morphine or any one of a half dozen other drugs; but he is not rested. He simply does not notice that he is tired when he is tired."

ANDREW CARNEGIE earnestly condemns the use of bituminous coal in cities. He saw the chimney of a Fifth avenue residence vomiting forth black smoke, and said that if the people of New York permitted it, a thousand would follow it. Said he: "The Carnegie Hall property is not a paying one, and it was once suggested to me that several thousand dollars a year could be saved if I would allow the use of bituminous coal. Knowing the curse it is to Pittsburg, my reply was, 'Never!'"

AFTER nearly two years' investigation of the subject in all of its phases, the Senate Committee on Commerce has presented a lengthy report upon the improvement of the Mississippi River. The committee concludes that no substantial relief from the floods can be obtained from outlets or from receiving reservoirs. The committee sees relief, however, in the construction of adequate levees. "Your committee is of the opinion," the report says, "that the Federal Government should continue, as it has since 1882, to aid in the great task of controlling and repressing the floods in the river."

LITERARY NOTES.

In the Century, this month, Edmond Kelly describes his experience in Spain during the recent war. He was there about seven weeks on business, remaining most of the time in Madrid. Was he molested? Not at all; not even insulted, though it became generally known that he was an American. Precisely as others have testified, and as FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER has repeatedly said, he says over again, that it is not the people of Spain who are defective in character, (though the want of education is general), but that the governing classes are to blame. "The Spanish peasant," he warmly declares, "is the finest fellow in the world; he is thrifty, sober, and industrious." He mentions that the American life insurance company, which has established a branch in Madrid, and has erected a large and handsome building, has done well, and is regarded with confidence; during the continuance of the war, policy-holders "were crowding the company's offices, asking to be allowed to pay their premiums," and "not a single policy was allowed to lapse." He says the Spanish families—differing from the rule in France—are usually large, and he adds that this causes friendly intercourse between the two sexes, "for it means hosts of cousins."

The Christopher Sower Company, Philadelphia, has begun the issue of a series of "Liberty Bell Leaflets," translations and reprints of original documents relating to American history. They are edited by Dr. M. G. Brumbaugh, of the University of Pennsylvania, and Dr. Joseph S. Walton,—who, as is well known, have been heretofore connected in historical and educational work. The first four issues of the series are sent us by the publishers; they include, (1) "Inducements and Charter from States General of Holland to Settlers on the Hudson," (2) "The West Jersey Constitution of 1677," (3) "Penn's Frame of Government, of 1682, and Privileges and Concessions of 1701," (4) "Charter of the Province of Pennsylvania." Other numbers are to follow. They will, we are sure, have much value to students and teachers of our early history, doing for this part of the country what the "Old South" publications of Boston have done for the States eastward of us.

Prof. Benjamin Ide Wheeler, of Cornell, continues in the Century his history of Alexander of Macedon, one of the number of so-called "Great" to whom the designation has been so falsely applied. Prof. Wheeler is a fine Greek scholar, and his study of all the conditions of the time, the fourth century B. C., is very interesting. As for Alexander, he aimed at a "world empire," made by the sword, and when after his brief successes, he died at the age of thirty-three, in his sensuality and drunkenness, his poor "world empire" dissolved more quickly than it had been created. It is to be supposed that Prof. Wheeler intends to bring this out plainly, at the proper time.

W. T. Stead, the English editor and author, has in this month's Review of Reviews an interesting article on the Czar, the "Emperor of Peace," whom he went to see and talk with at his palace at Livadia, in the Crimea. He is an earnest advocate of the Czar's noble movement for disarmament, and he answers confidently in the affirmative the much urged inquiry whether Nicholas will stick to his work, quoting Russian authorities that he has a strong will. We hope it will prove so.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE STORY OF WILLIAM TYNDALE, THE TRANSLATOR OF THE BIBLE. By Charles Tylor. 7¼ x 5 in. Pp. x. and 126. With seven illustrations. Price 2s. 6d. London: Headley Bros.

MEMORIALS AND LETTERS OF ANN HUNT. Compiled by Matilda Sturge. 7½ x 5 in. Pp. vi. and 187. Price 3s. 6d. London: Headley Bros.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—A meeting for the purpose of organizing a Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Thomas S. Gibbs, on the evening of Eleventh month 22, 1898.

Thomas S. Gibbs was appointed president, Franklin S. Zelley vice-president, Martha E. Gibbs secretary, and Courtney Pray treasurer. The names of forty-three members were placed on the list. The constitution and by-laws were then read by the secretary, in sections, and after thoughtful consideration, were, with slight alterations, adopted.

The following were appointed on the Executive Committee: Mary S. Harvey, Robert B. Taylor, and Charles Biddle, who with the officers held a meeting and appointed the following committees:

Discipline—Thomas B. Harvey, Sarah A. Biddle, Thomas Bunting.

History—Peter E. Harvey, Lydia L. Gibbs, Elizabeth B. Zelley.

Literature—Elizabeth Pray, Lewis Taylor, and Elizabeth Bowne.

Current Topics—Joanna Shreve, Cyrus S. Moore, Ethel Zelley.

After a short silence, adjourned to meet at the home of Thomas B. Harvey, Twelfth month 22.

Our second meeting was held at time and place appointed. The president and secretary both being absent on account of sickness, Peter E. Harvey was appointed to the chair, and Joanna Shreve secretary. It being a very stormy evening, but fifteen persons responded to roll-call. Sarah A. Biddle read an article concerning the difference in different books of discipline.

The question "Why did our Society increase more rapidly at its rise than at the present time?" was answered by Peter E. Harvey, who thought one reason was that after the persecution and injustice that Friends as well as others suffered in former times, they were only too ready and willing to follow the peaceful path pointed out by George Fox, and to believe that God was ever the loving Father, instead of the wrathful and revengeful Being he had been depicted to them. Hence they flocked in numbers around him; while now there are so many denominations with stronger "attractions" to draw the young, especially, away from our fold.

Cyrus S. Moore answered the question from Current Topics, "What effect has the recent disapprobation of the Philadelphia Peace Society had upon its members?" He likened the city officials to Saul, who possessed with power, had overreached justice, and turned from the household a worthy friend; but the Society was not discouraged. This would prove an incentive to action in a just cause, strengthening the resolve to elevate humanity, and advance morality, encourage economy, and save life, by Peace and Arbitration.

After a short silence the meeting adjourned to meet at the home of Mary L. Bowne, First month 26, 1899.

M. E. G., Secretary.

FRANCE is burdened with 400,000 office-holders called "functionaries," who draw each year in salaries 615,000,000 francs, or about $123,000,000. The sober-minded people of the country are alarmed over the annual increase in the number of these office-holders, but the problem is difficult, owing to the universal desire of the French to secure government places even at small salaries. But the eagerness is not confined to the French.

GOVERNOR MOUNT, of Indiana, has a solution on hand for lynching in his State. He has prepared a bill for the Legislature "allowing the next of kin to the person lynched to bring suit for damages against the county in which the lynching occurs." The bill will also include "white-capping."

In an article on sugar making in Vermont, Meehans' Monthly says that nature separates the sugar from the sap before the sap freezes, and that there is a flow of sap by day, but an intra suction by night.

THERE are reported 495 members and 68 "attenders" of Friends' meetings in Australia and Tasmania. They are considered connected with London Yearly Meeting.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

IN MEMORIAM.

RETNA MOTT, DIED TWELFTH MONTH 24, 1898.

AND now at last thy heart's desire is won
And thou art satisfied. O welcome feet
That ever proved a comforter so sweet,
For thee a glorious Christmas morn has come!
We who remember well thy gentle soul
Are not afraid, but know that they who love
Are born of God; and that in Him above
Thou shalt be glad. So, though the golden bowl
Be broken, and the silver cord be loosed;
The poor, who ne'er went from thee comfortless
Be bowed in grief that thou no more canst bless;
Though eyes be tearful, and though hearts be bruised,

Yet thou at last art satisfied; for He Shall feed thee; all thy burdens shall remove
From off thy shoulders, and anoint with love,
Healing thy soul to all eternity.
And of His peace shall be no end. For thee
Now that thy morn has come, angels are glad:
For us, there is this balm of Gilead—
In heav'n the faithful shall united be.

RUTH CLEMENT,

THE WINNER OF THE RACE.

I SAW them start an eager throng,
All young and strong and fleet;
Joy lighted up their beaming eyes,
Hope sped their flying feet.
And one among them so excelled
In courage, strength, and grace,
That all men gazed and smiled and cried:
"The winner of the race!"

The way was long, the way was hard;
The golden goal gleamed far
Above the steep and distant hills—
A shining pilot star.
On, on they sped, but while some fell,
Some faltered in their speed;
He upon whom all eyes were fixed
Still proudly kept the lead.

But ah, what folly! see, he stops
To raise a fallen child,
To place it out of danger's way
With kiss and warning mild.
A fainting comrade claims his care,
Once more he turns aside;
Then stays his strong, young steps to be
A feeble woman's guide.

And so, wherever duty calls,
Or sorrow or distress,
He leaves his chosen path to aid,
To comfort, and to bless.
Though men may pity, blame, or scorn,
No envious pang may swell
The soul who yields for love the place
It might have won so well.

The race is o'er. 'Mid shouts and cheers
I saw the victors crowned;
Some wore fame's laurels, some love's flowers,
Some brows with gold were bound,
But all unknown, unheeded, stood—
Heaven's light upon his face—
With empty hands and uncrowned head,
The winner of the race.

—Susan Marr Spaulding, in Sunday School Times.

A DESULTORY and miscellaneous habit of reading, John Stuart Blackie said, was "like the racing of some little dog about the moor, snuffing everything and catching nothing."

REST.

SWEET rest, dear rest,
 Thou art the best !
 Go, children, go in pleasure's quest ;
 Go have your song and dance and mirth.
 I, too, have felt the youthful zest
 That gives these winning pleasures worth.
 But somehow as the winters flit
 The thing on earth that seems the best,
 While in my easy chair I sit
 When glows the fire and lamps are lit,
 Is rest, dear rest.
 Then, children, go in pleasure's quest,
 I'd rather rest.

Sweet rest, dear rest,
 Thou art the best !
 From this dear corner by the fire
 How faintly sounds earth's jarring call ;
 Bright aims that roused my youth's desire—
 Time's dimming touch is on them all.
 Yet swells my heart with deep content
 To find this compensation blest :
 Along with sense of powers spent
 And failing strength, is sweetly blent
 The blessedness of well-earned rest.
 Then go, dear friends, pursue your quest—
 Leave me to rest.

Sweet rest, dear rest,
 Thou art the best !
 I mind me how when life was young
 And bright the years before me rolled,
 One shadow o'er the future hung—
 It seemed so dreadful to grow old.
 But now life's autumn season nears
 And seems of all my life the best ;
 I bid my heart dismiss its fears—
 I know that life's declining years
 Shall bring sweet rest,
 Go, friends, life has not lost its zest,
 But sweet is rest.

—Helen Ekin Starrett.

THE STORY OF BAI BUREH.

There was, sometime ago, an "uprising" in the English Colony of Sierra Leone, on the west coast of Africa. The person who was the ostensible occasion of it was a black man named Bai Bureh. A letter from Liverpool (from which port there is considerable trade to the west coast) to the London Chronicle, gives the facts of the case, and they are quite interesting.

WHEN it became known in Sierra Leone that Sir Frederick Cardew intended to impose a universal tax of 5s. per hut, a deputation of chiefs belonging to the various tribes of the hinterland, journeyed to Freetown to try and convince the Governor that the imposition of the tax would inevitably lead to bloodshed. Among these chiefs was a very remarkable and unusually intelligent savage, Bai Bureh, hereditary chief of the Timinis or Timinees, one of the most numerous and important tribes in the Protectorate. Bai Bureh was, in a manner, an ally of ours, for he and his warriors had on several occasions placed themselves at the disposal of the British, when the latter were engaged in punitive expeditions against slave-raiders. Bai Bureh, to whose superior intellectual attainments and enlightened ruling, several English missionaries and traders have paid tribute, earnestly besought the Governor to abandon this proposed tax, which he said was greatly in excess of what the people could pay. It is necessary to remark here, that to the entreaties of the natives were added the representations of all experienced white men in the colony.

The Governor, however, turned a deaf ear to all remonstrances, and dismissing the chiefs, sought an early opportunity of putting his project into execution. He summoned the Port Lokko chiefs, who are Bai Bureh's allies and dependents, to pay the hut-tax. The chiefs reiterated their inability to do so. Thereupon, the Governor marched a force into the country, seized the chiefs, and flung them into the Freetown goal, where they have lingered for many months, until released some three weeks ago through the beneficent action of Sir David Chalmers, Her Majesty's Special Commissioner.

The next step taken by Sir Frederick Cardew was to call upon Bai Bureh to pay the tax. The matter being physically impossible—as everybody well acquainted with the subject is aware—Bai Bureh naturally declined, in a courteous and dignified letter, which was published by the Sierra Leone papers. The Governor then committed the fatal error of publicly proclaiming that Bai Bureh was thenceforth dispossessed of his hereditary chieftainship over the Timinis ! At the same time, the Governor appointed a mere figure-head to replace him, whom he caused to be escorted with much pomp to Port Lokko. Almost simultaneously, he dispatched a strong force of soldiers to capture Bai Bureh. The Timinis rose to a man, decapitated the Governor's nominee, and the whole country took up arms for Bai Bureh, who repulsed the Governor's troops.

Immediately previous to this Bai Bureh, whose kindly feelings to Europeans was well known, foreseeing what the arbitrary action of the Governor would ultimately lead to, and fearing that his people would get out of hand, provided every merchant trader and missionary within his domains with an escort and a safe passage out of the country. He might have slit these white men's throats from ear to ear, or hacked them to pieces . . . as the Mendis did with the white men in their country. Instead of doing so, however, this "savage" whom the Sierra Leone authorities have hunted down so ruthlessly, declared that "he had no war palaver with the missionaries or traders ; his quarrel was with the Government," and let them go. It was only just in time. The war fever of the Timinis had risen, and unknown to Bai Bureh, a few fanatics had flung themselves upon a widely respected missionary, the Reverend W. J. Humphreys, and murdered him. When Bai Bureh heard of this he publicly disclaimed all foreknowledge of the deed, both to his people and in a letter to the Governor. He subsequently expressed his intense reprobation of the act by executing with his own hands the actual murderer.

All the year, until the rains rendered further operations impossible, Bai Bureh has been pursued from pillar to post. His wives, and the women and children of his tribe have sought refuge in French territory, and numbers of his followers have done the same. All the chief towns in the Timini country had been destroyed prior to the commencement of the rainy season : there were no huts left standing to tax, and the Timini nation was scattered to the four winds of heaven. Surely the Governor might have rested content with this. But no ; one thing was missing to make the vengeance complete. Bai Bureh had escaped capture. Consequently, the Governor, now that the rains are over, is about to organize another expedition into the Timini country, designed to seize Bai Bureh. [He was subsequently taken prisoner.] At the very time when it is admitted on all sides that the hut-tax is a mistake; when a special commissioner delegated by H. M. Government is holding a personal inquiry into the administration of the country, and the matter is therefore sub judice; when everything points to a natural termination of these sterile and—as far as Bai Bureh is concerned—unjust military operations; when produce is beginning to come down country once more; when the half-ruined merchants of Sierra Leone, profiting by the natives' desire to reopen trade, are hoping to recoup themselves for heavy losses during the past twelve months—Sir Frederick Cardew intends embarking upon another costly and profitless campaign, in order to hunt down the wretched man, who, once our faithful ally, has now lost everything in defending himself from what he considered to be an intolerable injustice. The episode of Bai Bureh is a scandalous one in the annals of Sierra Leone administration, and it is small wonder that people who know the circumstances, are surprised and indignant that a discredited official should be permitted to again plunge into the throes of bloodshed, and still further disorganize a colony, which, by his personal action, he has already thrown back fifty years.

The best natives in the whole of the protectorate, the most law-abiding, the most energetic, the best, if not the only, agriculturists, are being shot and hunted down like rabbits. Why? Because an official made an administrative blunder, and followed up that blunder by a display of force.

A BATTLE AS IT APPEARED TO AN EYE-WITNESS.

I WAS at Gettysburg July 1-4, 1863, with my brother General O. O. Howard, but not as a soldier. It was my first and only battle-field. I received there, not my first impressions, but by far my deepest conviction as to the real and essential character of war. The "pomp and circumstance" were not wanting, as we broke camp at Leesburg, Va., and marched to the sound of music and under waving banners toward Pennsylvania. The report of the first gun following a distant flash, and the slow rising of a puff of smoke over the woods excited a thrill of patriotic emotion. Our reinforcements hurrying beyond the town to repel attacks already begun, and others hastening to gain and hold important positions on Cemetery Ridge, roused my honest sympathy. But when the first broken line of limping, bleeding, "wounded" halted along the Baltimore turnpike, and I attempted, almost alone, the work of relief, I felt as never before war's cruel sacrifice of blood and limb and life.

On the second evening of the battle the moon rose as peaceful-faced as ever, and the silent stars looked down unchanged on the upturned, ghastly faces of our dead; the otherwise noiseless night resounded with cries of mortal agony from the dying around me. I said to myself, "O God, the moon and the stars thou hast made, but not this miserable murder and mangling of men." It is not like nature; it is anti-natural; it is of the pit. On the third afternoon I went up, weary with hospital work, for a few moments' rest to the cupola of a farm-house. The thin line of blue-coated soldiers seemed to waver along the summit of the ridge. I involuntarily prayed for their safety, my country, and for the right. Just then, above the rattling of musketry and the roar of artillery, there came a clap of thunder from a rapidly-rising cloud. For a moment no other sound was heard. It was as if God were saying, "I am mightier than ye all! Hear my voice. Cease your mad and tumultuous strife!" Here the question came to me as never before, "Is this the work of God or of Satan? Is there no other way of settling human differences, establishing and confirming human rights? Do union, liberty, and law lie along no other road?"

Then, as the roar of battle was renewed and volley succeeded volley, it seemed to me that each bullet was hungry for a life. Some lives, dear to me personally, rose in their noble manliness before me. I spoke imagined farewells to the dying. I seemed to look upon dead faces only too familiar. I heard in each discharge the possible knell of friend or brother. Oh, wicked extravagance and waste of most precious things! That young man has, with vast expense of time and toil, trained his bullet-pierced brain for great intellectual attainments. The other has had such gracious spiritual experience as to be divinely marked as an exemplar and teacher of religion. Learning, skill, wisdom, piety, and moral power were won by him by years of toil, self-denial, and consecration. Ability was thus acquired for which the world has a thousand aching voids. Alas! his body affords less an obstacle to the passage of a bullet than that of a horse or even a senseless stone. Surely here is a wicked waste.

What effect has all this had on such as come away unslain, unwounded?

Does not this work seem too like that of wild beasts or bull-dogs and prize fighters? Separate the military hero himself from his bloody deeds; forget for a moment the cause of the war in which he fights, —what are the personal motives, impulses, and passions roused into life and energy by fighting? A Christian soldier once said to me confidentially, "I cannot bear to go into the presence of God so angry as I always become in battle." General Sherman wrote, "War is cruelty. You cannot refine it!" It is that and worse. It lacks not only kindness and humanity, it lacks mercy, righteousness, justice,—it is a moral monster. However justifiable we may think its alleged cause, however beneficial its results, its facts are hideously wicked. In a divinely created and ordered universe there is, there must be, a better way. It is our duty to find it.—Rowland B. Howard.

IN all "Christendom," there is collected annually $10,000,000 for missions. This is a large sum, but it is stated that the expenditure in the United States alone for artificial flowers, etc., on women's bonnets, is $20,000,000.

PROF. WOOLSEY ON THE TREATY.

Prof. Theodore S. Woolsey, of Yale University, one of the first authorities in the United States on the subject of International Law, discusses the Peace Treaty in the Independent. We extract as below.

UPON the protocol foundation the treaty of peace was successfully built up. Its text is not officially published, pending the consideration of the Senate. But through London we get its provisions with sufficient certainty to warrant public discussion and criticism. These are timely now, for should the Senate act in favor of the treaty, opposition to the new policy involved in it will be too late. Still, it is unfortunate that a very critical turning point in our history should depend upon the approval or rejection by the Senate of a treaty which the public is not permitted to see.

It is before the Senate, then, that the question of imperialism must be fought out. It is absurd to say that a rejection of the treaty throws us back into war. It simply means a revision of certain unacceptable articles, no new thing in our history. There is neither illegality in ratification nor danger in rejection. The question is purely one of national expediency. Which is best for ourselves? And here let me call attention to the excessive and I think unusual appeal to the emotional qualities in our people which the advocates of expansion are employing. The President asks if we are to haul down our flag upon territory where it has once been planted? The reply is: Certainly, if it has been planted injudiciously or improperly or in course of the military occupation of a region. This happened in Mexico and in Florida when Jackson seized the ports of St. Marks and Pensacola before the cession.

Many well meaning and conscientious persons declare that our duty to humanity obliges us to take over the Philippines. They say that it is our mission divinely ordered; that the finger of Providence so directs. But how do they reason this? In so serious a matter we are entitled to some proof of their right to interpret the plans of the Almighty. Otherwise their dicta are mere opinions, of no more weight than the next man's; they are pure assumptions; they smack of irreverence, of ecclesiasticism. Far more general is the popular sentiment, commonly known as spread-eagleism, which swells the bosom of the unthinking citizen. Under its influence we are to do anything which will make this big country bigger, without regard to consequences. Such sentiment is not reason, and unfortunately it cannot be reasoned with. It is subtle, because it mistakes itself for patriotism; it is dangerous because it assumes tasks and responsibilities which may be unnecessary and to which it may be unequal.

Now I protest that this cession of the Philippines must not be argued on emotional lines.

The presumption is against taking them, because to do so is contrary to our past usage and ideals and seems certain to force us into closer relation with the European system of alliances and balance of power. It makes a new kind of republic, we holding unautonomous dependencies with a climate under which our own stock can never spread.

It must be justified, therefore, by convincing reasons, and not by an appeal to the emotions. Its advocates must show that it is constitutional. They must prove that it is likely to be profitable in excess of the burden of administration involved. They must show that it is practicable with our civil service to govern dependencies honestly, justly, firmly, wisely. For to say, as men are saying, that the mere gravity of this problem will bring a solution, is like a woman's logic when she marries a man to reform him.

If not proven to be constitutional and profitable and practicable, the argument that the retention of the Philippines is the easiest way out of a difficulty is weak, because our own interests are the ones to be considered and not the welfare of the Filipinos, while the difficulty concerns the latter. It was to secure the good of its own people that this Government was organized. To risk that good or to sacrifice it for the sake of another people is to betray a trust. The destruction of the Spanish fleet at Manila was a defensive act. It saved the Californian coast from possible attack. The dispatch of an army and capture of Manila was an offensive measure, not necessary for or directly connected with the main object of the war—viz., the liberation of Cuba. By it the Administration created a difficulty. Now it uses that very difficulty to justify its plans of annexation.

Twenty millions of dollars are given as "compensation" for the Philippines. Two things are to be said here. One relates to the wisdom of paying anything for the islands. They and their public works are the spoils of war. Why not take them as such, or else pay their fair value? To force a sale for a pittance is not a dignified operation. Let us take the islands if we must and save our money.

It is also to be noticed that the appropriation of this $20,000,000 will belong to the House of Representatives, which thus possesses a sort of secondary right of ratification. Whether our House must vote money passed by a duly ratified treaty is an unsettled question, and this is at least a loophole for attack.

I pass over the many details of revived intercourse, and mention finally the article ceding the Philippines, which is the question most at issue.

Here there seems to be a dilemma. If we keep the island trade to ourselves, we get some profit, but the islands die. If we open their trade to all alike, as we are pledged to do, we scramble for it with the rest, yet have all the burden of administration and responsibility for the conduct of seven millions of half civilized or savage Filipinos. In compensation we shall have the offices of island government to fill and the taxes to spend. To a country like Great Britain this is an object, for it gives her young men places, while at home the avenues for their employment are few. But in our own country, where nature as yet is only partly brought into subjection, there is still reward for the best energies of our sturdiest.

So that if we weigh what commercial advantage we are likely to get, plus the profits of administration, against the cost and the liabilities of possession, it is hard to figure a balance in our favor.

The cost of possession is twofold, civil and military. It may fairly be assumed that taxation and duties will pay for the civil administration and ordinary public works of the more civilized parts of the islands. But to subdue or satisfy the insurgents, to reduce the savage regions and maintain order therein, to maintain the usual and necessary garrisons, to keep up a navy patrol of gun boats, to commission public ships powerful enough to protect the islands from foreign attack and preserve the connection with the United States, all this with arsenals, dry docks, repair shops, coaling stations, fortifications, barracks, soldiers and sailors to be paid and fed and doctored, means a yearly expenditure only to be guessed at. And by it all we add, not to our military strength, but to our military vulnerability.

Choosing a Mennonite Minister.

In the presence of a congregation of over a thousand people, gathered in the Mennonite meeting-house, at Millersville, Pa., (says a letter to the Philadelphia Press), Daniel N. Lehman, a farmer of Manor township, was chosen by lot to be minister of the congregation. There were twelve candidates for the position.

"The exercises were conducted by Bishop Isaac Eby, assisted by over a score of ministers, the candidates being first examined as to their faith. After a sermon by the Bishop, the latter handed twelve small Bibles to two ministers and instructed them to repair to the ante-room and place a small strip of white paper, which he gave them, in the corner of one of the twelve Bibles. Upon their return the Bibles were set on end on a table at the foot of the pulpit.

"One by one the candidates stepped up and selected a Bible. Each book was then examined by the Bishop, who started with Amos Charles. The next one opened was that of Daniel N. Lehman, and in his Bible the slip of paper was found. Greeting him with the holy kiss, Bishop Eby immediately ordained him to the ministry in the informal but impressive custom of the church."

The Census Work Not Accurate.

THE American Agriculturist, discussing the approaching census, (for it is but a little more than a year off), criticises the work of 1890. It says:

"The agricultural features of the next census ought to be comprehensive and liberal. We make bold to state that no federal census heretofore has been at all accurate in its agricultural work. Indeed, it is not too much to say the whole of such work has been a frightful error. This is a bold statement, but we make it advisedly.

"Much was claimed for the accuracy of the census of 1890, but agriculturally it is quite unreliable. It returned the total value of all agricultural products in 1889 as 2,460 millions of dollars. As a matter of fact, the average farm value in December, 1889, of six cereals, hay, cotton, tobacco, and potatoes produced that year foots up 2,625 millions. It is probable that had all other produce been properly included, the census of 1890 would have shown 3,500 millions as the value of the United States farm products in the census year."

After 1900 Years.

New York Evening Post.

EIGHTEEN hundred years ago, or thereabouts, a pagan Roman jurist said that to do justly and be a good citizen, was to live honestly, to give every one his due, and to injure no man. The Jewish moralist, long before Christ, expanded this into "doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly before God." But 1900 years after Christ, it has been discovered in America, of all countries in the world, that more than this is necessary, that a young man's moral nature deteriorates if, in addition to earning an honest livelihood, and meeting all the responsibilities of civil life, he does not take arms once in a while and kill anybody that [the political leadership of the time] points out to him.

Repudiating the Declaration.

Springfield Republican.

THE following important passage in debate took place in the United States Senate on Monday (December 19):

"Mr. Hoar of Mass.—May I ask the Senator from Connecticut one question at this point?

"Mr. Platt of Ct.—Certainly.

"Mr. Hoar—It is whether, in his opinion, governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed?

"Mr. Platt—From the consent of some of the governed.

"Mr. Hoar—From the consent of some of the governed?"

"Mr. Platt—Yes."

The Senator from Connecticut, in other words, repudiates the immortal preamble of the Declaration of Independence. Thomas Jefferson did not write: "To secure these rights, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of some of the governed." If he had, the American Revolution could never have occurred, there would have been no American Republic, and William McKinley would not to-day be president of the United States.

The Monks in the Philippines.

THE story of the absorption and control of the Philippine Islands by the monastic orders of the Roman church is a most remarkable chapter of history. The monks hold—or did before the outbreaks of recent years—almost everything. "Lands equal in size to the whole present kingdom of Italy" were held by four of the orders.

"The Augustinian order alone, by its network of monasteries—over sixty in number—has been the actual ruler, as well as the largest land-owner, of Luzon. Spain has not been without many liberal statesmen during that period; but every effort of the best Spanish rulers to ameliorate the province or improve the wretched condition of the Tagals and Mestizes has been obstructed and perverted by the power of the Augustinian monastic lords. No political or civil officer who made himself distasteful to the Augustinians could long remain at his post. No private man could settle or reside anywhere in the interior unless he became the docile client of the monks."

Prof. Blackie on Education.

THE late John Stuart Blackie, (professor of Greek, in the University of Edinburgh), speaking of the study of history and the use of the imagination, "when it buckles itself to realities," laid down this rule: "Count yourself not to know a fact when you know that it took place, but only when you see it as it did take place."

Of education he said: "The best educated man is the man who has been well trained to do as many things as possible for himself." What an ignoramus a scholar may be under this definition! Books, much as he loved them, were of quite secondary importance in education, according to Blackie, and bookishness a disease. "What a student should specially see to, both in respect of health and of good taste, (here we dip into self-culture again) is not to carry the breath of books with him wherever he goes, as some people carry the odor of tobacco." The young should commence their studies as much as possible by direct observation of facts. "All the natural sciences are particularly valuable, not only as supplying the mind with the most rich, various, and beautiful furniture, but as teaching people that most useful of all arts—how to use their eyes. Among the most useful primary studies are Botany, Zoölogy, Mineralogy, Geology, Chemistry, Architecture, Drawing, and the Fine Arts." Along with accurate observation should go well-disciplined but active imagination. "In history, and in the whole region of concrete facts, imagination is as necessary as in poetry; the historian, indeed, cannot invent his facts, but he must mold them and dispose them with a graceful congruity; and to do this is the work of the imagination."

Tax "Expansion."

RESTRICTING the expenses of government is the one thing apparently left altogether out of account in the career upon which the nation has entered, remarks the Boston Herald, and adds:

"Yet it is as plain as a sum in mathematics that the pinch of taxation must come upon the people unless the expenditure is restrained. The money it calls for cannot be raised by a protective tariff. We cannot expect $700,000,000 or $800,000,000 a year, which is what the new program calls for, without adding permanently to the direct taxation of the people. It furnishes a potent argument for an income tax, which already looms ominously again in the future."

CURRENT EVENTS.

SPANISH "sovereignty" in Cuba ceased at noon on First-day last, the 1st inst., and the command was formally transferred by Captain General Castellanos to the American Evacuation Commission, and by it to Major General Brooke, the "Military Governor." The United States flag was raised on the palace and forts at Havana in place of that of Spain. After the ceremonies at the palace, General Castellanos embarked on the transport Rabat for Matanzas.

THERE is now much interest in the Philippine situation. At Iloilo, there has been determined opposition to American authority. A despatch from Iloilo, dated on the 30th ult., says that General Miller, in command of the American forces, had refused to grant time to the rebels in which to communicate with Aguinaldo, and was then preparing to land troops. "The city was filled with rebels, and the greatest excitement prevailed."

A proclamation, to be addressed to the Filipinos by General Otis, has been approved by the Cabinet at Washington, and cabled to Manila. It goes in great detail into the conditions in the islands, "and intimates that the whole future happiness and welfare of the people depends upon their conduct at this time."

GENERAL OTIS has cabled from Manila that in his opinion General Miller "has the situation well in hand," at Iloilo, and that he fully understands the purpose of the President not to "crowd" the insurgents unduly.

The insurgents, it is said, are willing to permit the American forces to land without their arms, but are preparing to resist if the troops, under General Miller attempt to land armed. "They are drilling on the beach, evening and morning, in full sight of the Americans."

BOTH Houses of Congress reassembled on the 4th instant. The Senate, it was stated, "would almost immediately adjourn for the day, as an evidence of respect for the memory of Senator Morrill. The Nicaragua Canal bill has the right of way, but may be temporarily displaced by the Peace Treaty or the supply bills, none of which have yet passed the Senate."

The Paris Peace Treaty, it was stated, would be submitted to the Senate almost immediately on its reconvening, probably to-day. It is understood that the President's letter of transmission will be in the briefest possible form."

It is announced that Admiral Sampson, with the flagship New York, is soon to return to Cuban waters. "Among naval officers it is generally believed that the Admiral's long continued sea service indicates that there is much hard work ahead for the navy in West Indian waters."

The Secretary of the Navy has sent to Congress the "detailed estimates" for the fifteen new war-ships which it is proposed to build. The cost is very great. The estimates for "armament and armor" are $14,168,400, and for construction and engineering, $36,100,800,—making 50¼ millions altogether.

THE Legislatures of thirty-two States convene this month, and of these twenty-six will elect United States Senators, six of them having already performed that duty, namely Maryland, Mississippi, Ohio, Rhode Island, Vermont and Virginia. With the full number that is expected to result from the elections, the Republican membership will be fifty-six, which would give the party a majority in the Fifty-sixth Congress of twenty-two.

THE Pennsylvania Legislature assembled at Harrisburg on the 3d instant. The question of re-electing United States Senator M. S. Quay causes serious party complications among the Republicans. A party "caucus" was held on the evening of the 3d, and Quay was nominated, but 55 Republican Senators and Members did not attend, and this reduced the number present to 109, being 19 less than are required to elect on joint ballot, of the two houses. The voting will begin on the 17th instant. The question of the indictment against Senator Quay for misuse of the funds of the People's Bank will come up in the Supreme Court before that date.

TWENTY-THREE members of the crew of the steamer Vindobala, bound from Rouen to Philadelphia, were rescued from their sinking vessel on December 27th by the American Line steamer Paris. A heavy sea was running at the time, and the rescue was attended with great danger. The carpenter of the steamer was drowned.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

UNITED STATES Senator Justin S. Morrill, of Vermont, died at his home in Washington on the 28th ult., aged 88 years. He had sat in the Senate continuously for thirty-one years, and in the House and Senate for forty-four years consecutively.

—Four parcels of manuscript of the late William Lloyd Garrison have been placed in the Boston Public Library by his sons. They cover the period between 1839 and 1842, and are an addition to a similar collection given to the Library three years ago. There are nearly 500 different manuscripts in the present collection. The letters given in 1895 comprise seven quarto volumes. It is the intention of the Garrison family to complete the collection later by placing in the Library other documents and letters covering the period from 1843 to the date of Mr. Garrison's death in 1870. A number of relics of the anti-slavery movement are also offered.

—A conference between members of the American Sugar Growers' Society and manufacturers of beet sugar machinery and representatives of beet sugar factories now in operation, was held in Chicago last week. The sentiment was unanimous that the acquiring of tropical territory would seriously affect the development of the domestic beet sugar industry, unless there was some arrangement made by which our own manufacturers would be protected. It was decided that a formal protest should be prepared and forwarded to Congress.

—There has been great suffering in Lima, Ohio, a dispatch from there, 31st ult., says, and a dozen other towns near there, because an explosion in the pipe line, which supplied the places with natural gas, has deprived them of their fuel supply at a time when a blizzard was prevailing.

—Statistics of the Treasury Department show that during the past year the importation of raw silk, India rubber, hides, and fibre, articles used by manufacturers, increased 50 per cent. while the importations of finished goods decreased, indicating that there has been greater industrial activity in this country.

—It is said in official circles in Washington that indications point to the conclusion of an agreement between the Joint High Canadian Commissioners that, while satisfactory to both the United States and to Canada, will not include all that either side hoped to obtain.

—The Chesapeake and Ohio Railroad Co. has issued an order that any employé detected entering a saloon will be discharged; also a garnishee of any employé's wages by a saloon keeper will result in his dismissal.

—"Mercury twenty degrees below zero," is the postscript of a letter written by a friend at Millville, Pa., to the INTELLIGENCER, on the 2nd instant.

—Adjutant General Corbin has prepared a statement showing that there are now nearly 34,000 American soldiers in Cuba, of which number half are in Havana province.

NOTICES.

* * The Home Influence Association will hold its regular monthly meeting in the meeting-house, Race street above 15th, on Third-day, First month 17, at 3 p. m.

The meeting will be addressed by Rachel Foster Avery on the subject, "Telling Stories to Children." A full meeting is desired. Visitors are welcome.

FLORENCE M. LUKENS, President.

* * The regular meeting of the Temperance Workers of 17th street and Girard Avenue will be addressed on Seventh-day evening, First month 7, by Isaac H. Hillborn, and Edward Everett Hale's story, "The Man Without a Country," will be given with illustrations.

All are cordially invited.

JOSEPH C. EMLEY, President.

* * Friends from Washington, wishing to attend Fairfax Quarterly Meeting, at Fairfax, Va., First month 16, will take cars at 6th Street Station. Ask for Friends' tickets to Pæonian Springs, where carriages will be waiting. Tickets issued 13th and 14th good until 21st. Trains leave 9 o'clock a. m. and 4.30 p. m., daily. Round trip tickets sold.

* * The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting-house at Wilmington, Del., on First-day, First month 15, 1899, at 2.30 p. m.

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

* * Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee will hold a meeting in Friends' meeting-house at Moorestown, on First-day afternoon, the 8th of First month, at 2.30 o'clock, on "Peace and Arbitration."

All are invited to attend.

* * New York Yearly Meeting's Visiting Committee expects some of its members to visit the following meetings in First month, 1899:

- 8. Matinecock.
- 15. Cornwall.
- 22. Jericho.
- 29. Manhasset.

J. T. McDOWELL, Clerk.

* * A Conference under the care of the Philanthropic Committee of Abington Quarterly Meeting will be held at Horsham meeting-house, on First-day afternoon, First month 8, at 2.30 p. m.

Prof. Joseph S. Walton will address the meeting on the subject of "Improper Publications."

All interested are desired to attend, and others that they may become interested.

JAMES Q. ATKINSON, Clerk.

ARABELLA CARTER, Asst. Clerk.

* * The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has arranged for the following meetings:

FIRST MONTH:

- 8. Oxford.
- 15. Fairfax.
- 22. Little Falls and West Nottingham.
- 29. York.

On behalf of the Committee.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

* * The First-day evening meetings during First month will be at 4th and Green streets, excepting First month 29, at 35th St. and Lancaster Avenue, West Philadelphia. All at 7.30 o'clock.

These meetings being held unitedly under the charge of the two monthly meetings, have claims on all within convenient access.

It is hoped that with the advent of the new year there will be a more lively interest shown in the maintenance of Friends' meetings, particularly on the evening of First-day.

* * Commencing First month 1, the meeting at 17th street and Girard Avenue will assemble at 11 o'clock.

* * A Circular Meeting, under the care of a Committee of Western Quarterly Meeting, will be held at Unionville, Pa., on First-day, the 8th of First month, 1899. To convene at 2 o'clock. SAMUEL H. BROOMELL, Clerk.

* * Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches, as way may open, will attend meetings as follows: FIRST MONTH, 1899:

- 8. Germantown.
- 24. 17th street and Girard Avenue.
- 29. Reading. AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

The Index to lamps and the chimneys for them will save you money and trouble.

We want you to have it.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

MONTGOMERY COUNTY MILK.
CONSHOHOCKEN Special attention given to serving families. Office 603 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Penna.
JOSEPH L. JONES.

WATCHES.

As one of the oldest houses in the watch trade—established three generations ago—and up to date in every feature of the business, we are able to offer the best and most serviceable watches for the least money. Give us a call.

GEO. C. CHILD,

1020 Chestnut St.—2d Floor.

Established 1810 at 824 North Second Street.

Swarthmore.

For rent or sale, Queen Anne Cottage, 12 rooms, steam heat, and open fire grates. The location is very delightful, directly overlooking the athletic grounds of the College, and very close to the meeting-house; one acre of ground, and plenty of fruit. Apply to DAVID SCANNELL, 814 Arch Street.

BRASS AND ENAMELED
BEDSTEADS

Enameled Bedstead, with Springs, $3.50.
Cribbs, from $5 up.
Mattresses of all qualities, our own make.
Bedding Cleaned and Re-made.
Furniture Re-upholstered.

Josiah G. Williams, 13 N. Eleventh St
FORMERLY 1027 MARKET ST.

John C. Hancock & Co.,
N. W. Cor. 9th and Master Sts.
(P. & R. R. R.)

DEALERS IN BEST GRADES OF

LEHIGH AND COAL FREE BURNING
Telephone Connection.

AQUILA J. LINVILL,
Dealer in Choice Lehigh Coal
1827 North 10th Street, Philadelphia.

CLEMENT A. WOODNUTT,
Undertaker
and Embalmer,
1728 GIRARD AVENUE, PHILADELPHIA.
Telephone 66-99-A.

Christmas Gifts.
USEFUL AND ORNAMENTAL Art Lamps

in Old Brass Filigree and Lace Work.

Guaranteed not to tarnish. Exclusive shapes—some in color; hand-painted designs overlaid.

We cater to all tastes in finish and ornamentation. Friends want plain colors as a rule. We have a most excellent lamp for the library in Dark Bronze. We also have for the dining-room and hall, Black,—very rich and durable.

Prices range from $2.00 up.

The light is all you could wish.

A. J. WEIDENER,

36 South Second Street, Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILWAY.

ANTHRACITE COAL. NO SMOKE.
NO CINDERS. DOUBLE TRACKED.
HEAVY STEEL RAILS. STONE
BALLASTED.

Royal Blue Line to New York.

SWIFTEST AND SAFEST TRAINS
IN THE WORLD.

Scenic Reading Route to

READING, HARRISBURG, GETTYSBURG, CHAMBERSBURG, SHAMOKIN, WILLIAMSPORT, AND POINTS
IN INTERIOR PENNSYLVANIA.

Royal Reading Route to

ATLANTIC CITY. CLEANLINESS
AND COMFORT. SAFETY AND SPEED.

Read
These Books

TO CALIFORNIA AND BACK,
176 pp., 176 illustrations.
5 cts.

THE MOKI SNAKE DANCE,
60 pp., 64 illustrations.
3 cts.

GRAND CANON OF ARIZONA,
32 pp., 15 illustrations.
2 cts.

NEW MEXICO HEALTH RESORTS,
80 pp., 31 illustrations.
2 cts.

ARIZONA HEALTH RESORTS,
72 pp., 18 illustrations.
2 cts.

LAS VEGAS HOT SPRINGS
48 pp., 39 illustrations.
2 cts.

Mailed free for postage named

They tell the story of wonderful sights and scenes, and special resorts for tourists and homeseekers in the Great West. They are published by the Santa Fe Route,

are literary and artistic, and will make you better acquainted with the attractions of your own land.

C. A. HIGGINS,
A.G.P.A., A.T. & S.F. R'y, CHICAGO.
Great Northern Bldg.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 14, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 2.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

II.

If we love and trust the goodness we have seen, known, and experienced, we shall surely go on to know more and to love more.

M. CATHARINE ALBRIGHT.

From "Present-day Papers," Vol. I., the paper on "Faith."

A PRAYER.

INFINITE Nearness! Thee I see revealed
In song of bird, the flower at my door,
The happy laughter of a little child,
The star at night, the pebble on the shore!
Each unto each allied, and all to thee!
Thou tender, loving, grand reality,—
Who art so near, so near!

Mystery shrouds thee, but to-day I saw
Thee mirrored in a glance of mother-love;
A bitter word, unsaid, brought God-born strength
Akin to that for which the martyrs strove;
And, growing from a small, unselfish deed,
Came that rare peace for which the angels plead,—
So near thou art, so near!

Infinite Nearness! Tell me not of God
Who dwells afar, apart, in other spheres,—
My Father's here! He shares my common life,
Inspires my duties and allays my fears;
And when night falls, like tired child I creep
Into his arms, who loveth all, to sleep,—
He is so near, so dear!

—Althea A. Ogden.

HE THAT OVERCOMETH.

Read to the students of Swarthmore College, First month 8, 1899, by Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond.

THE gift of life is very dear to us. We are made to cling desperately to life. We love its very uncertainties and risks, as well as its unending possibilities, and the joys that fill our cups to overflowing. And most of this company have already learned that life has many a hard place for us all. Our Father has honored his children, has given this sign of our kinship with himself as sons and daughters, that hard things lie at intervals all along our way of life. We are not even born upon our feet; but have to gain the mastery for these poor little members, by trial after trial, by stumbling over the inch-high obstacles in our way; and falling down and rising up over and over again.

In the struggle to get upon our feet our courage more than matches our feebleness, and we do not even remember our struggles.

Neither are we born with ready mental equipment. The records of all the ages to which we are heir, are sealed to our infant eyes. What were it to us to find ourselves in the midst of all the books in the world, with no key to unlock their treasures! But the day comes when the alphabet is mastered, the key is ours, and then begins the unending process of gathering and gathering the riches saved up from the past—and it may be, of adding our mite to the stores for the future. Hard places you know well there are, all the way along from the alphabet itself to the Master's degree, and only few of all the multitude attain the commanding heights of scholarship.

And what of our spiritual part, that which urges on our faltering feet and will not let them fail,—that which must illumine all our mental strivings if we would get from the intellectual life the very best it has to give? Here perhaps is the very hardest striving of all, here are the struggles we can never give over. If it is hard to get upon our feet, so it is hard to keep the courage that is needed to go forward into the uncertain future. So is it hard to hold steadfastly to our right purposes, to "do the next thing" whether or not it be the pleasant thing. Hard is it in childhood to lisp the alphabet.

So is it hard at your age and mine to keep our lips from speaking guile, to make our lips the fountain of life-cheering speech, so is it hard to learn the lessons set for us in youth in the disappointments and denied wishes that are a part of every life; so is it hard in mature age to rise above the inharmonies that threaten all the sweetness of life, into the region of perpetual shining; hard to carry our burdens with such calmness and strength that their weight need not fall upon other souls; hard to attain to such a realizing sense of the everlasting arms that we may know our weakness to be supplemented by their strength.

It is a great gain to us to give up our search after an easy life; to accept it as soon as we make the discovery that we are "to wrestle, not reign." Whom do you most respect among your fellows? Is it the young man or woman whose energy is chiefly shown in reducing work to the minimum, who makes a program that just satisfies the bare requirement of the law, and then lives a parasite upon the efforts of his neighbors, starving himself upon their honey, instead of getting the growth and vigor of his own visits to the flowers of literature and science and mathematics? In your hearts you pity him, perhaps despise him. The instant we present a firm face to the hard things of life, accepting them as a part of our portion, and meeting them with determination, the victory over them is begun. It is with the hope of beginning this victory, that I would place this thought of courage before you. There is a beautiful promise to be cherished in our heart of hearts. It is in that chapter of Revelation which describes a new heaven and new earth, for the first heaven and the first earth were passed away, the holy city coming down from God out of heaven, prepared as a bride adorned for her husband. The seer not only saw the vision of all things made new, but he heard a voice out of heaven saying, "Behold, the tabernacle of God is with man, and he will dwell with them, and they shall be his people, and God himself shall be with them." And the voice spoke also this promise, "He that overcometh shall inherit all things ; and I will be his God, and he shall be my son." You see that all things are promised to him that overcometh—that all possibilities are included in the overcoming.

And I believe the overcoming depends upon our sense of God. If our sense of ourselves, our own will, our own courage, our own strength fills all our horizon, is all we have to depend upon, we can get but little way in the overcoming. Our infinite resources are soon spent. How can we grow in this sense of God? If we need outward helps, they are all about us in the things that have been made by the Infinite Power whose name is God. Great temples and cathedrals, themselves inspiring us with awe and reverence, are only the handiwork of men. But the sky over our heads, the sunshine flooding the earth, these trees close at hand bared for their deep winter sleep, the primrose, blooming in our sunny windows—all these are straight from the hand of God. No man with all the helps that science has to offer, can make the primrose seed, or root, or leaf, or beauteous blossom. If then, we need an outward manifestation of God, let his flowers be ministers to us. Let one leaf of his, which no man can make, and is always at our hand, let this be written over with the name of God for us, and turn our thought in the direction of our highest conception of what is true and good—Godlike, and this conception will ever grow with our growth. Right in the midst of our work or play an instant's thought of God flashing through our minds will bring us illumination on our way, an increase of strength for our overcoming. These momentary, unplanned for uplifts of thought toward the Infinite, O let us cherish them as very steps toward God! Our appointed times for upward-reaching thought, our silence before meals, our assembling each morning before the day's work, our meeting here,—all these miss their deepest meaning for us, if they prove not the school in which we learn how to keep our souls open every moment toward the Divine. And then, God gives us so many helps beside his trees and flowers. How many times he speaks to us through the lips of his men and women,—how many great thoughts he gives us to grow on! Beside the outward help of the primrose leaf, we can wear in each pocket, and close to our hearts, some of these great thoughts. If not in our pocket, then in our hearts let us wear this saying of Jesus, "I and my Father are one—whosoever shall do the will of my Father which is in heaven, the same is my brother and sister and mother ;" and this aspiration of the psalmist, "As the hart panteth after the water brooks, so panteth my soul after thee, O God." And when we come face to face with hard things, let us renew strength and courage and hope, with the beautiful promise—"He that overcometh shall inherit all things!"

From The Friend, Philadelphia.

THE PRESENT GROWTH OF MILITARISM.

THE estimates of expenditure for the fiscal year 1899, made by the Secretary of the United States Treasury, are as follows :

For the civil establishment, . . .	$93,000,000 00
For the military establishment, .	250,000,000 00
For the naval establishment, . .	60,000,000 00
For the Indian service,	12,000,000 00
For pensions,	141,000,000 00
For interest on the public debt, .	41,000,000 00
For postal service,	92,874,647 37

Total estimated expenditures, $689,874,647 37

From the above it will be seen that a total of $492,000,000, or about three-quarters of the national revenue, is to be applied to expenditures connected with the army and navy, or to expenses that have grown out of our country's wars. The heavy interest and pension accounts are both results of past conflicts. In other words, assuming that our population is seventy millions of people, here is an annual tax of about seven dollars per head put on every man, woman and child of our country. Or, assuming that about one adult out of every five of the population pays the taxes, there is an average of say thirty-five dollars annually paid directly or indirectly by each tax-payer, for expenditures connected with the horrid system of war.

It is now being proposed to increase the United States army to 100,000 men. The navy is also being rapidly increased. We seem to be commencing an era of competition with the older countries of civilization in the matter of military power and its accompanying evils. Many contractors, builders of armaments, politicians, and the official world, gain by these things. But what about the moral effect on the people who pay for them?

The lust of conquest has spread among the people, and men who six months ago cried for war with Spain in the cause of humanity, now only speak about the grandeur of the nation, our place in the world as a military power, "imperialism," and "manifest destiny." Not only is the moral fibre of those who witnessed scenes of carnage impaired, but many of the countless thousands of young men who only went into camp-life, have been morally, physically, and spiritually injured thereby. The details from private sources of transactions at Chickamauga and other camps, are sickening to any Christian who loves his kind or the sacred cause of Jesus.

The various branches of the Society of Friends have not been apathetic under these sorrowful conditions. But now that peace is restored, let it be recollected that this war has only put our beloved country into the position of apparently at any time being obliged to again test its new-found military strength with rival Powers. Let us not close our eyes to the fact that those who stand for Christ's and the apostles' teachings, regarding war and its spirit, are all too sadly few. Let us remember that there is delegated to us as a people and as individuals, a great responsibility growing out of our knowledge that all that leads into war, or all that war leads into, is totally wicked. Let us individually, as we work, or converse, or travel, be watchful for any right openings to spread the propaganda of peace.

Above all, let us not become discouraged as professed followers of the Prince of Peace. His kingdom is an everlasting kingdom, and of the increase of his government there shall never be an end. His people are not only the conservers of the right and the best supporters of civilization, but they are also on the eventually winning side. Let the Society of Friends and its members therefore enter into a renewed struggle with a miserable system, which in time, like slavery and other sins, shall go down before the triumphant spirit of the Lord.

WM. C. ALLEN.

Twelfth Month 8, 1898.

A VIEW THIRTY-FIVE YEARS AGO.

From the Journal of Rachel Hicks, of Long Island.

HAVING been permitted for several years to remain mostly at home, for which favor I felt thankful, in the spring of 1864, a concern revived in my mind to attend the Yearly Meeting of Genesee, to be held in Canada, and a few meetings belonging to it. A minute of concurrence from our monthly meeting having been obtained, accompanied by my dear friend Mary Jane Field, I went first to Scipio, and attended several meetings there, thence to Pickering, Canada-West, where we made our home with our kind friends Nicholas and Margaret Brown. Except in the public meetings, it was not a season of great abounding in Heavenly influence; for want of that deep indwelling of Spirit, in which only our Heavenly Father condescends to favor the mind with the incomes of his love and solemnizing presence. There is a small remnant of devoted servants there, as in most other places where our meetings are held.

Seventh month, 1864.—I obtained a minute of our monthly meeting, setting me at liberty to visit the meetings constituting our Yearly Meeting, and also to visit the families of Amawalk and Chappaqua. Friends judged it best for me and my dear young friend Phebe Anna Thorne, to proceed without a private conveyance or other companion being provided from home, but to depend upon public conveyances, and the kindness of Friends to be helped on our way. This increased the burden of exercise which weighed heavily on my mind. In the prospect of so great an undertaking, I was ready at times to ask my Heavenly Father to lay the burden upon another, younger and better qualified than myself. But as no excuse I could plead released me, under a sense of his love, wisdom, and power, all within me bowed in submission to do, to bear, and to suffer whatever he might permit to come upon me, so that I might "finish my course with joy, and the ministry given me to testify of the grace of God."

In this bowedness of spirit the language of my Divine Master was, "Go, and I will be with thee; I will open a way where now thou seest no way; I will put words into thy mouth, and enable thee to deliver to the people the testimonies I give thee." Now that the work has been accomplished, I feel bound to bear the testimony that the promise has been fulfilled to my wonder and admiration. The minds of Friends and others were opened to receive us, and take us from place to place, so that there was no difficulty or detention worth naming. Often did the language arise, "This is the Lord's doing and it is marvelous in our eyes." Blessed, forever blessed, be his great and adorable name, saith all within me capable of feeling, in that he not only strengthened me to perform the journey, but also, that I am now permitted to sit by my own fireside, in that sweet peace of mind which the world can neither give nor take away.

Fourth month, 1865.—Often in taking a view of the foregoing journey my spirit is clothed in mourning, in having to see that a number of meetings throughout the Society have been discontinued; most of those that remain are small, and if there is not a revival of concern and dedication to our Divine Master, others must ere long follow, which is sorrowful to reflect upon. I fully believe that the Society of Friends was raised up to show by example and by precept the sufficiency of the gift of the Holy Spirit, which we profess to be led and governed by,—the foundation God himself has laid for the members of his church to stand upon; and that the principles emanating from this Divine source are indispensable for the well-being of the whole human family.

It is sorrowful that a people thus enlightened should fall away and be no more known as an organized body. There are living members still preserved, scattered here and there, as "one of a city and two of a family," and the prayer oft arises in my heart for the preservation of these, and that by the mighty power of Jehovah other faithful standard-bearers and laborers may be raised up, and the command given, "Go and proclaim the glad tidings of the everlasting gospel to the inhabitants of the earth;" bearing witness to the truth that God will teach his people himself by his own spirit in the soul of man, and to those who obey him he will give strength to resist every temptation that assails them, and thus they will be preserved from sin and its awful consequences,—a plain, simple, and all-powerful way to rest and peace here and hereafter. Blessed and praised be his great and adorable name, for he is everlastingly worthy!

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 4.—FIRST MONTH 22.

THE DELUGE.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The wages of sin is death.—Romans vi., 1-13.

Scripture Reading.—Genesis vi., 1-13.

THE story of a great flood which destroyed mankind, a chosen few being preserved as the founders of a new race, is one to be found among the traditions of many peoples.

In the Bible account, as in the story of Creation, we have two narratives. But instead of being wholly separated, as in the former case, the two are intermingled. If the reader will take in order Gen. vi., 5-8; vii., 1-6; viii., 20-22, and then Gen. vi., 9-22; vii., 7-24; viii., 1-20, he will find two accounts practically independent and complete. They differ in some slight particulars, as in the number of animals to be taken into the ark (Compare Gen. vi., 19-20 and vii., 2-3.) They differ also in the name used for God, as in the accounts of creation, the word Jehovah being used in the shorter narrative, Elohim in the more detailed one.

Again, as in the case of the Creation story, we find the story of the flood paralleled by an account found in the clay books of the Royal Library of Nineveh. Some account of the Assyrians, whose capital was at Nineveh, will be given at a later period of these lessons. For the present it is sufficient to say that this Royal Library, which had been lost for thousands of years, was preserved by the imperishable nature of the materials, and was discovered in the dust heaps of Nineveh about fifty years ago. Much time was spent before they could be fully deciphered, as the language in which they are written has long passed away. But the difficulties were finally overcome, and among many books of lesser interest were found some containing the legends and stories of Chaldea, the mother country of both Assyrians and Hebrews. The Chaldean poet tells that the gods having resolved on a flood, warned one favored man, who built a ship under their directions. At the appointed time he entered in with his family and "the cattle of the field," and closed the door. Then the deluge descended upon the earth and all things were destroyed except those within the ship. At length the ship grounded on a mountain and remained there for six days. The poem continues as follows :

"When the seventh day came I sent forth a dove and let it go.
The dove went and returned, a resting place it found not and it turned back.
I sent forth a swallow and let it go ; the swallow went and returned,
A resting place it found not and it turned back.
I sent forth a raven and let it go.
The raven went and saw the going down of the waters and
It approached, it waded, it croaked, and did not turn back."

The account will be seen to be practically the same, as far as the physical details are concerned. But we note at once an important difference in the moral atmosphere. In the Chaldean account the destruction of mankind is a mere caprice of the gods. In the Hebrew narrative it is because of sin. "God saw the wickedness of man" and said: "I will destroy" him. "The earth was corrupt before God." And God said: "Behold, I will destroy it."

Again, the Chaldean account is polytheistic throughout, while the purest monotheism is found in the account given in Genesis. In the Chaldean legend we read concerning the sacrifice: "The gods smelled the savor;" in the Hebrew account the words even are almost identical: "The Lord smelled a sweet savour." The difference seems but slight, but it is the kind of difference that set the Hebrew mind and character apart from those of the related peoples, in the midst of which he lived. Because the Hebrew said, "The Lord, my God, is one God" and because he recognized the relation between God and man as a moral relation, therefore was the Hebrew a chosen and a separate man. The subject matter of the tradition is of slight importance; the indication of a recognition of God's revelation of himself to man is of the greatest importance; the indication of a sense of the necessity for righteousness is of the greatest importance. These two things we ask those who are taking up the study of the Old Testament to note throughout its pages. God is one, and God demands righteousness. The story of creation begins with God, the sole Creator. The story of the flood reveals God as a Being devoted to righteousness. In the pages to follow, we will find, from time to time, low ideals of what righteousness consists in and low ideas of the nature of God; but nowhere do we find a swerving from the conviction that God is One, that he demands obedience to the law of right, that he punishes violation of this law.

Viewed in this light, the differences between the Chaldean and the Hebrew stories are by no means slight. Between them is a great gulf set.

The story of the confusion of tongues which introduces the account of the dispersion of mankind, also finds its counterpart in Eastern traditions, but this tradition is only partly known, and the subject cannot profitably be studied here.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS,
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 4.—FIRST MONTH 22.

JESUS AND NICODEMUS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—For God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life.—John, iii., 16.

Read from Gospel of John, Chapter iii., 1-16.

REVISED VERSION.

The incident of the visit of Nicodemus is itself unimportant, but it was the occasion for the presentation of spiritual truths of a striking character and of great value.

"Except a man be born anew" is the text, but the alternative marginal rendering is better, "born from above." That is, unless one be of the heavenly nature, "he cannot see the Kingdom of God," cannot enter into the experience of divine things. Again, Jesus said to his visitor, this respectable old Pharisee, who cautiously came in the night time to see what the proclaimed young Messiah might appear to be,— "that which is born of the flesh is flesh, and that which is born of the Spirit is spirit." This we know by observation, by the history of man. The mortal part, the body, that which remains after death, moulders away; it is flesh, and was born of flesh; but the spiritual part is not perishable, it was born of spirit, cannot moulder, and, as we believe, lives on.

Nicodemus was a member of the Jewish Sanhedrin, an assembly composed of seventy-one members, with the high-priest at its head. Its functions varied from time to time, according to the greater or less degree of power exercised by the political ruler. After the beginning of the reign of Herod its power was limited almost exclusively to church government. Herod rooted out also the aristocratic party, the Sadducees, from among its members, ordering forty-five of them to be put to death, and thus the struggle for power between them and the Pharisees was ended, and at the time of the incident in our lesson the latter party was the ruling power in the Assembly.

We hear of Nicodemus again (John 7: 50) when the indignation of the Pharisees is kindled by the failure of the officers to arrest Jesus; and though he does not openly avow himself a believer and follower, yet he pleads in his favor: "Doth our law judge any man before it hear him, and know what he doeth?" The only other record left concerning Nicodemus is that of his coming, after the crucifixion, with myrrh and aloes to embalm the body of Jesus, and this leads us to believe that he, like Joseph of Arimathea, "was a disciple of Jesus, but secretly, for fear of the Jews." (John 19: 38.)

The closing verse (16) of those selected for the lesson should be considered in connection with the one preceding and that following. Taken together they set forth the influence which the life of Jesus, and the system of religion which bears his name, were to have on the world. The love of God in giving his Son "that whosoever believeth may in him have eternal life," is stated (verse 15), and followed by a variant but similar verse (16), and in verse 17 it is said that "God sent not the Son into the world to judge the world," but that it "should be saved through him." This is the Christian faith: that the power of that Divine Spirit which was manifested in Jesus will convert the world, will draw it to better things, will induce it to follow him. "Even so must the Son of Man be lifted up," it is said in this lesson, and elsewhere Jesus says (12: 32): "And I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself."

"Behind all," says Phillips Brooks, "there lies the idea of Jesus that God is his Father, and that he may make men know that he is their Father, too. When that is touched, behold the miracle! See how the dry roots of obedience fill themselves with love; see how the hard stalk of experience grows soft and pliable with purpose; and then see how the flower of pain utters a life profoundly deeper than itself, and tells the world that story which it is the struggle of all pain and pleasure in the career of Jesus to tell, which all healthy pain or pleasure in the career of man is tempting him to learn,—of man's unbroken sonship to his Father, of the belonging of his soul to the soul of God."

THE solemnity of religion attaches to character, not to death. States of souls are solemn things. The question, What principles rule you? is a solemn question. But death, the disrobing of the flesh, is not peculiarly so,—not any more so than all life is, not any more than any crisis-season of life is which shows you what you are, and makes you taste the quality and sediment of your disposition and love.—Starr King.

WHAT use is a light under a bushel? It must shine where there is darkness. The place of need is the field of duty, and, though we are not to be of the world, we are to be first and last in the world and for the world.—Sunday School Times.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE WOODS IN WINTER.

I THINK it would delight the hearts of the Philadelphia members of the Forestry Association to see how many pretty pieces of woodland decorate the landscape within fifteen miles of Broad Street Station, in the north-east section of the city.

These woods are composed of several varieties of oak, poplar, beech, chestnut, maple, hickory, and gum, both the sour gum, and sweet gum (Liquidamber styraciflua), sometimes called the star gum on account of its fruit.

One of the most attractive features of the forests at this season of the year is the animal life abounding therein. Yesterday as I approached one of these little forests a flock of small birds attracted my attention. Among them I counted four blue birds; the others were snow birds. Woodpeckers of several species may always be seen in winter. A blue-jay, arrayed in gorgeous apparel, betrayed his presence in a tree top by his loud and angry scream, and his quick movements as he hopped from branch to branch, gave one the impression that he was very much in earnest about some important business.

Turning from this richly attired dandy, a less pretentious object presented itself within ten feet of me, in the shape of a little brown bird with a very long name (Troglodytes hiemalis) or winter wren, whose shy presence might easily have passed unnoticed as it moved quietly along the borders of a small creek. I always think of a "tailor-made suit," when I see this little bird; its coat of feathers is such a complete fit.

A much larger object soon arrested my attention as it swept by, and folding its immense wings perched upon a neighboring tree. It was a red-tailed hawk, a species much in evidence now, and more readily seen because the trees are bare of leaves.

A little further on I saw a trap made of boards, about four feet long and eighteen inches square. The owner, who happened to be with me, informed me that it was a "coon trap," and that the large hole at one end was the place where the coon "gnawed himself out night before last." He also informed me that minks, opossums, polecats, and weasels were abundant, to say nothing of gray squirrels.

As I passed thoughtfully from the timberland out into the open field, treading softly upon the rich carpet of brown leaves, and inhaling the fragrance peculiar to the forest, I was reminded that "the groves were God's first temples." N. R.

Byberry, Pa., Twelfth month 29, 1898.

PROGRESS, in the sense of acquisition, is something; but progress in the sense of Being is a great deal more. To grow higher, deeper, wider, as the years go on; to conquer difficulties, and acquire more and more power; to feel all one's faculties unfolding, and truth descending into the soul,—this makes life worth living.—James Freeman Clarke.

THE nature which is all wood and straw is of no use; if we are to do well, we must have some iron in us.—Canon Farrar.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 14, 1899.

THE SOUTHERN "RACE PROBLEM."

THE letter of Richard Carroll to a Columbia, S. C., newspaper, which we print elsewhere, discusses in an animated and interesting way the grave questions involved in the "race problem" of the South. The recent troubles in the two Carolinas, and the knowledge that these are continually liable to occur elsewhere, call new attention to the seriousness of the "problem."

No one who is at all observant and thoughtful can fail to consider the Southern situation one of great difficulty. The war made the colored people free and gave them—their adult males—the ballot. But in several States, by ingenious constitutional and legal devices, or by force, they have been practically deprived of the exercise of the suffrage. Their personal liberty has not apparently been greatly interfered with. They enjoy a tolerable protection of the laws for person and property, and they may go or come at will. Whether, in the States that have deprived them of their voting rights they will suffer in other respects later; whether it will prove that the injury to their citizenship is to be followed by other injuries, cannot now be said with confidence.

Richard Carroll, it will be seen, gives advice like that of Booker T. Washington. He advises more work, and less politics. He thinks that a peaceable and quiet perseverance in industry, and the acquisition of property, will give the colored people more respect and the assurance of friendly and just treatment. Whether this be true, or not, it seems under present conditions the only advice to them that can prudently be given. No doubt it is an invasion of their rights when, by fraud or by force, they are stripped of their suffrage, yet it does not seem good for them that persons at a distance—in the North—should exhort them in the communities where their political activity has been violently resented to insist upon the full measure of their legal rights, and persist in forcing the issue in that particular. Undoubtedly this advice, if followed, would only produce a new crop of sanguinary troubles.

There are some facts in the case which are undeniable, and in the main unchangeable. First, there is the fact of the increase of the colored race. In 1860, in what we call "the South," there were four and a quarter millions of persons of African descent,

(4,214,614); in 1890, there were over six and three-quarter millions, (6,892,125). While they have not increased as fast as the whites in that section, they have added, in thirty years, over fifty per cent. A second fact is that they furnish the industrial force of the South. The work that is done they mainly do, the crops that are raised they chiefly raise; and this must continue to be the case in most of the Southern States. A third fact is that there are, as Richard Carroll says, reasonable and fair-minded white men in nearly every southern neighborhood, who, so long as "political supremacy" and "social equality" do not appear in the case, may be relied on to help in maintaining justice for those who have a dark skin. The newspaper press is, as a rule, disposed to treat them with measurable fairness.

The white people are not going to leave the South. The colored people cannot. To live peaceably is the plainest and most obvious dictate of reason, considered apart from any higher rule of action.

THE action of New Providence Monthly Meeting (Iowa, of the other body of Friends), in dropping Joel Bean and the company at College Park, California, from membership, without notice, has caused much grieved comment in England. Thomas Hodgkin writes to the Friend, London, that—

"If no other Friend better qualified to deal with the subject shall take up the question I intend to propose at next Yearly Meeting (London), that we mark our sense of the wrong done to these dear Friends by entering into direct epistolary correspondence with them, ourselves."

"Isn't it disappointing to see so much prominence given to war writing, by all the magazines, for the coming year?" a friend says, in a private letter to one of the editors,—and adds that she continues taking one of the monthlies which has not so much committed itself to the war field. "I rejoice," she further says, "over your giving first place to Elizabeth Stuart Phelps's ringing article."

THE INTELLIGENCER is not a large newspaper, and we do not think it ought to be. Not being large, it ought not, as a rule, to print long articles. Sometimes we find it difficult to keep all of them as short as we should like, but our endeavor is to have a variety of concise, compact, and interesting matter. We mean to try this a little more than heretofore, and we think our readers will approve.

WE fully agree with what A. B. Farquhar says on the subject of bringing about the brotherhood of mankind, as prophesied by Micah—that the condition will not come of itself, but must be labored for and striven after. It must be brought to pass "by the work of man. We must work for these blessings ourselves."

ONE of the Philadelphia newspapers assures its public that the annexation of the Philippine Islands will "give employment" to thousands, or even "hundreds of thousands" of American workmen. It means, probably, that this employment will be building battle-ships and making cannon.

MARRIAGES.

MUMA—WILSON.—At the bride's home, near Buffalo, N. Y., Twelfth month 14, 1898, by Friends' ceremony, Michael K. Muma, of Coldstream, Ontario, to Emily Wilson, daughter of the late Ezra and Anna Wilson.

SILL—HALLOWELL.—At the residence of Edwin Hallowell, brother of the bride, near Willow Grove, Pa., Twelfth month 14, 1898, by Friends' ceremony, Magistrate Jonathan P. Iredell, of Horsham, being present, Davis Sill, of Horsham, and Sallie Hallowell.

SWAIN—HARDY.—At the home of the bride's parents, Markleville, Indiana, Twelfth month 28, 1898, under the care of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Fall Creek, Ind., George H. Swain, son of Charles and Margaret Swain, and Elizabeth R., daughter of Solomon F. and Rebecca P. Hardy.

DEATHS.

BALLINGER.—At her home near Lumberton, N. J., Twelfth month 17, 1898, after a short illness, Mary Ann, widow of Richard Ballinger, in her 95th year; a life-long member of Mt. Holly Monthly Meeting.

BOSLER.—At Ogontz, Montgomery county, Pa., First month 3, 1899, Mary Watson Bosler, widow of Charles Bosler, aged 88 years.

COCHRAN.—At Westtown, Pa., First month 1, 1899, of pneumonia, after an illness of less than two weeks, Arthur Stanley Cochran, aged thirty-four years.

He was a graduate of Swarthmore College, in the class of 1886, and chose for himself the profession of an architect, in which he had achieved an encouraging success. Several buildings in which Friends are interested were erected after his plans—among them the Friends' school at 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, and Somerville Hall, Swarthmore. He was unmarried, and devoted to the care of his mother, a widow. Many friends, who esteemed highly his gentle, courteous, and honorable qualities, sincerely lament his early and unexpected death.

COLES.—At his home in Glen Cove, Long Island, First month 4, 1899, Edward F. Coles, in the 75th year of his age; a member of Westbury Monthly Meeting.

COOK.—Twelfth month 26, 1898, of pneumonia, at his residence in Brooklyn, N. Y., Ebenezer Cook, son of the late Thomas Cook, of Point Pleasant, N. J., aged 80 years.

Interment at Friends' Cemetery, Prospect Park.

COOK.—Twelfth month 30, 1898, of pneumonia, at the residence of her late brother, Ebenezer Cook, in Brooklyn, N. Y., Sarah Sherman Cook, daughter of the late Thomas Cook, of Point Pleasant, N. J., aged 60 years.

Interment at Friends' Cemetery, Manasquan, N. J.

GOODWIN.—Near Jenkintown, Pa., Twelfth month 31, 1898, William T. Goodwin, aged 76 years, father of the late William T. Goodwin, Jr., who was superintendent of Friends' Beach Street Mission First-day School.

Interment at Salem Friends' ground, New Jersey.

GROFF.—At the residence of Heulings Lippincott, Cinnaminson, N. J., on the morning of First month 5, 1899, Benjamin Groff, in his 90th year.

HOPPER.—At New York, in the first hour of the new year, 1899, there entered into rest Maria Hopper, a loved woman whose friends sorrow that they will see her face no more. She was the daughter of Edward Hopper and Anna Mott.

[She was the last of the family of the late Edward and Anna Mott Hopper, of Philadelphia. She was the granddaughter of Isaac T. Hopper, and of James and Lucretia Mott. She was in her 54th year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.]

IRISH.—At Amawalk, Westchester county, N. Y., Twelfth month 30, 1898, James V. Irish, aged 58 years.

The funeral was held in Friends' meeting-house, Amawalk, where a large company of relatives and friends assembled, and many testimonies were borne concerning him. In his removal the meeting has sustained a loss of one who was ever ready to lend a helping hand in meeting affairs, and in the entertainment of Friends at his home.

IVINS.—At Easton, Pa., suddenly, First month 1, 1899, Dr. Horace Fremont Ivins, son of the late Isaac and Sarah Ivins, of Penn's Manor, Bucks county, Pa., aged 42 years, 12 months.

He was a student at Swarthmore College, and became a distinguished throat specialist, and was Professor of Laryngology at the Hahnemann College, Philadelphia.

KENDALL.—Suddenly, Twelfth month 31, 1898, at Friends' Boarding Home, West Chester, Pa., Ruth Anna M. Kendall, aged 78 years, formerly of Phoenixville, Pa.

LINE.—Twelfth month 22, 1898, at the home of her niece, Margaret F. Vail, Plainfield, N. J., Sarah S. Line, daughter of the late Ephraim Vail, in the 88th year of her age; a life-long member of Rahway and Plainfield Monthly Meeting.

McKELLAR.—At her home, in Hazelton, Pa., after a short illness, Twelfth month 14, 1898, Emily McKellar, wife of Dr. James McKellar, and daughter of Jacob and Louise Marsh, of Coldstream, Ontario, in her 36th year.

[She was a member of the Society of Friends by conviction and earnest for its welfare. Her remains were interred at Coldstream Friends' ground, on the 18th. The occasion was alluded to in Isaac Wilson's letter in the INTELLIGENCER of Twelfth month 31.]

MENDENHALL.—Twelfth month 15, 1898, at the home of her husband, James M. Mendenhall, Mill Creek Hundred, Del., Mary P. Mendenhall, in her 79th year.

Interment at Hockessin Friends' burying ground, Del., on the 19th.

MICHENER.—Twelfth month 16, 1898, at the residence of her son, Simpson B. Michener, New Hope, Pa., Sarah B., widow of Hugh B. Michener, of Plumstead, aged 81 years; an elder of Solebury, Pa., Monthly Meeting.

PICKETT.—Passed peacefully on to a higher life, at the home of her brother-in-law, Joseph Mendenhall, in Penn township, Morgan county, Ohio, Eighth month 12, 1898, Hannah, widow of James Pickett, in the 80th year of her age.

She was the daughter of Thomas and Mary Thorp, formerly of Philadelphia county, Pennsylvania. This dear Friend was a life-long member of the Society of Friends, ever diligent in attendance of meeting. She was clerk of Deerfield Monthly Meeting for a number of years, and also filled the station of overseer. For a number of years she had to travel on horse-back seven miles to meeting, yet she and her husband were seldom absent.

During her last illness, which lasted ten weeks, she was blessed with great patience; never once in all that time did an impatient word escape her lips, but she seemed to forget her own sufferings in her anxiety for her sister and others of the family, that they might not be overtaxed on her account, manifesting through all that she was remarkably supported by the Divine Hand. The close was so peaceful that those around her could not tell when her spirit left the earthly tenement, causing the desire to arise that our last moments might be as truly blessed with peace.

M. W. M.

ROSE.—At her residence in Newtown, Bucks county, Pa., First month 6, 1899, Mary W. Rose, widow of the late Aaron Rose, in the 90th year of her age.

Although not a member with Friends, she was an attender of Newtown Friends' Meeting as long as her health permitted.

RUSSELL.—At his home, Brooklyn, N. Y., First month 5, 1899, Prof. Henry R. Russell, formerly of Virginia, in his 67th year. Interment at Lincoln, Va.

THOMAS.—First month 5, 1899, at Sandy Spring, Montgomery county, Maryland, Lydia Gilpin Thomas, in the 87th year of her age; a member of Sandy Spring Monthly Meeting.

WALTON.—Twelfth month 25, 1898, Jennie T. Michener, wife of Howard J. Walton, and daughter of Catharine T. and the late Courtland Michener, aged 28 years.

Funeral from her late residence in London Grove township, Chester county, Pa. Interment at London Grove.

WOLF.—Suddenly, of heart trouble, First month 6, 1899, at Friends' Boarding Home, West Chester, Pa., Sarah Wolf, in her 84th year.

This aged woman had lived almost her entire life with Friends, having been for many years a valued housekeeper for Mordecai and Lydia Lee, well-known Friends of Uwchlan Meeting, Pa. When the infirmities of age became manifest, she felt she would like to end her days with Friends, and made application, and was received into the West Chester Boarding Home, where her gentle, kindly nature soon won the respect of all. For several years she has enjoyed this home, feeling that here she could independently enjoy a well-earned rest.

H.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—III.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

AFTER a pleasant social visit with our Friends at Yardley, and also with John and Sarah Ann Wildman, of Langhorne, we went on Seventh-day (Twelfth month 31), to Chester, to visit our friend Caroline V. Cutler and her family, where a hearty welcome was given us, which was much appreciated, as the day had proved to be a stormy one.

I returned in the evening to the city to meet our daughter and husband from Canada, but owing to some detention of the trains it was not until the ushering in of the New Year that we reached the Chester home again, and then, unlike the day previous, it was snow instead of rain, but we were made comfortable, and soon enjoying the needful rest.

But the time seems short, as we must leave at 7 a. m. for Concord. Notwithstanding sleet and snow, the trolley brought us to Wallingford in time for the train, and a conveyance waiting us at Concord, soon we were at the home of Lewis Palmer to wait until the meeting hour, when (considering the roads and weather as well as other services at the same time), a goodly number gathered in, and there was evidence of a satisfactory meeting.

We dined at Ralph M. Harvey's, in company with our friends Lewis Palmer and wife, enjoying the pleasant, social mingling until near the close of the afternoon, when their youngest son (who so kindly met us at the train in the morning) took us to Jacob Styer's for the night. A parlor meeting had been suggested, and a pleasant company gathered in where an interchange of thought and feeling was enjoyed.

We left early Second-day for the train, but found it one hour behind time, causing our friend Ellwood Marshall a long wait for us at Kennett Square. Arriving, we soon drove five miles over a rough road with the mercury five degrees below zero, to find a goodly number of Friends and others gathered in the meeting-house at Hockessin. The spoken word soon found free utterance and an attentive hearing, followed by many expressions of appreciation. After the business of their monthly meeting was over we were conveyed to the pleasant home of our friend Ellwood Marshall, where the physical was refreshed and the social enjoyed until time to return to Kennett. (My good wife had remained there, spending a restful day in the home of John and Margaret Yeatman.)

Third-day morning, we found the neat and spacious house at Kennett nearly filled. The presence of the children and teachers from Friends' School in no small measure added to the interest of the occasion. The lesson in the teaching of Jesus, found in his reference to the apparent neglect in not visiting him when sick and in prison, was enlarged upon, and its application to present privileges and possibilities sought for. After a few social calls our friend John Yeatman took us five miles to London Grove to enjoy again the hospitable home of our friends Bennett Walton and wife, and on Fourth-day morning we attended the monthly meeting held at that place. Like the preceding ones, it was blessed with the Divine presence, and a spirit of inquiry awakened as to our spiritual possessions and attainments.

Fifth-day morning, like the day before, was still mild and threatening rain, but another monthly meeting awaits us at New Garden, and a four miles' ride, though over muddy roads, is accomplished without any difficulty. The meeting was enjoyed and all, we trust, realized a living sense of the inspiration that could not be suppressed. After friendly greetings we were soon in the company of Friends, at the home of Samuel Wickersham, where the physical, social, and spiritual natures found both refreshment and enjoyment. Later, Bennett Walton and wife, with whom we have enjoyed so much, bade us farewell, leaving us in other hands. At 7.45 we met an appointment in the large hall in Avondale. Owing to the condition of the roads and weather, the meeting was not large, yet a number came from quite a distance, and we believe it to have been profitable.

We went to the home of Henry Pusey, where a good night's rest is welcomed, to be followed by a long ride of thirteen miles through the rain and mud to Homeville, but in a comfortable carriage and with the genial company of Thompson Richards and wife. We arrived safely (a little late) and were soon in the presence and near feeling with the pleasant company that awaited our coming, and although not as large as some other meetings, it was second to no other in that impressiveness of feeling that is better realized than described. Though the rain was still falling, we must move on. We came three miles on our return and dined at Samuel H. Broomell's, whose home is in a beautiful part of the country. We had to regret that our time was so short in this pleasant home, but with a long drive before us, we must leave, and at 6 p. m. we arrived again safely at Henry Pusey's, where my wife had remained for the day. And the ride of twenty-six miles, and service of the day, call for rest.

I. W.

AUTHORSHIP OF A POEM.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

IN response to my inquiry, last fall, through the INTELLIGENCER, regarding the authorship of a poem supposed by myself to be written by John G. Whittier, two replies were received, saying that a poem entitled "Mary Dyer," giving an account of her execution on Boston Common, had for its author Benjamin Rush Plumly. Had they not given a verse of it, this statement would have convinced me that I was mistaken, and that Whittier was not the author. But my poem is very different; it is entitled, "The Martyr," and is prefaced by an extract from Sewel's History, explaining the circumstances of Mary Dyer's banishment from New England, her return, and consequent execution. It commences in this wise :

"The Sabbath sun is shining clear, and beautiful and bright
On Boston roof and holy spire, it sheds its silent light ;
The hammer and the axe are still, the voice of mirth is o'er ;
The peaceful waters of the bay are slumbering on the shore."

It is composed of twenty four verses. Any one reading it and comparing it with the "Ballad of Cassandra Southwick," in J. G. W.'s complete works, cannot fail to note the similarity between the two poems. The subject has been revived in my mind by the appearance, in the INTELLIGENCER of Twelfth month 31, of the verses written by him, and never before published, at least not in his works. Also, last fall, shortly after sending my inquiry to the paper, I saw in a copy of The Friend a poem said to be by him and never published as his. The statement was there made that in his early manhood, while editor of a village paper, he frequently wrote verses for it without giving his name, wishing to convey the impression that his paper had a large number of contributors ; this may have been one of such, and therefore never gathered up for publication with his other writings.

The little clipping enclosed, which I would be glad to see in the INTELLIGENCER, strengthens the opinion that perhaps there may be others unpublished, and the one I have inquired about may be in that class. While nothing, it may be, of real importance will be gained by this correspondence and investigation, it is a satisfaction to know whether one is in the right or wrong even in a small matter, and if wrong, I wish to be set right. I might add that I was advised by a valued friend to whose library I had access while examining the poet's works, to pursue my search in this manner, as good might come of it, and certainly no harm could accrue.

Holder, Ill.

ELIZABETH H. COALE.

THE DISARMAMENT CONFERENCE.

To Friends' Philanthropic Union ; Dear Friends :

NEW YORK, First month 7, 1899.

The Philanthropic Committee of New York Monthly Meeting desires to call the attention of all the Committees of the Philanthropic Union to the subject of the Disarmament Convention, called in the Fifth month of this year, by the Czar of Russia.

We believe it to be an important step toward the abolition of war as a means of settlement for national difficulties, which is a reform in harmony with the fundamental principles of the Society of Friends.

We therefore urge that each of our Committees do all in their power to awaken a desire among the people for an International Court with such jurisdiction.

The work might be furthered by appeals through the press and otherwise, to all religious and philanthropic bodies to lend their aid to strengthen public sentiment in this direction. What the voters of this country want will be heeded by its rulers. The sufferings entailed by war are fresh in our minds, and there are indications that the time is, at least, ripe for such a court between Great Britain and the United States.

In this labor, we shall follow the precedent of our forefathers, of whom a newspaper says : " There is no feature in the early history of Pennsylvania so striking or so suggestive of thought, as the efforts of the Friends, controlling the Assembly from 1681 to 1756, to maintain peace, to avoid war, and to keep clear of military responsibility."

Surely the Representative Committees of our seven Yearly Meetings will express themselves either as a unit, or separately, to the authorities at Washington, urging the hearty coöperation of the United States toward the desired end.

On behalf of the Philanthropic Committee of New York Monthly Meeting.

HENRY N. HAVILAND, Chairman.

ELLA B. McDOWELL, Secretary, pro tem.

APPOINTMENTS IN THE INDIAN SERVICE.

INDIAN RIGHTS ASSOCIATION,

Philadelphia, January 4, 1899.

To the President, Executive Mansion, Washington, D. C. :

Sir : We, the undersigned members of the Executive Committee of the Indian Rights Association, take the liberty of addressing you upon a matter which we believe one of very great importance to the cause of Indian civilization. We are credibly informed that certain proposed exceptions are about to be made by your authority, in the Interior Department, which involve a withdrawal from the classified service of the following positions in the Indian Service : five special Indian Agents, eight special Allotting Agents, two special Commissioners, three Civil Engineers and Surveyors, five Examiners of Lands, and sixty-six Financial Clerks at Agencies.

We respectfully present our protest against these exceptions, for the following reasons : We have looked to the fulfilment of the promise made by you before assuming the high duties and responsibilities of the Presidency, to the effect that in relation to Civil Service reform no backward step would be taken by this administration, but on the contrary, the reform would be extended wherever practicable. We believe that if the exceptions referred to are made, it will involve a backward step. This, we think, no reasonable mind, well acquainted with the operations of the Indian Service and the history of Indian affairs during the last twenty-five years, can doubt. Our Society has labored ever since its inception towards securing an adoption of the merit idea throughout the entire Indian Service, and to that end we have welcomed every extension of the law by which appointments for partisan reasons have been rendered more difficult, and appointments solely with a view to securing competent and worthy incumbents have been facilitated. We respectfully submit that the proposed exceptions will accomplish only one result,—the reversal of this principle. This action will mean in practice that politicians, belonging to whatever party may be in power at the time, will have easier opportunity for putting into these places their friends and adherents.

On the basis of past experience we say without hesitation, this they will do, and they will do it to the evident detriment of the Service.

We are the more strongly prompted to make this protest since the present Honorable Commissioner of Indian Affairs has openly declared, as the result of his own experience, the importance of a complete extension of Civil Service reform principles and rules to the Indian Service. He has openly stated that in order to secure the very best results Indian Agents should be placed within the classified service. If the Honorable Commissioner's view be correct, and in it we heartily concur, it is evident that such exceptions as are proposed, at the very moment when he has felt called upon to advocate further inclusions within the rules, would be in the highest degree unfortunate.

We therefore earnestly trust, in view of these facts, that you may be willing to forego making the proposed exceptions, and to favor the further inclusions within the classified service, which your Honorable Indian Commissioner has advocated.

Respectfully,

O. W. Whitaker, Charles F. Jenkins, N. Dubois Miller, Philip C. Garrett, E. M. Wistar, Charles E. Pancoast, Albert B. Weimer, Herbert Welsh, Cor. Sec'y, I. R. A., J. Rodman Paul.

THE DOUKHOBORS.

JOSEPH S. ELKINTON obtained the approval of his (Philadelphia) monthly meeting, (Fourth and Arch streets Friends), to meet the first company of the immigrants from Batoum, on their arrival, about the middle of the present month, and to hold a few meetings with them.

We have received from England No. 7 of the pamphlet "News of the Doukhobors," edited by V. Tchertkoff, at Purleigh. This is largely occupied with an account of the visit of Aylmer Maude and his companions to Canada, and their arrangements for the immigration, all of which we have given in the INTELLIGENCER pretty fully.

Letters from the settlers in Cyprus up to Twelfth month 5, report the improvement in health maintained, and that the doctors insist that the seeds of their ailments were sown before reaching the island. Though there had been little rain, the wheat sown had come up, and the people "realize that with all the disadvantages of the climate (which are great) it is easier to grow enough food to live on where they now are than in the parts of the Caucasus they left. The women have shown the greatest courage and determination in facing all the difficulties of the situation."

Aylmer Maude writes the INTELLIGENCER from his home, (Wickham's Farm, near Danbury, Essex, England), on the 28th ult., that he reached home on the 16th. The steamer Lake Huron left Batoum on the 22nd, with over 2,100 Doukhobors on board. "She was to go in the first instance to Halifax, N. S., and if, on arrival there the health of the immigrants was satisfactory, she would proceed to St. John, N. B.; otherwise, they would land at Halifax. A young member of our 'Colony' group, (at Purleigh, in Essex), Herbert P. Archer, has volunteered to go to Canada, to assist the Doukhobors. He expects to leave England on the 5th of January, and is, I think, a very suitable man for the work."

A. Maude also mentions, (with reference to our statement in our issue of Twelfth month 17), that the Canadian Government grant of money may amount in all to some $35,000, or $37,000, according to the number of immigrants. "The limitation to $15,000 only refers to what the Government can pay in cash, this fiscal year.—i. e., to July 1st next. The balance agreed on will be paid after that date, and the Committee at Winnipeg will have to proceed on the faith of this anticipated payment."

Only one addition has recently been made to our fund.

THE "INTELLIGENCER" FUND.

S. C. W., Madison, Wis.,	$1.00
Previously acknowledged,	242.25
Total,	$243.25

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn, was held in Brooklyn, Twelfth month 11. The different sections reported, the Current Topics Section giving a particularly interesting report. One item of interest was the changes and improvements which are being made by John Russell Young, the Librarian, in the great Congressional Library at Washington. He is having a special room prepared for the blind, where they can read the books printed for their reading, and 10,000 books have been ordered down into a room prepared for children.

The paper of the evening, "Little Worries and how to get over Them," proved very interesting and helpful if we would only profit by it. The writer pointed out that many times we had too exalted ideas, and because we did not succeed in living up to them we made ourselves and those around us unhappy by worrying about it. The things we worry over are often imaginary, as they never come to pass. We should be ambitious to do everything to the best of our ability, and then be cheerful and happy so as to help others around us, who are often, perhaps, as discouraged as we. If we try to be cheerful and bear patiently the little things that do worry us, we will be stronger and better prepared to meet great trials when they come. Our moods are contagious and we must not thrust our cares and worries into other people's lives, but instead try to throw in all the sunshine we can.

The meeting adjourned after a few minutes of silence, to meet First month 8, as the next meeting falling on Christmas day would be omitted, and a social meeting held New Year's Eve.

The meeting previous, Eleventh month 25, was very small, owing to a severe storm, and the few who met spent most of the time discussing the Indiana Conference.

A. T. S.

LITTLE BRITAIN, PA.—Penn Hill Young Friends' Association met Twelfth month 11, 1898. The President opened the meeting by reading Romans, 12. Minutes of previous meetings were then read.

Mabell A. Haines read a paper on the "Boyhood of Whittier." An interesting report was made by the delegate to the late West Chester Conference. The paper written by Dr. Jesse H. Holmes on "Complaints and their Cures," was read by Howard Coates. Notes from Jane P. Rushmore's discussion were also given. Both were favorably commented upon. It was thought we will hear more of the suggestion in regard to answering the Queries as they do in England, though most of us had never heard of it before. A very interesting paper on "Current Topics" was read by Henry Bicknell.

New officers were appointed for the ensuing year. The Sentiment Roll was then called, those of the Literature Committee choosing from Whittier.

Twelfth month 25. This meeting was called to order by our new president, Robert K. Wood. Minutes of last meeting were read by Annie Hambleton, the secretary.

First committee report was by Robert K. Wood, who read Seventh Chapter of Janney's History, Volume 3. Sarah Hambleton read part of Chapter 8, and then from Walton and Brumbaugh's Stories of Pennsylvanias, bearing on Penn and the Germans.

"Our Opportunities," prepared by Sarah Bancroft, was read by Phebe L. Coates and was much appreciated. Several points were enlarged upon or emphasized. Elmira Wood read the Queries of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting in comparison with our own (Baltimore Yearly Meeting).

Neal Hambleton reported at length on Current Topics, It being late, sentiments were omitted. Adjourned to meet First month 8, 1899.

PHEBE L. COATES, Cor. Sec.

HOPEWELL, VA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held 12th month 25. The president opened the meeting by reading the 17th Chapter of John. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved. Reports of the various committees were read.

Jonathan Branson, under the head of History, presented a fac-simile letter from Mary Pemberton to George Washington, written in Philadelphia, 3d month 31, 1778; also his reply, written at Valley Forge, 4th month 6, 1778, granting her request "For protection of wagons with supplies, and for the persons we may employ to go with them." Lydia W. Irish read "Christmas at Bethlehem." Mary S. Lupton, under Discipline, wished to impress upon the thoughts of those whose characters are just shaping for maturity, the extreme importance of every act. Some one has said "No act we perform ends in itself." It leaves behind it in the nervous centres a tendency to do the same thing again. Let all then, and particularly the young, guard the habits they form. Guard the thoughts, that they be kept pure and clean. Guard the tongue, that only kindly speech falls from it. Guard the bodily habits, that they bring you health and fulfill well the office of their creation.

Referred Question, "Why are Friends opposed to War?" was answered by William E. Huyett. Friends have always consistently protested against war in all its form, and while they acknowledge that temporary troubles may result from adopting the principle of non-resistance, they have so strong a faith in its being essentially the dictate of Divine love to the Christian heart, that they believe God, by his wise and omnipotent providence, can and will yet, make it mighty to the pulling down of the stronghold of iniquity. The world, they believe, will by and by confess that the peace-makers are most truly the children of God.

Under new business the Nominating Committee was appointed to present names for officers of the Association for the ensuing five months. After a few moments of silence the meeting closed.
A. J. R.

CINCINNATI, OHIO.—The Friends' Association met at the home of I. W. Butterworth, Eleventh month 27, 1898. A very able paper was read by George Bailey on "What the Church should do for International Relations." The discussion upon the same subject, led by Charles Johnson, was animated.

The last meeting of the Association was held in the parlors of the Social Settlement of Cincinnati, Twelfth month 18. Barclay Spicer read an excellent paper on "What the Church should do for Politics." Nathaniel Murray opened the discussion upon the subject by asking some pertinent questions.

The meetings are all well attended, and the members are much interested in the series of topics taken for the winter.
RUTH BUTTERWORTH, Ass't Clerk.

FLEMING, PA.—Our Young Friends' Association held its regular meeting at 3 o'clock p. m., on the first day of the year, in the meeting-house.

Though we were but few in number, yet we felt to testify to the truth of the words of Jesus, that "Where two or three are gathered together in my name there will I be in the midst of them." An interesting program was participated in by all present, as follows: Opened by the President, Bertha K. Cleaver reading a part of the third chapter of 1st Corinthians. This was followed by the reading of "New Year's Resolutions," from the INTELLIGENCER, by Eva W. Cleaver. Mary Fisher then explained to the Association who Titus was.

Some history of the Doukhobor people, their religious principles and persecutions, was given by the Secretary. After hearing of those tribes of people who suffer thus, we ought to be more thankful for our privileges, and the many blessings granted us, and extend to them our sympathy in whatever way we are permitted to do so.

Some remarks were made by the President and others on the possibilities for the coming year, that we should make new resolutions, and endeavor to carry them out, and to advance spiritually, as well as in a temporal sense.

A piece, entitled "A New You," was read, showing that we ought not to look so much to the New Year as to the renewing of ourselves. The purity of the fresh-fallen snow was spoken of as being typical of the New Year. Pauline Smith read a story of a "Little Swiss Girl," telling how she had converted her papa by sacrificing her own life.

The program for next meeting was announced. Closed in silence.
NANNIE M. FISHER, Sec'y.

HORSHAM, PA.—The meeting of the Young Friends' Association of Horsham, was called to order by the vice-president, William J. Penrose, Twelfth month, 1898, at 2.30 o'clock.

E. Burton Satterthwaite read from the fourth chapter of Luke, after which Emily Coale read from Longfellow's "Tales of a Wayside Inn." This was much appreciated by all.

The question was brought before the Association, "Are Silent Meetings Profitable for the Young?" and was answered by Martha Parry, Howard T. Hallowell, and Anna T. Twinning. They seemed to think there was no doubt but what a silent meeting was profitable at times, but thought we were always glad to hear a good sermon.

Some thought an hour too long to hold meeting in silence. Lizzie Parry, Susan Jarrett, and Alvin Haines made remarks on the question. Alvin Haines thought it was not intended we should have silent meetings, and if there was faithfulness on the part of those at the meetings, they would not be silent.

Howard Comly next gave us a recitation. The Introduction to the Discipline was read by Annie R. Comly.

Mary Parry, who was to have read at our last meeting, not being present then, read from the Life of George Fox at this meeting.

William H. Parry, of Hainesport, N. J., gave us an eloquent address on the "Negroes of the South." In this he described how the negro was robbed of his right to vote, and was still treated harshly in other ways. Booker T. Washington, (a negro), and his great school at Tuskegee, Alabama, for colored youth, were spoken of.

After a few voluntary sentiments the meeting adjourned to meet First month 29, 1899.

ELLEN B. MOORE, Sec.

CONFERENCE AT HORSHAM.—On an ideal winter's afternoon,—so beautiful in fact as to make us think Old Sol and his attributes were in accord with our work,—a number of Friends and others gathered to attend the conference at Horsham, which had been announced in these columns.

James Q. Atkinson made a short opening address on the subject chosen for the day, followed by a Scripture reading by Susan H. Jarrett, of Horsham, after which Prof. Joseph S. Walton, of Friends' Central School, spoke entertainingly, and in an instructive manner as well, on "Improper Publications."

In commencing he gave especial weight to the argument in favor of good literature by comparing our inward forces for good to the stored and hidden force in coal, which having received through all the ages warmth and heat from the sun, the source of both, was now able, on occasion, to give so freely again of what it had received. The slate, however, not having been receptive, could not give anything to aid and cheer. The inference is so plain we need not explain further.

Imaginative power in human minds causes us to bridge many chasms and pitfalls in our lives, and enables us to see the world beyond. This is impaired by the short editorials and stories, etc., of our modern journalism, which permits of little concentration of thought, and what we have is lessened by this habit of jumping from one subject to another.

He further beautifully compared the life of a child to a light in a light-house; the parents desiring it to have the oil of knowledge, and endeavoring, too, to keep the wick of learning well trimmed; yet all this matters so little if the little moths of light literature are allowed to spot and dim the glass in front, and the reflectors become tarnished. Every life is a light of power somewhere, to save and help another.

Isaac H. Hillborn spoke of the power of habit, and cited the instance of the anaconda and the snake-charmer; the latter, after all his years of mastery, finally succumbed to the thralldom of the lower nature. So with boys of to-day smoking cigarettes, allowing the smoky serpents to coil above their heads, who are fitting themselves for the same end when this habit will master them.

Anna Jarrett gave an extract from Whittier's "Miriam;" and after a short silence the meeting adjourned and another profitable conference was placed on the annals of the Abington Philanthropic Committee.

A. C.

Byberry, Pa.

EDUCATIONAL.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.—On First-day afternoon occurred the first of a series of four lectures on the Bible, by Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, entitled "The Bible and its Contents." The lecture was well attended, and highly appreciated. The three remaining lectures by Dr. Holmes will be delivered on successive First-day afternoons at 4.15, on the following subjects: "The Hebrews and their Neighbors," "The Jewish Kingdom," and "Some Connecting Links between the Old Testament and the New."

College work was resumed on First month 5, after the usual vacation. The sickness, (grippe, etc.), which had become epidemic before the holidays, seems to have entirely disappeared, and regular work proceeds without interruption.

In Fifth-day morning collection, last week, Dr. Magill gave a brief and very interesting account of his recent call upon President McKinley at Washington, in which the latter outlined the policy of the administration in regard to "expansion."

Dr. Magill was on his way home, at the time of his call at the White House, from the meeting of the Modern Language Association. This was held on the 28th, 29th, and 30th of Twelfth month, at the University of Virginia, Charlottesville. Dr. Magill read a paper relating to the system of French correspondence, and a committee on the subject was appointed, of which he is chairman. He was accompanied to Charlottesville by (his daughter) Beatrice Magill. '99.

THE "SWARTHMORE PHOENIX."—The current number of the Phoenix deals with subjects relative to the "West House," the interesting old house on the college campus so well known as the birth-place of Benjamin West, the celebrated artist. An ode by John Russell Hayes, entitled "The West House," and an article "The College Ownership of the West House," by Dr. William Hyde Appleton, are features of the issue.

THE SOUTHERN SCHOOLS.—Robert Benson, in a recent letter from the Schofield School, at Aiken, S. C., says: "We have a full school and excellent teachers. I do not think there could be less friction where there are so many. A spirit of mutual helpfulness pervades them."

Abby D. Munro writes from Mt. Pleasant, S. C., on the 8th: "We are having very cold weather; are all well, and everything going on well. Funds do not come in very fast, though."

DEATH OF HENRY R. RUSSELL.—His many friends will be shocked by the announcement of the death of Prof. Henry R. Russell, of New York, (residence, Brooklyn), one of the teachers, this year, at Friends' Seminary, Sixteenth street and Rutherford Place. He has been during his life-time busily and efficiently engaged in the work of education in the Society of Friends. He was for some years principal of the school at Woodbury, N. J., later of the Academy at Millville, Pa., and for three or four years past has been in New York, where he took a course of study and received the degree of Pd. D. We sincerely lament his loss.

LECTURES AT GEORGE SCHOOL.—Lectures are to be given at George School, this year, by Prof. Robert Rogers, of Drew Seminary. First month 13, and First month 27, on "The Hebrews in Egypt, and the Exodus;" by President R. E. Thompson, of the Boys' High School, Philadelphia, Second month 24, on "The Evolution of the Dwelling-House." Hamilton W. Mabie, of the Outlook, will lecture in the latter part of Third month, and two other lectures, on the 10th of Second month, and 10th of Third month, remain to be arranged. Lectures at 3.30 p. m., unless otherwise announced.

LITERARY NOTES.

WE referred, recently, in a paragraph in this column, to the new series of "Present Day Papers." (They are advertised elsewhere.) We have from J. Wilhelm Rowntree, York, England, the volume containing the earlier of these papers, and making Volume One of the series. The papers in this are six in number, the topics being "Worldliness," by Edward Grubb; "Faith," by M. Catharine Albright; "The Mission of the Society of Friends," by Edward Grubb; "Fellowship," by Wm. Charles Braithwaite; "The Restoration of the Bible," by Edward Worsdell; and "Drifting," by Joan Mary Fry. They are all earnest, thoughtful, and suggestive papers, and "constructive, rather than destructive." The volume makes 94 pages; the price is 50 cents. Friends' Book Association will receive orders for it.

OUR COUNTRY.

ON primal rocks she wrote her name,
Her towers were reared on holy graves,
The golden seed that bore her came
Swift-winged with prayer o'er ocean waves.

The Forest bowed his solemn crest,
And open flung his sylvan doors;
Meek Rivers led the appointed Guest
To clasp the wide-embracing shores.

Till, fold by fold, the broidered Land
To swell her virgin vestments grew,
While sages, strong in heart and hand,
Her virtue's fiery girdle drew.

O Exile of the wrath of kings!
O Pilgrim Ark of Liberty!
The refuge of divinest things,
Their record must abide in thee.

First in the glories of thy front
Let the crown jewel Truth be found;
Thy right hand fling with generous wont
Love's happy chain to furthest bound.

Let Justice with the faultless scales
Hold fast the worship of thy sons,
Thy commerce spread her shining sails
Where no dark tide of rapine runs.

So link thy ways to those of God,
So follow firm the heavenly laws,
That stars may greet thee, warrior-browed,
And storm-spiced angels hail thy cause.

O Land, the measure of our prayers,
Hope of the world, in grief and wrong!
Be thine the blessing of the years,
The gift of faith, the crown of song.

—Julia Ward Howe.

THE CINNAMON BUN.

THERE'S a modest brown cake
Philadelphians make,
Which they've christened the cinnamon bun,
That for richness of flavor,
And crispness, and savor,
No rival has under the sun.

Oh, the currants and spice,
And the perfumes so nice,
That rise from the pan, when it's done!
And the sugary dust,
On the sticky sweet crust
Of the glorious cinnamon bun!

You may talk of the pies
By whose frequency and size
The Yankees attain their renown ;
But the laurels are won
By the cinnamon bun,
That is made in the old Quaker Town.

—C. St. John Hofman, in the Basis.

THE SOUTHERN "RACE" TROUBLES.

The following letter appeared in The State, daily newspaper of Columbia, S. C., on the 27th ultimo. The writer, Richard Carroll, a colored minister, at present chaplain of a volunteer regiment in the United States service in Cuba, is a man whose career promises good for his people. He was recently chosen a Trustee of the Schofield School, at Aiken, S. C. (The State editorially commented on the letter, and favorably, but disapproved holding meetings.)

To the Editor of The State:

For the last two months the papers have given the so-called "negro problem" a great deal of space in their columns. If I live I hope to return from Cuba and settle somewhere in South Carolina, and give my best energies to the work of lifting up humanity. I hope to settle all my debts and owe no man anything but love and service. My highest ambition is to be a man, simply a man, without color or distinction—to live above race prejudice and love all men.

I hope the colored readers of your paper will not accuse me of trying to "get on the good side of the white people" in South Carolina by my making a few suggestions to the leaders of the race, or that the white people will misjudge me. I am opposed to the "mass meetings" held in the north by the colored leaders on the "race troubles in the south," etc. These meetings do the negro race more harm than good, and are doing more to unite the white people of the entire country against the negro than anything I know of. The leaders claim that they are "creating sentiment." That is true, but "the sentiment" is against the race. The meetings should be held in the south, not in the north. The evil and remedy are both in the south. Let the leaders call a meeting where the lynchings and outrages—race conflicts—occur, and invite the white and colored citizens of the community, town or city, to meet together. Let there be a meeting at Phoenix, S. C., and Wilmington, N. C. There are fair-minded and conservative white citizens in every community in the south, and the colored men must appeal to this class (and to the "lynchers" also, if possible), for justice.

The appeals to the President or Congress do no good, for they are powerless. If the President placed a soldier at the door of every negro's home, it would only make matters worse, and the race would suffer more than now. The governors of the southern States are powerless. We must create sentiment in every county, home, school, and pulpit. The best element of the colored race will have to lay hands on the lawless, idle, and criminal population and bridle them. It is strange, but it is true, that the better class of the white race in the south and the same class of negroes are strangers, for they hardly ever meet. The "lower class" of the whites and blacks know each other, for they meet in barrooms, alleys, houses of ill-repute, and in the darkness. Therefore, "my people are destroyed for the lack of knowledge." To say that "all coons look alike" is not true, for I have seen "white coons" in the swamps, as well as black ones. The negro race is advertised daily on trains, corners of the streets, railway stations, and on "the lynching trees," by this unbridled element that is known of all men. The time has come for the better class to meet and come to some understanding; at the same time guard against social equality, for that will be a "fly in the ointment." I love the south and want to live in it. I believe the majority of the colored race are in it to stay, and the time has come for us to know our neighbors and make friends. I am glad that the President is striving to unite the north, south, east, and west. It will be better for the negro race. We have lived for thirty years on the popular breeze from the wave of the "bloody shirt." The Republican party in the south has been black—all black—long enough, and the Democratic party should cease to be all white. Let the country be united and there will be "more and better" negro farmers, physicians, mechanics, merchants, business men, editors, lawyers, servants, churches, schools, and consecrated preachers among the race. The negro will begin to lay the foundation stones of permanence and gather the jewels at his feet. He will need all the help he can get, north and south, but he must "begin at Jerusalem." There are too many colored people in certain localities for their good or the whites who live among them. They should "scatter" over the United States. Some ought to move to Cuba and Africa. The white people should have sympathy and patience with the race and help them to work out their salvation. It takes a long time to make a race.

With all the institutions of the white race they find that "there is room for improvement." Look at the depths from which the colored race has had to come, and their wanderings in the wilderness under bad leadership, and you will say "what progress!"

If I were in South Carolina at this time I would hold meetings at Phoenix, Republican Church (Edgefield county), other places close up at Lake City, and make my report to Governor Ellerbe with not one broken bone. Such "indignation meetings" with the white citizens and the "best thinking members of the colored race" (as editor People's Recorder calls them) will do more good than all the meetings held by the northern colored leaders for the last twenty years.

The physician must go where the disease is and there make the diagnosis of the case and apply the remedies at hand. The race must appeal to the laws of the south and make sentiment where it will help. It will never do to appeal to arms, violence, or force, except to protect their homes against all intruders by day and night. I again repeat, let the "best element" call meetings and invite the white people. Let those who wish to "fight, burn," etc., come and speak out in this meeting. Let them come nearer than Chicago, New York, or Washington, and if they are sure the race question can be settled forever, and there be "no hereafter," I will enlist as a private in the ranks and obey orders from "the superior officers." But I believe we will "perish with the sword," and I prefer a more excellent way. Come now, let us reason together, ye colored and white men. Let us agree to oppose crime, rape, theft, lynchings, murder, riot, deceit, drunkenness, adultery, dirt, the devil, idleness, lewdness, and all manner of lawlessness. Justice before the law, and fair dealings on the part of the lawmakers and breakers (in the past) added will cause this southland to put on a new garment, bud and blossom as the rose, while the (their) children of darkness will skip like lambs in the green pastures, and the Southland will exclaim, "these are my jewels."

RICHARD CARROLL,
Chaplain Tenth U. S. V. I.

SANITARY VALUE OF HIGH FORESTS.

From an Address by Dr. J. T. Rothrock, Commissioner of Forestry, of Pennsylvania, before the State Medical Society at Lancaster, Pa.

It is now more than forty years since I began as a young man to observe the character of the various portions of this State; and I may add, incidentally, that chances for comparison of the conditions existing here with those of other and distant parts of North America have not been wholly wanting. When my observations began, there was an area of about 8,000 square miles nearly in the center of this State which was almost a continuous and unbroken forest. That is, about one-sixth of the State was as yet almost wholly in its original condition. Besides this, in those counties which were among the earliest settled, there was over the State, on the average, perhaps as much wood as cleared land. At the present time, of the large tract to which I have just alluded, hardly a vestige remains over which the axe and the fire have not gone. But one or two original forests of considerable size remain in the State. I make these statements merely to show how rapidly these changes have taken place, and then to ask whether, if woodlands have any hygienic relation to the Commonwealth, it is not time proper steps were taken to protect and restore such as it is the interest of the State to have.

From the time of the early Aryans to the present, men have longed for the freedom and rejuvenation which are associated with the woods. We Pennsylvanians spend thousands of dollars annually in the Adirondacks (to the great advantage of New York) mainly because we have destroyed the primitive attractiveness of our own woods. In certain counties of this State there are large areas where agriculture is impossible, and even grazing gives but slight hope of ever becoming remunerative. Much of it is now abandoned, and sooner or later will come into possession of the State. Protective fire laws will in all probability allow restoration of the timber growth.

Certainly the area can be turned to no better purpose than that of a State forestry reservation. As such it will be the property of the people, dedicated to their use, and to be forever administered for the good of the whole people. In these reservations the sanitariums of the future will probably be located.

About the year 1872 a distinguished surgeon of Wilkesbarre, a man of real talent and skill, who had so endeared himself to the community that any harm to him had come to be regarded as a public calamity, had reached such a point with pulmonary tuberculosis that it became impossible for him to continue longer in active professional work. It was in the month of March, on a raw, inclement day, that he volunteered to accompany me on a thirty-mile drive to North Mountain, one of the highlands of the State in Sullivan county. He was desperate, and ready to do anything which promised good. I wonder now at my own willingness to have him undertake the trip. But it was his choice. By three o'clock in the afternoon we were driving slowly up the rough road, in the last stage of our drive. A blinding snow-storm came on. He was almost exhausted, and as the temperature became lower he was chilled, and when we reached the house I feared he would collapse completely before reaction could be established. We were not expected at the hotel, and no preparation for his coming had been made. However, we at once set to work to provide warm apartments for him and to get him to bed. Restoratives were administered, and in a few hours he had fairly commenced to rally. Day after day he gathered strength, until his gain was an amazement to even himself. In six weeks he left the place, went back to Wilkesbarre, and practiced his profession during that entire summer, through the fall and winter, until the following spring, when he began again to decline. His friends then sent him off for a month or two to Cuba. No good was received from the trip. He returned home, and in a few months died. There never has been in my mind a doubt that a residence of a year or two on North Mountain would have saved that most valuable life, or at least greatly prolonged it.

The second case was that of a well-known geologist, of New York City. Within ten days after he reported for duty on one of the Government topographical parties he was sleeping out on the ground in the open air, at an altitude of from ten thousand to twelve thousand feet above sea level. This was in the month of June. The air was still raw and cold from the masses of snow which lay unmelted in the immediate vicinity of the camp. But to make a long story short, he bravely endured all the hardships of frontier life, and did all the work his strength allowed under the not very tender treatment he received, from June to November, and when he rode his mule into Denver at the end of the season he had slept out the night before on the bosom of mother earth while the thermometer stood at twelve degrees below zero. He returned to New York City with a gain of twenty pounds of solid flesh. For two years more he continued in the same service, and lives to-day, one of the most honored scientists of the land.

Another case in the same expedition was an unfortunate private soldier who was sent as one of our military guard from Fort Leavenworth. He was tall, stoop-shouldered, sallow, and with a hectic flush and constant cough and expectoration which would have rendered any other diagnosis than that of consumption an absurdity. As the summer wore away he gathered strength, and the present speaker, as the medical officer of the party, knows that he neither asked nor received any medical aid. When autumn came, and the party was disbanded, after five and a half months of active field service, sleeping out every night with no other shelter than the blankets and the sky, this same apparently hopeless man was returned to his company rugged, ready for duty, and with a gain in weight of almost thirty-five pounds. Twenty-three years later he was found in Pennsylvania "tramping his way" toward a distant soldiers' home.

Let there be one qualifying statement here. I advise such treatment only for the early stages of the disease. To make it successful, we must have a fair natural recuperative power left, and above all, while the pure air has full access to the lungs the patient should be so protected that he burns up the minimum of tissue in keeping warm.

The pine woods of Minnesota, which, within the memory of most of us, were popularly regarded as regions of special sanitary value, have certainly lost much of the esteem in which they were once held. We are informed that the air has become more raw since the removal of the tempering cover of timber. The health authorities of several of our western cities have alleged that pneumonias have become more common than formerly, and that there has been a notable increase in the pulmonary tuberculosis of the surrounding districts which is not to be accounted for on the mere increase of population; that, in other words, there is an increase in the percentage of such cases.

LONDON LITERARY NEWS.

London Letter to the Literary Era, (H. T. Coates & Co.), Philadelphia.

A REPORT comes from "Brantwood" that John Ruskin is at present in good health, "ready and even eager to listen, but extremely silent and uncommunicative." He still brightens, however, when he hears about the Alps. "Once get the master," said his faithful attendant, "to be interested in an Alp, and he is himself again." The poet and critic is now in his eightieth year, but he comes of a long-lived race, his father having died at seventy and his mother at ninety. His quiet life at Brantwood is passed in long walks, chess, and novel reading.

One of the most interesting facts in connection with the new "Bismarck" book pertains to the translation, which was done, I believe, inside of a week. The publishers placed the translation in charge of Mr. A. J. Butler, who enlisted a corps of assistants. Dr. Richard Garnett was consulted in the matter, and chose six names,—Mrs. William Sharp, Miss Alice Zimmern, Mr. Barwick, Mr. Nisbet Bain, Mr. de Villiers, and Mr. K. Sharp. These translators, who are among the best German scholars in England, bore the brunt of the work, and the apparent dissimilarity which the book shows in fluency of translation is due to slight differences in the abilities of the translators.

When William Black, the dead novelist, was young, he visited Carlyle in Cheyne Row. He was told by the Chelsea sage, "Aye, aye, ye ken Scotland weel eneuch; but whan are ye gaun to do some wark?" The history of English fiction in the last thirty years shows that Black, in the face of many physical difficulties, did much creditable labor.

It will surprise many people to hear that Mrs. Edward FitzGerald has just died. The marriage between this quiet and sweet daughter of the Quaker poet, Bernard Barton, and FitzGerald, the first of Omarians, was a curious match, and ended sadly. She knew Lamb intimately, and her delightful conversation was in recent years marked by priceless revelations of the inner life of "gentle Elia." Mr. E. V. Lucas, who recently published a memorial of the Lloyd family, with which Lamb was closely associated, met Mrs. FitzGerald in the course of his investigations, and it is to him we owe a pleasurable and appreciative account of the old lady's career which was recently published in The Academy. Had it not been for that article, few people would have known of a genuine loss to the literary world.

THE GREAT PHILADELPHIA CLOCK.

THE great clock on the Tower of the City Hall, at Broad and Market streets, Philadelphia, was started at midnight on the 31st ult., in other words, with the first minute of 1899. The dials are placed on the four sides of the tower, 370 feet above the street. The clock is said to be "the greatest municipal clock in this country, if not in the world."

The four dials are immense. They are each 25 feet in diameter. They are framed in cast iron, faced with phosphor bronze, so arranged as to divide the glass faces into ninety-eight parts, without marring their appearance or shading the light which illuminates them at night. This division of the glass was necessary, because the wind pressure would promptly destroy any large segments. An elastic putty makes the joints of glass and metal air and water tight and yet allows for expansion and contraction. Frame and glass in each of the four dials weigh over five tons. The glass is three-eighths of an inch in thickness, and is of polished plate.

At such a height the Roman numerals so familiar upon the conventional clock face would not be distinguishable. Blocks of bronze, proportioned from the I up to XII, are used instead. The larger measure 38 inches in length and 14 inches wide, and the smallest is but one inch narrower in width. The apparent dots which spot the peripheries of the dials, marking the minutes, are plates of bronze 3½ inches square and 13 inches apart. Leaping from one of these points to another, as they majestically traverse the circumference, are the big minute hands. Steel framed and covered with copper, they are each, with counterweights, 16 feet long and weigh 225 pounds, while the hour hands are nine feet long and weigh 175 pounds each, making a total of 400 pounds to each pair, which are poised upon a ball-bearing arbor, or axis, projecting through the centre of the dial.

Back of each dial is set a huge metal disc enameled to a dazzling whiteness, and each disc is studded with 128 incandescent 16-candle-power lamps. When the current causes the lamps to glow with electric ardor the effect is superb, and the rays blend so as to make a perfect illumination. In fact, so complete is the light that the time will be distinguishable at a greater distance after nightfall than during the daylight.

Projecting through the centre of the disc to the rear the arbor is beveled, geared to a brass shaft which extends thirty feet downward to the dial mechanism. This is enclosed in a hardwood and glass-capped case, and consists of beautiful machinery in the way of ratchets, pawls, and wheels. Motion is given this mechanism by compressed air, which travels for 600 feet through tubes and is governed by the master clock on the seventh floor of the tower. The air is compressed into a cylinder of 400 gallons capacity and kept at a uniform pressure by two one-horse power electric motors. Either of these motors is capable of doing the entire work, but both are kept in service operating on the same shaft, so that in the event of an accident to one the other will maintain the full pressure. As a further precaution against the stoppage of the clock, through both electric motors becoming disabled, three water motors are constantly connected with the air compressor, and so adjusted that should the pressure fall below a certain point they immediately take up the work. These motors are located in the dynamo room, 600 feet distant from the dials.

The master mechanism which controls all is kept within a dust proof glass case, or, more properly, room, on the seventh floor.

ONE's chiefest duty here below
Is not the seeming great to do,
That the vain world may pause to see;
But in steadfast humility,
To walk the common walk, and bear
The thousand things, the trifling care,
In love, with wisdom, patiently.
Thus each one in his narrow groove
The great world nearer God may move.

—Matthew Hunt.

36

"THE platform woman," Edward Bok (editor) says in Ladies' Home Journal, "never has been a credit to, but always a blot upon, American women. I make this emphatic statement from a personal knowledge of the homes they leave behind when they go to their meetings." Whom he means by "platform woman" is not clearly explained; is it Lucretia Mott, Mary A. Livermore, or Frances Willard? If not these, or women like them, then who?

A CORRESPONDENT from Dover, Delaware, desires to know whether any one has attempted to graft the English walnut on the black walnut or butternut? If successful many a grove of black walnuts could be turned into great profit. It is said that in the vicinity Homosassa, Florida, large plantations are being made of the English walnut. These plantations have not yet come into bearing, and the healthy vigorous growth is all that can be desired.—Meehans' Monthly.

A FINE collection, numbering six thousand or seven thousand specimens of insects, has been made by the students of the Girls' Normal School of Philadelphia. Among them are boring-beetle, robber-fly, burying beetle, ordinary beetles, moths, katydids, butterflies, darning-needles, cockroaches, centipedes, and several kinds of crickets.

THE wheat crop of the world for 1898 is estimated by the United States Department of Agriculture at 2,640,000,000 bushels, the largest crop on record.

DRAWING ON THE BANK.

Zion's Watchman.

A LITTLE girl who had a rich papa, had also an iron savings bank, out of which, it is to be feared, she drew more than she deposited. Anyway, here is the way she became insolvent at her bank:

He was a bouncing big turkey; and they hung him by the heels, so that his nose almost touched the walk just outside the butcher's shop. A little girl was standing there and watching it. You could see that she was a hungry little girl; and worse than that, she was cold, too, for her shawl had to do for hood and almost everything else. No one was looking, and so she put out a little red hand, and gave the great turkey a push; and he swung back and forth, almost making the great iron hook creak, he was so heavy.

"What a splendid big turkey!"

The poor little girl turned round; and there was another little girl looking at the turkey, too. She was out walking with her dolls, and had on a cloak with real fur all around the edges; and she had a real muff, white with little black spots all over it.

"Good morning, miss," said the butcher man. You see he knew the little girl with the muff perfectly well.

"That's a big turkey, Mr. Martin."

"Yes," said the poor little girl, timidly. "He's the biggest I ever saw in my life. He must be splendid to eat."

"Pooh!" said the little girl with the muff. "He isn't any bigger than the one my papa brought home for Thanksgiving to-morrow."

"Could I have a leg, if I came for it to-morrow?" asked the poor little girl, softly.

"What, haven't you a whole turkey?"

"Never had one in my life," said the poor little girl.

"Then you shall have this one," said the little girl with the muff. "Mr. Martin, I've got some money in my savings-bank at home, and my papa said I could do just as I wanted to with it; and I'm going to buy the turkey for this little girl."

The poor little girl's eyes grew so very large you wouldn't have known them. "I shall love you always, so very, very much: and I'll go home for Foxy to help. Foxy is my brother, and I know we can carry him."

I haven't room to tell you all about it; but the poor little girl got her turkey, and papa his bill.

"What's this," said he, "another turkey, eighteen pounds, three dollars and sixty cents?"

"That's all right," said the little girl who had the muff. "I bought him, and gave him to a poor little girl who never ate one; and the money is in my iron bank."

The bank was opened, and there were just four big pennies in it!

BETWEEN the ages of twenty and thirty, where ten total abstainers die, thirty-one moderate drinkers die. Between the ages of thirty and forty where ten total abstainers die forty moderate drinkers die.

LIQUOR AND CIGARS IN NEW YORK.

HENRY W. WILBUR's newspaper, The True Reform, of New York City, quotes from the World figures giving the expenditure "by men," in that city, during the year 1898 for "wines, liquors, and cigars." The total amount thus expended is given as $109,000,000.

This is $34,000,000 more than the entire clothing bill of the city; $6,000,000 more than the amount spent by all the people for groceries. Men paid $20,000,000 more last year for liquor and cigars than was spent in the city for boots and shoes, coal and wood, gas, car fares, and hats.

The liquor and cigar bill of the men folks of Gotham was $69,000,000 more than the women spent for jewelry, dresses, hats, cloaks, and capes, entertainments, perfumery and cosmetics, candy, ice cream, and soda water. The women spent for these articles $40,484,305.

The whole city government of Greater New York cost, during 1898, $77,559,332, or $32,000,000 less than the drink and cigar bill of the city.

There were built in the city, in 1898, 5,312 residences, valued at $91,075,404. The money spent for the articles drank and smoked last year would have built all the residences put up in the city for the housing of families, and 1,000 just like them in addition.

The increase in real estate values in 1898 in the city was $63,180,317—just $40,000,000 less than the liquor and cigar bill.

The $109,000,000 spent for liquor and cigars would have paid the regular wages of 30,000 carpenters, painters, stone-masons, tailors, women coat-makers, and boot-makers, for a whole year.

Last year the public schools of the greater city cost $12,003,611, about one-eighth of the amount spent for liquors and cigars.

These figures are compiled from statistics furnished the World by Carroll D. Wright, of the National Labor Bureau; the Controller of New York, and the heads of the Bureau of Vital Statistics.

A REPORT comes from Keokuk, Iowa, of the successful use of crude petroleum on country roads. It is asserted that the petroleum makes a dirt road water-proof, so that it will stay dry and hard in wet weather. One barrel of it, worth ninety cents at the place of production, is said to be enough to treat one hundred feet of road twelve feet wide. At that rate, roads could be improved at the cost of about fifty dollars a mile. How long the effects of the treatment last does not appear.

A NEW industry in the county of Welland, Ontario, Canada, is the drying and compressing of peat for fuel. The process converts the crude peat, or swamp muck, into hard, dense blocks, the equal of coal in weight and value as fuel, while free from sulphur and clinkers, practically smokeless, and containing only two and one-half per cent. of ash.

JORDAN, MARSH & Co., proprietors of one of the largest department stores of Boston, set aside one per cent. of all the sales during one week in December as a Christmas gift to their employes.

EDMUND PARKER, once a slave in the Washington family, and a familiar character to all visitors to the Washington tomb, at Mount Vernon, over which for years past he has been a faithful guardian, died recently. He was born a slave in 1827.

Training Children.

Youth's Companion.

THE methods of training children have undergone a great change in the last fifty years in this country. A venerable lady recently told the following incident as a fact in her own childhood:

"I belonged," she said, "to a very strict family, in which gay clothing was considered a temptation of Satan. I saw one day in a shop window of the village, a pretty print, the color of the heart of a conch shell. I asked my mother to buy it for me. I was ten years old, and never had worn any but brown or gray stuff gowns.

"She looked amazed and horrified, but without a word went with me to inspect the pink muslin, and to ask the price of it.

"Coming out of the shop she said, 'The price is $5. I will not buy such a piece of vain folly, but if you choose to buy it for yourself I will not hinder you.'

"'I have no money!' I exclaimed.

"'If you give up butter, sugar, and molasses for six months you have earned the price of the dress,' she said.

"I agreed eagerly, but our tables were not then loaded with dainties as now. My fare was poor and hard that winter. However, I persevered, and one bright day the money was placed in my hand. I bought the lovely rose colored stuff, and carried it home with a high, beating heart.

"My father looked at it and at me with cold disapproval.

"'You have earned this finery,' he said, 'and can wear it if you choose, but think how much more worthy in God's eyes you would appear, if you gave it to poor, lame Peggy, the tailor's child.'

"I gave it to poor, lame Peggy, but in doing it my heart was full of fury and rebellion."

There were errors in judgment, no doubt, in the hard parental discipline of the earlier days, but is the excessive indulgence of young people now more wise and just? Self denial not learned in youth becomes a serious hardship, in middle life intolerable.

"Below Deck."

Sunday School Times.

MAN's greatest debt is to the invisible. This is true in a physical, common-life sense, quite as much as in the realm of the spiritual or the ideal. . . . A brave fellow writes from the flagship at Manila in behalf of the "men below deck." These are engineers, machinists, oilers, coal-passers, or still others. What were the navy without these heroes whose place is twenty feet below water-line? Every business in life has its men and women "below deck," upon whom success largely depends. Some of them are visible to the eye, but not to the appreciation of the public. Track-walkers and switchmen, compositors and proof-readers, janitors and sextons—these, and a hundred others, constitute that nobler kind of "submerged tenth," by whom we live, and to whom we forget to give the full meed of credit. We walk by a kind of half-conscious faith in them, but we ought to keep them in sight, for their own encouragement, if not for our own betterment.

Pennsylvania Public Schools.

THE reports and statistics on file in the Department of Public Instruction at Harrisburg show that there are 27,347 public schools in the State and 28,080 teachers.

The average salary of the male teacher is $42.69 per month and of the female teacher $38.45.

The whole number of pupils is 1,143,100, and the total amount paid for teachers' wages in 1897-8 was $10,332,759.97.

The increase in the number of schools was 641; decrease in salary of male teachers per month, $1.03; increase in salary of female teachers, 34 cents.

Delaware county pays the highest salaries, the average for male teachers being $77.48, and for female teachers, $45.58. Susquehanna county pays the lowest salaries.

Peter the Great in Friends' Meeting.

Christian Endeavor World.

It is just two hundred years ago since the famous Russian emperor, Peter the Great, then a young man of twenty-six, went on a visit to London, and lived for some time in Buckingham street. As the quiet and respectability of this spot did not suit the rather uncivilized czar, who loved drinking and rioting with his boon companions, he soon afterwards removed to Deptford, where in three months he damaged the house to the extent of $750.

Religion was not Peter's strong point, and one would think that the quiet simplicity of a Quaker service would be the last to attract such a man, and yet, curiously enough, during his sojourn at Deptford he used to attend the Friends' meeting-house there. The building is still in use, though it dates from 1692. It contains a large room and some smaller rooms, and has a little graveyard in the rear, only approached through the meeting-house, which is closely built on either side.

Peter retained his respect for the Society of Friends after he had left England. According to the journal of Thomas Story, it appears that, when in Germany in 1712, the emperor found his troops occupying a Quaker's meeting-house in Frederikstadt, and at once ordered them to vacate it. He then made it known that if the Friends resident in the town would assemble for a meeting he would attend it. This meeting took place, and the emperor, for the benefit of his generals, translated what was said by the German Quakers, and added his own commendations.

[The article adds that Friends preserve at the "old Deptford meeting-house a plain, wooden bench, which is said to be the actual seat that he used to occupy when at service."]

Value of Vaccination.

In a recent lecture delivered at Rome and reported in the London Lancet, Dr. Bizzozzero made a deep impression by his summing up of the argument for vaccination. He said:

Germany stands alone in fulfilling in great measure the demands of hygiene, having in consequence of the calamitous smallpox epidemic of 1870-71 enacted the law of 1874 which "makes vaccination obligatory in the first year of life and revaccination also obligatory at the tenth year." What was the result? With a population of 50,000,000, having in 1871 lost 143,000 lives by smallpox, she found by her law of 1874 the mortality diminished so rapidly that to-day the disease numbers only 116 victims a year. These cases, moreover, occur almost exclusively in towns on her frontier.

If it were true, continued Prof. Bizzozzero, that a good vaccination does not protect from smallpox we ought to find in smallpox epidemics that the disease diffuses itself in the well-vaccinated no less than in the non-vaccinated countries. But it is not so. In 1870-71, during the Franco-German war, the two peoples interpenetrated each other, the German having its civil population vaccinated optionally, but its army completely revaccinated, while the French (population and army alike) were vaccinated perfunctorily. Both were attacked by smallpox; but the French army numbered 23,000 deaths by it, while the German army had only 278; and in the same tent, breathing the same air, the French wounded were heavily visited by the disease, while the German wounded, having been revaccinated, had not a single case.

Holidays in New York.

NEW YEAR'S DAY used to be observed in New York with much drinking and intoxication, while Christmas was neglected. Now, the correspondent in that city of the Philadelphia Ledger says, Christmas has become the great festival of the year.

"Its religious observance is more general, while as a time of domestic festivity it has become more than New Year's ever was. The day is free from the drunkenness that finally brought New Year's into disrepute, and moreover it is essentially the children's day, and that fact and its religious significance will save it from the fate of the old Knickerbocker New Year's. But it may be questioned whether one feature of Christmas may not fall into the same disrepute as New Year's calling. I allude to the promiscuous and lavish exchange of presents among friends and acquaintances. It must be confessed, however, that there are no signs of a reaction against this custom this year."

Recipe For Ground-Nut Cakes.

[The Laing School Visitor prints the following.]

ONE of our friends requests us to send her old Tira's method of making her ground-nut cakes, which she peddles about the town.

So we insert in our November issue the receipt just as she gave it this afternoon,—with all her quaint, old-time interjections, while we sat before her with paper and pencil.

I gen'ly gits two quart groun-nut for ten cent; an shells dem for mornin, ma'am, yes ma'am!

I den mejers dem wid my pint cup what you gib me, ma'am, yes ma'am. I fines dat de two quart mek jus two pint, ma'am, yes ma'am!

Den I goes an buys a quart ob syrup for ten cent, and put it in de pot, ma'am, yes ma'am!

Den I stirs de two pint ob raw groun-nut, into de quart ob cold syrup an put de pot on de fire, an cook til he done, ma'am, yes ma'am!

I teck an holes up a little, ma'am, an if it string down like candy, den I know he bout done.

Den I bite tro'one groun-nut an if it be done, den I knows it be all proper done, ma'am, yes ma'am!

Den I get my little bench an puts my stone on it, an greezes it wid some lard, an I greezes my two knife, too, ma'am, yes ma'am!

Den I puts one big spoonful in a place, an spread it out flat wid de knife an keep em round and nice, ma'am. Dey cools right quick, ma'am, an I tecks dem off an puts dem in a pan an fill de stone again, till it all gone, ma'am, yes ma'am.

Den I lays dem all on a paper on my board, an goes out for to sell, ma'am, as you knows, ma'am, yes ma'am.

Sometimes I cuts up orange peel fine an puts it in to bile wid it for make it tast nice, ma'am, yes ma'am. An dats how I mecks it all, ma'am; an tank'e ma'am fer dis five cent, ma'am, yes ma'am.

"Remember the 'Maine.'"

AMONG the many things that just now discourage the lover of peace and civil liberty, we have found one that is very gratifying. Captain Sigsbee, who has been telling in the Century about the destruction of his ship in Havana harbor, says:

"Let me dismiss the prevailing impression that this motto was used in the United States navy, in the recent war, as a battle-signal. No United States naval vessel has entered into action flying the signal 'Remember the Maine.' I am glad that it can be so stated; yet one may excuse many mistaken expressions in the heat of action."

To this the Editor of the Century adds: "It may be said on the authority of Capt. John R. Bartlett, during the war chief intelligence officer of the navy: 'The signal "Remember the Maine," has never been displayed on a United States man-of-war or by the army or navy, with one exception. A signal quartermaster (an enlisted man) of the Coast Signal Service, hoisted the signal from the station at Port Eads, at the mouth of the Mississippi, when a transport loaded with troops was passing out to sea. In reporting the passing out of the transport, as was his duty, the quartermaster added to his message to headquarters the fact of display of signal, which was received with great enthusiasm by the troops. He was severely reprimanded by return message over the wires.'"

"WHY not stop talking about woman suffrage?" some one asked Mary A. Livermore. "Because legal injustice always begets social injustice," she replied. "Put a man down legally as a slave, and you damn him socially. Who shall not vote? Women and idiots, women and paupers, women and criminals. The ballot is the synonym and symbol of equality in a republic."

A Message to the Czar.

A FRIEND in Cincinnati sends a daily newspaper of that city which contains the programs of "Christmas services" at the different churches. At the Avondale Presbyterian church, at the close of the sermon, the congregation were to be offered cards, which when signed were to be sent to the Emperor of Russia, the following matter being printed on them:

The Avondale Presbyterian Church, Cincinnati, O., U. S. A., Christmas Morning, December 25, 1898. In the name of Jesus Christ, the Prince of Peace, I have this day lifted my heart in prayer for the success of the labors of the Czar of all the Russias to bring about the abolition of war—and I hereby dedicate myself to his assistance, and to the assistance of all who labor for this great end. I send a Christmas greeting to Your Royal Majesty, and beg you to accept the Christian love of an American citizen, who rejoices in your effort to hasten the day when

"The sword shall be beaten into the plowshare,
And the spear into the pruning hook."

Name
Address

Vermont's Abandoned Farms.

Burlington Free Press.

AFTER trying in vain to secure the occupation of its abandoned farms by foreign colonization, Vermont has found the most satisfactory solution of the problem to be the advertising of the existence of these lands in such a manner as to attract the attention of vigorous and thorough young farmers who are not afraid to work. The number of deserted farms in this State has been materially reduced in this manner, and at comparatively small expense; and now that all sections of the country are known to be similarly afflicted, no State need hesitate to advertise boldly to the world that it has a number of abandoned farms which can be purchased cheap, if, indeed, they cannot be had for the asking. In the meantime farms will continue to be abandoned until some philosopher discovers how to stop people from leaving the rural district for the cities.

METEOROLOGICAL SUMMARY FOR
TWELFTH MONTH, 1898.

Mean barometer,	30.088
Highest barometer during the month, 15th,	30.581
Lowest barometer during the month, 4th,	29.180
Mean temperature,	36.
Highest temperature during the month, 30th,	60.
Lowest temperature during the month, 14th,	16.
Mean of maximum temperatures,	42.3
Mean of minimum temperatures,	29.5
Greatest daily range of temperature, 31st,	29.
Least daily range of temperature, 3d,	4.
Mean daily range of temperature,	12.8
Mean relative humidity, per cent.,	64.
Mean temperature of the Dew Point,	23.6
Total precipitation in inches, rain and melted snow,	3.98
Greatest precipitation in any 24 consecutive hours, 1.24 inches of rain, on the 22d and 23d.
Number of days on which .01 inch or more of rain fell, 9.
Number of clear days 14, fair days 6, cloudy days 11.
Prevailing direction of wind from the Northwest and Southwest.
Sleet on the 31st.
Solar halo on the 12th, 24th.
Lunar halo on the 24th.

SENSIBLE TEMPERATURE DATA.

Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 41 on 23d.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 14 on 14th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 29.7.
Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 51 on 4th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 16 on 13th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 31.6.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer for this month, 30.6.

NOTE.—The mean temperature of this month just closed, 36°, is about the normal for Twelfth month.

The amount of precipitation is in excess of the average.

Very light flurries of snow fell on the 8th, 12th, 17th, 28th, and 31st. The total depth for the month was three-tenths of an inch—one-tenth of an inch on the ground at the end of the month.

JOHN COMLY, Observer.

Centennial Avenue, Philadelphia, Twelfth month 31.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE Filipino "insurgents," so-called, (though they appear simply as desiring independence and self-government), are not inclined to accept the rule of the military officers sent out to them by President McKinley. The President last week sent by cable an extended proclamation, explaining his intention, but the "insurgents" refused to accept its offers. Within a few hours after the proclamation had been posted in Manila, the agents of Aguinaldo filled the city with a manifesto, in which he protested against General Otis calling himself "Military Governor of the Philippines." At Iloilo, the American troops had not disembarked, at last accounts, and the resistance of the people is such that extreme measures may result. It was said that they "threatened to burn the business portion of that city at the first shot of bombardment fired by the American fleet."

MORE troops are to be sent to Manila. It is announced that the Secretary of War has decided to send out four regiments of regular infantry. A despatch from Manila, on the 9th, says a second proclamation by Aguinaldo appeared in Manila yesterday. In it he threatens to drive the Americans from the islands. The Filipino Committees in Paris, Madrid, and London have telegraphed to President McKinley protesting against the disembarkment of American troops at Iloilo.

NELSON DINGLEY, of Maine, who is the Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the National House of Representatives, has been almost at the point of death, of pneumonia, for several days, and at this writing, (10th), is still practically in that situation. He is the Republican "leader" in the House, and is also one of the Commissioners on the part of the United States for the negotiation of the Canadian questions. Another of the American Commissioners, John W. Foster, has also been quite ill. The work of the Commission may thus be interrupted.

THE Supreme Court of Pennsylvania, on the 7th instant, heard argument on the certiorari proceedings in the case of the Commonwealth against Senator Quay and others. Two lawyers were heard for the defendants, and the former District Attorney of Philadelphia, George S. Graham, presented the case of the Commonwealth, by request of the new District Attorney, P. F. Rothermel, Jr., who assumed office at New Year. Great interest attended the proceedings.

On the 10th inst., the Supreme Court "handed down" its decision, denying the application of Senator Quay's counsel, and returning the case against him to be tried in the usual way, in the Philadelphia courts.

In the election of United States Senators in several States, including Pennsylvania, Delaware, and West Virginia, there is much uncertainty as to the person to be chosen. In Pennsylvania, the effort of Senator Quay for reelection is complicated with his indictment in the courts, there being, besides, intense opposition to him. In Delaware the Republicans have a majority of the Legislature, but are divided into two factions, the "Regular" and the "Union Republican" or Addicks. It is now thought that there may again be no choice in that State, as was the case in 1895. In West Virginia, the Legislature is so closely divided on party lines that measures of the most partisan character are likely to be attempted by both sides.

SEVERAL very able and important contributions have recently been made to the establishment of the case against Imperialism. Carl Schurz delivered a fine address before the Convocation of Chicago University, last week. Ex-Senator George F. Edmunds contributed to the New York World a review of the Philippines case, discussing it as a statesman and jurist, in a manner which few others can equal, in this country. In the United States Senate, on the 9th, Senator Hoar delivered an extended speech on the constitutional authority to take and hold "possessions" not intended to become part of the Union. His speech was listened to with close attention by a full Senate.

GENERAL GRANT speaks in his Memoirs of the number of military men who sought civil positions on account of their services in the Mexican War. Two presidents, Taylor and Pierce, came out of it, and General Scott ran for president (1852) but was beaten by Pierce. This experience, it seems likely, will now be sought to be repeated. The Louisville Courier-Journal, a Democratic newspaper, nominates for the candidates of that party in 1900, Admiral Dewey, for president, and General Fitzhugh Lee for vice-president.

THE Dreyfus agitation is revived in France. The president of the Court of Cassation, named Beaurepaire, has resigned, asserting that other members of the Court showed too much favor to Dreyfus. The "Chamber," the popular branch of the French Congress, resumed its sittings on the 10th, under considerable excitement. Correspondents of London newspapers continue to represent that there is danger of revolutionary movements arising out of the military resentment at having the Dreyfus matter reopened.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

In the midst of all the talk of war operations, and the glorification of militarism, an important international arbitration is about to begin. United States Supreme Court Justice Brewer was announced to sail from New York on the 11th for Paris, to attend the meeting of the Venezuela Commission, of which he and Chief Justice Fuller are members. The Commission was to have met on the 25th instant, but a postponement until May 14 has been arranged.

—William J. Bryan, in a speech at Chicago on the 7th instant, on the occasion of the Jackson banquet, said of the Chicago platform of 1896: "There will be no turning back. The platform will be added to as new conditions force new issues into the arena of politics, but nothing will be abstracted from it."

—A "head-on" collision occurred on the 9th instant between two passenger trains on the Lehigh Valley Railroad, at West Dunellen, N. J., in which fifteen persons were killed and about thirty injured, of whom several were expected to die.

—One hundred houses at Hankow, China, fell into the river, on top of as many boats there, on December 3. The loss of life is estimated at 1,000.

—In Washington (State) as well as in South Dakota, the official recount shows the woman suffrage amendment to have received a larger vote than was formerly reported. In Washington, the adverse majority this year is 9,882. In 1889 it was 19,386. In South Dakota, in 1890, the adverse majority was 23,610. This year it is 3,285.

—A colored woman, "Aunt Lucy" Nichols, New Albany, Ind., has been granted a pension of $12 per month by special act of Congress. The St. Louis Globe-Democrat says: "Lucy is the only female member of a G. A. R. post in the United States. She served through the [civil] war with the 23d Indiana, participating in twenty-eight battles. She fought, nursed the sick, and cooked and washed for the others. She joined the regiment at Bolivar, Tenn., running away from her master."

—The Woman's Journal, commenting on the action of the Chicago and Northwestern Railroad Co., in discharging all its female clerks, says: "The managers are behind the age. If the women of Illinois had been voters, these female clerks would not have been discharged."

—We find it stated that "the Pennsylvania State Federation of Women's Clubs has repealed its rule that neither single tax, temperance, woman suffrage, nor anti-vivisection should be discussed, unless by unanimous consent."

—A current item says: "Not a song-bird hat in stock" is posted on frequent bulletins through the millinery department of Marshall Field's great Chicago store. This is a public acknowledgment of the victory of the Audubon crusade.

—The International Abolitionist Federation, the new name of the "British and Continental Federation for the Abolition of the State Regulation of Vice," will hold its next annual meeting in Geneva, September 13-18, 1899.

—Mary Mapes Dodge, editor of St. Nicholas, has sailed for Europe to spend some months in Italy and Egypt for the recovery of her health.

—Mail advices from Vladivostock (Asiatic Russia), received at Victoria, B. C., report the supposed drowning in the Lena Delta of a party of the Swedish geographical expedition, who were searching for Andree in Siberia.

—In the German Reichstag, at Berlin, on the 10th, Count von Posadowsky-Webner, Secretary of the Interior, said the supply of cattle in Germany was adequate, and, therefore, prohibitive measures against importation must be maintained in order to prevent the introduction of disease.

—The German Emperor William is reported as saying that he does not expect practical results from the Czar's disarmament proposals, and that consequently the increase in the German Army is no less indispensable than before.

—The Dreyfus proceedings are still in progress in the Court of Cassation, at Paris. A despatch says that Dreyfus, replying to the questions of the public prosecutor at Cayenne, energetically denies that he ever confessed he was guilty to Captain Lebrun-Renault, and he reprobates his innocence.

Can't help making good pies of ATMORE'S Mince Meat

Quality and flavor always the same—always the best. The best grocers sell Atmore's Mince Meat and ATMORE'S genuine English PLUM PUDDING.

WILLIAM S. YARNALL,
Manufacturing Optician.

118 South Fifteenth St., (4th door bel. Chestnut St.),
PHILADELPHIA.

A LAWYER, who worthily bears a distinguished name, occupies an old-fashioned mansion on the edge of the city. Recently one of his sisters tiptoed into his room after midnight, and told him she thought burglars were in the house. The lawyer put on his dressing-gown, and went downstairs. In a back hall he found a rough-looking man trying to open a door that led into the back yard. The burglar had unlocked the door, and was pulling at it with all his might. The lawyer, seeing the robber's predicament, called to him, "It does not open that way, you idiot: it slides back."—Harper's Round Table.

THE Lafayette Monument Commission reports that about $50,000 has been secured for the monument to be erected in Paris in 1900. The French Government has granted a site.

THE best-managed dairies in Minnesota have reduced the cost of manufacturing a pound of butter to 1.28 cents. The prevailing cost in other States is about 3 cents.

Don't spend so much money on lamp-chimneys—get Macbeth's—get the chimney made for your lamp.
The Index tells.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Useful and Ornamental LAMPS

in Old Brass Filigree and Lace Work.

Guaranteed not to tarnish.

We cater to all tastes in finish and ornamentation. Friends want plain colors as a rule. We have a most excellent lamp for the library in Dark Bronze. We also have for the dining-room and hall, Black,—very rich and durable.

Prices range from $2.00 up.
The light is all you could wish.

A. J. WEIDENER,
36 South Second Street, Philadelphia.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 21, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 3.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

III.

OUR intellects are as truly Godgiven as our limbs, our love, our life. We cannot stay where David or Paul abode. Their needs, and responsibilities, and limitations are not ours.

ARTHUR ROWNTREE.

From a paper on "The Duty of Thought," read at a meeting of young Friends, at Birmingham, England.

REJECTED.

THE World denies her prophets with rash breath,
Makes rich her slaves, her flatterers adorns ;
To Wisdom's lips she presses drowsy death,
And on the brow divine a crown of thorns.
Yet blessed, though neglected and despised—
Who for the World himself hath sacrificed,
Who hears unmoved her witless mockery,
While to his spirit, slighted and misprized,
Whisper the voices of Eternity !

—Florence Earle Coates.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

GOSPEL MINISTRY.

IN the book of Discipline of Illinois Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends we find the following :

"We believe that the Divine power alone can qualify for a gospel ministry, and man can only accept and acknowledge the evidence that this gift has been received through the anointing power of the Holy Spirit."

In the first clause we do not recognize any educational acquirements as sufficient, without the evidence of Spiritual baptism, neither do we want to ignore the qualifying spiritual power given to those who have not had these great advantages. What is the Gospel ? It is defined as glad tidings. Glad tidings of what ? Glad tidings concerning Christ and Salvation. But we choose to put it in a little different way—that it is a near relationship to the Father, a knowledge of the right to sonship, that our lives are to be henceforth devoted to his works of love, coupled with a clear command to go forth and declare this light and truth to our fellow-men.

We remember the preparation of the Prophet Isaiah, enabling him to understand the vision, and know his mission clearly. Then his own condition came before him, and he exclaimed, "Woe is me, for I am all undone," etc., after which his lips were touched, and he felt the purifying power. Hence, when the query was put, "Whom shall I send ?" Isaiah in humility said, "Here am I, send me." Let us know of the purifying, and not lay too much stress on published words, lest we err on the right hand as well as on the left. Whatever takes precedence of the Christ Spirit in the soul, and comes out into the life will lay waste our precious principle,—the spiritual life manifest,—and we will die to the first great principle of our Society. We want to hold fast to this as the significant badge of discipleship. Let us take the four Gospels, so called. Mark the first three, how minutely they give the law and testimony, all good in their place ; but when we come to John, how very different ! We find his writings of a much higher type, characterized by a deep spiritual impress, the beauty of expression, the adaptability to the past, present, and future, and a marked spiritual development.

This experiential knowledge of the Truth is the strongest testimony of Friends ; indeed it is all the law, and out of it arises whatever is necessary for us as individuals, or as an organization. This constitutes the bond of unity. It is this that ought to qualify our Eldership to rightly judge of the ministry. It is the badge of Christian fellowship. The Christ Spirit, be it in the proportion of the little babe, or in the full stature of men and women, is the same. Let us be very careful and not hurt this tender spirit by disregarding the little plant, or in thoughtless words to mar the growth, for they may languish and struggle even unto death. Let the Elders remember that they can no more judge of the ministry without this spiritual life being the means, than the minister can deliver the spoken word without it. Inspiration is the gift, and we need a deeper consecration to the first principle, and now at the beginning of the New Year, when our minds are being stirred into a closer relationship with the Divine Spirit, under the consideration of the forces around us, is a good time to remember our responsibilities.

We find under advices to Ministers and Elders, to dwell in that unselfish condition of spirit which gives ability to labor in developing the spiritual life in themselves and others. Again, let none of us lay too much stress on the ability of some to give doctrinal sermons, or to write doctrinal essays, as though that was all there was of the Gospel ; for it is rare that those give what the human soul needs. The great fundamental principle consists in the Indwelling Life of God in the soul of man, and as God is spirit, that life must be a spiritual one, and also a living, vital force. Let us then consider our individual responsibilities first to our own lives, then to our organization, and we believe there will be a renewal of the old Truth springing up, and we will build up our waste places with a deeper thought, and old customs with tradition and dead forms will pass away, and we will revive upon the basic principle of our Gospel Ministry—the Indwelling Spirit, Inspiration, and Revelation to man.

MARY G. SMITH.

Hoopston, Ill., First month, 2.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

A GARLAND OF CHILDHOOD LYRICS.¹

"Heaven lies about us in our infancy."

THUS sang the great poet who, almost first among modern authors, perceived and pictured the simple divinity of childhood. With Wordsworth, and with Blake, English literature, for four centuries almost silent concerning the little ones, awoke to the beauty and innocence of the child-heart. From that day the poetry of childhood has blossomed abundantly, and in the fragrant pages of the present book one may enjoy much that is best in this field.

The editor, Charlotte Brewster Jordan, M. L., of the class of '82 of Swarthmore College, has garnered representative mother-song and child-song from the century's output in England and America. More than a hundred poets have been drawn upon, among them Wordsworth, Blake, Scott, Tennyson, Mrs. Browning, Clough, Kingsley, Jean Ingelow, George Eliot, Swinburne, Stevenson, Whittier, Longfellow, Lowell, Helen Hunt, Celia Thaxter, Field, and Riley. The editor has herself contributed a melodious "Hammock Lullaby."

Let us take a few typical stanzas here and there. The sweet seriousness and unconscious depth of character so often seen in the clear faces of children have attracted many a poet's admiration. Dinah Mulock Craik has thus described "A Child's Smile,"—

"A child's smile,—nothing more ;
Quiet, and soft, and grave, and seldom seen ;
Like summer lightning o'er,
Leaving the little face again serene."

This beautiful ethical view of child-life, that sees the innocent soul shining through the little wistful face, dates from just a hundred years ago, when Wordsworth, radiant with spiritual vision and all the freshness of high poetic youth, was giving forth his exquisite lines in portrayal of real or ideal maidenhood,—

"Her's the silence and the calm
Of mute, insensate things ;"—
"Beauty born of murmuring sound Shall pass into her face ;"—
"She seem'd a thing that could not feel
The touch of earthly years ;"—
"A face with gladness overspread ;
Soft smiles, by human kindness bred ;"—

Lines, it seems to me, that are matchless for their simple beauty and their spiritual pathos. Yet matchless as they are, they find no mean echo in the utterance of later singers, as when Lowell writes of his daughter,—

"I know not how others saw her,
But to me she was wholly fair,
And the light of the heaven she came from Still lingered and gleamed in her hair,"— or when Frederick Locker thus addresses his winsome child :

"Your calm, blue eyes have a far-off reach.
Look at me now with those wondrous eyes.
Why are we doomed to the gift of speech
While you are silent and sweet and wise ?
You have much to learn ; you have more to teach,
Baby mine."

Frank L. Stanton, a living southern poet, caught something of this higher note when he sang :

"All heaven hath dreamed and smiled
In the sweet face of a child."

This charming garland of mother-song contains several cradle-pieces of primitive folk, strange out-of-door Indian songs, and half-humorous, half-tender negro lullabies. How quaint and bonny is this stanza from Hugh Miller's Scotch poem, "The Babie" !

"Her een sae like her mither's een,
Twa gentle, liquid things ;
Her face is like an angel's face—
We're glad she has nae wings !"

So we might continue to extract from these wholly delightful pages. In each song in the book, be it simple and tender and musical, or more subtle in thought, lies some new revelation of the eternal joy and artlessness of childhood. A few of the favorites, it is true, are missing : we look in vain for any of the fair little lyrics of old Herrick, or for Charles Tennyson-Turner's remarkable sonnet, that tells how little Letty fondly patted her toy globe :

"And, while she hid all England with a kiss, Bright over Europe fell her golden hair."

"Lewis Carroll's" whimsical child-poems, too, are not represented ; nor are Elizabeth R. Chapman's sadly beautiful threnodies for a lost son.

Yet much of the best slumber-song in the language is here. Tennyson's "Sweet and Low," Mrs. Browning's "A Child's Thought of God," Kingsley's "A Farewell," Longfellow's perfect sonnet, "Nature,"—these are poems that might honor any anthology. The editor has achieved her congenial task with fine taste and sympathy, and her volume will receive a wide welcome.

It is pleasing to find in the book nearly a dozen of the poems of James Whitcomb Riley, for in his best work this poet comes very near to the child-heart. Let us close with this grave, sweet little elegy of his, "The Way the Baby Slept" :

"And this is the way the baby slept ;
A mist of tresses backward thrown
By quivering sighs where kisses crept
With yearnings she had never known ;
The little hands were closely kept
About a lily newly blown—
And God was with her. And we wept—
And this is the way the baby slept."

Swarthmore College. JOHN RUSSELL HAYES.

"He that knows not, and knows not that he knows not, is a fool. Shun him.
He that knows not, and knows that he knows not, is simple. Teach him.
He that knows, and knows not that he knows, is asleep. Wake him.
He that knows, and knows that he knows, is wise. Follow him."
—Arabian Proverb.

36

MEN can be as original now as ever, if they had but the courage, even the insight. Heroic souls in old times had no more opportunities than we have ; but they used them. There were daring deeds to be done then—are there none now ? Sacrifices to be made—are there none now ? Wrongs to be redrest—are there none now ?—Charles Kingsley.

¹ Mother-Song and Child-Song. Edited by Charlotte Brewster Jordan. New York : Frederick A. Stokes Co., 1898.

From The Friend, Philadelphia.

THE "WARDER SCHOOL," AMSTERDAM.

FROM personal experience and private records a fuller account than that already given of the "John Warder School," in Amsterdam, may be of interest. A printed circular, about 1860, says of this school: "To all lovers of peace as well as of education, its maintenance becomes an object of interest, appealing alike to those interested in the Society [of Friends] in general and in the cause of education, and also in the maintenance of a Christian testimony to the principles of peace."

That John Warder, a respected citizen of Philadelphia and a Friend in good standing in his Monthly Meeting of the Northern District, should have spent ten years in London is explained by his letter-books, now in possession of the Historical Society, covering a period of three years 1776-'78. As a member—or representative—of the firm of Jeremiah Warder & Sons, of Philadelphia, in the Seventh month, 1776, he sailed from New London, Conn., for Bordeaux, a voyage of thirty-three days, whence he made his way to London and opened a business house with William Capper.

The captain of the ship Nancy, of which John Warder was part owner, unknown to J. W., in 1781 took out letters of marque, and captured a Dutch ship Holland's Welvaart. Hearing this, to guard against any future claims, J. W. insured the vessel, which, having put in to Limerick for repairs, was on its voyage thence to London totally lost. The eighteen hundred pounds insurance paid was the source from which in 1829 the infant school in Amsterdam was founded.

We pass over the successful and unsuccessful attempts at restitution made by John Warder himself and by the Friends of London; the subsequent increase of the fund; its final adoption by Trustees of Devonshire House Monthly Meeting. It is a story told in print but of no interest here. Part of the restitution consisted of money expended for the poor of Amsterdam, and an annual distribution of bread. Stephen Grellet, who was present at one of these latter occasions, hearing the explanation of the origin of the custom, which was always made, remarked that no more powerful peace sermon could be preached to the people than that embodied in these circumstances.

John Stephen Mollett, of Amsterdam, on a visit to London was much impressed with a sight of the infant school in Spitalfields, and at his suggestion the interest arising from the Trust property (of John Warder) was devoted to maintain a similar institution in the Dutch city. In 1829 a house was purchased for two hundred and eighty-one pounds and the school opened. It was not only the first infant school in Amsterdam, but its success led to the establishment of other schools in later years. At the death of S. Mollett his son-in-law, Daniel Boissevain, Jr., accepted the care of management and oversight necessary on the spot.

The premises were old when purchased; in thirty years they became so dilapidated that an appeal was sent forth for funds to erect a new building. In 1864 the house, No. 27, Beerenstraat, was built. It is a stone building surmounted by the figure of a ship in full sail; the monogram JW over the windows; painted on the front, "Bewaar School, Amsterdam's Welvaren." On a large wooden tablet inserted in the wall of the main entrance is recounted in English and Dutch the events leading to the establishment of the school. Entering the larger of the two school rooms the eye catches sight of a clock dial with this inscription: "Let op den Tyd." (Be punctual).

On several occasions the descendants of John Warder have visited the Amsterdam school, and always been received with distinctive courtesy. Through the interested kindness of William Beck, of London, representing the present trustees of the fund, the latest of these visits by John Warder's grandchildren was planned. G. M. Boissevain called upon the American party in Amsterdam, and arranged for the day and hour of the visit, and the presence of one of the committee of four women who make frequent inspection of the school.

In a pouring rain, and with the needful chance guidance of passers-by, the school-house was finally discovered on a quiet, narrow street. The school-mistress, who lives in the building, on our arrival gathered the little Dutch pupils—all between the third and seventh year of age—for the salute of welcome, a waving of hands. As the intercourse on either side must be by signs, this was as effective as speech.

These are children of the poor—not paupers—by preference those who live in the neighborhood. They must be taken to and from school at the appointed hours; nine to twelve a. m.; half past one to four p. m. The schooling costs two pence a week; for those who dine at the school one penny a week is charged. Seventh-day is a half-holiday. Four young women assist the head mistress in giving elementary instruction, singing, short poems suited to their capacity, the value of money, and the Fröbel methods. All must be cleanly dressed and the hair cut short. The demand to enter is so great, and the limit of one hundred and fifty not exceeded, that sometimes sixty are waiting for vacancies.

In the two rooms, separated by glass doors, the little people were put through their paces for the strangers from over the sea. As they sang or recited their wooden shoes clattered time upon the floor, arms and hands took due part in the performance. When play hour came, being too wet for the yard, we adjourned to the basement, and the young teachers joined in plays which simulated wind-mills and other Dutch accessories.

At lunch time the little tots were seated in orderly rows, the glass thrown open to make one long room. Their baskets and bundles were produced—one lunch was packed in a small cigar box—and they contentedly nibbled their bread and bologna sausage, or whatever mother had supplied. Tin mugs were passed round and each child received a drink of milk. One infant displayed with evident pride to his neighbors an impossible looking candy image, which was evidently a rich possession to the Dutch mind.

¹ See article by George Vaux, reprinted in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, First month 7, 1899.

Now while the children could not imagine what the Americans might say, they did evidently and appreciatingly and understandingly grasp a rendering of "Johnny Smoker," the delight of the Anglo-Saxon child. After presentation of specimens of weaving mats and frames, with waving of hands and thanks to and through the interpreting committee member, the visit was over.

SARAH CADBURY.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 5.—FIRST MONTH 29.

RACES OF MEN.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He (God) hath made of one blood all nations of men for to dwell on all the face of the earth.—Acts, xvii., 26.

Scripture Reading.—Genesis, x.

AFTER the story of the flood we are told how the sons of Noah were spread abroad and peopled the earth. At first view, chapter x. would seem to be a mere unprofitable list of unpronounceable names. But the student of Eastern lore tells us that which makes it alive with interest. He tells us that we have here a list of the names, not of men, but of the peoples with whom the Hebrews were acquainted. This is, then, the attempt of the ancient Hebrew historian to show the unity of the human race by tracing it from a common forefather. It needs but little inspection to show that the names are not those of individuals. The article is used in several cases "the Amorite," "the Jebusite" (vs. 16, 17, 18). "Mizraim," "Ludim," and others are plurals, while "Sidon" is the name of a city. The division is in general a geographical one, the sons of Japheth being on the north, those of Ham on the south, and the Shemites between. The list includes only men of the white races. No nations of the yellow or black race are included. This may be due to ignorance of such peoples, which seems unlikely, or to unwillingness to accept them as belonging to the same human family. An ingenious explanation is proposed in the theory that these inferior races represented to the ancient historian descendants of Cain, the accursed, and were therefore ignored. This may have been the basis of the exclusion, but the explanation is pure speculation.

Not all of the names given have been certainly connected with the nations or peoples intended by the Hebrew historian, but a large portion of them may easily be recognized.

The sons of Japheth are given as Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, and others.

Gomer was the people known to the Greeks as Kimmerians. Their home was near the sea of Azof; they were defeated in an attempted invasion of Assyria, and made a furious and partly successful attack on Asia Minor. Magog, according to Professor Sayce, probably means the Land of Gog, or Gyges, the King of Lydia. Madai is plainly the land of the Medes, and Javan is identified with the Greeks (the "Ionian"), a similar name plainly referring to the Greeks having been found in a letter on baked clay, three thousand years old. Among the sons of Ham are given Cush, a people on both sides of the Red Sea in Arabia and Africa, Misraim or Egypt, and Canaan, the predecessors of the Hebrews in Palestine. The story of Nimrod is plainly an interpolation. The descendants of Shem include the Hebrews ("Eber." v. xxi), Assyria under the name of Asshur, and the Elamites.

That the classification is almost wholly geographical, is shown in the inclusion as sons of Canaan, of the Hittites, with their dark skins and their retreating foreheads—many characteristics indeed, of the yellow race—with the blonde Amorites of the mountain land of Palestine. But with such details we are not concerned. The important point to notice is that the haughty sons of Israel, in spite of their pride of race, their insistent claim to be in a special sense the people of God, nevertheless recognized fully their close relationship with the despised Gentiles. In this admission lay the germ of their great message to humanity, which may be heard in part in the words of many of the prophets, which is illustrated in the narrative of the mission of Jonah to the despised people of Nineveh—whom yet God did not despise—and which culminated in the Sermon on the Mount.

In view of this threefold division of the white races, it is of interest to note that the names of the sons of Noah have been applied as a matter of convenience by ethnologists to the three divisions authorized by a study of language and physical similarity among white men.

Let us consider here by way of comparison, what science has to teach us of the white races of men and of their mutual relations.

The geologist with the aid of the astronomer fixes the probable time of the most ancient known relics of man—those of the "River Drift men" of western Europe—at 240,000 years ago. These were replaced by another people resembling Eskimos, who vanished perhaps 80,000 years ago, and were succeeded by a small dark people resembling the Basques of northern Spain—an ancient people of whom this remnant remains. Again, in times almost within the reach of history, these were conquered and replaced by a large blonde people, generally called Aryans, commonly said—though this is in dispute—to have come from Asia, and in successive invasions to have peopled nearly all Europe.

While this group of peoples, allied by blood and by language, were working out their destiny mainly in the west, another group, totally distinct from it, so far as known, was going through a similar process in the east. These, like the Aryans, were of the white group of human beings, though darker in complexion. They first appear in history as wandering tribes still in the pastoral stage. There is some evidence, however, that at an earlier period they lived in mountainous regions. Almost certainly as early as 4,000 B. C., a group of these wanderers appeared near the head of the Persian gulf, which at that time extended much farther inland than at present, the wash of the rivers flowing into it having partly filled it up at the upper end. From this region, called Chaldea, went out at a later time the ancestors of the Hebrews, the Assyrians, the Arabians, and many minor peoples. The adjective Japhetic is often applied to the Indo-European races which have been spoken of as Aryans. The name Semite is almost universally used for the descendants of the ancient Chaldeans. It has been the practice of ethnologists to class as "Hamitic" all those white peoples who cannot be shown to belong to the other two groups. The Egyptians, the Abyssinians, the Canaanites, have been so classed, though their relationship cannot be shown by similarity of language and of other characteristics, as can that of the Aryans and of those called Semites. Indeed, some ethnologists believe that the races classed as Hamitic should be included with the Semitic peoples, being those who separated earliest from the parent nation.

The tenth chapter of Genesis does not, then, give a classification by races which can be accepted by the student of races. It has value to him mainly as showing the geographical distribution of the various peoples mentioned. But to the student of the Hebrew people and of their religion, it is of the greatest value, since it makes clear a recognition at an early period of their history of the general brotherhood of man.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 5.—FIRST MONTH 29.

JESUS AT JACOB'S WELL.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst.—John, iv., 14.

Read from Gospel of John. Chapter iv, 5-15.

REVISED VERSION.

The verses assigned for this lesson should be read in connection with those following in the chapter. It is a most interesting portion of the Gospel account. Jesus shows that he is not bound by the Jewish prejudice against the Samaritans. He describes the religion which he was preaching as that which would permanently satisfy; he who should drink of it would not thirst, but should have within him that reality of divine qualities which would be as a well of water springing up to everlasting life.

The hour cometh, he said further, when neither in the mountain where he then was, nor in Jerusalem, should men worship the Father,—that is, not in those places alone. And he added that the hour would come, also, when the true worshippers would worship the Father in spirit and in truth, for God is spirit, and only spiritually must they who would worship him make their approach.

These are passages which give force and sustenance to the views of Friends. They are in accord with what has already been said in preceding lessons of the inwardness of the Christ power, the spirituality of true religion.

Of Jacob's Well, where this conversation occurred, a volume might almost be written. It is still identified, and many curious facts are connected with it. "The well is deep," the woman said, and Maundrell, a visitor in 1697, found its depth one hundred and five feet, with fifteen feet of water. Since that time rubbish seems to have fallen in, and measurements in 1841, 1866, and 1875 all made the depth seventy-five feet. In 1880 Thomson ("The Land and the Book") found the place enclosed by a low wall, of modern erection. The area of the enclosure was fifty-six paces from east to west, and sixty-five from north to south. "The surface is covered by a confused mass of shapeless rubbish, overgrown by weeds and nettles. The well is near the south corner of the area, and to reach the mouth of it one must let himself down, with some risk, about ten feet into a low vault."

The "confused mass" of debris is believed to be the ruins of a church which was built over and around the Well as early as the fourth century, A. D., but destroyed before the era of the Crusades. The old vault and crypts are still traceable, and it is one of these that, as stated, obstructs the mouth of the Well.

Why such a deep well should be dug at all seems strange, for a short distance away, on the west, there are fine flowing springs, whose water irrigates the whole plain, quite to the Well itself. The surmise is, that the Well is the older, and may have been truly that of Jacob, and that the springs are due to some convulsion of nature,—an earthquake, perhaps, in the sixth century. It may also be that the Well itself was injured then, and rendered incapable of holding its former supply of water.

It is among the strangest incidents in history, says Thomson, that this place, where Jesus held that marvellous conversation, should be so neglected. For "it is the only precise spot on the earth which we may be sure was hallowed by his presence, and rendered memorable forever by his teaching."

It was probably in the late summer or autumn that Jesus sat here, being "wearied with his journey" over the same road which then as now led from Judea into Galilee. It was about the sixth hour, that is, high noon, and in the very heat of the day. "He was thirsty; that was quite natural," says Thomson, "for not a drop of water could I find, at that season (autumn), along that same road for miles."

The disciples had gone "away into the city to buy food." This was Sychar, near by, now identified with Askar, a small village. When they returned they besought him to eat, but he declined. Following the thought of the spiritual fountain, he said, "I have meat to eat that ye know not. My meat is to do the work of Him that sent me, and to accomplish his work." Later, he added: "I say unto you, Lift up your eyes and look on the fields"—not the fields about him, but those of the world's life—"that they are white already unto harvest."

The central thought of the chapter from which this lesson is taken is the spiritual nature of God, and the duty of worshipping him "in spirit and in truth," without regard to place, and without bondage to outward ceremony and ritual. Of formal worship Whitier has said:

"As if the pomps of rituals, and the saviors
Of gums and spices could the Unseen One please;
As if his ear could bend, with childish favor,
To the poor flattery of the organ keys.

"Not such the service the benignant Father
Requireth at his earthly children's hands :
Not the poor offering of vain rites, but rather
The simple duty man from man demands."

ALCOHOL IN MEDICINE.¹

AT the outset of this brief consideration of the subject upon which I have been asked to say a few words, let me clearly state my conviction that the legitimate sphere of alcohol as a remedial agent is a very limited one; that the medical profession as a body is year by year coming to value it less highly, and that its use in diseased conditions should be even less frequent than it is to-day.

That it has no proper place in medicine I cannot believe. As to the narrowness of its rightful sphere, if we look for a moment at some of its well-known physiological effects, and consider that this remedy is always given in material, if not large doses, and that the powers of resistance of the system to any deleterious influences are liable to be diminished in any given direction by disease, I think we shall find reasons for concluding that a substance so potent for physical harm should be used with the utmost discretion and moderation, in the most carefully-chosen cases alone. The irritation of the digestive mucous membrane, followed by inflammation and catarrhal conditions; the hyperactivity of the glands of the body, leading in the case of the liver to disorder of the secreting power of its cells, and where great amounts of alcohol are taken, to contraction or cinchasis of the organ as a whole; the marked action upon the heart, causing first an over-activity, to be followed by a reaction so great as to be, as I believe, in some extreme cases of disease a cause of death; the exciting effects upon the nervous system, followed by depression, and later the actual structural changes which take place in the brain and spinal cord; the disturbance of equilibrium of the complex chemical process going on in the organism, and essential to the maintenance of its life; and finally, the general primary stimulation of most, or all, of the bodily activities, with the complementary and often serious reaction, which latter I would emphasize,—all these and other effects, not alluded to here, would seem to warn us to beware how we administer such an agent to the sick.

In support of my belief that physicians are relying less than formerly upon alcohol as a remedy, I appeal to some of the modern text-books and periodical literature relating to the practice of medicine, as well as to some personal acquaintance with the methods employed by a number of intelligent and careful practitioners in the management of their patients. Taking pneumonia for an example, a disease in which it has been, and indeed still is, quite customary to give considerable amounts of alcohol, especially in the heart weakness, so often a dangerous feature in such cases, we find Prof. Strumpell, of Erlangen, an eminent authority in the old school of medicine, using these words in his work on practice: "We never could satisfy ourselves of the often-praised influence of alcohol upon the action of the heart;" though he at the same time admits that in small quantities it may be of some benefit to the pneumonia patient. He pertinently inquires, "Why should we expect sick persons to bear doses of alcohol which have only bad results in healthy men unaccustomed to them?"

The same author says, in writing on the treatment of consumption of the lungs: "Small amounts of good wine may aid in improving the appetite and general condition. Many physicians, indeed, believe that the stronger alcoholic beverages, such as brandy and the like, are of special benefit in the treatment of consumption, but we doubt it."

In impending heart failure, due to acute inflammation of the substance of that organ, Dr. Hale, a prominent homœopathist of Chicago, condemns the use of alcohol, and advocates the administration of aromatic spirits of ammonia instead. As coming more under the head of preventive medicine, Prof. Helmuth, of New York, a well-known homœopathic surgeon of about forty-five years, experience, calls attention, in his text-book of surgery, to the much greater susceptibility to the effects of intense cold observed in those who take alcoholic stimulants before exposure, and says the history of Polar expeditions, and other facts, prove this beyond a doubt. He also remarks that cold water, or better still, cold tea, affords the best preparation for exposure to severe cold.

Dr. Fisher, a homœopathic writer on diseases of children, declares himself to be opposed to the use of alcohol in diphtheria, of which disease he says: "It has been the habit for generations to resort to its free use in some form," one of the many arguments used in its favor being that, "as diphtheria patients will tolerate larger quantities of whiskey than sufferers from any other disease, alcohol is antidotal to the poison, as to the poison of serpents." But Dr. Fisher says: "I have not found it useful in this or any other disease to any considerable degree; while on the other hand, I feel convinced that its use encourages kidney complications and sequelæ, and that it is responsible for many cases of neuritis, heart failure, and paralytic states." He goes on to say, however, that "perhaps stimulants should not be tabooed altogether," but he evidently has small faith in their value. This writer is also emphatically opposed to giving any form of alcohol to children suffering from typhoid fever, in which, even when apparently indicated, he believes that it works much harm; and also in tuberculosis.

To touch again for a moment upon what is known as heart failure, Dr. Shelton, of New York, while not wholly discountenancing the use of alcoholic stimulants, and expressing his belief that in cautious doses, and in a certain narrow class of cases, they are of benefit, declares that in his opinion "many a feeble heart struggling along has been started into a spasmodic effort by the sudden administration of a half ounce or ounce of whiskey or brandy, that has caused it to cease altogether." The physicians who hold such views are of course still in the minority, but are, I believe, increasing in numbers.

¹ By Dr. Emily M. Titus. A paper read before the W. C. T. U., of Portland, Maine.

The opinion which I hold, that alcohol is still too extensively employed in medicine, is based, besides the reason set forth above, upon the fear, which seems to me well grounded, first of over stimulation of the patient's system, furnishing a fictitious and highly misleading strength and energy, perhaps masking to patient and physician the real condition present, and leading to unsafe exertion and neglect; and secondly, of the probably unfailing and inevitable reaction,—in the form, chiefly, of depression,—the reaction which is as inseparable, I think, from stimulant action as action and reaction are inseparable in the realm of motion, where, it will be remembered, according to Newton, "they are always equal and opposite."

I have left until the last the most important of all reasons for care in prescribing alcohol, namely, the immense danger to the patient of acquiring the alcohol habit. This is so obvious, and so well understood that it seems to require little discussion in this place. It is but true to say that the physician incurs a fearful responsibility giving alcohol to many patients; very especially to those under middle age, to those liable by heredity to a tendency to the appetite, to those having a highly wrought or weakened nervous system, and to any but the incurably ill, for a long continued period. To this responsibility, I think the profession is more alive than of old; but we all know that much sin of this kind lies at the door still.

In bringing to a close this fragmentary view of a most important question, whether regarded from the professional or the moral side, it only remains for me, lest I have too strongly emphasized the objections, to say that there is no doubt in my mind that alcohol judiciously and very sparingly used has saved many lives, and is still capable of doing so; that its use in medicine may under some circumstances be a blessing, and, that its abuse is a curse in medicine, as well as outside its limits.

JOHN WESLEY'S PLAIN LIVING.

THE effects of John Wesley's "high thinking" are still evident, but his "plain living" is more likely to be lost sight of. An anecdote which serves to recall the latter characteristic is related in a recent issue of an English newspaper.

When his income was only thirty pounds a year, he lived on twenty-eight pounds, and gave away forty shillings. Then next year, receiving sixty pounds, he still lived on twenty-eight, and devoted the remainder to charitable uses. The third year he received ninety pounds, out of which he subscribed sixty-two pounds to the needy. In the course of fifty years he gave away more than thirty thousand pounds.

In the same magazine there is an interesting letter of Wesley's. In 1776 the English Government, being pressed for revenue to carry on war, resolved to issue the following circular, and a copy was sent to Wesley:

"Reverend Sir,—As the Commissioners cannot doubt that you have plate for which you have hitherto neglected to make an entry, they have directed me to send you a copy of the Lord's Order, and to inform you that they expect that you will forthwith mark the entry of all your plate, such entry to bear date from the commencement of the plate duty, or from such time as you have served, used, had, or kept any quantity of silver plate chargeable by the Act of Parliament, as in default thereof the Board will be obliged to signify your refusal to their lordships.

"N. B.—An immediate answer is desired."

Wesley replied to the circular as follows:

"Sir,—I have two silver teaspoons at London, and two at Bristol; this is all the plate which I have at present, and I shall not buy any more while so many around me want bread.

"I am, sir, your obedient servant,

"JOHN WESLEY."

GENERAL GRANT'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

Youth's Companion.

"I AM a profound believer," said General Grant, "in a special and general providence that shapes the destinies of individuals and nations; but in such a way as not to destroy man's free agency."

On another occasion, while conversing with Dr. Cramer, his brother-in-law, about his experiences, he said that he always carried out what he had planned to do.

"Did you ever pray to God for aid and success?" asked Dr. Cramer.

"Often, mentally, but briefly," he answered. "I asked for strength and wisdom to carry to a successful termination my task. Like my mother, I never talked much about my religion, but I think much. It is the all-important subject."

Grant, while President, spoke one day to his brother-in-law of the tremendous responsibility of the office. "I often," said he, "during the session of Congress, after a day of hard work and an evening spent in meeting social claims, sit up till it is far beyond midnight to study the various questions submitted for my action."

"Do you ever pray for wisdom and guidance?"

"Yes; night and day I ask God in silent prayer to aid in performing my duties," he answered. "I believe in prayer, though I don't talk about it."

Speaking of the impression made by his visit to Jerusalem, General Grant said: "I never felt so solemn in my life as I did while standing before places made sacred by their associations with [Jesus] Christ when he was here on earth."

REVERENCE that which is best in the universe; and this is that which makes use of all things and directs all things. Reverence also that which is best in thyself; this is of the same kind as that.—Marcus Aurelius.

"HEAVY and thick the atmosphere,
The prospect narrow, dark, severe,
Yet one step more the way is clear,—
For that one step press on."

His heart was as great as the world, but there was no room in it to hold the memory of a wrong.
—Emerson.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 21, 1899.

THE YOUNG FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS.

THE number of these organizations seems to increase. Several new ones have been formed this winter, and we do not know of any discontinued.

The value of these to the Society and its principles has come to be more and more perceived, and this accounts for their spread. They have a real place in our system, and render a real service.

The extent of this service, however, depends, as we have many times said, on keeping the Associations carefully and faithfully to their appropriate work. They are meant to be, and ought to be, auxiliary to the Society, and sympathetic with it. They ought to be helpful and not hurtful to the meeting on First-day. Their operations should tend to increase, not diminish, the attendance there. The meeting for worship is the foundation-stone of the Society as an organized body. It is encouraging to observe, by the reports of one of the Associations, printed in the INTELLIGENCER, that its important relation to the meeting has been dutifully regarded, and its operations have been adjusted with the desire to best serve the meeting.

The exercises of the Association when assembled are, of course, a subject of continual concern. They vary considerably, as the reports which we print show, the circumstances of different neighborhoods and places varying, and the tastes and inclinations of members as well. But the main object must be, if the purpose of the organizations is kept in mind, to follow the Friendly lines, and not to wander from essential Friendliness. These lines are well defined, and need not be doubtful. Those men and women of the Society whom it has recognized as competent to express its convictions have given us many serviceable and adequate testimonies as to the essential principles and purposes of our religious body. They did not, and could not, think the thoughts, or do the work for successive generations, but they have left us the light and help of their insight and experience.

There is available for the Young Friends' Associations, indeed, a considerable bulk of excellent literature on Friendly lines, some of it old, some of it new. This is well worth their thoughtful consideration. We think it may be safely said that no Association need be without the use of a good selection of Friends' books. If they do not have them in their own possession, some can no doubt be had.

In the endeavor to keep near the light of Friendly principles, the Associations should be cautious of much discussion of the daily doings of the external world. These are too much liable to draw off our attention, in our ordinary walk, and in the meetings held for the express purpose of strengthening our spiritual forces, and concentrating our mental power, it is a distraction to open the door widely to themes which do not have a real and a helpful relation to the ethical and religious growth which we seek. That "pure wisdom" to which John Woolman would commend us is unfortunately not much found in the chronicle of "— oppression and deceit,

Of unsuccessful or successful war," which is daily served up to us, as in the time when Cowper wrote, over a century ago. Against very much of the material that forms the "current topics" of the press, the natural and needful attitude of the associations of Friends, young or old, is one of disapproval. The Friends have striven to establish principles of action which would do away with much of the evil that is in the world, and for these principles they are bound to continue to strive. Wherever and whenever they are drawn into partnership with action, spublic or private, not conforming to the principles they profess, they by so much weaken the testimony which they bear.

OUR esteemed contemporary, the London Friend, we note, in a review of the history of Friends for the year 1898, speaks of itself and the American Friend, (Philadelphia), as coming "as welcome visitors, each week into many households, with their good tidings of the progress of the Lord's work." But it adds, as if the case might be otherwise with the British Friend and the (Philadelphia) Friend, merely that they "represent other shades of faith and practice." The classification strikes us as very interesting.

THE two articles on the Warder School in Amsterdam have interested us particularly, because the fund that established this school came from the sound rule of Friends' discipline that money ought not to be made out of war. As the article by George Vaux explained, John Warder received a considerable sum as his share of the capture, by a "privateer," of a Dutch merchant-ship. The money was returned, as far as possible, to the owners of the ship and cargo, and the remainder, increased after many years by interest accumulations, established the School. The Friends, in old times, were apt to "hew to the line."

THE National Temperance Advocate, this month, has a strong indictment of the "canteens," the liquor saloons, maintained in many regiments of the United States army, during the recent war. This is all very well, but the indictment is on a weak foundation, because the Advocate takes the attitude of regarding the war itself is a righteous thing, and the canteens merely as an "excrescence." Really they are a natural accompaniment. In old times, on going into battle, soldiers were given rum and gunpowder to drink, to inflame them, and when the time comes that intoxicating drink, profranity, and worse things do not accompany war, we shall doubtless be seeing the last of war itself.

"When shall our brave boys be emancipated from the canteen bondage?" says the Advocate. Never, entirely, while they remain employed as instruments of human destruction.

THE twenty-third annual meeting of the American Purity Alliance will be held in the parlors of the Isaac T. Hopper Home, 110 Second Avenue, New York, on the evening of the 23d inst., at 8 o'clock. Besides the addresses and reports of the officers, Mariana W. Chapman will read a paper, "The New Militarism and Purity," and there will be addresses by a number of prominent friends of the work.

BIRTHS.

HOLLINGSWORTH.—At Wilna, Md., Eighth month 30, 1898, to Robert A. and Elizabeth A. Hollingsworth, a son, who has been named Albert A.

SATTERTHWAIT.—At Lansdowne, Pa., Twelfth month 23, 1898, to Thomas C. and Ella S. Satterthwait, a son, who is named Charles Shoemaker.

DEATHS.

ALSTON.—First month 10, 1898, at the home of her daughter, 4230 Girard Avenue, Philadelphia, Lydia C. Alston, aged 75 years; a member of Camden Monthly Meeting, Del.

BENEZET.—First month 9, 1899, Lydia H., daughter of Elma E. and the late John Benezet; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street, Philadelphia.

BROWN.—At her home, near Calvert, Cecil county, Md., First month 7, 1899, Margaret Brown, wife of William P. Brown, in the 67th year of her age; a member of Nottingham Monthly Meeting.

Interment in Friends' grounds, Brick Meeting-house, Md.

BROWN.—At his home, near Calvert, Cecil county, Md., First month 12, 1899, William P. Brown, in the 72d year of his age; an elder of Nottingham Monthly Meeting.

Interment in Friends' grounds, Brick Meeting-house, Md.

CORWIN.—At his home, at Napanock, Ulster county, N. Y., First month 4, 1899, William Corwin, aged 85 years; a consistent member of Greenfield and Neversink Monthly Meeting of Friends.

DUDLEY.—At Moorestown, N. J., First month 9, 1899, Nathaniel M. Dudley, in his 89th year.

DUDLEY.—Near Bordentown, N. J., Twelfth month 28, 1898, John Dudley, in the 81st year of his age; a beloved and consistent member of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting, held at Crosswicks, N. J.

NYCE.—At San Antonio, Texas, First month 6, 1899, Hugh J. Nyce, only son of Dr. Elizabeth M. Clark.

Interment at Concord Friends' ground, Delaware county, Pennsylvania.

PARRY.—At Bala, Pa., suddenly, First month 12, 1899, Julia A., widow of Joseph L. Parry, in her 75th year.

Interment at Fair Hill Friends' ground, Philadelphia.

PYLE.—Twelfth month 16, 1898, after a lingering illness, at his home near Pylesville, Harford county, Md., David L. Pyle, aged 61 years, son of the late David Pyle; a member of Fawn Grove Particular Meeting.

SERRILL.—At his home, in Darby borough, Pennsylvania, suddenly, First month 12, 1899, William D. H. Serrill, in his 78th year; a member of Darby Monthly Meeting.

WEBSTER.—Passed onward to the higher life, at his home, Hopewell, Chester county, Pa., First month 4, 1899, Samuel L. Webster, after a long, painful illness borne with great patience and fortitude.

He expressed greater concern for his dear family than for himself. He was in the 57th year of his age, leaving a dear wife and nine children, for whose welfare and guarded education he was earnestly solicitous. He was a respected, useful citizen, serving on the school board; and an active member of the Farmers' Club of his vicinity. Gentle and conciliatory in manner, upright and conscientious, he endeavored to adhere to the Golden Rule. He was a member of Nottingham Monthly and Oxford Particular Meeting. Funeral was from Oxford meeting-house on the 8th. Interment at Calvert, Md.

"I know not what the future hath

Of marvel or surprise,

Assured alone that life and death

His mercy underlies."

F.

WELCH.—At her home with her son Horace G. Welch, Citronelle, Alabama, Eleventh month 6, 1898, Ann Welch, aged 66 years, 11 months, 28 days. Interment at Citronelle, Alabama.

She was a life-long member, and for many years an elder, in the Society of Friends. Her home, until the last four years, was near Iowa City, Iowa.

S. P. W.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—IV.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I THINK our last closed with our return from Homeville through the rain and mud. We were grateful for another restful night with our kind friends Henry and Annie Pusey, and the contrast in the weather and roads from yesterday's mud, to the rough and frozen ones of to-day did not prevent our safe arrival (after a six mile drive) at Doe Run meeting-house, where another and the last of six consecutive monthly meetings was convened. Although not as large as some preceding ones, it was no less impressive and interesting, and feelings of encouragement were expressed that found a welcome, we trust, in the listening hearts.

After meeting we rode one and a half miles to Ebenezer Maule's to dine, and spent a few hours pleasantly, until called for by our friend William Webster, to whose home at Ercildoun we went for the night; and the loving atmosphere of such a home can afford no other than a restful feeling to the weary traveler.

First-day morning was bright and clear, and at the meeting hour the neat and comfortable house was nearly filled with an interesting audience, to whom the spoken word was freely given. After dining in company with some others we hurried away, and accompanied by our friend William Webster, we went seven miles to Unionville to attend a circular meeting. We were glad to find in the gallery our friend Margaretta Walton, and our hope relative to her sharing in the vocal service was not in vain. Truth justified the belief that it was good to have been there. We met many Friends with whom we had mingled in their homes and elsewhere during the past week.

After the farewells we enjoyed a pleasant ride of four miles to Kennett, taking tea with Eli Thompson and wife, his health not permitting his mingling with his friends in a meeting capacity.

At the time appointed we found a good response to an expressed desire some days ago for a meeting this evening. We were again favored with the company of our friend Margaretta Walton. This being the last of a full week we feel that we have been much favored with good health, and have enjoyed meeting our many friends. The meeting was considered a favored one, and feelings of thankfulness and appreciation found expression with the farewells. We feel that our labor in this part is now at a close, and the assurance that the leading and qualifying influence of the Divine has accompanied us is not wanting.

Again we rested for the night at our former home, with John C. Yeatman, from which we started on Second-day morning (9th inst.) for Washington. We found upon arriving at Perryville, Md., that owing to an accident on the road we must return to Wilmington and go by the Baltimore and Ohio road to Baltimore. We were again detained when near the city until the day was spent in reaching our destination, and not without some anxiety, as the last hour of travel was with a severe attack of neuralgia in my right side that made it difficult to move. Safely reaching the home of our son and wife, in Washington, a physician was soon summoned, and although the attack prevents us meeting our first engagement, the meeting at Lincoln, Va., on Fifth-day, 12th, I am thankful to be much improved, and hope to be ready to attend the quarterly meeting on Seventh-day. And we are certain that the quiet, restful home here with our dear children can but aid in the desired improvement.

I. W.

Washington, First month 13.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

HAVING intimated to some of our friends a desire to attend the evening meeting in Philadelphia on the 29th, and Concord Quarterly Meeting, at West Chester, I thought best to say that owing to some disability and need of more time here in Virginia, it will not be convenient for us to get north in time for those meetings, and I will give further notice as to the time of attending the meeting in Willistown and vicinity, which will not be until after Abington Quarterly Meeting. Very sincerely,

ISAAC WILSON.

Purcellville, Va., First month 14.

THE ANTI-SALOON LEAGUE.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE writer was appointed, at the Richmond meeting, representative of the Philanthropic Union at the Anti-Saloon League meeting held in Cleveland early in Twelfth month. As the objects of the League are of interest to all Friends, it seems proper to make brief report of it through the columns of the INTELLIGENCER. [A short account of the meeting, furnished by our friend Wilson S. Doan, was given in our issue for Twelfth month 17.]

The object of the League is to unite all opponents of the saloon in a non-partisan, or rather omni-partisan, movement. Its methods include general agitation and education by means of temperance meetings, the strict enforcement of such restrictive laws as are already on the statute books, systematic effort for the betterment of such laws, and for the election of men to office, regardless of party, who will work for the objects of the League.

The organization consists of a president and secretary, who are officers of the annual League meetings, an executive committee, and a superintendent. The last named, with the executive committee, has almost entire charge of the actual work of the League. He is paid from voluntary contributions received in the course of his labors. It is his business to organize the various States as far as possible, arranging for superintendents of State work, who are paid as he himself is paid. In some instances a State is divided, more than one superintendent being appointed within its limits. These superintendents give all their time to this work, and in many instances very effective work is reported.

Nearly two hundred State and national organizations have joined themselves with the League, this number including churches (not individual churches but central organizations), temperance societies, Young Men's Christian Association, and Women's Christian Temperance Union organizations, and philanthropic societies of all kinds, besides the State Anti-Saloon Leagues. Baltimore Yearly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee has allied itself with the League, and one of its members is superintendent of the League in Maryland. It seems that the philanthropic committees of other yearly meetings might strengthen both themselves and the cause for which they are working by similar alliance. Such action carries no further responsibility than the moral one to support so far as possible the work of the League against the saloon. The League is a conservative body, and in addition to the fact that it cannot, Friends may be sure that it will not, try to involve organizations represented in any extreme or untried measures. It aims only to make more effective methods of which Friends with others have made constant use.

JESSE H. HOLMES.

SONG IN WORSHIP.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

STRANGE to say, here is a word of warning for Friends from the pulpit of a Methodist Episcopal Church, at a "Song Service."

Recently, at such a service at the Central Avenue Methodist Church of Indianapolis, Indiana, Col. Eli F. Ritter, a distinguished member of the Indianapolis bar, and for many years a prominent member of the Methodist Church, was chosen to address the congregation. The time given was to be taken during an intermission of the "Song Service," while the members of the choir were resting.

The learned attorney announced his theme as "A Church Without a Song." Upon announcing the subject, it was evident that the congregation expected to hear an argument in favor of music in Divine worship. But much to the surprise of his hearers he gave a very brief outline of the history of the Society of Friends, saying that "for more than two hundred years the Friends had maintained Divine service without a song or music of any kind." And he eloquently declared that "no church has ever wielded such an influence for good upon the world as Friends and no church has commanded higher respect of mankind. This was done not by song or music or outward service or profession, but by a life." He closed, by saying, that "some Friends had of recent years introduced the song in their service, but that it remained a serious question whether they would exert the influence upon the world now that they did before such was introduced."

W. S. D.

Indianapolis, Ind.

THE MALAYS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I WISH to protest, as mildly as I can, against the reference to the Malays in the issue of 31st ultimo. The Malay has been "addicted to piracy," and the American has been a privateer and slave-catcher, but things have changed.

The island of Java is the centre of population in the Malay Archipelago. Though less in area than Pennsylvania and New Jersey yet it has a population equal to about one-third that of the United States. By the census of 1890, "the mean density of the population of the nine provinces of Central Java is 657 to the square mile, while that of Belgium, the most-thickly populated of European countries, is only 530." The Europeans are in proportion of one to 537 natives.

An English writer in discussing the methods of the Dutch government of the island says: "One of the best tests of the general well-being of a community is that of the growth of the population; for where there is steadily increasing, where there is no pauperism, where serious crime is rare, and where famine and rebellion on any important scale are almost unknown, the Government cannot be otherwise than suitable to the people governed. This is the case with Java."

Further testimony to the readiness of the Malay to walk in the path of peace is found in the same writer's description of the province of Minahasa in the island of Celebes, the native people being of the Malayan race. In 1822 the Dutch Government introduced coffee cultivation. "Now there are 125,000 Christians in the district with excellent schools established in all the villages. The country, moreover, has become a perfect garden. In many of the villages the streets are bordered with hedges of roses, which thrive admirably at from 2,000 to 3,000 feet elevation, and are in perpetual bloom; the cottages are symmetrically arranged, nicely painted, and embowered in flowering shrubs and fruit trees; while the people are all well dressed, and well fed, well behaved and contented, presenting a marvellous contrast to the naked savages of fifty years back who were the fathers and grandfathers of the present generation."

The expression of the INTELLIGENCER, to which attention is called, seems very much like an appeal to race prejudice. The American is ready enough to condemn the Negro, Indian, Mexican, Chinese, Semitic, and other races. Without reason or fairness he judges a race by the wrong doings of individuals responsible for the fault of a race. H. G.

[The authority quoted is "Australasia, vol. ii., F. H. H. Guillemard," late lecturer in Geography at the University of Cambridge, England.—H. G.]

Pasadena, Cal.

A WHITTIER POEM.

SAMUEL T. PICKARD, of Boston, Mass., writes to the Independent as follows:

"I have found these lines on the back of a note received by Mr. Whittier in March, 1890, and they were probably composed at about that time. The poem was never finished or printed, and the manuscript is in the almost illegible style of his first rough drafts, and I have been compelled to guess at one or two of the words":

"For the land that gave me birth;
For my native home and hearth;
For the change and overturning
Of the times of my sojourning;
For the world-step forward taken;
For an evil way forsaken;
For cruel law abolished;
For idol shrines demolished;

"For the tools of peaceful labor
Wrought from broken gun and saber;
For the slave-chain rent asunder
And by free feet trodden under;
For the truth defeating error;
For the love that casts out terror;
For the truer, clearer vision
Of humanity's great mission;
For all that man upraises,
I sing this song of praises."

[This is the poem referred to by E. H. Coale in the last issue of the INTELLIGENCER—EDS.]

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

SOLEBURY, PA.—Solebury Young Friends' Association met as usual on First-day, 8th inst., in the meeting-house. The Executive Committee handed in the following report of appointments for next month:

Questions—"How shall we spend our First-days?" to Martha B. White; "What evidence have we that Heaven is within us?" to John S. Williams. Paper—"Our gifts from God; our gifts to God," to Stella Robinson, (continued). Reading, Florence R. Kenderdine.

Martha B. White, in behalf of the Nominating Committee, reported the following officers: President, Mattie Reeder; vice-president, Seth T. Walton; secretary and treasurer in one, Edward Simpson; correspondent, Florence R. Kenderdine. These names were approved separately by the meeting, and the new officers accordingly took their places. The following standing committees for the ensuing year were appointed from the body of the meeting: Executive Committee, Ella B. Carter, Agnes S. Ely, Frederick L. Smith, Hugh W. Michener, Martha C. Ely. Membership Committee, Ruth A. Roberts, Walter W. Carter, Florence R. Kenderdine, Martha Simpson, Annie M. Smith, Reba L. Tinsman. Finance Committee, William Tinsman, Edward Blackfan, Hampton W. Rice.

Walter W. Carter reported on the section for Literature, and Annie M. Smith on Current Topics. Hannah Kenderdine, who had been appointed to read the Discipline, chose that part relating to Overseers. Mattie Reeder presented the Treasurer's report.

"Do Friends bear testimony against the administering of an oath as well as to the taking of one?" was answered affirmatively by William M. Ely. Among those who spoke on the matter were Frederick L. Smith, Seth T. Walton, Hampton W. Rice, Annie M. Smith, and Eastburn Reeder. A beautiful recitation, "What would Jesus do?" was given by Edna May Walton.

"What is 'orthodoxy,' and to what class of men does the term apply?" was a question answered in a paper by Watson Kenderdine. He said in part: "The term 'orthodox' must not be applied to any one particular sect, but only to a small portion of every sect, to that portion who oppose all reforms in creedal or ceremonial religion."

For next month the president appointed to report on the History Section, Mattie Simpson; Literature, Florence K. Blackfan; Discipline, Ruth A. Roberts; Current Topics, William M. Ely.

The proposition of Eastburn Reeder to hold the meetings of the Association immediately after the close of the First-day morning meeting, was taken up and considered. It was decided to accept the proposition, and accordingly, after a short silence, the Association adjourned until the second First-day in Second month, at 11 o'clock a. m.

F. R. K., Cor.

PHILADELPHIA.—A regular meeting of Young Friends' Association of Philadelphia was held Second-day evening, First month 9, 1899, William E. Walter presiding.

After the reading and approval of last month's minutes the following nominations were made for officers and executive committee for the ensuing year:

President, Charles Paxson; first vice-president, Emma Waln; second vice-president, Isabel Chambers; secretary, Esther S. Stackhouse; corresponding secretary, Anna Jenkins Ferris; treasurer, John Woodall; executive committee, William E. Walter, William W. Birdsall, John C. Craig, Helen A. Comly, Alice Hall Paxson, William L. Price, Mary Janney.

The three standing committees made reports. The Current Topics Committee announced that Edward H. Magill was present, in response to their request, and would address the meeting.

The chairman of the Lecture Committee extended an invitation to an informal reception to welcome W. Hudson Shaw, at the close of his first lecture on Second month 17.

The Executive Committee announced that they have arranged for a series of papers analysing or condensing Frederick Storrs Turner's book "The Quakers." It is desired that members shall each month read parallel chapters which will add greatly to the interest of the papers.

The first of the series, reviewing the six opening chapters, was then read by William W. Birdsall, who said that it is well for us to refresh our memory and consider anew the significance of the Quakerism of George Fox and its bearings upon this present day. The chapters presented by President Birdsall outline briefly "the history of the rise of the Society, discuss the work of "The Apostle of the Inward Light," the "Substance of Quaker Doctrine," and finally, deal with that time when the Quakers were a majority of the dissenters in England, the condition of affairs which our author is willing to characterize as "The Truth Triumphant." "They tell the story of Fox, his origin, his religious experiences, his preaching, his persecution, the success of his mission, in a manner simple, direct, sympathetic, and effective. Our chief difficulty in understanding any reformation is our failure to comprehend the times in which it occurred." So we are apt to err in judgment when we attempt to measure the men of the seventeenth century. Fox's attitude towards the Bible was mentioned. Turner says: "It would be difficult to name a man who loved his Bible more or was more familiar with its contents than he, yet at Nottingham he declared that it was not by Scriptures by which they were to try all doctrines, but the Holy Spirit, for it leads unto all truth."

And so the review goes on, giving instances of the life of this man, divinely favored to see the truth, a prophet, a "forth-teller." It was thought that too much has been made of one side of George Fox's character. There has been a temptation to dwell upon that phase which would make him a mystic. The fact is, that he was a man of the greatest good sense, able in the administration of practical affairs.

In the remarks following this interesting criticism, several additional facts were mentioned. It was thought that the legal acumen shown by Fox, was the outgrowth of his own intelligence and common sense, aided no doubt, by the warm friendship of Judge Fell. Concerning the worldly position of the early Friends, it was said that they were artisans, yeomen, tradesmen, and farmers, but that "men of culture were not rare among them."

"Our New Policy of Expansion" was the second subject claiming the consideration of the meeting. Edward H. Magill, in an earnest paper, gave a presentation of views on our position at this crisis. He said he had labored for the cause of peace, and now that we must face, not "a theory," but "a condition," he endorsed President McKinley in his policy respecting the Philippines. Dr. Magill was recently afforded an interview with the President at Washington, and after the paper was written it received his approval; he was pleased with the treatment of the subject, which he thought evinced careful and conscientious consideration.

Dr. Magill believes that President McKinley is a "man governed by truly religious convictions which he daily strives to make practical." He has instructed his generals not to go to the Philippines as conquerors, but as friends and allies. Necessity requires that all this must be accomplished under military control, and it will not be difficult to direct our soldiers on lines tending towards peace and harmony.

In advocating a protectorate and the training of other peoples in other climes to enjoy the blessings of self-government, Dr. Magill says he does not forget the policy is open to serious objections. "But taking things as they are, and the world as it is, as it becomes all reasonable reformers to do, we should consider whether the course here proposed would not upon the whole tend toward this important end."

Varied and animated discussions followed Dr. Magill's address. Some Friends thought that we dare not advocate a policy that takes the sword with it, others that in facing this dilemma we must assume its responsibilities; they deemed the policy outlined in the paper rational and just. Adjournment followed a period of silence.

ISABEL CHAMBERS, Sec.

EASTON, MD.—On the evening of Eleventh month 27, 1898, the Young Friends' Association held a regular meeting at the home of Isaac A. Barber.

First on the program was the interesting and spicy "Association Paper," read by the editor, Sallie Powell Kemp, who was ably assisted by Wilson M. Tylor, W. Harry White, and Robert L. Kemp. Being a new idea, a paper of this description proved a very pleasant feature of the evening. Helen Shreve then read an excellent paper, entitled "Christian Martyrdom in Russia." The paper had been loaned to her by a member of the Philadelphia Young Friends' Association. The Association manifested much interest in listening to this paper, and greatly appreciated the kindness of the Philadelphia Friend. In the discussion, the prevailing idea seemed to be that the principles and testimonies of these Russian Christians are quite similar to those sustained by the Society of Friends.

The debate for the evening was postponed, owing to the illness of one of the leaders.

Miscellaneous quotations were next in order, then the hour of adjournment having arrived, the meeting closed to meet next time at the home of Henry Shreve.

LAURA B. SHINN, Sec.

BUCKINGHAM, PA.—The regular meeting of Buckingham Young Friends' Association was held at Buckingham meeting-house, on First-day, First month 15.

The program consisted of reading the 26th Psalm; reading of the part of the Discipline relating to war, by T. O. Atkinson; a recitation by Naomi Williams; an excellent paper on "The Bible as Literature," by Alice M. Atkinson. This paper was a thoughtful and carefully prepared discourse on the Bible as a literary work. It treated of the authors and their styles and qualities, as shown by the book itself.

A reading by Susan W. Atkinson, a paper on Elias Hicks and his work, by Emily C. Fell. This paper gave a sketch of this noted preacher, his life, and his part in the Separation, and a sketch of the Separation. It was suggested that Elias Hicks took no larger part than John Comly.

Altogether this was one of, if not the, most profitable and pleasant meetings the Association has held.

The Association decided to hold three of its regular meetings in Doylestown, namely, on the third First-day of Second, Fifth, and Eleventh months. It therefore adjourned to meet at Doylestown Friends' meeting-house, Second month 19.

G. W.

MICKLETON, N. J.—At a meeting of the Young Friends' Association, held First month 14, the second chapter of Paul was read by the President as the opening exercise, followed by the reading and approval of the minutes of last meeting.

A summary of the work of the year just passed was then read, refreshing our minds as to the interest that has been manifested in each of the twelve meetings which have been held. A part of the twelfth chapter, Vol. II., of Janney's History was read by Rachel M. Haines, followed by a recitation, the "Burial of Moses," by Mary A. Heritage. M. Elma Livezey read the anecdotal side of President McKinley, after which we listened to a "salad," composed of questions from the Bible, prepared by Mabel B. Haines and given by Hannah L. Peaslee. Ruth W. Peaslee then read a paper on the Ministry of the Society of Friends, by Howard M. Jenkins. Benjamin C. Heritage read a pretty piece called, "Incident of the fire at Harrisburg."

Martha White gave us an interesting collection of current topics, after which the question arose whether a letter-box would not be a help to the Current Topic Committee, asking any member or members to place anything in the box that would interest the meeting.

In answer to the question, "When was the first Young Friends' Association held?" Emma Peaslee said that it was started in 1888 by a few earnest Friends of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, hoping that it might deepen and broaden the work of the Society of Friends.

The appointments were read, and the roll called, only 22 answering to their names. After a period of silence, meeting then adjourned until Second month 11.

E. L. D., Secretary.

MILLVILLE, PA.—The Young Friends' Association, First month 8, gave the meeting to the subject of Character.

Sarah L. Eves read a piece entitled "Character Building." A short essay on "What is Character?" written by Myron Eves, and read by George Eves, followed. Sarah T. Eves, in speaking on character forming, suggested that a study of the life of Jesus would be a most perfect guide. Rachel S. Eves read "Building for One Another." The leading thought seemed to be that no person can build for themselves alone.

S. Jennie Kester read a paper, prepared by William Burgess, on "The Unseen Forces" on Character. This was followed by an excellent reading by Jesse John. Beatrice Eves recited "The Weaver." Mary Kline gave some thoughts on Character. Under closing remarks the general idea was set forth that "Character is God in Man."

MYRON EVES, Cor.

LITERARY NOTES.

OUR friend Aaron M. Powell writes that he has so arranged his work in New York as to have more leisure for the literary work on which he is engaged. He says: "Now that I have actually begun the work which I have had for sometime in mind I find myself much interested in, and quite enjoying, the preparation of my volume of 'Anti-Slavery and Other Reminiscences.' We received, a few days ago, as I was writing, a most kind New-Year greeting from our friend Mary Radley, of Warwick, (England), with a picture of a kneeling slave, a memento of the early anti-slavery days in England, with the interesting history of which she is herself associated."

The Century Company, New York, have sent us the bound volume of The Century magazine for the half year that closed with Tenth month last. There is, of course, a good deal of the war in it, but there are many articles of more real interest and importance—among them the contributions by James Bryce on Equality, Dr. D. G. Brinton on European Superstitions, President Gilman on Tocqueville's "Democracy in America," Prof. Sloan on Bismarck, Mrs. Van Rensselaer on Old New York, and Ambassador White on the famous Russian statesman, Pobiedonostzeff. There is a wealth of illustrations; especially it may be mentioned that six full-page wood engravings continue Cole's great series of "Old English Masters"; and three by Wolf and one by Aitken reproduce as many of "Gilbert Stuart's Portraits of Women."

The two bound volumes of St. Nicholas, covering the year 1898, contain several continued stories—complete within the year—of interest to young people. There are Gabrielle E. Jackson's "Denise and Ned Toodles," J. T. Trowbridge's "Two Biddicut Boys," Hughes's "Lakerim Athletic Club," Fezandie's "Through the Earth." We frankly admit our want of sympathy for Frank R. Stockton's stories of the pirates; we think piracy would better not be presented in young people's magazines, to excite the imagination of young readers. Very much better are Rose McEnery Stuart's delightful stories of the South and its colored folks. There are good descriptive articles—papers on the Great Lakes, on the bell-towers of Italy, etc., with some poems, which we like, following the Christian light, by Edith M. Thomas, and others.

In the lists of new books announced by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, are two on Biblical study. One of these is by Dr. Charles A. Briggs, entitled, "A General Introduction to the Study of Holy Scripture," which "covers the whole field of Biblical Study, states the results thus far obtained, the present problems, and the aims for the future." It is an enlarged and revised issue of the author's "Biblical Study." The other work is by Dr. George Dana Boardman, and is entitled "The Kingdom." The author essays to explain every New Testament scripture which contains the words "The Kingdom of God"; to "rescue the formula from radical misconception, and to unfold its symbols."

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

PHILADELPHIA: THE PLACE AND THE PEOPLE. By Agnes Repplier. With Illustrations by Ernest C. Peixoto. Pp. xxi. and 392. 7 3/4 x 5 1/2 in. $2.50. New York: Macmillan & Co.

CHARLES LAMB AND THE LLOYDS. Comprising newly-discovered Letters of Charles Lamb, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the Lloyds, etc. Edited by E. V. Lucas. Pp. 324. 7 3/4 x 5. $2.00. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co.

PEMBERTON: OR ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO. By Henry Peterson. Pp. vii. and 393. 7 3/4 x 5 1/2. $——. Philadelphia: H. T. Coates & Co.

ADDRESS BY DR. LYMAN ABBOTT.

DR. LYMAN ABBOTT will address the Alumni Association of Friends' Central School, Philadelphia, on Fourth-day evening, Second month 8, 1899, at the New Century Drawing Room, 124 South 12th Street, at 8 p. m.

Subject,—The "Duty and Destiny of America."

Tickets for sale by Friends' Book Association, 15th and Race Streets. Admission, 50 cents.

SENOR MATIAS ROMERO, the Mexican Ambassador to the United States, died at Washington on the 30th ult., aged 62 years. Death was due to appendicitis, for which he underwent an operation on the Wednesday before his death. He had been Mexico's representative at Washington since 1882. He was one of the most popular members of the diplomatic corps at Washington.

The British Post-Office Department employs nearly 30,000 women, mainly in the telegraph service. (In Great Britain the telegraph is part of the postal system.) About one thousand are engaged at the Central Telegraph Office, London,—in St. Martin's-le-grand.

If we sell steel rails, sewing-machines, etc., in England, it seems we are to take "munitions of war" in exchange. A dispatch says: "The Kynoch Company, of Birmingham, has begun the making of $10,000,000 cartridges for the United States, at the rate of 1,000,000 weekly."

CLAIMS to the amount of more than twenty million dollars have already been filed at the State Department by American citizens for damages sustained in Cuba, Porto Rico, and other Spanish possessions, during the war. War runs everything into millions.

For Friends' Intelligencer

AT FLORENCE.

In the beautiful English cemetery in Florence is the tomb of Elizabeth Barrett Browning, a plain, white marble sarcophagus, with the initials E. B. B., in small letters, and no other inscription or decoration. The sarcophagus stands on four short, round marble columns over the plain white marble slab covering the actual resting-place.

In distant lands, where winds the Arno river
Among its mountains, in a sunny clime
Where olives bloom,—their silvery branches shiver,
And monastery bells their vespers chime ;
Where over all the earth a glory hovers,—
Where ideality gave art its birth,
And ages back perfection rare discovers,
Because the theme was holy,—not of earth,—
There, in the twilight, as the stars are shining,
While the new Western world is bright and gay,
Behold a portal grim, where vines are twining,
And spirits hover in the gloaming gray.

For still a spell, they say, to earth yet binding
The souls of those who wandered far from home,
In hoping search of health, yet never finding Aught else save in that sunny land a tomb.
And 'mid the fragrant roses one lies sleeping
Among those strangers in a foreign land,
Whose heart, once wrung by sound of children's weeping,
Responded to the world in protest grand.

No sculptured scroll, of workmanship the rarest,
Nor flowret pale, with airy, fragile bloom,
Adorns that simple monument of fairest
White columned marble on her noble tomb ;
But see ! between two slabs with sturdy creeping,
A dainty plant has reared its tender crest,—
From out that sacred soil in beauty peeping,
A treasured weed from Mrs. Browning's breast !

SARAH P. BYRNES.

Paris, France, Twelfth month 23, 1898.

TO NICHOLAS II.

SALUTE the soul that dares, though royal born,
Become knight errant of the hope forlorn ;
Disdain the sneer that curls the curving lip,
Arrest a world's doubt by the sceptre tip.
As sure as crawling slug within the wood,
The lowest reading of the highest mood.
As surely as the skies the caverns crown,
The noble deed shall live the base thought down.
As certain as the dawn to stir the dark,
The arrow of the age flies to its mark.
Dividing years, and years to be shall know
Whose was the hand that held and bent the bow.
Now, then, and ever well the great Law wears :
All souls high-born salute the Soul that dares.

—Elizabeth Stuart Phelps, in the Atlantic Monthly (part of longer poem.)

SUNSET.

THE west is a mass of color,
A glow of golden light,
That resolves like a chord of music
The day into the night.

—M. L. M., in Outlook.

THE general freight agent of a large railroad employing two hundred men, attributes eighty-five per cent. of the mistakes made in his office to his thirty-two cigarette smokers. He refuses to employ any man addicted to the habit.

DEAN FARRAR's sequel to his great work, "The Life of Christ," will not be ready until the spring of next year at the earliest. It will be largely the result of his recent studies in Palestine and full of entirely new matter. The Dean's literary activity has been very great lately, and it is possible that two books will be published for him next year.

THE PRESENT PROBLEM.¹

BY CARL SCHURZ.

LOOKING them in the face, let us first clear our minds of confused notions about our duties and responsibilities in the premises. That our victories have devolved upon us certain duties as to the people of the conquered islands, I readily admit. But are they the only duties we have to perform, or have they suddenly become paramount to all other duties? I deny it. I deny that the duties we owe to the Cubans and Porto Ricans and the Filipinos and the Tagals of the Asiatic islands absolve us from our duties to the 75,000,000 of our own people and to their posterity. I deny that they oblige us to destroy the moral credit of our own republic by turning this loudly heralded war of liberation and humanity into a land-grabbing game and an act of criminal aggression. I deny that they compel us to aggravate our race troubles, to bring upon us the constant danger of war, and to subject our people to the galling burden of increasing armaments. If we have rescued those unfortunate daughters of Spain, the colonies, from the tyranny of their cruel fathers, I deny that we are, therefore, in honor bound to marry any of the girls, or to take them all into our household, where they may disturb and demoralize our whole family. I deny that the liberation of those Spanish dependencies morally constrains us to do anything that would put our highest mission, to solve the great problem of democratic government, in jeopardy, or that would otherwise endanger the vital interests of the republic. Whatever our duties to them may be, our duties to our own country and people stand first, and from this standpoint we have, as sane men and patriotic citizens, to regard our obligation to take care of the future of those islands and their people.

WHAT SPAIN'S COLONIES FOUGHT FOR.

They fought for deliverance from Spanish oppression, and we helped them to obtain that deliverance. That deliverance they understood to mean independence. I repeat the question, whether anybody can tell me why the declaration of Congress that the Cubans of right ought to be free and independent, should not apply to all of them? Their independence, therefore, would be the natural and rightful outcome. This is the solution of the problem first to be taken in view. It is objected that they are not capable of independent government. They may answer that this is their affair and that they are at least entitled to a trial. I frankly admit that if they are given that trial, their conduct in governing themselves will be far from perfect. Well, the conduct of no people is perfect, not even our own. They may try to revenge themselves upon their tories in their revolutionary war. But we, too, threw our tories into hideous dungeons during our Revolutionary War, and persecuted and drove them away after its close. They may have bloody civil broils. But we, too, have had our Civil War, which cost hundreds of thousands of lives and devastated one-half of our land, and now we have in horrible abundance the killings by lynch law and our battles of Virden. They may have troubles with their wild tribes. So had we, and we treated our wild tribes in a manner not to be proud of. They may have corruption and rapacity in their government, but Havana and Ponce may get municipal administration almost as good as New York has under Tammany rule, and Manila may have a City Council not much less virtuous than that of Chicago.

¹ From his address before the University of Chicago.

WHAT MAY BE EXPECTED.

I say these things not in a spirit of levity, well understanding the difference, but say them seriously to remind you that, when we speak of the government those islands should have, we cannot reasonably set up standards which are not reached even by the most civilized people, and which in those regions could not be reached, even if we ourselves conducted their government with our best available statesmanship. Our attention is, in these days, frequently called to the admirable, and in many respects successful, administrative machinery introduced by Great Britain in India. But it must not be forgotten that this machinery was evolved from a century of rapine, corruption, disastrous blunders, savage struggles, and murderous revolts, and that even now many wise men in England gravely doubt in their hearts, whether it was best for the country to undertake the conquest of India at all, and are troubled by gloomy forebodings of a calamitous catastrophe that may some day engulf that splendid fabric of Asiatic dominion.

No, we cannot expect that the Porto Ricans, the Cubans, and the Filipinos will maintain orderly government in Anglo-Saxon fashion. But they may succeed in establishing a tolerable order of things in their fashion, as Mexico, after many decades of turbulent disorder, succeeded at last under Porfirio Diaz, in having a strong and orderly Government of her kind; not, indeed, such a government as we would tolerate in this Union, but a government answering Mexican character and interests, and respectable in its relations with the outside world.

OUR MILITARY OCCUPATION.

This will become all the more possible if, without annexing and ruling those people, we simply put them on their feet, and then give them the benefit of that humanitarian spirit which, as we claim, led us into the war for the liberation of Cuba. To this end we should keep our troops on the islands until their people have constructed governments and organized forces of their own for the maintenance of order. Our military occupation should not be kept up as long as possible, but should be withdrawn as soon as possible.

The Philippines may, as Belgium and Switzerland are in Europe, be covered by a guarantee of neutrality on the part of the Powers most interested in that region—an agreement which the diplomacy of the United States should not find it difficult to obtain. This would secure them against foreign aggression. As to the independent republics of Porto Rico and Cuba, our government might lend its good offices to unite them with San Domingo and Hayti in a confederacy of the Antilles, to give them a more respectable international standing. Stipulations should be agreed upon with them as to open ports and the freedom of business enterprise within their borders, affording all possible commercial facilities. Missionary effort in the largest sense, as to the development of popular education and of other civilizing agencies, as well as abundant charity in case of need, will on our part not be wanting, and all this will help to mitigate their disorderly tendencies and to steady their Governments.

FRIENDS, NOT FOREIGN RULERS.

Thus we shall be their best friends without being their foreign rulers. We shall have done our duty to them, to ourselves, and to the world. However imperfect their governments may still remain, they will at least be their own, and they will not, with their disorders and corruptions, contaminate our institutions, the integrity of which is not only to ourselves, but to liberty loving mankind, the most important concern of all. We may then await the result with generous patience—with the same patience with which, for many years, we witnessed the revolutionary disorders of Mexico on our very borders, without any thought of taking her government into our own hands.

Ask yourselves whether a policy like this will not raise the American people to a level of moral greatness never before attained! If this democracy, after all the intoxication of triumph in war, conscientiously remembers its professions and pledges, and soberly reflects on its duties to itself and others, and then deliberately resists the temptation of conquest, it will achieve the grandest triumph of the democratic idea that history knows of. It will give the government of, for, and by the people a prestige it never before possessed. It will render the cause of civilization throughout the world a service without parallel. It will put its detractors to shame, and its voice will be heard in the council of nations with more sincere respect and more deference than ever. The American people, having given proof of their strength and also of their honesty and wisdom, will stand infinitely mightier before the world than any number of subjugated vassals could make them. Are not here our best interests moral and material? Is not this genuine glory? Is not this true patriotism?

I call upon all who so believe never to lose heart in the struggle for this great cause, whatever odds may seem to be against us. Let there be not pusillanimous yielding while the final decision is still in the balance. Let us relax no effort in this, the greatest crisis the republic has ever seen. Let us never cease to invoke the good sense, the honesty, and the patriotic pride of the people. Let us raise high the flag of our country—not as an emblem of reckless adventure and greedy conquest, of betrayed professions and broken pledges, of criminal aggression and arbitrary rule over subject populations—but the old, the true flag, the flag of George Washington and Abraham Lincoln; the flag of the government of, for, and by the people; the flag of national faith held sacred and of national honor unsullied; the flag of human rights and of good example to all nations; the flag of true civilization, peace and good will to all men. Under it let us stand to the last, whatever betide.

THE AGRICULTURAL SITUATION.

E. P. Powell, Clinton, N. Y., in The Independent.

It serves as a refutation of the silly pictures of farm life, made popular by such writers as Hamlin Garland, portraying the almost unbearable burdens borne by farm housewives, that we find women are more and more turning to agriculture as a pursuit. More than this we find that they are successful in all its branches. Woman really is more executive than man. She spends less time discussing laws, or laws of nature. Her training, outside of politics, has fitted her especially for agricultural pursuits. Fifty girls are reported as students of farming at the College of Agriculture in Minneapolis. They take as complete a course as the young men. The course covers three years, including instruction in housekeeping for the women, in the place of black-smithing, carpentry, and military drill for the men. Cornell also reports an increased number of women students of agriculture. A large number of women who have worn themselves out as teachers are trying to recuperate themselves by taking up rural pursuits. This is the least hopeful feature of the drift. It will not prove to be an easy matter for a woman to readjust herself to a new pursuit without previous training or study. Woman has always borne the harder half of farm work. There is no reason in nature why she should not be placed in full charge of a farm.

This will be all the more possible as intensive farming displaces extensive farming. "Ten acres enough" is getting to be a literal and accepted fact among land cultivators. The object of farming is less and less to accumulate a heap of wealth; it is more and more to make sure of a reliable income. We are pretty fairly across the roar and rush of the steam age—and ready to accept or enter upon a period of quiet. Professor Orton prophesies a good deal of reaction to the methods of our fathers. He thinks that we shall not only replant the forests, but shall revert to the use of wood as fuel, and rest satisfied with a good deal more of quiet helpfulness. At any rate, we see abundant signs that our farmers will give up the idea of cultivating large areas, and content themselves with growing a great variety of crops, in a very thorough manner, on a few acres. The most important phase of education is that which teaches our children moderation and temperance—to take life more simply and with less pushing ambition. Much of this education must come from home life. But we may justly require that from our schools there shall be eliminated the false ambition to excel others—which has led to the worst evils of the competitive system. The growth of industrial coöperation encourages us to believe that we are passing into a kindlier era, devoid of the meaner and least Christian conceptions of "a living."

But while we note as one of the chief developments of 1898 a vast increase in the way of social and industrial coöperation, we must not allow ourselves to be persuaded of a near approach of a millennium.

CORNELL UNIVERSITY has 2,038 students this year, 248 more than last year.

THE REAL INDIAN.

From an article by Geo. Bird Grinnell, (editor of Forest and Stream), in the current number of the Atlantic Monthly.

WE cannot deal with the Indian of to-day unless we know the Indian of yesterday. The average man seldom thinks about Indians, and when he does he thinks of them either with entire indifference or with contemptuous dislike. He is moved in part by that narrowness which leads us to despise those who in appearance or by birth or tradition are different from ourselves,—the feeling which leads many a white man to speak with contempt of negroes or Chinamen. More weighty than this feeling, however, is the inherited one that the Indian is an enemy, who from the time he was first known has been hostile to us. Even nowadays most people seem to think of the Indian only as a warrior, who is chiefly occupied in killing women and children, burning homes and torturing captives. From the days when they fought the Pilgrim Fathers, and then the settlers of the Ohio Valley, and later still the emigrants crossing the plains, nine-tenths of all that has appeared in print about Indians has treated them from this point of view; and the newspapers, which now constitute so great a portion of the reading matter of the American public, seldom print anything about the Indians except in connection with massacres and uprisings.

The popular impressions are entirely erroneous. The Indian was a fighter, yet war was only an incident of his life. Like any other human being he is many-sided, and he did not always wear his war paint. The soldier sees the Indian from one point of view only, the missionary from another, the traveler from a third, the agent from a fourth. Each of these is impressed by some salient feature of his character, yet each sees that one only or chiefly, and the image shown is imperfect, ill-proportioned, and misleading.

For the Indian is not, as the popular idea figures him, stolid, taciturn, or even sullen in his every-day life. He may be shy and silent in the presence of strangers, but in his home-life he is talkative,—eager to give and receive the news, and to gossip about it. He is of a merry, laughter-loving people, and likes to make good-natured fun of another's peculiarities. Thus, one of her companions may jeeringly call a very slender woman the shadow of a moccasin string. Once, on the prairie, in the bright hot sunlight, I heard an Indian say to another who was very stout, "My friend, stand still for a little while. I want to sit down in the shade and cool off."

Indians are not ashamed to show their affection to one another. Chums who have been separated for any length of time are likely when they meet, to put their arms around and hug and kiss one another. Often two young men will be seen standing or sitting close together and holding hands, or with the arm of one about the neck of the other. My old father among the Blackfeet always puts his arms around me and hugs me when we meet after an absence.

In the family relation the Indian shows a side which is attractive. He loves his wife and family as we love ours, and he thinks of them before thinking of himself. But besides the natural affection that any animal has for its young the Indian cares for his children for another reason. He is intensely patriotic. His pride in his tribe and its achievements is very strong. In the children growing up in the camp, in the boys shooting their blunt-headed arrows at the blackbirds and ground squirrels, or yelling and shouting with excitement in the mimic warfares which constitute a part of their sport; in the girls whom he sees nursing their puppies or helping their mothers at their work, he recognizes those who a few years hence must bear the responsibilities of the tribe, uphold its past glories, or protect it from danger, as he and his ancestors have done. No wonder he loves them. Indians seldom punish their children, yet usually these are well trained, though chiefly by advice and counsel.

SUPPORT OF THE TSAR'S MANIFESTO.

Many meetings have been held in England, under different auspices, to support the Tsar's proposal of Disarmament. One of these, at York, on the 18th of last month, was addressed by Dr. R. Spence Watson, a Friend, actively concerned with public affairs, and very widely known as an organizer in the Liberal party. We take the following from the (London) Friend.

A PUBLIC meeting was held in the Friends' meeting-house, Clifford street, York, on the 18th ult., when Dr. Spence Watson delivered an address on the Tsar's Manifesto. There was a large gathering. Joseph Rowntree presided, and was supported by Dr. Spence Watson, Henry Tennant, Fielden Thorp, J. W. Procter, H. T. Chapman, (Leeds), James Todd, F. A. Russell, Arnold W. Rowntree, and others.

Dr. Spence Watson, in the course of his address, said the idea of "Peace Sunday" was one of the few promising signs in the right direction. We could not forget the song which was sung before Christ's birth, of "Peace on earth; good will to men." We were told that the English were the best fitted to govern others, that our treatment of the native races was the best of all. If that were so, then bad was the best. Let them look at any of our little wars, sift it for themselves, and they must come to the conclusion that it was unjustifiable. We were giving up in other countries, in the name of "glory," the honor and a great deal of the good fame which our forefathers won for us. These little wars were dangerous in another way. We won these victories easily, and after every victory there was an outburst of what was called "patriotic feeling," and a great thirst for more. Anyone who had seen war face to face knew that this taste for war grew on what it fed on, that it hardened the finer feelings, and that in a very few months men who were still fighting were another class of men altogether to the men as they went into the war at first. They were more brutalized, more debased.

There were several reasons given, not simply for war, but for the constant preparation for war. One frequently given was insurance. Insurance against what? Not against panic. Was it, then, insurance against war and the consequences of war? If that was so, it was as if a man who was insured against fire filled his house with combustibles and explosives. What an extraordinary kind of insurance! Because every time you made your house more fire-proof, you had to pay a bigger premium. In the last twenty-five years the trade of this country had scarcely appreciably increased, but our insurance had increased by 75 per cent.

But there was an honest reason for war. It was a bad reason, but it was honest. It was trade. We must, it was said, increase our commerce. We had a great and increasing population, and we must find outlets for them; or, at all events, if we could not live in the places we were going to annex, we must find outlets for the goods we made. We were told that "trade followed the flag." In fourteen years, such was our land hunger, we increased our empire from seven millions to upwards of eleven millions of square miles. In that period our imports and exports together increased from 733 to 745 millions—an infinitesimal increase. But when we came to exports, which were the arguments used most constantly for getting more land, we found they had decreased from 239 to 234 millions. We had stolen four millions of square miles of land, and we had got nothing for it in the direction which was constantly urged as the reason for extending our Empire. Then, no less than 75 per cent. of our exports went, not to our Colonies or dependencies, but to foreign nations. Let them rest assured it was an absolute fallacy that "trade followed the flag."

In 1841 our war expenditure was 15½ millions; now it was 44 millions, or, with our expenditure in India and our interest on war debts of former years added, 77 millions. We were too poor to give old-age pensions, too poor to give secondary education to the very poorest, and so give them a great chance in the battle of life, yet we could throw away 77 millions. year after year.

On the motion of James Todd, seconded by F. A. Russell, a resolution was unanimously adopted, welcoming the proposals of the Tsar of Russia, and earnestly hoping "that instructions will be given to the representatives of this country to use their most strenuous efforts to bring the deliberations of the Conference to a practical and satisfactory conclusion."

A "STATE Conference of Religion" is proposed in New York. Its object is to realize the Brotherhood of the Spirit among the churches, and all have been invited. A biennial conference, to continue there four days, is suggested. James M. Whiton, one of the editors of the Outlook, is promoting the movement. Favorable replies have been received from Commander and Mrs. Ballington Booth, R. Heber Newton, W. S. Rainsford, Henry MacCracken, G. Gottheil, Charles Cuthbert Hall, Lyman Abbott, Aaron M. Powell, and others.

LET the truth stand sure,
And the world is true;
Let your heart keep pure,
And the world will, too.

—Lois Houghton.

THE total amount of money raised and appropriated by State and local authorities for schools (public) in Pennsylvania, for the four years ending June, 1898, was 60½ millions of dollars, ($60,651,541.13).

THE Spanish transport Notre Dame de Salut, which left Havana on December 19, has arrived at Barcelona with 1,100 "repatriated" soldiers on board. "Four hundred and sixty were sent to hospitals and the remainder were hardly able to stand. There were twenty-nine deaths during the voyage."

SLAVERY.

James Collier, in Popular Science Monthly.

THE iron age is fitly inaugurated by the most degraded relationship that man can bear to man—that of slavery. Only the oldest of modern colonies imitate the mother countries in passing through this stage; in those of later foundation a mere shadow of it remains, or it takes other shapes. Colonists first enslave the natives of the country where they settle. In the South American colonies, where they went to find gold, they would work for no other purpose; they therefore needed the natives to till the soil; they needed them also as carriers. For these purposes they were used unscrupulously. They were distributed among the Spaniards under a system of repartimientos which repeated the provisions of Greek and Roman slavery, and was itself reduplicated three centuries later in the convict assignment system of New South Wales. With such savage cruelty was it worked that, according to the testimony of Columbus, six-sevenths of the population of Hispaniola died under it in a few years. The same form of slavery, but of a very different character, prevailed in Africa down almost to our own times. In the British colonies it was submerged in 1834, from causes exterior to itself, by the humanitarian wave that wrecked the West Indies; in the French colonies it was abolished by the revolutionary government in 1848; in the Dutch colonies it possibly subsists to this day. Theoretically abolished or not, the relationship between civilized whites and savage blacks must be everywhere a modified form of slavery; and a white colonization of the African tropics can only take place under conditions indistinguishable from a limited slavery.

A JOURNAL for those afflicted with gout and rheumatism, and kindred ills, has been established in Paris. It is called La Revue des Rhumatismes, and is specially intended for the entertainment of the unfortunates who suffer from the malady indicated. The list of collaborators is remarkable, including many distinguished persons, and eminent medical men.

THE Bowdoin Paper Manufacturing Company, of Maine, has just completed an order of six carloads of paper for immediate shipment to Chile, where it will be packed over the mountains and into the interior of South America on mule back. The paper was put up in bales—150 pounds in a bale—and these are slung over the backs of the pack animals.

THE Engineering and Mining Journal estimates the world's production of gold in 1898 at $286,218,954. To this total the United States contributed $64,300,000; Russia $25,136,000; the Witwatersrand, South Africa, $73,476,000, and Australasia, $61,480,000.

COMPRESSED air, it is said, has been developed as a great power, and is soon to be put into practical operation on certain railroads. Two cross-town car lines in New York City are to be run by it within a few weeks, and between 125th street and Yonkers a locomotive run by compressed air is to be started.

A GRIST mill at Watertown, Mass., is known to have been in use as far back as 1635, when it is believed to have been a town institution. It is now the property of the Waltham Savings Bank, and still continues to grind corn by means of the upper and nether millstones, using water as a motive power. It is soon to be vacated, and, as it is probably the oldest building of its kind in the United States, the Massachusetts Historical Society is considering the advisability of securing possession of the ancient structure.

Why He Quit the Business.

Young People's Paper.

A MAN who keeps a restaurant has his two children wait on the table.

One of them is a boy about ten years of age.

A customer was attracted by the quickness of the little fellow, and said:

"You have a splendid waiter."

"Yes," said the proprietor, "he is my son. I used to sell liquor, but he made me quit it."

"How?" asked the visitor.

The father told the story. The boy had come home one day, and said:

"Papa, we boys at school had a talk to-day about the business of our parents. Each fellow we asked, 'What does your father do?' One said, 'My father works.' Another said, 'My father keeps a store.' I said, 'My father sells liquor.' 'That is the meanest business on earth,' said one of the boys. Father, is that so?"

And the father said, "Yes, John, it is, and God helping me, I will get out of it." And so he did.

One Cigar a Day.

"How can you afford all these books?" asked a young man calling upon a friend; "I can't seem to find spare change for even the leading magazines."

"Oh, that library is only my one cigar a day," was the reply.

"What do you mean?" inquired the visitor.

"Mean? Just this: When you advised me to indulge in an occasional cigar several years ago I had been reading about a young fellow who bought books with the money that others would have burned in cigars, and I thought I would try and do the same. You may remember that I said I should allow myself one cigar a day?"

"Yes, I recall the conversation, but don't quite see the connection."

"Well, I never smoked, but I put by the price of a five cent cigar every day; and as the money accumulated, I bought books—the very books you see."

"You don't mean to say that your books cost no more than that! Why there are dollars' worth of them!"

"Yes, I know there are. I had six years more of my apprenticeship to serve when you advised me 'to be a man.' I put by the money, which, at five cents a day, amounted to $18.25 a year, or $109.50 in six years. I keep these books by themselves as the result of my apprenticeship cigar money; and if you had done as I did, you would, by this time, have saved many, many more dollars than I have, and you would have been better off in health and self-respect besides."

English University Feeling.

W. HUDSON SHAW, the University Extension lecturer, now in Philadelphia, in a recent interview in the Evening Telegraph, spoke of the feeling of different classes of the English people toward the United States. Among other things he said:

"I regret to say that the universities are cold and critical towards America. This has often seemed strange to me, and I can scarcely understand it now. At Oxford there is no teaching of the history of the United States, past or present—unless that has been recently undertaken. I suppose that has considerable to do with the coldness found there. You will find volumes of history of the Greek, Roman, and Middle Ages, but I doubt if you find an American history. I know that I thought it very strange that the ninth century of German history should be considered so important and that the eighteenth century of America should be entirely overlooked."

THE comparative strength of the six largest navies of the world is as follows: Great Britain 1,557,522 tons displacement, France 731,629 tons, Russia 453,899 tons, United States 303,070 tons, Germany 299,637 tons, Italy 286,175 tons.

Comes From Maryland.

It was suggested in Harper's Weekly, by E. S. Martin, that Levi Z. Leiter was a Hebrew, the name Levi suggesting the idea. But one or two persons have written to say this is a mistake. One of them says he "grew up at Leitersburg, Maryland, and comes of Pennsylvania German stock, and that such of the Leiters as still live in Leitersburg go to the German Reformed Church." Another correspondent writes from Oklahoma to say:

"I have known Mr. Leiter Zeigler Leiter personally since 1862. He is a native of Leitersburg, a village six miles from Hagerstown, Maryland—a village started by his grandfather. My own home, and that of my father and grandfather, was but four miles from that place.

"I also well remember Mr. Leiter's father, Joseph Leiter. His father's family and his mother's family—the Zeiglers—were German Lutherans, belonging to the very best German immigration which ever came to this country—that which settled in southern Pennsylvania and northern Maryland in the eighteenth century."

The matter is of some interest because L. Z. Leiter is a prominent person. He was of the Chicago firm of Field, Leiter & Co., (now Marshall Field & Co.), and retired with a large fortune; it was his son who was at the head of the unsuccessful "wheat deal" in that city; and it is his daughter who is the wife of the recently-appointed Viceroy of India, Baron Curzon of Kedleston,—formerly George N. Curzon.

End of the Town of Pullman.

By a decision of the Supreme Court of Illinois, the contention of Attorney-General M. T. Maloney is sustained whereby the Pullman Palace Car Company must stop all operations except in those lines for which it was incorporated. This will end the town of Pullman. Its churches and schools, its hotels, its celebrated arcade hall, the market house, the public library, and 2,000 brick residences will be sold to the highest bidder. The steel plant will pass into the control of the Pullman Iron and Steel Company, which is to be reorganized, and the brick-works which have furnished all the bricks used in building the town will be operated by a separate organization.

The streets of Pullman will be given over to the authorities of the city of Chicago, the waterworks will also pass into the control of the city, and the "company town," which has been the subject of so much discussion, will become an integral part of Chicago in every particular. It is said that in disposing of the company's manifold interests to the highest bidders, preference will be given to the Pullman Company's employés to purchase the houses which they now occupy.

Ideals of Life.

In his paper in Scribner's Magazine, this month, "To a Young Man or Woman in Search of the Ideal," Robert Grant writes thus:

"If one questions sometimes the depth of purpose of highly evolved man, and doubts the existence of God, it is because of the lavish wantonness of living of some of the very rich in the presence of the thousands of miserable and wretched creatures who still degrade our large cities. But there is this to be said in this connection: This new æsthetic ideal is at least partially the fruit of the awakening of humanity to a keener appreciation of the conditions of human life; but its progress is made certain by the coming evolution of democracy, which slowly but surely will overwhelm the aristocratic spirit forever, even though æstheticism, as realized by the arrogant and exclusive, perish in the process.

"The ideal life to-day is that which maintains the noblest aims of the aspiring past, cherishing unselfishness, purity, courage, truth, joy, existence, fineness of sentiment, and æsthetic beauty; but cherishes these in the spirit and for the purpose of a broader humanity than the melting soul has hitherto discerned in the sunset, the ocean, or the starry heavens. There are among us men and women living in this spirit of idealism, and they, O, my correspondents! are the first-class passengers."

John Morley's Views.

JOHN MORLEY, M. P., one of the two or three who have been regarded as possible successors to W. E. Gladstone, in the leadership of the Liberal Party of Great Britain, addressed a meeting of his constituents at Brechin (Scotland), on the evening of the 17th instant.

He said he entirely concurred with the reasons which led Sir William Vernon Harcourt to resign the leadership of the Liberal party in the House of Commons. It was his own intention to retire from active and responsible participation in the formal councils of the heads of the Liberal party, although his zealous and eager coöperation could always be counted upon for the advancement of every Liberal cause.

He criticised the "prevailing spirit of jingoism and imperialism." He denounced it as "entirely opposed to all the lessons of Mr. Gladstone," lessons to which he would feel himself untrue were he to allow himself to drift in acquiescence with a course of policy which he believed "injurious to our material prosperity, to the national character, and to the strength and safety of the imperial State."

He frankly admitted that he took a pessimistic view of the difficulties threatening throughout the world. "I think," he exclaimed, "we are nearer the beginning of them than the end." It was his firm conviction that "the prevailing spirit of imperialism must inevitably bring militarism, a gigantic daily growing expenditure, increased power to aristocrats and privileged classes and war."

CURRENT EVENTS.

It is announced that President McKinley has decided to create a "Commission" to investigate conditions in the Philippine Islands. The members of it will be five in number, and are said to be President Schurman, of Cornell University, Admiral Dewey, General Otis, (now military commander in the Philippines), Charles Denby, (formerly United States minister to China, and recently a member of the Army Investigation Commission), and Professor Dean C. Worcester, of the University of Michigan. President Schurman, it appears, is president of the commission.

THE work of the Philippine Commission, it is stated, "will be purely of an economic and not of a political nature. They will study the manners and habits of the Filipinos, the material resources of the country and its commercial possibilities, but they will not attempt to deal with the problem of government for the islands." But in connection with this, it is also said that the Commissioners will "unofficially confer" with the Filipinos, and that "it is believed that the natives can keep from hostilities until the arrival of the Commission at Manila, and then it is hoped that the best results will follow the visit." The Commissioners will sail about the 1st proximo for Manila.

IN the United States Senate, on the 14th inst., Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, offered a resolution declaring that the people of the Philippines of right ought to be free and independent; that they are absolved from political connection with Spain, and that they have full power to establish a government for themselves with which the United States does not propose to interfere. Senator Davis, of Minnesota, chairman of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, objected to the consideration of the resolution, and it "went over."

THE Paris Treaty was reported from the Senate Committee of Foreign Affairs to the Senate, without amendment, on the 11th inst. It was proposed that the consideration of the Treaty be in open session of the Senate. This proposal was discussed in executive session (with closed doors) at length on the 13th. Those opposed to the Treaty favored open sessions, and vice versa. On the 10th, in the Senate, Senator Mason, of Illinois, made an earnest plea for the right of the Filipinos to govern themselves. On the 11th, Senator Foraker, of Ohio, declared that it was not the purpose "of any one" to retain the Philippine Islands permanently, and said he had "no sympathy with those who talk of making war on Aguinaldo."

FOSTER M. VOORHEES, Republican, was inaugurated Governor of New Jersey, at Trenton, on the 17th instant. On the same day, at Harrisburg, William A. Stone was inaugurated Governor of Pennsylvania. The Pennsylvania Legislature also took the first vote for United States Senator, no one being chosen. M. S. Quay had 112 votes, lacking 16 of the number necessary to elect. The Democrats voted for G. A. Jenks, the "anti-Quay" Republicans for several different candidates, including Congressman John Dalzell, Congressman Charles W. Stone, and Judge John Stewart. Senator Sproul, of Delaware county, voted for Charles Emory Smith.

DECISIONS have been reached as to several of the places in the United States Senate. In Vermont, the Governor has appointed Chief Justice Jonathan Ross, (of the State Supreme Court), to fill the vacancy caused by the death of Senator J. S. Morrill. This appointment will last nearly two years. In Connecticut, after a struggle in the Republican caucus, Senator J. R. Hawley has been elected to succeed himself. In New Jersey, John Kean, Rep., succeeds James Smith, Dem. In Indiana, A. J. Beveridge has been selected by the Republican caucus to succeed David Turpie, Dem. In New York, Chauncey M. Depew, Rep., succeeds Edward Murphy, Dem.

NELSON DINGLEY, JR., Member of Congress from Maine, and Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee of the House, whose critical illness was mentioned last week, died on the 13th inst., at Washington, after having been so improved for a day or two that his recovery was hoped for. He was born in 1832, and had been in Congress since 1881. It is universally conceded that he was a man of high character and solid abilities, whose place cannot readily be filled.

It is said the Spanish Ministry, on the reassembling of the Cortes, will immediately ask authority to sell the Ladrões, Caroline, and Pelew Islands, as Spain cannot maintain a sufficient force to defend them. Senor Sagasta remains the head of the ministry, and it seems likely will not be replaced under existing circumstances. From Paris it is reported that the Spanish Government has begun negotiations with Aguinaldo, through the agency of certain Filipinos in Madrid, for the release of the Spanish prisoners. "Having begun to treat directly with the insurgents, Spain is likely to go a step further and accord them that recognition hitherto refused by any Government."

A CONTROVERSY over the canned beef supplied to the troops in the field last summer has assumed proportions nearly equal to the war itself. General Miles, some time ago, before the "War Investigating Commission," charged that the canned beef had been "treated" with chemicals, or "embalmed," and that it thus became unwholesome, and caused much of the sickness of the men. On the 12th General Egan, Commissary-General, and head of the "Subsistence Department" of the army, caused intense scandal by the vehemence of his denial of the story, and his denunciation of General Miles. A number of witnesses, including several connected with the Chicago packing-houses that furnished the beef, have testified that it was not "treated," as alleged. The President has ordered a court-martial to try General Egan for his attack on General Miles.

A LITTLE while the world may run
Its old mad way, with needle-gun
And iron-clad, but truth at last shall reign;
The cradle-song of Christ was never sung in vain!
—Whittier.

TEN thousand casks of strong drink sent to Manila were our first invoice to "our new possessions." They did not wait for the missionaries. They wanted to begin the work of "civilization" at once.

THE German army is to be gradually increased by 40,000 men, the increase to be completed by 1903. This will require a yearly addition to the estimates of 8,000,000 marks.

SOME of the French journals are now discussing the possibility of a Franco-German alliance.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

JOSEPH H. CHOATE, of New York City, one of the most distinguished of American lawyers, was last week appointed United States Ambassador to England. The existing vacancy was caused by the appointment of John Hay to be Secretary of State.

—J. Sterling Morton, of Nebraska, recently made protest against the reckless cutting of Christmas trees, and his suggestions have been warmly received in the West. He said: "The trees selected for slaughter on this anniversary are always the straightest and most symmetrical. There were last year more than 20,000,000 of Christmas trees cut down and put on the market. The absurdity of celebrating the birth of the Saviour of the world by a wanton waste and extravagance which jeopardizes the welfare of millions of human beings yet unborn, is obvious to every thinking man."

—In New York City, the medical profession and the officials of the free dispensaries have agreed upon a plan for remedying the abuses of medical charity, without at the same time destroying the independence of the dispensaries. It is proposed to have a law passed creating a Board of Control, representing the dispensaries, which shall work in harmony with the State Board of Charities, representing the physicians. One Board can do nothing without the consent of the other, but both together can remedy all the evils complained of.

—John Russell Young, Librarian of Congress and ex-Minister to China, died in Washington on the 17th, aged 58 years, after an illness of several weeks.

—The scheme of "rural mail delivery" is found difficult, on account of the long trips which must be made, usually over bad "back" roads, and the relatively low pay. A current item says that, "one of the newly appointed distributors of the rural mail from the West Chester, Pa., post-office, after a trial of the job and finding that he was obliged to drive his own team twenty miles a day for $400 a year, gave up the job in disgust."

—The congregation of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, on the 16th instant, by a vote of 246 to 6, accepted the advisory committee's report recommending the acceptance of the resignation of the pastor, Dr. Lyman Abbott, and the calling, as his successor, of Dr. N. D. Hillis, of the Central Church, Chicago, who it is expected will accept.

—Charlemagne Tower, Jr., of Philadelphia, who has been United States Minister to Austria-Hungary, has been transferred to the Russian Embassy, to succeed E. A. Hitchcock, recently appointed Secretary of the Interior. Addison C. Harris, of Indiana, has been appointed to the Austrian mission to succeed Mr. Tower.

—A despatch from Copenhagen says: "Captain Daniel Brunn will next summer head an Andree search expedition in whalers from Iceland, going to the Island of Jan Mayen, about 300 miles east of Greenland, where the Austrians have a supply depot, and thence to Greenland."

—The casket containing the supposed remains of Christopher Columbus, which arrived at Cadiz on the 16th from Havana, has been opened, and found to contain "about thirty bones and some ashes." It will be deposited in the Cathedral at Seville.

—It is announced that there is "a quiet movement" for a consolidation of the leading American manufacturers of gas and electric light fixtures. The value of the output is $6,000,000 a year. Most of the leading manufacturers are in New York City and Philadelphia.

—It is stated that Mrs. Sampson, wife of the Admiral, has started an "endless chain" among her friends in the United States to help the Cuban reconcentrados. "The last mail to Havana brought her $200, and she is now feeding 200 persons daily."

—Besides all the United States war-ships now building, one has just been launched at Newcastle, England, the Albany. She was purchased in an incomplete condition just before the war, so that Spain should not get her.

—Cuba has 1,200 sugar plantations and 1,500 tobacco fields. Most of them are in the western part of the island, while in the eastern part cotton is gradually displacing coffee.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 28, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 4.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

IV.

THE best belief of our day cannot be considered final ; it is but a stage on the road towards a purer apprehension of Divine Truth. Whilst I believe most fully that no discoveries will ever overthrow the fundamental doctrines of Christian belief, I believe too that these fundamental doctrines need to be continually expressed anew.

JOAN MARY FRY.

From her essay, "Drifting," in "Present Day Papers," Volume I.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

A NEW YEAR'S PRAYER.

O THOU whose blessings all our way,—
From soft brown tress to thin white hair,—
Our grateful hearts to Thee upbear ;
Grant, Father, this, our prayer to-day.

A heart still resting in thy peace ;
A heart still trusting that thy truth
Shall reign as in our earliest youth ;
And that thy joy shall never cease :

That wheresoe'er our ways may be,—
Through flowery meads and happy days,
Or sorrows, lightened by thy grace, —
They'll lead us safely home to Thee.

First month, 1899.

R.

THE SCOPE OF WHITTIER'S BIBLE REFERENCES.¹

BY ALICE NICHOLS TOWNSEND.

It seems strange to me that we have so few poems with biblical themes. Strange, because the Bible is full of pathetic, heroic incident, and the references of our poets show that they know the stories so well. I wonder, therefore, that we have not more poems like Longfellow's "Chamber over the Gate," or Whittier's "Ezekiel." As an example of the many and different aspects in which the same incident may present itself, let us look at Ezekiel's vision by the river Chebar as it is reflected in Whittier's poetry. First of all the prophet himself speaks—

"In sudden whirlwind, cloud, and flame,
The spirit of the Highest came !
Before my eyes a vision passed,
A glory terrible and vast ;
With dreadful eyes of living things,
And sounding sweep of angel wings,
With circling light and sapphire throne,
And flame-like form of One thereon,
And voice of that dread Likeness sent Down from the crystal firmament !"

If you compare these lines with the first and tenth chapters of Ezekiel you can but see the singular fidelity with which the Hebrew's spirit has been rendered in English verse, and you will know at once whom Whittier calls thereafter "the Prophet of the Cherubim." And if you can remember that vision, the eyes, the wings, the wheels, and the spirit that was in the wheels, the awful splendor of the crystal and the sapphire; you will recognize it again in the following passages :

"God's providence is not blind, but full of eyes
It searches all the refuges of lies" is one of them ; and speaking of a lovely and devoted church woman he says "her fervent heart"—

"kindled up, intense and warm,
A life in every rite and form,
As when on Chebar's banks of old,
The Hebrew's gorgeous vision rolled,
A spirit filled the vast machine,—
A life ' within the wheels ' was seen."

Of Daniel Pastorius, the "Pennsylvania Pilgrim," he says—

"The Light of Life shone round him ; one by one
The wandering lights that all misleading run,
Went out like candles paling in the sun.
That Light he followed, step by step, where'er
It led, as in the vision of the seer
The wheels moved as the spirit in the clear
And terrible crystal moved, with all their eyes
Watching the living splendor sink or rise,
Its will their will, knowing no otherwise."

In both these quotations the idea is "the spirit in the wheels," but in one case the ritual of the church represents the wheels, and in the other the soul, or will of the man, while in both cases the Indwelling Life is the same.

"Light of all our light the Source, Life of life, and Force of force."

The remaining passage is quite different. The poet is standing in the dazzling beauty of the winter woods, after an ice storm, and longs for the tender homeliness of earthly green—

"For the white glory overawes me ;
The crystal terror of the seer
Of Chebar's vision blinds me here.
Rebuke me not, O sapphire heaven !
Thou stainless earth, lay not on me
Thy keen reproach of purity,
If, in this august presence chamber,
I sigh for Summer's leaf-green gloom
And warm airs thick with odorous bloom !"

This last is decidedly characteristic of Whittier. To him ice and sky bring the vision of the "terrible crystal" and the "sapphire throne," yet he loves the every-day loveliness of the world, and dreads strangeness unspeakably, most of all magnificent strangeness. This love and dread tinge all his thought of the life hereafter. Like a parti-colored thread you can trace it through his poetry from "Lines to Follen," in early manhood, to "The Traveller at Sunset," and "At Last," in ripe old age.

¹A paper read before Young Friends' Association, Philadelphia.

So far as I can remember, Whittier is the only one of our poets who mentions this vision of Ezekiel. He goes far beyond the others in the number and variety of his Bible references. Open a volume of his poems anywhere and there you will probably find one. They average more than one to a page, and refer to almost every book from Genesis to Revelation. Whittier knows his Bible from cover to cover; its speech is his speech, and whether he sounds a moral war-cry, or hymns his trust and praise, or sings an old time ballad, or of the beauty of the world about him, his verse is strewn with scriptural phrase and imagery. Everybody knows that he fought Slavery with his whole soul's strength. He called it Moloch, the name of the foulest, bloodiest, cruelest idol the Jews ever worshipped. The priest who dared uphold its cause in a so-called Christian pulpit was to him only a priest of Moloch, who "broke the bondman's heart for bread, poured the bondman's blood for wine," and the merchant who would rather sacrifice truth and honor than lose trade by opposing the system, was to him no better than the old-time father who passed his children through the fire. In that bitter controversy both sides quoted scripture, but Whittier had only scorn for him who urged—

"the vain excuse
Of Hebrew custom, patriarchal use," or for him who would send back a fugitive "for Onesimus' sake." That obscure personage, Onesimus, is little known to this generation, I take it, but he seems to have been a bone of contention between the pro and anti-slavery parties, and both Whittier and Lowell belonged to that dangerous class described in the "Biglow Papers" as "holdin' onscriptural views relatin' to Onesimus." The analogy between Egyptian and American slavery was close enough to figure freely in the literature of the period, and such lines as the following by Lowell:

"Out from the land of bondage 'tis decreed our slaves shall go,

And signs to us are offered, as erst to Pharaoh;
If we are blind, their exodus, like Israel's of yore,
Through a Red Sea is doomed to be, whose surges are of gore."

and Whittier's

"A redder sea than Egypt's wave
Is piled and parted for the slave;
A darker cloud moves on in light;
A fiercer fire is guide by night!"

are as typical of the time in which they were written as of the men who wrote them. When at last the matter was settled, and negro slavery abolished forever, Whittier burst forth in that triumphantly humble thanksgiving so Hebraic in feeling and expression; of which part may be here quoted:

"It is done!
Clang of bell and roar of gun
Send the tidings up and down.
How the belfries rock and reel!
How the great guns peal on peal,
Fling the joy from town to town!

"For the Lord
On the whirlwind is abroad;
In the earthquake he has spoken;
He has smitten with his thunder

The iron walls asunder,
And the gates of brass are broken!
Loud and long
Lift the old exulting song;
Sing with Miriam by the sea,
He has cast the mighty down;
Horse and rider sink and drown;
"He hath triumphed gloriously!"

All poems which Whittier wrote to keep alive the public conscience are rather the prophet's burden than the poet's pleasure. Let us leave them to follow where he was so happy, into the communion with nature. Here was a man who walked alway on holy ground. Read his verse and you will find that as he saw the vision of Chebar in the winter woods, he heard the still, small voice in the autumn days, and beheld the burning bush in the scarlet maple. The mists curling above his loved Kenoza, and the moon's long shining track upon the sea, brought before him the One who walked the waves of Galilee. In the sunset hush he stood in "the pause before the breaking seals of mystery," as truly as did John in Patmos. The heaped-up apples in our homely orchards showed him a better Eden than that of long ago, the ample reward for wholesome toil, of which he said, "The curse of earth's gray morning is the blessing of its noon." There are two passages from Whittier which often come to mind when I am in woods. The first is:

"Through each branch-enwoven sky light,
Speaks he in the breeze,
As of old beneath the twilight
Of lost Eden's trees."

the second is,

"With drooping head and branches crossed
The twilight forest grieves,
Or speaks with tongues of Pentecost
From all its sunlit leaves."

There is another passage which I mention because the form of expression is rather unusual with Whittier:

"The lake in the moon
Sleeps dreaming of the mountains, fair as Ruth
In the old Hebrew pastoral, at the feet of Boaz."

As sure as this is Whittier it "sounds like" Longfellow, for in precisely such picturesque guise does he habitually clothe his Bible references. I could multiply examples showing the different characteristics of the two writers, but two instances will be enough.

First, Jacob's dream. Whittier says:

"Rachel stooped at Haran's fountains
Amid her father's thirsty flock,
Beautiful to her kinsman seeming
As the bright angels of his dreaming
On Padan-aram's holy rock."

and again:

"'Tis said that in the Holy Land
The angels of the place have blessed
The pilgrim's bed of desert sand,
Like Jacob's place of rest."

And gracefully compares the ministration to his friend's smile. Longfellow's love-led maiden rests in the Louisiana forest, where—

"Over them vast and high extended the cope of a cedar,
Swinging from its great arms the trumpet-flower and the grapevine,
Hung their ladder of ropes aloft like the ladder of Jacob,
On whose pendulous stairs the angels ascending, descending,

Were the swift humming-birds, that flitted from blossom to blossom.
Such was the vision Evangeline saw as she slumbered
beneath it."

This seems to me a charming blending of a beautiful old story with a new, and here is a sweet and natural touch for those of us who sat as children in a country church:

"Through the closed blinds, the golden sun
Poured in a dusty beam,
Like the celestial ladder seen
By Jacob in his dream."

Now let us see how Jacob's wrestling appears. Longfellow writes, also in "Evangeline,"—

"wild with the winds of September
Wrestled the trees of the forest, as Jacob of old with the angel."

Whittier gives the words which have steadied many a faltering soul:

"Man sees no future,—a phantom show
Is alone before him;
Past time is dead, and the grasses grow
And flowers bloom o'er him.

"The present, the present is all thou hast
For thy sure possessing;
Like the patriarch's angel hold it fast
Till it gives its blessing."

And he has a precious little poem that holds the peace of Indian summer:

"I lean my heart against the day
To feel its bland caressing;
I will not let it pass away
Before it leaves its blessing."

Pitiable is he who has not known such days, and cannot say,—

"God's angels come not as of old
The Syrian shepherds knew them;
In reddening dawns, in sunset gold,
And warm noon lights I view them."

It is futile to question whose form is the better. Whittier may sometimes be trite and common-place, Longfellow may be sometimes pretty, but we are the richer for them both, and the wheels can only follow "the living creature."

Of Whittier's purely devotional poetry I need say little here where it is known by heart. The moral sense of the nation owes much to him, but for most of us the mass of anti-slavery literature has shrunk to a paragraph in some school history. The old Massachusetts is passing away; the whirl of the spindle is faint by the Merrimac; and the bare-foot boy of the hills is of other race than that which Whittier sung. But the bracing air of the Bay State breathes through his verses, the sound of her pines and her streams is there, and I believe that in his ballads his fame as a poet stands most secure. I think also that it is as a man of deep spirituality he will be most read. Could we look into the well-worn volumes in our households, I think it is the passages of love and trust and practical piety which we should find oftenest penciled. The first copy I ever read carefully was borrowed from a class-mate at college, and when I returned it she said: "You found it badly marked, but I think I could not have lived through one winter of my life if it had not been for that book." She was a girl with a truly religious nature, nurtured in one of the narrowest sects, and, had the sentiments that comforted her in the poems been presented as formulated articles of faith, I doubt not their unorthodoxy would have startled and troubled her, but the gentle influence of the poet's heart-life stole into her own heart as softly as dew and sunshine work their will. To say that he who will look up Whittier's Bible references will gain a knowledge of the text of the whole Bible is to say the simple truth. To say that he who reads his Whittier with his Bible will find the text illumined, is to say no more than the truth. Our poet does not merely quote Scripture; it was part of his mission to translate the old Hebraisms into the plain speech of his own time, so that men to-day might better understand the changeless ideas behind the changing symbols of words.

The flaming cherubim will never greet our eyes, but we can not fail to recognize the every-day images, wherein, no less than Ezekiel by Chebar, Whittier by the Merrimac saw "visions of God."

"And, as when, in the clefts of Horeb,
Of old was his presence known,
The dread Ineffable Glory
Was Infinite Goodness alone."

THE REMNANT OF FRIENDS IN GERMANY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

HAVING received from John William Graham, of Manchester, England, the address of the correspondent of the Friends in Germany, I wrote to the latter and received in reply the following letter. It was of so great interest to me that I obtained his permission to send a translation to the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER.

B. F. B.

Berlin, Germany, First month 9, 1899.

MINDEN, HANOVER,

First month 2, 1899.

Benjamin F. Battin, Berlin,

Geehrter Freund: Your request of Twelfth month 30, I answer gladly, and rejoice when I see that of our Friends in England and America some few still take interest in our little community, which lies like a single island in the vast sea of Europe.

I am sorry to say that there is little to be said about us. For as a result of opposing and unfavorable circumstances, the formerly very large number of communities has melted down into one in Minden [a town of 18-19,000 inhabitants, and a county of the same name, situated in the province of Hanover]. To the "christliche Gesellschaft der Freunde" (Society of Friends) in Minden there still belong five or six families, including altogether twenty-five to thirty members. In Obernkirchen, in the vicinity of Minden, two families yet join with us. The earlier meetings, with large memberships, which existed at the end of the foregoing and the beginning of the present century in Pyrmont, Friedenthal, in the villages of Martum, Hille, and Eidinghausen, and which numbered about 400 members, have entirely disappeared.

Since there is no literature concerning the Quakers in Germany, I will give you a short review of our history.

In 1795, at a time when, especially in Minden and in the surrounding country, there were large numbers of people who had turned away from the Established Church, and preferred to perform, within their own families and in small circles, the religious worship of that kind and in that way that seemed to them right and better—there came to Minden (I know not from what motive) a woman Friend from England, named Sarah Grubb. She taught the principles of Friends and established the first community. In the beginning, the number of members was very small; however, it soon increased to between 300 and 400, so that the Government began to notice this new religious movement, which could easily increase in importance, and adopted measures for its repression. The Friends, as a consequence of their creed, soon met with severe oppression and persecution; they refused to do military service and to take an oath; those marriages not performed by the Church, i. e., the Established Church, were not recognized as legal, the children passed as illegitimate, and could not in law inherit property. On account of the refusal to take oaths, high fines and costs were laid upon them. The young people, if they would not become soldiers, had to emigrate. Besides, a military tax of three per cent. of their incomes was laid upon them. Since the payment of this tax to support the militia was not freely given by most of the Friends, the Government resorted to attachments and seizures. Induced by all these adversities, the weak fell off. Many, almost all, emigrated to America, principally to Philadelphia, (1805–1813), so that the number gradually decreased, and to-day only about thirty members exist here. And now, in consequence of the military exactions, almost all the able-bodied young people have wandered away, the old are dying,—there is no fresh growth left behind. Propagandism is not practiced by us, and the little community is gradually sinking away.

I grieve about it sincerely that our simple, true creed has so little following in Deutschland. It may have lain much with us—but also with our opposing conditions of life. Whether it is too late, or whether once more a time of awakening will come, one can scarcely know; it lies in the hand of the Lord.

We few hold every First-day morning, from 10 to 11.30, our meeting. Perhaps you will have opportunity to visit Minden; and I would gladly give further information in case my few lines should not suffice.

I remain, hochachtungsvoll, ihr,
MAX RASCHE.

SOCIETY, not solitude, is the natural home of Christianity. The Christian is not to flee from the contagion of evil, but to meet it with the contact of health and holiness.—Sunday School Times.

REST in the Lord! Wait patiently for him! In Hebrew, "Be silent to God, and let him mould thee." Keep still, and he will mould thee to the right shape.—Martin Luther.

"HE who receives a good turn should never forget it. He who does one, should never remember it."

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 6.—SECOND MONTH 5.

THE ORIGIN OF THE HEBREWS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And all the people of the earth shall see that thou art called by the name of the Lord: and they shall be afraid of thee.—Deuteronomy, xxviii., 9.

Scripture Reading.—Genesis, xii., 1-10; xiii., 1-18.

It has been mentioned in the preceding lesson that the white portion of mankind is divided by race affinity and language into three great groups: the Aryans, who are to be found in Europe and in India; the Semites of Syria; and the so-called Hamitic group of rather miscellaneous tribes to the southward.

There is reason to believe that a nomadic band of Semites settled in the neighborhood of the Persian Gulf some four thousand years B. C. This date is obtained from a study of the records of their descendants, many of which records are now in the museums of England, France and Germany. The nation thus founded was afterward called Chaldea. The settlers did not, however, find the land untenanted. On the contrary, it was occupied by a nation of the great Turanian or Yellow race, having a civilization considerably developed. They had also a religious system of long standing, with its penitential psalms, its invocations and incantations, its priests and altars. As has been the case many times since, the invaders adopted the civilization and the religion of the people among whom they settled, retaining also their language as the language of religion. A modern illustration of a similar case is the adoption of the Latin language by the Christian church before the era of Protestantism, and its continued use in the Roman Catholic church to-day. For common purposes, however, the Semitic language superseded the Accadian as the Semites came to be the ruling class. In the course of centuries cities grew up in various parts of the plain of Shinar, and each became the centre of a local government, so that the region was rather an aggregation of cities—each governing the adjacent territory—than a nation. One of these cities, and for a time the most powerful of them, was Ur; another was Agade, known in the Bible as Accad. At a later time Babylon became the capital of the centralized government, but at the time of which we are speaking it was either not founded or was unimportant.

To the north and west of Chaldea lay the country of Elam. About 2300 B. C. an invasion of the Elamite king laid waste the lands of the Chaldeans, and for a time at least subjected the latter to the yoke of a conqueror. This invasion is of special interest to us, for it occurred at just about the time, and may have been directly or indirectly the cause, of the migration to the westward of Terah and his household. "And Terah took Abram his son . . . and Sarai his daughter-in-law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees . . . ; and they came unto Haran and dwelt there." The time of this migration is fixed by the names of several of the kings of Elam and Chaldea, which are mentioned in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis, and also in the clay books of Assyria. This will be more fully discussed in another lesson.

Haran was situated on the Euphrates river, on the main caravan route between Chaldea and Egypt. There seems to have been some connection between Ur and Haran; at any rate, both cities had altars dedicated to the Moon God as their special deity. So the movement of the family of Terah from Ur to Haran was probably not accidental, but may have represented a considerable movement on the part of Chaldean families desiring to escape from oppression. However that may be, we see that a short time afterward Abram was able to gather together three hundred and eighteen armed retainers (Gen. xiv., 14), showing a large body of nearly related people. Terah died in Haran.

"Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house unto a land that I will shew thee; and I will make thee a great nation" (Gen. xii., 1-2). So Abram, with his nephew Lot, his household and his flocks, set out from Haran to seek out a new home in an unknown country.

There is another account of the movements of this ancient family in the book known as "Antiquities of the Jews," by Josephus, a Jew of the Roman period. His narrative parallels the Bible narrative in the whole course of Hebrew history. He relates many traditions not included in the Bible, and omits much that is told there, but in general covers the same ground. He tells us that Terah left Ur because of his sorrow for the death of Haran, the father of Lot and of Sarai, Abram's wife (Gen. xi., 28). Of Abram he says: "He was a person of great sagacity, both for understanding all things and persuading his hearers . . . ; for which reason he began to have higher notions of virtue than others had, and he determined to renew and to change the opinion all men then happened to have concerning God; for he was the first that ventured to publish this notion, that there was but one God, the Creator of the Universe." Josephus goes on to tell that because of this the Chaldeans and the other people of Mesopotamia raised a tumult against Abram, so that he thought it best to leave that country. The emigrant probably moved westward to the fords of the Euphrates and then turned to the south, passing through Damascus. There is an ancient tradition that he made himself king of Damascus, and ruled there for a time, but later removed again with his people to Canaan. It is certain that many traditions link Abram's name with that of Damascus. One of his servants (Gen. xv., 2) is mentioned as "Eliezer of Damascus."

If the tradition of Josephus be true, we see in the father of the Hebrew people an early example of one persecuted for righteousness' sake. Whether it be accepted or not, we have the evidence that, living as he did, in the midst of an idolatrous people, he had the power and originality of mind to come out from them and to recognize the Unity of God. Flesh and blood had not revealed it to him, but the Father himself. So four thousand years ago God spake to His children; so He speaks to them to-day. "He that hath ears to hear, let him hear."

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 6.—SECOND MONTH 5.

THE RECOVERY OF THE SICK SON.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I bow my knees unto the Father that ye may be strengthened with power through his Spirit in the inward man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith.—Ephesians, iii., 14, 17.

Read from Gospel of John, Chapter iv., 43-54.

REVISED VERSION.

This lesson is taken, like the last one, from the fourth chapter of the Gospel of John. Its subject is simple, the recovery of the sick youth, "the nobleman's son," as the text gives it.

The title placed on the lesson by those selecting the "International" texts, is "The Nobleman's Son Healed." Two comments may be made on this title: (1) The name "nobleman,"—employed by the translators, in England, of our versions of the Scriptures,—is inappropriate. The father of the sick youth, as suggested by the marginal note, was probably an imperial official, a man in authority at Capernaum, under the Roman government, which then ruled Palestine. (2) The text does not say that Jesus healed the young man. It says he recovered from his illness,—that at the time when Jesus, in Cana, said to the father, "thy son liveth," the youth "began to amend." If we take the text as it reads, it appears therefore that Jesus apprehended the young man's condition, and so was able to console the anxious father, but we are not told that in this case he exercised a power of healing.

The place of the occurrence was Cana, in Galilee, where, nine months before, the "sign" of turning water into wine at the marriage feast, had been performed. The sick young man was at Capernaum, several miles away; the father had come to Cana with the purpose of invoking the aid of Jesus. Jesus, as the text says, had remained two days at Sychar, (now 'Askar), the town by Jacob's Well, after his conversation there with the Woman of Samaria, and then had gone "into Galilee," to Cana. A prophet, he had said, "is not without honor save in his own country," and by this he seems to have designated the near neighborhood of Nazareth, his early home, and of Capernaum, where he dwelt later, for Nazareth is itself in Galilee.

It is in this lesson the scripture occurs, already mentioned, in which Jesus says, "Except ye see signs and wonders, ye will in nowise believe,"—a reproof plainly of that outward and literal attitude of mind which would not be influenced by testimony of the spirit, but demanded proof that appealed to the physical senses. This, as the text says, (v. 54) was "the second sign that Jesus did," the turning of the water into wine being the first. The official, the father of the sick youth, being convinced that the recovery began at the moment when Jesus told him, "believed," and his family also, but the nature of their conviction, it may be feared, was but superficial. Faith so founded can hardly have a deep root in the spiritual life. The verses in Matthew, vii., 21-24, may be profitably recalled: "Not every one that saith unto me, Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of heaven; but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven. Many will say to me on that day, Lord, Lord, did we not prophesy by thy name, and by thy name cast out devils (or demons) and by thy name do many mighty works? And then I will profess unto them, I never knew you; depart from me." I pray the Father, says Paul, (Ephesians, iii., 14-18), "that ye may be strengthened with power through his Spirit in the inward man; that Christ may dwell in your hearts through faith; to the end that ye, being rooted and grounded in love, may be strong," etc.

It is this power and strength that is the thing needful. The healing of the flesh, the recovery from fevers that affect the outward body, is indeed a blessing, but the healing of the soul, and its gain of power by harmony with God, is the supreme object. "He indeed," says Samuel M. Janney, referring to the Divine Master, "through the power of God dwelling in him, cast out demons, healed diseases, and raised the dead; but these great works being performed on the bodies of men"—their outward and earthly garment—"were temporary in their character, whereas the works wrought by the same Divine Power upon the soul, healing its diseases and raising it from death to life, are permanent, and if we continue faithful will endure forever."

THE NEED CONTINUED.

From the Journal, 1860, of Rachel Hicks, of Long Island.

My desires are strong that there may be in all generations yet to come a succession of standard-bearers inciting the people to the Divine Light within; which, if attended to, will enlighten the understanding of every one to see that there is no safety in any other state than in watchfulness, prayer, and obedience to the will of God. We are, and ever will be, a tried people; not only by temptations in our own minds, but by the insinuations of those who, having departed from the Truth, and being given over to strange delusions and cunningly devised fables, labor to draw others into their own ways and opinions.

"He shall be for a sanctuary, a refuge and a strong tower, unto which the righteous flee and are safe." These being taught of God, are sons of God, and brethren in this heavenly relationship, seeking the welfare of one another in the unity of the Spirit, and bond of peace, and watching over one another for good.

Thus was our Society formed in the beginning; love of the brethren was and is the offspring of love to God, which inclined them to meet together to worship him in spirit. And as occasion required, our discipline was formed, containing rules and regulations for our outward conduct, originating in the perfect wisdom of him who is a God of order. Friends, in the meekness of their spirits, for the good of all, were willing to submit to one another, so that love and harmony might be maintained, seeing that without this outward bond societies or associations could not profitably exist. "Thou shalt be the head; thou shalt lend to many nations, but shalt not borrow," was the command to this people as well as to Israel of old.

THE VOICE OF AMERICA.

Edward Everett Hale, in Christian Register.

THE Czar's movement for permanent peace has been left to the welcome of the people of the world in the first instance, expressed more loudly and definitely than it can be expressed by ministries or administrations or princes. Nobody expected that the military aristocracy of Europe would be enthusiastic about a measure which should give permanent peace to the world. Nobody supposed that kings who are supported by bayonets would have grown to the confidence which should throw those bayonets away. On the other hand, everybody has known, for a hundred years, that war is a game which princes would not play at if people were wise. And every one has known that, in this matter, for fifty years people have been growing wiser and wiser.

It is quite true that the daily press has not quite "got round" to this matter yet, if one may use a bit of our national slang. It is as true that, so soon as the people find methods for expressing the interest which they feel, the press will be ready to express that interest.

Lord Salisbury's admirable letter is, in its way, as striking as the Czar's manifesto. And, if any careless person has supposed that the Czar confined himself to a plan of partial disarmament by the great nations of Europe, no one will be so foolish as to think Lord Salisbury is so restricted. Permanent peace is what the Czar wants. Permanent peace is what Lord Salisbury wants. Now both these men are familiar with the diplomacy of the last twenty years, as the general reader is not. Both these men tell us, therefore, that all the important treaties of the last twenty years have attempted to provide methods by which, before two nations rush into battle, the cause of conflict may be examined before a competent tribunal. True enough, many of the substitutes for war thus proposed, one may say sporadically, in the clumsy methods of old-fashioned diplomacy, have been crude. They have often supposed that governments are more stupid than individuals. Where two men in private life settle a difference by referring it to an established court, it has been supposed that two nations must make a new tribunal for every case. It is generally proposed that this tribunal shall not have even such power to call witnesses as belongs to a police court. It is proposed that it shall act from its own good sense, without precedence or authorities. And it is proposed that it shall die as soon as it has spoken, and that, in its next difficulty, the world must begin over again.

But, all the same, all these plans show the profound desire for peace, which has strengthened steadily in the last twenty years. The Czar states it very well, and founds his whole argument upon it. Perhaps to the English races it seems that Lord Salisbury states it even better.

"Let us have a focus," says the Czar, "which shall bring all these rays together. Let us have a corporate consecration of the hopes for universal peace." These are his words, as they appear from the English version of the French translation of the German rendering of the Russian original.

Perhaps they are not the words which an Anglo-Saxon would have chosen. But they mean action for peace, instead of talk. They mean union, instead of discussion. They mean a practical plan for a Permanent Tribunal at work all the time, instead of a chorus of singers united only on Christmas Day. Instead of longer discussions between the friends of this plan and that plan, they mean a frank conference between a small number of wise men who shall decide the question whether all the States of Christendom may not have a central tribunal before which to lay their unsettled issues, as for one hundred years the States of America have laid theirs before the Supreme Court of the United States.

For the next two months the people of America ought to be expressing their opinion in this matter. They have tried this experiment, and they know that it succeeds. Now is their time to say so. In petitions and in memorials, in town meetings, in parish meetings, and in conventions, by the voice of whatever club or society, they must show to the nations of mankind that they have confidence that the same system will be good for the world which has given to them their peace, union, and strength.

THE UNIVERSITY OF COMMON SENSE.

From an address by ex-President C. B. Hulbert, of Middleburg College, Vermont.

I REPEAT: the world is inexorably severe in inspecting the man himself, and cares little as to what sort of machinery has been employed in making him. It is studious to know if he is always a student in the University of Common Sense, and accepts its discipline, and follows its methods.

We all live in a magnificent university, if we will so interpret and use the world we live in. Every object in nature and every event in life is a professor's chair in full occupancy. The stars are not "gimlet holes" bored to let the glory through; they are teachers full of instruction. Every mountain, valley, tree, and shrub; "the brooks that make the meadows green;" flowers arrayed in fragile glory, whose every petal is a pulpit orator; these objects in nature, conjoined with the facts of science, philosophy, history, and art that attend them, constitute a Faculty of Instruction.

The habit of fixed and prolonged attention to any subject, book, or treatise is invaluable, and can be acquired by any one with a little resolution. Accuracy, promptness, versatility, and force of mental action can be steadily increased by simply attending to what is all the while before our eyes. "A youth," says President Gilman, "who has been taught to observe the phenomena of nature, who knows the aspects of the starry heavens, who welcomes 'the procession of the flowers' from the arbutus to the asters, who knows the birds from their songs, who loves to chase the brilliant butterfly, who has watched the habits of the animals of the forests, who has studied the starfish and the jelly-fish in their seaboard homes, who has learned the rocks of the region where he dwells, who delights to climb the mountain and trace out the range of the ridges, the interlockings of the valleys, and the courses of the flowing waters—the youth who can thus hold 'communion with the outward forms of nature,' has the foundation laid for a lifetime of culture, for an infinite variety of intellectual enjoyments."

This habit, too, carries him beyond the events of the day to those of past generations. It binds him into sympathy with his race. It repeats to him the lessons of sages and prophets of old. He learns all things by heart. His memory is stored with proverbs and maxims and poems. He falls in love with truth—all truth—and partakes of her immortality and her beauty. He sees her everywhere and in all things. He cannot escape from her if he would. She illuminates the remotest star and the first-born of the nebulae. There is no obscurity which she does not penetrate, no height which she does not scale, no magnitude which she does not embrace. The thoughtful soul recognizes her omnipresence and becomes the repository of her behests. It has been said that marriage with a noble woman is itself a liberal education: how much more, then, when such wedlock is also a bridal union with all truth! "She shall bring thee to honor, when thou dost embrace her."

I would be understood: I am not saying one word in a disparagement of academical and collegiate training: I am only insisting upon the opportunities and advantages accorded to those who are compelled to forego such training; and I say that these advantages and opportunities are simply huge; that the people's college opens to all, without money and without price, avenues to knowledge, discipline, and culture.

FOLLY OF USELESS RISKS.—It is better to keep away from a moral danger than to see how near we can go with safety. It is better to understate a fact than to risk an overstatement, which may be the first step toward lying. There is a lesson for us all in the familiar story of the gentleman who advertised for a coachman, and three men applied. He asked each of them how near he could drive to the edge of a precipice without going over. The first said "half a yard;" the second, "a foot." The third said he would keep as far from it as possible. He was given the place. No one wants a coachman who is willing to calculate how much needless risk he can take. And taking needless risk is equally unwise in the conduct of life. If you have a weak place, keep away from what would tempt it, as far as other duties will permit. Never court temptation, for that is a first step toward yielding to it.—S. S. Times.

DEMOCRACY [in America] may be said to have succeeded before it was accepted as doctrine, or embodied as a political fact. Our ancestors sought a new country. What they found was a new condition of mind.—J. R. Lowell.

GOD is love; and to love men till private attachments have expanded into philanthropy which embraces all,—at last even the evil and enemies with compassion,—that is to love God.—F. W. Robertson.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN.

PHILADELPHIA, FIRST MONTH 28, 1899.

"CIVILIZATION."

AFTER all, what is civilization? Much is said about it, and there is a confident assumption, almost dictating the world's action from day to day, that it is what society desires and nations ought to attain. The "uncivilized" are set aside with contempt; the "civilized" are held up as examples for universal and unqualified imitation.

We shall not get much help from the dictionaries, for they reflect mainly the assumption which is so fixed and settled in common usage. But one of them quotes a passage from Lecky's "History of European Morals" which throws some light on the subject, as disclosing more precisely what the ordinary idea is, and furnishing a "point of view." Lecky says that "the entire structure of civilization is founded upon the belief that it is a good thing to cultivate intellectual and material capacities, even at the cost of certain moral evils." And the "Century" dictionary, formulating its own definition of the word, says civilization is "the state of being reclaimed from the rudeness of savage life, and advanced in arts and learning."

We have thus some clues to an analysis of the word's meaning, as commonly understood. Civilization is a reclamation from primitive rudeness, an advancement in knowledge and skill. And its "entire structure," Lecky asserts, rests upon the assumption that even at the cost of moral loss, it is worth while, it is "a good thing," to acquire increased capacity of intellect, and increased material skill. As a friend said, to whom we propounded the initial question above, civilization is advancement in power to use the forces of nature.

But all this seems very imperfect. There is no note here of increased ethical quality. The whole formula is that of an intellectual and material advancement. Increased knowledge, but nothing said of wisdom; increased skill of eye and hand, but no suggestion of benevolent use of the skill. Lecky, we must reflect, when he defined "the whole structure of civilization," was thinking of Europe, and describing the ruling European note. It is true that in the ordinary affairs of nations in the old world, civilization has been largely a material growth.

It is safe, we are sure, to demand an enlargement of the scope of civilization. If we are to bow down before it, let it be endued with qualities entitled to our respect. If it is the model for the world, let it have a saving and uplifting character. Civilization must be not merely intelligence and skill, but intelligence and skill directed by virtue. It is not only the increase of power over the forces of nature, but the exercise of this power benevolently. To argue otherwise is to deny the evolution of good, the upward growth of the world's capacities. For if the increase of knowledge and skill are only to increase man's power in a material and unmoral sense, then obviously there is not a corresponding betterment of conditions,—the material must outstrip the ethical, and the world become more powerful but less humane. Civilization would diminish happiness instead of increasing it.

It may be suggested that something of this sort is what has occurred. The knowledge how to utilize nature, how to adapt and control the crude materials which she affords, has wonderfully grown within the century, and exulting over this, the world has plunged into the enjoyment of its results without duly considering the moral growth that ought to accompany it. We shall have to build up, now, on the side of the ethical in order to match the material and æsthetic. We shall have to make our system purify, as well as construct. We shall have to make the civilization which we celebrate so confidently helpful as well as useful. The civilization which is selfish and rapacious is a false system, and to hand it on to peoples rising out of primitive conditions would be not to uplift them, but to injure them.

WE are indebted to our friend B. F. Battin, (now engaged in study in Berlin), for the very interesting letter which he has had, and which he translates and forwards, from the correspondent of the Friends' community at Minden, in Prussia. The circumstances which have surrounded the meetings of Friends there, since their remarkable origin late in the last century, are well worth renewed attention. Their attempt to live in peace, and at peace, brought down upon them disapproval and repressive measures, which have made it practically impossible for them to survive as a religious body. The present system of universal and compulsory military service gives to young men but one alternative,—that of persecution. Precisely the same thing has been true in France, where the company of Friends at Congenies and its neighborhood have been and are under the same exterminating pressure from the military system.

A VALUED Friend writes us: "I took up my pen to commend certain parts of the editorial in regard to 'Young Friends' Associations,' in the INTELLIGENCER of First month 21, but on carefully reading it over for the third or fourth time, I find it all so good and so much to the purpose that I wish the attention of every member of Friends' Associations could be thoughtfully turned to it."

—Which we publish, not because of the commendation it contains—though this is not disagreeable—but because it approves the suggestions which we offered last week. That our friend quoted above finds them good is evidence that they were rightly founded.

A FILIPINO, at Manila, who is charged with posting a handbill in behalf of the independence of his people, is described in the despatches as "seditious," and the Filipinos who follow Aguinaldo are now commonly called "insurgents." It would surely rejoice the heart of George the Third and Lord North if they could see the Americans of 1899 repudiating George Washington, and taking up the "loyalist" phrases of 1775-83. The American Republic calling the people of the Philippines "insurgents," because they want a republic of their own, is a spectacle to make the Revolutionary Fathers rub their eyes.

THE plan to locate a Friends' Colony in the Western States—perhaps one of those on the Pacific Coast—is still entertained, and Friends in Illinois whose good faith and good judgment we confide in would like to have the coöperation of some interested in the plan, in the eastern yearly meetings. It is not proposed, as has been repeatedly explained, to unsettle those who are already well fixed, but to gather together those who may be inclined to remove. It can hardly be questioned that it would be much better for these to join forces—better for the individuals, and better for our Society.

We wish very much that some of our farmers in the East who are interested in the subject, in a practical and definite way, would write to our friend Morris A. Wilson, at Magnolia, Ill., and have an interchange of views.

BIRTHS.

BROSIOUS.—At Lansdowne, Pa., First month 5, 1899, to Sumner G. and Marion M. Brosius, a son, who is named Marriott Clarkson Brosius.

GARDNER.—First month 14, 1899, to Oscar B. and Julia Gardner, of Farmington, N. Y., a daughter, who is named Julia.

VALENTINE.—At Glen Cove, N. Y., First month 20, 1899, to Charles Post and Annie Laurie Valentine, a son, who has been named Charles Francis Lowell.

WALTON.—In London Grove, Chester county, Pa., Twelfth month 11, 1898, to Howard J. and Jennie Michener Walton, a son, who is named Howard J.

MARRIAGES.

ERISLEY—WOOD.—At the home of the bride's parents, near Hoopeston, Illinois, First month 12, 1899, Elmina, daughter of T. Clarkson and Alcinda Wood, and Othel M. Erisley.

DEATHS.

ALLEN.—At her home, near Wayne, Pa., Twelfth month 24, 1898, Eliza Scattergood, wife of Franklin Allen, in the 73d year of her age. Interment at Fair Hill, Friends' ground, Twelfth month 27.

She had been ailing for a short time, but was thought to be improving, and her sudden demise was a great shock to her family. She was a devoted wife and faithful mother, and leaves a husband and seven children to mourn her loss.

S.

EASTBURN.—At his late home near Mill Creek Meeting, Delaware, First month 1, 1899, David Eastburn, in his 88th year.

He had been for a long time a member and elder in good esteem of New Garden Monthly Meeting. He was very regular in the attendance of his religious meetings. Seldom ever have we known him to allow business or unfavorable weather to keep him absent from this reasonable service.

Through industry and economy he had amassed considerable means, which enabled him to assist many to help themselves to more comfortable conditions. Faithful in this line, as well as other duties of a more public character, that his friends had assigned him, he passed a long life of usefulness, appreciated and respected. After a few months' gradual decline of his physical powers, which confined him to his home, he was quietly, and with but little apparent suffering released from the bonds of mortality, and we trust reaps the reward for well doing, in accordance with the promise, "He that is faithful in the little, I will make ruler over more."

H.

HARLAN.—Twelfth month 17, 1898, at the home of her daughter, near Parkerville, Chester county, Pa., Lydia J. Harlan, in the 87th year of her age; a member of Kennett Monthly Meeting.

HALL.—At her home in Unionville, Pa., First month 6, 1899, Lydia Hall, aged 74 years.

Always associated with Friends, a few years since she became a member of Kennett Monthly Meeting.

JONES.—At Ardonia, New York, First month 14, 1899, after a lingering illness, Sarah Coutant, wife of Rufus M. Jones, (editor of the American Friend).

NEWBOLD.—In Langhorne, Bucks county, Pa., on First month 15, 1899, Mary Newbold, daughter of the late Elisha Newbold, in the 71st year of her age.

She had been an invalid for many years.

PARRY.—In Philadelphia, First month 16, 1899, Anne Knight Parry, widow of Oliver Parry; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street.

PENNOCK.—At his home, near Chatham, Londongrove township, Chester county, Pa., suddenly, First month 18, 1899, Evan T. Pennock, aged 70 years.

[An account in a local newspaper says: "After supper he went to the village for his mail and about 7 o'clock the man employed on the Pennock farm heard groans near the entrance to the premises. Hastening in the direction of the sounds he found Mr. Pennock lying unconscious in the road. He was removed to the house, but he died in a short time without regaining consciousness. When he left Chatham he seemed in his usual good health. He was a member of the Society of Friends, and for a number of years past a director in the First National Bank of West Chester. He was a son of James Pennock, and descended from Joseph Pennock, who purchased lands of the Penns, lying along the Street Road, and who, in 1737, erected 'Primitive Hall,' which still stands in West Marlborough as a monument to his thoroughness as a builder."]

ROGERS.—At Friends' Boarding Home, Moorestown, First month 11, 1899, Levi Rogers, in his 68th year; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting, N. J.

SHIPLEY.—At his home in Cincinnati, Ohio, suddenly, First month 20, 1899, Murray Shipley, a minister of the other body of Friends, in his 66th year.

[He was brother-in-law of Samuel R. Shipley of Philadelphia, and of Joel Bean of California.]

HOWARD PRESTON.

At the home of his son-in-law, Franklin D. Buckman, in Trenton, N. J., Twelfth month 15, 1898, Howard Preston, in the 66th year of his age; member and elder of Nottingham Monthly Meeting.

He was the last of a large family of talented sons and daughters of Amos and Margaret Preston, of Chester county, and brother to the late Ann Preston, teacher, poet, lecturer, and Dean of the Female Medical College of Philadelphia.

His father, a ministering Friend, was a fearless preacher of the religion of every-day righteousness, and maintained an important station on the "Underground Railroad."

Measured by the low standard too common among men in whose thought the chief purpose of life is to accumulate outward wealth, Howard Preston might be called a failure. But tested by the higher and nobler standard of worthier men, in whose thought true merit consists in richness of soul, in wealth of character, in uplifting influence, he was truly successful. He was a lover of the Truth, and a follower of the Light, howsoever unpopular the path into which it beckoned him. He was a born reformer, and did not sell his birthright. Though earnest and uncompromising in the advocacy of all right things as he saw them, he possessed a spirit of peculiar sweetness. His sympathies were tender toward his fellows, whether in his view they were right or wrong.

He was a true friend, and there was in his friendship a peculiar charm. Adverse fate in worldly affairs fell heavily upon him, but could not crush him. He simply did his best, and kept a cheerful spirit.

He was patient in extreme suffering, which continued through an entire year, and with beautiful trust and confidence in the wisdom and goodness of God, he awaited the final summons to the new life.

"Be his virtues with the living
And his spirit ours."

H. S. K.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—V.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

AFTER spending a pleasant and restful time with our children in Washington, we went on Sixth-day afternoon (13th), to Purcellville, as arranged, and were met by our friend Boone Davis, and were soon in the home where he and his wife (Susanna) have so kindly and generously shared with us their hospitality and friendship on previous occasions.

We commenced on Seventh-day morning our two weeks' visit and service by a drive of ten miles to Waterford, in time to dine at Jacob Walker's before the meeting of Ministers and Elders, held at 3 p. m. It was not large, but felt to be a good one. After which we drove to Arthur Phillips's, to enjoy the evening and a restful night in their congenial home, where the bright, sweet child-life added in no small degree to the pleasure of the occasion.

First-day morning was clear and bright, and at the meeting hour (considering the state of the roads and the very general complaint of grippe), a large and interesting company gathered, and a feeling of thankfulness and appreciation was realized at the close for the privilege and favor enjoyed.

After dining (in company with many others, including John William and Eliza Hutchinson of New York), we returned to the meeting-house to attend the First-day School Union. This was made interesting by the excellent papers presented, and some brief discussion which followed relative to the mission of our Society and the necessity of its perpetuation.

After taking tea and enjoying a very pleasant evening at Elizabeth Phillips's, where with her two sisters a friendly greeting awaits all, we went for the night to Edward Walker's, who so recently was bereft of a loving wife and true companion, a most genial hostess to all who were privileged to mingle in their home, as we with many others can testify. But the same helpful spirit is still his to manifest, even intensified by the increased responsibility to carry out what they had shared in doing.

Second-day morning, with fine weather but muddy roads, we met again at the meeting hour in the capacity of the quarterly meeting. A good number from other denominations, whose services had prevented their attendance on First-day, were present. A favored meeting was followed by the business meeting that closed with the feeling desire that Fairfax Quarterly Meeting had not convened in vain. After many farewells we got to the pleasant home of Robert Walker to dine and spend a few hours, then with a light rain falling, and after a short call at Rachel Steer's we went again to Jacob Walker's to spend the night. A number of others were there, and before retiring a spirit of quiet pervaded the social nature, and words of comfort and encouragement found utterance. A sweet rest followed the busy days.

Third-day morning was fair again. We left our kind friends at Waterford, and finding the roads still very muddy, we yet got along comfortably, reaching William Henry Brown's in time for dinner. Several other friends coming in, we found service for the spiritual as well as enjoyment for the social, and near night we drove to Joshua Smith's to spend the night, where we enjoyed our stay very much, and were pleased to meet our friend Mary Anna Smith, with whom we became so pleasantly acquainted six years ago, when in Kansas.

Fourth-day morning we went to the home of Thomas Brown, at Hamilton, to find him in bed with the grippe. With that exception our visit was a very enjoyable one. Although apparently ill at present, we think both he and his wife Elizabeth are well preserved for their age; they still enjoy driving their faithful blind horse of twenty-seven years, that has been spoken of on previous occasions.

And now we turn toward our Virginia home (as we call it), that we left last Seventh-day morning, and are pleased to find several letters waiting our arrival, by which we hear of the welfare of home and other friends.

Fifth-day morning we rise to find a great change from the deep mud of yesterday to the rough and frozen roads, over which B. Davis and I drove several miles to call on some aged Friends that we might not see at meeting, then spent the evening very pleasantly at Charles Nichols's. Calls, visits, and meetings being the order for the next week or two, we will probably report them later.

I. W.

Purcellville Va., First month 20.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

THE Lincoln, Neb., Executive Meeting of Friends will be held on the 9th of Second month, at 11 o'clock, at the home of the clerk, in University Place, Nebraska.

ADALINE A. GARLOCK, Clerk.

The Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia was held at Race Street, Fourth-day evening, 18th inst., John J. Cornell of Baltimore being in attendance with a minute. (The previous evening he had a meeting at Camden, N. J.).

A large number of names were reported to serve as elders, who were approved, excepting six who declined. The Treasurer's report had been found correct ; receipts from all sources over $10,000, expenditures over $8,000. Of the receipts, $4,569.50 were contributed from members. Of the expenses, $1,161.95 was in aid of needy members, being in addition to a larger expenditure by women Friends. $282.75 was to aid in the payment of school bills of those who find the reduced rate to Friends is still a burden. $225, being $75 to each of the First-day schools, had also been paid. S. Robinson Coale was reappointed Treasurer.

The annual examination of the trusteeships and trust funds had been found correct. It was not deemed necessary at this time to renew trusts, there being but two vacancies. The Trustees of the Free School Fund had collected rents, etc., and paid to the School Committee the net sum of $397.87.

The Trustees of the Phebe Smith Fund, for the poor who are not Friends, had been obliged to make some change in the investments, which now consist of three mortgages, with a total of $3,700. They spent for relief on seventeen orders, $75 ; balance in hand $67.88. The first order was drawn Ninth month 28, 1868, and in the past thirty years, on 1,006 orders, $4,675.50 has been paid out.

A committee to attend to collecting $4,500 for the meeting's use was appointed. For several years this has been done by apportioning the required amount and sending a circular letter, accompanied with a summary of the past year's expenses, and the prospective needs of the meeting. T.

Our friend John J. Cornell attended the meeting at Newtown (Bucks county), Pa., on the 22d., and spoke from the text, "By their fruits ye shall know them," to the satisfaction of a large gathering. "The meeting was very large," a Friend says, "every seat being occupied, and a large number of extra chairs used."

The time for holding Purchase Quarterly Meeting, at Purchase, N. Y., is on the 1st and 2d of Second month, at 11 o'clock, the meeting for Ministers and Elders at 9.30, preceding the public meeting on Fifth-day. On Fourth-day lunch will be served, after which a meeting will be held under the auspices of the Philanthropic Committee.

Friends wishing to attend please notify Robert Barnes, White Plains, N. Y., and conveyances will be furnished. Trains leave Grand Central Depot, New York City, at 3.35 for White Plains, Third-day, p. m., and Fourth-day morning at 8.35. Take trolley for Silver Lake Park.

THE Chicago and Northwestern Railroad has issued orders that no more student telegraphers are to be permitted in stations along its lines. It is stated that the students frequently are permitted to send messages for the regular operators, and sometimes are left in charge of offices while the regular men go out. Mistakes, it is feared, may happen through such practices, and the order consequently has been issued.

THE Pennsylvania Railroad Company is said to be figuring on building a big station in Chicago at either Thirty-ninth or Forty-seventh streets.

THE DOUKHOBOR IMMIGRANTS.

It is a pleasure to have the word that the first large party of the Doukhobors reached Halifax, N. S., safely in the steamship Lake Huron, on the 20th instant. The number on board, as stated in the news dispatch, was 2,300. They reached quarantine in the evening, and on the next day, 21st, landed and underwent inspection, at the quarantine station on Lawlor's Island, after which they reëmbarked, and the steamship proceeded to St. John, N. B., where they landed on the 23d, and after a short delay took train for Winnipeg.

THE ARRIVAL AT HALIFAX.

The despatch from Halifax, on the 21st, said :

"The Lake Huron had a good passage, taking a southern route, and avoiding much of the heavy weather reported in the last three weeks on the Atlantic. There were ten deaths of infants on the passage from Batoum. There is one case of measles on board. The Doukhobors were greeted at Halifax by a party of their representatives in America, notably Prince Hilkoff and [Joseph S.] Elkinton, of Philadelphia, and Gildey, of Dartmouth, Mass. At the sight of the Prince the people on the crowded decks broke into a hymn. In the midst of the multitude of immigrants the Prince led in thanksgiving to the Almighty for the safe voyage.

"Prince Hilkoff said the French government had offered free transportation to the Doukhobors to settle in a French colony. The offer was declined, as they preferred to settle in Anglo-Saxon dominions, where they would not be subject to conscription."

ON BOARD THE SHIP.

Joseph S. Elkinton went on board the ship with Prince Hilkoff, and had a brief religious opportunity with the company. Letters from him, received by his family in this city, represent his satisfaction with the arrangements made to receive and forward the immigrants. (He may remain in Canada, until the arrival of the second ship, the Lake Superior, which is due in a few days.)

The Halifax dispatch gives some further details. It says : "When the ship came to an anchorage in the spacious waters of Halifax harbor, the Doukhobors gazed with interest at their surroundings. They were mainly undemonstrative. They seemed comfortable, and showed pleasure at their safe arrival. They wear skin garments and caps. Mr. Elkinton, of Philadelphia, and other Quakers who received them, wore the broad-brimmed hats peculiar to their sect. They wept with emotion, and as their boat approached the side of the big steamer they called to the people leaning over the rail : 'Welcome, Doukhobors !'

"At the head of the gangway the scene was affecting. The immigrants recognized Prince Hilkoff, and crowded around him, all eager to hear him speak and to kiss him. The striking feature was the psalm chanting and the solemn service. The chanting began by the passengers themselves, as the ship slowly came to anchor. The singing was strong in volume and remarkably plaintive. It was interrupted by the Prince's advent on board, and gave place to services, conducted by J. S. Elkinton, who, with streaming eyes and face raised to the blue sky, and outstretched arms, seemed deeply moved.

"This service consisted of prayer and supplication. Everybody uncovered, notwithstanding the chilly atmosphere. The singing of the hymn was then resumed. The burden of the chant, as translated from Russian by Prince Hilkoff was, 'God is with us. He has brought us through.'"

THE ARRIVAL AT ST. JOHN.

A despatch from St. John, N. B., on the 23d, says it was "the largest party of immigrants ever landed at a Canadian port." The ship had been given a clean bill of health at Halifax, but to guard against any possibility of disease the steamer was hauled up at quarantine, inspected and passed. The despatch then adds :

"Immediately the work of unloading the four hundred tons of baggage was commenced, and this was completed and the baggage all identified and labelled inside of four hours. The immigrants were sent ashore in divisions of four hundred and fifty, and placed in sheds, where they were given all the food required, while the children were entertained by a delegation of the St. John Women's Council, and given a bountiful supply of cakes, fruits, and confectionary.

"The whole party are a fine, intelligent-looking lot of people, the men being of excellent physique, and to every appearance ideal settlers. The voyage from Halifax occupied about thirty hours. There have been eleven deaths on the vessel since she left Batoum, in the latter part of December. On the arrival of the steamer here, one man was found suffering from pneumonia and he was sent to the general public hospital. To-night the first train of nine cars, containing 450 persons, went forward on the way to Winnipeg. Other trains followed at early intervals, and the whole party were soon on their way to the Canadian West. Each train, in addition to baggage and colonist cars, had a dining-car attached.

"Both United States and Dominion Government officials agree that no finer looking lot of immigrants ever landed in any port in America. The fact that, after a twenty-nine days' voyage, no sickness of consequence developed is conclusive proof of the physical condition of the men, women, and children.

"The Canadian Pacific Railway has 100 colonist, dining, and baggage cars employed in the despatch of the immigrants."

LITERARY NOTES.

THE weekly journal, Literature, begun in London by the London Times establishment, about a year ago, and published in this country by Harper and Brothers, New York, (who added a cover to the imported sheets), has undergone some change. Since the New Year the Harpers have decided to set up Literature in this country, to print it themselves, and while taking advantage of the English and European matters contained in the paper, to make it a really American journal by using more American material. This last is an important matter, for while the paper in its original form was admirable as a record and a critique of contemporary English—and other European—literature, it had not very much referring to the field on this side of the Atlantic.

We shall now have, no doubt, an affirmative answer to the question, Can a periodical devoted exclusively to the discussion of literary subjects, be successful in the United States? That has been food for argument these twenty years, and yet no paper has ever been earnestly undertaken with adequate capital, that could be said to attempt this subject from a high standard.

Among features of Literature in recent issues is (10th instant), a systematic review of all the successful books published in England during 1898. The list of these is very large, and the books are classified in a convenient way. "Bismarck's Autobiography" stands at the head of biographical works. In short stories the year has been unusually prolific, and Kipling's "Day's Work" stands first among these. The most important works of travel were "In the Forbidden Land," by Savage Landor, and Dr. Sven Hedin's monumental work, "Through Asia."

In the issue of the 17th, there is a similar review list of the more important and successful works published in the United States during 1898. William D. Howells—who writes a weekly letter—discusses "The Destiny of the letter R in America." He might follow this with "The Ups and Downs of the letter A."

"Early Schools and School Teachers," and "Sources of Local History," two addresses delivered before the Teachers' Institute of Montgomery county, Pa., by Freeland G. Hobson, of that county bar, have been reprinted in a neat pamphlet of 29 pages, and we are indebted to the author for a copy. They relate particularly to Montgomery county.

The Doubleday and McClure Co., New York, has just published, simultaneously with its appearance in London, the authorized biography of Henry Drummond, (author of "The Greatest Thing in the World," etc.), by Prof. George Adam Smith. Dr. Smith has had placed in his hands by the Drummond family, who selected him as the biographer, all the journals and letters, etc., of Prof. Drummond.

In the forthcoming issue of McClure's Magazine, (Second month), Ida M. Tarbell will resume her articles on Abraham Lincoln. She will present "contemporary glimpses and reminiscences of Lincoln as he appeared in and about the White House, at Cabinet meetings, at the War Department, before Congress, and in the camps, at the time of the fall of Fort Sumter," in 1861.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, announce a book, "Democracy: A Study of Government," by a professor of Columbia University, James H. Hyslop, who, as the publishers announce, "squarely attacks democratic institutions, and proposes, in conclusion, a substitute or modification for the present form of government," though we are told that he "does not accept monarchy as a necessary alternative." Why Dr. Hyslop hesitates at a king is not explained. This may be a good time for such a book, since Washington's Farewell Address, the Declaration of Independence, and the Constitution of the United States have so far gone out of fashion.

Curiously enough, Dr. Hyslop is stated to occupy the chair of "Ethics" and "Logic." He should sell a copy of his book to Senator Platt, of Connecticut, who believes that governments derive their just powers from "some" of the governed.

We have repeatedly commended the Literary Digest, of New York, ($3.00 a year; new names less by our club rate) as a most convenient and serviceable compendium of current affairs. Any one who is confused and discouraged with wading through the issues of the daily press, trying to find out what truly is new, and what newly is true, must turn to such a weekly review with a sigh of relief. The Departments include "Topics of the Day," "Letters and Art," "Science and Invention," "The Religious World," "Foreign Topics," and "Miscellaneous," and whoever goes through these attentively, once a week, will be a well-informed, if not a wise person. Though we read with strong opinions of our own, we have not discovered any signs of bias in the selection and compilation of the contents. The editing seems very honestly done.

Henry T. Coates & Co., Philadelphia, have issued a new edition of the historical romance, "Pemberton," by Henry Peterson, of Philadelphia. Henry Peterson, not long ago deceased, was for many years one of the editors and proprietors of the Saturday Evening Post, and thus known to a wide circle. His romance is founded upon events in the Revolutionary period, 1777-83, and the place is Philadelphia. The opening chapter introduces the battle of Germantown, (Tenth month 4, 1777), a spirited account of the action at the Chew House being given, and the story deals with the experiences of the British occupation of the city, the "Mischianza," Arnold's treason, André's execution, etc.

The book was originally published in 1872. It is a careful study, and a very fair one, of the historical events and conditions to which it refers. There are some Friends in it, including "Seth Williams," and his wife, "Aunt Hannah," whose home was in Germantown, not far from Chew's, and they are kindly portrayed. There are two heroines, sisters, Isabella and Helen Graham, one dark, one blonde; Isabella marries Arthur Pemberton, and Helen, after betrothal to the unfortunate Major André, lives to marry her other lover, Arthur Morris.

Educational Department.

HENRY R. RUSSELL.

THE death of Henry R. Russell, in Brooklyn, on the 5th of the present month, was briefly alluded to in the INTELLIGENCER of the 14th. As one of the veterans of the educational work among Friends, retaining his activity and interest undiminished, we present a brief sketch of his life, which has been prepared for us.

He was born near the village of New Market, Frederick county, Maryland, Fourth month 23, 1832. His father was Joshua Russell, who died in 1888, aged 94 years, having lived where Henry was born for a period of eighty-three years. His mother was Rachel Steer, of Loudoun county, Virginia, a sister of William B. Steer, who was well known by many Friends.

Henry was raised on the farm, and was a busy, hard worker, attending during his early life the common school of the neighborhood, during the winter season. In 1852-3 he attended the boarding school of Benjamin Swayne at London Grove, Chester county, Pennsylvania, one year, and then for one year was at Dr. Franklin Taylor's School at Kennett Square, the home of Bayard Taylor, at whose father's house he often enjoyed hospitality. (Dr. Franklin Taylor was a cousin of Bayard Taylor.) In 1856 he went to Springdale Boarding School for Girls, near what is now Lincoln, Va., and near Goose Creek meeting-house, founded by, and under the management of Samuel M. Janney, where he taught two years. In 1858 he took charge of the large public school in New Market, Md., and taught one year. In 1859 he started a private school in the same town and continued it for several years, and but for the intolerance of the slave-holding element, and their sympathizers, would have continued. He had bought property and was arranging to put up suitable buildings for the better accommodation of his school; but being by birth, education, and conviction strongly opposed to Slavery, he changed his plans. As teaching was his great desire he turned his attention to other places, offering a wider field for usefulness. Many are the regrets that have been expressed by the more liberal-minded in the region of his home, and those who were his pupils, that he did not remain.

In 1867 he taught one year in the school of T. Clarkson Taylor, Wilmington, Delaware. He married, Eighth month 13, 1868, Elizabeth, daughter of John and Ruth Hannah Smith, of Loudoun county, Va., and in the autumn of that year became Principal of Deptford School in Woodbury, New Jersey, and continued there twenty-one years, except one year—1876-7—when he filled a vacancy as teacher in Swarthmore College. In 1890 he became Principal of Greenwood Seminary, at Millville, Pa., and remained there four years. In 1894 he was appointed by the Educational Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to visit, and lecture to, the different schools within their borders, and filled the position two years. Since the last date he took a course of instruction in New York, and received the degree of Pd. D. (Doctor of Pedagogy), and was, when stricken with his fatal illness, a teacher in Friends' Seminary, New York City. His mind was philosophically mechanical, his most notable achievement in mechanics being an automatic rake for reapers, which he and an elder brother patented in 1859, and which was bought by Cyrus H. McCormick, the great reaper manufacturer of Chicago, and applied to his reapers until the advent of the grain binders, which superseded the self-rake. His mechanical disposition—we might almost say instinct—led him to advocate for both sexes mechanical training in schools, in which he claimed and proved that pupils could be taught to make, very inexpensively, many of the appliances useful in illustrating the subjects taught.

For several years he took part in the Summer School at Glens Falls, N. Y., and last year, 1898, in that at Worcester, Mass. His whole life was a busy one. He was devoted to educational work, and when not engaged in the school-room he found much opportunity to labor in the cause so dear to his heart.

[To the above sketch a friend in New York adds:]

In the death of Henry R. Russell, the school with which he was connected, and the general educational interest of the Society, suffer alike.

He had come to Friends' Seminary less than a year ago, peculiarly qualified for the work he undertook. While pursuing his course at the School of Pedagogy, in the University of New York, and during the year following, he had developed his plan of coördinating the teaching of Science and Manual Training in schools; and the correction and strengthening of his scheme by a practical application to children of different grades was in progress when he was taken ill. He had, thus, for his work, a definite purpose, backed by a thorough professional training. A born mechanic, and an inventor, he had unusual skill and ingenuity. He was guided by experience gained in nearly half a century of teaching, and actuated by an ardent love for his work. Himself a life-long student, he was in full sympathy with those he taught. The completion of his work will be retarded by the want of teachers possessing all these qualifications.

Dr. Russell realized this lack among Friends, and it was his earnest desire to see established by his Society a special school, or a department of some institution already existing, for the professional training of teachers. His interest in education was as broad as the educational field; but his first concern was always with that part of the field that is or should be, cultivated by Friends. After taking his degree in Pedagogy he made no effort to find a school outside of the Society, preferring to wait till he could first do service among Friends. The wished-for opportunity to work out his own scheme of Manual Training came albeit he was unable to complete the work. But he did not live to see the beginning of the realization of his other hope. Friends have yet to be aroused to the need of a professional school of high order, founded and conducted upon the eternal truths of science, and in the light of modern pedagogical and psychological investigation, and, most important of all, permeated by the Friends' spirit of conformity with the mighty law of love.

To the principles and testimonies of Friends he was ardently and firmly attached. His character was sincere, straightforward, and kindly.

THE LATE HENRY R. RUSSELL, PD. D.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

THE Young Friends' Association held its regular meeting on the evening of First month 15. Dean Bond gave a paper on "Friends in the Lake Region," and Mrs. Collins reviewed a book on the "Geography and History of Palestine."

During the absence of Dr. William C. Day in New England, Dr. George Thomas, of the University of Pennsylvania, will conduct the classes in chemistry.

In the current number of the Phoenix, Prof. J. Russell Hayes reviews a recent publication entitled "Mother-song and Child-song," edited by Charlotte Brewster Jordan. The book is a collection of representative mother-song and child-song from the century's output of England and America, and the editor, Charlotte Brewster Jordan is one of Swarthmore's graduates of the class of '82.

A reception was given Dr. and Mrs. Wm. I. Hull, by Mrs. Bond, on the evening of First month 4. A number of the Faculty and other friends were present.

The preliminary contest for the choice of college orator, will be held Second month 8, and the final contest, Second month 18.

The usual reception of the Junior Class to the Freshmen was held in the college parlors on Seventh-day evening, the 21st. An enjoyable occasion is reported by all.

The current semester is drawing to a close, marking the mid-point of a year exceptionally pleasant and prosperous. With the beginning of the new semester a decided change in program will be made by the addition of another period to the three now observed in the afternoon. This is necessitated by complications arising in the elective courses, and will occasion further changes in the College curriculum. '99.

MARTIN ACADEMY, KENNETT SQUARE.—We had a very interesting entertainment on the afternoon of the 13th. It was given by the representatives of the Class of 1900. The exercises consisted of orations, recitations, an essay, a debate, a class history, and a class prophecy. The exercises were all pronounced good by those who heard them. It was a very stormy day, yet there was a fair audience.

Last week, (14th), closed the first half of the year, and this week was devoted very much to examinations. This week, (21st), we have a reorganization, introduction of new classes, etc.

The work, judging from the report and from the result of the examinations, has in most cases been gratifying to pupil and teacher. The number of pupils on the roll has not been equalled since 1881, which shows an interest in the school, and is gratifying to those in charge. Swarthmore College offers a scholarship now to a member of the senior class who will pass a required examination.

Dr. Emily G. Hunt begins a series of ten lectures before the school this week. The first was given on Sixth-day afternoon, 20th. S.

FRIENDS' ACADEMY, L. I.—Arrangements have been made for a number of lectures and entertainments, two of which have already been given. Charles F. Underhill, a well-known elocutionist, of New York City, opened the course by giving several readings, which were entertaining and instructive.

On the 13th inst. the students gave an entertainment, consisting of vocal and instrumental music, and a translation from the German, "Einer Muss Heiraten." The proceeds are for the benefit of the library. On both occasions, the assembly-room was well filled with appreciative friends and patrons.

At an early date Dr. Richard Jones, formerly professor of English at Swarthmore College, and now of Syracuse University, will deliver his lecture on "Macbeth." This promises to be an interesting lecture, as Dr. Jones has just published in book form the results of his extended study of "Macbeth."

A stereopticon has been purchased, which will be used in class and lecture work. B.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PLAINFIELD, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on Fourth-day evening, the 11th instant. After the opening silence, the first chapter of John was read.

The minutes of the previous meeting, which included items of interest from the proceedings of the general conference at West Chester, Pa., were adopted, and were followed by a chapter from the "Power of Silence," by H. W. Dresser.

The one chosen, as having peculiar interest to Friends, was "The Immanent God." The author after demonstrating the impossibility of conceiving of the universe without being convinced of the existence of an All-wise and All-powerful Creator, emphasizes the necessity of every individual coming into close communion with this great Over-soul, as an obedient child of a loving Father.

Current topics included the most important events of the past month, and furnished ample material for a general discussion.

Phebe C. Wright was a most welcome visitor, and spoke of the Scripture selection as one having special significance to Friends.

The meeting closed with the roll call, which was responded to with appropriate sentiments. C. A. G.

NORRISTOWN, PA. [Report from the Herald.]—There was an unusually large attendance at the monthly meeting of Norristown Friends' Association on the evening of First month 17, at the Roberts residence, Main and George streets. Roll-call showed a large majority of the members present, and a number of names of new members were added to the roll. The president and secretary were authorized to give attention to the matter of accessions to membership.

Ellwood Roberts read a selected article, supplementary to a previous sketch, on Elizabeth Haddon, the courageous maiden who left home and friends on the other side of the Atlantic, and founded Haddonfield, New Jersey. She became the heroine of Longfellow's well-known poem, which represents her as taking the initiative in her marriage with John Estlin. A discussion followed, in the course of which Susan J. Sheppard gave some interesting details of Haddonfield as it is to-day.

Margaret Walker read an essay by an English Friend, J. S. Rowntree, read at the Conference at Manchester, in reference to the state of Society in Great Britain, which elicited remarks and comparisons as to the status of Quakerism in that country and in this.

Mary Anna Lownes read a poem on prayer. Susan J. Sheppard gave a reading from the works of J. R. Miller. Charles Platt read "The City Hall Clock, Philadelphia," from FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER.

After roll-call for sentiments, the Association adjourned. The next meeting will be held at the home of George and Sarah Wood, 226 Jacoby street.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn was held First month 8.

The attendance was small at first, but a number of the members came later and the meeting proved very interesting.

The History Section in its report finished the "Life of Isaac T. Hopper," which it has been giving at the different meetings.

The Current Topics, beside the usual report, gave a summary of the events for the past year.

The Bible Section's meeting was devoted to the birth, and incidents in the life of Jesus, with copies of pictures illustrating him and his disciples doing the Father's work, as well as many pictures of him in his infancy and childhood.

The paper on the "Physical Basis of Religion" was then read, and set forth our first duty of keeping our bodies healthy, that we may be able to more fully appreciate our beautiful surroundings and all things which stimulate the purest emotions and generate the greatest amount of religious force. Love of the good can bear nothing but good, and we should be careful that the things which we absorb are such as will make this love of good more perfect. We are not responsible for what we get, but we are for what we give, and the state of our bodies will make a great difference in this as we are not apt to find inspiration, sunshine, or strength emanating from a tired, worn-out body. It does not make much difference what we believe, if we do not live up to it, as it is the doing that affects others; but if we have God within surely only good religion emanates.

The meeting closed with the usual silence, to meet First month 22, in New York. A. T. S.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

GOLDEN WEDDING.—On Third-day, First month 3, 1899, between the hours of two and four, over 170 guests were welcomed by Timothy and Sarah Thistlethwaite in their hospitable home in West Richmond, Indiana, upon the occasion of their fiftieth wedding anniversary. A number of their friends were present who had attended the marriage, half a century ago, in the little old White Water meeting-house, long since removed. Among these were two of the four who had acted as attendants at that time, Joseph C. Ratliff and Susan Shute Morris.

All their descendants, children and grand-children, were gathered in the old home and assisted in receiving. These were William Thistlethwaite and wife and son Forest, Charles S., and Mary Thistlethwaite Owsley, and son Charles T., and Edward Thistlethwaite and wife and son Paul.

It will always be a day of golden memories; stern winter paused to allow a day of golden sunshine and balmy air. Early in the morning letters began to arrive, bearing loving messages from distant friends. Many appropriate gifts of value and beauty were received. Among these was a poem written for the occasion by Frances M. Robinson, in which was fitly expressed the loving regard of their many friends. [It will be separately given.—Eds.] F. W. B.

William H. Livezey, son of Joseph B. and Elma H. Livezey, recently visited his parents at Mount Royal, N. J. He had been absent nearly fifteen years, having located in Montana. A warm welcome was given him by a large circle of friends.

Being one of our isolated members, it was comforting to have him again with us in our religious meetings. His stay was short, and he returned on the 4th instant. H.

Mentioning the meeting at Benjaminville, Ill., in a letter on several subjects, our friend Edward Coale says: "We are very sorry to lose Abraham H. and Susie L. Brown, who have just removed to Florida—a great loss to us."

A friend sends us a clipping from a newspaper at Central City, Nebraska, the announcement by "Rev. Herbert J. Mott," of the purchase of a college building (from the Methodists), "the building of a new church," etc., in that place, by Friends of the Western connection. The announcement is accompanied by a statement of the faith and usages of the Friends, as H. J. Mott holds them. The former is "evangelical," but moderately stated, and he adds that, "while we hold to the importance of sound doctrine, of correct intellectual conceptions of truth, we emphasize more the necessity of actual spiritual life, and an outward living in harmony with it, as distinguished from some who hold that to make a profession and unite with the church is sufficient." It is expected, he says, "to dedicate our new church about January 15th, and immediately after it is planned to hold meetings each day for a week or more."

There have been no Friends, we are told, in Central City. This appears to be—including the college—a work "from the ground up."

"I should like every family in our monthly meeting (and every other) to have the INTELLIGENCER for a weekly visitor. It was never better than now, and it should be earnestly supported. I have been looking into its circulation in [his place of residence] and I am surprised to find that several of our Friends fail to get it. I think it a loss to them, as the paper keeps us in touch with Friends everywhere. Its strong stand in favor of peace principles, and in opposition to acquiring lands by conquest, meets my hearty approval. I think this sentiment is growing, among intelligent people, and that there will be a powerful reaction against the war spirit."

—This is what a friend writes us, in a letter on business. We hope he is right.

CORRECTIONS IN "FRIENDS' ALMANAC."

[The following list of corrections in Friends' Almanac for 1899 is supplied by Friends' Book Association.]

PAGE 31. Germantown Preparative, First-day before monthly meeting, after the meeting for worship. Girard Avenue meeting, 11 a. m., on First-day during Winter and Spring.

PAGE 47. West Chester Preparative, Fourth-day, ten days before monthly meeting, at 10.30 a. m.

PAGE 48. Pocopson Station is 1½ miles from meeting-house, not half a mile.

PAGE 50. Meeting of Ministers and Elders of Western Quarter is at 11 a. m.

PAGE 54. Elkview Station is 1½ miles from meeting-house, not half a mile.

PAGE 71. Rochester Executive Meeting held at Mendon, not Macedon. Strike out last line, as it is included in Farmington Executive Meeting.

PAGE 77. Strike out about Orange Meeting; insert Ministers and Elders' meeting for New York and Flushing at 1 p. m., on monthly meeting day, in 1st, 4th, 7th, 10th months.

PAGE 78. Nine Partners Half-Year Meeting is held in Fifth month at Poughkeepsie, but in Eleventh month at Nine Partners, in 1899, and Oswego in 1900. Greenfield and Neversink, and Creek Monthly Meetings have been changed to Executive Meetings, Creek Executive Meeting being held at Creek in Fourth month, and Crum Elbow in Tenth month, both on Sixth-day before the Half-Year Meeting.

"NOT INTO TEMPTATION!"

THOU great, unchanged, eternal One!

Thou God of Nations, filled with awe,

We thank Thee for the course we run

'Neath Thy unalterable law.

We feel that so far on our way

Thy guiding care had but to bless

A life which ever forward lay

And ever looked to righteousness.

We give Thee songs of praise that Thou

Hath so disposed us for our weal,

And all thanksgiving even now

For our unconquerable zeal.

But from this zeal has grown such might,

With no grave errors to retrieve,

That time may come, may be in sight,

When we the old-time way would leave.

And reaching out our cleanly hands

Across the seas, across the zones,

Follow the lead of other lands

To spoil the weak, outwit the drones.

And strong, resourceful, fearing naught,

From shore to shore our sway extend,

Till o'ergrown empire, weak, distraught,

Has but disunion for an end.

Show Thou the fathers' path and lead

Where no world 'circling ills beset!

Stay us in every outward greed!

Stay us, great God, ere we regret!

—Harper's Weekly.

TEMPLES MADE WITH HANDS.

WITH reverent and unceasing care,

Striving to make divinely fair

That house of God, the human thought,

Scholars have toiled and saints have wrought

With passionate zeal the centuries through

To shape man's mind and soul unto

A certain form, a certain creed,
Like some great minster shrine indeed.
Clear carven, stately, aisled, and dim
"Behold God's house! Come, worship him!"
They cry "He dwelleth only here!
Acknowledge him with holy fear."

Yet, lo! outside the temple walls
God's sunshine just as sweetly falls.
Beyond its outer gate still lies
A world of pain and sacrifice;
Beyond that world a universe
Not to be summed in prayer or verse.
Omnipotence must still transcend
The finite mind that knows an end,
And still life's question, still life's needs,
Must overflow all human creeds,
Nor is God's majesty so small
That human heart can hold it all.

Always the temple which we raise,
Shuts out the sound of wider praise.
Shuts out the glories of the light
Which streams from out the infinite;
Always our bonds of time and space,
Limits our vision of God's face.
We know in part—how then can we Make plain each heavenly mystery?
Yet still the Almighty understands
Our human hearts, our human hands,
And, overarching all our creeds,
Gives his wide presence to our needs.
—Priscilla Leonard, in the Outlook.

FATHER.

Our in the morning Father goes,
Whether it storms with rain, or snows,
Whether the wild wind rests or blows.
By the fire sit Mother and I,
Doing our lessons quietly.

Back in the twilight Father comes,
When I've finished with books and sums.
Not all the noise of all the drums
Is a jollier noise, I know,
Than Father when he says, "Hallo!"
—Maud Keary, in St. Nicholas.

GOLDEN WEDDING POEM.

[Timothy and Sarah Thistlethwaite, West Richmond, Indiana,
First month 3, 1899.]

FIFTY years you've together spent
Filled with yearnings and sweet content,—
Yearnings, for something above, beyond
Content, with the blessings close at hand.

Your hearts being bound by love's golden chain
(Made only the stronger by sorrow and pain),
You've mingled your smiles and mingled your tears
As you've journeyed along through these fifty years.

Heaven has granted you many fair joys,
But none so dear as your girl and your boys.
To-day as you ponder in sweet meditation,
Filled with the weight of the momentous occasion,—

May your thoughts in gratitude heavenward turn,
And upward, still upward your spirits yearn.
May the Father's love continue to bless
And fold you about with its tenderness.

FRANCES M. ROBINSON.

"GOLD BIBLE HILL," the mound where Joseph Smith, the founder of the Mormon faith, claimed to have dug up, under celestial direction, the golden plates on which was inscribed the Mormon Bible, is situated on the farm of Admiral Sampson, near Palmyra, N. Y. The Mormons tried to buy the mound in 1893, to erect upon it a memorial chapel, but the Admiral refused to sell.

LIFE INSURANCE IN 1898.

Life insurance has grown to such great proportions that the following article, by our friend Allen J. Hiltcraft, of Oak Park (Chicago), Ill., is of general interest. It is a review for 1898. Allen is an authority on the subject, being editor and publisher of the Life Insurance Courier, and a series of annual publications concerning the business, by which he comes into relations with the different companies.

LIFE INSURANCE is a system of business by which a corporation guarantees the individual person who is insured or his beneficiary, against the amount of pecuniary loss of future financial earnings, through death. At the beginning of the year 1898, the latest official report, the life insurance companies doing business in the State of New York (twenty-five regular life insurance companies), had combined admitted assets, less deferred and unpaid premiums and accrued interest, of $1,296,898,495, with an undivided surplus of $185,802,015.

During the preceding year, the surplus earned was $29,511,008; dividends or share of surplus paid to policy holders was $18,425,197; for surrendered policies the companies paid $26,431,312; to annuitants there was paid $2,977,415; to beneficiaries, under claims maturing from deaths of policy holders, the amount paid was $77,420,537; in matured endowments the payments were $12,290,353, while the earnings from interest and rents aggregated $61,873,768; the total amount of insurance issued and paid for during the year 1897 was $820,861,496, making a grand total of insurance in force January 1, 1898, of $5,255,725,545.

During the first six months of 1898 more than one-half the companies advised the writer that they had written about 20 per cent. larger volume of business than was written during the first half of the preceding year. Within the last ten days advices have been received from the home offices of nearly all the life insurance companies to the effect that most of them have written a larger amount of "paid for" business during 1898 than was written by them during 1897.

The financial strength and general standing of American life insurance companies, and the confidence of the common populace reposed in them, was never before so thoroughly well established as it is at the present time. During the late period of financial stringency through which we have just passed, when the business man was wont to list his securities, many questions arose in his mind as to their value; indeed, it was a serious question with him as to what his estate would realize upon many of them should he be removed by death. The life insurance policy stood almost alone in his mind as the one thing which was worth no less than 100 per cent. of the face value in immediate cash, should his business pass into the hands of the executor or administrator of his estate.

Early in the year—January 17—the Supreme Court of the United States handed down a most important opinion regarding suicide as affecting life insurance, in connection with the case of A. Howard Ritter, executor of William M. Runk [of Philadelphia, some time of the firm of Darlington, Runk & Co.], versus Mutual Life of New York. Judge Acheson, of the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eastern District of Pennsylvania, in his opinion, had said: "It is a fundamental condition of the contract of life insurance, even if the policy be silent on the subject, that the insured, while in sound mental condition, will not voluntarily destroy his life. The contract would lack mutuality of obligation if the insured, at his own pleasure, by intentional self-destruction, could terminate the payment of the stipulated premiums and precipitate the payment of the sum insured. To sanction a recovery in such a case would be to reward fraud and encourage wrongdoing."

The Supreme Court, in its opinion, handed down by Justice Harlan, perceived no error of law in the record of the lower court, and its judgment was affirmed. The Supreme Court declared that when an insurance company entered into a contract to insure a man's life neither party to the contract could be supposed to have suicide in contemplation, and it was not intended in entering into such a contract that the life of the person insured should be at the option of either of the parties. In fixing the premium the company would naturally take into consideration the circumstances bearing upon the duration of life, and no company would undertake to insure against suicide. If any should make such an attempt, it would be against public policy, and would not be allowed.

During our recent war with Spain the treatment of policy-holders who engaged in military and naval service was one of extreme liberality by most of our life insurance companies. On policies already in force nearly all the companies assumed the extra war hazard without any additional charge of premium on those lives engaged in actual military and naval service outside of the United States.

The assumption that four per cent. interest would be earned upon investments, with the mortality experience according to the actuaries or the American experience tables, has proved more than adequate as a safe basis upon which the net premiums were cast for the cost of life insurance; but, in view of the probability of receiving lower rates of interest in the future, the more conservative element in life-insurance management advocate the adoption of a three per cent. reserve basis. Since April, 1882, one company has written all its new business on the basis of American three per cent. reserve. The tendency of all the companies is rapidly toward the adoption a three per cent. basis, which, in the opinion of the writer, is coming none too soon, when we contemplate the modernization of life-insurance policies; more especially the continuous installment contracts, where the face of the policy is to be paid in twenty equal annual installments, and to the beneficiary thereunder the payment of annual installments of a like amount so long as she may live.

The growth of the life-insurance business in the United States, with its marvelous evolution of policy forms suited to the needs of all classes and conditions, is the wonder and admiration of the civilized world. With nine of our life-insurance companies in business over fifty years, and eighteen companies with more than forty years of successful business experience, the experimental period in this business has long since been passed.

All the life-insurance herein referred to is on such a basis that, if not another policy were issued by any one of these companies, the outstanding policies could and would, at their completion as endowments or at their maturity as death claims, be promptly paid by the several companies respectively, besides the additional payment of a very considerable amount in dividends to the policy-holders from surplus earnings.

CONSIDER WHERE YOU'RE NOT HIT.

The Advance, Chicago.

THERE is a little fellow out our way who fell down and hit himself hard. He jumped up, and with speech that faltered now and then, he said to his mother, "It didn't hit my nose,—it didn't hit my thumb,—it didn't hit my toe,—it didn't hit my head,—it didn't hit my knee,"—and after he had enumerated all the known parts of his anatomy, he had quite forgotten where he had been hit.

"It might have been worse" has taken the sting out of many a despairing situation.

"Counting your mercies," often reveals such abundance of riches as to make a cause of complaint look quite lonesome.

This little fellow out our way has really struck a deep philosophical fact: that the way to cast out evil is to turn to the good. The little talk with his mother reveals about all there is worth knowing in Christian science, i. e., if you get hit, think on those places not hit, and the "places-not-hit" will so outnumber the "place-hit" that the "place-hit" will cease to be.

You have a weak spot. You have been hit. Your lungs are wheezy; your liver is torpid; your stomach is touchy; your head is hot; or your temper is irritable. You are hit hard in some place.

The best way is not to jump up and down and howl; but to turn your attention to the "places-not-hit." Work the organs that are strong. Push them a little, and like a lot of comrades who gather round and help up one who has fallen, the strong will bear the burden of the weak—and the "burden" ceases to be.

Dr. Gunsaulus said, in an address at Armour Institute, that the best way to cure evil was to increase the positive forces of good. Social sores can be cured only by an infusion of good blood, not by cutting them out or by putting them on some part of the body, under cover of clothing, where they cannot be seen.

So, says the boy philosopher out our way, if there be pain or weakness or disease or sin, take your mind off it, and rally the forces of strength and purity. We are sound by grace, not by law. When we get hit hard, we need to lift our eyes unto the hills from whence cometh our help.

A RECORD of train robberies in the United States shows the following interesting data: 1890, 12; 1891, 16; 1892, 16; 1893, 33; 1894, 34; 1895, 49; 1896, 28; 1897, 30; 1898, 28. Total number of trains "held up" in nine years, 246; total number of people killed, 88; total number of people injured (shot), 77.

RESOLUTIONS ON IMPERIALISM.

Adopted at the Academy of Music meeting, New York City, First month 21.

FIRST, that the full discharge of our obligations to the inhabitants of the Philippines require that we should, without delay, help them secure in their domestic affairs, first, order, then liberty; and that we are absolutely and unqualifiedly opposed to the annexation of the Philippines as a permanent portion of the national domain.

Second. That we are unalterably opposed to the abandonment of this Republic of the American ideal of national growth in favor of the European ideal of colonial conquest; we unreservedly subscribe to the theory that government derives all its just powers from the consent of the governed, and to the theory that there should be no taxation without representation; and we believe, moreover, that such theories are wholly applicable to the inhabitants of all the places abandoned by Spain as the result of the late war.

Third. That neither the Government, nor the people of the United States incurred any responsibility or obligation as to the result of the recent war with Spain which requires any departure from or abandonment of the policies and principles laid down for the guidance of the republic by Washington in his farewell address to the American people.

Fourth. That we are opposed, therefore, to the idea that the peace loving and free people of the republic, who are engaged in the grand task, as yet uncompleted, of developing their national resources and of establishing upon a firm basis their own theory of government by, of, and for the people, should now, or under any conceivable circumstances enter upon any alliance with any European Power, the result of which might be to embroil us in European controversies, in which our real interests are not concerned.

That we place on record our high appreciation and sincere thanks for the conspicuous services rendered to the American people by Senators Hoar, Hale, Mason, and Wellington in preventing the new and dangerous policy of imperialism from being forced through the Senate of the United States without proper and adequate discussion, and we commend to all citizens of this Republic the high sense of public duty and enlightened patriotism which have characterized the action of these Senators in resisting innovations on our system of government that are pregnant with demoralization and disaster.

THE CONSTITUTION IN CONTEMPT.

Harper's Weekly.

WE have said, and we believe, that the republic will survive even the shock and damage of expansion, because democracy is too vital to be destroyed; and we believe, too, that the principles of the Declaration of Independence will also survive, although our conduct may discredit them for a time, even, it may be, for generations, for, as Senator Hoar says, "the eternal providence of God is on the side of freedom." But, on the other hand, we do not believe that the Constitution will escape unharmed, for already, if he is reported correctly, we are told by an officer of the army, who has sworn to uphold and defend it, that we have outgrown the Constitution, and, in a large measure, he was justified in saying this, by the spirit which has been manifested by the advocates of expansion in their attitude towards the Constitution. It would be going too far, perhaps, to assert that the Constitution is despised by some of the expansionist leaders, but it is nevertheless true that their attitude is at least unconsciously contemptuous, the proof being their desire to defeat its wholesome restraints by interpretation.

More than once in the history of the country we have seen the Supreme Court bend to public sentiment, or to that part of it which makes the most noise, and therefore we are justified in saying that if the treaty is ratified as it stands, the Constitution will no longer be the safeguard of personal liberty which it has been. The exigencies of colonial government in the Far East, due to our possession of subjects, a class not recognized or provided for in the Constitution, will probably compel the first assault upon the bill of rights, and we shall have at least part of the republic subject to the legislation of an unrestrained Congress. How long it will then be before Congress throws off all restraint, will depend upon the spirit of the people. At present (we are forced regretfully to the conviction) the Constitution is less respected than it has ever been before. We have forgotten the evils from which it has saved us.

It is in the air that the Constitution must not be permitted to stand in the way of expansion, and that even the Declaration of Independence must be considered antiquated. The Declaration is vital and will live, but the breaking down of the Constitution, which is law, must bring material injury to the country, whose bulwark it has been against the assaults of intrigue and of momentary popular passion. This will be one of the charges which the country must bear if the expansionists prevail. The republic will survive, but generations of its citizens will be deprived of some of the great blessings which democracy has bestowed on us and our fathers, and will suffer the burdens of militarism and of heavy taxation, which, thus far, we have been spared.

Shall History Repeat Itself?

National Temperance Advocate.

WE have killed a good many Indians in the last fifty years, and the Indians have, in the same period, killed a good many white people.

The order of procedure has been something like this, viz. :

First: American citizens have filled the Indians with whisky, for the sole purpose of making money in the traffic.

Second: When Indians had absorbed whisky enough, they wanted to kill somebody, and promptly satisfied that want, whereupon,

Third: Our government killed Indians enough, men, women, and children, good, bad, and indifferent, to satisfy all immediate thirst for vengeance, and we then proceeded to repeat and re-repeat the performance in its various details.

Such appears likely to be the plan of dealing with our new possessions.

The distillery and the brewery are well to the front in our new work of civilization, and seem pretty likely to hold that position. Political managers certainly will not disturb them, and the people—pass resolutions, and—that's all!

"Generals" in Congress.

Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

THE House appears to perceive the threatening power of militarism. Its committee on the judiciary is to consider the lawfulness of an army general occupying a seat at the same time on the floor of the House. [The report, it is stated, is against the practice.—EDS. INTELLIGENCER.] And now the Speaker of the House is reported to have replied to a request that General Shafter be admitted to the floor in order to shake hands with the members, "Sir, the House of Representatives is bigger than any major-general." So the rules were not set aside, and the major-general had to do his hand-shaking in the corridors of the hall.

It was well of the speaker. When the executive power is exhibiting so strong a leaning to the military, and schemes abound greatly to enlarge and enhance the power and dignities and emoluments and scope of action of the standing army, no doubt the speaker thinks it is time to look sharply to the independence of the Congress from this insidious influence so dangerous in past times to the popular liberties.

The British House of Commons, in the growth of jingoism, has been gradually falling under this influence. Military officers abound in its membership. They fill the committees on the military and the military expenditure, and report what the military deems to be needed here and there for the defense of the empire, and few civilian members dare to question these "expert" opinions. They practically make up the military estimates, and few venture openly to doubt their necessity and economy up to the last figure. Thus the civil power has been made subservient to a degree to the military, which consults its own peculiar interests in the national expenditure, and magnifies its office to the alarming increase of the military and naval burden and the fostering of the imperialist influence.

Peace in Norway and Sweden.

John F. Hanson, in London Friend.

NORWAY has had over eighty years of peace, and the country has prospered; steady progress has been made in material and industrial affairs. . . . The people of Norway are free, independent, self-reliant, and peaceable. Every man of age has a vote and voice in the government, and no aristocratic class rules.

Sweden has its own Constitution and Assembly, like Norway; but Sweden has a titled ruling aristocracy, and not one in four of the men have a vote. . . . The aristocracy is also military in tone, and desires that Sweden and Norway should become a great military State. A small party in Norway has had the same ambition, but the people were opposed and immovable. . . . The real issue is here, as nearly everywhere else, whether these countries shall be ruled on civil or military lines. . . . The question is Industrialism versus Militarism—God or Mammon—Christ or Belial; on national lines, personal salvation broadening out to National Salvation—a National faith in God.

The Czar and Tolstoy.

ON his recent journey north from Livadia, the Czar, during a stop for luncheon at Toola, in central Russia, sent a message expressing his desire to see Count Leo Tolstoy. Tolstoy accepted the invitation, and soon appeared at the railway station, clad as usual in his peasant's garb. The Czar kissed him on the mouth and both cheeks, Tolstoy returning the salute. The Czar then asked him about the imperial proposal for the limitation of armaments. Count Tolstoy replied that he could only believe in it when the Czar should set the example to other nations. On the Czar mentioning the difficulties of the problem, and the necessity for the united aid of the great Powers, the Count expressed the hope that the Czar would be able to attain some definite results. The Czar said he would be pleased if Tolstoy could be induced to lend his genius to the solution of the question, and the Count replied that the Czar might count upon his coöperation, for he was already engaged upon a work dealing with the question in point, which would soon see the light.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE United States Senate, on the 21st instant, passed the Nicaragua Canal bill, 48 to 6. (It has not yet been acted on by the House.) It commits the United States to the construction of the Canal. The estimated cost is $115,000,000. There are to be one million shares of stock, of $100 each, and of these the United States will hold 925,000 shares. There will be seven directors, five appointed by the President, (with confirmation by the Senate), and one each of Nicaragua and Costa Rica. It is planned to complete the canal within six years. It is to accommodate "the largest sea-going vessels."

THE situation in the Philippine Islands is regarded as critical, owing to the increased estrangement of the independence party, and armed conflict is apprehended. The Filipinos are reported as thinking they could make a good contest in arms elsewhere than at Manila. The United States troops at Iloilo, 3,400 in number, are still on the ships, and it is said there are fears of an epidemic amongst them. "Steam launches" have been purchased at Hong Kong, by the United States Government, presumably to fight the Filipinos in shallow rivers, and the Filipino Junta at that city has denounced the transaction.

On the 24th, the Spanish General at Manila, Rios, cabled to Madrid that all the sick and maimed prisoners were released by the Filipinos.

THREE delegates from the Filipinos, Jose Losada, Juan Luna, and N. Marti Burga, arrived in Washington on the 21st instant. This makes five representatives of the Filipinos who are at Washington, Agoncillo being the chief. They have asked, but have not been allowed an interview with the President. The Filipino Junta in London is reported as saying that if Agoncillo is not received by the United States Government within a few days, Aguinaldo will recall him to Manila, "and suspend relations with the United States."

THE Spanish Premier, Senor Sagasta, declared in Madrid, on the 23d, that "Aguinaldo has made the liberation of the Spanish prisoners in the Philippines conditional upon Spain recognizing the Philippine republic and allying herself thereto." A Manila despatch, via Madrid, says, however, that the Filipino Congress at Malolos has authorized the release of the Spanish civil prisoners and will shortly liberate the military prisoners.

ON the 23d instant, the United States Senate went into executive session, but instead of taking up the Peace Treaty, nominations of naval officers were considered, including the promotions of Admirals Sampson and Schley, over which there was earnest debate. It was said that Chairman Davis, of the Committee of Foreign Affairs, hesitated to take up the Treaty, in consequence of the opposition which has developed, and it was further said that 46 Senators, a majority of the Senate, will vote against it unless it be accompanied by a declaration that the United States does not intend to permanently acquire the Philippines, but will use every effort to establish in the islands a stable and permanent government to be administered by the Filipinos.

On the 24th the Senate decided not to discuss the Treaty with open doors. The opponents of the Treaty desired an early vote, but Chairman Davis said he must consult his committee.

IN the House of Representatives, on the 24th, the Army Reorganization bill, by which the regular army is proposed to be increased to 100,000 men, was taken up. Speeches were made for and against the measure; among the latter a very able one by Representative Hay, of Virginia, who said that if the United States would treat Cuba and the Philippines on the line of the professions made at the beginning of the war, no large armies were needed in either. A vote is to be taken on the bill on the 31st inst. It is not believed that it can pass the Senate in its present shape.

In the House of Representatives, on the 23d, Representative Clark, of Iowa, introduced a bill providing that "no person living in or practicing polygamy shall be eligible to be a member of either House of Congress of the United States, nor shall such person be permitted to hold a seat therein." It is further provided that the evidence of polygamy shall be "of whatever nature that establishes the fact." Another provision makes the act take immediate effect. The proposed measure is directed, of course, at Congressman-elect Roberts, of Utah, who is said to have three living wives.

SEVERAL more United States Senators have been chosen in different States. The "dead-locks" in Pennsylvania, Delaware, Montana, Nebraska, and California are maintained. Senator Quay remains short about 14 votes, and there has not been at this writing, any change in the strength of the different parties to the struggle. The same is true in Delaware.

GENERAL Charles P. Eagan, the Commissary General, who made the abusive attack on General Miles, when testifying before the Army Investigating Commission, has been brought before a Court Martial, charged with "conduct unbecoming an officer and a gentleman," and "conduct to the prejudice of good order and discipline." The sittings of the court began on the 25th. If found guilty on the first charge, the penalty is dismissal from the service.

The controversy over the canned beef continues. Many of those who were in the service continue to say it was bad, and allege that it was chemically "treated." It is uncertain whether any testimony on this point can be brought out in the court martial of Eagan.

THE production of gold, in the United States, in 1898, is estimated at $78,461,202, which is considerably above that of 1897, which was then the highest on record. A few years ago, the annual gold output of the United States averaged less than 35 millions. On the other hand, the silver production has greatly fallen off, the estimate for 1898 being 39 millions, whereas it reached a few years ago, nearly 80 millions. If these figures are correct, and the consumption of gold "in the arts" be not greater than is usually estimated, the relative value of gold and silver must presently be influenced, as a great deal of silver goes out of the country as merchandise, but there is a nett import of gold, now, in settlement of the trade balances.

THE returns of the foreign commerce for 1898, completed by including the figures for the Twelfth month, make up the most remarkable totals ever known. The exports for the year were almost 1,255 millions of dollars, ($1,254,925,169), while the imports were but $633,664,634, leaving a balance in favor of this country of $621,260,535. As compared with the year 1897 the exports increased 155 millions, and the imports decreased 116 millions. The enormous balance in favor of this country has been partly met by returning our stocks and bonds, but much of it remains unliquidated, and is represented by loans made in Europe.

In only one other year besides 1898 and 1897 did the exports rise above a billion (1,000 millions), this being 1896, when they were nearly 1,006 millions.

An important meeting of persons opposed to Imperialism was held in New York City, on the evening of the 21st inst., at the Academy of Music. It was "attended by a great crowd. Long before the doors were opened 3,000 people were clamoring for admission, and in a short while the police ordered the doors unlocked because of the crush. Ten minutes later there was not a vacant seat in the house." Many prominent persons were announced as officers of the meeting. Addresses were made by James B. Eustis, formerly United States Minister to France, Samuel Gompers, President of the Federation of Labor, and W. Bourke Cochran. Letters of sympathy were read from ex-President Cleveland, Bishop Henry C. Potter, and W. J. Bryan, and others. (The resolutions adopted are printed separately.)

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

It is announced that the Secretary of War has appointed General Robert P. Kennedy, of Ohio, Curtis Guild, of Massachusetts, and George W. Watkins, of Michigan, a "Colonial Commission" to undertake the government, in Washington, "of all matters of detail respecting the administration of the territories occupied by the United States forces." The Commission will act only under the authority of the Secretary of War, and their action must have his approval.

—A despatch from Columbus, Ohio, says that H. Arcinus Chevalier, formerly of Paris, who for two years had been living a life of luxury there, is in jail charged with using the mail to defraud. It is charged that he has more than $100,000 which he made by selling penny lamp wicks for forty cents each. He soaked the wicks in a preparation which slightly retarded their combustion, and guaranteed them to last ten years. He "did an enormous business," it was said.

—The ferryboat Niagara, plying between Buffalo and Fort Erie, was caught in an ice flow on the evening of the 21st, and carried down the Niagara river until it struck the International bridge. The force of the impact carried away the upper works of the boat, but freed it from the ice, and it soon was in still water. There were nineteen persons on the boat.

—A severe earthquake on the 22d inst., shook the Peloponnesian district of Greece, destroying several villages and slightly injuring many of the inhabitants. There were further shocks on the 23d. In one place, a number of houses damaged by the preceding shocks collapsed, injuring many persons. In one village fifty children were injured.

—During the five years that the New Jersey Good Roads law has been in operation, 325 miles of road have been converted from heavy sloughs of sand to hard, smooth ways, on which teams can travel with facility, drawing such loads as would be impossible on the old system. The total cost has been $565,829, or about $1,750 per mile.

—The United States Commissioner of Internal Revenue decides that legacies paid out of the proceeds of real estate, directed to be sold for the purpose, are not subject to the tax upon legacies arising from personal property. In case the debts and claims against the estate exceed the appraised or clear value of the personal property, he says, there can be no legacy tax.

—The Spanish Queen Regent, it is announced, will sign a decree convoking the Cortes the day after the receipt of news of the ratification of the Peace Treaty by the United States Senate. She will not assume, herself, the responsibility of ratification, but will leave it to the Cortes.

—One of the first acts of the new wire trust was to reduce wages ten per cent. in the mill at Newcastle, Pa. The men were informed that if they did not like it the mill would be closed, as the trust "had other plants in abundance." This is one way in which trust "economies in production" are effected.

—The State (Massachusetts) has made progress, the Springfield Republican remarks, in abolishing executions by hanging, and the next step, in the opinion of many people, is to abolish the death penalty altogether. It is certainly impossible to prove that executions diminish homicides.

—The Russian Government has ordered the construction at Stettin, Prussia, of a new cruiser of 6,250 tons, and in Russian yards three battleships of about 12,800 tons each, and two cruisers of 6,000 and 3,000 tons respectively.

—Having fed 393 tramps and allowed 587 to sleep in his barn last year, Daniel Smith, a farmer of Berks county, Pa., has posted notices that in the future none need apply for food or lodging.

—General "Lew" Wallace, author of "Ben Hur," says his publishers tell him that "more copies of the book have been sold than of any other book ever published in the United States."

—The pension claims on account of the Spanish War now amount to about 5,000. Most of them allege "malarial poisoning" as disability.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 4, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 5.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

VI.

If one thing seems certain to us who believe in God, it is that He chiefly works, to fulfil his purposes, through consecrated human lives.

ANNE W. RICHARDSON.

From a paper "On Inspiration," at the Scarborough Summer School, England, 1897.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE ONE REFUGE.

If life were always summer,
If hearts were ever young,
And sorrow a chance comer
Our brilliant days among ;
The soul brave 'mid such glory,
Might trust her native pride ;
And scorning Faith's sweet story,
Choose Reason for her guide.

But the year waxes older,
Dark grows the threatening sky ;
When sombre clouds enfold her
Ah ! whither shall she fly ?
When happiness is fleeing
Before misfortune's gale,
And slow the heart is beating,
While strength and courage fail.

'Twere far too sad for weeping,
Too bitter for despair,
Were all her aid in keeping
Of Reason cold and clear.
But joy ! that upward reaching
Beyond all she can prove,
To the sad soul's beseeching
Respond the arms of Love.

Oh ye, who measure heaven,
Ye who can weigh the stars,
The powers to you given
Throb within mortal bars.
Not to knowledge, but to feeling,
The deepest truths unroll ;—
Amid the clouds revealing
Her Father to the soul.

F. M. S.

THE BIBLE AS LITERATURE.¹

BY ALICE M. ATKINSON.

SOME one has said that "the more thoroughly and freely the human life and character of the sacred writers and their immediate auditors is studied, the clearer to the student will be the revelation of God, afforded by the writings,—a revelation unparalleled for its strength and beauty by any other of the world's literatures."

"A revelation unparalleled for its strength and beauty by any other of the world's literatures." That is the side of the writings of the ancient Hebrews which has been neglected by the mass of readers, who go to them for religious inspiration only, and who have been prone to feel that their power as a source of inspiration might be impaired if studied with a view to discovering their beauties as literature. The feeling may be traced in part, perhaps, to Puritan ancestors, who cried out against all literature, except the religious and historical,—all that showed any trace of imaginative power ; in part, to the feeling that the Bible was an infallible source of religious inspiration, and could contain only plain relations of fact.

In spite of these almost instinctive prejudices in favor of making the Bible serve purely moral and religious purposes, we have had to yield to the influence of its wonderful literary beauties, forced upon our hearts and minds in even the most casual reading. The charm of the early stories, the intense interest of the later history, the nobility and splendor of the Psalms—to choose but a few out of the numberless beauties—have influenced our imagination from childhood. They could not fail to do so, when we consider that in the Bible we have the literature of a great people, filled with love of the beauty and majesty and nobility of human life and of nature, and, most of all, of the Creator of both. The time that it covers is twice that of our own English literature, from Chaucer to Tennyson—more than a thousand years—and the books included in the whole collection embrace legends, legal documents, historical records, stories, lyric poetry, sermons, wise sayings, and even dramas.

In Genesis is collected a number of stories, some pre-historic, some coming down in more or less authentic records—and all interesting or beautiful. Among them are the lovely idyl of Rebekah, and the dramatic stories of Abraham's trial of faith, and of Joseph's eventful life ; and through them all is the breath of spirituality that characterizes the Hebrew legends as against all others that we have.

Exodus, Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy are a mixture of narrative and of legal codes,—the latter serving at widely different times, and not proceeding as a whole from Moses, as was believed until modern investigation proved differently. The Ten Commandments we have as the central idea of the genuine Mosaic law,—“its grand distinction among other codes,” to quote Prof. Bruce, “consisting in dealing only with that which is fundamental in religion and morals. ‘Love God with all your heart and your neighbor as yourself,’ is its sum.” Besides the Decalogue is the Levitical code, prescribing mainly the forms and ritual of worship and religious life ; and the Deuteronomic code, impressing the importance of living up to the law, and repeating “the idea of the Mosaic law,—as its name implies, “Deuteronomy,” meaning “the law over again.” With these codes is mingled the stirring and vivid narrative of the migration of the Israelites, up to their arrival at the Promised Land, from which the story of the Ten Plagues and of Balaam stand out with particular distinctness.

¹ A paper read before Buckingham (Pa.) Friends' Association.

The next three books, Joshua, Judges, and I. Samuel, have been characterized by a careful student of Biblical literature, as "incidental history,"—incidents such as the stories relating to Joshua, Samson, Samuel, and Saul, and of so thrilling and exalted a character as to deserve the name of epic. Among them is included the inspired poem, the Song of Deborah. "For mere human interest," says Dean Stanley of this portion of the Bible, "for the lively touches of ancient manners, for the succession of romantic incidents, for the consciousness that we are living face to face with the persons described, there is nothing like the history of the Judges from Othniel to Eli." To the Jews, these stories must have been what the tales of the deeds of their heroic ancestors are to every people,—an inspiration to similar deeds. In the midst of these stirring events, and in sweet contrast to them, is the prose-poem,—as someone calls it,—of Ruth, tender and restful, and full of the calm pastoral life that went on in undisturbed corners of the turbulent land.

Regular history—with references to authorities—detailing the events from the accession of King David up to the Captivity, is the substance of II. Samuel and Kings; while that of Chronicles, Ezra, and Nehemiah may properly be termed ecclesiastical history,—history with particular reference to the bearing of events upon the Jewish church. The story of Esther, a tale of court-life, included among the books of regular history, is one of the most dramatic stories of the Bible, so elaborate as to sustain two plots and several striking scenes. It has been said that the story of Esther "is not only a material for the noblest and gentlest of meditations, but a token that in the daily events, the unforeseen chances of life, in little unremembered acts, in the fall of the sparrow, in the earth bringing forth fruit of herself, God is surely present. The name of God is not there, but the work of God is."

Leaving history now we come to what is, perhaps, that portion of the Bible which is most generally recognized as having great literary beauty,—the Book of Job. Critics and students agree that it combines wonderful perfection of artistic form and diction, with expression of the most profound and universal of human emotions—suffering and pain. And not only this; there is a deep appreciation of nature, in its most sublime and glorious aspects. Lowell says that the author of the Book of Job is the earliest who showed any profound sense of the moral meaning of the outward world. No one can be unmoved by the marvelous beauty of his description of storm and winter, and the height and depth of the wonders of the earth. Take only from the 38th chapter:

"Where wast thou when I laid the foundations of the earth? Declare, if thou hast understanding.

"Whereupon are the foundations thereof fastened? Or who laid the corner-stone thereof?

"When the morning stars sang together, and all the sons of God shouted for joy."

Of the beauty of the Psalms,—the poetical expression of the emotion of the Hebrew people toward God and nature, for over a thousand years,—it is scarcely necessary to speak. They are the best-known of all parts of Bible literature, probably, and many of them have been a part of us from our earliest years. Among the most beautiful are the 106th, "Praise ye the Lord. O give thanks unto the Lord; for he is good; for his mercy endureth forever," the 103rd, "Bless the Lord, O my soul, and all that is within me bless his holy name," the 23rd, "The Lord is my shepherd, I shall not want," and the 139th with its beautiful 9th verse, "If I take the wings of the morning and dwell in the uttermost parts of the seas; even there shall thy hand bear me, and thy right hand shall hold me."

Much of the beauty of the Psalms is due to the wonderful diction, and much to the form of expression, which has been called "parallelism,"—that is, the balancing of one part of the sentence against the other; but this is all external. "The most essential thing in the appreciation of the poetry of the Psalms," Dr. Henry Vandyke says very truly, "is the recognition of the three great qualities which distinguish it, and are evidences, not only of sublime genius, but also of spiritual inspiration." First is, "the deep and genuine love of nature;" second, "the passionate sense of the beauty of holiness;" third, "their intense joy in God."

Proverbs and Ecclesiastes embrace the so-called "wisdom literature," the theory of life and the philosophy of the Hebrews, expressed in maxims, epigrams, and sermons. Prof. Moulton would even describe the first portion of Proverbs, as well as the last, as sonnets on wisdom,—the last containing the famous one on a virtuous woman. The whole body of literature is characterized by a language rich in figures of speech, and in pictures of Jewish life in family, field, and village.

The contribution of the Song of Solomon has been styled the Love-song of the Bible, by one who has studied it with reference to Hebrew literature and history. He concludes that it is a drama in five acts, with three chief characters, King Solomon, the royal lover; the Shulamite peasant girl, and the shepherd lover. The action is carried along by these three, and ends in the marriage-festival of the last two. Prof. Moulton, who has also made a careful study of the Song, takes the view that Solomon, disguised as the shepherd, wins the rustic girl, where he has failed as the king. However this may be, authorities agree "that it is a dialogue of a dramatic character, with a story underlying it," and that it is probably a piece of fiction.

That portion of this literature that next claims the attention is one that is confined solely to the Hebrew writings—prophecy. They have made a glorious contribution to literature; there needs only the naming of Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Amos, Jonah, to bring up the splendid collection of discourses, lyrical poems, and rhapsodies, that are included under the name of Hebrew prophecy. No two books are alike, except in being written in noble and beautiful language, plainly under the inspiration of God, and bearing his message to the people of Israel.

The New Testament is, I think, more familiar to Friends than the Old. We all know the interest and charm of the parables—real stories, as they are, aside from their spiritual significance. Attaching to the Gospels is the interest of comparing the four versions,—all so similar in the main parts related, yet each one so characteristic in manner; the plain story of Matthew, the straightforward simplicity of Mark, the historical accuracy and care of Luke, and the mystical tone of John.

The writings of Paul, which constitute so large a portion of the New Testament, are all in the form of letters, and are so marked in style that one feels the intense personality of their author glowing through each one of them. They are the products of a vigorous, strong character, passionately devoted to his missionary work, vehemently denouncing the sins of his correspondents, and rising at times to heights of sublime eloquence in his exhortations to virtue and holiness.

Of the Revelation of John it has been said that "it is the one monumental classic of New Testament prophecy. The artistic structure is worthy of the author of a great epic poem." It is filled with beautiful imagery, and pervaded by a profound feeling for religious truth.

With a strong sense of the wonderful beauties of the Bible as literature, comes an equally strong conviction that the old conception is not a true one; that the study of the literary side of the Bible does not militate against its value as a source of spiritual and moral inspiration. We must still feel that a close study of it as literature will enable us to discriminate among the values of its various forms. Dr. Lyman Abbott thus expresses it: "The books are bound together not merely by binder's thread, but by an intellectual and spiritual unity; a common spirit pervades them all, a common purpose animates them all. We also discover that the Spirit is not equally unanimous, nor the purpose equally strong, nor the message equally clear in all. In brief, we discover that there is in this literature, a growth in clearness of apprehension, and of expression; that the light of this Hebrew anthology is one which 'shineth more and more unto the perfect day.'"

HOLD sorrow till its most selfish aspect passes, till it turns its religious side to you; till time and experience and faith do their work; till you feel not its gloom, but its glory; not its cross, but its crown. Do not, through any device, lose its sanctifying influence, the greatest loss the soul can meet.—J. F. W. Ware.

HAPPY those who are able in truth to say, "My Lord and my God!" Here is the noblest inspiration for life, strength for work, comfort in trouble, hope in death.—William Forsythe.

IN vain will you let your mind run out after help in times of trouble: it is like putting to sea in a storm. Sit still, and feel after your principles.—M. A. Kelty.

CULLED THOUGHTS OF TO-DAY.

THE man who consciously abides in God is superior to every other environment, master of every other force that comes against his life.

—[G. Campbell Morgan, in an article entitled "Environment" in the "Record of Christian Work."]

GOD is no more in the sanctuary than he is in your shop, or your office, or the mart, and it is no more difficult to pray when ungodly men are thronging around you than it is to pray here.

So long as you are longing for freedom from your present "environment" to be a Christian, you will never find the deliverance you seek.—[G. Campbell Morgan, article as above.]

WE do not think often enough of what we owe to those who have gone before us, and have given their life in suffering and sacrifice for holy causes. Every blessing we enjoy represents a martyrdom somewhere in the past.—[Dr. J. R. Miller.]

No one has ever endured persecution with submission and patience but the world has been made better. Every tear shed in witnessing to the truth has fertilized one spot of the earth. Every drop of martyr blood that has fallen to the ground has caused some plant of righteousness to grow more luxuriantly.—[Dr. J. R. Miller.]

DOING our duty is better than merely knowing it. The only advantage of knowing our duty is in order that we may do it. Therefore the best kind of knowledge is the knowledge of our duty; and the best kind of doing is the doing of our duty.—[Sunday School Times.]

THE mere hatred of evil in a particular form is no evidence of piety. Men have hated the Devil who had made little progress toward loving God. Jehu, the furious driver, in a burst of zeal swept his kingdom of Baal worshipers; but "Jehu took no heed to walk in the law of the Lord God of Israel with all his heart."—[Sunday School Times.]

IT is often said that our work is done in these days by other pulpits, presses, and churches. If it is so, the fact is our condemnation. For our work no one can do unless we fail to do it ourselves.—[Universalist Leader.]

WHEN I remember something which I had,
But which is gone, and I must do without,
I sometimes wonder how I can be glad,
Even in cowslip time, when hedges sprout;
It makes me sigh to think on it—but yet
My days will not be better days, should I forget.
—Jean Ingelow.

LOVE's secret is to be always doing things for God, and not to mind because they are such very little ones.—F. W. Faber.

THERE is but one failure, and that is, not to be true to the best one knows.—Canon Farrar.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS,
1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 7.—SECOND MONTH 12.

THE "HOLY LAND."

GOLDEN TEXT.—The word of the Lord came to Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram : I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward.—Genesis xv., 1.

Scripture Reading.—Psalm 85.

THE Lord said unto Abram, "Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father's house, unto a land that I will shew thee." The land that was shown is a small strip a hundred and forty miles in length, and no more than eighty miles in width at the widest part. If it were placed in New York State with the Jordan lying along the Hudson, the whole land would extend from New York City to Albany. "The Connecticut line would represent the eastern desert, and to the Delaware river its greatest breadth." Small as it is, however, the Promised Land has had an importance in the world out of all proportion to its size. This is true because of its geographical location, of its historical relations, and of its place in the religious life of humanity. It lies at the meeting point of the three continents of antiquity. It is the natural pathway between Asia and Africa, and between Europe and Africa, by way of Asia Minor. Its physical aspects are of the greatest diversity. Along the Mediterranean there stretches a series of fertile plains, extending from Beirut to the Nile. In the north these plains are narrow, and at one point Mt. Carmel thrusts across them nearly to the sea. South of this the plain broadens, and we have the fertile lands of Sharon, merging to the southward into the plains of Philistia. These lowlands by the sea were at first all that was included under the name of Canaan ; but the name was gradually extended to the whole land. Back of the broad plains of the south extends a series of low foothills, separating the lowlands of Philistia from the Judean plateau. This last is the broader southern portion of the central highland of Palestine. This highland is the most important portion of the whole region. The Hebrews were essentially a hill-folk. They never mastered the maritime plains for any long period of time, and never took on the characteristics of the people of the plains. This central highland issues on the north from the mountains of Lebanon in lofty ranges extending from north to south. "In upper Galilee it descends to a plateau walled by hills ; in lower Galilee it is a series of still less elevated ranges, running east and west. Then it sinks to the plain of Esdraelon. . . . South of Esdraelon it rises again, and sends forth a branch in Carmel to the sea, but the main range continues parallel to the Jordan valley." Samaria, adjoining the plain of Esdraelon on the south, is a region of great fertility. The mountains are in short, scattered ranges, and among them are broad valleys. Springs are abundant, and the cultivation of the soil is easy and profitable. To the southward in Judæa, the aspect of nature is less inviting. Bare rocks take the place of verdure-covered mountains, the valleys are deep and narrow, and springs are seldom found. These narrow valleys form the beds of mountain torrents in the winter, or rainy season, and in summer are dry and bare. Still further to the south this highland merges into the desert plateau of the south country.

The Jordan valley is a huge gorge extending from the Lebanons to the Dead Sea, and is continued to the Red Sea by the valley of Arabah and the Gulf of Akabah. In its course the Jordan widens at several points, forming in this way Lakes Huleh and Galilee. The latter is nearly seven hundred feet below the level of the Mediterranean, while the Dead Sea is over twelve hundred feet below the sea. Like the other regions mentioned, the Jordan valley widens at the south, the plains of Jericho being some fourteen miles across.

East of the Jordan the great mountain masses of Gilead and of Moab, fertile, covered with verdure, and well watered near the river, fade away into the great Arabian desert to the eastward.

Palestine is in the southern part of the north temperate zone. Its climate is therefore moderate, though much varied by the irregular surface and great differences of level,—from over twelve hundred feet below the sea level to nine thousand feet above. The climate is also modified by the presence of the sea on one side and of the desert on the other. The year is divided into the rainy season, from November till April, and the dry season, from April till November. Snow is common on the mountains in winter, but seldom remains long, except on the highest peaks. The prevailing winds are from the Mediterranean, tempering the heat of summer and the cold of winter. Occasional hot winds come from the desert and are known as siroccos. Fertile soil is everywhere, except in the mountain plain, intermingled with waste or desert land. Wherever water can be found there is abundance ; but the desert is never far removed. The fruit trees of the temperate zone abound ; the olive and vine are probably natives. Grain is raised on the lower plateaus, in the valleys, and on the plains. Garden vegetables thrive where water is abundant. In the mountain country pasture is abundant, and is luxuriant in the rainy season ; in the dry season flocks must have wide range to find sufficient food.

Palestine thus displayed in one or another part most of the characteristics of all lands in temperate and sub-tropical regions, and its imagery therefore appeals to the experience of all. This is no doubt a part of the source of the power with which its poetic writings take hold of men of every clime. For each there is a touch of the nature about him.

Palestine lies in the natural pathway between the two great centres of ancient humanity—the valleys of the Tigris and Euphrates and of the Nile. In the long contest between the civilizations of Assyria and Egypt, Palestine was the battle-ground. On one side is the sea, on the other the desert. All lines of communication, whether for peace or war, between Asia and Africa, must cross this isthmus of fertility. This is, of course, especially true of the coast plain. The Hebrews in their mountain fastnesses could watch the passing of the armies and the commerce of the ancient world, themselves in large measure aside from the main current of the stream of time. The land was not merely the bridge between Nineveh and the Nile, however. Lying broadside on the desert, with no barrier separating its eastern hills from the sea of sand, it was constantly open to waves of invasion from the wandering tribes of the desert. To this fact is due the great diversity of population of Palestine,—consisting of a vast number of comparatively isolated groups, incapable of national life.

We should not fail to note, finally, that in this land originated all the monotheistic religions which have strongly influenced mankind. Judaism, Mohammedanism, Christianity, all had their beginnings at this meeting point of continents, and among Semitic peoples. Geographically, historically, religiously, this land has had importance not equalled by such an area on any part of the globe.

[NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 7.—SECOND MONTH 12.

THE DIVINE LIFE IN JESUS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—This is indeed the Saviour of the world.—

John, iv, 42.

Read from Gospel of John, Chapter v., 17-27.

REVISED VERSION.

The scripture of this lesson presents the declaration made by Jesus to the hostile Jews, at Bethesda, in Jerusalem, after he had healed the paralytic man, beside the Pool. It was a few weeks later than the recovery of the sick youth at Capernaum. It should be read in connection with other verses of the chapter (v.) of John, to the end. This is an impressive chapter, throughout, and in many passages strongly presents the testimony that the Divine Light abode and was manifested in Jesus, and thus made him the Christ.

The words of the Golden Text come from the preceding chapter (iv.) of John, and were the language used by convinced Samaritans, who thus spoke to the woman whom Jesus met at Jacob's well. When the woman left her water-pot, and pondering on what she had heard, and questioning whether this indeed could be the Christ, made her way into the town, she hurriedly related all that she had seen and heard, and "many of the Samaritans believed on him because of the words of the woman." Later, others believed, not because of the woman's word, but because they had seen and heard for themselves, and they said, "This is indeed the Saviour of the world."

The sense in which Jesus was, and the Christ Spirit in him remains to be, the Saviour of the world, is easy of understanding, in view of the lessons already passed over, and of the declarations of Jesus himself, in this chapter of John, and elsewhere. "God sent not the Son into the world to judge the world," he said (John, iii., 17) to Nicodemus, "but that the world should be saved through him." In the present lesson (v. 26): "He that heareth my word, and believeth him that sent me, hath eternal life." Again (v. 26): "For as the Father hath life in himself, even so gave he to the Son also to have life in Himself." And in a number of the following verses (30, 31, 37, especially), he explicitly declares not only that he is Son of the Father, but that he has been "sent" by him, and has spiritual strength, authority, and efficacy, through the Divine Life abiding in him.

The mission of Jesus was to preach, and to exemplify a regenerating, saving religion. "To this end have I been born, and to this end am I come into the world that I should bear witness of the truth," was his declaration (John, xviii, 37) as he stood before Pilate. And he added (v. 38): "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice,"—not, of course, the voice of the physical, outward man, then on trial, but the Divine call which had been given him to utter, and which is still resounding, by which he becomes a Saviour indeed.

Jesus was the exemplification of obedience to the Divine Will. The living water of which he testified was in him "a well of water springing up into eternal life." The Divine Spirit with which he was filled controlled him. His was a perfect submission, of which he was conscious, for he says: "I can of myself do nothing," "I seek not mine own will, but the will of him that sent me," and "All things have been delivered unto me of my Father." We feel and recognize the force of this Christ Spirit when we come into contact with sincere followers of the Master, those who are ready to sacrifice not only their pleasures, but their comfort, for the sake of lifting humanity to a higher plane. We are impressed with the thought that they are the Master's workers,—instruments, as he was, in the hands of the Heavenly Father, and employed in the great work of redemption.

The character of the reforming spirit which Jesus brought to his work in the time of his outward appearance, and which remains to influence mankind, is "clear enough," Phillips Brooks remarks. "Jesus said that he wanted not to destroy but to fulfill the agencies which he found here in the world. He never cared to reshape circumstances until he had regenerated men. He let the shell stand as he found it, until the new life within could burst it for itself. It is very wonderful to me to see how thoroughly his disciples caught his method. Almost instantly, as soon as the disciples began their work, they seem to have been filled with a true conception of its divine method,—that not from outside, but from inside; not by the remodeling of institutions, but by the change of character; not by the suppression of vices, but by the destruction of sin, the world was to be saved. That truth, with whose vitality all modern life has flourished, with the forgetfulness of which all modern history has always tended to corruption, that truth only dreamed of by a few spiritual philosophers in the ancient world,—it is one of the marvelous phenomena of human thought that it should have leaped full-grown to life with the first influence of Christianity."

"WHAT a bond a great truth is! This was the glory of Christianity. It substituted a spiritual for an outward bond. The adoration of goodness,—this is religion."

BETTER is a little with righteousness than great revenues with injustice.—Prov., xvi., 8.

THINGS TO LEARN.

Christian Register, Boston.

IN the early history of all the American colonies, competition and discipline were enforced in their most rigorous forms. The condition imposed upon the majority of the people who sought their fortunes in the New World would to-day be regarded as tyrannical, cruel, and unbearable. The distinctions of caste and rank, even in New England colonies, were rigidly fixed, and were maintained without regard to any considerations of humanity. Large numbers of early settlers came as indentured servants, under bonds to work a certain number of years. They were practically slaves for the time. Some of them came voluntarily to better their fortunes in this way; others were sold for debt or were shipped from Europe for various reasons. In New England many of these servants were released from bonds because there was no profit in maintaining them. Afterward to some extent slaves from Africa took their places.

But the especial fact to which we wish to call attention is, that in all the early days of our colonial and national history, discipline was strict, subservience to all authority was exacted, and the conditions of competition were such that the unfortunate and the weak not only went to the wall, but were blotted out of existence. There was little sentiment, and scanty compassion, lavished upon the insane, the pauper, and the criminal.

The old idea was that they who were to rule must first learn to obey. Apprenticeship for all kinds of trades and professions was long and hard. It was arranged for the benefit of the employer; and the boy who spent five years learning to make a wagon or to build a house, spent more than half that time for the benefit of his boss. Poverty involved such pains and penalties that all classes of society dreaded the poor-house more than they feared the prison.

In our easy-going days we are forgetting these things. We overlook the fact that the hardy race of pioneers was not only sifted out by the method of immigration, but also resifted by the discipline of toil and hardship and the rigors of government until only the strong and the courageous were left to fight their battles against fortune in the New World.

We have now to learn how to keep the good of the old discipline, while we bring pity, sympathy, and a sense of universal brotherhood to bear in all the relations of society. We must keep respect for everything that is respectable, reverence for everything that is reverend, and honor for that which is honorable, at the same time that we pay respect to human nature in all its common and undistinguished forms.

We have yet to learn how to put our trust in all the people and yet hold every individual up to the strictest sense of personal responsibility. We have to open wide the gates of opportunity for every boy and girl, and yet make each one know, beyond a doubt, that the final fortunes of the individual are to be determined by industry, thrift, fidelity, and subordination to duty.

We have yet to learn how the new sense of sympathy for all who are weak and unfortunate and guilty is to have its way, while blame falls upon the guilty, and punishment follows crime. We must learn how to make allowance for all natural defects, for the tyrannies of society, for the injustice of the many who seek their own gain, and at the same time show the unfortunate and the guilty that their only possible escape from penalty is through obedience. Without the harshness and the terror which formerly made the fate of the pauper and the criminal almost equally forlorn, we must still maintain the distinction between right and wrong conduct, and let penalty fall upon the guilty.

We say, and say it with gladness, that all the people must share the benefits of all modern progress. The lesson will be hard; but we have yet to learn, and we shall learn, how all the people shall become the heirs of all the accumulated blessings of civilization according to their merit. It would be a topsyturvy world in which everybody ruled, and there was no discipline, in which there could be no promotion according to merit, and no distribution of benefits according to the services rendered by those who enjoyed them.

This is still a hard world to live in. Toil, trouble, and anxiety have not been abolished, and will not be, in any time within human foresight. But taking all the world together, and all classes as we find them, the conditions imposed upon every individual who enters the competitions of life are made more easy. What we need now to learn for the good health of society and for the welfare of each member of it is how to bring blessing to every one, while still we let a wide gulf separate the fortunes of the good and the evil, the thrifty and the indolent, the wise and the ignorant, those who help themselves and those who desire to reap where they have not sown.

If a process of evolution has been going on since the earliest times, with whatever lapses and backward swinging curves, then it follows that better times have already come, and that still better days are coming. But that they do not come for all is evident. That the uplift of the human race has not reached and helped every individual nor every class is a fact too painfully conspicuous. The task of this generation is to equalize benefits, to bring into the old stable relations between human beings, upon which all society has been founded from the beginning of time, new virtues, new harmonies, new blessings, while still maintaining, in all their strictness of outline and rigor of penalty, every righteous distinction and every wholesome restraint.

MUCH as I have seen of the world, of its triumphs, of its gayeties, and of its luxury and magnificence, I have never been for a moment shaken in the conviction that the best thing this side heaven, the delight of life, its chief consolation, indeed the very charm of existence, is in kind affections.—Henry Colman.

☛

“THE essence of courtesy is the instinctive giving to others the first place in our thoughts and words and actions. The attainment of this grace costs a great deal; and it is worth more than it costs.”

CO-OPERATION.

An article by Henry D. Lloyd, in the Union Signal, Twelfth month 30, 1898.

THE coöperative movement, after fifty years of struggle in Great Britain, has had fifty years of living prosperity, and a greater prosperity is coming into plain view. It has achieved an economic footing of a hundred millions of property. Some of the best men and best thinkers have given it leadership. At least one-seventh of the population of Great Britain have been enlisted in its ranks—the pick of the working classes of the greatest of European nations. It is an established religion, for coöperation is not a method of business merely, but an ideal of conduct and a theory of human relations. Without cathedrals, creeds, ritual, or priests, it has not only openly professed, but has successfully institutionalized the Golden Rule in business.

Coöperation has won the right to be accounted the most important social movement of our times outside of politics. It is, of course, only a half truth. It is the voluntary or domestic expression of the same resurgent spirit of self-help by each-other-help of which the republic, democracy, and the hopes of socialism are the political or public expression. Each of these—the private or voluntary, the public or political—is a half truth, but the world needs half truths to make up its whole truth.

We are a different people from the English and our circumstances are different. When the English coöperative movement struck its present roots, the consolidation of industry had hardly begun; while to-day in America, it does not seem to have much farther to go to bring us to the consummation of an industrial feudalism which will make impossible any individual, or even coöperative initiative or independence. Many of the American students and workers feel faint-heartedly that the development of the trusts makes it hopeless for coöperation to obtain that foothold here which the English workmen succeeded in obtaining a generation ago. There is, too, the feeling among many of us that Americans are not a coöperative people; that, as has been said, our genius is more for co-talking than for co-working. But this is the greatest of mistakes. America has been doing a coöperative work even more remarkable than that of England. Each nation has followed its genius on the lines of greatest need and least resistance. English coöperation has been industrial; ours has been political. The achievement of America in uniting in one common life and one coöperative citizenship the African and European, and even Asiatic types, which elsewhere glare at each other with hatred across frontiers of bayonets, is the greatest triumph of coöperation which the history of civilization has yet shown. Compared with this, the English task of getting the men of one trade and one locality to unite in so simple a social function as purchasing or making commodities was easy. As America advances from political coöperation to industrial, its accomplishment is likely to be as much grander than that of Great Britain as the task is more difficult on account of extent of territory, racial variance, and the newness of social life.

There is some reason to expect that the American evolution in coöperation will be partly along the lines of colonization and the establishment of new communities. The American is a colonizer. All Americans are colonists from abroad. The West was colonized from the East. We colonized California and are now colonizing Alaska. One hears to-day in every direction in America of plans for coöperative colonies. That aptitude for political coöperation which has been forced upon us by the necessity of amalgamating so many nationalities fits us specially for community building. Village communities so placed as to have an easy command of the necessities of life can achieve an independence of the railroads and trusts, and an opportunity for the members for production and exchange with each other which would be out of reach if they remained disconnected individuals, lost in the meshes of the highly complicated and centralized economic system of the American business world. The English coöperators, I found, look with great hope to America. Thomas Hughes, in one of the letters which I saw, said in 1897: "I should not be surprised if America took the lead out of our hands." Mr. E. O. Greening, one of the closest of living students of the coöperative movement, said to me: "Coöperation will be slow to take root in America, but once started, it will develop into forms far greater than anything here." Mr. George Jacob Holyoake made an interesting suggestion: "The churches," he said, "may make coöperation go in the United States."

Frederick D. Maurice pointed out to the workmen of Great Britain that the one indispensability for the success of coöperation was mutual confidence. Certain is it that coöperation in America must progress along lines where the people know each other, in their trades-unions or some other organizations—perhaps as Mr. Holyoake has said, in the churches—or where they will be forced together as in village communities. There is hardly, as yet, anywhere in America that neighborhood life, which made it easy for the weavers of Rochdale or the shoemakers of Kettering, who had known each other almost from childhood, to get together. In London, where the population is nearly as shifting as in America, it has been found almost impossible to acclimatize coöperation. Coöperation can go on in America as in Great Britain and on the continent, only by the help of men of means, culture, and good-will—men well-to-do in good deeds as well as title deeds. What coöperation needs here, as elsewhere, is not philanthropy, but leadership; not endowment, but initiative.

"I SHOULD be the veriest shallow and self-conceited blockhead upon the footstool," said Abraham Lincoln, "if, in my discharge of the duties that are put upon me in this place, I should hope to get along without the wisdom that comes from God, and not from men."

WHEN thou wouldst help another, study to please, not thyself, in the doing, but him thou servest. So shalt thou be unselfish indeed.—Selected.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 4, 1899.

THE PASSING OF THE FAITHFUL.

ANY one who at all takes note of passing events can not fail to be impressed with the continuous removals by death of those who steadfastly, and for many long years, have faithfully performed their duty as Friends, as members of an organization they loved, and which was honored by their loyal service. Almost every meeting within our household of faith can point to such standard-bearers, who in one way or another have shown their fidelity to the Society, some perhaps not by being conspicuous in any way, but "doing good simply by being good." Others have given time and thought and work to the many activities by which we keep in touch and alive to the moral and religious needs of our time.

To all we owe a tribute of gratitude that they thus performed their parts in upholding the truth for which we as a religious Society stand, and the plaudit of "well done!" we trust has been their reward. Many of them will be sadly missed from their accustomed places in our meetings, where their steady devotion to the hour of social worship has no doubt brought to them a sense of nearness to the Divine, although their lips may never have framed their appreciation of its helpfulness in words.

The adherence upon principle to justice and honesty which has characterized many of these passing Friends deserves its meed of praise. In times like these, when disclosures of dishonest dealings so often cloud the spirit, and discourage those whose ideals require value for value received, it is a thing to be thankful for that those whose vacant places we mourn have been persons whose characters stood so high. They may have had their peculiarities, even weaknesses,—who has not?—but these fade from sight and leave us only the memory of men and women we do well to know.

And where are their successors? Alas, that many of them have not sons or daughters to bear their names! Yet we need not despair, for no good passeth wholly away, and somewhere, in some form, it lives. We have faith to believe that it will become manifest in the time to come, and from directions we now do not see will arise standard-bearers for the Truth. If those who will bear the burden do constantly the near duty, and do not refuse to do that which is needful in upholding the Society in true

Friendliness, and are not unmindful of those not yet in active service, but willing to share the duties and privileges of membership, we need not mourn as without hope for these passing Friends, but cheerfully take up their work, which may lead to still greater growth and "purer apprehension of Divine Truth."

DR. S. D. MCCONNELL, of Brooklyn, (formerly in charge of St. Stephen's Episcopal church, Philadelphia), writes in the Outlook a labored article to prove that the treatment of the Indians and Negroes by the United States has been, on the whole, so good that there is no risk—on the contrary, much propriety—in our taking other "inferior races" in hand. How familiar Dr. McConnell may be with Indian affairs we do not know; we do not recall his name as associated with those labors for the protection of the Indians which humane people have found it necessary to carry on for so many years—in fact from the beginning of the white settlement.

There is a passage in Ezekiel, (xiii., 18), that might be applied to cases like this of the Brooklyn rector, and also to the Outlook, we fear. It is a "woe" to those "who sew pillows upon all elbows, and make kerchiefs for the head"—with the view of putting consciences at ease, and representing that things poorly done, or unjustly done, are after all not so bad as prophets like Ezekiel would make out.

It is observable that Dr. McConnell, in his Outlook article, declares the "irreclaimable savagery" of the Indian, and asserts that he "has no right, as an Indian, and never had any." "Because we have failed to keep alive and uplift a race of untamable savages," he says, it is no evidence that we cannot do better with "inferior folk" of "more plastic character."

From such expressions it is evident that the Doctor knows little or nothing about the Indians. Why will not Dr. Lyman Abbott, who knows much, accept him as a day pupil?

SOME of the Canadian newspapers, it seems, would like to make a little "party capital," by criticising the Government for aiding the Doukhobor immigrants. One thinks the simple marriage ceremony (a public declaration that the parties take each other as husband and wife) inadequate, and also that it is undesirable to have people brought in who decline military service. Neither of these objections, by the standards of the Christian religion, has weight. If Canada were bent on war, she might hesitate to receive peace people, and if she were inclined to make ceremonial and ritual part of the civil law, she might object to those who prefer a simple order of marriage. Fortunately, Canada appears more liberally minded in these as in other respects.

"SHALL I understand," asks a correspondent, "that you approve of, and agree with, all you print?" Certainly not. All that is implied by our printing anything (other than our own editorial expression) is that we think it suitable for the paper, likely to be interesting, or helpful, and in the main according to the principles which we profess. Often we reject articles, generally satisfactory, because they contain some paragraph, or even some passage, not in accord with the aim of the paper, but when there are simply expressions of opinions on points not of vital importance, these do not necessarily prevent printing, even if we should ourselves hold different views.

BIRTHS.

RILE.—At Ambler, Twelfth month 17, 1898, to Charles H. and Elizabeth S. Sheppard Rile, a son, who is named Joseph Clarence.

WOODMAN.—Eleventh month 21, 1898, to Dr. I. N. and Matilda B. Woodman, of Morrisville, Pa., a daughter, who is named Rachel Anna.

DEATHS.

BILDERBACK.—In Salem, N. J., First month 25, 1899, Margaret M., wife of the late Joseph Bilderback, in her 75th year; a member of Salem Monthly Meeting.

DIXON.—At Wilmington, Del., First month 13, 1899, Mary Dixon, in her 84th year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Wilmington.

ELY.—In Pennington, N. J., First month 24, 1899, of paralysis, Alfred Ely, in his 79th year; a member with Friends. Interment at Solebury Friends' ground, Bucks county, 28th.

[The Newtown Enterprise says: "Deceased was the oldest of the eleven children—nine sons and two daughters—of the late George and Phebe Ely, and was born in Upper Makefield, in 1820. He learned the blacksmith trade, but in a few years gave up the occupation and engaged in farming, at which he continued for many years. About 1884 he removed to the Williams farm in Upper Makefield, and a few years later went to Pennington, N. J. He is survived by his wife, who was Rebecca Smith, of Solebury, and by three daughters.]

GILPIN.—In Kennett Square, Pa., on the morning of the 25th of First month, 1899, Lydia W. Gilpin, widow of the late John G. D. Gilpin, in the 87th year of her age.

GUMMERE.—At Burlington, N. J., First month 24, 1899, John Griscom Gummere, in his 82d year.

LAKE.—First month 17, 1899, at Moorestown, N. J., Eliza K., wife of Howard T. Lake, and daughter of Elizabeth R. and the late George Roberts, in her 48th year.

LEACH.—In Negley, Columbiana county, Ohio, Eleventh month 26, 1898, Rebecca (Taylor) Leach, aged 80 years.

She was a member of Carmel Meeting, and was buried in the grave-yard there. She was born and raised near Warrington, York county, Pa., and became a member of the Society of Friends by conviction.

She retained her faculties until the last, and wrote interesting letters to her many friends. She was sincere, sympathetic, and liberal, and will be long and affectionately remembered by all those who knew and loved her. C.

MANN.—At her home in Coudersport, Potter county, Pa., First month 16, 1899, Mary W. Mann, widow of John S. Mann, and daughter of the late John and Hannah C. King, of Ceres, McKean Co., Pa.

She was a birthright member of the Society of Friends, and I believe always retained her right of membership, but living remote from any meeting, was seldom privileged to attend. C.

PARKER.—At Parkertown, N. J., First month 26, 1899, William B. Parker, aged 81 years, son of the late Benjamin and Phebe Parker, of West Creek.

Interment at Tuckerton Friends' ground.

PHILIPS.—In Wilmington, Del., First month 25, 1899, Isaac D. Philips, aged 83 years; a member of Wilmington Monthly Meeting.

[A local newspaper gives these facts: He was born at Ashland, Del., the son of John C. Philips a mill owner. Isaac worked with his father until 1850, when he and his brother, William G. Philips, bought the mill at Greenbank (on the Red Clay Creek, near Wilmington). They operated the mill together until the death of William, in 1876, and Isaac operated it alone until 1888, when he removed to Wilmington, and since has lived there. His wife, and their eight sons survive him: John C. Philips, with the Joseph Bancroft & Sons Co.; William C. and Edward M. Philips of the Philips Thompson Co., Wilmington; Horace G. Philips of the International Navigation Co., New York; Albert C. and Calvin Philips, who are in business in Tacoma, Wash.; Charles S. Philips, with the Newport News Shipbuilding Co., Va.; Jesse W. Philips, with the Maryland Steel Co., of Sparrow's Point, Md.]

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

FAIRFAX QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Waterford, Va., on the 16th ult. Although the weather and condition of the roads were unfavorable, our different monthly meetings were represented, and we had the company of a few Friends from other meetings.

At our meeting of Ministers and Elders, on Seventh-day preceding, our friends Isaac and Ruth Wilson were acceptably with us, with a minute of unity from their meeting. On First-day morning, when quite a large number of Friends and others were assembled, expression was given by J. Edward Walker to the desire that we might "get into the quiet," and thus be prepared to render acceptable worship. After a few moments' silence, Isaac Wilson spoke from the text, "I am the door; by me if any man enter in he shall be saved, and shall go in and out and find pasture." To the query, "How at this age can we experience that Christ is the door, by which we may enter and be saved?" a very clear statement of his views was given; and the need of the coöperation of the human with the divine will, to execute God's plans, was emphasized.

On Second-day, when an attentive audience was again gathered, Isaac spoke of the first utterance of Jesus, of which we have a record, "Wist ye not that I must be about my Father's business?" expressing much in a very few words, and dwelt upon the Beatitudes, "Blessed are they that hunger and thirst after righteousness, for they shall be filled." This condition would exclude all of a different nature.

After the transaction of the business of the quarterly meeting, it adjourned, and we separated, with the feeling that it had been a favored occasion.

S.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—VI.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

SIXTH-DAY morning (20th) was fine and bright again, and regretting very much that our kind hostess was unable to accompany us, on account of quite a severe cold, we went to dine at Edgar Gregg's where others were invited also, and an enjoyable day was spent.

Seventh-day morning, a beautiful, bright, clear atmosphere without, and no less pleasing in the company of Friends invited to this our Virginia home (Boone Davis's). (While in Pennsylvania, we felt that they excelled any former experience in "turkey dinners," but Virginia is not to be outdone, and if self-denial can be sufficiently practiced so as to return to our home in good health, we shall be very thankful. With it all we realize the hospitality credited to our Southern Friends.)

First-day morning, after two or three days' rest from any public service, we met again with a large and interesting company in the meeting-house at Lincoln, whose walls have so often echoed to the voice of our revered friend, Samuel M. Janney, and only a short distance from his dwelling-place. No small portion of those assembled can claim kinship, and most if not all some benefit or blessing from his life. And with this thought came the spirit of inquiry as to our loyalty to our privileges and profession. The inspiration of the hour seemed impressive, and to arise from the circumstances of the occasion. After the voicing of thankfulness and praise for the favor enjoyed, another of these meetings closed, and evidence was afforded by the earnest hand-shake and uttered feeling that the public servant had no monopoly whatever of the blessing.

Then, after our Friends had completed arrangements for the week, we went to dine at Edward Smith's, and visited pleasantly in their home. Our feelings were brought into tender sympathy with our dear friend Elizabeth Russell, who but a few days before had accompanied the earthly remains of her loving husband from New York, to be laid at rest amidst the scenes of early life. The patience and fortitude with which her great loss is borne give evidence of that alone Upholding Power that is not wanting.

After this visit, we went for the night to Elizabeth Gregg's, where in company with a few others an enjoyable evening and restful night were spent.

Second-day morning found us ready for a drive of four or five miles to dine at Isaac Picket's, whose wife and children had been welcomed into the Society since our last visit in this vicinity. A tendering memory was awakened of Elizabeth Newport's visit in my father's home, when, like her, I could not leave, (although the carriage was ready) until giving expression to a message of love and encouragement in faithful living, after which we felt at liberty to say farewell, and drive to the home of Alice Pancoast for the night. And it is seldom our privilege to enjoy a more pleasant visit, where the dear children are so lovingly and ably assuming their respective responsibilities, in the absence of the father and husband, who passed on to the higher life some years ago. Although we went as strangers in the home, regrets were felt at the brevity of the visit, but after a short season of social mingling, in loving service, we must leave to meet a previous engagement to dine at Phineas Nichols's where, with some other Friends, we enjoy much our visit, and the fine discussion of topics pertaining to Society's interests. Although the rain had been falling fast it just abated in time for us to drive to William H. Taylor's, for the night, where we find waiting willing hearts and hands to make our visit enjoyable. But we find a marked change in the atmosphere on Fourth-day morning, and the ride of six miles to Joshua Brown's, over hills and partly frozen roads, was not of the most enjoyable kind, but we arrived safely and shared another of those warm welcomes which Virginia Friends are so cordial in extending to their visitors. We remained until near evening, when we drove to our Purcellville home.

Fifth-day morning, 26, finds us at meeting time again with a large share of the members of our own Society, and a talk as of family relationship and obligations was seemingly enjoyed and many acknowledgments of appreciation expressed.

According to previous arrangements we went to Thomas Smith's to dine, and with the exception of a very pleasant call at Walter Smith's, we remain in this comfortable home until Sixth-day morning.

Purcellville, Va., First mo. 27.

I. W.

THE CZAR AND THE DOUKHOBORS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THERE is a singular relation between the recent proposition of the Czar for disarmament and the emigration of that peace-loving sect the Doukhoborts. What is the connecting link? Does this mean that at last there has arisen an "Autocrat of all the Russias," who has so keen an ethical perception that he prefers to connive at the removal of a valuable people rather than subject them to the persecution that seems inevitable under present conditions? Does it, on the other hand, mean that the brave heart of a fettered Emperor rises in its might and in face of the dread knowledge that he, alone, is an ineffective force, and must ultimately be crushed beneath the ponderous wheels of the old regime, cries out to the civilized world for help; for that moral support which belongs to the name of Christian nations?

Whichever these events represent, whether the half-hearted but clear-eyed enthusiast, or the man who sees that he must sacrifice himself for his country's zeal, have we any right to sneer at the remarkable proposal which has electrified the modern world?

Our native land has recently so far fallen from grace as to give eager assent to an endorsement of military management. There has been an unfortunate return to "the methods of the barbarians," and a painful sense of defeat oppresses all lovers of moral progress.

While we know that this must be but temporary, the reaction in favor of "Old World" methods, is vastly discouraging to such forward strides as the present suggestions of the Czar. It is natural that he should look to the "Land of the Free" for aid, but alas! perhaps it is also natural that the greater moral sense of our nation should be swayed by the apparent "brilliant success" of the army, and turn a deaf ear to the cry of the man who is facing enormous odds at his own door.

Now is the accepted time. We are still conscious of a thrill when we remember the axioms upon which our nation was founded, and the effect of powerful voices calling upon the thoughtless (who are the clamorous ones for military expansion) to return to the faith of the fathers, gives no encouragement that the elemental peace measures—the beginnings of disarmament—may touch our hearts and lead us to give countenance and aid to the suggestions which must have cost their author far more than we know.

It is a pleasant thing that representatives of our peace societies should join in the welcome by the Canadians of the first arrival of the persecuted Russians,—and to look after their comfort in the beginning of that tedious land journey. Let us be as ready to forward the interests of Peace everywhere.

SARAH M. H. GARDNER.

Andover, Mass.

WAR INFLUENCE.

IN a private letter received by one of the editors of the INTELLIGENCER from a lady in a town in a southern State, not a Friend, these passages occur :

"Three regiments of volunteer troops have been stationed here for some months past, much to the regret of most residents, and we feel sad seeing such mere lads as many of them are away from home and loving ones, exposed to the ills and demoralizing influences of camp-life, when they should be under better training. Truly, war is unholy, and they are antagonistic to divine teaching who, for conquest, or greed of power, thrust it upon the nations.

"Oh, for his promised coming who is to subdue all things to Himself as the Prince of Peace!"

THE DOUKHOBOR IMMIGRANTS.

OUR friend, Edgar Haight, of Sparta, Ontario, kindly sends us a letter from his cousin, Harry V. Haight, a young Friend, who is at present living at Halifax. The writer, after reporting the arrival of the immigrants, on the Lake Huron, on the 20th, says :

"They passed quarantine next morning, 21st, and left for St. John on the morning of the 22d. I had the pleasure of going down to quarantine on Seventh-day afternoon, on the tug which took down the two American Friends, Prince Hilkoﬀ, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, etc. They are a fine body of immigrants, the finest, we were told, that had ever been seen at Halifax."

The New York Times, 8th ult., speaks in warm praise of the exertions of the English Friends for the Doukhobors. "We venture to say," it remarks, "that there is hardly another association of men of equal numbers in England that includes so many of ability, large means, and persistent force. As a class they enter upon no work of this sort without the utmost care, deliberation, and investigation. And when they have once decided upon a course it is with ample knowledge of what they expect to do and the means in their possession. They have a compact and harmonious organization, with extensive relations, both commercial and social, and there is no tiring them out."

In the groups on board the Lake Huron, a Halifax paper says, was a veteran soldier (Russian), who had seen hard service in the Crimean war (1854-56), "whose gray hair and wrinkled face betokened a man of remarkable character. This man after the war left the service, and when 55 years of age joined the Doukhobors. Another in the company of worshippers was a man eighty-five years old, who had been in exile on the borders of the Glacier ocean. He was allowed to come home, but only to leave the country. A particularly attractive face among those who hung over the rail was that of a young woman. Prince Hilkoﬀ said that she was not a peasant like the others, but a physician, not a Doukhobor, who had volunteered to come across and help the people. She would return to Russia."

The name "Doukhobor," meaning "Spirit Wrestler," is one given "in derision," as "Quaker" originally was. The name they prefer is "Members of the Universal Brotherhood."

THE SECOND STEAMER ARRIVES.

The steamship Lake Superior, with the second party of immigrants, about 2,000 in number, arrived at Halifax, N. S., on Sixth-day last. They had come direct from Batoum, in twenty-three days. A child, eight years old, died of small-pox, at sea, on the 24th. No other cases of the disease developed on board. There were two other deaths from other causes. The steamship was sent to the quarantine at Lawler's Island, (near Halifax), and the passengers were landed on the following day and examined. A dispatch on the 28th said the examination "was proceeding favorably," and one on the 30th said that, "several supposed new cases of small-pox have proved to be harmless."

The whole company, however, will now be detained at quarantine for some time, perhaps a month, until they are entirely free from the disease, and then will proceed to Winnipeg. "A general vaccination," it is stated "was begun on the ships, at sea, and is completed." Count Serge Tolstoy, (son of Count Leo Tolstoy), came with the company, and the despatch on the 30th says he "is quarantined with the rest, and not even a letter is allowed to come off the island. The Doukhobors have their own bedding, and food sufficient for forty-five days. There is no means of fumigating skin coats and other leather goods, at Halifax, and a plant ordered from New York has not arrived. The cotton and woollens will be carted ashore to the steam chests, but the leather goods must remain on board to go through the sulphur fumigation when the ship's hatches are sealed. The Lake Superior will be there four weeks and the immigrants fully as long, even if no more disease appears."

On First-day (30th) the immigrants held religious services, as usual. Thanksgiving was expressed for their safe arrival, and prayer offered for a "clean bill of health," so that they might proceed to their new homes.

Current Literature.

A VERY notable book in that form of fiction which presents the reality of life is "Old Chester Tales," by Margaret Deland. It is a series of eight stories, quite varied as to incident, but all marked with a likeness of character, all of lively interest, and all done with fine literary skill. So worthy a book, in this field of creative and imaginative literature, does not often appear amongst us. The author, heretofore best known to us by her book, "John Ward, Preacher," has risen in these Tales to a quite different and distinctly higher level, and the confidence and strength of her work give assurance of her full ability to maintain her place, hereafter.

The "Old Chester" is our neighbor, down the river, the place of the Swedish Upland, and later of the Friends' settlement. This, it appears, was Mrs. Deland's childhood home, and beyond doubt she has given it new and enduring fame. She looks back upon it, in these stories, through a medium of fond imagination, and describes it as a place of restful quiet, of old-fashioned life, of strongly individualized characters, and quaint general surroundings. The town, now become a city, is indeed no longer an example of old times, but busy, stirring,—even, we fear, "hustling."

The old town, however, small, quiet, peaceful, living its life as really, if not so intensely, as a greater and more hurried one, is the place which Mrs. Deland draws, and it is intensely enjoyable. She finds in it examples of the universal experiences of humanity, and suggestions of the problems of life, and these, presented by old people and young people, by Doctor Lavendar, the exemplar of the church catholic, and by many others, she has described in a variety of circumstances, with grace, and humor, and pathos. The old Doctor we meet in all of the Tales, finding him usually wise as well as good, and some of the other characters appear more than once, but generally speaking, the stories stand alone.

The merit of the book includes not only the interest of the stories, and the skillful art, but the refined and wholesome suggestiveness of the author's point of view, and manner of treatment. Her episodes, and little plots, and "situations" are lively and natural, but she has withal a gracious and gentle philosophy which invests them with uplifting suggestion and impression. Some of her studies of character are very searching, and in "Miss Maria" and "Sally," for example, there is a treatment of sundry forms of human selfishness which is not likely to be read without profit.

Altogether, the judgment may be confidently expressed that the book will become and will remain a favorite in our literature, equalling perhaps "Cranford" itself. It is not surprising to hear that though issued but a few weeks, it has passed into a third edition, and is to be translated into other languages. (New York : Harper and Brothers.)

We find a good deal of good reading in Scribner's, this month. Governor Roosevelt is still marching his "Rough Riders," but fortunately there is other matter. That shining example of surviving courage and patriotism, Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, begins his reminiscences of the political events of the past fifty years in this number. He has known all the great men of the period, and his keen appreciation of human nature and his kindly spirit have made him warm friends with many of them. Each instalment of the Reminiscences will stand alone, and this one deals with "Four National Conventions," in which the Senator was a conspicuous figure, being those held by the Republican party in 1876, at Cincinnati, and in 1880, 1884, and 1888, at Chicago. Over that of 1880 he presided, and his description of it is intensely interesting.

Joel Chandler Harris, "Uncle Remus" of an earlier day, has a delightful negro story, "Aunt Minervy Ann," the first, if we understand it, of a series. It is admirably illustrated by A. B. Frost, "the best illustrator Harris has ever had," some one says. There is another instalment of Robert Louis Stevenson's letters, and a fine essay on Thackeray, by W. C. Brownell.

A Canadian edition of "Christian Martyrdom in Russia," the account of the Doukhobor people, has been issued by George N. Morang, publisher, Toronto. It is the English book, issued by the "Brotherhood Press," in England, which we noticed at the time of its publication, several months ago, but it has the added value of a timely and pertinent introduction by Prof. James Mavor, of the University of Toronto, giving facts "up to date." Prof. Mavor is one of those in Canada who have viewed with sympathy the Christian qualities of the Russian fugitives, and have given cordial and valuable help to their removal to America.

The book has a concluding chapter and a letter by Tolstoy. (Price 35 cents.)

Andrew Carnegie, in an impressive article in the North American Review for First month, with the title "Americanism versus Imperialism," vigorously presents his views against territorial seizure. He regards possessions in the Far East as fraught with nothing but disaster to the republic. He would leave the Filipinos to themselves, confident, he declares, that the inevitable result would be a government better suited to the people than any that our soldiers and their officers could ever give.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, publishers of the Atlantic Monthly, announce a special rate to new subscribers of fifty cents for a "trial subscription" to the magazine for three issues. (The regular price for a year is $4.) This offer affords an excellent opportunity for new readers to become acquainted with the magazine.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

OLD CHESTER TALES. By Margaret Deland. With Illustrations by Howard Pyle. Pp. 360. $——. New York: Harper & Bros. (Received through Strawbridge & Clothier.)

THE IMPORTED BRIDEGROOM, AND OTHER STORIES OF THE NEW YORK GHETTO. By Abraham Cahan. Pp. 256. $——. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

THE UNDERGROUND RAILROAD FROM SLAVERY TO FREEDOM. By Wilbur H. Siebert, Associate Professor of European History in Ohio State University. With an Introduction by Albert Bushnell Hart, Professor of History in Harvard University. Pp. xxv. and 478. $4.00. New York: Macmillan & Co. (Received through H. T. Coates & Co.)

CHRISTIAN MARTYRDOM IN RUSSIA. An Account of the members of the Universal Brotherhood, or Doukhoborts, now migrating from the Caucasus to Canada. Edited by Vladimir Tchertkoff; containing a Concluding Chapter and Letter by Leo Tolstoy; with an introduction by James Mavor. Pp. 16, xi., and 110. $0.35. Toronto: George N. Morang.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—At the meeting of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn, First month 22, the subject for the discussion was "Elementary Religious Training." The paper, presented by Helen Lamb, outlined the Fröbel system of child development, keeping prominent the idea of the Divinity within the child which needs only the right opportunities in order that it may so develop as to be the ruling power in his life.

The writer suggested some of the Kindergarten methods by which the little one "may be led from the unconscious feeling of the Divine Presence to that conscious knowledge of God which will enable him to trust him always to the extent that he will give himself up as 'a willing sacrifice wholly and acceptable unto God, which is his reasonable service.'" The child's great teacher is Nature. Through the manifestations of love and joy in Nature he learns to recognize similar feelings within himself, which Nature inspires. Having recognized them he is capable of exercising choice in their use. Then he meets these feelings in his human relationships, and finally seeks his way through these toward God. In conclusion she said: "One's duty to the children, then, is to lead them, first, to feel that Divine power in material things which manifests itself as the great principle of Law and Order; secondly, to think about that power and to recognize the Divine attributes in man as a higher evidence of the Unknown Spirit; so that, finally, after a better knowledge of these Divine attributes which must show themselves in right living, he will reach that ideal condition in which he will become conscious of the Universal Brotherhood of Man and Fatherhood of God."

The discussion turned upon the question of whether the course outlined is sufficient, without some more direct religious training. Much was said for and against that direct religious instruction which must include something of dogma and theology as opposed to the more heterodox theory of allowing the child to develop naturally in the best possible moral and æsthetic atmosphere, and trusting to the Divinity within him to generate a true religion.

The discussion was earnest and animated, bringing out much good thought, and stimulating to further consideration by its richness of suggestion.

MARY A. NICHOLS, Correspondent.

HUNTINGTON, IND.—The Young Friends' Association met Twelfth month 23, at the home of Benjamin and Loretta Nichols.

After a short silence, Mabel Brown was chosen chairman for the evening; routine business was then transacted.

The paper for the evening was written and read by Sarah Mason, subject, "Is it crime or slavery?" She said: "While searching for a name suitable, my scattered thoughts, (unaccustomed to being collected), rambled thus: Crimes of the world are unlimited, and make a subject too broad for any one person to realize in a life-time. When at last I did choose the interrogative little did I realize how very broad, how far it was beyond my mental vision; but these subjects that I will touch upon lie very close to my heart. We think some of our noblest thoughts when our hands are busiest. What is the matter with those people who have so little to do, they so frequently 'kill time'? And those who work with a selfish interest, too blind to see the large harvest within reach, and but few laborers in the field; and those, also, who are careful that any favors rendered are to a neighbor or stranger who will return the compliment. Such people are stumbling blocks to progress.

"There are those people also, who while their companions sleep, are toiling upward in the night. They see more to do than they can accomplish. Such people are truly noble, trying to make the world better for having lived in it. Let each one of us be worthy of our privileges and blessings; remember we are not living in the 'dark ages.'

"We are not slaves to ignorance, but we are criminals not to move with the world in some line. It is quite as necessary to cultivate and encourage the good habits as to weed out the bad ones. People who know they are wrong are sinners, criminals, when the evil is master of them. Don't be slaves to vanity; don't be slaves to fashion. Is it crime or slavery to use the check-rein so that the horse's head is reared up several degrees higher than nature intended? Spain had bull-fights to raise funds to relieve suffering humanity. We realize the inconsistency, but let us clean our own door-steps first, please. Penny, or nickel-in-the-slot machines abound, the victim receiving perhaps one-third value in return. Guessing for prizes—number of beans in a jar, pins in a board, etc., the lucky one receiving a bicycle, pony and cart, etc., as a prize awarded at the expense of all others. The participants in these lotteries show a spirit to get something for nothing. The world honors the lucky one, but the unfortunate multitude are told by word or action, 'serves you right.'

"Slaves of profanity are many. Judging from the profanity abroad in our day we might conclude that either there was some great advantage to be gained by the use of it or that the English language was inadequate to express the thoughts and feelings of many. Be it slavish, or be it criminal, the English language is comprehensive enough to express all that need be uttered. One of Germany's greatest generals said, 'beer is by far a greater enemy of Germany than all the armies of France.' A Chinaman expressed himself thus: 'Rum not proper sir, make Chinaman number one fool.' I feel that the drunkard is the slave; the dealer in the traffic whether behind the bar, at the manufactory, or at the polls, are the criminals. Trifling talk, this, before an intelligent, deep-thinking audience; perhaps so, but everyday thoughts and deeds, whether of kindness or abuse, in this work-a-day world, build our characters, and on our characters, be they weak or strong, vile or pure, lies the foundation upon which the nation is built."

The paper was thoroughly discussed, many ideas were advanced, some for remedying existing evils. Adjourned to meet First month 27, 1899, at the home of Vincent and Emma Moore.

CLOTILDE D. EDMONDSON, Cor. Sec.

HOPEWELL, VA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held at Hopewell, First month 22.

The president opened the meeting by reading the 15th chapter of John. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved. Edward L. Irish, on behalf of the Membership Committee, reported two new names.

Lewis Pidgeon, under the head of History, selected a portion of the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, dated Ninth month 27, 1863, giving an account of the early Friends and their character. Integrity was one of the strong points, and their word was "as good as their bond," their yea, yea, and their nay, nay. Allen B. Bond read "Are we drifting away from Home?" E. Caroline Branson read the Introduction to the Friends' Discipline. Current Topics, by David P. Lupton, were taken from the INTELLIGENCER.

Referred question, "What does plainness of apparel mean to Friends?" was answered by Daniel W. Lupton. It means simplicity in speech and behavior, and plainness of dress, and moderation in all things.

Under miscellaneous business the invitation from Winchester First-day school to hold the Association there at some future time, was accepted, and the next meeting, in Second month, will be held there. Dr. Daniel Janney addressed the Association; he recommended reading the life of William Penn.

Lewis Pidgeon, on behalf of the nominating committee, reported that the committee was unanimous in retaining the same officers for the ensuing five months. The Association approving the report, they are as follows: President, Walker M. Bond; Vice-president, Daniel W. Lupton; Secretary, Annie J. Rees; Treasurer, David P. Lupton; Executive Committee, Howell M. Bond, Mary T. Lupton, and D. Arthur

Robinson. Remarks were made by Jonathan Branson, Jonah L. Rees, and Walker M. Bond.

After a few moments of silence the meeting closed.

ANNIE J. REES, Sec.

LITTLE BRITAIN, PA.—Penn Hill Young Friends' Association held its regular meeting First month 8. Owing to the inclemency of the weather the meeting was small, and the question for discussion, "Is human nature the same as it was years ago?" was continued.

The next regular meeting was held on the 22d ult. Robert K. Wood read the 24th Psalm, and usual business was transacted. Fred. S. Brown read an interesting report on Current Topics, including an address of Dr. Abbott on Indians.

Lizzie Wood read a description of the City of Jerusalem, as seen by Dr. Talmage on his visit to the Holy Land. Cora Wood read from "Personal Reminiscences of Lucretia Mott." A lesson may be gained from the closing sentence,—"The religion she preached and lived was practical, manifesting itself in noble deeds and never-ceasing sacrifices of self."

The question for discussion was then considered, and answered in the affirmative.

At our next meeting we will consider the "Influence of the plain language," and "How are we to make our meetings more interesting?" Sentiments will be from Whittier.

After giving sentiments, we observed the usual silence and adjourned.

P. L. C.

TRENTON, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Friends' Association was held First month 23, with the President, W. Maxwell Marshall, in the chair. After roll-call, the minutes of the last meetings were read and approved.

After the customary business, the program for the evening was opened with a paper, by William Walton, "Of what advantage are the Semi-annual Conferences to the individual Associations?" the writer thinks these conferences can be of great use in building up weak Associations and enlarging and increasing the influence of strong ones. He referred to the last conference at West Chester, Pa. The thoughtful and instructive papers caused their hearers to think and awaken in their hearts a desire to work. In order to make the Associations successful each member should feel that they have an individual work to perform that cannot be rightfully done by another. Particularly to the younger members does this refer; upon them largely depends the success of the future.

"What was the Council of Nice, when did it meet, and what important Church Doctrine did it settle?" assigned to Joseph Willets, was announced by him. This Council was held at Nicæa, in Bithynia, 325 A. D.

A very interesting account, "A Continuation of the History of Trenton Meeting as taken from the minutes of the Monthly and Preparative meetings from the time of its establishment," assigned to J. Henry Fell, was read by Anna North.

After a short silence the meeting adjourned.

M. D. BRANIN, Sec'y.

PENN'S GROVE, Pa.—The Young Friends' Association of Penn's Grove met at the home of William Wickersham, on the afternoon of the 22d of First month.

In the absence of the President, the Vice-President, W. P. Hoopes, presided. Not having had a meeting for three months, the program was not very well fulfilled. Samuel H. Broomell opened the exercise by reading a chapter from the Bible, followed by silence and singing the hymn, "Saviour Like a Shepherd." The minutes of the previous meeting were approved as read.

The one appointed to represent the History Committee not being present, Ella Broomell read from the Memoirs of Samuel M. Janney. A recitation, entitled "On the Other Side," was given by Alberta W. Wickersham. Of the Discipline Committee, Samuel H. Broomell read John J. Cornell's views on music and dress. He also made some remarks on the same.

After a short intermission, the Association was again called to order. The subject for consideration was, "What progress, if any, has been made in the peace principles as held by Friends?" William C. Wilson and Samuel H. Broomell both gave their opinions on the question, believing that these principles had gained and will still gain. As long as children are taught from the cradle, and in public schools, and even churches, the military drills, there will be war.

A nominating committee was appointed to bring forward names for officers for the ensuing year, Fred. Cooper being its chairman. After roll-call, and observing a short silence, the meeting adjourned, to meet at the usual time next month at the home of Pusey Coates.

E. L. C., Secretary.

EDUCATIONAL.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

THE annual joint meeting of the Sigma Chapter of the Somerville Society with the Eunomian Literary Society, was held in Parrish Hall, on Sixth-day evening. The program consisted entirely of original productions, and was the more appreciated on this account. The exercises included the following: opening remarks, Helen M. Fogg, president of the Sigma; poem, Marshall Pancoast; debate, "Resolved, That the Radical is of more use to society than the Conservative." Affirmative, Joseph C. Haines and Margaret Eves; negative, W. Lyndon Hess and Mary Haviland. (Debate decided in favor of negative.) Recitation, Anna Coates Holmes; "Reveries," Gilbert L. Hall; critic's remarks, Prof. Marie A. K. Hoadley; closing remarks, John P. Broomell, president of Eunomian.

On Sixth-day afternoon, W. Hudson Shaw delivered his lecture on John Ruskin before a large assemblage of students and friends of the College. This lecture is one of Mr. Shaw's University Extension series, now being delivered by him in this country, and was much admired and appreciated by all who heard it. The lecturer was introduced by Joseph Wharton, president of the Board of Managers, who in doing so made appropriate remarks. '99.

SWARTHMORE REUNION.—The New York Swarthmore College Association have issued invitations for the banquet and reunion to be held on Seventh-day evening next, the 11th instant. All graduates and ex-members of Swarthmore College are invited. Extra invitations can be obtained by application to Henry C. Turner, acting secretary, 28 Ferry street, New York city.

HUDSON SHAW'S LECTURES.—The course of lectures by W. Hudson Shaw, for the Young Friends' Association, Philadelphia, will begin on Sixth-day, 17th inst., and follow on Fourth-day evenings, closing Third month 29. His general subject is "England in the Eighteenth Century."

COMMUNICATIONS.

A CONTRAST OF POLICIES.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

EXPRESSIONS of thankfulness were given in our meeting to-day (22d), for the safe arrival of the Doukhobors, and the protecting care that has been over them.

If there should continue to be a need for funds to assist others to come to Canada, I have been thinking that if an especial appeal was sent to each and every one of our monthly meetings, there might be a willing and hearty response.

We noticed a few evenings ago in our paper an editorial stating that the Armenians are also looking towards Canada, and it was thought that our Government could not do mission work in a better way than by encouraging them the same as they have the Doukhobors.

I feel that there is quite a contrast between the way that the two countries—I mean the United States and Canada—are spending their money, the one lavishing its millions upon war, and the other spending her thousands to enable a peace-loving and persecuted people to procure homes.

Sparta, Ontario.

E. H.

THE IDAHO COLONY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I note your editorial paragraph in this week's paper about Friends settling on the Pacific Coast. Is it understood that the plan of a colony in Idaho has been given up?

First month 28.

S. P.

[We are not authorized to say so, but we have the impression that Western Friends are not now looking to the proposed location at Riverside, in southern Idaho. Other suggestions are made, but we have not such knowledge as would justify us in making a positive statement about the matter. Some of those who located at Riverside have been, we understand, dissatisfied, but whether reasonably so, or not, we cannot say. Daniel Griest informs us that he is not now interested there, and is not connected with the Oregon Short Line Railroad since New Year.—EDS. INTELLIGENCER.]

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

FROM a letter to one of the editors of the INTELLIGENCER, from Redlands, Cal., on the 22nd ultimo, we take a few passages. The writer says: "I cannot describe the change one experiences, coming through the pass in the mountains to San Bernardino, from the long railroad ride over the desolate land to the north of them. It is of course—in the desert—green only where it is irrigated, so there would be a house surrounded by trees, orange groves, and gardens, (we saw peas in blossom, and they were plowing and harrowing), and next there would be a dreary space covered with stones and sage-brush. Here, in the San Bernardino valley, the orange-orchards are loaded with fruit, and rose bushes are in bloom,—geraniums and calla lilies also."

(Redlands is about nine miles from San Bernardino, and the latter place is east of Los Angeles, and about sixty miles distant.)

The name, Elizabeth E. Foulke, printed in connection with the authorship of two recent successful books for children, "Braided Straws," and "Twilight Stories," and the place of her residence, Richmond, Indiana, awakened inquiry by a reader of the INTELLIGENCER, with the result that we are enabled to share the information which was given. She is the grand-daughter of Anthony Foulke, of Bucks county, Pa., who removed west, many years ago, and whose wife was Eleanor Webster. ("Eleanor Foulke" is a familiar and honored name in the Foulke line, as she was the wife of the immigrant, Edward.) Her two books are, so far, the sum of her literary production. She was a scholar with William M. Jackson, when he conducted the Friends' School in Richmond, and later a student at Earlham College; she is now a teacher in the public schools of that pleasant city.

A Friend in New Mexico kindly writes us: "We would miss the INTELLIGENCER very much; the news of old friends does much to pass the time pleasantly and profitably. And then the thought that is expressed in the paper on public affairs is most excellent."

An architectural plan by the late Arthur S. Cochran, of Philadelphia, is among the exhibits in the architectural section of the exhibition now open at the Academy of the Fine Arts. It is a fine example of his careful and artistic work, a "Plan for a house for Dr. I. D. Webster, at Mankato, Minnesota."

The Farmers' Haymarket Company, which is the owner of the hay-market for many years maintained at 12th and Cambria streets, Philadelphia, decided, at its annual meeting on the 14th ult., to sell its property, and close business. It covered 3½ acres of ground, and is said to have been "one of the largest of the loose-hay markets in the world." Isaac H. Hillborn has been weigher and superintendent for nineteen years, and in that time has weighed, (a city newspaper says), an average of 15,000 loads of hay per year.

THE publishers of the United States, according to the official record of the book trade, during the year 1898 put their imprint upon 4,800 volumes.

DONATION DAY.

THE Woman's Hospital, North College Ave. and 22d St., Philadelphia, will have its Donation Day on next Fourth-day, the 18th instant.

The managers earnestly solicit money, groceries, clothing, towels, old muslin and linen, coal and flour, etc. All contributions to be sent to the hospital.

Tea will be served from 3 to 5.

The Treasurer of the Hospital is Anna L. Fogg, 1707 Arch street, Philadelphia.

A PLEA TO PEACE.

WHEN mighty issues loom before us, all
The petty great men of the day seem small,
Like pigmies standing in a blaze of light
Before some grim, majestic mountain height.
War, with its bloody and impartial hand,
Reveals the hidden weakness of a land,—
Uncrowns the heroes trusting Peace has made
Of men whose honor is a thing of trade,
And turns the searchlight full on many a place
Where proud conventions long have masked disgrace.

Oh, lovely Peace! as thou art fair, be wise;
Demand great men, and great men shall arise
To do thy bidding. Even as warriors come,
Swift at the call of bugle and of drum,
So at the voice of Peace, imperative
As bugle's call, shall heroes spring to live
For country and for thee. In every land,
In every age, men are what times demand.
Demand the best, oh Peace, and teach thy sons
They need not rush in front of death-charged guns,
With murder in their hearts, to prove their worth.
The grandest heroes who have graced the earth
Were love-filled souls, who did not seek the fray,
But chose the safe, hard, high, and lonely way
Of selfless labor for a suffering world
Beneath our glorious flag, again unfurled
In victory, such heroes wait to be Called into bloodless action, Peace, by thee.

Be thou insistent in thy stern demand,
And wise, great men shall rise up in the land.

—Ella Wheeler Wilcox, in Cosmopolitan Magazine.

THE BALLAD OF BERRY BROWN.

OH, do you know a country lad by name of Berry Brown,
Who rides upon a load of wood along the streets of town?
He has a hat turned up in front and crumpled down behind,
His curly hair so long and fair is tumbled by the wind,
And through his coat his elbows peep, and through his boots his toes;

But everywhere and anywhere he whistles as he goes.

There's something strangely taking in the eyes of Berry
Brown—

They seem to flash a cheery light along the streets of town:
Despite his course and tattered vest, his boots and hat forlorn,
His trousers patched, threadbare, and sagged, his shirt so old and worn,

For every glimpse he gives he takes a measure of surprise,
And everybody wonders where the secret of it lies.

And so his way of sitting there, so steadfast, calm, and strong;

His air, as if his whistling bore wagon and wood along;
His independence and self-trust, the firm-set throat and chin,
The working of his muscles when he reins his horses in,
Take hold of one and fascinate, as hints and glimpses can,
When all the glory of a boy is merging into man.

Oh, Berry Brown looks careless, but he holds his secret well;
Far hidden in the clouds are heights whereon his visions dwell:

Within him somewhere swells a vein of ancient hero-vim,
And who shall hold him back one step, or set the pace for him!

Wait, you shall see if poverty can chain so strong a soul,
Or if to sell his wood can be the rounding of his goal!

The old folk shake their heads and say: "Look out for Berry
Brown

When he shall measure forces with the best boys in the town!
The wind has beat in Berry's face, the sun has burned his skin,

And winter's cruel hand has pinched where Berry Brown has been;

But hearts like his are brave enough to meet the strokes that form

And fortify the giant souls that take the world by storm!"

—Maurice Thompson, in St. Nicholas.

AMERICAN PURITY ALLIANCE MEETING.

The American Purity Alliance met in the Isaac T. Hopper Home, Second avenue, New York City, on the evening of the 23d ult. The subject of discussion was "The New Militarism and Purity," upon which a paper was read by Mariana W. Chapman, of Brooklyn. A report in the New York Sun, giving probably a fair account of the meeting, contains the following.

MRS. CHAPMAN spoke of our army of occupation in the tropical islands as possibly the most disastrous army with which we should have to deal, and mentioned Russia's making her army into railroad laborers as a lesson by which we might profit. A strictly industrial population was least inclined to social offences, she said. Our army in Cuba—at least "supposed to be temporary"—was not likely to be troubled with industrial labors. There was record of an English regiment in Hong Kong, of which there were left only ten members after a service there of only eight years. There was an army of depraved women in Russia and in Germany wherever a regular army was stationed. In parts of Germany there existed the custom of proclaiming the honor or dishonor of a young girl by the whole or broken wreath she wore on her wedding day. And broken wreaths were lightly considered, the speaker declared, the glamour of the soldier's apparel having made Germans less careful than English and American women in their views of the matter. The United States were powerful because their strength had not been sapped by militarism, militarism that struck at their physical, mental, and moral state. Oh! that the country might have been kept from its dangers!

"Germany is a great country," said the Rev. Dr. W. T. Sabine, "but she might be greater. She would be greater if she thought more of the woman and less of the soldier."

The spectacle of seven women hauling a boat against the current up the Rhine had appalled him, as had the military display in cities, while the fields were full of women over there. How awful, he exclaimed, that our young men should be sent to war and come back vitiated morally, physically, and mentally, to spread infection, not merely physical, but moral, throughout the land. And the terrible cost to womanhood of it all. Mothers in Cuba and the Philippines shivered when they thought of the perils ahead for their daughters.

The Rev. Antoinette Brown Blackwell took a more hopeful view: "With all the desolation that is bound to follow, I still believe," she said, "that an overruling Providence can bring good out of evil. Many of our young men will carry to those nations nothing but evil. But I'm sure there will be taken also something to benefit those nations, and in this world good and evil go very close together." Speaking of Brigham H. Roberts, she said that if the country insisted that he be put out of the House, the people would show that the attitude of the nation was against what he represented.

The Rev. S. S. Seward of this city drew attention to the proposed international medical conference to be held next September in Brussels for the consideration of measures for international regulation of vice. "Another note of danger sounded from Europe," he called it, and he cited the circular sent out by those interested, calling attention to the spread of disease, and setting forth that the proposed conference was intended to establish the medical basis of measures to be taken for its repression, and to seek to have them incorporated in the laws. The desire was to bring about an international agreement on the subject. What he objected to was that, on its face, the aim of the conference was to stop the propagation of disease instead of vice that led to it. It seemed to him that such must be the aim, else the aid of others than doctors would have been sought in the enterprise. He hailed the conference as co-workers in the cause, but would counsel with them, hoping to find some common ground where moral and scientific workers could labor together to one end.

Samuel C. Blackwell advocated the selection of army chaplains with perhaps greater care than any other members of the regiments, the chaplains to keep near to the hearts of the men and encourage constant writing home. Then, why should there not be games for the soldiers' idle hours? And reading aloud of history, poems and tales of adventure, instead of training minds constantly to warfare? And then, have rewards for good conduct.

Mrs. Sarah B. Stearns, of California, thought that efforts should be made to keep the soldiers supplied with the very best reading matter, as they had lots of time to read. The Alliance's leaflets should be widely circulated.

A letter from a Baltimore member of the Alliance expressed the writer's conviction that the urgent need of the hour was a bureau of information concerning the conditions with which the Alliance has to do in the West Indies and Philippines, and that a personal investigation of these conditions should be made. The annual report of the Secretary spoke of the people of those islands as "mainly ignorant and morally very low." The Alliance's Executive Committee had asked Lady Curzon's aid toward securing the abolition of Government regulation of vice in India, with regard to the British Army, and had called her attention to the fact that native women and girls were greatly exposed to wrongs. The committee had also during our Spanish war sent a protest to President McKinley against the conditions which permitted 300 immoral women to follow the soldiers to Tampa, and seven carloads of the same kind to go to Jacksonville when the troops were there.

President Aaron M. Powell in his address said that there was much in this city to call not only for efforts toward every legal discouragement of social vice, but toward the upbuilding of higher ideas of chastity and purity of life, both in men and women. He spoke freely of the conditions the soldiers faced in the tropical islands, and drew attention to several resolutions passed at the afternoon session of the Alliance, among them especially one calling President McKinley's attention to Lord Wolseley's memorandum regarding vice in the British Army, and one asking pastors of churches to take every opportunity to inculcate purity of life.

PRINCE HILKOFF.

It has been, we think, already stated more than once that in making the arrangements for the Doukhobors in Canada, Aylmer Maude was accompanied by Prince Hilkoff. The latter is the nephew of the present Russian Minister of Railways, and is compelled to live out of Russia on account of his views, as explained below.

THE prince was an officer in the Russian army at the time of the Turkish war in 1878, serving in the Caucasus, and during his military life there met many of the Doukhoborts, who were then living in that hilly country. One day he killed a Turk in battle, and captured his horse, but another horse, an extremely fine animal, escaped him after a long chase. The prince returned to camp much discontented and dissatisfied, thinking at first that the failure to get the horse was at the bottom of his disquietude. It gradually dawned upon him, however, that his unrest came from having killed a man. The more he thought upon it the more he realized the bad use to which he was devoting his strength and energy, killing people whom he did not dislike, and whom he had never met before, and he determined to leave the Russian army. This he could not do at once, but he abstained from taking any more life, though often in positions of great personal danger.

At a later period Prince Hilkoff left the military service and settled on his mother's estates in Southern Russia. There he occupied himself with agriculture, and came into closer touch with the peasantry. He saw how miserable they were, and how hard their life was, in consequence of heavy taxation and enforced military service. Moreover, the quantity of land allotted to them at the emancipation of the serfs was insufficient for their needs. Ultimately the prince came into the possession of his mother's estates, and immediately divided it up among his peasants, he himself living by his own toil, and dwelling on a small section of land which had been allotted to him by the peasants themselves. By this act Prince Hilkoff acquired great influence among the peasants, and was consulted by them in all their troubles, more particularly with regard to the over-charging done by the priests of the Russian church in connection with the burial and marriage services. The prince finally advised the peasants to do as the Stundists and the other Protestant sects of Russia were doing—to get along without the priests altogether, advice which was at once adopted. This proceeding caused a serious shrinkage in the church income, and being denounced by the priests as the founder of a new sect, the prince was banished to the Caucasus. His two children were taken from him and handed over to his mother to be brought up in the "orthodox" faith.

In the Caucasus Prince Hilkoff lived among the Doukhoborts, and when, after a time, the Russian Government banished the leaders and prominent men of the Doukhoborts to Siberia, the Prince was sent to the Baltic provinces, and placed among the Lettish-speaking people. There he lived for two years, and at last received permission to leave Russia altogether. His present plan is to accompany the Doukhoborts to their future home in Manitoba, living on the 160 acres of ground which the Canadian government is to allot to each family of these refugees, and in no way will his mode of life differ from that of the peasants about him. Prince Hilkoff has a fine education and a good knowledge of English, and his presence in the future colony will be very valuable to the emigrants.

THE IMMIGRANTS AT ST. JOHN.

A DISPATCH from St. John, N. B., on the 24th, published in the Evening Journal of St. Thomas, Ontario, is kindly clipped and sent us by a friend in Canada. It contains some interesting points, additional to those published last week. The despatch follows.

The steamer Huron with the Doukhobors on board, arrived here yesterday at 4 p. m. The Canadian Pacific Railroad train-crews for five trains, with locomotives and coaches, were at Sand Point and vicinity from early morning, and the passenger train which was to leave first for the west was placed on the wharf tracks, while the box cars, to carry the Doukhobors' effects, were placed on the track in the rear of the warehouse. The colonist cars contained sleeping apartments, plenty of fresh water, etc., and were very comfortable, while the tourist cars, besides having all the above conveniences, are fitted out with a neat and serviceable cooking stove. In the centre of each train of eight passenger coaches is a large baggage car, which is used for the provisions.

In the provision cars, which are very clean, were rows of cans for coffee and tea, piles of new tin plates, knives, forks, spoons, cups, etc., for the Doukhobors, while there was fresh water in abundance. This car also contains brooms, pails, soap, etc., while in the provision line there is cheese, tea, sugar, milk, salt, vegetables, and a large amount of fresh bread. Nothing has been left undone by the Government and the Canadian Pacific Railroad officials for the comfort of the new settlers.

The upper deck of the steamship was alive with the Doukhobors, who, in their sheepskin costumes, presented a sight never seen in this city. When the large steamship was slowly moving towards the pier, about two dozen citizens, each armed with a camera, were busily engaged in taking snapshots of the vessel and her passengers, and some very fine pictures were secured.

The Doukhobors were received with cheers, which they duly acknowledged in their peculiar fashion, and, after singing a song of thanksgiving and praise, the landing commenced.

As they passed through the sheds to the train, the ladies of the Women's Council presented each child with a bag containing candy, oranges, etc., which were gratefully received.

The trains were filled up rapidly and despatched promptly. Five in all were made up and went out. The appearance and manners of the Russians impressed the people of St. John most favorably.

THE ARAUCANIANS.

A WRITER in Harper's Round Table describes the interesting Indian race, in the southern part of Chile.

The Araucanians live partly in villages, where they use wooden or wattled osier houses; partly in the country as farmers, herdsmen, and horse-breeders. Each village has a regular market-place on certain days of the week, when all the adjacent country buys and sells. Computation is made with knotted cords. They have always known the divisions of time into years, days, and weeks, and allow for the intercalary days. Yet with so much practical and inherited knowledge which belongs to what we call science, this people disdains books, and the acquirement of reading and writing is discouraged as leading to effeminacy. Bards recite the history and deeds of the forefathers in spirited poems to keep the fire of patriotism forever aflame, going from house to house, always sure of reverence and warm hospitality.

Christianity has made no headway among them, for the South American form of the religion with which they would come in contact has but little charm for a race marked by sagacity and good sense, and without superstitious leanings. They believe in a Supreme Being, in various minor deities who are his agents, in a future state, and in omens and divinations. But they have no priests, no idols, no temples, no rites, no ceremonies, nor sacrifices, and their worship, for the most part, is in the spirit. The Romanist missionaries have long since given them up as desperate cases, although these Indians have never interposed objections to their people becoming converts at their own choice.

Their skill in farming and stock-breeding is noted, their knowledge of the arts which conduce to household comfort and personal self-respect, such as carpentry, pottery, metal-working, cloth weaving from wool and cotton, ample. While they seek no contact with the white man, they are most honest and hospitable in the reception of all strangers. Possessed of so many of the finest traits of civilization, it is a marvel that they have followed intact so many of the primitive customs of their ancestors. Possibly this has best insured their survival as a hardy and virile nation.

IRRIGATION ON A GREAT SCALE.

ENGLAND is preparing to spend $800,000 a year for thirty years for a great lake for irrigating purposes, to be made by damming the Nile. Of the results of this dam-building F. C. Penfield speaks thus in the Century magazine:

The Egypt of the map shows more than 400,000 square miles, an expanse nearly seven times as great as New England; but the practical Egypt—that which produces crops and sustains life—is barely as large as the States of Vermont and Rhode Island taken together. This is the ribbon-like strip of alluvial land bordering the Nile, a few miles wide on each side, and measuring not more than 10,500 square miles. The extension planned, and to be completed in the next six or eight years, wholly by irrigation, is no less magnificent in conception than the rescuing from the Libyan and Arabian deserts of 2,500 square miles, or twice the area of Rhode Island. This will be exploitation in its truest sense, and its accomplishment will be a verification of the ancient saying that "Egypt is the Nile, and the Nile is Egypt."

As an object-lesson this Egyptian enterprise should have no more interested observers than in America, especially in Colorado, Nevada, California, and other States of the West, where the irrigation expert is succeeding the railway-builder as a developer.

Engineering skill is to rearrange nature's surface on the Egyptian frontier, and pond back into Nubia a body of water a hundred and forty miles long, crossing the tropic of Cancer, and extending southward nearly to Korosko—a goodly step on the journey to Abu-Simbel and Wady-Halfa—by means of a great dam across the Nile at Assuan. The Pyramids and the Sphinx have borne testimony through the centuries to the grandeur and power of execution which dwelt within the Nile valley; and what more fitting now than that the same valley be the theater of a gigantic engineering exploit, audacious perhaps, but certain of success, and ministering to man's necessities, rather than to his vanity?

As a building achievement the scheme is on a scale worthy of a Rameses or a Pharaoh. To create in the heart of the African desert a lake having from two to three times the superficial area of Lake Geneva, in Switzerland, and control it with scientific precision, so that the impounded flood may be turned into distant channels at will, is a stupendous undertaking. But the engineers claim that their plans can be carried out to the letter; they have estimated the exact cost of the dam, computed almost to the gallon the volume of water that will be imprisoned, and figured the necessary resistance to be provided at every point of the masonry. In Cairo, the experts of the ministries of public works and finance, likewise, have calculated to a nicety the sum from taxation that will come into the public treasury through the country's augmented productiveness.

Subordinate to the great dam, a smaller one, not unlike the barrage at the apex of the delta, ten miles to the north of Cairo, is to be made at Assiut. Its function will be to give a sufficient head to the river to force the water into the system of irrigation canals that vein hundreds of thousands of acres between Assiut and Cairo. The completion of the Cairo barrage (it was begun by Mehemet Ali Pasha, from the plans of a French engineer, but not made effective until England took the country in hand) so developed cotton-culture as to add to the public revenue of the country at least $10,000,000 annually. It may safely be concluded that the Assuan reservoir is but one of a series which will in time be constructed southward to the Victoria Nyanza. The re-establishment of khedival authority at Khartum will determine this.

The Military Display.

AFTER stating that the "inauguration" of the Governor of Pennsylvania, at Harrisburg, on the 17th inst., was (as usual on such occasions), accompanied by much intemperate drinking, the Pennsylvania Methodist of that city speaks of the great prominence of the military, and adds:

"We are not a military government. The inauguration is to duties mostly civic. To mass our soldiers from all over the State on such an occasion is to leave the impression on the minds of our youth that we are a warlike people, ready at every turn to resort to the arbitrament of arms instead of pursuing always and everywhere the arts of peace. It is possible that the Jingo politicians resort to the calling out for parade of our soldiers to familiarize our people with the new plans for conquest, and that it is the set purpose of Mr. McKinley and his political followers thus to indoctrinate the country with the military idea as embodied in the polity of the warlike nations of the old world, where, at great expense to the State, soldiers confront the citizen and the visitor at every turn."

Better things have certainly been expected of President McKinley.

"Commercial Cultures" in Butter.

THE discovery of the important part played by various bacteria in producing the flavor and aroma of butter has led to the introduction of what are known as "commercial butter cultures," and dairymen have been led to hope that by the use of such cultures, and of the process of "pasteurizing" the quality of their butter might be materially improved. Recent trials at the Pennsylvania Experiment Station, at State College, however, seem to indicate that cleanliness, the careful selection of milk, and close attention to details, promise to effect more in improving the flavor of our butter than pasteurizing and the use of commercial cultures.

With pasteurized cream, the acid-forming cultures were found to give slightly but distinctly better results than were obtained from unpasteurized cream ripened spontaneously, while non-acid-forming cultures gave results, if anything, slightly inferior to those obtained by spontaneous ripening. With unpasteurized cream, as might have been expected, the results were less marked. A home-made "starter," carefully prepared from skim-milk, was found to give as good, if not better, results than the more expensive commercial cultures, and this was true both with pasteurized and with raw cream. No distinctly beneficial results were observed from pasteurizing, although the experiments were not specially planned to test this point.

These results are similar to those recently published by the Wisconsin Experiment Station.

The 100,000 Regulars.

DISCUSSING the proposed increase of the regular army to 100,000 men, Andrew Carnegie says, in the North American Review:

"Thirty-eight thousand more men are to be called for the regular army; but it is easy 'to call spirits from the vasty deep'—they may not come. The present force of the army is 62,000 men by law; we have only 56,000, as the President tells us in his message. Why do we not first fill up the gap, instead of asking for legislation to enlist more? Because labor is well employed and men are scarce in some States to-day; because men who now enlist know for what they are wanted, and that kind of work is not what American soldiers have been asked to perform hitherto. They have never had to leave their own country, much less to shoot down men whose only crime against the Republic was that they, too, like ourselves, desired their country's independence and believed in the Declaration of Independence—in Americanism. The President may not get the soldiers he desires, and whom he must have if he is not to make shipwreck of his Imperialism. There is very grave reason to doubt whether the army can be raised even to one hundred thousand men without a great advance in pay, perhaps not without conscription."

Study of Indian Languages.

THE United States Bureau of Ethnology will print, under the editorship of A. S. Gatschet, a dictionary of the language of the Massachusetts Indians, from manuscripts left by the late Dr. J. Hammond Trumbull. About a year or two ago Dr. Edward Everett Hale brought a small storm of ridicule on himself by maintaining that the failure to teach some one of the Indian languages was a great lack in our educational systems; that children should be familiar with these tongues, in order to appreciate our geography, colonial history, etc. It seems now as though Dr. Hale's plea may not have been in vain.

At the last Mohonk Indian Conference, Mr. Gilfillan, the missionary to the Chippewa (Ojibway) Indians, in northern Minnesota, made an interesting statement related to this subject. Some one had sent him, some time before, some fragments from the "Indian Bible" of John Eliot, (1604-1690), the "Indian Apostle" of New England. It had been said that since Dr. Trumbull's death no one survived who could read this bible. But Mr. Gilfillan found that with his knowledge of the Chippewa language he could make it out, the explanation being that the Chippewas speak a dialect of the great Algonquin family of Indians, to which all those on the Atlantic coast, (north of Florida) belonged, as well as others inland.

CURRENT EVENTS.

AN agreement was reached in the United States Senate, on the 25th ult., to vote on the "Peace Treaty" on the 6th instant,—next Second-day. In "executive session," Senator Davis, Minnesota, chairman of the Foreign Relations Committee, and one of the five commissioners who negotiated the treaty at Paris, is reported as saying that "we need count upon no display of friendship from Europe," in regard to the partition of China, and the control of trade in eastern Asia. The European Powers, he declared, "were profoundly jealous of the United States, and the Senator declared that it was a fact that we had not had one friend on the Continent in our recent struggle with Spain, or in our efforts to secure peace favorable to this country. He further intimated that "but for Great Britain's attitude there would have been intervention by the Continental Powers,"—in other words, that our assault upon Spain was purely by England's sufferance.

IN the National Manufacturers' Association, at Cincinnati, on the 25th ult., a resolution urging the early approval of the "Peace Treaty" was introduced. It was strongly opposed, but after assurances, in which the president, Theodore C. Search, of Philadelphia, joined, that it did not commit the Association to "expansion," was adopted.

STRONG opposition was developed in the House of Representatives, last week, to the increase of the regular army to 100,000 men. Amongst others who spoke strongly against the bill for that purpose was Representative Henderson (Rep.) of Iowa, a one-legged veteran of the Civil War, who disapproved the annexation of the Philippines. Finally, those in charge of the bill were obliged to yield to amendments fixing the number at 50,000, though authorizing the President, in his discretion, to increase it to 100,000. It was agreed to vote on the bill on the 31st, and it was expected to pass. The Senate, it is presumed, will not approve it, in this shape. In the next Congress, the struggle is sure to be renewed.

IN the House of Representatives at Washington, on the 25th ult., Representative Henry U. Johnson, (Rep.), from the Richmond district of Indiana, made an earnest speech denouncing the scheme to annex the Philippine Islands. He was followed by Dolliver, a Representative from Iowa, a very rhetorical speaker, who defended the Administration. Johnson pressed him with questions as to whether it was the Administration's purpose to forcibly take and hold the Islands, regardless of the will of the people who occupy them. Dolliver evaded these under the cover of successive "outbursts of oratory," eulogizing President McKinley, etc., but finally declared: "If I had my way, I would take possession of the entire Philippine group."

THE United States Senator "dead-locks" in Pennsylvania and Delaware continue at this writing, with no appearance of any election soon. In some other States, also, contests continue, but West Virginia, Wisconsin, and Montana have made elections.

COMPLICATIONS in the Samoan Islands, resulting from the attempt of the three nations, England, Germany, and the United States to govern the islands in a "joint protectorate," have recently threatened to disturb the relations of this country and Germany. Dr. Andrew D. White, our Ambassador to Berlin, has exerted himself to adjust the difficulty. He said, on the 28th inst., at Berlin, that the two governments had "discussed the matter in the most friendly manner, and each has avowed its readiness to do whatever is just and right, including the disavowal of any action of one or more of its agents, which may be shown to have been contrary to the treaty or to the comity of the nations concerned." Emperor William, at his "birthday reception" on the 28th, greeted Dr. White "with special cordiality, and conversed with him quite a long time."

ALL dispatches from the Philippine Islands are under strict military censorship, so that no "news" may reach the public except such as the military authorities approve. On the 28th ult., the Cable Company announced that the rule was applied to "private telegrams in secret language."

THE President has appointed Representative Sereno E. Payne, of New York, a member of the Joint High Canadian Commission, to fill the vacancy in the American representation on that body caused by the death of Mr. Dingley. Mr. Payne also succeeded Mr. Dingley as Chairman of the Ways and Means Committee.

THE Spanish Cortes is to reassemble on the 20th instant. The Government, it is stated, will introduce a bill providing for the payment of indemnity to Spaniards who have suffered through the cession of the Philippine Islands to the United States. It is believed the session will be short. The Premier, Senor Sagasta, will at its close, submit to the Queen Regent a question of confidence in the Government.

DR. Edward Everett Hale, of Boston, has been visiting Philadelphia and other cities, with the purpose of awakening public feeling on the subject of the Czar's Conference, and especially an International Tribunal of Arbitration. He spoke on First-day evening last, 29th ult., at the First Unitarian church, Philadelphia, to a large and earnest audience, taking his text from the first nine verses of the 11th chapter of Isaiah. He strongly presented the case of Peace and Peaceableness, and was emphatic in his plea for a united effort by leading nations to establish a general and permanent arbitration court. This, he mentioned, was a plan of William Penn and of Henry IV., of France.

SEVERAL recent dispatches from St. Petersburg intimate that Count Leo Tolstoy, the author, may be obliged to leave Russia, principally on account of his friendship for and assistance of the Doukhobors. A dispatch, 30th ult., says there is a dispute between the Czar and the "Holy Synod" of the Greek church, of which Pobiedenostzeff is "Procurator-General," over the Tolstoy matter, the latter insisting on calling the Count before the Synod, and perhaps depriving him of his civil rights. The departure of Count Serge Tolstoy with the Doukhobors appears to be part of the case.

THE number of warships of all sorts now building in Great Britain is said to be the greatest ever known—a "record number," the dispatches call it. There are altogether 119, of which 28 are armored ships, costing over £26,000,000 (about $130,000,000). These latter alone exceed by two "the entire Russian fleet of battleships, and are treble the number of armored vessels in the American navy." It is added that the Admiralty (or Navy Department) in a few weeks will ask the authority of Parliament to build more.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE "Astor battery," which returned from Manila to New York last week, is thus reported by the New York Evening Post:

"It is worth noting that of the seventy-three members of the Astor battery who got home from Manila yesterday, sixty-seven said that nothing would induce them to go back there, these being sample expressions of the returning soldiers: 'I would not take the islands as a gift'; 'I wouldn't stay in Manila if you would give me the islands and all there is on them'; 'I wouldn't stay there for worlds.'"

—A dispatch says that W. B. Holmes, of Danville, Kentucky, on the evening of the 23d ult., Monday night, burned his stock of cigars, chewing and smoking tobacco and pipes in the street in front of his store. Holmes is a strict church member. He recently bought his partner out and then advertised that he would handle no more tobacco, and would sell Bibles at cost.

—Numerous bills have already been introduced in the Pennsylvania Legislature, which provide for the creation of new offices, and the increase of salaries of the holders of offices already established. And all this in spite of the fact that, according to Governor Stone, the State is not in possession of sufficient revenue to pay her present obligations.

—Judge William Butler, of the United States District Court, for the Eastern district of Pennsylvania, having reached 76 years, has sent his resignation to the President. He has served since 1879, and has been a model of the judicial qualities. He resides at West Chester, and is of Quaker stock. His son, William Butler, Jr., is Associate Law Judge of Chester county.

—Seats on the New York stock exchange are selling at from $35,000 to $38,000. This beats the long-standing record quotation of $34,000 reached in 1885. There is said to be a considerable demand for seats from rich men who wish to start their sons in "business."

—The Eiffel tower has been turned to practical use by the Paris police, who use it as a watch tower from which to spy out those chimneys that throw up more smoke than the law allows. By a system of ranges the location of the offending factory can be accurately told.

—Herbert Welsh and others have issued an appeal for contributions to a fund to be used in prosecuting persons charged with fraud, in Philadelphia, in connection with the election, in 11th month last. It is alleged that one-fourth the reported vote was fraudulent.

—The new "Curfew" ordinance went into operation at Vineland, N. J., on the 28th ultimo, "amid the blowing of whistles and ringing of bells." Though passed unanimously by the City Council, it is bitterly opposed by the Mayor, and others.

—A new record has been made by the delivery of Australian mail in London in 28 days. This is half way round the globe and the speed is greater than in Jules Verne's romance, which seemed so exaggerated when it was written.

—Four locomotives coupled together ran into a gang of twenty-six workmen, at the end of the Gallitzin tunnel, on the Pennsylvania Railroad, on the 29th ultimo. Two men were killed and fourteen injured.

—Woman suffrage bills have been introduced in both Houses of the Kansas Legislature.

Everyone knows the expense and annoyance of lamp-chimneys breaking.

Macbeth's don't break; and they make more light.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

WILLIAM S. YARNALL,
Manufacturing Optician.

118 South Fifteenth St., (4th door bel. Chestnut St.),
PHILADELPHIA.

WATCHES.

As one of the oldest houses in the watch trade established three generations ago—and up to date in every feature of the business, we are able to offer the best and most serviceable watches for the least money. Give us a call.

GEO. C. CHILD,

1020 Chestnut St.—2d Floor.

Established 1810 at 824 North Second Street.

Useful and Ornamental LAMPS

in Old Brass Filigree and Lace Work.

Guaranteed not to tarnish.

We cater to all tastes in finish and ornamentation. Friends want plain colors as a rule. We have a most excellent lamp for the library in Dark Bronze. We also have for the dining-room and hall, Black,—very rich and durable.

Prices range from $2.00 up.
The light is all you could wish.

A. J. WEIDENER,
36 South Second Street, Philadelphia.

ORDINARILY, the toad hibernates in the earth, preferably in dry soil not apt to freeze. It buries itself backward, its hind feet and the end of its body serving to scoop out its hole, while it pushes itself in with its forelegs. Once buried, it leaves no trace whatever of its hiding place. When it is in a temperature near the freezing point its own temperature is three-fourths to one and one-fourth degrees higher than that of the surrounding medium.

AMERICANS are great people to work for money for their children to quarrel over. Atchison Globe.

IN Das Weiter Dr. Meinhardus relates that during a "glazed frost" in Eastern and central Germany on October 20 a blade of grass at Potsdam was found to carry eight hundred times its own weight of ice. Frosts of this nature, the "vergias" of the French, are owing, it is thought, to rain falling on bodies at a temperature below the freezing point, and so freezing on them.

JOSEPH T. FOULKE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

OFFICES: { 623 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.
{ Ambler, Montgomery Co., Pa.

JOHN FABER MILLER,

325 SWEDEN STREET, NORRISTOWN, PENNA.

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practicing in Montgomery and Philadelphia counties.

Hanscoms'. Our prices are the lowest, our variety the most complete, and quality as near perfect as can be had. Shall we mail you a price catalogue for comparison?
No liquors or other offensive goods or methods resorted to.
1311 Market St., Phila.

A POSTAL CARD RECEIVES PROMPT ATTENTION.

JOHN S. CONRAD,
LAUNDRY.

2103, 2105 COLUMBIA AVENUE, PHILA

Newly Priced Books.

Marion Harland's "Some Colonial Homesteads and their Stories," cloth. Publisher's price, $3.00; now $1.25; postage, 22 cents extra.

Susan Ferrier's Novels, "Marriage," 2 volumes; "Inheritance," 2 volumes; "Destiny," 2 volumes. Publisher's price, $6.00; now $1.50; postage, 36 cents extra.

Townsend's "Near a Whole City Full." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 13 cents each.

Du Maurier's "The Martian." Publisher's price, $1.75; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Will Carleton's Poems, assorted, cloth, full gilt. Publisher's price, $2.50; now $1.00; postage, 15 cents extra.

Wilson's "Wonderful Story of Old." 2 volumes, illustrated, 1/2 morocco. Publisher's price, $7.50; now $2.00.

F. M. Kingsley's "Prisoners of the Sea." Publisher's price, $1.25; now 50 cents; postage, 10 cents extra.

Zola's "His Excellency." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

THE LAST OPPORTUNITY
To buy DUTCHER'S SHOES.

We vacate this store February 1st. ALL shoes at cost or less, for Quick Sales. Bargains in High Grade Shoes.

SAMUEL DUTCHER,
45 North 13th Street, (below Arch).

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 11, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 6.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

VI.

RELIGION, as we Friends at least ought to know it, is a LIFE; as little is it stores of knowledge only, or opinions only, as it is a mere ceremonialism, or mere acts of morality.

ANNE W. RICHARDSON.

From her paper, "The Personal Bearing of Inspiration," at Scarborough Summer School, England, 1897.

PRAYER.

PRAYER is a copious cloud
Hung o'er the parching plain;
Softly it falls or loud,
In unbought, priceless rain.

Pray for thy friend! Upon him shall distill
Those showers of love God sendeth at his will!

Prayer is a flowering tree
Fed from an unseen root;
It cannot fail, where'er it be,
To bring forth ripened fruit.
Thine be a tree which many blossoms fill,
Each bud bears fruit. It is the Master's will!

Prayer is a glorious star,
Its orbit out of sight;
It speeds beyond the midnight's bar
Far toward the throne of light.
Then it returns, steadfast, serene, and still;
Its rounded are completed by God's will.

Prayer is the setting sun,
Lost in the glowing west;
So drops our prayer when day is done,
In the All-Father's breast.
But it shall rise beyond the eastern hill—
A glorious sun of strength to work God's shining will!

—Mrs. Merrill E. Gates, in Christian Uplook.

THE RELATION OF "THE LAW" TO "THE GOSPEL."

Read to the Conference Class of Race St., Philadelphia, First-day
School, First month 15, 1899, by Anna C. Janney.

It is expected that we should base our consideration of this subject upon Paul's Epistle to the Galatians. McClymont's "New Testament and its Writers" has been found helpful and I have quoted therefrom.

In the outset, I would say that to no other religious body should this letter of Paul appeal with a stronger interest than to Friends, because of its presentation of the spirituality and freedom of the Gospel.

We must bear in mind, how closely, in the Jewish nation, the ceremonial law of the church was interwoven with the people's civil and individual life. Judah was a race, a nation, a religious organization,—church and state one and inseparable.

It comes out very clearly through the Epistle to the Galatians that it is against the ritual law as paramount that Paul protests, while toward the close of the letter he makes a mighty plea for loyalty to the moral law, for purity and nobility of living. Paul had twice visited the Galatian Christians, and on his second visit had observed amongst them a falling away from the purity of the Gospel of Christ. "This had evidently been connected with an attempt on the part of Judaizing teachers to take advantage of the ritualistic tendencies, which, as Cæsar tells us, were characteristic of the Gauls." Of the mixed elements of population in Galatia, the Celts from Western Europe had made the strongest impress, yet some of the Galatian converts to the Christian church were doubtless Jews. "The existence of this Jewish element in the Church explains the frequent allusions to the Old Testament and the influence gained over the impressible and impulsive Galatians by the Judaizing Christians of Jerusalem, who were 'jealous of the law' and desired to make the Gospel tributary to the synagogue and the temple." They had taken advantage of Paul's absence to undermine his character as an apostle on the ground that he had never seen Jesus, "and they had endeavored only too successfully to cause a reaction in the minds of the superstitious Galatians, from the simplicity and spirituality of the Gospel."

Let us note in the opening paragraph of the letter Paul's bold claim to apostleship; "Paul, an apostle, not of men, neither by man, but by Jesus Christ and God the Father," and let us find the clue to our subject in this same first chapter.

Paul recites his past faithfulness to what he verily believed to be God's service, when beyond measure he persecuted the Christians and this in conscientious fulfillment of his education and traditions as a Jew. He then declares that he had received the Gospel, not "of man, neither was I taught it but by the revelation of Jesus Christ," herein differing from the law in which he had been trained the straightest of his sect. Here, in brief, is our whole subject, "the Law and the Gospel."

He says, when "it pleased God to reveal his Son in me" (mark! in me, a spiritual Christ), "immediately I conferred not with flesh and blood, neither went I up to Jerusalem to them which were apostles before me; but I went into Arabia." Into the desert solitudes, to be alone, it would seem, with the heavenly vision. He sought not the pillars of the Christian church nor of the Jewish law; he sought the inward Teacher, the Gospel of Christ.

Later, he went "by revelation" to Jerusalem and his ministry was acknowledged by the earlier apostles; but we see that he owed his knowledge of the Gospel, not to them, but to direct and divine revelation. His letter tells us, however, that his elder brothers in the faith gave him "the right hand of fellowship" freely endorsing his mission to the Gentiles to be as authoritative as was theirs to those of the circumcision. "Only," says Paul, "they would that we should remember the poor; the same which I also was forward to do."

How beautiful an example to present-day Christians! uniting in essentials though agreeing to differ in non-essentials. Clearly these brethren agree that the ritual may be omitted or fulfilled according to each man's conscience—not to the duty of loving service—and nowhere in the Scriptures do we find a lovelier presentation of what is Christ-like living than in the opening of the last chapter of our epistle.

Having accredited himself afresh to his backsliding disciples in Galatia, Paul proceeds to take up the burning question "Having begun in the Spirit, are ye now made perfect by the flesh?"

"He proves that the Law has been superceded by the Gospel, the latter being the full assertion of that principle of faith that had always lain at the foundation of men's acceptance with God, even in the time of Abraham." He declares "the just shall live by faith. And the law is not of faith." He clearly portrays his conception of a spiritual Jerusalem and contrasts it with the Jerusalem which now is and is in bondage with her children; they being mentally still in bondage to the Rabbinical law.

This from Paul—afortime the strictest of his sect! And as he conceived a spiritual church, so he knew and preached a spiritual Christ, for he tells his people "because ye are sons, God hath sent forth the spirit of his son into your hearts, crying Abba, Father." The work of faith and grace was to be in their hearts, quite inward, not external to them; and their appeal was, not to an angry or even an appeased God, but to Abba, their Father.

Paul taught them not the satisfaction of vengeance nor of the Mosaic law, but the gospel of Fatherhood and sonship. Very tenderly but very urgently, he argues for the simple faith from which they have receded, that "all the law is fulfilled in one word, even in this; thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself."

"My little children, of whom I travail in birth again until Christ be found in you" (in you) "in Jesus Christ neither circumcision availeth anything, nor uncircumcision, but faith which worketh by love." Where can be found a more grandly simple condensation of the Christian message? Not faith in the narrow sense of mere assent, but faith which works by love. The windows of the soul open to the Father's blessing, the doorways open to our brothers claims and needs.

We conclude then that Paul's contention is, that while the ceremonial law may be a schoolmaster to bring the child-mind to Christ, there is no vital dependence between it and the gospel, for "after that faith is come, we are no longer under a schoolmaster."

From the heading of our subject as assigned, I however gather the impression that the thought may have been to consider somewhat the truth that faithfulness to the moral law is a preparation for spiritual strength and development.

While this is not Paul's primary subject in the Galatians, it is not far to seek his position in the matter. Hear his noble appeal. "Brethren, ye have been called into liberty; only use not liberty for an occasion to the flesh, but by love serve one another." Then follows a solemn warning against many temptations to which we may believe these volatile people were subject. "I tell you" "they which do such things shall not inherit the kingdom of God."

He had taught them what the kingdom of Heaven is, the spiritual Jerusalem. It is impossible that the impure, the envious, the degraded shall inherit it. But he says, "the fruit of the spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance; against such there is no law." "Be not deceived; God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap."

My friends, do not those miss the sweetest and the strongest claims of Christianity who fail to plead its transforming power in life and conduct for those who accept its rule and guide—those in whom the law is swallowed up in the gospel?

In many dedicated lives familiar to us, this inheritance is born with them, and has filtered down through generations in characters of purity and worth.

Let us try to put aside all our inherited reverence for the gospel of simplicity and love; to look through other eyes at its effect upon the lives of men to whom it came as a new thing, preferring not exclusively our inherited and easy point of observation.

Let us not even look at it as offered to the Hebrew mind, eminent among races for its early development of veneration for the one true God, for its lofty religious tone. Let us look, for illustration, upon the picture of the mild, sweet message of Christianity offered through meek lives to the early Roman world of splendor and corruption. Splendid in material prosperity, great in intellect, corrupt in morals. Her glory being that her civilization was great enough to become largely the foundation of all later civilizations—her body of civil law the basis of all later codes, yet her moral life was evil and debased.

Repulsive the picture will be to us in its luxurious licentiousness, but if we would really know against what mighty odds the permeating and persuasive gospel made its way, we must be willing to know the sort of peoples to whom the early giants in the faith must need carry it. How prone we are to accept it as handed direct to us, forgetting the sacrifices and martyrdom offered in its perpetuation. But the brighter and stronger lights of the historic picture will be shown in the winning over of lives long steeped in self-indulgence, to the gentleness and peaceableness taught by the Christian gospel.

Let us turn again to another race type in those early Christian centuries. And here I would plead that through whatever channel may come to us these glimpses of history, as atoms of the universal truth, we shall receive them gladly; let them be even in the guise of so-called fiction, which often sounds the note that has to us the very ring of truth.

In Henry Van Dyke's little book "The First Christmas Tree," we may find what would seem to be a graphic picture of Pagan worship in Europe among the hardy child-like northern races. Into the midst of its barbaric rites come the messengers of God's fatherhood, with such a fire of love in their hearts as keeps warm their zeal through suffering and exposure, through storm and cold, "enduring hardships as good soldiers of the cross of Christ."

How foreign and how wonderful to these child races, with their rude worship of the gods, must have been the tidings of a Heavenly Father, who is well pleased in the obedience of his children, and who had sent his well-beloved son as an example of immeasurable love and self-forgetfulness.

And Paul—the valiant preacher and follower of Christ, has done more in his epistle to the Galatians "than any other book of the New Testament has done for the emancipation of Christians, not only from the yoke of Judaism, but from every other form of externalism that has ever threatened the freedom and spirituality of the Gospel."

"THE LLOYDS" AND CHARLES LAMB.¹

CHARLES LAMB is related agreeably to Friends, in various ways. His advice to "get John Woolman by heart" would alone commend him to us most cordially, but his essays of "Elia" bear many other kindly and appreciative passages, and he was a near and attached friend of Bernard Barton. Besides this he had a most friendly relationship with the Lloyds of Birmingham.

The present volume is a contribution to the considerable body of literature which gathers about Charles Lamb, Coleridge, Southey, and others of the literary group to which they—with Wordsworth, and De Quincey—imparted distinction. E. V. Lucas presents us here some twenty letters of Lamb, heretofore unknown, and therefore of course unpublished. Several of them are among his best, as the examples which we give below sufficiently prove. These letters had been carefully preserved in friendly hands, and were "discovered" in 1894. Besides those from Lamb, there are some by Coleridge, Wordsworth, Southey, Thomas Clarkson, and by Charles Lloyd of Birmingham, and his family.

In our early Pennsylvania history an interesting figure is Thomas Lloyd, who was Penn's friend, and deputy governor of the province. He came from Dolobran, in Montgomeryshire, Wales, and his elder brother, Charles, was heir to a considerable estate there. Both became Friends, in the days of persecution, and Charles was nearly ruined, being for ten years (1662-72) not allowed his liberty, on account of his religious convictions. One of his sons, Sampson Lloyd, went to Birmingham, and established there a large business, the iron manufacture, and banking, and it was his grandson, Charles Lloyd (1748-1828), who was the banker, philanthropist, literary worker, etc., in the time of Charles Lamb, and who is in evidence in this book,—an active, capable, interesting man, with some qualities like Gladstone, as E. V. Lucas suggests, engaged in many things, and prosperous in them, the head of a large family, the manager of a large business, but with leisure to attend himself to one of his farms, and to translate the Iliad, the Odyssey, and something from Horace.

"The Lloyds" of this volume, therefore, are this Charles, and his children, chiefly his two sons, Charles and Robert. With these sons Charles Lamb was intimate. Charles was a poet, and if not ensured of a permanent niche in the temple of Fame by his writing, still a man of much feeling for poesy, and of some ability in its expression. He was for a time a pupil of Coleridge, and when in 1797 a volume of the poems of Coleridge and Charles Lamb was published, some by Charles Lloyd were included. That S. T. C. was altogether a visionary and unpractical person seems to be open to doubt when we read his explanation to Cottle, the publisher of the book, that through this inclusion, "Lloyd's connections" would buy "a great many copies—more than a hundred." Later, Coleridge published, over a pseudonym, some caricature-imitations of Lamb's and Lloyd's—also his own—poetry, and Charles Lloyd retaliated with a novel, "Edmund Oliver," in which Coleridge's absurd army episode as "Private Silas Tomkyn Comberbach" was introduced. But while there was this unpleasantness for a time with Coleridge, Charles Lloyd and Charles Lamb maintained, without important interruption, a cordial friendship. Charles Lloyd had "fits of melancholy," much like Cowper, but he married (his wife was Sophia Pemberton, of Birmingham), had a family of ten children, lived at Old Brathay ten years or more, entertaining all the "Lake School" of literary lights, and many others, was Coleridge's literary executor (and beloved by his sons Hartley and Derwent), went to London in 1818, relighted his poetical flame, producing what E. V. Lucas describes as his largest and incomparably his best poem, called "Desultory Thoughts on London," and died in France in 1839.

A sister of Charles Lloyd, Priscilla (sixth child of Charles the banker), married Christopher Wordsworth, brother of the poet. He was a rector in the Established Church, and Priscilla thus returned to the national fold, out of which George Fox had called her Dolobran ancestor. She was the mother of two bishops, Charles Wordsworth, of St. Andrews, and Christopher Wordsworth, of Lincoln, while her grandson, John Wordsworth, was bishop of Salisbury.

Robert Lloyd, brother of Charles and Priscilla, was not a poet, but a devoted friend of Charles Lamb, and it is to him that the "gentle Elia" wrote most of the more important letters in this volume. He was a somewhat "backward" lad, and chafed at times under the system of his father,—who, however, as already said, seems to have been a kindly, broad-minded man. The lad seems to have written to Lamb, that he had no friends (he was away from home, an "apprentice"), and Lamb wrote him a very good letter, part of which follows:

"I do not wish to deter you from making a friend, a true friend; and such a friendship, where the parties are not blind to each other's faults, is very useful and valuable. I perceive a tendency in you to this error, Robert. I know you have chosen to take up an high opinion of my moral worth, but I say it before God, and I do not lie, you are mistaken in me. I could not bear to lay open all my failings to you, for the sentiment of shame would be too pungent. Let this be an example to you. Robert, friends fall off; friends mistake us; they change; they grow unlike us; they go away; they die; but God is everlasting and incapable of change, and to him we may look with cheerful, unpresumptuous hope, while we discharge the duties of life in situations more untowardly than yours. You complain of the impossibility of improving yourself, but be assured that the opportunity of improvement lies more in the mind than in the situation. Humble yourself before God, cast out the selfish principle, wait in patience, do good in every way you can to all sorts of people, never be easy to neglect a duty, tho' a small one, praise God for all, and see his hand in all things, and he will in time raise you up many friends—or be himself instead an unchanging friend. God bless you.—C. LAMB."

¹ CHARLES LAMB AND THE LLOYDS. Comprising Newly-discovered Letters of Charles Lamb, Samuel Taylor Coleridge, the Lloyds, etc. Edited by E. V. Lucas. Philadelphia: J. B. Lippincott Co.

Again, Robert wrote, somewhat complainingly—saying among other things, that he did not like to go to meeting, especially when it was silent. (Meetings then were held long, and to young people they doubtless often were irksome.) Charles Lamb replied at length, and part of the letter follows:

"I am sadly sorry that you are relapsing into your old complaining strain. I wish I could adapt my consolations to your disease, but, alas! I have none to offer which your own mind, and the suggestions of books, cannot better supply. Are you the first whose situation hath not been exactly squared to his ideas? or rather, will you find me that man who does not complain of the one thing wanting? That thing obtained, another wish will start up. While this eternal craving of the mind keeps up its eternal hunger, no feast that my palate knows of will satisfy that hunger till we come to drink the new wine (whatever it be) in the Kingdom of the Father. See what trifles disquiet us. You are unhappy because your parents expect you to attend meetings. I don't know much of Quakers' meetings, but I believe I may moderately reckon them to take up the space of six hours in the week. Six hours to please your parents—and that time not absolutely lost. Your mind remains; you may think, and plan, remember, and foresee, and do all human acts of mind sitting as well as walking. You are quiet at meeting; one likes to be so sometimes; you may advantageously crowd your day's devotions into that space. Nothing you see or hear there can be unfavorable to it—you are for that time at least exempt from the counting-house, and your parents cannot chide you there; surely at so small expense you cannot grudge to observe the Fifth Commandment. I decidedly consider your refusal as a breach of that God-descended precept—Honor and observe thy parents in all lawful things. Silent worship cannot be unlawful; there is no idolatry, no invocation of saints, no bowing before the consecrated wafer in all this, nothing which a wise man would refuse, or a good man fear to do. . . . I know that if my parents were to live again, I would do more things to please them than merely sitting still six hours in a week. Perhaps I enlarge too much on this affair, but indeed your objection seems to me ridiculous, and involving in it a principle of frivolous and vexatious resistance.

"You have often borne with my freedoms, bear with me once more in this. If I did not love you, I should not trouble myself whether you went to meeting or not—whether you conformed or not (to) the will of your father.

"I am now called off to dinner before one o'clock; being a holyday, we dine early, for Mary and me have to have a long walk afterwards. My kindest remembrance to Charles. God give him all joy and quiet. Mary sends her love.

"C. L."

And here is one more letter to Robert, a short one, and a delightful example of Lamb's characteristic style:

"My Dear Robert: One passage in your letter a little displeased me. The rest was nothing but kindness, which Robert's letters are ever brimful of. You say that 'this world to you seems drain'd of all its sweets!' At first I had hoped you only meant to insinuate the high price of sugar! but I am afraid you meant more. O, Robert! I don't know what you call sweet. Honey and the honeycomb, roses and violets, are yet in the earth. The sun and moon yet reign in Heaven, and the lesser lights keep up their twinklings. Meats and drinks, sweet sights and sweet smells, a country walk, spring and autumn, follies and repentance, quarrels and reconciliements, have all a sweetness by turns. Good humor and good nature, friends at home that love you, and friends abroad that miss you, you possess all these things, and more innumerable, and these are all sweet things. . . . You may extract honey from everything; do not go a-gathering after gall. The bees are wiser in their generation than the race of sonnet-writers and complainers, Bowles's and Charlotte Smiths, and all that tribe, who can see no joys but what are past, and fill people's heads with notions of the unsatisfying nature of earthly comforts. I assure you I find this world a very pretty place. My kind love to all your sisters and to Thomas—he never writes to me—and tell Susanna I forgive her. C. LAMB.

"London, the 13th November, 1798."

Robert Lloyd died young,—at thirty-three, in 1811. He left four children; Charles Lamb wrote an obituary notice of him in the Gentleman's Magazine. He had remained a Friend; his wife, to whom he was married in the meeting-house at Castle Donnington, in Leicestershire, was Hannah Hart, of Nottingham. Her tribute to her husband's memory is given in this volume.

We can only add to this extended notice that to those interested in the literature that gathers around Charles Lamb and his associates, especially Coleridge, this is quite a notable book, edited with good taste, and not padded with unnecessary material. It is a handsome book, also.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 8.—SECOND MONTH 19.

THE CANAANITES.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I am inquired of by them that asked not for me; I am found of them that sought me not: I said, Behold me, behold me; unto a nation that was not called by my name.—Isaiah lxxv., 1.

Scripture Reading.—Genesis, xiv. Amos i., 3–15.

It was not merely the spray of the desert tribes that fell upon the hills and valleys on either side of Jordan. As we have seen, the pressure of conquest, of increasing population, or perhaps of the unconquered impulse to wander, drove, now and again, family groups of the Semites of Chaldea to seek new homes in the west. The emigration of Abraham was not the first of its kind. Many of the peoples whom he found in Canaan represented similar invasions of an earlier date.

The Phœnicians of the sea shore, afterwards the great traders and colonizers of the world, were doubtless such a people, as were also the Canaanites of the plains. Such, probably, also were many of the peoples whose lands were promised to Abraham (Genesis, xv., 18–21). As has been indicated in a previous lesson, there was no national life possible for such an aggregation of tribes as inhabited Palestine. Such government as they had centered about the cities or larger towns. There being no union or coherence among these local governments, the land was open to easy conquest, and it was conquered again and again in the contests for supremacy by the great nations on either hand. It was conquered by the Chaldeans, by the Hittites, by the Egyptians, by the Babylonians, by the Assyrians, as well as in more recent times by Persians, Macedonians, Romans, and Turks. The conquerors usually put governors over the larger cities, and exacted a tribute without changing the social conditions.

It was among such groups of more or less related peoples that Abraham and his band made their way. We are told that after a short stay, he was driven by press of famine into Egypt, but soon returned to Palestine. There is some reason to believe that at this time the land was under the authority of a king of Chaldea or of Elam.

One of the clay tablets speaks of a king of the eastern country as "King of the Amorites." Now the Amorites were a people of Palestine and the time of this king was from 2241-2216 B. C. This fact becomes of immense interest in view of the story of the kings of the east in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis. We read there that certain kings of the east, "Arioch, king of Ellasar, Chedorlaomar, king of Elam, and Tidal, king of the Goriim (translated 'nations' in the authorized version), made war with Bera, king of Sodom; and with Birsha, king of Gomorrah; Shinab, king of Admah; and Shemeber, king of the Zeboiim, and the king of Bela." These local chiefs of cities, called kings, had been subjected to the king of Elam, and now revolted. The rebels were defeated, and the victors retired with many prisoners and with much booty. But among the former was Lot, the nephew of Abraham, who had made choice of the fertile country about Sodom. So Abraham went speedily to the rescue of his kinsman, defeated a portion of the invading army, and brought back both prisoners and the spoiler.

The names of these kings of the east are of much interest, since records of them all for many centuries are among the treasures recovered by the spade of the eastern explorer. Among these names are those of Eri-Aku of Larsa (Arioch of Ellasar), Hammurabi of Babylon (Amraphel of Sumer or Shinar, which is southern Babylonia). Chedor-Laomer was not for a long time identified, but in October, 1896, Father Scheil announced that he had found in the collections at Constantinople a dispatch written by Hammurabi (Amraphel) as follows: "On the day on which Kundur-luggamar shall allow thee to return unharmed when the goddesses of Emutbal are angry with the god thy creator, destroy thou the warriors (of the enemy) with the warriors which are in thy hand." "Kudur-luggamal" is also mentioned in one of the tablets of the collection in the British Museum. Another fragment in the British Museum mentions "Tudhkhula son of Gazza," who is undoubtedly Tidal (properly Tidghal), king of Goriim." (From a private letter from Professor Rogers Drew, of Drew Theological Seminary). So it seems that this ancient story is not mere legend, as has been claimed, but has a solid basis in history and gives substantial outside evidence of the historic credulity of the Bible narrative concerning Abraham. There is reason to believe that this chapter is not from the same sources as is most of Genesis, but of very ancient, perhaps Babylonian, origin.

But another incident is related of the battle of the eastern kings. On Abraham's return with the booty he is met by "Melchizedek, king of Salem," "the priest of the most high God." This mysterious personage has been made the focal point of much speculation. It has been even suggested that he was an earlier appearance of the Christ. Again we are enlightened by the wonderful clay tablet of record left by the ancient east. But this time the enlightenment comes from Egypt. At a time somewhat later than this, Palestine was conquered by, and paid tribute to, Egypt. The king of Egypt was of Assyrian descent on his mother's side, and he made use of that language, which indeed was quite general as a written language, in his official communications. These official documents have been discovered by the hundreds in the ruins of his capital at Tel el Amarna. Among them is one from a king of Jerusalem, one Ebed-tob. From the wording of the letter we are led to understand, moreover, that he was a priest king. The word Jerusalem is a compound word, Uru, meaning "city," and Salim being the god of peace. We have then the fact that some centuries after Abram there was a priest king in Jerusalem, the city being called by that name. It is not difficult, then, to understand that there may easily have been a priest king there at this earlier period, and that Abraham may have recognized his priestly office and joined in his sacrifice.

Of the Canaanites in general, it is said, "Their religion was the worship of male and female divinities, Baal and Ashtoreth; it was accompanied by the most degrading and licentious rites, which tended to completely undermine the social and moral integrity of its devotees." (Kent: History of the Hebrews.) Some other tribal gods were worshipped among the different clans, as Chemosh, the God of the Moabites (I. Kings, xi., 7), and Molech, the god of the Ammonites (I. Kings, xi., 7). Among other religious rites, that of human sacrifice was not uncommon, and in the story of Abraham's intended offering of Isaac, we see that he was not unaffected by the influences of the people about him. But we see also that his mind continued open to higher influences, and he was saved, by minding the Light, from a degraded and superstitious rite. Although he felt the effect of corrupt associations he resisted them, with the aid of the Almighty, and we see no evidence that he was permanently affected by these surroundings. Later we will see that his descendants were less self-controlled, falling away again and again into idolatry; but again and again called back to Jehovah, who desired righteousness and not sacrifice, by the stern voices of the prophets.

MAKE life a garden spot with a hedge of roses round your little place of peace. . . . So will the rough ground be made smooth for whoever passes that way.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 8.—SECOND MONTH 19.

THE FIVE THOUSAND FED.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I am the bread of life.—John, vi., 35.

Read the Scripture, John, vi., 1-14.

REVISED VERSION.

The fourteen verses assigned by the "International" committee for to-day's lesson are those in John's gospel, which describe the wonderful feeding of the multitude with five barley loaves and two fishes. This event is recorded by the other three Gospel writers,—by Matthew (xiii., 21) who says (v. xxi) that "they that did eat were about five thousand men, beside women and children;" by Mark (vi., 30-44), who says (v. 44) that "they that ate the loaves were five thousand men"; and by Luke (ix., 10-17), who says (v. 14) that they—the multitude—"were about five thousand men."

The four accounts vary in details,—illustrating the danger of ascribing verbal infallibility to the scriptural record as we now have it,—but the general purport is the same.

The time of the event is presumed to have been in the spring of the year 29, A. D., the month commonly called April. It was near the festival of the Passover, which as said in the scripture cited (v. 4) was "at hand,"—and there were large companies of Jewish pilgrims on their way up to Jerusalem. The event described in the last lesson, the declaration by Jesus to his opposers at Jerusalem of the divine authority with which he was invested, was a full year past. In the meantime Jesus had made three circuits through Galilee, and one across the Lake of Galilee (or Sea of Tiberius) to Gadara (or Gerasa), returning each time to Capernaum, his usual abode. John the Baptist had recently been put to death by Herod, and the word had been brought to Jesus, who withdrew "in a boat" to the other side of the lake, to escape the "multitude," who pressed upon him "because they beheld the signs which he did on them that were sick."

The place, Bethsaida, where the multitude were thus fed, as the account says, is one of those of Palestine whose location cannot now be positively identified. It was certainly on, or very near, the Lake (Galilee), and it had its "desert place," where the multitude, following Jesus, as recorded in the Gospel of Matthew (xiv., 13), sat down on the grass. The desert place is also mentioned in Luke, in the account of the Feeding, (ix., 12), and was evidently a familiar feature of the neighborhood of Bethsaida. From the different evidences, competent writers upon Palestine, including W. M. Thompson ("The Land and the Book"), have believed that Bethsaida was on the northern shore of the Lake, near the place where the Jordan now flows in. The "city of Andrew and Peter" (John, i., 44) was certainly a town where fishermen such as they would live, and it therefore was not distant from the Lake,—in whose waters fish are wonderfully abundant.

The miraculous increase of the food, the five loaves and two fishes, into a quantity sufficient to feed five thousand people, and then leave twelve baskets of "broken pieces," is something quite beyond our comprehension, because beyond our experience, and the possibilities of the physical laws with which we are acquainted. That it is not beyond the power of Omnipotence, exercised by or through whom may be appointed by him is, of course, affirmed by the very name which we give to God in this instance, the Omnipotent, the All-Powerful One. It is past question that he can and does bless the little, and make it much, that he feeds his children, whether five thousand in a grassy place on the bank of an Asiatic lake, or many thousands scattered here and there, the world over. To all his trusting children he gives bread "convenient" and suitable for them.

The lesson should be read in connection with the closing verses of the chapter, in which occur (v. 35) the words of the Golden Text. The whole drift and purport of the declarations of Jesus, from the 22d to the 65th verse, is a spiritual one. It is the bread of God, coming down from heaven, he says (v. 33) that gives life to the world. "As the living Father sent me," he says (v. 57) "and I live because of the Father, so he that eateth me, he also shall live because of me." And when those about him, taking this in the literal and outward, called it "a hard saying," he answered them (v. 63): "It is the spirit that quickeneth; the flesh profiteth nothing: the words that I have spoken unto you are spirit and are life." He did not suggest to them to feed upon his corporal body, but upon the spiritual food which God, who had sent him, had made the Christ in him to be.

DR. PLINY EARLE.¹

¹ This review is from the Christian Register, Boston. Dr. Pliny Earle was the brother of Thomas Earle, of Philadelphia, and uncle to George H. Earle, (the elder), and Phoebe Earle Gibbons. The book reviewed is "Memoirs of Pliny Earle, M. D., with Extracts from his Diaries and Letters (1830-92) and Selections from his Professional Writings (1839-91)." Edited, with a general introduction, by F. B. Sanborn, of Concord, former chairman of the Board of State Charities of Massachusetts, and Inspector of Charities. Boston: Damrell & Upham.

THESE memoirs have a double—we might say, perhaps, a triple—interest. In the first place, they interest us as the story of a philanthropic life, engaged with one of the saddest problems,—the treatment of insane people. If the book were only this, it would amply justify itself; but, in the second place, Pliny Earle was a very interesting character,—a man who traveled much and had his eyes open to all that was going on, and could write of what he saw and heard in an attractive manner. If Mr. Sanborn's book only gave us Pliny Earle, the traveler and note-taker on society, it would justify itself without any deeper implication. But, over and above this double value, we have something which is entirely Mr. Sanborn's contribution, his knowledge of the times and men of Dr. Earle's period.

Of Dr. Earle as an alienist he speaks as one having authority. An instructive introduction gives an account of the progress made in this country in the treatment of the insane, and relates Dr. Earle's work to that progress. It is terrible to think how brutal some of the reforms have been,—hardly less so, if any, than the things reformed. Dr. Rush, of Philadelphia, for example, was a great reformer in his day. Like the more famous Pinel, whom Couthon, the associate of Robespierre, commissioned to unchain the inmates of the Parisian asylums, he approved of moral treatment, which consisted of “the tranquillizing chair,” privation of food, pouring cold water in the coat-sleeves, and the shower-bath for fifteen or twenty minutes. To these items we should add “the fear of death”; and they were all supplemental to bleeding, which was Dr. Rush’s great specific. We have a description of the “tranquillizing chair,” which suggests to us, as it did to Dr. Earle, a wonder whether the clanking chains were worse.

To Dr. Rush succeeded a generation of alienists, whose success was less owing to any improvement on his methods than to their broad intelligence and mother wit. Mr. Sanborn began his own inspection of insane asylums in 1863, and from that time on he speaks with a clearer accent of authority than before. Whatever the method of treatment, insanity increased amazingly in the community; and then came the era of big, showy hospitals and asylums,—in part the evil fruit of Miss Dix’s good tree, on which, and on her who planted it, Mr. Sanborn has several important pages in one of his later chapters. The political bias was extremely favorable to the big, showy asylums, and officered them too often with men of more thrift than knowledge and humanity. Some of Dr. Earle’s best work was done in opposition to such asylums. The one at Danvers, which cost $1,800,000, received some downright blows. He thought two hundred patients enough to be brought together under one roof, but conceded two hundred and fifty as a maximum. His method of treatment was distinctly moral, and work was his great moral instrument. At Northampton he made a very great saving in money by the work of the inmates, but a greater saving of their comfort and general advantage. Concurrent with the multiplying of large asylums was the propagation of the fallacy that insanity is easily and generally curable. To this fallacy Dr. Earle opposed himself with great vigor and intelligence. In his later years he took a more sympathetic interest in the Scotch system of local insolation than he did when it was first urged on his attention.

Getting his medical education in Philadelphia and concluding it in 1837, he soon after went to Europe; and there his interest in his life-work took definite form, and he saw much of the insane asylums in different countries. A small Quaker establishment first roused his interest, and it was a small Quaker establishment that was afterward in Philadelphia the scene of his first labors and experiments. In Paris he saw the horrible application of the douche by the son of the famous Pinel and other alienists, and thus early became suspicious of such “moral treatment.” From Philadelphia he went in 1844 to New York, where he took charge of the Bloomingdale Asylum. At that time there were only seven hundred and fifty-one patients in the State of New York. There are now twenty-two thousand. He remained at Bloomingdale five years, and then resigned,—why we are not informed. For the next fifteen years he was a stone fitter for the wall than any other alienist in America, and yet, strangely enough, left in the way. Much of the time he was a rolling stone; but, if he gathered no moss, he gathered much of various information, both as concerning his special business and the general world. He was never at any time one of the “moss-back” kind. He went to Europe, and visited many asylums, writing an elaborate book on those of Germany. He went to Cuba, to South Carolina, to Washington many times, seeing many people of distinction, and taking part in many functions of greater or less importance. He had some personal acquaintance with nearly all the fifteen Presidents, from Van Buren to the second Harrison. Of Quaker stock, his mother a sister of Arnold Buffum, one of Garrison’s right-hand men, in England both his Quakerism and his anti-slavery associations gave him the freedom of the Gurney family and its related tribes. His own anti-slavery was less pronounced than that of other members of his family. His brother Thomas was a candidate for Vice-President on the first Liberty Party ticket in 1840, before that man-child had a name.

In 1864 he came into his own again,—the charge of the Northampton Asylum. There he remained until 1885, handicapped with many weights, and yet carrying out many of his principles in a satisfactory manner. Born in the annus mirabilis 1809, December 31, two days after Gladstone, he died May 17, 1892. His home was always Leicester, Mass. There he was born; there he lived in the long years of his professional inaction, working at his magnum opus,—the “Earle Genealogy.” Thither his heart went back when his feet were tied to his Northampton or some other post. There for a neighbor he had Samuel May, whose reminiscences concerning him are a valuable addition to Mr. Sanborn’s appendix. He gave $6,000 to the town for the erection of a public library, which, since its erection, together with certain of the saints in different quarters of the world, has been Mr. May’s peculiar care. Dr. Earle’s opinion that insane people are not unhappier than others, is comforting. He strikes hard at the too common habit of regarding the insane as proper objects of vulgar curiosity.

ONLY when our young people grow old are they able to see things right, to disentangle confusions, and judge righteous judgment. Things which at the time appeared insignificant or wearisome, then give out the light that was in them, show their own truth, interest, and influence. They are far enough off to be seen. It is not when we are nearest to anything that we know best what it is.—George Macdonald.

OH deem not they are blest alone
Whose lives a peaceful tenor keep;
The Power who pities man hath shown
A blessing for the eyes that weep.—Bryant.

THE ideal which the wife and mother makes for herself, the manner in which she understands duty and life, contain the fate of the community.—Amiel.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 11, 1899.

SELF-GOVERNMENT.

It is a curious circumstance to find many persons, in this country of democratic principles, apparently committing themselves, under pressure of conditions which must be temporary, to doctrines which deny the right of people and nations to form their own government,—which assert, on the contrary, that in any given case self-government may be permitted or may be denied by a foreign power, at its own will.

There have been, as we all know, and indeed there can be, but two general conditions as to government: it must be home-formed, or foreign-imposed. Communities have either provided their own systems of order, or they have been forcibly brought under the yoke of other communities. That there has always been, in the latter process, cruelty and hardship, is a commonplace of history which every one knows; it may be added, with equal truth, that while the cruelty and the oppression have been greater in some cases than in others, there are few if any where the nation that "conquered" did not use its strength to the injury of those whom it overcame. This may be denied, perhaps, but a candid inquiry, conducted along the lines which George Fox or John Woolman would lay down, will leave little chance of success to the denial. President McKinley, in his message to Congress, in the Twelfth month, 1897, stated the futility of such argument. "I speak not of forcible annexation," he said, "because that is not to be thought of. Under our code of morality, it would be criminal aggression."

It is true, also, that no people on the face of the earth have failed to provide themselves, when not brought under the rule of others, with some definite form of self-government. These forms were often crude and rude, yet we have many examples, on the contrary, of elaborate social and political systems, which well served the purpose of those who adopted them. The Indians of this country illustrate this, and there is a passage in Parkman, in which he says that our communities of modern times do not show greater order or security than usually prevailed within an Indian town. The confederacy of the tribes of New York, the "Five Nations," formed by the influence of Hiawatha, was in no essential particular of statesmanship or utility inferior to other such organizations which have become famous in the pages of history.

If we look at other men as brethren, not as "aliens," and "foreigners," and "enemies," we shall not find it difficult to perceive in them qualities like our own, and capacities which if not the same as ours, may very probably serve in large measure the same purpose. It is certain that the development of these capacities in them is the end to be sought. No community can walk alone, except by developing in itself the power to walk. This is a power not conferred but evolved, and the process must begin at the beginning. Nations learn to do by doing, and unless they do they are not learning.

There is in the discussion of this question, as in every other where principle is brought to sacrifice, much misrepresentation, much ignoring of truth. The effort is to make it appear that other people are "unfit for freedom," or "incapable of self-government." These averments are on their face spurious. When he stood as the opponent of slavery, Abraham Lincoln said, "no man was ever created good enough to own another," and it may be added, as Senator Hoar has done, that "no nation was ever created good enough to own another." In this, as in every other question where vital principles are involved, we are bound to stand fast on the rock of truth.

THE Canadian reception of the Russian refugees has been most cordial, and we observe that a number of the "Conservative" journals are quoted, who speak kindly of them,—thus tending to offset the impression we had, and which we expressed in a paragraph last week, that some of them were inclined to raise objections to the new comers. A religious journal, the Wesleyan, of Halifax, says that "since the voluntary expatriation of the Pilgrim Fathers and their memorable landing from the Mayflower, on Plymouth Rock, there has not been a more genuine instance of exile for conscience, sake than that of the Doukhobors, or a more touching scene than that witnessed at Halifax and St. John."

MARRIAGES.

JENKS—WATSON.—In Philadelphia, First month 30, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, in the presence of the Mayor, Charles F. Warwick, Howard Jenks, of Byberry, and Adelle, daughter of Howard Watson, of Horsham, Pa.

DEATHS.

BROOMELL.—At Chicago, Ill., Second month 2, 1899, of typhoid fever, George D. Broomell, Jr., aged 28 years, second son of George D. and Ellen C. Broomell.

BROWN.—Mary C. Brown, wife of Nathaniel D. Brown, and daughter of the late Harrison Cornell, died Fifth month 5, 1898; an esteemed Elder of Cornwall Monthly Meeting: aged 74 years and 14 days.

CARTER.—At her home, near Clearbrook, Frederick county, Va., First month 30, 1899, Sarah Elizabeth, daughter of the late Joseph C. and Elizabeth (Lupton) Carter, in the 79th year of her age.

Although she never became a member of any religious organization, she was for many years a subscriber and interested reader of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER.

She was sent (through the influence of her mother, who was, in her day, a valued member of the Society of Friends), to Spring Dale Boarding School, when in charge of Samuel M. Janney, and she always valued the principles and testimonies of Friends.

Interment at Hopewell Friends' grave-yard.

D. W. B.

EVANS.—At Hatboro, Pa., First month 26, 1889, Elizabeth L., wife of Dr. I. N. Evans.

Interment at Horsham Friends' ground, on the 30th. At the funeral gathering at the home, David Newport and Nathaniel Richardson spoke, and bore testimony to her many virtues.

FOULKE.—In Philadelphia, Second month 3, 1899, Elizabeth C., daughter of Dr. Joseph and Caroline C. Foulke. Interment at Buckingham, Pa.

GARRETT.—In West Philadelphia, First month 28, 1899, Elizabeth S., daughter of the late William Garrett, aged 35 years.

Interment at New London, Pa.

HARVEY.—Suddenly, First month 27, 1899, at her residence near Columbus, N. J., Abbie S., wife of Amos E. Harvey, in the 54th year of her age; a member of Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting.

She was a member of Mansfield Friends' Association, and attended one of the meetings the evening before her death; retired in her usual health about 10.30, but at 3 o'clock in the morning she had passed away, without ever waking. "Hemorrhage of the brain," the attending physician pronounced it.

She was a conscientious attender of our little meeting and First-day School; a faithful wife, loving mother, devoted, self-sacrificing sister; and well-beloved by a large circle of friends, who deeply mourn her loss.

Her funeral, on the 30th ult., was largely attended, and loving tributes were rendered to her memory. The words of one who was present were especially fitting and appropriate: "None knew her but to love her, none named her but to praise."

Though bowed with grief we must control,
Though loving friends for her will weep,
These words may comfort and console,
"He giveth his beloved sleep."
The peace upon her face expressed
We'll ever in our memory keep,
We feel, in truth, she is "at rest."
"He giveth his beloved sleep."

M. E. G.

MITCHELL.—In Philadelphia, First month 30, 1899, Emilie B., wife of Philip J. Mitchell, and daughter of the late Dr. J. Bernard and Sallie W. Brinton.

MITCHELL.—Second month 4, 1899, at Jenkintown, Pa., Mary Ann, widow of Pierson Mitchell, in her 83d year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. Interment at Abington.

ROBERTS.—First month 30, 1899, at Spring Mills, Montgomery county, Pa., Mary H., wife of Isaac Roberts, in her 81st year.

THORN.—At the home of his uncle, Walter J. Middleton, in Hainesport, N. J., First month 27, 1899, Benjamin H., son of Albert M. and the late Elizabeth Thorn, in his 21st year; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia.

WEAVER.—At the Clarendon Hotel, Washington, D. C., Twelfth month 27, 1898, Beulah A. Weaver, widow of the late Dr. J. J. Weaver, of Uniontown, Maryland, and daughter of the late Thomas P. and Deborah E. Clark, of Woodbury, New Jersey, aged 76 years.

In her youth she was a member of Woodbury Monthly Meeting.

SUSANNA MARIA WIERMAN.

Departed this life, First month 22, 1899, aged 83 years, Susanna M. Lundy, eldest daughter of Benjamin Lundy.

She was born at Zanesville, Ohio, in 1815, went to live with an uncle in New Jersey, was married in Adams county, Pa., in 1831, to William C. Wierman. In 1837 they removed to Putnam county, Illinois, and in their pioneer home, a house of logs, was held the first Friends' meeting in Illinois. In 1850 they made a new home on the open prairie, and in 1877 became pioneers in Western Kansas, she, with her son Isaac, returning to Clear Creek, Putnam county, in 1890. Six children were born to William and Susan Wierman, five living to adult age. Isaac P. Wierman is now the only survivor.

Susan Wierman was especially gifted with a bright mentality, and kept well versed in public affairs until her death. Much of her early education was received in her father's printing office, setting type for his newspaper, the Genius of Universal Emancipation, whose varying fortunes she followed from Philadelphia to Washington, D. C., to Cincinnati, and to Mt. Pleasant, Ohio.

Thus has passed away another of the few remaining philanthropic souls who figured prominently in the successful conflict with human slavery.

H. K. S.

Mt. Palatine, Ill.

SARAH ANN SHEPHERD.

At her home in Union Bridge, Md., First month 26, 1899, Sarah Ann Shepherd, in the 79th year of her age.

The subject of this notice was born near Lincoln, Loudoun county, Va., Eleventh month 24, 1820. Her father, Elisha Janney, belonged to one of the pioneer families of Friends in Loudoun county. Her mother was the daughter of William Smith.

When quite young she married William K. Hoge, and settled in Logan county, Ohio, where they lived about ten years, when her husband died, leaving her with two small children. For ten years or more, she courageously struggled on, prayerfully endeavoring to train her children in the right way.

In 1861 she married Solomon Shepherd of Union Bridge, Md. She was a life-long member of the Society of Friends, and a regular attender of the little meeting at Pipe Creek; was an elder for many years; a devoted and faithful wife, a kind and loving mother. Her advice and words of encouragement to those in trouble, impel them to rise up and call her "blessed." From childhood to old age she showed a remarkable love of flowers, and gathered them about her, like pets of the household.

On the 4th of Ninth month last, she fell and broke her right limb. After eight weeks of suffering, it was declared healed, and high hopes were entertained by her friends that she would be restored to her usually active, happy life. But alas! a partial paralysis of the brain prostrated her more than ever. From the first she expressed great doubt of recovery, but seemed resigned to the will of her Heavenly Father, exclaiming in the midst of her suffering, "Blessed be thy Holy name!" Later on, in her feeble attempts at conversation, she showed more anxiety to be released, but patiently awaited the time of her departure.

The loss to her family is irreparable. The meeting, the First-day School, the Temperance cause, the Farmers' Club, will all miss her practical, active work and influence. We trust that her reward is sure: "Well done, good and faithful servant, enter thou into the joy of thy Lord." W.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING

THIS was held at West Chester, Pa., on the 31st ultimo, with a good attendance, although the day was stormy, as is so frequently the case at this season. A good day is scarcely expected, and Friends cheerfully prepare to meet what comes, and enjoy the spiritual and social commingling, regardless of weather.

In the meeting for worship Ezra Fell, Allen Flitcraft, and Peter Smedley appeared in the ministry; and were followed by Margaret P. Howard, of Philadelphia Quarter, who spoke of the difference between the moral and the spiritual law. By careful and constant adherence to the former we gradually grow into the realization of the latter, and learn to recognize the Divine guide, which will be granted to all who earnestly ask it.

Mary Heald Way, of Western Quarter, spoke of the universal longing of mankind after the truth. We are told that the spiritual bread of the churches is doctrine. But just as the household bread may become totally unfit for food, just so may this spiritual bread become of no effect if it is not taken in faith and with earnest supplication. Of this true doctrine the first and best thing is love. "If a man love not his brother whom he hath seen, how can he love God whom he hath not seen?" No matter what may be said, the world is growing better. This is the day of the Christ, this day when the sword is drawn and put up again; when the people are waking to the fact that God is the Lord of nations. "This is a transition period and we are rapidly laying aside distinctions of creed. We no longer ask what is the church of a brother, but does he love God and does his life bear out his testimony." She closed with the solemn words of Jesus as he took leave of his disciples, "Peace I give unto you, my peace I leave with you."

This completed the exercises of the first meeting, which was followed by an interesting business session. The West Chester Friends had prepared lunch for all, and about 300 partook of their hospitality. The meeting was pronounced a good one.

In the second meeting the usual business was transacted, with the addition of the concern that was forwarded to the last Quarter from Swarthmore Monthly Meeting, relative to sending to the Czar of Russia some token of our appreciation of his effort on behalf of Peace. This concern having been referred to a committee, it was reported in the shape of a sympathetic letter to the Czar, which was approved, and directed to be forwarded to him, signed by both clerks of the quarterly meeting.

PURCHASE QUARTERLY MEETING.

This was held at Purchase, New York, on the 1st and 2d of Second month. In the meeting on Fourth-day, Tacie P. Willets appeared in supplication, expressing the desire that we might more often be led to read the Scriptures, and be willing not only to listen but to obey.

Joel Borton arose with the query, "Is the Christian law at variance with the moral law, and is there a difference between the moral law and the worldly law?" He clearly showed that the worldly law is one of selfishness, dominated by the pursuit of pleasure or gain, and differed widely from the moral law. The Christian law and moral law should be harmonious, but the moral was not complete without the Christian law. It was illustrated by the text "To do justly, and love mercy," which the moral law included, but the remainder of the text as well, "and walk humbly with thy God," was necessary to the fulfilment of the Christian law.

In the business meeting which followed, the usual business was transacted. The advices being read, called forth expression of the hope that they might not become meaningless to us, but their beauty and comprehensiveness be ever appreciated. They take the place of a "creed" in our Society, and it is necessary that they be read often, to revive them in our minds, that we may be the better able to live up to their high standard.

At the adjournment of the meeting luncheon was served, and in the afternoon a meeting of the Philanthropic Association was held. It was decided, after some discussion, to change the name to the Friends' Association, as being a broader term. The president, James Haviland, in his opening address, quoted the saying of a sage, "When we have nothing to say, silence is the eloquence of discretion," and he hoped to be eloquently discreet. In the course of his remarks, he said that all down the ages are lives which stand out as light-houses, warning of hidden dangers. Well is it for any people that they so live that those who follow them may derive an inspiration from their lives.

Elizabeth Hallock then read a paper on Mission Work, followed by a recitation by Harry Field, entitled "The Buttercup." A paper prepared by Luella Burdsall was then read, also an original contribution on bearing one another's burdens, by Lizzie Hall. After some discussion of the two papers, Henry W. Wilbur addressed the meeting. He said that this is an age of concentration,—of organized effort. Real missionary work is undermining the causes which produce evil, instead of tiding over evil. He then spoke briefly on the subject of peace and closed by saying that in the thought lie the issues of life. Make it the habit to think purely and divinely.

After a few remarks, the meeting closed with the feeling that it had been a profitable occasion.

On Fifth-day morning, at 9.30, the meeting of Ministers and Elders was held, and at 11 the meeting again assembled. After prayer by Joel Borton, Henry W. Wilbur arose with the words, "Forgetting those things which are behind, and reaching forth to those that are before, I press toward the mark of the prize of the high calling of God in Christ Jesus." He spoke of how much more is to be gained by looking forward than by regretting and mourning over the things of the past. We should keep the goal in sight and press on toward it, even though the progress may seem slow.

"Where is God to be found" is a question which has doubtless troubled many minds, and in answering it Joel Borton directed us to the works of nature, but said that above all He is to be found in our own hearts. We should learn to know him and appreciate the blessing which comes from a closer walk and communion with him.

The presence of a minister of another denomination was an evidence of the good feeling which exists in the community.

The desire was expressed that the spoken words might sink deep in our hearts, resulting not in higher ideals, but in better lives.

L. H. M.

Isaac Wilson has a prospect of attending the meeting at Wilmington, Del., on First-day next, 12th instant.

Isaac H. Hilborn expects to attend the religious meeting at 35th street and Lancaster Avenue, West Philadelphia, next First-day morning, at 11 o'clock. In the afternoon, he will give his interesting lecture, with illustrations, on "The Tabernacle." A cordial invitation is extended to all interested, to attend.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—VII.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

WERE it not for previous engagements and a willingness to divide our time with other Friends, we should be quite loth to leave such a comfortable home on such a blustery, cold morning to drive over the hills and frozen roads, but we do not suffer on the way, and ere long receive a warm welcome in the home of Jesse Hoge. And, as in other circles, we find more than the social nature to gratify, and utterance was given to words of encouragement and thankfulness for the cheerful, happy lives that we find, notwithstanding trials and sorrows that too often are allowed to crush rather than strengthen.

At the proper time in the afternoon I bade farewell to our Friends and made a short but pleasant call at Henry Janney's, enjoying a walk over the mountain and through the woods and fields, arriving at John Logan's only a few moments later than those who went around by carriage. Then we found ourselves in another of those old substantial structures, built in a former century but as comfortable and sound as many later buildings. Here we meet a number of Friends and neighbors, who have been invited in, and a portion of our time is spent in religious service that we trust was not unprofitable. Again we welcome the place of rest, and Seventh-day morning, (28th), appears quite storm-like, but we must again pass over the hills and rough roads, a drive of five or six miles, to Enoch Fenton's to dine, and enjoy the social visit, which was supplemented, as we often find them, by a season of quiet and words of counsel and encouragement.

From here we drive a short distance to David Birdsall's, with whom we had so frequently met, but not in their own home. Usually such a visit affords the best opportunity for a more favorable acquaintance, and this but confirms the rule. After a short but pleasant visit we return again with our escorts to their home, closing another week of almost constant going and visiting. Our hostess suffered from quite a severe cold, but her persevering nature was joined with zeal and interest in the object of our visit, and we have been favored with their helpful company thus far.

First-day morning the threatening of a storm has disappeared and we gather again at the meeting-house, and considering the roads and much sickness, a large company is found. At the close, as the farewells are said, there seemed but one feeling—that we had had a highly-favored meeting. After which we went to dine with Edward and Eliza Rawson, and spent a few hours in their pleasant home. Thence to John Smith's to tea, and a short but pleasant visit until 7 p. m., when we met an appointment in the Presbyterian church at Purcellville that resulted to satisfaction, so far as known. Returning again to our Virginia home until Second-day p. m., we went to Hamilton to take tea with Yardley Brown's family, then joined in a parlor meeting where we found an interesting company of Friends and others who had been invited in. All shared freely in a friendly interchange of thought on points of religious belief as received by our own society and others. Realizing this to be the last opportunity with our friends in a meeting capacity, we made our farewells and returned again with our host, A. B. Davis, to his home, where we were sorry to leave his good wife on this occasion on account of indisposition.

Third-day morning we found a white mantle covering the ground, the first since we came here, and some threatenings of gripe prevent us making some calls that had been contemplated, so we spend the day in quietly resting. On Fourth-day, feeling improved in health and the clear atmosphere (the mercury at six above zero), can but stimulate, and near noon we must leave for Washington, with the feeling of much thankfulness to the dear friends who have devoted their time (with team and carriage) almost exclusively for nearly three weeks in doing as faithfully and efficiently their part of the service as could be done. Their enjoyment, we trust, is not less than ours. We leave them feeling that our movements while here have been wisely directed, and go to spend a few days in Washington with our children.

I. W.

Washington, D. C., Second month 4.

INTERNATIONAL DISARMAMENT AND ARBITRATION.

THE Representative Committee of New York Yearly Meeting, at a meeting held at Fifteenth street and Rutherford Place, First month 27th, adopted the following minutes, which the clerks were directed to sign and forward to Emperor Nicholas and to President McKinley :

"The Representative Committee of the New York Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, in session in the city of New York, First month 27th, 1899, welcomes with much satisfaction the profoundly important declaration of the Czar of Russia in favor of International Disarmament, and his opportune proposal of an International Conference, to be held in Fifth month next, for its consideration. We are cheered and encouraged, also, by the gratifying announcement that the subject of International Arbitration will be included among the topics for discussion by the proposed conference.

"We hold that great armies and navies create and foster abnormal social conditions, as well as impose onerous economic burdens, which International Disarmament would greatly lessen. Especially important would be the restoration of millions of military men to an industrial, peaceful home life.

"We would express to the Czar our most grateful appreciation of the high and humane ideal which his message outlines, and our earnest hope that his proposal for an International Conference may be heartily welcomed and acted upon by the different nationalities addressed, our own included, and that it may do much to promote the blessed condition of peace on earth and good will among men."

CHARLES THOMPSON ON MILITARISM.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

OUR dear and venerable friend Charles Thompson, of Morland, Westmoreland, England, who has now attained four score years, in a recent letter, dated First month 22, referring to our new American militarism, writes :

"I notice with deep concern the struggle going on among you. I fear your people are heaping up for themselves trouble in future years. It is simply incredible to conceive the weight and variety of the evils which militarism brings upon any nation that yields to its advocates. Every nation in Europe (of any importance) should be at the present moment an object-lesson to yours to the consequence to which it inevitably leads."

Would that our friend's timely and suggestive admonition might be heard and heeded by the multitudes who, at the present critical juncture in our national life, so much need it. Those to whom he is known, and by whom he is beloved, on this side of the Atlantic, will regret to learn that latterly his strength has been very considerably impaired. Recently it has somewhat revived, though he is still quite infirm.

AARON M. POWELL.

New York, Second month 6.

FRIENDS AT VICTORIA, B. C.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I SHOULD be glad to have mention made of our little meeting, struggling along, away out on the shores of the great Pacific.

There is essential need of Friends' principles being advanced and practiced, especially by the English and American Friends gathered here, that have been deprived of the blessing attained in Friends' meetings for many years, perhaps whose children have also missed such meetings, as I know I did when coming here two years ago.

I look back lovingly upon the meeting in San Francisco, led by Barclay Smith, who was moved to utter words of comfort when my beloved mother, who was a Friend, was called to her eternal home.

Words cannot express my loneliness upon landing in Victoria; my great comfort was when First-day morning came, I felt pressed to sit in silence in my room with my little boy, and wait upon the Lord, at the same hour I knew the S. F. meeting was held, and listen to the still, small voice within. We met thus for three months, when I was led by the spirit to rent a room, with the feeling the Lord would in his good time fill it with his people. In looking up the scattered Friends, I found two families, the mothers of both delighted to join the meeting; the children no doubt had missed the meetings also, but had soon got used to not having any meeting to attend.

Enclosed find a copy of a letter from one who, after membership of thirty years in the Methodist church, expressed herself beautifully the reason of now joining the Friends; though she can meet with but four other professed Friends, yet more than a dozen attend that feel drawn very close to Friends' principles. If her letter could be published in the Friends' paper, it would be appreciated by one who feels she is young and needs the assistance to establish a Friends' meeting-house, where the Lord will ever reign, establishing his truths and his teachings, in which I ever wish to be found doing my duty.

F. E. SMITH.

Victoria, B. C., First month 26.

[The letter alluded to above follows.]

VICTORIA WEST, Nov. 28, 1898.

Dear Brother : I here tender my resignation as a member of the Methodist church.

My reason for so doing is that I may unite with the Society of Friends. They are a people very much endeared to me on account of my parents, and having been educated in childhood to Friends' principles, and since I have grown and matured in knowledge and understanding in the Holy Scriptures, I can see that Friends' principles, discipline, and practice are in accord with these Scriptures; their testimony and manner of worship are to my mind in demonstration of the Spirit. They are beloved for the Father's sake.

I shall ever feel in sympathy with the Methodist church, and my prayers and best wishes shall ever be for their welfare. I believe I am acting under the influence and will of my Heavenly Father. Yours in the Truth,

M. J. G.

HENRY R. RUSSELL AT SPRINGDALE.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

In the interesting sketch of the life of Henry R. Russell in the INTELLIGENCER of the 28th of First month, mention is made of his teaching at "Springdale Boarding School for Girls," near what is now Lincoln, Virginia; "founded by and under the management of Samuel M. Janney."

There is a slight error in this statement, which I, having been a pupil at that time, ask the privilege of correcting.

The "School for Girls" was founded by Samuel M. Janney in 1839, and conducted as such, by him, for a number of years; but in 1854, to meet the need felt by Friends of Fairfax Quarterly Meeting, and others, it was re-opened, under his management, as a school for both boys and girls, and continued under the new system, until its close a few years later.

As S. M. Janney was one of the earliest advocates of coeducation, and this, one of the first schools to adopt the plan, it is due his memory that his efforts in that direction should be acknowledged.

In reverting to those days, and the beginning of Henry R. Russell's work in that school, some thrilling experiences come to mind, and all "Springdale scholars" who were there at that time, have vivid recollections of the "stirring events" which were but the premonitory "mutterings" of the storm which broke upon us in 1860 and 1861.

In the spring of 1856, when political feeling on the slavery question was intense, a few of the pro-slavery citizens in that vicinity used their endeavors to arouse prejudice against the school and its managers, especially Francis H. Ray, of Chatham, N. Y., who had been a teacher there since its opening the year before, charging him with expressing "incendiary" sentiments at a small debating society organized by some of the young men of the neighborhood for mutual improvement, and with no political aim whatever. The simple fact of his being from a northern State, afforded sufficient pretext for their prejudice, and they persistently tried to "draw him out" on points "obnoxious" to their views. Although he stated his opinions in a moderate and dignified manner, trying to defend his position and ward off controversy, it was to no purpose. They misrepresented and condemned him, and strong and repeated threats of persecution being made against him, it was deemed best for his safety and the welfare of the school for him to leave the State. Arrangements were quietly made for a few of the older students, young men, to take him to the nearest station on the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, some miles distant. It was a sad time when the word was cautiously passed around one evening that they were to leave that night. All the household were up to bid them "good speed," and after tearful farewells they passed out into the darkness. The excitement was intense, but subdued, and, fearing that they might be intercepted on their way, not until his faithful attendants returned, and reported F. H. R. safe on the other side of the Potomac, did we breathe freely again.

Having been a popular teacher, and sympathy for him increasing our interest, his departure under such painful circumstances left us "disheartened," if not "dismayed," with the plans of the school unavoidably disarranged until a successor could be secured.

This successor was Henry R. Russell, whose task was not an enviable one, to take up the lines so sharply broken, and adjust them and himself to existing conditions. But he quietly assumed the responsibility and faithfully performing his duty, served the remainder of that school term, and resumed the position of teacher there the following year. A. M. S.

Waterford, Va.

THE will of Caroline L. Macy, who founded the Macy Memorial Art School in New York, bequeaths $200,000 to the New York Teachers' College, and $5,000 to the Presbyterian Hospital.

THE fifth centennial of the birth of Gutenberg, the inventor of the printing-press, will be celebrated at Mainz, on the Rhine, in 1900, and the elaborate plans for the event are already concluded with Teutonic completeness.

QUEEN VICTORIA has withheld her assent from the act lately passed by the Legislative Council of Jamaica, lowering the "age of protection" for girls from fourteen years to twelve, and the act accordingly fails to become a law. The Queen has a legal right of veto over all legislation in Great Britain and its colonies, but this right is rarely exercised.

DURING 1898 Carlyle's London house in Cheyne Row was visited by some two thousand enthusiasts. So far the number of visitors has quite justified its being turned into a kind of museum. During the three years it has been open nearly ten thousand persons have paid for admission. Americans formed a large proportion at first, but during last year they were less numerous.

A LAWN that had been several years since put down under ordinary mixed lawn grass seed, was brought to the writer's attention as the snow was departing in early spring. The different species of grass had had time to spread into patches several feet in width. These patches were of as many shades of color as a crazy-quilt might be. The time will come when Mr. Olcott's method of planting a lawn, by one kind of grass only, will be the only method of making a lawn capable of competing for a beauty prize.—Meehans' Monthly.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

NEWTOWN, PA.—A regular meeting of the Friends' Association of Newtown was held Fourth-day evening, Second month 1, at the home of Robert and Elizabeth S. Kenderdine.

Mabel R. Worstall opened the exercises by reading the Thirty-first Psalm, after which the minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

The nominating committee then presented the following names for officers and executive committee for the ensuing year: president, Willis G. Worstall; vice-presidents, Thaddeus S. Kenderdine, Ellie J. Burroughs; secretary, Martha Wilson; treasurer, Anna Worthington; executive committee, Elizabeth Palmer, Sarah Cary, Mary R. Davis, Lavinia Brown, Elisha Worthington. The nominations were approved. The question, "What can the Church do to help the Home?" was answered in a paper by R. Anna Reeder. She spoke of the late war, and the distress it had brought to so many homes, and seemed to feel that the church was not doing all in its power for the home, when the late struggle was sanctioned in so many pulpits. In conclusion she said: "While we are not unmindful of the beneficent aid of the Church to make homes happy, greater efforts should be made in a more fearless spirit to arouse public sentiment in favor of arbitration, and every method tried to put down that greater enemy of the home than war itself, the saloon."

Lloyd Wilson next read a paper on the life of George F. White, who was at one time a minister in the Society of Friends; some interesting remarks were made by some of the older members of the Association, who had heard him in this country. Evan T. Worthington, in answer to a question, told how many of the different nations observed their Sabbath, and expressed the thought that it was right to always carefully observe the Sabbath, though we do feel that every day is a holy day.

Agnes J. Ambler next read a beautiful selection from Whittier's "Snow-Bound."

Representing Current Topics, Genevieve A. Carter read an article showing some of the good resulting from the work done by the "New York State Charities Aid Society." John G. Brady, Governor of Alaska by appointment of President McKinley, was taken charge of when a boy, by one of their organizations; he is a man well fitted for the position he holds, having been a missionary and resident of the Territory many years.

Elizabeth G. Stapler then read an article from FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER giving the latest news of the Doukhobor Immigrants.

Sarah F. Cary related the story of Elizabeth Haddon, after whom Haddonfield, N. J., is named.

The executive committee then presented the program for the next meeting. Roll was called for sentiments, and the meeting adjourned to meet at the home of Oliver and Cynthia Holcomb, Third month 1. A. E. W.

FLEMING, PA.—Our Young Friends' Association meeting convened on the afternoon of Second month 5, in the meeting-house with but a small attendance, owing to sickness amongst the members. However, a very good meeting ensued, with the program carried out. It was opened by the president reading from the INTELLIGENCER a piece entitled "The Quiet Hour." We are glad to know that other religious organizations beside our own, are adopting the "Quiet Hour" plan to some extent, and are realizing benefit from it.

Roll-call was responded to by each member present telling how he thought we might make our Association more beneficial.

The "Efficacy of Prayer" from Young Friends' Review, was read by Bertha K. Cleaver, showing forth the true meaning of prayer. Florence N. Cleaver read from the proceedings of the Richmond Conference, Ellwood Trueblood's paper "Early and Modern Friends, their Methods and Service," which is a most edifying paper. It was followed by some general remarks as to the duties of us "Modern Friends." Activity on our part will denote life; inactivity, decline or death. A member of the M. E. Church being present, spoke of how much he had enjoyed the meeting, and how highly he respected Friends for what he knew of their past history, and expressed a desire to know more about us as a religious organization. This is evidence that an extension of the knowledge of our principles would be profitable. Many have received wrong impressions concerning us.

Vocal prayer was offered by Mary J. Fisher, after which she read from the INTELLIGENCER "The Burden and the Back," showing that the back must be fitted to the burden, instead of the burden to the back. The meeting closed in silence.

N. M. FISHER, Sec.

WILLISTOWN, PA.—The Young Friends' Association was held First month 25, at the home of David C. Windle. The meeting was opened by the president, David C. Windle, reading the 17th Psalm. After roll-call, minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved.

The deferred question, "Are we making history for our Society's future?" was answered by George H. Bartram. He said we are undoubtedly making a very important history. Our membership is increasing and we are actively engaged in philanthropic work, and in many ways showing signs of renewed life. An interesting discussion followed.

The topic, "Those who are called heretics only see the truth in a light far beyond those of their time," was assigned to Elizabeth B. Smedley, but in her absence the paper as prepared, was read by Anna P. Smedley. The writer thought no man had a right to charge another with heresy. "When there are almost as many interpretations in regard to the Christian religion as there are men and women, who profess to be followers of Christ, which of these interpretations shall be selected as the standard by which we shall judge a man's belief, whether it be heresy or the true doctrine?"

An interesting review of the book "Penelope," by Dr. Thomas, was given by Florence Windle. Three new names were added to the list of membership. A recitation, entitled "Abou Ben Adhem," was given by Alice Windle.

After a short period of silence the meeting adjourned to meet Second month 22, at the home of William P. Davis.

A. C. B., Sec.

HANCOCK'S BRIDGE, N. J.—It scarcely seems right to dignify our small monthly gathering here at Hancock's Bridge by the name of Association. There were not so many present as there are letters in the word at our last meeting, on the afternoon of First-day, the 29th ult., but we don't intend to give up yet.

After silence, our meeting was opened by the president reading a chapter from the Bible followed by roll-call, and the minutes of the last regular meeting. Eric Carlson read a poem entitled "The Winner of the Race." The concluding portion of the third chapter of President Sharpless's "A Quaker Experiment in Government," was read, and then the subject for the day's consideration, "Strange Ways in Which God Leads Us," was introduced by a short paper, written and read by the secretary. This was followed by Whittier's "The Call of the Christian," and a short story illustrating the topic, selected and read by Maggie M. Ridgway. "The Story of Bai Bureh" was read from the INTELLIGENCER.

It was decided that in place of the next regular meeting a social will be held at the home of the secretary, on Seventh-day evening, Second month 25. After silence, the meeting adjourned.

L. P.

THE town of Georgiana, Ala., refuses to allow liquor sold in it, rejecting an offer of $1,500 a year for the privilege of one saloon.

AN appeal, signed by F. F. Mackay, president of the Actors' Society of America, has been sent to the clergymen of New York City, asking them to assist in suppressing "Sunday theatrical performances."

MONT BLANC has always been regarded as a no-man's land, but the increasing use of it for shelter-huts, inns, hotels, restaurants, photographic establishments, etc., has raised the question of ownership. The lower slopes are divided among three different cantons, and there is some doubt as to the rights of taxation of property on the higher levels.

EDUCATIONAL.

GEORGE SCHOOL NOTES.

PROFESSOR Robert Rogers, of Madison, New Jersey, delivered two lectures of the course in First month. The subject of the first was, "The Oppression in Egypt"; of the second, "The Exodus." In this second lecture the speaker described most interestingly how the Israelites crossed the Red Sea in their flight from Egypt.

The following was the program of the Whittier Society, First month 28: An oration by Edith Michener, a recitation by Alice Jarrett, Current Events, Marion Rice. The paper, edited by Ethel Perdue, was read by Elsie Wallace. The question, Resolved, "That the United States is justifiable in her late dealings with Spain," was debated in the affirmative by Maurice Griest and Mary Fox, in the negative by Malcolm Farquhar and Frances Preston. A new feature in contests was the recent impromptu debate between the Senior girls' debating club and the "Union," a boys' club. The question, Resolved, "That on the whole, the United States has retrograded in civilization in 1898," was upheld in the affirmative by Frances Preston, Lida Gillingham, and Beulah Darby; in the negative by Marius John, Russell Hibbs, and Alfred Crewitt. The judges decided in favor of the negative.

John J. Cornell of Baltimore, visited Newtown and George School on the 21st and 22d of First month, speaking at Newtown First-day morning, and in the assembly-room of the school in the evening. His thought to the students was what constitutes a practical, every-day religious life.

Many of the students attended the Local Institute (public schools) in Newtown, on Seventh-day, 28th. Prominent among the exercises was an address by Prof. J. Russell Smith on "The Philippines"; he advanced the idea that it would be undesirable for the United States to hold the islands.

There was also a good representation from the school at the talk on Purity in Friends' meeting-house, by Professor F. H. Green, of West Chester, First-day, 29th.

Principal Maris recently addressed the Teachers' Institute at Ivyland, Bucks county, on the subject of Moral Education. The exercises of the Young Friends' Association Second month 4, were opened with a recitation by Alice Woodman. Brief outlines were given of the lives of John Woolman, Elias Hicks, Mary Dyer, Isaac Penington, and Lucretia Mott, also some interesting incident connected with the life of each. The paper read by Jenny Thomas consisted of a review of the principal topics recently discussed in the different Friends' Associations of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. A paper entitled "William Penn and his Times," written by a member of Baltimore Friends' Association, was read by Eliza H. Miller.

Among the events of special interest to occur during the present month are a lecture by Prof. Bliss Perry, on the 10th, subject, "Recent Story Writers"; on the 20th, a lecture on Birds, by Wm. L. Bailly; on the 24th, a lecture by Prof. R. E. Thompson, on the "Evolution of the Dwelling-House," and on the 25th a debate between the Penn and the Whittier Societies.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.—The monthly meeting of the Joseph Leidy Scientific Society was held on the 2d inst. in Science Hall. Reports were heard from the Departments of astronomy, physics, and biology. A paper, "Surface Markings on Mars, and the Probabilities of its being inhabited," was presented by Emma Halloway, 1902, and another, "Bone," by Walter H. Lippincott, '99. The half-year elections of the society resulted in the choosing of the following officers: president, Levis M. Booth, '99; vice-president, Roger B. Farquhar, 1900; secretary, Ada Underhill, 1901.

Many of the students attended the address delivered by Dr. Lyman Abbott at the New Century drawing-room, Philadelphia, on the 8th. On Fifth-day morning, Dr. Abbott addressed the students in Morning Collection.

'99.

CHILD DEVELOPMENT.—At the Philanthropic session, accompanying Westbury Quarterly Meeting, on Seventh-day afternoon, the 28th, there was a large attendance. Mary H.

Whitson, of Philadelphia, read an interesting and valuable paper upon "Child Development," and the subject was also effectively presented in a second paper, by Rachel W. Underhill, president of the Froebel Club, of Brooklyn. President Birdsall, of Swarthmore College, who was present, shared acceptably in the discussion following the papers. P.

LITERARY NOTES.

In the current number of the Review of Reviews the editor seeks to apply the lessons of our national failures in the South during the reconstruction period following the Civil War to the present problems of a similar nature in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines. His deductions are interesting and instructive. He says: "The true way to restore the South to the Union after the war was to restore the South to its own people." The same principle applies to-day in the new territories just coming under our control. The editor warns us against a new type of "carpet-bagger," who is threatening to invade Cuba—namely, the franchise-grabber.

There is quite a striking article in the North American Review, this month, on Tuberculosis, ("consumption") in the United States. The writer says: "The curability of pulmonary tuberculosis is demonstrated every day. The most frequent and most certain cures are obtained by the hygienic, dietetic, and educational treatment in sanatoria; that is to say, institutions where the open air treatment, the best food, and the thorough hygienic management constitute the main factors of therapeutics."

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

GOLDEN WEDDING.—A large number of friends and neighbors gathered at Chappaqua Mountain Institute, N. Y., on the 31st ult., to celebrate the fiftieth wedding anniversary of Charles and Sarah Robinson, who have been connected with the school for nineteen years. No death has yet occurred in their family, which now numbers five children, twenty-eight grand children, and one great grand child. Many congratulatory letters were received from friends at a distance, and several poems, inspired by the occasion, were read. [One of these is printed elsewhere.]

The students joined in paying a hearty tribute of affection to those who have done so much to make the school life a pleasant home life.

Aaron M. Powell has accepted an invitation to give a lecture on "Anti-Slavery Reformers," at Swarthmore College, on the evening of the 24th instant.

A friend in the interior of Pennsylvania, in connection with some consideration of other subjects, says: "I esteem the INTELLIGENCER above every other paper. It is a whole library of Friends' teaching and doctrine, of itself, and should be in the hands and the home of every person of Friendly feelings."

DOUKHOBOR NOTES.

THE number in the first party, by the Lake Huron, is stated as 2,084. Of these 908 were expected to go to Winnipeg, 460 to Brandon, 460 to Dauphin, and the remainder to Portage la Prairie, and this arrangement we understand was carried out.

A letter from W. F. McCreary, Commissioner of Immigration at Winnipeg, to the INTELLIGENCER, dated 1st inst., says: "I have mailed to you a parcel of Winnipeg dailies, from which you will see how hearty a reception the Doukhobors have received from this community. I am glad to say that they arrived in excellent health, and in good spirits, and their orderly, quiet demeanor, and scrupulous cleanliness, were the admiration of all. Over two thousand have now been housed here and at other points along the lines of rail. Arrangements are being made for the selection of their villages, and the building of their houses, and we expect by the time spring opens up these people will be all comfortably settled."

The Winnipeg Free Press, 27th and 28th ult., reports the arrival of the first party there and at the other points. The first train load reached Winnipeg at noon, on the 27th, just a week after arriving at Halifax. The passage by rail had been without special incident. There was great interest shown in them everywhere and at Winnipeg two thousand people had collected to see them arrive. A public meeting had been held on the evening of the 27th, to arrange to receive them, and the women of the city came and prepared food for them, which was furnished in the "Immigration Hall," and at the Dufferin School building.

The particulars most emphasized in all the reports are the stalwart figures, and robust appearance of the people, their kindly, quiet deportment and their cleanliness. J. M. McGovern, "who had been constantly on trains, amongst Galicians and other immigrants, described the Doukhobors as the cleanest and most orderly he had ever seen."

From expressions used in the reports, it appears that the Canadians sympathetic with this movement expect that there will be a movement, also, of Russian "Stundists" and other conscientious dissenters from the Greek Church, to Canada.

Joseph S. Elkinton, of Philadelphia, has returned from his trip to meet the Doukhobors.

TO CHARLES AND SARAH ROBINSON.

[Golden wedding, First month 31st, 1899.]

With fifty years between you and your well-kept wedding vow,
The Golden Age, dear friends of ours, is not a fable now.
And sweet as has life's vintage been through all your pleasant past,
Still, as at Cana's marriage-feast, the best wine is the last.

Fair falls on hills of Chappaqua, and all its pleasant ways,
The mellow sunset of your lives, friends of our earlier days.
May many more of quiet years be added to your sum,
And late, at last, in tenderest love, the beckoning angel come.

Dear hearts are here, dear hearts are there, alike below, above,
Our friends are now in either world, and love is sure of love.

[Taken from the letter from the Board of Managers of Chappaqua Mountain Institute.]

THE MOTHER HEART.

NOBODY sits in that little arm-chair;
It stands in a corner dim;
But a white-haired mother gazing there,
And yearningly thinking of him,
Sees through the dusk of long ago
The bloom on her boy's sweet face,
As he rocks so merrily to and fro,
With a laugh that cheers the place.

Sometimes he holds a book in his hand,
Sometimes a pencil and slate;
And the lesson is hard to understand,
And the figures hard to mate;
But she sees the nod of the father's head,
So proud of his little son,
And she hears the word so often said,
"No fear for our little one."

They were wonderful days, the dear, sweet days,
When a child with sunny hair
Was hers to scold, to kiss, and to praise,
At her knee in the little chair.
She lost him back in her busy years,
When the great world caught the man,
And he strode away past hopes and fears
To his place in the battle's van.

But now and then, in a wistful dream,
Like a picture out of date,
She sees a head with a golden gleam
Bent over a pencil and slate,
And she lives again the happy day,
The day of her young life's spring,
When the small arm-chair stood just in the way,
The centre of everything.

—Margaret E. Sangster, in Mail and Express.

THE DOUKHOBORS AT ST. JOHN.

Though we have printed a good deal about the Lake Huron Doukhobor party at Halifax and St. John, there are still many details in the dispatch of the St. John correspondent of the Toronto Globe which seem of interest, and we print the following extracts from it. The date was First month 23.

PROBABLY this city never saw such a sight before as when this afternoon the steamer Lake Huron with the Doukhobors on board, steamed slowly up to the Canadian Pacific Railway wharf on the western side of the harbor. The Doukhobors, that is, all who could find space, ranged along the upper decks, and, with heads uncovered, reverently sang their hymns of praise to God. The wharves were lined with thousands of people, who cheered and waved handkerchiefs to the Russian immigrants, and the latter, in acknowledging the salute, bent lowly to the deck, some even getting down on their knees and touching the deck with their foreheads. Two cannons in the harbor saluted the Lake Huron and her peculiar cargo, and the steamer replied by two shots from the stern of the vessel. Then came the tying-up of the Lake Huron, a few minutes after a new and a strange race of people, fleeing from their native land to escape persecution, had landed on our shores and were Canadians.

DRESS AND APPEARANCE.

The men are large and usually powerfully-built fellows, mostly young, there being only three or four old men in the party. They are dressed as one usually considers correct in the Russian peasant, long, heavy leather boots and a long cloth coat, usually of a blue or black pattern. This coat, however, is only the inner one, the outside coat being of sheepskin, with the wool inside, fastened around the waist by a leather band, and reaching to just above the knees. This coat gives them a very bulky and clumsy appearance, but some of the men wear even longer coats, which come as far as their feet. When a Doukhobor gets one of these on he looks like a perambulating mountain; but these coats are much in demand for bed coverings, in fact, that is one of the purposes for which they are uniformly intended. Every Doukhobor on the Lake Huron wears a fur cap, and this in all weathers. The little boys look like men cut down, the same stolid features, excepting the moustache, and the same costume, even to the fur caps. The women naturally have a fondness for bright colors, red, blue, yellow and pink, and sometimes all these colors are worked in their petticoats. They tie bright-colored cloths around their heads, which give them a very picturesque appearance. Coarse woolen knitted stockings, also in colors, and low shoes complete the visible costumes of the women, with the exception, of course, of the inevitable sheepskin coat, which, in the case of the women, has no band around the waist, that is all.

KINDLY AND POLITE.

The politeness of these people cannot be surpassed. Address one of the men, and he takes off his hat and makes a low bow. The little children are the same way, but some of them will look up and smile and say "Good morning," which is as much of the English language as they have yet conquered. Should a visitor to the steamer approach a group on the deck they will immediately separate to allow him to pass.

The Doukhobors live together in the utmost amity, and the officers of the Lake Huron say that not one harsh word was heard between any of them during the entire voyage. Nearly all the adults of the party are married, and it is said that it is very hard to find a Doukhobor girl of over twenty years unmarried. It was noticeable, however, that there were very few babies on board. Most of the young children seemed to be from three to four years of age. The explanation which those acquainted with the Doukhobors give is that some years ago, while they were being subjected to cruel persecution by the Russian Cossacks, the men and women made a vow that they would not bring children into the world to suffer the torment that they were then suffering, and most of them have kept that vow. But apparently they realize now that they are in a free country, for yesterday there were no less than eleven couples married. [The correspondent gives the names—characteristically Russian—of the newly married ones.]

SOME INDIVIDUALS OF THE COMPANY.

Among those on board the ship were Messrs. Joseph Elkinton of Philadelphia, and Job Gidley of North Portsmouth, Mass., representing the committee of the American Society of Friends. The latter two gentlemen are Quakers, and have the quaint costume and speech of these brethren. They have taken great interest in the Doukhobors, and, although both old men, braved a rough passage round from Halifax in order to be with them and help them on their way. There were two other friends of the Doukhobors on board who had risked their lives to be with the persecuted peasants. They were Alexis Bakunin, a Russian doctor, and a graduate of Moscow University, and Maria Cayz, a nurse. They will not be able to go back to Russia now, after having assisted the Doukhobors, and they would not have been allowed to leave the country had it been known what their mission was. As brother and sister they succeeded in reaching Constantinople, where they caught the steamer. Neither of them speaks English. Unfortunately, their services were again required on the trip round from Halifax, for there are seven more cases of sickness on board, a woman of 40, a man of 44, a girl of 23, a young man of 25, a little child and a brother and sister, the girl, aged 18, suffering from consumption, and the boy, aged 15, having an abscess in the head. The sister will never reach the promised land in the Canadian west, for the doctor says her death is certain. None of those sick are suffering from any infectious disease, but they are kept in the hospital here until they recover.

Nicolini, as he is known among the Doukhobors, is a great favorite. He is a young fellow about 30 years of age, and is perhaps the only one in the party who does not wear the fur cap. Nicolini came to America to try and arrange for the exodus of the Doukhobors, and when he wanted to go back was not allowed to land at Batoum. However, he waited for them at Constantinople, and was warmly welcomed on board. The great character on the vessel, though, is Leopold Soulergitzski, a short, thick-set Russian, apparently built on springs, and who talks all the time. In his own country Leopold is said to be a noble and a man of wealth. He is the friend of Count Tolstoy, and is in charge of this particular party of Doukhobors. A better choice could not have been made. Leopold has them all under perfect control, and he has only to order a thing and it is done.

SYSTEM AND ORGANIZATION.

The organization of this party was simply perfect. Men were detailed to look after the affairs of the immigrants, and day and night there was always somebody on duty. The lower decks were kept so clean that the officers of the vessel were simply astonished when the hatches were opened. There were no less than eight villages of Doukhobors on board, each in charge of their head men, and in settling them in the northwest none of the inhabitants of the different villages will be separated. The Doukhobors have their own cooks, but are anything apparently but heavy eaters. In the morning they take a kind of flat cake baked of flour and water, and salt potatoes and cake or bread made into a kind of soup forms their mid-day meal. This is simply placed in a pannikin, each family is allotted its portion, and they sit comfortably around and eat their meal. The bunks, which were built between the decks, were put up by the Doukhobors themselves with their own timber, and the latter is to be sold for their benefit in St. John. They have their own bedding with them, but very little of this was needed, as the Doukhobor merely spreads his great coat of sheepskin over him and goes to sleep.

THE HYMN ON BOARD.

As the ship neared the wharf, after the first salutes of welcome, there was silence for a moment, as the Doukhobors bared their heads and bowed towards the people on the wharf, and an instant later their voices were uplifted, and everybody was silent while the Doukhobors sang their psalm of praise. A translation of it was furnished me by Mr. Elkinton. It is entitled "God can carry us Through," and is as follows :

- "Know all men God is with us,
He has carried us through.
We uplift our voices and sing His praises ;
Let all people hear and join in our praise of the Almighty.
- "They that planned our ruin did not succeed."
We never feared them because God was with us and gave us strength.
Our Lord has strength to save us ; why should we fear ?
They that trust in Him are never forsaken.
They that do not know Him now shall know
Him hereafter.
The light shines in the darkness and will dispel it."

"Their songs," said Mr. Elkinton to me to-night, "seem to me to be a combination of the Psalms and the religion that has been handed down to them by their forefathers." After the singing of the Psalm all on deck prostrated themselves, the little children who were too small to do this being laid down face forward by their mothers.

"DIALECT."

The Independent.

THE wide popularity of Mr. Kipling's strong and magnetic slang poems, and the almost equally popular so-called "dialect poems" of Mr. Riley, may be accepted as the origin of the interesting discussion at present going on touching the true office of "dialect" in literary art. It is not our purpose to attempt a solution of the problem involved ; but it will be well if in our schools and colleges the youthful students of literature have their attention called to the true meaning of the word "dialect," and have their understanding fully enlightened as to what should be meant when we speak of a dialect in literature.

Of course the loose style somewhat indulged in by most of us, when not upon our best behavior, might be as well called dialect as the speech of carelessness or ignorance involuntarily adopted by rustics or other uneducated people. But a dialect is a variation of language not necessarily due to want of culture. In fact, where the variation is due solely to ignorance, it cannot be a literary dialect, for the reason that it will lack uniformity. Were it otherwise, we might discover almost as many dialects as there are neighborhoods in some of our rural regions.

Our schools and colleges should teach young men and women to know that mere vulgar incorrectness of pronunciation and phrasing cannot properly be called a dialect in the literary sense of the word. A dialect may be a perfect form of language adapted to the purest artistic use and for the expression of the highest ideals of the cultured imagination. Sappho used one Greek dialect, Homer another, Pindar and Theocritus still another ; but all wrote the language of the most refined art. There is no dialect of the English language, in the sense that Doric, Æolic, and Epic were Greek dialects.

We are not here questioning the right of our poets to use uncultivated and incorrect modes of speech in representing, dramatically or otherwise, the lives and actions of uncultivated people. To be sure they may have carried the thing beyond safe bounds, and there may be danger of a lesion to popular taste which will require years of correct training for its cure ; but what is certainly needed now, in the way of rectifying looseness in criticism, is a return to the well-marked lines of scholarly knowledge and a care for the best linguistic traditions.

CHIMNEY-SOOT is an obstruction to snails, and if placed thickly around hot-beds, will prevent them securing entrance.
—Meehans' Monthly.

THE $100,000 fund for the widow and daughter of the late Col. George E. Waring, of New York, has been completed. During their lifetime they will share the interest on the money. At their death the money is to be used for the creation and endowment of a chair in Columbia University, to be known as the Waring municipal chair, for the giving of instruction in municipal affairs.

Two ladies of West Grove, Pa., (says the Independent, of that borough), were discussing theological questions, both being members of the Presbyterian church, and upon getting further and further from the point of unity, one exclaimed : "There is no use of us endeavoring to agree, for you are a Methodist and I am a Quaker at heart, and we are both trying to be Presbyterians."

Conquered by Spain !

PROF. WILLIAM G. SUMNER, of Yale University, delivered a lecture on "The Conquest of the United States by Spain," in New Haven on the evening of the 16th ult. His conclusion was :

"My patriotism is of that kind which is outraged by the notion that the United States never was a great nation until in a petty three months' campaign it knocked to pieces a poor, decrepit, bankrupt, old state like Spain. To hold such an opinion as that is to abandon all American standards, and to put shame and scorn on all that our ancestors tried to build up here, and to go over to the standards of which Spain is a representative. The reason why I am opposed to expansion and imperialism is that I am not ready to throw away American notions and to accept those of Spain."

What Kind ?

WHAT kind of civilization are we going to give to the Philipines? asks the National Temperance Advocate. "Is it to be a Christian civilization or a liquor civilization? If one might judge from items in the daily press, it would appear to be the latter, the promoters of such are first in the field. If we mean to inaugurate a policy of sending to these islands five dollars' worth of whisky for one dollar's worth of Bibles as we have been doing with Africa, better by far Admiral Dewey's vessels had never sighted Manila, as we will only be making the poor natives ten times more the children of evil than they now are."

Manual Training for Indians.

I HAVE great faith, says C. M. Woodward, in an article on "Indian and Spanish Education," in the North American Review, "in manual training, to arouse and sustain an interest in school work on the part of the Indian youth and their parents, but it must be very simple and carefully chosen. The education that is to succeed must bear immediate fruit; its value must be at once apparent to the narrow-minded, selfish, and ignorant. The normal product of an Indian school must be an Indian still, but one who is both willing and able to raise the standard of working and living in an Indian community. The boys and the girls are to be trained, not to cease to be Indians, but to be better Indians."

Women and Municipal Taxes.

WHEN Louisiana adopted a new Constitution last year, she provided that tax-paying women might vote on all questions of taxation submitted to popular ballot. The city of New Orleans has now submitted a scheme for city sewerage and water-supply, and the women will exercise this right for the first time. It seems as if even the members of the "New England Society Opposed to the Extension of Suffrage to Women" ought to admit the justice of this, but there is not one city east of the Mississippi River where women are allowed any voice in the levy or distribution of their taxes.—[Ida H. Harper, in New York Sun.]

A "War Course" at Harvard.

IT is announced that a "new course in military and naval science will be given during the second half year at Harvard University." Lieutenant Smith, United States Navy, who is to be instructor, outlines the course as follows :

"The art of war, or the guiding principles by which military and naval forces are organized and employed to accomplish national objects, whether by the moral effect of their menace or by acts of violence. Its sub-divisions are: Strategy, which determines the general plan of campaign; logistics, which relates to the moving of armed bodies to places of their use, and tactics, which determines the method of employing forces in action. It will include the various branches of national defence, a description of ships and fortifications, weapons, the various kinds of ships and their uses, and coast defense."

Candor in English History.

JULIAN RALPH (in Harper's Magazine), discusses the school histories in use in England. Within a month, he says, I have come across a "School History of England" for boys of what we would call high-school age, and have been more than astonished at the manner in which the writer, Cunningham Geikie, treats the subjects which have so long remained open sores with us, largely because we have supposed that the English were either wilfully ignorant of the wrongs we suffered at their hands or at least were unrepentant.

I found that this history, one of a well-known series of school-books, condemns the policies of England's governments, at the times of our ruptures with them, more severely and in harsher language than I remember ever to have seen in an American school-book. After enumerating the burdens, just and unjust, which Grenville forced upon us, the historian goes on to declare the insanity of the King, and the illness of Pitt at a later date (1766). He says that the members of the government were ill fitted to take Pitt's place, and one especially, Charles Townshend, Chancellor of the Exchequer, "wanting in prudence and self-restraint, was destined to be the evil genius of England at this crisis."

Imperialism at Home.

AT the recent annual meeting of the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association, (First month, 25), the following resolution was adopted :

"Whereas it is admitted that the natives of our new possessions will be entitled to self-government as soon and as far as they are capable of it; and

"Whereas, if the natives were known to be as civilized, intelligent, and law-abiding as American women, there would be no question of their right and fitness to enter upon self-government at once; therefore,

"Resolved, That the principles that governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and that taxation without representation is tyranny, are as applicable to civilized women in Massachusetts as to half-civilized men in outlying territories; and that the exclusion of women is imperialism at home."

Bud Variations or "Sports."

OF late years, much has been learned of the manner in which nature works; but the amount of secrets which nature has carefully locked up is in vast proportion greater than the little scraps of knowledge we have been able to secure. Bud variation is one of those mysteries yet unsolved. It is not an uncommon thing to find a plant or tree, which for years has borne flowers or fruit according to rule, as one might say, all of a sudden send out branches of a character often widely different from that of those which have preceded them. It is more remarkable, as a fact, that when these different branches are cut from the parent tree and rooted as cuttings or preserved by grafting, this wandering from the original form continues hereditary, and can be reproduced innumerable, just as the parent plant can. Many new roses have been raised in this way. Some of them have been of the most distinct character. In fact, those who watch for these variations or, as they are technically called, sports, can secure as many new varieties as those do who look for new variations from seedlings.

Fruit trees are especially subject to these variations. Sometimes a pear tree will have a branch with fruit which look as if they might be apples, and again apple trees have been known to produce pear-like fruit. Not only is this difference in form, but also in color. Plum trees, that for years will bear nothing but the normal purple-fruited plums, will send out branches occasionally with yellow-colored plums, and others may differ also in form,—that is to say, we may have round, yellow plums instead of egg-shape, purple ones. One of the most striking instances of this is in the case of the nectarine. A well informed biologist simply says he does not know what causes these wild wanderings from normal forms,—he merely tells the student there is a chance for you here in original investigation, which may bring you fame if you can work out the cause.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE "Peace Treaty" was ratified by the United States Senate, on the 6th instant, the vote being 57 to 27. Up to the time of voting, the result was in doubt, and the support of two Democratic Senators, McEnery, Louisiana, and McLaurin, South Carolina, was given at the last moment. With them in opposition, the vote would have been 55 to 29, which would have been a rejection. Six Senators were absent, "paired." Of the 57 affirmative votes, 40 were Republicans, 10 Democrats, and 7 Silverites and Populists. Of the 27 negatives, 2 were Republicans (Hale, Maine; Hoar, Mass.), 22 were Democrats, and 3 Silverites and Populists.

SEVERAL resolutions "declaratory" of the purposes of the United States concerning the Philippine Islands had been introduced in the United States Senate, and were pending when the vote on the Treaty was taken. They were all in substance to the effect that the United States, by the adoption of the Treaty, did not commit itself to a policy of annexing the Islands. One of them, offered by Senator McEnery, of Louisiana, and which, it is said, reconciled him to voting for the Treaty, was discussed, but not voted on, and it is now thought no vote will be taken while the state of "strained relations"—the fighting with the Filipinos—continues.

ON the evening of the 4th instant, a collision occurred between the troops of the United States, and the armed Filipinos, at Manila, and there was severe fighting that night and next day. The loss to the United States troops is variously stated up to 250 killed and wounded, but many more of the Filipinos were slain, one dispatch saying their loss was 1,900. The news received is nearly all from the United States officers, no dispatches from Manila being allowed to pass without "censorship." Agoncillo, who has been representing the Filipinos at Washington, went to Montreal, Canada, on the 4th, and there gave a statement to the press, in which he declared that the fighting at Manila was accidental, and asserted that his people did not want to fight. "There is no war," he said, "we do not want to fight, unless you force us to do so." It is stated from Washington that instructions have been sent to Major-General Otis, "to crush the revolt against American sovereignty."

ON the 7th instant, General Otis sent fuller details of the fighting. He estimated the "casualties" on his side at 250, and the Filipino losses killed, wounded, and prisoners, as probably 4,000. The insurgent army, numbering over 20,000, was armed with quick-firing and Krupp field guns, and the latest pattern Mauser rifles. Quite a number of Spanish soldiers were in the insurgent service and served the artillery. Two Krupp guns and a great many rifles were captured. On the 6th the United States forces captured the water works pumping station, six miles out of the city, which, it is said, were a principal object of the fighting.

THERE still remain "deadlocks" in the Senatorial elections in five States,—Pennsylvania, Delaware, Nebraska, Utah, and California. In Pennsylvania, the "anti-Quay" Republicans gained an advantage, on the 4th instant, in the nomination, at the party primaries in Lebanon county, of their candidate for State Senator over the Quay candidate. There has not been, up to this writing, any change in the strength of the factions, as shown in the Legislative balloting. The trial of Senator Quay, his son, and ex-Treasurer Haywood, at Philadelphia, for "conspiracy" in the use of State money, is now set for the 27th instant, having been postponed from the 20th.

THERE has been a protracted period of severely cold weather in the Northeast, extending southward, with heavy snows in some States. In the Colorado mountain region, snow-slides have occurred, with loss of life in several instances. In Nebraska, a dispatch on the 6th instant says, "the weather has been unprecedentedly severe for the past three weeks, concluding with the blizzard of February 2 and 3. During the period thousands of sheep brought from the South and not used to this climate, perished." In Washington and Oregon, east of the Cascade Range, the mercury has been 10 and 20 degrees below zero. In Texas, "wet norther" storms have caused severe losses of stock.

A DISPATCH from Denver, on the 7th, says the "great snow blockade on the Denver and Rio Grande Railroad in the Canon of the Grand river has been broken." The Marshall Pass is also open. Other railroads have serious trouble, but are generally in operation. "It is estimated that 60,000 sheep in southern Colorado are dying of cold and hunger. Many flocks have been abandoned by the herders." At Cheyenne, the temperature, up to the 7th, had been for seven days from 13 to 28 degrees below zero. A loss of one-half the cattle in the State, (Wyoming), was predicted by some. Along the railroad from Denver to western Wyoming, there was "not a shrub or bunch of grass of any kind visible above the snow, so that it was impossible for the cattle to find anything to eat."

THE English Parliament reassembled on the 7th. The proceedings were not of special interest. Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, who has been chosen leader of the Liberal party in the House of Commons, in place of Sir William Harcourt, who withdrew, spoke in reference to the "Queen's speech," (in which the Government's policy is outlined). Arthur Balfour, the Government leader in the Commons, said "there was no reason why the present peaceful relations with France should not be permanent."

THE Secretary of the Interior, lately appointed, is E. A. Hitchcock, of St. Louis, who has been serving since President McKinley took office as United States Ambassador to Russia. He reached London, on his way home, on the 4th instant, and a dispatch from that city describes him as emphatic in stating his confidence in the Czar. "Like most persons making the acquaintance of the Czar, Mr. Hitchcock has a profound admiration for the young potentate, and expresses himself strongly as to his frankness, sincerity, and enterprise. He scoffs at the idea that the Czar's peace propaganda is inspired by any but the highest motives."

A DISPATCH from Madrid says that the Spanish Government has notified the United States "that in view of the non-success of the Americans to obtain the release of the Spanish prisoners, the Spanish Government itself has taken steps to obtain their release," the expense of which the United States is expected to bear. General Rios, the Spanish commander in the Philippines, cables that Aguinaldo offers to release the prisoners on the "payment of $500,000 and the handing over to him of the cannon, rifles, and 300,000 cartridges belonging to the Spaniards." The Madrid Government is said to have rejected this proposal.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE following farm prices received at recent sales in Salem county, N. J., we find reported: The Johnson farm of 101 acres was purchased by Edw. C. Wilson, of Philadelphia (formerly of West Grove), for $70 an acre. The Harrison Johnson farm, near Daretown, of 101 acres, was sold to Thos. G. Hackett, for $81.50 per acre. The Isaac Richmond farm of 93 acres to Henry Richmond for $75 per acre.

—There is, and long has been, a persistent opposition in England, to compulsory vaccination, and alarm is now expressed by some of the friends of the system over the probable working of the "statutory conscience law," recently enacted by Parliament, which exempts from vaccination all who have or profess to have conscientious scruples. As many as 500,000 certificates of exemption have already been issued by magistrates. As an offset to this, school boards are insisting that all teachers and pupils be vaccinated, and most householders require a similar precaution on the part of servants.

—The establishment of a company in Germany to lay a direct cable between that country and the United States now seems definitely assured. The capital—20,000,000 marks—has been furnished by a number of banks and private capitalists, it is said.

NOTICES.

 A Conference under the care of the Western Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Temperance and Philanthropic Work will be held in the meeting-house at Kennett Square, Pa., on First-day, Second month 19, at 2 o'clock p. m. Isabel G. Shortlidge is expected to address the Conference. All interested are cordially invited to be present.

HORACE L. DILWORTH, Clerk.

 Appointments of Baltimore Yearly Meeting's Visiting Committee for Second month are as follows:

- 12. Forest Hill, Md.
- 19. Bald Eagle, Pa.
- 26. Menallen, Pa.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

 The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting-house at Darby, on First-day, Second month 19, 1899, at 2.30 p. m.

Subject, "Purity."

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

 The Home Influence Association will be addressed on Third-day, Second month 21, at 3 p. m., by Mrs. Herman H. Birney, on "Literature for Children."

The meeting will be held in the meeting-house, Race and 15th streets (entrance on 15th below Race). All are invited.

FLORENCE M. LUKENS, President.

 The Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, held at Race Street, will take place on Fourth-day next, the 15th, in the evening, at 7.30 o'clock.

 The united First-day evening meetings, in Philadelphia, during Second month, will be at 17th street and Girard Avenue, at 7.30 o'clock. Friends generally should feel it their duty to be in attendance.

WASHINGTON.

NEXT THREE-DAY PERSONALLY-CONDUCTED TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The next Pennsylvania Railroad three-day personally-conducted tour to Washington, D. C., leaves on Fifth-day, Second month 16. The rate, $14.50 from New York, $11.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rate from other points, include all necessary expenses during the entire trip—transportation, hotel accommodations, and Capitol guide fees. An experienced Chaperon will also accompany the party.

For itineraries, tickets, and full information apply to ticket agents: Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

Cheap Seed AND GOOD

We can help you get them. Send 5 cents in stamps and receive four packages of home grown seed:—Twins, new early cabbage; Potomac, the new tomato; Dirigo, the earliest beet; Quincy Market, the sweetest early corn, with our flower and vegetable seed catalogue, full of engravings. With one exception it is the largest vegetable catalogue published. Cut off one of the home grown labels, write in the name of this paper, and it shall count as 25 cents toward any order amounting to $1.00, excepting our special collections, in which we offer 33 packages seed of choice vegetables for $1.00, and 15 packages of selected flower seed, 40c.

J. J. H. GREGORY & SON,
MARLBOROUGH, MASS.

A good lamp-chimney dealer keeps Macbeth and no other.

Index tells what Number to get.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Of Interest to Friends.

The Underground Railroad

FROM SLAVERY TO FREEDOM

By Wilbur H. Siebert,

Ohio State University.

CLOTH, CROWN 8VO, $4.00.

"On the side of illustration the volume is exceptionally strong. The cuts are numerous, well selected, and well executed. The frontispiece is a reproduction of C. T. Webber's painting of the reception of fugitive slaves by Levi Coffin on the outskirts of Cincinnati. Few historical paintings are so full of the feeling which the scenes depicted should inspire."—The Outlook.

THE MACMILLAN COMPANY.

Newly Priced Books.

Marion Harland's "Some Colonial Homesteads and their Stories," cloth. Publisher's price, $3.00; now $1.25; postage, 22 cents extra.

Susan Ferrier's Novels, "Marriage," 2 volumes; "Inheritance," 2 volumes; "Destiny," 2 volumes. Publisher's price, $6.00; now $1.50; postage, 36 cents extra.

Townsend's "Near a Whole City Full." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 13 cents each.

Du Maurier's "The Martian." Publisher's price, $1.75; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Will Carleton's Poems, assorted, cloth, full gilt. Publisher's price, $2.50; now $1.00; postage, 15 cents extra.

Wilson's "Wonderful Story of Old." 2 volumes, illustrated, 1/2 morocco. Publisher's price, $7.50; now $2.00.

F. M. Kingsley's "Prisoners of the Sea." Publisher's price, $1.25; now 50 cents; postage, 10 cents extra.

Zola's "His Excellency." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

Hanscoms'. Our prices are the lowest, our variety the most complete, and quality as near perfect as can be had. Shall we mail you a price catalogue for comparison?
No liquors or other offensive goods or methods resorted to.
1311 Market St., Phila.

Swarthmore College,

SWARTHMORE, PENNA.

WM. W. BIRDSALL, President.

Under care of Friends. Send for Catalogue.

Friends' Central School, FIFTEENTH AND RACE STS., PHILADELPHIA.

Under care of the Monthly Meetings of Philadelphia; furnishes a practical, guarded education, and prepares for college.

JOSEPH S. WALTON, } Principals.
ANNA W. SPEAKMAN, }

Circulars on application.

George School,

NEAR NEWTOWN, BUCKS COUNTY, PA.

Under the care of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends.

Course of study extended and thorough, preparing students either for business or for College.

For catalogue, apply to

GEORGE L. MARIS, Principal,
George School, Penna.

OAK GROVE SEMINARY AND BAILEY INSTITUTE.

A Boarding and Day School for both sexes, under the charge of New England Yearly Meeting of Friends. Primary Department for children. Commercial Department. Exceptional facilities in Music, Painting, and Drawing. Prepares for college. Winter term begins December 6th. Spring term begins March 7th.

For Catalogue address

PRINCIPAL OAK GROVE SEMINARY,
Vassalboro, Maine

Friends' Academy,

LOCUST VALLEY, LONG ISLAND.

A Boarding and Day School for Boys and Girls, under the care of Friends.

Thorough instruction to fit for business or to enter college. Board and tuition $150 per school year. New Building with modern conveniences.

For particulars, address

PRINCIPAL FRIENDS' ACADEMY,
Locust Valley, Long Island, N. Y.

SWARTHMORE PREPARATORY SCHOOL, (Formerly SWARTHMORE GRAMMAR SCHOOL.)

New stone buildings; cottage plan; light, heat, ventilation, and drainage the best; combined advantages of individual attention and class enthusiasm.

For circulars address

ARTHUR H. TOMLINSON, Principal,
Swarthmore, Pa.

Abington Friends' School,

FOR BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS OF BOTH SEXES. Near Jenkintown, Penna., 10 miles from Philadelphia.

Under the care of Abington Monthly Meeting. Liberal course of study. Students prepared for college or business. The home-like surroundings make it especially attractive to boarding pupils. Students admitted whenever there are vacancies. Send for circulars to

LOUIS B. AMBLER, Principal,

Or
CYNTHIA G. BOSLER, Sec'y, Ogontz, Pa.

Chappaqua Mountain Institute,

A FRIENDS' BOARDING SCHOOL FOR BOYS AND GIRLS.

The building is modern, and the location is the hill country thirty-two miles north of New York City.

For Circulars, address

CHAPPAQUA MOUNTAIN INSTITUTE,
Chappaqua, New York.

Cheltenham Hills School,

FOR BOARDING AND DAY PUPILS,

will re-open September 21st, 1898, (17th year). College preparation. For circulars apply to the Principals.

ANNIE HEACOCK,
LIDA R. LEMASTRE.

Wyncote, Pennsylvania.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 18, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 7.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

VII.

THE Bible is a depository of principles rather than of precise rules : and these must be studied, not blindly or superficially, but with discrimination and divine enlightenment.

From "A Reasonable Faith," by William Pollard, Francis Frith, and William Edward Turner.

FIDELITY.

"WHAT folly now," the faithless critic cries,
With sneering lip, and wise, world-knowing eyes,
"To dream of peace amidst a world in arms,
Of swords to plowshares changed by scriptural charms ;
Still shall the glory and the pomp of war
Along their trains the shouting millions draw,
Still dusty Labor to the passing Brave
His cap shall doff, and Beauty's kerchief wave ;
Still shall the bard to Valor turn his song,
Still Hero-worship kneel before the Strong,
And Church for State, and State for Church shall fight,
And both agree that Might alone is right !"

Despite of sneers like these, O faithful few,
Who dare to hold God's word and witness true,
Still keep the path which duty bids you tread,
Though worldly wisdom shake the cautious head ;
No truth from heaven descends upon our sphere
Without the greeting of the skeptic's sneer ;
Still lives for earth, which war so long has trod,
The great hope resting on the truth of God,—
Evil shall cease, and violence pass away,
And the tired world breathe free through a long Sabbath day.
—John G. Whittier.

THE STORY OF PETER YARNALL.

Our friend Griffith John, of Bear Gap, Pa., has kindly prepared for us an account of Peter Yarnall, an interesting figure among Friends in the neighborhood of Philadelphia, a century or more ago. We have at time published extracts from the journals of his travels on religious service ; they are printed in "Friends' Miscellany."

PETER YARNALL was born in Philadelphia about the year 1753. Here his early life was spent. Having shown an aptitude for acquiring knowledge, he was placed with Robert Proud¹ to study Latin. Subsequently his father, Mordecai Yarnall, removed to Springfield, Chester (now Delaware) county, Pa., Peter was apprenticed to a tanner in the city. His master dying, to finish his trade he went to live with a man, within the limits of Uwchlan Monthly Meeting. Having reached his 18th year, Peter was regarded as a steady youth, to which his seriousness at meeting gave no little countenance, and Friends were totally unprepared to receive the intelligence later, that he had cut loose and was drifting away from them and their principles.

This state of affairs, it appeared, was brought about by a misunderstanding between him and his master. A trifling circumstance caused them to differ. The indignity and harsh treatment which he received in consequence, was resented, and without consent of his master (a serious offense in itself in that day), he suddenly took his departure for New York, and enlisted in the British Army (it was just before the Revolution). He shortly sent a letter to his father, informing him of what he had done. The receipt of this letter threw his father into great distress. In his mind's eye, he could see how easy it was for Peter to make his exit through such an open door, and abandon the precepts and training of his youth. Thinking of him as lost to virtue, wandering amid the mazes of evil, ever seeking to quiet an unrest of soul, by new deviations, and continuing on his way downward to ruin, overwhelmed him with sadness. Under this pressure he came to Philadelphia, hoping, if way should open, or assistance be had, to get his son released and brought home. While here, he attended the meeting on Market street. The assembled Friends were pleased to see him enter, for Mordecai Yarnall was an approved minister, beloved by and familiar to them all. On this occasion, they were pained to notice the depression depicted on his countenance, which told of the sorrow that was weighing him down. After some time of silence, he arose, uttering the words : "Many are the afflictions of the righteous, but the Lord delivereth him out of them all."

At the close of meeting, the Friends extended much sympathy to him, and he was glad to mingle with them again. But he wished to visit John Pemberton. This he accomplished. John was a friend to whom he was greatly attached, and he could fairly relate to him the story of his trouble. Mordecai was hoping that his counsel might suggest some way of effecting Peter's release, and of restoring to him another son, whose misconduct added weight to the father's already overburdened mind. John Pemberton in the goodness of his heart, was ready to do anything in his power. But the prospect was not bright for reaching the object in view. It was likely to be attended with difficulty, and with expense. Much would depend upon circumstances. The old man returned sadly to Springfield, and his death soon after followed.

In the meantime, the novelty of Peter's situation wore away, and the voice of reproof in his soul censured him for wrong-doing. In despondent mood, he wrote several letters to John Pemberton, revealing the state of his mind. "The following reply to these letters stands as a testimony of the writer's paternal care, and the concern by which he was actuated to cast his bread upon the waters of Peter's unstable mind. But it was found after many days, in the return of this prodigal to the Heavenly Father's house, to the great rejoicing of the worthy John Pemberton, and many others."

[¹ Robert Proud was a Friend, who taught the Friends' School, chartered by William Penn, then on Fourth street below Chestnut. He was the author of a well-known "History of Pennsylvania," whose publication, 1797-8, is said to have ruined him. He died 1813.]

"PHILADELPHIA, Ninth month 15, 1772.

"Dear Peter: Yesterday I received thy letter of 23d of Eighth month, which gave me some satisfaction to find thou continues so sensible of thy misstep. And I wish thy mind may become so humbled and thy spirit contrited, that thou may experience greater degrees of light and favor; after having passed through the righteous judgments of the Lord, because thou hast transgressed his holy laws, and run counter to the convictions of his grace. I much wish to see some one, and indeed all the offspring of thy worthy father, tread in his steps, and become ornaments of our holy profession.

Although I have not before acknowledged the receipt of thy two letters, sent soon after thou got to New York,—yet have not been unmindful of thee; but have written divers letters to our friend Henry Haydock to promote his using endeavors to obtain thy liberty, provided thou manifest a suitable disposition of mind. He writes me there is hope of thy being at liberty again, and I wish if that end is attained, thou wilt strive, by living under Divine fear, to manifest greater stability, and so make recompense to thy friends for their trouble, by the hopes they may have of thy future well-doing. It's a great mercy thou art brought in measure to see thy state and condition; and as thou attends to that which hath visited, thou wilt be brought into a nearer acquaintance with the Truth, and experience that peace which is not found in a rebellious course.

"Thy aged father lay but a few days in his last illness. I believe his end was hastened by thine and Morecai's conduct; though he bore his grief silently. I went to see him the day before his departure. He was sensible, though weak, and much bodily pain; and it was a satisfaction to him to be assured that some care would be taken about thee and thy brother. All his children, except you two, were there when he died, if I remember right. There were many Friends went from the city to his burial; and we had a good meeting after his interment. I have no doubt he is centered where the 'weary are at rest and the wicked cease from troubling.' He was buried at Springfield.

"I expect thy brother is released, and on his way hither. I wrote to a Friend who went from hence; and he made application. Though I expect it will cost me considerable, but if he hereafter does well, I shall count it a favor.

"If thou art set at liberty it will be needful for thee to get a good master. I believe Stacy Potts, of Trenton, will take thee. I spoke to him some time ago and he seemed willing, unless Friends at New York have a more suitable place for thee; and I hope thou wilt be willing to be advised. I am, with sincere desires for thy welfare, thy loving friend,

"JOHN PEMBERTON."

Shortly after this Peter Yarnall was released, and in compliance with the advice of his friends, he went to live with Stacy Potts. He continued with him until his twenty-first birthday. Then he went to Germantown, and pursued his calling as a journeyman tanner. While here, Dr. Bond, a famous Philadelphia physician in his day, observing the bent of his mind toward the study of medicine, urged him to take it up. He fell in with this proposal, and under the patronage of the doctor became a student at the Pennsylvania Hospital. Here he prosecuted his studies with zeal and industry. By strict attention to the various duties of his position, he won the confidence of all. It was now hoped that Peter would turn his thoughts to religious subjects, and seek reinstatement with Friends, as he seemed settled in purpose and at seasons was serious and thoughtful. What especially furnished reason for such conclusions was the report of Townsend Speakman, who supplied the hospital with drugs and medicines. Townsend said that once, late in the year 1775, on entering Peter's apartment, he found him reading Friends' books, with Sewel's History, Barclay's Apology, and some other works of Friends, lying upon his table.

But this encouragement was of short duration. A little later, in changing mood, Peter turned away from his religious impressions, and seemed determined to obliterate every trace of early education from his heart.

(To be continued.)

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 9.—SECOND MONTH 26.

ABRAHAM.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord appeared to Abram, and said unto him: I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect.—Genesis, xvii., 1.

Scripture Reading.—Genesis, xviii., 16–33.

IN previous lessons we have learned how the family of the first Hebrew came from the land of the Chaldeans, his forefathers, and penetrated into Canaan. Let us pause in the course of our study of the growth of the family into a nation to consider more fully the character of Abraham.

Fortunately we have left, in one of the ancient races of the East, men who live the same life, and under very similar conditions, as that of the patriarch of old. "The unchanged habits of the East render it a kind of living Pompeii." The Bedouin chiefs of Arabia set out on their movements from camp to camp, as Abraham set out for Canaan. "Their substance is heaped high on camels. Their slaves run by their sides. Their flocks of sheep, goats, and asses are round about them. The chief is there amidst the stir of movement, or resting at noon within his black tent, marked out from the rest by his cloak of brilliant scarlet. . . . The ordinary social state is the same: polygamy, slavery, the exclusiveness of family ties; the period of service for the dowry of a wife; the solemn obligations of hospitality; the temptations, easily followed, into craft or falsehood." (Stanley: History of Jewish Church.)

The outward resemblance is complete. But in considering Abraham we have to deal with one who is set apart from others of his kind by his recognition of God's presence. What has been said of the Hebrew people applies to their great ancestor. He was a specialist in righteousness and in the sense of the presence of Jehovah. It is not that he was a perfect character. He had his faults. Witness his falsehoods concerning his wife, while in Egypt. This story is rendered doubtful by being told of two different places and times, and by being told again of Isaac. But the fact of its repetition shows that it was a part of the current conception of the character of the patriarch. His no less cowardly yielding to his chief wife's demand for the dismissal into the wilderness of Hagar and Ishmael, his son, must be remembered against him. But on the whole we cannot fail to recognize the general greatness, and even grandeur, of his character. In some of the anecdotes told of him in the Bible and elsewhere, he shows a sweetness and generosity of disposition most remarkable when we consider his period and surroundings. Witness his division of the land with Lot (Genesis, xiii., 5-13), and his cordial reception of the strangers (xviii., 1-8). Witness also his pleading for the lives of the Sodomites when the destruction of their city was foretold to him; perhaps there might be among them a few righteous,—even ten; for their sake let the city live (Genesis, xviii., 23-33).

Among the Mohammedans of Arabia who also look back to Abraham as their ancestor, he is called "the Friend of God," or simply "the Friend." In the Koran (their sacred book) are stories further illustrating the ideals he left behind him. There is a story that his father, in his youth, called upon him to make offerings to the carved idols of "Nimrud's temple," and to the sun, moon, and stars.

"But Abraham said, 'Did they not see the sun Sink and grow darkened, when the days were done; Did not the moon for them, too, wax and wane, That they should pay her worship, false or vain? Wilt thou yet Bid me praise gods who humbly come and go, Lights that a greater Light hath kindled? No!'"

Again it is told that a fire worshipper, haggard with hunger and thirst, led his staggering camel into Abraham's camp and begged for succor. But when water was brought he first gave to his beast, and then offered an oblation to the setting sun, whereupon the chieftain would have driven him forth into the desert again; but the Lord interposed:

"Lo! God reproveth thee, thou Friend of God! Forbiddest thou gift of the common stream To the idolator, spent with the heat, Who, in his utmost need, watered his beast And bowed the knee in reverence, ere he drank? Allah hath borne with him these three-score years. Thou art rebuked! Seek pardon! for thou hast much need to seek."

Still another story tells how, in time of famine, Abraham sent to the king of Egypt for grain. The king was disposed to be friendly, but finally answered that if he should send the grain he knew the Hebrew chieftain would use it to feed all the hungry who came to him; and as he could not afford to feed all the desert he would not send it. Abraham's servants returning empty handed, feared that their master would lose credit among his neighbors if it were known that Pharaoh had repulsed him, so they filled the sacks with desert sand.

"Then was the heart of Abraham sore, because The people of his tribe drew round to share The good food brought, and all the desert trooped With large-eyed mothers and their pining babes, Certain of succor if the sheikh could help."

In his distress the chieftain swooned, and lay as one dead. But his wife, not knowing the trick, opened a sack and found there fine flour, from which she made bread for the hungry. Abraham, awakening, asked whence came the supply, and finding that all supposed it to be the bounty of the Egyptian, he "fell upon his face, low worshipping."

"But this hath come from the dear mighty hands Of Allah—of the Lord of Egypt's lords— My Friend, and King, and Helper; now my folk Shall live and die not."

These tales, with others previously mentioned, show distinctly a man of original genius, who impressed himself deeply upon his generation, and who left his mark upon those who came after him. His generosity was not confined to his dealings with his own people. His relations with his Canaanite neighbors were friendly throughout, but in his dealings with them there is a manifest sense of superiority in his constant refusal to accept favors from them. He purchases a burial field and cave (Genesis, xxiii.) from the children of Heth, though they are anxious to give it to him. He refuses to take any of the spoils after the battle with the Assyrians (Genesis, xiv.) "lest thou should say, I have made Abram rich."

In the further Bible narratives concerning Abraham we are told of his movements in Palestine, of his covenant with Jehovah by which his name was changed, and he was promised that his posterity should be a great nation. Account is given of the birth of Ishmael, from whom certain of the Arabian peoples claim descent, of the birth of Isaac, and later of the birth of Abraham's other sons, the forefathers of other peoples of Arabia. Abraham was buried in the cave of Machpelah before Mamre, which had been purchased from the Canaanites as a sepulchre for Sarah, his wife.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS. PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 9.—SECOND MONTH 26.

JESUS AT JACOB'S WELL.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If any man thirst let him come unto me and drink.—John, vii., 37.

Read the Scripture, John, vii., 14, 28-37.

REVISED VERSION

The event described in these verses of scripture from the seventh chapter of John is fixed as occurring in the year 30, A. D. It was about six months after the feeding of the multitude by the Lake of Galilee, described in the last lesson, and about six months before the Crucifixion. In the period after the Feeding, Jesus returned to Capernaum, where he discoursed in the synagogue (as described in the later portions of the sixth chapter of John, to which attention was directed), and later "walked in Galilee," for in Judea "the Jews sought to kill him." Now came the great Jewish festival, the Feast of the Tabernacles, at Jerusalem, and to this Jesus, "not publicly, but as it were in secret," went up. At Jerusalem, in the Court of the Temple, the incident of the lesson occurred.

The Feast of Tabernacles was a festival of the Autumn, as the Passover is of the Spring. It was in fact the "Harvest Home," a seven days' rejoicing. Not, however, the harvest of grain, for that in Palestine falls early in the summer, or even in the spring; barley, sown in the Eleventh or Twelfth month, is ready for harvest in April, and wheat is gathered in the two following months. This autumn festival celebrated the completion of all,—the gathering and treading-out the grapes, the plucking of the pomegranates, and the stripping of the olive trees, and the pressing of their fruit. The Feast was an event of great impressiveness to the Jews. At that time Solomon had dedicated his Temple, and at that time, also, on the return of the Jews from the Babylonian Captivity, when again they gathered at Jerusalem, and began the erection of the second Temple, they dedicated their new altar, upon which to present their sacrifices and offerings. "Then first, if modern criticism be correct," says Geikie, "rose the strains of the 115th Psalm, with its lofty protest against idolatry, and its proud trust in the Jehovah alone," beginning:

"Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us,
But unto thy name give glory,
For thy mercy, and for thy truth's sake."

In connection with the verses of scripture selected, as above (the 14th verse of John, vii., and the 28th to 37th), the verses between the 14th and 28th should be studied. In the midst of the Feast, the seven days' ceremonial, Jesus went up into the Temple and taught. The Jews marveled, for he had not the instruction of a rabbi. "How knoweth this man letters?" they asked, "having never learned." Then Jesus answered, as so many times, "My teaching is not mine, but his that sent me." And he added; "If any man willeth to do his (God's) will, he shall know of the teaching whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." In other words, here is the precious doctrine of Friends that he who is "in the Truth," in harmony with God, being willing "to do his will," has in his breast a witness which testifies to the Truth, wherever witnessed, or heard, or experienced.

Once more Jesus declared his mission. "Ye," he said, "both know me, and know whence I am,"—meaning evidently that those about him knew him to be Jesus of Nazareth,—his origin, and his place of abode familiar to them. (Just before, v. 27, they had said, "we know the man, whence he is.") And then he added, (v. 28-29), repeating, as so often, the declaration of his being sent by his Father: "I am not come of myself, but he that sent me is true, whom ye know not. I know him; because I am from him, and he sent me."

Finally, "on the last day, the great day of the Feast," Jesus proclaimed again the spiritual nature of the religion which he presented: "If any man thirst, let him come unto me and drink." Not outward water, certainly, but—as was declared at Jacob's Well—water that would quench the thirst, the water of life from divine fountains. The writer of the Gospel account adds (v. 39): "thus spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive," and it is clear from all the context, and the general nature of the account, that the enjoyment of the spiritual light and life, by derivation from him who is the Source of All, was what Jesus was then preaching.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

COLORED FARMERS IN THE SOUTH.

BY ROBERT BENSON, BUSINESS MANAGER OF THE SCHOFIELD SCHOOL, AIKEN, S. C.

A BALTIMORE paper stated recently that "85 per cent. of Southern negroes live in the rural districts and mostly engage in agricultural pursuits." Accepting this statement as correct, for our observation would not lead us to dispute it, we are impressed anew with the great importance of this branch of our work, especially as we do not think it desirable that any efforts should be made to change present conditions unless a larger proportion could be induced to live in the country. A convincing argument in support of this position may be found in the death and criminal records of cities, which show clearly that the race deteriorates when exposed to city influences. Racial characteristics and experience have also measurably defined the spheres of action where each thrives best under a semi-tropical sun, the white man in intellectual work and the colored in physical labor, preferably pursued in the country. Both degenerate when these circumstances are reversed and the negro problem, except perhaps the political phase of it, will ultimately settle itself in this way. It may be well to state here that the preceding and following remarks are based on a comparative study of the two races, individual exceptions, which are numerous, being disregarded.

With these facts before us we consider it important that more attention should be paid to farming by missionary institutions. A few recognize the great need and teach it thoroughly, some more in a desultory fashion, and the great majority not at all. We treat it as our most important industry, with striking and definite results. I have long held that the great poverty existing among these people was due chiefly to their miserable way of tilling the soil; lack of book learning is responsible only indirectly and to a limited extent. Rotation of crops, the corner-stone of all profitable farming, is not practiced; plant-food is bought on credit, at fabulously high prices, instead of being made at home; the soil is scratched with cultivators in place of being plowed, and cotton fields left bare of vegetation in winter for sun and rain to complete the havoc wrought by a ruinous system due to ignorance of the primary principles governing modern agriculture. The system is wrong throughout and must be revolutionized before any great improvement can take place in the material condition of the colored people South. Book learning may bring about the same result in time, but there is a quicker way, and, I believe, a surer one. The plow has little attraction for fine scholars.

A good living can be made on the farm at present prices of produce by those who do not hire labor. Middling cotton—the average grade—is selling in Aiken to-day at $5\frac{1}{4}$ cents, although fully nine pounds out of every ten sold cost more to raise than this. Our farm has five bales ready for market that cost a trifle over four cents a pound, leaving us a clear margin of 25 per cent profit. We accomplished this by a systematic rotation of crops, in which the cow pea—the best legume for this section—figured largely; by a gradual increase of live stock until all forage was fed at home and the manure used where it always should be—on the field that produced the hay; by keeping the ground covered in winter with cow pea stubble or oats; by plowing deeply before planting and cultivating every nine days during the growing season, and by using commercial fertilizers on legumes only, which did away with the expense of buying nitrogen, the most costly element required by growing plants. The six-acre field which gave us five bales of cotton this year, yielded but two four years ago, and the season was more favorable. We used no manure except that which the land gave us, and spent but \$12 on chemical substitutes; cow peas did the rest. As a renovating crop the cow pea is superior to clover, which has reclaimed thousands of acres in the North, for it flourishes on the poorest soil, and the hay is better. The cotton yield of this State in 1897—an average season—was about one-third of a bale to the acre. With good farming, which is less expensive than bad farming, this yield could be trebled in a few years and five-cent cotton raised with profit.

It is hard to institute such reforms among illiterate people who have practiced error for generations, but I find it easier sometimes than to convince them that education is a good thing. Practical proof of theories is the best way; but to carry out this idea experiment stations, run by capable men interested in the welfare and thoroughly conversant with the peculiarities of these people, would be required in every county, which renders the scheme infeasible to start with. A great deal could be accomplished, however, by the employment of one man in each Southern State, chosen for the qualities mentioned and attached to the State experiment stations for the purpose of reducing their admirable bulletins to simple language, omitting scientific reasons for conclusions which only confuse, the main object being to simplify them by limiting their scope to the bare instructions for applying information. He should then hold meetings at the county seats, explain these bulletins, for few can read, and distribute them.

The fruits of this adjunct to experiment station work would largely depend upon the man; if he possessed that rather rare order of ability which can make profound scientific truths plain to the ignorant, understood the colored people, and was interested in them from a missionary standpoint they would prove of great value. The importance in this work of using the common name for a spade can scarcely be overestimated, and may be illustrated by the following quotation from a lecture recently delivered to farmers by the very able agricultural instructor of a southern college for colored people: "Reduce your acreage, give diversification to your crops, produce for home consumption, live economically, invest your surplus earnings in possessions, instead of rent." Excellent advice this, but hardly more intelligible to the audience than Greek.

The proposition which I started out with, that farming should be taught in practically all missionary institutions, would, if acted upon, do more in one generation towards spreading prosperity and contentment through the South than the present system alone will accomplish in three. Scores of small planters have already followed the example set by our farm, with marked benefit, and our boys are carrying the information gathered here to their settlements. Bulletins like the following, widely distributed, are also useful, for some reach those who can read: "Sow a month before planting on an acre of land one sack acid phosphate and one of kainit mixed; this will cost $2. Then plow and at the right time sow cow peas broad cast and brush them in. Cut for hay and feed. Follow this next year with cotton. The third year plant corn, with peas between the rows for picking, using the manure, as near as you can judge, from the one acre for two years. The fourth season sow cow peas again for hay and so on. If this acre hasn't paid better than any on the farm and won't raise more at the end of four years, go back to the old way; if it has given better satisfaction, why not work your whole place on the same plan?" This bulletin contains the kernel of much experiment station work, reinforced by our own experience, reduced to a form which we have found most helpful to the colored people, and is presented here because it constitutes the first lesson we give needy farmers who ask us to help them get out of debt.

I have never understood how the mistake was made of establishing through the South, at enormous cost, our university system, which represents the zenith of nineteen hundred years gradual growth, for the training of a race whose development had just begun. There is no royal road from a low to a high civilization; we reached it through the trades, if I mistake not, and the signs multiply that we should have profited by this knowledge more than we did when the present responsibility was first thrust upon us. The negro does not need toning down so much as toning up. Vigor, force, virility, are demanded rather than genteel culture. He inherits a native refinement. Integrity, steadfastness of purpose, moral strength must be developed. The white man's college and his religion have not done this. Either his church or educational system is at fault, and we may confidently assume it is not the former.

There is but one bridge known to be safe and it leads to industrial fields. It makes for moral robustness. It has been trodden for a generation, and found perfectly adapted to present needs. It is not an experiment; it has justified the most sanguine claims of its builders. The next bridge is shrouded in a mist of uncertainty and may be labeled hazardous. If experience is worth anything, we should concentrate our energies on the first and adopt every expedient that promises to shorten the way.

THE POWER OF CHEERFULNESS.

Youth and Age.

DID you ever stop to consider how much a cheerful spirit is worth in the battle of life? We are often reminded that it is our duty to others to carry about with us a cheerful, smiling face; but, unfortunately, the thought of mere duty is not always sufficient to influence us in doing the better things; but when it becomes a question of our own good, the accomplishment of our purposes in life, then the matter appears in another light.

It is usually the cheerful people who are the successful people. We usually find the world what we expect; and the despondent, melancholy people, who are always looking out for the worst, are not likely to find things better than their expectations.

Life is hard; it is a struggle from the beginning to the end with most of us, and with all of us who desire to do something worthy with our time; but if one has a strong purpose and a cheerful spirit, there is no reason for discouragement. We have seen those who seemed to have all the odds against them, meet the world with a face full of hope and a heart full of courage, and by the very power of that attitude one-half the difficulties in the way were conquered.

The morose and melancholy spirit is usually caused by one of two things; impaired physical condition or adverse fortune. In many cases the people who go around looking at the world through blue spectacles, who think all the good ones are dead, that their friends are all false, and that hope has entirely departed from them, only need to have their digestion toned up, to take a good rest if they are overworked, and they will find after awhile that the world is taking on a different aspect.

If, on the other hand, our plans miscarry, our efforts fail to accomplish the desired results, and everything, has gone wrong, the best thing we can do is to remember that there is always a possibility that it might have been worse. Some one has said that discouragement is only another form of egotism, and grows out of the idea that life ought to be just a little easier for us than it is for a great many others. We need to realize that the world owes us no more than it owes the millions of others, and perhaps we need just the mental and moral gymnastics which this struggle with adverse circumstances will supply. We value more highly and use more wisely those things which come to us through effort, and the very end of success were defeated if it were attained too easily.

It is not without purpose that the best things of life are the most difficult to secure; that they come not through any right of inheritance, that money will not purchase them, that only through faithful and persistent endeavor may they be reached, and the road is open to all who have the courage to walk therein.

Perhaps the thing which goes farther than anything else to help us maintain this attitude of cheerfulness is faith in our work. This, of course, implies a certain amount of faith in one's self, not egotism; but one must be very foolish indeed to undertake a work which he feels that he has not strength or ability to do. It is a blessing to be busy, to have something to do; and if one is so fortunate as to be engaged in a worthy cause, and can feel in one's self that faith in its worth and its ultimate success which such a work should inspire, then it is an easy thing to wait through many vicissitudes for the final crowning of one's endeavors. Without such a feeling in regard to our work it is impossible to put our best efforts into it, and we have no right to expect the fullest returns for a half-hearted service.

I do not know how it is, but I do know it to be a fact that difficulties seem to melt away before the man who carries about a cheerful spirit, and persistently refuses to be discouraged, while they accumulate before the one who is always groaning over his hard luck and scanning the horizon for clouds not yet in sight.

In this we have only seen half of the question, the power on our own lives and destinies; the power is very little less on the lives and destinies of others. Did you ever walk on the street, feeling just a little dispirited yourself, your steps were heavy, and your eyes bent on the ground or looking vacantly at nothing? Suddenly a friend passes with a smile and a bright "Good morning!" You scarcely see him until he is gone; but somehow the cheerful voice, the brisk step, and sunny smile linger like a fresh, invigorating breeze. Unconsciously your own step grows lighter; you are suddenly conscious that the sun is shining, that the sky is blue, and that it is really what your friend wished it to be—a good morning. You do not realize how far-reaching the influence of that cheerful greeting goes; but you enter your office in better spirits than you left home, you take up the difficult duties of the day easier than you had hoped to do, and things run smoother than you had any right to expect. It is such a little thing, so easy to do; but sometimes it does more good than the offer of assistance of a more practical nature. Men will take a kind word and a smile, a hearty hand-grasp and good wishes, and in the strength of it go to their tasks and retrieve their broken fortunes, when they would not accept an offer of dollars and cents.

We have faith enough in the good in human nature to believe that most of us are not indifferent to the opportunities of helping others. We would not go through the world thinking only of our own selfish interests, but would make our lives useful and helpful; and there is no life which sheds more blessings on all within the radius of its influence than the cheery, hopeful souls who are always able to see a star on the darkest night, a promise of hope in the saddest life.

WITH our forgiveness to our neighbors, in flows the consciousness of God's forgiveness to us.—Geo. Macdonald.

PERSEVERANCE NECESSARY.

IN our religious course we must meet conditions as we find them, and labor for their improvement. "In the world ye shall have tribulation; but be of good cheer; I have overcome the world." Methods and forms adopted by Friends two and a half centuries ago may not be adapted to the present age. Fox, Penn, Barclay, James Parnel, Edward Burrough, Isaac Penington, and others, had to meet the situation of their day; the conditions around Friends at this time are dissimilar from what existed at its rise; and during the generations that have lived and passed away since George Fox labored and suffered for the cause of Truth, changes of methods and forms to meet the needs of the time have been introduced, yet the Divine principle has been kept alive, through the operation of God's law, and we find the Society to-day still strong and helpful in the world.

We may not all see alike on this matter, but if we possess the fruits of the spirit, which are meekness, patience, brotherly kindness and charity, we will have come under the Divine government, and no strife or contention will be known amongst us. Neither should any give way to discouragement; such are liable to lose Divine life; when a feeling may be entertained that "I have not that place in the Father's vineyard in which I was established in days gone by;" this condition of mind has a tendency to weaken our faith and to slacken our hold on the Divine arm. "Behold, I come quickly; hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Should the Divine principle be kept alive it rises above the finite and existent, and brings us into the real presence of the Divine. If under the Divine illuminating power we would be willing to consider any changes that have been made from forms and methods which were adapted to an earlier age, we might be able to see that they are the operation of God's law, which is unchanging; nevertheless, He is continually unfolding truths and adapting them to the needs of each generation as it enlists in his work; and no principle or testimony is violated.

"We must look for truth and love it, and let us remember that God is ever the teacher of His people." (Lucretia Mott.)

"We hear much of love to God; Christ made much of love to man. We hear much of peace with Heaven; Christ made much of peace on earth." (Professor Drummond.) J. P.

Philadelphia, Second month 12.

THE Lord hath not forsaken his people because the young ones do not think just as the old ones choose. The Lord has something fresh to tell them, and is getting them ready to receive his message. When we are out of sympathy with the young, then I think our work in this world is over. It might end more honorably.—George Macdonald.

THE man who does not look up will look down; and the spirit that does not dare to soar is destined perhaps to grovel.—Disraeli.

INDIVIDUAL RESPONSIBILITY.

Christian Register.

ONE of the principal differences between the church of a half-century ago, and the church of to-day is indicated by the fact that, instead of the question, "What must I do to be saved?" which the former strove to inspire and answer, the latter endeavors to prompt and reply to the inquiry, "What can we do to save others?" or what can we do to save the world?" The change marks an advance from individualism to a sense to human unity and brotherhood, from self-interest to altruism, and is therefore salutary and laudable. Yet there will be a distinct loss if the old question should cease to be asked. It is not safe for one to be so interested in the welfare of others as to forget his own soul,—the structural ideals of truth, honor, purity, and beauty,—in the cultivation of which by meditation, as well as by action, man finds depth and richness of life. One of Prof. Peabody's sermons, that upon the text, "For their sakes I sanctify myself," shows the deep and abiding relation between personal holiness and philanthropic activity, and hence the necessity for the message of the older church in the noble passion for social service which animates the new. "For their sakes I sanctify myself."

IT is an utterly low view of business which regards it as only a means of getting a living. A man's business is his part of the world's work, his share of the great activities which render society possible. He may like it or dislike it, but it is work, and, as such, requires application, self-denial, discipline.—Pall Mall Gazette.

HE only is great of heart who floods the world with a great affection. He only is great of mind who stirs the world with great thoughts. He only is great of will who does something to shape the world to a great career. And he is greatest who does the most of all these things, and does them best.—Roswell D. Hitchcock.

BE sunshiny. There is nothing in the world so helpful as cheerfulness. What a wonderful power for good there is in a happy face! One instinctively feels that happiness is never far from truth. The face that shines must have something behind it to make it shine, and there is no real sunshine of the soul except truth and goodness. Other lights are transitory and fitful; but the sweet, steady light of a true soul beams upon the face like the joy and peace of a summer day.—Zion's Advocate.

THE moral must be the measure of health. If your eye is on the eternal your intellect will grow, and your opinions and actions will have a beauty which no learning or combined advantages of other men can rival.—Emerson.

THE essence of our being, the mystery in us that calls itself "I"—ah, what words have we for such things?—is a breath of heaven; the highest Being reveals himself in man.—Carlyle.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 18, 1899.

THE PROPHESYING OF SMOOTH THINGS.

It is not only Jeremiah, who has been considered a pessimist, but Isaiah, also, who is quite differently estimated, that makes emphatic protest against the prophesying of smooth things. Ezekiel speaks to like effect, as we cited in these columns recently.

Jeremiah, in the thirty-first chapter of the book of his name, describes the land as afflicted with many evils, and he emphatically charged that the "prophets," those whose high duty it was to cry aloud and speak truth, were wanting in their service. They had been saying, Jeremiah declares, unto those who despised the Good, "ye shall have peace," and "unto everyone that walketh in the stubbornness of his own heart, 'no evil shall come upon you!'" Behold, declared Jeremiah, the Most High is "against the prophets that smooth their tongues." "The prophet that hath a dream, let him tell a dream;" and he that hath a true word "let him speak it faithfully."

Isaiah is not less emphatic. See his thirtieth chapter. He considered the evil in the land portentously great. It is "a rebellious people," he declared, "children that will not hear the law of the Lord," who said to the seers "see not," and to the prophets, "prophesy not unto us right things, speak unto us smooth things."

Ezekiel's thought was of like character. He said (chapter thirteen) the prophets had failed in their service, they had followed their own spirit, and "seen nothing." They had been "like foxes in the waste places." They had declared, he said, that there was peace, when there was not peace. They were daubing the wall with untempered mortar, and it would come to pass, when there should be "an overwhelming shower," and "great hailstones," and a "stormy wind," that the wall would fall. And when this should happen, it would be demanded of the unfaithful laborers who used the untempered mortar, "where is your daubing?" So, too, of those who sewed "pillows upon all elbows,"—to make their arms comfortable, and (figuratively) put their consciences at ease—Ezekiel spoke with severity. The pillows should be torn away, he said, and the kerchiefs that had been made for the heads of those who wished a smooth time.

It is quite true that while Isaiah, Jeremiah, and Ezekiel were really prophets, it does not follow that every one who claims to be, or thinks he is such, is one also. It is true, too, that mankind have moved—at a pace very slow—toward better things, as the centuries rolled around. But, with equal truth,—and even greater measure of it, since the significance of this fact is so vital, its importance so great,—we must remember that this progress has been made through the faithfulness of those who did not fail to point out the bad mortar on the wall, and remonstrate against the soothing pillow. There is no instance, it may be safely said, where those who pronounced things "well enough," and deprecated further effort, had an important influence for good, or where those who in time of tumult said "this is Peace" helped on a real peacefulness. All experience shows that while it is usually a popular thing to prophesy smooth things, it is not a useful or a helpful thing. It is like the thousand other instances in which it may be easy and physically comfortable to do a thing a wrong way, but only right, however hard, to do it the right way.

This has seemed to us a homily suitable for the times.

AN ANNOUNCEMENT.

WE shall be giving pleasure to our readers, we are sure, by the announcement that we have in hand a series of articles, to which we shall probably give the general designation, "Worthy Friends of the Nineteenth Century." They are biographical, but fresh, with many incidents and anecdotes never before printed, and will be freely illustrated.

The first of these will be a sketch of the life and labors of SAMUEL M. JANNEY. It has been prepared, at our earnest request, by Eliza F. Rawson, of Lincoln, Virginia, whose close and intimate acquaintance with him, during many years, gives her exceptional qualification for the work. We hope to begin this, in a few weeks. It will run through several numbers of the INTELLIGENCER. We have in hand some excellent illustrations for it, all of them new.

■ We have also in preparation a similar biographical paper on BENJAMIN HALLOWELL, prepared by members of his family, at our request. It will follow the memoir of Samuel M. Janney, and interesting illustrations will accompany it.

■ We are also promised by our friend Joseph Wharton a memoir of his mother, DEBORAH FISHER WHARTON; and this we desire to give as number three of the series.

OUR friend William Tallack, (London, England), sends us a four-page tract, "The Colored Race in America," issued by the Howard Association, of which W. T. is secretary. The tract is devoted to a summary statement of the evils of the penal system and lynching system in our southern States. The former, from the common employment of the "contract" plan, and the "chain-gangs," is surrounded with horrors, and as to the lynchings, the news items in the daily newspapers afford sad testimony. (At Leesburg, Ga., on the night of the 11th instant, "a mob took three negroes from the jail" and shot them to death.) The tract quotes a colored people's journal at Atlanta as saying that "there are no advocates of human rights in the United States to-day," since the death of Sumner, Lincoln, Phillips, Garrison, and others, but observes that this "is too pessimistic." It proceeds to say that "even the Society of Friends in America, once the foremost champions of the negro, through their J. G. Whittier, Thomas Garrett, Isaac T. Hopper, Levi Coffin, Francis T. King, and other good men, have of late years become strangely silent and apparently apathetic as to the oppressed race."

We are not sure that our friend W. T. is informed as to the aid continuously given the colored schools in the South, by Friends,—and by many others.

THE speech made by Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, in the United States Senate, on the 9th of last month, against an Imperialist and Military policy, was a noble and worthy effort. It is such an appeal as, in the older days, Sumner would have made, and such as Webster failed to make in the hour of trial, in 1850. It has been printed in pamphlet, and ought to be everywhere circulated. We urge our readers to write to Senator Hoar at Washington for a copy, and in writing, or later, to thank him for his noble stand in behalf of the rights of the people. Senator Hoar is in his seventy-third year, but his speech shows no abatement of moral courage, statesmanlike perception, or intellectual force.

SOME Canadian friend sends us a copy of the Toronto Globe, of the 7th inst., containing a "cartoon" referring to the United States and the Philippines. "Uncle Sam" has driven a bayonet through a document entitled "The Blessings of Liberty and Free Government," and has the point of the weapon against the throat of a Filipino. We can only say, in answer to the cartoon, that we hope this is not the real "Uncle Sam," but only some one who has stolen his dress and title, and who will presently be disowned.

BIRTHS.

JENKINS.—At Rogers Park, Chicago, Ill., Second month 3, 1899, to Edward A. and Ellen A. Jenkins, a daughter, who is named Miriam Atkinson.

MORRIS.—In Philadelphia, First month 26, 1899, to Harrison S. and Anna Wharton Morris, a daughter, who is named Catharine Wharton.

MARRIAGES.

CORRECTION.—In a marriage notice inserted First month 28, the name of the bridegroom should have been printed Othel M. Insley—not Erisley.

DEATHS.

BARTLETT.—At his home in Granville, N. Y., Twelfth month 22, 1898, Ira Bartlett, aged 82 years.

He was born in Danby, Vermont, Second month 6, 1816, the son of Joseph Bartlett and Phebe Calvin. He was a birthright Friend. He came to Granville in 1848, and at the time of his death was the oldest member in our monthly meeting.

He leaves a wife and two daughters to mourn the loss of one who was a kind husband and father, an honest, upright man, and a consistent and faithful Friend. For some time he was unable to attend meeting on account of feeble health. The funeral was held at the meeting-house, Twelfth month 25, Robert S. Haviland, of Chappaqua, being in attendance.

While reading a recent editorial in the INTELLIGENCER, "The Passing of the Faithful," it carried my mind quickly to the life of our aged friend. It mentioned those in our Society, who, while not making themselves conspicuous in any way were yet "doing good simply by being good." One, not a Friend, who in his boyhood passed a year in the employment of Ira Bartlett, doing farm work, says, "It was a very good home for a young man to live in; the influences were all good." While this dear friend is missed, especially in his family circle, we feel that his was truly "the death of the righteous," and that our loss is indeed his gain. M.

BARTRAM.—Second month 9, 1899, James R., son of the late Isaac L. and Emily Bartram, in his 49th year.

Funeral from residence of his brother, G. Edward Bartram, Darby, Pa.

FURMAN.—In Philadelphia, Second month 12, 1899, Abigail C. wife of Samuel T. Furman, aged 73 years.

LEVICK.—In Philadelphia, Second month 9, 1899, Elizabeth J., daughter of Hannah M. and the late William M. Levick in the 52d year of her age; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street, Philadelphia.

MATTHEWS.—On First month 30, 1899, at the residence of his son-in-law, Dr. William D. Corse, Gardenville, Baltimore county, Md., William W. Matthews, son of the late Thomas H. Matthews, aged 56 years.

OWEN.—At her home, Richmond, Indiana, after a few days' illness of acute bronchitis, on the morning of the 3d of Second month, 1899, Joanna Laws Owen, youngest daughter of the late William Owen, of Deer Creek, Md., and Mary Mifflin Owen of Baltimore.

A sweet spirit has entered its rest. Patient, self-sacrificing, and tender, the loved of many hearts, the idol of the devoted sister who finds her only solace in the wisdom which ordered that the beautiful dead should first lay her burdens down, while to herself was left the pain.

"It must have been for one of us, my own,
To drink this cup and eat this bitter bread.
Had not my tears upon thy face been shed
Thy tears had dropped on mine; if I alone
Did not walk now, thy spirit would have known
My loneliness, and did my feet not tread
This weary path and steep, thy feet had bled
For mine; and thy mouth for mine made moan.
And so it comforts me; yea not in vain,
To think of thy eternity of sleep
To know thine eyes are tearless tho' mine weep;
And when this cup's last bitterness I drain
One thought shall still its primal sweetness keep,
Thou hadst the peace and I the undying pain."

*

SEAMAN.—On the 24th of First month, 1899, Claude Seaman, son of Charles and Aryeline Seaman, in his 18th year, at the home of his parents in Fairport, New York.

He was the grandson of Israel and Sarah Mosher (deceased); consumption took him away in his early anticipation of life. C. W. C.

WARNER.—At her home in Bloomfield, Florida, Second month 5, 1899, Sarah Ann Warner, widow of Isaac Warner; a member of Third Haven Monthly Meeting, Easton, Md.

She was born Second month 28, 1809, and hence was very near the completion of her 90th year. Her husband, (also a member of Third Haven Monthly Meeting), died several years ago. Their children survive. She passed away peacefully and happily, "glad to depart." M.

WELLS.—At the residence of his son, Dr. Charles H. Wells, West Philadelphia, Second month 7, 1899, Isaac Newton Wells, in his 72d year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

He was a birthright member of former Robeson Meeting, a branch of Caln Quarter, and like the large body of its members in full sympathy with the Anti-Slavery cause.

After removing to Philadelphia he was a member at Green Street, but since 1857 of the meeting held at Race Street; a number of years later he was appointed caretaker of West Philadelphia Meeting and School House, and in 1876 transferred to a like position at Race Street where he continued till impaired health required a change.

He was strongly attached to the principles of Friends, and interested in what transpired among them. He was a kind, affectionate husband and parent, and endeavored to keep in harmony with the Christian standard. Though his removal was sudden he was doubtless prepared. T.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

ABINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Abington on the 9th instant. Though the day was very cold there was a good attendance and a satisfactory meeting. In the session for worship, Robert Hatton spoke first, followed by Isaac Wilson, whose exercise was extended. Later there was service by other Friends. In the business meeting, the three queries required to be answered at this time were considered. A committee which had in charge the proposal to hold a monthly meeting at Stroudsburg reported in favor of holding Richland Monthly Meeting, of which Stroudsburg Preparative is part, twice a year at Stroudsburg. (The two places are distant some forty to fifty miles, in a straight line, and more than that by any ordinary route of travel; in the time of the settlement of Friends at Stroudsburg, Quakertown—Richland—was the parent meeting.)

Isaac Wilson has a prospect of being at the First-day meeting at Media, (Providence), to-morrow, 19th, in the morning, and at Girard Avenue, Philadelphia, in the evening.

The Newtown Enterprise says: The Friends of Burlington Quarterly Meeting have bought the property at the southwest corner of Academy and Stockton streets, Trenton, and the same will be used as a home for aged and indigent Friends. A house on Overbrook avenue, in the same city, has been used temporarily since the home was established, about a year ago.

At Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, held at Race street on the 7th instant, the attendance was somewhat smaller than usual. The weather was threatening, and had been stormy. There was ministry by Isaac Wilson, Allen Flitcraft, Joseph Powell, Anna Smith, and Hannah W. Linton; Edwin L. Pierce offered prayer. In the business meeting, the three queries were considered. A member said there had been an increase of interest at Merion, since the bi-centennial anniversary, three years ago, and several new members had joined from there. The Visiting Committee made its report, (being the twelfth), and was continued. The Philanthropic Committee reported, and a nominating committee was appointed to propose names for a new committee.

The report of the Home Committee was read and approved, and the committee continued. During the past year the Home was moved from its location at 1708 Race street to a larger property purchased in Germantown, opposite Vernon Park. The property consists of a stone house of fourteen rooms, and a lot of 153 feet square, leaving ample room for enlargement. It was purchased for $21,500, all of which has been paid except a balance of $7,500. The Home is now open and has six members. The Treasurer's account showed a balance on hand of $2,013.56.

WE cannot resist our persecutors except by love.
—Charles Wordsworth.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—VIII.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE few days we spend with our children in Washington are now nearly at a close, and we need not mention the many places of interest that could well claim the attention of the curious and studious observer of both nature and art. But we were content with a small portion of this at the present time, taking only a glance through the new Congressional Library building, that is now complete, and is perhaps the greatest display of art found in any building decoration on the Continent. It must be seen to be appreciated, and we must leave it all for one more capable to describe. We spent an hour very pleasantly listening to one of the very able readers, who come at regular periods to read to the blind that may be gathered in to enjoy it.

First-day morning, 5th. We are surprised to find several inches of snow on the ground and still falling. The storm abated before meeting time, yet it doubtless prevented many from attending. We were pleased to find a good number present. Acknowledgments were made of an enjoyable meeting, and strong desires are felt that our members residing in the city would be loyal to their Society's interests. We spent the afternoon with our children and a few other Friends in the home of our son and wife, and on Second-day morning, bidding them farewell, we took train for Baltimore. We found quite an addition to the snow, which covered the pines and all shrubbery by the way, and presented a beautiful picture, and the ride seemed only short until we were with our friends John J. and Eliza Cornell to spend only a few hours pleasantly before going on to Chester to spend the night with our friend Caroline V. Cutler and family, who, though we are loath to feel they are no longer members of our yearly meeting, yet proffer us the same kind hospitality that their Canadian home always afforded.

Third-day morning we leave in time to attend the Quarterly Meeting in Philadelphia, and not having felt at all certain that we should return in time for this, it seemed a pleasant surprise alike to ourselves and the meeting. After partaking of lunch, provided in an adjoining room, where we met many Friends socially, we go by trolley to Jenkintown to stop off at the home of our friend Charles F. Wilson, whose door is always open to his many friends that share his kind hospitality.

On Fourth-day morning we attended the meeting of ministers and elders. It was much smaller than usual, owing no doubt to the very inclement weather, but was another evidence of the blessing to the few. Notwithstanding the weather being so extremely cold, I went to Philadelphia, accompanied by our host, Charles Wilson, and was privileged to listen in the evening to an address by Dr. Lyman Abbott, under the auspices of the Alumni Association of Friends' Central School.

Fifth-day morning, the storm abated, but the mercury, about zero, prevented some of our elderly Friends, and others having a distance to come, from attending the quarterly meeting. It was, however, one of those favored occasions that is not easily forgotten, and many expressions of thankfulness at the close bore evidence of appreciation. It is seldom we experience a colder drive than we had in going to dine with our friends Thomas and Mary Thomson, after meeting. Then after a very short but enjoyable visit, we must leave to call a few hours upon our friend Joseph Hallowell and family, which we enjoyed very much, returning then to our friend's home. Sixth-day morning finds us rested, and prepared to meet what the indications of last night pointed so strongly to, viz., ten below zero, but a clear bright morning, and my own feelings willingly responding to an invitation from the Matron of the Abington School to meet with them in their morning exercise; this led me there at the proper time and I trust in right line of service.

We spent the remainder of the forenoon in social mingling, and employed in some necessary writing, and soon after dinner bade our kind friends adieu and returned to Philadelphia. I. W.

Philadelphia, Second month 11.

A FAVORABLE VIEW.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE INTELLIGENCER has so ably upheld the peace principles of the Society of Friends during the whole course of our recent sad war experience, that it is a cause for deep regret to see it, now that the war is over, seeming to sink into a hopeless pessimism as to the outlook for the future. In its anxiety because of the unusual prominence given to military affairs at the present time, it seems to believe that all other interests are neglected.

In the issue of Twelfth month 10, it writes of heroism shown in rescue from shipwreck, and asks "Why is it that less honor is given to physical courage shown in these and like cases, than is lavished upon those who show physical courage in battle?" The answer is simple. No less honor is given. There is innate in human beings an admiration for bravery [? courage], and the man who fearlessly faces death is accounted a hero. But the admiration is doubled if the risk is run to save others, and an act of moral heroism receives full appreciation from even the most debased. Our newspapers are full of such acts of heroism; and magazines and theatres, which are good tests of the public feeling, never fail to score a success when they present scenes of physical bravery, done in real unselfishness for the benefit of others.

In the editorial of First month 28, the INTELLIGENCER argues that in what we call civilization at the present time, the material advancement has outstripped the ethical,—that with the increase of knowledge has not come proportionate moral growth. Is this true?

If we look over our country with our eyes fixed on the evils that exist, we shall see many,—we shall see poverty, misery, and injustice. We have an army of unemployed, a greater army of unpaid. We have slums, sweatshops, houses of debauchery, and saloons. We are culpably negligent in regard to child labor, and in the treatment of paupers and criminals there exist not only abuses, but horrors. Politics are controlled by bosses, lynchings of Negroes are not infrequent, and we have started in our second "Century of Dishonor" in our treatment of the Indian. These things and others that will occur to all who read make a dark picture.

But is this "civilization"? Is this "the state of being reclaimed from the rudeness of savage life, and advanced in arts and learning," as the "Century-Dictionary" gives the definition of civilization?

These things are what cling to us from the past. Bad as they are, they have in most cases succeeded something far worse. As we advance in civilization, we shall drop them off as a garment outgrown. Even now, we have for almost every evil an organized body of people working against it. We have Temperance, Purity and Peace Societies, Prison Reform Associations, Societies for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children and to Animals—to give free legal aid to the poor, to work for the rights of the Indian, to care for almost every class of afflicted human beings. We have but to compare the treatment given now to any unfortunates with that given the same class even fifty years ago, to realize the great advance in humanitarian ideals.

Even in the troublous time of the past summer, the attention of the whole people was quite as much occupied with what the Red Cross and the Women's Relief Associations were doing as with the movement of the soldiers. The one fact of the influence of women in public affairs at the present time is of itself a proof of the world's advancement.

Our voters are often thoughtless; they seem inclined to sell their birthright for a very small mess of pottage, but there has never yet been, I think, an instance in this country, where the voters of any locality have decided any matter in direct opposition to the expressed moral convictions of the women of that locality. If the morality of a disfranchised class can control in politics, we need not despair of future advancement in ethics.

No reform is impossible in a country where every man is a voter. We have passed through perils before, and the common sense, and honest conscience of the majority have brought us, generally, to the right side, even if after some delay. This they will do again.

Let us be hopeful. Let us have faith—faith in God, and faith in each other, who are his children, made in his image.

"For right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty
To falter would be sin."

New York City.

ANNA M. JACKSON.

FROM A NEW MEMBER.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I HAVE read with interest the letters of Isolated Friends, published in the INTELLIGENCER from time to time, and feel that I can sympathize with them in their isolated condition, as I am one among them. I joined the Society in 1894, and I believe I was led by the hand of God to join with Friends. I am entirely isolated from their meetings, and when I do not get my INTELLIGENCER to read on First-days I miss it as one does when they are deprived of the privilege of attending their church. I sincerely believe in their principles, and it is a comfort to know I am one with them.

As our Society has no formal creed telling us what we must believe to be saved, we are at times very harshly judged by some. Each member must stand alone and be led, as Jesus was, by the Spirit of God, or as George Fox said, "Mind the Light." In I. John it says: "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but try the spirits whether they are of God: because many false prophets are gone out into the world." When we have found the right spirit, which the world hates but cannot destroy, let us not be ashamed to follow that spirit as Jesus and his disciples did. Every Friend, standing alone with God as they do, must, it seems to me, believe in Divine revelation. God has said to his prophets in the past, speak these words and I will bless thee. And they have spoken his words, and told of a Saviour that would come to save us from sin. He came in human form, he was crucified by cruel hands, but he left disciples to go on with the work he commenced. His enemies have never been able to destroy that Comforter which he promised to send his people.

One of his closest followers says: "I was in the spirit on the Lord's day, and I heard behind me a great voice, as of a trumpet saying: What thou seest, write in a book, and send unto the seven churches." He listened to the directions of God, and followed the true spirit. In John's revelation there are many strange things, which the world, with all its knowledge, can never understand. God alone can open the eyes of his people, and through his spirit they can understand. He will continue to reveal unto us, if we "Mind the Light." Are there not in our spiritual life to-day, hands clasped in true friendship, and does God not reach down and touch such hands and by his Divine power bless them?

Madison, Wis.

S. C. W.

To a worthy cobbler named Vandenbrouck has been awarded the prize of 3,000 francs, which under the will of the late M. de Reverdy, of Paris, is given every two years to the French workingman who exhibits in competition for it the largest and most exemplary family of children. Vandenbrouck's children are sixteen in number, all of them pictures of health, and examples of good training. They live in a neat little house which the father built, and eleven of them are accustomed to sleep in a large bedroom on the second floor. The happy father used half of his prize money in paying off a mortgage on his little home. There were sixty-eight competitors, who had 466 living children.

THE increased use of the mails brought about by cheap postage is strikingly illustrated by the case of British colonies which have had penny postage since Christmas. The mail from England to Canada has increased 50 per cent. and the East Indies and West Indies both gain 30 per cent.

ROBERT COLLEGE, at Constantinople (established by Americans), has just finished its thirty-fifth year, in which year it enrolled 250 students. Of these 88 were Greeks, 87 Armenians, 49 Bulgarians, and 10 Turks. Seven-ninths of the expenses were borne by the students.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

HUNTINGTON, IND.—The Young Friends' Association met First month 27, at the home of Vincent and Emma Moore. The chairman for the evening was Stacy Moore. After a few moments of silence the regular business was transacted. The term of officers having expired others were chosen for the ensuing year. The executive committee also was chosen.

A paper entitled "The Possibilities of Life," was then read by William Moore. Conditions were set forth under which the physical, mental, and moral standards might be made much higher.

After some discussion the meeting adjourned.

We believe that our Association is productive of much good.
WM. C. MOORE, Cor. Sec.

POSTPONED MEETING.—Philadelphia Young Friends' Association, owing to the storm, held no meeting on the 13th, and it was postponed to the 20th.

CINCINNATI, O.—The Friends' Association of Cincinnati met in the parlors of the Social Settlement, Second month 5. An interesting paper was read by Miss Tuckerman, head-worker of the settlement, on "What the church should do for the poor around us." The chairman, Edwin Griest, at the close of the meeting, proposed that our Association send a letter to the Czar, expressing our approval of his suggestion for a Peace Conference, also that a letter be sent to the President of the United States, showing our approval of such a movement. The executive committee was given charge of the matter.

The following is an abstract from Miss Tuckerman's paper: "There are two broad classifications of the poor, the Catholic and the Protestant. The Catholic poor do not leave their church, as the Protestant poor. The reason for this is, the clergy and sisterhood are themselves poor, and are kept close to the people. Another reason is, the churches [the houses of worship] with their nobility and dignity, belong to the people. The people paid for them and feel that they are their own institutions.

"The Protestant church presents a maze. There is the institutional church, the fashionable church, which may be called a religious club, the mission church, the avowedly labor church, oftener found in England than here.

"The charitable work of the church is not effectual. The poor people find out just how much money is distributed among them and calculate what each will receive, and rely upon this for subsistence. The churches should be organized for this distribution of charity and prevent one of the most corrupt influences. The ideal church should know its people so thoroughly that it would not allow them to live off the charity of the church.

"The spirit of the church must be absolutely sincere: it must cast off prejudices, stand as brother to brother until these mistakes are obviated. Jesus himself was poor and honored poverty. All the church needs is a sincere attitude, and then there will not be a question of the rich and poor."

In the discussion on this subject, E. H. Foster said: "It seems that the Christian church above all should do work for the poor, for that was Christ's main work, and the work of the early church fathers. A very large part of the work has been injurious rather than beneficial. It is a scientific problem which the church has not recognized. At Harvard there are courses devoted to the study of charity, conducted by several able professors. This shows the difficulty in getting hold of the problem. We might ask the question, 'Who are the poor?' They are divided into three classes:

"(1) Those who from sudden misfortune, accident, or death, have been deprived of the supporters of the family. These have to be tided over at such times. Our modern industries have much to do with this class. Some people have learned a certain trade, and being thrown out of work become straitened in circumstances. Here the church may render enough assistance for them to help themselves, temporarily educate them, or give them a start at some other work.

"(2) The poverty of some is due to competition of machinery. After the invention of the power-loom, it was impossible for the hand-weaver to compete with the power-looms. A great deal could be done by churches in teaching the people another line of work. But this is not a simple thing to do, for it would require intelligence, skill, and tact on the part of the church people. Yet more could be done by churches in spending money in more profitable ways than is now accomplished.

"(3) People, who from poverty or inheritance have lost all hope and do not care to rise. They want to be left in poverty so long as there is enough to keep them alive. This is the hardest class to reach, and it can be accomplished only by personal, individual effort wisely directed. The Salvation Army does great good here. We have to 'raise the standard of living,' using the phrase of the political economist. A great work can be done with the children. Clean them up. Let them see how cleanly, cheerful surroundings are better than a sordid environment. Yet, as General Booth said, this work of relieving the poor is expensive. The average cost of taking a person from the slums, reforming him, and starting him out on a line of work, costs $15. This amount seems small, indeed, to us. Now the American people have spent $200,000,000 on the war, and we are not through with it yet. If the country gets through with a billion, it will do well. Suppose this money be spent in relieving suffering, poverty, giving men a new start in life! It would bring about a millenium.

"Some one might say this money would not be wisely spent by the government. The Europeans have said that the American people are unable to solve a difficult problem. But it would be no more difficult a task than raising the Filipinos to a state in which we can confer citizenship upon them. The church should try to create a public sentiment against war. Each individual should 'bear his testimony,' as Friends say. A public sentiment created in this way would solve the poor question."

RUTH BUTTERWORTH, Sec.

HORSHAM, PA.—The Young Friends' Association of Horsham held its meeting First month 29. Thomas P. Conard opened the meeting by reading from 1st Corinthians. Comly Walton read an excellent essay, in which he asked, "Who shall show us any good?" He thought it best to have an able speaker with us at our meetings; some one who would rouse the members. Susan Jarrett did not approve of having a stranger with us every time, but thought we all enjoyed it occasionally. The advices from the Discipline were read by Kate Smith. Anna Thomson read "The Meeting," by Whittier. Morris Penrose, who was to have read at this meeting, not being present, Anna Jarrett volunteered to read a sketch from the Life of Henry Drummond, by Lyman Abbott.

A sketch of the life of Samuel J. Leveck, by Anna D. Hollowell, was next read by Lydia Parry.

After a short silence the meeting adjourned to meet Second month 26.

E. B. M.

WILMINGTON, DEL.—The Young Friends' Association of Wilmington, held a very interesting and instructive meeting Sixth-day evening, the 10th. Matilda Ferris read a biographical and historical paper on the life of Mary Springett Penington, wife of Isaac, embracing many interesting incidents of the civil war and state of society in England during those stormy times. Miriam Worrell Webb read E. Stuart Phelps Ward's essay, entitled "Russia as a Missionary," which was listened to with absorbing interest.

Levi Taylor read from W. T. Stead's article in the Review of Reviews of his interview with Czar Nicholas; this was interspersed with Levi's own remarks and observations, containing valuable information, and was of great interest. D. Ferris read a short account of a meeting held the evening before at the Unitarian house to hear Anna Everinoff, a Russian noble-woman, who is now in this country to endeavor to arouse greater interest in the Czar's Peace Proposal.

There were remarks, and words of appreciation from several present. There was a good attendance, although the thermometer was below zero, and all seemed to feel rewarded for coming.

D. F.

Current Literature.

THE life of the Jewish people on the "East Side" of New York City has been depicted in a series of stories by Abraham Cahan, which have been gathered into a volume with the title, "The Imported Bridegroom, and Other Stories of the New York Ghetto." (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.) It is not too much to say of these that they are among the most interesting and striking descriptions of real life in our great cities that have yet been published.

The "Ghetto," in the usage of Old World cities, is the quarter occupied by the Jews, and the section of New York City in which they are most numerous may not inappropriately be called by that name. The writer of these stories, Abraham Cahan, (himself a Hebrew, we believe), is obviously very familiar with many aspects of the life which is led in the Ghetto, and he brings to his description a lively sense of humor as well as an artistic touch. There is one thing very notable,—his stories are clean. There is one where a poor, struggling young couple, Boris and Tanya, take a boarder, Dalsky, and the young wife presently finds him more interesting to her than her husband; but the end of the story, though it leaves the pair separated, presents Tanya as endeavoring to "live down," in the hardship of her occupation, the passion which has sprung up in her breast.

"The Imported Bridegroom," the longest of the stories, is delightful in its sketches of Jewish life and character in New York and Poland. Another relates how Nathan and his affianced, Goldy, spent all their money on a splendid wedding party, in the belief that they would then get many fine presents, and be quite able to set up housekeeping in good style,—and how this very plausible scheme proved an utter failure.

The language spoken by many of the Jews in New York, and repeatedly referred to in this volume is "Yiddish,"—i. e., Jewish, a dialect compounded of Polish, and German with Hebrew. The Jews of New York are mostly of these nationalities, and "Yiddish" affords them a common bond and means of speech. If they are always so well represented in literature as by Abraham Cahan, they will be fortunate.

Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood, Secretary of the American Peace Society, has written an important little book, urging and showing the practicability of "The Federation of the World." Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, will publish it immediately.

Besides a good deal of war matter, the Century, this month, has some excellent articles of travel, exploration, etc. Walter Wellman, commander of the Wellman Polar Expedition, writing under date of August 2, 1898, from "the most northerly inhabited house in the world," describes the experiences of his party thus far "On the Way to the North Pole." The opening paper, entitled "Harnessing the Nile," is ex-Consul-General Penfield's account of the proposed creation of a vast reservoir at the first cataract, having two or three times the superficial area of Lake Geneva, its object being the irrigation of agricultural Egypt. "What Charles Dickens Did for Childhood," with full-page illustrations by Albert Sterner, is the title of a very interesting paper by Mr. James L. Hughes, Inspector of Public Schools, Toronto, showing that Dickens was one of Fröbel's earliest supporters in the English-speaking world.

Discoursing upon the reasons why England and the United States should maintain friendship, Julian Ralph, in his article on "Anglo-Saxon Affinities," in Harper's Magazine, makes the statement that in all likelihood two out of every three English families have relatives in America. Other causes cited by Mr. Ralph are the great number of marriages between not only the aristocracy, but the middle classes, of the two nations, the large industrial interests of Englishmen in the United States, and the fact that both nations have the same lofty conception of their mission as civilizers of the world.

None of these reasons, however, is so important as the fact that the two nations stand for individual liberty, and the rule of the civil law. It is this, more than all else, that unites them.

The "Life of Edwin M. Stanton," which Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, will publish in a few weeks, should be a very interesting work. We have repeatedly referred to the facts of his Quaker ancestry. The work makes two volumes, and is written with the full sanction of the Stanton family by George C. Gorham, for some years Secretary of the United States Senate.

One of the most sensible, suggestive, and interesting magazine articles lately published is that by Jane Addams, the devoted Superintendent of Hull House, Chicago, in this month's Atlantic. She discusses "The Subtle Problems of Charity," and her paper is enlivened with many quaint and humorous experiences and incidents. The difficulties in being practically charitable so as really to do good without arousing antagonism and suspicion are clearly and interestingly set forth.

GROWING OLD.

[Author not stated. Sent by Jonathan W. Plummer to an old-time friend, aged 70, and the last verse added by the friend.]

SOFTLY, oh softly, the years have swept by thee,
Touching thee lightly, with tenderest care,
Sorrow and death have been often brought nigh thee,
Yet they have left thee but beauty to wear.
Growing old gracefully, gracefully fair.

Far from the storms that as lashing the ocean,
Nearer each day to the pleasant home-light,
Far from the waves that are big with commotion
Under full sail, and the harbor in sight.
Growing old cheerfully, cheerful and bright.

Past all the winds that were adverse and chilling,
Past all the islands that lured thee to rest,
Past all the currents that drew thee unwilling
Far from thy course to the land of the blest.
Growing old peacefully, peaceful and blest.

Never a feeling of envy or sorrow
When the bright faces of children are seen,
Never a year from the young would thou borrow,
Thou dost remember what lieth between.
Growing old willingly, thankful, serene.

Rich in experience, angels might covet,
Rich in a faith that hath grown with each year,
Rich in a love, that grew from, and above it,
Soothing thy sorrows, and hushing each fear.
Growing old wealthily, loving and dear.

Hearts at the sound of thy coming are lightened,
Ready and willing thy hand to relieve;
Many a face at thy kind word has brightened,
"It is more blessed to give than receive."
Growing old happily, ceasing to grieve.

Eyes that grow dim on the earth and its glory,
Have a sweet recompense youth cannot know,
Ears that grow dull to the world and its story
Drink in the songs that from Paradise flow.
Growing old graciously, purer than snow.

Guided in truth by the indwelling spirit,
Earth's empty honors declining to greet;
Faithfully, meekly, obeying Christ's leadings,
This is what maketh the life work complete.
Filled with humility, gentle and sweet.

THE WASHINGTON MONUMENT.

Oh pure, white shaft upspringing to the light
With one grand leap of heavenward-reaching might,
Calmly against the blue forevermore
Lift thou the changeless type of souls that soar
Above the common dust of sordid strife
Into the radiant ether of a life
Shepherded by the vastness of eternity!
A hero's quickening spirit lifteth thee
Unto the skies that claim thee for their own:
In those vast fields of light, sublime, alone,
High commune holdest thou with the young day,
With sunset's glowing heart ere twilight gray
Hath stilled its throbbing fires, and with dim night
That folds thee softly in the silver light
Of many a dreaming moon. In majesty
Serene, like the great name enshrined in thee,
Thou dost defy the all-destroying years.
Smite with thy still rebuke our craven fears!
Point us forever to the highest height,
And in our Nation's peril-hours shine white
With thy mute witness to the undying power
Of the high soul that lives above the hour!

—Julia Larned, in Scribner's Magazine.

THE GREAT SALT LAKE.

THIS remarkable lake is described by the Salt Lake City Register, which remarks that the Dead Sea is the only body of water comparable to it.

Think of a lake from 2,500 to 3,000 square miles in area, lying a thousand miles inland, at an altitude of 4,250 feet above the sea level, whose waters are six times as salt as those of the ocean, and, while it has no outlet, four large rivers, pouring their ceaseless floods of fresh water into it without raising its mysterious surface a fraction of an inch, or ever diminishing, so far as chemical analysis can determine, its indescribable saltiness. Where does all the water go? Where does all the salt, that no streams can freshen, come from? Where are the vast saline magazines from which it draws its everlasting supplies? One may stand upon its shores and ask a thousand such questions, but no answer comes from its mysterious depths, in which nothing lives but death and silence.

Salt Lake was once as large as Lake Huron, and was over a thousand feet deep. Its former benches and the marks of its olden wave plashings are as plain upon the mountain benches as though traced but yesterday. It is now about a hundred miles long, with an average width of from twenty-five to thirty miles. It is from fifty to sixty miles wide in some places, and its greatest depth is about sixty feet. Its waters contain 18 per cent. of solid matter, mostly salt and soda, with small proportions of sulphur, magnesia, calcium, bromide, potassium, lithia and boracic acid. The Asiatic Dead Sea water contains 23 per cent. of solids including less salt and soda, and much more magnesia, calcium, and potassium than Salt Lake. Atlantic Ocean water holds but 3.5 per cent. of solid material, of which salt constitutes 3.6 per cent. Hundreds of thousands of tons of salt are made by natural evaporation along the shores of the lake, and at one place near Salt Lake City a windy night never fails to pile up many tons of soda, eliminated by the movement of the waves.

Compared with this vast liquid treasure house of riches, the greatest bonanza mines of Utah or of the United States dwindle to beggars' penny boxes. Take out your pencil and do a little figuring.

Say Salt Lake is 100 miles long, and has an average width of 27 miles; that gives an area of 2,700 square miles. There are 27,878,400 square feet in a mile; so the lake has an area of 75,276,800,000 square feet. Take 20 feet as its average depth; then 20 times 75,271,680,000 will give us 1,505,433,600,000 cubic feet as the contents of the lake; 16⅓ per cent., or one-sixth of this, according to the analysis of eminent chemists, is salt and sulphate of soda.

That is, the lake contains 250,905,600,000 cubic feet of salt and sulphate of soda. Of this mass one-eighth is sulphate of soda, and seven-eighths common salt. A cubic foot of sulphate of soda weighs 50 pounds, and a cubic foot of common salt 80 pounds. So we have, as the contents, in part, of this unparalleled reservoir of wealth, 1,568,160,000,000 pounds, or 784,080,000 tons of sulphate of soda, and 17,560,339,200,000 pounds, or 8,789,169,600 tons of salt. Allowing 10 tons to a car load, that would be 78,408,000 cars of soda and 878,016,960 cars of salt.

The whole lake is dotted with magnificently picturesque mountainous islands or islandous mountains, rising out of the blue-green water to a height of from 3,000 to 5,000 feet. The principal of these wave-washed mountain beauty spots are Antelope, Stansbury, Fremont, Carrington, Gunnison, Dolphin, Mud, Egg, and Hat Islands. Antelope Island, the largest of them all, is sixteen miles long and five wide, and lies in plain view of Salt Lake City. It towers to an altitude of about 4,000 feet above the surface of the lake and abounds in exquisite scenery. Streams of pure sweet water tumble down its mountain sides and canyons; rich grasses flourish everywhere, and it is beautified by groves of trees, thrifty ranches, orchards and gardens. Vast deposits of slate of iridescent hues are found upon it. It has a glorious, gently sloping beach of snowy sand, and will, beyond all question, some day be the great fashionable bathing place of interior North America.

It may seem preposterous to talk of the finest sea bathing on earth, a thousand miles from the ocean; but truth is no less truth because it appears absurd. The sea bathing in Great Salt Lake infinitely surpasses anything of the kind on either the Atlantic or Pacific coasts. The water contains many times more salt and much more soda, sulphur, magnesia, chlorine, bromide, and potassium than any ocean water on the globe. It is powerful in medicinal virtues, curing or benefiting rheumatic gout, dyspepsia, nervous disorders and cutaneous diseases; and it acts like magic on the hair of those unfortunates whose tendencies are to bald-headedness. It is a prompt and pleasant tonic, the invigorant of body and mind, and then there is no end of fun in getting acquainted with the peculiarities. A first bath in it is always as good as a circus, the bather being his or her own trick mule. The specific gravity is but a trifle less than that of the Dead Sea, the actual figures with distilled water as unity being, for the ocean 1.027, for Salt Lake 1.107, and for the Dead Sea 1.116.

There is not a fish or any living thing in all the 2,500 or 3,000 square miles of beautiful waters, except the yearly increasing swarms of summer bathers. Not a shark or a stingaree to scare the timid swimmer or floater, not a crab or a crawfish to nip the toe of the nervous wader, not a minnow or a frog, a tadpole or a pollywog—nothing that lives, moves, crawls, or wriggles. It is the ideal sea bathing place of the world.

OLD AND NEW FURNITURE.

"A FRIEND of mine who has been too busy with the problem of ways and means to pay much attention to the adornment of his house, asked me yesterday to select for him a good piece of colonial mahogany, as he wanted to have one such piece in his house, and I declined to do so until I had explained to him the cost," said a scenic artist to a New York Sun reporter. "I knew that his furniture was oak and upholstered stuff, and that just so sure as he placed with it a good example of old mahogany, his troubles would begin. The mahogany would kill his oak, and, in course of time, it would mean the refurnishing of his house.

"His was a case of ignorance being bliss, and I did not propose to upset his household. I have seen the old mahogany disease work its way into many households, and in many cases the results have been disastrous. Talk about having a mortgage on your house, why that is nothing compared to the annoyance of finding that you have a lot of modern oak furniture on your hands, too good to throw away when you have once begun to collect old pieces. It has taken me nearly ten years to live down a collection of oak furniture which I made in St. Louis, and which has hung over me like the shadow of a great sorrow. I was boarding in St. Louis and doing work on a big production, when my wife and I decided that we didn't like boarding, and that we would try housekeeping. I had no time to spend in looking for a house, so we took the first one that we could find. We spent just one afternoon in furnishing it completely,—dishes, draperies, rugs, carpets, and an outfit of very new oak furniture. The result was just what might have been expected. Our house looked like a Grand Rapids show room. We moved to New York, leaving behind as much of our oak furniture as we could, but when we got settled here we found around us a lot of it which was too good to give away and which we could not sell.

"I had picked up by this time a few old pieces of mahogany, and the more I studied them the more I despised my oak. Then I built my house, and I was forced to move some of those pieces into it. I have been crowding them out by degrees ever since, however, and now I haven't got one modern oak piece left. In the meantime I have watched friends struggle with their modern furniture after they had picked up an old piece or two, and their troubles have been like mine. When my friend asked me yesterday to select an old piece for him, I told him what I have told you, and I said that, if after thinking it over for a week, he still wanted to make the plunge, I would help him. He will probably want to begin on an old chest of drawers, for that is usually the opening wedge, and then old andirons, tables with claw feet, and corner cabinets will follow, concluding with chairs, and the latter will keep him poor for the rest of his life. It's like the opium habit, and you can't shake it off."

PRIDE AND PRIDE.

Forward.

WE heard one day recently of a little girl who came home very jubilant over something that had happened in her class.

"I'm ever so proud of it, mother," said the little girl.

"But it is not right to be proud," replied the mother.

"Oh, but, mother, it is not a bad pride I feel, but a glad pride!" was the reply.

What a difference there is between a glad pride and a bad pride! One is virtue, the other is vice. One is the outgrowth of gratitude, the other is the result of self-conceit or something worse. All pride is bad that springs from our own vanity. All pride is glad that comes from good work done without any self-glory or self-interest as the impelling motive.

The mother who sees her own son grow up into a pure, manly, and noble young manhood, and who says out of the gratitude of heart, "I am proud of my son," feels a glad pride which the mother cannot feel whose son is acquiring wealth and mere worldly fame at the expense of truth and honor.

It is a fine thing when young people have done that which fills them with a glad pride. It is an evil thing when a bad pride takes possession of their hearts. Bad pride is always allied with weakness, while glad pride is coupled with moral strength. Here is something Lord Lytton once wrote about pride: "In beginning the world, if you don't wish to get chafed at every turn, fold up your pride, carefully put it under lock and key, and only let it out to air upon grand occasions. Pride is a garment all stiff brocade outside, all grating sackcloth on the side next to the skin."

This is good advice, but it would be better still if the writer had advised his readers not to let pride have even an occasional airing. Let us keep it under lock and key all of the time if it is of the bad kind.

A STORY OF PHILLIPS BROOKS.

THE Church Union puts into print this little incident in the life of Boston's great preacher:

A lady was traveling from Providence to Boston with her weak-minded father. Before they arrived he became possessed of a fancy that he must get off the train while it was still in motion; that some absolute duty called him.

His daughter endeavored to quiet him, but it was difficult to do it, and she was just giving up in despair when she noticed a very large man watching the proceedings intently over the top of his newspaper. As soon as he caught her eyes he rose and crossed quickly to her.

"I beg your pardon," he said, "you are in trouble. May I help you?"

She explained the situation to him.

"What is your father's name?" he asked.

She told him, and the large man, leaning toward the troubled old man, addressed him by name, shook hands cordially and engaged him in conversation so interesting and so cleverly arranged to keep his mind occupied that he forgot his need to leave the train, and did not think of it again until they were in Boston. Here the stranger put the lady and her charge in a carriage, received her assurance that she felt perfectly safe, cordially shook her hand, and was about to close the carriage door when she remembered that she had felt so safe in the keeping of this noble-looking man that she had not even asked his name. Hastily putting her hand against the door, she said:

"Pardon me, but you have rendered me such a service, may I not know whom I am thanking?"

The big man smiled as he answered, "Phillips Brooks," and turned away.

FABLES OF THE HOUR.

Springfield Republican.

THE IMPERIALIST, THE MUGWUMP AND THE ETHIOPIAN.

AN Imperialist and a Mugwump while traveling together (for a short distance) came upon an Ethiopian who was attacked by a Robber. Running quickly to the rescue, they threw stones at the Robber, and made him surrender his Booty. Struck by the beauty and value of his possessions, the Imperialist said to the Ethiopian, "All these things were Ceded to us by that Robber, and we will extend to them a Benevolent Assimilation. It return, let me give you this Bible." The Ethiopian, on this announcement, desisted from his Protestations of Gratitude and picked up his Club. The Mugwump, who had listened to the Conversation, timidly protested against robbing him of what he had been fighting for. While they were still debating the question, the indignant Ethiopian began to lay about him with his Club. "There," said the Angry Imperialist to the Mugwump, "your treason has excited this man to Open Rebellion." Then he made an end of the Ethiopian.

THE OCTOPUS, THE SHARK, AND THE LITTLE FISH.

A Shark, while swimming at a great distance from his Home, came upon a small Fish which was struggling in the Grasp of an Octopus. The Spectacle roused his Moral Indignation, and biting off one arm of the monster he compelled it to relinquish its grasp. Impressed with the tenderness and edibility of the Fish, he was on the point of swallowing it, when the latter protested, and seeing escape impossible weakly tried to bite. "Base wretch," cried the Shark, "have you no feelings of Proper Gratitude?"—and immediately swallowed the Fish.

THE Times-Democrat, of New Orleans, announces that the manuscript history of the Choctaws, by Dominique Rouquette, has been, with other manuscripts by that author, deposited for safe keeping with the Howard Memorial Library in New Orleans. It had been feared that this invaluable contribution to the history of one of the most interesting of the Indian tribes, had been destroyed by fire.

Women and Conservatism.

WHEN a man in Saco, Me., first employed a saleswoman, says Alice Stone Blackwell, the men boycotted his store, and the women remonstrated with him on the sin of which he was guilty, in placing a young woman in a position of such publicity. When Lucy Stone tried to secure for married women the right to their own property, women asked with scorn, "Do you think I would give myself where I would not give my property?" When Elizabeth Blackwell began to study medicine, the women at her boarding-house refused to speak to her, and women passing her on the streets would hold their skirts aside, so as not to touch her. It is a matter of history with what ridicule and opposition Mary Lyon's (founder of Mount Holyoke school), first efforts for the education of women were received, not only by the mass of men, but by the mass of women as well. In England, when the Oxford examinations were thrown open to women, the Dean of Chichester preached a sermon against it, in which he said: "By the sex at large, certainly, the new curriculum is not asked for. I have ascertained, by extended inquiry among gentlewomen, that, with true feminine instinct, they either entirely distrust, or else look with downright disfavor on so wild an innovation and interference with the best traditions of their sex."

In Eastern countries, where women are shut up in zenanas, and forbidden to walk the streets unveiled, the women themselves are among the strongest upholders of these traditional restrictions, which they have been taught to think add to their dignity. The Chinese lady is as proud of her small feet as any American "remonstrant" is of her political disabilities. Pundita Ramabai tells us that the idea of education for girls is so unpopular with the majority of Hindoo women that when a progressive Hindoo proposes to educate his little daughter it is not uncommon for the women of his family to threaten to drown themselves.

Original Science by the Children.

HERE are a few funny answers a teacher of Chicago received in "examination papers."

"The stomach is the most diluted portion of the elementary canal."

"The doctrine of evolution began with the beginning of life and grew higher and higher until it at last regenerated into monkey. This process was so slow that neither the monkey nor the man knew anything about it."

"A germ is a tiny insect, sometimes found in diseases or organs. It is so small that it can only be seen by a telescope. That is why diseases are contagious. At times it appears like the head of a pin, but it goes floating around into the atmosphere."

"Habeas corpus means, you may have the head, and I will take the body."

"A dowager is a widow without joints." (Jointures?)

"Pitt, Earl of Chatham, Premier of England, entered life at an early age, which office he held at a very early period in life, the time when most men are just finishing a professional education."

New York's Need of Shade Trees.

THE conclusion is inevitable that one of the great and pressing sanitary wants of New York city is an ample supply of trees. It is, in effect, destitute of trees; for the unsightly shrubs which are planted by citizens are, in no proper sense, adequate to the purpose which we contemplate. Its long avenues, running north and south, without a shade tree, and exposed to the full effect of the sun, are all but impassable at noonday in the summer months. The pedestrian who ventures out at such an hour, finds no protection from an umbrella, on account of the radiation of the intense heat from the paved surface. Animals and man alike suffer from exposure in the glowing heat. Nothing mitigates its intensity but the winds or an occasional rainstorm. And when evening comes on, the cooling of the atmosphere produced by vegetation does not occur, and unless partially relieved by favoring winds or a shower, the heat continues, but little abated, and the atmosphere remains charged with noxious and irrespirable gases. It is evident that shade trees, of proper kinds, and suitably arranged, supply the conditions necessary to counteract the evils of excessive heat. They protect the paved streets and the buildings largely from the direct rays of the sun; they cool the lower stratum of air by evaporation from their immense surfaces of leaves; they absorb at once the malarious emanations and gases of decomposition, and abstract their poisonous properties for their own consumption; they withdraw from the air the carbonic acid thrown off from the animal system as a poison, and decomposing it, appropriate the element dangerous to man, and give back to the atmosphere the essential to his health and even life.—[From Vegetation a Remedy for the Summer Heat of Cities, by Dr. Stephen Smith, in Popular Science Monthly.]

America and Europe: a Military Comparison.

A WHOLE continent of our globe, twice as large as the European continent, having 8,000,000 square miles and 80,000,000 inhabitants—North America—is divided into three political dominions: Canada, the United States, and Mexico. As none of these countries covets the territory of the other, there are on this vast continent only 114,453 soldiers and marines, one military man for 700 inhabitants, while in Europe there is one for 108. The American proportion would give 514,286 men for all the European armies. As there are no savage elements in Europe to be restrained by arms, half of the North American contingent ought to be enough to maintain internal order there. Europe needs only 300,000 soldiers at most; all the others are supported in deference to the idolatry for square miles. This additional military force exceeds 3,300,000 men, and costs 4,508,000,000 francs ($901,600,000) a year. And this is the direct loss entailed by the spirit of conquest; and yet it is trifling as compared with the indirect losses.

First, there are 3,300,000 men under the flags. If they were not soldiers, and were following lucrative occupations and earning only 1,000 francs ($200) a head, they might produce $760,000,000. The $900,000,000 absorbed now by military expenditures would bring five per cent. if invested in agricultural and industrial enterprises. This would make another $45,000,000. The twenty-eight days of the reserves are worth at least $40,000,000. Here, then, is an absolutely palpable sum of $845,000,000. But what a number of colossal losses escape all valuation! Capital produces capital. If $1,800,000,000 were saved every year from military expenses and poured into industrial enterprises, they would produce benefits beyond our power to estimate.—[From "The Spirit of Conquest," by J. Novicow, in Appletons' Popular Science Monthly.]

Trusts in "Natural Gas Belt."

COMMISSIONER McCORMICK, of the Arbitration Board of the State of Indiana, makes a statement concerning the formation of "Trusts" in the "natural gas belt" of that State. He says: "In no place in the country is the baneful influence of trusts felt to a greater extent than in the Indiana gas belt. They are not trammelled by State laws and they defy federal authority. They always adjust wages to the very lowest scale. They refuse to confer with their men; they refuse to arbitrate. All propositions, in case of a strike, are rejected, and they shut down their plants to starve the men out. Blanket injunctions are prayed for by these illegal corporations, and it is a sorry commentary that the eagerness with which injunctions are sought is only equalled by the ease with which they are granted. Thus these unlawful institutions—in Indiana at least—feast to satiety upon despoiled labor, destroy honorable competition, stifle legitimate enterprise, appreciate the price of their product to extortion, and levy unjust tribute on the consumer—all in violation and defiance of the law."

One of the consequences, it is stated, has been a very general reduction of wages in all the important industries, and often to as radical an extent as 45 per cent.

"Zero Weather."

NEARLY the whole country experienced unusual cold last week. The change at Philadelphia came on the 8th inst. The morning reports, 8 a. m., of the Weather Bureau in this city were: 8th, 24; 9th, 1; 10th, 6 below; zero; 11th, 4 below zero; 12th, 5 above. Private thermometers in the suburbs of the city were 8 and 10 degrees below on the 10th. At other places much lower figures were registered, on that morning. At Newtown, Pa., the Enterprise reported that thermometers generally showed 10 to 15 below, and one, "at Cyrus Hillborn's, at 6 a. m.," was 22 below. Phoenixville reported 15 and 16 below, Bristol, 8 to 10; Yardley, 15. At Norristown as low as 10. At Pittsburgh it fell to 20 below, being the coldest on record there, and all over Pennsylvania it was generally from 20 to 30 below.

In Florida, on the morning of the 9th, there was freezing temperature "as far south as a line traced from a point a little south of Tampa to the Atlantic coast just north of Jupiter, Tampa showing a minimum temperature of 30 degrees and Jupiter a minimum of 36 degrees. At Jacksonville a minimum of 28 degrees was reached."

Denver reported, on the 9th, "the sixteenth day's great snow-storm in the mountains." Leadville reported a "desperate situation," for want of coal, the railroads being blocked. Chicago reported that city "in the grip of the coldest weather since 1872."

WAR AND PEACE NOTES.

WHAT Prof. Sumner called "the conquest of the United States by Spain" is now a very serious menace. We have begun our work of civilization in the far East exactly as Spain began hers in Cuba and Mexico and Peru. The sword reaps the first harvest.—[Springfield Republican.]

THE deficit in the national revenue, last month, was $9,347,840, and the deficit for the fiscal year to date is $92,867,983. The war with Spain has been over for several months, but army expenses in January were nearly four times what they were a year ago, and navy expenses are 60 per cent. larger.

AT a "banquet" in Boston, last week, Admiral Sampson was one of the speakers. Among other things he said: "We must have more ships, more guns, and all that goes to constitute an efficient navy." He went on to say: "The increased territory which we have added to our country will probably produce an increase in our chances for war by at least 100 per cent.," and added that the navy would probably be increased as much—that is to say, doubled.

THE naval committee of the House of Representatives will advise the construction of three battle ships, three heavily armored cruisers, costing about $25,000,000 when placed in commission. "No such expensive naval program," it is stated, "has ever been brought forward in this country before, yet very little opposition to it is anticipated."

IN the case of General Eagan, the Commissary-General of the regular army, who was found guilty by the court-martial for his abusive language directed at General Miles, the "finding" was approved by President McKinley, but the sentence of dismissal from the service was "commuted to suspension from rank and duty for six years." It is explained that he will draw his "pay," during the six years, the same as if he had not been court-martialed, but that "he loses his allowances, which include commutation of quarters, rations, and fuel, and his horse allowance." These several "allowances" are stated to be "quite a large financial item."

A REMARKABLE memorial, objecting to the ratification of the so-called "Peace Treaty," was presented to the United States Senate, before the vote on the 6th instant. Its arguments against the Treaty were very earnest and forcible. It was signed by twenty-four persons, as follows: Charles Francis Adams, Boston; Felix Adler, New York City; George S. Boutwell, (ex-Secretary United States Treasury); John G.

Carlisle, (ex-Secretary United States Treasury); Andrew Carnegie, Grover Cleveland, Dr. Theodore L. Cuyler, President Charles W. Eliot, Harvard University; Samuel Gompers, (president of the American Federation of Labor); John B. Henderson, (ex-United States Senator from Missouri); William B. Hornblower, New York City; William J. Palmer, (president Rio Grande Western Railroad); Wheeler H. Peckham, New York City; Bishop Henry C. Potter, N. Y.; Sherman S. Rogers, Buffalo; Carl Schurz, Edward M. Shepard, Brooklyn; Edwin Burritt Smith, Chicago; Moorfield Storey, Boston; Prof. William G. Sumner, Yale University; Dr. Henry Van Dyke, Prof. Herman Von Holst, Chicago University; Pres. William L. Wilson, Washington and Lee University, Va.; Dr. Theodore S. Woolsey, Yale University.

METEOROLOGICAL SUMMARY FOR FIRST MONTH, 1899.

Mean barometer,	30.200
Highest barometer during the month at 8 a. m., 2nd,	30.989
Lowest barometer during the month, 24th,	29.396
Mean temperature,	32.4
Highest temperature during the month, 5th,	55.
Lowest temperature during the month, 2nd and 11th,	6.
Mean of maximum temperatures,	40.
Mean of minimum temperatures,	24.8
Greatest daily range of temperature, 17th,	27.
Least daily range of temperature, 9th,	7.
Mean daily range of temperature,	15.4
Mean relative humidity, per cent.,	68.4
Mean temperature of the Dew Point,	22.2
Total precipitation in inches, rain and melted snow,	4.13
Greatest precipitation in any 24 consecutive hours, 1.27 inches of rain, on the 6th and 7th.
Number of days on which .01 inch or more of rain fell, 12.
Number of clear days 12, fair days 9, cloudy days 10.
Prevailing direction of wind from the Northwest and Southwest.
Thunder storm on the 24th.
Sleet on the 1st.
Solar halo on the 10th, 21st.
Lunar halo on the 17th, 26th, 22nd.

SENSIBLE TEMPERATURE DATA.

Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 51.5 on 5th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 6.5 on 11th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 26.2.
Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 44 on 4th and 16th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 8 on 1st.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 29.4.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer for this month, 27.8

NOTE.—The mean temperature for the month, 32.4°, is very near the normal for First month, and 3° below the corresponding month in 1898.

The amount of precipitation, 4.13 inches, is about one-half inch more than the normal

Snow fell on the 1st, 12th, 26th, 28th, 30th, and 31st.
Total snow fall during the month 6.9 inches, 4.5 inches of which fell on the 1st, and 2.2 inches on the 31st.

The very unusual high Barometric pressure (for this section) of 31.000 inches occurred between 9 a. m., and 10 a. m., on the 2nd inst.

JOHN COMLY, Observer.

Centennial Avenue, Philadelphia, First month 31.

WHAT is a first, second, third, and fourth-class post-office? is a question frequently asked. A first-class post-office is one where the gross receipts are $40,000 and upwards; a second-class office is one where the receipts run from $8,000 to $40,000; a third class office is one in which the receipts run from $1,000 to $8,000; all other offices are fourth-class. Before any office can have a free delivery the receipts must be $10,000 or more. The President nominally appoints the first, second, and third-class postmasters, but the business is usually in charge of the Fourth Assistant Postmaster-General.

Two plans for "soap trusts" are said to be before the leading dealers of Chicago, one of them representing a capital stock of $100,000,000. The other, promoted by Boston capitalists, represents $29,000,000.

THE State of Missouri has presented to the United States "statuary hall" in the Capitol at Washington, statues of Thomas H. Benton and Francis P. Blair. Formal addresses of presentation were made on the 6th instant.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE fighting on the island of Luzon, around the city of Manila, continued on different days of last week, the United States troops forcing the Filipinos back. A dispatch from Manila, on the afternoon of the 12th, described affairs as "quiet," but added that "despite this, many are asking whether the problem is not still far from solution." The Filipinos have, it seems, "scattered throughout the country," and are fighting in "guerrilla" fashion, except at one point, Malabon, "where they are gathered in force." For miles around the country is a jungle, "so dense, in many places, that the eye cannot penetrate it." The plan of the Filipinos, in their struggles with the Spanish, was to retire to these fastnesses when beaten in the open. In the engagements that have taken place, one tribe, the Ygorotes, were "only armed with bows and arrows."

THE losses of the Filipinos have been very great. Their slaughter in action was substantially like that of the "der-vishes" on the Nile, at Omdurman, a few weeks ago, in the fighting with the English army under Kitchener. The der-vishes were then said to be "mown down" by the machine guns of the English. In the conflict near Manila, up to the 12th, the United States loss is said to be 65 killed, 257 wounded, 2 missing, while the native people have had "fully 2,500 killed, and wounded vastly in excess of that number,"—a total loss, it would appear, of from 6,000 upwards. Some of the native villages were "shelled" by the war-ships, and several were burned.

The Filipino Junta, at Hong Kong, sent out reports of the situation. They declare that "the Americans began hostilities" on the 4th, and assert that "the bombardment of defenseless places caused frightful slaughter among the women and children," adding that "it is estimated that 4,000 of them were killed."

WHEN the vote on the "Peace Treaty" was taken, on the 6th inst., it was said to be understood that a vote would then be taken on the "declaratory" resolution offered by Senator McEnery. This, however, was not done, and on the 11th, Senator Mason, of Illinois, (who is opposed to the acquisition of the Philippines, but voted to ratify the Treaty), earnestly complained and vigorously insisted on the vote being taken. It was agreed at the close of his speech that this should be done on the 13th. On that day, however, in consequence of the storm, there was no quorum, and no business was transacted. On the 14th the resolution was passed, 26 to 23. The voting was not upon any previous line of division; Senator Hale voted aye, Senator Hoar no.

FOLLOWING upon the excessively cold weather of last week, the Atlantic coast experienced a heavy snow-storm, on the 12th and 13th inst., which blocked the railroads, and substantially brought business to a stand-still. This was accompanied by low temperature, (about 8 above zero), and by high winds, which latter caused much drifting. There were unprecedentedly low temperatures in the South, on the 13th, the mercury falling to 12 degrees below zero, at Nashville, (2 degrees below the lowest record there), Atlanta 6 below zero, (4 lower than any previous experience), at New Orleans 6 above zero, (9 lower than ever known).

The snow ceased, at Philadelphia, on the night of the 13th, and the cold abated during next day, so that railway traffic could be partially resumed. Nearly all the street-car lines in Philadelphia remained closed until late on the 14th.

THE "deficiency of temperature," compared with the normal, at Philadelphia, last week, was as follows: 6th, 1 degree; 7th, 4 degrees; 8th, 9 degrees; 9th, 27 degrees; 10th, 33 degrees; 11th, 34 degrees; 12th, 26 degrees. Up to and including the 13th, (which was deficient 25 degrees), the deficiency for the month had reached 185 degrees. The snow-fall for this month, at Philadelphia, had reached 23½ inches at 8 o'clock on the 13th, and 6 to 8 inches were added that day, making about 30 inches altogether up to 8 a. m. on the 14th,—the storm having ceased in the night.

THE most energetic effort is to be made in the United States Senate to drive through the Army bill, authorizing an increase of the "regular" army to 100,000 men. The President insists on its passage, "as an emergency measure," and has notified those whom he consults that it must be passed, even if the appropriation bills fail. It is thought that "an extra session for the passage of appropriation bills will excite less criticism than one called solely for the purpose of increasing the regular army." A dispatch to the Philadelphia Ledger from Washington, says that the fighting at Manila and "the large amount of 'patronage' which an army reorganization will place at the President's disposal" are relied on to get the bill through.

THE question how to meet the tremendous expenditure of the national government is beginning to agitate Congress. In the House, on the 10th inst., Mr. Dockery, of Missouri, (Dem.), "produced figures to show that there was already in sight a deficiency of $67,000,000 for the next fiscal year. But this was exclusive of the additional expenditure of $2,500,000 involved in the navy personnel bill, the Cuban claims, the $11,000,000 for public buildings, and the enormous expenditures involved in the Hanna-Payne subsidy bill, and the bill for the construction of the Nicaragua canal should either of these latter bills be passed." (It is stated that Speaker Reed is strongly opposed to these bills, and that they may not pass the House.)

CONSIDERABLE significance is attached to the utterances of one of the daily newspapers of Chicago, the Times-Herald, whose owner, Kohlsaat, is said to be on very intimate terms with President McKinley. This paper announced some time ago that Admiral Dewey was not in favor of taking the Philippines. It has now published an article, (10th inst.) urging that the United States "treat the Philippines as we are pledged to treat Cuba,"—i. e., assist them to form an independent government.

A STEAMER, the Weehawken, reached Punta Delgada, in the Azores Islands, on the 12th instant, with twenty-five passengers from the Hamburg-American steamship Bulgaria, which left New York January 28, for Hamburg. The Weehawken reports the Bulgaria drifting hopelessly, 800 miles from the Azores. Nothing was known as to the fate of the other passengers. A London dispatch on the 12th reported that the twenty-five persons landed by the Weehawken were women and children. "The rest of the passengers and crew could not be taken off, owing to the heavy weather. The passengers are said to have numbered ninety."

SEVERAL serious fires have occurred. At Winnipeg, on the 8th inst., the Manitoba Hotel, "the largest hotel building in the Canadian West," was burned. It cost $400,000, and was the property of the Northern Pacific Railroad Company. The guests, 400 in number, got out. At Yankton, S. D., at 2 in the morning of the 12th inst., one of the cottages of the State Insane Asylum took fire, and was destroyed. There were 52 persons within, and of these 17, being "inmates," lost their lives. At Chicago, on the 12th, the five-story building occupied by the book publishing firm of A. C. McClurg & Co., was destroyed. Loss, $650,000.

A DISPATCH from Russian Siberia, on the 10th inst., announced the finding of the bodies of three men, "the head of one badly crushed," by a tribe of Tungusos, on the Timur peninsula, in North Siberia. It was surmised that these might be Andree, the aeronaut, and his companions, who left the coast of Spitzbergen for the North Pole, in a balloon, in July, 1897. The brother of Andree thinks it not likely. Later news is awaited.

THE distance from Philadelphia to San Francisco is 3,177 miles; from San Francisco to Honolulu, 2,089 miles; from Honolulu to Hong Kong, 4,961 miles; from Hong Kong to Manila, about 620 miles. Total, from Philadelphia to Manila, 19,847 miles.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE long continued cold weather in Iowa caused such a contraction in the iron work of the bridge over the Mississippi river at Muscatine that the end of one of the spans slipped off its pier and the span fell 40 feet upon 18 inches of ice with a terrible crash. Two teams went down with the span, but both drivers escaped death, almost miraculously.

—The "Earl of Meath" has brought forward a plan in England to enroll and drill "all lads between 16 and 18 years of age." He expects to have 200,000, who will form a reserve of volunteer troops. The scheme is supported (of course) by "Field Marshal Lord Wolseley, the Commander in Chief of the forces; General Lord Roberts of Candahar, the commander of the forces in Ireland," and other military people.

—Our returning ambassador to Russia, E. A. Hitchcock, says: "The Czar is in no wise discouraged by the reception of his plans for checking the increase of armaments. He has not any idea that he will achieve all he desires immediately, but is firm in the belief that his views must prevail in time, and a not far distant time."

—Dr. Henry Van Dyke, of New York City, pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, has declined a call to the chair of English literature at Johns Hopkins University.

—The Dismal Swamp canal, which connects Chesapeake Bay with Albemarle Sound, enables small craft to avoid the perilous passage around Cape Hatteras, and is a part of the inland navigation between New York and Florida, will be reopened soon after extensive repairs. This waterway is said to have the oldest canal charter in existence, dating back to 1787.

—Dr. James M. Taylor, President of Vassar College, has been appointed President of Brown University at Providence, R. I. President Taylor is a minister of the Baptist Church, and had charge, for four years, of a church in Providence, before going to Vassar. He has been in charge of the latter since 1886. (The President of Brown must be a Baptist.)

—Oklahoma is seeking admission to the Union as a State, and shows from a vote at the last election of 48,813 that it has a population of 250,000. This is more than any one of several of the smaller States now in the Union.

NOTICES.

* * The regular meeting of Friends' Temperance Workers will be held at 17th street and Girard Avenue (Philadelphia), Second month 18th. Longfellow exercises are on the program. WALKER E. LINVILL, President.

* * A Conference under the care of the Western Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Temperance and Philanthropic Work will be held in the meeting-house at Kennett Square, Pa., on First-day, Second month 19, at 2 o'clock p. m. Isabel G. Shortlidge is expected to address the Conference. All interested are cordially invited to be present. HORACE L. DILWORTH, Clerk.

* * Appointments of Baltimore Yearly Meeting's Visiting Committee for Second month are as follows:
19. Bald Eagle, Pa.
26. Menallen, Pa.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

* * The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting-house at Darby, on First-day, Second month 19, 1899, at 2.30 p. m.

Subject, "Purity."

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

* * The Home Influence Association will be addressed on Third-day, Second month 21, at 3 p. m., by Mrs. Herman H. Birney, on "Literature for Children."

The meeting will be held in the meeting-house, Race and 15th streets (entrance on 15th below Race.) All are invited.

FLORENCE M. LUKENS, President.

* * The united First-day evening meetings, in Philadelphia, during Second month, will be at 17th street and Girard Avenue, at 7.30 o'clock. Friends generally should feel it their duty to be in attendance.

Did anybody anywhere ever object to a Macbeth lamp-chimney?

But get the Number made for your lamp. Get the Index.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

S. W. BLACK'S SON, EDWARD T. BLACK
REAL ESTATE AGENT
AND BROKER
128 South Seventh Street, Philad'a.

FLORIDA.

PERSONALLY-CONDUCTED TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company's third tour of the present season to Jacksonville, allowing two weeks in Florida, will leave New York and Philadelphia by special train of Pullman Palace Cars, Third-day next, Second month 21. Excursion tickets, including railway transportation, Pullman accommodations (one berth), and meals en route in both directions while traveling on the special train, will be sold at the following rates: New York, $50.00; Philadelphia, $48.00; Canandaigua, $52.85; Erie, $54.85; Wilkesbarre, $50.35; Pittsburgh, $53.00; and at proportionate rates from other points.

For tickets, itineraries, and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad street, Newark, N. J., or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

OLD POINT COMFORT, RICHMOND, AND WASHINGTON.

NEXT SIX-DAY TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The second of the present series of personally-conducted tours to Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Seventh-day, Second month 25.

Tickets, including transportation, meals en route in both directions, transfers of passengers and baggage, hotel accommodations at Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington, and carriage ride about Richmond—in fact, every necessary expense for a period of six days—will be sold at rate of $34.00 from New York, Brooklyn, and Newark; $32.50 from Trenton; $31.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

OLD POINT COMFORT ONLY.

Tickets to Old Point Comfort only, including luncheon on going trip, one and three-fourths days' board at that place, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold in connection with this tour at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to Ticket Agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

A POSTAL CARD RECEIVES PROMPT ATTENTION.
JOHN S. CONRAD,
LAUNDRY,
2103, 2105 COLUMBIA AVENUE, PHILA

Newly Priced Books.

Marion Harland's "Some Colonial Homesteads and their Stories," cloth. Publisher's price, $3.00; now $1.25; postage, 22 cents extra.

Susan Ferrier's Novels, "Marriage," 2 volumes; "Inheritance," 2 volumes; "Destiny," 2 volumes. Publisher's price, $6.00; now $1.50; postage, 36 cents extra.

Townsend's "Near a Whole City Full." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 13 cents each.

Du Maurier's "The Martian." Publisher's price, $1.75; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Will Carleton's Poems, assorted, cloth, full gilt. Publisher's price, $2.50; now $1.00; postage, 15 cents extra.

Wilson's "Wonderful Story of Old." 2 volumes, illustrated, ½ morocco. Publisher's price, $7.50; now $2.00.

F. M. Kingsley's "Prisoners of the Sea." Publisher's price, $1.25; now 50 cents; postage, 10 cents extra.

Zola's "His Excellency." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

THE VIEWS OF FRIENDS.

Tracts and Leaflets for Circulation.

QUAKERISM: ITS BELIEFS AND MESSAGES. By William Edward Turner (Editor of the British Friend). 40 pp. 10 cents. 5 copies, 40 cents. By mail at these prices.

THE MEETING FOR WORSHIP. By Howard M. Jenkins. Small pamphlet. 12 pp. Single copies, 2 cents; 50 copies, 50 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF FRIENDS. By Howard M. Jenkins. (Chicago Congress Paper, 1893.) 24 pp. 2 cents; 50 copies, 75 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER ASSOCIATION,
Limited,
921 Arch Street, Phila.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873.

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 25, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 8.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

VIII.

CONVERSION does not depend upon the abundance of our knowledge, but upon the subjection of our wills to the Divine government.

SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

From "Conversations on Religious Subjects."

THE LARGER FAITH.

WE pray no more, made lowly wise,
For miracle or sign;
Anoint our eyes to see within
The common, the divine.

Lo, here! lo there! no more we cry,
Dividing with our call
The mantle of thy presence, Lord,
That seamless covers all.

We turn from seeking Thee afar
And in unwonted ways,
To build from out our daily lives
The temples of thy praise.

And if thy casual comings, Lord,
To hearts of old were dear,
What joy shall dwell within the faith
That feels Thee ever near!

And nobler yet shall duty grow,
And more shall worship be,
When thou art found in all our life,
And all our life in Thee.

—Frederick L. Hosmer.

THE UNDERGROUND RAILROAD.¹

¹ THE UNDERGROUND RAILROAD FROM SLAVERY TO FREEDOM. By Wilbur H. Siebert, Associate Professor of European History in Ohio State University, with an Introduction by Albert Bushnell Hart, Professor of History in Harvard University. New York: The Macmillan Company.

SINCE the abolition of slavery several important books have dealt with the history of the system—for system it substantially was—by which the fugitives from slavery were helped northward to freedom. Among these, in this neighborhood, were William Still's "Underground Railroad Records," and Dr. R. C. Smedley's "History of the Underground Railroad in Chester and the Neighboring Counties of Pennsylvania," while in the West, the "Reminiscences of Levi Coffin" covered part of the field north of the Ohio river.

But until the present work was undertaken no one had attempted to cover the whole geographical field, or to deal with the subject in all its phases. Prof. Siebert has drawn freely upon the works mentioned, but he has done much more. He has gone through many books,—history, biography, personal recollections,—has consulted official reports, magazines, files of old and late newspapers, has corresponded extensively, and visited and interviewed survivors of the now almost disappeared company who were actively concerned in the Underground work. Finally, he has brought his vast mass of data into an orderly and systematic volume of some five hundred pages, and has added a number of appropriate illustrations and maps.

He considers first the sources from which the history is written. He mentions that many of those who were well-known friends of the escaping slaves, and who kept lists of the passengers they had forwarded over the "railroad," found it prudent to destroy them at one or another period. Robert Purvis said in 1895 he had kept a record for a long time, but destroyed it after the passage of the Fugitive Slave Law, in 1850. (It showed, he said, an average of one a day sent northward, or over 9,000 fugitives passed through Philadelphia in the thirty years from 1830 to 1860). Daniel Gibbons, of Lancaster county, Pa., did the same with a record he had kept since 1824. For such reasons the manuscript sources are less numerous and serviceable than they otherwise would have been. Prof. Siebert experiences great satisfaction in having found a single leaf of the diary kept by Daniel Osborn, a Friend, of the Alum Creek settlement, in Delaware county, Ohio. He reproduces in fac-simile the two sides of the leaf, and shows from them that in five months, in the spring and summer of 1844, forty-seven fugitives had been forwarded.

In his second chapter Professor Siebert considers the origin and development of the Underground way, and he shows that it dates back to a time long before railroads were thought of, and when the name given was really the Underground Road. "Secret or 'underground' methods of rescue were already well understood in and around Philadelphia by 1804." Isaac T. Hopper, in fact, came here to live in 1787, and his period of greatest activity in aiding fugitives lay between that time and 1829, when he removed to New York.

In another chapter, the methods of escape and assistance,—the start of the fugitives northward, their flight by night, the "zig-zag routes" followed, the hidings, the subterfuges,—are described in detail. There is, of course, an enormous mass of detail in these, and some of the incidents are as entertaining as others are thrilling. A slaveholder from Kentucky, disguised as a "plain Friend," went to the house of John Charles, a Friend, at Richmond, Indiana, and finding there a lad, a son of J. C., accosted him: "Well, sir, my little mannie, hasn't thee father gone to Canada with some niggers?" The disguise was poor; the boy saw he was no Friend, and pointing his finger at the man, declared him 'a wolf in sheep's clothing.' The desperate expedient of nailing up a fugitive—known afterward as Henry Box Brown—in a large dry-goods box, and sending him from Richmond, Va., by express, to Philadelphia, where he arrived safely, is one of the most famous devices, and has been long known in the Underground annals. There was, at least, one more case of the sort, that of a slave sent from Baltimore, in a box, on a steamboat through the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal. He reached Philadelphia after seventeen hours' confinement; the other man was nailed up for twenty-four hours, and was nearly exhausted when let out, at the Anti-Slavery office. Rather an amusing incident was that which occurred in Levi Coffin's experience at Cincinnati. He was descended upon early one morning, at his house in the country, by a company of fugitives from Kentucky, numbering no less than twenty-eight, for whom provision must be made at once. An ingenious plan was adopted. Several friendly persons with carriages were procured, a pretended funeral procession was formed, "and started solemnly on the road to Cumminsville," with the fugitives inside! At Wilmington, Del., Thomas Garrett kept a number of garden tools for the service. When he wished to pass a fugitive openly through the town, he gave him a scythe, a rake, etc., which he was to place on his shoulder and carry boldly along the street. This plan usually succeeded.

A feature in the slave escapes not much noted was the return South of those who had succeeded in gaining freedom, to bring away their families. Prof. Siebert has many instances of this. Among them is "the case of a negro that went to Canada by way of New Athens, O., and in the course of two years returned over the same route, went to Kentucky, and brought away his wife and two children, making his pilgrimage northward again after the lapse of two months." Seth Linton, describing the operations of a "line through Clinton county, Ohio," reports that a fugitive that had passed along the route returned after some months, saying he had come back to rescue his wife. His absence in the slave State continued so long that it was feared he had been captured, but after some weeks he reappeared, bringing his wife and her father with him. He told of having seen many slaves in the country, and said they would be along as soon as they could escape. The following year the Clinton county line was unusually busy.

It was, however, not only men who returned to the slave country on these perilous errands. In 1842, "a brave woman named Armstrong escaped with her husband and one child to Canada. Two years later she determined to rescue the remainder of her family from the Kentucky plantation, and, disguised as a man, she went back to the old place. Hiding near a spring, where her children were accustomed to get water, she was able to give instructions to five of them, and the following night she departed with her flock to an Underground station at Ripley, Ohio."

The personality of the prominent agents in the Underground work is described in a chapter devoted to the subject, and in the list there are, of course, many whose names are familiar to the readers of these columns. "In general, it is safe to say that the majority of helpers in the North were of Anglo-American stock, descendants of the Puritan and Quaker settlers of the Eastern States, or of Southerners that had moved to the Northern States to be rid of slavery." There were more of this latter class than is sometimes understood, and it is a testimony to the conscience of the South that many men and women raised amid the conditions of slavery perceived its iniquities, and at no small loss and risk, to say nothing of social ostracism, took up the burden of opposition to it. It is, perhaps, one of the most common mistakes in reference to the anti-slavery movement, between 1800 and 1860, to suppose that it was represented by but a handful of people, and they of Northern origin only.

Other chapters of the book—there are eleven altogether—consider the geography of the Underground routes, showing where they ran, and how the different sections were joined to one another; and describe those most perilous adventures, the bringing of slaves from the South by persons who went down there for the purpose,—errands of such danger, indeed, that Seth Concklin, who went to Alabama to bring away the family of Peter Still, (brother of William Still, of Philadelphia), lost his life in the undertaking. The life of the colored refugees in Canada is described, and much of this is comparatively fresh. One of the interesting communities of the ex-slaves in Canada was the Elgin Settlement at Buxton, (named in honor of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, the English philanthropist), to which William King, a Presbyterian minister of Louisiana, sent his manumitted slaves, in 1849. Another chapter is devoted to "Fugitive Slaves in the Northern States," one to "The Underground Railroad in Politics," and finally one to "The Effects of the Underground Railroad." There is an appendix containing reports of notable fugitive slave cases; a directory of more than three thousand names of "underground operators," arranged alphabetically by States and counties; and a bibliography of works relating to the subject.

The general character and qualities of the book are fairly suggested by this notice, but it is far from being an adequate review. Indeed, the data which Prof. Siebert deals with are so numerous that even with his orderly arrangement and careful description it is not easy to generalize concerning his work. It will stand, no doubt, as the main, if not the final, authority on the subject.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE STORY OF PETER YARNALL.

BY GRIFFITH JOHN, BEAR GAP, PA.

(Continued from Last Week.)

THE Revolutionary War had now begun. Early in the year 1776 Peter enlisted in the American Army as surgeon's mate (a sort of assistant-surgeon), taking the oath of allegiance to the Colonies. He was at first stationed near Fort Washington, on the east side of the Hudson river, above New York. Toward the end of that year, he joined Dr. Shippen's department in the army hospitals at Bethlehem, Pa. The Battle of Princeton (at the New Year, 1777), soon made work for the surgeons, and there being urgent demand for them, he with Dr. Bond proceeded to Morristown, N. J., to perform such services as exigency required. Here Peter was seized with a fever, which confined him to his bed for several weeks. Recovering, he left the hospital, and joined a corps of light dragoons in which he continued until the Ninth month, 1777. Finding that he could not endure hard riding, he solicited a return to the hospital.

Having obtained leave of absence to visit camp, near Schuylkill, he met the Surgeon-General of the Army, who ordered him to accompany the sick to Reading. At this place, he became familiar with many scenes of distress and suffering, for war is always cruel, and the shout of victory as well as the wail of defeat, has its attendant miseries. He says a number of the men, recovering, were supposed fit for duty, but the want of clothing rendered it necessary to detain them till they were equipped for a march. Many poor fellows had neither shoes, stockings, nor blankets, and very few an extra shirt. After a time the most of these were restored to health, and sent forward to their regiments, which greatly lightened the labors of those caring for the sick and disabled, till the Battle of Germantown sent them a fresh supply. Continuing, Peter says: "As they came, we placed the privates in churches, the court-house, the powder-house, and Friends' meeting-house. We generally went into the hospitals about 8 or 9 o'clock in the morning, and did not close our eyes till the task of dressing their wounds was finished. This lasted several weeks. In the latter end of December, the sick came in great numbers to Reading in open wagons. In a short time after this, I was ordered to proceed to Ephrata, where the Moravian Brethren had accommodated 250 men with comfortable quarters."

In the first month, 1778, he was taken very ill, and had leave to return to Reading. After a partial recovery, he was sent to Nottingham, and in no very long time to Trenton, where being much broken in health, he asked for a discharge from the service, which was granted.

During the period of his service in the army, he was thrown into association with an officer who had been a member with Friends, but who entertained a bitter hatred to them. He was in the practice of railing against the Society, and ridiculing its principles. On one occasion, as he was thus engaged he endeavored to obtain the assent of Peter Yarnall, in condemning them altogether, but the latter felt restrained from going to such a length, alleging as a reason, that when he met with Samuel Emlen and two other Friends, they always spoke affectionately to him, without a symptom of coldness or reproach.

In a work, published in the year 1811, entitled "Memoirs of a Life, chiefly passed in Pennsylvania, within the last Sixty Years," (the author of which was Alexander Graydon, of Philadelphia), the writer in allusion to an incident that occurred while the American Army was stationed near Kingsbridge on the Hudson river, above New York, has the following paragraph respecting Peter Yarnall:

"Two forts had been erected, called Washington and Lee, one on each side of the river, in order to prevent the British ships of war from passing up.

But the inefficiency of these impediments was soon evinced by two vessels that taking advantage of a favorable wind sailed by us with great gallantry. Two other vessels, not long after, passed in defiance of both batteries. The first vessels that passed us took their station in Tappan Sea, where an attempt was made to set them on fire. It failed as to the larger vessels, but a tender was destroyed. One of the persons who embarked in this service, was the surgeon's mate of our regiment; a singular character, and degenerate son of Mordecai Yarnall, a Quaker preacher. I was amused with his oddities, and sometimes listened to his imitations of his father's preaching, as well as that of many others of the public Friends. Though a temporary apostate from the principles of his forefathers, in which he had been strictly brought up, I never doubted they had taken root in him; and that, if he was not prematurely cut off, they would vegetate and fructify, in due season. Nor was I mistaken. Many years after, I saw him zealously sustaining his paternal vocation, surrounded by a circle of Friends. He had come to preach in the town in which I [then] resided [Harrisburg, Pa.] I went to hear him; and had the pleasure of taking him home with me to dinner, with several of his attendants; where everything passed with as much gravity and decorum, as if I had never seen him in any other character. Mr. Yarnall's former profaneness could not but have occurred to him on this occasion; but whatever might have been his recollections, he dissembled them admirably."

After leaving the army, Peter diligently applied himself to the study of medicine in preparation for the examination held by the College of Physicians. This examination he passed, and received his diploma in Second month, 1779. The following day, as if he had not sufficiently trampled under foot the testimonies of the Society, he embarked on the Delaware, in a privateer ship, with Captain Barry² and others. In four months, they returned to Philadelphia, from a cruise to the West Indies. He immediately upon his arrival at the latter place left the vessel, with his share of the prize money, with which he bought a tract of land in New Jersey. Settling down to follow his profession, he attended the practice of medicine and surgery in the Pennsylvania Hospital. In a short time, he was appointed apothecary to that institution, the duties of which station he discharged with attention and fidelity.

We have now reached the turning point in Peter's career, and it furnishes us an instructive lesson. We do not certainly know what were the instrumental means that brought about this result, but one account said it was a sudden and alarming attack of illness, in which for a time death seemed inevitable. A poem attributed to him, published in an Almanac in the year 1781, would favor this statement, as it is descriptive of a state of mind similar to that of Peter's, when it was written. At any rate, through a quickened sense of right and wrong, he was troubled and brought under heavy condemnation, as reflection placed before him the record of his life. In this distressed situation, with regret for the past, and anxiety for the future, he resolved to follow the light, wherever it might lead. Resigned to bear the burden of condemnation, this feeling passed away, as he continued willing to be anything or nothing. Then he experienced great peace of mind, a sensation to which he had long been a stranger. Being but at the entrance of the right way, there were to be trials of his faith. Could he stand true to it? Time alone would tell.

[¹ This, of course, is Graydon's way of stating the case. Peter Yarnall no doubt thought it unnecessary and unprofitable to revive these recollections.]

[² Captain John Barry, born in Ireland, a famous commander of privateers and other armed ships during the Revolution.]

An opportunity soon came to test this. He was appointed to deliver a message to an officer in the city, and it very forcibly arrested his attention that in delivering it, he must address him in the "plain language." It was such a mortification to his proud spirit that he almost shrank from it. In this state of mind, he set out on the errand, absorbed in deep thought. When he reached the door, on knocking, he was met by the officer himself. Peter adhered to his impressions, and accosted him as he felt required to do. This mode of address from him struck the officer with astonishment, and he stood for awhile silent, before making any reply. As he recovered himself, he made no allusion to Peter's use of the plain language. This act of obedience meant much to Peter Yarnall. It enabled him easily to separate himself from, and throw off the influence of his "gay" companions, who held in light esteem those yielding to religious conviction, and poured ridicule upon the customs of Friends, particularly upon their use of thee and thou in speaking to each other. It also provided him with ability to advance with steady footstep in the path he had chosen, and furnished him increased power to overcome the next difficulty that might fall in his way. It now lay in his course to mingle more and more with Friends, and as their principles were in harmony with his sentiments, he became once more a diligent attender of their meetings.

(To be Continued.)

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS,

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

NO. 10.—THIRD MONTH 5.

ISAAC, JACOB, AND ESAU.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Let us arise and go up to Bethel; and I will make there an altar unto God, who answered me in the day of my distress and was with me in the way which I went.—Genesis xxxv., 3.

Scripture Reading—Genesis, xxviii., 1-5; 10-22.

IN the account of the life of Abraham the intermingling of two or more accounts continues as in earlier chapters in Genesis. The story of Abraham's denial of his wife is told of Egypt and Pharaoh by the "Jahvist" (xii., 9-20), and of Gerar and Abimelech by the "Elohistic" (xx., 1-17). The "Jahvistic" story of the birth of Ishmael indicates that he was about fourteen years old when Isaac was born (xviii., 16); while the "Elohistic" account of the sending away of Hagar and Ishmael into the wilderness some time after the birth of Isaac, speaks of him as of a child in arms (xxi., 14-16). These indications of the composite nature of Genesis continue throughout the book, and are found, indeed, throughout the Old Testament. It is not necessary in these lessons to attempt any detailed separation of the various fragments, however interesting it may be to the student. It is sufficient for our purpose to notice the most striking illustrations of this structure: but it is essential for any right knowledge of the books of the Old Testament that they shall be clearly understood to be, not the works of individuals, but composite views of the ancient life of a wonderful nation.

While the historic character of Abraham may be regarded as fairly established by evidence both within and without the Bible, the same cannot be said of his immediate descendants. Many students are inclined to regard them as wholly traditional. Isaac is a character very faintly drawn. Between such sharply defined leaders as Abraham and Moses, Isaac is ghostly and bloodless. An interesting picture of ancient life is brought to light in the tale of the mission of the faithful family servant of Abraham's household to the home of his forefathers to find a wife for Isaac; and the scene at the well at Aram of the two rivers, is beautiful in setting and in sentiment. The account of Rebecca gives the impression of a person of vigorous and original mind. We are won by the simplicity of the tale, and when we read that Rebecca "became his wife and he loved her," we feel that it is the right and appropriate ending of the pretty story. But it is impossible to give to Isaac any of the deep respect, almost reverence, with which we turn back to his father.

It is somewhat different with the twin sons of Isaac. In the story of these two we are told in some measure the story of civilization. It is the old time against the new, the life of the wandering hunter against that of the "plain man, dwelling in tents." As we compare the two, our sympathies almost inevitably turn from the father of the Israelites to the shaggy hunter, who was cheated out of his birthright, and tricked out of his father's blessing, but showed himself in the sequel open-hearted and forgiving; yet we must recognize in him the instincts of the nomad. He was cheated of his birthright, indeed; but only because "coming in weary from the chase, he is caught, as with the levity and eagerness of a child, by the sight of the lentil soup." As with the hunter peoples of to-day, the needs of the moment erase all thought of the future. There is no restraint of appetite, no patience to endure. We recognize the genial temper and the affectionate nature of the huntsman, but who among us does not know such a one whose easy nature and temper are only a part of the careless indolence of the ne'er-do-well? The Bible story indicates the Edomites as the descendants of Esau—of whom came Herod, many centuries later, to avenge his ancestor on the descendants of the one who elbowed him out of his family place. Jacob, on the other hand, represents the pastoral life. The meannesses of his nature are distinctly drawn; yet we cannot but see the elements of his character which command success. "He entraps his brother, he deceives his father, he makes a bargain, even in his prayer; in his dealings with Laban, in his meeting with Esau, he still calculates and contrives." But, on the other hand, he is steady and unwavering in purpose. He drives a hard bargain, but is true to the bargain made. He has endurance and industry. His wife is won by seven and again seven years of service. He labors faithfully with the flocks and herds entrusted to his care. These are qualities less engaging for the moment than easy good-nature, but in the long run sure to win. It has rarely happened, if ever, that men of real greatness are of the complaisant disposition; often they have been far from agreeable personally—but industry and perseverance they have never lacked.

Jacob, like his father Isaac, sought and found his wife among his kinsmen of the north, and after twenty years of service he returned again to the home of his father and grandfather. He went out empty-handed and returned a rich man. But it is with the development of his higher nature that we have to deal in particular. Like his grandfather, he had a vivid sense of God's presence; and in spite of much unworthiness, the still, small voice led him in ways that tended upward. As he goes out from home with the shadow of deceit and fear upon him, he hears God's voice in the night time, "Behold, I am with thee." It is a wholesome sign that under these conditions he should have said, "How awful is this place!" yet his vow showed a low moral plane. "If God will be on my side, I will give him a tenth." (Genesis, xxviii.) The spirit, not unheard-of in our own day, which is willing to serve God on condition of being promised salvation in the life to come, is of the same mould. It is by no means the spirit of him who, in humble faith, whispers "Our Father."

This place was called Bethel. Jacob returned to it again after he had become "two flocks." The return journey is especially marked by the meeting of the two brothers who had parted in anger a score of years before. Again we see the easy good-nature of Esau, who had not despised the sin, but had hated the consequence for himself; and who, now that the consequence was forgotten, cared for it no more. Again we see the crafty spirit of Jacob in the magnificent present with which he hopes to make his peace. Again, too, we see in Jacob the sense of God's presence, and his words are more worthy than before, though neither now nor ever striking the clearest note of manly character. "Put away the foreign gods that are among you. . . . Let us go to Bethel; and I will make there an altar unto God who answered me in the day of my distress." (xxxv., 2-3.)

Of the origin and meaning of the story of the mysterious struggle with the unknown "man," nothing is known. The new name, "Israel," means "Prince of God," and the old one "the Supplanter."

Your souls are a picture gallery. Let their walls be hung with all things sweet and perfect,—the thought of God, the image of Christ, the lives of God's saints, the aspirations of good and great men, the memories of golden deeds.—Canon Farrar.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 10.—THIRD MONTH 5.

FOLLOWING THE CHRIST.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If therefore the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed.—John viii., 36.

Read the Scripture, John, viii., 12, 31-36.

REVISED VERSION.

THE Scripture selected for this Lesson follows closely upon that of last week. That was taken from the seventh chapter of John, and extended to verse 37; this takes the 12th verse of chapter eight, and also the 28th to the 36th verses.

The time was probably the day following the event described in the last lesson. The place was again the Temple at Jerusalem. In it Jesus continued his teaching. In the meantime, his words, as given in the last lesson, had caused excitement and discussion,—“a division in the multitude,”—and while some desired to have him “taken,” the officers hesitated, and said, “never man so spake.” The Pharisees declared that no one of education, none of their sect, or of the “rulers,” embraced his teachings, but only the “multitude,” the common people. And in the controversy over him, Nicodemus, “he that came to him, before,” in the night (Lesson No. 4) put in a cautious but friendly plea: “Doth our law judge any man, except it first hear from himself, and know what he doeth?”

There are in the seven verses of this lesson five of special significance and force, in the very spirit of the Christ religion. They carry two thoughts—(1) the light and the liberty of the Divine life; (2) the necessity of making real this Divine life, the following after Christ. First, there is verse 12, in which Jesus declares, “I am the light of the world,” etc. Clearly he did not speak of himself in any physical or outward sense,—not of Jesus, the man, born at Bethlehem, and called “of Nazareth.” He spoke of the “light and leading” which his religion should be to mankind, and of the power of God manifested in and by him. In this sense he truly was, and has been, and is, the light of the world, and it has been shown again and again in the world's history that whoso followeth this manifested power of God “shall not walk in darkness, but shall have the light of life.” There is a passage in Revelation which helps our present study,—where, in the description of the holy city, the New Jerusalem, it is declared (xxi., 23) that it “hath no need of the sun, neither of the moon, to shine upon it; for the glory of God did lighten it, and the lamp thereof is the Lamb.” Paul says (II. Corinthians, iv., 6): “it is God that said, Light shall shine out of darkness, who shined in our hearts, to give the light of knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ.” In all these passages the thought is essentially the same—the light of God manifested in his Son.

Two other of the verses, 32 and 36, pursue a line of teaching closely related. They promise the enjoyment of the Truth to those who walk in the light. “Ye shall know the truth,” Jesus declared, “and the truth shall make you free.” And varying the thought but a little, "if the Son shall make you free, ye shall be free indeed." This condition of freedom in the Truth is a high condition.

"He is freeman whom the truth makes free,
And all are slaves besides,"

is the word of Cowper. Jesus himself declared (John xviii., 37): "To this end have I been born, and to this end am I come into the world, that I may bear witness unto the truth." And he added, "Everyone that is of the truth heareth my voice,"—meaning, of course, spiritually, and through the influence of the Truth itself, since his natural voice could be heard only during his natural existence.

The necessity of making real the Divine life is the teaching in verses 31 and 34. "Every one that committeth sin is the bondservant of sin." This is true, indeed—a truth realized by every one who so offends, and shown in all the records of the human family. "To those Jews which had believed him," Jesus said, "if ye abide in my word, then truly are ye my disciples." The passage instantly comes to mind when he said (John, xv., 4): "Ye are my friends if ye do the things which I command you." And again that in Luke (vi., 46), when he pathetically asked, "why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" Observe the test of discipleship,—the doing, the following. "He that followeth me," is the declaration, (v., 12) "shall not walk in the darkness, but shall have the light of life."

"Our Friend, our Brother, and our Lord,
What may our service be?—
Nor name, nor form, nor ritual word,
But simply following thee. (Whittier.)

[CORRECTION.—The New Testament Scripture Lesson, printed last week, had a wrong heading. It should have been, "Jesus at the Feast."]

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—IX.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

SIXTH-DAY evening we spent very pleasantly in the home of A. Eavenson; our hearts saddened on receiving a telegram of the death of our much esteemed friend Daniel Underhill, of Jericho, N. Y., whose kindness and hospitality we have so often enjoyed.

After making a few calls on Seventh-day morning we spent a few hours with our friend Rachel Conrad and family, and regret it must be so hurried as we must leave for Wilmington. There we were met by William Bancroft, and taken to his home, the genial atmosphere of which we so much appreciated.

First-day morning presents a very wintry appearance, but quite a number gathered, at the usual time of their First-day School, and these, with as many more as we could expect (with the extreme cold and much snow rendering the travel very unpleasant), constituted a meeting that we believe was blessed in a good degree with the Divine presence, and although another meeting had been intimated for the evening we felt to excuse ourselves and returned to dine with our friends Wm. P. Bancroft and family, and took the train at three p. m., for New York. And notwithstanding the many trains delayed by storm we arrived safely at the "Penington," in good time for a full night's rest.

Second-day morning, the storm still continued and even increased. Upon arriving at Long Island City, to take train for Jericho, I found no train going through to Hicksville. The strong desire to be with our friends at Jericho prompted the effort to go as far as possible, and I succeeded in reaching Mineola. Here were comfortable hotel accommodations, and I communicated by telephone with our Jericho friends, and learned that the burial was deferred. So we wait and trust, and Third-day evening we were pleasantly surprised to receive a call from George Clark inviting us to go with him to his home, which we gladly accepted, although it was no easy task for him to get back and forth, as the roads were impassable in all directions. We appreciated very much the home feeling as contrasted with the hours of lonely waiting in the hotel.

We were pleased to hear, quite early in the morning, the steam whistle, indicating some movement on the road, and we soon found our way back to the depot hoping to find a train to Hicksville. Through the kindness of the superintendent allowing us to ride in the "caboose" attached to the snow plow we got there in time for the funeral, at 2 p. m., (having been postponed to that from Second-day), and we cannot express our thankfulness in that we had been enabled to do so. Nor did the appreciation of our friends seem less for the blocked condition of the roads prevented any but the immediate neighbors from attending. Instead of being at the meeting-house, as was proposed, the funeral was held in the home. We could but feel that the quiet, impressive gathering was beautifully in harmony with the unassuming but serious and kindly life, that however deserving, needed no loud or long eulogy to leave its impress upon our hearts. Some fitting words found utterance but only feebly to voice the deep feelings of thankfulness that such a life had been, and as we lower all there is of the earthly into the last resting place, there seems a voice to say, Follow me, as I have endeavored to follow Christ. We returned to the home to behold the vacant chair and miss the wonted voice, but still to feel that the same loving friendship will be ever found with the remaining family.

While we can but regret that our stay is so short, we must endeavor to meet some appointments that await us in Pennsylvania and take the train for New York, where we stay to lunch and spend a few hours pleasantly with our dear friend Jane Russell, the pleasure of the visit increased by the company of our mutual friend Margretta Walton. Again regretting that we must leave so soon, we start for Philadelphia and find an almost impassable condition of many of the streets, owing to the great amount of snow. Just as we leave, rain began to fall, and it was feared even more damage might result by water.

We close this letter as we again move slowly, (owing to a disabled engine), toward the Quaker City, where we arrive under widely contrasting conditions from First-day last, leaving it then with the mercury at zero and snow drifting, now the rain falling and snow and water making the streets almost impassable, in fact, some not yet opened.

I. W.

Philadelphia, Second month 17.

ENGLAND'S REPLY TO THE CZAR.

The reply made by Lord Salisbury, the English Prime Minister, to the Czar's proposal, was sent to the English Ambassador at St. Petersburg; it was published in England early last month. We print it as an important document in the great movement.

SIR—Her Majesty's Government have given their careful consideration to the memorandum which was placed in your hands on the 24th of August last by the Russian Minister for Foreign Affairs, containing a proposal of His Majesty, the Emperor of Russia, for the meeting of a conference to discuss the most effective methods of securing the continuance of general peace, and of putting some limit on the constant increase of armaments. Your Excellency was instructed at the time by Mr. Balfour, in my absence from England, to explain the reasons which would cause some delay before a formal reply could be returned to this important communication, and in the meanwhile to assure the Russian Government of the cordial sympathy of Her Majesty's Government with the objects and intentions of His Imperial Majesty.

That this sympathy is not confined to the Government, but it is equally shared by popular opinion in this country, has been strikingly manifested since the Emperor's proposal has been made generally known, by the numerous resolutions passed by public meetings and societies in the United Kingdom. There are, indeed, few nations, if any, which, both on grounds of feeling and interest, are more concerned in the maintenance of general peace than is Great Britain.

The statements which constitute the grounds of the Emperor's proposal are but too well justified. It is unfortunately true that, while the desire for the maintenance of peace is generally professed, and while, in fact, serious and successful efforts have on more than one recent occasion been made with that object by the Great Powers, there has been a constant tendency on the part of almost every nation to increase its armed force and to add to an already vast expenditure on the appliances of war. The perfection of the instruments thus brought into use, their extreme costliness, and the horrible carnage and destruction which would ensue from their employment on a large scale have acted, no doubt, as a serious deterrent from war, but the burdens imposed by this process on the populations affected must, if prolonged, produce a feeling of unrest and discontent, menacing both to internal and external tranquility. Her Majesty's Government will gladly coöperate in the proposed effort to provide a remedy for this evil, and if in any degree it succeeds, they feel that the Sovereign to whose suggestion it is due will have richly earned the gratitude of the world at large.

Your Excellency is therefore authorized to assure Count Muravieff that the Emperor's proposal is willingly accepted by Her Majesty's Government, and that the Queen would have pleasure in delegating a representative to take part in the Conference whenever an invitation is received. Her Majesty's Government hope that the invitation may be accompanied by some indication of the special points to which the attention of the Conference is to be directed, as a guide for the selections of the British representative, and of the assistants by whom he should be accompanied. You will read this despatch to the Minister for Foreign Affairs, and leave him a copy of it. I am, etc.,

(Signed)

SALISBURY.

APPEAL FOR MT. PLEASANT SCHOOL.

LETTERS from Abby D. Munro, of Mt. Pleasant, S. C., represent the needs of the School as very pressing. Our friend Matilda S. Ellis, treasurer of the fund to be collected in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, writes us that she is in receipt of an earnest letter from Abby, but being herself confined to the house (as for some little time past), is unable to do anything herself. The following letter has been received by another Friend, and is sent to us for publication :

MT. PLEASANT, S. C., February 15, 1899.

The weather here is just something terrible, and the suffering it brings no pen can describe. It has been a very cold winter with continual high winds and storms. On the 11th instant it grew very cold, and the ground was a glare of ice. Then the snow came, and on the 13th here in the sunny south it lay nearly four inches on the ground. We could not enjoy the beautiful sight, knowing the terrible suffering it had brought, and which it was not in our power to alleviate. I don't know that I ever experienced such a day in mind or body. With every effort we could not be comfortable. Even in bed, with piles of bed clothing, we suffered all night, till we were glad to get up to start a fire, which seemed to make little impression. And this with two thrifty northern women, you may imagine what it must have been with these poorly housed, scantily clothed, half-fed people. It seems cruel. A number have sustained serious falls, and some have been found frozen. Sickness and distress will follow in the train of such weather as this, here, where all are so poor. There is no work for any one.

Will you not ask through the INTELLIGENCER for the usual contributions of those not already sent in? This weather increases our expenses, the teachers are asking for money due them last month, and I have advanced all I have on hand except a few dollars, which I do not dare to part with till I get more. As day after day goes by, the mails are brought to us, and we receive no encouragement or aid, it is very disheartening. If others were not looking to me I would not care so much.

Our school is going on as usual. Every room is full, and advancement all along the line, but we are sadly in need of funds.

[Will not our monthly meetings, or Philanthropic Committees, to whom Philadelphia Yearly Meeting Committee on colored people have lately sent an appeal, respond as quickly as possible with their contributions? Surely these faithful workers should not be left in such straits.—EDS. INTELLIGENCER.]

THESE are the two remedies for doubt—Activity and Prayer. He who works and feels he works—he who prays and knows he prays—has the secret of transforming life-failure into life-victory.—Robertson.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SECOND MONTH 25, 1899.

THE PRESIDENT'S ATTITUDE: THE PEOPLE'S DUTY. 7

THE address of President McKinley, at the dinner of the "Home Market Club," in Boston, was made too late last week (the evening of the 15th), to be noticed in the last issue of the INTELLIGENCER. But it was a speech of so great importance that it deserves to be noticed everywhere, by every one, at the earliest possible moment, and with the utmost courage and candor.

The important part of the address lay at the close, where he referred to the conditions in the Philippine Islands. As to these he said, in general, that the subject was now in the hands of Congress, and of the American people. This is a most vital disclosure of the mind and attitude of the President, as head of the executive branch of the Government. If the subject is in the hands of the people, it is a duty of the highest character that they let it be known what their will now is.

The President's expressions were no doubt carefully chosen, and they had all the appearance of most benevolent intention. He said:

"The treaty of peace . . . having been ratified . . . Congress will have the power, and I am sure the purpose, to do what in good morals is right, and just, and humane, for these people in distant seas . . .

"The future of the Philippine Islands is now in the hands of the American people . . . [The] treaty now commits the free and unfranchised Filipinos to the guiding hand and the liberalizing influences, the generous sympathies, the uplifting education, not of their American masters, but of their American emancipators.

"The whole subject is now with Congress, and Congress is the voice, the conscience, and the judgment of the American people . . . Until Congress shall direct otherwise it will be the duty of the Executive to possess and hold the Philippines, giving to the people thereof peace and order and beneficent government . . . but neither their aspirations nor ours can be realized until our authority is acknowledged and unquestioned."

These passages contain the substance of the President's statements, though there were others that might be cited of almost equal importance. He said, for example, that "no imperial designs lurk in the American mind," that the Filipinos "will be aided in every possible way to be a self respecting and self governing people," and in the peroration of his address he declared that "every red drop" shed at Manila "is anguish to my heart."

The essential, the vital fact, is that the President describes himself as merely a trustee. He is holding the Islands—the "sovereignty," of course, not actual possession of the soil—until he learns what the American people, and Congress, desire. It is true he says he must press on until "our authority is acknowledged and unquestioned," but he does not say that this must be by force of arms.

What, then, do the people,—all kinds, and sorts of people, those who wish to be just, to be fair, to be humane, those who would no more wantonly slay by wholesale than murder individually,—what do they say to the President? What do they want to say? He announces that he waits to hear from them. Is it possible, we inquire in all seriousness, in an earnestness, indeed, inspired by the most poignant shame and sorrow for the recent slaughter of thousands of the Filipino people, is it possible that the American nation wish to further stain the pages of their own history?

In behalf of many, we say to the President: The principles laid down in your address are good. But they are good only if acted upon in good faith. They forbid the further slaughter of the Filipinos. Those people inhabit their own country. Their country is not ours. Spain held it by force, and they rose to claim independence. Putting ourselves in Spain's place, and making a cruel war upon them as she did, we take upon ourselves every crime with which we charged her, while we are guilty in a far greater degree, because we have professed,—and as the President shows, continue to profess,—principles of freedom, of honor, of philanthropy, which Spain did not profess. To continue the slaughter of the Filipinos will not only be monstrous, but to the wickedness of the act we should add a hypocrisy beyond description. For the President describes us as philanthropic "emancipators," he speaks of the "free and enfranchised" Filipinos, he represents that we have no purpose but to benevolently aid them. With these professions on our lips, the operations of a hostile army and navy, the "shelling" of towns, the burning of villages, the "mowing down" of naked men, the slaughter in fine of five thousand people, of all ages and both sexes, in their own land, in a land not ours by any moral right whatever, would be such an offense as would put upon those responsible for it the brand of continuing infamy.

Let us hope that the people will speak out. It is not believable that they wish to slaughter the Filipinos.

THE bill to increase the regular army, in passing the House of Representatives, was amended, on motion of Representative Johnson, of North Dakota, so as to abolish the so-called "canteens"—liquor saloons—which many of the regiments in the service maintain. In the Senate, however, the committee on military affairs changed this clause so as to permit the maintenance of such "canteens" for the sale of "malt liquors." This change excites earnest protest, and the Voice, the Union Signal, and others of the Temperance journals urge that the Senate be made aware of the public feeling on the subject.

The defect in this and similar efforts is the assumption that war can be made temperate and respectable.

EARNEST appeals are being made in behalf of the movement for "industrial relief" in Cuba. A pamphlet sent us says that in that island, "our flag waves over three hundred thousand people who have neither food to eat, clothes to wear, nor houses to live in." The thought cannot be repressed how much might be done for these poor people with the tenth part of the cost of one "high class" ship of war.

THE INTELLIGENCER was late last week in reaching its readers. This was one of the consequences of the great storm which detained printers from getting to their work, disarranged postal operations, and delayed mails. Most of our weekly exchanges have come in late,—some as much as four or five days.

THE need for "testimony bearing" seems to be indicated even in the reports made by those who wish "to look on the bright side." Our friend A. M. J., in her interesting letter last week, gave a description of conditions which appeared to us quite a reasonable justification for some anxiety, as well as plain speaking, and the letter we print this week from a London correspondent of a New York newspaper, paints a dark picture, indeed. The "defective classes," Prof. John B. De Mott declared, in a recent lecture at Fifteenth and Race streets, "increased faster than the population." Is it, indeed, a time to be light-hearted?

BIRTHS.

EAVENSON.—In Philadelphia, Second month 13, 1899, to Lewis L. and Rachel T. S. Eavenson, a daughter, who is named Hannah Tomlinson.

HERR.—At Moorestown, N. J., First month 29, 1899, to Frank S. and Frances S. Herr, a son, who is named Lawrence Janney Herr.

PALMER.—In Philadelphia, Second month 4, 1899, to Edwin L. and A. Dora F. Palmer, a son, who is named Charles Lewis Palmer.

PAXSON.—At Swarthmore, Second month 18, 1899, to Charles and Alice Hall Paxson, a daughter, who is named Eleanor Mary.

DEATHS.

BROOMELL.—Second month 2, 1899, in Chicago, Ill., after an illness of less than one week, of grippe and typhoid fever, George D. Broomell, Jr., son of George D. and Ellen C. Broomell, aged 28 years and 3 months.

[Unity, Chicago, in its issue of Second month 9, in a notice of this sad event, said: "Many readers will join with us in the expression of deep sympathy for our old-time friends, Mr. and Mrs. George D. Broomell, in the death of their second son, George D. Broomell, Jr., which occurred on the 2d instant. Mr. Broomell had just stepped across the threshold of promising young manhood, being twenty-eight years old. He was a member of the legal profession, and had gained a fair and hopeful start in his chosen work. He was at the time of his death also studying medicine, employing his evenings for that purpose, not with a view to practice, but for the general enlargement of knowledge. He was of a studious and deeply reflective cast of mind, singularly pure and just in all of his ideals, seeking to be absolutely upright in all his dealings with others, of gentle manners and generous, lovable disposition. His sudden death leaves an irreparable gap in the home graced and uplifted by his presence and in the hearts of his numerous friends. But the inspiration of such a life remains with us always, to comfort and inspire.]

COLES.—Second month 12, 1899, Postrema R., wife of Joseph Coles, a recorded minister of Pilesgrove Monthly and Woolwich Preparative Meeting.

The funeral was held at the residence of her husband, Mullica Hill, N. J., Second month 18.

Whilst health permitted she was a faithful attender of her home meeting. She was ever concerned for the interest of those around her, and in a quiet, unassuming manner always ready to extend words of love or the hand of benevolence.

L.

ELLIS.—In Trenton, N. J., Second month 19, 1899, Sarah S. Rose, wife of John C. Ellis, aged 70 years; a member of Trenton Friends' Meeting.

HAINES.—On First-day, Second month 19, 1899, Dr. Samuel E. Haines, aged 49 years, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, (Race Street). Interment at West Chester, Pa.

HAMBLETON.—At the residence of Dr. Swayne, Philadelphia, Second month 18, 1899, in her 88th year, Ruth, widow of Eli Hambleton, of Pennsgrove, Pa., daughter of the late Jonathan Lamborn of Kennett Square.

Interment at Pennsgrove Meeting ground.

MOORE.—At Richmond, Indiana, Second month 9, 1899, of pneumonia, Phebe Moore, aged 73 years.

She was a sister of William Woolman, a minister of Cincinnati Monthly Meeting. She was truly, as was testified to at her funeral, one of the meek and lowly ones of the earth, who accepted her situation in life submissively, envying no one, complaining of nothing; the hard things in her life (and she had her full share), which "could not be cured, she patiently endured." Two of her daughters passed on to the other life years ago, and fully realizing that her time of departure had come, she exclaimed upon her death-bed, "Darling daughters, mother's coming!"

She leaves two sons, and her aged companion, to mourn for, and miss her gentle companionship. A. M. S.

MOORE.—In Woodstown, N. J., Second month 11, 1899, Allen Moore, in his 82d year.

After months of suffering, this dear Friend has "passed on to the higher life."

Interment on the 15th inst. *

PAINTER.—In West Chester, Pa., Second month 7, 1899, James G. Painter, in the 77th year of his age; a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting.

PILKINGTON.—Second month 14, 1899, at the home of Horace G. Welch, Citronelle, Ala., where he had gone in hopes of improving his health, Clark Pilkington, son of Levi and Mary M. Pilkington, and grandson of the late Joseph and Sarah Pilkington and Reuben and Sarah E. Wilson, of Millville, Pa.

Death came to him the day before he reached his 20th birthday. His health had not been good for more than a year, but the immediate cause of death was paralysis. He was a birthright member of Wapsinonoc Monthly Meeting of Friends held at West Liberty, Iowa, a most dutiful son, a loving brother and friend, and was highly esteemed by all who knew him. Interred in Pine Crest Cemetery, Citronelle, Ala.

W.

POWNALL.—Near Smyrna, Lancaster county, Pa., Second month 7, 1899, Philena C., wife of Benjamin H. Pownall, in the 57th year of her age.

SEAMAN.—At her home in Wantagh, formerly Jerusalem, Long Island, N. Y., Second month 9, 1899, Martha A. Seaman, widow of the late Edward H. Seaman, in her 71st year.

[“All her life a sympathizer with Friends, and one who did all she could to keep up the little meeting in Jerusalem,” says the friend who sends the above.]

SUPLEE.—In Philadelphia, Second month 13, 1899, Mary, only child of Chalkley J. and H. Lue Suplee, and granddaughter of Thomas B. and the late Emily J. Suplee, in the 10th year of her age.

TOWNSEND.—In Philadelphia, First month 28, 1899, Minerva Sarah, wife of James Wood Townsend, and daughter of Frank C. and Mary Pyle, in her 29th year.

They have been members of Little Britain, but recently their certificate was sent to the Monthly Meeting of Philadelphia. Her death leaves two quite young children motherless who now are in the care of their grandmother. *

TYSON.—Second month 18, 1899, Rebecca L. Tyson, daughter of the late Ezekiel and Lydia Tyson; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, held at Spruce St.

Interment at Langhorne.

UNDERHILL.—At Jericho, Long Island, N. Y., on Sixth-day, Second month 10, 1899, Daniel Underhill, in his 73d year.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

ELIZABETH LLOYD, correspondent of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting with isolated members, writes us:

NEWTOWN, PA., Second month 17.

In response to the five hundred copies of the Yearly Meeting's epistle to its isolated members, about seventy letters were received, and about fifty letters were returned because the address given was incorrect. The following persons particularly mentioned that they would be glad to receive visits from ministering Friends:

H. Taylor, and Mary E. Rogers, Asheville, N. C.

James B. Paxson, Dundee, Mich.

Elizabeth Harvey Lodge, S. Pittsburg, Tenn.

Alice B. Knickerbocker, New Lenox, Ill.

Sallie A. T. Palmer, La Grande, Oregon.

Sarah W. Lacey, LeLoup, Franklin Co., Kansas.

S. E. Griest, Lordsbury, twenty miles from Pasadena, Cal.

George A. Newbold, Wm. F. Newbold, Clara Newbold Williams, Mayten, Siskeyou, Co. Cal., Gazelle Railroad Station,

Joseph B. Rich, Carney, Oklahoma.

Marianna Haines, Bushnell, Ill.

Lydia A. Warner, Bloomfield, Fla.

The Doylestown Intelligencer states that at a meeting of the “Home” Committee of Bucks Quarter, last week, it was concluded to purchase a lot of ground in Newtown, (corner of Center and Congress streets), of Emmor K. Janney, for $2,100, and that “during the coming spring it is intended to erect thereon a building suitable for the purposes of a HOME. The structure is to be of stone and large enough to accommodate from twenty to twenty-five boarders. The aggregate cost of ground, building, equipment, etc., will be in the neighborhood of $10,000.”

Burlington Quarterly Meeting is held at Mount Holly, Third-day next, 28th, at 10 a. m. Southern Quarter at Camden, Del., on Fourth-day, 11 a. m., and Youths' Meeting the following day. Nottingham Quarter at Little Britain on Sixth-day, 10 a. m.

John J. Cornell has a prospect of attending Burlington Quarter, also to have a meeting at Mount Holly, on Second-day evening, at 7.30 o'clock, and appoint other meetings within that quarter during the week, as way opens.

THE WAR ON THE FILIPINOS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

CAN any true lover of his country look with unconcern at the position now taken by our nation in subjugating the natives of the Philippine Islands? A weak and rude people (still using bows and arrows in warfare, utterly unable to offer any effectual resistance to our trained soldiers, with the latest scientific weapons of death and destruction), are being indiscriminately slaughtered and driven from their villages and homes into the wilderness. Their only offense is that they want their liberty, and plead earnestly not to be transferred from Spanish rule to American rule, but claim that their government should have the “consent of the governed.”

It is not yet two years since President McKinley, in his inaugural address, used these words: “We want no wars of conquest. We must avoid the temptation of territorial aggression. War should never be entered upon until every agency of peace has failed. Arbitration is the true method of settlement of international as well as local or individual differences.” Later our President declared that “forcible annexation cannot be thought of,” in the case of Cuba, because “it would be criminal aggression.” Is it not criminal aggression in the case of these poor Filipinos, hopelessly pleading and struggling for their freedom? How hopefully thousands looked to our President to act consistently with these early professions; how earnestly we endeavored to strengthen and support him in his endeavors to avoid war, but when right is sacrificed to expediency where shall we land, or to what extremity may we not be carried? If it had been foretold to our President a year ago that the United States should slaughter the poor Filipinos as we are now doing by the thousands, would he not have said, “Am I a dog that I should sanction such iniquity?”

These poor people have earnestly besought our friendship and aid in establishing an independent government for themselves; we repulse their overtures and say to them, “nothing but unconditional submission to the rule we may choose to impose upon you.” So in desperation they resist, and we turn loose our mighty armaments of death and destruction upon them to slay them, without distinction of age or sex, burn their villages and humble homes, and drive them to the swamps and jungles.

It is not pleasant or agreeable to most Friends to take an active part in political controversy, and it is incumbent upon us to endeavor to maintain good will to all; but this should not be in any way a question of politics with us. It is far above that; and our Society has many times firmly remonstrated with the powers that be against injustice and wrong. It seems to me a crisis is now upon our beloved country, when “Silence on our part is crime.” We have not been silent; our INTELLIGENCER has been faithful in every number to uphold our testimony against war; and most earnestly against the late war with Spain. I think the other branches of Friends, as far as their publications bear record, have also borne a faithful testimony in this respect. But in this crisis of oppression and cruelty towards these poor and almost defenseless people (as pitted against our powerful enginery of destruction), I think our Society ought to feel it incumbent to make a united remonstrance against this great wrong. Our Representative Committees ought to get together and send to the President and Congress an earnest remonstrance against the present oppressive war.

DAVID FERRIS.

Wilnington, Del., Second month 20.

FRIENDS MOVING IN COMPANY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I HAVE several times noted in the INTELLIGENCER reference to the movement of Friends westward. I have been a dweller in the West from childhood, and since I left my father's home, (Dr. Jesse Holmes), at West Liberty, Iowa, have been separated from any meeting. I have always regretted this, and whenever my eye has caught these references to families of Friends coming West I have wished some method could be adopted to prevent the scattering of these families, and, too, that some guidance could be afforded reducing the percentage of disappointment from mistake in location. I think care should be taken in the East, preventing a movement West, when fairly good opportunities are possible there, but I too believe there are many cases where it would be wisdom to secure the advantage a wise selection of a new home in the West would offer.

Moreover, many times what has been an unsatisfactory move could have been advantageous had several families of Friends gone together. There is strength in such union, and there is sympathy and encouragement one for another. What is more, there is the nucleus of a meeting planted, and the children of the families can have a continuance of the influences emanating from such association. An item in the INTELLIGENCER of this month 4th, mentions an Idaho colony. I have no knowledge of it, but from some personal observation had been favorably impressed with some portions of Idaho, as affording exceptionally good prospects for Friends' occupancy. I am myself, in my own interest, going to make a careful examination of that region, the coming spring, and I have thought perhaps some conservative conclusions that I might arrive at, would be valuable to others and that perhaps the INTELLIGENCER would be willing to use the same. With this in mind I wrote my brother Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, at George School, a few days ago, but have thought to write you this without awaiting his suggestion.

I may as well add that I have no axe to grind, no personal interest to subserve, but in this have simply been moved to be of assistance to others, if I may.

I would be glad to hear from some one to whom this may come, if it shall seem best.

K. O. HOLMES.

Kearney, Nebraska, Second month 17.

Correspondence of Friends' Intelligencer.

THE DUKHOBORS AT HALIFAX.

HALIFAX, N. S., Second month 14.

THE second party of the Doukhobors, those who arrived on the Lake Superior on the 27th ultimo, will be released from quarantine on the 17th. When the first party came I did not get any pictures, as it was too late, and too dark, when the tug reached the ships, but I shall try to get some of these, before they leave.

Through the kindness of Mr. George Campbell, of F. D. Corbett & Co., I had the pleasure of going down on their tug to Quarantine Station, the evening before the first party, on the Lake Huron, sailed for St. John. The Quarantine Station is on Lawlor's Island, about three miles or so from the city, and out of the usual track of vessels. There were thirty or so of us on the tug, among whom were the two American (Orthodox) Friends, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, the Government Interpreter, Prince Hilkooff, reporters, city business men, etc. Prince Hilkooff is of medium height, thin and sharp featured, and wore a long brown beard, making quite a contrast to the Doukhobors, as most of them were tall, and none of them wore beards.

The Doukhobors were crowded around the railings of the steamer, and a lot were on the wharf, as we drew up, and they made a fine sight, one that I would not have missed for a good deal. As the Interpreter greeted them for us they smiled and bowed low, and the men all took off their caps. In fact, they do a great deal of bowing, bending at the hip when they bow. Those on the wharf were holding a service, singing a psalm as we came up, and every little while during the singing they bowed, and the men and boys all took off their hats. Except for the difference in the style of the bow, it reminded one of the Church of England custom. The hymn sounded something like a chant in a Roman Catholic church, every note was prolonged. Some of the men, and the leader of the singing in particular, had one oft-recurring note which reminded one forcibly of the bleating of a sheep,—and as they all wore sheepskin coats the effect was rather funny.

The photos [two were kindly enclosed by our correspondent] give you a good idea of their dress and appearance. They are tall, well-formed, and healthy-looking. Everyone remarked that they were the finest looking lot of immigrants they had ever seen. I don't think that 2,000 average Canadians or Americans would look so well. Their complexion and features are not particularly foreign looking; they would pass in a crowd as Canadians now. They are a cleanly people, too. I was over the steamer, and it looked and smelt quite as clean as could be expected, quite a big contrast to the state in which a few Russian Jews left the Tangarivo.

They were neatly and comfortably,—in fact very warmly—dressed. They all, with two or three exceptions, wore sheepskin or goatskin coats, with the pelt inside; the men had the coat belted in at the waist, and the women let it hang loose. The men (and the boys were dressed like the men) wore black caps, which looked like lambskin, with cloth tops. The women wore a kind of cloth, like a "fascinator," on their heads; usually the color was pink, and they looked quite pretty. Their other garments were of thick heavy cloth, the prevailing color being blue. The women usually had some bright colors, for instance the stripes at the bottoms of the aprons of the two girls who stand in front [in one of the pictures] would be all the colors of the rainbow.

They are brought up to be courteous, even the very smallest children bowing low when they were given candy, and the little boys took off their caps. When the first one or two bowed that way I thought and said that they seemed to have the greatest respect for one another. They were cleanly in all their habits.

It was very cold during their trip on the train, from St. John to Winnipeg. The water froze and they could not wash, and the milk in the provision car froze and did not thaw during the whole trip.

Halifax, N. S., Second month 14. H. V. H.

LITERARY NOTES.

"SOCIAL Ideals and Social Progress" is the title of a timely pamphlet of 32 pages, by Lewis G. Janes, Director of the Cambridge Conferences, author of various works, etc., which comes to us from James H. West Co., publishers, Boston. (Paper cover, 25 cents.) In a hasty reading we discover in it a very clear and strong statement and argument concerning present questions in this country. The tenor of what he says may be inferred from his citation, in a text-page, at the first of the work, from Abraham Lincoln's great speech at Lewiston, Maine, in which he plead for the principles of the Declaration of Independence, and L. G. Janes declares, (p. 17), in the good company of the President-Emancipator, that "it is a sound political philosophy, justified by scientific sociological principles, which is enunciated in the Declaration, that all just government rests on the consent of the governed." "This is as true," he adds, "in Cuba, Hawaii, and the Philippines, as it is in Massachusetts."

Charlotte Coffyn Wilkinson, secretary of the "National League of Associations of Working Women's Clubs," is editor of a bi-monthly journal, The Club Worker (Syracuse, N. Y.; 25 cents a year), the first copy of which is sent us. "There is great need," we are told, "for such a League, for the collection of data and information relating to club work, and in order to supply lists of entertainments, and practical talks, to clubs desiring such."

The "Directors of the Old South Work," Boston, have just issued two Lafayette leaflets. The first is a selection from Lafayette's Autobiography, covering almost the entire period of his first visit to America, (1777-1779), and the second is devoted to "Letters of Washington and Lafayette," written, some of them in the period of the American Revolution, and some in the French Revolution.

The "Old South Leaflets," have now reached nearly a hundred issues; these are numbered 97 and 98. They are mostly documents relating to early American history. Their price is five cents each.

It is stated that our Ambassador to Germany, Dr. Andrew D. White, is contemplating the preparation of three extended works—a book on the relations of Americans with France before the Revolution, another on the making of the German they had dropped a candy. If they had been American children that would have been the explanation.

DOUKHOBOR GROUP, AT HALIFAX.

During the service on the wharf a woman offered a long prayer, standing bolt upright, looking straight before her and speaking rapidly and distinctly. I was standing near the Interpreter and he remarked that in her prayer she did not mention God at all, but spoke to the Spirit.

They are a quiet people. There was no loud talking at all, and when we gave them three British cheers at parting, they bowed and took off their caps.

One short, jolly little man, in a sailor suit, and wearing a light brown beard, who waved his hat to us and shouted, was evidently not a Doukhobor. I took him for a British tar from a ship, but he turned out to be a Russian nobleman who was accompanying his oppressed countrymen. [This was Leopold Soulergitzski, we presume.—EDS.]

An employé of the Government who accompanied the first lot of Doukhobors to the north-west, reported that it had never been his privilege to have to do with such a superior class of people. He did not see a cross look or hear a cross word during the trip,

Empire, and another* containing political and literary reminiscences. He is said to have found during his recent journey in Italy some valuable unpublished material bearing upon the subject of the first-mentioned volume.

A friend in California sends us a copy of The Land of Sunshine, a monthly magazine published at Los Angeles, Cal., and edited by Charles F. Lummis, author of a recent excellent book on Mexico. We find the contents of real interest,—they relate chiefly to the Pacific Coast,—and what pleases us most they are generous and kindly in tone. Plans of conquest by force, and of expansion by slaughter are not approved. Even the Indians are justly treated, in an interesting article by Dr. Washington Matthews, of the regular army, describing a search for mythical gold deposits in the Navajo Reservation, on the border line of Arizona and New Mexico.

An article at the close, freely illustrated, (as is the whole magazine), describes Redlands, one of the most attractive and beautiful places in Southern California. The homes of our friends A. K. and A. H. Smiley, with others, are shown.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

LITTLE BRITAIN, PA.—Penn Hill Young Friends' Association met Second month 5. The vice president, Harry Bicknell, opened the meeting by reading the third chapter of John.

The history report was given by Harry Bicknell. An article on the "Second Query," taken from the INTELLIGENCER of Third month 16, 1895, was read. "They also serve who only stand and wait," was recited by Phebe L. Coates, and Annie Smedley gave "Our Yankee Girls." The second of a series of papers on the Life of Whittier, treating of his school-days, was read by Mabel Haines.

A suggestive incident from the Current Topics seems worth mentioning. At a certain M. E. church one of the members was asked to occupy the time during an interval in a song service, while the choir rested. To the surprise of all he announced as his topic "A Church without a Song," and gave a history of the Society of Friends, telling how it had existed for two hundred years without the aid of music of any kind in its service. He also spoke in praise of the character of its members.

"How can we make our meetings more interesting?" was answered by Mary K. Brown. This is a question of interest to all societies and difficult to answer, for all can not see alike. We would urge punctuality and individual effort. Let each do something that his work may count. If we wish to accomplish any good work we must put our shoulder to the wheel of action and help move it along. We must not rest in our present condition, but look up to a higher ideal. The Young Friends' Association was founded on Friends' principles and as we work along that line it will give us a better understanding of the Society. Success does not lie with the few, but depends upon the earnest endeavor of all in the work.

Many beautiful sentiments from Whittier were given.

P. L. C.

FISHERTOWN, PA.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on First-day morning, the 12th instant. The meeting was opened by the assistant superintendent reading a part of the 22nd chapter of Proverbs. The minutes of the previous meeting were read.

Literary exercises were opened by a select reading by Addie Russell, followed by a recitation by Harold Blackburn. A selection was read by Anne Blackburn, teaching us to always try to set good examples. "The Builders" was recited by Carrie D. Blackburn. "The Little Clock," a short poem teaching us to always try to keep our faces bright, like a clock, was recited by Russell Blackburn. A selection on "Going to Meeting" was read by Allen C. Blackburn. A poem entitled "Keep to the Right" was recited by Lesley Blackburn. A selection on temperance was read by Jason Blackburn.

Mary Hammaker recited a poem entitled "My Little Garden." Sentiments on temperance, were given by a majority of the number present. The program for next meeting was read.

The meeting closed to meet Second month 26.

MARY J. BLACKBURN, Sec.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—A meeting of Mansfield Friends' Association was held at the home of Mary L. Bowne, First month 26, the president, Thomas S. Gibbs, in the chair. Thirty members responded to their names, a number with appropriate sentiments. The names of five new members were added to the roll.

Elizabeth Bowne read an article from the INTELLIGENCER on "Friends' Associations," which expressed the thought that Friends should be careful in their selection of "Current Topics." Some present thought we should post ourselves on events current in the outside world, and not confine ourselves particularly to topics concerning our own Society. We should be more liberal.

Thomas B. Harvey read extracts from Queries used over a hundred years ago, and these were responded to by Peter E. Harvey reading our present Queries. In some there was a great difference, in others very little.

Robert Taylor responded to the question "Have the Recent Disturbances, between the Old and New Worlds, had a Tendency to Promote Arbitration?" in a paper in which he thought the cause of arbitration had been set back many years by the late war. He paid a tribute to the President, as being mindful of the requests of Friends and others to avert war if possible, and settle the differences by arbitration, but said he was over-powered by circumstances. The paper called forth much discussion on both sides. Franklin Zelley thought the war would forward the cause of Peace and Arbitration, that the manifesto of the Czar of Russia, was probably inspired by our late war, and that eventually good might result.

After a pleasant interchange of thought and a brief silence, we adjourned to meet at the home of Thomas A. Bunting, Second month 23.

M. E. G., Sec.

CAMDEN, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association of Camden, N. J., met First month 3d. After a few moments' silence the minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved.

The report of the Executive Committee was as follows: An original poem by Wilhemina Ivins, on Christmastide. She felt very often "St. Nicholas" was made too real to the children,—that when they grew older they would reproach us for deceiving them. The idea the poem set forth was, that St. Nicholas should be represented more as the Mother Goose stories or as the Spirit of Love.

Mariana Burroughs gave an account of the Society of Friends as depicted by Dr. Weir Mitchell, in the novel "Hugh Wynne." It was unanimously agreed that they were misrepresented, and that the novel gave a very untrue idea of the Quaker character to the world.

A review of the life of our honored friend Benjamin Hallowell was then read and discussed. He was the first to introduce the Manual Training School, thinking it not right to cultivate the brain alone and not the muscles. As teacher, lecturer, philanthropist, and Friend, he filled a wide sphere of usefulness and many noble friends have lived to call him blessed. The meeting adjourned to meet Second month 7.

LAURA COLLINGS, Secretary.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn was held in Brooklyn, Second month 12.

The storm prevented many from attending; and because so few were present the paper of the evening was postponed.

Reports were received from the Current Topics, Bible, and History sections. In the latter the life of James and Lucretia Mott has been taken up, and is being reviewed with much interest.

One member having asserted that in his opinion a college education unfits a man for a business career, a lively discussion followed, in which all participated.

Some of the points brought out in the discussion were : The need of a more practical system of education. The advantages to be derived from the training of the hand and the development of the formative instincts. The mission of the college in creating ideals, enlarging the horizon, and enriching life. The necessity of the higher education in this age whose intricate problems demand the trained intellect, the aroused feelings, and the willing hand.

The meeting closed after the usual period of silence.

C. J. S.

CORNWALL, N. Y.—Friends' Association met at the "Seaman Homestead," after a postponement of one week. The meeting was called to order by Elizabeth K. Seaman, after which the minutes of last meeting were read and approved. Selections were read by Mary K. Brown, James Seaman, and Theodore Barton, upon which comments were made. Sentiments were given by all those present. The question of Friends associating more closely was then discussed by some of the members present and an extract from the INTELLIGENCER was read by Rowland Cocks, on the subject.

The subject of discussing "Current Topics" was introduced and explained by Jacob Seaman, but it was decided not to take it up for the present.

Baldwin F. Brown brought up the question of having at least one original contribution at each meeting, and Helen Jones and Jacob Seaman were appointed to prepare one, the subject being "Duty of Young Friends." Charles Seaman was also appointed to have a selection. The social question was then discussed. It was decided to hold the next meeting at the home of James Seaman, on Fourth-day, 25th of First month. The old Program and Refreshment committees were re-appointed for the ensuing social. Then adjourned to meet at the home of J. Quimby Brown, in three weeks.

EDMUND COCKS, Secretary.

Educational Department.

TEACHERS' CLASS WORK, PHILADELPHIA Y. M.

At the last meeting of the Educational Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting a report, (being No. 2), was submitted by the committee in charge of the Training Class,—as prepared by Belle H. Mooney, Principal, who directs the work.

The number in the class, since Eleventh month 12, was 20, of whom 14 are members with Friends. The amount received from Jeanes Fund was $500, of which about $300 had been expended, and from the Yearly Meeting funds, $250, and from the tuition of non-members, $100; from which two items, about $45, had been expended. Sixteen schools (four of them public schools), had been supplied with substitute teachers; number of days taught, 164. Two vacancies had been permanently supplied by teachers. In the list of "other work done by the Class": coaching a pupil for Girls' Central, Philadelphia, drawing at Gwynedd School, lectures on biology at Horsham School.

"We are now prepared," the report states, "to furnish teachers for drawing, and to supplement the history work in outlying schools by lectures on English, Grecian, or Roman history"; to furnish lectures in biology on a wide range of practical subjects; and in literature, "An Hour with Whittier," "An Hour with Louisa M. Alcott," "An Hour with Lucy Larcom." The report concludes:

"On account of the prevalence of grippe the week preceding the holidays I was called to the Girls' Department of Central School. Eight teachers from the class were engaged elsewhere as substitutes, several of those remaining were ill, and our work was discontinued until First month 3.

"Upon application we will furnish competent teachers as substitutes, thereby giving regular teachers an opportunity to visit other schools."

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

The College Oratorical Contest for the selection of college orator was held in Parrish Hall, Sixth-day evening last, the 17th inst. Five orations were delivered, as follows: "Possession through Expression," Mary E. Seaman, '99; "American Ideals," Marshall Pancoast, '99; "American Imperialism," Benjamin A. Thomas, '99; "True Independence," A. Davis Jackson, 1900; and "Our Civilization," Gilbert L. Hall, '99. All the orations were of an unusually high standard, as regards delivery and originality of thought and expression. The judges were Professor Tomlinson, of Swarthmore Preparatory School, and Prof. Charles S. Moore, '95, of Moorestown Friends' School. Mary E. Seaman was awarded the Delta Upsilon prize of $15, and title of College Orator. A. Davis Jackson and Gilbert L. Hall, respectively, were awarded the Literary Society prizes for second and third places. Mary C. Seaman will represent Swarthmore at the Inter-Collegiate Oratorical Contest, to be held at Lehigh University, next month.

The February meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held in the college parlors on First-day evening. Mrs. Hall, the president, presided. Gilbert L. Hall presented a comprehensive paper on "The Philippines," dwelling upon the characteristics of the population, and upon the natural resources of the islands. A paper, "The Sympathy of Religion," was read by Dr. Eringer, of West Chester State Normal School, which was greatly appreciated, and awakened considerable discussion in regard to the distinction between "Theology" and "Religion." Dr. Magill, Dr. Hull, Dean Bond, Prof. Birdsall, and others, took part in the discussion.

'99.

A WESTTOWN MEMORIAL FUND.—Friends of Westtown Friends' Boarding School, (in charge of the other body of Friends), represented in the Old Scholars' Association, have set out to raise a Fund of $100,000, in aid of the institution's endowment, and commemorative of its opening in 1799. The work of the school has grown, and changed, and conditions within a few years have not been favorable to its endowment funds. The charge per pupil, per year, is about $280, "while the charge has never been more than $180."

A circular sent out, stating the reasons for the effort, says: "With a full school, the interest on the invested funds met the deficit on each pupil. To-day, with the improvements greatly extended, and with a smaller attendance, the advanced position of the school has only been maintained by drawing on the principal of its endowment."

NEW YORK SWARTHMORE CLUB.—The first annual banquet of the New York Swarthmore College Association was held in New York city, on Seventh-day evening, Second month 11. The attendance was ninety-seven, including President William W. Birdsall, Dr. Edward H. Magill, and Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond, of Swarthmore College, and Aaron M. Powell and wife, who were guests of the Association.

George H. Strout, '93, President of the Association, presided.

The speakers were President Birdsall, Dr. Magill, Dean Bond, Aaron M. Powell, Harry S. Wood, '80, Dr. W. L. Baner, '82, Dr. Mary Willis, '84, and Mrs. Mary Willis Albertson, '86. Every class was represented from 1873 to 1898.

H. C. T.

ADDRESS WANTED.—A letter for "Prof. Stephen Knowlton," whose address was not known, has been sent to this office by the writer, (C. H. Gates, Plainfield, N. J.), who says he thinks S. K. is "a teacher or professor in a Friends' seminary in or near Philadelphia." We shall be glad to forward the letter, if address is furnished.

PROF. F. SPENCER BALDWIN, of Boston University, in the North American Review, discusses "Some Aspects of Luxury." The luxuries of the few in one generation, he declares, become the common heritage of the many in the next. Luxury is a main factor in the onward movement of the race. It stands for much of the beauty, grace, and variety which alone make life really worth the living.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

I AM glad to be among a few Friends again, after an absence of nine years in eastern Washington. I always meant, while there, to write you an article describing scenes and experiences in the new country.

We who were of the younger generation of Friends, ingraft some new ideas into our principles, as we are brought into contact with the world and with other Christian denominations, yet I see no essential difference in my belief. But I have learned more faith in, and charity for all, and love my daily silence, and the reading of your excellent journal more than ever. It is but the truth we are all seeking, the truth that is—or makes—free. "The Word was made flesh, and dwelt among us," and so the spirit of Christ dwells amongst us to-day, and is moulding the churches, and God's chosen people.

San Francisco, Cal.

S. E. M.

I have been very much pleased with the course the paper has taken in regard to the late war, and "Expansion." From my earliest childhood the INTELLIGENCER and the New York Tribune have been constant inmates of the home, the most depended upon in any religious matter, or great question of the day, among all the others which came and went. The Tribune has failed me utterly this time, but the INTELLIGENCER has been a help and inspiration in its own advocacy of the peace principle, and in its selection of able articles on this and the matter of expansion. I trust this course will be continued.

The Society of Friends needs it almost as sorely as if Peace had not been one of the foundation stones in its organization. I think any one having this principle at heart must have been greatly pained by the open or tacit leaning of many of our members toward the war and its consequences. If nothing is done to check this decline, the coming generation will regard the peace principle as one of the once-advocated but now out-grown testimonies of the Society.

A. B.

Woodstown, N. J.

Our attention is called by a reader to the fact that the lines published Second month 11, an extract from the letter of the Trustees of Chappaqua Mountain Institute, are adapted from Whittier's poem, "The Golden Wedding of Longwood,"—the fiftieth wedding anniversary of Bayard Taylor's parents. They were, however, very appropriate also on the Chappaqua occasion.

A Friend from Waynesville O., writes, Second month 13: "For the past week the mercury has been from 2° to 28° below zero, and only a few degrees above in the day,—unprecedented cold weather. Snow on the ground makes splendid sleighing. Our quarterly meeting (Miami) very small on account of the extreme cold."

A FRIEND in Indiana, at the close of a business letter, says: "I want to add that the INTELLIGENCER has made progress, with which I am pleased, and that the out-spoken expression of principles on the war, and the conquest in Cuba and the Philippines, deserves commendation."

Our friend Matilda Garrigues, in a note on the 20th inst., in unfamiliar character, adds an explanation which we regret to hear: "Please excuse this left-handed scribble, as I have no scribe to-day, and was so unfortunate as to fall and break my right arm a few days since."

A Friend in Camden, N. J., speaking of the Young Friends' Association there, says: "We have just lately organized and feel greatly encouraged in the interest shown in our meetings."

THE Oneida Indians in Wisconsin are increasing in numbers instead of decreasing. Six years ago there were 1,800 entitled to annuities, now there are 2,000. This increase is in part due to the better sanitary conditions on the reservation, and with the growth of farms and clearing of swamp lands the better mode of living.

COMMUNICATIONS.

BURLINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING HOME.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

Will you allow space in your columns to correct the statement from the Newtown Enterprise that Burlington Quarterly Meeting has bought a property for a Friends' Home?

The committee on Friends' Boarding Home of Burlington Quarterly Meeting have not been authorized to buy any property, nor have they the means with which to purchase. The misunderstanding probably arose from the fact that they are about renting the property designated.

L. H. S.

Trenton, N. J., Second month 20.

CAUTION GIVEN.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

A private letter recently received from William Lloyd Garrison, of Boston, asks that caution be given against giving funds to a colored man, John J. Smallwood, who asks help for a colored school of which he is Principal.

Wm. Lloyd Garrison characterizes him as unworthy of aid.

A notice to this effect may prevent some of our Friends from being deceived.

ANNA M. JACKSON.

Clifton, N. J.

AGAINST LIQUOR LICENSES.

RAHWAY and Plainfield Monthly Meeting of Friends held on the 19th instant, adopted the following protest against the granting of liquor licenses in Plainfield, N. J., which the clerks were directed to forward to the Common Council:

To the Common Council of the City of Plainfield:

At Rahway and Plainfield Monthly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, held Second month 19, 1899, the following minute was approved and adopted by the meeting:

"This meeting learns with regret of the renewal of applications for licenses for the sale of intoxicating liquors for drinking purposes in Plainfield, and it hereby protests, in the interest of the public welfare, against their being granted by the Common Council."

Signed by direction, and on behalf of, the said meeting.

MARGARET F. VAIL, Clerk,

EDW. D. HUTCHINSON, Asst. Clerk.

THE DOUKHOBORS.

THE letter from Harry V. Haight, at Halifax, elsewhere printed, states that the second party of immigrants, who came on the Lake Superior, were to be released from quarantine on the 17th inst.

We have received $5.00 more for the Fund in aid of the Doukhobors, from a Friend in Bucks county, Pa.

Inquiry is made of us whether we are still receiving contributions, and we answer that we are. The sum in hand, ($82.00, counting the $5.00 above), we have deposited in bank, and are waiting to see where it is most needed. There are still others to come, and help will be required for the settlers in Canada.

FROM A VIRGINIA FRIEND.

ONLY yesterday [19th] was our first mail for a week received, owing to our railroad from Washington city being completely blocked. Yesterday and this morning, so bright and mild, we can scarcely realize that such formidable obstacles had to be overcome, though there is still a great quantity of snow around us.

Our experiences in this locality were similar to those reported in so many others,—extreme cold, the mercury ranging from zero to minus 20, or lower, with snow falling rapidly from the afternoon of the 11th to night of 13th, accompanied with high winds for twenty-four hours, leaving immense drifts, which stopped travel. The snow was said to be from 2½ to 3 feet deep on the level, and in some places the roads filled with drifts ten feet deep. Many farmers seemed almost exhausted from battling with the storm, caring for their stock, etc., but we have heard of no fatalities from exposure to the cold, and no serious sickness, which is a great favor.

The road to our meeting-house, near the village [Waterford, in Loudoun county] being impassable, our monthly meeting on Fourth-day, the 15th, was held here, in the home of our sister E. J. Phillips. Just a dozen of us "gathered in the quiet," under a feeling, to which expression was given of deep thankfulness to our Father for our preservation and the mercies received at his hand.

Hoping that our friends elsewhere fared as well as possible,
Very truly, A. M. S.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE FROLIC OF THE WINDS.

Out from the frosty caves of the north,
Boreas and his boisterous crew
One winter's day hastened forth
The outer world to view.

"Now we are free to do as we may,
In frolic and fun we'll spend the day,"
Over the mountain, into the vale,
With a whirl and a whistle,
They go in a gale.

Blow, blow, blow, and away they go;
Hustle, and bustle, rush and rustle,
On their wings the drifting snow,
Over the fields in a romping race,
Whirling the snow in the traveler's face;
Leaping, and jumping, and bounding away,
Thus they go the livelong day.
Into the woods and over the break,
Their snow-burdened pinions
Wild echoes awake.

Now they turn architects, trying each hand
At building of castles over the land.
Without any thought, without any care
Spreading them broadcast everywhere.
As varied their forms as those in a dream.
And quite as fantastic as in midnight they gleam.

Rounding and smoothing with exquisite grace,
With no compass to measure, no pencil to trace.
Little they care if to-morrow's bright sun
Undoes the work which to-day they have done.

For them it has been
A jolly good day,
So they care not a whit
What others may say.

Derwood, Md.

W. C. H.

THE PATHWAYS OF THE HOLY LAND.

THE pathways of thy land are little changed
Since Thou wert there;
The busy world through other ways has ranged
And left thee bare.

The rocky path still climbs the glowing steep
Of Olivet;
Though rains of two millenniums wear it deep
Men tread it yet.

Still to the garden o'er the brook it leads Quiet and low;
Before his sheep the shepherd on it treads,
His voice they know.

The wild fig throws broad shadows o'er it still
As once o'er Thee;
Peasants go home at evening up that hill
To Bethany.

And as, when gazing, Thou didst weep o'er them—
From height to height
The white roofs of discrowned Jerusalem
Burst on our sight.

These ways were strewn with garments once and palms,
Which we tread thus:

Here, through thy triumph, on thou passedst, calm,
On to thy cross.

The waves have washed fresh sands upon the shore
Of Galilee;
But chiselled on thy hillsides evermore
Thy paths we see.

Man has not changed them in that slumbering land,—
Nor time effaced;
Where thy feet trod to bless, we still may stand;
All can be traced.

Yet we have traces of thy foot-steps far
Truer than these;
Where'er the poor, the tried and suffering are,
Thy steps Faith sees.

Nor with fond sad regrets thy steps we trace;
Thou art not dead;
Our path is onward till we see thy face
And hear thy tread.

And now wherever meet thy lowliest band
In praise and prayer,
There is thy presence, there thy Holy Land;
Thou, thou art there.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS IN ENGLAND.

A London letter is regularly sent to Harper's Weekly by Arnold White. His sympathies, as shown by his letters, are imperialistic, and he has been very cynical about the Czar's efforts. But here is what he says (in his letter in the Weekly of the 11th) of social conditions in England. It is a noteworthy description.

It is true that the country is prosperous, that the revenue is increasing, that philanthropists are active, that politicians are eagerly on the lookout for grievances that will tell with the voters. But the mass of national misery is appalling. It remains practically untouched by legislation. Over a million of our social failures are provided for in the workhouses. The sum of poverty and degradation outside the Poor Laws, inherited by this generation from its predecessor, is not being reduced. We are in a fair way to hand down to the next generation greater embarrassment and more efficient machinery for the manufacture of larger masses of human degradation. The national debt of the country is under $100 a head. In 1815 it was $225 a head. While liability for past expenditure has thus diminished, responsibility for our social failures has increased. In London alone the number of prostitutes exceeds the population of Albany. The folk without homes in London equal the population of Boston. Known criminals exceed one-third of the population of Memphis.

It is economically untrue that the rich are getting richer and the poor poorer; but the gulf between the Haves and the Have-nots is deeper and wider and blacker as education enables the latter to understand the contrast between their lot and that of the comfortable classes. I have seen men willing to work, throw themselves down in the street praying for death to end the misery of want. I have heard the wailing of children locked lonely into a bare unsanitary room while the mother, all too soon after recent childbirth, seeks the wherewithal to feed them. From the cheap lodging-house, from the railway arches, from the overcrowded tenements, rises an ever-increasing volume of inarticulate but unquenchable revolt against intolerable conditions of life. Statistics published by optimistic officials are satisfactory to those who wish to believe that all is well in this over-crowded island. Discontent is not a matter that lends itself to statistics. Discontent, however, is growing. For the present everything is quiet. Trade is good. The disinherited have no means of coöperation, no political pull, no leverage as against the prosperous members of the community. The combined efforts of all the churches and all the societies have undoubtedly produced certain visible effects, but the evils that remain are so enormous in their extent that the blindest and most pre-occupied politician can scarcely fail to perceive that expanding trade, a strong navy, friendship with the United States, a settlement with France, and public and private charity still leave something to be desired if the British people are successfully to escape the charge of hypocrisy.

Myriads of children produced in reckless disregard of parental responsibility and plunged into an environment of villany and vice, with no play-ground but the street, is a feature in English city life which attracts little attention, but it is as much a reality as the Sudan victories. The social reformers are no more in agreement than theologians themselves, though there is a general conviction that a great deal requires to be done. Canon Barnett, who has done brave and good work in Whitechapel for many years, has recently called public attention to the horrors of Whitechapel and Spitalfields, but, with the exception of one or two letters in the newspapers, has met with no public response.

Although there is no country in the world where the social revolution is less likely to take place than in England, there is national weakness and shame in the social condition of masses of our countrymen, and until a new Savonarola arises to rouse the national conscience, the tendency will be to go from bad to worse. Many of the younger members, especially on the Unionist side, in the present Parliament, are keenly alive to the social question, but the preoccupation of the country, and necessarily, therefore, that of the Prime Minister, in foreign affairs, renders them impotent, even if legislation could accomplish anything in a direction where nothing but change of character and of morals can be of permanent benefit.

ARNOLD WHITE.

So far as reported, women were elected to the office of county superintendent in nineteen counties in Kansas at the last election. Thirteen of them were Republicans and six were Populists, according to the Topeka Capital.

ACCORDING to a writer in the Popular Science Monthly, the Jew still possesses an absolutely unprecedented tenacity of life. The death-rate is really but little over half that of the average American population.

THE trustees and professors of Cornell College, (Iowa), have taken a decided stand against the use of liquor at any of the college banquets, or in any building on the campus, a position that has been cheerfully responded to by the students.

FIFTY walnut trees in Cass county, Michigan, were recently sold for $10,000 cash. These trees have now been felled, and will be shipped to English buyers. The largest tree was seven feet in diameter at its base and will yield lumber worth from $700 to $1,000.

"The Brown Man's Burden."

The meretricious rhymes, "The White Man's Burden," by which Rudyard Kipling endeavored to support and stimulate the Imperialistic movement in this country, have been well parodied by a writer in Truth, of London, Labouchere's candid journal. There are eight stanzas, but the following three are sufficient to show the author's satirical exposure of Kipling's hollowness:

"Pile on the brown man's burden;
And if ye rouse his hate,
Meet his old fashioned reasons
With Maxims up to date.
With shells and dum-dum bullets
A hundred times make plain.
The brown man's loss must ever
Imply the white man's gain.

"Pile on the brown man's burden,
And through the world proclaim
That ye are freedom's agents—
There's no more paying game!
And should your own past history
Straight in your teeth be thrown,
Retort that independence
Is good for whites alone.

"Pile on the brown man's burden,
With equity have done;
Weak, antiquated scruples
Their squeamish course have run,
And though 'tis freedom's banner
You're waving in the van,
Reserve for home consumption
The sacred 'rights of man!'"

Life in Siberia.

THE five years that I spent in Siberia were for me a great education in life and human character, says Prince Kropotkin in the Atlantic. I was brought into contact with men of all descriptions: the best and the worst; those who stood at the top of society and those who vegetated at the very bottom,—the tramps and the so-called incorrigible criminals. I had ample opportunities to watch the ways and habits of the peasants in their daily life, and still more opportunities to appreciate how little the state administration could give to them, even though it was animated by the very best intentions. Finally, my extensive journeys, during which I traveled over fifty thousand miles in carts, on board steamers, in boats, and especially on horseback, had a wonderful effect in strengthening my health. They also taught me how little man really needs as soon as he comes out of the enchanted circle of conventional civilization. With a few pounds of bread and a few ounces of tea in a leather bag, a kettle and a hatchet hanging at the side of the saddle, and under the saddle a blanket, to be spread at the camp fire upon a bed of freshly cut spruce twigs, a man feels wonderfully independent, even amidst unknown mountains thickly clothed with woods, and in winter time.

Siberia is not the land buried in snow and peopled with exiles only, that it is imagined to be, even by many Russians. In its southern parts it is as rich in natural productions as are the southern parts of Canada; and beside half a million of natives, it has a population of more than four millions as thoroughly Russian as that to the north of Moscow.

The Earliest Writing in France.

THE ancient Celts and Gauls of France had no real letters, says Gabriel de Mortillet, in the Popular Science Monthly. A few Celtiberian pieces of money bear characters belonging to the Phœnician and Carthaginian alphabets. In Cisalpine Gaul we find Gallic written in ancient Italian characters. The Greeks, when they founded Massilia and spread themselves along the Mediterranean coast of France, brought their language and writing into the country. The Gauls took advantage of this, and many Gallic inscriptions in Greek characters occur scattered through the south of France, among much more numerous inscriptions in the Greek language and character.

When the Romans came, the Latin alphabet rapidly took the place of the Greek, and the few Gauls that continued faithful to the old tongue used Latin characters in engraving the inscriptions they have left us. Similar changes took place in Gallic pieces of money.

Arab Carriers on Vegetable Food.

ARAB carriers bear great loads upon their backs, and go at a trotting pace from 6 a. m. to 6 p. m., says the Vegetarian Messenger. During the month of Ramadan, the Koran forbids the taking of food between sunrise and sunset, and this law is said to be held sacred and rarely violated. Not only do these porters continue their arduous physical exertion during the twelve laboring hours of the day without taking any food during that period, but the French inspectors who are in charge of the gangs told our informant that they could work better during the month of the fast than at any other time of the year, because their energy was not needed for digestion.

At eventide, these Arabs have a moderate meal of wheat-meal porridge, mixed with large proportions of butter (it is to be had cheap) or olive oil. Their expenditure for food is not more than six or seven cents a day, and the only luxury which they permit themselves is a cup of very strong black coffee and a cigarette. The idler exists on one cent's worth of bread with a little olive oil, which he buys for an additional five cents.

Light on the Philippines.

IN the mass of matter concerning the Philippine Islands, which continues to be published, there have been some interesting and important letters, recently. One of these, a private letter from an American at Manila, a prominent business man (name not disclosed), appeared in the Washington Post (an expansionist journal), a few days ago. The Post vouches for the writer as a competent authority, and trustworthy person. He expressed strong regret that the views of General Merritt were to be so much regarded by the American Commissioners at Paris, and said:

"I consider it not merely a mistake, but a grave misfortune, that he has gone to Paris in the capacity of an adviser to the peace commission concerning the Philippines, for he can know nothing of them from his own experience, and almost nothing through the advice of others."

As to the Islands themselves, the latter went on to say:

"In considering their value, it must be remembered that we have yet acquired a mere speck of territory on the coast, the rest being in the hands of Spaniards and insurgents. We can, of course, easily acquire what territory remains in Spanish hands. With the insurgents the tale is different, and they influence or control the bulk of this island. With them, we must either fight a long, expensive, indecisive war, or arrange diplomatically to recognize their rights and their demands, and so live in peace."

THE agents at the different Indian agencies between the Black Hills and the Missouri river are encouraging the Indians to hunt the wolves, which are increasing in such alarming manner on the cattle ranges. This winter the animals seem to be more ferocious than ever before, and they are killing the young cattle at an alarming rate. One rancher, who came to Belle Fourche from the Slim Butte range, reported having seen a large number of carcasses of cattle along the trail, which had been killed by wolves. The Indian agents are paying $5 for every wolf brought in. One Indian spent a week hunting on the Cheyenne, and he returned to the agent at Standing Rock with a wagon load of wolves.—[Correspondence St. Louis Globe-Democrat.]

STOCK of the Chemical Bank, New York City, sells at $4.105 per share. The par value is $100 per share. Stock of the Calumet and Hecla Copper Company, (on Lake Superior), has sold recently at $775 per share, the amount paid in being $12.50.

CURRENT EVENTS.

FELIX FAURE, President of France, died after only a few hours' illness of heart trouble, in Paris, on the evening of the 16th instant. He was fifty-eight years' old. He had been a merchant, and ship-owner in Havre, and entered politics in 1881, becoming a member of the Chamber of Deputies. (In his youth, in order to acquire a knowledge of the leather trade, he served three years' apprenticeship to a tanner at Amboise.) He was elected President, in First month, 1895, on the resignation of President Casimir Perier.

On the 18th instant, the Senate and Chamber of Deputies, in joint meeting, elected Emile Loubet President, in succession to President Faure. He is a lawyer, aged sixty, comes from Montelimar, in the south of France, and his family are "plain people." He has been a member of the Senate since 1885, and for some time President of that body.

THERE has been some effervescence in Paris, and the usual predictions were sent out of "revolution," etc., but there seems to have been no more foundation for them than usual. The Bonaparte and the Orleans "pretenders" have shown some activity, but up to this writing their intriguing and scheming, (outside of France, as they are not permitted within), have apparently borne no fruits. The new President "has not committed himself" on the Dreyfus question, and both sides have been endeavoring to capture him. He is described as of much plainer and simpler manners than Faure, and one of the newspapers hostile to him charges that he "tucks his napkin inside his collar," at meals. Emily Crawford, a well-known Paris correspondent, declares that he "is the right man in the right place." He has requested the existing ministry, headed by Dupuy, to remain in office.

THERE have been further skirmishes and interchanges of shooting between the United States and Filipino combatants, near Manila, but no serious fighting. A dispatch on the 19th says, "many of our men have been prostrated by the heat." More troops are being dispatched from this country, and additional war-ships have joined Admiral Dewey. Two Filipino delegates who had come to this country in the expectation of composing the trouble, but who reached San Francisco after the fighting began, have come eastward, and will go to Europe to urge there the justice of the Filipino claims. Agoncillo, who was at Washington, but went to Canada, has also gone to Europe. He denies having recommended an attack by the Filipinos.

THE American-Canadian Joint High Commission, in Washington, on the 20th instant, adjourned to meet in Quebec on August 2, unless the Chairmen of the respective Commissions agree upon another date. The Commissions have been unable to agree upon the settlement of the Alaskan boundary. It was officially given out that "very substantial progress had been made in the adjustment of many of the questions considered." Some apprehension is expressed that the adjournment may prove to be final. The question of the Alaska boundary is represented as very difficult, Canada making claims which would take considerable territory heretofore considered American.

THE bill to authorize the increase of the regular army to 100,000 men was made a special order, by a vote of 44 to 26, in the United States Senate, on the 20th, thus having precedence over other unfinished business. There is considerable difference of view concerning the measure, among Republicans as well as Democrats, and as the session will close in a week, the passage of a bill on the subject is not certain. President McKinley insists upon action before adjournment.

The discussion of the measure began on the chief feature being a speech by Senator Cockrell, (Dem.), of Missouri, who said that "those who stood with him were willing to give the President all the money and every man he desired, but they were determined that no great standing army should be fastened upon the country without full and free discussion."

THERE still are "dead-locks" in the election of United States Senators, in five States: Pennsylvania, Delaware,

Nebraska, Utah, and California. In Utah, the Legislature is Democratic; in the others the Republicans are in the majority. It seems probable that in Delaware there may be no election, as the session is limited to sixty days, and the same may occur in Pennsylvania, where it has been voted to adjourn on April 20. If no elections meantime occur, the seats now held by Senators Quay, (Rep.), Gray, (Dem.), Allen, (Dem.), Cannon, (Dem.), and White, (Dem.), will become vacant at the close of the session next week.

THE Court of Inquiry into the charges made by General Miles against the army beef, began at Washington on the 20th, and he was the first witness. His testimony was cautiously given. He disowned several so-called newspaper "interviews;" one of them, published in the New York Herald, had not occurred at all. His charge, in his testimony before the War Inquiry Commission, that the beef had been embalmed "as a pretense of experiment," (to which Eagan so vehemently rejoined), he qualified by withdrawing the word "pretense." He said he heard frequent complaints of the army beef during the war, but the chemical treatment idea was not impressed upon him until Surgeon Daly's report, late in September. Other officers said that the canned roast beef was condemned by the men as unfit for food, one of them expressing the opinion that it had first been used for making beef extract.

COMPLAINTS are sent to the Treasurer of the United States, at Washington, from other cities of "a deficiency of paper currency and a surplus of gold coin." The Treasurer, on the 18th, speaking of such a complaint from New Orleans, said: "We have received lately, similar appeals from New York, Cincinnati, Chicago, and Kansas City, asking for paper in return for deposits of gold in the Sub-Treasury of New York." He stated that there was in the Treasury, $227,000,000 in gold, and $23,000,000 in paper. The people, he thought, had not got accustomed to using gold, and said, "business is so active that paper money is being kept out among individuals instead of being in the banks."

THERE has been a remarkable rise in many "raw materials" entering into manufactured articles,—especially in metals, including copper, iron, and steel. This will necessarily raise prices of finished products, and will tend to check our sales of manufactured goods abroad. Some increases of wages have been made. At Reading, Pa., the Reading Iron Company, (employing 2,000 men), ordered an advance, to take place on the 1st instant, and at Catasauqua, Pa., an advance of ten per cent. is made by the Crane Iron Company, employing 300 men.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

A MOVEMENT is on foot to establish a chair of Welsh history, language, and literature, at Marietta College, Ohio, and to suitably endow it, for which purpose $50,000 is proposed to be raised. An Eastern Committee to promote the object has been in part formed, the New York members of which include ex-judge Noah Davis, William Dean Howells, United States Assistant-Treasurer Ellis H. Roberts, Dr. D. Parker Morgan, and others. There has been a great revival of interest in Celtic study in England, due to the scholarship of Prof. John Rhys, of Oxford, and others.

—Bad fires continue to be reported. The following occurred last week: The Governor's mansion at Frankfort, Ky., was totally destroyed. Most of Governor Bradley's valuable personal property was saved. The town of Digby, Nova Scotia, the gateway to the land of "Evangeline," was almost wiped out. All the business part of the town is in ashes and the loss will be $200,000. Over a million dollars' worth of government property was destroyed on the night of the 15th instant, by a fire which broke out in the machine shop of the Brooklyn navy-yard.

—John Ruskin celebrated his 80th birthday on the 8th instant, and it was expected that the occasion would be taken for a new portrait by Holman Hunt of the patriarch of English letters. According to a recent report, Ruskin's mind is quite clear, but the storm and stress of the world have ceased to make any impression upon him, and he spends his days in quiet serenity, looking on the calm waters of the lake below his windows.

—A dispatch from Washington says that five months' trial of the new Canadian tariff, which gives British merchandise lower rates of duty than that from the United States, shows that exports from this country to Canada have increased twenty per cent. during that time, while British imports only increased ten per cent.

—Many of the alumnae of Vassar College are striving to prevent President Taylor from going to Brown University. The alumnae in New York, Chicago, Washington, and Cleveland have taken formal action. At a meeting of New York alumnae it was stated that $2,000,000 more was needed for Vassar, and a committee was appointed to solicit subscriptions.

—An amendment to the Constitution of North Carolina, limiting the suffrage, has been adopted by the Legislature of that State. The assigned object is "to eliminate the ignorant negro vote."

—The Legislature of Minnesota has passed, over the veto of Governor Lind, the bill appropriating $20,000 to pay bounties earned under the Beet-Sugar bounty law.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
REYMER-BAUMAY
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR } Cincinnati.
ROCKFORD }
ATLANTIC }
BRADLEY }
BROOKLYN } New York.
JEWETT }
FLATKE }
UNION }
SOUTHERN } Chicago.
SHIPMAN }
COLLIER }
MISSOURI } St. Louis.
RED SEAL }
SOUTHERN }

JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY
Cleveland.
SALEM
Salem, Mass.
OORWELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

THE brands of White Lead named in the margin are old friends, tried by many generations of use and proven the best. They are made by the "old Dutch process" of slow corrosion, and, with pure Linseed Oil, there is no other paint as good.

There are other brands made by quick or patent process and numerous mixtures of Barytes, Zinc, Whiting, etc., which are branded and sold as Pure White Lead. Make sure that the brand is right.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

—"Miss Jessie Louise Payne, of Oshkosh, Wis.," says the Union Signal, "announces upon her wedding cards that she desires no gifts. A young woman who has the moral courage to do that must be reckoned among the heroic pioneers of social reform whose memory should be perpetuated by a grateful race.

—Remarking upon the large shipments of beer to the Philippines, (a million bottles on one steamer), a morning paper remarks that "this will, sooner or later, be likely to constitute a portion of 'The White Man's Burden,'" in that locality. No doubt it will.

—The Twentieth Anniversary and Eleventh Graduating Exercises of the United States Indian School at Carlisle, Pa., will take place next week, on the 28th, 1st and 2d.

—We find it stated that the Oregon legislature has just passed an amendment to grant full suffrage to women, by a vote of 48 to 6 in the House, and 25 to 1 in the Senate.

NOTICES.

* A Circular Meeting, under the care of a Committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting, will be held at Chester, Pa., on First-day, Third month 5, 1899. To convene at 3 o'clock.

MARY P. HARVEY, Clerk.

* A Conference under the care of the Philanthropic Committee of Philadelphia Yearly and Bucks Quarterly Meetings will be held in the meeting-house at Langhorne, Bucks county, on First-day, Second month 26, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. The meeting will be addressed by Dr. Joseph S. Walton. Subject, "Temperance." All are respectfully invited to attend. On behalf of Committee.

SUSANNA RICH, Clerk.

* The Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches will attend meetings as follows:

SECOND MONTH:

26. Spruce Street, 10.30 a. m.

THIRD MONTH:

19. Green Street, 10.30 a. m.

FOURTH MONTH:

2. Frankford, 10.30 a. m.

16. West Philadelphia, 11 a. m.

30. Fairhill, 3.30 p. m.

FIFTH MONTH:

21. Merion, 10.30 p. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

* Appointments of Baltimore Yearly Meeting's Visiting Committee for Second month are as follows:

26. Menallen, Pa.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

* The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting-house at Darby, on First-day, Second month 19, 1899, at 2.30 p. m.

Subject, "Purity."

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

* The united First-day evening meetings, in Philadelphia, during Second month, will be at 17th street and Girard Avenue, at 7.30 o'clock. Friends generally should feel it their duty to be in attendance.

OLD POINT COMFORT, RICHMOND, AND WASHINGTON.

NEXT 1X-DAY TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The second of the present series of personally-conducted tours to Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Seventh-day, Second month 25.

Tickets, including transportation, meals en route in both directions, transfers of passengers and baggage, hotel accommodations at Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington, and carriage ride about Richmond—in fact, every necessary expense for a period of six days—will be sold at rate of $34.00 from New York, Brooklyn, and Newark; $32.50 from Trenton; $31.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

OLD POINT COMFORT ONLY.

Tickets to Old Point Comfort only, including luncheon on going trip, one and three-fourths days' board at that place, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold in connection with this tour at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to Ticket Agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

Macbeth makes half the lamp-chimneys; and half the dealers won't sell 'em, because they don't break.

Get the Index—free.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Get it Now.

After a while it will be too late to secure a copy of "The Christiana Riot." It is well worth the money to any Friend. Illustrations of the Riot House, and portraits of Castner Hanway, Joseph Scarlett, and Elijah Lewis are some of its many features.

Cloth Edition, Gilt-edge, Price $1.00 Postpaid.

Address all orders to
MARVIN E. BUSHONG, General Agent,
May, Lancaster county, Pa.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

We will continue the manufacture of Custom Shoes and carry a Select Stock of our own reliable work.

SAMUEL DUTCHER,

(SECOND FLOOR.) 45 N. 13th Street.

At the wedding anniversary of a railway magnate one of the guests, noticing a somewhat lonely looking and rather shabbily attired man in one corner of the parlor, walked over and sat down near him. "I was introduced to you," he said, "but I did not catch your name." "My name," replied the other, "is Swaddleford." "Oh, then, you are a relative of our host?" "Yes," rejoined the "poor relation," with a grin, "I am his cousin, $500,000 removed." — [Youth's Companion.]

AGAIN the old cry of "The horse must go" is raised; but, for that matter, the horse has never done anything else. — [Chicago News.]

TRYING to spell proper names that one has never seen written proves very difficult to many people especially little folks. For instance a little [Indian] girl wrote the name "Ruth" the other day "Rought" and "Helen," "Hellownie." — [From Indian Leader, Haskell Indian School, Kansas.]

"PAPA, my teacher told me to ask you to tell me something about Victor Hugo. To-morrow she wants me to tell the class what was the most important thing he ever did." Papa (who pretends to know it all) — "Victor Hugo founded the Hugonauts — but you tell your teacher I'm payin' school taxes, and I don't propose to have to do her work." — [Chicago News.]

AN enthusiastic professor was advocating the advantages of athletic exercise. "The Roman youths," he cried, "used to swim three times across the Tiber before breakfast." The Scotch student smiled, at which the irate professor exclaimed: "Mr. McAllister, why do you smile? We shall be glad to share your amusement." The canny Scot replied, "I was just thinking, sir, that the Roman youths must have left their clothes on the wrong bank at the end of their swim." — [Bookman.]

Newly Priced Books.

Marion Harland's "Some Colonial Homesteads and their Stories," cloth. Publisher's price, $3.00; now $1.25; postage, 22 cents extra.

Susan Ferrier's Novels, "Marriage," 2 volumes; "Inheritance," 2 volumes; "Destiny," 2 volumes. Publisher's price, $6.00; now $1.50; postage, 36 cents extra.

Townsend's "Near a Whole City Full." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 13 cents each.

Du Maurier's "The Martian." Publisher's price, $1.75; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Will Carleton's Poems, assorted, cloth, full gilt. Publisher's price, $2.50; now $1.00; postage, 15 cents extra.

Wilson's "Wonderful Story of Old." 2 volumes, illustrated, 1/2 morocco. Publisher's price, $7.50; now $2.00.

F. M. Kingsley's "Prisoners of the Sea." Publisher's price, $1.25; now 50 cents; postage, 10 cents extra.

Zola's "His Excellency." Publisher's price, $1.50; now 50 cents; postage, 14 cents extra.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

THE VIEWS OF FRIENDS.

Tracts and Leaflets for Circulation.

QUAKERISM: ITS BELIEFS AND MESSAGES. By William Edward Turner (Editor of the British Friend). 40 pp. 10 cents. 5 copies, 40 cents. By mail at these prices.

THE MEETING FOR WORSHIP. By Howard M. Jenkins. Small pamphlet. 12 pp. Single copies, 2 cents; 50 copies, 50 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF FRIENDS. By Howard M. Jenkins. (Chicago Congress Paper, 1893.) 24 pp. 2 cents; 50 copies, 75 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER ASSOCIATION, Limited,
921 Arch Street, Phila.

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to
CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

CHARLES BURTON,

Practical House and Sign Painter,

Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, }

JOSEPH T. FOULKE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

OFFICES: { 623 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.
{ Ambler, Montgomery Co., Pa.

JOHN FABER MILLER,

325 SWEDR STREET, NORRISTOWN, PENNA.

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practicing in Montgomery and Philadelphia counties.

S. W. BLACK'S SON, EDWARD T. BLACK
REAL ESTATE AGENT
AND BROKER

125 South Seventh Street, Philad'a.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 4, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 9.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

IX.

ANY mind that is drawn outward for spiritual help, further than as encouragement from examples of what the spirit of God can effect upon obedient, devoted subjects, is drawn from God, the alone source and fountain of life, light, and strength.

BENJAMIN HALLOWELL.

From his Preface to "Young Friends' Manual."

WHEAT-SHEAVES.

HE saw the wheat-fields waiting,
All golden in the sun ;
And strong and stalwart reapers
Went by him one by one.
"Oh, could I reap in harvest !"
His heart made bitter cry :
"I can do nothing, nothing !
So weak, alas ! am I."
At eve a fainting traveler
Sank down beside the door :
A cup of crystal water
To quench his thirst he bore.
And when refreshed and strengthened,
The traveler went his way,
Upon the poor man's threshold
A golden wheat-sheaf lay.

When came the Lord of harvest,
He cried : "O Master kind,
One sheaf I have to offer,
But that I did not bind.
I gave a cup of water
To one athirst ; and he Left at my door, in going,
This sheaf I offer thee."

Then said the Master, softly :
"Well pleased with this am I :
One of my angels left it
With thee as he passed by.
Thou mayst not join the reapers
Upon the harvest-plain,
But he who helps a brother
Binds sheaves of richest grain."

—Christian Life.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE STORY OF PETER YARNALL.

BY GRIFFITH JOHN, BEAR GAP, PA.

(Continued from Last Week.)

In the Ninth month, 1780, at the beginning of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, (held at the Market Street meeting-house), Peter Yarnall was seen sitting far back in the meeting. After a period of silence, he arose, quoting the words of Scripture, "Whosoever shall be ashamed of me, and of my words, of him shall the Son of Man be ashamed when he shall come in his own glory, and his Father's, and of the holy angels." In these words the gathered Friends heard Peter's resolve to lead a religious life and tread in his father's footsteps, regardless of the finger of scorn that might be pointed at him. If he thought of his venerable father on this occasion, and of his pitiful presence here, eight years before, how it must have thrilled him with varied and conflicting emotions. But touched by the tendering visitations of Divine love, thought was quieted into a holy calm, and humbly sensible of his shortcomings, he placed his dependence upon the Lord.

Notwithstanding these evidences of religious interest, many Friends held aloof from him. They were afraid of him, as the Christian Jews were of Paul after his conversion, believing not he was a disciple. Thinking that for some purpose he was endeavoring to assume the character of a Friend, they distrusted his sincerity. But his gift soon made room for him in their minds. Prejudice against him disappeared, as the life and power attending his ministry were felt, and acknowledged, while his conduct and deportment were fully in keeping with his profession. In the year 1781, his acknowledgment was received and he was restored to membership.

During this year Peter received a letter from his brother Mordecai, telling how he had fallen under the judgment of the Lord for his transgression, and that now with contrition of heart he was endeavoring to lead a circumspect Christian life, as a consistent member with Friends ; also advising Peter to continue in the good way, and concluding with this paragraph : "Give my love to John Pemberton, who has been our father's friend and most unspeakably our friend."

In 1782 Peter was recommended as a minister by Concord Monthly Meeting, and shortly afterward was married to Hannah, daughter of Benjamin Sharpless, of Middletown. He settled within the limits of this monthly meeting, near his friend and former fellow-apprentice, Thomas Marshall, who often accompanied Peter in his visits to neighboring meetings. In the autumn of 1782, having obtained a minute of the unity of his Friends, he attended Fairfax Quarter in Virginia. Next, in Second month, 1783, he visited, besides attending Bucks and Burlington Quarters' meetings within their limits. In the Eleventh month, of the same season, with the concurrence of Friends, he set out to visit the meetings of Long Island, New York, and New England, accompanied at first by George Dillwyn, and afterward by Joseph Delaplaine. His religious service in 1784 took him to visit meetings in Delaware and Maryland. In 1785, at the request of several Friends living at York, Pa., he removed thither, thinking it a good situation to establish a practice, the physician there having died. With Elisha Kirk, of York, he traveled in New England a second time in 1786. He devoted the intervals which left him at home to his practice as a physician, in which the account states, he was skillful and attentive, and much loved for his assiduity and tenderness.

Receiving nothing from his father's estate, and having relinquished the property purchased with prize money, he was obliged to depend upon his profession for a livelihood. But the frequent calls to ministerial service abroad afforded him little time for this secular employment, thereby limiting his income from it to such an extent as might hamper him with straitened circumstances. But nobly yielding to impressions of duty, he trusted that in the end all would be well, even as to temporal things, and this was realized, for he lacked nothing that was essential to his comfort, and those around him. He was welcomed in each community of Friends reached by his travel. Every family with which he was brought into contact in the social circle was delighted with his agreeable manners and entertaining conversation, by which he drew the young people around him, whom he pleased by displaying a wealth of fact with which experience and observation had filled his mind. A retentive memory enabled him to hold his knowledge at command, so that he was ready on occasion to interest as well as instruct.

But he never allowed such engagements to interfere with his religious work, which often absorbed his thought to a great extent. This labor being upon him, his paramount object was to mingle religiously with Friends in their meetings. At such times he appeared deeply exercised, and when he arose to speak, the audience beheld before them a man with prominent features, tall, well-proportioned, and graceful in his movements. There was a solemn dignity in his countenance, mingled with an expression of humility and meekness. The first few words, as he opened his discourse, fell deliberately from his lips, but they soon followed each other in rapid succession, increasing in life and energy until they seemed to glow with an intensity of fervor that warmed the hearts of his hearers, bringing them into sympathy with his theme, and touching them with his tenderness and love. Affected by his ministry, they fell into a holy calm, in which, as it were, the gates of heaven stood ajar, permitting truths to descend and influence the thoughtful mind and direct its earnestness to greater endeavor for the advancement of everything good. This period of solemnity commonly ended only with the close of meeting.

He passed on thus from meeting to meeting. The account states that in his religious character perhaps few have stood higher in the estimation of his contemporaries, and James Hampton (in "Friends' Miscellany"), has these notices of him: A season of renewed visitation under the ministry of Peter Yarnall; again a favored meeting under the powerful ministry of Peter Yarnall.

In the autumn of 1789 Peter was set at liberty to visit Redstone, Pa., (now Brownsville, in Fayette county, on the Monongahela river), and parts of Virginia. He began his journey in company with Jacob Worley on the 26th of the Tenth month. They lodged that night at Joseph Griest's. Next day had a meeting at Huntington and staid the night following at Joseph Elgan's. On the 28th attended Monallen Meeting. They were at Shippensburg on the 29th, where an evening meeting was held. From this place it required two days' travel to reach Thomas Blackburn's, at Bedford. Two meetings were held at this place, one with the Friends and another for the towns-people generally. On the 3d of the Eleventh month they addressed themselves to the task of crossing the Alleghenies on horseback. It was at a period somewhat later than this that the demands of trade between Philadelphia and Pittsburg caused better roads to be opened. Along these thoroughfares at this later date there might frequently be seen processions of great wagons, heavily loaded, and each drawn by six or eight horses, transporting merchandise to Pittsburg.

Two days were occupied, following tortuous mountain-paths, so rough and rugged that on the second day only fourteen miles were accomplished. Peter's journal says:

"Eleventh month 5th. Proceeded this morning over Laurel Hill, the roads more difficult, I think, than I ever knew them before, abounding with deep mud, rocks, and stones. I walked much, in order to warm myself and favor my horse. I felt for many people that were moving toward the back countries, and who had to encounter many difficulties, both themselves and their children. I was often closely affected with sympathy toward them, many being bare of money and of the necessities of life. We stopped on the west side of Laurel Hill and fed our horses, they being very tired as well as ourselves. With great industry we traveled only twenty-one miles this day, and though much wearied and unwell, had to put up with lodging that was much exposed in an open loft and no plastering between the logs, yet through Divine goodness we were preserved from taking cold.

"Next day we went on, and heard of a Friend, named Alexander McGrew, where we called, had our horses fed, and dined. After which we had a season of retirement with the family. Going forward in the evening, we reached the house of James McGrew, where a meeting of Friends was held, and we proposed staying till First-day, in order to attend it. This place is called Sewickly. The land in this settlement is rich, the timber large and tall, abounding in sugar maple, of which some families can make near two hundred weight of sugar per year. Notwithstanding the soil is fertile, the inhabitants labor under considerable difficulties, or what we should account such. Tradesmen get very little cash for their work and some scarcely any. There is a lack of schools for their children, and some have far to go to get their grain ground at mills. I think if the people were more industrious they might live more comfortably. The houses being open and cold, they put great piles of wood on their fires; but if they would stop the large holes and cracks in their houses much labor might be saved in cutting their wood. I wondered they could not see this want of economy, but custom has great influence on the people. Goods are high in the stores in this back country, much being brought out by pack-horses, some of which are exceedingly oppressed and die on the roads. Salt is about twenty and from that to twenty-five and thirty shillings per bushel. Some bushels of wheat were lately bartered for one bushel of salt. What seemed to affect me most was the want of care being taken of children, to cultivate their minds and bring them up in a proper manner."

(To be Continued.)

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS,

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 11.—THIRD MONTH 12.

EGYPT.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Now the Egyptians are men and not God; and their horses flesh and not spirit; and when the Lord shall stretch out his hand, both he that helpeth shall stumble and he that is holpen shall fall, and they shall all fail together.—Isaiah, xxx., 13.

Scripture Reading—Isaiah, xix., 4–16. Ezekiel, xvii., 5–1.

"EGYPT is the gift of the Nile." It is a narrow ribbon of fertility laid across a desert. For seven hundred miles below the first cataract it is never more than eight or ten miles wide. Less than a hundred miles from the Mediterranean the valley expands to the broad level delta, which is nearly two hundred miles wide at the coast. There must be added to this the valley of the Fayoum, a natural depression of the desert into which water was introduced from the Nile by a canal many thousands of years ago. The long, narrow valley, shut in by low, rocky hills, and the illimitable stretch of desert, presents a striking contrast to the flat monotony of the delta, unbroken by any natural elevations. So Egypt has been known from very ancient times as "the two lands." In the Bible it is usually spoken of by the plural word "Mizraim" or "the two Mazors." The desert region on either side of the fertile country, though nominally included in Egypt, is really no part of it, being inhabited by a different race of men, indifferent or hostile to its laws and customs; and this has been true from very ancient times.

Every year, with wonderful uniformity, the Nile rises gradually until the whole country is inundated. Only artificial mounds, usually supporting houses, are to be seen above the water, which has a depth, outside its bed, of from three to five feet. "Everywhere, when the inundation begins, the inhabitants are seen hurrying their cattle to the shelter provided in the villages, and if the rise of water is more rapid than usual, numbers rescue their beasts with difficulty, causing them to wade or swim, or even saving them by means of boats." (Rawlinson: "Ancient Egypt.") Even the villages themselves are endangered if the inundation is excessive; while if it is deficient it may cause famine after harvest time. But these misfortunes seldom occur. The river slowly sinks again to its accustomed course, leaving spread everywhere a thin layer of mud, a natural fertilizer which made ancient Egypt the granary of the world. Three harvests were gathered each year; first a grain harvest, then two of vegetables and grasses.

The climate is equable and mild. As in Palestine there is an occasional sirocco, or hot desert wind, but the prevailing winds are from the Mediterranean, cooling and pleasant. Rain, frost, and snow are unknown.

The Nile is not merely a dispenser of fertility. It is also a broad road from end to end of the nation. Navigation is rendered easy by the north winds, which make it possible to go up stream by means of sails, dropping down again with the current. The situation of Egypt was favorable for foreign as well as for domestic trade. Alone of ancient nations it had easy access to the countries of the east and the west. The Mediterranean sea and the Red sea gave outlets for produce, and for trade in both directions.

The origin of the people of ancient Egypt is hidden in obscurity. Their traditions throw no light on the subject. Their language had some affinity, indeed, with the Semitic tongues, but not more than could be accounted for by mere association. Their personal appearance suggests the Ethiopian rather than the Caucasian type. It is probable that they are a mixed race. Their religion included the worship of a vast number of gods. Animals also were worshiped, especially the bull or cow, the cat, dog, and several others. Moreover, the king was looked upon as a god, and was paid divine honors. It is said, however, that among the priests and the more educated of the people a belief in the divine unity existed.

Socially, there was a large class of land-owning nobles, which, with the officials, the priests, and the literary class, made the aristocracy; the laboring classes were not much above slaves.

The history of Egypt goes back to the most remote antiquity. And the most ancient period, moreover, is marked by works that indicate a civilization already considerably advanced. It cannot be doubted that engineering feats, such as the turning aside the Nile by a great embankment, the building of great temples, and greater monuments, were accomplished hundreds of years before Abraham came up out of Ur of the Chaldees. And almost every age from that ancient time to those times within easy reach of history has been marked by wonderful monuments and colossal buildings, structures of such immensity as to strike the modern observer with amazement. Moreover these monuments of various kinds,—tombs, temples or palaces—have all been used as places of record. Miles upon miles of picture writing upon the walls of ancient buildings or tombs have been discovered and studied. So that the life and experiences of ancient Egypt are better known than those of many nations of more modern times.

We have seen already that in times of famine the nomads of the desert, and even the more settled tribes of Palestine, turned to Egypt for succor. "And there was a famine in the land: and Abraham went down into Egypt to sojourn there; for the famine was grievous in the land" (Genesis, xii., 10). Isaac, at another time of famine (Genesis, xxvi., 1, 2), intended going to Egypt, but was guided otherwise. We shall see in the next lesson that the experience was repeated in the next generation. The lands of famine constantly pressed upon the land of plenty.

It is not possible to locate exactly the time of the Hebrew patriarchs in the chronology of Egypt. But students of Egyptian history agree that it must have occurred at a time no earlier than the middle of the eleventh dynasty, and no later than the thirteenth. Most probably the visit of Abraham, if indeed it is historic, occurred near the beginning of the twelfth dynasty. At this time there was great increase in the pressure from Asia on the Egyptian frontier. There were movements from Chaldea to the westward, which must have caused great crowding in the populations whom they replaced. We have seen (Lesson 8) the account of the attack on south-eastern Palestine by the kings of the east. We have noted also the movements of families of Semites toward the Upper Valley of the Euphrates. At about this time a more extended movement from Chaldea laid the foundations of the great Assyrian Empire. The Hittites—a great nation of the upper Euphrates—the Canaanites and the various other peoples of Syria, felt the impelling force pushing them toward Egypt. As a result of this pressure many foreign people settled in the northeastern part of Egypt, being received at first peaceably enough. But they were only the forerunners of a terrible invasion. We have the account of this by a native historian of Egypt, quoted by Josephus. He tells us that certain "ignoble men" from the east fell upon Egypt unawares, and conquered it with the most barbarous cruelty. This conquest probably had much to do with the future story of the Hebrew people. This relation we reserve for the next lesson.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 11.—THIRD MONTH 12.

THE BLIND EYES OPENED.

GOLDEN TEXT.—We must work the works of Him that sent me while it is day : the night cometh when no man can work.—John, ix., 4.

Read the Scripture, John, ix., 1-11.

REVISED VERSION.

The healing of the blind man is one of the most touching stories in the Gospel narrative. It seems to have occurred soon after the teaching at the Feast of Tabernacles, described in the last two lessons. Apparently Jesus left Jerusalem, after the Feast, and went into retirement. It is suggested that the events then occurred which are recorded in Matthew, xi., 25-30, and in Luke, x., 17, to xi., 13, namely: the return of the Seventy from the mission on which they had been sent; the parable of the Good Samaritan; Jesus's visit to Mary and Martha at Bethany; and the teaching of the disciples how to pray.

The time of the healing of the blind man therefore must have been late in the year 29. The place was Jerusalem, not far from the Pool of Siloam. The blind man "sat and begged." Jesus anointed his eyes with moistened clay and bid him wash in the pool. "He went away, therefore, and washed, and came seeing."

The pool of Siloam is in the south-east section of Jerusalem, near a squalid modern Moslem village, Kefr Silwan. The old name is preserved in the modern one, Birket Silwan, which occupies the site of the ancient pool. It is described as a rectangular reservoir, 58 feet by 18, and nineteen feet deep. The water comes by a crooked underground passage, a tunnel, from a spring, called the Fountain of the Virgin, twelve hundred feet away. The water rises in this spring intermittently, and so flows to the pool at Siloam, and this rising and falling of the water is ascribed by the Moslem "common people" to the presence of a "jan," or demon, who is supposed to cause and to check the flow. Dr. Robinson, one of the authorities on the description of Palestine, compares this view of the irregular flow with the account given in John of the Pool of Bethesda, where (according to the old version; it is omitted in the Revised Version), "an angel of the Lord went down into the pool at certain seasons, and troubled the water."

The Fountain of the Virgin is directly below the Mohammedan Mosques of Omar and el Aksa, and thus is under the original "Temple area." "All accounts agree," says Dean Stanley, "that the water of the two pools of Siloam, as well as that of the many fountains of the Mosque of Omar, proceeds from a living spring beneath the Temple vaults. There was no period of its history when such a provision would not have been important to the Temple for the ablutions of the Jewish worship." Stanley then cites a number of scripture passages indicating the value attached by the Jewish people to such springs, and their place in the "prophetical idea of Jerusalem;" adding an allusion to Ezekiel's vision (xlvi., 1-5), where "the thought is expanded into a vast cataract flowing out through the Temple-rock eastward and westward into the ravines of Hinnom and Kedron, till they swell into a mighty river, fertilizing the desert of the Dead Sea." In the lessons which we have had on Jesus at the Feast, the thought of the "rivers of living water" was again made prominent by him in his teaching.

The fourth verse of the lesson, used as the golden text, is well worth our special attention. "We must work the works of Him that sent me, while it is day : the night cometh when no man can work." It is an exhortation to the present performance of duty by every one.

The restoration of the blind beggar's sight is one of the numerous acts of healing ascribed to Jesus in the scripture account. The man, we are told, had been "blind from his birth." The power exercised upon him by Jesus must have been derived from the one Source of all strength, and of all life. Jesus himself spoke of it, according to the account, as a power which might "go forth" from him. In the sixth chapter of Mark, where the woman touched his garment, in order to be healed, "Jesus perceiving in himself that the power proceeding from him had gone forth, turned him about, and said, 'Who touched my garments?'" And in Luke, eighth chapter, where the same occurrence is related, "Jesus said, some did touch me, for I perceived that power had gone forth from me."

We are not to understand—however the language as we have it in the text, may seem to suggest this thought—that the man was born blind in order that Jesus might exert on him the power of healing. His misfortune became the occasion of blessing, of that exquisite mercy and compassion which we ascribe in its fullness to the Master, and by which the divine nature he possessed was manifested.

Blindness, a commentator on this lesson remarks, "was very common in Palestine. In those days there was no provision made for the care of such cases, as there is in Christian countries in modern times. They were compelled, therefore, to beg. We may remind ourselves that all charitable and benevolent institutions are among the fruits of Christianity. There were no hospitals, asylums, or 'homes' of any kind for the sick, the suffering, and the poor until after Jesus had lived, taught, and died. His teachings and example put into men's hearts the seeds of love and helpfulness. His life illustrated his teachings, for he went about doing good. Then his death put into the world a mighty impulse of compassion which has softened all hearts toward distress."

THE VAMPIRE OF WAR.

From the chapter "The Vampire of War," in Alfred Russell Wallace's book, "The Wonderful Century."

COUNTING only the armies of the six Great Powers on a peace footing, they amount now to nearly three millions of men; and if we add the men permanently attached to the several fleets, we shall have considerably more than three millions of men in the prime of life withdrawn from productive labor, and devoted, nominally to defense, but really to attack and destruction. This, however, is only a portion of the loss. The expense of keeping these three millions of men in food and clothing, in weapons, ammunition, and all the paraphernalia of war; of keeping in a state of readiness the ships, fortifications, and batteries; of continually renewing the stores of all kinds; of pensions to the retired officers and wounded men, and whatever other expenditure these vast military organizations entail, amounts to an annual sum of more than 180 millions sterling, [about 900 millions of dollars. This refers only to the six "Great Powers" of Europe.] Now, as the average wages of a working man (or his annual expenditure), considering the low wages and the mode of living in Russia, Italy, Austria, and other continental states, cannot be more than, say, twelve shillings a week, or thirty pounds a year, an expenditure of 180 millions implies the constant labor of at least six million of other men in supporting this monstrous and utterly barbarous system of national armaments. If to this number we add those employed in making good the public or private property destroyed in every war, or in smaller military or naval operations in Europe, we shall have a grand total of about ten millions of men withdrawn from all useful or reproductive work, their lives devoted directly or indirectly to the Moloch of war, and who must therefore be supported by the remainder of the working community.

And what a horrible mockery is all this when viewed in the light of either Christianity or civilization! All these nations, armed to the teeth, and watching stealthily for some occasion to use their vast armaments for their own aggrandisement, and for the injury of their neighbors, are Christian nations. Their governments, one and all, loudly proclaim their Christianity by word and deed—but the deeds are usually some form of disability or persecution of those among their subjects who are not orthodox, of really Christian deeds there are none—no real charity, no forgiveness of injuries, no help to oppressed nationalities, no effort to secure peace or goodwill among men; and all this in spite of the undoubted growth of the true Christian spirit during the last half-century. This spirit has even ameliorated the inevitable horrors of war; by some regard for non-combatants, by greatly increased care for the wounded even among enemies, and by a recognition of some few rights, even of savage races.

Never, perhaps, have the degrading influences of the war-spirit been more prominent than in the last few years, when all the great Christian powers stood grimly by, while a civilized and Christian people were subjected to the most cruel persecution, rapine, and massacre, by the direct orders, or with the consent and approval, of the semi-barbarous Sultan of Turkey. Any two of them had power enough to compel the Despot to cease his persecution. Some certainly would have compelled him, but they were afraid of the rest, and so stood still. The excuse was even a worse condemnation than the mere failure to act; again and again did they cry out—"Isolated action against Turkey would bring on a European war." War between whom? War for what? There is only one answer—"For plunder and conquest." It means that these Christian governments do not exist for the good of the governed, still less for the good of humanity, or civilization, but for the aggrandisement and greed and lust of power of the ruling classes—Kings and Kaisers, ministers and generals, nobles and millionaires—the true vampires of our civilization, ever seeking fresh dominions from whose people they may suck the very life-blood. Witness their recent conduct towards Crete and Greece, upholding the most terrible Despotism in the world, because each one hopes for a favorable opportunity to obtain some advantage, leading ultimately to the largest share of the spoil. Witness their struggle in Africa and Asia. . . .

The whole world is now but the gambling table of the six Great Powers. Just as gambling deteriorates and demoralizes the individual, so the greed for dominion demoralizes the governments. . . . The condemnation of our system of rule over tributary States is to be plainly seen in plague and famine running riot in India, after more than a century of British rule and nearly forty years of the supreme power of the English Government. Neither plague nor famine occur in well-governed communities. That the latter, at all events, is almost chronic in India, a country with an industrious people and a fertile soil, is the direct result of governing in the interests of the ruling classes instead of making the interest of the governed the first and only object.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 4, 1899.

THE COMMON HUMAN TIE.

AT the weekly meeting of the Methodist ministers of Philadelphia, on Second-day of last week, a missionary woman had present five boys, representing as many different native tribes of South Africa. She had brought them to show the result of missionary training. They were bright, intelligent, well-looking, and—for in a Methodist gathering this could not have been omitted—sang with good voice, and to the pleasure of their hearers, some of the company's favorite hymns. "It was," said an acquaintance who described the occasion to the writer, "a splendid object-lesson, proving the worth and worthiness of the work among undeveloped people like those of South Africa. No one who saw and heard those boys could avoid a friendly feeling for them, and sympathy for the missionary effort."

All of which, we doubt not, is true. The same feeling is experienced with respect to the Indians by the missionaries who labor among them, and by others who go to them sympathetically. The common tie of humanity, the brotherhood, the like origin and inevitably like end, are always felt by those who let the feeling arise. In the case of the Doukhobors there has been an object-lesson of an impressive character. In book-learning these people are deficient; in the knowledge of goodness to one another they are cultured beyond the average of mankind. Their reception in America has been more cordial than any one could have anticipated, and the fact is in no small measure due to their demeanor of friendly and kindly Christian fellowship. They come with peace in their hearts, and they are peaceably welcomed.

This recognition of the common tie and the common obligation is shown among the crowded poor in the great cities. The little stories which Jane Addams has drawn from her extended and close-at-hand experience in the great city in which she labors illustrate pathetically the readiness with which even the very poor help those who are worse off than themselves. It is a trait familiar to those who have labored among such people, and yet it is one which seems precisely opposed to what would be expected. When men and women are so near the line of extreme poverty, so close to the condition of sinking to despair, one might think that they would struggle with one another, and hold closely such morsels as they might get. This is not the rule—though it may occur exceptionally; on the contrary, as Jane Addams describes, those who have barely enough food or fuel for the day to come will spare some of it to those whose last is gone.

We do not go into these facts, at present, as a sociological study, nor with any other view than to illustrate the strength, after all its trials, of the common tie of human and humane feeling. It is more potent than we are apt to think. The touch of nature which makes the whole world kin is much more than a touch; it is a principle deeply seated and strong. There needs only to be in men and women the disposition to kindness and justice, and the recognition of equality before our common Creator, in order to banish at a stroke the greater part of the hardships and sufferings by which the world's life is daily marred. The words of Micah, so familiar, so often quoted, present the substance of conduct, and the test of character: "He hath shown thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" Three things, observe, are required, and with them present injustice disappears, cruelty disappears, pride disappears, and the recognition in all mankind of the one-ness which their Maker gave them comes into dominion, a benign and blessed influence. The little boys of the South African native tribes, the Indians in our western country, the simple and kindly "Russian Quakers"—all these, and many more, are of the one blood, which as Paul declared runs in the veins of the whole human family.

THINGS do change for the better in some particulars. Speaking of the Province of Quebec, a Canadian religious newspaper remarks upon "the toleration, the liberty of thought and speech in religious matters, that exists to-day in the Province as contrasted with thirty years ago," "This difference," it says, "is immense," and it ascribes the change, in no small degree, to the devoted labors of Father Chiniquy, who recently died nearly ninety years old; he had spent fifty in the Church of Rome—twenty-five as a priest—and forty in the ministry of the Presbyterian Church.

Of Quebec, however, it is remarked how limited is the circulation of the Bible and Testament. The population is largely French, and English is little spoken outside of Montreal. Inquiry was made at the French bookstores in Montreal for a Testament in French. At the first two none was found; at the third, an expensive copy, "such as most people could not buy;" at the fourth a single copy, at eighty-seven cents, "such as the Bible Society sells for fifteen."

ONE of the most enterprising of the younger illustrated journals is issued weekly in New York City. Some time since they began to send it (as also to many other newspapers, no doubt), as an "exchange" to the INTELLIGENCER, and later letters of inquiry arrived to learn why it had not been noticed, or the INTELLIGENCER sent in return. We were thus obliged to candidly say in reply that while some of the contents seemed to us good, the war matter (and other, but this particularly), we could not recommend, and as this made so large a part of the paper, our silence was easy to understand. We just now have the publisher's printed slip describing the contents of a current issue. It begins :

"The keynote of the contents for February 25 is a wealth of illustrations concerning the fighting in the Philippines. There is a double-page picture, drawn by [blank], entitled 'The Battle of Manila, February 4-5.' It is a striking picture of the Filipinos, breaking before the fierce onslaught of the American troops, and being driven into the Pasig river, where 'scores of them perished like rats.'" and so on, and so on, with considerable further description.

JAMES BRYCE, M. P. for Aberdeen in the English House of Commons, and author of "The American Commonwealth," has an article in the Century, this month, on "British Experience in the Government of Colonies." In substance it is advice to us not to go into the Colonial business at all, though suggestions are made, all of them very judicious, if unhappily the country should find itself involved in such responsibilities. He points out—what the Imperialist people persistently try to begot—that the establishment of colonies is a new thing for this country, a problem "on which neither the cases of the various Western Territories which have, with four exceptions, become States, nor the case of Alaska, with its handful of savage Indians, throws much light." And he candidly says : "Let it not be supposed that what follows is intended to convey an opinion favorable to the acquisition by the United States of the territories recently conquered from Spain. Were I a citizen of the United States I should be among those who are opposing their annexation."

There is probably no living Englishman, sympathetic with the institutions of the United States, who understands our affairs and our government so well as James Bryce. His famous book abundantly demonstrated his knowledge of them.

"I WISH our seven yearly meetings might go on record in favor of the Czar's proposal," a Friend writes. We do, also. The feebly expressed response to it, from this country is sad, indeed. Our official attitude is cold and unsympathetic. Our unfortunate entanglement in the toils of war has done more to balk the Czar's effort than any other one influence. The United States of America should have been its most vigorous and sympathetic supporter.

WE have asked a friend in England, whose opportunity of knowledge is excellent, concerning the stories that Count Tolstoy would be expelled from Russia. He replies that "the newspaper reports of his banishment are mere inventions. He has been continually in danger for twenty years past, but there is no special fear at present. He has not met the Tsar ; is not in correspondence with him ; nor is it known that the Tsar feels any special sympathy for him."

A LETTER from a Friend at Little Britain, Lancaster county, gives information of the death of Levi K. Brown. The funeral was appointed for the 1st instant—Fourth-day of this week—at Little Britain (Penn Hill) meeting-house. It will be recalled that he was injured, by being knocked down by a bicycle, in this city, during yearly meeting in Fifth month, 1897, from which accident he never recovered. He was many years clerk of Baltimore Yearly Meeting. His age was about 84 years.

BIRTHS.

RAYMOND.—At 154 Clinton street, Brooklyn, N. Y., First month 29, 1899, to John W. and Hannah V. Raymond, a third son, who is named Richard Valentine.

SHINN.—At Clear Creek, Ills., Second month 3, 1899, to D. Reeves and M. Gertrude Shinn, a daughter, who is named Mabel Eleanor ; granddaughter to Morris A. and L. Emma Wilson ; all members of Clear Creek Monthly Meeting.

MARRIAGES.

DARLINGTON—ARMENT.—At the residence of the bride's mother by Friends' ceremony, Second month 23, 1899, Edward Darlington, of Pennsbury, Chester county, Pa., son of Mary F. and the late Edward Darlington, of Middletown, Delaware county, and Philena C., daughter of Elizabeth Jane, and the late John Arment, of Chadd's Ford, Pa.

DARLINGTON—PARKER.—At the home of the bride's brother, John Parker, Parkerville, Pa., Second month 22, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Emlen Darlington, of Pocopson, Pa., and Mary Parker, of Parkerville.

WALTON—SWEIGART.—At the home of the bride, Cedar Lane, Lancaster county, Pa., Second month 23, 1899, Mary E. Sweigart, and Charles S., son of Bennett S. and Tacy Walton, of London Grove, Pa.

DEATHS.

AMBLER.—In Baltimore, Second month 16, 1899, Jonathan Ambler, in his 82d year ; an elder and member of Little Falls Monthly Meeting. Interment at Fallston, on the 19th.

Another landmark has been called from our midst, from this life's trials and difficulties. A true, earnest Friend, desiring the welfare of the church, never absent from his meetings save when obstructions were impossible to be overcome. A beautiful example, worthy of imitation, of prudence and discretion in conversation ; quiet in manner, sympathizing with others, and an elder in whom the truest sincerity existed, blended with humility. A kind husband and loving father has passed on to inherit the mansion promised to all who love the appearing of the Lord, and are faithful to follow his manifestations of duty which lead to peace and joy. P.

BETTS.—At the residence of her nephew, at Germantown, Pa., Second month 14, 1899, Hannah Heston Betts, daughter of the late Thomas and Sarah Betts, and sister of Rebecca C. Betts.

For many years she was an efficient teacher at the Beck School.

BROWN.—Second month 1, 1899, in Toughkenamon, Pa., Mary Pierson, wife of David Brown, in her 77th year. Interment at New Garden.

BROWN.—At the home of her son-in-law, E. H. Childs, near Danborough, Bucks county, Pa., Second month 19, 1899, Sarah, widow of Thomas Brown (some time of Wilmington, Del.), aged 93 years.

Interment at Plumstead Friends' ground.

GREEN.—At Friends' Boarding Home, West Chester, Pa., Edith H. Green, in the 77th year of her age ; a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends.

HALL.—Second month 20, 1899, Joseph Hall, in his 65th year ; for several years past in charge of Friends' Book Store, 304 Arch street, Philadelphia.

RAMEY.—In West Conshohocken, Pa., Second month 24, 1899, Elizabeth R. Ramey, aged 82 years.

Interment at Plymouth Meeting Friends' ground.

SERRILL.—In Philadelphia, Second month 21, 1899, Elizabeth Serrill, late of Darby Pa., in the 84th year of her age ; a member of Darby Monthly Meeting of Friends.

SMEDLEY.—At her home in West Chester, Pa., Agnes Smedley, aged 93 years.

This estimable woman was one whose long life was passed in the quiet performance of near-by duties. Early left a widow, with more than the usual responsibilities of widowhood, she calmly performed the allotted tasks of a mother, a caretaker of aged invalids, and a farm manager, with such ability and good judgment as to win for herself the admiration of her friends and neighbors. When increasing years and family separations made retirement from such cares imperative, her ministrations were continued to her loved ones in a variety of ways, and her social nature found enjoyment in the visits of her friends and relatives, who were always warmly welcomed to her home.

An attender of Friends' meetings, she ever lived the life of a consistent Friend, and her memory will long be cherished as one whose length of days, though burdened by physical infirmities, brought no diminution in vigor of mind or warmth of affection. Two children survive her, Dr. William Smedley, of Denver, Col., and Susan, widow of the late Morgan B. Hall, of Willistown, Pa., her other son, Dr. Robert C. Smedley, and his gifted wife, Esther K., having preceded her to the realms of peace and rest. * * *

SUTTON.—At Moorestown, N. J., Second month 23, 1899, Abigail H., widow of Edward Sutton, aged 55 years.

TEMPLE.—At her home, near Doe Run, Second month 20, 1899, Rebecca Temple, widow of the late Caleb Temple, in the 90th year of her age.

She was a member of the Society of Friends. Interment at Old Doe Run Friends' burial ground.

WORLEY.—Second month 13, 1899, at her home in Media, Pa., of heart failure, in the 81st year of her age, Hannah M., daughter of Jacob and Beulah T. Mendenhall, and widow of Louis D. Worley, formerly of Waterford, Loudoun county, Virginia; an elder of Chester Monthly Meeting. Interment at Providence, Pa.

Those whose blessing it has been to know her will not forget the lesson her life has taught—a life so sweet and strong, so calm and beautiful, that struggle and pain forgot themselves in her presence, and learned from her to find calmness and content. She showed us the beauty of the common way. Her strength was drawn from no distant source; her cheerfulness she found where all may find it who turn, as she turned, always toward the light. Her breadth of thought may be theirs who look abroad with love on all the world. Her sunny home life may be theirs who invite love, and who give it as freely as she gave; who find in little things the symbols and the realities of great things. C.

RUTH HAMBLETON.

Died, on Seventh-day, Second month 18, in Philadelphia, 1726 North 22d street, in her 88th year, Ruth, wife of the late Eli Hambleton, of Upper Oxford, and second daughter of the late Jonathan Lamborn of Kennett Square, Chester county, Pa.

Her funeral was at Pennsgrove Friends' meeting-house, on the 21st inst., and in the burying-ground adjoining, where lie her husband and four children, she, the last of her family, was laid to rest.

Left waiting for many years alone, her life has been a retired and unobtrusive one, but heightened still by the love of cherished friends whom she ever warmly welcomed to see her. Serene and methodical to the minutest particular, with "her house set in order," she waited with cheerful patience through life's long afternoon for the summons to join her loved ones, though never losing interest in the living, nor in the current affairs of the day. She was of a gentle, but firm and heroic nature, following bravely but quietly the path which she conceived was that of duty.

It was hers to live through "the storm and stress" of the Anti-Slavery struggle, and to meet the jeers of opponents, and the discouragements of half-hearted friends with a noble equanimity and an unswerving faith in the right. Many and many a fleeing bondsman found hospitality under her roof, and help from her and her brave-hearted husband to further them on their way to freedom. She with him was one of the founders of the Clarkson Anti-Slavery Society, and they both were efficient members of the different county and State organizations for the same object. A Garrisonian of the staunchest type, she read The Liberator from its founding to its end with sustained interest and confidence in its promulgated doctrines. From early womanhood till the Civil War annihilated slavery and American slave produce, she, at infinite pains and sacrifice always used for herself and in her family only the product of free labor. What that meant of watchfulness and self-denial only those who have practiced it can know. It meant the refusal of all sweets and delicacies made with sugar at the tables of those who held not her own conscientious scruples. It meant passing by the pretty and cheap American-made muslins, chintzes, and lawns, to pay a much greater price for foreign-made, but free, goods.

She was equally strenuous throughout her whole life in her testimony for Temperance, and succeeded thus by example and precept in instilling her own principles into the minds of her children, so that they grew up firm in their adherence to what they had been taught was right. E. W.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—X.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

Our last week's report closed by our return to Philadelphia, where we spent a pleasant and restful night in the home of our friend Samuel S. Ash, only interrupted by the alarm of fire, that proved very serious both in the loss of much property and (subsequently) in life of brave firemen who so frequently must risk their lives in the discharge of duty.

Sixth-day morning, we went to Chester, to spend another night with our Canadian acquaintances (Caroline Cutler and family) which was as before, an enjoyable visit. Leaving there on Seventh-day morning for Swarthmore to visit our daughter and cousin, we spent a few hours with them and felt grateful that it was our privilege; their absence from the home is made to seem shorter by this little break. In the evening we went to Media for the night, to the home we left about one year ago, that of our dear friend John P. Townsend, now to find his bereft widow and sister, whose hospitality we have so frequently enjoyed in Philadelphia. We miss the presence of him whose pleasure it was to share with his dear wife in entertaining their many friends.

First-day morning was bright and beautiful, and notwithstanding the unfavorable condition of the roads a goodly number gathered at meeting, (Providence, near Media), and we have reason to believe it a profitable occasion. After dining with our friends we took train for Philadelphia to attend the evening meeting at 17th street and Girard Avenue, which was well attended by an appreciative audience, both in the silent waiting and to the spoken word, and we felt it good to have been there. After many friendly adieus, we return to the home of our friend Rachel Conrad, and a number of the friends coming in, a pleasant hour was spend before retiring from another busy day. In consideration of the much travel, and other circumstances, my wife deems it best to spend her time this week with our daughter and some other dear friends, and I took my departure for Sunnyside, in Adams County, Pa., spending a few hours by the way at the Indian School at Carlisle, where we have several acquaintances holding responsible positions. I can only take time now to say I was delighted with the appearance of the place, and the work being accomplished in the many branches of useful labor, resulting in so large a percentage of cases in the development of useful and honorable citizenship from the otherwise primitive and untutored Indian.

But my stay is short and I must resume my journey, arriving about six p. m., at Sunnyside, to be met by Cyrus Griest, with whom I had had some acquaintance by correspondence. I was soon at home, and the cheerful and kindly association of the father and children, who so recently had lost the companionship of a faithful and devoted wife and mother, gave us the evidence of a living concern to carry out in the home life that loving influence that does not cease with the exit from this earthly scene.

Third-day morning, my kind host having arranged for some calls and visits, we went by carriage (although much snow in some places) to call for a short time upon Mary A. Griest, who at an advanced age is quite a sufferer, but whose patient and trusting nature, with the loving care and attention of a son and daughter, helps to make of life the best that may be, and words of comfort and cheer were given expression to.

We then went to dine at S. Griest's, and take tea and spend the evening at Edward Wright's, and feel that the day has been a pleasant one; we return for rest to our Sunnyside home, but only to remain until Fourth-day morning, when we attend their monthly meeting, which was not large but a satisfactory one, and, we trust, to some profit. Then dined with a Friend, whose wife is a daughter of Cyrus Griest; then after spending a few hours very pleasantly in another home, (William Black's), we again wend our way homeward.

Fifth-day morning, we spent quietly in social enjoyment until after dinner. We went to attend the funeral of a dear friend, who died very suddenly, but whose life as a wife, mother, friend, and neighbor had been of that true Christian character that leaves its lasting impress upon the community, and as the remains were lowered to their resting-place a worthy tribute was paid to her life by the reading of a poem entitled, "A Beautiful Life," followed by fitting words of comfort. On our return from the funeral we took tea and spent the evening with our friends Charles and Elizabeth Koser, in their pleasant home.

This leaves me on Sixth-day morning with quite a change in the atmosphere, and quite rough roads, with several calls to make during the day. I. W.

Guernsey, Pa., Second month 24.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

CENTRE QUARTERLY MEETING.

OUR Quarterly Meeting in Second month is held at Unionville, Centre county. The inclemency of the weather, and illness, made it much smaller than it usually is, but a dear old Friend said, "I think we never had a better Quarterly Meeting." A deep feeling of gratitude was felt and expressed for the presence of Joel Borton with us at all our meetings. His earnestness, the consecration of all his strength, and his deep spiritual baptism, spread as a mantle over all assembled. His message was for all,—the old, the middle aged, and the young. But in an especial manner did he speak to the young, inquiring minds, who are waiting and asking,—What must I think? What must I believe? What must I do? To them he pointed out in all its simplicity "what the Lord, thy God requireth of thee."

Nathan Moore and Reuben P. Kester, of West Branch Monthly Meeting, were very acceptably with us; the former has long been a faithful servant, and the latter, though young in years, has been in them a faithful disciple, and was favored to bring forth in large measure that which was spiritual food for the waiting assemblage.

Seventh-day morning, Second month 18, the Quarterly First-day School Association met. It was opened by reading of the 19th Psalm, and the recitation of the 23d Psalm by the primary class. The Young Friends' Association was represented by a paper, "Friends' Work," by Nancy M. Fisher; primary class by recitations from Pauline Smith, Harold Fisher, Susan and Chapman Underwood; intermediate class by paper, "Life of Dr. Judson," by Florence N. Cleaver; and the adult class by paper, "Seven Bibles," by Alice W. Henshey. The subject for general talk was "Inspiration—its relation to every-day life," in which we had much help from our visiting Friend.

Many interested Friends not in membership with us attended all the sessions, from the opening to the closing of the business session, which ended with a tender supplication by Joel Borton. R.

[Another correspondent adds the following:]

On the 19th meetings for worship were held at 10 a. m. and 3 p. m. In the forenoon meeting Joel Borton spoke from the text, "Salvation by Christ, and what it will do for us." In a plain and practical manner he spoke of the teachings of Jesus and their adaptability to our lives. That if we would be willing to be guided by the Christ within us, it would lead us into paths of peace and happiness, and we would be saved from the commission of sin.

Nathan Moore, of West Branch, expressed some thoughts along the same line.

In the afternoon meeting Reuben P. Kester, of West Branch, spoke from the text, "This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ, whom thou hast sent."

Nathan Moore and Joel Borton followed, the latter comparing the conscience with the light-houses along our coasts, whose windows, if kept clean, will be a true guide to the mariner.

The regular meeting for worship was held on Second-day, the 20th, in which J. B. handed forth words of encouragement to all. The business of the quarterly meeting was transacted. A letter was read from our esteemed friend, Dr. O. Edward Janney, of Baltimore, containing a message of encouragement and love, and expressing regret that he could not be with us in our several meetings. The letter was highly appreciated.

Our meeting closed with a feeling that we had enjoyed a profitable and refreshing season.

B. K. C.

Salem Quarterly Meeting will occur on Fourth- and Fifth-days of next week, Third month 8th and 9th. Meeting for ministers and elders on Fourth-day, at 3 p. m. A Philanthropic Meeting is arranged for that evening. Trains leave Market Street Ferry, Philadelphia, for Woodstown, N. J., at 1.30 p. m., Fourth-day, and 8.20 a. m., on Fifth-day, in time for meeting.

The following arranged plan has been made for John J. Cornell, who expects to attend the Quarterly Meeting :

At Alloways Creek, First-day morning, Third month 5, and Salem in the evening.

At Elmer, Third-day afternoon, the 7th. Attend the Quarterly meeting at Woodstown Fourth-and Fifth-day, and on Sixth-day afternoon at Mullica Hill.

At Woodstown, First-day morning, Third month 12, and Mickleton, Second-day afternoon, and Woodbury Third-day evening. Then proceed to Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, on Fourth-day.

An earnest and very commendable effort has been made by Friends of Kennett Monthly Meeting, Pa., to put their records in order. A paragraph in a recent issue of a West Chester paper in substance says :

In response to a concern felt by Samuel Pennock, of Kennett Square, the late Pennock Barnard, of that borough with the assistance of the former, worked for about three years collecting data regarding the membership of Kennett Monthly Meeting. The old records were in a mixed and mutilated condition. The work on the present volume, which is now completed as far back as the year 1827, will be the most full and valuable inventory ever possessed by this monthly meeting. The workers will begin at once to unearth the earlier records, which, however, are in tolerably good shape, though they will require copying and rearrangement. In the present task all the records have been copied into new books by Anna Mary Martin and Margaret Yeatman, of Kennett Square. Elma M. Preston, who has been one of the most faithful workers also, has given fully three months of her time within the past year in arranging the form of these records ready for the copyists. In the work she has been assisted by John Yeatman and others.

Bucks Quarterly Meeting of Friends was held at Wrightstown, on Fifth-day, the 23d ult., with a somewhat smaller attendance than usual. No ministers or others were present from beyond the limits of the quarterly meeting, and the only speaker was Walter Laing, of Bristol. He dwelt at some length on the spread of Friends' principles and the necessity for the perpetuation of the Society. The meeting for worship was not a prolonged one, and closed with prayer by Louis K. Worthington. Many matters of importance claimed the attention of the meeting for discipline, it being the last to be held before the Yearly Meeting. The state of the Society, as revealed by the answers to the queries sent up by the different monthly meetings, is but little different from former years. Matters pertaining to the proposed new Friends' Home were discussed at considerable length. The business was concluded about 2 o'clock. [Newtown Enterprise.]

Group of Doukhobor women, at Halifax, Second month 17, gathering snow. ("Water was scarce.") Photo by H. V. Haight.

THE DOUKHOBOR MOVEMENTS.

As was expected, the Doukhobors, at Halifax, who came on the Lake Superior, and were placed in quarantine, were released on the 17th ult. At 9 a. m., the work began of transferring them from the quarantine ground on Lawler's Island to the steamship, and shortly before 2 p. m., "with a clean bill of health," she sailed for St. John. From there they proceeded, like the first party, by rail to Winnipeg.

The scenes at Halifax were described in the newspapers of that city. The Halifax Herald says that, in going from the quarantine to the ship, "every man had his great bundle of baggage, and they were passed singly through a gate, at the head of the wharf, where they were carefully counted. Before any one, man, woman, or child, could pass the gate they had to show at least two tickets. One of these, colored red, signified that the holder had been vaccinated, and that it had taken effect; the other was yellow, and indicated that the holder had been fumigated. If a white ticket was presented it meant that the first vaccination not having taken effect, the operation had been repeated a second time.

"The count showed 1,977 Doukhobors. This included a number of cripples, who had to be brought down on sledges, and one or two idiots who were not capable of walking from the buildings to the steamer. A party of eighteen rather sad-looking Doukhobors were not included in this number. They are members of the families of three invalids, who were too ill to travel. One of them has pneumonia and two suffer with acute rheumatism. With those three their families were left. The total number, therefore, in quarantine was 1,995."

Dr. Montizambert, the health officer, who, with Dr. Jones, port officer, had remained with the Doukhobors throughout the whole time of detention, said "that never before had he been in quarantine with so many people, nor under such trying circumstances. The cold had been unprecedented, and the buildings were inadequate to the numbers handled. But the people had been easily managed. Not in his experience had he seen men and women so amenable to rule, and who could be handled with so little trouble."

Though one died of small-pox on the voyage, the number of Doukhobors on the island was the same as left Batoum, for a child was born in quarantine. It was a boy, and its father's name was Semon.

Some pathetic circumstances are given. The wife and three children of Timofey Samerodin came from Batoum, and are in the party, but he himself is detained in Russia. He was arrested as the Lake Superior was leaving Batoum, on a charge of having escaped from exile in Siberia. Another man, A. Zhitnawa, was more fortunate. For four years he was in banishment in Siberia, but he made his escape from exile and reached Constantinople. From there he made his way to Batoum, and, without recognition by the Russian police, he got on board the steamer, rejoined his family, and is now safe with them in Canada. The Halifax papers mention the valuable services of "Joe Bernstein," the "quarantine interpreter," who is said to speak fourteen languages. Russian being one of his accomplishments, he could converse with the Doukhobors fluently.

Group of Doukhobor women and children, at Halifax, Second month 17.
Photo by H. V. Haight.

Count Sergius Tolstoy, who came with the party, and was in quarantine with them, made a brief visit to Halifax, before the Lake Superior left for St. John. With him on board, as she sailed away, were the two Friends, Joseph S. Elkinton, and Job S. Gidley, and also Herbert P. Archer, the young English friend of the Doukhobors.

The Lake Superior safely reached St. John on the 18th, and the movement by train from that city was begun next day.

Our friend and correspondent, Harry V. Haight, of Halifax, has sent us seven new and very interesting photographic pictures of the Doukhobors, and we reproduce three of them in this issue, as giving a better idea of the people than the picture given last week. H. V. Haight says: "I could not get a photo of a small group of them, as they all wanted their pictures taken, and crowded around in front of the camera in hundreds."

Joseph S. Elkinton, of this city, made a second visit to Halifax. He went, as above said, with the party to St. John, and has since returned home.

There seems to be an impression that the Doukhobors who went to Cyprus have come to Canada. This is not the case. The number who went to Cyprus last year was over eleven hundred; of these some eighty had died, (of fever and other diseases), at last report; all the remainder are still in the island. As has been repeatedly stated, they appear desirous of joining the larger body in Canada, and this, it seems most probable, will be accomplished later.

On the steamship Lake Superior, at Halifax, Second month 17, showing the Doukhobors on board, after being released from quarantine, and preparing to sail for St. John. Photo by H. V. Haight.

FRIENDS' TRACTS IN IRELAND.

We find the following report of the experiences of a Friend distributing the publications of the Friends' Tract Society, (London), in the north of Ireland, published in the London Friend.

As I go through the country (in Ulster) I find that most of the people appear to be very poor, living in small thatched cottages with mud floors, and a large open fire-place. We cannot expect that such can buy more than one or two penny books; but they seem pleased to accept tracts explaining our view of Christian truth.

Although with many religious life is a very formal thing, in every district there are sincere believers who appreciate our books on consecration and the "out-and-out" Christian life. There are many who do not give undue importance to the outward ordinances; having received the substance, these do not see the necessity to hold fast to the shadow. On the other hand, there are very many who find the "ordinances" a great stumbling block in the way of accepting the Friends' position.

In most parts Friends are better known as "Quakers," so that I often explain why the name arose, and this sometimes leads to a profitable conversation. One day I found some persons who could not understand where the Friends' meeting-house was; at last they were enlightened by my telling them it was "the wee house on the Quaker's Green."

In the summer I spent two months at Portrush, a northern watering-place, and whenever the weather was suitable I showed books on a stall, with a sign-board over it. This was on the approaches to the shore, where many people from Scotland, England, and Ireland stopped to look and purchase books, and several seemed very much pleased to get definite information as to who and what the Quakers really are. The signboard was a good advertisement for the Society of Friends.

The work of the Friends' Tract Association has now been going on in Ulster for about two and a quarter years. In eight months I have sold 2,300 books for £36. About 700 of these were Friends' books, some of which were the attractive publications of the Friends' Tract Association. In the same period I sold 28 Bibles, 70 Testaments, a few Douay Testaments, and 60 Gospels. I have also given away a large number of tracts.

Colportage work is no new thing in Ulster, so that the Roman Catholics have been forbidden by the priests to look at any of our books or tracts, or even to speak to a colporteur. Thus it is almost impossible for a stranger to approach them, but we can repeat a text or two before the door is shut in our face, and trust God to use his written word. In some country districts the Lord has opened the way for me to take a part in Gospel and other meetings, so that with his blessing on the books sold and on the messages delivered we trust that the Friends' colportage work in Ireland is being made the means of sowing the seed of the Kingdom of God.

R. E. DAVIES,
Of the Friends' Tract Association.

Educational Department.

"LITERATURE FOR CHILDREN."

THE Home Influence Association (Philadelphia), at its regular meeting (the third Third-day of each month), Second month 21, was addressed by Mrs. H. H. Birney, of this city, on the subject, "Literature for Children, from a Mother's Standpoint." She was direct from Washington, where she had presented this most interesting and instructive paper before the National Congress of Mothers.

The thoughts contained in the paper and those called forth in the discussion from speaker and audience were most valuable and suggestive, and it is a matter of deep regret that more young mothers were not present to receive the practical suggestions, and to add the value of their experience to the discussion.

Mrs. Birney believes that the one way to overcome evil is the old way, as old as Christianity itself,—with good, and that every one having the care of children must make an intelligent study of what the growing mind can appreciate, and of what will best contribute to its development. Everything the child sees and hears must be interpreted to him. Do not play, or talk or read down, but up, to a child, and he will come to feel himself a part of the great world.

A child repeats the history of the race, and there is a time in his experience when myths appeal to him strongly. In many ways they are better than the fairy story. But the latter has its place, for unconsciously right lessons of life are impressed in them,—virtue is rewarded and vice punished. Tell or read the story without an effort to interpret. The child feels the subtle meaning oftener than we think. Do not underestimate the importance of style. Good English is necessary and is appreciated, whether the story is read or told.

Let children early know and love the classics, and they will never care for trashy literature. The classics are simpler than most modern literature: Homer is especially suited to the child mind. Hawthorne, Kingsley, Ruskin, and others have given such excellent renderings of these stories in forms suitable for children that no child should grow up without a knowledge of them.

A good "historical novel" places the reader in the atmosphere of the time and place represented, and usually begets a love for pure history. Children delight in what is "really true." Wise direction in historical reading may train for that higher citizenship so much needed in the world to-day. Ruskin said, "We do not educate a man by telling him what he knows not, but by making him what he is not."

The mother must be sure she knows what her child is reading, read it first herself, and talk to him about it afterwards. This will impress the helpful parts, and make a stronger bond of sympathy between the two.

The public libraries are a great benefaction, but they are also a great danger. A mother may comfort herself with the thought that her child is doing well because he is "fond of reading," but it may be he is imbibing mental poison. No one can estimate the power of a really good book, or the harm lurking in a bad one.

At the next meeting of the Association, on Third month 21, will be given a report of the Mothers' Congress, by our president and delegate, Florence M. Lukens. W.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

On Third-day evening, 21st ult., the regular meeting of the Swarthmore College Classical Club was held in the Manager's Parlor. Winifred Rogers, 1902, presented an excellent paper on the "Parthenon," which was duly appreciated. Dr. Appleton followed with a talk on the subject of "How England gained the Elgin Marbles," and was listened to with intense interest. This meeting of the Classical Club was the largest which has been held since the organization of the Club, two years ago, and shows that increased interest is being taken in this and kindred subjects throughout the College.

The Annual Gymnastic Exhibition was held in the Boys' Gymnasium, on Fourth-day evening, and despite the meagre facilities which the building affords for the accommodation of visitors, was unusually well attended. The program consisted mainly of the usual work upon the bars and mats, and was successfully concluded by a game of basket ball between the allied classes. Many visitors were present from the city and from various Preparatory Schools.

The Senior Class has elected officers for the second semester and class-day as follows: President, John P. Broomell, of Baltimore, Md.; Vice-President, J. Serrill Verlenden, of Darby, Pa.; Secretary, Edith Flitcraft, of Woodstown, N. J.; Treasurer, Anna Bradbury, of Richmond, Indiana; Prophetess, Emily Carter, Buffalo, N. Y.; Poetess, Annie Lodge, Philadelphia; Historian, Katharine Lackey, Atlantic City; Presenter, Lewis M. Booth, Chester, Pa.; Ivy Poetess, Mary G. Lieper, Wallingford, Pa.; Ivy Orator, Benjamin A. Thomas, Abrams, Pa.

A lecture, "Reminiscences of Anti-Slavery Times," was delivered on Sixth-day evening by Aaron M. Powell, under the auspices of the literary societies of the College. The lecture consisted for the most part of personal reminiscences of those stirring times of our country's history, and was filled with intense interest throughout. '99.

SWARTHMORE ALUMNI IN BERLIN.—The current number of Swarthmore Phoenix contains an account of the meeting of the "Verein der Swarthmoreaner zu Berlin," at the residence of Mrs. Andrew D. White, (wife of the American ambassador), in Berlin, on Fifth-day afternoon, First month 26, 1899. There were present Helen Magill White, '73; Benjamin F. Battin, '92; Ellen Williams Battin, '93; Anna R. H. Harrison, '95; Ellwood C. Parry, '97; Augusta Edel, '98; and Edna H. Richards, '98.

Both the present holders of the Lucretia Mott and the Joshua Lippincott Fellowships are studying the German language and literature in the University of Berlin. The writer of the account concludes: "Probably no other college in America has so large a percentage of its Alumni resident and studying in the German metropolis."

PRINCIPAL APPOINTED.—Prof. John W. Gregg has been appointed by the committee in charge Principal for next year of the Friends' new School at Park Avenue and Laurens street, Baltimore. The school is to occupy new rooms next fall, and its work will be built up from a Kindergarten and Primary School to a College Preparatory institution.

Prof. Gregg is a graduate, B.L., of the Class of 1894 at Swarthmore College, and of Cornell University, M. A., in 1896. He was principal one year of Friends' School at Moorestown, N. J., and was one year in charge of the teaching of history at George School; he went from there to pursue his studies at Cornell, and is this year teaching history and mathematics at Friends' Seminary, New York City.

DALTON HALL, MANCHESTER.—A booklet, with information concerning Dalton Hall, Manchester, England, of which John William Graham, M.A., is Principal, has reached us. It is embellished by several fine views of the large buildings of the Hall, with some interiors, and a Group of teachers and students "at the Porch," in the centre of which the Principal is easily recognized.

Dalton Hall is a "hall of residence," on the English system, connected with Owens College, Manchester, which is itself part of the Victoria University. It is in charge of a Committee of Manchester Friends, and has accommodation for fifty-two students. At Owens College the students attend lectures, and have the use of libraries and laboratories. At the Hall the teaching is in the nature of private tuition in small classes, suited to individual needs, and general tutorial oversight and advice are extended. Seven tutors are at present employed.

ADDRESS FURNISHED.—A friend has furnished the address asked for last week.

SINCE the spring of 1890 there have been incorporated, mostly under the laws of New Jersey, trusts and other combinations, the total capitalization of which is $1,200,000,000.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

EASTON, N. Y.—The Young Friends' Association was held on the afternoon of Second month 12, at the home of Julia A. Baker. After the opening silence the members responded to the roll-call with sentiments from Longfellow.

After the usual business, the program for the day was opened by Abby Thomas reading the "History of the Early Life and Experience of George Fox," which called forth some comment, especially upon his views of the atonement.

The singing of a hymn was followed by George Gifford reporting the current events of the month; among other things he mentioned the ratification of the Peace Treaty, also the formation of a large "Cracker Trust," giving as his opinion that the forming of so many large trusts, thus closing smaller manufactories, is one cause of so many men tramping through the country looking for work. Other items were mentioned relating to temperance and equal suffrage. It was remarked that reformers are often misconstrued, sometimes by repeating only part of a sentence, when if it were all given a very different meaning would be conveyed. The speaker said that Friends were always in advance of others in reforms, though perhaps a little behind in some other things.

Charles E. Wilbur read a paper entitled "Are our present business methods in harmony with Christian life?" He mentioned particularly the banking systems and trusts. An interesting discussion followed, in which many business methods, both public and private, were explained. The prevailing opinion seemed to be that many of the present methods of carrying on business were not in accordance with true Christianity.

After a brief silence the meeting adjourned to meet Third month 12. P. A. H.

NORRISTOWN, PA.—There was a large attendance at the meeting of Norristown Friends' Association at the home of George and Sarah Wood, Jacoby street, on the evening of the 21st inst.

The "Sale of Old Spruce Street Meeting in Philadelphia," a newspaper article, was read by Anna B. Thomas. It was suggested in the course of a discussion which followed, that the "laying down" of the meeting is due largely to the tendency of population to West Philadelphia and other sections of that city.

Susan J. Sheppard read an interesting account of the establishment of Gwynedd Monthly Meeting and its branches, Norristown, Plymouth, and Providence, transcribed largely from the records of the Society. This was followed by a paper by Ellwood Roberts on the establishment of Plymouth Meeting, giving some reminiscences of prominent ministers, including Ellis Pugh, Jacob Ritter, Samuel Livezey, Joel Lare, and others. A meeting was established as early as 1686, but it was held at private houses until (probably) about 1712 or 1713, when the first meeting-house was erected on the present site, the burial place having been used much earlier.

Susan J. Sheppard read a poem, "Never Too Late."

"The Czar's Proposal for Disarmament," written by Winfield W. Conard, of Port Kennedy, was read by Mary R. Livezey. It was an excellent article, and gave rise to an interesting discussion as to peace prospects.

"The Recent Snow Storm," William Evans, was also followed by discussion.

Several questions were referred. The next meeting will be held at the residence of Cecilia Zimmerman, 1031 DeKalb street.

MOORESTOWN, N. J.—A meeting of Young Friends' Association was held Second month 10. After the reading of the minutes the Executive Committee handed in their report.

William W. Birdsall gave a very interesting talk on "The Present Forces acting for Perseverance in the Society of Friends." The rise and progress of Friends in England were carefully reviewed; then crossing to our own shores he laid stress on the labors of our predecessors in firmly establishing our principles in the Colonies. Coming down to a later period he spoke of some of the things he believed to have an omen of good in reviving a reverence for those principles held dear by our forefathers. Among those hopeful signs were the First-day schools, the movement for higher education, and a willingness on the part of young Friends to take an active interest in meetings, Associations, etc.

The address was enjoyed by all and called forth some discussion. After the usual moment of silence the meeting adjourned.

IDA A. LIPPINCOTT, Sec.

HOPEWELL, VA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held at Friends' meeting-house in Winchester, Second month 26.

The third chapter of John was read by the president at the opening of the meeting. A severe rain-storm and sickness prevented the usual good attendance. Minutes of last meeting were read and approved.

Jonah L. Rees, under the head of History, read "An account of the conditions of Society that developed the origin of Meetings for Worship, among Friends."

He commenced in the 16th Century when Alexander VI., was Pope, and step by step he led us to the time when George Fox, about 1644, attracted attention by his earnest inquiries, conversation, and deportment. His experience seemed new, but real and convincing, reaching the witness of truth in many minds. The parish churches were called by him "steeple houses." After the overthrow of the Anglican church, in the period of the Commonwealth, the buildings became the property of the people, and were directed to be used freely for public worship; they were often used for discussions by different faiths. In a paper drawn up by George Fox concerning the first spreading of the truth, he states that "it first sprang up to us to be a people to the Lord." Judge Fell offered Swarthmore Hall to George Fox and his friend for public Meeting in 1652, where they were held until 1690, when a meeting-house was erected near the Hall.

Anna J. Rees read a poem entitled "What is Noble?"

The subject for discussion: "Are we responsible for the wrongs we might prevent?" Tacy Branson on the negative side, "thought the question a difficult one to discuss in this way, because conditions in every-day affairs, vary to such an unlimited extent that what would be possible to one actor, would be utterly impossible to another." According to her idea, "Man is only responsible to the Being who breathed into him the breath of life, and only when he passes on to the Great Beyond, will it be known just how his life and its requirements have been met."

The subject brought forth a good deal of expression; some thought if you tried to prevent a wrong and did not succeed, no further responsibility rested with you. The meeting closed after a few moments of silence.

ANNIE J. REES, JR., Sec.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE Memorial Ode, by Florence Earle Coates, written by request of the City of Philadelphia for the "Peace Celebration," in Tenth month last, and read at Independence Hall, has been printed at the Riverside Press, Cambridge, Mass. The last stanza follows, and we cordially echo its sentiment:

"To love devoutly is to pray.

O Land! for thee in thy victorious hour,

We lift our souls in supplication,

That righteousness may sanctify thy power

And fill thee with that purer exaltation

Which bides with those who highest hests obey.

Oh, may the lips that praise thy strength,

Laud thee for justice, rather, and for truth,

Welling immediate from thy heart of youth

To bless thy children first, and all mankind at length."

Literature (New York: Harper & Bros.) in its issue of Second Month 3, proposed that ten "charter members" of an "American Academy of Immortals," similar in character to the French Academy, be selected by ballot, and invited correspondence. The results therefore are interesting, though the vote is not yet very large. In the issue of the 24th ult., forty-six persons are reported as in the competition,—all literary workers, of course. Only nine of the number are women, while thirty-seven are men. The leading names, nine in number, appear in the following order: William D. Howells, Mark Twain, John Fiske, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Charles Dudley Warner, Bret Harte, S. Weir Mitchell, Henry James, John Burroughs. Margaret Deland, George W. Cable, and Frank R. Stockton receive an equal number of votes for the tenth place.

The fact is that in the present condition of American literature, no ten names can be easily selected; there is no such preëminence held by a small number. But there can be readily twenty or thirty named, all of whom are very nearly equally entitled to honor.

An elaborate article, by the United States vice consul-general at Hong Kong, Edwin Wildman, in last week's Harper's Weekly, writes on Emilio Aguinaldo, the Philippine leader. The article is notable because Consul Wildman describes Aguinaldo in quite favorable terms. It was written, of course, (as it had to come from China), before the recent military operations at Manila, resulting in the slaughter of the Filipinos. (We quote elsewhere some passages from the article.)

Two Prohibition newspapers of New York, Facts, published at Elmira, and The True Reform, New York City, have been united, under the name of The Defender. The editor is Prof. A. A. Hopkins, and Henry W. Wilbur, who has been the editor of The True Reform, becomes "Field Associate Editor," with office in New York City.

Mary W. Plummer has prepared, and will immediately publish, a volume on the recent literature of Spain: In her studies for a paper on the subject, she found so much of interest that she thought it would be well to let American reading people know more of it.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

A PRIVATE letter from the wife of a young physician in a city of southern Minnesota, dated the 8th ult., (just as the extreme cold reached here), has this to say on the subject of the severe weather of last month:

"Two weeks ago to-day it rained, but since then we have had the longest cold spell for ten years. It has been below zero every night in the two weeks, sometimes to 25 below, and last night it was 32 below,—colder than for several years. To illustrate the perversity of human affairs: D. had hardly been in the country this winter, but since the cold weather began he has had three trips of seven, nine, and ten miles, and now since this very coldest he has a patient whom he must see every day, who is twelve miles out. To-day he and the man started at 10 a. m. The road is bad, with four miles on the prairie over plowed ground. It is cloudy and windy, and the thermometer was 25 below when they started. I asked D. if he thought they could keep warm; he said he was afraid it was no use trying, this time.

"However, they did all they could. D. had on a cloth winter overcoat under his fur coat, and a big scarf across his face. Then he put a heavy blanket over his shoulders, and took three hot irons in the sleigh. At 1.30 they returned, having driven home the twelve miles in an hour. They kept warm, except their faces, but D. said it was dreadful on the prairie,—the air full of blowing snow, till you could hardly see."

On the 14th of this month (Second) our friends John R. and Sarah M. Benjamin commemorated the fiftieth anniversary of their wedding, which occurred at or near Chatham, New York, from which place they moved to their present home, at Benjaminville, Ill., in 1854, and have resided here ever since. Their relatives and friends to the number of fifty or sixty assembled to do honor to them and the occasion. Their union has been blest with five children, (one dying while an infant), two sons and two daughters, all married; these have given to their parents, twelve grandchildren. The couple enjoy good health, and are comfortably situated, and bid fair to pass many more milestones together on life's journey.

E. H. C.

Holder, Ill.

At a recent meeting of one of the Young Friends' Associations, the subject of "the plain language" was considered. A friend writes: "We had quite an interesting discussion. The view was expressed that it would be just as well to drop it, as it was a peculiarity, but most thought it very beautiful, and that we should continue the use of it at least among ourselves. For myself, I feel it would be a spiritual loss to the Society, if we abandoned it."

"In closing, I want to add how much we like the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. I enjoy it more than any other magazine or paper that we get, and always read it through as soon as it comes."

"At a recent meeting of our Woman's Club, in Chicago, the Countess Schimmelman was our guest, and spoke to us of her work. She belonged to the court of the Empress Augusta, of Germany, and never saw any poverty or misery until after the death of her father. She grieved so for him that the Empress urged her to take up some useful work, and suggested visiting prisons. She never could enjoy court life after that, and felt called to do what she could for the poor and unfortunate. She is here in her little ship, and looks after poor sailors, especially, and tramps, those who are too low for even the Salvation Army to reach."

"She was told that Chicago was the 'wickedest American city.' When she came she went directly to the Anarchist meeting in their hall. They told her they did not believe in God, nor in the soul, but they allowed her to speak to them every First-day for six weeks. At the end of that time she said she would like to know if she had influenced one person to change his mind,—if so, she wished he might rise. They all rose! She said, 'O, you misunderstand me; I will make it plainer. I hope no one will rise who has not changed his mind, and who does not believe there is a God.' They all rose again! That seems very remarkable, and I wonder what it implies. Can it be they are anarchists because no one has gone to them with the gospel message?" [From a friend's letter.]

Recently there has been inquiry for copies of John Woolman's Journal. There are many editions, but a very good one is that with the Introduction by John G. Whittier. This is published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston. (Friends' Book Association, Philadelphia, supply it at $1.20.) A correspondent of the INTELLIGENCER in Chicago says: "I wrote to Jane Addams, and asked her if she had a copy in 'Hull House' library. She replied that just a week before Prof. Herron gave her a copy, and said, 'I do not see how my Quaker relatives ever allowed me to escape such a good man.'"

The world is ready for the good seed. Let us be diligent in giving what has been committed to us [Friends] for two centuries and more. We need no new revelation until that given to us has been fully used.

H. A. P.

Glencoe, Ill.

"I am very much interested in the INTELLIGENCER," a Friend writes from New Jersey, "and approve very much of the stand it has taken in regard to our recent war. The paper is growing in interest, and the news it contains of Friends' movements in different localities will tend, I believe, to bind us closer as an organization."

We desire to express our appreciation of the courageous expressions, from time to time, in the INTELLIGENCER; especially are we grateful for the editorial article in the last issue.

Clarksboro, N. J.

E. A. H.

"I have cut out some of the reports of our recent weather, and preserved them, 'lest we forget,' as we are so prone to do," says a friend in a private letter.

COMMUNICATIONS.

FRIENDS' HOME FOR CHILDREN.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

FOR some years the first First-day of each month has been designated as a special day for "Friends' Meeting" at our Home for Children, (4011 Aspen Street, West Philadelphia); on the remaining First-days we have First-day school.

At our last Board meeting a suggestion was made that we discontinue these meetings on account of so few persons attending them. Some of us strenuously opposed this. We do not want to feel that this very useful institution, founded by a member of the Society, which has been watered by the tears of sympathy, remembered in the prayers of hundreds; supported by the generous offerings of so many Friends, and around which cluster so many pleasant memories of good works accomplished, has been injured in the home of its friends by discontinuing our "Friends' Meetings."

The next meeting will be First-day, the 5th of Third month, at 3 p. m, at the Home. We urge all to be present and bring every friend they can with them to testify to their appreciation of this good work.

This is a purely personal note; no other member of our Board is in the slightest degree responsible for its contents. I plead for the Home. We expect visiting Friends.

JOHN A. M. PASSMORE.

Philadelphia, Second month 27.

KEEPING LENT.

Is this a fast to keepe
The larder leane
And cleane
From fat of veals and Sheape?

Is it to quit the dish
Of fleshe, yet still
To fill
The platter high with fish?

Is it to fast an houre,
Or ragged goe,
Or show
A downcast look and soure?

No! 'tis a fast to dole
Thy sheaf of wheate,
And meate,
Unto the hungry soule!

It is a fast from strife,
From old debate,
And hate
To circumsise "thy life."

To show a hearte grieve-rent,
To starve thy sin,
Not bin,
And that's to keep thy Lent!

—Table Talk.

THE STARLINGS.

EARLY in spring time, on raw and windy mornings,
Beneath the freezing house-eaves, I heard the starlings sing—

"Ah, dreary March month, is this then a time for building wearily?

Sad, sad, to think that the year is but begun."

Late in the autumn, on still and cloudless evenings
Among the golden reed-beds I heard the starlings sing—

"Ah, that sweet March month, when we and our mates were courting merrily;

Sad, sad, to think that the year is all but done."

—Charles Kingsley.

J. EADS HOW, a young millionaire of St. Louis, is leading a life of voluntary poverty in that city, trying by example to better the condition of the laboring classes.

WILLIAM TALLACK'S VIEWS.

The students of Carleton College, (Northfield, Minn.), and those of Hamline University, (Hamline, Minn.), having on hand an inter-collegiate debate on the question "Should the United States enter into an offensive and defensive alliance with Great Britain," some of the former wrote to William Tallack, secretary of the Howard Association, London, (a prominent Friend), soliciting his opinion on the subject. He thereupon sent the reply below.

GENTLEMEN: As the Howard Association is not a political body, I am rather at a loss to gather the reason of your inviting an opinion in this quarter on the topic of your debate; but, being thus solicited, I venture to offer a few observations in my private capacity.

Englishmen earnestly desire an enduring and cordial alliance between your country and their own, and would highly value your moral support in times of difficulty. The aid, of this nature, which Great Britain has recently been very glad to render to the United States, when the Continental Powers seemed inclined to be hostile to you, they would rejoice to see reciprocated by you, should the occasion arise. And they would also welcome the adoption by your Government of a permanent treaty for arbitrating any further disputes between the two nations, as already proposed to you from this side of the Atlantic.

But grave objections would attend any formal treaty of offensive and defensive alliance, and it would find many opponents in both countries. On the one hand, it might increase that spirit of "Jingoism," or ostentatious militarism, which is already a danger to each of the two nations; and, on the other hand, it would impose much heavier obligations on your country than on ours. For we are open to assault from adjacent Continental rivals, and might even have to meet a formidable hostile confederacy of them, though in such event, we might hope for the renewed protection of Providence, as at a former period of our history. But you, with the immense oceans of the Atlantic and Pacific guarding you, are incomparably safer. No external enemy can do you more harm, at the worst, than to cause a little temporary injury to your fringe of coast. Any effective invasion of the multitudinous millions of your vast country is impossible. The United States are practically invincible and invulnerable by any foreign foe.

But are you as secure from a very serious internal peril, in the dangerous condition of your ten millions (more or less) of colored people, who, in some of the Southern States, have been virtually disfranchised by wholesale, subjected to intolerable cruelties, robberies, and lynchings, at the hands of secret societies or public bands of white assailants, and, through the vile operation of the convict "leasing-out system," widely subjected to oppression worse than that of the old days of slavery?

¶ The condition of the colored race has already brought, even upon your great nation, one terrible conflict. Is there no further risk involved in its present position? If Britain is herself partly responsible for the existence of that race in your midst, she has, at any rate, subsequently endeavored, and at great cost, to secure to them throughout her own empire liberty and justice.

In this direction, as in others, may the young men especially, of both nations, cheerfully respond, in the service of God and of His creatures, to Rudyard Kipling's animating appeal—"Take up the White Man's Burden!" And with such aims our kindred nations may well cultivate the friendliest of rivalries and the closest coöperation of mutual sympathy. These two Anglo-Saxon Empires are each largely interested in territorial and commercial relations in both hemispheres, and thus they have imposed upon them, by Providence, the duty of civilizing and evangelizing the races under their influence. This destiny of common obligation, if obeyed, will nobly ally them in realizing the poet's vision of——"that glorious birth,"

Which shall one day be born,
From marriage of the Western Earth
With the nations of the Morn."

Nearly forty years ago (in 1860) I enjoyed the privilege of traversing the length and breadth of your vast country, from the Pacific to the Atlantic and from Mexico to Canada, and therefore am better able than many of my countrymen to appreciate the magnificent grandeur of your territory. Subsequent intercourse and correspondence with many excellent Americans have further deepened my interest in your nation. Hence I have special cause to desire your collective and individual welfare.

[It will be observed that our friend W. T. regards Kipling's poem as an appeal for philanthropic effort; we have considered it as inciting to an "Imperial" policy.—EDS. INTELLIGENCER.]

TRAITS OF THE CITY POOR.

From the article by Jane Addams, of Hull House, Chicago, in the Atlantic Monthly.

A VERY little familiarity with the poor districts of any city is sufficient to show how primitive and frontier-like are the neighborly relations. The fact that the economic condition of all alike is on a most precarious level makes the ready outflow of sympathy and material assistance the most natural thing in the world. There are numberless instances of heroic self-sacrifice quite unknown in the circles where greater economic advantages make that kind of intimate knowledge of one's neighbors impossible. An Irish family, in which the man has lost his place, and the woman is struggling to eke out the scanty savings by day work, will take in a widow and her five children who have been turned into the street, without a moment's reflection upon the physical discomforts involved. The most maligned landlady is usually ready to lend a scuttleful of coal to a suffering tenant, or to share her supper. A woman for whom the writer had long tried in vain to find work, failed to appear at the appointed time when a job turned up at last. Upon investigation it transpired that a neighbor further down the street was taken ill; that the children ran for the family friend, who went, of course; saying simply, when reasons for her non-appearance were demanded, "It broke me heart to leave the place, but what could I do?" . . .

If a poor woman knows that her neighbor next door has no shoes, she is quite willing to lend her own, that her neighbor may go decently to mass or to work; for she knows the smallest item about the scanty wardrobe, and cheerfully helps out. When the charity visitor comes in, all the neighbors are baffled as to what her circumstances may be. They know she does not need a new pair of shoes, and rather suspect that she has a dozen pairs at home; which indeed she sometimes has. They imagine untold stores which they may call upon, and her most generous gift is considered niggardly, compared with what she might do. She ought to get new shoes for the family all round; "she sees well enough that they need them." It is no more than the neighbor herself would do. The charity visitor has broken through the natural rule of giving, which, in a primitive society, is bounded only by the need of the recipient and the resources of the giver; and she gets herself into untold trouble when she is judged by the ethics of that primitive society.

The neighborhood understands the selfish rich people who stay in their own part of the town, where all their associates have shoes and other things. Such people do not bother themselves about the poor; they are like the rich landlords of the neighborhood experience. But this lady visitor, who pretends to be good to the poor, and certainly does talk as though she were kind-hearted, what does she come for, if she does not intend to give them things which so plainly are needed? The visitor says, sometimes, that in holding her poor family so hard to a standard of thrift she is really breaking down a rule of higher living which they formerly possessed; that saving, which seems quite commendable in a comfortable part of the town, appears almost criminal in a poorer quarter, where the next-door neighbor needs food, even if the children of the family do not.

CANADIAN VIEW OF THE DOUKHOBORS.

Christian Guardian, (Methodist), Toronto.]

THE event of the past week, which has interested Christians of all denominations in Winnipeg, Portage la Prairie, Brandon, and other centres, and indeed it may be said throughout Manitoba and the Northwest generally, has been the arrival from the Caucasus, south-eastern Russia, of the Doukhobors, spirit-wrestlers, or Russian Quakers, as they are variously called. [This was the first party, those coming on the Lake Huron.] Their appearance, the history of their persecutions, and the peculiarities of their religion have been discussed in articles, original or quoted, in every paper in Canada. A point, however, which may well be placed in greater prominence, and kept there permanently, is the stress which they lay upon Christian living. To live right, to have the truth in the heart, and obey it, is with them, the main thing.

Mr. Leopold Sulerjitzky, who is with them as Count Tolstoy's representative, tells how he was impressed with their consistent living, when he became acquainted with them, and during his stay among them for the past four years. His observations of nominal Christians in Moscow and elsewhere had made him skeptical as to the fact or the possibility of any one living in strict accordance with the teachings of Christianity; but close study of the Doukhobors showed him nothing in their lives to which he could take any exception. Not only do the adults live as brothers and sisters, treating one another with the utmost love and deference, but even the children are free from angry passions, quarreling and fighting being unknown. A German woman, whose home was in the Caucasus, not far from the Doukhobors, on being asked what she knew of their religion, answered, "They have a very holy religion." She went on to explain that they decline to associate with people who drink intoxicating liquor, or do other bad things.

Mr. Sulerjitzky makes the remarkable statement, that in the large settlement of two thousand people in which he is personally interested, that of those now here, a printed or written Bible had been, up to the time of his going among them, a thing unknown. They had never seen the book, or heard any portion of it read. When, for the first time in their lives, and apparently in their history from an indefinite period, he read passages of Scripture to them, their comments were, "That is true; that is good; that is just what we believe; just like our religion." They maintained, however, that it was better to have their religion in their hearts and heads than to have it in a book. A similar conclusion was expressed by them last Sunday. The choir of a neighboring city church visited the immigration hall last Sunday, and sang hymns for the Doukhobors. The latter, in return, sang (or chanted) some of their Psalms, and on being congratulated by Immigration Commissioner McCreary, replied, "Your people sing from a book; we sing from our hearts and heads."

WORKING WOMEN AND THE BALLOT.

Florence Kelley.

No one needs all the powers of the fullest citizenship more urgently than the wage earning woman, and from two different points of view—that of actual money wages and that of her wider needs as a human being and a member of the community.

The wages paid any body of working people are determined by many influences, chief among which stands the position of the particular body of workers in organization, their solidarity and united action, keep up their wages, in spite of the invasion of their domain by new and improved machinery. On the other hand, the garment-workers, the sweaters' victims, poor, unorganized, unintelligent, despised, remain forever on the verge of pauperism, irrespective of their endless toil. If, now, by some untoward fate the printers should suddenly find themselves disfranchised, placed in a position in which their members were politically inferior to the members of other trades, no effort of their own short of complete enfranchisement could restore to them that prestige, that good standing in the esteem of their fellow craftsmen and the public at large which they now enjoy, and which contributes materially in support of their demand for high wages.

In the garment trades, on the other hand, the presence of a body of the disfranchised, of the weak and young, undoubtedly contributes to the economic weakness of these trades. Custom, habit, tradition, the regard of the public, both employing and employed, for the people who do certain kinds of work, contribute to determine the price of that work, and no disfranchised class of workers can permanently hold its own in competition with enfranchised rivals. But this works both ways. It is fatal for any body of workers to have forever hanging from the hinges of its skirts other bodies of workers on a level just below its own; for that means continual pressure downward, continual additional difficulty to be overcome in the struggle to maintain reasonable rates of wages. Hence, within the space of two generations there has been a complete revolution in the attitude of the trades unions toward the women working in their trades, whereas forty years ago women might have knocked in vain at the doors of the most enlightened trades union of those days. To-day the Federation of Labor keeps in the field paid organizers whose duty it is to enlist in the unions as many women as possible. The workingmen have perceived that women are in the field of industry to stay; and they see, too, that there cannot be two standards of work and wages for any trade without constant menace to the higher standard. Hence their effort to place the women upon the same industrial level with themselves in order that all may pull together in the effort to maintain reasonable conditions of life. But this same menace holds with regard to the vote.

The lack of the vote places the wage-earning woman, as such, upon a level of irresponsibility compared with her enfranchised fellow-workman. By impairing her standing in the community, however unintentionally, the general rating of her value as a human being and consequently as a worker, is lowered. In order to be rated as good as a good man, in the field of her earnings, she must show herself better than he. She must be more steady, or more trustworthy, or more skilled, or more cheap, perhaps, in order to stand the same change of employment. Thus while women are accused of lowering wages, might they not justly reply that it is only by conceding something, from the pay which they would gladly claim, that they can hold their own in the market so long as they labor under the disadvantage of their disfranchisement?

Good Humor in Cold Weather.

Harper's Bazar.

EVEN "the coldest weather in twenty-seven years" brought some compensations with it. In the first place while it is a perennial joy to talk about the weather, there is an existing prejudice against doing so. We forswear the habit from time to time, but we can never quite give up apologetic returns to it. When therefore the thermometer does such violent gymnastics that it simply must be noticed, it is a comfort to be able to do so without the usual deprecatory air.

Among the compensations which a cold snap brings is one which is a paradox. The colder the weather, the warmer grow people's hearts. It is not simply that purse-strings are loosened by pity for the suffering poor. Something else happens, which one need not visit the charitable societies to discover. It is a thawing out of the cold indifference of ordinary city life. On one of those freezing, stinging days, not soon to be forgotten, one had only to enter a crowded car to be convinced of this. Generally every cranny of such a car is filled with unadulterated crossness. People fairly glare when they are pushed and prodded and stepped upon. A new comer, edging his way into the car, is made to feel like a criminal.

During the cold snap—which might better be called a cold grip, from its tenacity—everything was different. Nobody had the heart to even look coldly at new-comers, who were already half frozen. If the car was packed, those near the door simply squeezed themselves a little tighter into the central mass, and pulled the late arrivals within shelter. Everybody laughed; everybody was willing to do a good turn for somebody else. People who ordinarily go about the streets looking, as the French say, as amiable as the door of a prison, actually spoke sympathetically to conductors and motormen.

Anti-License Campaign in Kentucky.

THE W. C. T. U., it is said in "Mida's Criterion," (a liquor organ) have been "quietly at work in Kentucky for two years preparing for a local campaign. The first gun has been fired at Lexington, where they have indicted 102 saloon-keepers for Sunday opening. In Richmond, Paris, Winchester, Mount Sterling, Cynthiana, Nicholasville, Georgetown, Lancaster, Lebanon, Williamstown, London, Manchester, and other towns, the ladies will try to keep liquor from being sold. Local option already prevails in Winchester, Wilmington, and London, and it came near carrying recently at Richmond. Nearly every country precinct in the State has local option, so that the sale of liquor in Kentucky can only be conducted legally in the towns and cities, with many of the towns against it. This is notably true in the case of Danville, the home of Center College. It has been twenty-one years since liquor was legally sold in that city, save on a physician's prescription."

A Cordial Word of Welcome.

Presbyterian Record, Montreal.

THE Doukhobors, two thousand and again two thousand, with more to follow, exiles from Russia, have landed and have gone to our far West to make for themselves new homes in a land of freedom. They have been welcomed by voice and press, for their clean, healthy bodies, their high-toned morals, and their dauntless faith and courage under sore persecution, prominence being given to one or other of these according to taste.

One point may be noted. They have been driven from their homes, they have lost everything, they have come to our land, all for conscience' sake. Conscience is a valuable commodity in any country. Russia has none to spare, and her policy is suicidal. Canada cannot have too much of it. Her fields and forests and mines are of great worth, but more essential to her true prosperity is "a good conscience toward God and toward man." This is probably the largest single importation of conscience in the world's history, and well may we rejoice that Canada is the recipient of it. May it spread.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THERE was, during much of last week, a very disturbed condition in and about Manila. On one night, the 22d, fires were spread in the city, presumably by the Filipinos, and great damage done. The night is described as "one of terror." The troops were employed to extinguish the fires, and to fight the Filipinos within the city. Many were killed. On the 23d ult., "some of the fiercest fighting that had yet taken place around Manila" occurred at Tondo, a suburb of the city, and at Caloocan, some distance away. The losses of the native people are reported very heavy.

General Otis made a report of his "casualties" on the 27th ult., being 83 killed and 347 wounded. This appears to be the entire loss since the fighting with the natives began. Theirs is at least ten times as great.

REPORTS from Manila, on the 27th ultimo, represented the Filipinos as showing signs of submission and of desiring peace. A flag of truce, borne by an officer, a "Commandante," came into the lines of General Otis, and the bearer said that "fully 8,000 of his men had had enough, and were anxious to surrender." It was also reported that "two Spanish Commissioners, who returned to Manila, said that Aguinaldo and Sandiko were both at Malolos and inclined to pacific overtures."

A LATER dispatch from Manila than that referred to above says "the reports that the rebels are offering to treat for peace are untrue." Military operations continue. Cebu, one of the islands, (seventh in point of area), was seized by a United States warship on the 22d ult., and the native leaders, representing Aguinaldo, after a conference, made a surrender in writing, saying they yielded to superior force, and "adding that they protested against the manner in which the Americans waged war at this end of the nineteenth century."

It was announced from Washington, on the 28th ult., that Germany would withdraw her warships from the Philippine Islands, and that the United States Government would assume responsibility for the lives and property of German subjects resident there. This is considered as "a strong evidence of Germany's desire to promote cordial relations with this country." In Europe the relations of the several leading nations to one another have lately become a matter of much uncertainty, and they are all looking about for new combinations and alliances.

CONGRESS will close its session on the 4th instant at noon. The army bill has been so amended in the Senate that it makes no permanent increase in the regular army. The opposition to permanent increase was so strong that the supporters of the measure were obliged to yield.

A CAUCUS of the Democratic members of the House of Representatives, on the evening of the 27th ult., adopted resolutions reaffirming the right of self-government as stated in the Declaration of Independence, and applying this to the case of the Philippines; favoring a declaration by Congress that the United States disclaims any disposition or intention to hold the Philippines permanently, and that "when an independent government shall have been erected," it will be recognized. The resolutions were adopted practically unanimously. General Wheeler, of Alabama, however, opposed them. "Wars were popular, he declared, and at the present time the spirit of the people was shown by the fact that every boy had his drum and sword, while the mothers were proud of this patriotic spirit."

THE funeral of President Faure, in Paris, on the 23d ultimo, passed off without disturbance. The new president, Loubet, walked in the procession the whole distance. Since then, "plots" in behalf of the Orleanist "pretender," who wishes to be King, are reported to have been discovered, and two members of the Chamber of Deputies, Deroulede and Habert, have been arrested. Deroulede attempted to induce General Roget, who commanded a body of troops in the funeral procession, to march his men to the Elysee Palace (the official government building) and effect revolution. It is very generally said that the outcome of the last fortnight's events is favorable to the present republican government, and that the military, the Orleanist, and the Bonapartist intrigues against it have all lost ground.

THE Pope, at Rome, is reported seriously ill, and at his age, (he was 88 on the 2d instant), the gravest alarm is felt by those about him, on every such turn of health. "Intrigues" have begun, a dispatch says, looking to the holding of the "conclave" of cardinals to choose a successor, and it is added that no "foreigner,"—none but an Italian,—has any chance of success. One candidate is Father Gotti, "a barefoot Carmelite monk from Genoa"; three others are prominent dignitaries of the church.

THE trial of Senator Quay and his son, on the charge connected with the alleged misuse of State funds in the People's Bank, was to have begun on the 27th ultimo, in Philadelphia, and they were in court with their counsel, apparently expecting to proceed, when the District Attorney, Rothermel, proposed to the Court a continuation of the case until the 10th of next month, and this order was made. The District Attorney did not explain the reasons for postponement, and the proceeding has excited much discussion.

Benjamin J. Haywood, the former State Treasurer, who was indicted with the Quays, died at his home at Sharon, Pa., last week, after an extended illness. His death was no doubt due in part to the worry occasioned by this prosecution.

A REMARKABLE instance of escape from the perils of the sea is that of the steamship Bulgaria, of the Hamburg-American Line, which reached Ponta Delgada, in the Azores Islands, on the 24th ultimo. She had been reported by the Weehawken, which took twenty-five persons off her on the 5th ultimo, as in a sinking condition. The crew, however, labored at the needed repairs, and finally got her into port, as stated. There were some seventy persons on board. It had been generally supposed that she was lost.

RUDYARD KIPLING, the English author, has been lying very ill, of pneumonia, at a hotel in New York city. His condition on the 26th was very critical. It is thought at this writing that he is slightly improved.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
REYNOLDS-BAUMAN
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHANDLER
Pittsburgh.
FAIRBANKS
Pittsburgh.
ANGUS
Cincinnati.
ROSKIN
ATLANTIC
BRADLEY
BROOKLYN
JEWETT
New York.
ULSTER
UNION
SOUTHERN SHIPMAN
Chicago.
COLLIER
MISSOURI
RED SEAL
St. Louis.
SOUTHERN
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY
Cleveland.
SALEM
Salem, Mass.
CORNELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

"THERE is a vast difference between an unsupported assertion and a demonstrated fact."

Our assertion that Pure White Lead made by the "old Dutch process" of slow corrosion is far superior to White Lead made by patent or quick processes, has been demonstrated by the experience of competent, practical painters everywhere. Comparative tests made by employees or parties interested do not prove anything.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILWAY.

ANTHRACITE COAL. NO SMOKE.
NO CINDERS. DOUBLE TRACKED.
HEAVY STEEL RAILS. STONE
BALLASTED.

Royal Blue Line to New York.
SWIFTEST AND SAFEST TRAINS
IN THE WORLD.

Scenic Reading Route to
READING, HARRISBURG, GETTYS-
BURG, CHAMBERSBURG, SHAMO-
KIN, WILLIAMSPORT, AND POINTS
IN INTERIOR PENNSYLVANIA.

Royal Reading Route to
ATLANTIC CITY. CLEANLINESS
AND COMFORT. SAFETY AND SPEED.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

VERR discouraging views are taken of the damage done to fruit by the severe cold of last month. The entire peach crop of the Delaware Peninsula, a news item says, "has undoubtedly been destroyed. This is the opinion of many prominent peach growers who were interviewed and who have made thorough examination of the buds. This is the third successive destruction of the crop. A grower who has kept a record says there have been but four good crops of peaches within the past sixteen years."

—At Point Pleasant, W. Va., a news item says, "Mrs. O. B. Harper, while wearing an immense pompadour comb made of celluloid, stooped to pick up a pin from the hearth in front of a blazing coal fire. The comb took fire and before it could be extinguished burned all the hair from her head and charred the scalp so that fears of her recovery are entertained. She had a wealth of dark brown hair, and had just dressed it preparatory to going to a party."

—If a current report may be relied on, there is some progress making, after all, in reform. "One of the results of last fall's crusade against extravagance at Harrisburg is that members of the present Legislature are not getting pearl-handled English knives, or gold-mounted fountain pens at the expense of the State. Neither have they received leather card cases, fancy envelope openers or combination corkscrews. The issuance of silver match boxes, costly hair brushes and dainty whisk brooms has also been cut off." These were all formerly supplied, at public cost, and called "stationery."

—"We are likely to be forced into embarrassments on account of expansion," says president G. Stanley Hall, of Clark University. "I am not wise in those matters and have no opinion that is worth anything; but I can't get over the feeling that the argument that we ought to take up the white man's burden, as Kipling calls it, is false teaching. It is a bad pedagogy to teach people at the point of the bayonet, and is repugnant to our methods. As a general principle it does not succeed."

—The Governor of Kansas has signed a bill by which the Legislature aims to relieve farmers from the "exactions of the binding twine combination." The measure provides for the manufacture of binding twine by convicts in the State Penitentiary, and appropriates $40,000 for the installing of a plant and $150,000 to be used as a fund to carry on the enterprise.

—The State Department has been informed by cable from Ambassador White, at Berlin, that orders have been issued according to which American oranges, lemons, and raisins imported into Germany, as well as all American fresh or dried fruit passing through Germany in bond, are no longer to be examined for San Jose scale.

—William R. Day, of Ohio, who was for some time at the head of the Department of State, and was one of the commissioners who negotiated the Paris Treaty, has been appointed by President McKinley Judge of the Sixth Judicial Circuit of the United States Courts.

—Ethan Allen Hitchcock, of Missouri, recently United States Ambassador to Russia, last week took the prescribed oath and entered upon his duties as Secretary of the Interior, in place of Cornelius R. Bliss.

—A new line of steamers has been started to run between San Diego, Cal., and Manila, and the cargo of the first ship to sail for Manila on this line was made up chiefly of whisky and beer—so a citizen of California reports to the New York Times.

—Samuel J. Barrows, Representative in Congress from the 10th District of Massachusetts, has been appointed Librarian of the Congressional Library at Washington. He was editor of the Christian Register, Boston, from 1881 to 1898.

—It is now said, at Havana, that "enormous frauds have been found in the water distribution of Havana, fully one-fifth the householders having been stealing the supply from the city in connivance with the officials." (This was during the former régime.)

....BREAD....

.....Made from the

FINE FLOUR of the ENTIRE WHEAT

As Ground by the Franklin Mills

Is the Representative Human Food, embracing all the elements of nutrition necessary to build up and sustain every part of the system.

When you compare the price of The Franklin Mills Fine Flour of the Entire Wheat with the price of ordinary white flour, you should also compare the two flours in Food Value.

Every pound of the Franklin Mills Fine Flour of the Entire Wheat represents a pound of Food Value, and is the cheapest flour ever known.

If your grocer does not keep it, send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied. See that the Flour delivered bears our label. Send for free Booklet.

The genuine made only by the
FRANKLIN MILLS CO.,
Lookport, N. Y.

It is the opinion of tamers that the tiger is more to be feared than the lion. One will kill a man with as much ease as the other; but the lion gives fair warning of his murderous intention by rushing at his victim with a roar, whereas the tiger, true representative of the cat tribe, comes sneaking up with the semblance of an affectionate purr, only to set his fangs, with sudden spring, into the very life of his victim. The lion has somewhat greater muscular power than the tiger, but the latter has greater quickness. In intelligence they are about equal.

RINGS as tokens or pledges for loans were made for Queen Henrietta of England while in Holland trying to raise money and troops for her ill-starred husband, Charles I. "H. M. R." was done in filigree upon them and covered with a crystal; these were to have been redeemed by favors if the royal cause prospered.

Of the entire human race it is estimated that 500,000,000 are well clothed—that is, they wear garments of some kind; 250,000,000 habitually go naked, and 700,000,000 only cover parts of their body; 500,000,000 live in houses, 700,000,000 in huts and caves, 250,000,000 have virtually no shelter at all.

Nobody ever complains of Macbeth lamp-chimneys.

They give a good deal more light and don't break.

Get the Index.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

AQUILA J. LINVILL,

Dealer in Choice Lehigh Coal

1827 North 10th Street, Philadelphia.

John C. Hancock & Co.,

N. W. Cor. 9th and Master Sts.
(P. & R. R. R.)

DEALERS IN BEST GRADES OF

LEHIGH AND COAL FREE BURNING

Telephone Connection.

WILLIAM S. YARNALL,

Manufacturing Optician.

18 South Fifteenth St., (4th door bel. Chestnut St.).
PHILADELPHIA.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY MILK.
CONSHOHOCKEN Special attention given to serving families. Office 603 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Penna.
JOSEPH L. JONES.

Criss-Cross
CEREALS

Ask dealers for them—see that packages have these criss-cross lines. Pamphlet and our sample offer mailed free. Special Diabetic Food, for Diabetes. Gluten Flour, for Dyspepsia and Constipation. Barley Crystals, for Kidney Troubles. FARWELL & SMITH, Waterbury, A. S., U. S. A.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 11, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 10.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

X.

ALL God's revelations need to be intelligently received. Spiritual impressions must be tested by experience, and by the Divine revelations in the past. Even our outward senses are guided and perfected by the results of experience; and it would be strange if it were not so as regards the things of the Spirit.

From "God manifest in the Spirit," in "A Reasonable Faith."

GOLDEN AGE.

O GOLDEN age, whose light is of the dawn,
And not of sunset, forward, not behind,
Flood the new heavens and earth, and with thee bring
All the old virtues, whatsoever things
Are pure and honest and of good repute,
But add thereto whatever bard has sung
Or seer has told of when in trance and dream,
They saw the Happy Isles of prophecy.
Let Justice hold her scale, and Truth divide
Between the right and wrong; but give the heart
The freedom of its fair inheritance.

—Whittier, the Prelude to "Among the Hills."

MANKIND ONE BODY.¹

Two recent publications bear upon the great—one might almost say, so far as this world is concerned, the final—question of the unification of mankind. Both are the work of men not only earnest and devoted to the ideal, but also practical and experienced. Dr. Boardman has approved himself, in many years of active labor, a man of affairs, and Dr. Trueblood is a singularly even-tempered, calm, and patient worker for the best things attainable.

When Tennyson wrote, in "Locksley Hall," his line on—

"The parliament of man, the federation of the world," perhaps he did not very strongly entertain a hopeful anticipation that this would ever be realized. It was a "dream," probably, as Dr. Trueblood terms it. Yet there are too many things in its favor to dismiss it as a dream only,—a phantasm without form or substance. The fundamental facts of science testify to the unity of the human race. Not merely the inspired utterance of Paul at Athens,—for inspired he truly must have been, to have so spoken, in such a time and place,—but the patiently collected evidences of students of anthropology, all tend to the one conviction that the Creator has indeed made of one all those who dwell upon the earth. The plea of Shylock, if we detach it from its surroundings, is a plea which any one may make, the world over: "Have I not eyes? Have I not hands, organs, dimensions, senses, affections, passions?" More than that, he might have asked, and any one may ask, who is included in the human lists, whether an Esquimaux of the Arctic, or a Fuegian such as Darwin brought home to England in the Beagle, "Have I not intelligence, capacity of growth, mental and spiritual life?" The tale is the same, no matter where told, and whether it is George Fox conversing with the American Indians, or Livingstone guided by the black men of South Africa, the conviction must be that all men are of one brotherhood.

Both the publications which we have under notice in this article should be read, and in order to that should be circulated widely. Dr. Boardman's is the substance of an address delivered in Washington City nine years ago, (Third month 4, 1890), "in the presence of a large audience, including the then Secretary of State, several other members of the Cabinet, many members of Congress, many foreign ambassadors, etc., Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court of the United States presiding. It was substantially repeated before the Peace Congress at the World's Fair in Chicago." Dr. Trueblood's book is the outgrowth of "two lectures delivered before the faculty and students of the Meadville Theological School, Meadville, Pennsylvania, in the spring of 1897, on the Adin Ballou foundation."

Both our authors look forward with confidence to the time when not only will men cease to oppress and slay one another, but when they will be practically associated in one general political organization, a "federation of the world," as Dr. Trueblood terms it. Dr. Boardman, in the opening of his address, employs the analogue of Paul, in his first letter to the Corinth Christians, when he declares that "the body is one, and has many members, and all the members of the body, being many, are one body." He believes that humanity, world wide, is one body, the offspring of the Father, the flock of a Christ religion, and that ultimately as good overcomes evil, and generosity replaces selfishness, it will become one in a true and real sense. "For it is only," he says, "when we conceive mankind as one colossal, ideal body, having all its organs in coördination, and all its functions in reciprocal action, that we can truly grasp this mighty word—MANKIND. It is a sublime conception, which shall yet by God's grace dominate humanity."

It is quite impossible, in the space of this notice, to even suggest the facts and arguments which either Dr. Boardman or Dr. Trueblood has embodied. Dr. Boardman adds enthusiasm to his learning; Dr. Trueblood is calm and earnest, but both have presented a mass of information which will help any sane and open mind to a conclusion that, in spite of our ingrained tendencies to revert to the barbarous condition, our better natures must finally triumph. Dr. Trueblood declares that the "conception of the entire unlawfulness of war, which has been held by so many Christian leaders in the past, . . . is in no remote future inevitably to become universal among good men. Its adherents are not decreasing. They are more numerous throughout Christendom to-day than ever before. Witness the hundred thousand Stundists in Russia, many of whom sympathize strongly with the opinions of Count Tolstoy; the twenty thousand Doukhobors in the Russian Caucasus; the thirty thousand Nazarenes in southern Hungary; the Friends, Mennonites, and Moravians, who still in many parts of the world, maintain their ancient profession; the increasing number of individuals in all the denominations who will no longer make any apology for war; the many individuals in Continental Europe who refuse to do military service."¹

¹"Disarmament of Nations; or, Mankind One Body." By George Dana Boardman, D.D., LL.D. Third Edition, Revised and Enlarged. Philadelphia: 1898.

"The Federation of the World." By Benjamin F. Trueblood, LL.D. Pp. vii. and 162. $1.00. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co., 1899.

These words were written, of course, before the recent recrudescence of the barbaric system, but they remain true in spite of that, and we believe that however quickly and suddenly the tide of Christian feeling seemed to ebb, a year ago, it has begun to flow again. This must be true, if we believe in the general advancement,—it must be that each flow is greater than each ebb.

Dr. Boardman's thesis is more upon the side of the unity of the social state, the close relationship of the peoples in one actual and conscious body. Dr. Trueblood discusses and suggests more the feasibility of a confederated system. He points out how near all parts of the earth are now brought to one another by the inventions of the nineteenth century; how thousands and tens of thousands of people now live part of the time in one country, or in one climate, and part of the time in another. "Racial distinctions are in many respects beginning to break down, because of the intermingling of peoples in all quarters of the globe. What may be styled the universal human characteristics, those belonging to the one race of man lying at the basis of all sub-races, are destined thus more and more to come to the front as against those which have marked off one portion of mankind from another."

Dr. Trueblood does not expect that the federation of the world can come without further friction, and even war. But he believes that in spite of wars the tendency will be toward association in the bonds of peace. He does not think a confederation can be artificially created, that it can be made off-hand; on the contrary, as "States grow before they are made," it will be an evolved result, the outcome of many preparatory influences. But toward such a result "forces and processes" have been long working, and in recent years their operations have been manifest in many directions. "When the wheat is knee-high in the fields one is justified in believing that the harvest time will come soon."

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE STORY OF PETER YARNALL.

BY GRIFFITH JOHN, BEAR GAP, PA.

(Continued from Last Week.)

AFTER attending the First-day meeting, which was large and favored, they set out the same afternoon for Pittsburg, accompanied for a few miles by James McGrew. They stopped at the house of Garret Pendergrass; he with his wife were an aged couple, with whom they had a sitting, and who expressed much satisfaction with the opportunity. Reaching Pittsburg on the 9th of the Eleventh month, they called on Col. John Gibson, an Indian trader, stating that they proposed holding a meeting in that place. He went with them to a magistrate, who, in a very kind manner, fell in with their proposal, and promised that general notice should be given. The landlord of the inn where they put up, offered a room in his house for the meeting, which was accepted. The meeting was well attended and was satisfactory.

On the 10th they returned to Sewickly, and next day attended the week-day meeting there. Then they went home with Ebenezer Walker, who lived near the Youghiogheny river. Peter Yarnall being lame from the hardships of travel, was kindly cared for by these people. They next attended meetings at Little Redstone, and Fallowfield, and an appointed meeting at Ebenezer Walker's. 15th they rode to Little Redstone, where was held another favored meeting. They lodged with John Cope, where they were visited by two aged Friends, Nathan Brown and wife; she was a sister to Joseph Elgar; they were the first Friends who settled at Little Redstone. 17th they attended an appointed meeting at the old Fort of Redstone, (now Brownsville).

The next night, they were at Rees Cadwallader's. On the 20th, after being at Westland Meeting, they proceeded to the town of Washington, county seat of Washington county, Pa., and held an evening meeting at the court-house. On the 21st, they set out in a westerly direction, traversing roads of the worst description, over which their progress was slow, and the difficulties of the way made it very fatiguing to the horses. Having gone forward twelve miles, they entered on a mountain ridge, extending nine miles toward the Ohio River. Keeping along the summit for some distance, and then descending the mountain, they came to a rapidly-flowing stream full of water, which had to be forded five times, the first mile following its course. This was a sparsely settled region, mostly covered with forest, and presented a dreary appearance in the dull November day. The skies that had been threatening, began to grow thick with a gathering storm. Night, too, was approaching, and no house anywhere in sight,—the nearest one some miles away. It soon became so dark they could neither see the path nor anything else. It was necessary to call out continually, to be assured of each other's safety, and as to keeping in the way, they trusted to the sagacity of their horses. The perplexity and danger of still being obliged to cross the stream under such circumstances, greatly increased their anxiety. Then to add to their discomfort and dread, the rain began to pour in torrents. For a while it seemed to them that no lodging place could be reached that night, though the consequences of such exposure would be serious, if not fatal, to them. At last to their great joy, they beheld a bright light at a window, streaming out into the darkness. Drawing near they called for assistance, which was readily afforded, a man being sent on horseback to guide them to a point a mile ahead, where they could be suitably accommodated.

¹ In a foot-note, Dr. Trueblood mentions the case of Van der Ver, "whose recent heroic refusal to do military service Tolstoy has preserved for all time," and adds that he "is only one of an increasing body of young men in Europe whose example would be much more contagious than it is if their conduct were not so carefully kept by the authorities from the knowledge of the public. One of the leading lawyers of Brussels, a Belgian Senator, told the writer in 1894 that what is needed more than anything else in Europe to-day, to break down the tyranny of militarism, is a large body of men who will refuse to do military service of any kind."

To get there they waded their horses into the creek and followed it, until it spread out into a mill pond, which the high water made it dangerous to cross. On account of the darkness they had much ado to keep to the directions of their guide and avoid the deeper places that threatened to engulf both horse and rider. At last the opposite bank was gained, and they found themselves at the house of Colonel David Shepherd, near Fort Henry. Perhaps no benighted travelers ever welcomed with more satisfaction the prospect of warmth, shelter, entertainment, and rest for the night, chilled and drenched as they were by the rain. Once inside the Colonel's residence, and the door closed upon the gloom and storm without, they felt a sense of relief, and were truly thankful for their preservation. The generous hospitality of their host and his kind-hearted wife, raised their drooping spirits, while the great blazing logs in the capacious fire-place, sent out a heat that soon dried their clothes and enabled them to partake of the evening repast. After this they retired for repose, and arose next morning greatly refreshed. This place, twelve years before their visit, had been the scene of an Indian attack. David Shepherd was commandant in the fort at the time. He and eleven men defended it against 400 Indians, and endured the terrors of a two days' siege. The Indians abandoned the siege before a reinforcing party bringing assistance to the fort.

The Friends, in company with Colonel Shepherd, rode to the mouth of Wheeling Creek, having sent a messenger before them to inform of their desire to have a meeting at Ebenezer Zane's. They found high water would prevent many from being present. However, it was concluded to hold the meeting. A number of emigrants for Kentucky, waiting an opportunity to go down the river, attended it and were quite. They lodged at Ebenezer Zane's. He, with Silas and Jonathan Zane made the first opening in the woods here in 1770, (where the city of Wheeling now stands). The next morning, the 23, through some carelessness, their horses were missing. Men on foot and horseback took different directions through the woods, but returned unsuccessful in finding them. Peter went out soon after, and met the horses coming toward him.

Peter Yarnall was, in a short time, ready to depart, but not feeling clear, he proposed having a religious opportunity with the family, so sitting down together with one of Ebenezer's daughters who lived on the west side of the Ohio, and was here on a visit, and a neighbor woman, they were favored with a season of Divine refreshment, and parted in much love. Looking across the river they beheld a vast wooded wilderness constituting the eastern portion of the Northwest Territory. In this wild region two settlements had been made the year preceding their visit,—one at Marietta and the other at Columbia, five miles above the present city of Cincinnati. The first attempt to establish homes beyond the Ohio river by the Americans, was made by four families from Redstone, Pa., in 1785, on the site of Portsmouth, but was shortly abandoned from fear of the Indians. An extract from Peter Yarnall's Journal, says: "We returned with the Colonel, and accepted his invitation to tarry with him another night, as good quarters were scarce in this part of the country. He took us a nearer way to his house, so as to escape the deep, miry road; but had to cross a deep water, and over a mountain so steep that we all had to alight from our horses and climb up, in doing which I had to hold by the saplings to assist me. Here the Colonel showed us where the Indians made a pen to secure the horses taken from the white inhabitants—also some curious marks I took to be descriptive of their nation, and the number of prisoners and scalps they had obtained. Yesterday as we went down, we overtook a delicate woman on horseback, who had fallen from her horse into the deep mire, so that she could not get out without help. She was assisted and placed upon her horse. I pitied the woman much, as also her infant, which she had in her arms. She bore it without complaint, though she appeared very solicitous about her child, as there was no fire near."

(Conclusion to follow.)

"THE AMERICAN COLONY" IN JERUSALEM.

T. E. Egerton Shore, in "The Christian Guardian," Toronto, Canada.

THE traveler visiting the Holy Land is frequently overcome by a depression of spirit, brought on by the keen disappointment he feels in the evidences of the demoralized condition of Christianity, especially in Bethlehem and Jerusalem, the birth-place and sepulchre of our Lord Jesus Christ.

Christianity is well represented from the point of view of numbers and variety of creeds. Protestants, Roman Catholics, Greek Catholics, Armenians, Abyssinians, Copts, and Syrians all have their churches where they worship the same God, and adore the same Christ. But who shall explain the pharisaic formalism that governs their service, and the barbarous strife that rules in their relations one with the other? They hate one another with bitterness of heart, and do not hesitate to manifest it when opportunity occurs. Some years ago four monks were killed in the church of the Nativity in Bethlehem, in a riot between the priests of two rival churches, so that to-day, within that temple, built over the birth-place of the Prince of Peace, two armed Mohammedan sentinels continually stand, as a means of mediation between the warring factions of the church. In Jerusalem it is still worse, where, on Easter Sunday, the Church of the Holy Sepulchre has to be guarded by a line of a thousand Turkish soldiers, to keep the rival Christians at peace.

But from the background of gloomy confusion, among the churches of Jerusalem, there stands out one of the most beautiful pictures of Christianity I have ever seen. Unknown to most travelers, there is, in a part of the "New Jerusalem," outside the walls, a quiet colony of a hundred and thirty people, mostly Americans, who live together there as a religious community or large Christian family. I shall never forget the first time we learned about this "American colony," as it is called. Our dragoman brought us to their house, to get from its house-top the finest panoramic view that can be obtained of Jerusalem. We were met at the door by Miss Spafford, one of the leading members of the "family," a most talented young lady, with a beautiful Christian spirit. When we descended from the house-top, where we had enjoyed the delight of beholding all the points of interest in and about Jerusalem, we were invited into the parlor, where the kindness of our hostess had provided us with a lunch and cup of tea; and we were inspired, as well as entertained, by the story of the American colony of Jerusalem. A few points on their life and work are all that can be mentioned in this brief reference.

About twenty years ago the late H. G. Spafford, who wrote that beautiful hymn,—

"When peace, like a river, attendeth my way," took his wife and child on a pilgrimage to the Holy Land. There they settled down with the object of being near the scenes of Christ's life, and of following in the footsteps of his daily living and self-sacrifice among the people of that land. It was not a missionary enterprise in the usual sense of that term. They preached more with their lives than with their tongues, and they gradually gathered about them an increasing family, composed of men, women, and children of all nationalities, mostly Americans, and a few Canadians. They all speak English, and some are proficient in many languages. They live simply as one family, and it was interesting to see them all gathered together in one dining-room, upon an occasion when I was a guest at the home. They live in perfect peace and harmony, not even the children being seen to quarrel or show an unkindly spirit. A quiet calm pervades the household, and yet they are full of happiness and joy. This is the testimony of all who know them. It is marvelous that so many people of diverse dispositions and different nationalities can preserve such perpetual peace. They have various industrial occupations, both in the general business of the city, and in the work within the colony itself. It is a hive of industry. They have a farm and various kinds of factories. Everybody has something to do suitable to his or her ability and disposition. They have a common purse. Nobody is rich and nobody is poor. There is no special attempt at organization. There is no recognized head or leader. All are possessed with the spirit of that inquiry, so familiar to us all of late, "What would Jesus do?" and, having, upon uniting with the family, made a full and complete consecration of all their powers and persons to Christ, they make no hesitation in at once responding to the call of need. They help one another to self-sacrifice and to service.

To the outside world their relation is one that tells mightily for good. While the sects, mentioned above, receive only the contempt of Mohammedan and Jew, these Christians receive their constant respect and love. We said that they build no churches and do no preaching. This might easily be misunderstood. They are continually going about doing good, visiting the sick of the city, distributing to the wants of the poor, and everywhere showing forth Christ by their lives of sacrifice and love. They also open their large home to the people, and all are treated alike, hospitably and kindly. As a result, scarcely a day passes without numbers of Mohammedans and Jews visiting them, to learn of the way, attracted by the persuasive power of their gentle lives. ("And I, if I be lifted up, will draw all men unto me.") Some of these have been received into their family, and none could fail to have been blessed by the Christian intercourse of the home. Every one is welcomed to their family worship each day, and to their service on Sunday afternoons.

I spent one evening in their home, in company with a dozen of the leading Turkish officials of State, including the Minister of the Treasury, Minister of Education, and others of high rank, as well as about twenty visiting Jews. I learned that the Minister of Education, a Mohammedan, visits the colony almost every day, and is learning much from them about the true way of Christ. Miss Spafford is the principal of the Government school, and others of the colony are teachers under her. This is a remarkable evidence of the confidence which the Mohammedans place in these people.

The Mohammedans call the home of the colony by the name, "The House of the Peace of God," referring to the harmony which always prevails among the members. One of the former governors of Jerusalem, a man who was noted as the most bigoted Mohammedan governor Judea ever had, used to visit the colony occasionally; and was so much impressed by the lives of these Christians in contrast with the bigotry and hatred of the sects, that he was led to say, just before leaving Jerusalem, "If all Christians lived like you do, I would be a Christian to-day." What a testimony that was to the power of practical Christianity! What a rebuke it was to the weakness of mere professional Christianity!

It was Jerusalem—the place where Jesus walked and talked with men in days gone by. I thought how I had often, in my life, longed to see Christ. I had just been a day or two before in Bethlehem, the place of his incarnation, but there I saw only the swaddling clothes of his power in the formal worship of the priests. I had gone over the road to Emmaus, but I heard not his voice by the way. It was only the meaningless chant of the Latin monks. I had been up and down the streets of Jerusalem, I had visited the tomb, but nowhere could I see him whom my heart worshipped and loved. How I would have fallen at his feet, if I could have but seen his face, or touched even the hem of his garment! At last, it came to me as I watched the lives of that little Christian colony, and listened to their conversation, and drank in some of the spirit of their love,—is not this the Christ? Is not Jesus here incarnated in the words and lives of these children of God? Christ is living still. He has returned to Jerusalem, and has set up his kingdom in the hearts of these people who dwell in the "House of the Peace of God." That place will ever be sacred in my memory, for there, in the quiet of those holy Christ-like lives, I met with Jesus, and conversed with the Spirit of my Lord.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

NO. 12.—THIRD MONTH 19.

JOSEPH.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thy heart.—Leviticus, xix., 17.

Scripture Reading, Genesis, xiv.

THE invasion of Egypt by the Semites, mentioned in the last lesson, was no light matter. Lower Egypt fell, apparently without a struggle, and was swept with the besom of destruction. Houses, temples, tombs were ruthlessly demolished, and the people were put to the sword or enslaved. The Delta and the Fayoum became subject to the invaders; the upper Nile valley escaped desolation, but was forced to pay tribute. After the period of rapine and plunder immediately following the conquest, the country gradually settled into peace again. A leader among the invading Semites, stronger than the others, founded what is known as the Sixteenth Dynasty. As has so often been the case in later times, the invaders after conquering the people, were themselves conquered by the surroundings. The ancient customs and ideas of Egypt, borne back for a time by the blast of war, closed in about the victors like an atmosphere forcing them more and more into the old ways. The gods of the victors took up their abode in the places of the Gods of the vanquished, and by degrees came to be more and more identified with them.

The story of Joseph must be assigned to the time of this dynasty of the Hyksos or shepherd kings. The particular king who received him and under whom he held office is a matter of some disagreement, but most authorities accept the fifth of the line, Apepi by name, as most probable. This would fix the date at about 1800 B. C. The elevation of Joseph to be prime minister can be easily understood when we realize that the king himself was a Semite and a foreigner. A similar incident is known concerning a Semite king in Egypt at a later time. There served under the so-called "heretic king" Khu-n-Aten, whose mother and grandmother were Babylonians, a minister with a name distinctly Semitic.

Although Egypt was a land of abundance, yet famines are not unknown there. In the eleventh and again in the twelfth century of our era, terrible catastrophes of this kind occurred. The first, like the one told of in the Bible, lasted for seven years. They were due to the failure of the Nile to overflow, because of deficiency of rainfall in Abyssinia and the upper Nile. But there has been brought to light also an account of a famine of several years' duration, which occurred about the time of Apepi and Joseph. It is contained in an inscription at El Kab in the grave of a certain Baba. On the walls of the tomb are records of the good deeds of its owner. Among them it is stated that when a famine arose lasting many years, he issued corn to the city for each year of the famine. This tomb is in the south of Egypt; but as all Egypt depends upon the Nile for irrigation, a famine in the south would indicate a famine in the north also. The further inscriptions serve to fix the time, and such seasons of scarcity are so rare that it seems probable that this one is identical with that told of in Genesis.

It is not necessary to take up in detail the narrative of the family of Jacob, the sale of Joseph to the Egyptians, his servitude, and his exaltation. That part of the story which deals with the current life of the Hebrew family gives us a vivid glimpse of nomadic existence. The older brothers wander far and wide from the dwelling-place of their father, guiding their flocks and herds to this valley or that hill-slope, wherever the scanty mountain verdure gives promise of a few days' sustenance. The boy Joseph is sent for news of them. He follows from place to place until he finds them, when the envious plot against him is conceived and executed. The whole is a picture of half-wild life, which helps us to comprehension of the conditions of the Hebrews in the age of the patriarchs. The further history of the career of Joseph "evinces a close acquaintance with Egyptian affairs and customs; . . . the Egyptian element in the narrative cannot be mere literary coloring. It must belong to the core of the narrative. This points out a comparatively high antiquity and testifies to the existence of an ancient tradition, dating as far back as the Egyptian period itself." (Kittel: "History of the Hebrews.") This fact does not prove that the tale is substantial history, but does certainly give support to its general credibility. Tradition, however, has always a tendency to attract to itself and to centre on its hero contemporary stories which will heighten its interest and its vividness. There is reason to believe that this process has taken place in the tradition of Joseph. The story of his temptation by his master's wife is almost identical with an ancient Egyptian tale, known as "The Story of Two Brothers." It is hardly likely that this tale, which is certainly as old as the Exodus, and it is therefore much older than the written account in Genesis, is wholly independent of the latter. "The part played by dreams in the history of Joseph seems Egyptian rather than Palestinian," (Sayce) though dreams have been considered prophetic at many times and among many peoples.

We are told that Joseph was "set over all the land of Egypt," that he was given a special title (Genesis, xii., 45) which means "Revealer of Secrets," and that he married the daughter of the priest of On. On is Heliopolis, the city of the great temple to the sun god. It is situated on the east side of the Delta, not far from the land of Goshen, afterward occupied by the Hebrews.

There is no Egyptian record of the change in the land tenure said to have been made by Joseph at the time of famine. There is, however, some evidence that such a change occurred. In the early days of the monarchy the country was in the hands of the great feudal lords, over whom the Pharaohs at times held merely nominal sway. They inherited their estates and power; the land belonged to them absolutely." (Sayce: "Higher Criticism and the Monuments.") After the Hyksos dynasty, this feudal tenure is wholly lost. The Pharaoh is absolute lord of the lives and property of his subjects, excepting only those of the priests and the soldiers. We have no certain means of knowing that this change is the one told of in the Bible story of the famine; but there need be no special difficulty in connecting them. Laying aside the historical features of the narrative, the special beauty of it is in the magnanimity of Joseph. The kindly trick by which he discovers the changed nature of his brothers (chaps. xii., xiii., xiv.), and the affection that breaks forth after he finds them true (chap. xv.), show a loving disposition and a forgiving nature. It is worth while to note again at this point the essentially moral nature of the Bible story. We are in the presence of Pharaoh, the great monarch of Egypt; but the narrator is not drawn aside. The wonders of the Nile country are round about us; but the Hebrew writer thinks not of them. On the other hand, he dwells at length on every point in the relation which emphasizes filial piety, generosity, and brotherly love. The moral relations of men are the central features; their political relations are secondary. Though the environment is Egyptian, the ideals are distinctly Hebrew.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 12.—THIRD MONTH 19.

THE GOOD SHEPHERD.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The good shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep.—John, x., 11.

Read the Scripture, John, x., 1-16.

REVISED VERSION.

THE healing of the blind man, with the debate among the Pharisees which it caused, occupies the whole of the ninth chapter of John. The present lesson is the beginning of the tenth chapter, and therefore follows directly. The time is immediately after that of the last lesson, and the place the same, Jerusalem.

The relation of shepherd and flock was, of course, one familiar to the experience of the people of Palestine. They had been pastoral for a long period of time. The parable spoken by Jesus in this form would appeal strongly to his hearers.

Throughout the Old Testament God is spoken of in many places as the Shepherd who would gather and care for his sheep. Thus, in Isaiah, (xl., 11): "He shall feed his flock like a shepherd, he shall gather the lambs in his arms, and carry them in his bosom, and shall gently lead those that give suck."

Again, in Ezekiel, nearly the whole of the 34th chapter is his passionate prophecy of the restoration of the Children of Israel, and many of the passages are very beautiful,—for example, verse 12: "As a shepherd seeketh out his flock in the day that he is among his sheep that are scattered abroad, so will I seek out my sheep; and I will deliver them out of all places whither they have been scattered in the cloudy and dark day."

There is, indeed, no other figure more fit or more beautiful, as we speak of the goodness of God, or the relation of his Son to the human family, than this of the Good Shepherd, and none, perhaps, is so continually and so effectively employed. The love and the care which the shepherd must manifest are qualities which we ascribe to our Heavenly Father. "I know not," says Whittier,

"I know not where his islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond his love and care."

The unremitting guardianship, the patient effort, the noble self-sacrifice of the true shepherd of the flock, are qualities which Jesus preëminently displayed. In this parable he presents in many striking ways the lesson he was teaching. He that entereth the fold not by the door—the open, the natural, the right way of entrance—such a one must have some wrong motive. The just and the peaceable, coming with love in their heart, will attempt no secret entrance; they will come openly to the door, confident in the sincerity of their purpose. But above all others he that entereth the door is the shepherd himself. He has the right to enter; the porter opens the door to him; the flock hear his voice, and know it, and follow him out. They will not follow a stranger.

In the further development of the lesson (verse 8), it is probable that Jesus referred to those who had professed to be spiritual teachers, and religious leaders, just preceding his advent,—the "false Messiahs" of the time. Elsewhere (Matthew, vii., 15) he warned against false prophets, wolves in sheep's clothing, though these, apparently, were to appear later. The thief cometh not, he proceeded, in the parable we are studying, but that he may steal, and kill, and destroy, but I come, he declared, that they—the sheep of the flock of the Christ—may have life, and may have it abundantly. In that life which is of the Spirit of God, which dwelt in Jesus, and by him was manifested to the world, we may indeed live "abundantly" and through all time.

Verse 11, and the two (17 and 18) that follow the scripture assigned for this lesson, deserve special consideration. Jesus says the good Shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep. He adds, in the later verses, "therefore doth the Father love me, because I lay down my life, that I may take it again," and, "No one taketh it away from me, but I lay it down of myself. I have power to lay it down, and I have power to take it again." The plain import of these passages, as we study them in connection with those preceding, is the devotion of the shepherd to his flock; his watch over them and guardianship of them, even at the cost of his life; and the voluntary sacrifice which he would make of himself. The thought here is altogether different from that of a "sacrificial offering" to appease the wrath of some deity, and the language employed by Jesus raises the subject into the atmosphere, not only of a different, but of a higher and purer religion—such as Christianity is, compared with what preceded it.

Finally, in the last verse of the lesson (16), there is an interesting and impressive statement. "Other sheep I have," he declared; they are "not of this fold;" them also must he bring; they should hear his voice; "and they shall become one flock," under one shepherd. What is the thought here, but that the flock which Christianity would gather would embrace other peoples than those who then heard him speak, other countries than the little strip along the eastern coast of the Mediterranean Sea? It was not only to Jews, but to Gentiles, that he addressed himself. Such is the great truth of the Christian life. It embraces all. "For in one spirit," says Paul (I. Corinthians, xii., 13), "were we all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free." And again, when we have put off evil things, we come, he declared (Colossians, iii., 11), "where there cannot be Greek and Jew, circumcision and uncircumcision, barbarian, Scythian, bondman, freeman; but Christ [the Divine Spirit] is all and in all."

TWO VOICES FROM THE PAST.

WILLIAM PENN.

[From Bancroft's History of the United States.]

THIS is the praise of William Penn, that in an age which had seen a popular revolution shipwreck popular liberty among selfish factions; which had seen Hugh Peters and Henry Vane perish by the hangman's cord and the axe; in an age when Sidney nourished the pride of patriotism rather than the sentiment of philanthropy; when Russell stood for the liberties of his order, and not for new enfranchisements; when Harrington and Shaftesbury and Locke thought that government should rest on property, Penn did not despair of humanity, and though all history and experience denied the sovereignty of the people, dared to cherish the noble idea of man's capacity for self-government. Conscious that there was no room for its exercise in England, the pure enthusiast, like Calvin and Descartes, a voluntary exile, was come to the banks of the Delaware to institute "THE HOLY EXPERIMENT."

ABRAHAM LINCOLN.

[From his speech at Lewiston, Maine, 1858.]

THE Fathers who created the Republic . . . grasped not only the whole race of man then living but they reached forward and seized upon the furthest posterity. They erected a beacon to guide their children and their children's children, and the countless myriads who should inhabit the earth in other ages. Wise statesmen as they were, they knew the tendency of prosperity to breed tyrants, and so they established these great self-evident truths, that when in the distant future some man, some faction, some interest, should set up the doctrine that none but rich men, or none but white men, or none but Anglo-Saxon white men, were entitled to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, their posterity might look up again to the Declaration of Independence and take courage to renew the battle which their fathers began, so that truth and justice and mercy and all the humane and Christian virtues might not be extinguished from the land—so that no man should thereafter dare to limit and circumscribe the principles on which the temple of liberty was being built. Now, my countrymen, if you have been taught doctrines conflicting . . . with the Declaration of Independence, if you have listened to suggestions which would take away from its grandeur and mutilate the fair symmetry of its proportions, . . . let me entreat you to come back.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

CHEERFULNESS.

READING with much interest, "The Power of Cheerfulness," in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER of the 18th inst., I felt like writing a word or two on the subject, for it is a true and beautiful selection, and one for us to glean some lessons from.

Life is, I know, filled with much that is sad and hard to bear, but it has many gleams of hope and joy mingled with it, and for others' sake let us try be cheerful in this earthly lot our Father has placed us in. Let us keep our hearts young, and have charity with those who do not see just as we do, and not let the cobwebs of custom blind us, and wish to keep others in the beaten track we think right. Sometimes old people forget they were ever young themselves, and make life unhappy for their children.

Some of the brightest characters I remember were those who were cheerful, interested in the welfare of both young and old, and so kept their hearts loving and bright. Among these were Mary Jane Field, Esther Haviland, and Mary K. Carpenter.

While at boarding-school in Pennsylvania, long years ago, in a box sent at Christmas from home was a number of dainties from Mary Jane Field. Her thoughtfulness seemed to me so lovely; and it made my heart more light to feel some one remembered me that was in no way related. I think the key-note to many lives which have passed from among us is not that their yoke was more easy than others, but they put self to one side, and crowded into the years that are permitted any of us here all the sunshine and gladness for others possible, knowing that in God's own time they would lay aside the cross which was heavy, but in that other city they would wear the crown.

In a book I read not long ago, a piece entitled "For My Sake," impressed me, and I copy a little of it here:

"For my sake' let the harsh word die unuttered
That trembles on the swift, impetuous tongue,
'For my sake,' check the rebellious feeling
That rises when thy brother does thee wrong.

"For my sake,' press with steadfast patience onward,
Although the race be hard, the battle long;
Within my Father's house are many mansions;
There thou shalt rest and join the victor's song."

Pleasantville, N. Y.

LIZZIE J. HALL.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 11, 1899.

THE RIGHTS OF MAN.

THE essence of the Christian religion, man-ward, is its recognition of the rights of man. Christianity is a democracy. Its name has been used to promote opposite and hostile conditions, but in every instance this has been an abuse of the Christ name, and a defiance of the Christ principle. The teaching of the Master is that of recognizing, and regarding, and well-treating the humblest as well as the most exalted.

These, of course, are primary propositions,—“horn-book” facts, as lawyers might say. But however primary, they need continually to be recalled. It is such principles, such abiding and imperishable aspects of truth, that must be our guiding and directing rule of life. It is our duty to recur to them, to ask daily of ourselves whether we are conforming to the great principles that should underlie conduct, or whether we are led away after “Lo, here,” and “Lo, there,” departing thus from the only true way.

The common origin of man, the common tie of mankind, the love which, as we believe, the Creator bears equally for all, gives to each and every one of the human family his “rights.” When the assembled Congress, at Philadelphia, in the year 1776, appealed to the world with its Declaration that all men are born equal, and are endowed with certain inalienable rights, among which—for it was not attempted to make a full list—are the enjoyment of life, the possession of liberty, and the opportunity to pursue happiness, this Declaration stirred the nations, and was then, as it has been since, a beacon-light, which gave hope and encouragement to millions of oppressed, and yet it was only a new, and under the circumstances bold, restatement of truth as old as the history of intelligent and responsible men.

With such native, inborn, indefeasible rights of men no concerned and real Christian can or will interfere. He respects them as the gift of the All-Father. He knows that his own rights rest upon the same basis as the rights of every other child of the one Parent, and are noway superior or different. He does not, of course, rest his case on the Declaration of 1776, though he is grateful to those who uttered that famous testimony, and he honors the moral courage, the loftiness of mind, which prompted it; he stands upon the truth of that ordering which has made all the children of the One-Father alike in his sight.

Keeping close to principle, to essential truth, we shall not be misled by specious and fallacious suggestions. We shall not think that human rights depend upon education,—as if a college diploma alone conferred the right to life, liberty, and happiness; nor upon wealth, or “culture,” or “civilization,” or any other external circumstance. Those rights are inborn. They are derived from God. They are indefeasible. However they may be assailed, they still survive. No truth is plainer to us than the triumph of those martyrs who perished for His sake. Nothing is more evident than the final failure of the assault which cupidity and bigotry have made so many times upon human rights, and which seemed for a time to triumph.

CONSIDERABLE material for the paper, which we would have been glad to insert this week, came in the mail of Third-day, and has had to lie over to next week.

AMONG the speakers announced at the series of public meetings in Boston, in behalf of the Disarmament Congress, is Dr. Lyman Abbott, and those who have been discouraged with the Outlook's general backsliding will be glad to see this evidence of his interest in the right direction.

BIRTHS.

NICHOLS.—At Perryville, Cecil county, Md., Second month 22, 1899, to Ellwood and Rebecca S. Nichols, a son, who is named Wilmer E.

NOBLE.—At their residence, 495 Ninth Street, Brooklyn, N. Y., Second month 24, 1899, to Franklin and Marianna H. Noble, a daughter, who is named Emily Lucile.

WALTER.—At Wallingford, Pa., Third month 1, 1899, to William E. and Caroline Sargent Walter, a son, who is named David Sargent Walter.

WEBSTER.—At Mankato, Minnesota, First month 12, 1899, to Dr. I. D. and Anna Jenkins Webster, a son, who has been named Alan King Webster.

MARRIAGES.

DECOU—HENDRICKSON.—At the home of the bride's parents, Morrisville, Pa., Second month 23, 1899, under the care of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting, N. J., Rebecca S., daughter of Mahlon K. and Rachel H. Hendrickson, and Joseph DeCou, of Trenton Junction, N. J.

HAINES—KINNARD.—At the residence of the bride's parents, Pendleton, Ind., Second month 21, 1899, under the care of Fall Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends, Edward V., son of Noah C. and Mary Haines, and Elizabeth C., daughter of William R. and Mary F. Kinnard.

SAURMAN—WOOD.—At the residence of the bride's parents, near Byberry Road Station, Moreland, Montgomery county, Pa., Fourth-day, Second month 15, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Stanley W. Saurman, of Bustleton, and Anna M., daughter of Joseph and Anna M. Wood.

DEATHS.

ASH.—At her residence, near Lansdowne, Pa., Third month 3, 1899, Elizabeth B., widow of George W. Ash, aged 95 years.

CAPRON.—At her residence, White Plains, N. Y., Second month 25, 1899, Jane E. Capron, widow of Jacob Capron, in her 64th year; a member and elder of New York Monthly Meeting.

After a week's illness this dear Friend was taken from the busy scene of life to dwell in the world beyond. Her life gave evidence of a preparation for death, being of a genial nature, manifesting nothing but kindness to every one. Even the dumb animals and birds were objects of her care.

She leaves three children, besides a large circle of friends, to remember her as she was in life, but who will sadly miss her presence and loving service. Her funeral was held at Friends' meeting-house, 15th street, New York City, and the casket containing the mortal part of our sister was taken to Friends' cemetery, Prospect Park, Brooklyn, to be laid beside her husband.

B.

COLEMAN.—At Bedford, Calhoun county, Mich., First month 24, 1899, of paralysis, Alexander Coleman, aged 81 years; for several years an elder of Rochester, N. Y., Monthly Meeting of Friends.

He leaves an aged wife and one son at Bedford.

GARRETSON.—Suddenly, of heart disease, at their home, Flora Dale, Adams county, Pa., Second month 20, 1899, Hannah Ann, wife of Joel V. Garretson, in the 67th year of her age.

Interment was made in Friends' burial ground at the Menallen meeting-house, on Fifth-day afternoon, the 23d. Testimonies were borne by Isaac Wilson of Bloomfield, Canada, Hiram Griest, and Elizabeth M. Koser.

Her parents were Eli and the late Phebe Cookson, who were members of our Religious Society, at Warrington, York county, Pa. She was a person of many valuable traits of character, and mother of ten children, eight of whom, three sons and five daughters, with her husband, survive to mourn her loss.

*

HAINES.—At Tucson, Arizona, Second month 24, 1899, Dr. Franklin R. Haines, son of Harriet T. and the late Richard R. Haines, aged 30 years; grandson of the late Edward Townsend, of Philadelphia.

Interment from his uncle's, Benjamin R. Lamb, Mount Holly, N. J.

JANNEY.—Third month 2, 1899, of pneumonia, Elizabeth T., daughter of the late Joseph and Mary Ann Janney, a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. Interment at Newtown, Pa.

KAIGHN.—At Germantown, Philadelphia, Third month 3, 1899, Hannah E., widow of James E. Kaighn, in her 89th year.

MOORE.—At Friends' Boarding Home, Norristown, Pa., Second month 27, 1899, Mary T., widow of Mordecai R. Moore.

Interment at Valley Friends' ground.

PLATT.—In Norristown, Pa., Second month 24, 1899, Elizabeth S., wife of James A. Platt.

Interment at Darby Friends' ground.

ROGERS.—At Crosswicks, N. J., First month 18, 1899, Rebecca Rogers, on her 94th birthday.

She was a life-long member of the Society of Friends, and for many years an elder of Chesterfield Monthly Meeting. Her declining health the past few years prevented her from attending meeting, which was a great trial to her.

She was of a loving, generous nature; her trials in life she accepted submissively. "Not my will, but thine, O Father," seemed to be her great strength.

But as was said by a dear friend present at her burial, "I will not speak in eulogy of her, she has written it herself in the hearts of all that knew her; words of mine would be but empty sounds in comparison with what is there."

*

TITUS.—At his residence, Westbury, Long Island, Second month 15, 1899, Charles F. Titus, in the 84th year of his age.

He was for many years an overseer and elder of Westbury Monthly Meeting; faithful and diligent in his attendance of all meetings, and an exemplary member. The closing of this long and well-spent life was peaceful and beautiful. He retired to rest in apparently his usual health, to awake in one of those "mansions" which are prepared for those who do His will.

JOHN H. DUDLEY.

On the 20th of Second month, 1899, John H. Dudley ended a long and useful life at his residence in Mount Laurel township, Burlington county, New Jersey. He was an elder brother of the late Thomas H. Dudley, whose relations with our Government as United States Consul to Liverpool, in the Administration of President Lincoln, have passed into history.

John H. Dudley was born in Evesham, now Mount Laurel township, in the year 1812. His mother was early left a widow with four small children, and the eldest son being very delicate, the burden of managing the farm and helping his mother support the family fell upon the subject of this notice. Being blessed with a good constitution and industrious habits, he mainly supported his mother and her family for a number of years, and helped to place them beyond the reach of want. Acquiring what education he could from the schools in the vicinity, and gaining much from books and observation, he soon became a useful and valuable man in the neighborhood. Born a member of the Society of Friends, he was firmly attached to its principles, and during his whole life was a regular attender of meeting, believing in the Divine manifestations of the Inward Light, and conforming in plainness of speech, behavior, and apparel.

In 1835, he married Hannah Ann Glover, a member of the Society of Friends, and one every way suited to be his companion through life. He settled on a farm not far from his birthplace and here, with little means to start, became a large land-holder, by thrift and industry. Two sons and two daughters survive him. In his early years he was identified with the affairs of his township, and foremost in the public improvements in his neighborhood.

Being an elder in the Society of Friends, he frequently traveled in company with other Friends on religious visits, and became widely known. During the Administration of President Grant he was one of the Committee appointed by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting to visit some of the tribes of Western Indians, and performed his mission in a satisfactory manner. He was forcibly impressed with the injustice the Indians had suffered at the hands of the white man, and expressed his regret at the Red Man's melancholy decay. But it cheered his heart to find that a tradition still existed among the tribes of the just treatment the Indians once received from the Society of Friends, and that a reverence was still felt for the great White Chief, William Penn. Returning from his Indian Mission, John H. Dudley kindly entertained his friends with an account of his experience of Western life.

As the years passed on, his faithful wife gradually declined in health, and after a time passed away. His own daughters having married and gone, a son with his wife moved back to the old homestead, and a daughter-in-law ministered to him in his last days with a faithfulness rarely equalled. As the infirmities of age and disease began to tell upon him, he would sometimes be absent from meeting, but if his health at all permitted he was found in his accustomed seat. When the time came that this pleasant duty could not be fulfilled he submitted cheerfully, and kindly welcomed all his friends who came to his home to see him. Even in his last days he sometimes repeated beautiful verses of poetry he admired, showing his mind had sought and retained what was good. He was conscious to the very last, and as his family gathered around him just before his death, he said he had lived a long and happy life, and expressed a full belief that a brighter world awaited him beyond.

W. R. L.

ELIZABETH J. LEVICK.

[Deceased, Philadelphia, Second month 9, 1899.]

The early childhood of our dear deceased friend was notably marked for the simplicity, gentleness, and loveliness of her disposition. In mature life she was a dutiful daughter, affectionate sister, and steadfast friend. The life she lived was the outcome of a life hid in Christ; and the blessing proclaimed by her Saviour on the Mount is now hers, "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God," and she now stands in the presence of her dear Lord and Master, whom she so fully trusted and so faithfully served. Keeping the window of her soul open to the entrance of the Divine Life she was never in doubt to discern His silent teachings, and was ever ready to obey His call, and when the summons went forth, come up higher ; " Thou hast been faithful over a few things, I will make thee ruler over many ; enter thou into the joy of thy Lord," she was ready, and is now gathered with the great multitude clothed in white, standing before the Throne, and before the Lamb in the Heavenly City, the New Jerusalem. " Blessed are the dead who die in the Lord, from henceforth, yea saith the spirit, they may rest from their labors and their works do follow them." C.

SUSAN NIXON.

In Richmond, Indiana, Second month 17, 1899, at the residence of her brother-in-law, William Emmet Wilcox, Susan Nixon, in the 86th year of her age ; a member of Whitewater Monthly Meeting of Friends.

After a long life of much usefulness to others, this dear one has laid down her oars and entered into that rest prepared for such. Few have better filled their earthly mission with good deeds and faithful performance of duties that presented, to all around her ; a loving self-sacrifice cheerfully given to enhance the comfort and happiness of others rendered her very dear to those with whom she mingled.

A tender and devoted daughter to her aged parents, through all the years of their lives, nursing and caring for them unweariedly, until in advanced life they passed from her care into the Father's keeping, she seemed to have so little thought for herself and so highly appreciated the blessing of being able to wait upon herself, desiring not to add a burden to others, and yet so frail for many years it seemed impossible for her to linger on. The summons came slowly, and with only a few days' illness the imprisoned soul was gently released from its tenement of clay, leaving a smile upon the lips that seemed to tell of new-found joys within the paradise of God.

"So quietly she walked this earth
So calmly trod the isles of prayer,
That no uncertain sound went forth
Or lingered on the evening air.
She chose the quiet, humble way,
With true and firm endeavor ;
With loving deeds has won her way
Into God's arms forever."

And while we would not laud the creature, we feel such pure and good examples may be spoken of for the encouragement and help of others, inciting to greater care and watchfulness to keep our lamps trimmed and burning, so that when the call comes we may also be ready to pass into that rest prepared for the children of God. P.

THE PRESIDENT AND THE CONFERENCE.

[Personal letter from a public man.]

I AM not able to say what the President designs to do about the Disarmament Conference. It has been reported that he proposes to appoint the three ambassadors to England, France, and Germany as our representatives in the Conference. This is, however, only a rumor. They are organizing in Boston a series of Monday noon meetings, to promote public sentiment in support of the Conference. The first meeting is to be addressed to-day [6th], by Edward Everett Hale. It is proposed to continue these meetings during the months of March and April. There is talk of organizing similar meetings in New York, Baltimore, and other cities.

You ought by all means to have such a series of meetings in Philadelphia, addressed by the very ablest men you have. The movement in Boston is conducted as a citizens' movement. I hope when these meetings, and similar ones in other cities, get under full way, we may be able to induce a few men like Edward Everett Hale, William E. Dodge of New York, and others to go to The Hague, at the time of the Conference.

Of all the men in this country, I think ex-Senator Edmunds the most suitable person to send as an official delegate, but there is no chance of getting him appointed, I fear. The President is not likely to appoint any man who would interfere directly with the present plan of military and naval extension.

VISITS TO FRIENDS IN NEW JERSEY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

ON the 25th of Second month my wife and myself left Baltimore to carry out part of our concern, in accordance with a minute granted us, heretofore noticed in the INTELLIGENCER. We went directly to Moorestown, and were kindly entertained at the home of our friend William Dunn Rogers. On First-day morning we were at the meeting at Moorestown. Notice having been previously given, although the morning was stormy, a large company gathered. On rising to speak I became conscious of the presence of a spirit that was disposed to watch for some expression that could be criticised and used to misrepresent me, but I was enabled to rise above its influence, and to deliver the message given me. We dined at the home of William Dunn Rogers, and afterward went to call on the family of Abigail H. Sutton, whose funeral was to take place the next day. We found there our esteemed friend Robert S. Haviland. After a little time of social converse, and the expression of our sympathy, we left to take the cars for Mt. Holly, at which place we were kindly met by George H. Killé, and taken to the hospitable home of Charles H. Engle for our abode during the Quarter. It was expected that a number of friends of Mt. Holly would meet us in the evening, but it rained so fast that but few came, with whom we spent the time in pleasant social converse. Second-day morning we attended the quarterly meeting of ministers and elders, in which I found some words of encouragement opening up what I understood to be the origin and design of that meeting, and showing that it yet had its field of usefulness, drawing from my own experience that in which it had, and was still benefitting me. We arrived at the meeting-house, and after an hour or so of pleasant social commingling returned to the home of our host, to rest for the evening, at which time a meeting had been appointed. A large company gathered, to whom was opened the way to reach and the object of the perfected life. A deep and sweet solemnity rested on the meeting till its close.

On Third-day attended the quarterly meeting, which was larger than I had expected, considering the state of the roads. The testimony borne in this meeting, followed by that of R. S. Haviland, seemed to be appreciated, judging from expressions of satisfaction and warm greetings which were given. The business of the quarterly meeting was conducted in much harmony, and all felt it had been a precious meeting. Dining again at the meeting-house, and spending a couple of hours in social converse, gave us the opportunity of meeting and becoming acquainted with many who had hitherto been strangers. After which we went home with Priscilla H. Clothier, by whom we were pleasantly entertained until after dinner on Fourth-day, when George H. Killé came to take us to Old Springfield. Although this is usually a small meeting, quite a number gathered, for whom a little bread was broken, and the word of encouragement given, and the feeling expressed that if some of those who were present would be faithful to the call which had been made, there would be a revival of interest among them, and the spoken word would be required.

After meeting we went to the home of Franklin S. and Elizabeth Zelley, and some other friends coming in to spend the evening, we had an enjoyable social time until the afternoon of Fifth-day. After dinner, in the midst of a moderate rain, we set out for Crosswicks, making a ride by the route we traveled of some twelve miles, seven of which were quite muddy roads, but we arrived safely at the hospitable home of Edward and Mary Black, Eliza standing her ride much better than we had expected. In the evening, notwithstanding it continued to rain and was very dark, a large meeting gathered. The Methodist minister adjourned his prayer-meeting, and came with his members to the meeting, with a number of others of different persuasions, to whom a message from the teachings of Jesus concerning the character of the fruits our profession demanded us to bear, was given. At the close, the Methodist brother responded with a hearty amen. The feeling under which the meeting closed was precious, and testimonies were given privately of the encouragement it had afforded.

JOHN J. CORNELL.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—XI.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I BELIEVE our last letter closed on Sixth-day morning, (24th ultimo), with intimations of a full day in making some calls and visits. And while time or space does not admit the mention in detail of all we see and realize, yet we must acknowledge in some measure the lessons taught us by the experiences both of our own and other lives,—as when we sit, as we did this morning, by the bedside of one suffering so long (and many times severely) as does this dear friend, Jane Whitson, with years of rheumatic affliction, and yet the loving heart given only to enumerate the blessings enjoyed, among which was the care of husband and daughter, whose greatest desire seemed to be to arrange for her comfort.

We dined at Hiram Griest's, whose wife is also a patient invalid, but not such a sufferer. In the afternoon we called on several friends, and took tea and enjoyed a pleasant evening at Ruth Anna Wickersham's; then returned to Sunny Side.

Seventh-day. We dined with Alice Wright and daughter, the former not being able to get out to meeting. At 3 p. m. we joined the few Friends in the meeting of ministers and elders, and although few in number, a living spirit of inquiry was awakened, and the blessing to the few realized.

We then went to the pleasant and cheerful home of Zachariah Peters, for the evening, when a few other Friends came in, and social mingling of a religious character was enjoyed, and returned again to our resting place, feeling that while the week had been one of much going from place to place, the directing influence of the Divine had been experienced.

First-day, a. m. We wake to find the rain falling fast, and everything covered with ice, and feel that no doubt many will be prevented from the anticipated pleasure of the quarterly meeting. However, we are pleased to find an interesting company gathered, some coming a long distance through the rain, and expressing themselves well repaid, the only regret being that more could not have been there.

My kind friend Cyrus Griest accompanying me, we went to dine at Joel Garretson's, where two days before we had mingled with them in their sad bereavement. Feelings of sympathy and encouragement found utterance.

Then, although the rain is unabated, we must drive to Edward Tyson's, where we took tea before going to the evening meeting at Bendersville. We thought but few would come through the rain and sleet, but were surprised to find the seats nearly full, some driving several miles. Seldom have I realized a more favored meeting, being joined in the public service by our dear friend Martha Townsend, of Baltimore. The company was largely of young people, and the quiet and attentive waiting and listening gave evidence of more than ordinary interest.

At the close we found the rain abated, and made another short call at Jane Whitson's, who, although suffering so much and long, says she has her little meetings when her friends (who are many) come to see her. It seems good to be in her presence, but rest is needed and we return to the very pleasant home of Edward Tyson, where we enjoy our stay until meeting time on Second-day, and are pleased to find the weather more favorable, and a general attendance of members at the quarterly meeting, which was held to satisfaction, and closed under feelings of appreciation and thankfulness. After the many farewells we went to dine and enjoyed a few hours in the pleasant home of John Longstorf, then made a short call upon Elizabeth Koser, who had so unexpectedly been deprived of the quarterly meeting by an illness; we were glad to find her improving, and while regretting her privations, felt thankful that others had the privilege.

And now we return to the friends who have made so pleasant a home for me this week, the father (C. Griest) spending each day with horse and carriage calling on some aged and invalid Friends and visiting others, but returning at night to his home at Sunny Side. The sunlight of love makes it well worthy of its name, and enables its inmates to bear the great loss sustained so recently in the removal by death of a loving and devoted wife and mother, and Friend, whose influence can never die.

I must say farewell and take the train to Philadelphia. There I had to wait nearly an hour, and so arrived at Chester too late to get a car, and find the only way left is to walk to our friend C. Cutler's, which place was reached in safety. My wife had been spending a few days there during my absence. At nine on Third-day morning (28th), I again left for Wyoming, Del. (And just here I would urge the importance of information in regard to the change of day or hour of meetings being correctly stated in "Friends' Almanac," as in this case, I left much earlier than necessary, as the meeting of ministers and elders is on Fifth-day morning at 10 o'clock, instead of Fourth-day afternoon.) Arriving safely at noon, I found a welcome at Pemberton Emerson's, and although I could have remained at Chester through the day, I enjoyed the kindness of my host and hostess, who although unable to go out, sent me for a drive of several miles in the country. A stranger may soon see where Delaware peaches and pears come from by the many large orchards on all sides in this beautiful, level country, with soil so free from stone and easily tilled. But fears are entertained of the result of the extreme cold upon the fruit crop this year.

Fourth-day morning. I went to the old meeting-house at Camden, built in 1805, and bearing but little appearance of modern improvements. The graves of the fathers and mothers lie very near the house. Soon after we gathered into the quiet with the few Friends here. These words of Whittier came fresh to my mind—

"Our fathers sleep, but men remain
As good and true and brave as they."

and the importance of our faithfulness to the light was dwelt upon. After which the business of the quarterly meeting was transacted with a good degree of life.

We dined in company with some others at Emma Carroll's, then called upon some other Friends before taking train for Dover (three miles away), where a parlor meeting was arranged for the evening, and a very pleasant company of Friends and neighbors of other denominations being invited in. And if the expressions of satisfaction at the close were taken as evidence, it could but be called a profitable occasion. After a good night's rest in his pleasant home, our friend Daniel C. Cowgill took us three miles to Camden, to the meeting of ministers and elders, and although only elders were there (besides a visiting minister), and two or three Friends that were invited to sit with them, the spirit of enquiry relative to present needs was awakened, and we trust not in vain. The meeting closed, and we were pleased to find at the meeting-house a goodly number present, and the promise of the Divine presence in our midst was fully realized.

After dining and enjoying a short stay at John Hunn's, at Wyoming, I took train for Rising Sun, Maryland.

ISAAC WILSON.

Third month 2, 1899.

MAX NORDAU, author of the book on Degeneracy, is an earnest advocate of the "Zionist" movement of Jews to re-occupy Palestine, and is making a tour in Europe in that behalf. His first lecture, at Vienna, drew the largest audience ever gathered in that city. He described the bright future in store for the Jewish people once a Jewish state should be established in Palestine. He said the phlegmatic treatment of Zionism by wealthy Jews was principally due to the fact that they suffered but little by the increasing "anti-Semitic" sentiment on the continent of Europe.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

BLUE RIVER QUARTERLY MEETING

INCLEMENT weather, bad roads, sickness on the part of some, and a fear of the consequences of exposure by those who had been ailing, conspired to make the quarterly meeting held at Benjaminville, on the 24th, 25th, 26th, of Second month, very small indeed, the smallest I have ever known. There were but six Friends from other meetings. The meeting for ministers and elders was correspondingly small, also. In it we were reminded that the elders, although chosen from the body of the meeting to be the shepherds of the flock, could not be true elders by virtue of this choice only, but must be anointed by holy oil from the Divine Father to become rightly qualified to fill their mission. The qualification for ministers and elders proceeds from the same source.

While considering the Fourth query, the one that asks if ministers and elders are concerned to instruct their families in our principles and testimonies, one Friend remarked that whatever might be the situation at present, she feared that in the past there had been a remissness, which was one of the causes of the decline in numbers of our membership. Our fathers and mothers, having come out of bondage to the written word, went to the other extreme, depending solely upon the teaching of the Spirit in their children, ignoring the fact that God uses instrumentalities in all ages of the world; as a consequence the children were not instructed at all in our principles, but left to learn them as best they could, as the speaker could testify was only too true in her own case. More frequent conversation on these topics in the family circle would be beneficial.

The quarterly conference of First-day schools was held Sixth-day evening; also slimly attended. But two schools hold their sessions through the winter, and from only one of these was there a report. This one, however, was encouraging, showing a good average attendance throughout the present winter, notwithstanding so much severe weather.

Seventh-day was very unpleasant, with high winds, and some snow and rain; although the weather was so unpropitious, the meeting, even though so small, was very interesting, particularly during the consideration of queries, notably the one regarding tale-bearing and detraction, and the one on temperance. It was said that a good rule was to say nothing of a person, if we can not say good, even if the reverse be true, then there could be no tale-bearing or no detraction. In the meeting preceding that for business, the query was put, What are we met here for? Is it essential to come to this house to worship God? Do we come merely to hear the spoken word? God speaks to his children himself, as much and as plainly now, as at any time, consequently we can worship him at any time and in any place; yet he often uses instrumentalities, and in social worship, when the minds of the people are centred on good, they are in a fit condition to be fed, or ministered unto.

We reached our respective homes just as the rain commenced falling, and it continued during the afternoon, with much severity, and steadily, accompanied with a driving wind. These conditions made us thankful for a good shelter over our heads, and for entertaining company. Rain continued a great part of the night, and next morning the weather was still lowering; we saw that our friends got to meeting, but owing to indisposition the writer did not attend, and can give no account of it, save that it was a little larger than the day before, and was addressed by two or three speakers.

I am aware this is a very lame and unsatisfactory account of the meetings, which must be characterized as having been good, if they were small.

Holder, Ill.

E. H. COALE.

Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting will occur at Moorestown next week, 15th and 16th inst. Friends wishing to attend the meeting of ministers and elders, on Fourth-day, at 11 o'clock a. m., will take the train at foot of Market street, at 10 o'clock, a. m.; and for the general meeting, on Fifth-day, at 8.30 a. m., for East Moorestown.

John J. Cornell will have a meeting on Fourth-day evening, at 7.45, and will appoint one or more meetings after the quarter.

DEVELOPMENT AMONG INDIANS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

IN regard to the government and education of the people living on islands acquired by the United States, there are various propositions made. If the lands could be separated into States, each State composed of counties and townships, as the United States are, each State having a governor appointed by the President of the United States, a common school established in every township, teaching first the rudiments of an American education; in addition to this, teach practically farming, mechanical, and other work, that they may be self-supporting, and economical. Also, let them be taught how to properly fill positions for enforcing just laws in township, county, and towns or cities. Let none be promoted until they receive the highest merit for good deportment and excellence in studies.

When U. S. Grant was President of United States he requested the Society of Friends to select agents to go and aid in civilizing Indians; Jonathan Richards was one appointed for Indian Territory. He took with him his wife, who was an invalid, and her nurse, leaving them in Lawrence, Kansas, until he could make a suitable home, as when he arrived in the Indian country there was an old fort only, at Fort Sill, with a broken door crosswise the entrance. The Indians came and looked in and could say "ugh," "ugh," and some other of their own language. As soon as possible there was a comfortable home built, and the wife and her nurse came. In a short time another room was built separate from the house, and in it placed a stove and fire; there the two women took books and pictures and sat by the stove. The Indian children came and peeped in at the door, then ran away; they came again and were finally coaxed in to get warm, and were taught the name of our eye, ear, nose, mouth, fingers in our language, the children repeating the names also in Indian language. The pictures were shown and names in books. Soon a regular school was established there for them, in which reading, writing, drawing, arithmetic, geography were successfully taught, specimens of which I have in my possession. In eight years they improved rapidly, and many were advanced from this, and other agencies of Friends, to Carlisle and other Indian schools, where most of them passed examinations as creditably as our civilized students, although they had our language to learn.

At the Agency they were also taught farming, blacksmithing, wagon-building, to use a saw-mill, and live and work as white people. The women were taught to sew on the sewing-machine and make their own clothes. The Friends contributed material for sewing and also clothing. The Indians thus learned to respect and love their agent and his family. A few of the children were occasionally given a supper, and were taught to eat, and to use knife and fork as we do.

I think much can be done without military rule. I feel sure it never did any real good for the Indian or the white man. While under the military the Indians are pushed off their cultivated lands and made to settle on barren land, at the same time are demoralized by liquor, tobacco, and otherwise. A good motto for honest people is this: "Put yourself in his place and you can settle the whole question without firing a shot."

I believe the Indian, when living as a civilized American citizen, is as competent to cast the public elective vote as hundreds of uneducated people, natives of other countries unaccustomed to our laws.

I can see no wise reason that women and Indians be debarred from helping to use their influence in forming laws they must abide by, more than others, who are not American born, and are not always law-abiding citizens, who are allowed the privilege.

Woodbury, N. J.

P.

A WORD OF ENCOURAGEMENT.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I AM rejoicing over the firm and Friendly stand you have taken on one of the leading and most important of all our testimonies in favor of peace, and opposition of war. It does seem the time has come when every Friend should be able and willing to give a reason for the faith that is in him.

Are we not amazed at the present policy of our government, meddling with and subduing foreign countries with which we were at peace, with the prospect of nothing to gain and everything to lose? I therefore encourage you to stand by your convictions, for I do believe we have need in our own Society of being awakened to a true sense of our condition as a nation, and the perils that await us in the future if the policy of our government is not changed.

I enjoy your valuable paper, and wanted to tell you so, and wish it was taken by more Friends and Friendly people, and sometimes I have thought it would not do William McKinley any harm to see it.

Your friend,

Hughesville, Va., Third month 2.

JESSE HOGE.

LITERARY NOTES.

T. S. LEACH & Co., 29 N. 7th St., Philadelphia, announce two new books for issue on the 25th instant, "Pauperizing the Rich," by Alfred J. Ferris, and "A Handbook of Labor Literature," by Helen Marot. The former is described as a new critical study of the central social problem, with a definite proposal toward its solution," and as neither "anarchistic nor socialistic," yet "not lacking in radicalism." Helen Marot's book is designed to aid librarians and others, who are continually called on for information as to the literature of the labor question.

It is announced that Mahlon Z. Kirk, of the American Friend, 718 Arch Street, Philadelphia, has spent several years in collecting the records of the Whinery family, and expects soon to publish the results of his labors in the form of a large chart. He would be glad to correspond with any one interested in the family. Robert Whinery, the first of the name in Pennsylvania, was a Friend, and came over from county Armagh, Ireland, in 1738.

John A. M. Passmore, who recently completed and published a very extensive Genealogy of the descendants of Andrew Moore, is engaged in preparing a similar work on the family descended from John Passmore, who settled in Chester county, Pa., in 1713.

In McClure's Magazine, this month, Lieutenant Peary, who is now in the Arctic regions, describes the plan on which he is conducting what he aptly calls his "campaign" and explains the grounds of his strong hope of its ending in securing to himself and the United States the honor of discovering the Pole. The article is illustrated, largely from photographs taken by the author himself. The same number has the first of a series of articles on Egypt, by Charles Dana Gibson, another instalment of Ida M. Tarbell's biography of Lincoln, and an account of liquid air, based on conversations with the discoverer, Charles E. Tripler, with numerous pictures illustrating interesting experiments and the whole process of manufacture.

Educational Department.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

THE annual College Reception was held in the College parlors on Seventh-day evening, the 4th instant. A large gathering of alumni and friends were present to help make the occasion enjoyable. The parlors, Phoenix room, and Literary Society rooms were all open and tastefully decorated by a committee from the classes, consisting of Walter H. Lippincott, Mabel Gillespie, George M. Lamb, Caroline F. Comly, J. Edward Downing, Elizabeth Dinsmore, Milton Griscom, and Caroline F. Clothier.

At a meeting of the Property Committee on Seventh-day, 4th instant, the site for the location of the new men's gymnasium was definitely selected. The new building will be placed slightly to the rear of the west wing of the College, facing the station; it will be built of stone and fully equipped in every particular. Besides the large gymnasium proper, filled with apparatus, the building will contain society rooms for each of the men's literary societies. It is hoped that the new building will be ready for use on the resumption of work next fall. It will furnish a much needed incentive to this feature of College work.

The program of the meeting of the Joseph Leidy Scientific Society, on Fifth-day evening, comprised two topics of general interest. A paper on "The origin of storms and the recent blizzard" was presented by Ada Underhill, 1901. This was followed by an informal talk by Dr. Day on "The antiquity of life on the globe," which called forth much interesting discussion.

The following speakers for Commencement Day have been chosen by the Faculty: Gilbert L. Hall, Calvin F. Crowell, Anna B. Eisenhower, and Emily Underhill; by the Class, Marshall Pancoast and Mary E. Seaman. '99.

GEORGE SCHOOL NOTES.

Professor Robert Ellis Thompson, of the Central High School, Philadelphia, recently delivered his lecture on "The Evolution of the Dwelling-House," before the school. The speaker made his descriptions of the early habitations of man, and their gradual development to the present time, and finally his glimpses into the future home, very interesting to his audience.

The annual inter-society contest took place Seventh-day evening, Second month 25. Edward Russell, a former student and member of the Whittier Society, now a student of medicine at the University of Pennsylvania, presided, and Beulah Paschall, of the class of '96, occupied the secretary's chair. The first speaker, William Roberts, of the Whittier team, gave an oration on "Attention." Beulah L. Darby, of the Penn team, followed with an oration on "The Power of Music." The question for debate was, Resolved, "That under existing conditions, the abolition by civilized nations of their armies and navies, other than those required for the maintenance of their domestic police, is feasible." E. Stanley Hutchinson, assisted by Lida Gillingham and Allie Rohr, "Penns," upheld the affirmative; the negative was sustained by Grace Woodman, assisted by William Smith and Gilbert Underwood. At the conclusion of the debate, Alfred Crewitt, Penn, gave an oration, subject, "Intemperance, the Curse of the Nation." Ethel Brinton, the second Whittier orator, closed the contest with an oration on "The Flood of Years."

The judges were William T. Hilliard, of Salem, New Jersey, Henry H. Gilkyson, of Phoenixville, Pa., and Dr. Raymond M. Alden, of the University of Pennsylvania. Dr. Alden, after some preliminary remarks, announced that the Whittiers had won in the contest by six points, that the ground was well covered on both sides, and that the work done was of an unusually high order. At the conclusion of the exercises, an informal reception was tendered the participants in the Principal's parlor.

Sixth-day afternoon, 3rd instant, Paul Lawrence Dunbar, assistant librarian in the Washington Congressional Library, gave readings from his poems, which were much appreciated by the students.

Seventh-day evening, Third month 4, the hour of the Young Friends' Association was occupied by Anna T. Davis, head worker of the College Settlement in Philadelphia. She described briefly the three College Settlements of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia, but spent most of the time in detailing the work done in the last named.

Principal Maris delivered an address on "County Government" before the Delaware County Teachers' Association, on Seventh-day, 4th instant. *

FRIENDS' SEMINARY, NEW YORK.

The report of the Board of Trustees to the monthly meeting shows that there has been a steady increase in attendance for the last five years. There are now 145 pupils, of whom 27 are Friends. There are ten regular and five special teachers; seven of these are members of the Society.

There have been a number of changes this year in the details of administration. In the reseating of the pupils, when the old furniture was replaced by new single desks, no thought was given to the separation of the sexes. The policy of making the school as much as possible like the home, by encouraging a free and healthy mingling of boys and girls, is working well. The privilege of using the buildings and playgrounds until five o'clock every day, with no systematic supervision by the teachers, has been granted the pupils with satisfactory results. The regular course of study above the Kindergarten is designed to cover ten years. There is, however, near the top, an extra year's work, which may be taken by those who desire or need more time, or who require for special reasons unusual studies, or who must repeat a part of a year's work. It may be omitted by those who are pressed for time, or who do not need all the matter required by the severe college entrance requirements. This arrangement makes the course flexible and seems to meet a real want.

The monthly lectures have been of unusual interest this year. Dr. Jesse H. Holmes came over from George School on the 1st instant, and talked about "Insects." A month ago Dr. W. H. Tolman, Secretary of the League for Social Service, gave an illustrated lecture which he calls "A Study in Social and Industrial Betterment." In it he showed how almost ideal conditions have been brought about in the home and factory life of the employés of the National Cash Register Co., of Dayton, Ohio. *

ABINGTON FRIENDS' SCHOOL.—The oratorical contest for the prize offered by the Alumni Association of the school will take place on the 31st of the present month. The competition will be between the A, B, and C classes of the school, and the successful class will buy a picture or bust to be used in the decoration of the school-room.

Eight members of the teachers' training class, at Fifteenth and Race streets, are at present taking a course of study at the school. Their earnestness and enthusiasm in their work make them a welcome addition to the body of students.

The present principal, Louis B. Ambler, handed his resignation to the committee in charge, at their meeting, Third month 1st. He has had charge of the school for seven years. His resignation will take effect at the close of the present term in Sixth month.

The school is at present in its usual prosperous condition, all available space in the boarding department being occupied and the attendance of day students being fully up to the average of several years past.

MARTIN ACADEMY, KENNETT SQUARE.—Dr. Emily G. Hunt gave on last Sixth-day, (24th ult.), the last of a series of ten lectures before the students of Martin Academy on Zoölogy. These lectures were very interesting, and already some of the pupils show an increased interest in Natural History. They all feel grateful to Dr. Hunt and also to the committee who made it possible for these to be given.

E. S.

STUDYING IN GERMANY.—Prof. Benjamin F. Battin, who has been studying in Berlin, with his wife, writes that he expects to spend the coming summer semester at some other university, and has been making a tour of the university towns, Göttingen, Jena, Leipzig, and Halle.

Attendance at any one university in the German or Austrian Empire, or Switzerland, "counts" for a degree equally with any other. From this has arisen the custom among students of dividing their time between two or more institutions.

COMMUNICATIONS.

RECORD OF THE WEATHER.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I SHOULD like very much if Friends in different localities would send the INTELLIGENCER a short memorandum of the lowest temperature reached this winter. Here at Ellis, Kansas, from the 1st of Second month to the 12th inclusive, the mercury never got above 10 above zero, and on the 12th it was 33 below, the coldest morning I ever saw. It was 4 below zero on the 24th, 4 above the 25th.

Ellis, Kan., Second month 27.

DANIEL GRIEST.

WATER AND IMPERIALISM.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

Judging from our newspapers there must be a good many people in Philadelphia who want to rule over the Filipinos. Does it seem reasonable that persons who cannot so govern their own city as to have clean water for drinking should go to governing the Philippine Islands?

INQUIRER.

Third month 4.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

WAYNESVILLE, OHIO.—An interesting and well attended meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held First-day afternoon, Second month 26. The president J. Edwin Janney, opened the meeting by reading a portion of the 6th chapter of John. The subject under discussion was "An Appreciation of Our Opportunities."

The first topic taken up was "How should we use the faculties given us?" Many good points were brought out by Charles Brown and others. The next topic was, "What is the most important lesson in life?" and the unanimous decision seemed to be, learn to embrace our opportunities. "Do we all appreciate our opportunities?" was next considered, and, with the remedy for not doing so, was freely discussed by several. "What special elements of character should we cultivate to improve our opportunities?" brought forth responses of faithfulness, acceptance of duty, perseverance, and other valuable thoughts.

The other topics brought out the thought that great opportunities are made up of little ones, and we should employ, to the best of our ability, every fragment of time. Much interest seemed manifested during the entire meeting, and the hour was only too brief for discussion of so helpful a subject.

The meeting adjourned after a brief silence to meet Third month 11.

MARIANA CHANDLER, Sec.

PHILADELPHIA.—The annual meeting of Philadelphia Young Friends' Association, postponed from Second month 13, was held Second month 20.

In the absence of the Secretary, Anne B. Stirling acted as secretary, pro tem. The minutes of last meeting were adopted as read.

The election of officers for the ensuing year being the first business, the following were unanimously chosen: president, Charles Paxson; first vice-president, Emma Waln; second vice-president, Isabel Chambers; secretary, Esther S. Stackhouse; corresponding secretary, Anna Jenkins Ferris; treasurer, John Woodall; executive committee, William E. Walter, John C. Craig, Helen A. Comly, Alice Hall Paxson, William L. Price, Mary Janney.

The Treasurer's report was read by the President; standing committees also made reports. The Lecture Committee regretted the small attendance, (on account of bad weather), at W. Hudson Shaw's opening lecture, Second month 17. Statement was made of the further lectures of the course, and notice given of John R. Macdonald's lectures at the Free Library of Economics. The Executive Committee reported the evening's program and the election of three new members.

Howard M. Cooper then read a review of chapters vii. to x., in Frederick Storrs Turner's book, "The Quakers," entitled "Early Friends as They Appeared to the World." The chapter on "Fanaticism" deals with exceptional cases which, totally repugnant to all that Quakerism really stood for, did not cause a ripple in the spread of its principles. Turner, in a spirit of justness and kindness, treats the subject of "Miracles and Prophecies," and says the "Children of the Light" must be called fallible, but not false prophets. Under the head of "Schisms and Discipline" the author reviews the difficulty of establishing an organized body which shall deprive none of its members of proper individual liberty. In the chapter "The Quakers as they appeared to their Opponents," a comprehensive picture is given, showing how Friends were influenced by the custom of the times in the use of severe terms in their religious controversies. In closing his interesting review Howard M. Cooper said that Turner does not hesitate to criticise Friends, but we may well accept criticism from one who speaks of us so sympathetically and fairly as he does in this valuable book.

In the subsequent discussion of the paper, Howard M. Jenkins said "The Quakers" was incisive, accurate, and sympathetic,—the best book on the subject, by one not a Friend, which he knew. It was the result of an attraction towards Friends which Turner had felt on his return to London after years of missionary labor in Asia. It was strongly confirmative of the position of our branch of the Society. The book had been kindly received by English Friends, and one prominent member, Samuel J. Capper, bought up the remainder of the edition, and distributed them. The question was asked if Friends have a sadder history of schism than other religious bodies. It was answered that according to a recent writer nearly all denominations have a record of many internal cleavages. This fact was commented upon as a sign of the stirring of healthful life and thought, and the opinion advanced that it makes for ultimate progress.

As the second subject of the evening, the recent book, "What is Art?" by Count Tolstoy, was reviewed by Howard M. Jenkins. This, he said, may be considered a challenge of the ordinary definitions of art. It examines the theories concerning Art, and the various definitions of Beauty. The central thought of the book is that Art is a means by which "feeling" is transmitted by the artist to others. Insisting on emotion as necessary in art, it seems that the feelings which Tolstoy particularly has in mind are those of pity, of tender sympathy, of human fellowship. The speaker, after presenting some comment and analysis, read passages from the book.

Several friends subsequently expressed sympathy with the author's inability to appreciate much of the so-called Art of the present day. In answer William L. Price thought that the strange utterances—the "fads," so to speak, of art, such as Impressionism, deserved something more than mere contempt. There is a meaning, a reason, back of these imperfect struggles to hold forth some new message to men. Let us strive to keep our eyes open to the good underlying the effort.

Some further discussion followed. After a moment's silence, the meeting adjourned.

ANNE B. STIRLING, Sec., pro tem.

LANGHORNE, PA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held at the home of John Wildman, Second month 25. After a short silence the minutes of the previous meeting were read and approved. The exercises for the evening were opened by Annie Fothergill, who read Kipling's poem, "Take up the White Man's Burden," and made it the subject of an excellent paper.

"Zoroaster and the Zend-Avesta" was prepared by Abbie F. Marshall, and in her absence read by J. Howard Marshall.

A recitation by Margaretta Mather was followed by a reading from the Discipline, by Mitchell Watson. Anna R. Mather, from the Current Topics Section, gave an interesting account of the Doukhobors. A reading of the beautiful poem, "A Free Seat," by Marion Osmond, closed the program.

After reports from various committees roll-call was responded to with quotations, and after a few moments' silence the meeting adjourned until Third month 23, at the home of Mitchell Watson.

T. E. A., Sec., pro tem.

TRENTON, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Friends' Association was held Second month 27, with the president, W. Maxwell Marshall, in the chair. After roll-call, the minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

After the customary business, the program for the evening was opened with a paper, by Louisa Dunn, "Give an account of the Doukhobors." Much might be told of the sufferings of these Christians, persecuted for refusing to learn how to kill their fellowmen.

"About how many Friends emigrated to the West Indies from England to escape persecution and what became of them?" assigned to John Wright, was answered by Seth Ely, who read an article from the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, entitled, "Relics of Friends in Barbadoes." The descendants of Friends seem to have entirely disappeared from the island and very little could be learned of them.

"Is the extension of activities of the United States government to the Far East likely to make for peace or war?" was answered by Linton Satterthwaite. This question needs to be viewed in a double aspect; first, whether we shall be able to hold the Filipinos in subjection without frequently recurring wars; and next, whether we shall by reason of our presence as a Power in the Orient, with possessions to protect, be likely to become involved in controversies with other nations. As far as the Filipinos themselves are concerned, the activity of the United States in the Far East is likely to result in wars of more or less frequency and seriousness for an indefinite time to come, but whether this will involve us in war with other nations will depend on circumstances impossible now to foresee.

After the customary silence the meeting adjourned.

M. D. B., Sec.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—Mansfield Friends' Association met on the evening of Second month 23, at the home of Thomas A. Bunting. Twenty-five members responded to roll-call.

Thomas A. Bunting finished the reading of the ancient queries left over from last meeting. Elizabeth A. Scott gave a very interesting biography of Lucretia Mott. Hers truly was a beautiful and well-ordered life, ever seeking the good of others, seeking to uplift the lowly and fallen wherever found.

The history of Mansfield Meeting was given by Anna B. Taylor. The first meeting was held near the Delaware river, at the home of one named White, in 1678, the second at the home of John Curtis, near Columbus, about 1680. Mansfield meeting was established in 1730, at Mansfield. The first Burlington Quarterly Meeting was held at the home of William Biddle, near Kinkora, from 1683 to 1712, then alternated between Crosswicks and Burlington. Upper Springfield Monthly Meeting was established in 1783. It was composed of Upper Springfield, Crosswicks, and Upper Freehold preparative meetings, each having over 200 members.

Ethel W. Zellej responded to the question, "Should Young Friends be progressive, or should they adhere strictly to the Discipline?" She thought they should be progressive and yet could still be in accord with the Discipline. In all philanthropic work, we are surely progressive. The higher education to which we are attaining in our schools and colleges, exemplify progression. The First-day Schools, Conferences, and Young Friends' Associations, introduced for the purpose of bringing young people forward in the work of the Society, are fitting channels for the work of progression, and there is nothing in the Discipline forbidding them.

Allusion was made to the sudden death of one of our members, Abbie S. Harvey, since our last meeting, and some lines on her death, written by one of our members, were read by Edith S. Gibbs. They were approved by the meeting and ordered engrossed on the minutes.

After a brief silence, adjourned to meet at the home of Joseph F. Taylor, Third month 23.

M. E. GIBBS, Sec.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—The Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn met in New York, Second month 26. A paper upon "Early religious forms and ceremonies" was presented by Jessie B. Ginn. The paper was historical in character, beginning with prehistoric religions, nature worship, and ancestor worship. Although no records of these exist, the writer inferred that prayer and sacrifice were prominent elements then as later. The religions of Egypt, of India, of Confucius, of the Parsees, of Jews, and Christians, of the Greeks, and of the Mohammedans were briefly outlined with the more important rites of each. In many cases it seemed clear that the elaborate ceremonials had crushed out the vital spark and that the use of symbols has usually degenerated into idol worship.

Discussion was chiefly upon the question of how far forms and ceremonies are helpful to religion at the present time, and whether it is possible to dispense wholly with them. The thought was expressed that Friends have lost ground not because of their want of forms, but because of an unwise subservience to those they have. It was questioned whether the child, since his development follows the order of the growth of the race, needs to go through the pagan experience. In other words, is there an age when children need symbols and objective religious teaching? And further are not certain ceremonials helpful to mature minds in certain stages of intellectual development?

The discussion showed a tendency away from formalism, in all stages and phases of religious life, and a general belief that the use of such means is not necessary nor productive of the highest good.

M. A. N.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

SOME one, who dates his letter at Brooklyn, N. Y., Second month 28, but does not sign his name, sends us a note as follows:

"I know of no organized class of people that did more than Friends to bring on the state of things that now exists in Cuba and [the] Philippines. And is it Christianlike, after getting the President buckled in the shafts, at the foot of the hill, with a large load behind him, to leave him at the mercy of a tomahawk and scalping-knife?"

Enclosed in the letter was an editorial article clipped from the New York Tribune, and this no doubt explains the state of the writer's mind.

"Speaking of John Woolman, I think he differed from many other social reformers of former days and now in this—that his love and charity extended to the employer as well as the employed. In his effort to eradicate slavery, he labored to convince the slaveholder, instead of stirring up strife against him." So says a friend.

In a private letter from Redlands, Cal., a friend writes: "I went this [First-day] morning to the 'Holiness Tabernacle,' and quite an experience it was. They have a little building on Citrus avenue, 'down town.' I went into a plain bare room, with white walls, bare floor, common wooden chairs. Scripture texts, printed in black letters on muslin, were on the wall back of the desk. A man was speaking, when I went in, to about fifty plainly dressed, apparently poor people. His subject was Holiness,—leading a holy life; such a life as Jesus lived. It was somewhat like a Methodist camp-meeting, of old times; the people would respond to the speaker, and all would shout 'Hallelujah!' He gave a 'dig' at some church in town, (perhaps the Unitarian), where, he said, they talked of Zoroaster and Buddha, and thought Jesus only a very good man. He spoke of George Fox going about preaching without pay, and said, 'he went in a meeting-house where the minister was saying the people had the gospel 'without money and without price,' whereupon George spoke up, 'That's a lie! You get $1,500 for preaching it.'"

"When the speaker sat down, there was singing, and after each verse an 'experience' was given; perhaps ten or twelve altogether. One said he had been a 'birthright member of the Society of Friends.' One asked prayer for his mother, who had 'chronic spells,' so all the company fell upon their knees in prayer, first one and then another.

"Do not think I wish to make the description amusing. They seemed very earnest, devout people."

"I have been wishing some one would keep up the name of Mary; it is too good a name to be lost." So writes a friend in the West, apropos of some recently named new arrivals. We cordially unite with her view.

"We value the INTELLIGENCER highly, and are in full unity with its principles of Peace," says a friend at Christiana, Pa., in closing a business letter.

CLEMENT B. WHITE, of Selma, Ala., is the sole surviving brother-in-law of Abraham Lincoln. He is described as "a thorough Southern gentleman of the old school," and is now nearly 70 years old. He served with such distinction in the Confederate army that Lincoln said on one occasion: "Well, I suppose we'll have to hang White—when we catch him!"

A HITHERTO unfamiliar remark of Abraham Lincoln is this one, which Senator Palmer, of Illinois, says Lincoln made to him: "I have simply tried to do my duty every day, hoping that when to-morrow came I would be equal to it."

THE Indian population of the United States is 248,340. In 1492 they were the lords of the whole country; now they have reserved for them 144,496 square miles.

DOUKHOBOR REPORT.

WE have received the following letter:

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION,
WINNIPEG, Manitoba, February 27, 1899.

Editors FRIENDS INTELLIGENCER:

In your issue of the 25th instant I observe an article from your correspondent at Halifax, signed "H. V. H.," which would appear to require some explanation,—or at least the last sentence, in which the writer states that "on the train from St. John to Winnipeg it was so cold that the water froze and they could not wash, and the milk in the provision car froze, and did not thaw during the entire trip."

Mr. Leopold Solerjitzky was in charge of these trains, at least one of them, and I have asked him, as well as all the other English-speaking men and interpreters, and they state that this is not a fact.

Mr. Solerjitzky signs this letter with me and agrees with the interpreters that at no time during the trip were any of the cars cold. None of the water was frozen in any of the tanks, and the people could wash themselves at all times. In the provision car, where one man slept, it was kept at about freezing point, in order to keep the provisions, especially the milk, from spoiling, but at no time was the milk frozen, and it was in daily use by the people.

I personally looked after the unloading of the balance of the provisions, including bread, cheese, and milk, on arrival here, and found them all sweet and in good condition; no trace of frost whatever, and the cars quite comfortable.

I do this not only in justice to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, but in order to show your readers that these immigrants are not coming to such a cold climate as this clause would lead people to imagine.

I regret that your correspondent should have fallen into such an error, but I presume that some who did not know the facts gave the information. I am your obedient servant,

WM. A. MCCREARY, Commissioner.

LEOPOLD SOLERJITZKY,

[Our correspondent, H. V. H., who has the kindest possible feeling toward the immigrants, and estimates highly the good management of the Canadian Government and the Canadian Pacific Railroad, no doubt simply reported what he had heard. The correction above is interesting. Our experience of the extreme cold, so far south as this, made us apprehend suffering in Canada.—EDS.]

Our illustrations, last week, were not satisfactorily printed, partly because of insufficient time to "make ready" the cuts. We had hoped to get better results in the pictures. Still, they gave a tolerable idea of the subjects.

THE "INTELLIGENCER" FUND.

We have two additional contributions:

A. B., $ 1.00

F., 100.00

(Contribution mentioned Second mo. 25), 5.00

$106.00

Previously acknowledged, (First mo. 14), 243.25

Total, $349.25

THE lifeboats round the British coast during the year 1898 rescued 682 people.

WILLIAM A. CLARK has been elected United States Senator from Montana. He is a Democrat (succeeding Lee Mantle, Silver Rep.), and is known as a "copper king"; his income last year is said to have been not far from $10,000,000. He is a native of Pennsylvania and drove an ox team into the gold regions in 1863.

COUNT A. C. APRAXIN, a millionaire Russian, who died recently at St. Petersburg at the age of 80, had a contempt for everything in the shape of display. He always dressed poorly, walked about the city a great deal, and was continually making individual charitable donations, invariably exacting a promise that the recipient must never tell who gave the aid.

AGUINALDO AND THE FILIPINOS.

From an article in "Harper's Weekly," Second month 25, by Edwin Wildman, United States vice consul-general at Hong Kong, China.

In the nineteenth century there has not been a more unique figure among the native races of the earth than this Tagalo patriot—or rebel; call him what you will. Philosophers call silent men wise; superficial people call them ignorant. Aguinaldo is wise among his people, ignorant among Europeans. A man must be judged by his environments, his compatriots, his race. He has the astuteness of his race, the fearless bravery of the savage warrior, the sphinx-like imperturbability of the Indian, the straightforwardness of childhood, and the innate sense of justice that characterizes all aboriginal races. It may be premature to sum up a man's character while his career is at the zenith. Some trick of circumstance or expediency may shift the kaleidoscope, for no man can stand under the microscope of the historian until the last page of evidence has been turned in; but Aguinaldo, as he is to-day, commands the consideration and respect of all who have taken the trouble to study his character and watch the trend of events of which he is the central figure.

Nothing in the chieftain's dress suggested his rank, but a glance at his serious, bronzed countenance stamped him, in my estimation, as a leader. His head is large, but sets well upon his rather slight body. His hair is the rich shiny black of the Tagalo, and is combed pompadour, enhancing his height somewhat. He was neatly dressed in a suit of fine pina cloth of native manufacture, and as he stood there, straight and dignified, one hand resting on his desk, despite his under-size and mock-heroic surroundings, he impressed me as a man capable of all he had undertaken, and the possessor of a will and determination equal to the task set before him, and I made up my mind then and there that he was genuine; that his dignity was natural; that his aim was lofty, and his character trustful and worthy of being trusted. True worth shines through the eyes, will shows itself in the mouth, ability in the curve of the nose. There is something in the make-up of this little Tagalo that inspires more than respect—something that commands without words. I do not think that I am overestimating Aguinaldo when I say that he possesses the attributes that go to make up greatness as it is understood among men. There is something out of the ordinary in a man, born in the wilds of an outlying island, uneducated, uncultured, untraveled, who possesses the power to inspire men to heroism and self-sacrifice; who can muster an army out of men who never fought but with the knife or the bow and arrow; who can hold in check the violent passions for revenge, plunder, and destruction in a race which has never known anything but cruelty and oppression from the white man, and which does not forget that the soil must be tilled and the crops harvested, and that there is a God in heaven who will listen to the petition of a Tagalo curé and will reject the mock prayers of a Franciscan Pharisee.

In Malolos the natives told me that Aguinaldo never slept. While the Filipino takes his siesta from 12 o'clock until 3.30, the priest from 12 until 5,

Aguinaldo grapples with the problems of war and peace. Over a thousand miles of telegraph wires (captured from the Spanish) terminate at his desk. All parts of Luzon, and even beyond, are within his ready reach, and every regiment receives its orders daily. He is an enigma to his people, and to the foreigner who would probe his thoughts. Among the natives he is held as a demi-god who leads a charmed life—even far back among the hills the yet untamed Negrito tribes fear his name. He knows every inch of Filipino soil, and can hold the outlying districts loyal, for his purpose is never questioned, and the ethics of right and wrong are not discussed. His flag flies over every group of huts, every petty pueblo, and every junk and barge that plies the rivers and bays of Luzon, and it is not a stranger among the southern islands. His people, in the general acceptance of the word, are Indians; but they must not be confused with the North American product. They are advanced in the arts of civilization far beyond the native races of our own continent. They are industrious; they make the soil productive; they understand the method of developing to their best maturity the native fruits, the cocoanut, the betel-nut, the banana, the mango, and even raising potatoes and apples of an inferior quality. They build substantial houses; they make and mix paints; they carve in wood; they work in iron; they make skillful machinists, good mill-hands, servants, and day-laborers, and they worship God.

Whittier's Perfect Lines.

WRITING of Whittier, Dr. J. P. McCaskey, of the Pennsylvania School Journal, says: "If he had written no more than this, it would be worth the life-time of tens of thousands of ordinary men to put these perfect lines into the thought of the world:

- 'I know not what the future hath
Of marvel or surprise,
Assured alone that life and death
His mercy underlies.
- 'And so beside the Silent Sea
I wait the muffled oar;
No harm from Him can come to me
On ocean or on shore.
- 'I know not where His islands lift
Their fronded palms in air;
I only know I cannot drift
Beyond His love and care.'

Alcohol For Severe Effort.

Medical Record.

THE British authorities some time ago made a test of the alleged value of alcohol when men are subjected to unusual and exhausting labor. Experiments were made at different times and under varying conditions with three regiments from each of several brigades. In one every man was forbidden to drink any alcohol whatever while the test lasted; in the second malt liquor only was taken; in the third a ration of whisky was given to each man. The whisky drinkers manifested the more dash at first, but generally in about four days showed signs of weakness and fatigue; those given malt liquor displayed less dash at first, but their endurance lasted somewhat longer, while the abstainers improved daily in alertness and staying powers.

In the German army experiments are being made with sugar, which is claimed to have such great sustaining powers that it is proposed to serve it as an extra ration when unusual fatigues are to be borne.

Reports on Alaska.

THE reports of the United States officers, Captain Ray, and Lieutenant Richardson, sent to the Klondike region to distribute the "relief fund" voted by Congress in Twelfth month, 1897, have been sent to Congress by Secretary Alger. The latest of the reports is dated in Seventh month, 1898. In a report two months earlier, Captain Ray says he does not find anything to justify the great rush of people either to Alaska or the Northwest Territory. In the latter "no discoveries of extraordinary richness have been made since the Klondike. In this district (Dawson City) all claims are well known, and held at very high prices, and while the whole country has been staked it has been done for speculative purposes, and no work is being done except such as is necessary to hold a title until they can be sold to the unwary new comer or disposed of in the States for corporation schemes."

"Up to date no paying mineral lodes of either gold or silver have been discovered in North Alaska, so far as known."

Captain Ray thinks that while Alaska will ultimately be the source of considerable wealth, "the development will necessarily be slow owing to the climatic conditions. I recommend the early introduction of horses, mules, and cattle, and extra inducements should be held out for the development of agriculture in the valley of the Lower Yukon especially. Wild hay can be obtained there in great abundance, and oats, barley, and spring wheat can be successfully cultivated, as well as potatoes, turnips, and all the more hardy garden vegetables, all of which would be required for many years to meet the local demand."

It was long held that General Grant came of Scotch-Irish origin, but the descendants of Matthew Grant, of Windsor, Conn., who now number many hundreds, have organized a society and have elected as president U. S. Grant, Jr., of California, and the new society claims that the family is from the south of England.

THE estimated expenses of the city of Philadelphia for the year 1899 are $31,400,000, the chief item of which is for education, the police expenses being $3,100,000, and the Fire Department $1,000,000. New York has, approximately, three times as many inhabitants as Philadelphia, and its Police Department costs nearly $12,000,000 a year.

BURRIS A. JENKINS, a professor in Butler College, Indianapolis, has been chosen as the first President of the University of Indianapolis, which has been constituted by a union of Butler College, the Medical College of Indiana, the Indiana Law School, and the Indiana Dental College. He was educated at Yale and Harvard.

CURRENT EVENTS.

CONGRESS closed its session at noon on the 4th instant. All important measures were disposed of, and there will be no extra session, now. The Army bill was passed in such shape that the increase is limited to expire Seventh month 1, 1901. The Nicaragua Canal bill failed. In the House, at the closing, Speaker Reed did not recognize Gen. Wheeler, of Alabama, who sought to speak. (The House Judiciary Committee had reported that members who accepted commissions in the army thereby vacated their seats, the two places being "incompatible," under the Constitution, and though the House, by vote, refused to confirm the report, the Speaker apparently considered it a sound decision.)

A DISPATCH sent out from Washington on the 6th inst., announced that "General Otis had practically completed his plans for a grand onslaught on the insurgents." The United States forces now in the Philippine Islands were reported in the same dispatch as reaching 41,000 men in combined army and navy. There are nineteen warships at Manila or Hong Kong, under command of Admiral Dewey, and four more, one of them the Oregon, are on their way to join him.

THERE is considerable unrest in Cuba, over various questions arising under the present military control. Gomez, with other Cuban leaders, continues to assert the independence of the island. Under "orders from Havana," where General Brooke, the "military governor" is stationed, nearly 3,000 men have been thrown out of work in the Province of Santiago, by the stoppage of public improvements. The issue of free rations to large numbers of persons has been made necessary, and there have been vehement protests.

BARON HERSCHELL, who was Lord Chancellor of England in W. E. Gladstone's administration, and who has been in this country for some months at the head of the "Joint High Commission" to negotiate on Canadian questions, died suddenly at Washington, on the 1st instant. He had been confined to his bed for several weeks with a broken bone, caused by a fall on a slippery sidewalk. He was born in 1837.

THE term of United States Senator Quay, of Pennsylvania, expired on the 4th inst. It is now considered impossible to elect him at this session of the Legislature, and one of his supporters, State Senator Grady, said at Harrisburg on the 7th inst., that the "deadlock" would probably continue, and no choice be made. Senator Quay has gone to Florida. An investigation of alleged attempted bribery is in progress in the Legislature, and witnesses, on the 7th, testified that two members had been offered, one $1,000, and one $500, to vote for what is called the "McCarrell bill."

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMAN
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.
ANGOR } Cincinnati.
ECKSTEIN }
ATLANTIC }
BRADLEY }
BROOKLYN } New York.
JEWETT }
VLASSER }
UNION }
SOUTHERN } Chicago.
SHIPMAN }
COLLIER }
MISSOURI }
RED SEAL } St. Louis.
SOUTHERN }
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY
Cleveland.
SALIM
Salem, Mass.
CORWELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

DWELLING house in the city of Elizabeth, N. J., built one hundred years ago, has always been painted with Pure White Lead and Linseed Oil—nothing else.

There is not a crack, blister, blemish or imperfection of any kind in the paint. Makers of mixtures, beat this record if you can!

Be sure the brand is right. Those in margin are genuine, and made by "old Dutch process."

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILWAY.

ANTHRACITE COAL. NO SMOKE.
NO CINDERS. DOUBLE TRACKED.
HEAVY STEEL RAILS. STONE
BALLASTED.

Royal Blue Line to New York.

SWIFTEST AND SAFEST TRAINS
IN THE WORLD.

Scenic Reading Route to

READING, HARRISBURG, GETTYS-
BURG, CHAMBERSBURG, SHAMO-
KIN, WILLIAMSPORT, AND POINTS
IN INTERIOR PENNSYLVANIA.

Royal Reading Route to

ATLANTIC CITY. CLEANLINESS
AND COMFORT. SAFETY AND SPEED.

It was announced in a New York newspaper on the 7th that J. Pierpont Morgan, who returned from England the previous day, had effected "a consolidation of all the great eastern coal interests under one management." The large railroad companies, engaged in coal mining and coal carrying, are in the combination, including the Pennsylvania, Reading, Lackawanna, Central of New Jersey, and others. "A pro rata division of the coal output, and of profits, has been outlined, though months will be required to adjust the details." The combined capital of the corporations engaged is stated at $889,000,000.

THERE is no end to the destruction on account of war. On the 5th instant, the Government naval powder magazine near Toulon, in southern France, exploded about 2.30 in the morning. Sixty persons were killed, and more than a hundred wounded. The dispatch says: "It looks as though a volcanic eruption had occurred, the country being swept almost bare within a radius of two miles, houses destroyed, trees overturned and distorted, fields devastated and covered with stones and impalpable black dust." It is believed the explosion originated "in chemical decomposition of smokeless powder."

THE sudden illness of the Pope, reported last week, occupied serious attention for a few days, but he has since improved. On the 1st instant his physician extracted from his thigh a "hematic cyst," of considerable size, which had been forming probably for thirty years. He could not take an anæsthetic, but stood the operation well.

RUDYARD KIPLING improved last week from his severe illness, of pneumonia, and is now regarded as out of danger. Two of his children had the same disease, and one, Josephine, aged six, died on the 6th instant. The other is recovering.

—President James M. Taylor, of Vassar College, has declined the invitation to become president of Brown University.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

BISHOP HUNTINGTON, of the Episcopal church, has vetoed a proposed celebration of the completion of the 30th year of his service, on the ground that the money and time are needed for church work. This is characteristic of one whose chief business in life is to serve, and to whom the incense of applause has never become necessary.

—Dr. Andrew D. White gives the proceeds of the sales of his book, "The Warfare of Science," to the library of Cornell University. It has been bringing in about $1,500 a year, and the money is expended in the purchase of works relating to the general subject of the book.

—It is stated that the "milk combination" of Chicago, formed by Joseph Leiter, will handle 12,000 of the 16,000 cans of milk brought into that city daily. He has paid $1,400,000 for the business of the largest firms. A saving of $497,000, or 8.2 per cent. on the capital stock, is claimed to be possible under consolidation.

—Europe's international telephone system is being rapidly extended. Within a few weeks all Swiss cities have been connected with Frankfort, and with Vienna they will have connection as soon as the distance from Munich to that city shall have been included in the circuit.

—Dr. Alpha J. Kynett, of Philadelphia, a leading Methodist minister, many years corresponding secretary of the Church Extension Society of the M. E. Church, died on the 23d ult., aged seventy. He died at Harrisburg, whither he had gone in relation to the work of the Anti-Saloon League, of whose Pennsylvania branch he was president.

—Fairmount Park (Philadelphia), reports bicyclers few. Only 375 of them used the Park drives last month, against 17,927 in February of 1898, and 6,183 in January, this year. The storms and cold weather are mostly responsible, no doubt, but in the opinion of the Park guards the bicycle is losing popularity.

Wheatlet
DELICIOUS
HEALTHY NUTRITIOUS

MANY LETTERS are received daily from all parts of the country highly endorsing the perfect cereal food—

WHEATLET

We append one:
"After a thorough test in my own family, I can hold up my hand and say on my soul that Wheatlet is the best cereal food in the world, and I feed my five children on it."
E. C. HAZARD,
Pres. Food Mfrs. Ass'n. N. Y.

Your grocer keeps it, if not send us his name and your order; we will see that you are supplied.

Made only by the
FRANKLIN MILLS CO.
Lockport, N. Y.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY MILK.
CONSHOHOCKEN Special attention given to serving families. Office 603 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Penna.
JOSEPH L. JONES.

OLD POINT COMFORT, RICHMOND, AND WASHINGTON.

SIX-DAY TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The third of the present series of personally conducted tours to Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington via the Pennsylvania Railroad, will leave New York and Philadelphia on Seventh-day, Third month 18.

Tickets, including transportation, meals en route in both directions, transfers of passengers and baggage, hotel accommodations at Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington, and carriage ride about Richmond—in fact, every necessary expense for a period of six days—will be sold at rate of $34.00 from New York, Brooklyn, and Newark; $32.50 from Trenton; $31.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

OLD POINT COMFORT ONLY.

Tickets to Old Point Comfort only, including luncheon on going trip, one and three-fourths days' board at that place, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold in connection with this tour at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

THE vitalizing power of the blood is better realized when we reflect that a drop takes but twenty-two seconds to go the round of the body. There passes through the heart once in every three minutes an amount of blood fluid equal to all that is contained in the body.

No one who knows Macbeth lamp-chimneys will have any other — except some dealers who want their chimneys to break.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Ellwood Heacock,

UNDERTAKER
and EMBALMER

ESTABLISHED 1860.

TELEPHONE 5807.

1313 Vine Street, Philad'a.

Calls outside of city answered promptly.

A POSTAL CARD RECEIVES PROMPT ATTENTION.

JOHN S. CONRAD,

LAUNDRY,

2103, 2105 COLUMBIA AVENUE, PHILA

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to

CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

CHARLES BURTON,

Practical House and Sign Painter,

Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, }

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844. }
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 18, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
{ Number 11.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XI.

THE ill dispositions of the bad are powerfully encouraged by the want of upright examples in those who are better.

JONATHAN DYMOND.

—
From his essay on Immoral Agency.

CONTENT.

THERE is a jewel which no Indian mine can buy,
No chemic art can counterfeit ;
It makes men rich in greatest poverty,
Makes water wine, turns wooden cups to gold,
The homely whistle to sweet music's strain ;
Seldom it comes, to few from Heaven sent,
That much in little,—all in naught—Content.

—[Unknown Author of the 16th Century.]

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE STORY OF PETER YARNALL.

BY GRIFFITH JOHN, BEAR GAP, PA.

(Concluded from Last Week.)

On the 24th, Peter and his companions, after a sitting in Colonel Shepherd's family, set their faces to return. Stopping at Washington to hold meetings, they came on to Redstone in time to attend Westland Monthly Meeting, on the 27th. After this attending some meetings and paying a few family visits, they took their departure for Virginia. Abel Walker's was reached Twelfth month 8. Next day it came in course to attend Centre week-day meeting, and after that a meeting in Winchester. Having visited his brother in this place, Peter went on to Hopewell, and was over night with Amos Tolliff, attending the meeting there. On the following day they traveled no farther than the Widow McPherson's, where Peter being much fatigued and a little unwell, it was concluded best to remain till the 12th, when they passed on to Israel Janney's, at Goose Creek. 13th, at Goose Creek Meeting and at Leesburg in the evening. 14th, attended Fairfax Quarterly Meeting. Lodged at Mahlon Janney's, staid to the week-day meeting on the 16th, which was large, Job Scott being there.

He says: 19th, returned to Fairfax and were at meeting next day with Job Scott, who was on a religious visit. 21st, set out with William Stabler for Sandy Spring and lodged at Basil Brookes. 22d. Visited Roger Brooke's family, and on the 24th had a meeting at Evan Thomas's. 26th, we went to Georgetown to a meeting appointed for us, and that evening reached Alexandria, where we staid the night with John Saunders, an old school-mate of mine. 27th being the first of the week, we attended the morning meeting at this place. The afternoon meeting began at 3 o'clock. It was a very laborious time, yet I hope ended well. This evening we had a sitting with our kind host John Saunders, to our comfort and refreshment. On the 28th we visited all the families of Friends in Alexandria. On the morning of the new year, 1790, they went with Evan Thomas to Sandy Spring, where they had an appointed meeting, which was large and satisfactory. 4th, accompanied by Samuel Snowdon, they went on toward Indian Spring, where a large and solid meeting was held. Then went home with Joseph Hopkins, and in the evening went to his brother Elisha's. His wife being low in health, they had an opportunity in her chamber which was satisfactory. 6th, they called at the Widow Hopkins and had a sitting. Visited Philip Hopkins, Jr., and wife, and John Cowman's family, who were in much affliction on account of their son being removed by death, in the bloom of life. Had an opportunity in the family and spent the afternoon with them. On the day following, set out with Richard Hopkins and other Friends, with the intention of holding a meeting at Annapolis in a Methodist meeting-house, but as notice had not been sufficiently given, another meeting was appointed there for the next week. Then went on to John Thomas' at West River. First month 10th, they were at Cliffs meeting, which was largely attended, after which Peter went to lodge with his cousin, Richard Roberts. Having attended West River on the 13th, they proceeded to Annapolis and had a favored meeting there, which was followed later by another meeting. Then returned to Widow Hopkins and next morning proceeding to Ellicott's Mills, they parted with their kind friend Evan Thomas. A large meeting was held at this place in the evening, to satisfaction. The people were solid and quiet. 19th, were at meeting at Elk Ridge in the morning and at John Ellicott's in the afternoon, where a large and quiet meeting was held. 20th, attended the week-day meeting at Elk Ridge, and then rode to Baltimore. On the evening of the 21st had a meeting in the Methodist house, at which near a thousand were present. 24th. Being First-day, was at two meetings. On the 25th were at Gunpowder meeting. Called to see Hannah Matthews, Oliver's daughter. After visiting another family lodged at the Widow Matthews's. The next day, the 26th of the First month, 1790, Peter Yarnall reached home, having been absent three months, and traveled upwards of a thousand miles.

In 1791 Peter Yarnall removed from York with his family to the neighborhood of Horsham Meeting, Montgomery county, Pa.

In the Ninth month following we find him appointing meetings for those not of our Society, within the limits of Horsham Monthly Meeting. In this labor he was frequently accompanied by his friend and neighbor James Simpson. Peter was set at liberty to visit the meetings of Chester, Western, and Warrington Quarters in the autumn of 1792. The next winter he visited the families of Horsham Monthly Meeting. Not long after this he requested a minute of unity of his Friends, to visit New York and New England, which being granted, he set out the 18th of Fifth month, 1793, and did not return until near the close of the year. In the Fourth month, 1794, he obtained a minute to visit New York Yearly Meeting and visit some meetings in New Jersey. Again, in the Eleventh month following, he was set at liberty to visit the families of Richland Monthly Meeting in Bucks county. Shortly after this he visited Friends' families at Gwynedd, which was followed by similar labor among the Friends of Philadelphia. On the 11th of the Fourth month, 1795, he met with a great loss in the decease of his amiable wife, after a short illness. His family was now broken up. His only daughter Rebecca went to live with Hannah Thornton, while the other children found places among their relatives. In the Tenth month, 1795, a certificate, endorsed by Abington Quarter, was furnished him to make a religious visit to the Southern States. Setting out on this journey, he was accompanied by James Emlen, of Delaware county. After much service they came back in Eighth month, 1796. In Twelfth month of the same year Peter Yarnall and Hannah Thornton laid their proposals of marriage before Horsham Monthly Meeting, and on the 15th of the Second month, 1797, were married at Byberry Meeting. Martha Routh and companion from England attended the marriage and spent some time with the newly-married couple. Peter now settled with his wife at the house she had previously occupied, being the one in which James Thornton had resided. Peter whenever at home continued the practice of medicine, but he did not intermit the higher duty of attending to his spiritual concerns, much as they took him away from his business. In the Ninth month following he attended meetings in New Jersey.

On Second month 14, 1798, he was taken suddenly ill, and such was the severity of the attack that there was little prospect of his recovery. He submitted to the desire of the family in employing a physician, but said his reliance in his present situation was upon the Lord Jesus alone, not on medicine. He said, "Heaven is a glorious place, into which I have no doubt of an entrance, if removed at this time. On another occasion, having the children around him, he endeavored to impress them with the importance of being prepared for death, saying it would be miserable indeed if he did not feel easy in mind. The evening before his departure, being asked how he was, replied, "in the Lord's keeping. I have that evidence." About the middle of the next day he bid his wife an affectionate farewell, saying, "the Lord's power is above all other powers," and then quietly expired, after a week's sickness.

SINCERITY must always remain the ingredient of all our actions, of our thoughts and their expressions. Insincerity is the curse of life, and cannot be smothered over by any effort.—Jewish Voice.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 13.—THIRD MONTH 26.

REVIEW.

GOLDEN TEXT.—For precept must be upon precept, precept upon precept; line upon line, line upon line; here a little, and there a little.—Isaiah, xxviii., 10.

Scripture Readings—Genesis, i., 1; vi., 5, 6; vii., 1; viii., 1; ix., 1; xii., 1; xv., 1; xxii., 15-19; xxvi., 24; xxxv., 9-15; xlv., 9; xlvii., 2, 3; l. 20.

GOD has revealed himself in many ways at all times and among all peoples. Nowhere among men has he left himself without a witness. In many cases his witnesses have more or less completely recorded their testimony for the benefit of the times to follow; and these records are treasured as sacred books by the people who inherit them. Too often, indeed, the books are worshipped instead of the message; the form is treasured rather than the substance. But even in such cases the message—the substance—is preserved in the husks for later times which may again winnow out the chaff and find the golden grain. So with the books of Confucius, of Zoroaster, with the sacred writings of India. Students have found in them lofty thought and helpful leading; and translation has put this within reach of many. But the sacred books of the Hebrews, which in the providence of God have become household possessions in all the homes of Christendom, are shown by comparison to contain vastly more of vital truth, of noble example, of far-reaching witness to God's presence and fatherhood, than any other of the inspired volumes of mankind. Moreover, by constant association with its forms of expression from childhood, we have been so moulded to its mode of thought that it appeals to our minds as a book of strange incident and foreign manner of thought could not.

Turning, then, to the Old Testament we find it to be not a book, but a literature. In it we find history, biography, and narrative; we find essays, poems, and stories. These vary much in moral elevation and in helpfulness. They ascend to the mountain tops where the air is pure and where we may see God face to face; but they descend also to depths where we seem for a time to reach after him vainly. We enter into the family life of rude peoples, and we stand before kings; we march to battle with Joshua or Saul, and hear the savage order to slay and spare not, and again we see forgiveness and brotherly kindness when Esau meets with the brother who has tricked and deceived him, or when Joseph weeps on the neck of his brethren who would have slain him. Brutal teaching and violation of sacred guest-right are seen side by side with noble self-sacrifice and true courage. The whole gamut of human nature is sounded—the harsh discords of strife and selfishness, mingling with clear, high notes of charity and long-suffering; and the whole softened and sweetened by distance, blends into a grand oratorio whose central theme is God.

The Hebrew people, as no others, have shown the sense of God's presence. Their tradition of creation, brought with them from the idolatrous nation from which they sprung, is changed and illuminated by this sense so that from a petty and superstitious tale of the acts and contests of man-like gods, it becomes a majestic and worthy hymn of God's power and presence. In like manner the story of the deluge, a mere mischievous caprice in the Babylonian legend, becomes in Hebrew hands a stern reminder that the wages of sin is death. We are not left in ignorance as to the manner in which this revelation came to the Hebrews. It was by the direct teaching of the Father to one fitted to hear Him. "The word of the Lord came to Abram." And because of this word this first Hebrew went out from his place and people to be the founder of the family which should serve the Self-revealer. That he was a man like ourselves is evinced in many failings, but that, as to ourselves, the word of God still came to him, every page of his history tells. The effect of such effort to follow the voice of the inspeaking God is shown not only in the increasing majesty to be observed in the character of Abram and in his relations with other men as made clear in the Bible narratives; but also in the high esteem with which he is regarded by other peoples than the Hebrews, who look to him as their forefather, and especially in the name which they apply to him—the Friend of God. The sense of God's presence is not lost in his descendants. Though less elevated in character and less faithful to God's monitor, Isaac and Jacob show, nevertheless, and increasingly in their later years, that Jehovah is with them. God's message is partly stifled, but not lost. We shall see in the next quarter how another prophet arose to make clear again the word half-forgotten.

The high conception of Jehovah among the Hebrews is made clearer by contrast with other more or less related families round about them—the Chaldeans, from whom they came out, the Canaanites, among whom they lived, the Egyptians, who were their neighbors.

As to the transmission of the Hebrew message to us we find that Genesis, as also many of the following books, was drawn together by a writer, probably only a few hundreds of years before the Christian era. In much earlier times priests and prophets had seized upon ancient story and tradition to impress upon their people the presence and the message of their God. This latter priest or prophet did a like work for the people of his own time—knitting together the fragments which the earlier prophets had left him. His aim was, like theirs, an ethical one. He did not seek to teach history, but religion; not man, but God. History is, therefore, everywhere subordinate to the main purpose. They do themselves and the Bible wrong who seek to test its value by the ordinary canons of historical criticism. Such tests are properly used when we are seeking to trace the history of the Hebrew or allied peoples; but its value as a religious book lies quite elsewhere. The early chapters of Genesis are not valuable because they agree with the evidence of geology or of evolution; they do not so agree. They are valuable because they show that many thousands of years ago God revealed himself to men and that as a God of righteousness. The later chapters of Genesis are not valuable because they agree with the facts brought to light by ethnology and archæology—though it is of interest to find that they do so agree in the main; they are valuable because they bear witness to God's close dealing with men in ancient days and thereby help us, who believe him to be the same yesterday, to-day, and forever, to reach out after him to-day if haply we may find him. If we make this the central theme of our study in our further lessons on the Old Testament, to see that God reveals himself directly to men, that he is righteous and demands righteousness—we will find new light and leading in its pages.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS, PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 13.—THIRD MONTH 26.

REVIEW.

GOLDEN TEXT.—My sheep hear my voice, and I know them, and they follow me.—John x., 27.

REVISED VERSION.

FOLLOWING the rule of the "International" committee, the last lesson of the quarter is a Review of twelve lessons which have been studied.

The thought of the twelve lessons is only in part represented by the golden text above. The essential spiritual teaching that runs through them all may be divided into three thoughts:

1. The Divine Life.
2. The Light shining from the Divine Life.
3. The Life and Light to be enjoyed by those who follow the Christ.

The teaching throughout the lessons is spiritual. It is placed high in the first golden text of the twelve: "In him was life, and the life was the light of men,"—referring to the Word, the Divine Spirit, which entered into and possessed Jesus, making him the Christ. This is the note which is found in the whole course of the Gospel of John, and from which it rarely turns far aside. This thought we must follow in our review.

"In him was life." As was pointed out in the lesson, (First month 1), the pronoun "him," representing the Word, or "Logos," is imperfect and inadequate. This Divine spiritual force confers life, and is life,—that life which was in Jesus, that which those who are partakers with him will enjoy also. "For as the Father hath life in himself even so gave he to the Son to have life in himself," is the declaration, (John, v., 26), and Jesus, in the figurative language which he used in his teaching in the 6th chapter of John, said, (v., 51): "I am the living bread which came down out of heaven; if any man eat of this bread, he shall live forever,"—meaning, plainly, that the divine nature which he possessed, if partaken of by those whom he addressed, would be in them a life eternally enduring.

"The life was the light of men." This form of the spiritual thought—that the Divine life, or spirit, was light,—appears in several of the lessons. Nearly the same is found in the Old Testament. Thus, in the Psalms, (xxvii):

"The Lord is my light and my salvation, whom shall I fear? The Lord is the strength of my life, of whom shall I be afraid?"

and in Isaiah, (lx., 19): "The Lord shall be unto thee an everlasting Light." Daniel, (ii., 22) says: "He revealeth the deep and secret things: he knoweth what is in the darkness, and the light dwelleth with Him." "O, house of Jacob," is the cry of Isaiah, (ii., 5), "come ye, and let us walk in the light of the Lord." The teaching of the new dispensation is well exemplified in the first Epistle of John, in several texts. Thus, (i., 5): "God is light and in him is no darkness at all." (Verse 7): "If we walk in the light, as he is in the light, we have fellowship one with another." So, (ii., 10): "He that loveth his brother abideth in the light."

"The divinity of Christ [says Samuel M. Janney, in his life of George Fox] is his light, the indwelling of divine power, the divine Word (or Logos) which was and is manifested in him, and which through him gives life to all his members, for 'it pleased the Father that in him should all fullness dwell.' The eternal Word, or Holy Spirit, is the manifestation of God;—omnipresent, but invisible, yet made known to the quickened conscience as a reprover for sin;—'a spirit of judgment and a spirit of burning' to the guilty soul, but to the obedient and pure in heart a comforter in righteousness."

"Follow me." This third branch into which we have divided the Review is not less vital than the others. The lesson of the parable of the Good Shepherd is essentially that expressed in the brief golden text employed in Lesson No. 2. The thought is closely associated with that of the divine Light and Life. "He that followeth me," declared Jesus, "shall not walk in the darkness, but shall have the light of life." (John, viii., 12). "There was the true light, even the light which lighteth every man coming into the world," (John, i., 9), and this, abiding in and manifested by Jesus, making him the Christ, is that which the Christian must "in spirit and in truth," follow after.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE PLAIN LANGUAGE.

As I meet with all classes of people, and converse with them, the more I become strongly impressed with the advantage of the use of our plain language to others, as well as to members of our beloved Society. Many persons whom I have met near home, but more especially those far away, when I have addressed them with "thee" would remark, "I observe you are a Friend," and some would say, "my grandparents were Friends," or "I had an uncle or an aunt who was a Friend." Others would state, "I have heard of Friends, but never had the opportunity of meeting any. I have heard much about them, especially their belief, mode of worship, and their practical religion,"—and thus there was opened the way on several occasions to give them further information regarding Friends.

When my wife and I have been riding in the cars persons hearing us use the plain language to each other, have come to us and said, "We are glad to meet Friends among so many strangers; we, too, are members of the Society of Friends;" and this has added on many occasions interest and pleasure to our journey.

I think it very important that we as a Religious Society keep to the plain language, not only on account of the advantages and satisfaction it may give us as members in passing through life, but on account of what many in the beginning of our Society had to suffer because they addressed others with "thou" and "thee."

Very many instances can be given where a large number suffered, on account of their using the singular language in addressing relatives and others.

There are good reasons why our early Friends bore a testimony to its use. Some of them I will mention. First, it had been used in all ages of the world till the ninth century; then, in honor of an Emperor, to convey to him by his subjects that he had more power than that of an individual, the nobles, the "great," and the common people began to use "you" to him, and in the course of time most persons and nations fell into the use of the plural word you, instead of thou and thee, in addressing another person.

Second, we do not find you to a single person in the Bible. Third, the plain language, thou, (not you), to one person, is grammatical, and it is the language of kindness. Perhaps all Friends for two centuries used it from a sense of duty, and many at this time feel it to be still one of our important testimonies.

From my own experience I feel it right to encourage all of our members to use it, in addressing persons of all ages, and all classes of people whether they belong with us or not. ALLEN FLITCRAFT.

Chester, Pa., Third month 8, 1899.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

PETER THE GREAT AND THE FRIENDS.

NICHOLAS II. of Russia has been so much talked of, the relation of his military policy to his theory has been so thoroughly discussed, of late he has become so prominent a character, that it may be of interest to note a similar blending of opposite interests in his ancestor, Peter the Great, who, while he was in England two hundred years ago, studying the tactics of her army and navy, became interested in the early Friends and their teachings.

In the quaint old journal of the life of Thomas Story, printed in England in 1747, is related an account of an interview of the writer with Peter the Great. In 1696 the Czar was in London "incognito," and the brother of Robert Barclay's wife hearing that a kinsman of his was in the Czar's service, went to the royal residence, accompanied by Story. Upon being admitted to an upper hall they met two men, (who afterward proved to be the Czar and his interpreter). The Czar asked, through his interpreter, "Why do you not pay respect to great persons when you are in their presence?" Story explained the principles of his sect, and how, though they had laid aside "vain and empty shows of respect and duty and flattering titles," yet they felt a sincere respect, and yielded ready obedience to lawful commands. To this the Czar made no reply, but talked again with his interpreter, who asked, "Of what use can you be in any kingdom or government, seeing that you will not bear arms and fight?" Story said that many had fought in times past, in "days of ignorance," but that the error of it having been revealed to them, and they being commanded to love their enemies, there no longer remained the right to fight and destroy them. He explained in clear and logical statements the exact position held by Friends; that they were concerned with husbandry, manufactures, and other peaceful pursuits, at the same time paying taxes and conforming to the government in all things approved by conscience. After further questioning they left, leaving a copy of "Barclay's Apology" for the Czar, and requested that he would give his protection to any Friends who might go to his country. The next First-day the Czar and his attendants went to the meeting in Grace Church Street. After this he went to Deptford to learn ship-building, and while there he attended their meetings. "Behaving as a private person, and very social, changing seats and standing or sitting as occasion might be, to accommodate others as well as himself." [An item relating to these visits to Deptford appeared in the INTELLIGENCER, First-month 14, last.]

In the year 1712 the Czar was in the city of Frederickstadt, with five thousand soldiers, to assist the Danes against the Swedes. After quartering his men he inquired of a burgomaster whether there were any Quakers in the city. The officers told him that there were a few. The Czar desired them to hold a meeting, that he might attend, and he was much displeased when told that some of his soldiers had been quartered in the meeting-house. He ordered his captain to take them out and when the house was clear a meeting was arranged, which the Czar and a number of Russian nobles and officers attended; they gave respectful and interested attention to the words of Philip Defair. The Czar commended what he had heard, and said that whoever could live according to that doctrine would be happy.

HENRIETTA STEWART SMITH.

George School, Pa.

A BLESSED SECRET.—It is a blessed secret, this of living by the day. Any one can carry his burden, however heavy, till nightfall. Any one can do his work, however hard, for one day. Any one can live sweetly, patiently, lovingly and purely till the sun goes down. And this is all that life ever really means to us, just one little day. Do to-day's duty, fight to-day's temptations, and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things you cannot see and could not understand if you saw them. God gives nights to shut down the curtain of darkness on our little days. We cannot see beyond. Short horizons make life easier and give us one of the blessed secrets of the brave, true, holy, living.—Christian Work.

RELIGION is the aspiration of the soul after God, the search after truth, the endeavor after righteousness. Dogmas and doctrines may fade and vanish away; but these three, God, Truth, Righteousness, an eternal Trinity, remain the same, yesterday, to-day, and forever.—William D. Little.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

A PARAGRAPH FROM JOHN COMLY.

WHEN I was a lad, in the early '30's, for several summers I attended Henry Pike's and Henry Griscom's schools at Byberry, and had the frequent opportunity and pleasure of listening to the sermons of John Comly, and I now love to turn to page 414 of his Journal, in which occurs the following passage, viz:

"The life of God in the soul is the true happiness of man. The Spirit of God, ruling and directing the powers of man, constitutes the kingdom of Heaven within him. This is true religion; and produces all the comfort and happiness of this life, and also prepares the soul for the enjoyment of perfect bliss in the world to come."

I am in my 77th year, which was the period when dear John Comly left this state of being, and I am engaged now in the desire to realize the above description. And feeling this necessity for myself, I have felt it also for some of the readers of the INTELLIGENCER, in an especial degree and manner, as the one thing needful for us all.

D. N.

Willow Grove, Pa.

A WORD FROM BISHOP PARET.

THE Episcopal bishop of the Diocese of Maryland, William Paret, "a firm advocate of Peace," writes to the Baltimore Sun, 7th instant, urging action in behalf of the Disarmament Conference. Now that we are no longer at war, he says, "we can begin to think more calmly, and to look beyond the atmosphere of immediate pressure. We can stop concentrating our intense interest upon our relations with a single nation and listen to the call to a larger view in the interest of all nations and of all mankind."

"I know that the sincerity of the Czar's call for peace has been questioned. However that may be, the opportunity, the possibility, the probability of an international congress in which all the great powers of the world shall be represented by their best men, to study the question of disarmament, is rich with hope. But I cannot see that it has met with very serious consideration anywhere. The Great Powers of Europe have some of them given answer, and in many ways, in England especially, action is proposed and begun for the furtherance of the movement for peace."

"But in this country there has been no really generous answer to the Czar's noble invitation. We can have time and freedom of thought now to consider what answer we shall make. . . . May not the voice of the nation be heard on this most important matter, and so heard that it shall waken our statesmen in office to generous and positive coöperation?"

"I have no definite action to propose. I only wish to express my own most earnest wish that the Czar's wonderful invitation to the world, this strange appeal for peace, should have the consideration which it deserves from all who love God, and all who love their fellow-men."

WILLIAM PARET."

THE common opportunity comes, as the divinest opportunity in the whole history of the world came, cradled in obscurity.—Christian Union.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 18, 1899.

THE CHOICE LAST YEAR.

VERY earnest appeals continue to be made for various relief measures in Cuba, and it appears that many of the people there are still in want. At one of the cities where the public works were discontinued, a few days ago, the free distribution of food had to be immediately begun, the number to be fed being about three thousand.

In connection with this it may be noted that there have now been filed with the Department of State at Washington "claims" to the amount of twenty-one millions of dollars, on account of property destroyed in Cuba, belonging to American citizens, or for personal injuries for which money "damages" are asked. By the terms of the "Peace Treaty" it was agreed that each nation, Spain and the United States, should pay such claims of its own citizens, and when Congress reassembles those mentioned will be sent in for that body to struggle with.

Of the appropriations made by the Congress which just adjourned, over four hundred and eighty-two millions of dollars is described by the Chairman of the House Appropriations Committee, Representative Cannon, as "directly chargeable to our late war with Spain, or incident thereto," and, as a matter of fact, the amount really spent on the war, including contracts made, new ships built, the continuing military operations, the pension list which is accumulating, and scores of other accounts, will swell this item enormously, and probably double it. It is not unsafe to say that counting everything, from the beginning of the calendar year 1898 to the time when, under the most favorable circumstances now in view, we can hope for peace, the expenditure of the United States because of the Spanish War will be not less than one thousand millions of dollars. And this, as already said, means that the war in the Philippines shall soon be ended, that Cuba and Porto Rico shall be quiet and orderly, and that the swarm of extravagant militarist schemes shall be held strictly in check.

We mention these facts simply as facts. But there is one more which belongs in their connection. A little more than a year ago, when food was being sent to the "reconcentrados," the victims of the cruel conditions of war in Cuba, and when it was said the President proposed to ask Congress for an additional million dollars for the purpose, a vehement outcry arose over such a use of money. A member of the House from Michigan, whose name need not be recalled, was especially loud in declarations that he never would vote another dollar in this way, except upon terms such as must cause immediate war. The plan of feeding the people who were in need of food was thereupon halted at that point, and the conflict of arms was precipitated. Refusing angrily to grant another million in bread, Congress and the country chose instead to spend a certain five hundred millions, an almost certain one thousand millions, and a probable still larger sum, in the operations of war. Meantime, of course, the "reconcentrados" perished, and a new class of the starving were produced, whose thousands we now have in Cuba asking further charitable aid.

It is said by some that this choice of procedure last year, by Congress and by—perhaps—a majority of the people, was compulsory and unavoidable, but this saying is void of truth. The fact is that the choice was forced by those who were bent on war, and that there was not, at that moment, any compulsion whatever. That such a course should have been taken appears in the light of the facts that now are presenting themselves,—and the long and evil chapter is only fairly beginning to be unrolled,—as sad evidence how far we are from the conditions we were supposed to have reached. All this waste of the products of peaceful industry,—for every dollar of the thousand millions has to be earned by toil of laborers in field, or shop; "money," so called, is not really produced in any other way,—indicates not that the human mind is intelligent and "advanced," but that it is crude and primitive, and that it needs yet deep draughts of Christian grace to quench the fires of old paganism.

It is too true, indeed, as Bishop Paret, of Maryland, says, that "in this country there has been no really generous answer to the Czar's noble invitation." The silence at Washington is painful. We confess we should have expected something of influence for such a good cause from the Secretary of the Navy, John D. Long, who has been known as a "square-edged man"—to use the phrase of another of the men of Massachusetts, Henry Wilson,—but even Secretary Long has been silent, and his speech at the Boston banquet was one of avoidance and excuse on the Philippine question. We find the Christian Register itself,—possibly on the Secretary's account,—treating the subject as cautiously "as though walking on eggs." Is it possible that Boston and the Unitarian body are so infatuated with war that this caution is necessary?

As we have heretofore said, no one thing has done more to balk the Disarmament effort than the false attitude of the United States. No help has been given it officially, and our delight with our war operations has far more than offset the unofficial expression. This country should have been the most earnest and energetic supporter of the Czar's proposal, but it seems even less so than the Government of England.

BIRTHS.

ROSS.—In Medina, N. Y., Twelfth month 7, 1898, to DeForest G. and Lina Vail Ross, a daughter, who is named Mary Loraine.

STILES.—In Camden, N. J., Twelfth month 28, 1898, to Charles and Susan P. Stiles, a daughter, who is named Marion Susan.

MARRIAGES.

IREDELL—BORTON.—At the residence of the bride's parents, near Mullica Hill, N. J., Third month 8, 1899, under the care of Pilesgrove Monthly Meeting, Clinton, son of Charles and Deborah Iredell, to Martha H., daughter of Aaron W. and Sarah S. Borton.

LIPPINCOTT—DUDLEY.—At the home of the bride's parents, near Moorestown, New Jersey, Second month 22, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, James Hansell, son of Richard R. and Ella H. Lippincott, of Rancocas, N. J., and Lida Borton, daughter of Charles H. and Sarah H. Dudley.

ROGERS—ROBERTS.—At the residence of the bride's grandmother, Rachel L. Evans, Cinnaminson, N. J., Third month 1, 1899, under the care of Chester Monthly Meeting, Walter J. Rogers, son of Josiah and Martha Rogers, of Lumberton, N. J., and Gertrude E. Roberts, of Cinnaminson, N. J., daughter of Priscilla and the late Enoch Roberts.

SNYDER—SMITH.—At the home of the bride's parents, Edward H. and Carrie E. Smith, in East Pittsburg, Allegheny county, Pa., Second month 15, 1899, Albert H. Snyder and Helen Elizabeth Smith, granddaughter of Elizabeth E. Eyre, of Newtown, Pa.

DEATHS.

FAWCETT.—At Westminster, Cal., on the 1st inst., Sinah Gregg Fawcett, wife of T. W. Fawcett, in the 83d year of her age.

She was born in Belmont county, Ohio, and was the daughter of Jacob and Mary Sinclair Gregg, who settled in that county near the beginning of the present century. Making a home in the wilderness near what is now the town of Belmont. In 1851 the subject of this sketch entered into marriage with T. W. Fawcett, and they continued to reside in Belmont county until 1864, when they moved to Chariton, Iowa, and remained until 1887, when they removed to and settled at Westminster, Orange county, California. She was a birthright member of the Society of Friends, and although during far the larger portion of her marriage life she was isolated from Friends, yet she held to the teachings of the old-time Quakers until the end. She was always held in high esteem in the various places where she resided, taking an active part in the various reforms of the day, and doing all she could for the relief of distress wherever found. Her only regret at crossing the river was leaving her aged and blind husband, to whose wants she had administered for so many years. * *

LAMBORN.—At Elmira, N. Y., Third month 5, 1899, Lewis Lamborn, in his 76th year. Interment at Old Kennett, Pa.

MIDDLETON.—Third month 8, 1899, in New York, suddenly, William B. Middleton, of High Bridge, N. J., son of Hannah S. and the late Nathan Middleton, of Philadelphia; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street, Philadelphia.

MOORE.—In Germantown, Philadelphia, Third month 7, 1899, Francis W., son of Samuel W. and Esther R. Moore, aged 22 years.

PAIST.—Third month 7, 1899, Harriet W., widow of Mahlon K. Paist, and daughter of the late Reuben and Sarah J. Webb, in her 72d year; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street, Philadelphia.

PERKINS.—At Chester Pa., Third month 2, 1899, Annabella L. Perkins, daughter of Franklin and Hannah Lloyd, and wife of Caleb C. Perkins, aged 60 years and 3 months; a member of Darby Monthly Meeting of Friends.

ROBINS.—Near Auburn, N. J., Third month 8, 1899, Joseph Robins, aged 81 years; a member of Pilesgrove Monthly Meeting.

Funeral and interment at Mullica Hill, N. J.

TOWNSEND.—In Byberry, Philadelphia, Twelfth month 30, 1898, Mahlon Townsend, aged 79 years.

CORRECTION.—In the notice of the death of Rebecca Temple, Third month 4, it should have been stated that she died near Ercildoun, Chester county, Pa., and that the interment was at Ercildoun Friends' ground.

LYDIA E. CARR.

Lydia E. Carr died at her home, 260 Bowen Avenue, Chicago, Ill. She was a twin daughter of Jehiel and Lydia Wasson; was born in Laporte county, Indiana, Eighth month 23, 1840. In 1855, after her mother's death, her father moved his family to Milton, Wayne county, Indiana, where she spent her girlhood days. She was married to Oliver K. Carr, Sixth month 12, 1861. Most of their married life was spent in Iowa.

She was a member of Winona Monthly Meeting of the Society of Friends. She dearly loved their principles, and taught them to her children. About sixteen years were spent in Mitchellville, where she had many friends.

Seven children and four grandchildren are left to mourn the loss of a patient, loving mother, and all were present to administer to her comfort. The eldest, Rachel Searcy, of Aurora, Ind., John M. J. Carr, of Chicago, Ill., Dr. Jesse W. Carr, of Sheridan, Ill., are married; Ruthanna, a faithful daughter, who was ever ready to add to the comfort of her mother; Clarence T., and Isaac K., affectionate sons, who are just growing into manhood; the youngest, Oliver Kinsey, a devoted child, whom it was hard for her to leave.

She had four sisters living: Charlotte W. Cocks, of Mendon Centre, N. Y., Dr. Sarah W. Andrews, of Chicago, (who at the present time is in Europe), her twin sister Martha A. Mason, of Ruth, Stone county, Missouri, and Eliza W. Morris, of Richmond, Ind., who was with her during her last illness. She bore her suffering with that patience which is born of God. Her life was a living example to us all. The burial took place at Milton, Ind., her former home, Third month 3. E. W. M.

DANIEL UNDERHILL.

The decease of Daniel Underhill, of Jericho, Long Island, marked the close of an unobtrusive, kindly life, one little influenced by the activity that characterizes the movements of the present day, yet deeply interested in education, and those things that better human life.

For a lifetime he faithfully performed his duty as a member of the Society of Friends, holding important positions in the meeting until the time of his death. He seldom if ever missed the hour of social worship when health permitted, and was an authority on the proper and right order of conducting meetings for business. The hospitality of his home will long be remembered by ministering Friends and others. To him, as to many another, we owe a debt of gratitude that they did their part in upholding the truth for which we as a Religious Society stand. * *

THEODORE WHITSON.

At his home in Atglen, Chester county, Pa., First month 5, 1899, Theodore Whitson, 58 years of age. His illness was a short and severe one, but was borne with great fortitude and patience.

He was the son of Thomas and Martha Whitson, and was born in Bart township, Lancaster county, Second month 12, 1840. He married Eliza Rakestraw, a daughter of Abraham and Lydia Rakestraw, and to them were born seven children, five of whom are now living.

As a member of the Society of Friends, he was a conscientious attender of the meetings and First-day school held at Sadsbury. He was gifted with a bright intellect, and was always well versed in public affairs. He founded what might be termed a perfect home, and will there be sadly missed.

He was a devoted husband, kind and loving father, and looked well after the welfare of his family. Children now grown to manhood and womanhood rejoice in the privilege to rise up and call him blessed. He was always an advocate of the highest standard of education, and his efforts helped to establish his children in that way.

What better monument could stand to the memory of any man than the sacredness of a well established home? While not a worldly man, he was highly esteemed and appreciated by those of the community in which he lived.

His love of truth, his constant example for better living, were uplifting and encouraging to those around him. He had that rare sympathy with boys and young men, which allowed him to hold their confidence, and made them realize his true interest in their every-day life and their ambitions.

His friendship had a charm for all and his good works will live after him. Always quiet, always dignified, truly he bore himself at manhood's simple level—that level which requires no epitaph to explain it, needs no adjective to describe it, but bears itself high as the stars in heaven—"God's noblest work—an honest man." And when on that day, rich and poor, black and white, gathered to perform the last sad rites, we could but think of the lines he loved so well, "and if everyone to whom he did some little act of kindness were to place upon his grave a single flower, he would sleep to-night beneath a multitude of roses." B.

VISITS TO NEW JERSEY FRIENDS.—II.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

ON Sixth-day morning (Third month 3), our friend T. Randolph Swain came for us and took us eight miles to the home of Thomas Gibbs, where a hearty welcome was given us. Thence we went in the evening to a meeting in the town hall at Columbus. Although the weather was still unpleasant, quite a large meeting gathered composed of different denominations who attentively received the message given. There were expressions of thankfulness for the opportunity. After meeting we went home with Thomas Harvey and wife, and here, too, we found another social home, which we much enjoyed. Seventh-day afternoon Thomas took us to the cars en route for Salem, at which place we were kindly met by Jonathan Bradway, and taken to his hospitable home for the night. First-day morning they took us about six miles to Hancock's Bridge, to attend a circular meeting. This meeting was well attended for the place. The testimony called for was the defining the nature of religion, its object and effect; it called forth from our friend Rachel M. Lippincott a tender prayer of thankfulness for the precious season we had enjoyed. We went home with Jeremiah Powell, with whom and his daughter, a grand-daughter of my friend Mary Bradway, we spent a few hours very pleasantly, and then returned to Salem to take tea with Joshua Waddington and family,—the father of our Baltimore Friend, Pauline W. Holm. After a pleasant visit we started for the meeting which had been appointed for the evening. This was largely attended and great openness was manifested. I felt called on to give the reasons for our ideas of salvation and restoration. We went home with Woodnutt Pettit and wife.

Third month 6th. We made a call this morning on Sarah Acton, an aged Friend who was not able to be out at meeting last evening; then returned to Woodnutt Pettit's to dine, and remained until time to take train for Woodstown, where our friend Joel Borton met us and took us to his hospitable home.

Third-day morning when we awakened we were surprised to find a severe snow-storm raging, rendering the prospect of our day's service disagreeable; but about 9.30 we started to attend a meeting at Elmer, about nine miles from Joel's. Eliza decided to remain at Joel's and rest, which we all deemed wise. We went to Reuben Woolman's to dinner, and found a kind welcome. The meeting was to be held at 2.30 p. m., and before that time the storm abated, but we found the people, who perhaps did not understand the habits of Friends, thought we would not come, so the meeting was small, but all felt it to have been a profitable season, and that though few, the Lord was in our midst. We returned to Joel's immediately after meeting, feeling none the worse for our ride in the storm.

On Fourth-day morning we went with Joel and Mary Borton to visit the school, (Bacon Academy, Woodstown), and to be present at an entertainment given the children by Rebecca B. Nicholson; consisting of views of various places on the Great Northern route to the Pacific coast, and up to the Muir Glacier, which we all enjoyed very much. In the afternoon I addressed the scholars on the subject of Temperance, in accordance with the wish of the Educational Committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting that such instruction should be given in the schools. The children listened with attention, as I endeavored to present the subject so all could understand it. At 3 p. m., the meeting of ministers and elders convened. In this meeting I had some pretty close labor, and had to leave a word of encouragement for some who were at times despairing.

In the evening a meeting was called under the auspices of the Philanthropic Committee to consider the subject of Temperance, from the standpoint of a letter prepared for the purpose by Edward H. Magill of Swarthmore. I had been requested to present the aim and purpose, as well as the methods of the Anti-Saloon League, as referred to in the letter, and also to speak on the license system from the financial standpoint. The meeting seemed to be deeply interested in the presentation made, and expressions were made in favor of organizing a League to carry on the work.

Fifth-day morning, although cloudy, and threatening falling weather, a large meeting gathered, to whom a message of practical righteousness was delivered, apparently meeting the witness in many hearts. At the close a deep feeling of solemnity had overspread the meeting, which was deepened by a fervent and appropriate supplication by Joel Borton. The meeting entered upon its routine business in such a condition as to enable it to transact the affairs of the church in much harmony.

JOHN J. CORNELL.

Woodstown, N. J., Third month 10.

FOREIGN missions are said to have taught the Chinese many lessons in human philanthropy. The mission hospitals have been an object-lesson which the Chinese have not been slow in learning, and to-day there are a number of native hospitals and free dispensaries throughout China.

LETTERS FROM ISAAC WILSON.—XII.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

ARRIVING at Rising Sun about 7 p. m., I find our friend Edwin Buffington in waiting to take me to his pleasant home, where a few hours are socially enjoyed with the family and some Friends that called. Sixth-day morning is quite cloudy and threatening rain, but a drive of ten miles is before us, over hills and muddy roads, causing us to be a little late. Yet a number arrived after us, and considering the roads and weather it was (to me) a large meeting, and the feeling of thankfulness and appreciation for the privilege was only mingled with regrets because of the very brief time allotted here.

We went to dine at Neal Hambleton's, but could only enjoy that pleasant home a short time and say farewell to them and my escort, E. Buffington, and drive two miles again to a train for Oxford. I was pleased to have the company of other Friends for the same point, and the hour of waiting at Oxford was spent in a pleasant call at Dr. Coates's, as suggested by a young Friend. Resuming the journey, I soon arrived at Toughkenamon, where after a short wait my wife and daughter from Swarthmore joined me, and the carriage being in waiting, we were soon in the home of our dear friends Bennett and Tacie Walton, at London Grove, from which we went two months ago. On Seventh-day a large company of friends and relatives gathered to the marriage reception of their youngest son, and an enjoyable day was spent.

First-day morning, after considerable rain, with thunder and lightning, we find it still dull and threatening, but were pleased to find at the meeting hour so large a gathering, some coming several miles, notwithstanding the unfavorable condition of the roads. The feeling of thankfulness and appreciation was given utterance to by many, and some to whom it was the first Friends' meeting, expressed words of satisfaction. After lunch, and a few hours' stay with our friends, we say our farewell and take the train to Chester, where upon our arrival, we are pleased to find our friends Joel Borton and wife, with whom we spent a very pleasant evening.

Second-day morning, (6th), with feelings of thankfulness for the many privileges of social and religious mingling during the past weeks in this and other homes, we turn our faces homeward. We spent the day in Philadelphia, making some calls and taking tea with our friends Samuel and Sarah Ash, and spending the night at the home of our friends Allan and Sarah Evanson. Rising on Third-day, we were surprised to find it snowing again, and not unlike another blizzard, but we soon leave for New York, arriving safely at noon, and find the same welcome that has been our privilege to enjoy on many previous occasions in the home of our esteemed friend, Jane C. Russell. Fourth-day the storm had ceased, and a beautiful clear atmosphere was enjoyed, as we proceeded to their Fourth-day meeting, where the school children came in, and the meeting was enjoyed.

After dining and having a pleasant visit with a number of friends at the Penington, we return with our hostess (with the additional company of our dear friend Serena Minard), to spend the evening. Fifth-day was spent socially, with a call or two, and in the afternoon we went to Flushing, L. I., to spend a few hours with Dr. Brown, (a Canadian cousin), Superintendent of Sanford Hall, and his genial wife and sister. Sixth-day is also spent in a social visit with our friends in New York, and in the afternoon we much enjoyed a drive to Grant's Monument, and other places of interest, returning near evening. We were joined by our friend Henry W. Wilbur, and the evening was enjoyably spent. I. W.

New York, Third month 11.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

JOHN J. CORNELL proposes to attend the meetings at Race Street on First-day, 19th instant, at 10.30, a.m., and 7.30 p.m.

At West Philadelphia meeting, to-morrow, 19th instant, (11 a.m.), the company of Margaretta Walton is expected. Prof. Joseph S. Walton will address the First-day school at 10 a.m.

The Friends' meeting (O.) at New Providence, Iowa, which "silenced" the San José, Cal., Friends, (Joel Bean and others), and later dropped them and several others from its membership roll, has rescinded the latter action. The Friend, (Philadelphia), of the 4th instant, states that on the 18th of last month, the following minute was adopted: "This meeting having recinded its action in regard to certain San José Friends who were dropped from membership in Fifth month, 1898, are now united in rescinding said action, and in restoring the following Friends to membership in this meeting." (The names follow).

THE PHILIPPINE CRISIS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

THE conditions which at the present time confront the American republic are such that it seems to me Friends should break away from the inertia that has too much characterized the Society relative to secular affairs. While Friends are using their influence to promote the welfare of mankind for the world to come, they should not neglect the duty they own to the living, and the generations yet to come, in the way of an endeavor by their efforts to check the tendency toward an imperialistic, or, as some prefer to term it, an "expansion" policy, with its accompaniment of extravagance in public expenditures, and its most wilful negligence in executing the laws against trusts and combinations, now forming, to the great detriment of the poor, and of the middle class of society.

I read with gratified interest the comments of the INTELLIGENCER on the President's Boston banquet speech. The position you take on the expansion question is certainly the only correct one, and the one, I trust, that both branches of the Society of Friends will unanimously assume, regardless of the inclination to adhere to party. If the INTELLIGENCER erred, it was in not placing the responsibility a little more forcibly where it belongs—with President McKinley. Action is needed now, before hundreds, perhaps, thousands, more defenseless people shall have been sacrificed to our army's bullets. President McKinley should act at once. The people are powerless; we have no law of referendum. The encouragement to war which the President may receive from an obsequious and subsidized press is not the voice of the people. He said in his speech that the Philippine question is now with Congress, but at the same time the "Administration" Senators opposed a resolution offered in the Senate, the object of which was to define the position of our government, and which declared the United States entertained no intention of holding the Philippines, but that they should be ultimately free and independent.

However contrary to Peace principles, as held by many, it was from motives of kindness, and an innate love of liberty, that a majority of the people of the United States insisted on interceding by force to put down Spanish tyranny in Cuba, but they had no idea that after hostilities had been inaugurated and successfully terminated, the principles of the republic would be ignored and a war of conquest, if not extermination, would be urged against the Filipinos.

I heartily concur in the sentiment expressed by your correspondent, David Ferris, of Wilmington, and agree with him that a remonstrance to the President and Congress should be sent, but would also suggest that a little time be taken to circulate a petition among every Friends' meeting, of both branches of the Society, throughout the United States, and that it be presented to the next session of Congress, when it shall convene in special or regular session.

WM. H. VORE.

Lincoln, Neb., Third month 6.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I was much interested and gratified with the opinions expressed by the editors of the INTELLIGENCER in the issue of the 25th, and by David Ferris's letter. I was glad to learn that there were Friends who felt it their duty to protest against the slaughtering of a people by our Government, whose offense is that they desire their liberty. While the President says they will be aided in every possible way to be a self-respecting and self-governing people, and describes us as philanthropic emancipators, and "that no imperial design lurks in the American mind," how can we be expected to be considered sincere, when our army and navy are killing thousands of those people?

Yet we are told that we must show our "patriotism" by sanctioning the President's policy—no matter how much it violates our convictions of what is right, and what is wrong. Certainly it is the duty of every one that believes in the principles professed by Friends to use their influence to prevent the dangers which threaten the overthrow of our republican form of government, which was intended, Abraham Lincoln said, to be a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, not controlled by a one-man power. Any one who was a close observer of the persistent effort to have a great standing army established in this country, and to grant the President the absolute power to control it, could not do other than realize the danger that we should have a law passed which would be injurious to the liberty of our people. Such a proceeding should not be allowed if we expect to retain our free institutions. I fear that the President's exercise of the great power which the war has given him has tended to smother his professions for peace, and his frequently avowed purpose of consulting the people. The whole tendency of a military government is to deprive the people of their liberties, and the trend of it is toward a one-man power, a dictatorship. Are the American people willing to accept that condition? That is the question for them to decide.

ELIZABETH A. ROGERS.

Crosswicks, N. J.

AN ADDRESS TO THE CZAR.

AFTER an address to a meeting at the Coulter Street (O.) meeting-house, Germantown, Philadelphia, on the 20th ult., by Anna Evreinoff, the Russian lady who is now speaking in this county, an address to the Czar was introduced and extensively signed. (It is given below.)

Copies of this address are placed at the office of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, and elsewhere, to be signed. We also suggest that it can be cut out of the INTELLIGENCER, pasted on a sheet (neatly) and names added. We shall be glad to receive and forward any that may be so prepared.

"We, the undersigned, sovereign citizens of the United States of America, without regard to race, creed, or political affinity, desire to express our hearty sympathy with the Czar's noble effort for the cause of God and humanity.

"Appreciating the difficulties which confront him at home and abroad, we admire the high moral courage with which he dares to face them, in the faith which, in all ages, has removed mountains.

"We think no more fitting place can be found from which to start an American crusade than this city of Philadelphia (Brotherly Love), and this State of Pennsylvania, whose founder, in 1693, published an appeal for arbitration to the nations of Europe, while war was raging among them, and practically gave them an illustrious example of what a colony can be whose chief defenses are arbitration and justice extended to all men.

"Here, from the Cradle of Liberty, where later we proclaimed that not only ourselves but all the world, had a right to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness, we stretch forth the helping hand to Russia, our friend, when she 'bringeth good tidings, when she publisheth peace.'"

TRUTH, patience, faith, a conscience crystal clear.
For these press on, nor pause, and thou shalt be Lifted into a peace that knows no fear.—Celia Thaxter.

Educational Department.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE ANNUAL CATALOGUE.

THE annual Catalogue and Register of Swarthmore College, for 1898-99, has been issued, in a pamphlet of 71 pages, and is a document of more than ordinary interest. The increasing age of the institution is shown by the fact that this is the "thirtieth" issue.

The Officers of Instruction, as they appear on pages 9 and 10, are now twenty-five in number. This includes, however, one emeritus professor, Dr. Beardsley, whose state of health at present precludes active work.

The several Departments of Instruction are Biology, in charge of Prof. Spencer Trotter; Chemistry, Prof. William C. Day; Drawing and Painting, Beatrice Magill; Engineering and Mechanic Arts, Prof. Wilbur M. Stine; English Languages and Literature, Prof. Wm. Hyde Appleton; French Language and Literature, Prof. Edw. H. Magill; German Language and Literature, Prof. Marie A. K. Hoadley; Greek, Prof. W. H. Appleton; History and Political Economy, Prof. Wm. I. Hull; Latin, Prof. Ferris W. Price; Mathematics, Prof. Susan J. Cunningham; Pedagogy, President Birdsall; Physical Training, C. C. Houghton, (young men), Dr. Mary V. M. Green (young women); Physics, Prof. George A. Hoadley.

The list of Fellowships and Scholarships has been rearranged and restated. It was published in full in the INTELLIGENCER a few weeks ago. It affords aid to a number of students. There are two fellowships for graduates, one of $450 for a year, to young men, and one of $525 to young women. There are some fifty-eight scholarships, varying in amount from $50 a year to the full charges of board and tuition.

STUDENT LIST FOR THE YEAR.

The list of students for the year has a total of 188, divided as follows:

Seniors, 29; Juniors, 21; Sophomores, 53; Freshmen, 75; Unclassified, 10.

It is interesting to note that besides those in attendance from Pennsylvania and near-by States, there are students from Indiana, Canada, Kansas, Kentucky, Georgia, Alabama, California, Illinois, Massachusetts, Michigan, North Carolina, and Bermuda.

THE COLLEGE EQUIPMENT.

The special equipment of the College includes the science building, with its laboratories, machine shops, etc., the observatory, the museums, the libraries, the gymnasiums, etc. Science Hall contains, besides lecture and recitation rooms, electrical, physical, engineering, and chemical laboratories; machine shop, and draughting rooms; foundry, forge, and wood-working rooms; engine and boiler rooms.

The equipment of the observatory includes a transit of three-inch aperture, an equatorial telescope of six-inch aperture, with micrometer and spectroscope attachments; a chronograph and chronometer, mean-time and sidereal clocks, and a reference library. Connected with the observatory is the local Signal Service Station of the State Weather Bureau, fully provided with the necessary meteorological apparatus. The latest addition to the building accommodates a Seismograph of the most approved construction, which records by photographic process any vibration of the crust of the earth.

The libraries now contain over 18,000 bound volumes. Included in these is the collection of the Friends' Historical Library, founded by the late Anson Lapham, and now containing 2,362 volumes, besides many pamphlets, and objects of historical interest; forming one of the best collections in reference to Friends to be found anywhere.

The museum of the College is in constant use in teaching, and additions are continually made to it. The collections include the Joseph Leidy collection of minerals, the collection of comparative osteology, the Wilcox and Farnham collection of birds, the Frederick Kohl ethnological collection, the C. F. Parker collection of shells, the Robert R. Corson collection of stalactites and stalagmites, the Eckfeldt herbarium, etc.

THE ROLL OF GRADUATES.

The first graduating class at the College received its diplomas in 1873, and had six members, one man and five women. Counting the class of 1898 there have now been twenty-six classes altogether, and the number of members is 492. Of these 23 are deceased. Eleven classes have no deceased members.

The 492 graduates are divided: men 262, women, 230. The graduating classes since 1887 have been much larger than in the period preceding. From 1887 to 1898 inclusive, thirteen years—being one-half the whole number of classes—the graduates number 339, (178 men, 161 women), while in the thirteen years previously they numbered but 153.

The average number of graduates per year down to 1886 was a fraction under 12; the average of the thirteen years since then is a small fraction over 26. The average of the whole twenty-six classes is not quite 19.

The transition from partly preparatory school work to entirely collegiate work is shown in these figures of larger recent graduating classes, for the total attendance of students at the institution was formerly greater than now,—the explanation of the diminution being that the students who were formerly in the preparatory department are now prepared elsewhere in the various schools for the purpose. The College is now entirely engaged in collegiate work.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

The seventh annual contest of the Pennsylvania Inter-Collegiate Oratorical Union was held with Lehigh University at South Bethlehem on Sixth-day evening, the 10th instant. The seven colleges of the Union were all represented, and the contest was well attended. President Drown, of Lehigh University, presided. The judges were Dr. Austin Scott, President of Rutgers College; Prof. Silas Neff, of the Neff School of Oratory, and Prof. John Quincy Adams, of the University of Pennsylvania. First place and the prize of $25, was awarded to Mary E. Seaman, of Swarthmore, with the oration, "Possession through Expression." James S. Grim, of Lafayette, was accorded second place, oration, "Sealed Orders." Honorable mention was made of the oration of Ernest N. Evans, Franklin and Marshall College, "Missions, a World Factor." Dean Bond, Prof. Furman, and some of the students accompanied Swarthmore's representative, and were highly gratified at the result of the contest.

On Second-day, Dean Bond delivered a lecture before the students on "Swarthmore Hall, the Home of George Fox." The lecture was illustrated by numerous stereoptican views, and proved interesting to all.

Dr. Appleton on Third-day evening gave the fourth of his series of Shakespeare readings. The reading for the evening was from the "Tempest."

The sixth annual Lantern-Slide Exhibition of the Swarthmore College Camera Club was given Sixth-day evening. Slides were exhibited from over two hundred photographs taken by members of the club. Many of the slides were prepared from photographs of College scenes, familiar associations, etc., and were of much interest.

The orations for the President's Prize, which has been continued by President Birdsall, were due on Third month 11. More than twenty-five candidates are entered, and the contest bids fair to be a close one.

On Seventh-day evening the president and his wife received the Sophomore Class at their home and a pleasant evening was enjoyed.

CHANGE AT WELLESLEY.—Changes in the heads of colleges seem to be the order of the day. Julia J. Irvine, president of Wellesley College, (one of the four or five leading American institutions solely for women), since 1894, having resigned, Caroline Hazard, of Peace Dale, R. I., was elected by the college trustees, last week.

Miss Hazard is the daughter of the late Rowland Hazard, distinguished as a manufacturer, philanthropist, and author. She is about forty-two years of age, and is known as the author of several books, a memoir of Prof. J. L. Diman, of Providence, a biographical and historical study of one of her ancestors ("College Tom"), and a collection of poetry,

"Narragansett Ballads." The last two were reviewed in the INTELLIGENCER at the time of their issue, a few years ago. The Hazard family were for several generations Friends.

LITERARY SOCIETIES AT SWARTHMORE.—A meeting of Swarthmore alumni was held at the College, on the evening of the 12th to increase the interest among the undergraduates in literary society work.

It was quite an earnest and animated gathering. A. Mitchell Palmer, of Stroudsburg, presided, and addresses were made by Carroll R. Williams, Dr. Edward Martin, '78; G. E. H. Weaver, '82; Henry J. Hancock, '84; W. G. Underwood, William E. Walter, Charles D. White and Henry E. Bean, of Philadelphia; W. C. Sproul, of Chester, and James W. Ponder, of Delaware. Letters were read from Solicitor General of United States Richards, United States Senator McLaurin, of South Carolina; P. Lesley Hopper, of Maryland; Joseph Fitch, of New York; Benjamin F. Battin, of Berlin, Germany; Henry McAlister, of Colorado; Professor T. Atkinson Jenkins, of Vanderbilt University; Alexander G. Cummins, of New York; Ralph Stone, secretary to Governor Pingree, of Michigan, and other prominent alumni.

LITERARY NOTES.

IN an article describing instances of great courage and devotion on the part of railway engineers, Gustav Kobbé in the Century (of this month), says it seems to him that the words of Edward Kennar, who was killed near Batavia, N. Y., in saving his train, and whose last thought was for another train, are worthy to be placed alongside of Captain Lawrence's "Don't give up the ship!" or of "any dying words of heroes on the battle-field which history has recorded." Undoubtedly this is true, and the reader of the article,—which is very brief, as compared with the great detail given to the accounts, in the same number, of war operations,—cannot but be impressed and thrilled with the stories which are told of the men who died at their posts, amid the daily dangers of the railway service. These dangers, as another writer in the same issue of the Century remarks, are continually present, and the fortitude with which they are met deserves the highest praise.

The Peace Crusade, to be published fortnightly or weekly at 14 Bedford street, Boston, by the Lend-a-Hand Society, is a leaflet of eight pages, and is introduced in the first number, dated 8th instant, by Edward E. Hale, Edwin D. Mead, and David G. Haskins, Jr. It is intended to continue it "until the close of the Conference proposed by the Emperor of Russia." Seventy-five cents will be charged for the series, and $15 for one hundred subscriptions. "It will express from number to number the plans and hopes of the men and women of America who do not propose to lose the great opportunity offered by the Conference at the Hague."

The second instalment of Senator Hoar's Reminiscences, in Scribner's Magazine, this month, goes back to the early days of the Free Soil Movement, and gives some interesting views of Daniel Webster. Senator Hoar, with his brother, Judge E. R. Hoar, now deceased, was among the organizers of the Free Soil party in Massachusetts, and his account of those days is most interesting.

Two notable articles on Teaching, in the current Atlantic Monthly, are those of Professor William James, who discusses the question of what is the nature of a child's character, and the ruling impulses, and how they should best be approached and taken advantage of for educational purposes; and one by Marion Hamilton Carter, who spiritedly represents the revolt of a primary teacher against some of the kindergarten training. Prince Kropotkin's autobiography continues to be very interesting. An unsigned article at the front of the magazine represents, apparently, the expansion doctrine, and suggests that the writer would do well to read some of the poetry of the first editor of the Atlantic, devoted to the subject of aggressive war, a half-century ago.

A new edition of Dr. George Dana Boardman's address on "Disarmament of Nations" (reviewed in last week's INTELLIGENCER), is in press, and will be immediately published by Howard M. Jenkins, 921 Arch street, Philadelphia. It is a valuable and interesting document, and should have a wide circulation.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

A BIRTHDAY GATHERING.—Our friend E. W. Chandler, wife of Spencer Chandler, Sr., of Hockessin, Del., celebrated her seventy-third birthday, on the 28th ult., by inviting a number of her friends—over twenty—to spend the evening. She was married at nineteen; of her five children, the two sons live near, the daughters, all married, have long resided in the West. In a paper read by a grand-daughter, Mabel Palmer, many facts and reminiscences had been gathered.

Lydia H. Price, a cousin, spoke feelingly of the pleasant years passed by, and of the beautiful lives we might live by mingling in love and harmony. Although her cousin had known many years of invalidism, she had learned three deeper lessons of not allowing her happy nature to dwell on the dark side of life.

Selections were read, and remarks made by a friend, and by T. D. Baldwin, a friend of her youth, who spoke of the principles of the Society of Friends, which had been a beacon light to his youthful steps. * *

The Newtown Enterprise, 11th, prints the following paragraph:

"A Friend residing in New Jersey, writes that a woman with a horse and wagon, and claiming to be a Friend, has been traveling about in his locality soliciting money for charitable purposes. There is satisfactory proof that she is not in reality what she professes to be, but is in fact an impostor."

The Russian lady, Anna Evreinoff, who has been speaking in this country in behalf of the Disarmament Conference, is a person of "rank," as well as culture, in her country. Her father, a general of the Russian army, was governor of the imperial palace, the Peterhof, during the reign of the present Czar's grandfather, Alexander II. She studied at the University of Leipsic, and graduated in law, since which she has given much attention to judicial studies and history.

DOUKHOBOR REPORT.

WE have no further contributions in aid of the fund. An interesting letter from Commissioner McCreary is given elsewhere.

A friend in Philadelphia hands us the following extract from a letter received from a business correspondent at Portage la Prairie, west of Winnipeg, one of the points at which a large party have been quartered. The letter says:

"We think the Doukhobors are a fine class of people, and will make first-class settlers. We have about 400 here for the winter. Most of the men have gone forward to make homes for their families, in time for spring. They will locate about 250 miles northwest of here, adjoining the Swan River district. I send, under separate cover, a map of Manitoba, and mark on same the location for the Doukhobors; also enclose an old number of a Winnipeg paper, giving cuts of them, which show they look well even in their foreign dress. They are learning the English language very rapidly."

THE Duke of Connaught, third son of Queen Victoria, laid the corner stone of the great reservoir dam at the top of the First Cataract of the Nile, at Assouan, Egypt, in the presence of the Minister of Public Works, and other notables, on 2nd mo. 11. The length of the dam is a mile and a quarter. It will be eighty feet wide at the base, and eighty feet high. It will raise the level of the Nile for 140 miles.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

NEWTOWN, PA.—Newtown Friends' Association met at the residence of Oliver and Cynthia Holcomb, on the evening of Third month 1. The meeting was opened by the president reading the second chapter of the first epistle of John. The reading and approval of the minutes of last meeting followed.

On behalf of the Historical Committee, Evan T. Worthington read "A Historical Sketch of Newtown Meeting," prepared by Isaac Eyre. On a careful examination of the minutes of Wrightstown Monthly Meeting, it was found that on Fourth month 15, 1815, liberty was granted to hold an indulged meeting in Newtown. The meeting was held in the old court-house until the meeting-house was built, about 1816 and '17. No monthly meeting was held here until 1820, when it was held alternately at Newtown and Makefield, as it is now.

Sarah J. Reeder next read "The Philosophy of Quakerism," from Young Friends' Review. This article contains much that is valuable, and urges Friends to be able to give a reason for their faith, and not be satisfied to say "We are Friends because our parents are Friends." "The universal Light which is the foundation of Quakerism, runs like a distinguishing brand through all its organizations, all its faith, all its hope, all its life. Truth is found in a greater or less degree in all religions," and as Friends have always upheld the doctrine of toleration it is consistent that they should "accept the truth wherever found."

T. S. Kenderdine next read the part of the Discipline on plainness, also an extract from John J. Cornell on the same subject, who thinks true Quakerism does not require a uniformity of dress, either in pattern or color, but does expect those who embrace it to adopt a style of dress suited to the means and good taste of the wearer, and not let such matters occupy time and thoughts to the exclusion of higher duties.

The executive committee presented the program for the next meeting. Roll was called, to which many responded with sentiments, and the meeting adjourned to meet Fourth month 5 at the home of Mabel R. Worstall. A. E. W.

FLEMING, PA.—Our Association met Third month 5, at 3 o'clock p. m., with a good attendance. The program was made up of voluntary work.

Opened with the president reading the 20th chapter of Matthew, followed by the reading and approval of the minutes of last meeting, and the roll-call, responded to by beautiful extracts and sentiments.

Edgar W. Cleaver read "The Poverty Pew." Mary J. Fisher, the poem entitled "A Memory." Sue Underwood read "Your Work," which treated of the necessity of exercising patience in religious labor, for results are not always apparent. Some account of the life of Charles M. Sheldon, the author of "In His Steps," and what led to his publishing the work, stating that 250,000 books had been sold during one year, was read by Florence N. Cleaver.

The secretary read from the book, "Making the Most of Life," by J. R. Miller, a part of the chapter entitled "The Only One." The best that any of us can do in this world is but a fragment, and the humblest of us dare not fail, for our one life is all God has at the point where we stand.

The beautiful story of Whittier's poem, "Snow-Bound," was given by Myra Underwood. Edith W. Cleaver recited a pretty little story of the life of a tree, comparing it to an individual, and as sometimes the tree dies in its prime from some destructive agent at the root, just so dissipation will destroy young lives.

The "Effects of Associations" was the topic for general discussion. Many thoughts were expressed on this, among which were these: "We may not always be able to choose our associates, but we can choose good books, and make these suffice for our best associates."

"The higher spiritual life is necessary, that we live above the degenerating elements that may exist about us, as in the lives of the missionaries."

"We may mingle with persons and still not associate with them or enter into the spirit of their character."

The time for holding our meeting was changed from once in four weeks to once in three weeks. After the announcing of the program for next meeting we closed in silence.

N. M. FISHER, Sec.

WOODSTOWN, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association of Woodstown held a meeting Third month 2, having been adjourned since Twelfth month 29. The president, Mary E. Borton, opened the meeting with a Bible reading from the 1st chapter of James. The minutes of the last meeting were read, and the reports of the different committees called for.

The program for the evening consisted of a number of papers. The first "The rise and progress of the testimony against Slavery in the Society of Friends," read by Annie P. Flitcraft, had been prepared for the Association by Annie E. Pancoast. It spoke of George Fox's being one of the earliest to call the attention of his brethren to the subject of slavery. Also Wm. Edmundson and others. In 1688 this subject was for the first time brought before the Yearly Meeting of Pennsylvania and New Jersey. The quarterly meeting of Chester was the most southern branch of the Yearly Meeting, and in 1711 Chester Monthly Meeting brought the subject of slavery before the quarterly meeting; the latter concurred on expressing its dissatisfaction with the buying and bringing in of negroes; and in 1776 the Yearly Meeting of Philadelphia concluded to make slave-holding a disownable offense.

The next paper, written by May Weatherly, the subject of which was "The History of the Underground Railroad," was well presented. This system of helping the slaves to their freedom was started about 1810, Columbia, Pa., being one of the first places to start a line of stations, which were about ten miles apart in different directions. The slave-holders lost all trace of the fugitives here, and declared there must be an underground railroad, which gave the name of which we have heard so much. There were different routes through Pennsylvania, Ohio, and New Jersey to Canada.

The paper spoke of George Atkinson, a Friend of Wallace Hill, N. J., and others in this State, who were workers in the cause; and of a slave, who escaped and settled near Woodstown. He was a man much respected and made many friends, but was finally betrayed and captured by his owner; but escaped again before he could be gotten out of the State, and afterward his owner signed his freedom papers for $100. The writer concludes thus: "Let us rejoice that on the ordering of Divine Providence the dark stain upon our Nation's honor is at last removed."

The last paper of the evening, subject, "Steps in the development of the Industrial Differences between the North and South," was written by Annie E. Pancoast for the class work of the Lectures on History by Professor Mace, of Syracuse, N. Y., and read by request. It contained a number of historical data, and was of much interest.

The meeting was then open for general discussion. Lydia Norris spoke of having been at her grandparents' home in Chester county, when a child, where slaves were hidden through the day and passed on to other stations at night. Isetta B. Allen read some extracts from the INTELLIGENCER in regard to slavery. Joel Borton spoke of how he had been impressed in listening to the papers with the comparatively few leaders that carried on the work, and came to the front, and it is a few that move the world, if they are only faithful. Did we appreciate our privileges of to-day sufficiently? We must remember there is yet work to be done. Intemperance, if it is ever overcome, will be by the faithfulness of the workers for the cause.

After a period of silence adjournment followed.

E. L. D., Sec.

HUNTINGTON, IND.—The Young Friends' Association met Second month 4, at the home of Michael and Louise Moore. Emma Brown acted as chairman for the evening. After routine business was transacted, a carefully-prepared paper was read by Benjamin F. Nichols, subject,—"Youth: its Privileges and Responsibilities." The paper was freely discussed, bringing out many interesting points. After the discussion the meeting adjourned, to meet Third month 24, at the home of Nehemiah and Sarah Brown. Paper by Lou. Rall.

W. C. MOORE, Cor. Sec.

SAN FRANCISCO NOTES.

A YOUNG man was present at Friends' meeting San Francisco, on First-day the 19th ult., who bears the name of George Fox. Although his words were not exactly on the line of Friends' thought, he was nevertheless welcome. His name, and the fact that our new meeting room, Swarthmore Hall, is named for the home of the founder of the Society, awakened pleasant and profitable reflections that were echoed from several voices. He is an evangelist, preaching and holding meetings wherever an opening presents, and says that he is like his namesake in one respect, he does not take pay for preaching. His ancestors lived in Pennsylvania, and were Friends.

Alice Nichols Barnes, of Montana, who is in San Francisco with her husband for the winter, attended Friends' meeting on First-day, 5th inst. She belongs to the old-time family of Friends of that name in Maine, and was a teacher in Canada and the Far West for several years. Going to Montana in the '80's, she taught in a mining town where there was not a sabbath school or place of worship of any kind. Joining with one or two other Friends in the place, a meeting and school were established, the former with 100 members and the school with over sixty, essentially a Friends' meeting until a field missionary from one of the Evangelical churches came along and wanted to establish a church of his faith. For the sake of harmony Alice united with him, and a year later the whole congregation chose her as their pastor or leader. While she is a pastor working with another society, she is still a Friend in principle and belief.

She spoke acceptably on the occasion above referred to, saying inter alia that in every place where she had lived or visited she found the Glorious Light breaking and the doctrines and principles which Friends have held up for over two centuries spreading among all classes of religious professors.

There has come among us recently from Southern California R. Esther Smith. She is a young woman of ability, and a minister among Friends (of the other body). She comes to assist in the benevolent movement here, under the name of "Silent Workers."

She is an indefatigable worker, and gives almost every working hour to the children, the mothers, the sick, and needy in the district where our work lies, where we have five or six young women constantly employed. There are over 2,000 families in a district of four blocks in the most thickly populated part of the city.

Good results are already seen from this work, which is but a little over a year old. Those who want to know more of it can address "Silent Workers," 934-936 Harrison street, San Francisco, Cal.; and a copy of the Dinner Pail and other printed information will be sent them. Esther Smith's family are from Virginia, where her ancestors settled several generations ago, emigrating from Pennsylvania. She probably descended from William Smith, who came from Yorkshire, England, in 1680, and settled in Wrightstown, Bucks county. He married Mary Croasdale, who came on the good ship Welcome with William Penn in 1682, and probably has had more descendants than any other person that came to America. From a genealogical book compiled by Josiah B. Smith, of Newtown, Pa., a few years ago, and making moderate allowance for those who emigrated to South Carolina, Maryland, and Virginia in the early colonial days, they would number about ten thousand persons. "The path of the just is as the shining light, that shineth brighter and brighter unto the perfect day." *

THE DOUKHOBOR COLONISTS.

OFFICE OF THE COMMISSIONER OF IMMIGRATION,
WINNIPEG, Manitoba, March 10, 1899.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I AM glad to be able to state that considerable progress is being made towards locating them satisfactorily on their homesteads. I have this week received word from both Colonies. I find in the Colony known as Thunder Hill there are about twelve houses, 25 by 30 feet each, together with a number of tents, capable in all of holding between seven hundred and a thousand people. There are two rows of berths in each building, the buildings being of log; corners dove-tailed and well put up; roofs, with a good pitch, made of lumber, whipsawn by the Doukhobors themselves. Between the logs they are well chinked and plastered with clay, and the buildings, I am informed, are very comfortable. These buildings are right on the edge of the Swan River, in a beautiful spot, surrounded by trees, and with plenty of water. Fish are quite numerous, and my informant tells me that the 150 Doukhobors now there are well satisfied.

Count Sergius Tolstoy, with Mr. Archer and myself, leave to-morrow at 11 o'clock with the first trainload of women and children, consisting of three hundred of the Lake Huron party who have been in this Hall, [Winnipeg], and eighty who have been in the Hall at Portage la Prairie. We are taking out with us a large quantity of supplies in addition to what have already been forwarded, together with hardware and so forth. We have also, through the kindness of the railway authorities, secured the services of thirty teams of horses, which in addition to some eighteen teams already purchased for the Doukhobors, will be sufficient to move all the supplies, I think, before the roads break up.

As soon as this trainload of 380 have been moved to the Colony, the cars will return and take out the 300 now at Dauphin, and thence continue taking out a trainload at least once a week until all the Lake Huron people have been moved to the Thunder Hill Colony, except the three or four hundred now at Yorkton, who will go to that Colony.

I shall return by the Yorkton Colony about the 20th instant, Prince Hilkooff, in the meantime, remaining in Winnipeg to assist in moving the Lake Superior people out to the Yorkton Colony. At the latter Colony there are some sixteen houses already constructed, so that at the present rate of progress, within one month, at the outside, we should have the entire four thousand Doukhobors in their colonies. The Government, of course, has had to put up a little more money than they arranged for with Mr. Maude, but we feel sure, from the evidences of thrift shown by these people, that the money will be well invested.

Three hundred of those who came on the Lake Superior are now in this city, and 1,700 at East Selkirk, all getting along very well indeed, and quite comfortable, but some of them are anxious to get out to the colonies; they do not like idleness.

It would be a great help to these people if they could have one or two cars of good grade cattle sent up about May or the first of June, together with a thorough Durham or grade young bull, about two years of age. They would also like some sheep, and of course a few more horses, if obtainable. These should reach here, if possible, by the first of May, in order that they should be got to the colonies not later than the 10th. I have sufficient seed potatoes on hand, about three thousand bushels, which will have to be moved out in April, so that it will require a lot of horses, but possibly they will be able to buy a few more teams from settlers up near the colonies.

As it is now very late, and I am leaving to-morrow, I regret that I cannot write at greater length.

W. F. MCCREARY, Commissioner.

W. HUDSON SHAW'S LECTURES.

W. HUDSON SHAW lectured Fourth-day evening last before the Young Friends' Association at 15th and Race streets, on "The English Revolution of the XVIII. Century." After reviewing rapidly what he described as the political corruption and religious apathy of the early XVIII. Century, with the decadence of English morals following the "Revolution" of 1689, and the universal hatred of enthusiasm, he proceeded to speak of the transformation which John Wesley's influence effected.

The circumstances of his life, and the salient points of his character were first touched upon. Continuing, the speaker said: "If we were to endeavor to trace the Evangelical Revival of the XVIII. Century to its fountain head, we should probably find that it originated in a book. In the year 1727, John Wesley read for the first time William Law's 'Serious Call.' That book is one of the most remarkable religious works written in the English language. . . . Law was a high churchman who had refused to swear allegiance to George I. He became the religious adviser of the Wesleys; and his influence upon them was so great that there is some truth in the saying of Bishop Warburton that William Law was the father of Methodism. In 1729 there was formed at Oxford the first Methodist society. Its real originator was not John Wesley, but his brother Charles. They practiced the strictest self-examination, met together for religious purposes every evening, fasted Wednesdays and Fridays, received the sacrament every Monday, gave away nearly all they had, taught in the schools, visited the sick, and especially devoted themselves to the inmates of workhouses and prisons. This was more than the swearing, rioting, tippling, undergraduate of Oxford would bear; and Wesley's small society was assailed with pitiless ridicule and abuse. Certainly the young lads—as most of them were—were guilty of some extravagances. So have been the religious reformers of all the ages from St. Francis downward. 'It is true,' as Mrs. Oliphant says in her sketch of the movement, that 'we are not to expect moderation in a forlorn hope'; and at this moment John Wesley's little band of young, extravagant, ascetic knights-errant, were England's forlorn hope."

Wesley's wonderful activity, the spread of the movement among the poorer classes, and its results upon English life, were touched upon in turn. Concluding, the speaker said: "John Wesley in very truth gave his life to the poor people of England. His influence on the rich and powerful was directly only small; but he broke down the spirits which had despised the poor. From his day to now, the passion of Humanity, of strenuous toil on behalf of the suffering, the ignorant, and the poor, has gained strength year by year; and even those to whom his love of God means nothing, can reverence him for his love to his fellow creatures. What his work has been we can dimly realize when we compare England as it is to-day with the awful, degraded England of one hundred and fifty years ago."

Hudson Shaw's last lecture in the Young Friends' Association course will be given next Fourth-day evening, Third month 29.

COMMUNICATIONS.

LIBERTY OF OPINION.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

WITHIN the last year I have seen in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER many helpful articles on the subject of Peace, and many expressions of appreciation from its readers concerning the attitude of the paper in this matter. This is very helpful and gratifying to all true Friends, I believe.

However, it has appeared to me that at times in its zeal to uphold peace principles, as embodied in the anti-imperialistic movement of the present time, the INTELLIGENCER has been less charitable than it should be toward so-called imperialistic people, who are doubtless as conscientious in their convictions as the most ardent Friend can be in his. While we may not coincide with the opinions of Dr. Lyman Abbott, or of Dr. Weir Mitchell, should we not, in obedience to our faith in "the Light that lighteth every man that cometh into the world," respect such conscientious beliefs no matter how strongly they may differ from our own?

Hoping that you will insert this suggestion in your columns, as a reminder of "two sides to every question," I am, cordially your friend,

CORA HAVILAND CARVER.

Media, Pa., Third month 10.

Remarks by the Intelligencer.

[We print our correspondent's note with pleasure. Of course we respect the right of opinion, but this does not compel us to respect all opinions formed under the right. And similarly as to "conscientious beliefs." No doubt those who directed the Inquisition thought they were doing right, as did John Calvin when he promoted the burning of Servetus, Cotton Mather, when he wanted the women hanged as "witches," and the defenders of American Slavery, who showed its rightfulness by the case of Onesimus.

There is a passage in the first Epistle of John, (iv., 1) which we understand to be the sound rule, (and therefore a Friends' rule): "Beloved, believe not every spirit, but prove the spirits . . . because many false prophets are gone out into the world."

We might add that there are not two sides to every question.]

POEM BY HERRICK.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

The poem on page 175, in the issue of Third month 4, credited to "Table Talk," was written by Robert Herrick, (England 1591-1634).

The title should be "A True Lent."

JOSEPH FUSSELL.

Germantown, Third month 9.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE APPROACH OF SPRING.

SPRING is near! on bush and tree

Early buds are swelling;
From the throats of happy birds
Gladsome notes are welling.

Winter's brown and yellow robe
Changes color daily;
Lawn and meadow wake to life,
Grass is greening gaily.

Bluer skies and softer airs
Hint the coming glory;
Countless signs at ev'ry turn
Tell the same sweet story.

Daffodils and jonquils pale
Bloom in sheltered places;
Inmates sweet of woodland glades
Lift their tender faces.

South winds blowing o'er the globe
Perfumes soft are bearing;
All things breathe the fragrant air,
Nature's incense sharing.

Soul of man, too, feels the spell,
Tuning with the weather;
Human hearts and Nature's heart
Beat and throb together.

Sounds of life in myriad forms
Woods and fields are hearing;
Nature wakes from winter sleep;
Spring, sweet Spring, is nearing!

ROBERT TILNEY.

Correspondence of Friends' Intelligencer.

THE CHURCHES OF BERLIN.

THE good people of Berlin in future times will remember the reign of Kaiser William the Second as the time of the rapid expansion of the city's growth, and especially the era of church building. Even the casual visitor who can compare the capital of half-a-dozen years ago with that of to-day remarks the large number of fine new structures for religious purposes. The churches of Berlin may lack the historical interest and the beauty of the architecture of by-gone centuries that attach to those of almost any other large Continental town; but it is to be remembered that Berlin is the youngest of the great European cities.

When the present metropolis was naught but a fishing village, with Alt-Kölln (Old-Cologne) its rival, on the island in the river, there were established three churches. And very suitably was this done; for the fishermen built on the island a little temple of worship and dedicated it to their patron St. Peter; the river sailors raised a church to St. Nicholas, and both combined erected and worshipped in the structure devoted to St. Mary, the patroness of all. Parts of these three, Nicolai, Petri, and Marien Kirchen, still exist; but in general they have been often restored and renewed. Around the original massive granite foundation walls of the tower of the Nicolai Kirche are the grave-stones of Berlin burgers and knights—each stone with skull and cross-bones graven thereon; and in the interior are many-colored tablets, shields, coats-of-arms, and chapels used as burial vaults. Before the Marien church is a cross of white stone set up to commemorate the murder at this place of the Priest of Bernau; and in the entrance hall is a curious wall-painting of the 15th century representing the Totentanz (Death Dance), with simple rhymes in a South German dialect. It is in this church that the famous choir from the Cathedral sings while the latter is being rebuilt.

The Dom or Cathedral was torn down a few years ago; and on the same spot, the most prominent position in the city, in the Lustgarten, between the Royal Palace and the Old Museum, there arises a fine new Dom. When the maze of scaffolding that now envelops the whole structure and its five towers is taken down, the result will be a notable addition to the splendid series of buildings at the eastern end of Unter den Linden.

One church only in Berlin has chimes that can play hymns—the Parochial Church. This is situated in the Kloster Strasse, where also the cloisters of the Kloster Kirche are a prominent feature. But these chimes are not of very wide range and the “bells out of tune” are not sweet.

There is a crooked bending street named Heiligegeist Strasse, (Holy Ghost street), after the Heiligegeist Kirche; the latter is a small, simple structure in the old city's heart. The congregation remained Catholic when most of the other churches followed Luther; and the one priest has but a handful of listeners, while the “responses” are led by a wheezy, old-style wooden organ.

The fine square, which is called the Gensdarme Market, contains three buildings of splendid architectural effect, especially in moonlight—the Royal Theatre, the Neue Kirche, and the Französische Kirche. The new church has famous, powerful, rich-toned bells, that ring out the hours and quarters of the day and summon worshippers to service. The other church belongs to the so-called French Colony. The Great Elector, after the Edict of Nantes, invited the French Huguenots to settle in Brandenburg; and fortunately for Berlin many did so, bringing both thrifty habits and artistic and industrial knowledge. In the church established by these refugees services are held alternately in French and German.

Directly in the middle of Mauer (Wall) Strasse stands Trinity church. It is different in form from most church buildings—being round, and having two galleries that encircle the structure, except where the altar and organ are built in. Here preached Schleiermacher, Marheinecke, and Krummacher; and the people crowd now into the whole building, when occasionally one of the Emperor's favorite preachers, Dr. Dryander, is to be heard.

The newer Lutheran churches are generally more impressive than the older; among them are the Emperor William and Emperor Frederick memorial churches and the Garrison churches.

Other religious denominations do not seem to be so widely represented in the capital. There are several Roman Catholic churches scattered throughout the city; the most important is St. Hedwig's Church, which has a fine location in the Opera Square off Unter den Linden, and in which many important functions take place. The Church of England worships in St. George's Church, a beautiful little structure in English style, in Monbijou Palace Park. Most Americans attend service there or in the American Union Church. The latter uses a hall in the building of the Christliche Verein Junger Manner (Young Men's Christian Association). The number present is usually quite large and it is pleasant to see so many students and members of the resident colony. The first time we were present the minister said: “We have representatives of nearly every Christian sect—from the Church of England to the Quakers.” Plans are now being carried out for the construction of a separate church building for the American Union Church.

Members of the Greek Catholic Church have service in the Russian Embassy; there is a chorus of twenty or more voices, which render in a most impressive way the sublime music of this service, which precludes the use of instruments. One of the best modern buildings in the city is the world-famous New Synagogue. The large and rich Jewish population spared nothing to produce a magnificent effect in the main hall, where 3,000 worshippers may be seated. Here, too, the musical service is very fine.

We have usually attended services in the German churches, and have been impressed with the earnestness of the sermons. They were all, except just at Christmas time, powerful appeals for a better daily living and denunciations of the sinfulness of the metropolis. Especially was the desecration of the Sabbath-day condemned; and in the pulpits above our heads the clergymen, in their simple, black gowns, thundering against the wickedness of the modern city of culture and commerce, seemed veritable Savonarolas.

B. F. B.

Berlin, Second month 17, 1899.

A PRACTICAL PACIFICATION.

From an article by Edward Everett Hale, in Christian Register, Boston.

THERE is a special interest [for the American people, at this juncture] in the great object-lesson which Sir Andrew Clarke, “The Pacificator,” and his successors have given us since 1874, in the Straits Settlements and the fifteen native States which are now united in what may be called “the United States of Malacca,” [a confederacy formed of chiefs of small tribal organizations in the Malacca Peninsula].

As early as 1819, at the instance of Sir Stanford Raffles, the Indian government had established the English colony of Singapore. England had three very small dependencies in the neighborhood,—

Penang, the Dindings, Malacca, so called; and these came to be known as the Straits Settlements. The rest of the peninsula was held by a great number of petty tribes, constantly at war, and under no control but that of force from powers whose commerce they interrupted. The home government of England seems to have been very unwilling to attempt any control of these States. And until 1874, when at last it interfered with their foreign relations, the people were, to all intents and purposes, living in the Middle Ages; for each State had its own sultan under a complete feudal system.

Their wars with each other brought about a complete anarchy. "Up to the year 1874," writes Mr. Swettenham, "all these countries excepting Johor and Pahang had been in a very unhappy state." Perak was torn by intestine troubles. Larut was fast becoming a stronghold of pirates. The leaders of this strife, taking a base in the English settlement of Penang, sent orders and supplies to the fighters, "while they were in comparative safety." It was said that in one day three thousand men were killed in one of these disturbances in Larut.

Selangor was even worse, if such a thing were possible. And in all these "States" the feudal lords fought against each other, without any intervention of the respective "sultans." All these disturbances were overwhelming the sultans with debt, however. Without attempting the least detail, it is enough to say that, excepting Johor and Pahang, all of them were at war; and they were so jealous of each other that their condition was scarcely better.

Under these conditions, Sir Andrew Clarke, the British governor of the Straits Settlements, met the principal Chinese of Penang and of Larut in January, 1874. By treating both factions equally, he effected a reconciliation, which stopped at once all piracy by sea, and made a step toward further mediation.

Of this whole history the interesting detail is given in the papers submitted to the Senate with the Treaty. [The treaty made at Paris is probably referred to.—Eds.] It is perhaps a pity that, in the midst of discussions about borax and salicylic acid, this interesting contribution to the history of peace should have been generally overlooked or disregarded. Simply, it is the story of the union in one confederacy of nearly twenty different feudal States, each with its wretched "sultan," who were wasting all their resources on mutual wars. If the sultans themselves did not fight, the fighting was done by the lesser chiefs, who correspond precisely in this feudal system with the barons of Europe in the Middle Ages. Sir Andrew Clarke was the governor of Singapore and the Straits Settlements. By personal visits to these feudal chiefs, he made them understand that England did not want an inch of their territory or a penny of their revenue. A first step was taken in a sort of union of what were known as the "Nine States." One by one the sultans of the larger States agreed to abandon maritime piracy, and to submit their mutual disputes, not to feudal battles, but to the arbitrament of the English authorities at Singapore.

Those authorities, on the other hand, were ready enough to agree that they would not take either revenue or land from the chiefs, nor interfere with their government, unless they asked for "residents." Many of them, as has been said, did ask for such residents.

This simple system has now been running for ten years with perfect success. The result is that the sultans are now rich where they were poor. What is more, their people are rich where they were poor, and happy where they were wretched. For many tropical products the peninsula is the richest country that God's sun shines upon. The value and quantity of its products have increased enormously since "The Pacificator" took hold of his great enterprise. The intelligent reader who may wish to follow the details of this great enterprise will find them in the Senate report alluded to, in the English Blue Books, in the Proceedings of the Singapore Branch of the Asiatic Society, and in some references in the correspondence of the American Board of Commissioners.

ALASKAN FISHERMEN.

Harper's Round Table.

WITH his home-made fishing-tackle, one native Alaskan can capture more fish in a day than can any three white men with their latest improved implements. The Alaskan Indian shows his intelligence by clinging to his own implements and tools, and at the same time in quietly adapting himself to the greatly altered conditions of his environment. He will adopt certain of our customs and utensils, but refuses to adopt many others. While he will always give you the most superstitious reasons for clinging to his own time-honored tools, he is quick to decide that the spirits wish him to make use of any new idea which will be an actual benefit under existing conditions.

These Indians use the same fishing-tackle that Bering found them using during his explorations of 1741, and which George Vancouver found during his first visit among them as a midshipmite under the famous Captain Cook, a few years later.

Fish are abundant. Alaskan homes are always near some excellent fishing-grounds. A village is often situated in a certain location simply to be near good halibut banks. Hooks used in fishing for halibut are usually made of a fork of spruce root to which an iron barb has been lashed, the only change from the original being in the iron barb, which sometimes takes the place of the one of bone used in the primitive hook. All bait is secured to the hook by means of a small cedar cord, which is neatly lashed about the hook when it is not in use.

Halibut feed near the bottom of the sea. The Indian has a method, as ingenious as it is rude, to keep his bait where it will be most tempting.

He will tie a stone a few feet above the hook on his line with a slip-loop, which the halibut, in trying to get away, will twitch out, releasing the stone and giving the Indian warning that he can draw up his fifty or a hundred pound halibut without the additional weight of the stone. Between the hook and the stone sinker is a wooden float whittled in the shape of a duck, which in seeking to rise to the surface, draws the hook up to the proper distance from the bottom.

Steel hooks made after these patterns have been on the market for many years, but the Indian has better success with his own.

His cords and lines are his own production. They are made of cedar bark, split spruce roots, or kelp. The cedar bark is scraped from the tree with a bone shaped like a chopping-knife.

After soaking for several days, the bark is beaten into shreds with a hammer made also of bone, and picked into fine threads, which are twisted into cords by being rubbed between the hand and the thigh. Cords of spruce roots split and twisted are also very strong, but those made of kelp are least valued.

An Indiana Model City.

Cincinnati Enquirer.

INDIANA claims the one model city in the United States—a city where the workmen own, control, and operate the factories and fix the price of labor. Tell City is the name of this place. It is situated in Perry county. The toilers are formed into companies and operate their factories singly. There is, however, no common purse for citizens. Each man must make a living for his own family, but the matter of employment is so simplified that the difficulty of this is minimized. The city was founded in 1858 by the Swiss Colonization Society of Cincinnati. Each factory in the city is owned by a stock company of citizens. They were started years ago, the first in 1856, by small sums furnished by individuals. Year by year the business grew, and as soon as a dividend was declared this money was added to that already in the business.

In this way new buildings were erected, and great sums of money were eventually invested in the industries which have made Tell City a flourishing town, and famous as a manufacturing centre of wooden utensils of all kinds. Each stockholder in a factory at Tell City is a workman. Each company selects its own Board of Managers and Superintendent. These men are always stockholders. Each member of the corporation is entitled to as many votes as he has shares of stock. Each laborer is paid at the end of the week, according to the amount of work done or at a stipulated sum per hour. A dividend is declared annually.

The various industries employ 595 workmen, and represent nearly $700,000 of capital. In addition to this, about 200 men are given employment by the chair factories caning chairs, which work is done by hand at the workmen's homes. The leading products of the city are furniture, desks, mantels, wagons, hubs, hub-blocks, spokes, brooms, baskets, shingles, railroad ties, flour and meal, harness (wooden), staves, barrels, toys, wooden goods, bricks, dressed lumber, etc. There are no unemployed people at Tell City. Everybody is busy and contented. Most of the workmen own their own homes.

Studies at Three Universities.

FIGURES recently compiled, showing the relative proportions of studies in eight leading branches for Yale and Harvard, allow also comparisons with Princeton, the figures for the latter being printed some months ago. The table annexed, covering the whole curriculum at each institution, shows in percentages the scholastic ratios:

	Yale.	Harvard.	Princeton.
Ancient languages . . .	24.4	7.8	21.3
European languages . . .	14.4	20.4	13.9
History	11.2	13.9	1.6
Political science	11.3	11.4	9.6
Mathematics	10.6	4.1	19.1
English	9.6	16.4	10.3
Philosophy	9.4	6.6	9.8
Natural science	7.3	11.9	9.9

The table shows that in ancient languages both Yale and Princeton adhere to the old ideas, and have each about three times the amount of Harvard under her liberal elective system. All three universities are strong in modern languages, but Harvard exceeds Yale and Princeton in the ratio of about three to two. Both Harvard and Yale have gone far beyond Princeton in history. In political science the three are about equal, while Princeton has five times the mathematics of Harvard and double the mathematics of Yale. All three universities are strong in English, but Harvard has one and a half times the other two. In natural science there is not much disparity, while in philosophy the comparison is partly vitiated by the fact that it is a required study at Yale. Biblical literature, (not appearing in the table), represents at Princeton about 6 per cent. of the curriculum.

The table goes to accent the general fact of much greater conservatism at both Princeton and Yale than at Harvard. In view of the disparities of the elective system at the three universities the table can only in small degree be regarded as a comparative test of that.

Surviving Industries of Old-Times.

THE primitive manner of life which survives in the mountains of North Carolina and Tennessee,—the slopes of the Appalachian ridge,—is described by William Goodell Frost in the Atlantic Monthly. He mentions, among other things, their ability to make articles of domestic use.

If these primitive folk (he says) cannot step to the telephone and by a supernatural fiat "order" whatever may be desired, they can step into the forest and find or fashion some rude substitute. (Though in truth the handmade product is not a substitute, but an archetype). Is the lamp chimney lacking? The mountain potteries are still making flambeaux, lamps of almost classic pattern, in which grease is burned with a floating wick. Is the sawmill remote? In the high mountains where streams are small and mills impracticable the whipsaw is brought into use, and two men will get out three or four hundred feet of boards from the logs in a day. Hand-mills for grinding can still be constructed by well-brought up mountain men, and in some places they have not yet lost the tradition of the fashioning of the old English crossbow!

And who does not have a feeling akin to reverence in the presence of a hand-loom? When a mountain maid speaks of her "wheel" she does not refer to a bicycle, but to the spinning-wheel of our ancestors, her use of which here in our mountains calls to mind the sudden and entire disappearance of cloth-making from the list of household industries. Not a single member of the Sorosis could card, spin, dye, or weave. Their mothers for the most part had forgotten these arts, yet their grandmothers, and their foremothers for a hundred generations, have been spinners. Spinning, in fact, has helped to form the character of our race, and it is pleasant to find that here in Appalachian America it still contributes to the health and grace and skill of womankind.

THE Watchman says: "It is as true of churches as of individuals, that though they give all their goods to feed the poor, but have not love, it profiteth them nothing."

"ZION'S HERALD" states that Bishop Dwamgee, the South African ecclesiastic, is of heathen parentage and ran wild in the jungle until he came under Christian influence. He is now a man of learning and refinement.

A RECENT item says that the agitation in the Catholic Church in upper Austria and Styria, resulting in a remarkable reaction and secession from Catholic ranks, is assuming proportions that may be compared to the crisis in the English Church.

A REMARKABLE ceremony occurred a short time ago at the Isle of Orleans, Canada. An old resident named Pierre Pouliot celebrated his golden wedding, and at the same time his son celebrated his silver wedding, and two sons of the latter were married. The quadruple ceremony attracted an immense crowd to the church.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A STATEMENT was sent out from Washington, on the 10th instant, showing the total number of deaths (in the army) reported to the Adjutant-General's office between May 1, 1898, and February 28, 1899. The figures are as follows:

Killed in action	329
Died of wounds	125
Died of disease	5,277

Total 5,731

THE military operations in the Philippine Islands continue, the forces of the United States, directed by General Otis at Manila, having advanced upon the native people's lines. Details of the fighting appear daily in the newspapers, but it is difficult to form any judgment as to the actual results. The reports usually state that the Filipino loss of life was "heavy," while only few "casualties" were suffered on the American side. There was severe fighting, it is said, on the 13th, and General Otis reports the Filipino loss "as very heavy, while the American loss was thirty-five, mostly slightly wounded.

THE Washington correspondent of the Cleveland Leader, which is regarded as "Senator Hanna's organ," telegraphs that the President has made up his mind to keep the Philippine Islands permanently. He says: "It is possible to-night to state, without the slightest qualification or equivocation, that the fixed aim and purpose of the national Administration respecting the Philippine Islands is now, and without doubt will continue to be, to retain the great Asiatic archipelago as a permanent acquisition of the United States. This is a statement of absolute fact; there is no conjecture or surmise about it. Moreover, it is official, and, therefore, sanctioned by highest authority."

IN Cuba, the so-called Assembly has decreed the removal of Gen. Gomez from the command of the "Cuban army." This is not regarded seriously. The United States, it is announced, will take a careful census of the population of the entire island. The action of the Assembly causes some excitement, but the policy of the United States will be to give that body no recognition. The three millions of dollars for the Cuban army has been sent out to Havana by our Government.

THERE has been no announcement what the United States Government will do in reference to the conference invited by the Czar. A dispatch from London, 11th, describes the European governments as actively preparing for it. It says: "In spite of all disturbing events and rumors, the various Foreign Offices continue to exchange views with great gravity on the forthcoming peace conference at The Hague." Sir Julian Pauncefote, British ambassador at Washington, is mentioned as a probable representative of Great Britain, and the Marquis Visconti di Venosta, of Italy.

IN the Legislature of Nebraska, a Republican, M. L. Hayward, was elected United States Senator on the 8th instant. He succeeds Allen, Fusionist. There has been no choice in California. The Legislature of Utah adjourned without electing, and so, also, on the 12th instant, did the Legislature of Delaware. In each case there will be but one Senator from the State named until the Legislature shall meet and elect. In Pennsylvania the dead-lock continues. The investigation, by a committee of the House, of charges of the corrupt use of money, has developed some testimony which supports the charges.

THERE were some outgivings, last week, that opposition would be made to the election again of Speaker Reed, when Congress again assembles, on account of his standing in the way of legislation desired by the Administration. The Nicaragua Canal bill was one of the measures alluded to. The general supposition is that Speaker Reed is too strong with the Republican members to be "turned down" in the way suggested. Unless called in special session, Congress will not meet until next December.

THE steamship Castilian, of the Allan line, from Portland for Liverpool, was wrecked on Gannet Rock, near Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, early in the morning of the 12th inst., "in a dense fog, her compasses being destroyed." The passengers and crew were all saved. The ship is a total loss. She was new, this being her first trip from this side back to England. She was valued at $700,000. The cargo, valued at $400,000, was said to be "the most valuable the Allans have ever shipped from Portland."

THERE has been much concern in southern California over the light rain-fall this season. At Los Angeles, from Ninth month 1 to Third month 1, six months, there has been is made from the entire wheat kernel, except the woody, innutritious, indigestible outer skin or husk, which is not Food.

The Coming Flour.....

It is wholly a new and distinctive product, differing from all other flours, be their names what they may.

If your dealer does not keep it, send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied.

Franklin Mills Co., Lockport, N. Y.
Send for Free Booklet.

THE Duke of Leinster on a certain occasion met one of his laborers and said to him: "I regret, owing to a report made by my steward, at having to dispense with your services, as there is not I believe sufficient work for all." Upon hearing this the man innocently remarked: "Faith, your grace, there is no necessity to dismiss me on account of the scarcity of work, as very little would keep me busy." His ready reply amused the duke, who gave orders for his retention.

WILLIAM S. YARNALL,
Manufacturing Optician.

118 South Fifteenth St., (4th door bel. Chestnut St.),
PHILADELPHIA.

F. GUTEKUNST,
FINE ART IN PHOTOGRAPHY

712 Arch St., Philad'a, Pa.

Branch, 1700 N. Broad St.

Right chimney, good lamp.
Wrong chimney, bad lamp.
Besides breaking.
Go by the Index.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Ellwood Heacock,

UNDERTAKER
and EMBALMER

ESTABLISHED 1860.

TELEPHONE 5807.

1313 Vine Street, Philad'a.

Calls outside of city answered promptly.

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to
CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

CHARLES BURTON,
Practical House and Sign Painter,
Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, }

but 2.91 inches. Last year, in the same period, it was 4.30 inches, and in 1897, 14.40 inches. The rainfall after Third month 1 is usually light, so that the outlook is regarded as rather discouraging. The grain and hay crops it is feared will be a failure. Meantime great efforts are making to increase the artificial supply for drinking and irrigation. Towns and cities are seeking mountain streams, wells are being sunk, and rivers that run underground are being examined.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

It is announced, 13th, that the President has appointed Herbert Putnam, of Boston, Librarian of Congress, in the vacancy caused by the death of John Russell Young. He is now the librarian of the Boston Public Library, and receives a salary of $6,000 a year. The salary at Washington is $5,000, but this, it is said, will be increased.

—President McKinley and his wife, with a number of friends, including Vice-President Hobart and wife, left Washington on the 13th instant, for Thomasville, Georgia, where they will remain two weeks as the guest of United States Senator Hanna.

—The thickest ice cut in the memory of the oldest inhabitants of the shores of Lake Hopatcong, N. Y., was that cut after the recent zero weather. Blocks thirty-three inches in thickness were cut in the deepest part of the lake.

—The Missouri Pacific bridge over the Platte river, south of Omaha, was carried away by the ice on the 14th.

—At Abraham Yerger's sale, in Lower Pottsgrove township, (Montgomery Co.), Pa., the Harleysville News says, a number of old relics were sold, among which were the following: Small size plates, 90 cents; large size, $2.50. Sheets, spun by Mrs. Yerger when 7 years old, $2.50; chair, $3.45; eight-cornered teapot, decorated with pictures of landing of Columbus, $2.70. A small money trunk, covered with straw, brought from Germany 207 years ago by the Yerger forefathers, was sold for $2.70.

—The recent cold was exceedingly severe in the Northwest. At one station in York State where there was a warehouse full of potatoes, among which were 1,200 bushels of "Green Mountains" belonging to Joseph M. Eastburn, of Langhorne, the thermometer was 48 degrees below zero for two days and nights, and in the effort to keep the tubers from freezing during the night the building caught fire and was burned with all its contents.—[Newtown, Pa., Enterprise.]

—A Cheyenne and Northern passenger train, which has been for three weeks blockaded by the snow, near Iron Mountain, Wyoming, was reported on the 14th, still ten miles beyond the rescuing work train, and that it will require several days to get it out. There were supplies in plenty for the passengers.

—The Appellate Court at Chicago, on the 14th instant, unanimously sustained the decision given by Judge Taney last summer that express companies are obliged to furnish war revenue stamps to all shippers.

Washable Fabrics

In White Goods Department today will be found the following special values in fabrics for wrappers, dresses, shirt waists, etc.

Lace Stripe Lawns, regular value 12½ cents, at 8 cents a yard.

Dotted Swiss Stripes, regular value 25 cents, at 15 cents a yard.

Soft and very heavy-weight Dimity Cords, regular value 25 cents, at 15 cents a yard.

Madras Cloth, regular value 18 cents, at 15 cents a yard.

Lace Stripe Dimities, regular value 25 cents, at 18 cents a yard.

Checked Lace Dimities, regular price 18 cents, at 12½ cents a yard.

In all the above numbers there are from three to five patterns each to choose from. The stock is now overflowing with novelties and staple white goods.

32-inch White Organdies, 10 to 31 cents a yard.

66-inch White Organdies, 25 cents to $1.00 a yard.

48 inch French Nainsooks, sheer and medium-weight, 25 to 85 cents a yard.

Persian Lawns, Linen Lawns, English Nainsooks, Cambrics, India Linens, Longcloths, Dotted and Figured Swisses and Plain Swisses and everything that may be wanted.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier, PHILADELPHIA.

JOSEPH T. FOULKE,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,
623 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.
OFFICES: Ambler, Montgomery Co., Pa.

JOHN FABER MILLER,
375 SWEDD STREET, NORRISTOWN, PENNA.
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.
Practicing in Montgomery and Philadelphia counties.

ON TO WASHINGTON UNDER PERSONAL ESCORT.

The fourth of the present series of Pennsylvania Railroad three-day personally-conducted tours to Washington, D. C., will leave Third-day, Third month 28. The rate, $14.50 from New York, $11.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points, include all necessary expenses during the entire trip—transportation, hotel accommodations, and Capitol guide fees. An experienced Chaperon will also accompany the party.

For itineraries, tickets, and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad street, Newark, N. J.; or address George W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

A POSTAL CARD RECEIVES PROMPT ATTENTION.
JOHN S. CONRAD,
LAUNDRY,
8103, 8105 COLUMBIA AVENUE, PHILA

The Wonderful
Golden
Rambler Rose

Hardy and bears all the time. A glorious profusion of gold and white roses at same time on same bush. Blooms all summer from June till December. Finest, hardy ever-blooming rose for garden, trellis or veranda. Strong plants on own roots. 15c. each, 2 for 25c. New Floral Guide 124 pages, tells all about 400 other choice flowers. Free. CONARD & JONES CO., Dept. 6. West Grove, Pa.

Dreeer's Garden Calendar For 1899
An up-to-date Catalogue of the best new and rare, as well as the cream of the standard varieties, of Seeds, Plants, Bulbs, Etc.
A handsome book of 168 pages, profusely illustrated, mailed FREE to those who state where they saw this advertisement.
HENRY A. DREER, 714 Chestnut St., Phila., Pa.

The Dinner Pail

is a little 8-page monthly, published by "Silent Workers," an incorporated company of Friends, in the interest of helpful educational work they are doing for the world. Character-building is their aim; "Others" is their motto. Annual subscription 25 cents; stamps will do. Can you spare this much for "others," or send postal for sample copy. Address "Silent Workers," 934-936 Harrison street, San Francisco, Cal., U. S. A.

"The Dinner Pail" will be whatever its friends make it," writes an interested Friend.

PHILADELPHIA & READING RAILWAY.

ANTHRACITE COAL. NO SMOKE.
NO CINDERS. DOUBLE TRACKED.
HEAVY STEEL RAILS. STONE
BALLASTED.

Royal Blue Line to New York.

SWIFTEST AND SAFEST TRAINS
IN THE WORLD.

Scenic Reading Route to

READING, HARRISBURG, GETTYSBURG, CHAMBERSBURG, SHAMOKIN, WILLIAMSPORT, AND POINTS IN INTERIOR PENNSYLVANIA.

Royal Reading Route to

ATLANTIC CITY. CLEANLINESS
AND COMFORT. SAFETY AND SPEED

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 25, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 12.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XII.

THERE is a subtle tendency in the human heart to claim the privileges of the gospel of Christ without submission to its obligations. This has been evident in the experience of all professing denominations, and the Society of Friends is no exception to it.

CHARLES RHODES.

Of Haddonfield, N. J. From an article in The Friend, Philadelphia.

SPRING.

WHO was it that so lately said
All pulses in thine heart were dead,
Old Earth, that now in festal robes
Appearest, as a bride new wed?
O wrapt so late in winding-sheet,
My winding-sheet, oh! where is fled?
Lo! 'tis an emerald carpet now,
Where the young monarch, Spring, may tread.
All that was sleeping is awake,
And all is living that was dead.
Oh! thou who say'st thy sore heart ne'er
With verdure can again be spread;
Oh! thou who mournest them that sleep,
Low lying in an earthly bed,
Look out on this reviving world,
And see new hopes within the bud.

—[From Archbishop Trench's "Seasons."]

THE "EXAMPLE."¹

You will remember that Jesus said, "I have given you an example, that ye should do as I have done to you." It is true that these words were spoken to a small company of his disciples, pupils, friends, he had named them, and they were spoken long centuries ago in far-away Jerusalem, in that upper chamber where they were to celebrate together for the last time one of the rites of their Jewish church. The sandaled feet of that time and country made feet-washing one of the services of hospitality—a service reckoned the most menial of all. But at this supper no servant was called to do this service. Jesus himself, their teacher, their elder brother, their guide, the greatest among them, laid aside his outer garment, girded himself with a towel, as the custom was, and bearing the basin of water from one to another, in spite of the heartfelt protests of Simon Peter, washed their feet and wiped them with the towel wherewith he was girded. He had known them very intimately as they walked the fields together, and met the multitudes drawn by his works of healing and his words of authority. Perhaps he had discovered that they had not yet caught the vital meaning of his mission; perhaps he had glimpses in them of the Pharisaic spirit which he was living his life, and would die his death to overcome. One more appeal he would make to them, one more object lesson he would give them to lift them above the pettiness and benumbing influence of self-seeking and self-absorption into the largeness and vitality and illumination of his own spirit. He shocked their sense of propriety—it did not belong to their caste to do this lowliest office. But we may believe that they could not miss wholly the baptism of that spirit at one with God, who is not only the creator but the server of all!

"So after he had washed their feet, and had taken his garments, and was set down again, he said unto them, Know ye what I have done to you?"

"Ye call me Master and Lord: and ye say well; for so I am.

"If I then, your Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet.

"For I have given you an example, and ye should do as I have done to you."

What plain, straightforward words these are! Can we possibly miss their meaning? "I have given you an example that ye should do as I have done to you." Someone has said that the life of Jesus upon the earth was the human life of God, to show human beings how to live with one another. This is quite consistent with all the manifestations of God. For God pours out his own life upon the universe to serve his children, to be the energy of fructifying sunshine, to be the vitality of the harvest, to be the ministering rain-drops, to be the joy-giving beauty of skies and blossoms. And then, we may well believe, that to make things still plainer for us, so plain that the meaning cannot be missed, he has really lived before us in the life of Jesus the ideal of human relationships. What is the glimpse given us of the childhood of Jesus? He came back from his remarkable meeting, when he was twelve years old, with the rabbis in the Temple, and was subject to his parents, and "increased in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and man." Not until he was thirty years old did he leave the privacy of his carpenter's bench (you see how he respected hand-labor) to become the public teacher of men. In the meantime had he used his carpenter tools to build himself a temple, with a throne therein where he should sit in purple and fine linen to dispense his message to men? Instead of the Temple, he "had not where to lay his head." Instead of sitting upon a throne he went about among men; virtue went out of him and healed their diseases; little children felt the sweetness of his heart of love; the accused before him were bidden to sin no more, and went away with new hope and courage. For one class of men he had a severe, stern message—for such as were very scrupulous about the letter of the law, and had no sense of its spirit; for such as made long prayers and devoured widows' houses; for such as laid heavy burdens on men's shoulders, and would not move them with one of their fingers; for such as honored him with their lips, while their hearts were far from him.

¹Read to the students of Swarthmore College, Third month 5, 1899, by Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond.

The searching question which I would have us put to ourselves, is this—Has the life of Jesus among men any message for us; have we any part in that last Passover supper with his friends; did he give an example to us in that last service of hospitality, for us to do as he had done? We come of a long ancestry that has borne the name of Christ—does it have any vital meaning to us? Are our relations to other people to be patterned in any degree after the "example" which he left? The day is drawing very near for some of you when you must take your places in the wider world of business and of social life, to make permanent relations. You will have to meet the question whether the Christian name you bear means anything. And how is it right now and here in our smaller college world—is that example of service one to another the standard to which we try to fit our lives? Perhaps there is still another question that should be asked—Is it worth while to try to fit our lives to that standard? Would it make too much kindness and sweetness in our College world? Would there be danger of losing from our community what is known among students as class-spirit? There is no hint in the story of Jesus that has come down to us that he found recreation in his intimate intercourse with his friends Lazarus and Mary and Martha, in things that mildly teased and inconvenienced them. Was his way "the more excellent way"? or has modern youth, that often craves a spice of mischief to give zest to recreation, found the key to a higher development? These are fair questions, and worth while that we should think about them. Because it is college relations now that test our loyalty to the standard of Jesus—the affairs of the wider world do not yet claim us. Let us beware lest we find ourselves in that company that honor with the lips, while the heart is far from him!

The service of hospitality which Jesus used as an "example," has no place among us; but the spirit of that feet-washing rite,—how many ways there are of translating it into the language and activities of our college halls! There is the loyalty to college regulations imperative for the orderly and peaceable living together of scores of people. Does the "example" that Jesus gave mean anything at this point? There is the door-knob to be held; there is the precious hour of study to be undisturbed; there is the thoughtless, bitter word of criticism to be smothered behind the lips, lest it go forth a winged thing to sting and blight wherever it touches! Could our life be too kind and sweet, if we tried to fit it to the "example" that Jesus gave?

I believe that if we can get a glimpse of the spirit in which Jesus lived, and along with that glimpse one aspiration of soul to live under the guidance and control of that spirit, we get a glimpse of the essence of the religious life. It is good for us to read of Jesus over and over, to try to fill ourselves with his spirit toward life and toward men. And let us sing with our hearts as with our lips:

"Shall I not lift my heart to Thee,
And ask Thee, Lord, to rule in me?"

"If I be ruled in other wise,
My lot is cast with all that dies,
With things that harm, and things that hate,
And roam by night, and miss the Gate.

"The happy Gate, which leads us where
Love is like sunshine in the air,
And Love and Law are both the same,
Named with the everlasting name."

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

NO. 14.—FOURTH MONTH 2.

THE EGYPTIAN PERIOD.

GOLDEN TEXT.—And many nations shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, and to the house of the God of Jacob.—Micah iv., 2.

Scripture Reading.—Genesis, xlvii., 1-12; xxvii., 31.

THE land of Goshen, where the Hebrew emigrants were established by permission of the Pharaoh, was east of the upper part of the Nile delta. It extended from the eastern river stream to the desert, and was near some of the most important cities of Egypt. The famous religious and educational centre, the city of On, or Heliopolis, marked the southern limit of Goshen, while Memphis, the capital city of the Shepherd kings, was only a score of miles further south. It would seem that Goshen was uninhabited at this time, perhaps having been laid waste in the destructive wars at the beginning of the Hyksos dynasty. While capable of great fertility under proper care, this whole country is always besieged by the desert sands and soon returns to wilderness if neglected. It was, however, well adapted to the needs of the nomads from Palestine, accustomed to leading their flocks to and fro for pasture, and their life, except for greater security, was probably not much changed for a time. The colony increased rapidly, however. It may be that only a part of those allied with the family of Jacob had accompanied the patriarch into Egypt. It would seem likely that a part had remained in the region about Hebron, since the family sepulchre was there and the body of Jacob was taken to it for burial. Those who had remained may have been absorbed by the Amorite families about them, or they may have joined their brethren in Egypt. Possibly others of the desert Semites were attached to the more comfortable life of Egypt and joined with the Hebrews. At any rate the Hebrew colony grew in size and in strength until the Egyptians came to regard them as a serious menace to the kingdom.

For in the course of years new kings had arisen who "knew not Joseph." The native Egyptian governor of the Upper Nile provinces, at Thebes, had revolted against the foreign kings. The wealth and luxury which had tempted the children of the desert had sapped their strength in the centuries which had passed, and after a brief struggle they were driven out (about 1580 B. C.). Not content with this, the Egyptians continued their victorious career across the plains of Palestine and far into the north. The successive kings of the eighteenth dynasty brought into subjection the Philistines, Canaanites, Phœnicians, and the inhabitants of Mesopotamia; while they received tribute even from Babylon and from the rising power of Assyria. But the Egyptians were not successful colonizers. They left no armies of occupation in the conquered territories, and were obliged to reconquer them many times because of repeated revolts on the part of the subject peoples. They retained their power over Palestine and Syria, however, for several centuries. This period, moreover, seems to have been a period of considerable progress in these territories. Canaanite cities grew large and important under their Egyptian governors, though incapable, as always, of effective union against a common enemy.

The Pharaohs adopted the plan of strengthening their power by contracting marriages with the most powerful families in the subject countries. About 1450 B. C., Amenophis III. married a Syrian princess, who brought into Egypt and taught to her son the religion of her native country. This son, Amenophis IV., is known as the heretic king. He attempted to reform the Egyptian religion by the introduction of the worship of the sun. The form of this worship was much more elevated than that of Egypt. It substituted monotheism for polytheism, replacing the multitude of animal and human deities by a single and more adequate symbol. He was a man of courage and character, but the weight of centuries was too great for him to lift, and he failed. In the course of the struggle he removed his capital to escape from the influence of the Egyptian priests, from Thebes to a new city which he built on the Nile near the place of the modern village of Tell el Amarna. After his death old customs swept back into their accustomed ways, the new capital was abandoned and fell into ruins. But in 1888 there were discovered in these ruins between three and four hundreds of state letters and documents belonging to the heretic king and his predecessor. Many of these are from the Egyptian governors of Syria and Palestine. A curious fact about all of them is that they are in the Babylonian language and characters, and are written on baked clay, like those earlier discovered in the royal library of Nineveh, and elsewhere in Babylonia and Assyria. They show that knowledge of this language and of writing was widely distributed at this very early day. Moreover, this wide knowledge of a common tongue implies close relations, commercial and otherwise, among the countries of the eastern world.

The contents of the letters (previously referred to, first quarter, Lesson 8), give us welcome glimpse of the conditions in Palestine just before the Exodus. It is seen that there was at this time another great movement to the westward and southward on the part of the inhabitants of Mesopotamia. The Semites of the river country and the Hittites of Asia Minor are pressing upon the boundaries of Egypt. Nearly every letter from Palestine and Syria is a call for help. Some of the more northern cities are already lost to Egypt, and others are hard beset. The Canaanites are restless, and tend to join with the enemies of Egypt. Help must be sent, and that right soon, or Egypt must withdraw. And indeed Egypt was soon obliged to withdraw, and a treaty was concluded with the Hittites, leaving to them part of the former Egyptian territories. Later Egyptian kings attempted more than once to regain the lost possessions, but only with partial and temporary success. Palestine remained subject to Egypt, but enjoyed comparative freedom and progressed in wealth and civilization.

Pressure and defeat from without rendered the menace of the Hebrew foreigners within more severe. Their position near the eastern frontier would make them a most dangerous rallying-point for the enemies of Egypt. Consequently the comparative freedom of the early days in Egypt disappeared. No longer the Hebrews maintained an independent existence almost isolated from their Egyptian neighbors. Egyptian overseers put them to unaccustomed tasks. The grinding slavery of Eastern despotism closed round about them. The Pharaohs of this dynasty were great builders, and the children of Israel were thus employed as well as in other forms of service. Some of the details of the oppression will be reserved for a future lesson.

Let us note in passing how far the false material standards of success and importance would lead us astray in estimating the people of ancient days. The Egyptians had wealth, an ancient empire, power, a considerable degree of civilization and learning. The Israelites were poor, enslaved, and ignorant. Why were the latter destined to have an effect on mankind so vastly out of proportion to their condition? It was because there had been implanted among them the seeds of belief in righteousness. Their God demanded of them self-mastery, and although the idea was only faintly seen and weakly grasped, it involves all that makes man great. It is an idea that makes men rather than nations. The Hebrews are marked rather by the prophets than by the kings. The demand for righteousness implies the knowledge of righteousness. The development of these ideas: that God demands righteousness; that man can know righteousness; that man can obtain the power to attain righteousness; is the development of the human race. The repeated proclamation of these ideas has been the work of the prophets of all ages. The renewed appreciation of them has been the work of all religious reformation, and their supremacy in the life of man is the ultimate aim of Christian effort.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 14.—FOURTH MONTH 2.

THE RAISING OF LAZARUS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I am the resurrection and the Life.—

John, xi., 25.

Read the Scripture, John xi., 32-45.

REVISED VERSION.

Though the verses assigned for this lesson are only the 32d to the 45th inclusive, of the eleventh chapter of John, the whole of the chapter should be read, as it is devoted almost entirely to the one subject, the raising of Lazarus from the grave.

Jesus had gone "beyond Jordan, into the place where John was at the first baptizing," after his discourse in the temple in Solomon's porch (John, x., 22-39). There he learned of the sickness of Lazarus. Two days later he departed for Bethany, though his disciples represented to him the danger he incurred in returning again into Judæa, where but recently the Jews had sought to stone him to death.

The time is supposed to have been early in the year 30, A. D. Events were rapidly drawing on to the close of the Master's earthly career. It was probably about three months before the Crucifixion. Jesus, having no home of his own, was accustomed to lodge at times in the homes of his friends. In the little town of Bethany, on the Mount of Olives near Jerusalem, lived a family whom he especially loved. There were two sisters and a brother, Mary, Martha, and Lazarus. It is believed that they were in good circumstances, if we may judge from their owning a tomb, and from the costliness of an ointment which Mary once used upon Jesus. A record of a visit of Jesus to this family is found in Luke, x., 38-42. This Lazarus is not to be confused with the Lazarus mentioned in the parable of the rich man and the beggar found in Luke, xv., 19-31.

The account of the miraculous raising of Lazarus, after he had been four days in the tomb, and, as Martha feared, decay of the body had begun, is very definite, and must be taken, for the purposes of this study, as we find it recorded. The passage in verse 4, where Jesus says, "This sickness is not unto death," and verse 11, where he says, "Our friend Lazarus is not dead, but I go that I may awaken him out of his sleep," are, however, to be noted. The power which Jesus is recorded as exerting he ascribed to God. "Father, I thank thee that thou heardest me," he said, indicating that the miracle to be performed was in response to his petition to the Father of All.

The verse in the golden text must be considered in the light of the lessons that have preceded the present one. The "life" of the Divine Spirit, as it appeared in Jesus, was imperishable, and therefore constituted a true resurrection to all who partook of it. To "believe on" Jesus is to follow him. He has, himself, disposed of the doctrine that a mere recognition of him as Lord and Master, is enough, for he declares, (Matthew, vii., 21): "Not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the Kingdom of heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father who is in heaven."

Aside from the miraculous character of the event, there is in the lesson a distinct picture of a great sorrow, a strong faith, and a great love. The confidence of the sisters that if Jesus had been there, their brother would not have died, is very touching.

From the lesson we can draw an illustration of the power of the indwelling Christ to call to life the dead soul, and to make it possible for the resurrected soul to live on with the life of Christ as its constant living fountain of refreshment.

The poets have dealt with the subject. In Tennyson's "In Memoriam" he seems to speculate on the experience of Lazarus while out of the life of this world,—his four days' experience in another state of existence,—and Browning was also attracted by the theme. In his poem, "An Epistle of Karshish, the Arab Physician," he represents Karshish as meeting Lazarus long after the death of Jesus, and of finding him strangely indifferent to events that men mostly regard as important, but keenly disturbed by the slightest indications of evil or vice, as if his four days in the heavenly kingdom of the soul had made him regard what affected the soul's peace as the only thing of consequence in the world.

"Thus is the man as harmless as a lamb:
Only impatient, let him do his best,
At ignorance, and carelessness, and sin."

For Friends' Intelligencer.

LESSONS FROM INDIA.

AMERICAN advocates of colonial expansion frequently cite, by way of precedent and justification, English experience in India and other colonial dependencies. British soldiers in India, Hong Kong, and elsewhere, in their relations with the native races, have been poor missionaries, indeed, in behalf of a higher civilization, and are themselves confronted with temptations which in too many instances, prove their physical and moral ruin. Josephine Butler, in a letter to a friend, concerning the conditions of immorality in connection with army life in India, and the recent revival of state regulation, writes: "I cannot too strongly express my feeling (in which all mothers at least will surely sympathize) of compassion for the soldiers—those poor boys sent out in such numbers to India, and there subjected to every evil influence, and to few good ones. Apart from all statistical errors or exaggerations, we believe their physical state is bad in the extreme, and we do not deny the truth of certain ghastly descriptions of military hospitals. I have been permitted at times to visit such patients in hospitals (the male as well as female wards), and the very memory of the faces of these, my poor benighted fellow-creatures, fills my heart with pain at this hour, and with the most yearning desire for their redemption of soul and body in the fullest sense."

Referring also to the India women in this connection she adds: "A word concerning the native women who are made the employees of the Government under this system which we oppose. In this case never forget that these women are the daughters of a conquered race, which is dependent on the conqueror; that they are weak, ignorant, poor, (the Indian is said to be the poorest population in the world), so that doubtless the few annas paid by the British soldier to an Indian woman for her degradation is a temptation, even a prize to her, and sometimes to her poverty-stricken relations."

Two American women, Dr. Katharine Bushnell, and Elizabeth Wheeler Andrew, visiting India in the capacity of missionaries, and making careful observations in sundry military cantonments of camp life, as involving both the soldiers and the native women, have given some very striking testimony before a Parliamentary committee as to the evils and degradation attendant upon militarism in that country. In The Queen's Daughters in India they say: "When so-called 'Christian England' took control of so-called 'heathen India,' and plots of ground called cantonments were staked off for the residence of the British soldiers and their officers, full provision was made for the flesh, to fulfill the lusts thereof." They add: "Even the price of the visits of the soldiers to the chakla was fixed by military usage, and was so low that the poor slave women were often half naked, in winter often bitterly cold, and nearly starved. We have frequently heard in England that the recruiting officer who is sent out in the English villages to secure volunteers for the army in India, will hold out, as an inducement to young men to enlist, the fact that a licentious life in India is so cheap."

How completely the moral sense is deadened in this degrading India military life is strikingly shown in an official circular, addressed by the Quartermaster General to "General officers commanding Divisions and Districts," which I forbear to quote from literally, but which says "it is necessary" to provide women in connection with the "cantonments," and proceeds to suggest details of the most revolting character.

The publication in England of this shocking military circular, with its shameful details, created much indignation; Lord Roberts, then chief in command of the army, at first denied its existence, before a Committee of the House of Commons, but subsequently was forced to admit that he was in the wrong, when confronted with irrefutable proof brought to the light by Dr. Bushnell and Mrs. Andrew. He also made a very creditable public apology to those heroic women whose word he had impugned. This, also, is a part of the Parliamentary record.

Notwithstanding the prohibitive action of the House of Commons, which adopted a resolution, introduced by Walter S. B. McLaren, M.P., (a nephew of John Bright), directing the abolition of military regulation of vice in connection with the British Army, the resolution was practically evaded or ignored by the India authorities; official immorality in the army continued, entailing a terrible aggregate of disease and disability on the part of the soldiers. Statements of a most startling character on this point were published by partisans of military "regulation" of vice, with a view to having it again legalized. This, unhappily, under the leadership of Lord George Hamilton, Secretary of State for India, has been accomplished. That evil consequences increased there is no doubt. An official return, "East India (Cantonment Acts)," No. 318, of 1895, gives information in relation to the subject and includes a memorandum by the Army Sanitary Commission which says: "That venereal diseases prevail among European soldiers in India to such an extent as to constitute a most serious cause of inefficiency in the Army is a fact which admits of no question, and the grave character of which can hardly be exaggerated. The bare statement that throughout India in 1892 no less than 28,000 European soldiers were admitted into hospital suffering from one or other of the many forms of venereal disease, and that the time spent under treatment by each of these cases averaged 29.01 days, is sufficient to illustrate, in a very few words, the magnitude of the evil which has to be dealt with."

Another aspect of this great evil in connection with foreign military service, is the degrading influence of such returning soldiers upon the home population, as they come back again to civil life. A memorial to Lord George Hamilton, Secretary of State for India, opposing the revival of the "regulation" system in connection with the army in India, signed by W. S. B. McLaren, as chairman of a London committee, appeals for better moral conditions in the environment of the soldiers, but also for consideration of the home population. It says: "We earnestly plead with you to look beyond the horrible statistics of disease to the still more terrible facts of which it is at once the index and the inevitable outcome. The figures reveal the startling facts that we have in India an army of 70,000 men all but given up to debauchery, and that these return to this country at the rate of 13,000 annually, bringing with them the debasing sentiments and habits acquired during their Indian training, and infecting our industrial communities with a moral pestilence more destructive of the national stamina than the disease on which you have concentrated your attention."

The London Contemporary Review, in a thoughtful, suggestive article emphasizes the peril of a returning corrupted soldiery from foreign military service. After commenting upon the ominous fact that in a single year 28,000 British soldiers in India were maintained in a state of inefficiency for almost one out of twelve months, it says: "A corrupt soldiery means a corrupt people, and the evils with which the old regulation system professed to deal are not the only penalties of a vicious life. Police magistrates, poor-law guardians, masters and matrons of work-houses, educational authorities, and all the philanthropies are confronted by a problem of imbecility which is just as surely due to vice in the sufferer or his parents. The soldier, when his years of service are over, passes back into civil life, bringing with him, for good or evil, the habits and ideas he has learned in the army. We may go so far as to say that an army system will not have reached its perfection till this 'return of the native' can be reckoned a positive gain to the morality of civil life. At present it is all the other way."

Most pathetic is the condition of the helpless and exposed, ignorant and dependent native Indian women and girls. Pundita Ramabai, well known and much esteemed in this country, writing of the moral peril of girls and young women in the famine districts in India, says that hundreds of girls, young widows, and deserted wives, are waylaid as they go to the Relief Camps and Poor Houses in search of food and work, and taken away; that a "wholesale trade" is carried on in young girls who have been obliged to leave their families and wander away from home in quest of food. (In a report of a Government special commissioner on the general subject, General Viscount Frankfort is quoted as stating, on the subject of age of the wretched girls in the cantonments that one-half are from fourteen to sixteen years.)

The problem of British military service in India and other distant colonial possessions has at least three very important factors: 1. The welfare of the soldiers themselves; 2, that of the natives of these colonies, especially the native women and young girls; and, 3, the well-being of the civil population at home. Kindred grave problems, with essentially the same characteristics and results, confront France in Africa, Holland in her Dutch colonies, Germany and Russia in their vast military areas.

Would that Americans, so many of whom appear latterly dazzled with the prospect of enlarged colonial possessions, with an imagined, but in large part delusive "increase of trade," in Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, might be made more thoughtful as to the grave responsibility involved, concerning the moral and physical welfare of the thousands of American soldiers engaged, and for a long time likely to be engaged, in police control of the ignorant, undisciplined natives of these tropical islands, and of the forty thousand or more already dispatched for military service in the Philippines. Very grave also is the responsibility involved for the natives, especially the native women and girls, of these islands; and likewise for the later moral and physical health of our home population to be affected by returning soldiers from the type of social contact to which our new militarism exposes them. AARON M. POWELL.

New York, N. Y.

FAITHFUL FRIENDS IN DENMARK.

From "The Interchange," (published by Dr. Richard H. and Anna Braithwaite Thomas, Baltimore).

OUR Friends in Norway and Denmark, deserve our most hearty sympathy in their struggles against militarism. It is no slight thing for them, numbering as they do less than 160 persons in both countries combined, to maintain unblemished their testimony for peace. A number of them have from time to time, to use their own expression, "sat in prison" for conscience' sake. The following extract from last month's Venlig Budbringer, a quarterly periodical published by Danish Friends, seems to us especially interesting, as showing the spirit that animates them. It required considerable courage in the editor to send it out because the government might easily regard it as inciting its readers to disobey the laws, and this in Denmark is an offense punishable by fine and imprisonment. It is as follows:

"I am sure that I am in accord with Friends everywhere when I say that from our hearts, we are devoted to the king, as the one who has the chief earthly authority over us, and that we submit ourselves willingly to the existing government. We hold that governments are of God, and from our hearts we are loyal subjects of our king. But we recognize also that our highest Lord is greater than the king, and for us his law is the final appeal. He has firmly established in our hearts the principle that we are to love God above all things, and our neighbor as ourselves; and we are unable to reconcile this law with the command to enter the ranks of the soldiers. It is a real sorrow to us to take up this attitude, but we cannot do otherwise. What shall we say then about the law of compulsory military service? Yes. It is required in this country. The king and the parliament have decreed it, and as long as this is the case the law must be enforced, and we who cannot take part in military service must accept what is laid upon us because of our refusal. Yet even so we are convinced, if we continue faithful, that this very conflict of suffering (that we may undergo) shall bring forth its own fruit."

Shall not this example from our Friends in more trying circumstances than ourselves stimulate us to greater zeal? We may say that compulsory military service will never be established in America. How do we know? The country has this very year started on the same road of militarism that the European nations are traveling. Unless checked we cannot predict where it will stop. For our own sakes, therefore, and for the sakes of those who are in other places struggling in the same cause, let us be earnest and faithful.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

Dr. Richard Henry Thomas publishes a forcible and timely letter in the Baltimore Sun. We extract as below:

SHALL the Conference, so soon to be held, prove a success or not? The answer lies largely with the people themselves. If those who meet in conference realize that the peoples they represent earnestly desire and expect tangible results that shall make peace more easy and war less probable, their attitude will be very different from what it will be should the people manifest only a lazy indifference.

Some say, but without evidence, that the Czar is insincere. They tell us that it is to the interest of Russia to preserve peace during the next few years. But, speaking broadly, cannot the same be said of every nation? The rulers of the various countries in accepting the invitation have practically acknowledged that there exists a grievous burden and a standing evil. They have agreed to send representatives to confer together and see whether there be not a remedy. Shall this opportunity of a century be allowed to slip by unimproved, or shall it be in reality the inauguration of a movement that shall become, as years go by, a stronger and stronger defense for peace and good-will and for the best and unhindered development of arts, commerce, and religion? This question will be largely determined by the attitude of the people themselves. But we are enlarging our army, are even now engaged in a war. Is the present a suitable time to interest ourselves in such a proposition as this? Most decidedly, yes. It is a peculiarly favorable opportunity. If we are, indeed, entering the arena of European politics, as appears, and are no longer to remain secure, as we have been in our comparative isolation from entangling foreign complications, then all the more reason have we to join heartily in a movement that promises to affect international relations so strongly and so beneficently. The time is past when we could flatter ourselves that the affairs of Europe are nothing to us. They affect us profoundly, and we affect them. The preservation of the peace of the world is of vital importance to us, as to the nations abroad.

The scheme is not the chimerical one that some suppose. With the record of over eighty wars prevented by arbitration within as many years without any concerted action among the nations, what may the record of the next century show with concerted action? The proposed conference is, of course, to be advisory only. No nation is to be held bound by its conclusions, and yet if it be able to formulate a practicable scheme for the preservation of peace, its moral effect will be such as to produce most wide-reaching results.

The question before us is not whether the Conference is to be held, or whether America is to be represented. These points are already decided. But the question is, Shall the Conference meet under the impression that the people will be satisfied if its deliberations be merely perfunctory, or shall it realize that the people demand and expect results that shall make for peace and higher civilization? It is here that we have an influence. Let us join with other patriots in working for the success of the Czar's effort. It is a movement above all partisan considerations. It is world-wide in its scope.

FRANKLIN'S RELIGIOUS VIEWS.

ONE usually thinks of Franklin as anything but a religious man, and religious in the orthodox, conventional sense he certainly was not. Yet he was a believer in God and immortality and the efficacy of good works. His close personal friends were, many of them, devout Christians. In the chapter on "Franklin's Religion" in his "Many-Sided Franklin" series, in the Century magazine, Paul L. Ford says:

"Franklin had that rarest kind of tolerance which tolerates the opinions of others, and though he laughingly asserted that 'Orthodoxy is my doxy, and heterodoxy is your doxy,' his whole life was one contradiction of the epigram, for the faith or lack of faith of his circle of friends ranged from the most doctrinal of ministers to the most radical of free-thinkers. For such rigid Puritans as the Rev. Drs. Cooper and Mather of Boston, for the enthusiast Whitefield, for the Anglican Bishop of St. Asaph, and for the Abbes de La Roche and Morellet he showed as much affection and respect as he did for Hume, Lord Le Despenser, Thomas Paine, and others closer in accord with his own views. Nor was it ever a one-sided regard. No man in Pennsylvania exercised such influence over the Quakers. Massachusetts made him her agent in Great Britain, and he served her faithfully, even to the defending of her religious intolerance against English criticism. In France the papal nuncio consulted him frequently and followed his advice in the changes the Revolutionary War made possible or necessary in the Catholic Church in America. Absolutely unsectarian as he was, Franklin apparently was trusted by all sects, and he seems never to have refused a service that he could render any one of them."

ADDRESS BY CONCORD QUARTERLY MEETING.

The following is the address adopted by Concord Quarterly Meeting (of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting) of Friends, at its last sitting, at West Chester, Pa.

To the Czar of Russia, Nicholas II:—

We have read with great satisfaction thy proposition that the leading Powers of the world should look toward a general Conference to consider a peaceful arrangement for national disarmament; or if not so much as that, for a mutual agreement to greatly decrease the means of national defense by force of arms. It required about two thousand years after the first establishment by the Jews of the monotheistic idea to prepare the world for the advent of the Messiah, the Herald of the New Dispensation, the Prince of Peace. Since that advent nearly two thousand more years have passed, and no single nation has yet been founded upon the principles which Jesus taught. It is an especially appropriate time as we are soon to enter upon the last century of these two thousand years, for the nations to take some steps which may lead to a total disarmament, and the ultimate establishment, not of one nation only, but of all the leading nations of the world, upon this only sure foundation.

In this view surely thy manifesto now proclaimed may constitute a turning point in the world's history. Neither thyself nor thy immediate descendants will be likely, as the world moves, to see this glorious fulfilment, but it is not unreasonable to suppose that the end of the century soon to be ushered in may behold it. When that time comes, this important movement, now inaugurated by thee, which has recalled to our minds the beneficent action of thy revered ancestor, Alexander II., in liberating the serfs, will be viewed in its true light, as a powerful means of concentrating the public sentiment of the world upon such a consummation. To hasten this result and aid the movement which thou hast so wisely inaugurated, shall be our constant endeavor,—the promotion of the cause of Peace having been one of the important testimonies of our religious organization since its foundation about two and a half centuries ago.

"COURTESY is often lacking towards our fellows. In the matter of the swinging door the commonest politeness requires that we should not cut off the noses or the fingers of our neighbors, yet we go in and out of public places and never think of the one behind us, who must receive the door we pass through in the face if we do not hold it for a second.

"A little thing, but a little thing which affects the comfort of others can never be brought to our notice too often."

To love others is the true counterpoise of our unsteady natures. Towering and inſirm self-love is likely to collapse at any moment. The outflow of the heart upon others is in the ordering of God, the most infallible way of securing sanity of mind, as far as right human relations can secure it.—New York Observer.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, THIRD MONTH 25, 1899.

A CASE OF CITY ADMINISTRATION.

THE confidence with which people whose own houses are in bad order will willingly assume to manage other people's houses is effectively illustrated by some at least of our American cities. These are centres of eagerness for ruling the world, and they are at the same time examples of the grossest failures in domestic management.

Let us begin at home. Others may be dealt with later. Consider the urgent case of the third largest city in the list. Philadelphia has long had a high death rate from typhoid fever. Compared with other cities of the country, it is one of the very highest. The cause has been well known,—the pollution of the drinking water. In medical science nothing is better understood than that a city's typhoid fever rate depends on the quality of its water, and while we are in some respects less intelligent in Philadelphia than we should be, our deficiencies do not much lie in the direction of medical science. Everybody here has known for a long time that the impurity of the water supply caused the excessive prevalence of typhoid fever.

With this knowledge, what has been done to remedy the evil? Practically, not anything. The subject has been considered, it has been discussed, it has been reported on, and re-reported on. Years have passed by. The water was bad, it continues bad. It is many days clouded with coal-dust from Schuylkill county, and other many days reddened with the triassic clays of Berks county, while, even when it occasionally runs clear, it carries unseen the sewage of the thickly-populated Schuylkill valley; but all the same, nothing has been done to purify what water Philadelphia has, nor to provide a better supply.

Now we have come into what is probably the worst visitation of typhoid fever Philadelphia has ever known. At the close of last week, the "record" had been broken. There had been from First month 1, to Third month 18, 4,509 cases of typhoid fever reported, with 457 deaths; there were in the week then ending 477 cases, with 44 deaths. In the experience of ten years past with this disease it has usually abated after the first of March; this year it has increased.

What is the cause of the city's failure to improve the water supply, and so reduce this scourge? The answers illustrate our capacity as governors, and prove that we are qualified to manage the ends of the earth. One answer given is that the water is intentionally kept bad by those who have been in control of the city in order that the people shall consent to have the water-works leased to a corporation. Another answer is that the Councils are not able to decide what to do. A third answer is that money enough cannot be had to procure good water,—from the Delaware Water Gap, or some other distant point, where the supply would be permanently good.

We do not say which of these answers is correct. But let us point out a few facts. The first is that not nearly enough interest is taken in the subject by those who ought to be alive and earnest in demanding reform of this abominable condition. As is the case with so many other evils, a moral paralysis seems to prevail. People who can afford to do so drink "table waters," or have special supplies brought them from the country; very many put in filters, some of them of such capacity that the whole of the water entering the house is passed through, and bathing and domestic washing become processes of cleansing, instead of affronts to the physical senses and burdens to the conscience. Everybody is counseled to boil drinking water, and no doubt the great majority of well-to-do people habitually do so. But how about the poorer people? They have no filters. They must take the water as it is, coal-dust, red clay, Schuylkill sewage, typhoid-germ. It is hardly worth while to exhort them to boil it, for boiling takes fuel, and fuel costs money, and a coal trust is forming. It appears therefore that the municipal administration in Philadelphia, as to the second great object for which municipal government exists, is either so corrupt that it is poisoning its own people to promote a corporation water scheme, or so imbecile that it cannot decide what to do. In either case we need hardly add a word of remark.

One fact should be mentioned. If it be said that there is a lack of money to procure good water, let us remember on what objects money is wasted. Philadelphia is about one-seventieth of the United States, in population. One-seventieth of the cost of the war begun last year will be, no doubt, from ten to fifteen millions of dollars. That would go far to get a water supply free from typhoid fever. But how many would prefer that use of the money?

COUNT TOLSTOY, in a letter to a London newspaper, the Chronicle, condemns the Conference called by the Czar. It will be, he declares, a hypocritical gathering, not really aiming at the establishment of peace and the check of militarism. Referring to the lessening of armies, he says that in the present state of the world, when the nations are all doing their utmost to acquire new possessions, such a decrease is impossible. "As long," he declares, "as governments continue to acquire territory, such as the Philippines and Port Arthur, or to keep what they have acquired, such as Poland, Alsace-Lorraine, and Egypt, just so long will armies grow larger and larger; and as long as governments continue to govern their subjects through force, they will never tolerate refusals to serve as soldiers."

This may be true, but it would be a great mistake not to embrace the opportunity offered. If it shall be promoted, with courage and energy, by the peoples of the different nations, many of them staggering (as the Czar's rescript said) under the military burden, good must come out of it.

THOSE who are hostile to Peace, (and strange as it may seem there are many), are hoping to see the Hague Conference a merely formal and perfunctory gathering. "Nothing will come of it," is the word passed around. It is to the interest of the peoples of the world that something should come of it, and it is for them to make their demands known, and their pressure felt. Every contribution to that result is an act well performed.

In the poem by Robert Tilney, last week, first line of fifth stanza, "globe" should be glebe. It was plainly so in the author's excellent copy. In the report of the Young Friends' Association of Woodstown, "Wallace Hill" should—of course—be Mullica Hill. The school at Byberry referred to by D. N., in the brief article, "A Paragraph from John Comly," was not Henry Griscom's, but David Griscom's. The error was probably made by the copyist in preparing D. N.'s article for the printer.

A DISPATCH from The Hague announces that the Disarmament Conference called by the Czar, will assemble there on the 18th of May.

BIRTHS.

GREEN.—At St. Louis, Mo., Second month 17, 1899, to J. Walter and Ida Wylie Green, a daughter, who is named Maxine Wylie Green.

HILTON.—At Swarthmore, Pa., Second month 19, 1899, to Arthur and Harriet Kent Hilton, a son, who is named Sylvester Willard Hilton.

LIPPINCOTT.—At Riverton, N. J., Second month 16, 1899, to J. Lawrence and Caroline Biddle Lippincott, a son, who is named Clement Biddle.

MERCER.—Near Kembleville, Chester county, Pa., Third month 12, 1899, to Thompson H. and Edith P. Mercer, a daughter, who is named Marguerite.

WALTON.—At their home, Swarthmore, Pa., Third month 16, 1899, to Lewis E. and Gertrude K. Walton, a daughter, who is named Anna Bassett Walton.

MARRIAGES.

BROOMELL—COATES.—At the home of the bride's parents, near Russellville, Chester county, Pa., Third month 16, 1899, under the care of Penn's Grove Monthly Meeting, of which they are both members, John Howard Broomell, son of Samuel H. and Mary E. Broomell, and Evaline L. Coates, daughter of Pusey and Adaline B. Coates.

DEATHS.

BUSHONG.—Second month 2, 1899, at the home of Gilbert Bushong, Lancaster county, Pa., Ellwood H., son of Henry and Irene P. Bushong, aged 25 years. Death resulted from lead poisoning, contracted in the United States Navy.

Another victim of our war with Spain. * * *

CANBY.—At Germantown, Philadelphia, Third month 18, 1899, Elizabeth A., widow of John Canby, recently of Gwynedd, Pa., in her 75th year; a member of the Arch Street body of Friends.

COOKE.—At the German Hospital in Philadelphia, Third month 18, 1899, of typhoid fever, Morris Gilpin Cooke, son of William R. and Mary (Heikes) Cooke, in his 25th year.

Funeral from the residence of his parents near Dillsburg, York county, Pa. Interment in Warrington Friends' ground, near Wellsville, York county. The deceased was a member of Menallen Monthly Meeting of Friends, and an exemplary young man. M.

ELLIOTT.—Suddenly, of heart failure, at her home in St. Joseph, Missouri, Second month 8, 1899, Hannah Bateman Elliott, aged 87 years, 8 months, and 15 days.

She was the widow of Thomas R. Elliott, who was a fair-minded, liberal man, (a Roman Catholic), and died many years ago, leaving two sons whom he had charged to be obedient and affectionate to their mother, which she testified they were. She was the daughter of Isaac E. and Rachel (Bateman) Jones, faithful Friends, who were married at Waynesville, Ohio, in 1818, moved to Richmond, Indiana, in 1826, and twenty years later to Cincinnati, and were members there the remainder of their days. Hannah's right was also there till that meeting was discontinued in 1896, and after that at Miami Monthly Meeting till her death.

She had a brother, William Bateman Jones, long in the revenue service in Cincinnati, who died about four years ago. Had also a sister, Priscilla, who died soon after her father, and who was a diligent and faithful Friend. They were cousins of the late Warner M. Bateman, an eminent attorney of Cincinnati. [His death was noticed in the INTELLIGENCER, some time ago.]

She valued greatly her right in the Society, and while lamenting that her location and some bodily afflictions prevented her attendance of its meetings, "rejoiced that she could have Quaker meetings by herself," and she assisted cheerfully in furthering the Society's work, glad to feel that its moving, living principles were widely permeating other religious societies, and helping on the day of universal brotherhood.

In the few years of my knowledge of her—through correspondence only—I have felt assured that she was a woman who wanted to do right, which, to my mind is high praise.

C. B.

FOGG.—Second month 8, 1899, Aaron A. Fogg, in the 79th year of his age; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Salem, N. J.

GILLINGHAM.—In Philadelphia, Third month 18, 1899, Rachel E. C., wife of William J. Gillingham. Interment at Colestown, N. J.

Her life-work, in which she was deeply interested and actively engaged, related largely to the care, training, and uplifting of children from the lower walks of life to better surroundings, teaching them to become frugal and self-supporting. She was one of the visitors for the State Board of Charities to penal and charitable institutions; also, one of the originators of the Northern Day Nursery Association, of Philadelphia, and at the time of her decease, its President, succeeding our valued friend, Louisa J. Roberts. While not a member of our Religious Society, her inspiration for the good work she was so well qualified to do came in a great measure from her association with Friends. * * *

INSKEEP.—At Sharon Hill, Pa., suddenly, Third month 15, 1899, Edward Warrington Inskeep, M.D.

LUKENS.—At his home, Argenta, Ill., Third month 1, 1899, David Lukens, son of the late Aaron and Anna M. Lukens, a member of Bradford Monthly Meeting Va.

MURRAY.—At Aylmer, Ontario, Canada, Second month 19, 1899, Walter E. Murray, in his 89th year; "an almost life-long adherent of the Society of Friends."

[His son, Lorne T. Murray, who gives the information stated above, sends also a clipping from the Aylmer Express, from which we extract. It says: "He was a remarkable man in every way, physically, intellectually, and morally. Up to within a few months of his death he could be found every day at his office looking after his large banking business (one of the largest in Western Ontario), his mind being as bright, clear, and active as many men at sixty. He was a great reader and student. Kind, considerate, large-hearted, and generous, he was always helping someone less fortunate than himself out of financial and other difficulties, and there are not many men in Aylmer who have lived here and done business for any length of time, who have not had occasion to thank Mr. Murray for assistance in times of emergency. If a man was honorable, honest, and industrious, he never appealed to him in vain."

He was born in Howick, Scotland, 1810, came to Canada when nineteen years of age, and taught school for several years. He settled in Aylmer, in 1850, was engaged first in mercantile business, and later in banking. He was twice married, and leaves three children, a daughter and two sons. Two brothers also survive him. "He was a member of the Society of Friends, but as there was no church here of that denomination he was a regular attendant at the Baptist church. The flag on the town hall was put up at half mast out of respect for deceased, and the members of the town council, Malahide council, and collegiate institute board attended the funeral in a body. By his strict honor, integrity, and fair dealing he has set an example to the younger men of the community in all business matters which we might follow with profit, and to the good of the world at large."

We may add that he had been, for thirteen years, a subscriber to FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER.]

ROGERS.—Third month 18, 1899, Ann A., widow of John S. Rogers, in her 94th year. Interment from Haddonfield meeting-house, N. J.

RUSSELL.—At the home of her son J. K. Russell, Cleveland, Ohio, Third month 12, 1899, Eliza Russell, aged 75 years, 1 month, 18 days.

She was the wife of the late John Russell, whom she survived about seven years, mother of eight children, seven of whom are now living. Interment was made in Friends' burial ground at West Branch meeting-house, Clearfield county, Pa., Third month 15 (she being a member of this meeting), where testimonies were borne by Nathan Moore and Reuben Kester.

The deceased, although a delicate woman for many years, possessed an unusually cheerful disposition, which endeared her to her relatives and many friends. Her pure spirit has passed to higher life, leaving behind her most pleasant memories. A. C. B.

SMITH.—At Blue Mound, Linn county, Kansas, Second month 19, 1899, Cary Smith, formerly of Bucks county, Pa., son of Robert Smith of Buckingham, aged 86 years and 6 months.

Interment at Mound City, Kansas. He was a member of Solebury (Pa.) Monthly Meeting.

WILSON.—In Moreland township, Montgomery county, Pa., First month 6, 1899, Elizabeth A. Wilson, widow of Austin Wilson, aged 82 years, 2 months, and 27 days; a member of Buckingham Monthly Meeting.

LEVI K. BROWN.

Died, Second month 25, 1899, near Goshen, Lancaster county, Pa., Levi K. Brown, in his 85th year.

The Society of Friends has had few members, perhaps, more widely known or more generally useful in the various departments of its services than the subject of this sketch. For twenty-five years he served Baltimore Yearly Meeting as Clerk and Assistant Clerk. He was deeply interested in the Indians, a member of the Committee on that subject, and until the time of his death secretary of the Seven Yearly Meetings on Indian affairs, visiting several times, in his official capacity, the tribes in Nebraska and Dakota.

As many readers of the INTELLIGENCER will be interested in the sketch of his life as given in the Oxford, Pa., Press, of Third month 2, I extract and condense from it the following:

Levi Kirk Brown, second son of Jeremiah and Anna K. Brown, was born at Goshen on June 27, 1814. At that time Jeremiah conducted a store at Goshen, and when he was elected to Legislature in 1826 his son Levi had charge of the store until about 1835. In that year he was married to Hannah C. Moore. Three years later he moved to Oxford and purchased a portion of the property formerly owned by his uncle, Timothy Kirk. He conducted a general store business in the building (now the Octoraro Hotel) for five years. From Oxford he went to West Chester and engaged in store-keeping with his brother Lewis. During his residence there he purchased the Chester County Hotel, changed the name to Brown's Mansion House, and conducted it as a temperance house about four years. He afterwards engaged in business in Philadelphia and Baltimore.

In 1853, at the desire of his father, who was growing feeble, he returned to Goshen and managed affairs at the old homestead. Since that time he had resided there and became one of the most prominent and useful citizens of the lower end of Lancaster county. He was a man of good judgment, and many people sought his advice in legal, financial, and other matters. He settled over half a hundred estates and assisted in many accounts. He was a director of the National Bank of Oxford for about 28 years, and a director of the Conowingo Bridge Company for about 23 years.

His wife died in 1893. His own death was caused, after a long period of prostration, by injuries sustained in Philadelphia, Fifth month 11, 1897, while attending yearly meeting; he was accidentally knocked down in the street by a bicyclist, and never recovered. Several children survive: William H. Brown of Philadelphia, Chief Engineer of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company; Jacob K. Brown of Goshen, Charles E. Brown of Pittsburg, Theodore F. Brown of Pittsburg, Auditor of the Allegheny Valley Railroad Company; and two daughters, Mary L. Haviland, and Annie S. Brown.

It was the privilege of the writer to come into close relation with the soul-life of this aged Friend, as the twilight shadows gathered over the busy life, and it was the supreme desire of his heart to attain to a condition worthy of those who must soon stand in the presence of the King.

M. H. W.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

NEBRASKA HALF-YEAR'S MEETING.

THE Half-year's Meeting of Lincoln, Nebraska, will be held on the 22d, 23d, and 24th of Fourth Month, in the G. A. R. Hall, corner of 12th and N. streets.

Parties will be met at train upon notification, stating the railroad traversed and time of reaching Lincoln. For any information further, address either of the undersigned.

MARIA A. BAILEY, 1315 G. Street,
Lincoln Neb.

ADALINE A. GARLOCK,
University Place, Neb.

Salem Quarterly Meeting was held at Woodstown, N. J., on the 16th instant. In the meeting for worship, after the opening waiting, Allen Flitcraft offered prayer. John J. Cornell spoke from the text, "Wherefore, by their fruits ye shall know them." He dwelt upon the Christian virtues, as enumerated by Paul—faith, virtue, knowledge, temperance, patience, godliness, brotherly-kindness, charity—or love. Following John's testimony, Joel Borton appeared in supplication, and after a period of silence the meeting closed.

In the meeting for discipline, the business appropriate at this time received attention; the queries were all read and answered, representatives to the approaching yearly meeting were appointed, and four Friends named as members of the Representative Committee. "All was conducted in much harmony," a Friend writes.

VISITS TO FRIENDS IN NEW JERSEY.—III.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

In my last I omitted to state that while attending the school and the meetings we were kindly entertained at Joshua Moore's at dinner on Fourth-day (8th inst.), and at Charles S. Pancoast's on Fourth-day evening and night. On Fifth-day morning, called on Isaac Ballinger, who is now in his 88th year, and after meeting dined at the home of Lydia Davis. We returned to Joel Borton's in the evening, passing the time with them and their family of children, with some of their children's friends, in a pleasant social way, and on returning for the night felt the day well spent.

On Sixth-day morning, 10th, Joel Borton took us to Mullica Hill to attend the funeral of Joseph Robbins, an old man. It was an occasion in which, while we could feel that the removal had been a blessing to the departed as well as his friends, yet could be and was made a season of deep solemnity and instruction. We went home to dine with Henry and Rachel Lippincott, with whom we had a pleasant social visit until time for the meeting appointed for the afternoon. This was largely attended, and the spiritual interpretation of the new birth was opened in the religious service. After meeting we went to Thomas Borton's, where in the evening a large parlor meeting gathered, and I was led to address a number of different states and conditions, and judging from the many expressions given, to satisfaction. We stayed the night here, and in the morning called on Anna Gaunt, who with her daughter was caring for an aged friend. We then went on to Hope Moore's, where we dined and enjoyed a pleasant visit. After dinner we went to Asa Lippincott's, and made an agreeable call, and then home to Joel Borton's, Mary his wife having joined us in the evening at Thomas Borton's. In the evening a circle of young people met at Joel's, whose society we enjoyed until it came our hour of retiring.

First-day morning opened pleasant and warm, and at the proper time we wended our way to the meeting-house (Woodstown), to attend the very interesting First-day school. When the meeting hour came a large meeting gathered, to which were opened the nature of love and its requirements in a religious life. This was followed by an impressive supplication by Joel Borton. We went to dine with George Andrews, a son of Elizabeth T. Andrews, and after spending a little time with them in a social way, called on Elizabeth Cawley, who has been an invalid for some weeks, but who was at meeting this morning for the first time this year. Then we called on Dr. Allen and wife, the latter being connected with some of our Baltimore Friends, and went to take tea with Chalkley Haines and wife. A number of friends were also there, and the time passed agreeably until the hour which had been named for a parlor meeting at the meeting-house, no parlor being large enough to hold those who came. This was felt to be an impressive and instructive season, eliciting many expressions of satisfaction, and as this was our last meeting in this neighborhood we had many parting greetings of love. About the time the meeting closed it began to rain, and we soon had quite a heavy thunder storm. We stayed the night with Charles H. Pancoast and wife.

Second-day morning we left Woodstown for Mickleton, where we were met by John Heritage and taken to his home for dinner. In the afternoon we went with them to Gideon Peaslee's to tea, at the old house of Amos J. Peaslee. We had an interesting visit in their family until time for the meeting, which had been appointed for the evening. This meeting was well attended, and was felt to be a favored season. We returned with John Heritage for the night. Had an interesting conversation with these Friends in the morning on the subject of the ministry, the wife having a sweet gift which has not long since been acknowledged.

We then went and called on Edward Cooper and wife, who are quite aged, and the wife not able to be out at the meetings. Then to Ann Borden's to dine. After spending a few hours here very pleasantly, we were taken by John Heritage and wife to Woodbury, —and took tea with James and Lydia Griscom, children of William Wade Griscom. We missed the company of the father and mother, but much enjoyed that of the young people.

In the evening we had a meeting at Woodbury, which was well attended. Attention was called to the perfected life. We stayed the night at Warner Underwood's. Fourth-day morning we came on to Moorestown to attend the Quarterly Meeting of Ministers and Elders, which was felt to be an interesting meeting, and the counsel given was appreciated. We dined and spent part of the afternoon with Mary Linton, the wife of Isaiah Linton, the husband being at his business in Philadelphia. We went from there to Joseph Sullivan's to supper, and thence to a meeting appointed at Moorestown for the evening. It rained most of the day, and was very unpleasant in the evening, notwithstanding which we had a good-sized and satisfactory meeting. Those assembled seemed in a receptive condition, and some acknowledged their appreciation of the testimony given.

JOHN J. CORNELL.

Moorestown, Third month 16.

FROM ISAAC WILSON.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

SEVENTH-DAY (11th) is spent in the city (New York) with our friends, until afternoon, when we called on our friends Jane and Elizabeth Haydock. The former having been disabled for many weeks by a broken limb, yet so bright and hopeful of an early recovery, and if care and loving devotion of a dear sister, now quite advanced in years, can induce it, her hopes will surely be realized.

First-day morning, we are pleased with the promise of a fair day, and at the meeting hour we find a large and interesting company of Friends and others, who both in the silent waiting and attentive listening gave evidence of interest. We are pleased after meeting to find so many of our acquaintances from other parts, among whom were H. V. Haight, of Halifax, N. S., (from whom we have heard of late through the INTELLIGENCER, relative to the Doukhobors), William G. Brown, of Toronto, J. Watson, and others. Returned to the hospitable home of our host, in company with a number of our friends to dine. We enjoyed the social opportunity in an atmosphere sweetened both by the fragrance of many flowers and loving hearts. As we take leave of our dear aged friend, we are forcibly impressed with the uncertainty of many if any more such visits, but we feel truly thankful for the knowledge of such lives.

Just as we took the train and moved out of the Grand Central depot the rain began to fall, but after an hour's ride we reach Sing Sing, where a carriage awaits us, and soon conveys us to the hospitable home of our esteemed friends Hannah Bowron and sister, to share again the friendship that has been ours to enjoy on previous occasions. And although our stay seems to be necessarily short, (in order to meet other engagements), yet we feel it a pleasant opportunity. At 3 p. m. (Second-day 13th), we take train for Albany, and although delayed an hour on the way, arrive safely at the familiar home of our dear aged friend, Mary Davis, in that city, who with the devoted daughter has so often welcomed and entertained us during the last fifteen years, and we still find the same genial and loving life that makes the visitor feel at home. It was our privilege to call upon our dear friend Caroline Merchant, also Jane Cary and family, during our brief stay. We left on Fourth-day p. m., for Utica, to remain for the night. There we find a good night's rest and made our last start in the morning for Canada. A light snow having fallen during the night, everything bore a beautiful but wintry appearance, but nothing to prevent our moving on, and so we are landed safely across the St. Lawrence river, on the Canadian shore, just at the noon hour, and after a short stay we take our Canadian train for Belleville, to spend the night with a sister of Ruth's, whence we started over three months ago.

This Sixth-day morning, (17th), is bright and clear, and we board the train for the last time on our homeward trip, which we reached in safety at 2 p. m. In a brief review of our three months' absence, the many homes (nearly one hundred) we have visited, the many miles of travel, (about thirty-eight hundred), the social and religious intercourse, the renewal of former and the making of many new acquaintances, the many favored meetings, and now our safe arrival home, with the kindly greeting of many of our friends who have spent the evening with us,—all this, with the conviction that our movements have been largely directed by the unerring spirit of the Divine, causes us to feel more grateful than this letter can express, and all with whom we have associated who may read it, may accept their respective portion for the many services that have added so largely to our enjoyment.

ISAAC WILSON.

Bloomfield, Ont., Third month 17.

THE Indian population of the United States is 248,340. In 1492 they were the lords of the whole country; now they have reserved for them 144,496 square miles.

WHERE DO WE STAND?

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE Society of Friends has stood, in the past, committed uncompromisingly to the principles of peace. It has stood for equality in rights, for brotherly love, for adherence to principle at the expense of comfort, property, personal liberty, and even of life. What does it stand for now? Theoretically for the same things; practically,—let each one of us answer for himself.

Do we not believe in peace? Don't we all regret the necessity for the late war with Spain and the present philanthropic enterprise in the Philippines? Aren't we loud in our praise of the Czar for his disarmament proposition, and sincere in our hope that something may come of it? Yes we are; but did the Friends who made the Society and made for it the reputation under which we are masquerading, admit that there could be a necessity for war? Were they led by the Spirit to do what they knew to be wrong in order that good might come of it? Did they urge people to lay down their arms on condition that the enemy would do the same, or did they refuse to take up arms under any provocation? They were "fanatical," "unpractical," of course, as anyone is who does not concern himself with the consequences when he is doing what he knows to be right.

But are Friends less faithful now than formerly in cleaving to the right as they see it? Perhaps not; but are our eyes single to the light, or is our vision obscured by the un-Christian, unscientific, irrational doctrines that the end justifies the means, that the laws of ethics are all conditional, and that there are no principles not to be interpreted by policy?

Perhaps these doctrines are not un-Christian, unscientific, and irrational; perhaps they are true, and the early Friends were wrong. Perhaps so. But if so, let us be true to them as our fathers were true to what they believed. Let us say that we believe in peace—if we can get along without fighting; that all men are our brothers—except the ignorant and the uncivilized; that right is right—unless it is inexpedient; that the law of love is eternal—except that it doesn't always work.

Where do we stand? Let us find out, and then, wherever we are, let us stand!

EDWARD B. RAWSON.

New York City.

THE PRESIDENT'S DUTY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE course of the INTELLIGENCER in reference to the recent war with Spain and the present war with the Filipino people deserves the hearty commendation of all Friends, as well as all true lovers of our country. The recent speech of President McKinley, at Boston, which was commented upon in the INTELLIGENCER of the 25th ult., and in which he gave expression to the most philanthropic sentiments towards the poor people who are being fought by our army, presented him to the country in rather a painful attitude. If the President of this nation is simply the trustee for the people, to carry out their expressed wishes, what then becomes of the idea of leadership? And if the President is now waiting to hear what the people want him to do, and if on every occasion when a prompt decision is required he proposes to wait until the people can express their wishes, what is to become of our government in the meantime? The President is chosen to lead, to execute, to direct, not simply to wait and follow.

From the inception of the war against Spain, there have been two schools of thought in our country, one (the better element of our citizenship, as I believe), strenuously opposing the war, and the other, represented by sensational newspapers, by politicians, and by some, perhaps, who are looking for other people to exploit, now that they have our own so largely in control, as strenuously advocating it. For awhile the President appeared to belong to the former school of thought, but he yielded to the demand for war. His position no doubt was, as it still is, an extremely difficult one. No doubt he was desirous of finding a peaceable solution for the dispute with Spain, and it was probably the great pressure exerted by the advocates of war, rather than his own wishes, that induced him finally to yield to their demands. But yield he did, and for that yielding he must be held responsible both before the bar of human judgment and before that Higher Court from whose decision there is no appeal.

For the present warfare in the Philippines, which seems to be opposed to every principle of our own government,—for we still believe in the right of self-government,—the President is largely responsible. He is, under the Constitution, the Commander in Chief of the Army; it is his right and duty to give general direction to the war. Up to this time there has been no declaration of war against the Filipinos. Is it not fair to ask, then, by what authority the war there is being prosecuted? It is said that the Filipinos are rebels. But the right and title of this country to those islands has been, and at this writing still is in question. The Treaty of Paris, by which alone we were to acquire sovereignty there, has not yet up to this time been ratified. How, then, can those poor people be "rebels"? Our only right there is by right of conquest. Has the United States then descended to this, that it will seize and hold by force a foreign country, and claim that its people are subjects? A Republic can have citizens; it cannot, of right, have subjects.

Our profession is that we wish to secure to the Filipinos a free, independent, stable government. Our action at present is that of a conqueror by force of arms. Cannot the President make our acts as a nation more nearly coincide with our profession? The solution of the Philippine question does not seem such a very difficult one. Let us apply the golden rule, and treat those poor people as we would like to be treated. Let us apply rules of right, justice and truth,—doubtless we would be surprised by the result. Let us meet them as Penn met the Indians, "on the broad pathway of justice and good will;" let us recall our machine guns and our gun-boats, and our noble professions of friendship and brotherly regard to a people who desire above all things to be free and independent and to form a republic like our own, can then have full sway.

"The True Grandeur of Nations" is to be found in ways of Peace, not in the barbarity and destruction of war. It is the high privilege of the President of this nation, and it is his highest duty as well, to lead this people in the direction of their highest development and greatest influence for good among the nations of the earth. That direction is ever toward "Peace on earth, good-will toward men," and in these last days of the century, when even the thought of Europe has been directed by the Czar of Russia toward Disarmament, what a great privilege should our President consider it that he can lead this nation in that direction, and not only toward that object, but toward the still nobler one of a permanent International Court of Arbitration. The best thought of our people would heartily support him in that direction. The moral sense of our people has been touched by the action of the Czar; it is to-day hoping and praying that our own chief will lead his people in the direction of National honor and a lasting peace with the nations of the earth. Will he not do it? Upon the decision of that question rests the greatest measure of responsibility that any President has ever yet faced.

ISAAC ROBERTS.

Conshohocken, Pa.

A VIRGINIA SCHOOL.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

IF my readers will look on the map of Virginia, they will find the town of Heathsville, on the Chesapeake Bay near the mouth of the Potomac river, a quaint old village, the county seat of Northumberland county, where one is shown records going back to the days of "our gracious Queen Anne." However, it is not the past, but the present of this region to which I would invite attention.

Four miles south of this town, a school for colored people was established as early as 1867, one year before Hampton, and it has been doing its work in this out-of-the-way land ever since, with little intermission. This is its history: Emily Howland, its founder, went from her home in the State of New York, during the war, to teach the freedmen, first in the camp in Washington, where over one thousand people were crowded into barracks that had been used for McClellan's cavalry. These people were refugees, sent in from the front as the army advanced. Later the camp was broken up, and they were moved across the Potomac, and settled on the Arlington estate, where they worked the land. Thither this teacher followed them and continued her work.

Some of the men were anxious about their future, and often discussed it with her, saying that they "thought that Uncle Sam ought to give them some land." These talks suggested inquiries that resulted in her finding that large tracts of land could be bought in this part of the Old Dominion at a moderate price. Her father purchased three hundred and fifty acres here, for her to try the experiment of giving a chance to a few, to buy homes. Several families went from the Camp and settled on the land, and in the spring of 1867 she followed them down the Potomac.

A log-house was kindly furnished by the friend who had secured the purchase of the land, and had settled in that region with his family. Here the first school for colored youth was opened, in what is called the "Northern Neck," the peninsula between the estuaries of the Potomac and the Rappahannock.

The yearning for knowledge denied the enslaved, which they well knew meant power, filled the poor little place each day to its fullest capacity, with the children from miles around. Adults gathered there in the evening to be taught, but the Sabbath School marked the high tide of the enthusiasm. Youth and age assembled, filled the house, and overflowed surrounding it. On these occasions others were pressed into the service of teaching; sometimes the United States officer, stationed at Heathsville, rode over, and gave himself to the work.

This exuberant zeal of course passed with the novelty of having the liberty and opportunity to learn, and much the same feeling toward school exists now as is found in other communities, though little children walk longer distances to school than I have ever known any others to do.

While this pioneer work progressed, a piece of the teacher's tract was chosen for the site of a building to be used for both school and chapel. On that spot a house was built by the people, aided in the work by the energy of a young man from the North, and a sum of money from the Freedmen's Bureau, as well as by the contributions of friends. In the autumn, the school was opened in the new house. As the years have passed, many have gained instruction here, and have gone out to take their part in the battle of life, better furnished for the struggle by the lessons learned and the principles instilled within those walls.

The next necessity being a home for the teacher, she built a cottage to be occupied by those having charge of the school. This is the home of the present teacher, with her husband and children. She was one of its first pupils, and her school is attended by the children of those who assembled there in 1867.

Its third decade was marked by the addition of an industrial feature. A pleasant, roomy house has been built near the school-house, and, as I had had some years of experience in teaching the use of the needle in the Laing School in South Carolina, I was asked by Emily Howland to come and take charge of this department. I came in the autumn of 1897.

Although this is a poor country and wages small, she has always been adverse to giving clothing, being convinced that the effect is harmful, lessening self-respect and independence. So her plan has been to offer the people worn clothing at a small price, the avails of which, if any, after paying the freight, to go toward supplying materials for the sewing school.

A glimpse at a sewing class, in the morning, would show sixteen little girls, in comfortable little chairs, sitting by a low table, on which they lay their work-bags; these are their pride, the work of their hands; each is furnished with a cushion for pins and needles, a thimble, scissors and bees wax. Their tools are quickly in use, for they are at work on aprons that were Christmas presents. We have days for practising different stitches, but they like better the days that help the aprons on to completion. Perhaps the most delightful are the hours when they are permitted to make picture scrap books, grouping the little pictures according to their own taste. Friends send us pretty chromos, of which the present time is so lavish; these decorate the walls of our class room. An older class, more proficient in the use of the needle, comes in the afternoon. As many of the garments received need mending, the lessons of this class include a mending day. Thus these women of the future may learn to displace rags by patches, to respect the one and despise the other.

I am much interested in this work, therefore happy in it, finding it so engrossing that I have no time to be lonely, nor to realize my isolation from my friends and society.

Permit me to add that I shall be glad, if this account awaken interest in my work that may materialize in contributions toward it, of anything that can meet a human need, from a toy or a picture, to an old shoe.

ANNA M. STANTON.
Heathsville, Northumberland Co., Va.,
Second month, 1899.

The Doukhobors.

Joseph S. Elkinton, in American Friend.

MAY neither Cyprus nor America spoil them of their simplicity, as worldly success and maxims have given degeneracy to another once spiritual people, of whom we might say, Quakerism made their wealth, and their wealth unmade their Quakerism, or that of their posterity. The worldliness of mammon will continue to do this, save where we hearken unto the Lord, both in all other things and in his saying. "Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of righteousness, that when it shall fail, they may receive you into the eternal tabernacles."

Some Irish Flowers of Speech.

From a London Newspaper.

A LITTLE boy was caught by an irate farmer up in one of his apple trees. "Come down this instant," cried the farmer, "and I'll give you a sound box in the ear, you bla'guard." "Troth, sur, I wouldn't come down if you'd give me a dozen," was the reply.

A school inspector while examining a class of small boys in geography in a national school in a remote part of Ireland put the question, "What is a lake?" "Sure, 'tis the hole in a kittle, sur," said one of the youths. It was the only "lake" with which he was acquainted.

A gentleman once said to a milkman who admitted that he went with his pail occasionally to the pump, "How do you know, Tom, when to stop watering the milk?" "Begorra, yer honner, I go on watherin' till the customers cry out agin it," was the candid reply.

During the Crimean war the supply of tallow was limited, and, as a consequence candles went up in price. A woman was charged a half penny instead of a farthing for a tallow candle at the village shop. "Now, how is that Mr. O'Brien?" she inquired. "It's due to the war, ma'am," said the shop-keeper. "Well," exclaimed the woman, "I niver knew they fight by candlelight before!"

—In Pennsylvania, the Philadelphia Press says, "we have now nearly twice as many judges as are necessary."

Educational Department.

FRIENDS' NEW SCHOOL BUILDING, BALTIMORE.

We have already mentioned the appointment of John W. Gregg to be principal of the enlarged school in Baltimore.

The new building will adjoin the meeting-house property. It will have fifty-four feet front on Park Avenue, running back sixty-six feet. It will be connected with the present school building by a wing and a fire-proof corridor. It will be constructed of granite, and the architecture will be in keeping with the present building. There will be two entrances, one for boys and one for girls. Each floor will have a door connecting with the present building. The rooms in the rear of the meeting-house, now used for the school, will continue to be used for class rooms. The Kindergarten will not be changed from its present location.

The new building is under contract, to be completed by Eighth month 1. The architect is Charles E. Cassell, and contractors Morrow Brothers. It will be fitted up in the most approved manner, as to furniture, etc., and opened in Ninth month.

For the purchase of the lot on Park Avenue $7,000 was paid, and the cost of the building, not including furniture, will be about $25,000, making $32,000. Toward this amount Baltimore Yearly Meeting appropriated $6,000, and subscriptions to date amount to about $19,000, so that about $7,000 remains to be raised.

The first or gymnasium floor of the new building will contain a gymnasium, 30 by 62 feet, and 18 feet high, also locker-room, bicycle-room, bath-rooms, lavatories, boiler-room, etc. The second story will contain school-room 43 feet 6 inches by 41 feet 9 inches, with two class-rooms in rear, (opening into school-room), principal's room, and girls' locker-rooms, etc. The third story will have school-room 43 feet 6 inches, by 41 feet 9 inches, with three class-rooms in rear opening into school-room. The fourth floor will contain art-room, with sky-light, literature-room, manual training-room, also scientific department, chemical laboratory, and room for physics. There will be an observatory on the top of the building. (This will be one of the highest points in the city of Baltimore.)

The new building will enable the School to accommodate about three hundred pupils. The present school numbers about seventy, with six teachers, and is doing excellent work.

The committee now in charge of the School are: Jonathan K. Taylor, Chairman; Annie W. Janney, Secretary; Richard P. Thomas, Treasurer; Kirk Brown, Mary B. Andrews, Seneca P. Broomell, Rachel R. Holt, R. Henry Holme, Margaret W. Matthews, Mary Dixon Bartlett, Mary H. Price, Edward Stabler, Jr., Mary H. Townsend, and Lucy C. Walker.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

THE second annual contest of the Literary Societies of the College for the Underwood-Pardee prize was held in College Hall, Sixth-day evening, the 17th inst. The program of the evening was as follows: Address, President William W. Birdsall; debate, "Resolved, That the Jury System should be Abolished." Affirmative, Mark Thistlethwaite, 1902, and Georgia C. Myers, 1901; negative, Gilbert L. Hall, '99, and Mary S. Haviland, 1901; essay, Caroline T. Comly; solo, Emily Coates, '99; orations, Edson S. Harris and W. Lyndon Hess; recitations, Lillian J. McDowell and Anna C. Holmes, '99. The judges of the evening awarded the contest to Delphic Omicron, by a score of nine points to two.

On Third-day evening a lecture was delivered at the College by S. Hudson Chapman, under the auspices of the Classical Club. The subject of the lecture was Athens, and it was profusely illustrated by magnificent lantern slides from original photographs taken by Mr. Chapman.

The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on First-day evening in the College parlor. The discussion of the evening was, "Resolved, that Friends do not offer to younger members the same opportunity for work as do other churches." Edward Williams upheld the affirmative and Georgia Cook Myers the negative. Dr. William I.

Hull also presented a paper on "The Life of Jesus," which was much appreciated.

On Third-day evening, the 21st, Dr. Appleton, with a reading of Hamlet, completed the series of Shakespeare readings, which has been so thoroughly enjoyed this winter. '99.

BEQUESTS FOR EDUCATION.—Harriet W. Paist, widow of Mahlon K. Paist, whose death was announced in the INTELLIGENCER of the —inst., left several bequests in her will for aid of education. They are stated as follows:

To Swarthmore College, $8,000, to be added to the educational fund of that institution, and the interest thereof applied to the education of female members of the Society of Friends belonging to the Yearly Meeting which meets at Fifteenth and Race streets, Philadelphia.

To Friends' Central School, Fifteenth and Race streets, Philadelphia, $2,000.

To George School, $1,000, (after the expiring of life-use of a niece of testator, Jane J. Hobson), the interest to be applied annually to the education of female members of the Yearly Meeting which meets at Fifteenth and Race streets, whose limited means would exclude them from enjoying the benefits of the said school.

Harriet K. Paist also left $2,500 to Green Street Monthly Meeting, the interest to be applied to aid of necessitous members.

She had been in earlier years an active woman, much interested in the public good. She was one of the first female school directors in Philadelphia.

CHANGE AT WILMINGTON.—Enos L. Doan, who has been Principal of Friends' School at Wilmington, Del., the past year, has been obliged to decline further service, finding the duties of the place trying to his health. The committee in charge accepted his resignation with regret. The position was then offered to Herschel A. Norris, who after consideration has accepted it.

Herschel A. Norris is of Woodstown, N. J., and is now in charge of the Boys' High School department of the school, and teacher of Latin and Greek. He is a graduate of Princeton University, and a member of our body of Friends. He will take charge of the school in Ninth month next.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Young Friends' Association met Third month 13. The newly-elected President, Charles Paxson, presided. The standing committees made reports. The Current Topics Committee expressed its appreciation of the services of William W. Biddle, who has so faithfully filled the office of Chairman of that committee for eleven years. The Executive Committee stated that the Treasurer's report had been audited, and showed a balance of $339.45, and announced the election of a new member, and the program for the evening. The appointment of a new Lecture Committee was deferred, as the returns had not all been received, and the course of lectures was not completed. The appointment of a new Publication Committee was referred to the Executive Committee to be acted upon at its next meeting.

The first number on the program was a review of chapters eleven and twelve in "The Quakers," entitled "Fox, Penn, and Barclay," by Annie Cooper Lippincott. In the opinion of the writer these two chapters are probably the most important in the book, as they deal with the doctrines of the Quakers, as found in the writings of these worthy men. The complaint that it was impossible to ascertain the creed of Quakers was not surprising. George Fox's mind was so filled with the Spirit that his own simple, spontaneous effusions and outpourings were satisfactory to him—feeling sure he was taught by God—and for the delivery of his own message he was responsible. At length the writings of Penn and Barclay rolled away such reproaches, and made it impossible for any candid opponent to pretend it was difficult to discover what Quakers believed. Quaker doctrines were presented in a simple and attractive form in Penn's "The Christian Quakers," "No Cross, No Crown" and other publications. The chief interest in Barclay's "Apology" is in the chapter on "Immediate Revelation." For thirty years Friends had "labored under the grievous interpretation of denying the Word of God," and it is due to Barclay that the Quaker conception of the Scriptures was made clear. George Fox taught a practical religion; he entreated tradesmen to be fair and honest in their dealings; to those keeping public houses he says, "see that you never let any man or woman have any more strong drink than is for their health and good." He exhorted those of America who had Indians and blacks as servants to preach the Gospel to them.

In the discussion that followed it was remarked, "Friends say they have no creed. Even truth may become a creed if we talk about it and make it the source of our life action. We must not think Fox, Penn, and Barclay made Quakerism, and put it up a finished article. The question was asked, "Were not the views of Penn and Barclay more orthodox than our views of to-day?" In answer, Isaac Roberts said: "It is a fair question, and one that may occur to any one who studies the history of Friends and I think must be answered in the affirmative. The faith we hold is somewhat different from what Fox, Penn, and Barclay taught, and we need not apologize for the difference. That God is the teacher of his people himself is held as firmly now as then." J. Eugene Baker thought there was danger in going too far in considering the Bible as literature. As inspiration is from God, so we must have regard to the inspiration of the men who wrote the Bible.

To present the second paper of the evening, the President took pleasure in introducing John Cox, Jr., of New York, a representative member of the New York Association.

The paper, entitled "Seventeenth Century Quakerism in New York," gave a graphic account of the endeavors of the Quakers to preach their religious convictions and their consequent sufferings. Many of the punishments inflicted are too harrowing to relate in detail. Fines, imprisonment, and starvation, corporal punishment, and exile were the penalties meted out to men and women alike and patiently borne. Holland, although detesting Quakerism, yet fearing the depopulation of her colony, suggested the discontinuance of rigorous proceedings. In 1664 the colony passed into the hands of the English, and the laws were more tolerant. Considerate laws were also made relative to those having "tender consciences" regarding the militia and the taking of oaths. However, property was confiscated to maintain and build forts and other defenses. The paper had a cheerful side, and some amusing incidents were related. As, a member having "gone from truth" for a wife, the meeting labored with him for a long time, and it is recorded: "Daniel Dain hath sent a paper to the meeting, acknowledging his error and default concerning his marriage and signifying yt, he hoops to be more careful on all occasions for ye time to come." Friends were gradually becoming an organized body. As early as 1672 a burying-place was purchased, and it was directed that accounts of births, marriages, and burials be handed to the meeting for record. By the close of the seventeenth century the Society had increased largely, and meetings for discipline were settled as to time, place, and procedure.

During the discussion, accounts from records and occurrences of other sections than New York were given. After the usual silence the meeting adjourned.

ESTHER S. STACKHOUSE, Sec'y.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—A meeting of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn, was held in Brooklyn, Third month 12.

A paper on "Domestic Service" was presented by Marianna S. Rawson. After briefly outlining the position in the family of the so-called servant, the writer expressed her views as to how her condition might be improved. An ideal way would be to have training schools for cooks, just as there are training schools for nurses. They should be of such a character that girls of the poorest classes might gain admission. With a diploma from such an institution, the girls could command higher wages and greater respect, because skilled labor is always worth more than unskilled.

Until such schools can be established, it was suggested that she be treated at least as well as the shop girl. She should have fair wages, good hours, from eight to six perhaps, and for only six days in the week; her room should be healthful and pleasant, and her dress not conspicuous. Her mistress should emphasize the fact that "it is the art of cooking and the art of housework that is her vocation." Such service should be put upon a self-respecting basis, and the writer concludes by saying "Self-respect is necessary to good work and to good morals, and as a society of 'brotherly love' we fall far short of our profession if we fail to recognize the fact that the brotherhood of man includes the sisterhood of woman. Furthermore we should especially recognize the dignity of labor. 'All true work, be it only true hand labor,' says Carlyle, 'has something of divineness in it,' and it is the divinity of labor we should try to teach."

Then followed a discussion as to the practicability of the plans suggested. The question arose, "Could the majority of people afford to pay the higher wages the trained girls would demand? Also, "Could those girls desirous of holding such positions, spend two years, or even one, in such a school, even if the tuition were free?" Likewise there were presented many other suggestive questions in connection with the domestic problem as it exists to-day.

H. P. L.

WOODSTOWN, N. J.—A Philanthropic Conference was held in the meeting-house, Fourth-day evening, Third month 8. It was opened by the President, Annie L. Bradway, reading the third chapter of John. Blanche Davis gave a recitation, "Bustin' the Temperance Man."

A letter prepared by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee, on "The Abolition of the License System," was read by Helen G. Borton. John J. Cornell, of Baltimore, Secretary of the Anti-Saloon League, followed the reading of the letter by an address on the same subject. He gave a detailed account of the League, for the instruction of those not acquainted with it. Its object in the beginning was to unify the people, irrespective of party and religious beliefs, in regard to this question, and concentrate power upon the liquor traffic. In this respect it has not reached all that it hoped to do. A part of its work is to educate the large, massive community, that alcohol is unnecessary as a remedial agent. He gave facts to show that scientific men have come to see its uselessness, and are discarding it. There are now twenty-six States in which the League has been established, and each has a State Superintendent in the field.

The League is aiming at another point, when the public are sufficiently educated to help without political machinery,—the annulment of all license laws by act of the courts. They are looking toward the execution of the present laws now and later on, when the people are educated, toward the amendments to the present laws. As long as our interests are unified, and outside of politics, we shall progress, but while we are not united, the liquor interest will be the stronger. Let all temperance organizations unite and work earnestly toward the accomplishment of the greatly desired result. At the close of the address remarks were made and questions asked by many present. Almira Lippincott then recited a poem entitled "Licensed." After a short silence the meeting adjourned.

S. H. P., Sec.

MICKLETON, N. J.—The meeting of Young Friends' Association was opened by the president reading the second chapter of Peter. The thirteenth chapter of Janney's History was read by Martha R. Heritage, after which Rebecca V. Ogden read the Introduction to the Discipline.

Ellen B. Haines read an interesting account of the life of John M. Whitall. Next we listened to a Quotation Contest, given by Hannah A. Heritage, Martha White, M. Elma Livezey, and J. Omar Heritage. It lasted twenty minutes, and 128 quotations were given; the exercise was much enjoyed by all present.

Anna Pancoast read the memorial of Deborah F. Wharton and also a letter from her daughter, Esther Smith, alluding to her life.

Clarence Heritage gave a beautiful recitation entitled "The Two Workers," showing us how two workmen started out on life's journey together, with bright prospects before one, and dark and gloomy before the other; one drinking from the well of life, the other from the fatal cup.

Esther L. Rulon read the "Peace Pipe," from the "Song of Hiawatha." Mabel B. Haines recited a beautiful poem entitled, "Scandal," teaching us to always sow good seed, and we shall reap rich rewards. Hannah L. Peaslee read a pretty piece entitled, "New Every Morning," after which we listened to an interesting collection of items read by Ruth W. Peaslee.

The appointments were read and the roll called. Meeting then adjourned until Fourth month 8. Number present 35.
E. L. D., Sec'y.

WILMINGTON, DEL.—Our Young Friends' Association was pleasantly and profitably entertained Sixth-day evening, Third month 10, by a lecture and stereopticon views, etc. The lecture was by J. Russell Smith, of George School, on "Friends in Slavery Times." He gave us interesting reminiscences of the flight of slaves from bondage, and the help Friends gave them. Then we had passed before our vision the likenesses of many of those earnest Friends who have passed onward; also pictures of meeting-houses, residences, groups of fleeing slaves, etc. It was remarked how short seemed the time of the lecture.
D. F.

CORNWALL, N. Y.—An interesting, though not a very largely attended meeting of the Cornwall Friends' Association, was held First-day afternoon, Third month 19, at the home of Theodore Ketcham. An instructive paper prepared by Baldwin F. Brown and Eva J. Ketcham was read at this meeting, the subject being "Proselyting in connection with the Society." In this there were three topics discussed,—the Social, the Association, and the First-day School.

This paper was so thoroughly enjoyed that it was decided to have it read again at the next session, on account of the small attendance at this meeting.

An appropriate selection on "Kindness," was read by Jessie Ketcham. After the customary business the Friends adjourned to meet Fourth month 9.

EDMUND COCKS, Secretary.

CAMDEN, N. J.—The third regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of Camden was held Second month 7, 1899.

The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved. The report of the Executive Committee was as follows:

"An Account of the Negro Race Question," read by Anna B. Sheppard. A recitation entitled "Penelope's Christmas Dance," by Myrtis C. Bailey. A very interesting paper prepared by Edward Roberts, Jr., on "Are our Business Methods of to-day in harmony with Christian Life?" He felt that the great love of gain influenced business men to be grasping and selfish, often leading them to give orders to their employees, which are not in accord with Christianity. What we really need is a practical religion, one that can be adapted to our every-day life, which Friends profess to have.

Another paper was read on the same subject, by Oliver Troth, in which he said that under the present business methods the success of one man is the failure of many. If we could only live up to our greatest commandment "Love thy neighbor as thyself."

The roll being called, all members responded with a sentiment embodying a sound business principle.

Two new names were added to the roll. The meeting then adjourned to meet Third month 7.

LAURA COLLINGS, Secretary.

DROP thy still dews of quietness,
Till all our strivings cease,
Take from our souls the strain and stress,
And let the ordered life confess
The beauty of thy peace. —Whittier.

THE bravest battle that ever was fought,
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you'll find it not,
'Twas fought by the Mothers of men.—J. Miller.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE issue of a new monthly magazine, devoted to Genealogy and Local History, has been begun by Thomas Allen Glenn, known as an author in these departments by his book, "Merion in the Welsh Tract," and others. The magazine begins with the number for the present month. The contents include the opening portion of a tracing of the "American Descendants of Rhirid the Wolf,—Rhirid Flaidd, a Welsh "Lord" of Penllyn, in North Wales, in the time of Henry II., and Richard. The number of families, chiefly in Pennsylvania, whose descent is traced to him is very large, and T. A. Glenn has long been engaged in studying them. Other papers in the number are "Scotch Planters of Ulster," "Morton Notes," "Some of the First Planters of West Jersey," and "Moravian Immigration to Pennsylvania, 1742-1763," with departments of Notes and Queries, and Book Notes.

There has long been a doubt in the minds of our local genealogists whether a magazine of this sort at Philadelphia could be sustained. Certainly it ought to be.

The price is $1 a year; ten cents a single copy. Address T. A. Glenn, Ardmore, Pa.

In the Popular Science Monthly for the coming month under the title "The Coming of the Catbird," Dr. Spencer Trotter, of Swarthmore College, gives a delightful yet instructive account of the spring bird migration as it may be observed in the Delaware Valley. Among other interesting points mentioned is the close relation between the advent of certain birds and a certain temperature.

John Kendrick Bangs has become the editor of Harper and Brothers' literary weekly, Literature, established first in London, by the Times newspaper, but since made an American publication.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

ST. MARY'S HALL LECTURES AND OTHER PAPERS. By Henry Budd. Pp. 287. $1.50. Philadelphia: Henry T. Coates & Co. 1898.

THE FEDERATION OF THE WORLD. By Benjamin F. Trueblood, LL.D. Pp. 162. $1.00. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (Received through John Wanamaker.)

THE AWAKENING OF A NATION: MEXICO OF TO-DAY. By Charles F. Lummis. Pp. xi. and 179. $2.50. New York: Harper & Brothers. 1899.

HOME LIFE IN COLONIAL DAYS. By Alice Morse Earle. Illustrated. Pp. 470. $2.50. New York. The Macmillan Company.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

IN England, writes Dr. R. H. Thomas, the importance of the people speaking out in regard to the Disarmament Conference has been recognized, and a movement of great force has been developed. Leading churchmen and non-conformists, prominent men in politics and in the world of letters, even the commander-in-chief of the British army, have sanctioned it. Large and enthusiastic meetings have been held in different places throughout the kingdom, and thousands of signatures have been obtained to an address to the Czar approving his proposal. How seriously this proposal has been taken in that country the speech of the first lord of the admiralty in Parliament shows.

Speaking of a meeting in eastern Pennsylvania, a Friend, in the course of a letter mainly on business, says: "Our meeting has lost all of its elderly members, by death, [except one man Friend]. I thought when [five Friends, three men and two women] went over to the other shore, and [another] moved away, we would not be able to keep up our meeting, but [a Friend named] and [another] a graduate of Swarthmore College, attend every meeting, and we have drawn in a number of young people, and are holding our own nicely,—yes, and more."

Our friend Harry V. Haight, in a letter on business, writes from Halifax, 17th inst., and adds: "I have been in New York the past two weeks, and met many old friends, and made some new ones. Serena Minard I have always known; she spoke at my mother's funeral, fifteen years ago. She spoke very nicely, the first First-day I was in New York, and the next First-day we had the pleasure of hearing Isaac Wilson."

"I have been much pleased with the standard of Peace which the INTELLIGENCER has maintained all through our war difficulties," a Friend writes us. "The editorials on this subject have been very good and very much to the point. Press on, sowing the good seed; a little may take root and prosper."

"Your issue of last week contains so many good articles, namely,—'Peter the Great and the Friends,' 'A Word from Bishop Paret,' 'An Address to the Czar,' etc., and the editorial on 'The Choice Last Year' corresponds so heartily with my feelings that I must write and express them." How true, indeed, it is that the silence at Washington is painful. Let every effort be heard, so I thought the address to the Czar, which Concord Quarterly Meeting adopted at its last meeting, might find a place in the paper."

COMMUNICATIONS.

FRIENDS AND OTHERS IN ATHENS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I HAVE lived in Athens, Greece, for sixteen months, and I have come to the United States for a visit of a few months. I have had a correspondence with a number of Friends living in the Eastern Hemisphere, and I have labored for a closer religious fellowship amongst us. About nine months ago I discovered a family of eight Friends living in Athens, and greatly rejoiced in their company. We held a number of meetings which were well attended. There is an inquiry in Athens to know more about Friends, and now that the time of holding the Paris Exhibition is approaching, an invitation is extended to Friends to visit us. Some Friends could come to Athens next winter, and return to their homes by way of the Paris Exhibition, and others could attend the Paris Exhibition and come to Athens the following winter, returning to their homes afterwards.

Conshohocken, Pa.

GEORGE J. WEBSTER.

[G. J. W. speaks of two Greeks, Nicholas Athan Malevitis and Rigas Pofonti, as religious persons, interested in a better way, and says that "about two years ago they were imprisoned two or three times and beaten, because of their preaching." He also mentions Elizabeth B. Tonjoroff, at Philippopolis, in Bulgaria, and says her husband "has suffered imprisonment several times for his preaching."—Eds.]

SIGNING FULL NAMES.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I have for a number of years been an interested reader of your valuable paper, which we still look for as a welcome weekly visitor in our home. The communications from your various correspondents are enjoyed to their fullest extent. I have often thought of making the suggestion through your columns that the writers of the various interesting articles that come to you from time to time for publication would kindly sign their full names. It certainly adds much to the interest of an article to know the author's name, although we may be personally unacquainted.

I would also feel grateful to the secretaries of Young Friends' Associations if they would feel it right to give the readers the benefit of their full names instead of the initials. For surely anything that is good enough for publication in the INTELLIGENCER should be good enough to have the writer's full name.

Hopewell, Va.

JONATHAN W. BRANSON.

THE ADDRESS TO THE CZAR.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

It seems a most excellent plan to provide a form of address, to be signed and sent to the Czar, and we are much interested in the one presented in the INTELLIGENCER. But it does not make the statement that only men are to sign. Yet the form is for Pennsylvania only, and its beginning excludes women. In four States of this Union only are women "sovereign citizens."

A. M. J.

Clifton, N. J.

[We printed the address as it was formulated at the Germantown meeting, where Anna Evreinoff spoke (and subsequently printed in the American Friend). The word "sovereign" might be omitted, we think, without impropriety, and the form of the address otherwise amended to suit different localities. In Baltimore, a form has been adopted similar in import, but varying in language.—Eds.]

METEOROLOGICAL SUMMARY FOR SECOND MONTH, 1899.

Mean barometer,	30.085
Highest barometer during the month, 11th,	30.702
Lowest barometer during the month, 8th,	29.416
Mean temperature,	27.8
Highest temperature during the month, 22d,	59.
Lowest temperature during the month, 10th,	-6.*
Mean of maximum temperatures,	34.4
Mean of minimum temperatures,	21.2
Greatest daily range of temperature, 15th,	22.
Least daily range of temperature, 13th,	3.
Mean daily range of temperature,	13.1
Mean relative humidity, per cent.,	76.8
Mean temperature of the Dew Point,	19.8
Total precipitation in inches, rain and melted snow,	6.46
Greatest precipitation in any 24 consecutive hours, 1.36 inches of rain, on the 26th and 27th.
Number of days on which .01 inch or more of rain fell, 16.
Number of clear days 8, fair days 9, cloudy days 11.
Prevailing direction of wind from the Northwest.
Thunder storm on the 3d.
Hail on the 3d.
Sleet on the 8th.
Solar halo on the 11th, 15th.
Lunar halo on the 17th, 21st, 23d.
Snow on the 1st, 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, 11th, 12th, 13th, 14th.
Total snow fall during month, 31.2 inches.
Depth of snow on ground 15th instant, 20 inches.
Depth of snow on ground at end of month, none.

SENSIBLE TEMPERATURE DATA.

Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m., 45.5 on 27th
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m., -7 on 10th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m., 22.2.
Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m., 43 on 21st.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m., -2 on 10th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m., 25.6.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer for this month, 23.9

NOTE.—An important feature of the weather this month, was the extremely low temperature which prevailed from the 8th to the 15th inclusive. On the 9th, the minimum temperature was zero, on the 10th, 6 degrees below zero, and on the 11th, 5 degrees below zero. In the surrounding suburban districts, temperatures of 8 degrees below to 14 degrees below zero are reported from different localities.

The mean temperature of this month, 27.8°, is 6° below the average for the second month.

The most remarkable meteorological event of the month was the very unusually violent and heavy snow storms which commenced on the 5th and continued to the 8th, inclusive, and again from the evening of the 11th to the 14th, during which time 30 inches in depth on the level of snow fell. The snow was very light and dry, and being accompanied by high North and Northeast wind, formed almost insurmountable drifts, rendering the railroads and other roads impassable, causing complete suspension of travel for several days. Owing to the dry nature of the snow in this storm, the damage to telegraph and telephone wires was slight. A well remembered storm of this general character occurred in Third month, 1888. In First month, 1831, and Second month 1836 very similar storms are described by our older friends.

The total precipitation, rain and melted snow, 6.46 inches is about double the normal average for Second month.

* Below zero.

JOHN COMLY, Observer.

Centennial Avenue, Philadelphia, Second month 28.

It is stated that M. Faure, the late President of France, said, just before he died, to his valet, whose service he much appreciated: "You see how small a thing man is, though he be President of the republic."

CURRENT EVENTS.

DISPATCHES from Manila have been almost daily chronicles of further military operations against the Filipino people. The dispatches usually speak of "driving the enemy back," "shelling" their towns and villages, and of "inflicting heavy loss" upon them, with a few of the United States troops killed, and a small number wounded. Many villages have been burned. At the close of last week, it was said that General Otis now had the situation almost under control, and that the war would soon be over. A later dispatch intimated that there was no certainty of this, and said some thought 10,000 more men should be sent out. On the 21st a dispatch stated that "an outbreak" had occurred in Negros, one of the islands that had been considered entirely "pacified."

GENERAL OTIS, a dispatch says, declined to release the volunteer troops, whose time, (as they were to serve during the war with Spain), is now regarded as out. The Government will send him "three light batteries, and six Hotchkiss guns," to be used in mountain service against the Filipinos. The Navy Department is about to organize a "mosquito fleet," (light-draft armed ships), to penetrate the rivers and "shell" villages, or other places which the troops could not easily reach by land.

The United States Consul at Hong Kong, Edwin Wildman, is quoted in a dispatch from that city as saying that he does not expect to live to see the end of the war in the Philippines.

ON the 17th instant, the Queen Regent of Spain, acting on the advice of the ministry, ratified the treaty of peace in behalf of that country by affixing her signature to the document. By the terms of the treaty ratifications may be exchanged at any time before June 10. Formal notice of the signing was given the United States Government, on the 18th, by M. Cambon, the French Ambassador, and it was arranged that M. Cambon shall act as representative of the Spanish Government and Secretary Hay for the United States in the formal exchange of ratification.

It is intimated from Washington that efforts will soon be made to develop a new policy of enterprise with reference to China. The question "of insistence upon our treaty rights" in that country is to be raised. "The American Asiatic Association," which is composed of prominent manufacturers and exporters, wishes the United States to resist Russia's policy in Asia, and help guarantee the "integrity" of the Chinese Empire. An "understanding" with Great Britain for joint action would be essential, and probably a "triple alliance," to include Great Britain, the United States, and Japan, and so form a naval and military front against Russia and other nations.

THE formation of "Combines," or "Trusts," has gone on since the first of the year at a rate far exceeding anything ever known. A New York financial journal, a week ago, stated the "capitalization," in the last two months, of such corporations, to be $1,106,300,000. This is more than in the whole of 1898, though the amount in that year was considered enormous, and is stated to have been $906,176,000. Most of the so-called "common stock" in these combinations is entirely fraudulent, and represents no value; the total capitalization is usually more than twice the value of the property. It will be impossible for them to earn a return on the sum unless by some means of extortion.

A FRIGHTFUL disaster occurred in New York city on the 17th instant. The Windsor Hotel, at Fifth avenue and 46th street, a large hotel, filled with people, was entirely burned in a very short time, and many persons perished. The fire occurred in the afternoon. Many persons believe it was set on fire by thieves; the flames appeared all over in so many places that this theory is insisted upon. It was stated on the 19th, that the list of known dead was sixteen, and of missing, sixty-three, while fifty-seven were injured. Among the dead were the wife and daughter of the hotel proprietor, Warren F. Leland. On the 20th it was stated that two more bodies had been found and many fragments of human bones, etc., impossible of recognition.

THE military "Court of Inquiry" concerning the canned beef furnished the army in Cuba and Porto Rico last summer, has been sitting at Chicago, Kansas City, and elsewhere in the West. The testimony favors the charges made by General Miles against the beef, and reflects upon the conduct of Eagan, the Commissary-General, (now under suspension, but drawing his usual pay). It appears that the name, "canned roast beef," is entirely fraudulent, all the beef being boiled, and that a lower grade of cattle, known as "canners," are commonly used for putting up in cans. Many witnesses declared the canned beef, as used in Cuba, very bad.

Wheatlet
ABSOLUTELY THE BEST
CEREAL FOOD

Ask Your Grocer
about it. If he is honest he will tell you that for all members of the family—father, mother, children—nothing can equal

WHEATLET

It is made from the whole wheat with the innutritious woody husk removed. The most sensitive stomach can easily digest it. Your grocer keeps it, if not, send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied.

Made only by the
FRANKLIN MILLS CO.,
Lockport, N. Y.

Send for free booklet containing valuable recipes and opinions of noted physicians and chemists.

It is about nine hundred years since forks were invented. A princess was married to a prince of Venice. For the wedding breakfast she provided herself with a silver fork and a gold spoon. This set the fashion, and wealthy families soon provided themselves with like table furniture. The greatest excitement followed their introduction; and the Church condemned the use of these articles, without which you would not be able to eat with comfort. It is said that it was six hundred and thirteen years later that the fork and spoon entered England.—[Exchange.]

THE average young man thinks he is in a position to marry if he has $250 in the bank and a steady job. Hope is a great factor in a love affair. After the man is 40 he wonders how he ever did it, and when he eats pie at night and he has the nightmare he always imagines that he is marrying again on $250.—[Atchison Globe.]

EVERYTHING useful or necessary is cheapest. Walking is the most wholesome exercise, water the best drink, plain food the most nourishing and healthy diet. Even in knowledge the most useful is the most easily acquired.

There is a right chimney for every lamp. The Index gives you its Number.

Your dealer should have it.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Ellwood Heacock,

UNDERTAKER
and EMBALMER

ESTABLISHED 1860.

TELEPHONE 5807.

1313 Vine Street, Philad'a.

Calls outside of city answered promptly.

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to
CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

CHARLES BURTON,

Practical House and Sign Painter,

Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, }

THE California Legislature, after taking one more ballot for United States Senator, making 104, on the 18th, adjourned finally, later, without a choice being made. This makes three States, Delaware and Utah being the other two, which have failed to elect. It is generally supposed that the same result will be reached in Pennsylvania. There has been no change in the balloting at Harrisburg, since three of the Quay supporters left him some two or three weeks ago.

JOHN SHERMAN, formerly for many years United States Senator from Ohio, and a member of the Cabinet under President Hayes and President McKinley, has been critically ill of pneumonia on board the steamship Paris, (American Line), which is making an excursion trip among the West Indian islands. On the 20th his physicians were said to have little hopes of his recovery, and a report was circulated on the 21st of his death. Later, this was contradicted, and his condition was said to be improved. He is in his 76th year.

GOVERNOR ROOSEVELT having refused to interpose, a woman, Martha Place, convicted of murder, was put to death in the electrical chair at Sing Sing prison, N. Y., on the 20th instant, in the forenoon. The proceeding was quite private, only two representatives of the press being allowed to be present. The time of the execution was not known to the public, in advance. It was the first instance of the electrical execution of a woman. The crime of which she was convicted was the killing of her step-daughter, in a very cruel manner. Two physicians had declared her not insane.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

DR. HENRY M. WETHERILL, a Philadelphia member of the State Board of Charities, makes the statement that insanity is on the decrease. [We do not know what statistics there are supporting this view.—EDS. INTELLIGENCER.] He attributes most cases of insanity to the "strain of modern life,—overwork, excitement, and high pressure." In five years, between 1890 and 1895, the number of insane patients in Pennsylvania doubled, but now Dr. Wetherill thinks there is more moderation in life, and the number, as already said, tends to diminish.

—At the meeting of the "Sosis" woman's club, in New York, Kate Upson Clark talked about the "Gnats that Annoy Us." "There are several," she said. "First comes that awful fashion of writing out the date in full instead of using numerals. Why, if we'd saved the time we've wasted on that we might have downed the political bosses by now."

—The woman mentioned last week as traveling about in New Jersey soliciting money for some charity is now a resident of the Somerset county jail at Somerville, N. J. She proved to be a fraud of the worst type. On this side of the river she operated only in a limited way.—Newtown Enterprise.

—Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, of Chicago, the successor of Dr. Lyman Abbott in Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, preached his inaugural sermon on the 19th in the latter church.

—The oldest known dictionary in any language was issued in China about eleven centuries B. C.

Washable Fabrics

In White Goods Department today will be found the following special values in fabrics for wrappers, dresses, shirt waists, etc.

Lace Stripe Lawns, regular value 12½ cents, at 8 cents a yard.

Dotted Swiss Stripes, regular value 25 cents, at 15 cents a yard.

Soft and very heavy-weight Dimity Cords, regular value 25 cents, at 15 cents a yard.

Madras Cloth, regular value 18 cents, at 15 cents a yard.

Lace Stripe Dimities, regular value 25 cents, at 18 cents a yard.

Checked Lace Dimities, regular price 18 cents, at 12½ cents a yard.

In all the above numbers there are from three to five patterns each to choose from. The stock is now overflowing with novelties and staple white goods.

32-inch White Organdies, 10 to 31 cents a yard.

66-inch White Organdies, 25 cents to $1.00 a yard.

48 inch French Nainsooks, sheer and medium-weight, 25 to 85 cents a yard.

Persian Lawns, Linen Lawns, English Nainsooks, Cambrics, India Linens, Longcloths, Dotted and Figured Swisses and Plain Swisses and everything that may be wanted.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

TYPEWRITERS

REBUILT nearly equal to new

Fully guaranteed. Prices 50 per cent. to 75 per cent. below list. Catalogue free.

Philadelphia Typewriters Exchange,
135 S. 5th Street, Philada.

FOR a short distance a lion or a tiger can outrun a man and can equal the speed of a fast horse, but they lose their wind at the end of half a mile at the most. They have little endurance, and are remarkably weak in lung power. Their strength is the kind which is capable of a terrific effort for a short time. It would take six men to hold a lion down, even after its legs were tied so that he could not use his paws.

A YOUNG tailor, named Berry, who succeeded to his father's business, once sent in his account to Charles Matthews somewhat ahead of time. Whereupon Matthews, with virtuous rage, wrote him the following note: "You must be a goose—Berry, to send me your bill—Berry, before it is due—Berry. Your father, the elder—Berry, would have had more sense. You may look very black—Berry, and feel very blue—Berry; but I don't care a straw—Berry, for you and your bill—Berry."

WHAT is thought to be the largest apple orchard in the world is in Glenwood, Ia. Its area is 800 acres, and it has 133,000 trees.

Friends' Book Association, OF PHILADELPHIA

Publishers, Booksellers, Stationers,
Blank Book Manufacturers,
Engravers, and Printers,
Artists' Materials,
Kindergarten, School Supplies.

All Books furnished at as low prices as they can be purchased elsewhere. Friends' Books and Literature a specialty. Also everything relating to the Kindergarten and School.

The Dinner Pail

is a little 8-page monthly, published by "Silent Workers," an incorporated company of Friends, in the interest of helpful educational work they are doing for the world. Character-building is their aim; "Others" is their motto. Annual subscription 25 cents; stamps will do. Can you spare this much for "others," or send postal for sample copy. Address "Silent Workers," 934-936 Harrison street, San Francisco, Cal., U. S. A.

"The Dinner Pail will be whatever its friends make it," writes an interested Friend.

Are You Going To California?

The California Limited, Santa Fe Route, gives the best and speediest service. Through dining car, and observation car with spacious parlor, especially for use of ladies and children. 2¼ days Chicago to Los Angeles.

Address General Passenger Office,

The Nicholson, Topeka & Santa Fe Railway,
CHICAGO.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 1, 1899.

Volume LVI.
Number 13.

THE PUBLIC LIBRARY
OF THE
CITY OF PHILADELPHIA
APR 1 1899

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XIII.

OUR religious meetings are designed to be opportunities for spiritual profit and refreshment; and they will become such as they are entered upon in a spirit of earnest devotion and prayer. We recognize the value of silence, not as an end, but as a means toward the attainment of the end.

—
From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, Chapter on Meetings for Worship.

A PSALM.

O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
Our shelter from the stormy blast,
And our eternal home:

Under the shadow of Thy throne
Thy saints have dwelt secure;
Sufficient is Thine arm alone,
And our defence is sure.

Before the hills in order stood,
Or earth received her frame,
From everlasting Thou art God,
To endless years the same.

A thousand ages in Thy sight
Are like an evening gone;
Short as the watch that ends the night
Before the rising sun.

Time, like an ever-rolling stream,
Bears all its sons away;
They fly forgotten, as a dream
Dies at the opening day.

O God, our help in ages past,
Our hope for years to come,
Be Thou our guard while life shall last,
And our eternal home.

—Selected.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

HIGHLANDS CREEK MEETING.

BY E. H. TRUEBLOOD, HITCHCOCK, INDIANA.

IN the first quarter of the present century a large emigration of Friends from the mountain and seaboard counties of North Carolina turned towards the new north-west to seek homes, away from the blighting influence of human slavery. Many of these Friends were the descendants of those that went down to the warmer climate of the South from the Island of Nantucket in the last century.

These early emigrants to the West, after crossing the mountains, came through the State of Kentucky. Many crossed the Ohio river at Louisville, and journeyed to the head waters of Blue River, a small stream that has its source from the springs of Washington county, in southern Indiana. Here they procured homes, and became to the new county, and even to the State, a powerful influence for good.

Their numbers were large enough to soon build a meeting-house, and this seems to have been done before 1815; a few years later an addition was put to it. Their meeting was established and named Blue River; it grew to be perhaps one of the largest meetings of Friends in the Western States, and only the unhappy separation in 1828 checked this. But it is not our purpose here to follow the history of this meeting, only of it as being the parent of another, Highlands Creek, situated six miles from it, in the same county. The new meeting at Highlands Creek was in a great part, but not altogether made up of Friends that had moved here from Blue River. Such names as Trueblood, Bundy, Knight, Morris, Overman, Coffin, and Hallowell were among the founders of the new meeting. The first meeting held was First month 9, 1809, at the home of Nathan Trueblood, Blue River appointing a Committee to attend the opening. The Committee in their report to the monthly meeting expressed their satisfaction with the meeting, and their judgment was it be continued under the care of the monthly meeting.

It appears that Friends here, feeling the need of a regular place of worship, built a log meeting-house in as central a place as possible for all the members. In Fourth month, 1841, Friends requested to have Highlands Creek Meeting established as a meeting of worship, and this was granted by Blue River. In 1844, Charles Brooks and family moved in the limits of this meeting, with certificates from Fallsington Monthly Meeting, Bucks county, Pa. Elizabeth, the wife and mother, became a beloved minister in the Society, and traveled extensively throughout Indiana and Illinois Yearly Meetings.

In 1848, the frame meeting-house shown here was built, this picture of it being a photograph from a painting taken just before it was removed in 1893 to make room for the new and larger one that was required.

In passing, I will say this old house was not only used for one of worship, but for a school room, for literary societies, for temperance contests, and once for a County Sabbath School Convention. The schools were under the care of a committee appointed by the monthly meeting, and the reports show they were always satisfactory. E. S. Hobbs was the first teacher, and taught two terms, commencing in 1851. Ellwood Trueblood followed him, teaching many schools (though not continuously), between 1853 and 1870, and his services were of inestimable worth to the whole neighborhood. In 1851 certificates were received from Wilmington Monthly Meeting, Delaware, for Thomas Atherton, wife, and two children, who had moved in our limits, and in Twelfth month, 1865, certificates for Beezon Baynes and family from Gwynedd Monthly Meeting, Pa., and also near this time for Mary Heacock, formerly of Delaware county, Pa., her family becoming members soon after settling here. A few years later, Paschall May, with a certificate from Kennett, Chester county, Pa., and Mary Bunting Trueblood, with one from Darby Monthly Meeting, Pa., settled here. These accessions from the east, gave a strength as well as growth to the meeting. Naturally enough many marriages have taken place between the descendants of the early pioneers from Carolina and those from the East.

A proposition was made in First month, 1860, to have Blue River Monthly Meeting held during the winter months at Highlands Creek, which was granted, and two years later it was permanently located at this place. The new meeting-house built six years ago (1893), is a good substantial frame building, heated by warm air, and has a seating capacity of about three

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 15.—FOURTH MONTH 9.

THE OPPRESSION.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord hath sworn by the excellency of Jacob. Surely I will never forget any of their works.—Amos, viii., 7.

Scripture reading, Exodus, i., 1-14; v., 10-20.

RAMESSES II., of the nineteenth dynasty of Egypt, was the monarch who concluded peace with the Hittites (see Lesson 1) after many years of fierce warfare. The remaining forty-five years of his long reign (about 1330-1260 B. C.) were years of progress and prosperity in the subject provinces, which could only be held to allegiance by fair treatment. The military power of Egypt was on the decline. One of the great public works of Seti I., father of Rameses II., was a wall across the Isthmus of Suez from Peluhundred persons. It has many times been well filled, and at quarterly meetings has proven too small. The interest and generosity of Friends, East and West, made it possible for us to build so comfortable a home.

OLD MEETING-HOUSE, HIGHLANDS CREEK, INDIANA.—1848-1893.

No doubt many of our older Friends, if they read this article, will recall the name of Priscilla Cadwallader, whose home was with us. She has been dead over a quarter of a century, but her memory remains dear, and almost sacred to us. Our records show how often she had been liberated by the meeting for Gospel labor, traveling not only among our Western meetings, but at one time or another had visited nearly all the meetings of America.

THE past only sleeps, and we carry it with us through life, slumbering. Those are wise who bear it gently, so that it may never be aroused.—H. S. Merriam.

HE who would be a great soul in future must be a great soul now.—Emerson.

sium on the Mediterranean to the lagoons connected with the upper end of the Red Sea. This wall was finished and strengthened by Rameses II. himself. The object of this great line of defense was, of course, to protect Egypt from a recurrence of invasion from Asia such as that which resulted in the Hyksos supremacy. Such walls have several times been built in the world's history, and always by nations in declining strength. The great wall of China and the successive Roman walls in Britain will serve as examples.

Though there are some facts which indicate an earlier period, Rameses II. is generally accepted by students of Bible history as the Pharaoh of the Oppression. The conditions of his reign as shown by contemporary monuments agree with those of the Bible narrative. His great building operations account for the forced labor demanded of the Hebrews; and his long reign is the only one, so far as known, which would allow the chronology of the account in Exodus

It is said that the buildings, monuments, and other works of Rameses out-numbered those of all his predecessors for two thousand years. These great undertakings involved, under the ancient social conditions, the actual enslavement of a great portion of the population of Egypt. Not only the slaves taken in battle and the foreigners settled within the kingdom, but many of the native Egyptians, unable to pay the heavy taxes imposed, or on some other pretext, were driven to labor on the king's works under the lash of the taskmaster. And indeed the subjects nominally free could be employed in forced labor by the king, the theory of the Egyptian government being that everything in Egypt was his to use according to his pleasure.

The great palaces, temples, and monuments of stone were built at an expenditure of human labor almost inconceivable in these days of machinery. The stone was quarried in the mountains of Upper Egypt, was floated down the river on great barges, and finally was literally dragged by hand over the yielding soil of the lower valley to the appointed place. Only the rudest machinery was available even for lifting the stones to their final positions in the massive walls.

It is not alone for great buildings that the reign of Rameses is celebrated. Stones of enormous size and weight—some not less than hundreds of tons—were carved into colossal statues and were placed before the temples. Four statues of Rameses II., each seventy feet high, form the facade of one of the great rock temples. Hundreds of his monuments, obelisks, sphinxes, and statues are to be found with inscriptions showing his inordinate vanity. He dug great canals to carry the Nile waters to fields yet in the grasp of the desert. He built great dykes to protect cities against the overflow or to direct the wealth-giving waters. These, like the works of stone, were built by forced labor and under the lash. The earth was scooped into baskets by the bare hands of the laborers and was carried in baskets to the desired position. Some of the cities built by Rameses were made largely of bricks. This made necessary other severe labor. Clay was mixed with water and straw or broken reeds, shaped, and dried in the sun. The raising of water from the level of the Nile into the great irrigating ditches was another duty, and like all other labor was accomplished by man power, assisted only by the simplest of water wheels. The Hebrews, doubtless, with the other slaves were engaged in all of these various operations. They were worked long hours and without wages, beyond the scantiest allowance of food. Human life has always been held cheap in the East. "Thirty thousand men died in this very century in digging out the Mahmoudieh Canal with their hands, without picks, spades, or wheelbarrows—falling worn out with the toil exacted from them by the blows of their pitiless taskmasters" (Geikie: Hours with the Bible). It is not to be supposed that the overseers of three thousand years ago were more merciful than are those of modern times. And in view of the causes which would lead the Egyptians to fear the Hebrews as of an alien and unfriendly race we may well believe that the latter staggered under a burden of oppression almost intolerable.

"They did set over them taskmasters for afflict them with their burdens. And they built to Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Rameses" (Exodus, i., 11).

This should more properly be rendered "store cities." A contemporary Egyptian document tells of food being delivered "to the aperin who transport the stones for the store cities of King Rameses." Some believe this word to be the Egyptian form of the word "Hebrew," but evidence on this point is lacking. As to the store cities there is no doubt whatever. Excavations at a ruined city about thirty-five miles north-east of Cairo leave no question that this was the "Pithom" of Rameses II. The store-

NEW MEETING-HOUSE, HIGHLANDS CREEK, INDIANA.—1893.

rooms are still to be seen. They are unlighted rooms built into the walls and separated by brick partitions. They were used for storing grain and supplies for the army which protected the eastern frontier. It is of special interest to observe in the walls of Pithom that while the bricks of the lower courses are carefully made, the clay being mixed with straw, the upper courses are without straw. Irresistibly we are reminded of the words of Pharaoh: "I will not give you straw. . . yet not aught of your work shall be diminished." (Exodus, v., 10, 11.)

The effect of the oppression on the Hebrews is plainly to be seen in the following chapters. Their independence and manly spirit is lost. The difficulties of the desert life after the Exodus, instead of inspiring them to effort, produce grumbling and a longing backward look to the food of slavery. They are vastly changed from the free, courageous nomads who fled from the famine centuries before. It is a steadfast law that faculties and powers unused shall be lost. Dependence destroys independence. Slavery destroys the power of free thought and free action. This fact may well be the basis of anxious thought for those who see the gradual enslavement of our working classes to great combinations of capital.

Our government rests on the clear-headed, independent thought of its people. Independence, whether of thought or action, cannot be expected of those who depend upon others for even the privilege of laboring for daily bread. Yet the increasing complexity of the life of to-day constantly reduces more and more men to such subjection to others. It was not so in the early days of our country, when the great unoccupied territories offered opportunities for productive labor which seemed unlimited; for the laborer of to-day there is no such resource. Slavery destroys free men, and without free men free institutions cannot endure.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS, PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 15.—FOURTH MONTH 9.

THE ANOINTING IN BETHANY.

GOLDEN TEXT.—She hath done what she could.—

Mark, xiv., 8.

Read the Scripture, John, xii., 1-11.

REVISED VERSION.

THE present lesson includes the first eleven verses of the twelfth chapter of John. The eleventh chapter is mostly occupied with the miracle of Lazarus, but the closing verses, 46 to 57, describe the agitation among the Jews, the gathering of a "council," (sanhedrin) of the chief priests and the Pharisees, their debate what should be done with Jesus, and their conclusion that he must be put to death. "If we let him thus alone, all men will believe on him, and the Romans will come and take away both our place and our nation." Jesus, "therefore, walked no more openly among the Jews," but departed to the city of Ephraim, in "the country near the wilderness," about thirteen miles north-east of Jerusalem. Later he went to Perea, where probably occurred the events recorded in the nineteenth chapter of Matthew, (v. 3-20), in the tenth chapter of Mark (v. 2-45), and the eighteenth and nineteenth of Luke (v. 35-19). Then he proceeded to Bethany.

The time of the incident in the lesson was a Sabbath (seventh-day) evening, the place Bethany, where Lazarus and his sisters lived. Bethany is on Mount Olivet, south-east of and near to Jerusalem; it is now a ruined place, with some "forty humble habitations" scattered over the hill-side. Dr. Thomson, ("The Land and the Book"), describes it as entirely occupied by Mohammedans, and called by them el 'Azar, (Arabic for Lazarus). "Long before the Moslem conquest of Jerusalem, in the seventh century, there were churches and monasteries erected there upon the sites where Mary and Martha were supposed to have dwelt, and over the reputed grave of Lazarus. These were destroyed by the Moslems." Bethany does not apparently occupy the site of any place named in the Old Testament, and Josephus does not mention it. When Jesus was a visitor there it was probably but a small hamlet.

The time was the year 30, A. D., a few weeks after the incident described in the last lesson. It was, as the text says, (verse 1), six days before the Passover; seven days before the Crucifixion. (We must, however, count both days in, to make these descriptions accurate; the anointing is supposed to have occurred on Seventh-day, the Passover on Fifth-day, the Crucifixion on Sixth-day.) The exact date fixed upon by the Scripture chronologists is the first day of April.

"There they made him a supper." This, it is said by both Matthew and Mark, was given in the house of Simon the leper. It is presumed that Simon was a kinsman of Lazarus; this supposition is supported by the fact that Martha "served" at table, and it is also a surmise that Simon may have been healed of his leprosy by Jesus. Lazarus, the brother, "sat at meat" with Jesus. The disciples apparently had borne Jesus company; Judas, at any rate, was among those present.

The subject of the lesson is an incident only, and the story in the Scripture account may very well be left to speak for itself. The love of the little family for Jesus, his enjoyment of their hospitable home, the gratitude of the sisters for the restoration of their brother, Martha's laborious "serving," and Mary's unsparing devotion, all these appear as features at once interesting and impressive. The ointment which Mary used was kept, Matthew and Mark say, in an alabaster "cruse," or flask, and Mark says "she broke the cruse" in order to pour the precious contents over Jesus. A pound of such ointment was, of course, a large quantity; naturally, "the house was filled with the odor."

"Sometimes," says a commentator on this lesson, "injustice is done to Martha, in the study of the character of the two sisters." In Luke, x., 40-42, it is said that upon a visit which Jesus paid them, Martha was cumbered—or, in the Greek, "distracted"—about "much serving," and that she besought Jesus to have Mary help her, but Jesus answered her, "Martha thou art troubled about many things; but one thing (or few things) is needful: for Mary has chosen the good part, which shall not be taken away from her." The writer quoted observes that "it was not her (Martha's) serving that Jesus disapproved, but the distraction of mind that she allowed in doing it. Mary's mind was at rest. She had learned the lesson of peace. We should serve, but should never lose our peace in our serving."

The murmuring of Judas at what he chose to regard as a waste is ascribed by Matthew to "the disciples," and Mark says "there were some" among those present who "had indignation" over it. But the wretched Judas, who was, we may suppose, even then possessed by his purpose of betrayal, seems the one who naturally would offer his dishonest protest.

The words of the golden text convey a comforting lesson. If it shall be said of each one of us, "She (or he) hath done what she could," that, we may trust, will secure the Divine favor.

JOY is a prize unbought, and is freest, purest in its flow when it comes unsought. No getting into heaven as a place will compass it. You must carry it with you, else it is not there. You must have it in you, as the music of a well-ordered soul, the fire of a holy purpose, the welling up out of the central depths of eternal springs that hide their waters there.—H. Bushnell.

NEWSPAPER READING AS A DISSIPATION.

President Robert Ellis Thompson, of the Boys' High School, Philadelphia, in Saturday Evening Post, Philadelphia.

THERE are few undertakings in life which seem easier, but are really harder, than to read a newspaper aright. To most people it seems to require no effort of any kind, nor yet any preparation. It is the one kind of reading they feel to be a delight and not a task, and they are apt to make it the substitute for all other kinds, not excepting the Bible. But the newspaper so used is not unlikely to do us much more harm than good, and had better be abstained from than read.

The first peril of careless newspaper reading is that of being morally hardened by constant contact with the physical and spiritual evils of the world, without being called upon to any action with regard to them. It requires a notable degree of moral culture to keep from becoming "used to" such things; and there are few things worse for us than to grow accustomed to men's sufferings and their sins, so that these no longer evoke pity, or indignation, or any other emotion in us.

The great minds are those which show the least disposition to become familiar with wrong, so as not to feel indignation every time they see it. They flash out in wrath at iniquity and baseness, they overflow with pity for suffering; and that as much at the hundredth time as the first. They have a moral freshness, which is our right and normal condition. They never "get used to" things, on either their good side or their evil.

It is very hard for us to keep this freshness of moral impression in our daily contact with what the newspaper tells us of the world's evil. It is even harder not to be deceived as to the comparative weight of evil and goodness in the world. The newspaper is drawn naturally to the former. It "makes copy" more readily, and gives him a quicker grasp on the public attention.

I once asked a newspaper publisher why the boys were always crying "A Terrible Murder in the Fourth Ward," as they were trying to sell his sheet. He answered that he supposed it must be because they knew their public. He had tried again and again to get them to change from that doleful announcement to things less lugubrious, but in vain. It was impossible for them to sell the paper, they said, if they had not a murder to cry. So the newspaper gathers all the horrors of human life, all the rascalities of human conduct, and serves them up to us for our daily repast. The result is a picture which is totally misleading as to the actual texture of human life. It is not the facts, but a selected series of them, which make an impression utterly misleading.

Take one striking instance of this. If any one had been asked a few years ago, when the Irish Land League was in active operation, what was the most lawless country within the bounds of the English language, he no doubt would have said it was Ireland. Every occurrence in Ireland that could create and heighten that impression was collected in the office of certain Unionist journals in Dublin for telegraphing to England and America. The total impression must have been that Ireland was a hell upon earth. Yet at that very time the average of crime in Ireland was lower than in any other part of the British Empire,—lower than in our New England States, which rank as the most orderly part of America. In no corner of the civilized world is there so little crime as in Ireland. The criminal class numbers less than 500 in a population of nearly 5,000,000.

To come nearer home, how much of our loyalty to duty, self-sacrifice, goes on in our own lives which will not "make copy," and therefore never will be mentioned in the newspapers! A man may be born and die in Philadelphia, discharge every duty of a father of a family, a neighbor, a citizen, a member of the church, and all in the best way, and earn the love and esteem of all who know him, and yet he may be mentioned only twice in the newspaper,—when he is married and when he is buried. I know how hard it is to have it otherwise, but the transcription of life fully and fairly is one of the hard things which will have to be done, unless we are to see a growing sensitiveness to the quality of our newspapers, which will seriously affect their position.

The last peril of newspaper reading I shall name is its effect upon our mental powers, especially the memory. An Arab metaphysician enumerates the things which tend to weaken the power of recollection, and one of them is to go into the graveyard and read the inscriptions on the tombstones. That is, to occupy the mind with a series of isolated and unconnected facts must impair the memory.

Newspaper reading is too largely of this very character, not of necessity, but because the reader has not the previous culture required for seeing the underlying connection between the facts the paper brings him. He needs to know the political, social, economical, literary, and spiritual history of the times before he can get things into their right relations and see their real connections. As he does not, his reading runs through his mind without producing any impression, whatever, and the mind takes on the character of a sieve by very force of habit.

Earlier generations carried Homer, Job, the Vedas, the Talmud in their memories over the centuries. The Hindu student still learns the Vedas by oral tradition from Gurus, who learned it in the same way. But they read no newspapers, and our newspaper-reading generation holds fast to nothing. Quite recently a controversy has arisen as to what Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Browning said at a London dinner-table about Mr. Disraeli; and Canon MacColl and Mr. Tollemache, who were both present, flatly contradict each other. That is only a sample of thousands of instances of our short memories.

Here the fault is in ourselves, and is felt to be so. The formation of classes for the study of "current events" shows this. They are honest efforts to remedy a real evil. ROBERT ELLIS THOMPSON.

KIND looks, kind words, kind acts, and warm hand-shakes,—these are the secondary means of grace when men are in trouble, and are fighting their unseen battles.—Dr. John Hall.

PETER YARNALL'S ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

A FRIEND has sent us the original paper of acknowledgment, sent by Peter Yarnall to Friends, in 1780. It is as follows :

To the Monthly Meeting of Friends to be held at Uwchlan ; Dear Friends :

Notwithstanding I have been educated, and for some time made profession with the Religious Society of Friends, yet for a want of attention to the teachings of Divine Grace, I have so far deviated as to deny in my life and conversation the principles of the Blessed Truth, absconding from my master, with whom I was placed as an apprentice to learn a trade, and enlisted myself a soldier in the British army, for which misconduct a testimony was read against me some years since ; and although frequent visitations of Divine love were extended, I continued in a long course of vanity and dissipation, and at the commencement of the present unhappy war, I took an oath of allegiance to one of the contending powers, and actually by heat and malice frequently engaged in a task which was conducive to destroy men's lives, contrary to the pure living principle of Jesus, who gave his cheek to the smiter, his hair to those who plucked it out, and hid not his face from shame and spitting. Thus, pursuing one scene of licentiousness and cruelty after another, soaring above the Witness which frequently convicted me of sin, therefore being in some measure sensible of the reproach brought on truth by such repeated transgressions I do hereby sincerely condemn the same, hoping through repentance and amendment of life to be preserved from future snares and entanglements. I remain your loving friend,

Twelfth month 6, 1780.

PETER YARNALL.

PEOPLE IN THEIR OWN HOMES.

Andrew Carnegie in North American Review.

ONE of the great satisfactions in traveling around the world is in learning that God has made all peoples happy in their own homes. We find no people in any part of the world desirous of exchanging their lot with any other. My own experience has impressed this truth very strongly upon me. Upon our journeying to the North Cape, we stopped in the Arctic Circle to visit a camp of Laplanders in the interior. A guide is provided with instructions to keep in the rear of the hindmost of the party going and returning to guard against any being left behind. Returning from the camp, I walked with this guide, who spoke English and had traveled the world round in his earlier years as a sailor, and was proud to speak of his knowing New York, Boston, New Orleans, and other ports of ours. Reaching the edge of the fjord, and looking down upon it, we saw a hamlet upon the opposite side, and one two-story house under construction, with a grass plot surrounding it, a house so much larger than any of the adjacent huts that it betokened great wealth. Our guide explained that a man had made a great fortune. He was their multi-millionaire, and his fortune was reported to reach no less a figure than 30,000 kroner ($7,500), and he had returned to his native place of Tromso, to build this "palace" and spend his days there. Strange preference for a night six months long ! But it was home. I asked the guide which place in all the world he would select if he ever made such a fortune—with a lingering hope that he would name some place in our own favored land. How could he help it ? But his face beamed with pleasure at the idea of ever being rich, and he said finally : "Ah, there is no place like Tromso !"

Traveling in Southern India one day, I was taken into the country to see tapioca roots gathered and ground for use. The adults working in the grove, men and women, had each a rag around the loins, but the boys and girls, with their black, glossy skins, were free of all encumbrance. Our guide explained to these people that we were from a country so far away, and so different from theirs, that the waters were sometimes made solid by the extreme cold, and we could walk upon them ; that sometimes it was so intensely cold that the rain was frozen into particles, and lay on the earth so deep that people could not walk through it, and that three and four layers of heavy clothes had to be worn. This happy people, as our guide told us, wondered why we stayed there, why we did not come and enjoy life in their favored clime.

It is just so with the Philippines to-day, as one can see from Mr. Bray's account of them. It is astonishing how much all human beings the world round are alike in their essentials. These peoples love their homes and their country, their wives and children as we do, and they have their pleasures. If, in our humanitarian efforts and longing to benefit them, under the call of Duty or Destiny, we should bring a hundred to New York, give them fine residences on Fifth Avenue, a fortune conditioned upon their remaining, and try to "civilize" them, as we should say, they would all run away if not watched, and risk their lives in an attempt to get back to their own civilization, which God has thought best to provide for them in the Philippines. They have just the same feelings as we have, not excluding love of country, for which, like ourselves, as we see, they are willing to die.

THE world has need of knowledge, but a larger need of insight. It needs information less than inspiration and impulse. I sometimes think that people are destroyed by excess of knowledge, and long to have them forget a little that truth may strike them with some degree of freshness. I believe that there is no greater fallacy than the common opinion that the mere learning of facts is a panacea for the world's ills. What the world needs is what Christ came to teach—the nearness of God to common life, the sacredness of what we call the secular, the reality of the spiritual world, present and future, and a conception of the glory of working together with God, which shall make life dignified, earnest, and fruitful.—W. E. Barton.

HALF the misery of human life might be extinguished, would men alleviate the general curse they lie under, by mutual offices of compassion, benevolence, and humanity. There is nothing therefore that we ought more to encourage in ourselves and others, than the disposition of mind which in our language goes under the title of good-nature.—Addison.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 1, 1899.

"WHITE" MEN'S BURDENS.

THE recovery of its author from his recent dangerous illness removes any personal indelicacy there might be in speaking as the truth requires of Kipling's poem, "The White Man's Burden." It has been so generally printed and so much lauded— incautiously, no doubt, by many—that it has acquired thus an importance which otherwise it would not possess.

The appeal of the poem is to the people of this country. They are asked to "take up the white man's burden." This appeal, if it were meant in some worthy and noble sense, would deserve our respect, even though in the light of history it should appear rather uncalled-for and impertinent; but it is meant in the "imperialistic" sense,—it desires that we shall join in the treatment of other and weaker peoples on the plan of aggression, conquest, and what is called "exploitation." The "burden" which has been taken up by the imperialistic elements of England, and which is now loaded upon the shoulders of that country, this vigorous young poet desires us to help carry.

For this sort of "burden" the United States has not, and ought not to have, any call whatever. When the guns of the British fleet opened fire in the bombardment of Alexandria, John Bright withdrew from Gladstone's cabinet. What would he have said if it had been proposed to put the slaughter of Omdurman on his shoulders? What would he advise us, in response to Kipling's appeal?

The truth is that the United States has never been unaware of a duty to the world, and in her own way she has sought to perform it. Her people, since the beginning of the seventeenth century, have faced courageously many of the most difficult problems of human society, and have dealt with them generally upon principles that could by no means be improved by drafts on the "barrack-room" methods of the British army. The American flag has been the symbol of free government, of the peaceful and orderly union of States, of the permanency of democracy. The example of our nation, though it has had defects, has powerfully influenced the whole world. It has been idealized in the minds and hearts of millions struggling under such systems as we are now exhorted to "take up," and has encouraged them to struggle on in their own homes, or to seek, as hosts of them have done, a new home in the land which was bearing so fairly the "burden" of mankind. Such influence of the United States has been many times greater, directed upon the principles of Thomas Jefferson in the Declaration, and of George Washington in the Farewell Address, than if it had been framed upon the pagan systems which the poem under examination would have us revive, and which, in the present aberration—we believe temporary—of our moral forces, have been brought so close home to us.

The true burden of Christian men,—not "white" men merely, for a light complexion does not guarantee against cruelty, greed, or hypocrisy,—is that of improving the world's condition by Christian means. Only such are allowable. The influence of the United States' example, already mentioned, was a grand and noble means. The establishment of Robert College, at Constantinople, the labors of our devoted missionaries in Armenia, the efforts of the two women in India, mentioned last week in Aaron Powell's article, the carrying of food to Ireland and to Russia in their famines, the promotion of the arbitration system,—these are Christian and noble ways of helping the world. But they have been "taken up," long ago; it did not need the poetry of Kipling to suggest them.

On the other hand, what are the essential methods which this young writer's appeal would propose to us? Here is an example of the sort of "burden" which we are asked to "take up." It relates to the Niger region of West Africa. That region has been made, by force of arms, what is called a British "sphere of influence." In other words, the pecuniary advantage of preying upon the natives there has been assigned to England. This monopoly has in turn been given to the control of a corporation, the "British Royal Niger Company," whose readiness to "take up" any "burden" whatever that may be pecuniarily profitable to it is of the most candid character. The unhappy nations of that region have thus become practically the slaves of this "royal company." And what does the company bring them? A large and important item is gin. "During 1897," says a statement which we are now following, "nearly 100,000 cases, or about 2,227 tons, of gin," were exported by this "royal company" to that coast. In 1898 this gin traffic increased to 124,500 cases, or 3,207 tons, and it is now stated that for 1899 it will be still greater. In the first two months of this year, the shipments are reported as 45,000 cases, which would be at a rate more than double that of 1898.

It may be said that this Niger case is exceptional. Not at all. It is typical. In every direction the plans and methods which we are advised to "take up" may be seen, and they are all practically of the same sort. The whole chapter is crowded with iniquitous features, such as John Woolman would have testified against, from A to Z. In Africa, adjoining the territory of the Niger Company, the exactions, cruelties, and corruptions visited upon the people of the Kongo Free State, under the rule of the Belgian king, Leopold, have brought that once-promising enterprise to the point of ruin.

In fact, as we all well know, there can be no beneficence exerted upon individuals, or communities, or nations, by means that in their nature are unbeneficent. If we would do good to the world, we must carry good to it, or exchange services of good. Light does not come out of darkness, nor blessing out of rapacity. And if we want inspiration from poets of England there are many to whom we may go. We shall not, we hope, desert the Cowpers, the Wordsworths, the Brownings, the Tennysons, to take up with the ethics and philosophy of the "barrack-room."

THE work in Armenia, to which we were giving attention in the INTELLIGENCER a year or two ago, and on account of which we were enabled to forward some small sums to be expended in relief of those persecuted people, has been continued, and remains of extreme necessity. The National Armenian Relief Committee, (in this country), of which Justice David J. Brewer, of the United States Supreme Court, is president, maintains its organization, and we receive, at intervals, from its faithful secretary, Dr. George P. Knapp, Barré, Mass., circulars relating to the work. They all show, in the most convincing manner, the distressing conditions of many thousands of Christians in Armenia, and the need for relief to them.

Does it occur to you, Brother Knapp, how futile it seems for a small part of the American nation to be striving, by charitable collections, to save a few thousands of distant people in western Asia, when the whole American nation is spending millions in conquest of another distant people, in eastern Asia? The daily cost of the "shells" with which we destroy the Filipino homes, and kill or maim their occupants, would be a tremendous contribution to your Armenian fund.

RUSSIA, it appears, will have three strong representatives at the Hague Conference—M. de Staal, the Russian ambassador in London, Prof. Martens, of St. Petersburg University, and Chevalier de Struve, the Russian ambassador to Holland. M. de Staal is very highly spoken of, as "possessing the confidence of his countrymen, and the regard and respect of those of other countries with whom he has been brought in contact." Prof. Martens is the president of the Tribunal to arbitrate the Venezuelan boundary dispute, and is regarded as "one of the most distinguished international jurists living." He has represented Russia on at least three international conferences—those on the Laws of War, in 1874; on Maritime Laws, in 1884; and on Slavery in Africa, in 1890-91.

The United States ought to send strong men to meet such as these.

THERE has been some delay in perfecting the arrangements, but we now learn that it is concluded to have the Summer School of Friends, in England, at Birmingham in the Ninth month,—probably the first ten days of the month. This will be a gathering similar to that at Scarborough in 1897, and has been arranged by the Committee which was appointed at that time. "We think the program an improvement even on the Scarborough one," our friend John William Graham says, in a brief message on the subject.

We hope that any of our Friends who may be visiting England this summer will make the Summer School a part of their itinerary. They will, we are sure, find it to well reward them.

DEATHS.

HAINES.—Third month 16, 1899, Rebecca S., widow of Stokes Haines, aged 77 years. Interment from Rancocas, N. J., meeting-house.

HAYHURST.—At Lambertville, N. J., Third month 22, 1899, Jeremiah Hayhurst, aged 79 years. Funeral from his home on Seventh-day, 25th, at 10.30 a. m.

[Dr. Hayhurst was born in Middletown township, Bucks county, Pa., in 1819. He was a member and minister of Solebury Monthly Meeting. In 1850 he was graduated from the Philadelphia College of Dentistry, and was for a number of years a member of the Faculty of that institution. He first established a dental office in Attleboro, Pa., now Langhorne, and then came to Lambertville in 1862, and soon built up a large practice. He was the first Chairman of the New Jersey Board of Examiners, and the first President of the New Jersey Dental Society. He collated a general history of dental colleges and dentistry, and read a paper on the same subject before the Dental Congress at the World's Fair.]

KENNEDY.—Suddenly, Third month 22, 1899, at the residence of her son, Franklin W. Kennedy, Frankford, Philadelphia, Catharine A., widow of Samuel W. Kennedy, in her 72d year; a valued member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street, Philadelphia.

KING.—In Philadelphia, Third month 21, 1899, Samuel G. King, formerly Mayor of the city, aged 82 years, 10 months, 19 days.

[His parents were Lutherans, but the greater part of his education was obtained at the school, Dillwyn and Green streets, under the management of the Overseers of Friends' Public Schools (all of which are now consolidated in the William Penn Charter School), and he generally afterwards attended Orthodox Friends' meetings.

He distinguished himself in the City Councils as a clear-headed man of integrity, and progressive spirit. In 1881, by the union of the reform element with the Democratic party, he was elected Mayor, by 5,781 majority over his predecessor, who had held the position three terms.

He carried out his principles in favor of a non-partisan police, and was the first to appoint some colored men on the force. He also suppressed the fireworks clamor on 4th of July. In other respects he did credit to the city of his birth.]

LIPPINCOTT.—At Marlton, N. J., Third month 13, 1899, Howard Evans, only child of Herbert E. and Eleanor P. Lippincott, aged 5 months, 21 days. Interment at Medford.

MARPLE.—Third month 22, 1899, at her son's residence, Ashley, Pa., Mary W., widow of Robert Lukens Marple, and daughter of the late Isaac K. Wright, of Philadelphia. Interment at Fair Hill.

MEASEY.—At Moorestown, N. J., Third month 12, 1899, Alfred S., twin son of Frederick A. and Gulielma R. Measey, aged 2 years and 4 days. Interment at Colestown Cemetery.

TYSON.—Near King of Prussia, Pa., Third month 23, 1899, at the residence of his son, J. R. Tyson, Samuel Tyson, aged 86 years. Interment at Roberts family ground, in Upper Merion.

[He had had a stroke of paralysis some months ago which partly disabled him, but his death was undoubtedly hastened, the Norristown Herald says, by the fire which destroyed the mansion in which the family had resided for many years, on the 25th of Second month. "In trying to save a valuable collection of relics, minerals, and coins, the accumulation of a lifetime, Mr. Tyson had a narrow escape from being burned to death. He was partially overcome by the smoke and had to be carried from the house. He was burned about the face and hands. He valued his collection at $5,000. In spite of his efforts to save his treasures of this kind, they were entirely destroyed. He had made a special study of geology, and was regarded as an authority on minerals found in this vicinity."

He had been twice married, and five children survive him: Samuel Tyson, who has an interest in a Mexican silver mine, and has long been absent from home, superintending its development; Dr. Sarah F. Tyson, a practicing physician in Philadelphia, and Jonathan R., Edward, and Eliza. His second wife, surviving, was the daughter of Jonathan Roberts, of Upper Merion, long prominent in national politics in the earlier half of the present century,—Representative in Congress, United States Senator, etc.]

WILLIAMS.—Third month 24, 1899, Clarence, son of Joseph S. and Anna S. Williams, in his 24th year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

MARTHA ANN WILCOX.

At Richmond, Ind., the 5th of Third month, 1899, Martha Ann Wilcox, wife of William Emmet Wilcox, passed to rest, in the eighty-first year of her age. A member of Whitewater Monthly Meeting of Friends.

She was born in Chester county, Pennsylvania, 21st of Ninth month, 1818. Her parents were William and Martha Nixon. In 1824 the family became residents of Richmond, Ind., and in 1842, Martha Ann was married to William Emmet Wilcox, of Virginia. Nearly fifty-seven years of married life have been granted the worthy couple, the aged husband still surviving. The death of her sister, Susan Nixon, was noticed in the INTELLIGENCER on the 11th of Third month. In the short time of two weeks, death made sad vacancies in a united happy home. An invalid for many years, her sufferings were patiently endured, and with her mind clear to the end, she was ready for the change to eternal rest. The two daughters were constantly with her, and during the last sad days ministered to her wants with love.

"We nightly die ourselves to sleep,
Then wherefore fear we death?
'Tis but a slumber still more deep,
And undisturbed by breath.

"We daily waken to the light,
When morning takes its way,
Then wherefore doubt, death's longer night
Will bring a brighter day."

G.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

WHITWATER QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Duck Creek, Indiana, Third month 4, 1899.

Owing to the inclemency of the weather and sickness in many localities, it was much smaller than usual. Seventh-day meeting convened at 10 a. m., in what seemed a living silence, broken by earnest supplication by Sarah J. Bogue, to our Father, that we might feel his Spirit and his presence in our midst, and that to bless. She was followed by L. L. Benson, from the text, "This is life eternal, to know thee, the only true God, and Jesus Christ whom thou hast sent."

On First-day morning, Ellwood Trueblood's address was especially to the young inquiring minds. His deep spiritual baptism spread as a mantle over all assembled, for which we should be thankful to our Heavenly Father for the spiritual blessings enjoyed.

We had the company of several ministers with us, Levi L. Benson, Ellwood Trueblood, Sarah J. Bogue, and Davis Furnas. A deep feeling of gratitude was felt, and expressed for the labors and presence of all of our ministering Friends. Levi L. Benson and Sarah J. Bogue remained with us a few days and had some appointed meetings, and visited several families.

M. K.

Concerning the Friends' Home of Bucks Quarterly Meeting, the Newtown Enterprise says, "There is no longer any doubt about the building of the Friends' Home in Newtown this spring. Mention was made a few weeks ago of the purchase of the Janney lot on the northwest corner of Congress street and Centre avenue by those interested in the undertaking. Recently title to the property passed to ex-Judge Edward M. Paxson, and he has agreed to erect the Home under his own supervision and entirely at his own expense, and when everything is completed to make a gift of the property to Bucks Quarterly Meeting. The Quarterly Meeting is now engaged in raising an endowment fund for the institution. It is expected that the building will cost from $16,000 to $20,000. Architect Edwin F. Bertolett, of Philadelphia, is now at work on the plans and specifications, and ex-Judge Paxson says he thinks ground will be broken about Fourth month 1.

"The structure will be built of Newtown stone, two and a half and three stories in height with main front on Congress street. There will be a wing facing Centre avenue. On the first floor there will be parlor, library, sitting and dining-rooms, kitchen, six bed-rooms, etc. The second floor will be devoted mainly to bed-rooms, and there will be a few of the same on the third floor. It is expected to have the building ready for occupancy in the early fall."

VISITS TO FRIENDS IN NEW JERSEY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THIRD month 16th. My last letter was written in the home of William Dunn Rogers, where we had passed the night following the meeting last noted. At Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, to-day, which was largely attended and, as was remarked in the business meeting, by an unusual number of younger people. I was led to present some lessons from John's testimony that God was light, etc., at the close of which a sweetly solemn feeling spread over the meeting, under which it entered upon its routine business, which was conducted with much harmony and loving interest.

After meeting closed, while very many of those present went to the hall nearly opposite the meeting-house, where Friends had prepared an abundant meal, we, at the solicitation of our friend W. D. Rogers, went home with him, and there met a number of friends in whose company we enjoyed a pleasant social converse until about 4 p. m., when we started to take the train for Pemberton, some fourteen miles eastward from Moorestown, where we were to hold an appointed meeting in the evening. This meeting had been appointed at the request of ex-Judge Joshua Forsythe, who had met us at Mt. Holly, and who seemed much disappointed that we could not go there at that time. Our friend met us at the station, and took us to his home about two miles, to tea, returning in time for the meeting which was held in Jubilee Hall. A large company gathered, who listened with attention as I was led to explain my views of Quakerism and its adaptation to meet the requirements of humanity to enable them to come into and live in harmony with God. Expressions of satisfaction were made to me, and reached me through other sources, for a clearer understanding of our views, the meeting being composed, with few exceptions, of those who were not Friends. We were thankful that we had embraced the opportunity thus offered. We went home for the night with our friend Forsythe, remaining with them until after dinner the next day, and much enjoyed the social visit with him and his wife. Among the sources of enjoyment was the opportunity of looking over some old deeds and wills of the early settlers of the tract on which he lived, written in parchment, and bearing date 1714 to 1729.

We were here in the vicinity of the cranberry culture, our friend having several acres of them, and were glad to learn so much of the manner of their culture and yield, of which we had heretofore but a very limited knowledge.

After dinner our friends took us seven miles to Vincenttown, where we had a meeting in the Friends' meeting-house. About fifty gathered, who expressed their gratification at our coming. This meeting had become almost extinct, but few families of Friends residing in the vicinity, but they had organized a First-day school and were now holding a small meeting. Our friends George H. Killé and Charles H. Engle met us here, and after meeting took us to Mt. Holly, to take the cars for Morristown again, where we were met by Ezra Lippincott's conveyance and taken to his hospitable home.

The day had been bright and clear, so that on awakening Seventh-day morning (18th), we were much surprised to find a storm had set in, at first consisting of snow and sleet, and then turning to rain, which continued most of the day. We had a meeting appointed at Westfield on Seventh-day afternoon at 4.30, which, notwithstanding the rain, drew a goodly number together, to whom was opened thoughts concerning the new birth. The meeting closed under a solemn feeling. After meeting we went home with S. Robinson Coale for the night, enjoying with them as we always do when there a pleasant and profitable evening. First-day morning still storming, but not so heavily. We took the train for Philadelphia, where notice had been given of our expected attendance at both morning and evening meetings. Quite a large meeting gathered at Race Street, notwithstanding the rain, to whom I was led to give a reason for our views as applicable to meet the needs of man for his salvation. We went home with Hannah Woodnutt to dine, and afterward went to Samuel S. Ash's to tea. The evening meeting, at the same house, was not so large but was a baptizing season, in which our duty of love to God and to each other was dwelt upon. After meeting we went home with Alban and Sarah T. R. Eavenson for the night.

Second-day we returned to Baltimore, feeling that our work for the present had been accomplished, and to much satisfaction. So with increased thankfulness of spirit for the favors enjoyed, and for the gain in health of my dear wife, for whose travail and sympathy with me I am deeply indebted for the ability to do the work assigned me, we have returned to our home and friends to assume our usual routine of daily life.

JOHN J. CORNELL.

Baltimore, Third month 24.

A LETTER FROM FRANKLIN.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I READ the article in the INTELLIGENCER about Franklin and his religious views, and I remembered something on the subject which I found in a religious paper and preserved in my scrap-book. I thought it might be of interest to some of your readers and send a copy of it.

L. J. M.

Granville, N. Y.

A LETTER OF CONSOLATION FROM DR. FRANKLIN TO MISS E. HUBBARD.

Dear Child : I condole with you. We have lost a most dear and valuable relation, but it is the will of God and nature that these mortal bodies be laid aside when the soul is to enter into real life. 'Tis rather an embryo state—a preparation to living. A man is not completely born until he is dead. Why, then, should we grieve that a new child is born among the immortals, a new member added to their society?

We are spirits. That bodies should be lent to us while they can afford us pleasure, assist us in acquiring knowledge, or in doing good to our fellow-creatures, is a kind and benevolent act of God. When they become unfit for their purposes, and give us pain instead of pleasure, instead of an aid become an incumbrance, and answer none of the intentions for which they were given, it is equally kind and benevolent that a way is provided by which we may get rid of them. That way is death. We ourselves prudently in some cases, choose a partial death. A mangled, painful limb, which cannot be restored, we willingly cut off. He that plucks out a tooth, parts with all the pains and possibility of pains and diseases it was liable to or capable of making him suffer.

Our friend and we are invited abroad on a party of pleasure that is to last forever. His chair was first ready, and he has gone before us. We could not conveniently all start together; and why should you or I be grieved at this, since we are soon to follow, and we know where to find him? Adieu, my dear, good child, and believe that I shall be, in every state, your affectionate papa. BENJAMIN FRANKLIN.

LIFE hath two hands for those who fitly live,
With one it gives, with one it takes away;
The willing palm still finds the touch of love,
And he alone has lost the art to live
Who cannot win new friends. —Weir Mitchell.

SCHOOLS "ON PAPER" ONLY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

THE time has come when it is right for me to lay some facts before the public. It is for the sake of justice to my profession and the noble co-workers who are spending valuable lives working for the colored people. There are quite a number of that race who travel through the North, raising money from those interested in education, yet who have not time to investigate, but out of sympathy give contributions which seldom do what the givers imagine or expect.

We were present, some few years since, at a church association where a white man was reprimanded and his name crossed from that religious body, because for years he had traveled North and secured funds to support a colored school on an island near the Georgia coast, and no school had ever existed there. He had traveled and supported his family on what he secured in that way. From this State a man goes North and has collected hundreds of dollars for an "orphanage." He had pictures in northern papers of a building half completed. On investigation it was found not a spadeful of soil had been dug and never has been, for the foundation. His last report was "two hundred orphans needing help"; a friend of ours went to find the truth and discovered thirty-two orphans and the rest day pupils from homes of their own.

In Virginia a man that did have a school, induced a generous lady to give him enough to clear a mortgage on his property. She did so, only to learn in two years by investigation of a Boston gentleman, that the names had been forged on every official paper she received in the "legal" transaction. He was exposed in the daily papers. They do not always mean wrong, but slavery did not create business principles, and missionary money needs more wisdom in spending than getting. They want to be head of a great institution, they like to travel and they know just how to reach the sympathies of good people in the North. The names of influential persons are printed as "Our Philanthropic Friends," on an appeal, which also says, "There is an Industrial Department consisting of carpentry, wheelwright, blacksmithing, brick-laying, tailoring, shoe-making, cooking, laundrying, dress-making," etc. We asked, "Have you carpentry now?" "No, but we want it." The same question was put to each industry, and No was the answer every time, except laundry, and that was they had a woman who knew how, and was going to teach. The education system enumerated a long list of studies. The truth, as drawn out from the reverend president was, a little country school on a "stormy island by the sea," yet that man had thirteen passes, (we saw them), on various railroads to and in the North, and spends his summers in Baltimore, Philadelphia, New York, and Boston. Closer questioning showed that he had been away about eighteen months, and had raised over two hundred dollars. "How much money is in the bank whose president's name appears as a receiver of funds?" "None." "How was it spent?" "For lumber." "What did it cost?" "Forty dollars on the ground." "Where is the rest?" and the impatient reply came, "We had to have agents and canvassers." Between this and the first visit we had written to reliable parties, and learned that the man had traveled, after the cyclone of '93, but the money and clothing were distributed so unsatisfactorily that the people would not allow him to speak in their churches.

We have not the time to make these investigations, though we will gladly answer any letters of inquiry. Slavery would have been a blessing if it had left all the race honest and truthful. Missionaries should see things as they are, and have to work with present conditions. There is a certain amount of money given by the North for educational purposes yearly; every ten cents that goes to a paper school, (one on paper only), or any unworthy object is lost to the well established and reliable institutions, where the pay for good instructors has to be met by work that could not be accomplished without Divine aid and guidance. Are not good persons tempting the weak to enter the business of begging and getting by false representation? It has a reflex influence, for when those who give find the recipient unworthy, they do not want to give again, and thus missionary funds are lessened.

These disagreeable facts have been forced from me at this busy time, because of the pressure of emptiness in our own treasury. This school is largely supported by small subscriptions; of a hundred and fifty-one contributions last year, one hundred and two were less than twenty-five dollars. Eighty-four were five dollars or less. The larger ones include the money from Philanthropic Committees and meetings which are often collected by small contributions. We are missing these small sums, and our friends having been weighed in the past and not found wanting, we hope the scales of justice willsoon be balanced by generous giving.

MARTHA SCHOFIELD.

Aiken, S. C., Third month 25.

A CLEAR TESTIMONY NEEDED.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I READ with interest the note of Cora H. Carver in the INTELLIGENCER, (Third month 18), exhorting to greater charity on the part of Peace friends towards the advocates of Imperialism. I want to respect all honest, conscientious belief; but if it had not been for the conscientious advocacy of Imperialism and war, by such good men as Lyman Abbott and Weir Mitchell, and S. R. Calthorp (and even some good members of the Society of Friends), the war with Spain might have been prevented, the conquest of the Philippines would never have been undertaken, and our country would have been spared the uncountable millions of expense, the deplorable moral degradation, and all the revolution that has occurred within one short year.

Charity and good will are incumbent upon every Christian, but viewing the deplorable results which have followed from the support or connivance which many good, conscientious people have given to the late war with Spain, and are now giving to the cruel war waged on the Filipinos, the question arises, Is not the influence of these good, conscientious people greater for evil than that of the openly wicked natures who make no profession of righteousness?

I am old enough to remember the great anti-slavery agitation for thirty years before emancipation. One of the wisest and most eloquent of the pleaders for the slave then said that slavery could not exist for one year if it were not upheld by good men of high character; and if it were not for the many kind-hearted slave-holders who were humane, and endeavored to treat their slaves with justice and kindness.

Let us everyone endeavor to be charitable, and entertain no unkind or bitter feeling to any human being; but let us be faithful in bearing an uncompromising, clear testimony against wrong.

I wish every reader of the INTELLIGENCER might peruse carefully the editorial article, Third month 18, and judge whether it is not the calm unexaggerated truth; and then ask themselves whether they can be too earnest in their protest against the sad complications in which our beloved country is now involved. This awful situation is now preventing us from giving the Czar's protocol any warm official recognition. Bishop Paret of Maryland says "The silence at Washington is painful." But I hope for a moral uprising of the people that will demand a withdrawal from our country's present deplorable attitude.

Wilmington, Del.

DAVID FERRIS.

THE PHILIPPINE CRISIS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I CANNOT well resist the impulse to express my gratification and satisfaction, at the many timely and able editorials that have from time to time appeared in the INTELLIGENCER during the past year in regard to the war with Spain, and the more recent troubles in the Philippine Islands.

David Ferris also explains the situation in such a clear, logical manner that it would seem that little more could be said in condemnation of such an iniquitous war as is now being urged against an almost defenseless people, whose only offense, as has been said, is that they want their liberty. Every true American, it seems to me, can heartily sympathize with the cause of the Filipinos, who are in much the same situation that the Americans found themselves during the Revolutionary period of our country's history.

It is indeed a humiliating spectacle that we are called upon to witness during the closing days of the 19th Century, the return of fossilized conditions that we had fondly hoped had been relegated to the dark ages. We had believed that we were soon to enter upon a golden age, in which arbitration would be the supreme tribunal for the final settlement of all international, as well as national difficulties.

It is really a travesty on the constitution of our country to coerce a foreign body into our government without the consent of that body, and no patriotic American can look unmoved upon the very great injustice that is being done in those far-away islands upon a people who by tradition and inheritance are the rightful owners of the soil. No doubt they look upon us as invaders in much the same light that the American Indians did when the white men took forcible possession of their country.

In many instances the secular press, in startling headlines, takes a certain pride in parading the news, if not actually boasting, of the large number of the Filipinos slain, and the smallness of our losses.

We certainly have no desire to follow in the footsteps of the Sultan of Turkey, in Armenia, but if we are not very careful we shall do so, if we have not already done so, for the starvation and suffering that are the accompaniment of war must next be expected.

That the humanitarian views that this country professed at the outset of the war for the poor Cubans have been lost sight of, and have been swallowed up in the mass of selfishness and greed, is the opinion of many. If we only had the "initiative" and "referendum," we could do something to stay the slaughter of the Filipinos, but as Congress is the master of the people instead of the people being its master, we are powerless, and our only hope appears to be in circulating petitions craving the indulgence of our public servants, (but really public masters), to grant us a favor, which should be ours by right. I am afraid we shall never have a government of the people, by the people, and for the people, as Abraham Lincoln said, unless we have the referendum, or direct legislation. I have much sympathy with the views expressed by your correspondent, Wm. H. Vore, of Lincoln, Neb., and Elizabeth A. Rogers, of Crosswicks, N. J. I unite with the suggestion made in circulating a petition to be presented to the next session of Congress, and would gladly aid in getting signatures. In my opinion the time has come when all true Friends of whatever branch, should rally to the cause of Truth, and by voice and pen show their colors in the world, (to use a worldly expression), and aid in some degree, however small, in endeavoring to establish in the earth, Justice, and Truth, and Love, and eventually to proclaim Peace on earth, and goodwill to all men.

WILLIAM W. COX.

Mendon Centre, N. Y.

ANOTHER VIEW.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I AM glad for the ringing words of Edward B. Rawson, "Where do we stand?" in the INTELLIGENCER of the 25th. They are certainly refreshing in the midst of apologetic approvals of "the United States using force in putting down Spanish tyranny in Cuba," and, at the same time, censuring President McKinley for "waging a war of extermination in the Philippines."

There are many criticisms that may be offered to President McKinley's administration, both as to what was done, as well as to what was not done; but after destroying, by express direction of Congress, what government there was in the islands of Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, he is not to be criticised for remaining upon the ground in the Philippines, as well as elsewhere, and using the army and navy, if need be, in furnishing protection to life and property of the thousands of people entitled to this protection, and which the United States, under the circumstances, is morally and internationally bound to furnish until some adequate form of government shall have been established. The care of the Philippines is an early retribution visited upon the United States as a result of the war, and she cannot evade the responsibility now.

A most unfortunate state of affairs exists at Manila at the present time. Sympathy has been expressed in the INTELLIGENCER for "the defenseless people who are being sacrificed by our army's bullets." And what about our sons, brothers, and neighbors in the American army, who have been detained all these months exposed to a tropical climate, privations of camp, and, at the present time, the dangers and carnage of battle, which is causing the death of hundreds of them? It is scarcely probable that indictments for manslaughter against the United States Senate, or any members of it, would be sustained in court. Nevertheless, the charge is true that the havoc of war now being enacted at Manila has been caused by the filibustering tactics of a few United States Senators, preventing the prompt ratification of the Peace Treaty months ago, at which time the occupation of these islands would have been quite as peaceful as was that of Cuba and Porto Rico, and the people will not hold them guiltless.

This attack upon the American army is an act of treachery of deep estdye, and clearly demonstrates that the insurgent leaders are not the men who could establish a republic in the Philippines. In May last, Aguinaldo was a refugee from the islands, and his insurrection against Spain was hopelessly dead. At this time Admiral Dewey brought him back and virtually destroyed the Spanish power in the islands, and befriended him in many ways, for which friendship and assistance Aguinaldo owed Dewey and the Americans unlimited confidence and assistance. His army was chiefly gathered together after the protocol was signed, and wholly since the capture of Manila. Aguinaldo pretended that the United States would be highly welcome in the islands, and that he was holding together an army in order to resist Spain in the event the United States would withdraw. "Give not that which is holy unto dogs, neither cast your pearls before swine, lest they trample them under their feet and turn again and rend you."

ISAAC UNDERWOOD.

Belleville, Pa., Third month 27.

MILITARY LAWS POSSIBLE.

The Interchange, Baltimore.

A CORRESPONDENT writing to us in regard to the article in our last issue on "Danish Friends and Peace," says that there is grave danger that both National and State laws of an oppressive kind may be enacted [in this country] in regard to military service. An old proverb says: "Beware of beginnings." But in cases like this the great difficulty is that so often those who would have influence are for so long a time incredulous, and smile at the forebodings of the few. Nothing is done till the movement has assumed such force that it is almost impossible to stop it. Let us not allow this to be the history of the effort to preserve this country from submitting to the bonds that a rising militarism would force upon it.

LITERARY NOTES.

HENRY BUDD, a member of the Philadelphia bar, and a student of history and literature—as the volume we are about to mention shows—has published, with the title "St. Mary's Hall Lectures and other Papers," twelve essays or lectures, most of them the outcome of the "occasional relaxation of a professional life." They are partly biographical studies, partly historical, partly literary. The sketch of Thomas Jefferson, which is an address delivered, 1884, on the birthday of the Sage of Monticello, is somewhat partisan, though in the main a fair review of the career and principles of the father of American Democracy. In another address the system of trial by jury is earnestly defended. In the lecture on Norse Mythology, the author takes the conventional ground that the "dominant quality" in the American character is "Anglo Saxon,"—a theory which has been worn rather threadbare by the hard usage it has had. The opening paper is a historical sketch of La Vendée, with its frightful civil war of 1793.

(Philadelphia: H. T. Coates & Co.)

Senator Hoar continues his political reminiscences in this month's Scribner's Magazine, and tells some interesting stories about General Grant. There is a good story of a winter trip from Dyea to Dawson City in the Klondyke; it has the great merit of not being either coarse or affected, but, on the contrary, is simple, sympathetic, and kindly. The sketch of "Jack Beltz," the giant from Pennsylvania, with his team of dogs, is very attractive, and the dogs themselves almost lovable. Maxfield Parrish furnishes the design for the cover of this issue of Scribner's, and it strikes us as one of the best he has made for it.

In the Atlantic Monthly, this month, Julia Ward Howe continues her reminiscences; this instalment covers her life in Boston, in the '50's, with experiences in Rome and Cuba. She gives sketches of Professor Agassiz, of that odd person Count Adam Gurowski, and others. Prof. T. J. J. See explains that when the sun's fires die out the earth will freeze. This may not occur, however, "for several million years." The approaching tri-centenary celebration of Oliver Cromwell (he was born April 25, 1599) gives occasion to an article on him by Samuel Harden Church, in which he reviews the character and career of the great Protector. He considers that Cromwell had remained almost unknown until Carlyle published his Letters and Speeches, in 1845.

EDUCATIONAL.

CLOSING FOR SPRING VACATION.—Swarthmore College closed on the 24th ult., for the week's vacation usual at this time of year, and the students generally departed. They will return to their studies on Second-day next, the 3d inst.

George School has also closed, this week, for a similar vacation.

TEACHER'S RESIGNATION.—Allen B. Clement, instructor in mathematics at Friends' School, Wilmington, Del., with which he has been connected for eight years, has presented his resignation, to take effect at the close of the present school year. He proposes to continue the study of law, and will shortly be ready for his final examination.

BEQUEST FOR SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.—By the will of the late Daniel Underhill, of Jericho, L. I., Swarthmore College receives a bequest of $5,000. He had been a member of the Board of Managers of the College, and a very useful one, for many years.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

NORRISTOWN, PA.—The Friends' Association met at the home of Cecilia Zimmerman, De Kalb street, on the evening of the 21st instant. There was a good attendance. The topics treated related largely to the Society, but many of them possessed a more general interest.

Lillian Zimmerman read a portion of a letter, describing a fugitive-slave hearing before a United States Commissioner, giving a picture of Lucretia Mott and other anti-slavery workers.

Alfred W. Wright read an essay on the "Separation in the Society of Friends, in 1827." The writer deprecated the revival of unpleasant memories in this connection. A spirited discussion followed. Bertha Harry gave a reading on "Liquid Air, the Coldest of all Colds," and William Kinsey another on "The Persecution of Quakers in New England."

Isaac Roberts spoke of the new building of Young Friends' Association at Fifteenth and Cherry streets, Philadelphia. Ellwood Roberts answered a referred question, "What is Orthodoxy?" by saying that there could be no fixed and unyielding standard of faith from age to age, creeds being modified by the development of knowledge, as can be realized by the changes in this respect which have been witnessed in our own time.

The next meeting will be held at the home of Isaac and Martha Richards, No. 809 Swede street.

LANGHORNE, PA.—The Langhorne Young Friends' Association met at the home of Mitchell Watson, Third month 23. The president, John Wildman, called the meeting to order, and the minutes of the previous meeting were read by the secretary and approved.

Elizabeth Burgess gave a chapter from Janney's History of Friends, containing accounts of the lives of Samuel Parrish, John Comly, and Isaac Tatem Hopper. "The Gods of Egypt," an excellent paper by Ada B. Mitchell, told of the advancement of ancient Egyptian civilization, and the instability of their veiled and mystical religion.

Helen Row read a beautiful poem, entitled "Keeping his Word." "Religious Training in the Home," an interesting paper by Emily Atkinson, was followed by a reading from the Discipline, by Joseph Mather.

The program closed with a reading by Emma P. Worrell of Lincoln's favorite poem, "Oh Why Should the Spirit of Mortal be Proud?"

After the report of the Executive Committee the roll was called and responded to with sentiments.

After a short period of silence, the meeting adjourned until Fourth month 20, at the home of Mary Bunting.

A. R. P., Sec.

ABINGTON, PA.—The Abington Friends' Association was entertained at the home of Agnes Paxson, Jenkintown, Pa., Third month 25. The attendance was smaller than usual, owing to the inclement weather.

In the absence of both the president and vice-president, Isaac P. Mather presided for the evening. After the usual reading of the minutes, the Executive Committee's report was read. It fixed the time and place of next meeting, Fourth month 22, at the home of Edwin S. Hallowell. The question for discussion to be, "Are our present business methods in harmony with Christian Life?" A discussion, also upon the book, "In His Steps, or What Would Jesus Do?"

Caroline Thompson opened the program for the evening, by reading a letter from Florida tourists. This was much enjoyed by all and took us, for the time, away from the land of snow storms, into the beautiful sunny south. Following this Anna L. Smedley recited a selection from James Whitcomb Riley.

The correspondent, Jane T. Hallowell being absent, her valuable paper was read by Sidnea Lukens. The question, "What are the Duties of our Overseers, and can they in any way advance interest in our Meetings?" created quite an animated discussion. Sarah T. Paxson read a paper which she had prepared upon the question and which ably answered it.

Some of the Friends expressed a wish for younger members of the meeting to be appointed to the duties of overseers, as they are more progressive, and would make our meetings more interesting and consequently better attended. Various opinions were expressed upon the policy of such a step, and some favored it quite strongly.

There being no further business the meeting adjourned.

MARY PRISCILLA HARPER, Sec.

BUCKINGHAM, PENNA.—A meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held Third month 19, at the meeting-house. The meeting was opened by the president's reading the 16th Psalm, which was followed by a reading, "The Battlefield," by Sarah Broadhurst.

Isabel Worthington gave a well written and comprehensive paper on "The Beliefs of Different Churches." A reading, "The Flower Garden," given by Lettie Watson, was followed by Anna J. Williams reading from that part of the Discipline relating to "Gaining and Diversions."

This concluding the exercises, after a short silence the meeting adjourned.

J. A., Sec'y.

FISHERTOWN, PA.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held Third month 26. The meeting was opened by the president, Rebecca M. Blackburn reading a portion of the eighth chapter of Romans. The minutes of last meeting were read.

The program was opened by a recitation by Russell Blackburn, followed by a recitation, "The Looking Glass," by Margaretta Blackburn. "Faith, the Engineer," was read by Maria Griest. A poem entitled, "The Skein We Wind," was recited by Mary J. Blackburn. Papers on the subject of "Happiness" were read by Lizzie, Carrie, and Lesley Blackburn.

It was decided to hold our Association the last First-day of each month, instead of semi-monthly, on account of our First-day school, which commences in a short time; also to the change of the time of the Association from 10 o'clock in the forenoon to 3 o'clock in the afternoon.

The meeting closed to meet Fourth month 30, in the afternoon, at 3 o'clock.

MARY J. BLACKBURN, Sec.

HOME INFLUENCE ASSOCIATION.—The Home Influence Association (Philadelphia) at its regular meeting on Third month 21, listened to a most excellent and comprehensive report of the Mothers' Congress, given by the president, Florence M. Lukens.

So many interesting and important points were touched upon that a brief report of the meeting will almost be an injustice to the paper. Mention was made of the proposal to establish a National Health Bureau, which should have a watchful and intelligent oversight of the health of this great nation, but as large bodies move slowly and sometime must pass before such a Bureau can be organized, members of such organizations as the Home Influence Association were urged to make a study of household economics.

A mother's duty was said not to be the study of how to treat sickness so much as how to prevent it. There must be no showing off of the baby; besides its natural activities, rest and silence are its greatest necessities. Health foods were condemned; good home cooking declared most essential, as mastication in children amounts to very little. Moral and religious training to be effective and lasting must begin in the cradle. A child looking up into a noble mother's eyes is inspired to lead a pure, noble life.

Since eighty per cent. of womankind adopt home-making as their life work, the women's colleges of the country should provide an advanced course in household economics. In the hands of the parents who are nursing the babies of to-day lies the political weal or woe of our country twenty years hence.

Mary E. Mumford, member of the Board of Education, and one of the honorary vice-presidents of the Mothers' Congress, followed in a most pleasing talk. She justified the organization of a Mothers' Congress by saying that men manufacturers, even of ten-penny nails, come together from all parts of the Union to confer about the best ways of manufacturing and of putting their goods on the market. How much more necessary is it that mothers should come together, for those who now see their grandchildren growing up around them know that all-sufficient knowledge does not come intuitively.

The mother holds the key to the child's future. She should know when her boy goes out just where he is going. He will appreciate her interest and anxiety if they are sincere.

The meeting on Fourth month 18 will be held in the evening, and will be addressed by Dr. James B. Walker on hygiene in the home. W.

WAYNESVILLE, OHIO.—The meeting of Young Friends' Association, Third month 12, was opened by the president reading portions of the 10th chapter of Mark and the 15th of Matthew. Faith was the subject for the meeting, and the discussion was opened by Joseph B. Chapman, who read an excellent paper on that subject. It showed careful thought, and gave each one present many beautiful truths to remember. The touching lesson of the woman of Canaan and her faith in her Master was vividly brought out.

The president then read the topics in the following order: "What is Faith?" "The acts and offices of Faith." "The signs of a true Faith." "The means and instruments of Faith." "What power has Faith?" And lastly, "What are the results of Faith?"

The answers brought out were: one act of faith is to believe everything God does for us, and another, we must be true disciples of Christ. When our work is complete then we receive a bountiful blessing. That we may know our faith we should do nothing for our vain glory, and show that we are contented with God for our guide. We should scrutinize our lives to see what God has done for us, and by doing an act through faith it will lead us to try again. The wonderful power lies in a faith that will make us love to help others and that suggests research and knowledge. It leads to the beautiful thoughts of Life and Light, Happiness and Contentment.

A little business was disposed of, and after a brief silence the meeting adjourned to meet Third month 26.

MARIANA CHANDLER, Sec.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

A FRIEND, O. E. J., writes from Baltimore, Third month 14: "We are stirring up things a little, endeavoring to get an expression from each monthly meeting in our yearly meeting [on the Hague Conference]. The quarterly meeting held here yesterday endorsed the movement most heartily."

I am a reader of your paper. There is no meeting of Friends within forty miles of my place. I attended other meetings, United Christian Brethren in Christ, the Methodist, and Baptist, but I felt that there was a more spiritual way. I was at that time (1871) a member of the American Peace Society of Boston, Mass., and in 1872 became a life member. I saw in the Advocate an account of George Fox's Journal. I sent for a copy and a number of Friends' books, and became convinced that their way is the way of life everlasting to me. I have been a constant reader of the INTELLIGENCER for years. When I was in Philadelphia, in 1876, I attended meeting on First-day at Race Street, and some good Friend gave me a copy of Janney's "Conversation on Religious Subjects," which I read and believed. I do not think Friends ought to have separated, but should have stood as this branch does. S. M. H.

I am well pleased with the stand your paper has taken in regard to the late war. In some way or other justice will prevail, and all wrongs will be righted. Y.

La Porte, Ind.

BLOW wind of March, blow all about
And clean the cracks and corners out;
Sweep with your brooms the earth and sky,
For company's coming by and by,
For everything must be fresh and sweet
When we hear the patter of April's feet.

—A. M. Pratt.

COMMUNICATIONS.

THANKFUL FEELINGS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

"FROM the abundance of the heart the mouth speaketh"—therefore I would like to express my feelings of thanks at this time, for the visits we have had from Isaac Wilson to our meetings in this part of the country, during the extremely cold winter. It reminds me of the One who said he must be about his Father's business. Although I have not been out of my home to hear him preach, his letters in this paper are as sermons for me. I feel that he is rewarded in this life, and a blessing will rest upon those he mingles with, if we keep in the Christ spirit. O, what more could be done, than what has been done for us in this part of the Lord's vineyard during the past year. The reading of the papers and sayings of our people at the great Conference in the West has provided much food for our minds. Has not the Good Father of us all been mindful of us in many ways, for which we should give him thanks?

"Oh, it is hard to work for God,
To rise and take his part
Upon this battlefield of earth,
And not sometimes lose heart.

"But right is right, since God is God,
And right the day must win;
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin."

Terwood, Pa., Third Month 15.

S. R. V.

A RECORD OF ARCTIC WEATHER.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I see it is the wish of friend Daniel Griest to have a record of the weather of different localities. I see it was much colder here than it was at Ellis, Kansas. On Fourth-day, evening, Second month 8, 1899, the snow fell to the depth of 12 to 15 inches. On Fifth-day 9, temperature at 6 a. m., was 9° below zero, and at noon 7° below zero, and at 8 p. m., 16° below zero.

Sixth-day, 10th of Second month, temperature at 5 a. m., 41° below zero, and at 6.40 a. m., spirits in the thermometer stood at 45° below zero.

The mercury in one of my thermometers was solid at 40° below zero. At Jollytown, three miles southwest of Mulgrave, A. E. Clovis, who was using the same kind of spirits thermometer that I was, telephoned to me that at 7 a. m. the temperature was 50° below zero at that place. I took my thermometer into my store room at 6.40 a. m., thinking it at the lowest.

It was never known to be so cold here. It made us think of the Arctic regions.

SAMUEL H. HEADLEY.

Mulgrave, Greene county, Pa., Third month 20.

CORRESPONDENCE INVITED.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

A desire to once more mingle with Friends,—if not bodily, then in a spiritual sense,—is my reason for asking admission to your columns.

Born and brought up in the Society, I love it, and it must always be my church home. Although drifted (from no fault of my own) far away from any of its centres, I still long for the comradeship of brothers and sisters of the same faith, and if this should meet the eye of any such who may feel drawn to write me and give me words of encouragement, it will be appreciated, I assure thee my dear brother or sister whichever the case may be.

From my early childhood's home in western New York, my husband and I moved to Southern Michigan, where in 1883, he passed on to the better life and left me alone, until the present finds me living with my son-in-law and daughter in Southern Missouri, J. S. L. Brown and Loretta Calkins Brown. I shall cherish the hope that I may hear from some of my brothers and sisters in the church.

MARY A. CALKINS.

Mansfield, Missouri.

REGISTRY OF CONVICTIONS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I have been much interested in the correspondence in the INTELLIGENCER with reference to the war in the Philippines, together with the comments by the editor. It is the duty of all who see the light to speak out early, and take their place in the shaping of governmental affairs.

I understand the Christian religion to be the application of the Spirit of Christ within us to human affairs. The ballot should be the means by which we all should register our convictions, but such fails to be the case of late years, as the total count usually decides that the present policy is to be perpetuated,—two or four years more, as the case may be.

My acquaintance with and knowledge of men in authority is that they are nearly always desirous to know the will of the mass of intelligent people but, in the midst of our so-called "loyalty," we are afraid to speak out, either verbally in the face of opposition, or even through correspondence, and thus the selfish interests get in their work. If Christians would register their convictions at this late day, both by voice and pen, the President might be persuaded to do some thinking for himself. It is very encouraging to me to see so much independent sentiment, in the face of so much printed matter in the daily papers, in opposition to what should be the policy of a Christian nation.

FRANCIS W. HICKS.

Avondale, Chester Co., Pa.

THE BARNYARD'S SOUTHERLY CORNER

Charles G. D. Roberts, in Youth's Companion.

WHEN the frost is white on the fodder stack,
The haws in the thornbush withered and black,
When the near fields flash in a diamond mail
And the far hills glimmer, opaline pale,
Oh, merrily shines the morning sun

In the barnyard's southerly corner.

When the ruts in the cart-road ring like steel,
And the birds from the kitchen door come for their meal,
And the snow at the gate is lightly drifted
And over the woodpile thinly sifted,
Oh, merrily shines the morning sun

In the barnyard's southerly corner.

When the brimming bucket steams at the well,
And the axe on the beech-knot sings like a bell,
When the pond is loud with the skaters' calls,
And the horses stamp in the littered stalls,
Oh, merrily shines the morning sun

In the barnyard's southerly corner.

When the hay lies loose on the wide barn-floor,
And a sharp smell puffs from the stable door,
When the pitchfork handle stings in the hand,
And the stanchioned cows for the milking stand,
Oh, merrily shines the morning sun

In the barnyard's southerly corner.

The steers let out for a drink and a run,
Seek the warm corner one by one,
And the huddling sheep in their dusty white,
Nose at the straw in the pleasant light,
When merrily shines the morning sun

In the barnyard's southerly corner.

THE LITTLE YELLOW DOG.

YES, I went to see the bowwows, and I looked at every one,
Proud dogs of every breed and strain that's underneath the sun;

But not one could compare with—you may hear it with surprise—

A little yellow dog I know that never took a prize.

Not that they would have skipped him when they gave the ribbons out,

Had there been a class to fit him—though his lineage is in doubt.

No judge of dogs could e'er resist the honest, faithful eyes
Of that plain little yellow dog that never took a prize.

Suppose he wasn't trained to hunt, and never killed a rat,
And isn't much on tricks or looks or birth—well, what of that?
That might be said of lots of folks whom men call great and wise,

As well as of that yellow dog that never took a prize.

It isn't what a dog can do, or who a dog may be,
That hits a man. It's simply this—does he believe in me?
And by that test I know there's not the compeer 'neath the skies

Of that plain little yellow dog that never took a prize.

Oh, he's the finest little pup that ever wagged a tail
And followed man with equal joy to Congress or to jail.

I'm going to start a special show—'twill beat the world for size—

For faithful little yellow dogs, and each shall have a prize.

—Harper's Bazar.

A CORN FARM IN IOWA.

In the "Review of Reviews" for last month, an interesting article, by Frank H. Spearman, describes a great corn raising farm of 6,000 acres, in Iowa. The farm's balance-sheet for 1898 is given. The following extract describes the raising of the crop.

THE essentials of a profitable farm are good land, well drained but not too rolling, and accessibility to reasonable transportation. Six thousand acres being about three miles square makes the largest farm which can be operated to advantage from a single central station; a larger acreage simply means two or more farms.

About April 1 men and mules move on the fields in battalions. Four-horse seeders, four-foot harrows, and six-horse gang-plows, manœuvre for six weeks like an army, sowing small grain, plowing, and planting corn. The minute the small grain is sown 31 corn-planters are thrown behind the plows, and in this work lies largely the success or failure of the crop. Note, for instance, the pains taken in selecting the seed corn.

A perfect stand of corn is the first requisite of a large yield. From a choice piece of land previously planted with selected seed about 2,000 bushels of the finest ears are taken. From these an expert selects 600 bushels. These ears are placed on racks in a building arranged especially for a seed-house. Whatever the thermometer registers in Iowa, the temperature in that seed-house never falls below freezing. All this insures the highest possible germinating power in the seed, and that alone might, in case of a cold, wet spring, save the entire profit of the season by producing a good stand.

The planting must of necessity be done by machinery, and to secure the maximum yield three seed kernels must be dropped in each hill. If five drop in, that hill is lost to the profit account; if only one it is partially lost.

But perfect as American farming machinery is, it does not leave the factory perfect enough to insure against irregular planting. Patiently and by a series of exhaustive tests the planter plates are so adjusted to the size of the seed kernels for each year that they will deposit an average of sixty-five kernels to every twenty hills, and not more than four nor less than two in any one. So great are the precautions that before the seed is shelled the tips and butts of the seed ears are cut off to secure kernels of an even size.

Even after this delicate adjustment of the best machinery in the world, foremen follow the 31 planters and at intervals open hills to count the seed deposits and make sure that each machine is doing its work. In addition, a purse of $100 is split into eight prizes between the eight men who do the best work and whose teams mark the straightest rows. With such method is it any wonder that the crop on this farm averaged 60 bushels per acre, against the average of 32 bushels as given Iowa by the government report for 1898?

After the seeding, the harrowing, and it is done with extraordinary energy and concentration. One hundred and forty sections of four-foot harrows sweep the fields like a charge of cavalry. Every time they move a mile together sixty-two acres are covered.

When the 3,800 acres of corn are up and ready 76 two-horse cultivators are put into it. The point in the first cultivation one way and in the second the other way is to get as close as possible to the corn; but after the pains taken to place it there no plant must be left covered by a clod of earth. The field-hand must uncover it, and a foreman on horseback behind each twenty men is held responsible for his crew's work. In the third and final cultivation the earth is thrown up against the plant, the small weeds in the hill being smothered and the large ones pulled by hand. It will be of interest to merchants and to theological professors to learn that it is not the weed in the row, but the one in the hill which mars the beauty of the balance sheet.

The corn being now three feet high, the inter-lacing roots and the overhanging stalks prevent further cultivation. Into this field, approximating one mile in width and six miles in length, are sent in October 75 wagons and men for the husking. This takes 60 days, and a row of cribs 10 feet wide and 16 feet high, half a mile long, are required to hold the crop.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA TREES.

Jane A. Stewart, in Boston Transcript.

ONCE upon a time—and it is not such a long time, either—the arid desert of Southern California knew no trees. The white man came, surveyed the land and saw that it was good. With immigration came irrigation and cultivation.

Encouraged by the fact that, given water, anything will grow in this "wonder region" the immigration of the shades to the sunshine land has reached a unique degree. One finds here the spruce and pine of the northland and the palmetto of the tropics prospering side by side. The Australian oak, the South American pepper, the Italian cypress, the Chinese bean, Florida's magnolia, all the rare creations of the Orient—a cosmopolitan brotherhood of trees—luxuriously flourishing in amicable contiguity along the highways and byways.

One comes upon a beautiful residence grounds whose outer finish is a diversified border of rose tree, eucalyptus, orange, and palm in charming succession. One often sees the happy alternation of pepper and palm, cypress and eucalyptus, olive and almond. This very beautiful and effective combination is the shapely grevillea and leafy umbrella. Again the roadway is bordered by a striking and popular contrast—the slender Norway spruce of the Northern latitudes and the stately fan palms of the tropics.

Frequently a frugal orchardist, grudging even the roadside soil for purely decorative planting, carries his orchard proper out upon the sidewalk lines. Thus the lovely lemon with its distinctive upright branches and gaily green in its new top growth; the olive, most graceful of fruit trees, in dainty silvery green attire; the almond, the apricot, the prune; the fig tree of the Orient, with its spreading foliage; the pomegranate, regal in cardinal bloom; and not least the orange, first among citrus fruits, whose "beautifully, deeply, darkly" green foliage is an endless delight to the eye—extend their rich fruit lavishly to the passers-by.

One can imagine no more stately vanguard to the serried files of an orange grove than this lone line of the noble eucalyptus—the "fever tree"—whose aromatic leaves are for the healing of the nation; whose loosely hanging bark contains wonderful properties, and whose slender swaying tops seek heaven's blue anywhere from fifty to one hundred feet above you—the very tree, which, planted about the Campagna, routed the malignant Roman fever.

Again a tender young orchard or a fine residence plat is flanked by a row of the balsamic cypress, with its tapering tops like fingers pointing heavenward. Far away over the wide garden land, these cypress digits are frequently the only index to the cozy homes hidden within the luxuriant foliage of the orange groves.

But woe betide the lovely cypress if unfortunately it be stationed on "the dusty side" of the country road or city avenue, for its fine foliage catches and retains the pervasive dust, blown gray by the diurnal ocean breeze of summer. Again, however, what a magical change is wrought by the first welcome rain of fall, transforming gray old age to verdant juvenescence!

But more recurrent than any other of the varied shades of the sunshine land is the deservedly popular pepper tree. Not half has been told of the perennial beauty and evergreen loveliness of this queen of semi-tropical shade-trees, with its pendulous, flashing, fern-like, green leaves and lovely drooping clusters of delicate white bloom and green and scarlet berries. A native of South America, it thrives magically in its sunny California home. One is refreshed and soothed in the dry season by its perpetual green, kept fresh and nourished by taproots extending hundreds of feet beneath the arid, thirsty earth. Along the dusty roadside and in desert places we hail the pungent pepper, "a thing of beauty and a joy forever."

PROVERBS exert an undue influence over the human mind. Proverbs perverted may slay their thousands. Beware at this season of that one, "Stuff a cold, and starve a fever." The meaning of it is, "Stuff a cold, and you will have a fever to starve."—Christian Register.

NOTWITHSTANDING the tribulations of Greece, millionaires exist there, and one of them, Andre Syngros, a banker who died recently at Athens, has left his entire estate, valued at five million dollars, to charitable institutions.

Diseases in Puerto Rico.

Harper's Weekly.

It is customary to suggest hygienic rules and regulations by which the traveler in the tropics should be governed, but in practice he seldom lives up to the strict limitations of these formulæ; the army in Cuba and Puerto Rico, even where it was possible, never did, and, further, it is feared it never will.

The most common physical ailments which overtake the unacclimated, as well as the native population, are, first, dysentery, sometimes of so persistent a type as to cause death; second, malarial and pernicious fevers, which take intermittent or malignant forms; third, colds, catarrhs, pneumonia, and consumption.

Dysenteries, mucous-membrane affections, and lung troubles may usually be, in large measure, prevented by simple methods of taking care of the person. Never eat fresh fruits with which you are unfamiliar, is one rule, if dysentery is to be averted; this rule is broken by nine out of every ten persons who are of an inquiring turn of mind, the rare and delicious fruits being a sore temptation to the appetite. Mangoes, bananas, and nisperos, while fine flavored and tempting, produce great distress in the average stomach by fermentation. Lemons (sweet and sour), limes, and oranges are considered safe, though the natives will never eat an orange after meals. The too constant or frequent use of lemon or lime juice is not beneficial to some systems, as it brings on a chronic acidity of the stomach. Dysenteries, which arise from malarial or bacterial poisoning of the intestinal tract, may be alleviated by strict dieting, but not prevented. Such diseases can be overcome by medical aid only.

Malarial affections are universal, and those who make their homes in tropical countries are never immune for long periods against the visitations of this stealthy foe.

The germs of malaria are no doubt oftenest carried into the system by drinking water, though the exact method or means of transmission is a much-mooted question with the medical fraternity.

Count Tolstoy's Daughter.

THE second daughter of Count Tolstoy, Maria, a writer in Harper's Bazar says, is putting into practical operation some of her father's theories. When the family property was divided she refused to accept her portion, and though she lives at home, and is therefore in one sense dependent, she works in the fields with the peasants, and turns over the money she makes to those who are disabled by illness. The money she makes, to be sure, is not excessive. Twenty or thirty kopecks a day comprises all her gain—a kopeck being half a cent of our money.

When asked why she did not devote herself to more lucrative labors, the better to provide for her indigent neighbors, she replied: "As a matter of fact, I know of nothing that I can do that will bring me in more money than my work in the fields does. I have not been trained to make a living equal to that which I now enjoy at home, and if I were forced to shift for myself I don't know that I could do any better than by working as a peasant woman. As matters now stand, I have my living at home, and there is also this opportunity to help the peasants. Besides earning a little money for them, I think that I am doing them some good by associating with them. It took them a long while to get accustomed to my companionship, and I don't feel that even now they accept me as I should like to have them do; but a few, at any rate, have learned to realize that I am not playing with them or the work, and that I really want to be of service to them. What I shall succeed in accomplishing, by way of example and suggestion, is but an infinitesimal part of what is necessary to be done before the peasants learn what it is that my father believes the Bible teaches that men ought to be and do; but it is a satisfaction to me to try to achieve even this slight result, and I am sure that already some of the women have views and ideas that they did not have when they saw me playing tennis or sitting in the music-room the day long."

A correspondent of the Sun worked for one day with her in the fields, only to be too exhausted to stir until noon. But Maria was up again at dawn and out beside the peasants, seemingly as fresh as they.

Speaker Reed's Opinion.

A DISPATCH from Alfred, Maine, on the 22d ult., says the private secretary of Speaker Reed, was at his home at that place, and said:

"With regard to the war with Spain, Mr. Reed has been no more conservative than was President McKinley at the beginning. Mr. Reed has all along regarded it as unfortunate, and is still firm in the belief that it might and should have been averted."

Around the World in Thirty Days.

J. G. PANGBORN, of Baltimore, who has just returned from Russia, says that in three years he expects, in company with Prince Hilkoﬀ, the Russian minister of railways, (uncle of Prince Hilkoﬀ, who is assisting the Doukhobors), to go around the world on the moon's schedule, or in thirty days. The itinerary from Baltimore would be as follows:

Via the Baltimore and Ohio, the Milwaukee and St. Paul and the Great Northern it is, say, 3,150 miles to Seattle; thence via the Pacific to Yokohama 4,500 miles, whence to Port Arthur via Nagasaki it is 1,200 miles more. At Port Arthur we leave ship, and, going ashore, take train on the Manchurian extension of the Trans-Siberian railway for St. Petersburg, 5,600 miles; thence by rail direct to Berlin, 1,000 miles, and on to London, 750 miles. Ship again, this time on the Atlantic, to New York, 3,200 miles, winding up with the Royal Blue Limited, the concluding 200 miles or less.

The total rail travel would be 10,700 miles and water travel 8,900 miles, an aggregate of 19,600 miles. An average of forty miles an hour by train and twenty by ship would insure the transit within thirty days.

Interesting Suit for Damages.

Harper's Bazar.

THE attention of horsewomen is invited to a recent decision of the Supreme Court of Massachusetts, affirming the verdict of the lower court, which directed Mrs. Caroline Swift, of New Bedford, and her daughter Helen, to pay $5,458 damages to Annie E. Adams, of Manchester, New Hampshire. It seems that in August, 1894, there was a "coaching parade" in New Hampshire. Mrs. Swift and her daughter went to it in a carriage drawn by two spirited horses driven by Miss Swift, who was then nineteen years old and weighed 108 pounds. Coming home there was a procession of carriages on the road, and Miss Swift inadvertently ran the pole of her vehicle into the back of the carriage in front of her. This excited her horses so that she couldn't hold them, and they drove the pole against Mrs. Adam's back and injured her. Suit was brought in Mrs. Adam's behalf, and damages as aforesaid were awarded to her.

The appeal seems to have been taken on the ground that Mrs. Swift was not responsible for her daughter's driving, and was improperly included as a defendant. The court held that the excursion was a joint undertaking of the two ladies; that the mother was an equal promoter and manager, and not a mere guest, and that "under her control and direction her daughter, so inexperienced a whip that it might be negligent to allow her to drive on such an occasion, was driving, and driving carelessly." So the verdict of the jury was upheld.

It is a curious fact that colds and kindred diseases are extremely prevalent in hot climates, because the pores of the skin are kept so constantly open. As a consequence, few people escape being afflicted for weeks at a time by some form of these distressing attacks, and a cold once contracted is very hard to cure.

THE "open door" now means an opening through which all the nations can run in and grab whatever they can lay their hands on.—[Indianapolis News.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

ON the 25th ult., the United States troops in Luzon Island began an attack, "in force," upon the Filipinos, advancing northward toward Malolos, which has been the seat of the Filipino government. The Islanders have desperately resisted, and the United States troops have slowly pressed them back. The fighting has continued up to this writing. The dispatches speak with satisfaction of heavy losses of the Filipinos; one from General Otis, on the 26th, says: "Our loss thus far moderate, enemy's heavy;" another from him on the 28th says his troops inflicted "considerable slaughter."

DISPATCHES from Washington state that it is evident that the military plan devised by General Otis, and which he attempted to put into execution on the 25th, failed. It was previously announced from Manila that he expected to capture Aguinaldo, and end the war. A Washington special to the Philadelphia Ledger says: "It is admitted that the failure of General MacArthur to entrap Aguinaldo's forces, by turning their left flank, on the movement from Novaliches to Marilao, is a great disappointment." The result was that the United States troops have been obliged to form one column of advance upon Malolos, and to press forward, step by step. The heat is very great, and the country generally low, often covered with water. The plan of the Filipinos is to resist to the utmost, give way slowly, burn all the towns and villages they are forced to leave, and fall back into the mountains, if Malolos is captured.

A LIST prepared in the office of the Adjutant-General, at Washington, shows the casualties of the United States troops in Manila, since February 4, to be 157 killed and 864 wounded.

Among the killed, on the American side, is Colonel H. C. Egbert, formerly of Philadelphia, who commanded the 22d regiment United States Infantry. He was severely wounded in the fighting before Santiago, in Cuba, last summer, but "declined to give up the army." His family had accompanied him to the Philippines.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY and party left Thomasville, Georgia, on the 27th ult., for Washington, where they arrived on the afternoon of the 28th. The President was the guest of Senator M. A. Hanna, of Ohio, who has a winter home at Thomasville. Visits were paid to Jekyll Island, (owned by a private club), to Jacksonville, and some other places.

A DISPATCH from Washington to the New York Herald, on the 27th ult., says Vice-President Hobart will not again be a candidate, on the Republican national ticket with President McKinley. The renomination of the latter, next year, is assumed. Dispatches within the last fortnight have represented that this subject, and the choice of a candidate in Hobart's place, have received careful consideration during President McKinley's stay with Senator Hanna, at Thomasville, Ga. The Herald dispatch says that it is desired to have "a war hero" on the ticket, in Hobart's place, and that some one conspicuous in the Philippines is being looked for by some.

IT is announced that the "muster-rolls" of the Cuban army "are still in the custody of Senor Rafael Portuondo, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Military Assembly. As a consequence the $3,000,000 sent by the United States to pay the Cuban troops remains in unbroken packages aboard the transport Burnside, at Havana."

A MEETING of citizens of Philadelphia to organize more effectively the popular response to the call by the Czar for the international conference at the Hague, was held on the afternoon of the 24th inst., at the Y. M. C. A. rooms, at 15th and Chestnut streets. There was a good attendance for a preliminary meeting. Judge W. N. Ashman presided. The call for the meeting was signed by over sixty prominent citizens, including five judges, ex-governor Pattison, United States District Attorney James M. Beck, Archbishop Ryan (Roman Catholic), Bishop Whitaker, (Episcopal diocese of Pennsylvania), Isaac H. Clothier, President Sharpless, of Haverford, and others. A permanent organization was effected, with ex-Senator George F. Edmunds as Chairman, and it is hoped that the voice of Philadelphia will soon be more distinctly heard.

THERE were vigorous debates in the Canadian Parliament on the 20th and 21st ult., upon the policy of the Laurier Administration in respect to "reciprocity" with the United States, the Alaskan boundary, etc. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the premier, replied to the attacks made by Sir Charles Tupper, the Conservative leader. He appeared to abandon "reciprocity," and it was inferred from what was said by him and other Government leaders that the Joint High Commission on American and Canadian greatness, which recently adjourned in Washington, would not meet again. Sir Wilfrid deplored the death of the late Representative Nelson Dingley, of Maine (one of the United States Commissioners), and said that "a fairer man never lived."

THERE seems to be much ill feeling over the unsettled Alaskan boundary. A dispatch from Seattle on the 22d ult. represents Governor Brady of Alaska as saying in that city: "The Canadians will surely have a fight on their hands if they try to move the boundary on the Porcupine as they have on the Stickeen and the Lynn Canal passes. Do you think that 2,000 Americans, every one of them well armed, who have gone into a country and taken up claims on what has always been considered American territory will let a handful of Canadian policemen move the boundary line at will? This boundary question is a serious one, and no one can tell how it is going to come out."

THE typhoid fever continues in Philadelphia. There were 563 new cases reported for last week, (ending Third month 25) and 38 deaths, making 5,443 cases, and 496 deaths since the first of the year. The mortality, it will be seen, is slightly over 10 per cent. of the cases. Nothing has been done to improve the water supply. A large majority (twenty-four to thirteen) of Select Council voted, on the 23d ultimo, for the use of $3,200,000, (as proposed for a long time), for this purpose, but a two-thirds vote (twenty-seven yeas) could not be obtained. The whole effort therefore failed, and the legislation will have to be again begun.

ONE triumph of Peace is announced. The Port Arthur Ship Canal was formally opened at Port Arthur, Texas, on the 25th ult. It is 37,000 feet long, and will connect Port Arthur, the southern terminus of the Kansas City, Pittsburg and Gulf railroad, which controls the enterprise, with Sabine Pass, on the Gulf of Mexico. The canal will finally have a uniform depth of from twenty-five to thirty feet, and it is the intention to bring vessels up from the Gulf, thus creating a new outlet for traffic to Mexican, South American, and European ports.

LUCY M. SALMON, professor of history in Vassar College, who was one of the few strangers who witnessed the recent election of President Loubet at Versailles, contributes to the Review of Reviews an interesting description of the event. In the same issue Agnes C. Laut, a writer for the Canadian press, gives a statement of Canada's case before the Anglo-American Joint High Commission, and thus affords us an opportunity to see the points in dispute from the other side.

THE Catholic population of the United States, as given in the official directory of the church, is stated as 9,907,412. There are 12 archbishops, 80 bishops, 2,756 religious clergy, [members of the several "orders," etc.] 8,383 secular or parish clergy; churches and chapels 11,571; 11 universities and 191 colleges for boys. The total number of children in Catholic institutions is 956,784.

PROFESSOR von Holst, the historian, in a recent address in Chicago, showed that the difference between former expansions and that of to-day is that the former territorial acquisitions could and did become flesh of our flesh and spirit of our spirit, while with the Philippines "it is the engrafting of proud flesh upon the body politic by a surgical operation."

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE winter and early spring in the South have been rough and cold. A letter from New Orleans, the middle of the month just closed, says: "Imagine sleet and snow and ice in our climate and with our houses! Imagine the great Mississippi with ice floating from bank to bank for days past the city. Gardens are ruined. Vines which were the growth of years are dead, and rose bushes are so trimmed down that they look like gaunt skeletons. All the gardens look bare and naked though already the lawns are beautiful and the rose bushes are sending forth little sprouts."

—The figures of the American loss in the Philippine fighting, up to about the 18th ult., are stated to be: 104 killed, 25 dead from wounds, 238 dead from disease, and 456 wounded. Total dead 467, total casualties, 923.

—A dispatch from Chicago, 27th, says that practically every vessel at that end of Lake Michigan had been chartered and loaded with grain, awaiting the opening of navigation. The loaded vessels at Chicago and South Chicago held at that date about 9,000,000 bushels of grain.

—Navigation between Detroit and Cleveland was formally opened on the 27th, when a steamer started on the first trip of the year, with 100 passengers. Dispatches from Cleveland and Colchester, Ontario, on that date, said that Lake Erie was clear of ice as far as could be seen.

—It is now announced that no exclusive franchises or concessions will be granted by the United States military authorities in Cuba that are not absolutely necessary. The occupation of the island being only temporary, it is thought to be wiser not to burden the municipalities with debt."

—The Baldwin locomotive works of Philadelphia have recently received orders for 70 locomotives for Russia's Manchuria line. The Westinghouse company, Pittsburg, also has large contracts for the adoption of its brake on all Russian lines.

Do You Know....

that three-fourths of the food value of wheat is bolted out to make flour white? Franklin Mills Flour, A Fine Flour of the Entire Wheat.

As ground by the Franklin Mills, is a little off white; therein is where the richness lies—in its tint. This flour is a brain, bone, nerve and muscle builder—a life giver and sustainer.

If your grocer does not keep Franklin Mills Flour, have him order some for you or send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied. See that the Flour delivered bears our label; avoid substitutes. Booklet mailed free. The genuine made only by the FRANKLIN MILLS CO., LOCKPORT, N. Y.

OUR Pasteur Thermometers
FOR STERILIZING BABY'S FOOD
Mailed to any address for 60 Cents
H. C. BODEN & CO., Manufacturing Opticians,
S. E. Cor. 13th and Walnut Sts.

The Wonderful Golden Rambler Rose

Hardy and bears all the time. A glorious profusion of gold and white roses at same time on same bush. Blooms all summer from June till December. Finest, hardy ever-blooming rose for garden, trellis or veranda. Strong plants on own roots. 15c. each, 2 for 25c. New Floral Guide 124 pages, tells all about 400 other choice flowers. Free. CONARD & JONES CO., Dept. 6, West Grove, Pa.

In one of Miss Muloch's stories she says that "a cheerful heart seeth cheerful things," and gives this incident in proof of it:

A lady and gentleman were in a timber yard situated on the banks of a dirty, foul-smelling river. The lady said, "How good the pine boards smell!"

"Pine boards!" exclaimed the gentleman; "just smell that foul river."

"No, thanks," was the reply, "I prefer to smell the pine boards."

A FOOL may make money, but it needs a wise man to spend it. Remember, it is easier to build two chimneys than to keep one going. If you give all to back and board there is nothing left for the savings bank. Fare hard and work while you are young, and you will have a chance to rest when you are old. A penny saved is a penny earned.

A FEW days ago "our cook" reported a "fuzzy rain" in progress. This morning "the freeze is still falling."—[Laing School Visitor.]

ANY one who calls a citizen of Sierra Leone (Africa) a "nigger" violates the law of the land, and may have to face a suit for damages assessed by a colored jury.

WHEN Queen Elizabeth died, 1603, Lady Scroope dropped a sapphire ring from the palace window to announce the event; her brother hastened with the greatest speed to deliver it to the Scotch prince, James VI., who became James I., of England.

DON QUIXOTE read romances till his wits, By nature weak, became extremely hazy; The modern reader quite collected sits— It is the writers only who go crazy. —[English Paper.]

Compel your dealer to get you Macbeth lamp-chimneys—you can.

Does he want your chimneys to break?

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Black Dress Textures

Our showing of Black Dress Textures is concededly as fine as any ever made in Philadelphia. Judge the prices of all by these few.

All-wool French finish Serge, surah twill, double-width.

Special price, 25 cents a yard.

All-wool Plain Black Challis, usually 40 cents.

Special price, 31 cents a yard.

English Mohair Brilliantine, brilliant lustre, 45 inches wide.

Special price, 50 cents a yard.

All-wool Grenadine Voile, a very desirable light weight fabric, 45 inches wide, excellent value.

Special price, 75 cents a yard.

English Mohair Brilliantine, a rich quality with a brilliant, high lustre, 45 inches wide, the regular $1.00 quality.

Special price, 75 cents a yard.

All-wool Black Cheviot Suiting, the proper weight for Spring dresses, sponged and shrunk, 48 inches wide.

Special price, $1.00 a yard.

Samples sent upon request.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

Dreer's Garden Calendar For 1899
An up-to-date Catalogue of the best new and rare, as well as the cream of the standard varieties, of

Seeds, Plants, Bulbs, Etc.

A handsome book of 168 pages, profusely illustrated, mailed FREE to those who state where they saw this advertisement.

HENRY A. DREER, 714 Chestnut St., Phila., Pa.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873.

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 8, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 14.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XIV.

LOVE keeps out of all strife, and is of God. It never fails, but keeps the mind above all outward things and strife about them. It overcomes evil, and casts out false fears. It is of God, and unites the hearts of all his people together.

GEORGE FOX.

From his letter, written in Third month, 1689, a few months before his death, to Friends at York, (England).

THE HUMAN BROTHERHOOD.

THERE is an unseen cord which binds
The whole wide world together ;
Through every human life it winds,
This one mysterious tether.
It links all races and all lands
Throughout their span allotted :
And death alone unties the strands
Which God himself has knotted.

However humble be your lot,
Howe'er your hands are fettered,
You cannot think a noble thought
But all the world is bettered.
With every impulse, deed, or word,
Wherein love blends with duty,
A message speeds along the cord
That gives the earth more beauty.

Your unkind thought, your selfish deed,
Is felt in farthest places ;
There are no solitudes where greed
And wrong can hide their faces.
There are no separate lives : the chain,
Too subtle for our seeing,
Unites us all upon the plane
Of universal being.—Ella Wheeler Wilcox.

MEXICO, TO-DAY.¹

THOUGH for many hundreds of miles the republic of Mexico adjoins the republic of the United States, it may confidently be said that Mexico is a country about which most Americans are either not informed at all or are seriously misinformed. The volume now under notice is therefore one which ought to be of great use. For it presents, in an attractive and interesting manner, an array of facts about Mexico which its neighbors northward need to know, in order to relieve their present ignorance.

We are apt to suppose that European civilization began in America with the advent of Englishmen on our middle Atlantic coast, early in the seventeenth century. This is a serious error. The Spanish pioneers were in Mexico almost a century earlier. Vera Cruz, "the first [European] town on the American continent," was founded by Cortez in 1519, eighty-eight years before the English came up the James river, and a hundred years plus one before the Mayflower entered Cape Cod Bay. Philadelphia is ridiculously juvenile, founded in 1681, beside a dozen Mexican towns and cities, founded by Cortez and his companions, a century before the time when William Penn's father was born.

We must not only keep facts like these in mind, but some others as well. In the City of Mexico, (founded 1521), were "the cradles of printing, education, art, and organized charity in the New World," says our author. It had the first printing-press in America, set up there in 1536. None reached the English colonies until 1638. The first New World attempt at a newspaper was one begun at the City of Mexico in 1693, the Mercurio Volante, (Flying Mercury). But not only this: "the first American schools, colleges, museums, hospitals, asylums,—even schools and training schools for Indians, and even hospitals for Indians and negroes,"—belong to the same city. It had, in 1803, being then a place of about 140,000 people, an aggregate of 1,100 beds in its hospitals, and Lummis remarks that "certainly no city of ours approaches that proportion to-day." A great new hospital, on the "detached" plan, with thirty-five buildings, fifty feet apart, to cost $800,000, is now building, and a model penitentiary, on the Crofton system, has lately been completed, at a cost of two millions. Lummis doubts if it has its equal anywhere in the United States. (There is not, it may be mentioned, any death penalty in Mexico, except for offenses concerning the army and "brigands," and "irons" on prisoners are not allowed.)

Humboldt pronounced the City of Mexico, when he saw it in his famous visit, at the beginning of the present century, "the handsomest capital in America," and no doubt the praise was deserved; Washington has since then risen out of its beginnings. But the most wonderful thing about the Mexican capital, so far as human effort is concerned, is its great drainage system. It must be remembered that the city, though on top of a mountain plateau, is built in a sink, out of which there is no natural drainage. As early as 1607 a great cutting through the elevated "cordon which rims this fertile bowl" was begun by the Spanish engineers, and resulted in the taga or notch of Nochistongo, which drained northerly into a stream, and is twelve miles long, with an average depth of about 180 feet and an average width of about three hundred. (The railroad from the north enters the city through this cutting.) But in our own day, an entirely new drainage canal has been cut, and it is "the greatest in the world." As remarkable as its dimensions and its construction is the fact that the engineer who devised it, Luis Espinosa, is a Mexican of humble birth, and of few early advantages, and—please note—"largely Indian by blood." He took hold of the work in 1879, and it was completed in 1898. "Through years of discouragement, wherein he sometimes lacked not only money for his army of laborers, but food for his family, the mute brown engineer held his way, like the man he is; and the end has crowned his work." It cost eighteen millions of dollars, "and has been completed without fatalities." It is one of the engineering wonders of the world.

¹ "The Awakening of a Nation. Mexico of To-day." By Charles F Lummis. New York: Harper and Brothers, 1899.

The republic of Mexico really began its railway system since our civil war. It has now about forty railroads, with nearly seven thousand miles of track. The main line, the Mexican Central, connecting with the United States, and running from El Paso, on the Rio Grande river, south to the City of Mexico, was opened in 1884. There are many telegraph lines, and "with the cheapest tariffs in America." The school system has been greatly extended and improved in the last twenty years. In 1896, the central government took direct charge of the subject. "There is now in Mexico," says C. F. Lummis, "no hamlet of one hundred Indians, I believe, which has not its free public school." As to internal peace and good order, a marvelous change has been effected. "Bandits" and "brigands" have disappeared, the roads are safe, the peaceable traveler and the quiet citizen are fully protected. The means by which this great reform has been effected were partly penal, partly persuasive. Evil doers were checked by the "strong hand," and then were given better work to do.

These statements may serve, perhaps, to correct some of our crude conceptions in relation to our Mexican neighbors. But the volume under notice contains many others of equal significance. C. F. Lummis laments that they are so little known, apparently so little cared for, and remarks as to intelligent and sympathetic writers on Mexico that there has been only one Humboldt, one Bandelier, one Janvier—this last being a reference to Thomas A. Janvier, formerly of this city, a well-known litterateur, who has located a number of striking stories in the Mexican field. One class of facts relating to the Mexican people we may refer to here. The vigor, endurance, and industry of the native race are probably underestimated. Humboldt found the Indian tenateros in the silver mines he visited "carrying for six hours a weight ranging from 225 to 350 pounds on their backs, in a very high temperature, ascending eight or ten times, without rest, ladders of 1800 rounds." Such facts may change our ideas that in the tropics even the natives are necessarily enervated. Lummis adds that "to this day it is a common thing to see a Mexican Indian carrying a back-load of 150 pounds, twenty miles to market."

The Mexican Indians have, in fact, furnished many individuals of note. Juarez, the persistent leader of Mexican independence against the French invasion, at the time of our civil war, was of Indian blood. The mother of the present President, Diaz, had a strain of the aboriginal blood, "her grandmother having been a Mixteca." The engineer of the great drainage works, as already mentioned, is nearly a full blood Indian.

Our author describes President Diaz as a very able man. He explains in detail the skillful management by which the country has escaped serious loss through the enhanced valuation of gold as compared with silver—for Mexico is a silver country, producing annually about seventy-five millions of dollars in that metal, and only about six millions in gold. The marvelous growth of manufactures is another interesting feature of the country's development, which C. F. Lummis describes.

CHILD DEVELOPMENT.

BY MARY H. WHITSON, PHILADELPHIA.

THERE is no subject broader, deeper, or higher, more vital, more worthy of our earnest, prayerful consideration than that of child development. When I contemplate the possibilities of the human race, my soul is lost in admiration of its attainable grandeur, till my heart is chilled by a realization of the great gap between what might be and what is.

There are some who tell us there is nothing in heredity, but do we not all tacitly admit that there is? Do we ever expect the child of Chinese parents to be anything but Chinese in appearance and traits? Do we marvel that the child of colored parents has short, curly hair, while that of the Indian child is straight and black?

But, alas, heredity is not all on the physical side. We know too well of the woman who was the ancestor of a hundred criminals. When a few years ago a prize was offered in some section of New York State for the largest family, it was won by the parents of seventeen,—nine of whom were in prison. What a heritage!

What is the root of this wrong condition whereat we are to lay the ax? It is of little use to lop off the branches, so long as the root is thriving and growing. It is of no use to cry out against the darkness: the remedy is to bring in the light. Perhaps our war against an evil only increases that evil by making it a prominent thought in the minds of ourselves and of others. Instead, learn the higher way, walk in it, and endeavor to show the light unto others.

Where is the beginning point? Napoleon said we must educate the grandmothers. A woman at the Mothers' Congress was heard to say that she was so sorry she could not have been her own great grandmother. The progress of the future rests with the parents and the teachers, for they are making and training the parents of coming generations. The greatest responsibility rests with the parents. Could the solemnity of their position but be made clear to them, could they but realize themselves co-creators with God, and that it is theirs to give humanity a push up or down, would so many enter the marriage relation thoughtlessly as they do now, absorbed in the joy of close communion with a congenial spirit, reluctantly yielding themselves to the cares of parenthood, negligent of the claims of the immortal soul which has been entrusted to them?

Delicate plants which grow up, flourish and bloom or fade and die before our eyes have taught us how careful and wise must be our treatment of them, and much information is scattered abroad concerning them, and the possible perfection to which they may be brought. The breeding of domestic animals has become a science, and there are men who are more concerned about the pedigree of their horses than they are about that of their own children and grandchildren.

But the science of human growth and development is beginning to claim popular attention. There has apparently been a prevailing opinion that any man or woman has a right and the ability to assume the position of a parent. Would you intrust delicate chemicals with one who has not made a study of chemistry? Would you expect a well-trained dog from an owner who only fed and sheltered him? Yet there are parents who do no more, or worse.

The marvel is that humanity is so admirable as it is. Much honor is due our forefathers, especially our foremothers, that we stand in culture and goodness where we do to-day. The question that concerns us is: Can better results be accomplished? Can the present and coming generations be made to realize the infinite possibilities of the race, and to work for its advancement? Since knowledge is power, why do we not urge the greatest knowledge along the line which is most vital, and teach and preach that which will produce the greatest and most lasting results?

Workers along all lines of philanthropy have come to realize that their watchword must be "formation," not "reformation." "If it is worth the effort of a life-time to lift a fellow-creature out of a pit of degradation, how much more worth while is it to prevent him from falling into the pit."

Those who take upon themselves the responsibility of bringing a human being into the world owe that being the best inheritance they can possibly give him. A child's first birth-right is a sound body. If men and women cannot bring forth healthy children they have no right to bring forth any.

How many of our coming fathers and mothers are preparing themselves, consciously or unconsciously, for even this physical side of paternity. Is the boy keeping himself free from the vile habit of using tobacco, which, if indulged in, will warp his own nature, poison the body of the pure companion whose life he links to his, and handicap his offspring at their start in the race of life? Does he know that he dare not tamper with alcoholic beverages, that if he does he is laying a pitfall which may, in spite of his weakened efforts to save, wreck all he holds most dear? And does he know the sacredness of his bodily organization, and the awful danger that lies in its abuse?

Is he pure in body, mind, and soul? Does he realize that his daily thoughts are not only building up his own body now, but that they may be reflected on the next generation, and, wavelike, increase in ever-widening circles through eternity? Do his parents consider this a part of the education they should give him, that it is the part which will count to the end of time? Or do they feel that this subject must not be mentioned, and leave all to chance, as was the case with most of themselves?

And the maiden,—does she realize that the framework given her must have the care and the freedom which will give it the best and fullest development? Does she know that there are higher ends to be attained than the narrow, mistaken, often harmful, ones dictated by fickle fashion? Does she realize that heart culture is more than brain power, great and desirable as is the latter, and that the school for heart culture is omnipresent, offering its lessons and opportunities for practice every moment and in every place?

Then, when called upon to decide a life question, does she consider that the little word she is about to say is a bond between her and him, and God? that she has chosen not only a husband for herself but most probably a father for her children? And has she chosen him accordingly?

Then do that young husband and wife religiously take up the cares and duties of life? Do they know that their daily acts and thoughts, and the real characters which their earlier years have formed, are being imprinted upon material more plastic than wax and more enduring than marble? Do they know that they can almost create the future of their child before it sees the light of day? They can make it the musician, the scientist, the artist, or the nothing but mediocrity,—alas! worse—they can make it the criminal.

Then when the child is laid in their arms, do they look upon it as a sacred charge,—a temple which is to be furnished and ornamented for the habitation of a king? Having done the utmost that knowledge and circumstances will permit to give a sound physical basis to their child, and by pure thoughts and lofty ideals to create those tendencies which work for righteousness, their next task is to direct and nourish the expanding faculties. Can any work be more interesting, more worthy of our highest care?

Why do mothers shrink from the duty,—nay, why do they deprive themselves of the privilege of being their children's companion and guide? Surely, it must be because they are ignorant of what may be the result of intrusting it to others, or of what might be the result of their own intelligent, loving care. Learn a boy's or a man's opinion of women and you will know what kind of a mother he has had.

(Conclusion to Follow.)

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 16.—FOURTH MONTH 16.

MOSES.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Who hath made man's mouth? . . . Is it not I, the Lord? Now, therefore, go, and I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shall speak.—Exodus, iv., 11, 12.

Scripture Reading.—Exodus, iii., 1-18.

THERE is a saying to the effect that great crises produce great men. It would, perhaps, be equally true to say that great men produce great crises. It was the appearance among the enslaved Hebrews of a natural leader of men that made possible their escape from the cramped and narrow life of unrequited toil and from final race degradation.

The early life of Moses is hidden in a mass of tradition. The reported order of Pharaoh that all male infants of the Hebrews should be killed, is very improbable. Slaves were too much in demand for such a diminution of the supply to be encouraged by the greatest master of slaves. There may be a foundation for the story in some temporary and local order, but there is no evidence on the point except the narrative in Genesis. The story of the method adopted to save the infant Moses finds a curious parallel in the story of Sargon I. of ancient Chaldea, 2,000 years earlier. It is told in a fragment of a contemporary narrative: "I am Sargon, the mighty king of Akkad. My mother, of noble race, bore me in secret. She put me in a basket and closed the opening with pitch. She cast me into the river, which carried me to Akki, the gardener." As the Hebrews came from the land of this ancient king, this tradition may well have been preserved among them, and may have suggested to the mother of Moses the plan told of in the Bible, or the tradition may have been transferred to the great leader by the common process by which such legends concentrate about great men.

All Jewish tradition agrees that Moses was associated in his early life with the rulers of Egypt. The Bible narrative says little of this. Josephus, on the other hand, indicates that he was of the king's own household, and was even in line for the royal succession. He tells us that Moses was physically very beautiful, so that workmen forsook their tools to gaze at him. In the Acts (vii., 20) Moses is spoken of as "exceeding fair"; and again in Hebrews (xi., 25), as "a proper child." His position in the king's household is also suggested in Hebrews, where it is stated that he "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter." Stephen says (Acts vii., 22) that he was "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians." The probable source of his learning would be the great university at On, not far from the southern borders of Goshen. There he would be brought in contact not only with the learning but also with the religion of the Egyptians. Indeed the religion and the teaching were closely related, and perhaps many of the teachers were priests also.

It is of great interest, therefore, to know, as we do in part from Egyptian books, that the "wisdom" of the Egyptian priests was a secret religion, not revealed to the masses. Exactly what this was cannot be known, but it seems likely that the central idea was the belief in one God, and that it included principles of science and of morality. It is striking to notice that the forty-two mortal sins from which the soul of the Egyptians had to clear itself—in the next world—as a condition of happy immortality, embrace nearly the whole Mosaic law.

In all his association with the oppressors of his people, Moses had not lost sight of his origin, having that strong sense of race which is especially characteristic of the Jews of this day. On one occasion, seeing a fellow-countryman cruelly beaten, he interfered in his behalf, slew the Egyptian and hid his body in the sand. It may be said that the hiding of the body was, perhaps, in the eyes of the Egyptians, a more heinous offense than the murder. The latter destroyed the physical life only, but the former would prevent a happy life in the future, since, the body not being preserved, the soul was forever barred out of heaven.

Moses fled to the wilderness of Sinai, where he became the son-in-law of one of the priest-princes of the desert. He took up the life of the nomadic shepherd, which had been that of his ancestors, and there were brought to bear upon him the influences of solitude, of rugged surroundings, of wide, empty spaces. No doubt the knowledge of the geography of the Sinaitic peninsula, acquired during this period, served him well in the after time. No doubt, also, the wild impressiveness of nature round about him worked upon his soul and strengthened his belief in God. Perhaps in the day-long reflections of his shepherd life it was made plain to him that the mysterious Deity, of whom he was taught in secret by the Egyptian scribes, was no other than the Jehovah whose name was still whispered among those of the enslaved Hebrews who were not wholly crushed under the burden of heavy servitude; no other than the God who revealed himself to Abraham, saying, "I am the Almighty God; walk before me and be thou perfect"; who went with Jacob in his flight from home and whispered into his sleep, "I am the Lord God of Abraham, thy father." The associations of the Egyptian court faded away in the presence of a King mightier far, who swung the sun in majestic courses, who thundered upon the mountains, who smiled in the sunrise, and who murmured the sweet tones of fatherhood from wayside springs and in morning zephyrs. Here, in the desert, the great leader came to feel that—

"Earth's crammed with heaven,
And every common bush's afire with God."

With this new sense of Divine presence, there was borne in upon him also a mission. His people were in the chains of the oppressor indeed, but they were also in the chains of forgetfulness. They had forgotten the God of their fathers, who had been the friend of their ancestors and the protector of their race. As the mission was made clear to him he shrank from it. It was not easy to go to the court, where he had been honored, as the representative of a group of despised slaves. The task seemed too great for him. "I am not eloquent, . . . but slow of speech." So do many men of many days thrust aside their duties in a pretense of a humility which is really unfaith—the real infidelity. But the hesitation in the case of the Hebrew was not for long. The mission forced itself upon him—"have not I the Lord?" Perhaps no circumstance in Bible history, or in any other, touches us more nearly than this shrinking from duty and responsibility on the part of the future hero. We feel our kinship with him in his weakness. And in time of crisis, when the new duties of our new occasions press around us, shall we not seek the same help?—"Have not I the Lord?"

TRUE dignity abides with him alone who, in the silent hour of inward thought, can still suspect, and still revere himself in lowliness of heart.—Wordsworth.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS,
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 16.—FOURTH MONTH 16.

JESUS TEACHING HUMILITY.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I have given you an example.—
John, xiii., 15.

Read the Scripture, John, xiii., 1-17.

REVISED VERSION.

WE have come now to the gathering in the "upper room" in Jerusalem. After the anointing at Bethany, on the evening of the Sabbath, April 1, important events occurred, which are passed over by the lesson, but which should be read in the scripture account. On the day (First-day) following the supper at Bethany, Jesus entered Jerusalem, and many of the "common people" who went to meet him, waved palm branches, and shouted his praises. Next day, he cleansed the temple, and the day following taught there. On the evening of that day he left the temple for the last time and went with his disciples to the Mount of Olives, where he spoke the words recorded in Matthew, twenty-fourth chapter, (verses 1-25; 46). The following day, (fourth of the week), he spent in retirement; next day he sent Peter and John to Jerusalem to prepare the passover supper, and toward evening followed with the other disciples. Then, at the supper, occurred the incident which is made the subject of the present lesson.

The Passover feast was, and is, an annual feast of the Jews. They regard it as commemorating the escape of their forefathers in Egypt, when, according to the account, the death angel, smiting the first-born children of the Egyptians, "passed over" the homes of the Israelites, which had been marked with the blood of the paschal lamb. The observance was ordered by the Mosaic system, as recorded in Exodus, xii., 24, 26, 27. The celebration occurred on the evening of the 14th day of the month called Abib, or Nisan, the first month of the sacred year. Every householder ate with his family a lamb killed by the priest, which must be served up without breaking the bones. Other rules of the kind were strictly observed.

"The company for a single lamb varied from ten to twenty; first the cup of consecration, over which the master of the house had pronounced a blessing, was drunk; then hands were washed, and the meal served, consisting of bitter herbs, cakes of unleavened bread, a sauce called haroseth, made from dates, raisins, and vinegar, the paschal lamb, and the flesh of subsidiary (Deuteronomic) sacrifices. The master of the house dipped a morsel of unleavened bread into the haroseth, and ate it, and a similar 'sop' was given to every one present. Afterwards the paschal lamb was eaten, and three other cups of wine were drunk at intervals, with thanksgivings and singing of the Hallel (Psalms cxiii.-cxviii.)."

The incident of the washing of the disciples' feet may very well be studied and pondered. It has two striking features for all who profess or desire to follow Christ. The first is the lesson of the humility of Jesus. The second is the manner in which professing Christians, (with a very few exceptions), while they mostly agree to exalt the Supper, and make it a "sacrament," ignore the Washing, and pay it no regard.

The lesson of humility should sink deeply into our hearts. It was plainly the purpose of the Master to make it impressive. The disposition of all men, his disciples not excepted, is to seek honor, distinction, authority. There had already been (Luke, ix., 46) a "reasoning" among the disciples, "which of them should be greatest," and Jesus had told them, (v. 48,) "he that is least among you all, the same is great." And again, as Luke relates, (xxii., 24) the same "contention" arose at this very meeting in the "upper room." Now, as they were assembled for the last time, Jesus rose from the supper which they had been eating, took a towel and fastened it about him, poured water into a basin, and began to wash the disciples' feet, and to wipe them with the towel. And when Peter vehemently protested, Jesus declared, "If I wash thee not, thou hast no part with me." Finally he said, "If I, then, the Lord and Master have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another's feet. For I have given you an example that ye also should do as I have done to you." He had performed for them the most humble, menial service. A traveler in the East has his feet washed in the house of his entertainer by a slave, or some of the inferior servants. Jesus wished to set them an example of humility which they would not forget. "I have given you an example," he said.

We do not believe that an ordinance, for all mankind in all time, was thus established. We believe that the lesson here taught is that of sincere and true humility. Whoever does a kindly act, in the right spirit—not with condescension, not feeling it a stooping, or a descent—is washing his brother's feet. The Pope, at Rome, once a year goes through the ceremony of publicly washing the feet of twelve old beggars, who are brought in for the purpose, and while we are not justified in assuming that he does this as an act of spiritual pride, it can hardly be said to accord with the general pomp and splendor of his surroundings. The act is one of those whose merit absolutely depends upon its being done in spirit and in truth. It must be one truly of Christian humility. And Christian humility has ways of expression beyond number.

The inconsistency of insisting upon the Supper as an "ordinance" divinely established, while rejecting the Washing needs only to be pointed out.

THE DOUKHOBOR EXILES IN SIBERIA.

Manchester, Eng., Guardian.

SOME account was recently given of the banishment in Ninth month, 1897, of thirty Doukhobors of conscription age to the region of the river Notora, a desert in the Yakoutsk Province of Siberia. The whole winter of 1897-8 these exiles had to live in a Toungouz urta (cabin), which they bought from these nomadic natives, and ultimately improved and somewhat enlarged. Still the cold in this dwelling was so intense that its inhabitants had to sleep the whole winter in felt boots and sheepskin overcoats. The crowding and lack of daylight (an urta has no regular windows, inasmuch as no glass could be procured in the place) were additional trials. The store of victuals the settlers brought with them was soon nearly exhausted, and the Doukhobors had to apply to the Governor of the Yakoutsk Province for permission to leave their settlement in search of work, as otherwise they would have to die from starvation. The permit was given, and on Second month 14, 1898, twenty of the Doukhobors went to the nearest villages of sectarians of a very different creed from their own, called Skoptsi, who gave them exceedingly low wages, in fact only just enough to keep them alive. The Government allowance, at first denied for the year 1898, was finally granted, but only to the amount of twopence a day per man; yet this money, accumulated, was now their only resource for procuring flour, together with some butter and salt, for the community at Notora.

The twelve who remained there (ten of the original settlers and two sectarians of a similar denomination ordered to join them from other places of exile), did not waste their time in the absence of their comrades. They prepared all the timber necessary for the building of a house, sawed a great deal of it into boards, and prepared a stretch of land for future ploughing. This was begun as soon as the climate would permit—that is, in Fifth month—with two ploughs, one drawn by the only horse which they possessed, the other by ten Doukhobors. Barley, rye, and potatoes were sown, and the crop was comparatively satisfactory.

Soon after the return of the twenty settlers who had been earning their living at the village of the Skoptsi, a new party of exiled Doukhobors arrived at Notora, numbering forty-two persons. Thus the number of people to be accommodated and maintained in that wilderness was more than doubled, while the means for accommodation remained as poor as ever. So it was decided by the community that a party of twenty should again leave the settlement, to diminish the number of "mouths," and earn some money. This time they were more fortunate. As it was harvest time, they were paid over two pounds a month each. Meanwhile the remaining settlers at Notora, who had now five horses in their possession, undertook the clearing of a portion of the primeval forest for agricultural purposes. The work was, perhaps, harder than labor in the mines; still the Doukhobors were so far successful as to get ready twenty-seven acres of new arable land. With the setting in of the summer they gathered in a crop of hay, and in the autumn of 1898 they had their first winter sowing, comprising three hundred and sixty pounds of rye. At the same time the building was pushed on vigorously. But the position of the Doukhobors—their isolation from the civilized world, the wildness of the place, the severity of the climate—was not very much better than that of Nansen on an ice-bound stretch of Arctic land, without his wealth of modern appliances for coping with the severity of nature. And yet, owing to untiring energy and courage, that band of noble-minded, though simple men, much exhausted by previous imprisonment and trials, torn from their families, contrived to establish a real outpost of civilization in a savage wilderness.

Last Eighth month the Doukhobors received permission to go in search of work and wages as far as the town of Yakoutsk, and a party of fifteen again availed themselves of it. Their journey was exceedingly trying. Even in the Eighth month the nights in this part of Siberia are frosty, and the poor men had to sleep without any shelter, sometimes drenched through. They had to go for twenty days in two small, over-loaded boats along the rivers Lena and Aldan, mostly dragging the boats by means of ropes, tumbling down into the river when the unsteady soil of the bank gave way under their feet, and having sometimes to wade in cold water. The store of bread they had with them was soon exhausted, while it was impossible to procure any on the way. Once in Yakoutsk, the poor Doukhobors were much disappointed; they were not allowed to stay in the town, and had to go for work to the neighboring villages of the Skoptsi, to whom they engaged themselves for the whole of this winter for rather low wages.

The Notora Doukhobors are aware of the emigration of their brethren to Cyprus and Canada. Very naturally they manifest the greatest interest in this arrangement, and dream of being permitted to join the emigrants. It is, however, very doubtful whether the permission will ever be granted, as they are all of the conscription age, while the Tzar's government seems to be firm in enforcing military service among them, or, if impossible, to replace it by exile for the same term—eighteen years.

NO YIELDING TO FATALISM!

From an address by Senator Caffery, of Louisiana, at Boston.

OUR simple-minded ancestors left the shores of the Old World with the set purpose of living in a New World of freedom. They builded, in the course of time, a Government whose corner stone rests upon "the consent of the governed." They fought against the country of their origin with this declaration as the cardinal principal of their national life. They won. They have grown into a prosperity and power as marvelous as they are solid. They have, into every State government, erected beneath the folds of their starry banner, incorporated this living principle of self-government. They have widened their borders so as to embrace a vast extent of practically coterminous territory, and erected it into sovereign States, where this self-governing principle is recognized and enforced.

All this has been the work of human agency. With the same deliberation and resolve with set purpose that characterized the Pilgrim Fathers of this glorious old State, and the chivalric cavaliers, who planted the first colony at Jamestown, have we gone on building and making State governments, all moulded and fashioned on the principle of the Declaration of Independence. Here is not the destiny or evolution of events which no man could control, but the legitimate results of patriotic, intelligent action! Here is the fruition of the hopes of enlightened patriotism and brave hearts! Our ancestors and their descendants have controlled events! Events have not controlled them. Not until the fires of Liberty cease to burn; not until our race forgets its inheritance of freedom; not until that "eternal vigilance, which is its price," sleeps on its post, bedrugged with imperialism and expansion and all the parasites and crawling things of tyranny and empire, will this energizing, essential, vital, principle leave our breasts and cease to be a governing principle of our republic. When that time comes, Mr. Chairman, let the destiny that overtakes the degenerate, the power-loving, the worshippers of Mammon, the followers of Moloch, overtake us, as surely it will overtake us. The principle of self-government is our Coliseum. While it stands, our republic shall stand—when it falls, "Liberty shall perish from the earth."

THE MENACE OF MILITARISM.

The Advocate of Peace (Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood, editor), Boston, Mass.

BUT the contest with militarism must be carried on, not simply to save Anglo-Saxon civilization from its worst and most degrading form, but that it may be driven from every country in Europe and all the peoples of the old world set free from its fetters. Anglo-Saxon freedom cannot be saved, unless we can at the same time save the rest of the earth. It is a shame, for whose description there is no sufficient adjective in the language, that after nineteen centuries of Christianity there should be any country on the globe calling itself Christian where an upright, industrious, Godfearing people like the Doukhobors cannot live in security of life and property. Russia is not the only military despotism. The Doukhobors could not live without persecution in Germany, or France, or Austria, or Italy.

It will be a greater shame still when it shall come to pass, if it shall ever come to pass, that there shall be no refuge for such a people under the British or the American flag. But this will surely come to pass, unless the friends of civil and religious liberty, the friends of peace, singly and unitedly stand to their post and everywhere raise the cry of warning. The contest with the tyranny of militarism is growing steadily more pronounced. Even the Czar's peace trumpet has aroused the enemy to new activity nearly everywhere in Europe. They are greatly mistaken who suppose that this hoary evil will die easily. Like every other organized evil, it spreads and strengthens itself continually, and it will one day lay its hand again upon the Doukhobors in their new home, and upon many others too, if the friends of liberty and peace are not awake to the tremendous responsibilities to-day resting upon them.

SUFFERING is a wonderful fertilizer to the roots of character. He who has not suffered lacks richness of life in his inmost being. He who has not profited by suffering has not made such growth in character as God has proffered him the opportunity of attaining to. When God calls us to suffer, God calls us to gain and grow thereby.—Sunday School Times.

A GOOD deed is never lost. He who sows courtesy reaps friendship, and he who plants a kindness gathers love. Whatsoever a man soweth, that shall he also reap.—Selected.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

PLEASANT MEMORIES.

EACH day brings its own task. Each task accepted, each opportunity fulfilled, may be a step forward to a higher life, and the more elevated our spiritual vision the nearer it brings us to that heaven toward which we all aspire, and we should try to live—

"For the cause that lacks assistance,
For the wrong that needs resistance,
For the future in the distance,
And the good that we can do."

I am frequently most thankful for the prophets, chamber, supplied in the days of prosperity. How many beautiful thoughts are laid up in the storehouse of sacred memory, through the means of the happy times when the good, the gifted, the weary, and worn, paused in our home and left with us treasures of heart and intellect to enrich our lives for many days. Truly it is bread of life, nourishment that is satisfying, continuing to enrich the journey towards the setting sun of existence.

M. J. G.

THE POWER OF BELIEF.

From a Private Letter.

I HAVE come to the conclusion that the saying, "As a man thinketh so is he," is a positive truth. Whatever we positively believe takes possession of us. The Salvation Army soldier believes his soul is saved from hell through the blood of Jesus, and it makes a new man of him. The Friend believes he may be led and guided by the Divine "Light within," and yielding to this belief, he obeys, and his faith is justified; he is a new creature . . . and so it is with all believers. They are what they believe.

I know from my own experience, that when I believe I can do a thing then I can do it; when I believe I cannot do it I cannot. So it behooves us to be sure that our beliefs are "consistent with right reason," as John Woolman says.

A NATION baptized by the memory of Abraham Lincoln, the great emancipator of the slaves, must find the secret of how to avoid forging shackles of economic slavery for its own children. Triumphant democracy cannot wear the helmet of the war god. Aggression cannot be its temper. It must be a prince of peace. Militarism shall have no apologists and prophets among a free people. The plow, and not the sword, is the emblem of the people's consecration to the ideals of liberty.—E. G. Hirsch.

WE are in danger of removing some of the most valuable safeguards of society through excess of sympathy. We are inclined to shift the responsibility for all personal failure, for the folly and wickedness of men, from the individual to society. Society—that is, all men thinking and feeling together—has its duties; the duty of sympathy, of mutual protection, and mutual service. But society has no duty to the individual which absolves him from responsibility for his own acts.—Christian Register.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 8, 1899.

VALUING SOCIETY MEMBERSHIP.

THE question often arises, as to whether Friends who have come to their inheritance of membership in the Society by reason of their birth, sufficiently value the privilege. There has been much discussion on this point and it never has been definitely settled as to the real value of such membership. But it is generally conceded that the custom is a wise one, and the problem of its value largely depends upon parental example and training. If parents show a love for their connection with our Religious Society, and a reverence for its principles, and without austerity, observe, and expect the observance, of its reasonable requirements, most children will value their birthright and be loyal to the Society.

A Friend,—whose family of five children were, after arriving at maturity, most zealous Friends,—was asked the secret of the training that produced such a result. The query was a surprise, but after a few moments of thought the reply came, "As parents we always manifested our love and interest in all the things pertaining to the Society, and without severity expected of them attachment to what we so valued, and we have not been disappointed."

It is, however, often found to be the case, that membership is not greatly valued until some separation from amongst Friends occurs, perhaps occasioned by marriage and removal from Friendly communities. Then the slumbering love is aroused to consciousness and is ever after maintained, even when there is seldom opportunity to manifest it. Such feelings our Society should foster, as it now endeavors to do by its efforts on behalf of Isolated Friends, and we hope more care will be taken to retain in membership those whose interests in life lead them apart from Friends. A recent letter from one who had been unwisely counselled to withdraw from Friends, as she was going to marry one not a Friend and go from amongst them, pathetically says: "I wish I might be among Friends in meeting work and worship, and although my name is no longer on the record, yet at heart and in feeling I am a thorough Friend. I wish the time would come when the custom will be overcome, of having to resign if married out of meeting. Those of other denominations intermarry, yet do not have to be cast aside."

This time is happily here, and those leaving us are retained to carry their early influences into other fields; and there should be, and no doubt is, a fostering care felt over such in their respective meetings, that follows them and keeps them in close touch with their religious home.

But, we repeat it, with the parents must largely rest the responsibility of valuing a birthright membership. If they are careless and indifferent, and do not themselves value their Friendly privileges, or if they give their strength and support to other organizations, or do not interest themselves in any religious matters, the Society will have little hold upon their children and they in turn may lose a goodly inheritance; the Society itself, being composed of its members, should work together for the good of the whole. If all realize this and unite their forces, our body will be so enriched and vigorous, that not only our children, but our children's children, will gladly proclaim themselves as Friends.

A FRIEND at Poughkeepsie, N. Y., has sent us a pamphlet giving information concerning the Navajo Indian Mission Hospital, at Fort Defiance, Arizona, and appealing for aid for it. The pamphlet is sent out by the "Westchester Branch of the Women's Auxiliary of the Diocese of New York," the treasurer of which is Eunice J. Titus, Rye, N. Y.

The Navajo Indians, some eighteen thousand in number, are probably the largest tribe of native Americans in the United States. Their large reservation, a wild and arid region, is on the line of New Mexico and Arizona, lying partly in each Territory. They have seen hard times, and like most other tribes have suffered at the hands of the whites. (Recently, Mormons and others have been endeavoring to crowd them away from the pasture and water to which they drive their flocks.) The hospital at Fort Defiance is a noble work, in charge of Miss Thackara, a former teacher in the United States Indian service, and Dr. Mary E. P. Harper. The former directed the building of the hospital, and it was opened in Third month, 1897; the latter joined her in the summer of 1898.

THE place of publication of Young Friends' Review has been transferred from Coldstream, Canada, to New York City, and Henry W. Wilbur has taken editorial charge, assisted by Samuel P. Zavitz and Edgar M. Zavitz, of Coldstream, who have so faithfully carried on the paper since its establishment. The Review is issued monthly, at 75 cents a year. The first issue since the transfer is that for the present month, and it appears in an enlarged form.

WE are glad to know that Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood, of Boston (secretary of the American Peace Society), is expecting to visit The Hague during the sittings of the Disarmament Conference. His present plan is to sail about the 9th of Fifth month, and to remain at The Hague during the Conference.

THE regular circulation of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER was never quite so great as at present. (We have sometimes printed a rather larger edition, when we were sending out a considerable number of "sample copies.") The edition this week is 3,850.

In considering the persecutions which the Doukhobors suffered in Russia for their peace principles, it must be remembered—as Dr. Trueblood says in the Advocate of Peace—that the laws of the other Continental countries would be as harsh. They “could not live without persecution in Germany, or France, or Austria, or Italy.” Militarism has its foot upon the people of those countries the same as in Russia.

MARRIAGES.

PHIPPS—BOWNE.—At the residence of the bride's mother, Third month 29, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Joel H. Phipps, of Chester, Pa., son of the late Elias H. and Edith S. Phipps, of Plymouth Meeting, Pa., and Nellie Bowne, daughter of Marietta and the late Edward L. Bowne, of Mt. Holly, N. J.

DEATHS.

ALLEN.—Third month 30, 1899, Harrison Allen, Jr., only son of Julia C. and the late Dr. Harrison Allen, of Philadelphia, in his 25th year.

COOK.—Entered into rest, Third month 29, 1899, at the residence of her son-in-law, William L. Fussell, Germantown, Pa., Hannah Somers Cook, widow of Dr. Charles Cook, of Jersey City, N. J., and daughter of the late Jacob and Hannah Ballinger, of Philadelphia.

CORNELL.—Suddenly, at his home, Sparta, Ontario, Third month 19, 1899, William Cornell, aged 78 years.

He attended First-day morning meeting, as usual, and, in about an hour, after returning home, passed peacefully away.

JONES.—Second month 14, 1899, at the home of her sister, D. Alice Branda, Scranton, Pa., Gertrude Jones; a valued member of Clear Creek Executive Meeting, Ohio.

JONES.—On Second-day, Third month 27, 1899, Thomas W. Jones, of Neiffer, Montgomery county, Pa., in his 84th year.

Interment at Darby Friends' ground.

LIGHTCAPP.—In Philadelphia, Third month 25, 1899, Florence, daughter of Caroline K. and the late Thomas J. Lightcapp, aged 18 years; a member of Girard Avenue Friends' First-day School, Philadelphia.

PAXSON.—At the home of her son, Schuylkill Haven, Pa., Third month 25, 1899, Louisa Heston Paxson, widow of John J. Paxson, formerly of Philadelphia, and daughter of Edward Heston (founder of Hestonville, Philadelphia), aged 97 years and 4 months.

PUSEY.—In Wilmington, Del., on Seventh-day, Third month 25, 1899, Sarah W. Pusey, widow of Joshua L. Pusey, in her 81st year.

SANDS.—At her home in Buckingham, Pa., Third month 24, 1899, Rachel B., widow of James B. Sands, in her 91st year.

Interment from Buckingham Meeting.

SIMMONS.—At his home in Simmontown, Lancaster county, Pa., Second month 7, 1899, Robert Barclay Simmons, in his 88th year.

This aged and valued friend, though not a Friend by membership, was a regular attender at both our meeting and First-day School at Sadsbury, and in the essentials that go to make up the true Friend he was surely one. The purity and simplicity of his life, his integrity, and scrupulous honesty in the smallest detail of business, won for him the respect of every one.

His parents were Robert and Hannah Simmons, and he lived all his life in the house in which he died. His last sickness was the first and only real sickness he had ever known, and this was not a protracted one. Only three First-days was he absent from our meeting.

Though age had dulled his hearing, and he was unable to hear much that was said in meeting or First-day school, he often said that “he felt it good to be there,” and he was remarkably punctual in his attendance, often coming in very inclement weather.

He had a love for the beautiful, and a fine taste for poetry, of which he had an almost exhaustless store in his memory, and almost always gave as his sentiment in First-day school some beautiful lines that he had learned years ago from one of the old poets.

Farewell, aged and honored friend! Long will we miss thee from thy accustomed seat, but the influence of thy pure and simple life remains with us—a sacred legacy which nothing can take from us.

W.

SPEAKMAN.—At his home, 937 E. street, S. W., Washington, D. C., Third month 23, 1899, of spinal meningitis, Enoch C. Speakman, aged 70 years.

He was the son of Jesse and Margaret Speakman, of Chester county, Pa., and for the past sixteen years made his home in Washington.

For fifty years he has been connected with the Pennsylvania Railroad as bridge constructor. His employers and those with whom he was associated held him in the highest esteem; his character being straightforward, sincere, and kindly.

Always associated with Friends, a few years ago, he became a member of the Washington Meeting, on I street, N. W. He seldom missed the hour of worship; coming and going in that peculiarly quiet and unassuming way that characterized the simplicity of the man. Enoch was a diligent student of the Bible, and loved best the character and writings of Paul. It was his wish that he might be able to say with Paul, “I have fought a good fight, I have finished my course, I have kept the faith.” He was confined to his bed but a few days, and at the close joyfully said, “I am ready.” Thus ending a truly good and beautiful life with a courageous, hopeful death.

Enoch Speakman was a faithful friend, a devoted husband, and loving father. He leaves a wife and seven children, four sons and three daughters, to mourn his loss; also two sisters, Elizabeth Wilson, and Mary H. Speakman, of Philadelphia.

M.

VICKERS.—Third month 25, 1899, at his residence in Baltimore, of paralysis, William M. Vickers, aged 77 years; a member and Elder of Baltimore Monthly Meeting.

He leaves three children, who deeply feel the loss of a devoted father, of whom it can be truly said, “none knew him but to love him.” His sweet, quiet disposition and genial manner made his home a pleasant place to visit for the aged and the young. He loved his friends, and his serene countenance and dignified bearing in his accustomed place in our religious assemblies was as an inspiration. A consistent Friend, living a life of purity and uprightness, we have cause to feel he has found an entrance into that “City whose walls are salvation, and whose gates are praise.”

For some time, failing health caused anxiety in the hearts of his family and friends, but rallying at times and still attending to business when able, it was not thought the end was so near, but suddenly, while enjoying the visit of a married daughter, the blow came, and for one week he lay upon a bed of suffering, at the end of which he quietly yielded up his life to him who gave it.

After a solemn meeting at his late home, where sweet and truthful tributes to his life were given, his remains were interred in Friends' cemetery near the city.

P.

TAYLOR.—In Philadelphia, Third month 25, 1899, Edward Taylor, son of the late Lowndes and Rachel Taylor, of West Goshen, Chester county, Pa., in the 70th year of his age.

WALKER.—Near Johnsville, Bucks county, Pa., suddenly, on Sixth-day, Third month 31st, 1899, Samuel C. Walker, in his 79th year.

Three weeks before his death he fell from a mow in his barn, and although but a short distance, broke his shoulder blade, and put his shoulder out of place. The doctors attended to the case, and he seemed to be doing as well as could be expected till about 8 o'clock on Sixth-day evening, when after being helped out of bed and to his chair he suddenly died without any warning.

A good neighbor, honest and upright in all his dealings, he will be greatly missed.

B.

MORRIS G. COOKE.

In the INTELLIGENCER Third month 25 is a notice of the death of Morris G. Cooke, son of William R. and Mary (Heikes) Cooke, at the German Hospital, Philadelphia.

This young man and one of his sisters were engaged in business in our city; they both embraced every opportunity of attending our religious meetings that offered, and enjoyed doing so.

The morning following Morris's death, the family in which he had boarded, feeling keenly his death, desired, before the remains were taken to his parents' home for burial, that they might be taken there, that his friends and associates in business might have the sad satisfaction of once more looking on his face. This request was granted, and a strong feeling being expressed that this might be one of God's opportunities among Morris's young friends, notices were accordingly sent to the few Friends within reach, and on the evening of Third month 19 a meeting was held, which was characterized by its solemnity.

Testimonies were borne to the life he lived while amongst us; his young friends were exhorted to follow him as he had endeavored to follow the Light given him by our Divine Father, that they might be able, as he was, to approach the end of earthly life without a fear. All were entreated to listen to and obey the voice of God in the soul, and comfort was offered the bereaved family, as the All-Father inspired those present to speak.

A. K. W.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

NOTES FROM SPARTA, ONTARIO.

ON the 5th of Third month, it being the first First-day of the month, we were favored to have Samuel P. Zavitz, and Ida, his wife, of Coldstream, with us. Samuel addressed us on the beauty and practicability of silence as the basis of our worship, after which our dear friend, William Cornell, spoke with much feeling and earnestness. In the afternoon S. P. and I. Z. attended a meeting (appointed by a committee to have charge of holding such meetings among our isolated Friends), in the Malahide meeting-house, which is one of those unused houses except at funerals and appointments. Although a stormy day, a goodly number had gathered when our friends reached there, and from all reports I should consider it a favored season. In this locality are several descendants of Friends, and those interested in us, who might regularly attend if there were a few devoted ones who could be with them for a few months.

On the 8th Lobo Monthly Meeting was held here. But few were present from other preparative meetings. We enjoyed communications from S. P. Z. and other Friends. In the business meeting a committee reported that a new member had been informed of being received.

On the 19th we gathered as usual in our meeting for worship, William Cornell being present (having walked from his home, which is quite near). He addressed us impressively, testifying that he had been blessed through life, in basket and in store, and desired not only for those there gathered but for the whole human family that they be faithful to the voice within. They that obey the voice of God shall live forever.

He remained to the Young Friends' Association which is held at close of our First-day meetings, in which Ethel Oille read a paper on the Inner Life. While she was reading William was noticed to be not feeling well, and some one asked him if he would not like to go home. He said no, as he wished to remain until the close, which he did. He walked about the meeting-house apparently feeling better, and went home in his usual pleasant way, helped himself out of the cutter, walked into his house and took a chair and soon went into an apoplectic fit, and died in about an hour.

He was an acknowledged minister of Lobo Monthly Meeting, and his labors of Gospel love in our midst were appreciated.

The funeral was held on Fourth-day, 22d, which was largely attended. His children were all present, and Serena A. Minard, of New York, who spoke. All felt it a privilege to have her with us again, this being her former home meeting. Among other speakers the Baptist and Methodist ministers of this place spoke of William's Christian worth and goodness.

Serena attended our usual Fifth-day meeting, which was a season of deep spiritual baptism. She spoke of the life that had just gone out, alluding beautifully to his many virtues. She remained with us and attended our meeting on First-day, the 26th, in the morning and an appointed meeting at Union, in the Methodist meeting-house in the afternoon, which was largely attended, the house being near full. She was greatly favored in the communication, speaking about three-quarters of an hour. At the close there were many expressions of appreciation. Occupying seats on the platform by the side of our friend were two elders and a Friend, a young man, which seemed to add life to the meeting.

As we were leaving the meeting-house, we met a messenger who informed us of the death of our dear and highly esteemed friend Edward G. Schooley. The funeral was held at his late residence in St. Thomas, on Fourth-day, and although a very snowy and blustery day quite a large company gathered. A Friend spoke of Edward's exemplary life, and of the many responsible positions he had held in our Society, which he had filled with honor and dignity. After which Serena addressed us, making many spiritual truths plain and simple. A Presbyterian minister offered prayer, and a Methodist minister spoke, saying he considered it a privilege to hear such beautiful testimonies to one departed as he had heard that afternoon.

Last Fifth-day, 30th, at our preparative meeting, two requests for membership were handed in.

E. H.

LEAVE God to order all thy ways,
And hope in Him whate'er betide;
Thou'lt find Him, in the evil days,
Thine all sufficient strength and guide.
Who trusts in God's unchanging love,
Builds on the rock that naught can move!"

THERE doth not live
Any so poor but he may give,
And so rich but may receive.

Withhold the very meagerest dole
Hands can bestow, in part or whole,
And we may stint a starving soul.

—Margaret J. Preston.

A PLEA FOR THE OPPRESSED.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

"WOE unto him that buildeth a tower with blood, or that establisheth a city by iniquity." These words ring in my ears day and night, as I think of the barbarity of our nation in the Philippine Islands. It is a marvel to me that a nation that was born with the principle of self-government as the basis of its right to live, and which has for more than one hundred years proclaimed this as the only true basis of national authority; a nation boasting of its high Christian civilization, and holding itself up as an example to the nations of the world, should, in view of all this, send its soldiers, armed with the most destructive machinery of war that modern ingenuity can devise, against a simple people in their own land, bombarding their towns and cities, destroying their homes, killing men, women, and children, and driving the survivors into wilderness, for aught we know to perish of hunger. And all this for no crime but the love of liberty, which if it is a crime is one that the founders of this government were guilty of, and that their descendants have boasted of for more than a hundred years.

In the short space of one year that principle is all forgotten, and the Chief Executive of the nation says that "The authority of the United States must be established there, peaceably if possible, but forcibly if not otherwise." What a change since 1776, when the patriots of that day were so stoutly asserting the principle of self-government as a divine right! Did not Asa Pollard, the first one that died at Bunker Hill, or Warren, who died in the retreat, believe that they were giving their lives to establish an eternal principle, one that would elevate men to a higher, a nobler, a more divine recognition of their obligation to humanity, and a truer sense of their relation to God the Father of all men?

Nor is this all. We profess to be a Christian people, and to believe in the teachings of Jesus of Nazareth. Have those in authority stopped to ask the question, What would Jesus do in this case? Would he go there with an army, furnished with instruments of destruction, and destroy those people? Would Jesus go in that way, or would he go as did William Penn, with a message of love, and win their respect by proving his regard for their rights? This lesson which history teaches seems to have been forgotten, and the Pagan practices of the dark ages are being followed, after proclaiming the principles of peace, and pointing to arbitration as the proper way of settling difficulties.

It seems to me that if there was ever a time in which Friends were called upon to proclaim their testimony against injustice and oppression, this is emphatically the time, when the cry of a struggling people is going up to the throne of eternal justice, pleading for escape from the yoke of foreign control, with an earnestness which is begotten by the unhealed wounds of the yoke from which they have just escaped. As our sympathies go out to those people, the words of the Prophet come forcibly to mind, The stone crieth out of the wall, and the beam out of the timber answereth, saying, "Woe unto him that buildeth a tower with blood, or establisheth a city by iniquity."

DANIEL ANTHONY.

Accotink, Va.

FRIENDS AT PASADENA, CAL.

From a private letter to one of the editors of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. Date, late in First month.

M. AND I were at "Friends' Church," this morning. We had attended the Friends' meeting two or three weeks back, and we find a striking contrast between them. The "meeting" is an old-fashioned Orthodox society, with members well advanced in years, many, both men and women, in the plainest of plain attire.

On Sixth-day, Seventh-day, and to-day, occurred the quarterly meeting at the Friends' church. The meeting on Sixth-day was mentioned this morning, as one of "Ministry and Oversight." I stopped that day and was told by the pastor that the public meetings would be held yesterday and to-day. It is called the Pasadena Quarterly Meeting. As I have attended three sessions, yesterday and to-day, I can give thee some idea of the character of the meetings.

Yesterday morning's session was a religious meeting. On a raised platform, having a small pulpit, were three men and two women. One of the latter was reading a chapter from the bible when I entered. After the reading the congregation was asked to rise, and while thus standing three different ones prayed. After a silence, a man, whose white hair and beard looked like the pictures of Longfellow in old age, delivered a discourse with ability and earnestness. Then one of the sisters, as the women were frequently called, started the singing of "Rock of Ages," the people generally joining, the organ not being used. After the hymn, one of the members spoke, very much as in an "experience service" in a Methodist Church, and a dozen or more men and women, in different parts of the meeting, followed in the same manner. The chief thought was praise for blessings received, and they would generally commence, "I wish to praise the Lord," or "I praise God." All spoke with much earnestness and feeling. Then they stood up and sang "Old Hundred," and while standing, the pastor asked if some one in the congregation would close the meeting, when a young woman pronounced the benediction. Invitation was given to all to lunch in a room back of the auditorium. There were many "amens," and other responses during the service. Two—one black and one white—old-fashioned bonnets were the only reminders in the building of the Quaker.

At the business session in the afternoon, the platform and pulpit were vacant, and the pastor sat in the congregation. At a table in front of the pulpit sat a man clerk and a woman assistant clerk. The business commenced by his reading an opening minute, and then the names of representatives from four or five monthly meetings were read. I noticed that many did not respond. Thus the meeting opened in quite a Friendly fashion. In the written record the months were stated in numerals, and also the days of the week, but the speakers invariably used names. Communications were received from Berkeley monthly, and from Whittier quarterly meeting, and the latter sent a list of "fraternal delegates," of whom, however, but one responded to the call. The last previous quarterly meeting was held at Long Beach, (a shore resort), and the next, by invitation, is to be held at Los Angeles. The yearly meeting is to be held at Long Beach. Only one committee was called—one on Vivisection—and no queries or answers. (It is possible that the state of Society was considered the day before.)

The business which excited the most interest was a report regarding the recent purchase of a lot of ground and the purpose to erect a church building in Los Angeles. It was stated that the plan was to build at a cost of $2,000, when a young man, who said he was a recent arrival in California, cautioned those who were urging the matter to not put so low a cost in their plans. He said that a Friends' church in Portland, Me., had recently built a $10,000 building, and by calling a live young man as pastor, had gathered up a large membership. A nominating committee to name treasurer and trustees was appointed. Altogether the business meeting was much more Quakerlike than the religious service. The expressions: "Friends," "Quakers," "I unite," "So do I," were familiar. Once there was applause.

On First-day morning the meeting was large, the body of the house, having a large proportion of Quaker-looking people, while the number of young people was notable. There were three pastors on the platform, one of whom opened the service by reading a chapter from the Bible. Then a hymn was sung by a choir of young people, accompanied by the organ. After an address of welcome to strangers present, an anthem was sung by a quartette. Somewhere in between the above a young woman in the audience spoke. After the anthem three women in the audience prayed at some length, and then the pastor of Los Angeles prayed and also preached the sermon. In his discourse much emphasis was put on the orthodox doctrine of atonement, but more on the spiritual character of religion. Everyone taking part was to all appearances deeply moved. The service closed with a hymn and benediction. Somewhere in the service a collection was taken. There may have been some variation from the order of the meeting from what I have given.

I have described the three meetings in considerable detail, in order to give an idea of what a mixture the Society of Friends in its several branches is, and what a number of shoots have been grafted upon the original stem of Friends' methods. With a Bellamy imagination one might predict that this Society will stand, sometime, as representative of Quakerism. Away off in the future, when the seat of empire has crossed to the Pacific coast, a commission, composed of a New Zealander, a Filipino, and a Japanese, may be sent to investigate the reported discovery of a statue of William Penn in the ruins of the city hall, in the ancient city of Philadelphia, and in their report they may give a history of the sect of the Quakers, sometime called the Society of Friends, and again the Friends' Church. Among the conclusions will be, perhaps, that the Society reached the largest membership early in the 20th century, when large churches took an active part in raising the rather low standards of religion and morals which had prevailed among the people of the Pacific coast. The sect differed from other Protestant sects chiefly in the manner of church government, and in putting emphasis upon the power of the Spirit, called by some of the earlier branches the "Inward Light."

Why this prophecy? and what foundation is there for it? Simply because of the large proportion of young people taking part, the proselyting spirit, and the earnestness of the Friends' church. With them in it, it will be flourishing when the old-fashioned meeting up the street shall have passed away.
G.

THE DOUKHOBORS AT WINNIPEG.

A friend in Detroit, Michigan, sends us the following extracts from a private letter received from a correspondent at Winnipeg.

DEAR MADAM: Your favor of January 29 was duly replied to, and has been lying in my desk for six weeks, awaiting Prince Hilkoﬀ's signature, but the Prince has been out of the city most of the time since, and called at my house but once in that time, and in the hurry of business your letter was forgotten. I am not his amanuensis, only a friend of mutual interest in the Doukhobors, and sometimes reply to letters for him. However, if it is not altogether unpardonably late, I will assure you of Prince Hilkoﬀ's deepest appreciation of your interest and sympathy shown for the welfare of his long-suffering countrymen, especially as the cause of the Doukhobors appeals to but few, their religion being regarded as "quite peculiar" here, and also there are many who are not yet spiritually enlightened, and who cannot understand the enlightenment of these simple, unlettered peasants, forgetting that Jesus chose his disciples from the ranks of the humble and ignorant fishermen, instead of the learned rabbis.

However, the tide of opinion is rising in their favor since the Canadian people have had an opportunity to see something of the lives of this people, and the high example they set of brotherly love will enter the hearts of all those with whom they come in contact. Never in my life have I met a gentler people, possessed of a quiet dignity that is both impressive and extraordinary to find in such a race. We have opened a school here to teach the children English during their sojourn in this city for about three months, and I find them so apt, polite, and withal so kindly disposed toward every living thing, showing such a feeling of helping and sharing, besides an eagerness to learn, and assimilation of our language that the work is really a labor of love, and the children have become very dear to me.

I am aware of the practical help given by the Society of Friends, and Prince Hilkoﬀ is most grateful, for much is owing to their efforts to release these poor Russian brothers. Prince Hilkoﬀ is not himself a Doukhobor, however,—like yourself, he is in sympathy with the religious ideas of these people. I wish that you might meet him, he is so gentle and unassuming in manner, and his people fairly idealize him. I compare him to another Moses, leading his people out of bondage. He has been an exile from his home and country since 1891. It was when first exiled to the Caucasus in that year that he met the Doukhobors, and has since labored for them with his tongue and pen, causing more suffering to himself on account of it. He was finally confronted with the choice of exile to Siberia, or to leave the country altogether, he chose the latter, and I think he will send for his wife and two children, and will settle here. He has just asked permission from his Government to be allowed to go home long enough to sell his estates and see his two older children, who were taken from him during his exile, and placed in charge of the Russian Church. . . . And now allow me to express my appreciation of your sympathy for a people that unite us in one bond of common brotherhood.

Sincerely yours,

Winnipeg, Manitoba.

MRS. W. F. O.

FARMERS AT SANDY SPRING, MD.

A friend has sent us the following clipping from some other journal, whose name he does not state.

At Sandy Spring, Montgomery county, seventeen miles from Washington, is a community of farmers representing the highest ideal in farm life. It is a settlement made up almost entirely of those known as Friends or Quakers.

Over fifty years ago a number of families took up a large tract of land at this place, and they were attracted to it by the very fine growth of hard-wood timber. The soil proved, however, very disappointing and when cleared and put to growing crops, the yield was not above five bushels of wheat and ten bushels of corn to the acre. A farmers' club was organized, and means were carefully discussed and considered how best to improve the soil, which was so much less productive than they expected to find it. This club is now fifty years old.

A woman's club was also organized, probably the first in the country, older than Sorosis, and the women very intelligently studied their part to be taken in the building up of that community.

There is a community of prosperous, intelligent, highly cultivated, and educated farmers' families, rarely to be met. Clover was used and fertilizers were studied and intelligently applied until the soil has been made highly productive, yielding for many years 35 to 45 bushels of wheat, and corn 60 to 75 bushels per acre. From this improvement of the soil, these families have educated their children, and graduates from Swarthmore College are frequently met with in the sons and daughters. They have a public library, in addition to private libraries, while upon their tables will be found daily papers and magazines.

Their houses are connected by telephone, and they can converse with each other daily without leaving their homes. Many of their houses are furnished with bath-rooms and closets and the modern improvements of city houses. They have stone roads, so that they can go to Washington with their produce, two to three tons to the load, at any season, while it is with expedition and comfort that they can go to each other's homes, their religious meetings, lectures, club meetings, and post-office.

Here is a very marked illustration of what the soil will do for an individual, or for a community, if they will study its needs, and intelligently coöperate with it.

When will more of our farmers learn this all-important lesson, to use the soil aright, and not abuse it; to so develop its possibilities as to get from it better living in every sense and the higher thinking that naturally results from better living.

A nation of farmers like these, who put their faith in the soil and show it by their works, who believe in industrial improvement, who would turn "swords into plough-shares and spears into pruning-hooks," would place agriculture before the world in its true position, and bring to such nation greater power, growth, and wealth than countless ages of war and conquest, with all of its attendant destructive forces and influences.

GEORGE T. POWELL.

THE MODERN PAGANISM.

"They have seduced my people, saying Peace; and there is no peace: and when one buildeth up a wall, behold they daub it with untempered mortar."—Ezekiel, xiii., 10.

THE Bishop of Manchester, (England), addressing the clergy of his diocese recently, said that he had found the churches of his diocese much more sparsely attended than was the case twenty years ago. He thought this was caused by "devotion to amusements," and to the extraordinary expectations aroused by the hope of greater material prosperity. "Not only," said he, "are men learning to look for their paradise rather in this world than in the next—perhaps a not wholly unwholesome reaction—but, also, they are seeking to better themselves by the improvement of their means rather than their characters,—rather through the satisfaction of the senses than from the elevation of the soul."

We spend (says the National Advocate, current issue), as much in two days in making heathens at home as we do in a whole year in seeking to convert heathens abroad. Five million five hundred thousand dollars ($5,500,000) is spent by the Christian Church in foreign missions in the course of a year, in comparison to one thousand millions of dollars ($1,000,000,000), spent in self-indulgence in drink. Which is the most honored? Which has the richest homage paid to him—the Christian's God or the god Bacchus?

The Chicago Inter-Ocean, in a recent issue, says: "Chicago seems to have gone adrift. There are more parents looking for lost children, more children looking for lost parents, more sisters looking for lost brothers, and more wives looking for lost husbands than ever before in the history of this great city."

Chicago is said to have 6,000 "saloons" and drinking-places.

In an address in Boston, about a fortnight ago, a

Philadelphia minister, Wayland Hoyt, (Baptist), is reported (Boston Transcript) to have said:

"There never was a more manifest providence than the waving of 'Old Glory' over the Philippines. The only thing we can do is to thrash the natives until they understand who we are. I believe every bullet sent, every cannon shot, every flag waved, means righteousness. When we have conquered anarchy, then is the time to send the Christ there."

In a letter written a few weeks ago, W. T. Stead, the well-known English editor and author, thus described the attitude of the newspaper press in England in relation to the controversy then existing with France over the "Fashoda incident":

"The talk, the writing, the policy of some men, even in my own profession—which I think is about the worst one at the present time from the point of view of the peace of the world—is all in favor of forcing France to fight when we have her at an advantage. When you expostulate with them they reply—and it is language worthy of a savage—'Oh, France will probably attack us when she has us at a disadvantage. Therefore we should be quite justified in finishing her off now.'"

PRESIDENT LOUBET'S MOTHER.

Review of Reviews.

THE new President of France has had a career which appeals peculiarly to the liking and sympathy of the average Frenchman. Emile Loubet is the son of a farmer whose ancestral acres were situated in the little commune of Marsanne, which is in the Department of the Drome, in southeastern France. The father of the new President was so good a farmer and so respected a citizen that he became at one time the mayor of Marsanne. This estimable man, it seems, died a good while ago; but his widow, the mother of the President, still lives and carries on the farm, at the age of eighty-six. The French public is taking a great deal of interest in Madame Loubet, mere, and the illustrated papers from Paris are giving us a profusion of pictures of the farmstead, with its sheep and lambs huddled close in the sheltered angle of the buildings, and of the old lady with her shrewd face and short peasant skirt, who has been photographed until she is heartily tired of it. She is well enough pleased, doubtless, with her son's advancement in position and fame, but she will never believe him as great a man as his father—once the mayor of Marsanne and always a weather-wise and thrifty farmer—to whose picture on the wall she points with reverence and pride when visitors come to talk to her about her distinguished son. The best thing she can say of Emile is that she believes he is growing to be a good deal like his father.

EX-UNITED STATES Senator Merrimon, of North Carolina, said: "I have never drunk or meddled with liquor; I have seldom used it in my family as a medicine; and yet it has meddled with me—it has made my boy a wandering vagabond, has broken my wife's heart. Yes, when I was asleep, thinking him at home in his bed, he was being made a drunkard in the bar-rooms in the city of Raleigh."

Literature.

ONE of the most notable books recently published is "The Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Barrett, 1845-1846." (New York: Harper and Bros.) They are the "love letters" which passed between Robert Browning, the poet, and the young woman who subsequently (1846) became his wife, and is known—scarcely less than her husband—as the poet, also, Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

That the letters should have been published at all will probably strike many persons as rather remarkable, for, as a literary writer says of them, "such a self-revelment has possibly never been made, very certainly not in English letters. They tell, as nothing else could, the whole course of the wooing." They are issued with the authority of the son, Robert Barrett Browning, and close with the marriage, for as he remarks, his father and mother were never afterward separated. The letters—all of them—passed in the years 1845-46, when Miss Barrett was in her father's house, and Browning lived in a London suburb. She was then an invalid, supposed to be suffering from an incurable affection of the spine, but she subsequently quite marvelously recovered. The "Life" of the Brownings was written by their intimate friend, Mr. Kenyon, and with that and these letters the full story is made up.

Perhaps the first thing to be noted about the letters is that they are worthy of their authors. They are such as one would expect from the author of "Sonnets from Portuguese" and "Aurora Leigh," from the author of "Pippa Passes" and "The Ring and the Book." Throughout two volumes of some twelve hundred pages we find much thoughtful comment on literature and life, but it is after all rather incidental to the main subject. Above everything else they are love letters, and their writers show that their chief interest lies only in their love for each other and for each other's work.

In the North American Review, this month, Prof. Francis Brown, of Union Theological Seminary, New York City, discusses the question "What is Orthodoxy?" He is of the opinion that the time will surely come when the Church will call nothing heresy that is not schismatical and immoral; just as the time will come when no orthodoxy will be recognized that does not utter the harmonious convictions of a united Church. Bishop Potter, of New York, in an article in the same number, entitled "National Bigness or Greatness—Which?" lays emphasis upon the perils which attend the policy of annexing distant regions inhabited by alien and semi-barbarous people. "What we want all around the world," he says, "is a system of international government. What we want to create to-day is the highest court of appeal, that court of appeal to which nations could take their differences and their problems for final adjudication."

Robert Browning in 1846. A photograph in "Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Barrett." Copyright, 1898, by Harper & Brothers.

Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, Mass., have added to their admirable "Riverside Literature Series" as No. 130, "The Superlative, and Other Essays," by Ralph Waldo Emerson. The "other essays" contained are those on "Uses of Great Men," "Shakespeare," and "Social Aims." This group of essays has a general coherence as regards the education of the young American, teaching the lessons of moderation in language, dress, and manners; moderation and temperance in life; enthusiasm for high ideals; and the consciousness of individual worth. (The price of the book, paper cover, is 15 cents, net.)

This number will be immediately followed by Number 131, containing two of Emerson's greatest essays, "Nature and Compensation," edited by the poet's son, Dr. Edward W. Emerson. There will follow in the same series Carl Schurz's sketch of Abraham Lincoln, with a Portrait of Lincoln, and a biographical sketch of Carl Schurz.

In the outpour of fiction there is no limit. A delver into the statistics of the subject calculates that in 1898, there were eighty novels written—completed—per day, counting every day of the year, First-days and holidays. His conclusions, says Literature, are not based upon his experience as a reader, but on the basis of expert calculation. Five new novels a day were actually published in Great Britain, and three a day in the United States—a total of eight daily, and as only one novel in ten that are written is published, therefore 29,200 were actually produced.

A romance, "The Ship of Stars," begun in this month's Scribner's, is by Arthur T. Quiller-Couch, a rather remarkable young Cornishman, who has done for the rugged Welsh coast of England and its quaint people what Sarah Orne Jewett and Mary E. Wilkins have done for New England. He is so devoted to his native Cornwall that he prefers to live there in comparative retirement, despite the attractions of London.

An admirable newspaper for those within the New England region, and very interesting to many others, is the Boston Transcript. We find its presentation of news and views refreshing in the midst of the generally prevailing aberration, mental and moral, in the daily newspaper field.

Educational Department.

COMMENCEMENT AT WILLIAMSON SCHOOL.

THE closing exercises, the Sixth, at the Williamson Free School of Mechanical Trades occurred on Seventh-day last, the 1st instant. There was a large attendance. A train from Philadelphia, leaving Broad street at 1.48, took out many invited guests.

After visits to the shops, in which the work of the students was shown,—all of it very good, and some remarkable so,—the company gathered at 3.30 in the School auditorium, to hear the exercises. There were forty-seven graduates—fourteen brick-layers, twelve machinists, ten carpenters, five electrical machinists, six pattern-makers. Diplomas were granted them. The bearing and appearance of the young men favorably impressed all, and the interest shown by them in their training, and in the institution, was a gratifying feature. One of the graduates, Wills Main Fleming, a machinist, delivered a brief, pertinent address. The exercises included also an address by Isaac H. Clothier, who is one of the Trustees.

The School was established, as is generally known, by the gifts and bequests of the late Isaiah V. Williamson, of Philadelphia, a Friend. The property occupied, which is in Delaware county, a short distance west of Media, cost $423,000, and there is an endowment fund of two millions. The annual income on this is about $80,000, and as the cost of boarding, clothing, feeding, and instructing each pupil is $324 a year, about 250 can be taken. The term is three years, so that the cost per pupil in the institution is about $1,000.

Since the School opened in 1892, there have been 2,232 applicants for admission, of whom 497 have been accepted, and 260 graduated. President Shrigley stated that four fifths of the present graduating class already had positions, and read an extended list of leading industrial and employing concerns in which the Williamson boys are now engaged. All the members of the graduating class, he stated, have taken the total abstinence pledge.

SWARTHMORE PREPARATORY SCHOOL.—The fourth annual oratorical contest between members of first and second forms has been held. The school-room was crowded with an appreciative audience. The parts were well sustained by five students representing each class. These had been chosen as the result of previous contests. William E. Hannum, Annie G. Harshberger, Cleora M. Haviland, Norman S. Passmore, and Ruth Walden spoke for First Form. Marguerite Campion, Bromwell Geddes, Lida McClung, Charles Walton, Jr., and Phoebe D. Wetherill represented Second Form. The judges rendered their decision in favor of First Form.

The enrolment of pupils for the current year is much in excess of any previous one; the number of boarding pupils enrolled to date is sixty. The inquiries and entries of new pupils for next year are both more than double what they have been in any previous year at this time. There is also a noticeable increase in the age of those now making application.

FRIENDS' ACADEMY, LOCUST VALLEY.—One of the most enjoyable lectures given in our course was that by Jacob A. Riis, of New York, upon the subject, "Tony's Hardships." "Tony" was the name given by the lecturer, to the typical "street Arab," found among the poor of our large cities, but especially on the East Side of New York city. As he is devoting his life to the study of the conditions existing there, and is doing much toward their amelioration, Mr. Riis speaks with authority, and one cannot listen to his appeals for sympathy and action without a strong desire to respond.

On the evening of the 22d ult., C. W. Broomall gave an illustrated lecture on "Historic New England." The views were fine, and the lecture was very instructive and enjoyable.

FRIENDS' SCHOOL, MEDIA.—Friends' Select School at Media, Pa., under care of a Committee of Chester Monthly Meeting, has recently entered upon the second half-term of the school year 1898-99. All interested feel that the time, from the re-opening in the Ninth month until the present, has been well spent, and expect good results from the work done then and the work yet to be done.

Lectures by Dr. Emily G. Hunt and others will give additional interest to the second half-term. These lectures begin Fourth month 6, and are well distributed.

The committee in charge has recently reappointed the present teachers, for the coming year, their work having been quite satisfactory, and they are expected to return to the school in Ninth month next. They have been with this school since Ninth month, 1895, and are: Emma Fell Paxson, principal; Esther E. Spicer, assistant, and Annabel Hill, drawing teacher.

A GOOD WATER SUPPLY.—In order to have pure drinking water for the scholars at 15th and Race streets, (Philadelphia), and others who use the well-known hydrant in the open court between the School and the Meeting-house, the water from the street is now deflected, and boiled and filtered before flowing from the hydrant.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—A meeting of Mansfield Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Joseph F. Taylor, Third month 23, twenty-five members responding with beautiful sentiments.

Lydia L. Gibbs read a sketch of the persecution of Mary Dyer, and the query arises, how many of us, at this day, would be willing to stand by our faith and suffer even unto death as she did?

"Do Friends receive due credit at the hands of American historians?" was replied to by Joseph F. Taylor, by reading extracts from a discourse by Dr. David Gregg, in the Presbyterian church, Brooklyn, N. Y., on the occasion of "Fore-father's Day," Twelfth month 20, 1896, his text was "The Quakers, as makers of America," and his sermon was a general review of the Friends, with some allusions to their treatment by Governor Endicott of Massachusetts. He said in part: "The Quakers are more than an embodiment of oddities: they are an embodiment of great principles and an incarnation of a grand life. Both their principles and life have entered into the bone and sinew of our republic, and both are still necessary for the realization of ultimate America. We wish to look at this destiny as it existed in the souls of our Quaker ancestors." [Extended extracts from this sermon were published in the INTELLIGENCER of First month 2, 1897—soon after its delivery.—EDS.]

These remarks, coming as they did from a Presbyterian minister should be doubly appreciated by Friends, some Friends present thought we had not as a people, received due credit from historians.

"Proselyting in the Young Friends' Association and its effect," was the subject of a paper by Sarah A. Biddle, who thought that as Friends' views were so fully explained in our Associations they would proselyte for us, and with faithfulness, and a willingness to work, we will obtain good results. Success does not lie with a few, but upon the earnest endeavor of all concerned.

Edith S. Gibbs gave a recitation "The Origin of the American Flag," by request. After a brief silence, adjourned to meet at the home of Franklin S. Zelle, Fourth month 20.

M. E. GIBBS, Sec'y.

WOODSTOWN, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Woodstown Association was held in the lecture room of Bacon Academy Third month 30, 1899. The meeting was opened with a reading from the 5th chapter of Matthew.

The reports from the standing committees were as follows: Mary Hazelton Clark, representing History, gave some interesting extracts from their readings in "Friends' Miscellany." Izetta B. Allen, for Literature, read from the "Ministry of George Fox." Tacie D. Cobs reported that the Discipline Committee had considered the subject of "Disownment." Annie P. Flitcraft gave Current Topics; she spoke of the abolishing of liquor sale in the army and navy.

The paper of the evening was given by Emily R. Kirby; subject, "Do religious societies bear a strong enough testimony against profanity?" She spoke of her impression, upon hearing one of a group of boys at play, utter a profane word, and asked whether, if our religious bodies were sufficiently faithful in bearing testimony against profanity, would this boy have dared utter that sacred name, in this blasphemous manner, without a thought, perhaps, of having done a vile thing, or the knowledge of having broken one of the commandments? Profanity, as the writer saw it, did not consist of the false utterances of the names of Divine personages alone, but might be applied with equal force to the lowered standard of every relation in life. She told how Purity, Trust, Friendship, and Character, (the great foundation structure of a true religious life), might be profaned. The paper concluded with a beautiful quotation from the writings of a Russian poet. A number present expressed their appreciation of the paper.

Ellen M. Cole answered the question, "How did the custom originate of men and women sitting apart in Friends' meeting?"

Annie E. Bradway read an article from the INTELLIGENCER, in regard to the Czar's disarmament movement, and asked those present to sign a petition in connection with it. After which the meeting adjourned.

E. L. D., Sec.

TRENTON, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Friends' Association was held Third month 27, with the president, W. Maxwell Marshall, in the chair. After roll-call the minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

The program for the evening opened with "A Synopsis of Frank R. Stockton's work as related to Friends," assigned to Florence Tittenson. For answer she read "The Man in the Auger Hole."

Next was a reading from Maria Webb's book "The Penns and Peningtons," by Nellie Turnbull. The portion read related to William Penn's treaty of peace with the Indians. Voltaire said that it was the only one ever made without an oath, and the only one that was never broken. After a brief silence the meeting adjourned.

M. D. B., Sec.

HOPEWELL, VA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of Hopewell, Va., was held Third month 26.

The president opened the meeting by reading the third chapter of John. The roll being called, the attendance was unusually good. Minutes of last meeting were read and approved. Reports from the various committees were then read.

Hugh S. Lupton being absent, Mary S. Lupton read the paper prepared by Ellwood Trueblood for the Richmond Conference. Florence Dell Branson, for the Literature, read "An Old Meeting-house." Cassie Pidgeon, on Discipline, took quotations from the Friends' Discipline. Current Topics, by Anna M. Bond.

"Is it consistent with Friends' principles to give prizes in social games?" was referred to Lydia W. Irish, who thought "it would not have been consistent for early Friends, but that times are changing." She also spoke, of prizes being offered at various schools for good behavior. An interesting discussion followed. It was said that prizes offered as a reward became an incentive to application or good behavior, while in social games they encourage a disposition to get something for nothing.

After a few moments of silence the meeting adjourned.

ANNIE J. REES, Sec.

HUNTINGTON, IND.—The Young Friends' Association met Third month 25, at the home of Nehemiah and Sarah Brown. After the business of the evening was transacted a paper was read by Lou Rall, subject, "Thoughts; Whence Cometh, Whither Goeth?" The paper was something quite different from those heretofore presented, touching upon Occultism and Mental Science. The writer believes that thoughts are transferred from one person to another. Eminent scientists have of late been experimenting along these lines, and many interesting discoveries have been made.

After an interesting discussion of the paper the meeting adjourned, to meet Fourth month 21, at the home of James and Margaret Plummer. Paper by Lauretta H. Nichols.

W. C. MOORE, Cor. Sec.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

WHEN my husband was traveling through Siberia as a member of the Transportation Commission (sent out from Chicago) he became acquainted with Prince Hilkoff, Imperial Director of Railways. The Prince and his attendants met the Commission at Krasnoyarsk, in his private train,—which was the first to pass over the newly laid track of the Trans-Siberian railway,—and conducted the party some fourteen hundred miles to St. Petersburg. When I heard of Prince Hilkoff being with the Doukhobors in Canada, I supposed him to be the same person, and wrote him a letter of welcome to America, and sympathy with the interesting body of people in his charge. Then I learned that he (in Canada) is the nephew of the Director of the Railways.

E. P. J.

Detroit, Mich.

"It is most fitting," a friend writes, "that Friends should feel even more than common interest and sympathy in the Doukhobor people, who have so heroically accepted persecution in upholding Christian principles. May the influence of their example extend across the border into our own land!" And she adds, referring to the fact that several of the most capable and intelligent of the Doukhobors were banished to Siberia, for a term of eighteen years, "cannot something be done to free these exiles?"

I want to say to you that the INTELLIGENCER is invaluable to me, situated as I am here, separated from Friends. I look with deep interest for its coming every Seventh-day, and read it all.

J. M. T.
Commonwealth, Ga.

"The division superintendent of the railroad" (the Atchison, Topeka, and Santa Fé, in California), "told me that among the best laborers they had on the road were the Mojave Indians. Practically all of them—the remnant of the tribe—are thus employed." So a friend writes, in a private letter.

Henry C. Ash, of Philadelphia, (son of our friends Samuel and Sarah Ash), who went to Alaska a year or more ago, remains there, and has been engaged recently in promoting the opening of improved roads to Atlin, on Atlin Lake. He is making his home, at present, in the interior, north of Skagway. His health is very good, the out-door life appearing to be favorable.

I think we are all here in full and hearty sympathy with the stand the INTELLIGENCER has taken on the present war situation;—for we have war yet, though the peace treaty has been signed.

E. H. T.
Hitchcock, Ind.

COMMUNICATIONS.

CARETAKER AT FAIRHILL.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE caretaker of Fair Hill cemetery, Wm. H. Meloney, having resigned, the committee have appointed Alfred A. Longshore, with whom all contracts should be made for the care of lots and graves, after Third month 1, 1899.

ALFRED OGDEN, Sup't and Treas.
1117 W. Lehigh Avenue, Phila.

CONFERENCE PROGRAM.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

We are informed that the executive committee of the Conference of the Young Friends' Associations that met in Philadelphia on Third month 25 made a new departure in arranging for the meeting in Philadelphia, in Fifth month. Instead of following in the old ruts, they have decided not to have two papers on the same subject, as has been the custom in the past.

While the committee still adheres to the habit of appointing some one to open the discussion, they have limited that person to five minutes time thus practically doing away with two papers on one subject. For this move, they deserve our thanks. This change should have been made years ago. For after the first meetings of the Friends' Associations it was seen that there would be no dearth of speakers, and therefore, no necessity for appointing any one to open the discussion or, as has been the fact, two papers on the same subject, often independent of each other.

There can be but one reason for appointing a person to open the discussion, and that is that it may not drag for want of someone to begin it. This custom might be well for a cross-roads debating club, where the members are few and the speakers diffident, or even in a local association, but in the conferences of the Young Friends' Associations, the case is entirely different. For at these meetings the trouble has not been to find speakers, but for the speakers to find an opportunity to speak. I have attended a number of these conferences, and have noticed that many failed to be recognized by the chairman for want of time, where if the second paper on the same subject had been omitted, most if not all of these members would have had an opportunity to be heard.

What is said against two papers on the same subject at the conference of the Young Friends' Association applies with still greater force to such conferences as those at Chappaqua and Swarthmore. In talking on this subject with a prominent member of the Society, he remarked that he heard a great deal of dissatisfaction expressed at the Swarthmore Conference in regard to taking up so much time with two papers on the same subject.

While we may feel disposed to blame the committees of these associations, yet the fault is really ours, for have we not adhered to that Friendly habit of appointing the same members on these committees year after year, many of whom have held their present position since the organization of these conferences? This should not be so. We should try to appoint at least one new member on these committees each year, and thus endeavor to infuse new thought into its action. This method would do much to keep the committees out of the grooves into which the old committees of both organizations have fallen.

JOHN R. SATTERTHWAITE.

Trenton, N. J.

A TRIBUTE.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I wish to offer a short tribute to the memory of our deceased Friend Daniel Underhill, of Jericho Monthly Meeting. The Society of Friends has met with a heavy loss in his death; but we mourn not as those without hope, but trust that our loss is his eternal gain. He was born in 1826, the year before the separation in the Society of Friends. His parents were Samuel J. and Mary Willets Underhill, of Jericho, then Queens county, N. Y. His sister Phebe, also a valued member of the Society, married Elias H. Seaman, a grandson of Elias Hicks. Accustomed to the Society usages and traditions, he was indeed an authority in all technical matters. He married Caroline Post, of Westbury. JESSE MERRITT.

Farmingdale, New York, Third month 20.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE FIRST SPRING BIRD.

LONG on a weary couch I had lain,
With parching lips and throbbing brain,
It seemed the night would never be o'er,
I longed for the daylight more and more.

Yet I counted the hours, one by one—
Sometimes how weary time will run!
The night without seemed dark and deep
I slept a broken and troubled sleep.

'Twas thus the weary night had passed,
But the blessed daylight came at last.
The first gray streak of light soon grew
Into great broad fields of pearly blue.

The snowy twigs were gleaming bright,
In that first red gush of morning light,
And the only sound that could be heard
Were the plaintive notes of the first spring bird.

Like dew on a parched and drooping flower
Was the sweet little song in this lone hour;
A feeling of thankfulness filled my breast,
And I heeded not the want of rest.

The organ's peal may be music to some,
Others might choose the martial drum;
Ivory keys when touched by the fair
Have charmed humanity everywhere;

But sweeter music was never heard
Than the soft clear notes of that little bird;
And so free to all, on sea and land,
For the chords were touched by God's own hand.

I listened long, for it seemed to me
Like the voice of that One on the troubled sea;
It breathed o'er my spirit like healing balm,
The waves were hushed, and the sea was calm.

Richmond, Indiana.

ESTHER S. WALLACE.

THE SUPREME ISSUE.

Senator George F. Hoar, of Massachusetts, in a letter (dated Second month 4) in reply to an address from many leading citizens of Boston. (The letter was made public on the 30th ult.)

THE blood of the slaughtered Filipinos, the blood and the wasted health and life of our own soldiers, is upon the heads of those who have undertaken to buy a people in the market like sheep, or to treat them as lawful prize and booty of war; to impose a government on them without their consent, and to trample under foot not only the people of the Philippine Islands, but the principles upon which the American republic itself rests. . . .

The law of righteousness and justice, on which the great and free American people should act, and in the end, I am sure, will act, depends not on parallels of latitude and meridians of longitude or points of the compass. It is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. It is as true now as when our fathers declared it in 1776. It is as binding upon William McKinley to-day as it was upon George Washington or Abraham Lincoln. The only powers of government the American people can recognize are just powers, and those powers rest upon the consent of the governed.

The question the American people are now considering, and with which they are about to deal, is not a question of a day, or of a year, or of an administration, or of a century. It is to affect and largely determine the whole future of the country. We can recover from a mistake in regard to other matters which have interested or divided the people, however important or serious. Tariffs and currency and revenue laws, even foreign wars, all these, as Thomas Jefferson said, "are billows that will pass under the ship." But if the Republic is to violate the law of its being, if it is to be converted into an empire, not only the direction of the voyage is to be changed, but the chart and the compass are to be thrown away. We have not as yet taken the irrevocable step. Before it is taken let the voice of the whole people be heard.

Scenes in the Philippine War.

AN Associated Press despatch from Manila, last week, contains the following, which we print just as it appeared in the daily newspapers, and without comment:

"The country between Marilao and Manila presents a picture of desolation. Smoke is curling from hundreds of ash heaps, and the remains of trees and fences torn by shrapnel are to be seen everywhere. The general appearance of the country is as if it had been swept by a cyclone. The roads are strewn with furniture and clothing dropped in flight by the Filipinos.

"The only persons remaining behind are a few aged persons, too infirm to escape. They camp beside the ruins of their former homes and beg passersby for any kind of assistance. The majority of them are living on the generosity of our soldiers, who give them portions of their rations. The dogs of the Filipinos cower in the bushes, still terrified and barking, while hundreds of pigs are to be seen busily searching for food.

"Bodies of dead Filipinos are stranded in the shallows of the river or are resting in the jungle where they crawled to die or were left in the wake of the hurriedly retreating army. These bodies give forth a horrible odor, but there is no time at present to bury them.

"The inhabitants who fled from Marilao and Meycauayan left in such a panic that on tables our soldiers found spread money and valuables and in the rooms were trunks containing other property of value. This was the case in most of the houses deserted. They were not molested by our soldiers, but the Chinese who slip in between the armies are looting when they can, and have taken possession of several houses, over which they raised Chinese flags, some of which were torn down.

"An old woman was found hidden in a house at Meycauayan yesterday just dead, apparently from fright and hunger."

A report from F. A. Blake, of California, who is in charge of the work of the Red Cross Society, at Manila, was published last week. He wrote just a week after the fighting actually commenced two months ago, and he thus describes the scene at the end of the first day's operation:

"I never saw such execution in my life, and hope never to see such sights as met me on all sides as our little corps passed over the field, dressing wounded—legs and arms nearly demolished, total decapitation, horrible wounds in chests and abdomens, showing the determination of our soldiers to kill every native in sight. The Filipinos did stand their ground heroically, contesting every inch, but proved themselves unable to stand the deadly fire of our well-trained and eager boys in blue. I counted seventy-nine dead natives in one small field, and learn that on the other side of the river their bodies were stacked up for breastworks."

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE fighting in the island of Luzon continued last week. The United States forces were pushed forward, and on the 31st ult., captured the native town, Malolos, which has been the Filipino "capital." The place had been set on fire by the Filipinos, and was partly burned. They retired toward the more mountainous country farther north, and had evidently been preparing to do so, Aguinaldo having left two or three days earlier.

The advance to Malolos had been slow, the United States troops, (commanded by General MacArthur), having consumed six days and a half in moving twenty-six miles. North of Malolos, the country is still more rough and difficult for military operations.

THE news reports from Manila are all under military censorship, and are therefore regarded with doubt. Dispatches on the 2nd and 3d instant, reported the Filipino forces scattered and disorganized, and the end of the war probably near. On the 4th it was reported that the Filipinos were still making a vigorous defense, and had a considerable force at Calumpit, about five and one-half miles north of Malolos, with intrenchments. The dispatch added that it was "expected that hard fighting will be necessary to dislodge them at that point and at San Fernando, where Aguinaldo is supposed to be. Large rivers strengthen both positions. The Montana regiment had one man killed and three wounded. Twenty-five men were prostrated by the heat."

It is stated by Herbert Meyrick, (of the "American Agriculturist," and "New England Homestead"), that letters written home by private soldiers from Pacific Coast States, now in the Philippine Islands, are very unfavorable to the war now being carried on, and "emphasize the complications brought on by the policy of subjugation." The Governor of Nebraska declined to approve a resolution passed by the Legislature commending the service of the regiment from that State, because it contained language justifying the war.

THE Commissioners sent to Manila by President McKinley, (President Schurman, of Cornell, Admiral Dewey, General Otis, ex-Minister Denby, and Prof. Worcester), issued a proclamation to the Filipinos. It represents the President's good will, promises reforms, and asserts the aim of the United States to be the welfare and the elevation of the Filipinos, but says the supremacy of the United States must and will be enforced throughout every part of the archipelago. "The most ample liberty of self-government will be granted to the Philippine people which is reconcilable with the maintenance of just, stable, and economical administration of public affairs and compatible with the sovereign and international rights and obligations of the United States."

IN the Samoan islands, in the South Pacific Ocean, where the United States, England, and Germany have for several years exercised a tripartite authority, there have been serious troubles recently, owing to the death of the native chief, or "King." The German officials have taken the side of one faction among the natives, and those of the United States and England support another faction. Last week, the United States cruiser Philadelphia, commanded by Admiral Kautz, and an English warship "shelled" some of the native villages, "intermittently for eight days." Complications with Germany have been narrowly avoided. The orders given at Washington to Admiral Kautz are said to have been imprudently drawn.

AN official message, representing the Czar of Russia, was issued on the 30th ult., by his ambassador at London, thanking all who had sent appreciative words concerning The Hague Conference. The message is as follows:

"Numberless expressions of gratitude have reached the Emperor of Russia from all countries for the initiative which his imperial highness has magnanimously taken with a view of alleviating the heavy burden caused by the present armaments. The Emperor has commanded his ambassador to convey his majesty's thanks to all who, either in addresses, letters, telegrams, or in any other way, have expressed their adhesion to his humanitarian work."

It is understood that Sir Julian Pauncefote, the English ambassador to the United States, will be one of England's representatives at The Hague Conference, "and the other may be of even higher rank." Lord Rosebery has been suggested, but he is an imperialist. Many, even among his party opponents, desire Lord Salisbury to go himself. Arthur J. Balfour, the present leader in the House of Commons (Lord Salisbury's nephew), is, a London dispatch says, "a strong friend of peace," and "there is reason to suppose that the British ministry means to give its fullest support to the czar's proposals, especially in the way of a mutual reduction of naval and military estimates."

THE delegates of Germany to The Hague Conference it is said will be Count von Munster, Professor von Stengel, of the Munich University, Professor Zorn, of the University of Koenigsberg, and two officers representing respectively the army and the navy.

The representatives of Austria will be Count Welserheim,

Herr Okolicsanyi, Austrian minister to the Netherlands, and a military and legal attache.

According to the Paris Gaulois France will be represented in the conference by M. Leon Bourgeois and M. De Stourmales, formerly French minister at The Hague.

It is intimated that the American representatives will be Andrew D. White, United States ambassador to Germany, Charlemagne Tower, United States ambassador to Russia, and the United States minister to The Hague.

SERIOUS marine disasters have occurred. A freight steamer, the Norseman, from Liverpool, for Boston, struck in a fog, on Tom Moore's Ledge, on the coast near Marblehead, Mass., on the 29th ultimo. All on board, 102 in number, were got off by the life savers. On the 30th, an excursion steamer, the Stella, running from Southampton, England, to the Channel Islands, struck upon "the dreaded Casquet rocks near Alderney," and was totally wrecked. There were about 210 persons on board, and early despatches said that from 70 to 100 were reported lost.

DURING last month, two hundred and fifty new corporations, most of them "trusts" or "combines," with very large nominal capital, were granted charters at Trenton, under the general law of New Jersey. The total capital of those authorized to issue stock and bonds of over $1,000,000 each amounts to $1,111,750,000. The incorporation fees received from these companies by the Secretary of State amount to $126,000. The average capital stock of the 250 companies is $4,447,000. The industries represented include woolen manufacture, sixty-five millions; ice, sixty millions; cast iron pipe, thirty millions; ship-building, thirty millions; steam pumps, twenty-seven millions; beet sugar, twenty millions; fruit, twenty millions; salt, twelve millions; brick, ten millions, school furnitures, ten millions.

A DISPATCH from Atlanta, Georgia, on the 1st inst., says that the "convict lease" system of that State has ended and all of the State convicts—about twenty-four hundred—pass from the control of various lessees to the direct charge of the State. Hereafter the State will work the convicts, under supervision of State guards, and the men will be fed and imprisoned in State convict camps. Although their labor will be sold, the convicts will be worked and punished under Georgia officers. "The lease system had been in existence thirty years, and its abuses were so great that public sentiment demanded its abolition."

—Rudyard Kipling sent out a card to the press on the 2nd instant, thanking all for their messages of sympathy. He got out of bed that "day for the first time since his illness."

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMAN
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR
Cincinnati.
EUKSTEIN
ATLANTIC
BRADLEY
BROOKLYN
J.K./ETT
ULSTER
UNION
SOUTHERN
SHIPMAN
COLLIER
MISSOURI
RED SEAL
SOUTHERN

JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY
Cleveland.
SALIM
Salem, Mass.
CORNELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

FRESH coat of paint and change of color will make your house look fresh and bright. If you want to sell it will enhance the value of your property, or enable you to rent it quicker, to better tenants and for more money; is therefore a good investment if properly painted. To paint it properly have Pure White Lead and Pure Linseed Oil applied by a competent, practical painter.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

EIGHTY-SIX per cent, of railway tickets issued in England are for third-class.

FATHER: "When women get to voting, if they ever should, they will be found wearing the party yokes as meekly as the men." Daughter: "They won't if yokes are not in fashion."—[Exchange.]

"LOOK at me!" exclaimed the leading lawyer. "I never took a drop of medicine in my life, and I'm as strong as any two of your patients put together!" "Well, that's nothing," retorted the physician. "I never went to law in my life, and I'm as rich as any two dozen of your clients put together!"

IN a small village in the south of Scotland an elder in the parish church was one day reproving an old woman, who was rather the worse for liquor, by saying, "Sarah, don't you know that you should fly from the tempter?" Sarah (not too well pleased): "Flee yersel'." Elder: "Oh, Sarah, I have flown." Sarah: "Aweel, I think ye'll be nane the waur o' anither flutter."—[Scottish-American.]

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE Navy Department of the United States is about issuing advertisements for bids for supplying 24,000 tons of armor plate for war ships. It is supposed that this could be furnished for about $400 a ton, making the whole cost about $9,600,000. For a portion of it, however, Congress restricted the cost to $300 a ton, and it is not expected that bidders at this rate will be found, so that this part of the work may have to wait the action of another Congress.

—Minnesota is adopting a plan for replenishing land that has been stripped of its timber. The State will hold all the lands that come into its possession, seed them with white pine and secure the revenue as the trees mature. Eight hundred thousand acres have already passed into the hands of the State, and it is expected that this amount will be increased to 3,000,000 acres in a few years, taxes being left unpaid by the lumbermen after the timber has been stripped off. The State expects a net revenue of $1 an acre, but the principal benefit will be the restoration of the timber lands.

—Our growing commerce with the new possessions in the far Pacific is most encouraging. Our exports this month to the Philippines amount to several thousand American youth with guns, and $1,500,000 in gold, while our imports therefrom amount to only several hundred sick, wounded, and invalided soldiers. As will be seen, the trade balance is heavily in our favor.—Springfield Republican.

—President Diaz opened the spring session of the Mexican Congress on the 1st instant. His message showed an excellent condition of the national finances, with an increase of revenue in all branches.

—Ex-President Harrison and ex-Secretary Tracy will sail on the 11th of next month for Paris, where they will act as counsel for Venezuela before the International Court of Arbitration, which meets in Paris on May 25. Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Brewer, who are arbitrators will probably go at the same time.

—It is reported from Chicago that a serious shortage of vessels in the grain trade, which is likely to result in the diversion of a large traffic from the lakes to the all-rail lines eastward, is threatened for the coming season. The shortage is due in a large degree to the heavy chartering in the iron ore trade.

—The Quarantine Officer of the State Board of Horticulture of California has refused to permit the distribution of 152,000 hop plants from Kent, England, on the ground that they are affected with hop vermin. The plants were to have been planted near Hopland and Ukiah.

—In the Supreme Court of the United States, at Washington, on the 3d inst., a decision was handed down by Justice Peckham confirming the validity of the War Revenue act imposing taxes upon the transactions of Boards of Trade and similar institutions and upon transactions at stock yards.

—The "canteen" system will probably not be discontinued in the army. United States Attorney-General Griggs, (formerly Governor of New Jersey), gives his opinion that the law recently passed by Congress does not prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors through the canteen system as heretofore organized, except that no officer or enlisted man can be detailed for duty in the canteen to sell liquor.

The Dinner Pail

is a little 8-page monthly, published by "Silent Workers," an incorporated company of Friends, in the interest of helpful educational work they are doing for the world. Character-building is their aim; "Others" is their motto. Annual subscription 25 cents; stamps will do. Can you spare this much for "others," or send postal for sample copy. Address "Silent Workers," 934-936 Harrison street, San Francisco, Cal., U. S. A.

"The Dinner Pail will be whatever its friends make it," writes an interested Friend.

Ellwood Heacock,

UNDERTAKER
and EMBALMER

ESTABLISHED 1860.

TELEPHONE 5807.

1313 Vine Street, Philad'a.

Calls outside of city answered promptly.

EXPERIMENTS seem to show that a large ocean steamer, going at nineteen knots an hour, will move more than two miles after its engines have been stopped and reversed.

LOS ANGELES draws its electricity from a turbulent mountain river ninety miles away. The 12,000 horse power runs street cars and machinery and supplies the city with light and heat. There is less loss of energy than was expected.

MANY of the tall, old houses in the residential streets and even squares of the inner belt of London, which less than a century ago were the houses of the well-to-do, have been cut up into tenements in the perpetual search for rooms to live.

TO OLD POINT COMFORT, RICHMOND, AND WASHINGTON UNDER PERSONAL ESCORT.

The next six-day personally-conducted tour to Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Seventh-day, Fourth month 15.

Tickets, including transportation, meals en route in both directions, transfers of passengers and baggage, hotel accommodations at Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington, and carriage ride about Richmond will be sold at rate of $34.00 from New York, Brooklyn, and Newark; $32.50 from Trenton; $31.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

OLD POINT COMFORT ONLY.

Tickets to Old Point Comfort only, including luncheon on going trip, one and three-fourths day's board at that place, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold in connection with this tour at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

LAST TWO TOURS TO WASHINGTON UNDER PERSONAL ESCORT.

The last two of the present series of Pennsylvania Railroad three-day personally conducted tours to Washington, D. C., will leave Fourth month 20, and Fifth month 11. The rate, $14.50 from New York, $11.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points, includes transportation, hotel accommodations, and Capitol guide fees. An experienced Chaperon will also accompany the party.

For itineraries, tickets, and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

There is but one good make of lamp-chimneys — Macbeth — and your dealer knows it.

You want the Index.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Black Dress Textures

Our showing of Black Dress Textures is concededly as fine as any ever made in Philadelphia. Judge the prices of all by these few.

All-wool French finish Serge, surah twill, double-width.

Special price, 25 cents a yard.

All-wool Plain Black Challis, usually 40 cents.

Special price, 31 cents a yard.

English Mohair Brilliantine, brilliant lustre, 45 inches wide.

Special price, 50 cents a yard.

All-wool Grenadine Voile, a very desirable light weight fabric, 45 inches wide, excellent value.

Special price, 75 cents a yard.

English Mohair Brilliantine, a rich quality with a brilliant, high lustre, 45 inches wide, the regular $1.00 quality.

Special price, 75 cents a yard.

All-wool Black Cheviot Suiting, the proper weight for Spring dresses, sponged and shrunk, 48 inches wide.

Special price, $1.00 a yard.

Samples sent upon request.

Mail Orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 15, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 15.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XV.

THE Quakerism of the immediate future has surely a great responsibility, and a great opportunity. . . . If it be faithful, it should gather to itself in brotherhood, not only the poor and the unlettered, but the cultured, and intellectual also. Both require a religion of extreme simplicity.

WILLIAM POLLARD.

From the chapter on the Future of Quakerism, in "Old-Fashioned Quakerism."

BEYOND THE SUNSET.

So, when Time's veil shall fall asunder,
The soul may know
No fearful change, nor sudden wonder.
Nor sink the weight of mystery under,
But with the upward rise, and with the vastness grow.
And all we shrink from now may seem
No new revealing ;
Familiar as our childhood's stream,
Or pleasant memory of a dream,
The loved and cherished Past upon the new life stealing.
Serene and mild, the untried light
May have its dawning ;
And, as in summer's northern night,
The evening and the dawn unite,
The sunset hues of Time blend with the soul's new morning.

—John Greenleaf Whittier.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

MOTHERS—AND FATHERS.

THE accounts in the INTELLIGENCER of the different associations of young people, and others, are often extremely interesting, especially to those who are deprived of attendance thereon. The reading of one in a late issue of the "Home Influence Association," started a train of thought in my mind, to which I wish to give expression in this paper. Much stress is laid upon a mother's duty to her children, and not unduly, for to the mother is committed by nature the first care of the infant, the first nursing, the first tender attention. A mother's love has been, for ages, and still is, held up as the holiest feeling in our human nature, likened unto that that our Heavenly Father feels for the creatures of his care.

We know the sacrifices a mother will make for her child, what dangers she will encounter, what risks she will run to promote its welfare, to provide for its comfort, or to save its life,—sacrifices no other one will make. No wonder then, that "mother love" is so glowingly portrayed, no wonder that on the mother is laid, (shall I say thoughtlessly, by the world?) the burden, the responsibility, of that child's moral training. No wonder, then, that fathers, hearing, and reading of the strength of this love, and knowing of it in their own families, should in many cases be willing, nay, oftener more than willing, that mothers should accept and carry this responsibility to their (the fathers') exclusion from any participation therein. Did the mischief stop here, it would not be so bad; but how often is the lack of responsibility supplemented by influences which all a mother's care, and love, and prayer, and endeavors to the contrary are powerless to counteract. For instance, the mother teaches the child that the use of tobacco, strong drink, profanity, etc., etc., is wrong, physically, morally, and intellectually, and the father may be addicted to all these habits. His example will be stronger than all her precepts, and under its shadow how can she point to one of God's express commands, with the injunction that the child obey it, "Honor thy father," etc. And not alone in these but in many other ways, business integrity, honesty, etc., his example in one hour may destroy the effect of her teaching for years.

Not for anything would I depreciate the mother's love, the mother's formative influence and power on the child, but I would raise the standard of thought and action on the part of fathers. Fathers and mothers should remember that the child is jointly theirs, and therefore is entitled to their joint care, if not directly, then indirectly, the father not suffering his example to oppose, and thus nullify, the good precepts the mother is striving diligently to instil into the receptive mind of the child. It is more often from want of thought, I believe, than from any intention to shirk duty, that fathers err in this respect. They have simply accepted the general idea that the mother is responsible for the future of the child, and do not take the trouble to think for themselves. I am speaking, of course, in general terms, and my readers will bear me out in the assertion that, as such, my statements are only too true. There are exceptions in this, as in other rules, but it is to the mass allusion has been made.

"The mother holds the key to the child's future," says the article referred to in the beginning of this communication. If this be true, would she not turn the key and effectually lock out all intruders against her child's welfare, his happiness, his progress in all that is good? But while she locks with precept, and her example, the father may, by his example, unlock what she has closed, and let in a flood that will entirely wash away all her efforts for the right.

May these few thoughts waken in the minds of indifferent fathers the idea that they too are responsible, that they also hold the keys to their children's future; if so, they will not have been penned in vain.

Holder, Ill.

ELIZABETH H. COALE.

EDWIN M. STANTON.¹

ONE of the most interesting and most remarkable figures in American history, because of his service as Secretary of War from 1862 to 1868, is that of Edwin M. Stanton. His Life, in two handsome volumes, has just been published, the author being George C. Gorham, who was for several years Secretary of the United States Senate, and who has had a good opportunity of knowing the circumstances and conditions at the national capital, amid which Stanton pursued his titanic task. The materials for the work were very scanty. "In the very nature of the case," says G. C. Gorham, "his most important work during the war left no record behind. Mr. Stanton kept no diary, nor did he in any manner concern himself with what should be said of him either by his contemporaries or by posterity. The great mass of papers left by him contain no suggestion of any contribution by him to his biography. The daily conferences between him and President Lincoln at the War Department, where the latter spent much of his time, and the share which he contributed to the conclusions at which they arrived, cannot be known or estimated. They worked together as one man, each supplying something that might be wanting in the other."

Aside from the great interest which every American takes in Stanton's career, in the intense years of the civil war, we have always had a special and peculiar interest in him, because of his descent from a line of Friends. The facts as to this are briefly given in this biography; they have been published with some detail in the INTELLIGENCER, in previous time. His father was Dr. David Stanton, of Steubenville, Ohio, (at which place Edwin, the son, was born, 12th month 19, 1814), whose mother, Abigail Stanton, had brought her children, in the year 1800, from North Carolina, to the then new "Northwestern Territory." She was a widow when she made this removal, her husband, Benjamin Stanton, having died in North Carolina about 1787. Both were Friends, and he, by his will, manumitted his slaves, as the Society by that time was requiring its members to do. She was a Macy, her family from New England,—presumably Nantucket.

Dr. David Stanton married Lucy Oliver, who was not a Friend, and he was disowned for not making a sufficient acknowledgment. But his house was open to visitors of the Friendly character, and "every week during 1821," we are told in this biography, "Benjamin Lundy, Quaker Abolitionist, came there to bring, for distribution therefrom, his edition of 'The Universal Genius of Emancipation,' an anti-slavery journal published by him at Mount Pleasant, where he also made saddles for a livelihood, and to eke out the cost of printing his paper." Dr. Stanton died, a comparatively poor man, in 1827, leaving his widow with four children to care for. Edwin, thirteen years old, was the eldest; he was placed in a book-store to help the family support, at four dollars a month. Later, in his seventeenth year, after patient and earnest striving, and saving, and study at night—such as few boys, in these days, go through—he entered Kenyon College, at Gambier, Ohio, hoping to complete the course. This, however, he could not do; his money gave out, and he was compelled to leave in his junior year, in 1833. "In a letter written that year he complains bitterly of a disappointment which rendered it impossible for him to realize the hope he had entertained of being able to remain at least one year longer in college."

After leaving Kenyon he entered as soon as possible on the study of the law, which had been his ambition, and excepting the six years spent in the War Department, it is as a lawyer that he was known. He began his studies soon after leaving college, and in 1836 he was admitted to the bar, and began practice at Cadiz, the county-seat of Harrison county,—adjoining that in which he was born. He was then twenty-two years old, but considerably earlier than this, when he began to study law, he had formed an engagement with a young woman, Mary Ann, daughter of William Lamson, of Columbus, Ohio, and the marriage took place on the last day of 1836. "In the spring following they went to housekeeping in a very modest way, in a house but partially finished, at the edge of that town [Cadiz]. . . . This removal did not take place, however, until the young husband, leaving his wife at Judge Tappan's, [in Steubenville] had made a journey over the mountains of Virginia, for the dutiful purpose of escorting home his mother, who had been spending the winter there with her family. In all periods of his life, and under all circumstances, his devotion to his mother was a marked trait in his character."

As a lawyer, he soon attracted notice. He was appointed, the year he began practice, prosecuting attorney of the county, and presently had other engagements. In 1839 he removed from Cadiz to Steubenville, in 1847 to Pittsburg, in 1856 to Washington City. Perhaps his most famous case was the suit which he brought in the Supreme Court of the United States, in 1849, in behalf of the State of Pennsylvania, against the company which had been chartered by the State of Virginia to build a bridge across the Ohio river at Wheeling. It was feared at Pittsburg that the bridge would obstruct the river, and make Wheeling the "head of navigation," so that Pittsburg would be ruined. It was considered a very dubious undertaking to bring the suit, but Stanton achieved a complete success, the Court accepting his view of the case completely, and compelling the revision of the bridge plan so that the river would be freely navigable. Another great legal triumph which he achieved was the investigation and discovery in 1858, of fraudulent claims to land in California, under alleged Mexican "grants." This was a most important piece of work, and showed his abilities at their best. It may be fair to remark, here, as to the Mexican system, that the records of land grants "were found to have been admirably kept and indexed," and also that the "high character" of Jimeno, who had been the Mexican official in charge of those grants for many years, "stood the test of all the investigations."

¹ "Life and Public Services of Edwin M. Stanton." By George C. Gorham. With Portraits, Maps, and Facsimiles of Important Letters. In two volumes. Pp. xvi., and 456, xvi., and 502. $6.00. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1899.

We cannot undertake, here, to discuss Stanton's services as Secretary, and his relations to the war, nor to consider the complicated and trying situation which arose after President Lincoln's death, (Fourth month 15, 1865), when Andrew Johnson succeeded to the presidency. For several weeks, in 1868, (just preceding the impeachment trial of Johnson), Stanton remained day and night in the War Department building, not venturing to leave, for fear General Lorenzo Thomas, who had been designated to succeed him by the President, but whose appointment was not legal, should take possession in his absence. (The writer of this notice well remembers a call upon him, in his office in the Department, in company with Judge William D. Kelley, in the period when he was thus "holding" the building.) The election of General Grant to the Presidency, in 1868, closed this chapter of politics, and the following year, when Judge Robert C. Grier resigned from the Supreme bench, President Grant appointed Stanton to the vacancy. But he was then fatally ill, and died, (Twelfth month 24, 1869), four days after the appointment.

Secretary Stanton's first wife, Mary Ann Lawson, died in 1844, and in 1856 he married Ellen Hutchison, daughter of James Hutchison, a wealthy merchant of Pittsburg. By the first marriage there were two children, both deceased; by the second four, of whom three survive.

The traits of Stanton's character which command notice were his courage and his integrity. He entered the Cabinet comparatively well off, and when he left it had little property remaining but the house he lived in. He had been obliged to borrow some money, and the persons making the loans desired that they should be regarded as gifts, but he refused, while later a friend who had begun to raise a fund of $100,000 for him was compelled by his remonstrances to desist. His relations to President Lincoln were of the closest character. When Chief Justice Taney died, in 1864, it was proposed to appoint Stanton in his place, and this would have been his highest ambition, but Lincoln made the condition, (to Bishop Matthew Simpson): "If you find me another Secretary of War like him, I will gladly appoint him." John Hay, now Secretary of State, was one of President Lincoln's private secretaries, and on the President's death he wrote to Stanton: "Not everyone knows as I do how close you stood to our lost leader. How he loved you and trusted you, and how vain were all the efforts to shake that trust and confidence, not lightly given and never withdrawn. All this will be known sometime, of course, to his honor and yours."

REPENTANCE without amendment is like continual pumping in a ship, without stopping the leaks.
—Palmer.

THOSE are the best Christians who are more careful to reform themselves than to censure others.—Fuller.

GOD resisteth the proud, but giveth grace to the humble.—James, iv., 6.

CHILD DEVELOPMENT

BY MARY H. WHITSON, PHILADELPHIA

(Concluded from last issue)

THE world is coming rapidly to recognize that of all the professions for which careful, conscientious training is needed, not one requires that broad knowledge and culture, that high ideal and earnest devotion thereto, that motherhood, that parenthood does. And so there is growing up a science of motherhood, of parenthood, and concerned minds are speaking and writing the general facts and principles that close observation, experience, and study have made known. One of the new things in the educational world is child study, and with it, perhaps from it, has come a realization of the need of parent study, i. e., a study of parents and by parents.

Students along this line will find great help in the publications of Dr. Mary Wood-Allen, Ann Arbor, Mich., and Dr. A. B. Stockham, 277 Madison St., Chicago. "Teaching Truth," by Dr. Wood-Allen, and her periodical, "The New Crusade," are especially suggestive.

Unrealized power lies in the hands of the mother. By her food and daily care the child may be made strong and healthy, or weak and delicate. The growth of intelligence in the eye and in the use of the hands not only delights her, but mutely cries out to her for proper nourishment and development. This growth must not be forced but wisely fostered. Psychologists assure us that the various brain centers have periods at which each can be best developed; that period neglected, the fullest development is rarely attained. The universe may be opened to the growing mind, or the faculties may be so neglected that the beauties and marvels of every-day life are never apprehended. The young nature is so easily influenced; it may be encouraged to send its delicate tendrils out in every direction, ready to absorb from every source of nourishment, or it may be forced by neglect or harshness to remain stunted and undeveloped.

Observe the children of the poor working-woman, who has not time to give much thought to the child she has perhaps brought unwillingly into the world. Baby soon learns that it is wisest to keep still. Visitors to sweat-shop districts tell us that the babies there lie or sit hour after hour, stupidly quiet, scarce uttering a cry or a murmur. What a sin against humanity to stunt thus a human soul!

My plea is for an encouragement of the natural activities of the child. I know a mother whose little son insisted on climbing up the porch trellis. Instead of saying, "Don't, Rodney, you will fall and hurt yourself," her words were, "all right, dear, let me help you." She was never too busy to lay aside her work and assist the little arms and legs in the desired performance. The feat once performed to his satisfaction, the desire to do it disappeared.

There lingers in my memory an incident told by a wise kindergartner. A new little boy came to the kindergarten one morning, and to the surprise of the other children, the teacher let him climb over the benches and chairs as he seemed to desire to do, rather than to join in the games and songs of the other children. The teacher explained that Johnny had never seen those chairs and tables before, and that he was becoming acquainted with them. As she expected, before the close of the second day he had satisfied his curiosity in that line and then he turned his attention to his little companions.

The child's instincts will generally guide him toward the information he needs, and our care must be to provide all things we can for his inspection. Mother, before you say "Don't," try to see why baby is inclined to do that for which you are correcting him. It may be just the thing he should do. And remember that the best way to say "Don't do that" is to say "Do this."

Every fault is but the lack of some virtue, and if the virtue be developed, the fault will die for want of nourishment. Cultivate in anyone a love for goodness, form high ideals, and government will come from within rather than from without. Those having charge of children are too often satisfied with having the right thing done, rather than to have the right thing chosen.

So put aside your impatience and selfishness and study the impulses of your child. Remember it is his life he is living, his nature he is developing, not yours. Do not be so much in love with yourself that you wish to make another you. An all-wise Creator, who never made two leaves alike has given even greater variety to his human plants.

But we must not forget the power of example; we must not only study to guide wisely, but strive to exemplify the high ideals we would build up in the child's mind. Gail Hamilton says, "The best way to bring up a child in the way he should go, is to go that way yourself."

Persons who have spent years among the Indians say they never scold their children, but by talking to them and showing them the reason for acting thus and so, they lead the children to do as they wish. And it may be the child should not do as you think it should. Beliefs are matters of education, often of wrong education. Unless you can view a matter from the child's standpoint as well as your own, you cannot be sure.

Happy are those parents and children, or teachers and children, who have the sympathy with each other which comes from a common standpoint. And since the child cannot possibly view anything from the parents' or teachers' point of view, they must come to his.

This sympathy will make us treat children with the same consideration that we do grown people. Their feelings are fully as sensitive, if not more so, and their ideas of justice, though the result of instinct rather than of reason, are very keen. Rudeness is as inexcusable and politeness as much appreciated when the recipient is a child as when it is a cultured adult.

Honor a child's questions and requests as you would a friend's of larger growth. The question is the legitimate seeking of an expanding mind for knowledge, and the tendency should be guided rather than checked. Many adults are suffering to-day because a sensitive nature was repressed rather than encouraged in its early questionings.

Punishments are doubtless sometimes necessary, but let them be retributive, coming as naturally and as unfailingly as does the burn when the little finger touches the hot stove,—no threats, no fuss,—but the burn is there, and few experiences are necessary to impress the lesson. In Sparta, when a child committed a crime, the father was punished. Possibly if strict justice were done to-day, parents might be exchanging places with their children in reformatories and jails; mothers and nurses might be standing in corners or lying abed; and teachers working over unprepared lessons or tasks assigned for disorder.

Humanity is but in a stage of evolution, and what is considered mistakes or wrong-doing as viewed from a higher plane of development, is but ignorance or lack of development of the lower plane which we are criticising. Hence, harshness and carping, warping criticism and condemnation, are not what are required of us, but education, and a helping hand.

Perhaps much of what I have said may not apply to any of my hearers, but it has been in my heart to say it, and some of the thoughts may be worthy to be passed on to those who do need them.

My experience in homes and with children has been wide, and the loving sympathy between parents and children, the coöperation and consideration for others which I have found in so many Friendly homes, linger as happy pictures in my memory.

But there are other homes and other conditions. I meet the children from both, and the contrast makes one's heart ache. My concern is that from the better home circles shall go waves of thought and action that will lift the world to a higher plane.

Because I believe that humanity can make rapid strides upward, and that it must be effected through the knowledge and efforts of consecrated parents and teachers, I have been willing to speak to you on this subject, hoping to stimulate some minds, which in their turn may magnetize others, till in our search after knowledge we shall all be drawn nearer to the great loadstone of Truth.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 17.—FOURTH MONTH 23.

THE EXODUS.

(Between 1300 B. C.—1200 B. C.)

GOLDEN TEXT.—The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil: . . . Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them.—Exodus, xv., 9-10.

Scripture Reading.—Exodus, vi., 1-13; xiii., 3-10.

It is generally conceded that the Pharaoh of the Exodus was Menephtah, the son of Rameses II., the oppressor. There is one inscription which seems to remove the whole series of events to an earlier date, and on the other hand the relations of Egypt and Canaan at the time of the Exodus accord better with a somewhat later time. But on the whole the conditions of the reign of Menephtah agree more generally with the requirements of the Bible story than those of any other reign.

Menephtah had continued the policy of his father in his relations with foreign countries, and also, in the main, in domestic policy. The oppression was continued or was increased. A danger from outside may have mitigated for a time the hardships of the Israelites. A great invasion of Egypt from the west occurred during the reign of Menephtah. A league of the Libyans of Africa with the mixed inhabitants of the Ionian islands and perhaps also with those of the mainland of Europe threatened Egypt with destruction. For a time the fate of the nation hung in the balance, and it is to be supposed that in such a time of crisis the burdens of the slaves may have been lightened, since it would have been folly to goad to desperation a people within the land who might give valuable aid to the enemies from without. But Egyptian arms were finally victorious in a great battle, and the tide of invasion rolled back. It is of interest here to remark that the Philistines, afterward the great enemies of the Hebrew nation, may have been a remnant of this great invasion. After this successful war the reasons for lightening the burdens of the slaves would disappear, and the greed of the king for enduring monuments probably soon demanded renewed sacrifice of human life in the dreary grind of slavery. At this time of renewed suffering, the more galling for the brief respite, occurred, we may suppose, the return of Moses from the desert to his people.

The idea of Moses at first was not the entire liberation of his people, but their recall to the religion of their forefathers. Doubtless, however, it was soon made plain to him that any renewal of spiritual life was impossible under the conditions of slavery. The first demand for permission to make a "Haj" or religious pilgrimage to the wilderness, there to make sacrifice to Jehovah, was soon increased to a demand for freedom. The necessity for a pilgrimage if sacrifice was to be offered lay in the divine honors paid to many animals by the Egyptians. The sacrificial rites of the Hebrews would have been awful sacrilege in their eyes.

As to the miraculous plagues by which, as we are told, Moses enforced his demand, there is little to say. It is worthy of note that all of the afflictions spoken of in the ten plagues either are common, or at least are known, in Egypt. The plagues of flies, of lice (better translated "insects"), and of locusts, are of almost annual occurrence. It is said that dried larvæ of insects among the dust spring into life with the slightest touch of moisture, and thus the advancing Nile flood is preceded by vast swarms of them. Frogs also in the swampy delta country sometimes become so abundant as to amount to a severe plague. When the desert winds blow for a long time (the Chamsin), the sun is darkened, and there are a few occasions on record when the darkness was so great that it was believed that the end of the world had come. Even the changing of the water to blood is not without a possible parallel. There have been several cases, told by travelers, when the Nile waters were colored a deep red by multitudes of microscopic algæ. The diseases mentioned of cattle and of men are the common Egyptian diseases.

There is no intention in this presentation to raise the question of the possibility of the miraculous. We do not know and cannot know the ways of Him who "laid the foundations of the earth," who "shut up the sea," who "commanded the morning," and who "binds the sweet influences of the Pleiades." To question the power of God is meaningless. The question of the plagues of Egypt is one simply of historical facts, and the evidence concerning them is wholly traditional. It is probable, indeed, that there is some basis for the tradition, but what that basis is must be left an open question. There is some reason in the monumental records of Egypt to believe that the eldest son of Menephtah died before his father, but even this much is doubtful, and it is all that can be added to the narrative in Exodus. The tendency to look for signs and wonders as evidence of God's dealing with man is a strong one. "Show us a sign and we will believe." But it is an unworthy tendency, and one condemned by the Master of Nazareth as by many another since. The orderly cause of nature is not less but rather more the evidence of God's care than would be some surprising infraction of that order. It has been said that "the undevout astronomer is mad," and this is because astronomy more than any other science is one of clearly defined order. Violence and variability—shock and upheaval—these are signs of weakness rather than of strength; are evidences of temporary and destructive powers rather than eternal and creative ones.

The demand for permission to withdraw was at last granted, and hasty preparations for immediate departure were at once made. This crisis of national life made a deep and lasting impression on the Hebrew people. In commemoration of the hurried departure the Passover feast remains even unto this day among devout Jews. The bread baked hurriedly and with no time for the working of leaven, the lamb eaten while standing and girded for a journey are the marks of haste. After the exile it became the principal feast of the Jewish year. However far removed, it was always the aim of the son of Israel to return to Jerusalem for the Passover. Before that time it was much less prominent, if indeed it was celebrated at all. The close association of the chief events of the life of Jesus with the Passover feasts will not be forgotten.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 17.—FOURTH MONTH 23.

THE WAY, THE TRUTH, AND THE LIFE.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The words that I say unto you I speak not from myself, but the Father, abiding in me, doeth his works.—John, xiv., 10.

Read the Scripture, John, xiv., 1-14.

REVISED VERSION.

THE gathering in the "upper room" to eat the Passover supper was presented in the last lesson. It is presumed to have been the evening of the 6th of April, (fifth-day of the week), the evening before the Crucifixion.

The lesson consists entirely of a portion of the discourse of Jesus to his companions, after the supper had been eaten, and is, indeed, but the introductory part of it, for three chapters of John, fourteenth to sixteenth, are entirely occupied with the parting words of Jesus, on this occasion. They are found only in John; the other three gospels do not give them.

Following the incident of the washing, Jesus had added words of explanation, and then he had disclosed his knowledge that one of those present would betray him. Judas then left the room. He had, according to the account in Matthew (xxvi., 14-16) agreed with the chief priests, for thirty pieces of silver, to "deliver" Jesus to them. "When, therefore, he was gone out," Jesus addressed the company, and intimated to them his own early departure. Then he said, "A new commandment I give unto you—that ye love one another, even as I have loved you." And he added another of those most important words of reminder against mere profession without reality, "By this shall all men know that ye are my disciples, if ye have love one to another." It is the supreme test of discipleship; if love be not shown by those who profess Christianity, they are none of his.

"To Thee our full humanity,
Its joys and pains, belong;
The wrong of man to man on Thee
Inflicts a deeper wrong.

"Who hates, hates thee, who loves becomes Therein to thee allied;
All sweet accords of hearts and homes
In thee are multiplied." (Whittier.)

The lessons to follow will take for study other extracts from this great parting discourse of the Divine Master, but it is not desirable, even if it were practicable, to detach any part of it from the rest. The whole of it should be read and attentively considered. Not simply in detached texts, but as an entirety, it contains the vitality of the Christian gospel.

There is comfort in the assurance that in our Father's house there are many mansions, and that Jesus, Son of the Father, sent upon earth, will "prepare" them for those who follow him. The thought suggests the parable of the Prodigal, who returned to the house of his Father, and illustrates that beautiful feature of our faith, the Divine Paternity, the One who has created all, and who provides for all, whose shelter is boundless, whose provision knows no limit, whose "mansions" are innumerable.

"I come again, and will receive you unto myself." The coming of the Christ spirit—that divine outflow which filled Jesus and made him Christ—must be inward and spiritual. It is not outward, not a reappearing in human form. The visitations of the Christ to the children of men are not a "second" advent, but an advent perpetually and continually. The discourse, following the present lesson, presents this great truth in different forms, and will be treated of in following lessons.

"I am the way, the truth, and the life." Not in the outward merely, not only in the human life and example which had been shown in Palestine, in the brief time of which we have a fragmentary account, but supremely in that possession and manifestation of the Spirit of God which was the characteristic of his appearing. This made the "way," and was the "truth," and was the "life." And not only in the past tense but in the present, and ever. There can be no life outside of that which proceeds from the Eternal Source. There can be no way which does not lead to him. There can be no truth but his. The testimony of Jesus was given—as so often elsewhere—in the words of the golden text, to the power in him derived of the Father: "The words that I say unto you I speak not from myself: but the Father, abiding in me, doeth his works."

"No one cometh unto the Father but by me." By him, not in the outward, but in the inward appearing. Not through a door opened by physical means, to the sight and knowledge of the senses, but by the spiritual power of God exercised in the heart and soul. That—the Word, the Greek Logos, was in the beginning, and was and is eternally. In it Jesus abode, and by it not only the disciples gathered for the pass-over in that upper chamber in the Jewish city, but all the children of the Father, have access to him. "The words that I have spoken unto you," said Jesus, (John, vi., 63), "are spirit and are life."

FRIENDS IN SOUTHERN FRANCE.

Letter from Joseph G. Alexander in the (London) Friend. (His brother, referred to in the letter, is Samuel J. Alexander.)

CONGENIES, 12th March, 1899.

WRITING from this ancient centre of French Quakerism, the home of Christine Alsop and Lydie Majolier, the only place in France that contains a Friends' meeting-house, fragrant with memories of Stephen Grellet, Elizabeth Fry, Eli and Sybil Jones, and many other Quaker worthies, a touch of sadness is almost inevitable. One feels in sympathy with the remarks of Mary Ann Schimmelpenninck, when, visiting Coalbrookdale in her later days, recalling the memories of Richard Reynolds and Deborah Darby, and their contemporaries, she wrote that over all seemed to be written "Ichabod: the glory is departed." It is not merely that French Quakerism seems dying out in this once favored village. It was also the birthplace of French Methodism, whose founder, Pastor Cook, found a home and a welcome in the house of Louis Majolier, as I remember to have been told by his daughter, Christine Alsop. To-day the Methodist and Reformed Churches of Congénies seem as little able to influence the young and strong men of the village as the little surviving band of French Friends. Here, as in almost all this Protestant district, the lack of men, especially young men, in the Protestant Churches, is deplorable. I have felt it right to stir up the Christians of Congénies to make this a matter of earnest and persevering prayer. Will not some readers of The Friend join with them?

I am thankful to say that amongst the young women we hear of a very gratifying movement. In one extremely dark town, which my brother and I have both had laid on our hearts, but in which, after knocking at every available door, we have found it impossible at present to obtain an entrance, we were thankful to learn that a branch of the Y. W. C. A. has been formed, with the assistance of the Nîmes Association, which sends over two delegates every Sunday to attend its meetings. The president of this newly formed Association is the daughter of a Friend, and was a pupil at the Friends School at Nîmes ; she now finds the Scriptural teaching she there received of the greatest value. Similarly, in another town, where formerly a Friends' meeting existed, and where B. Combe and I joined at a meeting in the "temple" last week, a Y. W. C. A. has been recently organized, also under the leadership of a Friend's daughter. So the seed sown in faith and amidst not a little discouragement is springing up after many days.

My brother Samuel and I have now been privileged to work together for nearly a month. This day four weeks (Sunday) he spent with the interesting Welsh colony at Basse Indre, near Nantes, where two devoted English ladies are now working, not only amongst the Welsh, but also amongst their French neighbors, with manifold signs of blessing. I spent the day at Saumur, on the Loire, with an old friend, the pastor of that city, who has occupied the same post for more than thirty years. His "temple" was well filled in the evening for my lecture on the progress of the Gospel in the East. I had also addressed his Sunday-school in the morning, and a gathering of Protestants in the afternoon.

Next day we joined forces, and attended a meeting at Poitiers. Thence to St. Soline, a remote village in Poitou, where the pastor is an earnest young man whom we had both met at Montauban. My brother stayed three days with him, having a meeting each evening. I left on the third day, having arranged to spend a night with Mr. Hathaway, an Englishman who, with his wife, has been led to devote himself to work in France. In a purely Catholic village they have gathered a congregation of about sixty, about half of whom are decided Christians. Last summer they were attacked by a band organized by the priests, and stones thrown which injured several of the workers ; but the police took proceedings against the disturbers, whose delusion that foreigners were not protected by the French law was dispelled by the decision of the local Court, confirmed by the Court of Appeal at Bordeaux.

[J. G. A. here speaks of visits to Arcachon, La Teste, and Pau. At the last named place, near the borders of Spain, he "attended the meeting of an interesting Spanish mission." He proceeds:]

After an evening at Béziers, where we spoke to the children of the Thursday school, and in the evening my brother gave his Palestine address in the chapel of the Free Church, we reached Congénies, which has been our headquarters for the past fortnight. Sunday, 26th, was the half-yearly meeting of Friends in the South of France ; B. Combe, who is their Clerk, and only recorded minister, had come over from Montmeyran to attend it, as well as several Friends from Fontanès. We had hoped to see Anna Vally, from St. Gilles, who returned to France last year after some ten years' absence in California. She was not feeling well enough to attend, but sent a letter giving her opinion on the subjects it was proposed to consider, and we subsequently went over to St. Gilles to see her.

The morning meeting for worship was attended by thirty-six, including children, and the business meeting in the afternoon by only nine besides ourselves. An interesting part of the business was the proposal to acknowledge the gift of the dear Friend who ministers to our friends at Fontanès ; a proposal which was very heartily and unanimously agreed to. She had not been previously informed of the proposal, so we were asked to see her with regard to it on behalf of the meeting, as they did not desire to act against her decided wish. We have discharged this commission, but, after taking a week to consider her answer, our friend does not feel able to accept the proposal, and we are reporting accordingly. The opportunity was availed of for a brief exposition of the grounds on which our Society recognizes women as being equal with men, called to exercise the gift of prophecy.

On Wednesday week we had a meeting for Friends and those connected with them at Nîmes in the house of one of their number, when twenty-six were present. B. Combe was with us at this meeting, and left for home the following morning. Next day I gave my lecture at Nîmes to the inmates of the interesting institutions under the management of Pastor Kruger ; the day before yesterday my brother gave them his Palestine lecture. Last Monday, after an interesting village meeting in the afternoon, I lectured at Caloison, where the "temple" was filled with an audience of between 400 and 500. On Tuesday we went to Lasalle, a considerable village amongst the Cevennes mountains, in which a beloved cousin spent several months in 1877, shortly before her death, under the roof of Madame Monteil, who was our kind hostess.

To-day my brother cycled over from Fontanès to join in a public meeting in the Friends' meeting-house at 3.30 p. m. ; before which I had addressed the large Sunday-school in the "temple." Both the pastors were at our afternoon meeting, which was attended by about fifty, and was felt to be a helpful time, the Methodist pastor offering prayer very acceptably at the close. We have attended his evening service, both taking some part at the close. We trust we have been permitted to be the means of infusing some fresh hope and confidence into the hearts of Christian people here who were tempted to let their hands hang down in despair ; and we have received many kind expressions of thankfulness for our visit.

It is easier to answer an opponent by calling him names than by meeting his argument. Nowadays the man who raises a cautionary signal, or calls a halt that men may stop and think, is branded as pessimistic or heterodox. But such a one is often the most truly orthodox, or in the highest sense optimistic. It is just because he is seeking the truth, and because he believes in the best, that he is misinterpreted by those who cannot, or will not, calmly sit down and think, as he does. Many a man who preaches optimism lives, in effect, pessimistically.—Sunday School Times.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 15, 1899.

THE GREAT CONFERENCE.

ARRANGEMENTS are progressing for the International Conference called by the Czar, and in a few weeks it will become a historic actuality. The place of meeting is the capital of the Netherlands, the city of The Hague, and the time the 18th of next month. The principal nations have been formally invited to send representatives, and the names of many of these have been announced.

In the midst of the discussions of the Conference, there are a few facts which stand out conspicuously, and which give to it enormous importance. These are (1) that such a Conference should be assembled, by one of the most powerful of the European military nations; (2) that in the call for it the Czar should have candidly declared the abominations of militarism; (3) that upon these, and the imperative necessity for relief from them, he rests the reason for making the call; (4) that, being thus assembled, under circumstances so dignified, and so formal, nothing but its own treachery to the interests of mankind, and infidelity to the Christian religion, can prevent some measure of good coming out of it.

Upon some of these points it is worth while to dwell a moment. One of them is the character of the Czar's call. It is a document such as the world has rarely been favored with. It is not a qualified or cautious statement of the military burden resting on the people of Europe, and threatening those of the United States, but a definite and emphatic one. It is not an invitation to some discussion of arbitration; it is a declaration of the evils of war, and the desirability of peace. If some private person, some known philanthropist, had written this,—as thousands have, thousands of times over,—it would not have been notable, however worthy; but from the emperor of Russia it is at once wonderful and honorable. A re-reading of the document may well repay every one who is not fully familiar with it. They will find, perhaps to their surprise, what a declaration against war it is, and what a plea for relief from those who desire to torment the world with processes of death and destruction.

The discussion of the Czar's sincerity is idle, besides being insulting. Suppose it be true that the great bureaucratic system which is established in Russia has persecuted the Doukhobors, and that it is now forcing Finland into the Russian mould, as Poland has been forced, these facts do not discredit the sincerity of the Czar himself, and if they did, they do not justify betrayal by the Conference of the great duty and opportunity which lie before it. The Conference is called; it is about to assemble; it may, and can, greatly mitigate the present burden and horror of war; nothing can excuse its failure to do so.

We hope for much from our American representatives. Dr. White is surely a peaceful, if not distinctively a peace man, and he has seen too much of the world's misery under the war horror not to desire to do something, at this zenith of his extended and honorable public career, for its amelioration. President Low, of Columbia, is one of those whom many have looked to as a leader in right ways. His voice, so far as we have observed, has been silent—unlike that of President Eliot, of Harvard—in the present crisis, but it can hardly be imagined that he would not sincerely serve the United States, as a great nation of peaceful and fair dealing, in the important place to which he has now been appointed. Of our minister to the Netherlands, Stanford Newell, we have no special knowledge. The representative of the Navy, Captain Mahan, has shown himself in his books an ardent advocate of the system of great armaments, and a teacher of the advantage of "naval power." It is to be hoped he will not be of those—great numbers of whom will no doubt gather at The Hague—who will seek to prevent any important result coming out of the Conference. Frederick W. Holls, secretary of the commission, is a man whose public ideals have been honorable.

If—but unfortunately it is if—our own national record were clean, and our hands at this moment free from war stain; if, also, our Government at Washington were a vigorous and earnest exponent of the principles upon which the republic is established, the representatives whom we are sending to The Hague could, and would, go to the front, the very fore-front, in efforts to bring out of its deliberations a high conclusion. What, let us ask, would Abraham Lincoln say to Dr. White and his associates, if he were now President? What, indeed, would that quiet, clear-minded, magnanimous friend of peace, Ulysses S. Grant, say?

SEVERAL signed addresses to the Czar—some of them numerous signed—have been received by the INTELLIGENCER, and have been forwarded through friends of the work, who have been sending others. We take this means of acknowledging them to those who got them up and sent them to us.

THE annual Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration, the fifth of the series, will be held this year, (upon the invitations sent out by A. K. Smiley), on the last day of Fifth month, and the two days following.

BOOKER T. WASHINGTON, Principal of the great school for colored youth, at Tuskegee, Alabama, will deliver an address at the Academy of Music, Philadelphia, on the evening of the 25th, on "The Solution of the Race Problem in the Black Belt of the South." Bishop McVickar, formerly of this city, will preside and address the meeting. It is desired to make the interest thus awakened the means of bringing substantial aid to the Tuskegee work, and a guarantee fund is being raised. Checks should be made to the order of Booker T. Washington, and sent to Henry C. Davis, 204 Walnut Place, Philadelphia.

The annual expenses at Tuskegee, it is stated, are about $100,000. Of this sum $10,000 is granted by the Peabody Fund, and $2,500 by the State of Alabama, and the balance is raised by the personal efforts of Booker Washington. The General Government has lately granted the School 25,000 acres of Government land, in Alabama, and in time this will be available in some way.

E. H. TRUEBLOOD desires us to correct two dates in his article in our issue of the 1st instant. On the first page, (eighteenth line from top of second column), the date when the first meeting was held at the house of Nathan Trueblood should be 1839, not 1809; and in the first line at top of next page the date (of Beeson Baynes's certificate) should be 1855, not 1865.

BIRTHS.

FLITCRAFT.—At Haddonfield, New Jersey, Third month 3, 1899, to Warren Whitney and Martha W. Reeves Flitcraft, a daughter, who is named Ruth Roberts Flitcraft.

MARRIAGES.

PHILIPS—PIERCE.—At the residence of the bride's parents, Tacoma, Washington, Fourth month 4, 1899, Albert C. Philips, of Tacoma, son of Caroline E. and Isaac D. Philips, of Wilmington, Delaware, and Alice Marion, only daughter of Eben and Marion H. Pierce.

DEATHS.

BURILL.—At Fox Chase, Fourth month 8, 1899, Annie, widow of John Burill, in her 90th year. Interment at Buckingham Meeting, Pa.

COGGINS.—Fourth month 8, 1899, Mary W., widow of Paschall Coggins, and daughter of the late Thomas Williamson, of Philadelphia, aged 73 years.

COOK.—After about two weeks' illness of la grippe, at his home near Chatham, Chester county, Pa., Third month 3, 1899, Ennion J. Cook, in his 85th year.

"One less at home!"

The charmed circle broken—a dear face
Missed day by day from its usual place,
But cleansed, saved, perfected by grace,
One more in Heaven!" C.

EVANS.—At Moorestown, N. J., Fourth month 2, 1899, Joshua R. Evans, in his 59th year; a member of Chester Monthly Meeting of Friends.

FELL.—At Orlando, Florida, Fourth month 3, 1899, Mary Meredith Fell, of Swarthmore, Pa., wife of Oliver S. Fell; a member of Philadelphia Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Race Street.

Interment at Marlborough, Chester county, Pa., Friends' ground, on the 7th.

HAMBLETON.—At Oskaloosa, Iowa, Fourth month 2, 1899, of pneumonia, Levi Hambleton, in the 79th year of his age.

He was born in Columbiana county, Ohio, and was a birthright member of Friends. He was very social by nature and had a large circle of relatives and friends both East and West, particularly in Chester county, Pa. He removed to Oskaloosa, Iowa, in 1871, where he became a very earnest member of the larger body of Friends, and was active in the establishment of Penn College, being one of its Board of Trustees. A man of Christian character, his close was "bright and cheerful," and he has gone to his reward, missed by "many, many friends." H.

HOGGE.—At an early hour Third-day morning, Fourth month 4, 1899, at his residence near Lincoln, Va., William Hoge, in the 78th year of his age.

In his young manhood the deceased married Rachel, a half-sister of Samuel M. Janney, and joined in membership with Goose Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends at the same time. The wife passed from works to rewards less than a year ago. Our brother was called to the duties of an elder at an unusually early age, and served his meeting in that station with dignity and propriety, until recently, when failing health forbid. A home newspaper says: "Wherever known, William Hoge was universally regarded as an honest, upright man, and good citizen." Two sons, George and Charles—both married—survive him. He was a brother of Jesse Hoge. H. R. H.

JACKSON.—In Washington City, Third month 18, 1899, Joseph R. Jackson.

Though not a member, he was a frequent attender of Friends' meeting, where his words of love and helpfulness were appreciated. H.

JAMES.—In Göttingen, Germany, Anna M. James, of West Chester, Pa.

She was the daughter of the late Francis James, and had been spending some time abroad, but was preparing to return, when she was taken ill with pneumonia. Word of her death was cabled to her friends at West Chester, on Fourth month 3, 1899. She was formerly a constant attender at High Street Friends' Meeting, where she was greatly beloved. A large circle of friends mourn her death, for her life was one of unselfishness and full of unobtrusive kindnesses. Though dying far from her home and home friends, she could not be separated from her Divine Father, who has now taken her into his eternal keeping. *

KNIGHT.—Third month 30, 1899, at Tacony, Philadelphia, Amos W. Knight, in his 64th year; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Green Street, Philadelphia.

MOORE.—In Philadelphia, Fourth month 7, 1899, Rachel Leedom, wife of Davis Moore, aged 77 years. Interment at Merion Friends' ground.

REES.—At his home near Whitehall, Frederick county, Virginia, Twelfth month 29, 1898, John N. Rees, aged 55 years.

The deceased was a member of Hopewell Monthly, and Ridge Particular Meetings. He was raised by his grandparents, John and Mary Purcell, being left an orphan when quite young. He was highly esteemed in his community, and has left an influence for good by "doing justly, loving mercy, and walking humbly."

Interment at Hopewell. *

RIDER.—Entered into rest, at the home of her son, James C. Rider, Central Valley, N. Y., Third month 28, 1899, Mary A. Cornell, widow of Charles C. Rider, in the 71st year of her age.

THISTLETHWAITE.—Third month 13, 1899, at the home of her brother, Timothy Thistlethwaite, West Richmond, Ind., Eleanor Thistlethwaite.

She was born Ninth month 1, 1815, at Baynton, in the parish of Baynton, Yorkshire, England. Throughout her life, she was ever the devoted, self-sacrificing daughter, sister, friend. She was of an exceptionally modest and retiring disposition. Her love of knowledge, and quiet tastes, led her to devote much time to reading. She was not only familiar with the best standard literature but kept abreast with the questions and interests of the day.

Her last sufferings, extending through many years, were borne with uncomplaining fortitude. B.

TOMPKINS.—Fifth-day, Third month 30, 1899, at her home, Baldwin Place, N. Y., Esther Ann Tompkins, aged 71 years.

The funeral, at Amawalk meeting-house, Second-day, Fourth month 3, was a large gathering of her friends and neighbors, who were addressed by Robert S. Haviland and Louisa Loder. She was a member of Amawalk Monthly Meeting.

VAIL.—Near Dunellen, New Jersey, of paralysis, Third month 20, 1899, Amos Vail, son of Jonah and Rachel Vail, aged 62 years, 9 months, and 22 days. Interred in Friends' burying-ground at Plainfield, New Jersey, on the 23d.

WILKINSON.—At her home, 1316 Washington Street, Wilmington, Del., on Sixth-day, Third month 24, 1899, Rebecca Wilkinson, in her 94th year; a member of Wilmington Monthly Meeting.

WILSON.—Fourth month 4, 1899, Ann Wilson, a native of Bucks county, Pa., daughter of Joseph and Elizabeth Wildman, aged 97 years, 5 months, and 21 days.

Interment at Somerton Friends' burying-ground, Belmont county, Ohio.

CORRECTION.—Hannah Somers Cook, the notice of whose death appeared in the INTELLIGENCER of Fourth month 8, 1899, died on Third month 29, 1897, (not 1899). She was in the 82d year of her age.

BIRMINGHAM SUMMER SCHOOL.

THE Summer School of Friends in England, following the plan of that at Scarborough two years ago, will be held this year at Birmingham, in the Ninth month, from the 4th to the 15th. The first draft of the program has been printed, and shows lectures and teaching by Prof. R. W. Rogers, Prof. A. C. McGiffert, Paul Sabatier, (of Paris, author of the life of Francis of Assisi), and a number of Friends, including Dr. J. Rendel Harris, Dr. Thomas Hodgkin, John Wm. Graham, W. C. Braithwaite, John Wilhelm Rowntree, Edward Grubb, Joan M. Fry, and others.

One study will be, "The Poetical Literature of the Old Testament," and this will be considered fifty minutes in the morning, of three days. Devotional meetings will be held every day, from 10 to 10.25 a. m. Paul Sabatier's theme is "Francis of Assisi," Prof. McGiffert's, "The Spiritual Conception of the Church," and "The Eucharist, in the light of the Textual and Higher Criticism." John William Graham will speak upon "Isaac Penington," and Frances Thompson on "Emerson." Public meetings will be held in the Town Hall of Birmingham on two evenings, the 5th and 7th, the subjects assigned being "The Ideal Church," and "The Church and Humanity." The school sessions will all be held in the forenoon, and will close at 12.25, except that on the afternoon of the 10th, (First-day), from 3 to 4, M. A. Wallis will speak on "Methods of Christ's Teaching."

The program is certainly a very interesting and attractive one, and may be made the means of blessing, we trust, to Friends and many others. Visitors from this side, who may be in England early in Ninth month, will, we are sure, do well to make a stay in Birmingham part of their program.

EQUAL suffrage has brought a great infusion of conscience into politics. Especially has it elevated the primaries. Before women could vote, you would find at a primary meeting just a small group of men, most of them not of the highest type—professional politicians. Now, the attendance is four times as large, and includes the best citizens in the community, both men and women.—[President Slocum, of Colorado College.]

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

FARMINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING.

FARMINGTON QUARTERLY MEETING was held near Mendon Centre, New York, Fourth month 5, 1899.

We were favored to have the company of our friend Isaac Wilson. He spoke from the text, "My Father worketh hitherto, and I work." In which he emphasized the thought that our salvation is gained by daily works, and that Love instead of fear should control our actions.

Fifth-day morning being public meeting, and notice having been given of Isaac's attendance, a goodly number assembled at the usual hour, 11 a. m.

Isaac was favored to speak at some length in his usual earnest manner on the many things in nature that could unite the dominion of God. How he created man in his image, and made him to be self-controlled. Jesus came and taught us to let the Divine Love and Light so shine that others seeing our light will glorify God. Those possessing the inshining of the Divine Love will have power to control all human passions and become like him. Why are we not living on a higher plane than our ancestors? Each one answering for himself, would not the world be better, the government better, our homes better, if man so accepted the Divine teachings? Would not righteousness reign, and love, truth, and justice be paramount among men?

Did not He when asked to restore life, stoop down and roll away the stone? So we must, if we would lift to a higher plane the down trodden and fallen. We must stoop down to lift them up. Did not Jesus teach to leave the ninety and nine sheep, and go after the one that was lost?

Jesus said, my Father and I are one, one in spirit, one in work, and one in giving and saving power. Can we say, here am I! do with me as thou wilt? help to make me perfect like thee, let my light shine forth upon the world around me, and be led by his spirit to do it in such a way that will redound to the glory of His name. Friends are we so living and doing his work?

W. W. C.

PLAINFIELD MONTHLY MEETING.

At a meeting of the Philanthropic Committee of Plainfield Monthly Meeting, N. J., the following minute was adopted, and the Clerk of the Committee was directed to forward it to the chairman of the American deputation at The Hague:

"We hail with much satisfaction the International Conference, to be held at The Hague next month, at the invitation of the Czar of Russia, to promote disarmament and International Arbitration, and are much gratified that, by appointment of the President of the United States, our own country is to be ably represented at this Conference, and we hereby express earnestly the hope that much may be accomplished by it to discourage destructive war and preparations therefore, and also to inaugurate a Permanent Tribunal of International Arbitration for the peaceful adjustment of International differences."

The following was also adopted, and directed to be forwarded to the President of the United States.

"The Philanthropic Committee of Plainfield Monthly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends greatly regrets the recent official interpretation, by the Attorney-General of the United States, of the late act of Congress concerning the sale of intoxicating liquors in Army Canteens, to the effect that it applies only to such sale by soldiers and officers of the army, and we hereby earnestly appeal to the President to direct the execution of the law in accordance with its obvious intent for the entire suppression of the sale of intoxicating liquors in the Army."

Richland Friends propose holding their Monthly Meeting of Fourth month 28, 1899, at Stroudsburg, Pennsylvania, at two o'clock p. m.

The change of hour is due to the fact that the trains from Philadelphia do not reach Stroudsburg until nearly noon.

It is stated in the Norristown Herald that Friends at Plymouth are about to make extensive improvements to the burying-ground connected with the meeting-house. A fund is being raised for the purpose. A similar improvement was begun in the grounds at Gwynedd, last fall.

Anna M. James, of West Chester, Pa., who died recently at Göttingen, Germany, left a bequest of $1,000 to Friends' Meeting at West Chester. She was the only daughter of the late Francis James, who was a member of the bar of Chester county, and served in the Senate of Pennsylvania. She had been traveling abroad for some time.

A TIME TO SPEAK.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

OUR deplorable state as to our new "dependencies" has given me much concern, as it has I trust very many of our countrymen. The essential unrighteousness of our conduct and present attitude is indeed distressing,—the more so, as we were flattering ourselves that our government is "of and by and for the people," responsibility for what is going on resting to some extent on each one of us.

In going back to the entrance of the United States upon a national life, I have been interested in noting how history repeats itself, and how the same questions that our forefathers were a party to now confront us, and must be met by us. But how changed the conditions! Then the Colonists were demanding their rights as men, their right to frame a government for themselves, and to become an independent nation. George III., and the English Government denied their right, and rejected their claim. But a large element, and the better one, I take it, of the English people, in sentiment were with the refractory Colonies, and said so with refreshing candor and boldness. For instance, hear the words of Pitt in Parliament, "I rejoice that America has resisted. Three millions of people so dead to all the feelings of liberty, as voluntarily to submit to be slaves would have been fit instruments to make slaves of ourselves."

It will be a sad day for America when the voice of protest and remonstrance against wrong-doing on the part of the government shall be hushed.

A long time ago, it is recorded that the Great Ruler of World said he would not destroy a bad city, for the sake of ten righteous ones. England still survives, in spite of an ugly career in many respects. Did her Pitts and other protestants for the right and the true save her? However that may be, there can be no doubt that duty and safety now call for courage in the expression of heart-felt conviction concerning this war we are waging with the poor islanders of the Pacific, on the other side of the earth,—so far away, the reports we get under censorship, our President letting things drift, and calling it "destiny." The hope of our country and of liberty, it seems to me, lies in earnest and effective protest, to the end of securing a reversal of the present unwarranted and unrepugnant policy of our Administration.

Hamilton, Va.

HUGH R. HOLMES.

THE DOUKHOBOR SITUATION.

LETTER FROM PRINCE HILKOFF TO JOSEPH S. ELKINTON.

WINNIPEG, Third month 24, 1899.

JOSEPH S. ELKINTON,

Dear Friend: I write to you at the request of the Doukhobors. They ask me to put their situation before the Society of Friends and yourself, thinking that you might help them.

The present condition of their affairs is as follows: The Canadian government has decided to spend all the bonus money on the first party, that is, on the Lake Huron passengers. The Lake Superior passengers are obliged to maintain themselves. Some of these, about two-fifths, had money of their own, which they put up for the common benefit of their party, and which they turned over to me and one of their number, to be used for food, seed, and farming implements. All the money put up amounts to about $12,000. Their maintenance (2,000 people) costs about $1,000 per month; this will show you that there is not much left for buying other things than food. We have bought eight teams of good horses, five sleighs, lumber and iron to make forty wagons. (In buying lumber and iron, and in making wagons, harness, etc., we save about forty dollars on each wagon.) We also bought six blacksmith-shops, and will start work as soon as we get to the colony. We hope to be there next week.

As the Lake Superior party is managing its own affairs, they show more energy, and I think the main point is to bring about such a condition of affairs that the Lake Huron party could likewise manage its affairs themselves.

Out of the bonus money, which amounts to about $35,000 for the whole party of Doukhobors coming to Canada, the government has already spent, for the benefit of the Lake Huron party, $30,000. They are provided with food until the first of June. They have ten pair of horses, six pair of oxen, twenty-eight sleighs, eight wagons, some hundred axes, saws, and other tools, and about 3,000 bushels of potatoes, for seed. This is, in the main points, the condition of affairs at the present time.

In a few days the Doukhobors will sign a contract for work with the Lake Manitoba Railway and Canal Company; this work will enable them to earn a little money, which will go toward the maintenance of their families from the first of June.

What is most needed now, is money to buy horses, oxen, plows, wagons, (or lumber and iron to make them), and general farm implements, and seed. It is in this regard they wish me to write to you. They wish to know if it is possible for the Society of Friends to loan them a sum of money. They are quite willing to pay interest. Unless such a loan can be made or some money forthcoming, their condition will be very bad. The Canadian government is willing to make such a loan, but the conditions governing it are too heavy, for under it the government requests the return of the $35,000 bonus money.

If it is possible for the Society of Friends, or some of its members, to make a loan, I would suggest that it should be made to the whole Doukhobor Colony, and not to either the Lake Huron or Lake Superior parties, as otherwise there might arise an undesirable division among the people. Some unpleasantness has already arisen, owing to the government applying all the bonus money in favor of the first party, seemingly not taking into consideration that one-half of the second party is just as poor; this arrangement obliges the wealthier portion of the Lake Superior party to maintain their poorer brethren. They are perfectly willing to do this, and are doing it, but the attitude of the government in compelling them to do this, by the disposal of their bonus money on the first party, has caused dissatisfaction.

It creates two parties, where there is, and can, and must be, only one.

I think no one knows better than themselves which villages are in most need of assistance, and if you see your way to get a loan of money for the whole commonwealth, I, in conjunction with the elected representatives of the Doukhobors, will see that such money will be put to the best use, and bring practical results.

It is very necessary that the loan, if possible, should be made as soon as possible, for they could start to work at once, thereby making considerable saving of money. I am, dear friend, yours truly,

D. HILKOFF.

Educational Department.

SOMERVILLE SOCIETY, SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.

THE annual meeting of the Somerville Literary Society of Swarthmore College was held in Somerville Hall on Fourth month 8.

The morning session was devoted to the business of the Society, and was presided over by Emily R. Underhill, president of the active membership. At the close of this session a banquet was served in the College dining-room, which was tastefully decorated with ropes of laurel and boughs of hemlock; at each plate was placed a daffodil from the college grounds. The toast-mistress was Helen M. Fogg. The first speaker was Beulah W. Darlington, '90, who chose for her subject "The Club Woman." Katharine Pfeiffer, 1900, followed. Alice M. Atkinson, '88, spoke on "Teaching on the Pacific Coast;" Rachel Knight, '98, on the "Wide, wide World," and Martha McIlvain Eastwick, '75, on "The Future of the Somerville Girl." Professor Marie A. K. Hoadley and Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond were called upon and responded.

The program of the afternoon session was opened by a vocal solo by Susanna M. Garrett. Then followed the reading of portions of the thesis of Mary E. Seaman, to whom has been awarded the Lucretia Mott Fellowship. A letter was read from the present holder of the Fellowship, Edna H. Richards, who is pursuing her studies at the University of Berlin.

The address of the day was delivered by Martha Bunting, Ph.D., of the class of '81. The subject was "A Discussion on the Volturistic and Intellectual Views of Education." Four scenes from Mrs. Gaskell's "Cranford" closed the exercises.

About one hundred life members were present, and the day was considered a great success.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

The 28th anniversary of the Somerville Literary Society was celebrated at the college on Seventh-day, Fourth month 8. Nearly two hundred of the alumnæ and ex-members of the college assembled to do the occasion honor. A business meeting was held in Somerville Gymnasium at 10 a. m., and at 12 m. the banquet was served in the college dining-hall. In the afternoon an interesting program was carried out in Somerville Hall. [Details of the day are separately given. —EDS.]

The Lucretia Mott Fellowship has been awarded to Mary E. Seaman, '99, who will spend the coming winter in study abroad. A special scholarship of $500 has also been awarded to Anna B. Eisenhower, '99, for the highest average ever attained by a student of the institution.

The 1900 Halcyon, the College annual, published by the Junior class, made its appearance during the past week. A. Davis Jackson, 1900, is Editor-in-chief and Roger B. Farquhar Business Manager. The book is handsomely bound in steel cloth, and is fully up to the usual standard of such publications.

The teams appointed to compete in the Sophomore-Freshman Oratorical Contest for the President's Prize on Fourth month 11, have been announced as follows: Sophomores, G. Arthur Seaman, Edward Williams, Elizabeth Gillingham, Arthur Hugh Jenkins, and William C. Tyson; Freshmen, Edson S. Harris, Mark Thistlethwaite, Arthur G. Hoadley, Phoebe Scheibley, and Alida Stephens. '99.

ABINGTON FRIENDS' SCHOOL.—The annual oratorical contest, provided for by the Alumni Association of the school, took place Third month 31. The competing classes were the A and B grades, each grade being represented by two students. All had previously prepared and delivered orations during the preceding month, and the contestants were selected by vote of the classes themselves. Class A was represented by Arthur M. Dewees and Byron Beans; Class B, by Elizabeth R. Cox and Elizabeth W. Jackson.

The judges decided in favor of Class A, stating, however, that the contest was very close. Prof. M. E. Furman, of Swarthmore College, and two members of the Alumni Association, Elizabeth H. Smith and Charles W. Bosler, acted as judges.

TEACHERS WANTED.—Advertisements appear elsewhere in the INTELLIGENCER for a Principal for Friends' School at Abington, and a teacher for Friends' Grammar School at Buckingham.

DECLINED.—President Joseph Swain, of the University of Indiana, has declined the Vice-Presidency of Leland Stanford University, California.

CHANGES OF TEACHERS.—Arthur C. Smedley, at present teacher of science at Abington Friends' School, will take charge of similar work next year at Friends' Seminary, in New York city.

Bertha L. Broomell, at present engaged in teaching sciences and Mathematics, at Abington Friends' School, will be engaged in similar work next year at the Wilmington Friends' School.

SUMMER SCHOOL AT LEHIGH.—Lehigh University, South Bethlehem, Pa., will hold a summer school of chemistry, physics, surveying, and shop work. The term opens Seventh month 6, and continues from four to six weeks.

LITERARY NOTES.

WE have looked, with much interest, through a book, "Presbyterianism: its relation to the Negro, Illustrated by the Berean Presbyterian Church, Philadelphia." The author, Matthew Anderson, A.M., a colored man, is the pastor of the church named, and son-in-law of William Still, of Philadelphia. The writer has recently made acquaintance with him, in connection with his excellent work of instruction in manual training, which he has begun (in the basement of the church building, on South College Avenue, above 19th), under the conviction that this is greatly needed for colored youth. It is a worthy undertaking, and is the outcome of long consideration, and prudent counsel with a number of well-known and capable business men.

The book is in two parts, the first describing the relation of the Presbyterian church to the colored people, and the second giving the writer's autobiography. He was born in Franklin county, Pa., was educated at Iberia, Ohio, at Oberlin College, and at Princeton Theological Seminary. He taught school two years at Salisbury, N. C. The experiences and incidents described form an interesting and lively narrative.

"In Tune with the Infinite," by Ralph Waldo Trine, has just entered upon its 13th thousand. It has been published a little over a year, and the publishers, Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., feel, judging from the steadily increasing demands for it, that it is to have a large and permanent sale. They mention, as one notable thing about it, that many of its readers buy numbers of copies of it for others, there being many cases of a single reader purchasing from ten to twenty-five copies for this purpose. One reader, a prominent railroad official in the West, since December last has given out over five hundred copies. A few months ago, a prominent Boston business man purchased a thousand copies of the same author's first book, "What all the World's a-Seeking," for a similar purpose.

William Dudley Foulke's biographical volume, long in preparation, the Life of Oliver P. Morton, (Governor of Indiana, and United States Senator), has been recently issued by the Bowen-Merrill Co., Indianapolis. An (unsigned) review in the American Historical Review speaks favorably of the author's work, while sharply discussing Senator Morton's public career.

There is a good deal of concern manifested concerning the spread of the Mormons. Some of those who have given them a good deal of study, including the former United States Commissioner of Education, John Eaton, insist that the propaganda at Salt Lake City is energetic and persistent, and has by no means given up polygamy. In the North American Review, this month, Eugene Young has a paper on the "Revival of the Mormon Problem." He says the Mormons have eleven members of the Legislature in Idaho, and their settlements are spreading through Colorado, Wyoming, Montana, Washington, and Nevada. "Their ambition is to control the nations of the world, and they have been promised that the time is not far distant when they will spread over North and South America, and become rulers of men, indeed."

THE Watchman (Boston) says: "The more intimately one becomes acquainted with the life experiences of a large number of persons, especially of those in lowly conditions, the more he is amazed at the amount of self-devotion, self-sacrifice, and heroism there is in the world."

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

RISEING SUN, MD.—The Young Friends' Association of West Nottingham met at the close of meeting on the morning of Fourth month 2.

The meeting was opened by the president reading a selection entitled "A Lenten Thought." This contained a searching test for those who are trying to find out whether or not they are controlled by the love of God. The sin of the world grows more and more repulsive to the good man, but as it grows in repulsiveness his desire to aid the sinner must grow in intensity. Let us not be so anxious about our personal advancement as we are to contribute to the stream of universal good. One's self is such a short, pitiful outlook! Let us turn rather to that greater human cry wherein is "Salvation from selfishness."

The secretary read minutes of last meeting, which were approved. Some helpful thoughts were given at roll-call, after which the regular exercises were considered.

The first number of the program was an interesting paper by Edwin R. Buffington,—subject, "How are we to obtain Divine Light?" When we ask "How are we to obtain Divine life or light," we are asking, How are we to receive the life of God in a fullness that will show us the course to pursue leading to salvation? Divine Light will never come to us unless we desire it, and oftentimes our desires for its possession do not go deep enough. We desire it, providing we can select our own work, or climb heavenward in our own way, which means the retaining our selfish life intact, and thus we live the life of Christians only in name and not in possession of the life or light that must ever form the true foundation.

"What is meant by the windows of the heart being opened?" was the subject of the paper assigned Sarah S. Buffington. The windows of the heart are not real windows that we may open and close at will, and their being open means a state—a state of heart and soul when it is open to receive the love of God. The difficulty lies in the acquirement of this receptivity. And not until we are ready to have our hearts searched by the "calcium light of Truth" have we the windows of the heart open. In commenting upon the paper read, the thought was expressed that we must place ourselves in position,—God's love is all around us if we but open our spiritual eye, when the illuminating presence shines steadily on only waiting access for its light. Under the head of voluntaries, an article of interest was read by John Coale.

It being Easter, some thoughts were expressed regarding the day, commemorated as the resurrection of Christ,—the eating of eggs at this time, the breaking of the shell symbolical to the opening of the grave, and the coming forth of new life.

Being conscious that God does not work through folded hands, we realize in this field of labor, as in others, our individual responsibility. At the same time believing that if we each conscientiously perform our share, the soul's capacity will be quickened, enabling us to see with a clear vision the mysteries of spirituality, distinctly hear the whispers of the still, small voice calling us to even greater work.

After observing the usual silence the Association closed.

L. JANETTE REYNOLDS, Sec.

HORSHAM, PA.—The Young Friends' Association met Second month 26. After the reading of the minutes by the secretary, Ellen B. Moore, the report of the Executive Committee was read, and the new officers took their places.

The twelfth chapter of Romans was read by S. Frances Moore. John Walton being absent, the reading of the Discipline was omitted. Jane K. Jarrett read to us some extracts from the essay of Susan W. Janney on "Bible Studies," presented at the Richmond Conference. Elizabeth E. Hallowell read some extracts from the life of Isaac T. Hopper.

We had with us Professor George H. Nutt, from George School, who read a paper, "An Outsider's Views on Quakerism." He began by saying that he had often been asked how Quakers appear to the outside world, and the only answer he could give was that they do not appear at all. He feels that Quakers are hiding the light which they should give to the world. An outsider feels that he is not wanted in their midst, and when he comes to a meeting and sits down in the quiet, he cannot think for himself, and is lost without a minister. The speaker felt that while Quakers object to form they stick to their own forms with great tenacity. He referred to Friends' view that all days should be holy days, and the first day of the week different from the rest in being a day of rest. This was a shock to one who had been brought up in the idea that one day was especially the "Lord's day." "We should," he said, "preach the truth to the world that it may prevail there."

The paper was much enjoyed by all; after which several sentiments were given, and the meeting adjourned to meet Third month 26.

ANNA T. JARRETT, Secretary.

CORNWALL, N. Y.—A very well attended meeting of Cornwall Friends' Association was held at the home of Elizabeth Joyce, on First-day afternoon, Fourth month 9, at 3 p. m.

The paper, prepared by Baldwin Brown and Eva Ketcham, was read, and created much interest, the title being "Prose-lyting in connection with the Society." There was also another paper on "Sociability Among Friends." This was prepared by Blanche Brown and Edmund Cocks, and compared the Friends of former times with those of to-day, on the above subject.

Of all the members present each one had a sentiment.

Elizabeth K. Seaman and Edmund Cocks were appointed to the offices of chairman and secretary respectively for the next three months. The new office of treasurer was created, to which Baldwin Brown was appointed.

After some routine business the meeting closed, to meet Fifth month 7, at the usual time.

EDMUND COCKS, Secretary.

WEST CHESTER, PA.—The Young Friends' Association held its regular monthly meeting in the Association room on the evening of Third month 29.

There was a large representation of the members and their friends present, when the president, William Taylor, called the meeting to order. The minutes read by the secretary, Sarah Passmore, were approved.

A clear and logical paper upon "The relation between Religion and Conduct," was presented by J. Hibberd Taylor. The meaning of the terms conduct and religion were defined, the former summed up in the one word actions, the latter our inner relation to God consciously expressed. "Conduct may exist without religion, but true religion cannot exist without its corresponding conduct." The only way in which we can express our religion, show its value and practicability, is through our actions. Jesus embodied the principles for which he stood in his conduct and for this reason he is a great example to all."

Discussion of the question was opened by Mary Darlington. Among other things she said, in past ages, religion was cumbered with forms and superstitions, and the moral code separated from religious belief, but we are beginning to realize that a life of faith means one of faithfulness.

In the general discussion which followed, among other phases of the subject considered were the following: whether it is possible, with the present system of business methods, for a man to carry his religion into the commercial and political world and make a success of his undertakings; whether living up to the highest moral code of which we are conscious, may not be the first step in religious development.

All who expressed themselves seemed to feel that the relation between religion and conduct is a very close one, that the higher our ideals, the more we must seek to show them forth in daily living.

The next exercise was a select reading, "The Tree of Life," by Elizabeth C. Hopewell. Homer Darlington, under "Current Events," gave several items of interest that occurred during the month.

A report of the meeting of the committee of the General Conference of Friends' Association, held recently, was presented by a member of the committee. A few moments of silence and the meeting adjourned.

S. R. P.

LITTLE BRITAIN, PA.—Penn Hill Association met Fourth month 2, after missing three regular meetings because of inclement weather. Meeting opened as usual. Cora Wood gave the History report. A recitation, "The Master's Visit," was given by Bessie Jacobson. It illustrates the danger of overlooking small opportunities for doing good while looking for some great deed, and thereby missing the blessing of serving entirely.

A selection on "Origin of the Bible," describing some valuable manuscripts to be seen in the British Museum, was read by Day Wood. It mentioned one record (the "Alexandrian Codex"), on vellum, 1500 years old, which contains the whole Greek Bible except parts of Matthew and Corinthians.

Raymond S. Good read an article on the Philippine question, showing that our treatment of the Filipinos is unjust. Current Topics were reported by Charles S. Coates.

A paper on "Influence of Plain Language," prepared by Esther K. Haines, was read by the Secretary. Its use was urged on account of its beautiful, kindly, helpful, sympathetic influence. Instances were cited of tender recollections being awakened by hearing the language "mother used to use," and sometimes better impulses roused to action. The strength of poetry would be lost without it, Thanatopsis, for instance. It is the language of the Bible and might be followed as well as many other Bible usages.

"What games and diversions are in conflict with Friends' rules and discipline?" was continued. "Do men's lives or their writings exert the most influence?" was answered by Neal Hambleton, who thinks the life is the strongest. While ones life will affect their writings, we generally consider that acts speak louder than words. Many good sentiments were given by the members.

PHEBE L. COATES, Cor. Sec.

NEWTOWN, PA.—Newtown Young Friends' Association was held at the home of H. C. Worstall, on Fourth-day evening Fourth month 5. The meeting was called to order by the president reading the 12th chapter of Ecclesiastes. After the minutes of the last meeting were read and approved, we listened to an interesting article by Thaddeus S. Kenderdine on "The Doukhobors."

The question: "Which in your opinion is the better ruler, David or Solomon?" was assigned to Evan Worthington and Sarah J. Reeder. This was ably answered by Evan Worthington on which he said: "There is no doubt that David is the greatest of the kings of Israel, and his reign changed the whole face of Hebrew history. That reign deals largely with war and bloodshed, and his private life contains that which is condemned, yet measured by the light of that day as well as this, there is but one opinion—that he was a great soldier and a national hero, and he made the kingdom of Jerusalem the highest conception of national life possible under those rude social conditions. Under the rule of his successor Solomon, who lacked all those qualities of personal force and sympathy with public feeling, the great kingdom began to decay, and in the next generation fell apart." Sarah J. Reeder was excused from her part of the paper, owing to absence from home.

Lavina Eyre read a selection called "The Truth we Live by," which expressed the thought that if we would only place our lives in the hands of our tender, strong, and loving Saviour, that our hearts would be lighter than air.

The Discipline Committee presented "A Scriptural Basis of Queries," which was read by Mary Eyre and Elizabeth Stapler. An account of the Workhouse of Delaware, which is to be built in the style of the modern prison and thus do away with the crowded, unsanitary county jails, was read by Elizabeth Palmer.

The Executive Committee then reported the following program for next meeting: Question, "What do you believe to be the greatest reform movement now in existence, and why?" Thomas Stapler and Phoebe Eves; "Scriptural Basis of the Queries," Sarah Wilson and Abbie Rice; Reading, Elisha Worthington; Current Topics, Maud Kenderdine.

After roll-call and a few minutes of silence, the meeting adjourned to meet at Ellie Burrough's home, Fifth month 3.

M. R. W.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

"We had, at our meeting, last First-day, Allen J. Flitcraft and wife, of Chicago, also John Butterworth and wife of Ohio, who are spending the winter in Berkeley, Cal." So a correspondent writes, Third month 27, from San Francisco.

The Friends' meeting in San Francisco is held in a building in Harrison street, adjoining the large house occupied by Barclay J. Smith. The latter was originally a costly and handsome private residence; later, it was used by the wife of Bishop Kip, of California, as a Home for Friendless Children. A long flight of steps leads up from the street to the front of the house, where there are fine live-oak trees, walks, and flowers, and passing through these to the left, entrance is had to the meeting-house.

A correspondent in Nebraska, W. H. Vore, sends us clippings from western newspapers referring to the war in the Philippines. In one of these, a father whose son had been wounded at Manila replies to a telegram from the Governor (of Nebraska) informing him of the fact, and says that he regrets it, "not only by reason of the possible serious consequence of the wound, but also because it was incurred in the prosecution of a conflict which is revolting to every true American, and I know is to him." Our correspondent adds that this "expresses the sentiment of a large majority of mid-continent people, irrespective of party. The sentiment against the acquisition of the Philippines is very much stronger than it was two months ago."

A subscriber to the INTELLIGENCER writes us from Cairo, Egypt, that she is traveling, and hence fails to see the paper, but adds: "I miss the paper very much, and shall be glad when I can see it again."

The Omaha Daily Bee reprints the recent impressive article by Aaron M. Powell, in the INTELLIGENCER. "Lessons from India." A friend who remarks the fact says "it should be published in some of the Eastern dailies." We wish it might be.

COMMUNICATIONS.

TAXES ON CHARITABLE BEQUESTS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

SOME one has said to me that the bequests of our friend, Harriet W. Paist, who was recently reported in your columns as leaving several sums for school and benevolent purposes, are subject to ten per cent. or more of taxation, and will be diminished that much. I should like to know as to this.

Philadelphia.

QUERY.

[There is a "collateral inheritance" tax of five per cent. on all such bequests, laid by the State of Pennsylvania, and there is also, now, since the war with Spain, a special "war tax" of five per cent. Adding the two will make ten per cent. On each hundred dollars left by the testator to the school, etc., five dollars will go to the State treasury and five to pay the United States war expenses. Out of the $8,000 left to Swarthmore College, there will be eight hundred dollars taken.—EDS.]

"MAMMON OF RIGHTEOUSNESS."

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I observed, in the extract which you printed from an article by Jos. S. Elkinton in the American Friend a Scripture quotation in which occurs the phrase "Mammon of righteousness." I presume this must be a misprint; the passage reads (Luke, xvi., 9): "Make to yourselves friends by means of the mammon of unrighteousness," which is quite different.

Fourth month 5.

N.

[We have hunted up the "copy" used by us, the extract from A. F., and find it printed there as our correspondent describes, so that our printers were not in fault. No doubt J. S. E. wrote it as it stands in the Gospel text.—EDS.]

METEOROLOGICAL SUMMARY FOR
THIRD MONTH, 1899.

Mean barometer,	29.993
Highest barometer during the month, 14th,	30.490
Lowest barometer during the month, (at regular times of observing 8 a. m., and 8 p. m.) 19th,	29.235
Mean temperature,	40.8
Highest temperature during the month, 12th,	70.
Lowest temperature during the month, 21st,	22.
Mean of maximum temperatures,	48.
Mean of minimum temperatures,	33.5
Greatest daily range of temperature, 19th,	28.
Least daily range of temperature, 4th,	4.
Mean daily range of temperature,	14.5
Mean relative humidity, per cent.,	73.2
Mean temperature of the Dew Point,	30.5
Total precipitation in inches, rain and melted snow,	7.12
Greatest precipitation in any 24 consecutive hours, 1.13 inches of rain, on the 18th and 19th.
Number of days on which .01 inch or more of rain fell, 14.
Number of clear days 4, fair days 11, cloudy days 16.
Prevailing direction of wind from the Northwest.
Thunder storm on the 5th, 12th, 19th.
Hail on the 12th.
Sleet on the 18th.
Solar halo on the 3d, 21st.
Lunar halo on the 21st.
Snow on the 7th, 19th, 20th, 25th, 29th.
Total snow fall during month, 4.1 inches.

SENSIBLE TEMPERATURE DATA.

Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 57 on 19th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 21 on 21st.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 34.8.
Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 60 on 12th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 22 on 21st.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 36.6.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer for this month, 35.7

NOTE.—The mean temperature of this month, 40.8 degrees, is nearly the normal average for Third month, and is 7 degrees lower than the mean for corresponding month in 1898.

The total amount of precipitation 7.12 inches is about double the normal average for Third month. The principal snowfall occurred on the 7th. It measured three and three-quarter inches in depth. Light flurries only on other dates. None on the ground on the 15th, nor at the end of the month.

During the storm of the 19th instant, in the afternoon, there was thunder, snow, and the usually low atmospheric pressure of 28.959 inches, followed by a rapid fall of temperature and very high wind from the Northwest.

JOHN COMLY, Observer.

Centennial Avenue, Philadelphia, Third month 31.

PRICELESS WEALTH.

THERE's that more precious than the diamond's flame

And beautiful as is the ruby's glow,

Or bloom of pearls; which gold indeed may maim,

And yet not easily again bestow;

Which giveth beauty grace, like scent to flowers;

Without which beauty is a rootless bloom;

Which raiseth bright-dressed thoughts, like vernal showers

The beaded grass, and gildeth sorrow's gloom;

It makes a beggar happy as a king;

A king who wants it is a fettered slave!

'Tis manhood's very sceptre; it may bring

Hope to the hero, courage to the brave!

"Come, tell us, pray, what is this priceless wealth?"

What we are spendthrifts with, my friends—our health!

—G. G. Somerville.

"E'EN as the flowing of the ocean fills

Each creek and branch thereof, and then retires,

So doth the virtue and the life of God

Flow evermore into the hearts of those Whom he hath made partakers of his nature."

36

"O MASTER, let me walk with thee

In lowly paths of service free;

Tell me thy secret; help me bear

The strain of toil, the fret of care.

Help me the slow of heart to move

By some clear, winning word of love;

Teach me the wayward feet to stay,

And guide them in the homeward way."

BUSINESS IN THE PHILIPPINES.

From an article on "Material Problems in the Philippine Islands," by Samuel W. Belford, in the Review of Reviews for April.

THE retail business of the Philippines, as well as the smaller wholesale houses, are in the hands of Chinese merchants. They have traded with the natives for centuries and have carried on their business in every centre of population. Inter-marriage with natives and the consequent assimilation of races have given the Chinese a superior advantage with the Filipinos, which they have utilized to the utmost. Content with the smallest profits and wages, able to live in comfort on fifteen cents a day, they have intrenched themselves in the business affairs of the Philippines too strongly to be displaced. They supply the islands with all kinds of goods for which there is a demand, and the proximity of this market to China and Japan eliminates the freight-rate as a factor; while the great distance that separates us from Manila, makes the same charge an almost unsurmountable barrier. I know it is argued that accessibility and not distance should determine the commercial value of a possession, but so long as steam continues to be the motive power for vessels and railroads, the time between San Francisco and Manila will continue approximately as it is now, and all American goods sent to the Philippines for sale will be burdened by traffic charges almost great enough in themselves to bar us out of that market.

The small number of Europeans, excepting the Spanish, who are engaged in business in the Philippines are either the proprietors or responsible managers of established firms. The total absence of European and American laborers in the Orient is a sufficient demonstration that their employment is not needed. It is quite true that the cost of living is merely nominal in comparison with the cost in the United States, but even if one should save one's entire income, it would scarcely amount to a competence. It is a mistake to indulge the supposition that the Filipinos are uncouth savages, incapable of performing skilled labor that requires the exercise of judgment. The population living along the coast and in the cities has attained a surprising degree of civilization, and the workmen of this class produce an infinite variety of articles of their own manufacture that would be creditable to a more enlightened country. They are, in my judgment, superior to the same classes in Cuba, Porto Rico, and Hawaii, and possess in a great measure the cleverness at imitation of the Japanese, whom they resemble in physical appearance and in the similarity of many customs.

It does not require a long residence in the Philippines to discover that but few openings exist there at the present time for the introduction of staple articles of American manufacture. The wants of the people with whom our commerce must be carried on are as simple as their manner of living. The most northerly point of the Philippines is south of Santiago de Cuba, and American goods, to be salable, must be suitable for use in a peculiarly tropical climate. They must also be thrown upon the market at from 50 per cent. to 100 per cent. less than they bring in the United States. The clothes of men and women alike usually consist of plain garments of cotton and duck and are of Indian and Chinese manufacture. It is at least doubtful whether we could successfully compete in the sale of such goods. The food of the natives consists of rice and fruit, grown at their doors, and fish, in which the waters of the islands abound. We have nothing to offer them in the way of foodstuffs. We cannot export sugar and rice to the Philippines, and must undersell the cotton goods of India and China to get into the market.

THE STING OF IT.

"I DON'T like mosquitoes," said Nannie, petulantly, dropping the folds of netting and rubbing a pink spot on one cheek.

"Then never be like one, child," answered Grandmother, placidly, looking over her spectacles. "There are folks who always make me think of mosquitoes. They come in with a cheerful little buzz, as if they meant nothing but a friendly visit, and their stings are such little things, that seem scarcely worth complaining of, yet they leave one thoroughly uncomfortable. A mosquito that gets into your room at night always finds the hand or foot that has strayed from under the covers, and it sometimes seems as if the human mosquitoes did the same thing. If there is a tender spot in the family history, or a bit of household economy that isn't quite covered up, they're sure to light just there. And they never seem to know, when they go away, that they have left a drop of poison to vex and burn."

"They don't care. It isn't ignorance; it's malice," asserted Nannie.

But the grandmother shook her head. "I don't think so, child—not always, not usually. Tact isn't so much a natural gift as some people imagine; it has to be learned. To say the right thing in the right way, to remember who will be hurt, to 'speak the truth unto edifying,' and when it won't edify not to speak it even though it is the truth—it takes a deal of thought. And I believe that is where we often make a mistake. We talk about doing good and being kind, where the Bible talks about 'taking thought' for others. It is thoughtfulness for others that teaches us to be quick to see and tender to do the right thing and avoid the wrong. No, they are mostly well-meaning people who come to your homes, and tell you how much nicer somebody's else things are, and that they think your new dress will fade; that they have heard your new horse was sold by somebody because it wasn't safe to drive; that your sister's cough seems worse, and she is getting to look like your aunt who went into a decline. They are honest when they tell you that they have had a good time. They do not mean any harm, and they do not know that they go away leaving you dissatisfied, uncomfortable, and sore, without being really able to tell where all the pin-pricks are.

"I read the other day, in the advertisement of some seminary, that the girls would be taught how to enter and leave a room gracefully. Now if I had a seminary," and the grandmother laughed softly, "I'd care a great deal more about having the girls taught so that their coming into a room would be always welcome, and that when they left it everybody would be more comfortable and happy for their visit.—[Forward, Philadelphia.]

Peace Work in Boston.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

BOSTON is doing her share in the work for the success of the Czar's Conference and the better organization of the world.

Public meetings have been held for some weeks, every Monday noon, at Tremont Temple. It was very fitting that the first meeting should be addressed by Dr. Edward Everett Hale, who at the age of seventy-seven still leads in the cry, "A Permanent Tribunal! A Permanent Tribunal!" Samuel Gompers, president of the American International Federation of Labor, at the second meeting spoke on Organized Labor's contribution to international peace. Dr. Lyman Abbott drew a large gathering, March 27, and spoke on International Brotherhood.

The fourth meeting was in charge of the women. Julia Ward Howe presided. She spoke very fittingly of the terrible burden of war laid upon all classes of people in all countries, and bade God speed to the cause of universal peace. Mary A. Livermore spoke of England's sympathy with the Czar's great manifesto, and the effort in its behalf, including the sale and distribution of literature which is going on. If England started on a peace crusade, America must too. Mrs. Lucia Ames Mead gave statistics of war, and drew a sad picture of the destruction of life and property in war and for the support of standing armies. These remarks were followed by short addresses by Miss O. M. E. Rowe, president of the State Federation of Woman's Clubs, and by Mrs. Alice Freeman Palmer, formerly President of Wellesley College.

The Peace Crusade, an eight-page weekly, published in Boston, is being distributed in these meetings, as is also War Against War, published in England by William T. Stead. Many pamphlets bearing on the subject of peace and arbitration, and the Peace Crusade hymns, are being liberally distributed.

C.

A Congressional Funeral.

THE funeral of the late Representative Nelson Dingley, of Maine, who died in Washington while Congress was sitting, was at the public cost, and the charges for it, it is stated, amounted to $4,500. The following statement is made concerning the affair :

"The undertaker at Lewiston wanted $500 for his services. There was an item of $75 for a steel case, in which the casket was to be placed while it rested in the vault of the cemetery ; another for $75 for a slate case in which the casket was to be placed in the spring, and the charge for the catafalque, on which the casket rested while the remains were 'lying in state,' was $90. Eight carriages were used, but the undertaker asked pay for thirty-six. The bill rendered for the quartette that sung at the house was $60.

"Owing to Mr. Dingley having been a life-long abstainer from the use of liquor, his colleague, Captain Boutelle, who was in charge, issued orders that no intoxicants should be carried on the funeral train, but the 'vouchers' in hand show that the order was disregarded ; that by direction of a prominent member of the joint committee which accompanied the remains whisky and champagne were supplied in abundance. At Portsmouth, N. H., just before crossing the line into Maine, the papers say that a large purchase of whisky was made. Everything furnished on these trips is paid for from public funds, even to the cigars smoked."

Hospital Work Among the Indians.

THE Indian Hospital at Fort Defiance, Arizona, recently mentioned in the INTELLIGENCER, was built with money raised by the "Westchester Branch of the Woman's Auxiliary." Bishop Kendrick, in an address, said :

"The money was ready, but a person was needed to superintend the building. Who should it be? It must be a woman, for the Navajos respect all women. Their experience leads them to distrust white men. Miss Thackara, who was at that time a teacher in the government school, was chosen to take charge. The Indians selected the site, and presented about forty acres of land for the use of the hospital. The building was erected under Miss Thackara's superintendence, and is a remarkable instance of excellent work, economically done, under great difficulties."

On the morning after the completion of the hospital, March 3d, 1897, Miss Thackara received her first patient, an Indian "with a frightful cancer in the arm," who had been kept waiting till the hospital was ready. "Without the furniture or utensils that were absolutely necessary, without a nurse or housekeeper to attend to the wants of a patient, with nothing in fact but a well arranged building in a state of perfect cleanliness," this Indian was laid on the floor and the operation performed by the doctor, aided by a trained nurse, at that time matron of the government school. Neither doctor nor nurse could remain and upon Miss Thackara devolved the whole care of the patient. It was a critical case, for, had he died, the superstitious fears of the Navajos would have rendered the hospital a failure. His recovery was rapid and complete, and the success of the hospital was assured. A recent report states that no surgical case has failed in this hospital.

Home and Club.

It is the idea of some that everybody must have a "Club," a place to go for company and conversation,—and perhaps, also, eating and drinking. Some aver that the drinking saloon is the "poor man's club," and that unless something as good or better is provided it must continue. The Church Standard (Philadelphia) says :

"There was a time when neither the club nor the saloon was regarded 'as a social necessity' ; the home was thought sufficient for all the social needs of rich and poor. Is that time altogether gone? Is it not possible that the social, spiritual element of the home is what men need? And is it not possible that the gregariousness of the club and the saloon as places of habitual resort may often be destructive of the truly social instinct? That is what John W. Vrooman maintained in Utica the other night, when he is reported to have said :

"I want to record my protest against the proposition that a club, either a rich man's, or a poor man's, is a social necessity. A social convenience possibly, but a social necessity—never! The great necessity in this intensely practical present is more preaching and writing to promote the use of the home as a social necessity club, extending home influence, elevating home surroundings, purifying home life, opening home doors, not only to the more favored, but also to the less fortunate."

"Imperialism" Abroad.

A FRIEND in England writes : "I read with interest the constant testimony in the INTELLIGENCER against Imperialism on your side. It is a warm question here, too, but it is a more difficult issue with us. The Past has a heavy hand upon us, and almost compels the Present—and even the Future, perhaps—to yield to the leadership it has assumed. But your Past is all the other way."

The Temps (Times) newspaper, of Paris, one of the most thoughtful and able of the French press, in an article discussing the course taken by this country, says the United States "have said good-bye forever to the idyllic era wherein they dispensed with the regular standing army, and laughed at the heavy burdens imposed upon the nations of the eastern continent by their international situation.

"There is not a friend of Democracy, a friend of the principles that regulate modern society," continues the Temps, "that does not deplore bitterly the inoculation with a spirit of conquest of territories and expansion of a democracy that hitherto has been peaceful and liberal. President McKinley may say farewell for free America to the era of peace and good-will, reforms, economy, internal progress and self-government."

Enough Land at Home.

IN a vigorous article on the "Wheat Problem," (in which he insists on our ability to produce a sufficient wheat supply for many years to come), in the Popular Science Monthly, Edward Atkinson, of Boston, the well-known statistician and economist, says we have plenty of land at home.

"Yet under a craze for centrifugal expansion we are now in danger of trying to develop tropical islands far away, already somewhat densely peopled, where white men can not work and live, to our detriment, danger, and loss, while we fail to see that if we expand centripetally by the occupation and use of the most healthy and productive section of our own country, we may add immensely to our prosperity, our wealth, to our profit, without cost and without militarism. This sparsely settled Land of the Sky [western North Carolina] is greater in area and far greater in its potential than the Philippine Islands, Cuba, and Porto Rico combined. Verily, it seems as if common sense were a latent and sluggish force, often endangered by the noisy and blatant influence of the venal politician, and the greed of the unscrupulous advocates of vassal colonies, who now attempt to pervert the power of government to their own purposes of private gain."

Two Ex-Presidents' Voices.

THERE are only two ex-Presidents of the United States living—Grover Cleveland and Benjamin Harrison. Both have written letters, recently, to the Society of Christian Endeavor, on its proposal for a "War against War, and Peace by Arbitration."

Ex-President Cleveland wrote:

"The members and the friends of the Society of Christian Endeavor have never entered upon an undertaking so practical and so noble as the effort they are now making to secure an abandonment of war as a means for the settlement of international differences, and if there is any substance to the claim that our institutions and the traits that characterize us as a people tend to national elevation and Christianization, it is eminently proper that our country should be in the lead in any movement in the interests of peace."

Ex-President Harrison says:

"For myself, and much more for the great body of its citizenship, I express the desire of America for peace with the whole world. It would have been vain to suggest the pulling down of block-houses, or family disarmament, to the settlers on a hostile Indian frontier. They would have told you rightly that the conditions were not ripe. And so it may be and is, probably, true that a full application of the principle is not presently possible, the devil still being unchained."

"It is by a spirit of love and forbearance mastering the civil institutions and governments of the world, that we shall approach universal peace and adopt arbitration methods of settling disputes."

A CORRESPONDENT of a New York newspaper says: "Upon the corner of Fourth Avenue and 23d street stands the fine building of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. There, if you look up, you will read on a beautiful bronze shield the name of this society, surmounting and surrounding an emblematic coat of arms, wherein the child is represented as shielded from all harm and cruelty. Just below, if you look down, you will find the corner store rented to a man who hangs out conspicuously a sign advertising brandy, 'rock and rye,' malt whiskey, London dock gin."

THE gift of a Buddhist temple to the Ningpo (China) Methodist Mission is an unprecedented incident, it is said, in the history of missions. The villagers were not only willing it should be used as a preaching hall and school, but would convey it by legal deed of gift. The British Consul pronounced the deed legally valid. In addition to the temple and its demesne, twenty-two Chinese acres of land have also been conveyed.

"OPINIONS change," says the Congregationalist, "but Christian character is the true basis of fellowship, and we are thankful that it is recognized cordially where once it was questioned."

CURRENT EVENTS.

RECENT operations in the Philippines include the capture, on the 10th, by an expedition under General Lawton, of Santa Cruz, a place on the southeastern side of Laguna de Bay, near Manila. "The Americans had six men wounded. The insurgents had sixty-eight men killed and forty wounded." A dispatch on the same day, 10th, reports some of the native forces near Malolos, again, where they fired at a scouting party of United States troops. Malolos is the "capital," recently captured by the United States forces, so that the Filipinos do not seem to have been driven far away.

It does not appear that the "proclamation" issued by the five commissioners has had any considerable effect, and the comment is made that it contained nothing new, and, as it explicitly refused to countenance the idea of independence, it would not conciliate the Filipinos who follow Aguinaldo. A dispatch from Manila, 7th, sent through Hong Kong, 10th, (thus escaping military censorship), quotes "one of the foremost of the American generals" as saying recently that "we will see a hundred thousand soldiers in the Philippines before the Americans control the islands." A majority of the officers of the army are claimed to be of this opinion. It is also said that a majority of the United States volunteers "are eager to return home."

MORE fighting took place on the 11th instant, the Filipinos attacking "the rear of MacArthur's division between Marilao and Cocane, at 3 o'clock in the morning." The American loss was five killed and fourteen wounded. John F. Bass, a correspondent of the New York Herald and other newspapers, in reporting this and other features of the conflict, says, "more troops are needed out here; the fighting has only just begun."

THE war with Spain is now over, as far as formalities are concerned. The formal exchange of ratifications of the Paris treaty was made at Washington on the 11th instant, and subsequently President McKinley issued a proclamation announcing the fact, and the consequent restoration of peace between Spain and the United States.

THE appointment of delegates to represent the United States at the Conference at The Hague was announced at Washington on the 6th instant. They are: Dr. Andrew D. White, United States Ambassador to Germany; Stanford Newell, United States Minister to the Netherlands; President Seth Low, of Columbia University, New York; Captain Crozer, Ordnance Department, United States Army, and Captain A. T. Mahan, United States Navy, retired. Frederick Wm. Holls, of New York, will be secretary of the delegation.

IN reference to the complications at Samoa, it was announced at Washington on the 6th inst., that an agreement had been reached between the United States, and Germany and Great Britain for the appointment of a Joint High Commission for Samoa. Unanimity will be necessary upon all decisions of the Commission. Bartlett Tripp, of South Dakota, who was formerly United States minister to Austria, has been appointed the American Commissioner. Dispatches from Samoa, printed last week, gave full details of the controversy between the English and American officials, on one side, and the German on the other, and described the "shell-ing" of the native villages by the United States cruiser Philadelphia.

SERIOUS riots have broken out among the Tartars in the province of Kasan, Russia, on account of a famine. The people have been dying rapidly from starvation and typhus fever, and the Russian government sent large quantities of grain to be distributed, and Red Cross detachments to oversee the relief work and to attend the typhus and scurvy sufferers. A rumor was spread among the people, who are Mohammedans, that advantage was to be taken of their misery to baptize them into the Greek Church, and people stoned the relief parties and refused aid.

ELECTIONS of some importance were held last week. In Michigan, Republican candidates for Regents of the University and Judge of the Supreme Court were chosen. In Chicago, 4th instant, the present Mayor, Carter H. Harrison, Dem., was re-elected, having a large plurality over the Republican candidate, Carter, and ex-Governor Altgeld, who ran independently. In Ohio, on the 3d instant, the independent candidate for Mayor in Toledo, Jones, was chosen by a large majority over two opponents, a Democratic Mayor, Farley, was elected in Cleveland, defeating McKisson, Rep., the present incumbent, who was "cut" by adherents of Senator Hanna; and Republican candidates for Mayor were elected in Columbus and Cincinnati.

In the Second month, (22nd), 1898, a mob surrounded the house of Baker, a colored man, postmaster at Lake City, S. C., set it on fire, and shot the inmates as they passed out, Baker and an infant in his arms being killed, and his wife and five other children desperately but not fatally wounded. At Charleston, on the 7th instant, thirteen persons were indicted by the grand jury in the United States Court for the crime. They are described as "merchants and farmers" of the neighborhood of Lake City. The trial will be watched with great interest. The Philadelphia Bulletin remarks on the excitement which would have been caused "if this atrocity had been perpetrated by a band of Tagals on an American family in the outskirts of Manila."

THE trial of Ex-Senator M. S. Quay for alleged misuse of funds, etc., in connection with the People's Bank of Philadelphia, began in this city on the 10th instant, and is in progress at this writing. A jury was secured with little delay, on the first day, and the hearing of witnesses was promptly begun.

At a business meeting of the members of Plymouth Church, Brooklyn, last week, a committee was appointed "to consider and report whether it is expedient to take action in connection with other Christian churches for the purpose of remonstrating against any policy by which the United States shall enter into or continue upon the conquest or forcible annexation of other countries, and that this committee be instructed especially to consider the duty of Christian churches in respect to the war now going on in the Philippines."

BISHOP LEIGHTON COLEMAN (Episcopal), of the diocese of Delaware, in a sermon on the 9th inst., referred in emphatic language to the war in the Philippines. Speaking of "Eastertide," he lamented the lack of appreciation amongst Christians, "of the value of human life," and said: "We need not go very far to find illustrations to this effect. For the to me unwarrantable, merciless, and unjustifiable slaughter now going on in the Philippine Islands under the authority now at the command of our own at least nominally Christian government, we are writing a page of our great country's history, which it will be very difficult for even the most enthusiastic American to explain and justify.

THE annual joint debate, being the fifth, between Harvard and Princeton universities took place at Princeton on the evening of the 5th instant. There were three speakers for each university. The question was: "Resolved, That a formal alliance between the United States and Great Britain for the protection and advancement of their common interests is advisable." Of this, Princeton had the affirmative, and Harvard the negative. The decision was in favor of Harvard. The judges were Professors E. J. Phelps of Yale, J. B. Moore of Columbia and J. W. Jenks of Cornell.

THE epidemic of typhoid fever in Philadelphia, due to the impurity of the water supply, shows some abatement, as has been the usual experience at this season. The number of new cases reported last week (to noon on the 8th) was 296, and the number of deaths forty-eight; since the first of year, cases 5,160, and deaths 533. The mortality is now at the rate of over ten per cent. The new Mayor, S. H. Ashbridge, who took office on the 3d instant, has proposed to Councils three measures to improve the supply of water. These include (1) the restraint of waste, (from one-half to three-fourths the total supply is wasted); (2) improvement of weak features in pumping machinery, etc.; (3) filtration. These are, no doubt, the first steps to take, and will result in great benefit.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE steamship Norseman, whose wreck was mentioned last week, has been hauled off the rocks near Marblehead, and beached near by, for repairs.

—Stephen J. Field, for many years Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, (resigned in Twelfth month, 1897), died at Washington on the 9th instant, in his eighty-third year. He was a brother of Cyrus W. Field, of Atlantic Cable fame, and David Dudley Field, the distinguished lawyer.

—A Berlin dispatch to the London Times says that Von Stengel, of the Munich University, who will be one of the German delegates to the disarmament conference at The Hague next month, has published a pamphlet opposing the advocates of perpetual peace. He ridicules the idea of general peace, and says that Germany "has still to achieve her rightful position in the politics of the world."

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
REYMER-BAVIAN
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR } Cincinnati.
EOKETIN }
ATLANTIC }
HEADLEY } New York.
BROOKLYN }
JEWETT }
UNION }
SOUTHERN } Chicago.
SHIPMAN }
COLLIER }
MISSOURI } St. Louis.
RED SEAL }
SOUTHERN }
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY
Cleveland.
SALEM
Salem, Mass.
CORNELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

HY is it that the brands of White Lead made by quick or patent process are almost invariably sold below the price of standard brands?

Because practical painters and consumers generally know that they are inferior to the brands made by the "old Dutch process" of slow corrosion. The brands named in margin are genuine.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

THE north pole, somebody says, is like a woman's pocket—we all know where it should be but no one can find it.

"My boy says his ambition is to grow up to be a man just like his father."

"I wouldn't let that worry me. When I was your boy's age I had a burning desire to be a pirate."—[Indianapolis Journal.]

A LITTLE boy, with his dog Sport, was going past a liquor saloon, the door of which was wide open. The dog, not knowing any better, went in, but his little master was soon after him with the following good advice: "Come out of there, Sport! Don't be disgracing the family."

ONE day an Irishman was taking a walk in a small town near Glasgow, when he met an old friend. After walking along the road together, Pat's friend said to him:

"Have you heard the latest news?"

Pat—"No, what is it?"

"There's a penny off the loaf."

Pat—"Bedad, and I hope it is off the penny ones."—[London Paper.]

GETTYSBURG, LURAY, AND WASHINGTON.

PERSONALLY-CONDUCTED TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged for a five-day Personally-Conducted Tour to Gettysburg, Luray, and Washington on Fifth month 6. A full day will be spent at Gettysburg, three hours at Luray, affording ample time to make the tour of the wonderful caverns, and two days at Washington.

The party will be under the guidance of one of the company's experienced tourist agents. A chaperon, whose especial charge will be unescorted ladies, will also accompany the party throughout. Round-trip tickets, including transportation for the round trip, hotel accommodations at Gettysburg and carriage drive over the battlefield, luncheon, transfer, and admission to the Luray Caverns, luncheon, transfer, and hotel accommodations at Washington, and dinner going and supper returning, at Broad Street Station in connection with tickets from Trenton and points east thereof, will be sold at the extremely low rate of $25 from New York, $24 from Trenton, $22 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Phila.

Hold On to a good thing when you find it. The planter who once reads Gregory's Seed Book—who once plants Gregory's Seeds, will never begin a season's work without them.

Gregory's Seeds
represent the highest development of scientific seed culture. Gregory's seed book contains the best of seed and flower facts. The book is free to all—the seeds cost no more than the ordinary kind. Send for book at once.

JAMES J. H. GREGORY & SON,
Marblehead, Mass.

GREGORY'S SEED CATALOGUE
FOR 1899

The Wonderful Golden Rambler Rose

Hardy and bears all the time. A glorious profusion of gold and white roses at same time on same bush. Blooms all summer from June till December. Finest, hardy ever-blooming rose for garden, trellis or veranda. Strong plants on own roots. 15c. each, 2 for 25c. New Floral Guide 124 pages, tells all about 400 other choice flowers. Free.

CONARD & JONES CO.,
Dept. 6. West Grove, Pa.

Dreer's Garden Calendar For 1899

An up-to-date Catalogue of the best new and rare, as well as the cream of the standard varieties of

Seeds, Plants, Bulbs, Etc.

A handsome book of 168 pages, profusely illustrated, mailed FREE to those who state where they saw this advertisement.

HENRY A. DREER, 714 Chestnut St., Phila., Pa.

Macbeth's is the only lamp-chimney advertised.
What of that?
It's the only make worth advertising.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Ellwood Heacock,

UNDERTAKER
and EMBALMER

ESTABLISHED 1860.

TELEPHONE 5807.

1313 Vine Street, Philad'a.

Calls outside of city answered promptly.

LAST TWO TOURS TO WASHINGTON UNDER PERSONAL ESCORT.

The last two of the present series of Pennsylvania Railroad three-day personally conducted tours to Washington, D. C., will leave Fourth month 20, and fifth month 11. The rate, $14.50 from New York, $11.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points, includes transportation, hotel accommodations, and Capitol guide fees. An experienced Chaperon will also accompany the party.

For itineraries, tickets, and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

TO OLD POINT COMFORT, RICHMOND, AND WASHINGTON UNDER PERSONAL ESCORT.

The next six-day personally-conducted tour to Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Seventh-day, Fourth month 15.

Tickets, including transportation, meals en route in both directions, transfers of passengers and baggage, hotel accommodations at Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington, and carriage ride about Richmond will be sold at rate of $34.00 from New York, Brooklyn, and Newark; $32.50 from Trenton; $31.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

OLD POINT COMFORT ONLY.

Tickets to Old Point Comfort only, including luncheon on going trip, one and three-fourths day's board at that place, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold in connection with this tour at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

NOTICES.

* * A Conference upon the subject "Peace and Arbitration," will be held at Abington Friends' meeting-house on First day afternoon, Fourth month 16, at 2.30 o'clock, under the care of Quarterly Meeting's Committee.

JAS. Q. ATKINSON, Clerk.

* * The Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, held at Race Street, will take place on Fourth-day next, the 19th, in the evening, at 7.30 o'clock.

* * Bucks County First-day School Union will be held in Friends' meeting-house, Makefield, Pa., Seventh-day, Fourth-month 22, at 10.30 a. m.

All interested Friends are cordially invited.

ISABEL L. WORTHINGTON, } Clerks.
ROBERT KENDERDINE, }

* * The Western First-day School Union will be held in the Friends' meeting-house at New Garden, Pa., on Seventh-day, Fourth month 22, commencing at 10 o'clock a. m. All interested are invited to be present.

HORACE L. DILWORTH, } Clerks.
ELLEN P. WAY, }

* * Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee will hold a meeting in Friends' meeting-house at Medford, N. J., on First-day afternoon, the 16th of Fourth month, at 2.30 p. m., on "Temperance."

All are invited to attend.

EDMUND BRADDOCK, Clerk.

* * The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor, will be held in the meeting-house at Willistown, Chester county, Pa., on First-day, Fourth month 16, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. Subject, "Temperance."

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

* * The following compose the Committee to assist in securing homes for strangers in attendance at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting:

Charles E. Thomas, 868 N. 26th street.

Tamar Hartley, 1511 Swain street.

Martha D. Hough, 1340 Spruce street.

Matilda K. Lobb, 1702 N. 18th street.

Sarah L. Haines, 1513 Marshall street.

Joseph M. Truman, Jr., 1500 Race street.

Rebecca B. Comly, 1529 Centennial avenue.

* * Elizabeth Powell Bond, of Swarthmore College, will address the Friends' Temperance Workers, Fourth month 15, 1899, at 17th street and Girard avenue.

WALKER E. LINVILL, President.

* * The Home Influence Association will hold its regular monthly meeting in Race Street meeting house, on Third-day, Fourth month 18, at 8 o'clock in the evening.

The meeting will be addressed by Dr. James B. Walker; the subject, "Personal Hygiene." All are cordially invited.

* * Abington First-day School Union will be held in Friends' meeting-house, Abington, Pa., Seventh-day, Fourth month 15, at 10 a. m. All interested Friends are cordially invited.

Conveyances can be obtained at Jenkintown Station for both North and South bound trains.

MARY H. FORMAN, } Clerks.
JOSEPH S. EVANS, }

* * The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has arranged for the following meetings during Fourth month:

16. Aisquith St., Baltimore.

23. Fawn Grove, Md.

30. Sandy Spring, Md.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 22, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 7 }

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XVI.

THE true fast is to fast from sin and iniquity, from strife and debate, from violence and oppression, and to abstain from every appearance of evil.

GEORGE FOX.

From his sermon at Amsterdam, 1677, on a day ordered as a "public fast."

PRAYER.

I.

It is not prayer,
This clamor of our eager wants,
That fills the air
With wearying, selfish plaints.

It is not faith
To boldly count all gifts as ours—
The pride that saith,
"For me his wealth he ever showers."

It is not praise
To call to mind our happier lot,
And boast bright days,
God-favored, with all else forgot.

II.

It is true prayer
To seek the giver more than gift;
God's life to share
And love—for this our cry to lift.

It is true faith
To simply trust his loving will,
Whiche'er he saith—
"Thy lot be glad" or "ill."

It is true praise
To bless alike the bright and dark;
To sing all days
Alike with nightingale and lark.
—James W. White, in Sunday School Times.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

CO-OPERATION OF PARENTS.

IN reading the remarks of Elizabeth Coale in last week's INTELLIGENCER concerning the coöperation of parents in the training of their children, I am reminded of Charles and Priscilla Townsend, well-known Friends of Philadelphia.

It was my happy privilege to be intimate in the family, through a lasting friendship with an invalid daughter. The mother, Priscilla Townsend, told me that early in their married life she and her husband had mutually agreed never to weaken the authority of the other over their children; also never to bring into their home the infelicities of persons with whom they would not associate, but to remember and share with each other the most agreeable happenings of the day. Educated under these influences their children became the dispensers of the highest, the most cheerful, and the best, which was occurring in their several spheres. The married brothers made it their pleasure to store up for their sister what would most interest her, and bring it as an offering with their evening visits. Thus the cherished invalid became the centre towards whom converged the best happenings of the family and the world. Her room became a shrine of beauty in nature and in art, and a store-house for the good deeds of men. From it went forth elevating influences to a wide circle of friends, each bound to the other by a common tie of love and admiration for her who had drawn them together, and many sought her presence for the strengthening and uplifting of their own lives.

A friend once said to Edward Townsend, "I hear thee has an afflicted sister." "That is a mistake," he promptly replied. "I was told she was a great sufferer," continued the friend. "Ah! now thee is reaching the point. She does suffer acutely, but she is not an afflicted person." Edward Townsend's knowledge of his sister was of one whose bodily sufferings are hidden under the wealth of her intellectual and spiritual nature. To him, as to others, she was a delightful companion,—a lofty ideal to reverence, as well as to love, a friend in whom to confide, a soul strong in its support of all good.

The agreement the young parents made with each other would be good for any young people in their situation. They were right-minded to begin with, or they would not have felt the value of these determinations, but I have no doubt that the uniform practice of the rules mentioned, had much to do with the happiness of the whole family, and through the different members of it, influenced a wide circle.

G. L.

THE COMING DAY OF PEACE.¹

BY CHARLES G. AMES, BOSTON.

A YEAR and a half ago, some of us were pleasing ourselves with the notion that in any movement for Universal Peace the United States would march at the head of the procession. We knew that the policy of the republic was against keeping up any more than a nominal standing army; and against intervention in the affairs of other nations. We knew, also, that our Department of State had initiated correspondence with European governments and had found them inclined to consider favorably the proposal for treaties of arbitration. And when Mr. Olney's treaty with Great Britain failed in the Senate only for lack of a two-thirds vote, the defeat affected us like a memory of Bunker Hill. But last August we were surprised to find our country superseded in the post of honor by the lead of a despotic government whose word can set in motion any day a million of soldiers.

¹Address at the Unitarian Club, Boston, Fourth month 8, 1899.

The rescript of the Czar opens upon us with these words: "The maintenance of general peace and the possible reduction of excessive armaments. . . . present themselves as ideals toward which the endeavors of all governments should be directed." I am persuaded that the events of the last twelve months, and the history we have had a part in making, do but give a solemn emphasis to the Czar's appeal.

What people on earth can have more weighty motives than we to desire and promote the pacification of the world? If the combinations of human rapacity and violence which have wrought such havoc through the sad past are to continue their rage unchecked through the long future, our own country is to be exposed to new and formidable dangers. Every year the oceans are growing narrower; we are already nervous because our thousands of miles of coast are unfortified; and every extension of territory, as well as every advance in the development of our internal resources, will offer an inviting point of attack and compel large provisions for defense.

Are we to confirm and strengthen our free institutions and to hold a place of honor among the forces of civilization? Then we need to escape from the necessity of matching our army and navy against the ever-growing armaments of other nations. If we do not join them in following after the things that make for peace, how can we reasonably hope that the republic will not plunge at last into the abyss which has swallowed all the old empires which trusted to the sword only to perish by the sword?

To keep our own government simple, to hold back the tendencies to centralization and arbitrary power, and to spare the people from those burdens which, as the Czar truly says, are crushing Europe—all these things are involved in our coöperation with his plan.

Last summer it came to the knowledge of the British government that Russia was to add a few vessels to her navy. Parliament immediately voted to build a larger number. At about the same time, the German statesman, von Bulow, was saying, "Our future is based on our right, and our right upon the sharpness of our sword." Very fine and brave; and in the next breath comes a request for twenty or thirty more regiments!

Meanwhile, just across the Niemen, Russia was suspicious about Emperor William's visit to the Turk; and just across the Rhine, France was in a paroxysm and the republic was shaking to its base, because millions of people were more concerned for the "honor" of the army than for the honest administration of justice. At home we were being urged to fall into line with the exhausting Old World policy, and enter on a course of endless military and naval expansion.

These incidents illustrate the whole business. The nations that think it necessary to be always on a war footing, to go armed for every possible emergency, must not only lie awake nights to watch each other; they must study how to be more than a match for any other power, or any probable combination of powers. Hence the hypocritical alliances by which one group of nations is kept in hostile array against another group. Hypocritical, because not rooted in friendship. The alliances are broken off in a day at the dictate of selfishness. France is the ally of England long enough to fight out the Crimean war with Russia; France becomes the ally of Russia against England the moment a point can be scored against Germany. Austria is hardly driven out of Italy before Italy is wanted to help Austria and Germany keep the balance of power against Russia and France. Even an Anglo-Saxon alliance cannot last a day longer than England and the United States can make common cause in dealing with questions of Asiatic trade, and neither of them dares carry a gun the less so long as all the world is in arms. The military system is the beast of Scripture, with its seven heads, ten horns, and great iron teeth.

Small nations are obliged to assume enormous burdens in order to keep themselves from being hustled to death in the crowd. What a sorrowful spectacle is young united Italy, impoverished and tortured by the supposed necessity of creating a great army and navy and of embarking in a policy of colonial expansion in Africa and Asia! Why could she not learn wisdom from a neighbor's folly? Since 1895 Spain has spent $275,000,000 in trying to establish her sovereignty over the islands which hate her as a murderess.

Shall we go on sowing dragon's teeth forever? There is a more excellent way. We are to change the animus and objects of diplomacy by bringing all the nations into an alliance. We are to consult together, not merely how one combination can outwit or overpower another,—not merely how to shape our policies according to the promptings of suspicions, jealousies, old grudges, traditional hatreds, dynastic and territorial greeds; but to contrive how we may open the highway of prosperity to all mankind.

It is largely a question of horizons. How far can we see? Officialism, civil and military, is called to deal with the day's doings; it is short-sighted to all but nearby facts and present situations; it is often blind to causes and consequences. So it demands strong armies to over-awe, strong garrisons to defend, strong and swift ships to clear the seas, not half realizing that every such demand on one side compels an equal or greater outlay on the other. Thus every military nation, under the plea of self-defense, becomes an oppressor of all mankind, perpetuating war by perpetually increasing the preparations for war.

A few evenings ago I heard a naval chaplain describing the eagerness of our marines for the Santiago fight and their exultation at the sight of the enemy emerging from the harbor. The physician, he said, is glad of a call to try his skill; the lawyer welcomes a case; the preacher gives thanks for an opportunity to speak to the people. Just so, it is the soldier's business to fight, and it is natural that his spirits should rise to the occasion. Yes, all this is natural, and we are human enough to understand it, and perhaps to sympathize with it. But it will occur to you that this passion for war, when it becomes a settled motive and gives rise to a permanent profession, is not one of the forces that make for peace, and is very likely to increase the probabilities of conflict ; it is the spark that explodes the magazine, the kindling wood that lights the conflagration. Nations are like individuals ; if they carry arms, they find occasion for using them. If they go unarmed, they settle their disputes by more judicial methods.

The difficulties in the way of general pacification are great, but, as has been well said, "more difficulties are in the way of its proving a failure." The forces at work for peace are many and mighty. The clearest voices heard just now throughout the civilized world are protests against war. Every cabinet of Europe is consulting how to keep the peace. Every leading statesman and journalist, even if he throws cold water on the Czar's proposals, admits the desirability of their success. Why should not the will make the way ? . . .

The growth of reason is slow. The animal still suppresses and imprisons the man ; brute force still dominates the earth, and goes about like a roaring lion, seeking whom it may devour, and generally finding a square meal. The conflict of right with might, of reason with violence, of justice with selfishness, still goes on. But the museum which holds the spear and club of the earlier savages may yet be the resting-place of those more destructive weapons and engines which are still the boast of our spurious civilization. That better day may tarry long ; we must wait for it, and work for it.

The movement for peace will gradually acquire momentum and carry all before it. There will be an uprising of the people. Sheldon Amos, an eminent jurist, predicts that some future morning when a government declares war, it will be surprised and paralyzed into inaction by discovering that a change has come over public feeling—that the people refuse any longer to shoot or be shot.

Back of politics and statesmanship and diplomacy is trade. Trade does not want war,—not even to create markets. When all the world is at peace all the world will be an open market. Back of trade is industry. Production does not want war. Nobody knows as well where the military shoe pinches as the workingmen. They are almost unanimous in their hatred of war. They know too well how the wealth is produced which is swallowed up in this maelstrom. They know that when rich men's sons wear the shoulder-straps poor men's sons must die in the trenches or rot in the camps.

I once asked our loved and honored General Armstrong whether there was truth in the accounts given of the general degradation and dishonesty and sensual vice of the Southern negroes. "Yes," he said, "no words could over-state the horrors of the situation." "What hope, then," I asked,— "what hope of a better future? Your Hampton and Tuskegee schools reach a few hundreds ; yet in a few years the number of the colored people is increased by millions."

His answer was exultant. "No matter how black the night ; when once the faintest ray gilds the eastern sky, we know the day is coming. The light will increase, the darkness will fall back ; the sun is sure to conquer."

And I am sure that if Whittier were still with us, the call for a Conference of civilized nations to consider how to lessen the evils and abolish the customs of war would make him break once more into glad and grateful song :

"The day is dawning in the East of which the prophets told,
And brightens up the sky of Time, the Christian Age of Gold."

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 18.—FOURTH MONTH 30.

PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord is my strength and song,
And he is become my salvation.

—Exodus, xiii., 2.

Scripture Reading.—Exodus, xiv., 5-31.

THERE were three ways open to the children of Israel for the journey out of Egypt. Perhaps no monuments of men are more enduring than the roads he marks out for himself. Generation after generation follows the same paths as its forefathers. Even unto this day the three ways out of Egypt remain. The first passed close by the Mediterranean Sea, crossed the Isthmus of Suez, and then followed the sea to the Philistine cities of the coast. This was the Way of the Land of the Philistines, and the shortest path to Canaan. The second was the Way of the Wall, which crossed the isthmus inland, and passed up from the southward into the midst of Palestine, thus avoiding the Philistine country. The third passed close by the upper end of the Red Sea, and crossing the Peninsula of Sinai, turned southward into Arabia.

