It will be remembered that a wall was begun by Seti I. and finished by Rameses II., extending across the isthmus from sea to sea. This wall was garrisoned by Egyptian troops. The country on either side was a wilderness. No cities were allowed ; the land was uncultivated. This was a further protection, since an enemy, even if he passed the wall, would find difficulty in getting supplies until he had penetrated far into Egypt. The garrison of the wall was probably supplied from the store cities, Pithom and Rameses, mentioned in the second lesson (Exodus, i., 11).

The Hebrews seem to have set out from Goshen for the way of Philistia. We read that after they had begun their journey (Exodus, xiii., 17) "God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near ; for God said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and so return to Egypt." In this we see a suggestion that the calamities which had fallen upon Pharaoh were hardly so crushing as represented by the annalist. The leaders of the Hebrews evidently expected pursuit and resistance in their exodus from Egypt. It is hardly to be supposed if Pharaoh had been convinced that the Hebrew leader had life and death in his control, that he would have ventured to further oppose the movements of the Israelites (Exodus, xii., 33). Moreover, we see that the leaders did not fully trust the people. Broken by generations of slavery, they could not be depended on to fight courageously even for liberty. It seemed best, therefore, to turn aside into the wilderness of the Wall, and to move southward toward the Red Sea. This had the additional advantage of misleading the Egyptians, who did not know at once where to look for them in that uninhabited country. The position of their encampment near the Red Sea is very definitely located by the Bible narrative (Exodus, xiv., 2).

The event next to follow is worthy of minute study, for it left its impress on Israel for all after generations. It is not too much to say that the awful pressure of immediate danger and the sudden unlooked-for rescue welded the rabble of Egyptian slaves into a nation. We must first acquaint ourselves with the facts concerning the Red Sea. The northwestern arm of the sea, near which the Israelites were encamped, is a very shallow bay. The Suez Canal avoids this northern end by a detour, and enters the sea several miles south of it, where deep water can be secured. Only the smallest boats can navigate the northern portion. When the wind blows from certain directions it often happens that the water is driven back so that the sea may be crossed for many miles on foot, and there are a few recorded cases in this present century when the whole area was practically bare. The Bible makes no suggestion of the use of other than natural means in the rescue of the Hebrews. "The Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all night, and made the sea dry land."

The events in orderly sequence are given as follows: While the Hebrews were encamped by the sea, the Egyptian army appeared in pursuit. It was impossible for them to flee around the end of the sea, for the Egyptian wall, with its garrison of soldiers, was across that path. To the south was the waste African desert. The Hebrews "saw war," and were afraid. All was confusion. The fugitives reproached Moses, saying, in bitter irony, "Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness?" And again, displaying their lost manhood, "It had been better for us to serve the Egyptians than that we should die in this wilderness." It was at this crisis that the strong east wind bore back the waters, and the Hebrews, seizing upon the only way of escape, passed over with their flocks and herds. The Egyptians pursued, but their heavy chariots were retarded by the sand, so that they "drove heavily" (Exodus, xiv., 25), and the waters returning overwhelmed them.

As indicated above, this sudden and unexpected deliverance impressed itself so deeply on the minds of the Hebrews that it was never forgotten. The prophets refer to it constantly; it is sung in the Psalms and is preached by the Christian apostles. It is the crowning example of Jehovah's care for his people. He is able in every crisis of his people to open a way where no way appears. Let them not fear though danger threatens them on all sides. It is not necessary for them to know the way of their deliverance. In some unexpected way the Lord will find a safe path, and their enemies shall be destroyed. Their feelings of exultation and awe found voice in the grand song of Moses (Exodus, 15), in which the strength and sufficiency of Israel's God are exalted. "The Lord is my strength and my salvation. . . .

Who is like to thee among the gods? . . . The Lord shall reign for ever and ever."

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 18.—FOURTH MONTH 30.

THE COMFORTER PROMISED.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter.—John, xiv., 16.

Read the Scripture, John, xiv., 15-27.

REVISED VERSION.

THIS lesson follows directly on from the last one, in the fourteenth chapter of John, it being part of the extended 'parting discourse of Jesus to his disciples, in the upper room at Jerusalem, after the Passover supper, the washing of feet, and the departure of Judas. It was the evening before the Crucifixion.

The whole of the lesson is impressive and important. The first verse is succinct and striking: "If ye love me, ye will keep my commandments." This is a companion to many declarations of like character. "By their fruits ye shall know them." Where the commandments of the Master are ignored and disregarded, it is obvious that there is no real love for him. The pretense of it there may be, the ceremony of it there may be, but the reality cannot be. For the religion of Christ is a reality, a life, a practical demonstration.

Other passages in the same lesson are to the same effect: "He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me." And again: "If a man love me he will keep my word. . . he that loveth me not keepeth not my words." The thought is over and over the same, the injunction is made emphatic.

"To do thy will is more than praise,
As words are less than deeds,
And simple trust can find thy ways
We miss with chart of creeds.

"The heart must ring thy Christmas bells,
Thy inward altars raise;
Its faith and hope thy canticles,
And its obedience praise." (Whittier.)

The Comforter, whom or which Jesus promised would come to his sorrowing disciples, was, and is, as the account explicitly says, (v. 26) the Holy Spirit. It would, he said, be sent by the Father. It would be a spiritual comforter. It would be to them inwardly as he had been outwardly—the Christ. Its visitation would remind them of him. All this is consistent with the faith and the conviction which we have of that manifestation of the Divine Being. Jesus names it here (v. 17) the Spirit of Truth, and the name is excellent. For Truth is essentially divine, as Love is, and the spirit which exemplifies Truth in the highest degree and most perfect measure is that which has entered into our hearts when we are divinely filled.

We are not to suppose, from the language of the text, that God's Spirit only visited his children after the departure of Jesus in the flesh. That he would "send" this Comforter, as God had sent him, may seem to be implied. But we know that from the earliest time God was spiritually known. We know that thus he manifested himself in every age.

"All souls that struggle and aspire,
All hearts of prayer by thee are lit;
And, dim or clear, thy tongues of fire
On dusky tribes and twilight centuries sit.

"Nor bounds, nor clime, nor creed thou know'st,
Wide as our needs thy favors fall;
The white wings of the Holy Ghost
Stoop, seen or unseen, o'er the hearts of all."

(Whittier.)

The world, he said, cannot receive the Spirit of Truth, the Comforter, (Greek, Paraclete, meaning Advocate, Helper). The meaning here lies in the word world. It is not mankind, not the mass of children of men, but the irreligious, sensual, proud, pagan condition, in which the divine nature is denied and defied. It is this world, and it always has been this, which has warred against the spread of the diviner condition. Cruelty has thrust out kindness, and selfishness has repelled love. Such a world truly cannot know or receive the Spirit of Truth, for it is an antagonistic principle; it is that which we have called Satan, and have given a personality. The world, the flesh, the devil, are one. Every evil opposite of the good is part of this aggregation which cannot know, cannot receive, cannot enjoy, the divine. Necessarily, it must be perishable; in time it must give way to the good. For the good is that which God directs, the evil is that which resists good.

The present lesson proceeds only to the 27th verse, in which are the beautiful and comforting expressions of benediction: "My peace I give unto you . . . let not your hearts be troubled," but the chapter should be read through to the end, and carefully studied, as the next lesson is taken from the next chapter. "I go unto the Father," Jesus said, and then he added, "If ye loved me, ye would have rejoiced, . . . for the Father is greater than I." He, appearing in the outward, a messenger sent of God, a manifestation of the Divine, a spiritual man, returned now to him who is the Father, who alone endues and endows. The last two verses of the chapter are partly obscure, but the final clause emphasises the same thought: ". . . the world may know that I love the Father, and as the Father gave me commandment, even so I do."

THE DOUKHOBORS AS CHRISTIANS.

Toronto, Canada, Globe, Third month 26.

To the Editor of the Globe: I see in the newspapers that some good Christians are thinking seriously of sending missionaries to the newly arrived Doukhobors in Manitoba—a proposition which may well give rise to some meditation. These Russian colonists are distinguished by the fact that they are literally carrying out the teachings of Jesus, having refused in the face of severe persecution to defend themselves, to serve in the army and take the lives of their fellow-men. In their lives they rank easily as the chief of living Christians, or, perhaps, it might be more correct to say, as the only living Christians. Now, what will these missionaries teach these disciples of Christ? They all interpret the Sermon on the Mount in the Pickwickian sense. They recite like parrots that we are to turn the other cheek, but they neither practice it nor teach it. They say "Love your enemies," and approve of showing that love with bombshells. They assert that a man's life consists not in the abundance of things which he possesses, but they have not a word of protest to utter in the midst of a civilization founded upon the very antithesis of this doctrine. They cannot plead ignorance of the emphasis which Jesus placed upon his words, for he said at the close of the Sermon on the Mount that "every one that heareth these sayings of mine and doeth them not shall be likened unto a foolish man, which built his house upon the sand," while whoever "doeth them, I will liken him unto a wise man, which built his house upon a rock." Is it not rather absurd for Christians who have built in the sand to worry about the salvation of men who have built on the rock?

Perhaps it is to the immigrant's form of worship that the missionaries are to address themselves, but here again they are at fault, for Christ says explicitly that "not every one that saith unto me Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom of Heaven, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in Heaven," and he asks significantly, "Why call ye me Lord, Lord, and do not the things which I say?" Certainly on the basis of these teachings the Doukhobors have little to learn from any known church.

But is it the dogmatic and theological science of these peasants which is askew? Are they unsound as to the constitution of the Trinity, or the meaning of the long words in which the fathers have fossilized their guesses at the unknown? Here once more we must give the preference to the Doukhobors. Christ has given only one method of ascertaining the truth: "If any man will do his will, he shall know of the doctrine, whether it be of God, or whether I speak of myself." This the Doukhobors have done, and according to the text they are almost the only accredited teachers of theology now in existence.

If there are to be any missionaries, let these Russian Christians send them forth. Surely we have need enough of them. Let them go to the Soudan, where the Church of Christ is preaching the forgiveness of enemies and sanctioning the avenging of Gordon—to Manila, where she is blessing the slaughter of brave patriots and telling men to turn the other cheek—to every city, town, and hamlet of Christendom, where she is crying Lord, Lord, and taking precious care not to do a thing that He said. And finally, let us hope that the misguided men with beams in their eyes who attempt to convert the Doukhobors may have no success.

"Woe unto you, scribes and Pharisees, hypocrites, for ye compass sea and land to make one proselyte, and when he is made, ye make him twofold more the child of hell than yourselves."

ERNEST H. CROSBY.

19 Liberty street, New York, March 22.

MORE OF A HERO.—A man who will sacrifice his wit to save the feeling of another is more of a hero than the man who risks his life to save a friend from fire or drowning before a crowd of spectators.—Walter Blackburne Harte.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 22, 1899.

"RACE" MANNERS.

IN the poem by Rudyard Kipling, recently commented on in this column, the idea is that all sorts of other-complexioned peoples are inferior to the "white," and it speaks of them in one verse as "silent" and also "sullen." We are exhorted to take up the burden of oversetting them, and then setting them up again—those who survive the process—partly because of their color, and partly because they are silent and sullen. Now it would be a sad thing for this ardent appeal to us if there should prove to be a vital defect in the theory itself, a sort of worm in the bud, as it were. If the manners of the sun-burnt brethren are not so bad, what becomes of the poem?

C. F. Lummis, whose book on Mexico we recently reviewed, takes the view that our "race" is not so well-mannered as some others. This is a startling suggestion, we admit, but here we have Lummis's prose against Kipling's rhyme, and though the latter thinks we "dare not stoop to less" (though we fear it underestimates the stooping capacity of the "white" man) than the immediate reconstruction and transformation of all races whose complexion does not reach the standard, still it is not clear that we are really called to "stoop" to that. It may be that we are not so superior as we have thought. Instances of over-estimate of self have occurred, we all know.

What Lummis says is that in manners our "race" does not do so well as people to the southward, whose average complexion is darker. He is, in fact, extremely emphatic on this point. We cannot copy his views in full, but he finds, he says, "the Spanish American not only of incomparably more tact, but of fully as deep sincerity" as the English American. "Perhaps the most striking quality of this courtesy is its democracy. The Saxon, even in a republic, is polite to his friends and superiors, if he can be polite at all. The Iberian is polite to every one—to his servants, the beggars at the curb, the foreigner with nose aloft. In more than a dozen years of intimacy with his lands, I have never found a flaw in his manners. . . . No door was ever shut to me by any Spanish American, nor even by any Indian of Spanish speech, in the wildest and poorest corner between Colorado and Chile. I have been gently forced to sleep on the one bed of a hovel, while for me the aged hosts slept on the dirt floor; I have come in the tatters of a long mountaineering to a princely ha- cienda and found a prince's welcome, not as Anybody, but as a man."

Supposing this to be true—and we have no reason for questioning either C. F. Lummis's large opportunity for observation, or the sincerity with which he gives his testimony,—what are we to conclude? Is it a part of the white man's burden to change all this,—and by force?

HERE are a few points of instruction and suggestion in relation to sending "copy" to newspapers:

1. Write plainly. A "fancy" hand is an abomination to editors and printers. Type-writing is best, of course, but a simple, plain, "round" hand, without flourishes, is very nearly as good.
2. Write on one side of the paper, only. Leave some margin at top (for a heading) and at the edges. Do not write too closely; leave room between the lines for interlineation, if the editor should think it best to insert any.
3. Use figures for dates. The custom of writing dates out fully in words may be required in polite correspondence, or society formalities, but it is not used in printing, and is not likely to be.
4. In proper names, spell them correctly, and write them so plainly that a mistake cannot reasonably be made. Recollect that the printer is not familiar with these names, as you are, and cannot depend on guessing. If you make u for n, he does not know but that you want it that way.
5. Do not roll your manuscript, fold it. Use moderately thin, rather than thick, paper. If it is bulky, do not fold it up tight, in order to get it into a small envelope, but use a larger one, so there may be less folding.

IT is a very effective note of Peace which Dr. Ames of Boston, formerly for many years well-known and much esteemed in Philadelphia, sounds in the address which we print elsewhere. He brings out clearly and graphically many points of the overwhelmingly strong case.

A FRIEND in Salem Quarterly Meeting, N. J., has sent us copies of the address to the Czar, signed by 257 persons in that quarterly meeting. "We might have had many more signatures," she adds, "but thought the papers ought soon to be sent."

BIRTHS.

JANNEY.—In Philadelphia, Third month 5, 1899, to John and Florence Janney, a daughter, who has been named Beulah Moore.

MARRIAGES.

BAKER—MAULE.—At the residence of the bride's father, Third month 2, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Thomas C. Baker, of Homeville, Pa., son of George and Mary J. Baker of Homeville Meeting, Pa., and Eva V. Maule, daughter of Benjamin and the late Elizabeth J. Maule of Londonderry, Pa.

DEATHS.

BROWN.—At his home in Zanesfield, Ohio, Second month 27, 1899, Jehu Brown, aged 99 years, 7 months, 5 days; a life-long member of the Society of Friends. He was born in Chester county, Pa., Seventh month 25, 1799, and was a descendant of James Brown, who came to this country about the year 1699 and settled in Pennsylvania. His parents were Elihu and Margaret Brown. They removed with their family of nine children to Harford county, Maryland, in 1806. In 1834 he came to Logan county, Ohio, where he spent the remainder of his life.

He was married Fourth month 19, 1837, to Susanna Michener, in the Friends' meeting near Zanesfield. She was the daughter of Benjamin and Abigail Michener, and died Sixth month 21, 1888. S. J. F.

CALEY.—In Philadelphia, Fourth month 13, 1899, Sabina S., wife of William R. Caley, in her 57th year.

Interment at Newtown Square, Delaware county, Pa.

CLARK.—At the home of her son-in-law, George Coates, Londonderry, Chester county, Pa., Third month 28, 1899, Lydia B. Clark, widow of the late Joseph Clark, in her 77th year.

CONROW.—Near Moorestown, N. J., Fourth month 9, 1899, Minnie B., wife of Dr. A. E. Conrow, aged 34 years. Interment at Westfield Friends' ground.

COOPER.—After an illness of less than two weeks, Daniel Kent Cooper, of Upper Oxford township, Chester county, Pa., died early Third-day morning, Third month 28.

His illness was caused by a carbuncle, which developed blood-poisoning, and eventually caused his death. He was in the 28th year of his age, unmarried, and lived with his parents, Hiram K. and Ruthanna K. Cooper, and his brother Wilfred P., at the home of his birth near Pennsgrove, of which meeting he was a member.

Conscientious in the performance of duty, free from bad habits, pure in life, a staunch friend, and a helpful neighbor, he was much loved by his many friends, and much respected by a wide circle of acquaintances. Straightforward and energetic, he was honest to his conviction of right, and always supported the policy of the Prohibition party. The funeral, which took place Sixth-day, Third month 31, was very large, one hundred and fifteen vehicles being counted at the house where the services were held at 1 o'clock. B.

COWPERTHWAIT.—Suddenly, on Fifth-day morning, Third month 30, 1899, at his residence in Medford, N. J., Thomas B. Cowperthwaite, in the 75th year of his age.

Though not a member of the Society of Friends, he regularly attended their meetings on First-days, when health permitted. He was much respected by all who knew him.

He was a brother of Rebecca J. Cowperthwaite, a recorded minister of Medford Monthly Meeting. He leaves a wife, but no children survive him. *

DUELL.—At Wenonah, N. J., Fourth month 14, 1899, Mary G., widow of Charles Duell, aged 64 years.

Interment at Mullica Hill Friends' ground.

HOAG.—At his home in town of New Baltimore, Greene county, N. Y., on First-day, Fourth month 2, 1899, William Hoag, in his 91st year.

MEREDITH.—At his late residence, in Upper Uwchlan, Chester county, Pa., Fourth month 6, 1899, Peter Meredith, in the 81st year of his age.

[A local newspaper notice says: He was a man highly respected in the community, an honest, conscientious citizen, and a member of the Society of Friends. During his lifetime he had raised several boys, and, while he never gave them much cash in their own hands, he usually placed snug sums at interest for them annually, so that when they grew to manhood they set out for themselves with little fortunes. He was a life-long resident of Uwchlan township, and a farmer by occupation. He was unmarried. He was the son of John and Elizabeth Meredith, and was one of a family of three children. His sister Lydia died some years ago, and another sister, Mary Ann, who is advanced in years, survives him.]

ALL changes, but Life ceases not
With the suspended breath;
There is no bourn to Being, and
No permanence in Death;
Time flows to an eternal sea,
Space widens to Infinity!

—Florence Earle Coates.

DOUKHOBOR NOTES.

WE have, at this writing, no further word from the Doukhobors in Canada, additional to that contained in the letter of Prince-Hilkoff to Joseph S. Elkinton, printed last week.

In the last issue of the Friend, (Philadelphia), J. S. E. states that a second letter has been received from Prince Hilkoff, dated Fourth month 2, "setting forth the need of horses, oxen, plows, wagons, and general farm implements and seeds; in this last letter he states that the immigrants are in need of animals for ploughing, and harness for horses, and cows for milk for the children. The next greatest need is for ploughs, for the party which first arrived and for those who are expected from Cyprus, with harness, wagons, and other implements."

A letter from James A. Smart, Canadian Deputy Minister of the Interior, dated at Ottawa, the sixth instant, is also noted in the Friend. It stated that something like 2,500 of the immigrants were already set out on their land, buildings having been erected for between five and six thousand, and it was expected that in a week or two the two ship loads would be in the colonies set apart for them.

It has been definitely decided that the colonists in Cyprus shall be removed this spring to Canada. The climate in Cyprus does not suit them, (though their health is much better than it was), and they are naturally very anxious to be reunited with their friends in the Canadian settlements. (We print elsewhere an extract from a recent letter describing the Cyprus settlers.)

The Cyprus party, it is stated, are almost entirely without means, and will need much help. The Canadian Interior Department would have to do what it can for them until they are in a position to help themselves.

The Friends of Fourth and Arch Streets Yearly Meeting have sent forward to Canada, $2,000 of the fund raised, from Friends and others, for Doukhobor aid, "to be appropriated for most pressing needs, under the oversight of Prince Hilkoff and representatives of the Doukhobors."

The balance remaining in the INTELLIGENCER fund is $183. As the amount is small, we have not applied it to any purpose, thinking it better to wait on an occasion of extreme need. It may be, perhaps, best to keep it to aid the Cyprus party.

THE PHILIPPINE POLICY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

SINCE one of your correspondents has somewhat unfavorably referred to the sentiments expressed by nearly all of the contributors to the INTELLIGENCER regarding the expansion question, I will ask space to say a little more. Is it not one of the cardinal principles of the Society of Friends that they bear testimony against war? If so, upon what basis can any member of the Society sustain the war of conquest in the Philippines?

Notwithstanding a desire or inclination of all citizens of the United States to look with favor upon the acts of their own government, especially in time of war, the sober second thought is rapidly taking the place of the dazzling enthusiasm that characterized the fall of Manila and Santiago, and our policy in the Philippines is being condemned by our better judgment, and the conservative, stand-by element of the country.

As evidence that this is a war of conquest, we have the pronunciamiento of about the 4th instant, of the commissioners to the Philippines, defining the position and purpose of the United States government toward the people, and asking a conference with their "representative men"—but probably not with Aguinaldo and the authorized heads of their organized government—for an exchange of views and opinions. The Commissioners say : "American supremacy must be enforced," which means, of course, that the "views and opinions" will all be on the side of the commissioners. So we are now permitted to know where the President stands, notwithstanding his utterances at Boston, declaring, in effect, that he was waiting the sentiments of the American people. The proclamation may be said to promise everything that a subjugated people could wish for,—except their liberty. That is, if the Filipinos can find excuse for faith in a government whom they had looked to as friends and extolled as liberators, but whose policy seems to be acquisition of territory by conquest, for the purpose of exploitation by capitalists, and designing politicians. Just possibly, the people of those islands would be temporarily better off under the guiding wing of the United States. But this is not the question to be considered.

The American people should ask themselves whether the policy we are pursuing is based upon the fundamental principle upon which the liberty-loving people of America established the government of the United States, in refusing the Filipinos the same rightful aspiration and privilege of governing themselves, and compelling them to accept whatever we may dictate. It matters not that we might give them a government that some of their "business" people could prosper under, for they would still be deprived of the right, which we hold so dear, to govern themselves.

Those people fought Spain for years, and are now at war with the United States, and for what? for liberty. It has been well suggested that we are now standing in the same position that Lafayette would have assumed had he, after his helpful hand in our war against Great Britain, transported the French army to America to subjugate us, and acquire our territory, at the behest of the French King.

Even should the people of the Philippines quietly or protestingly submit, or our troops and fleet be withdrawn at the overwhelming demand of the American people, I fear it is too late to wipe out the stain that we have put upon ourselves in the estimation of the civilized world.

When Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish ships, he should have withdrawn his fleet, reserving perhaps a coaling station at Manila bay, and at the same time recognizing the independence of the Philippine republic.

WM. H. VORE.

Lincoln, Neb., Fourth month 8.

ANOTHER "PLEA FOR THE OPPRESSED."

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

A LARGE amount of matter has been printed in the INTELLIGENCER about the Philippines, which I think tends to bewilder instead of enlighten. War between two so-called Christian nations is an anachronism, a foul blot on the Christianity and the civilization of the age, but while mankind remains as it is, while so many men and women come into the world, with defective mental and moral development, circumstances will rise in which a resort to force seems to be necessary. (1) I will not discuss this proposition unless it shall be controverted.

A correspondent of the INTELLIGENCER makes a serious condemnation against our government for sending its army "against a simple people in their own land, bombarding their towns and cities, destroying their houses, killing men, women, and children, and driving the survivors into the wilderness for aught we know to perish of hunger." He asks, "would Jesus go in that way, or would he go as did William Penn, with a message of love, and win their respect?" How did Jesus treat the drovers and brokers who had invaded the temple? He did not meet them with a message of love. He seemed to think that a case that needed other treatment, and he "made a scourge of cords and cast, (or as the Old Version has it, drove), all out of the temple, both the sheep and the oxen, and he poured out the changers' money and overthrew their tables," and said, "make not my father's house a house of merchandise"; or, as Matthew reports him, "ye have made it a den of thieves." (2)

In the INTELLIGENCER of Second month 25, the editor asks, "inspired by the most poignant shame and sorrow for the slaughter of thousands of the Philippine people, is it possible that the American nation wish to further stain the pages of their own history?"

We all deplore the slaughter of our fellow-men anywhere, at any time, and under any circumstances, but in such cases we are not justified in assuming the facts to be as they are not. In all the criticisms of the government it is assumed that "those people inhabit their own country. Their country is not ours. Spain held it by force." So we hold a large part of our country "by force." We conquered it from the Indians and from Mexico. (3)

The government of Spain was the only authorized, the only recognized government the Philippine islands had during the last four hundred years, and now the islands belong to the United States, according to the recognized law of nations, both by conquest, (4) by treaty, and by purchase; (5) and the only organized government therein is that of the United States; (6) and to speak of it as "their country" is to assume the facts to be not as they are, but as we wish them to be. (7)

It is assumed that they are fighting "for no cause but the love of liberty." So said Jefferson Davis and General Lee. They were fighting for "self-government," for liberty to govern themselves, but they were rebels against the only recognized government in the land; and Aguinaldo is a traitor and fighting against the only government existing in the islands. (8)

When Admiral Dewey destroyed the Spanish fleet Aguinaldo appeared at Hong Kong and professed friendship for the Americans. He soon made his appearance at Manila, was invited there perhaps, and offered his services. But it soon became evident that he was planning opposition to our forces; and not as an act of war, but stealthily and feloniously he set fire to and burned nearly half of the city of Manila, burning the houses of his friends as well as the Spaniards; and when force was sent to Iloilo to drive off the Spanish army, and thus relieve the islands of the last of Spanish barbarism, it was found that it had surrendered to Aguinaldo, and he was in possession of the town and refused to let the American forces land; and he has been trying ever since to drive them from the islands by a system of warfare more barbarous than the American Indians were ever known to practice. They were never known to use a flag of truce to decoy an enemy within two hundred yards, and then draw rifles from behind their backs and fire on them; and still worse, when a friend, an officer in his own army advised him to cease his hopeless war against the Americans, he ordered him beheaded, and the order was promptly executed, and was followed by an order that he would behead any man who should repeat such advice. He has burned all the towns and villages of his own people through which he passed in his retreat before our troops.

Now we have emotional appeals against our government and in favor "of the poor Philippines hopelessly pleading and struggling for their freedom." To whom and by whom have they appealed? They have never asked, nor allowed any one to tell them what was intended or proposed to be done for them. (9) We have no evidence that Aguinaldo represents any but his own army, which is made up almost entirely of one tribe, the Tagals. (10)

We are appealed to to not violate the "principle upon which our government was founded, the consent of the governed," which we are charged with doing in this case,—a charge which has no foundation in fact, but there is not space to discuss it here.

The President said in his speech in Boston, "Until Congress shall direct otherwise, it will be the duty of the Executive to possess and hold the Philippines, giving to the people thereof peace and order and beneficial government, affording them every opportunity to prosecute their lawful pursuits, encouraging them in thrift and industry, making them feel and know that we are their friends, not their enemies; that their good is our aim, that their welfare is our welfare," but a reign of terror is not the kind of rule under which right action and deliberate judgment are possible. It is not a good time for the liberator to submit important questions concerning liberty and government while they are engaged in shooting down their rescuers."

What more can he do? He has no power nor right to say what shall be done with the islands. That Congress alone can say. (11)

The inhabitants of Negros, one of the largest islands, drove off Aguinaldo forever, hoisted the American flag, and asked American protection, and there is no evidence that Aguinaldo represents any but his own army. We have destroyed the only government they have had during about four centuries, and we cannot relieve ourselves of the duty of securing for them a better one, and to turn them over to a barbarian like Aguinaldo, would be a crime against the civilization of the age.

"If we drove out a mediæval tyranny only to make room for savage anarchy, we had better not have begun the task at all." (12)

Columbus, Ohio.

JOHN J. JANNEY.

Comment by Friends' Intelligencer.

Our friend's letter is long, but we print it as he sends it. (In a private note he asks its insertion "in the interest of truth and justice.")

We are obliged, in connection with it, to do two things. First, we ask that other correspondents do not take up the points in it for controversy, or we fear we shall be overwhelmed, and we think besides such controversy unnecessary and probably unprofitable. Second, we have at several points, numbered, in parentheses, some of the statements which, in our judgment, are unsound, and we add, here, our comment upon them; this, we hope, will relieve the minds of others, and make any further discussion unnecessary.

1. If this (beginning with the word "but") means a resort to war, especially aggressive war, it has always been denied by Friends.

2. To attempt to justify war, by the recorded action of Jesus in the Temple, is a straining of the text, and the attempt should not be made.

3. If our own title, derived from conquest, (of Indians and Mexicans) is clouded, as J. J. J. intimates, it is evident that will not make a conquest title in the Philippines a good one. Two wrongs never made a right.

4. The islands evidently do not belong to the United States, "by conquest," for we have not yet conquered them.

5. Nor do they "by treaty," or "by purchase" morally, for Spain, with whom we dealt, had not a good title.

6. The government of the United States is not "the only organized government therein"; on the contrary the Filipino government was, and still is, existent and effective.

7. The facts are well known, and speak for themselves.

8. Aguinaldo is not a "traitor" to the United States. He claimed independence, before the war of the United States with Spain, and still claims it. The name is misapplied. (The further extended statement concerning Aguinaldo is entirely one-sided—what the lawyers call ex parte: it is the opinion of many, among whom is Senator Hoar of Massachusetts, that Aguinaldo is a patriotic man, and deserves to be classed at least with Bolivar and Juarez.)

9. The Filipinos have learned, several times, the plan of the United States. It was explicitly set forth in the recent proclamation of the five commissioners, and had been previously in those of General Otis. This plan is to compel them to submit, and to give them no encouragement to expect independence.

10. The Tagals are probably the strongest and most capable tribe in the Islands.

11. Congress is not in session. The people are. The President, in his Boston address, referred the question to both.

12. Quite true. Our campaign in the Philippines has been wrong from the beginning. And "savage anarchy" (even if it existed), cannot be worse than civilized slaughter and rapine.

SANDY SPRING SETTLERS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I WISH to add somewhat to George T. Powell's interesting communication in the INTELLIGENCER, Fourth month 8. It leaves the impression that the Sandy Spring settlement began some fifty years ago. James Brooke, who married Deborah Snowdon, settled at Charlie Forest, and built the house (now standing) in 1728; this house is half a mile from Sandy Spring meeting-house. Their son, Roger Brooke, married Mary Matthews, and settled at Brooke Grove in 1753; the farm is now in possession of the fourth generation. In that year the meeting at Sandy Spring appears to have been established. In the "Story of Peter Yarnall," page 201, he speaks of having gone from Leesburg, Va., to Sandy Spring, in 1798, accompanied by William Stabler, who settled in Sandy Spring about 1800; he was a brother of Edward Stabler, of Alexandria, Va., a distinguished minister of our Society.

Thomas Moore, who married Mary, daughter of Roger and Mary Matthews Brooke, was a civil engineer, employed both on the Erie and the James River and Kanawha Canals. We have in my family a commission issued to him and two others, in 1804, to survey a road from Frederick City, Maryland, to the Ohio river, (the national turnpike), with autographs of Thomas Jefferson, President, and James Madison, Secretary of State. Isaac Briggs, who married another daughter, was also a noted engineer.

The original settlers, Brooke's, Thomas's Snowdons, and others, cleared the land, but much the larger part of the present Sandy Spring farms were made on land that had been exhausted in raising corn and tobacco, and then left to grow up in pine and sedge growth.

In 1846 the first experiment in a very small way was made with Peruvian guano, by Caleb Stabler, and from this date on the improvement was steady. The guano started clover, and then bone-dust and lime did the rest. I must qualify Friend Powell's statement as to the crops. We have had crops as large as he mentions, but not by any means as an average.

WARWICK P. MILLER.

Alloway, Md., Fourth month 10.

THE CYPRUS DOUKHOBOR COLONY.

Letter in The Friend, London.

I HAVE now been more than a week living in a room at the new cottage hospital, on the Doukhobor farm colony, Athalassa, and have thus seen much of this interesting colony of Russian peasants. There is a good-sized farm-house with enclosed yard, in which several families are accommodated, and on the hillside small houses (much like Irish cabins) have been built for the rest. Just below these is an enclosed garden of about an acre, with palm, orange, and olive trees; except for these I should fancy myself in an Irish village. About 500 Doukhobors are located here. I am most favorably impressed with them, especially the women, who are so clean and industrious; when not busy in their household affairs, cooking, cleaning, winnowing the wheat, or grinding, they are busy with knitting or embroidery. They look very picturesque going about in their skirts, bright-colored petticoats, and cosy-like caps. They always meet us with a pleasant smile, and frequently send us (the Russian nurse and myself) presents of cakes and various specimens of their food, so that we have vegetarian diet with a good deal of variety. The children are most anxious to learn English, and come to us all day long, "Please, a book," while there is generally a group on the porch spelling, and repeating texts, or teaching one another to count.

The nurse is busy each morning with various visitors. Besides the two men who are now in the hospital, others come to her daily—one man with a badly cut eye, a boy with a scalded foot, and some rheumatic patients. Then there is milk to send off to the cabins for the children who are not strong, followed by visits to some who are still suffering from malarial fever—though we are thankful there are no cases of serious illness. The nurse has two or three classes daily to teach Russian, while Captain St. John (who is living here also) has classes of the elder boys for English. These people have no schools, so but few can read; but we impress upon them the necessity of learning to speak English if going to Canada, and there is quite a furor for this just now.

I hope Friends will not get discouraged about these people. It is disappointing that they are not settling in Cyprus, but after the great mortality here it is evident the climate does not suit them, and now that 4,000 of their people are in Canada it would not do to press their staying. They seem to me a truly God-fearing people. We find them in groups chanting psalms as they work, and never hear a noise or quarreling, and with about 300 children and no school this is wonderful.

The country round here is pretty, and the children ramble over the hillsides and bring us bunches of wild flowers.

I hope next week to send an account of the Doukhobors' Sunday morning sunrise service.

M. A. MARRIAGE ALLEN.

Larnaka, Cyprus, Third month 21, 1899.

THE men and women whose lives are other people's strength or repose are not men and women seeking to do separate things at separate times, but those who have got and are filled with the life of life, who know there must be a fountain of supply, flowing by no artificial means itself from no exhausted source. We have to get very far back, away from low things, and close against the high one.—J. F. W. Ware.

SPIRITUALITY is best manifested on the ground, not in the air. Rapturous day-dreams, flights of heavenly fancy, longings to see the invisible, are less expensive and less expressive than the plain doing of duty. . . Spirituality is seeing God in common things, and showing God in common tasks.—Sunday School Times.

BANCROFT, the historian, who lived to be ninety years old and enjoyed exceptional vigor of body and cheer of countenance, was accustomed to say, "The secret of a long life is in never losing one's temper."

Educational Department.

GEORGE SCHOOL NOTES.

At the Young Friends' Association, Seventh-day evening, 8th, a paper on "How shall we reach the non-going church people?" prepared by Lydretta Rice, called out considerable comment. The writer thought that the First-day school and meeting could have a great deal of influence in this direction, if members would make a greater effort. Edith Michener, Ella Gillingham, and Prof. Smith all expressed the feeling that a sufficiently cordial welcome is not extended to strangers. Principal Maris read the paper which he had prepared for, and recently read at the conference at Race Street on "Christianity the Outgrowth of Judaism." Prof. George H. Nutt followed with a paper on "How Friends Appear to Outsiders." He expressed the thought that in a great measure they do not appear at all, and that greater effort should be made to spread the principles of Friends. A lively discussion followed.

With the exception of the paper, the program of the Whittier Society on Seventh-day evening, 15th, was devoted to Bayard Taylor and his works. Horace Way delivered an oration on his writings, and "Cedarcroft," (Bayard Taylor's home near Kennett Square, Pa.), was the subject of an essay by Lucille Preston. Several scenes from the story of Kennett, closed the meeting.

Hamilton W. Mabie, of The Outlook, recently gave the last of the season's course of lectures, subject, "Education and Success."

Sixth-day evening, 14th, William L. Bailey, of Philadelphia, treasurer of the Audubon Society, gave an illustrated lecture on birds, which was most interesting as well as instructive.

The new electric plant furnished lights for the first time Seventh-day evening, 15th instant.

Golf is receiving much attention during recreation hours, when the front lawns present a lively appearance.

The boys of the Athletic Association have put the tennis courts and base ball grounds in fine condition.

Dr. Holmes addressed the Young Friends' Association of Salem, New Jersey, on Sixth-day evening, 14th.

The prospects for a full attendance next year are very encouraging. Most of the rooms for boys are already engaged, and the girls' department is rapidly filling up.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

Alice M. Atkinson, Ph.D., has been appointed assistant professor of Greek at Swarthmore College, to enter upon her duties the next college year. She is a graduate, A. B., of Swarthmore, in the class of 1888, and received the same degree, 1889, at Cornell; in 1895 she received Ph.D. from the University of Pennsylvania. For two years she was engaged in teaching at a seminary in Portland, Oregon.

The eleventh annual oratorical contest between the Sophomore and Freshman classes for the President's prize was held on Third-day evening, the 11th inst. The program of the evening was as follows: Introductory remarks, President Birdsall; oration, "The Dreyfus Case," Arthur G. Hoadley, 1902; "The Secret of Greatness," William C. Tyson, 1901; "Character," Alida M. Stephens, 1902; "Lost Enthusiasm," Edward Williams, 1901; "Should we fear War?" Mark Thistlethwaite, 1902; "World Leaders," Elizabeth S. Gillingham, 1901; "Wasted Energy," Phebe Scheibley, 1902; "The Crime in Patriotism," Arthur Hugh Jenkins, 1901; "Universal Brotherhood," Edson S. Harris, 1902; "Anglo-Americans, Onward!" G. Arthur Seaman, 1901.

There were three judges on Thought and three on Delivery. The contest was the closest in the history of the competition; the award was made to the Class of 1900.

The Delphic Literary Society held its twenty-sixth annual reunion at the College on the evening of the 15th instant. A large number of enthusiastic alumni and ex-members gathered in honor of the event. At the banquet, Isaac H. Clothier, Jr., '96, directed the speeches, and the speakers included President Birdsall, Prof. J. Russell Hayes, Howard Cooper Johnson, '96, and Robert Pyle, '97.

A new competition, in extemporaneous speaking, has been established by a friend of the College. Prizes will be awarded to the three best speakers, in a contest of five minutes' speeches, on subjects not previously announced. The preliminary contest will be held within a few days, when the list of candidates will be reduced to twelve for the final contest. '99.

PRINCIPAL OF ABINGTON SCHOOL.—Prof. George M. Downing, of the University of New Brunswick, has been appointed Principal of Abington Friends' Boarding and Day School. Prof. Downing's former home was in Chester county; he is a member of the Society of Friends, and takes the position with high recommendations. B.

TEACHERS' PLANS.—Prof. Louis R. Ambler, who has been for several years Principal of Abington Friends' School, and who has resigned that position, purposes to spend two years in study at the University of Michigan, at Ann Arbor.

Helen R. Hillborn, of Swarthmore, will take charge of Friends' School at Darby, Pa., the coming year. She succeeds Eliza Hibberd, of Malvern, who has been in charge at Darby for two or three years, but is at present in impaired health.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

EASTON, N. Y.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Julia A. Baker, Fourth month 9, with the president Charles E. Wilbur, in the chair. The roll-call was responded to with sentiments from William Penn.

The program for the afternoon opened by George Gifford reading a very interesting paper on the early life of William Penn, in which he gave an account of his early religious experience and convictions, and the opposition which he met with in his own home, especially emphasizing the strength of his convictions, which enabled him to pass by the brilliant worldly prospects offered him by his father, and keep to the dictates of the Inner Light. A poem, "William Penn's Letter to His Daughter," was then read by Ruth Thomas.

Francis Borden reported the current events; he spoke of Bishop Potter's attitude toward the temperance question. He thought that most of the leading officers in other churches were in favor of prohibition; he mentioned that Kansas, a prohibition State, has forty-five counties with no paupers, and thirty-seven with no criminals. Regrets were expressed in regard to the North Carolina movement in trying to prohibit the colored vote in that State. Other items were mentioned.

Phebe A. Hoag read a paper entitled "The Influence of Plain Language," a short discussion of which followed. After a few moments of silence the meeting adjourned.

PHEBE A. HOAG, Cor. Sec.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—The Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn, at its meeting in New York, Third month 26, discussed the question of "Our Policy in the Philippines." In support of our present policy it was urged: (1) That it is the duty of a superior race to impress its civilization upon those less highly developed. Wherever countries have come under Anglo-Saxon rule, justice has been established, and inhumanity and confusion replaced by law and order. (2) That since we have destroyed the Spanish government in the islands, we must, in justice to the Filipinos, protect them, since the majority of them are, as yet, unfit for self-government.

On the other hand it was thought, (1) That the present policy is opposed to the spirit of true democracy, and at variance with the peace policy for which we have always stood among nations.

(2) That we have no inherent right to the islands, since those whose protection we assume, bitterly resent our interference. Believing that there is a Power which worketh for righteousness, we may trust that good will eventually triumph in the Philippines without our interference.

(3) That the loss to the world will be greater if we abandon the great principle of peaceful democracy for a policy of aggressive imperialism than if we allow the Filipinos to work out their own problems in their own way.

(4) Finally, that it is a duty laid upon those of us who have faith in the principles which are our inheritance to uphold them now; conscious that some of the world's seeming failures, are by the test of centuries, proved its sublimest victories.

On Fourth month 9, a paper was presented by J. R. M. Savage, treating of "The Practical Effects of a Belief in Immortality." The writer assumed a belief in the immortality of the soul, and a future conscious existence, as an established factor in all phases of Christian religion, and upon this hypothesis outlined some of the effects of such a belief upon character-making and upon religious ceremonials.

In the discussion which followed, the idea of reward and punishment, which is so often involved in the scheme of immortality, was disparaged as being an unworthy incentive and not conducive to the highest development.

It was suggested that there is in religion another element than moral obligation, and that in this more subtle essence the faith in immortality has a part. Such a faith is a basis for hope, and an inspiration through this life, as well as an amelioration of the pain of death, and thus, whether or not the fear of punishment and the hope of reward have any direct influence upon the course of our lives, still this faith reacts indirectly upon our tempers and temperaments, and largely influences our lines of action.

MARY A. NICHOLS, Correspondent.

PHILADELPHIA.—The Young Friends' Association held a regular meeting Fourth month 10. After the reading and approval of the minutes, the reports of the standing committees were given, all showing that interesting work was being done.

The Lecture Committee reported the completion of its work, and submitted a statement of the receipts and expenditures, showing a deficit of $40.44. The statement was referred to the Executive Committee for consideration. The advisability of our continuing our Centre for University Extension work was questioned. The attendance at Hudson Shaw's lectures was very small. It was thought this should be attributed to sickness, and to the fact that the same course had just been given at Fifteenth and Chestnut Streets, and concurrently was given at Germantown, rather than to lack of interest. The deficit of $40.44 was to some extent insured by the free lectures. A new Lecture Committee was appointed: William H. Gaskill, Chairman, Helen R. Hillborn, William G. Underwood, Mary B. Paxson, and Joseph E. Haines.

The Executive Committee mentioned the receipt of seven quaint books, the gift of the Race Street First-day School Library, also that a new Publication Committee had been appointed, Hannah Clothier Hull, Emma Speakman Webster, Nathaniel E. Janney, and Charles Paxson. It further stated that three persons had been elected into membership, and announced the program for the evening.

The first paper on the program, entitled "Ebb Tide," was written and presented by Alice N. Townsend. The paper considered chapters thirteen to seventeen of "The Quakers," by Frederick Storrs Turner. The introductory paragraph says: "As the subject of these chapters is alliterative, Decadence and Divisions in the Society of Friends, so our contemplation thereof produces alliterative feelings of pain and perplexity." Reference to the decrease in our membership is made; "some may believe the decadence was less real than apparent, but in the face of Turner's statistics who can deny apparent decline? The only possible compensation for the loss in quantity would be a corresponding gain in quality." Alluding to the influences of the social world of the 18th century, the paper says: "What really interests us in the century of so-called quietism and decadence is the interaction of character and conditions, and conditions and character. We have seen the Quaker in the midst of a crooked and perverse generation of active persecution and acrimonious controversy, now we are to see him in an atmosphere of toleration and religious indifference, or an enthusiasm entirely outside his circle. In 1760 the work of the investigating and disciplinary committee began its labor, which covered a period of twenty years." This committee is responsible for at least a one-third decrease in the membership, about this proportion being expell'd on account of "marrying out," but what constituted the alleged immorality and worldly-mindedness, we cannot ascertain from the vague reports left by this committee. However, some idea can be obtained from the Eliot diaries and letters recently published. These records inform us of the elaborate style in which the Eliot family conducted weddings and funerals, of their extravagance in dress, that they wore mourning, patronized the lotteries, had considerable plate and fine furniture. After a time the Society awoke to philanthropic labor, but renewed activity was accompanied by difference of opinion on historical and theological points.

In closing, the paper states: "Whatever our dangers of to-day may be, theological discussion does not seem one of them. The nineteenth century has learned 'not to be sure,' and our problem is still the old, old problem of using the world but not abusing it." The subsequent discussion attested to the merits and interest of the paper. It was remarked that judging from what Hudson Shaw had told us of the corruption of the eighteenth century, the backslidings of Friends were not surprising, as they could scarcely escape being influenced by their surroundings. Referring to the wealth of Quakers, one Friend said, he did not believe that prosperity caused the decadence, that the best men were not found among the poor. That prosperity was a good and right thing. Dig into the present, find out God's work to-day and to-day do it, and let that increase come which surely will. Another expressed his belief that the decadence was more apparent than real. We may have fewer members, but that does not indicate a lessening of strength. The Society is holding to its truths, and it is truth which endures.

Margaret P. Howard's paper on "Proselyting" was very closely allied to the preceding paper, and as one friend expressed it, "was a beautiful supplement." Much of the discussion verified this opinion. The paper referred to the work of the Society of Friends as being that established by the Founder of Christianity. Our method is to instil into the minds of men the thought that shall help them to perceive their divine kinship, and naturally the mind will dwell upon the Life of Jesus, the greatest example of the good accomplished by a life which conforms to the principles of Truth. The writer strongly advocates that every opportunity should be used for the more widespread of the Truth as we understand it, but does not consider it a worthy motive to seek the acceptance of our principles for the mere increase of membership. Lift our standard high—living clean and blameless lives, and willingness to occupy all fields which promise the betterment of our kind, surely should have a drawing power. The only practical way of spreading our principles and testimonies seems to be by individual faithfulness to the call of service in whatever direction there may be a qualification. The requisites for membership should rest not only on an intellectual acceptance, but on a life reasonably consistent.

During the discussion of the subject we were warned about being too sure that the flood tide had set in, but we should help it on. If as a body we have not been an aggressive force in the community, as individuals Friends have stood for big and great things, and their power to-day shows it.

After a few moments of silence the meeting adjourned.
ESTHER S. STACKHOUSE, Sec'y.

CONCORD FIRST-DAY SCHOOL UNION.—This Union met at Swarthmore, Pa., on the 15th inst. The meeting was well attended, and the various exercises conducted with spirit. The schools constituting the Union, sixteen in number, all reported, and most were in a flourishing condition. A few, however, were suffering from reduced members, caused in most cases by the removal of Friends to other centers. This element of change was commented upon as being cause for encouragement. We must recognize the growth of our suburban towns, and although some of our meetings will be losers thereby, the Friends who remove to new localities are stimulated to fresh responsibilities in regard to their growing families; hence we see efforts being made, as at Lansdowne, Pa., to have First-day schools and meetings for worship, and such efforts should be encouraged. At the same time encouragement in some form should be extended to those schools and meetings losing their membership.

A suggestion was made relative to the sometime introduction of music in our First-day schools, but the prevailing expression was against such an innovation. It was thought that the power of love and good instruction were stronger attractions than music to hold the children together. Three excellent object lessons were given, and questions as to how we can increase the sense of responsibility for the right training of children in parents and teachers, and also whether we shall teach the belief of Friends, brought forth much excellent and pertinent expression.

The Union adjourned to meet at Concord, in Tenth month next.

BUCKS QUARTERLY MEETING HOME.—The plans for the new Home of Bucks Quarterly Meeting, to be built at Newtown, Pa., by ex-Chief Justice Edward M. Paxson, as a memorial to his parents,—Thomas and Ann Paxson, of Buckingham, have been completed, and the contract for erection awarded to Garret B. Girton. A picture of the building is published in the Newtown Enterprise.

The architect is Edwin F. Bertolett, of Philadelphia. The building will stand at the corner of Congress street and Centre avenue, having a front on each. It will be constructed of Newtown brown-stone, with interior walls of hard brick. On the first floor will be a hall, office, manager's parlor, house parlor, 17 by 24 feet; reading-room and library, dining-room, 22 by 24 feet; kitchen, pantry, etc. The second floor and third floor each will contain eleven bed-rooms, with ample closets, etc., two bath-rooms will be located on the second floor, and one each on first and third floors respectively. The basement will contain laundry, provision, storage, vegetable, and coal cellars, besides a boiler, or furnace-room. A passenger lift and dumb waiter will traverse the four stories of the building, and clothes shutters will lead from bath-rooms directly to the basement and laundry. The heating will be by hot water circulation and the lighting will be by electricity from the town current. Artesian water will be introduced.

ABINGTON UNION.—Abington First-day School Union was held at Abington, on the 15th instant. There was a large attendance and it was pronounced by all who spoke of it a very successful and satisfactory occasion,—one visitor, from another Quarter, saying it was the best Union he had ever attended.

Delegates from all the schools in the Quarter except Stroudsburg were reported, and nearly all these appointed were present. Alvin Haines opened the exercises in the morning, and in the afternoon Louis B. Ambler delivered an address of welcome. The afternoon exercises were mainly by the children.

Luncheon was provided in the dining-room of the Friends' School, near by, and a large company partook of it.

The next meeting of the Union will be held at Upper Dublin, on the third Seventh-day in Tenth month. The clerks, Mary H. Forman, and Joseph S. Evans, were re-appointed. Susan Y. Sheppard desired to be excused as clerk of the visiting committee, and Mary R. Livezey was appointed.

SOLEBURY, PA.—The Young Friends' Association of Solebury, met as usual, First-day, 9th instant. The minutes having been read and approved, Hugh W. Michener, in behalf of the Executive Committee, made the following report of appointments for next month: Question, "Can the germ of the Divine in each human soul be developed without any external aid?" to Agnes S. Ely. Paper, "The Quaker Poets," to Florence R. Kenderdine. Reading, Ely J. Smith.

Agnes B. Williams reported on History by reading an account of the Doukhobors. Laura E. Walton reported on the Section for Current Topics, and Eastburn Reeder read that portion of the Discipline relating to membership.

Frederick L. Smith discussed the relation of religion to history. Remarks were made by Seth T. Walton, Watson Kenderdine, and others.

An article by John Burroughs was read by Florence R. Kenderdine, after which the president, Mattie Reeder, assigned the various sections to the following: History, Martha C. Ely; Literature, Seth T. Walton; Discipline, Hannah Kenderdine; Current Topics, Edith B. Slack.

A letter was read by the secretary, Edward Simpson, to the effect that an assessment from each association will be required toward defraying the expenses of the General Conference of Associations. The amount required, two dollars, was made up by the members present. It was decided to have the next meeting on the first First-day in Fifth month, instead of the second, in order not to conflict with yearly meeting. A brief period of silence closed the exercises of the day. F. R. K.,

BUCKINGHAM, PA.—The Buckingham Young Friends' Association met at Buckingham meeting-house on First-day, Fourth month 16, with George Watson president, and Jane Atkinson secretary. After silence the president read the twenty-third Psalm, after which the usual routine business was transacted.

The Discipline as regards "Conduct and Conversation" was read by Ellen Smith, which was followed by a paper by T. O. Atkinson, "What influence has Higher Education on the Society of Friends?" Remarks on the subject by George Watson and Mary A. Watson were followed by a paper, "Benjamin Hallowell," written by Elizabeth Williams and read by Susan Atkinson.

Others to whom duties had been assigned, not being present, after the usual silence the meeting adjourned to meet in Doylestown meeting-house on First-day, Fifth month 21, at 2.30 p. m. W. LEIGH.

CAMDEN, N. J.—A meeting of the Young Friends' Association of Camden was held in the meeting-house, Third month 8, with a large attendance. The minutes of the previous meeting were approved. The business of the meeting was deferred for the following month. The report of the Executive Committee was read.

A paper, "Newton Preparative Meeting: A Retrospect," was presented by Howard M. Cooper. The Newton Meeting dates back to 1680. It was started by William Cooper, who settled at Pyne Pointe, now Cooper's Point, in the city of Camden, and Richard Arnold offering their homes for holding the meetings. To these little meetings the Friends, located at Shackamaxon, often came across the river. This was the commencement of our Newton Meeting, some two years before the settlement of Philadelphia. The meetings continued to be held in the Friends' houses till 1684, when a lot was purchased on Newton Creek, and a log meeting-house built thereon, one of the first in New Jersey.

In 1828 Joseph W. Cooper, though not a member, gave to the Friends the ground where we now meet. At that time from Market street to far north of Cooper street was all woods. Our meeting was designated "The little meeting in the woods." The meeting remained unchanged for nearly sixty years, when in 1885 many improvements were made, making it one of the most attractive belonging to Friends. "And long before another century shall be completed, let us hope the quarterly meeting will see the fitness of again holding one of its sittings in this, the oldest of its branches, and where it was founded."

Longfellow's poem, "Elizabeth Haddon," was read by Abby Bailey; and the prose account of the same Friend read by Wilhemina Ivins.

Three five minute papers on "What can the home do to help the meeting?" were prepared by Emily W. Collings, Fannie Schribner, and Reuben Gillingham. One Friend expressed the thought, "It is the home influence that is deep and far-reaching—the parental care, the mother's love, the first consolation in trials, the foundation of character, and the cradle of our ambition and aspirations. Thus we see the home training, while fitting for a life of usefulness, can also influence and cultivate a desire to help the meeting, by mingling in social fellowship, by cheerful greetings,—extending the glad hand of welcome to those who feel disposed to meet with us from time to time, even if they are not in accord with all our views, there will be an appreciation that cannot fail to be productive of good."

THE NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
ASTOR, LENOX AND
TILDEN FOUNDATIONS

Another Friend said she would love to see the meeting-house made so attractive and pleasant that a passing Friend if so disposed, might feel free to enter at any time, to meditate or rest, thereby gaining that courage and patience so needed in the every-day walks of life.

Two recitations were then given, one by Emily Burrough, and the other by Ollie Gibberson. After attending to the new business, the meeting adjourned to meet Fourth month 4.

LAURA COLLINGS, Secretary.

MICKLETON, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of Mickleton, N. J., was held Fourth month 8. The president opened the meeting by reading from the fifth chapter of Matthew. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved.

Elizabeth L. Engle read a very interesting account of the life of Sarah H. Pierce, late of Philadelphia, and also a tribute to her from the INTELLIGENCER, written by Aaron M. Powell. We then listened to a "salad," given by James Pancoast, composed of quotations from different authors. There being so few present it was suggested to have it given again at our next meeting. Benjamin C. Heritage recited a beautiful poem, entitled "The Temperance Picket."

As voluntary exercises Ellen B. Haines read two very good selections, one entitled "The Right Spirit," teaching us it is not the outside that makes the man. The other, entitled "The Old Doctor's Story," reminded us not to begrudge loving deeds and kind words, to those around us. Benjamin Heritage gave us a very interesting collection of current topics he had gathered during the past week.

The questions were answered and appointments were read for the next meeting. The roll was called and after the usual silence, adjourned to meet Fifth month 13. Number present, eighteen.

E. L. D., Sec.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE second number of T. A. Glenn's new monthly, The American Genealogist, (Ardmore, Pa., $1 a year), is that for the present month. It has further instalments of John W. Jordan's paper, "Moravian Immigration to Pennsylvania," "American Descendants of Rhirid the Wolf," "Morton Notes," and "Scotch Planters of Ulster." A paper is given on the "Descendants of Godwin Walter," prepared from notes by Emma Walter, with additions by Anne H. Cresson and Frances K. Walter. Godwin Walter came to Pennsylvania from England, (presumably Wiltshire), in the ship Unicorn, Thomas Cooper, commander, in 1685, and was the ancestor of a large family.

A list of marriages at Great Valley Baptist Church, Chester county, from the note-book of the pastor, David Jones, Notes and Queries, and Book Notices, complete the number.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

LETTERS OF THOMAS CARLYLE TO HIS YOUNGEST SISTER.

Edited, with an Introductory Essay, by Charles Townsend Copeland. Pp. 276. $2.00 Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (Received through H. T. Coates & Co.)

LIFE AND PUBLIC SERVICES OF EDWIN M. STANTON.

By George C. Gorham. With Portraits, Maps, and Facsimiles of Important Letters. Two Volumes. Pp. xvi. and 456, xvi and 502. $6.00. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (Received through John Wanamaker.)

A REMARKABLE increase in the population of Jerusalem during the last fifty years is exciting much interest. The number to-day is estimated at 45,000. Of these 28,000 are Jews. The whole Jewish population of Palestine is reckoned at 100,000.

THE Pacific (newspaper) states that the California Spanish Missionary Society is doing a good work among the Spanish-speaking people in that State. Recently a man over eighty years of age joined the church, and in alluding to the gospel story said: "Why was I not told this before?"

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

OUR friend Aaron M. Powell, writes us:

"We have accepted an invitation to attend the Lake Mohonk Conference on International Arbitration, to convene the 31st proximo, though as the dates are this year arranged it will take us away from part of our Yearly Meeting in New York. The Conference is, however, in the present ominous condition and tendency in our national and international affairs, so important, as involving peace principles, that we shall feel justified in leaving part of our yearly meeting to attend it.

"We think we shall also see our way clear to attend, as we have been several times invited, the approaching Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, which preparations for our European trip last year prevented."

At the meeting of the managers of the Friends' Home of Concord Quarter, (at West Chester, Pa.), last week, the legacy left the Home by Hannah Miller, of West Chester, was paid over. The legacy was $500, and from it there had been taken the Pennsylvania "collateral inheritance" tax of 5 per cent., and the United States "war tax" of 5 per cent., so that the amount received by the Home was $450.

A Pennsylvania woman now living in a Colorado city, writes to a friend in the East: "I cast my first vote yesterday for Mayor, etc. It was great fun. The men of our family and I went together. All the men about seemed to be gentlemen,—no smoking even; other men and their wives kept coming in, and it was quite sociable. I don't see how the most fastidious could find anything to object to, and I just felt proud to go into that little cubby-hole and make my mark opposite the straight ticket."

Charles M. Grimm, of West Chester, Pa., is a lineal descendant of John Bartram, the botanist, and carries his watch, which is a curious old time-piece and yet in a good state of preservation.

COMMUNICATIONS.

DIRECTIONS FOR SHIPPING.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

WOULD you please insert this notice for the benefit of those wishing to forward contributions to the Howland, Virginia, School? If sent as freight direct to A. M. Stanton, Sampson's Wharf, Northumberland county, Va.; send by freight to Baltimore, Md., then by steamer Ida to Sampson's Wharf.

If expressed it goes to Baltimore, and then by steamer Potomac to Coan's Wharf, Northumberland county, Va. There is no express office at Heathsville. Anything sent by mail comes direct to Heathsville, Va.

Some have written to inquire, and to save others the trouble I forward this. Papers and books are gladly received. We want to start a reading-room and library, so reading matter from an almanac to an encyclopedia will be welcome. One friend kindly sent a few numbers of Scattered Seeds, a dear little paper that I have often wished for, to give out to the children. Second-hand clothing is always in demand.

Heathsville, Va.

ANNA M. STANTON.

THE question of the use of the Revised Version of the Bible has recently been before the Convocation of Canterbury, England. The bishop of Rochester said that the Revised Version "is the most faithful available rendering into the English of the Old and New Testaments."

THE Morning Star, which is the organ of the Free Baptist denomination, says: "The position of that body with reference to the Philippine Islands is that none of them should be annexed to the United States, except in accordance with a free expression of the will of the people."

THE Christian Advocate states that "there are more than 1,500 Mormon missionaries in all parts of the world. They claim that they baptized in 1897, 11,000 proselytes, and a still larger number in 1898. We desire all ministers to familiarize themselves with what the Mormons teach."

ATTITUDE DURING PUBLIC PRAYER.

Two correspondents write from different places in Ohio to the Sunday School Times, Phila., regretting that a practice of sitting during prayer has "crept in." The S S T. comments as below.

POSTURE in prayer is not a matter of denominational custom or opinion. Centuries before Presbyterians were known by that name, or as a religious body, the matter was in discussion among Christians, and, even earlier than our era, among Jews. Many Orientals, now as of old, assume different attitudes in different phases of prayer. They stand waiting as servants, they kneel as suppliants, they prostrate themselves in humiliation, they lift up their faces and arms in grateful praise, they cover their faces and bow their heads in a sense of unworthiness before God. Orientals generally would not think of remaining in the same posture through an entire season of prayer. They claim to conform their position to their attitude of spirit. While the early Christians were accustomed to stand in public prayer at ordinary times, on many occasions they knelt in public to pray.

The proper posture in prayer at such times also included, according to the opinions of early Christians, the eyes raised to heaven, and the arms extended horizontally. It was not merely the erect figure that showed a reverent mien. The matter of posture in prayer had mention in several church councils. At the Ecumenical Council of Nice, A.D. 325, formal action was taken directing the standing in public prayer on the Lord's Day, and in daily worship between Easter and Pentecost; but this very direction for special days implied a change from other days. Standing is still preferred by many, but others besides Ohio Presbyterians have changed their practice, including Lutherans, Episcopalians, Baptists, Methodists, and those of other denominations. Dean Stanley says, on this point, "To pray standing was, in public worship, believed to have been an apostolic usage. It is still the universal practice in the Eastern Church, not only on Sundays, but week-days. But in the West [of Europe] kneeling has gradually taken its place; and the Presbyterians of Scotland, and at times, the Lutherans of Germany, are probably the only Occidental Christians who now observe the only one rubric laid down for Christian worship by the First Ecumenical Council."

There certainly is a gain in agreement as to a reverent posture and an orderly and serious frame of mind on the part of a body of worshipers in the Lord's house. And, in considering this, we ought not to forget the position of the hands and eyes, as well as of the body, especially if we would have regard to the most venerable customs of antiquity. For a few in a congregation to stand with eyes open listlessly, or looking about them, has the appearance of irreverence and disorder, even though nothing of the sort be intended. Perhaps this is why so many prefer the bowed head and closed eyes, and the posture of kneeling, or of seeming to kneel, in public worship.

THE New York Observer says Christianity has no competitors, it has only imitators. There is no morality which rivals, either in theory or in practice, the ethics which the world's one Master taught.

ANTI-IMPERIALIST LIBERALS.

Justin McCarthy, M. P., in the Independent, New York.

ALL that has happened in our political life here since I wrote to you last only tends to justify the explanation which I gave to your readers as to the true causes of difference in the English Liberal party. I told your readers from the first that these differences arise out of the question concerning what is called a "spirited foreign policy." "The spirited foreign policy" means, in fact, extension of empire and a readiness to undertake foreign war, if need be, on behalf of that purpose. Some members of the Liberal party are opposed to the quest after extended empire, and to any war which is not called for by the need of national defense.

Sir William Harcourt and John Morely broke away from their Imperialistic colleagues [in the Liberal party] because they could not, and would not, sanction the craving for extension of empire. Sir William Harcourt resigned the leadership of the Liberal party in the House of Commons and, as your readers are aware, Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman was elected leader in his place. Since I wrote to you, however, John Morley brought forward a motion in the House of Commons which distinctly raised the whole question, and Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, to the consternation of most of his followers, supported Mr. Morley's motion. The motion was lost, of course, by a large majority, for it was opposed by all the followers of the Government and by most of the Liberals, but it had at least the effect of making it known to the country that, although Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman does not acknowledge himself to be a Little Englander, he is determined that he will not encourage the Jingoists. I hope that his example will strengthen the Liberals in Parliament and all over the country, who deplore the reaction toward the sort of policy which found favor in the days of Lord Palmerston.

I feel well convinced that if the intelligence and the heart of the country could be appealed to directly on the question, the great majority of English Liberals would go with Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman, Sir William Harcourt, and John Morley. Only a few weeks ago we seemed to be on the verge of a war with France, and only a few days ago we seemed to be on the verge of a war with Russia, and at each time the crisis arose out of some dispute about which the vast majority of Englishmen know nothing and care nothing. I am satisfied that not one Englishman in ten thousand knows anything about the merits of the dispute with Russia in regard to a Chinese railway, or could be got to feel the slightest interest in the merits of the controversy. There seems to me something profoundly melancholy and even terrible in the thought that a people might thus be committed to a great war with a foreign power about some question of which the nation has no knowledge, and in which its direct interests are nowise concerned. Sir William Harcourt and John Morley stood up manfully against the policy which would run such risks and commit the Empire to such responsibilities, and I am glad to think they have now the support of Sir Henry Campbell-Bannerman.

I am much inclined to believe that the dispute with Russia might have led to an actual quarrel if it were not for the personal influence of the Czar, who was determined that his proposals for International Peace should not be blighted in their very birth by persistence in such a policy. I was talking the other day with a distinguished English soldier, who has served his country in many a great campaign and who assured me that he knows the Czar well, that he believes him to be absolutely sincere in his desire for Peace, and that he regards him as the very model of a Christian gentleman. So far as I have any means of judging, the recent passion in England for what is called "a spirited foreign policy" does not arise with the army. It is of political birth altogether, and comes for the most part out of a vague kind of reaction against Gladstone's policy of peace and a sort of desire to prove to our neighbors that England can fight now as well as ever she did, and a yearning among certain sections of Liberals to make it known that it is not the Conservatives alone who are ready to go to war for the extension of the Empire. I wait in hope that this passion may soon cool down.

FEEBLE-MINDED CHILDREN.

Dr. M. W. Barr, of the Pennsylvania School for Feeble-Minded Children, Elwyn, Pa., in Popular Science Monthly.

PERIODS of extraordinary efflorescence or fruitage are followed by exhaustion and sterility not infrequently demanding the free use of the pruning knife; and, just as we remark how frequent is idiocy the offspring of genius, so do we find the same seeming paradox, of mental defect in rank and increasing growth the product of this most wonderful nineteenth century.

True, science has contributed to numbers by revealing as mental defectives the many "misunderstood," "the backward," "the feebly gifted," as well as by showing what was once esteemed moral perversion to be moral imbecility; but a truth to which science also attests is, that unstable nerve centers uniting and reacting through successive generations, producing various forms of neuroses, evidenced in insanity, moral and mental imbecility, idiocy, and epilepsy, do show the influence of a highly nervous age.

Our last census reports, although necessarily uncertain and unreliable, yet show ninety thousand mental defectives, not including the insane. Unrecognized and unacknowledged cases swell the number easily to one hundred thousand within our present borders. How many we are going to annex remains to be seen; but this is an enemy that attacks not our frontiers but our hearthstones. We have reached that point when we must conquer it, lest it should conquer us, and the means to this end may be summed up in three words—separation, asexualization, and permanent sequestration.

I find in our museum of educational work a little ball which I am inclined to regard the most valuable thing in the whole collection. The boy who made it was a low-grade imbecile. His hand against every man; he fancied every man's against him. Always under strict custodial care, that he might harm neither himself nor others, he would vent his spleen in tearing his clothing. His teacher, a woman of rare patience and devotedness, sat beside him one day, tearing strips of old linen and laying them in order. "See, Willie, let us make some pretty strips and lay them so." His wonder grew apace at seeing her doing what he had been reprov'd for doing; at once he responded, and a new bond of sympathy was established between them. She was playing his game—the only one, poor little lad, that he was capable of—and he joined in.

"Now, we will draw out the pretty threads and lay them in rows." For weeks the boy found quiet pastime in this occupation, and the violent nature grew quieter in proportion. One day the teacher said, "Let us tie these threads together and make a long string." It took him months and months to learn to tie those knots, but meanwhile his attendants were having breathing space. "Now we will wind this into a pretty ball, and I will cover all you make for the boys to play with"; and a new occupation was added to his meager list.

The next link in this chain of development was a lesson in knitting. Again, through months of patient teaching, it was at last accomplished, and the boy to the day of his death found his life happiness in knitting caps for the children, in place of tearing both them and their clothing.

HINTS ON THE CARE OF ROSES.

Harper's Bazar.

JUNE roses require pruning but once a year. This should be done in spring, as soon as one is able to see where the strongest and healthiest shoots are going to be. The old wood should be cut back nearly half, and all weak, unhealthy branches should be removed. If the branches are thick, they should be thinned out well. Air should have free circulation through the plant.

Hybrid perpetuals require a different treatment. As their flowers are produced on new growth only, they should be grown on a system which insures the constant production of such growth. This is done by making and keeping the soil very rich, and by cutting the plants back sharply after each period of flowering. The term perpetual is a misleading one, because it carries with it the idea that the roses in this class, are under all conditions, ever-bloomers. But such is not the case. They bear a profuse crop of flowers in June and July. After that, by pursuing the treatment advised above they bloom at intervals during the season, but never in such profusion as in early summer. Without the treatment advised they will not do this. Many varieties are shy bloomers, and will only give an occasional flower after July. The freest bloomers are not prolific enough to suit the lover of fine roses, but their flowers, though few in number compared with those of the first crop, are so large, so fine in form, so rich in color, and so fragrant as a general thing that we cannot afford to overlook this class in making our collections of roses. It requires more attention than any other, but the results are well worth all the care we expend on it.

Of the June roses the best for general use are the mosses, in red, pink, and white; the Provence and the good old damask, both delightfully sweet, large, double, and of fine shape, and produced with wonderful freedom; the yellow Persian, which well merits the name "Cloth of Gold," so rich is the color; and the small, low-growing Scotch and Austrian varieties. There are others in this general class which deserve a place in any collection, but I have named those with which the amateur gardener will be most likely to succeed. When he or she learns to grow these well, other sorts can be added with a reasonable chance of success.

PROGRESS OF EQUAL SUFFRAGE.

Woman's Journal.

SIXTY years ago women could not vote anywhere. In 1838 Kentucky gave school suffrage to widows. In 1861 Kansas gave it to all women. In 1869 England gave municipal suffrage to single women and widows, and Wyoming gave full suffrage to all women. School suffrage was granted in 1875 by Michigan and Minnesota, in 1876 by Colorado, in 1878 by New Hampshire and Oregon, in 1879 by Massachusetts, in 1880 by New York and Vermont. In 1881 municipal suffrage was extended to the single women and widows of Scotland. Nebraska gave school suffrage in 1883, and Wisconsin in 1885. In 1886 school suffrage was given in Washington, and municipal suffrage to single women and widows in New Brunswick and Ontario. In 1887 municipal suffrage was extended to all women in Kansas, and school suffrage in North and South Dakota, Montana, Arizona, and New Jersey. In the same year, Montana gave tax-paying women the right to vote upon all questions submitted to the taxpayers. In 1889 municipal suffrage was extended to single women and widows in the province of Quebec. In 1891 school suffrage was granted in Illinois. In 1893 school suffrage was granted in Connecticut, and full suffrage in Colorado and New Zealand. In 1894 school suffrage was granted in Ohio, a limited municipal suffrage in Iowa, and parish and district suffrage in England to women both married and single. In 1895 full suffrage was granted in South Australia to women both married and single. In 1896 full suffrage was granted in Utah and Idaho. In 1898 municipal and county suffrage were granted to the single women and widows of Ireland, the women of Minnesota were given the right to vote for library trustees, and Louisiana gave tax-paying women the right to vote upon all questions submitted to the taxpayers. In 1899 the Legislature of Oregon has passed an amendment to grant full suffrage to women, by a vote of 48 to 6 in the House and 25 to 1 in the Senate.

The trend of civilization is clearly in the direction of equal rights for women. Hon. John D. Long calls the opposition "a slowly-melting glacier of bourbonism and prejudice." He adds: "I want to be on record as having melted out early, or rather as having never been frozen in."

THE Contemporary Review states that there are some twenty or more colonies which have already been founded in Palestine and the whole face of the country is being changed by the efforts of the colonists.

SECRETARY GRESHAM'S FORECAST.

New York Evening Post.

SURELY it was a prophetic word which that sane and cool American, Secretary Gresham, wrote in 1894:—

"In our relations to Samoa we have made the first departure from our traditional and well established policy of avoiding entangling alliances with foreign powers in relation to objects remote from this hemisphere. Like all other human transactions, the wisdom of that departure must be tested by its fruits. . . . Every nation, and especially every strong nation, must sometimes be conscious of an impulse to rush into difficulties that do not concern it except in a highly imaginary way. . . . But our first adventure in that direction afforded most signal and convincing proof that the only safeguard against all the evils of interference in affairs that do not specially concern us is to abstain from such interference altogether. . . . The general act of Berlin has utterly failed to correct, if indeed it has not aggravated, the very evils which it was designed to prevent."

If Mr. Gresham could say this in 1894, what would he say now if he were alive and saw not only the natives in Samoa butchering each other, but the foreign forces there almost at blows? The way in which all ideas of justice and decency are necessarily mixed up in such a business is shown in the dispatches. A landing party kills 27 natives with machine-guns with no loss of its own. That is quite right. That is the way civilized men fight and teach savages to be good. But the next day the savages ambush the foreigners, whose machine-gun gets unluckily "jammed," kill half a dozen men, and cut off their heads. Thereupon the civilized and Christian world explodes with cries of "Butchery!" Why won't the brown man take his killing by the white man in peace? He will have to be killed some more till he learns this first lesson. Meanwhile, we observe that the angry Germans in Samoa are sneering at the Christianity of the English and Americans, and that Admiral Kautz returns the compliment with fine scorn of German Christianity. One would like to know what the natives could do, if they had a chance, in taunting the religion of their foreign slayers. "Muscular Christianity" made a good deal of a stir in its day, but the slaughtering Christianity of the present, as now on exhibition in Samoa and Luzon, bids fair to add new saints to the list—Saint Maxim, Saint Krag-Jorgensen, Saint Colt, and the other powerful and rapid-fire missionaries among the heathen.

Notes on Mexico.

From Chas. F. Lummis's "Mexico of To-day."

THE first sugar cane in the New World was planted in Santo Domingo, 1520—only twenty-eight years after the first voyage of Columbus—by Pedro de Atienza. It soon spread to Cuba and Mexico. Cortez built a crushing mill in Mexico, and left it by will to his heirs.

The first wheat in America was planted in Mexico. A negro slave of Cortez found a few grains among the rice of his rations, and planted them with care. This was about 1530.

Wheat in Mexico produces anywhere from 22 to 100 fold. The average in Europe is about five fold.

The tomato gets its name from the Aztec name tomatl, and is native in Mexico. So also is cotton; it was cultivated, spun, and woven by the pre-historic inhabitants of Mexico.

Chocolate was a favorite drink in Mexico, five hundred years ago.

The Ocean Currents.

THE force, speed, and direction of ocean currents are discovered by a systematic plan of throwing sealed bottles overboard and in time receiving reports of them. An explanation of this plan was printed in St. Nicholas for Sixth month, 1893.

These reports are indexed and classified, with the result that much valuable information is gained about the ocean currents.

For instance, a bottle thrown overboard Eleventh month 16, 1896, was picked up Third month 26, 1898, during which time it had drifted 4,700 miles. Another that was thrown over near Nantucket was found 512 days later, off the coast of Scotland. Another, starting from Cape Cod, brought up at Cornwall, having traveled 2,500 miles in 600 days.

Some bottles, however, have shown an average speed of thirty-one miles per day, while others have traveled along at the slower rates of twenty-six, fourteen, and even four miles per day. In the Pacific Ocean there are fewer chances of the bottles being picked up, but the experiments are tried there with fair success. As the work goes on, the number of bottles used is increasing, and the captains and skippers are becoming accustomed to finding the bottles and reporting them to the bureau.

A Bartram Bi-Centennial.

JOHN BARTRAM, the famous botanist, was born in 1699, (at Kingsessing, now part of Philadelphia), on the 23d of March. A meeting at the rooms of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, on the evening of the 10th instant, commemorated the event. The rooms were well filled, many members of the John Bartram Association being present.

Dr. J. T. Rothrock, State Commissioner of Forestry, made an interesting address, speaking generally of Bartram's important contribution in science. Bartram, he said, in his time, stood almost alone for botany in this country. He was a divinely created botanical pioneer to make known to men of the old world the floral wealth of the new. His genius commanded the respect and admiration of the most distinguished naturalists of Europe, and the most famous one of them all said he was the greatest living natural botanist of the world.

Mira Lloyd Dock, of Harrisburg, spoke of Bartram's many achievements and wide range of knowledge, and concluded by saying that Pennsylvania should adopt the rhododendron, which Bartram discovered and transmitted to England, as the State flower.

President Albert Bartram Kelley, of the John Bartram Association, spoke in conclusion. He mentioned the acquisition of the Bartram house and grounds, for a botanical garden and park, and said that the Association hoped that eventually the city will restore the old house and establish a museum of Bartram relics therein.

Over-Capitalized Trusts.

It is estimated by the New York Journal of Commerce that the capitalization of three-fourths of the big trusts is at least double that for which a modern plant of equal productive capacity could be provided. In raising prices, in order to pay dividends on this fictitious capital, these trusts thus offer the strongest possible inducement for an invasion of competing enterprises, based on actual capital, that can earn large profits on greatly reduced prices.

THE Presbyterian ministers of Chicago have been discussing the scarcity of candidates for the ministry and have appointed a committee to consider the causes.

THE Watchman says: "Those who are wont to extol the advantages of written sermons should remember that there is such a thing as unprepared writing as well as unprepared speaking."

THE Sunday School Times says: "No one has a right to complain of the hardness of life who has not tried to make it easier for someone else."

CURRENT EVENTS.

DISPATCHES from Washington state that it is now being seriously considered whether the "regular" army must not be promptly increased to 100,000 men,—an increase of 35,000. There is said to be need in the Philippine Islands for 100,000 men. General Lawton, who was in command of the recent expedition to the south of Manila, is reported to have expressed this view. In Cuba, it is reported that the force there is inadequate. "The withdrawal of volunteers has been followed by an increase of brigandage and disorder." It is added as to Cuba that the unhealthy season is near, when "a large number of men are certain to be invalidated."

THERE is a strong desire among the volunteer troops now in the Philippines, who were enlisted "for the war," to come home. A dispatch from Washington, 16th inst., says an official report on the subject shows that, of those who have been offered opportunity to re-enlist, with the offer of a bonus in travel pay of over $500, only about seven per cent. will accept. Governor Linde, of Minnesota, in a message to the Legislature, urges that measures be taken to secure the return of the regiment from that State, whose time is out, but which is being held, he says, contrary to law. Senator Pettigrew, of South Dakota, says he has had requests from 119 members of the regiment from that State for discharge, and he has written to the President on the subject.

THERE have been no further military operations of importance in the Philippines. General Lawton's expedition to the south of Manila has returned, and it appears had only partial success. Dispatches state that he "found it impossible to proceed in his pursuit of the insurgents and at the same time to retain possession of the captured towns in his rear," and more troops are now said to be necessary. In one of the encounters of Lawton's party with the Filipinos "the North Dakota regiment found the insurgents behind log trenches, and in driving them out lost five men killed."

North of Manila, near Malolos, the Filipinos seem to be still active. West of that place, on the 13th inst., "a small body" of them "attacked the camps of the Third Artillery, killing three privates, and wounding a lieutenant and two men."

THE complications in the Samoan Islands continues, and at one time last week threatened to involve the three nations which are trying to "govern" the islands, (Germany, England, and the United States), in a bitter dispute. News was received on the 12th that on the 1st inst. a party of 214 British and American sailors were "ambushed" by the natives, "on a German plantation," and obliged to retreat, with the loss of several officers and men. Many of the natives were killed. The officers' heads were cut off by the natives, but subsequently brought in "by some French priests."

The manager of the plantation where the fighting occurred, a German, was arrested by the English, on "affidavits that he was seen directing the natives in the attack," but he was subsequently handed over to the German warship's commander, "on the promise that he would be detained."

THE arrest of the manager, charges in some of the English newspapers of "German treachery," and in general the "bad blood" caused by the whole situation, made it difficult to maintain friendly feeling between the three nations, but especially between England and Germany, but this is now said to have been effected. The three commissioners—one for each nation—who are to go out to Samoa to effect a settlement, are all appointed, and will leave San Francisco in a few days on a Government vessel.

THE trial of ex-United States Senator Quay has been in progress since our item of last week. The prosecution is conducted by the District Attorney, P. F. Rothermel, Jr.; the defendant has five lawyers. The most prominent feature of the trial has been the objection made by the defense, at every step, to the admission of the evidence offered by the Commonwealth. Apparently, half the time has been consumed in argument on such objections. The Court, Judge

Craig Biddle, has almost uniformly ruled in favor of admitting the testimony, including what is called the "red book," a secret memorandum book kept by the cashier of the People's Bank, John S. Hopkins. (Hopkins committed suicide at the time of the bank's failure.)

THE Legislature of Pennsylvania had voted some time ago to adjourn on the 20th of this month; it is expected, at this writing, to do so. Few measures have passed finally during the session, and some of these have been vetoed. There has been no provision for an increase of revenues, and it is thought that the purpose is to have a special session called. Up to this time there has been no election of United States Senator.

THE policy of the German Emperor continues repressive. A despatch from Berlin says the entire German press is greatly alarmed by the news that he intends to introduce in the Prussian Diet a measure creating the city of Berlin and its suburbs into a separate province, and largely destroying the present self-government of the municipality. Some of the newspapers, however, encourage the measure.

THE Canadian Government has approved the suggestion of the United States Government for a modus vivendi on the Alaskan border, to overcome the possibility of a lawless outbreak pending a final adjustment, and the matter now awaits the action of the British Foreign Office.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

A LAW class of forty-eight women has just been graduated from the New York University, New York City. Most of them have no idea of practicing law, the aim being simply to give them a practical knowledge of the laws which concern them, especially in the direction of the management of property. "In this year's class were such women as Mrs. Washington Roebling, vice-president of 'Sorosis,' and the wife of the famous engineer; Mrs. Bonner, the wife of the publisher; Mrs. McKelway, wife of the editor of the Brooklyn Eagle; a daughter of ex-Mayor Gilroy, a daughter of Justice Leonard, of the Supreme Court, a daughter of Chancellor MacCracken, and others."

—A historic landmark of Atlantic City is about to disappear. Congress Hall, one of the oldest hotels in the city, was sold by auction last week and will be torn down at once. When the buildings are removed the land, which is considerably below the street level, will be graded and sold as cottage sites. Massachusetts avenue, on which the hotel faced, was the first highway built after the incorporation of Atlantic City in 1854, and the hotel was erected soon afterward.

—Two London newspapers, the Mail and the Telegraph, are proposing to issue editions on the first-day of the week—"Sunday" papers—and the proposal has caused much discussion, having even been considered in Parliament. A. J. Balfour has announced that the Government does not intend to interfere in the matter.

—The deer outside of parks in the State of New Jersey are safe for five years, as the Legislature last winter passed a law prohibiting the hunting or killing of them for the period named. The fine for hunting is $100 with an additional penalty of $100 for each deer killed, injured, or found in possession of the hunter.

—It is stated that more than 15,000 students are enrolled in the colleges and professional schools of New York City, and there are probably several thousand more students not regularly enrolled in schools, but who are in New York to study art and music. Of the enrolled students fully 5,000 come from homes outside of the city.

—A medical paper compliments the Philadelphia physicians on the fact that, whereas more than 25 per cent. of typhoid fever cases terminated fatally in 1886, and more than 20 per cent. in the years before 1890, there is now a mortality of scarcely more than 10 per cent. from the disease.

—Edward Entwistle, who, it is said, when 14 years old held the throttle on the first trip of Stephenson's first passenger railroad engine, the Rocket, on the Manchester and Liverpool railroad, in 1829, has just celebrated his eighty-fourth birthday at Des Moines, Iowa.

—The Topeka Capital says: "Kansas has begun to realize what war means. Nearly every county is represented at Manila, and many communities have felt the sting of death. Threescore of men have died of disease or been killed in action."

—The New England States are ahead of most other parts of the country in the average number of passengers in a train, but even on the New Haven road, dense as its traffic is, the average train load is little if any more than one full carload.

—Rudyard Kipling has gone to Lakewood, N. J., where he hopes that his convalescence from his recent severe sickness will be more rapid. "He has done no literary work, and has no plans for the future."

—A large flock of wild geese, numbering somewhere about 200, was observed near Newtown Tuesday afternoon, [11th inst.] winging their way northward at a great altitude.—[Newtown Enterprise.]

—It is announced that a Life of Theodore Parker is to be written by John W. Chadwick, of Brooklyn, the distinguished Unitarian minister and author.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.

REYMER-BAUMAN
Pittsburgh.

DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.

FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.

ANCHOR
Cincinnati.

ROCKSTEIN
Cincinnati.

ATLANTIC
New York.

BRADLEY
New York.

BROOKLYN
New York.

JEWETT
New York.

VLSTER
New York.

UNION
New York.

SOUTHERN Chicago.

SHIPMAN
Chicago.

COLLIER
Chicago.

MISSOURI
St. Louis.

RED SEAL
St. Louis.

SOUTHERN
St. Louis.

JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.

MORLEY
Cleveland.

SALEM
Salem, Mass.

CORNELL
Buffalo.

KENTUCKY
Louisville.

YOU cannot afford to take chances in painting when, by exercising a little care and common sense, the use of mixtures of unknown composition and questionable value can be avoided and the best materials (and, as you will find, by far the cheapest) can be obtained.

The best materials are Pure White Lead and Pure Linseed Oil. The brands named in margin are genuine.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

"I MAY pass off a spurious coin for a genuine, but sooner or later some one will drop it and detect the counterfeit ring. So I may palm off a counterfeit life upon society; for years it may not be detected, until, suddenly dropped in an unguarded moment, by some misfortune or adversity, the world discovers the deceit."

OF every one thousand inhabitants of the globe, five-hundred-and-fifty-eight live in Asia, two hundred and forty-two in Europe, one hundred and eleven in Africa, eighty-two in America, five in Oceania and the polar regions, and only two in Australia. Asia contains more than one-half of the total population of the earth, and Europe nearly one-fourth.

A NORTH BATH milkman has, perhaps, the unique pasture of Maine. It is an island, and when the tide is high the cows have to swim for it. The animals have become so accustomed to this that they will strike out without a moment's hesitation, and it makes a spectacle worth looking at when the fifteen cows all plunge into the water and swim for their feeding ground.

LAST TOUR TO OLD POINT COMFORT, RICHMOND, AND WASHINGTON UNDER PERSONAL ESCORT.

The last six-day personally-conducted tour to Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Seventh-day, Fourth month 29.

Tickets, including transportation, meals en route in both directions, transfers of passengers and baggage, hotel accommodations at Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington, and carriage ride about Richmond will be sold at rate of $34.00 from New York, Brooklyn, and Newark; $32.50 from Trenton; $31.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

OLD POINT COMFORT ONLY.

Tickets to Old Point Comfort only, including luncheon on going trip, one and three-fourths days' board at that place, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold in connection with this tour at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

GETTYSBURG, LURAY, AND WASHINGTON.

PERSONALLY-CONDUCTED TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged for a five-day Personally-Conducted Tour to Gettysburg, Luray, and Washington on Fifth month 6. A full day will be spent at Gettysburg, three hours at Luray, affording ample time to make the tour of the wonderful caverns, and two days at Washington.

The party will be under the guidance of one of the company's experienced tourist agents. A chaperon, whose especial charge will be unescorted ladies, will also accompany the party throughout. Round-trip tickets, including transportation for the round trip, hotel accommodations at Gettysburg and carriage drive over the battlefield, luncheon, transfer, and admission to the Luray Caverns, luncheon, transfer, and hotel accommodations at Washington, and dinner going and supper returning, at Broad Street Station in connection with tickets from Trenton and points east thereof, will be sold at the extremely low rate of $25 from New York, $24 from Trenton, $22 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Phila.

A POSTAL CARD RECEIVES PROMPT ATTENTION.
JOHN S. CONRAD,
LAUNDRY,
8203, 8205 COLUMBIA AVENUE, PHILA.

THE VIEWS OF FRIENDS.

Tracts and Leaflets for Circulation.

QUAKERISM: ITS BELIEFS AND MESSAGES. By William Edward Turner (Editor of the British Friend). 40 pp. 10 cents. 5 copies, 40 cents. By mail at these prices.

THE MEETING FOR WORSHIP. By Howard M. Jenkins. Small pamphlet. 12 pp. Single copies, 2 cents; 50 copies, 50 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF FRIENDS. By Howard M. Jenkins. (Chicago Congress Paper, 1893.) 24 pp. 2 cents; 50 copies, 75 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER ASSOCIATION
Limited,
921 Arch Street, Phila.

THE death rate in Michigan in 1898 was 12.5 in each 1,000 of population.

SWITZERLAND now has over one million depositors in savings banks, with an average for each family of two hundred and seventy-five dollars in cash deposits.

MRS. TILFORD.—"It must have taken Daniel Webster a long time to compile the dictionary; don't you think so?"

Tilford.—"Daniel? You mean Noah, don't you?"

Mrs. Tilford.—"Now, don't be silly. Noah built the ark."—[Brooklyn Life.]

AN ostrich can not kick backward. When the time has come for the bird to be despoiled of its feathers, its head is inserted in a bag and the plucker stands behind his victim. A blow from its foot has vigor enough to kill a man.

THE drought of the last few years has cost New South Wales an enormous amount of money. The flocks of the colony have shrunk from 66,000,000 to 46,000,000, representing a loss of 20,000,000 sheep. In addition there has been a loss of nearly 300,000 horses and 150,000 cattle.

No one seems to have taken the time and trouble to thoroughly investigate the early history of the honey bee in America. Enough is known, however, to assure us that it is not indigenous to the country, but was, in all probability, imported by the early colonists.—[Scientific American.]

The lamp-chimney Index is worth some dollars a year to you — free.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Ellwood Heacock,

UNDERTAKER
and EMBALMER

ESTABLISHED 1860.

TELEPHONE 5807.

1313 Vine Street, Philad'a.

Calls outside of city answered promptly.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY MILK.

CONSHOHOCKEN Special attention given to serving families. Office 603 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Penna.

JOSEPH L. JONES.

FOR SALE.

Old-fashioned house, with open fire-places. Ten acres of land attached. Convenient to both steam and trolley cars. Address, P. O. Box 2603, West Chester, Penna.

Swarthmore.

For rent or sale, Queen Anne Cottage, 12 rooms, steam heat, and open fire grates. The location is very delightful, directly overlooking the athletic grounds of the College, and very close to the meeting-house; one acre of ground, and plenty of fruit. Apply to DAVID SCANNELL, 814 Arch Street.

NOTICES.

. Communications intended for Women's Branch of New York Yearly Meeting may be addressed to me at Chappaqua, New York, care of Robert S. Haviland. EMILY P. YEO.

. Westbury Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee has arranged for a Conference to be held in the meeting-house, East 15th street and Rutherford Place, New York, on Seventh-day, the 29th, at 3 p. m., to be addressed by Dr. Lyman Abbott.

Subject, "The Disarmament Conference."

HARRY A. HAWKINS,
MARY W. ALBERTSON, } Clerks.

. Richland Friends propose holding their Monthly Meeting of Fourth month 28, 1899, at Stroudsburg, Pa., at two o'clock, p. m.

The change of hour is due to the fact that the trains from Philadelphia do not reach Stroudsburg until nearly noon.

. A Conference under the care of the Philanthropic Committee of Philadelphia Yearly and Bucks Quarterly Meetings will be held in the meeting-house at Makefield, Bucks county, Pa., on First-day, Fourth month 30, 1899, at 3 p. m.

The meeting will be addressed by Prof. F. H. Green. Subject, "Temperance."

All are respectfully invited to attend.

On behalf of Committee.

SUSANNA RICH, Clerk.

. The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor, will be held in the meeting-house at Middletown, on First-day, Fourth month 30, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. William W. Birdsall is expected to address the meeting on the subject, "Literature, and its Influence on Character." CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

. Bucks County First-day School Union will be held in Friends' meeting-house, Makefield, Pa., Seventh-day, Fourth-month 22, at 10.30 a. m.

All interested Friends are cordially invited.

ISABEL L. WORTHINGTON,
ROBERT KENDERDINE, } Clerks.

. The Western First-day School Union will be held in the Friends' meeting-house at New Garden, Pa., on Seventh-day, Fourth month 22, commencing at 10 o'clock a. m. All interested are invited to be present.

HORACE L. DILWORTH,
ELLEN P. WAY, } Clerks.

. The following compose the Committee to assist in securing homes for strangers in attendance at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting:

Charles E. Thomas, 868 N. 26th street.

Tamar Hartley, 1511 Swain street.

Martha D. Hough, 1340 Spruce street.

Matilda K. Lobb, 1702 N. 18th street.

Sarah L. Haines, 1513 Marshall street.

Joseph M. Truman, Jr., 1500 Race street.

Rebecca B. Comly, 1529 Centennial avenue.

. The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has arranged for the following meetings during Fourth month:

23. Fawn Grove, Md.

30. Sandy Spring, Md.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

. The Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches will attend meetings as follows:

FOURTH MONTH:

30. Fairhill, 3.30 p. m.

FIFTH MONTH:

21. Merion, 10.30 a. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 29, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 17.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XVII.

PURE worship under the Gospel stands neither in forms nor in the formal disuse of forms : it may be without words as well as with them, but it must be "in spirit and in truth."

From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, chapter on Meetings for Worship.

WHERE IS GOD ?

OH, where does God abide ?

I asked the lily, and her petal tips
Slow parted their white, smiling lips,
As softly she replied :

" In me He dwells. Lo ! that sweet perfume rare,
Which thou inhaledst from my heart, is there
Because He there does hide."

Oh, where may God be found ?

I asked the storm to tell me, if it knew,
And thundrous it replied, as on it flew :

" Hear how His steps resound
Within my hurtling heart. Lo ! down is trod
The bush, and bent the branch, because thy God
Along this way is found."

Oh, where does God belong ?

I asked the restless, surging mass of men ;
Like sound of mighty sea came answer then :

" Behold, not angels' song,
Or spherical music vast, speaks God at hand
As does the moan and laugh in every land
Of God's great human throng."

Oh, where does God not dwell ?

Of. not a single far off solitude,
Where God's sweet presence does not bide and brood,
Can earth or heaven tell !

In deepest desert may God's Jacob sleep ;
E'en there God's ladder rests, that He may keep His tender vigil well !

—Louis M. Waterman, in Youth's Companion.

THE CARLYLE FAMILY LETTERS.¹

ONE of the most interesting and satisfactory additions which have been made to our stock of Carlylean literature are these "Letters of Thomas Carlyle." They are edited by Charles Townsend Copeland, lecturer on English Literature in Harvard University, who, besides fitting them together with needed notes and explanations, contributes a pleasing, if somewhat discursive, introductory essay on "Carlyle as a Letter-Writer."

Pursuing the thought partly expressed above, we say with emphasis that we do not recall anything in the collections relating to Carlyle that on the whole is more satisfactory. The letters are family missives. They are chiefly those written by him to his youngest sister, Janet, who married Robert Hanning, came to Canada, lived in Hamilton, Ontario, and died in Toronto, at the age of eighty-four, in Twelfth month, 1897. These letters begin in 1832, and close in 1873; there are, however, added in the volume, other letters to Janet Hanning, by other members of the family, and there are several from Carlyle's mother to Janet, and some from Carlyle to his mother.

¹"Letters of Thomas Carlyle to his Youngest Sister." Edited with an Introductory Essay by Charles Townsend Copeland. Pp. viii., and 286. Illustrated. $2.00. Boston : Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

The pleasing features about the letters include their simplicity, their animation, and their unmistakable tone of family affection. The love of the children for their mother, and of her to them, goes without saying, but besides all the members of the family show attachment to one another, and a real interest in one another's fortunes. Amongst all Carlyle's written work, we know of nothing more satisfactory than his biography of his father, the plain, Scottish stone-mason, and similarly these family letters, so simple and so unaffected, tell the story of life experience with a directness and pathos that no "fine writing" could equal. Take, for example—and many others might as well be chosen—this one from Carlyle to his sister. She was living at Liverpool, before her removal to Canada, and Carlyle, whose home was in London, was making a visit to the old Scottish home and its neighborhood :

SCOTSBRIG, 18th July, 1837.

My Dear Jenny : According to promise, I set about writing you a word of Scotch news, now that I am fairly settled here and know how things are. The railway train whirled me away from you rapidly that evening. Next evening, about the same hour, we were getting out of Liverpool harbor, and on the following morning, between 7 and 8 o'clock, I had got my eye upon Alick waving to me from the end of the jetty at Annan. It is almost three weeks now that I have been here and found all well, but it was only the day before yesterday that we got our first visit to Dumfries made out, and could rightly report about matters there. I fancied a newspaper with two strokes would communicate the substance of what was to be said in the interim.

There has been a good deal of discussion about Alick [a brother] and his going to America. He himself seemed of mind to go, but not very strongly or hopefully set on it. Our mother, again, was resolute against it, and made such a lamenting as was sufficient to dishearten one more inclined than he. So now I think it seems fixed so far as that he will not go. What he is to do here one does not so well see, but it will evidently be a great point gained for him that he give up thinking about departure, and direct his whole industry to ascertaining how he can manage here where he is. Men of far less wit than he do contrive to manage, when once they have set their heart on it. Jamie [another brother] is quite ready to go to Puttock and give up Scotsbrig to him, but I still rather think there will nothing come of that ; nay, some think Alick himself does not at bottom wish that, but is satisfied with finding Jamie so far ready to accommodate him and keep him at home. He seems very tranquil, cheerfuller than he was, and altogether steady ; likelier to have a little fair luck than he was a while ago. He must persist where he is. There is nothing that can prosper without perseverance. Perseverance will make many a thing turn out well that looked ill enough once. John of Cockermouth is gone off to America about a fortnight ago with all his family. I got him a letter from Bunswark to a brother of his at New York. I doubt not he will do well. Clow of Land has his property advertised for sale; means to be off about the end of August, which also I reckon prudent. With two or three thousand pounds in his pocket and four or five strong sons at his back, a man may make a figure in America. James Austin and Mary [Carlyle, a sister] were at one time talking of America, but they also have given it up.

We had a letter from the Doctor [John Carlyle, a brother] shortly after my arrival here. He is well, living at Albano, a summer residence some twenty miles from Rome. He speaks of it being possible, or probable, that he may get back to England in September, but it is not certain. He will be pretty sure to come by Manchester and you if he come northward. The rest, as I have already hinted, are all well and following their usual course. Jamie [the brother, named above] and his wife and two sons go along very briskly. His crops look well. He had his peat-stack up (and mother's little one beside it) and his hay mown, though the late rains and thunder have retarded that a little. The country never looked beautifuller in my remembrance, green and leafy; the air is fresh, and all things smiling and rejoicing and growing. Austin is busy enough now with work. He had a bad time of it in the spring, when horse-provender was so dear. The children are well,—even the eldest looks better than I expected,—and Mary, their mother, seems hearty and thrifty. I mentioned that we had been at Dumfries. Alick took up our mother and me on Friday last in a rough "dandycart" of Mrs. Scott's, with a beast of Jamie's. One of the first questions my mother asked of Jean was, "Hast thou had any word from Jenny?" To which the answer was "No." Jean's child is running about quite brisk, though a little thinner than it once was; from teeth, I suppose. James Aitken has plenty of work, three or four journeymen. In short, they seem to be doing well. Finally, Jamie (Maister Cairlill) [this was a familiar name for James Carlyle, the brother] authorizes me to report that he this day met with a brother of thy Robert's, who said that the Peat-knowes too were all well. The day after my arrival here I fell in with William Hanning, the father, on Middlebie Brae, measuring some dykes, I think, with a son of Pottsfowns. He looked as well as I have seen him do. The same man as ever, though he must be much older than he once was. The tea parcel was forwarded to him, or sent for, by my desire, that same night.

Our good mother here is quite well in health; indeed, as well every way as one could expect, though doubtless she is a little lonelier now than when you were with her. She complains of nothing, but does her endeavor to make the best of all things. She wishes you "to write very soon and tell her how the world is serving you." She would have sent a word or two to that effect in her own hand, she says, but "having a good clerk" (me, namely) "she does not need." I am to confirm her promise of coming with me when I return southward, and staying till you tire of her. There was word from Jane [his wife] on Sunday gone a week. She wrote in haste, but at great length, and seemed very cheerful. She will not come hither this time, I think. Her mother is to return home about the end of this month. Jane appears quite prepared to stay by herself. She has some friends yonder whom she is much with, and she rather likes the treat. Mrs. Welsh expects Liverpool people with her to Templand, and can stay no longer.

I have ended my paper, dear Jenny, and given one of the meagrest outlines of our news. You will see, however, that nothing is going wrong with us; that we are thinking of you and desirous to hear from you. Be a good bairn and a good wife, and help your good man faithfully in all honest things. He is a thrifty fellow with a good whole heart. There is no danger of him. Help one another. Be good to one another. God's blessing with you both. All here salute you.

I am always

Your affectionate brother,

T. CARLYLE.

It will be remarked that this is nothing more than a simple family letter, occupied with domestic details. So it is, but there is a note running through it all of the qualities which make good and earnest people. "Mother, wife, family, and one or two friends, were very dear to Carlyle," says the editor of the volume under notice, and he quotes, on another page, a letter he wrote to John Sterling in 1837, describing the old home and its surroundings: "One night, late, I rode through the village where I was born. The old kirkyard tree, a huge old gnarled ash, was nestling itself softly against the great twilight in the north. A star or two looked out, and the old graves were all there, and my father, and my sister; and God was above all." In a letter in this volume to his sister, in 1855, he sends her a photograph of their mother, and after relating that there is some uncertainty as to the exact date of her birth, he says: "Alas, we cannot settle it now, nor is that the important thing we have lost hold of in the change [her death] that has happened to us all! But let us not lament; it is far from our part to lament; let us try rather to bless God for having had such a mother, and to walk always while in this world as she would have wished we might do."

The temptation is strong to go on with quotations. Many more striking ones might be given; the letters abound with them. Very seldom are we favored to meet with correspondence not intended for print so marked by rugged force and simple pathos. Defects can be found in Carlyle himself, and some serious holes can be picked in his literary work, but he comes to us nobly in these letters, as a man and a brother. It is no small thing to have artificialities, glosses, and veneerings stripped away and thrown aside, and to meet one of so strong a build in mind and spirit, face to face. After all, life is vastly greater than talk about life, and these letters, disclosing actualities, dealing with real experiences, not theatrically but in plain words of truth, are worth far more than many a more pretentious volume.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 19.—FIFTH MONTH 7.

THE PERIOD OF WANDERING.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather a day's portion every day, that I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law, or no.—Exodus, xvi., 4.

Scripture Reading. { Exodus xv., 23-27.
xvi., 1-3.
xvii., 1-8.

DURING the reign of Rameses II. (see Lessons 1 and 2) a treaty of peace was concluded with the Hittites, after long warfare. This treaty left Palestine partly in the hands of the Hittites, and such power as Egypt then retained was gradually lost. There was an agreement also for the return of fugitive slaves from the one country to the other. This agreement was in force at the time of the Exodus, and added to the difficulties of the Hebrews, since it made the Hittites allies of the Egyptians so far as they were concerned. The power of Egypt had weakened materially under Menephtah, but was still formidable. Finally, the Hebrew force was undisciplined and unused to war. The conditions were not ripe for the conquest of a permanent abiding-place. The number of the Hebrews as given in Exodus is vastly beyond what is possible under the conditions. Six hundred thousand men (Exodus xii., 37, and Numbers i., 45, 46) implies as many as two million or more souls. This number, especially with "flocks and herds, even very much cattle," could not possibly have been watered at the springs of Sinai; moreover, the comparatively small area of Goshen, where they lived in Egypt, and of Sinai, where they sojourned as nomads, render such numbers out of the question. After the settlement in Canaan the number forty thousand men is suggested in the Song of Deborah (Judges v., 8), but there is no sure basis for an estimate. The number was too large, at any rate, for a single company, and we see that they were divided into five groups, which probably separated so as to scatter the flocks and herds over a wide range of country. (Numbers ii.)

The Hebrews did not, then, set out at once for Canaan, but turned southward into the wilderness, already familiar to their leader during his exile from his people. Their first important halting-place was the great oasis of Sinai. But this was not to be occupied without a struggle. The nomad Amalekites already in possession thrust themselves across the path, and a battle was fought in which the Hebrews were victorious. Soon after they were hospitably received by the Kenite Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses. The Kenites were a small desert tribe under the priest-chief, not uncommon among Semites. Their religion was not unlike that of the Hebrews; indeed it was among them that Moses reached his more perfect conception of the Hebrew Jehovah, and it is very possible that he may have been influenced by the religious customs of the family of which he became a part. The Kenites finally allied themselves with the Hebrews and entered Canaan with them. Mention is made of them at various times before and after the conquest (Numbers xxiv., 21; Judges iv., 11). By the advice of Jethro the government of the people, up to this time wholly in the hands of Moses, was systematized so that his duties and responsibilities were lightened.

The question of the sustenance of the children of Israel during their period of nomadic life is one concerning which there is much misconception. In the first place they had with them their flocks and herds (Exodus xii., 32, 38). Then the wilderness was not a desert. It had numerous oases, and as we have seen was the home of various wandering peoples. Quails (Exodus xvi., Numbers xi.) are not natives of Sinai, but occasionally pass over this region in vast migratory swarms. (The statement in Numbers xi., 31, which reads as if the quails were piled up to a depth of two cubits all over the ground should read "flying about two cubits above the ground.")

"The manna, according to the Jewish tradition of Josephus, and the belief of the Arab tribes, and of the Greek church of the present day, is still found in the droppings of the tamarisk bushes which abound in this part of the desert." (Stanley.) The sugary sap which flows from the tamarisk is still called "manna" by the Arabs, and is used as an article of commerce. "White manna is mentioned on the Egyptian monuments as a kind of vegetable food. . . . The Bedouins still speak of it as 'raining from heaven' because it falls from the trees with the dew. . . . Like that of the Bible, this manna looks like coriander seeds, tastes like honey, and melts in the sun." (Geikie.) The Hebrews had dates also, since "three-score and ten palm trees" are mentioned (Exodus xv., 27), and they may have purchased food of the other tent-dwellers in the desert (Deuteronomy ii., 6). The mention of the morning dew (Exodus xvi., 14) of itself shows that the wilderness was by no means an arid desert. That the difficulties of the desert were great we may not doubt. What was easy for Kenite and Amalekite, trained to living from hand to mouth, accustomed to see about them food and water only for the day or for the hour, was most difficult for the escaping slaves just emerged from the land of plenty. There in all their lives they had never been withdrawn from the sight of the Nile or its canals; here a spring must be sought out for each encampment, and sought with the burning anxiety of fear and ignorance. Even when found the water was not always agreeable, so that murmurings and discontent were common. In Egypt, even though they were scantily fed, there was never fear that the supply would fail. The unfailing fertility of the Nile country was about them and on every hand food was plenty. The wildness and barrenness of the wilderness of itself struck terror to a people accustomed to the teeming population of the Delta. It was not the most promising material for the making of a great nation or a great people. The Hebrews had neither emancipated themselves from the characteristic defects of slavery nor had they acquired the virtues of free men. They had all the weaknesses of both conditions, and none of the advantages of either. Just released from servitude, they did not yield willing obedience to a leader, yet they had no individual independence of action. They were blown by every wind of rumor or of fear, and complained of their leaders as if they were responsible for the difficulties about them; yet they were incapable of giving to those leaders the hearty support which alone could justify such placing of responsibility. Only time, and the constant experience of hardship endured, of difficulty overcome, could mould them into a united people and make a nation possible.

Such change, too, was necessary before they could grasp the conception of Jehovah which had been revealed to Moses. To a race of slaves God will necessarily be a taskmaster; to a race of freemen he may be recognized as a trusted leader. The slave cowers and fears God, for he feels that God as his master will use him for His own pleasure; the free-man stands erect and has respect for God, for he feels that God as his guide will lead him better than he can lead himself. This was the God of Moses. A later time will show an evolution of this to a further stage, when man shall see God as his father, in whose power he can trust himself, nothing doubting. The time of Moses says, "The Lord is a man of war,"—the later time shall say first, "The Lord is my shepherd," and then "Our Father."

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS, PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 19.—FIFTH MONTH 7.

THE VINE AND THE BRANCHES.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If ye keep my commandments, ye shall abide in my love.—John, xv., 10.

Read the Scripture, John, xv., 1-11.

REVISED VERSION.

THE last lesson extended nearly to the close of the fourteenth chapter of John. That chapter concludes with the words, "Arise, let us go hence," and as the next three, the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth, are all of the same nature as the fourteenth, continuing the discourse of Jesus, it seems likely that there must have been, in copying, some transposition, or misplacement. It has been suggested that the words quoted are not in their proper place; they seem to belong at the close of chapter xvii. (Professor Benjamin W. Bacon, of New Haven, thinks chapters xvi. and xvii. should follow in chapter xiii., after v. 20.) Another suggestion is that the disciples, upon this being said to them, rose, but hesitated to separate, and that Jesus seeing their hesitation, and their dependence on him, added his further discourse. Upon either supposition, the place of the present lesson was still the "upper room," in Jerusalem. The night was wearing on.

The parable of the Vine and the Branches, which forms the lesson, is a beautiful and impressive one, when we come into the thought of a fellowship formed in the bonds of Christ—that is, a unity of feeling, of aspiration, of endeavor, on the foundation of Christian love. In such a case Jesus, the Christ, who enunciated the great principles of our faith, and who represented them in the actions of his life, becomes the Vine, and those devoted to him are the branches.

The Divine Spirit which was manifested in Jesus must make the vitality which flows through vine and branches, and which gives them their united and harmonious life. As the branch, when severed from its parent stem, withers and dies, so does man when separated from the Father. While the connection between the vine and the branch is complete, the sap flows throughout, the fragrant blossoms appear, and in course of time the fruit taking the place of the blossoms, and growing until matured. But should the branch be cut off, what follows? Not only does the branch wither, but the fruit decays; the promise which it gave is unfulfilled. So in the spiritual, if we lose our connection with the great Source of life and strength, if the divine spirit that filled Jesus does not flow into and through us, the promise of fruitage in us fails, the leaves wither, the fruit dries up, and there is spiritual death.

"Every branch that beareth fruit, he cleanseth it, that it may bring forth more fruit." The thought here is rather more outward. God is called the husbandman, the gardener attending the vine. Every branch in the Christ brotherhood "that beareth not fruit, he taketh away." So too, "every branch that beareth fruit, he cleanseth it, that it may bear more fruit." Every true disciple desires to be in condition to bear fruit, and to bear more and more as he becomes perfected and strengthened. Again Jesus said: "Now ye are clean, through the word I have spoken to you." We cannot to-day hear his outward voice, as did they of that time, but we can hear the Christ-voice within us, and if obedient to its teachings, we will verify in ourselves this saying.

"If a man abide not in me [in the Christ Spirit] he is cast forth as a branch, and is withered, and they gather them and cast them into the fire." Let us endeavor that we "abide" in the divine life. With it, none can wither. And as, in the outward, the gardener collects the dead branches which he has cut off with his pruning-knife, and casts them into his fire, so the spiritually dead branches will spiritually be consumed. A parallel thought, here, may be that fire of affliction which want of trust or want of faithfulness brings, and by means of which we are often regenerated, when a smooth or easy life would have been to us a positive injury. In one sense anything burned is destroyed,—that is as an organism. But its substance is indestructible, and in the economy of nature is made over into new forms. So they who cannot be taught life's best lessons by a sunshiny experience may through the refining fire of discipline have their old life destroyed and their being renewed.

The closing verses of the lesson repeat and emphasize the thought that Jesus continually impressed upon his disciples: "If ye keep my commandments ye shall abide in my love; even as I have kept my Father's commandments, and abide in his love." Discipleship with Christ, the divine, the eternal, is to be found in the following after him, dwelling in and near him, partaking of him. No purely intellectual view concerning him is of value; the supreme test is the life, the character, the "keeping" of his commandments. This is illustrated in the parable itself. The evidence of the flowing of the life of the Vine in its branches is the bearing of fruit. And what is this fruit? Paul says (Galatians, v. 22.): "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, longsuffering, kindness, goodness, faithfulness, meekness, temperance."

The next lesson is taken, according to the "International" program, from the eighteenth chapter of John, so that the remaining verses of the fifteenth, from which the present lesson comes, and all of the two following chapters, are passed over. They should be attentively read. In the fifteenth, just following the present lesson, occur those important passages, (verses 13, 14, 15), in which the Master declares: "Greater love hath no man than this, that a man lay down his life for his friends. Ye are my friends, if ye do the things which I command you. No longer do I call you servants; for the servant knoweth not what his lord doeth: but I have called you friends; for all things that I heard from my Father I have made known unto you."

THE INFLUENCE OF PLAIN LANGUAGE.

Paper read at the Easton, N. Y., Young Friends' Association, by Phebe A. Hoag, Fourth month 9, 1899.

LET us first consider what is meant by plain language. Jesus says, "Let your communication be yea, yea; nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these cometh of evil." Friends have always taken this command as a guide to their conversation, believing that all forms of flattery should be avoided; hence they dispensed with the use of all "titles," addressing all persons of whatever rank by their Christian names. "Mr." and "Mrs." are but abbreviations of master and mistress, implying that the person so addressed is, or has the right to be, master over us, while Jesus says: "Neither be ye called masters, for one is your Master, even Christ." Even these titles were not used.

For the same reason they kept to the use of the singular pronoun when addressing one person, for in the time of the early Friends the plural pronoun was so used only in addressing persons of a higher rank, and as they believed that all men are created equal, they did not think it right for them to thus appear to hold one person above another.

From the New York Book of Discipline of 1839 I quote the following: "Friends should keep to the simplicity of Truth, and our ancient testimony against the superstitious observance of days and times, and calling the days and months by Heathen names." Following, was given the derivation of the names of the months and days of the week, showing that they were all of an "idolatrous or superstitious origin," and Friends were encouraged to keep to "the language of Truth, in denominating the months and days according to the plain and numerical way of expression."

Thus we see a principle underlying each peculiar form of language as used by Friends. For their strict adherence to these principles they often met with persecution, but that did not move them when they believed they were right, and by faithfulness in these apparently smaller matters they were gaining that self-control and strength of character which have characterized Friends from their rise to the present time.

The language of Friends is beautiful,
So soft and gentle and sweet,
The heart seems overflowing with love
When its earnest accents we meet.

For who can utter the "thee" and "thou"
If the heart's not pretty near right?
To them we look for the guiding star
That leads to the Inner Light.

This simple and beautiful language
Is always pure and mild,
Its expression is quaint and simple
As the thoughts of a little child.

We feel there is strength of character;
For they've braved the taunts of men
To keep to these simple words of truth,
When to change 'twould have easier been.

We feel the simple truth is spoken;
It cannot be otherwise,
For who ever swerves from truthfulness
Who uses the "thees" and "thys"?

When on meeting we feel the hand-clasp warm,
And hear the "How does thee do?"
And are then addressed by our Christian name
We feel that the friendship's true.

From this plain language, simple and strong,
Is reflected out to the world
The feeling of sympathy, love, and truth,
And purity manifold,

Of sweet and Christlike charity,
Of a gentle and sincere heart,
And a life of earnest devotion, given
To God in every part.

May this simple language continue,
And never be lost from sight,
But form a distinguishing feature
Of this sect which stands for the right.

HARDSHIPS and sorrows are oftentimes the fires which burn out the dross of selfishness from human hearts.—Selected.

DRIVING THROUGH NARROW PLACES.

I HAD driven up in the carriage. One of the barn doors was open and the other was closed.

"Do you think I can drive through that one door?" said I to the boy.

"No, sir, but you can unhitch the horse and then draw the wagon in." But I reasoned, if there was room enough to draw the wagon in by hand there was room enough for the horse to draw it in without unhitching him; the only trouble was to know how to keep in the middle of the space and not strike the posts on either side. After a moment's thought, I saw how to do it, and drove the carriage in through the narrow door without any trouble, but with, perhaps, not more than an inch or two of room to spare.

It was done in this way: I thought, if I drive just as close as possible to the post on one side, there will be no danger of hitting the post on the other side; and so, without trying to keep in the middle of the road, I turned all my attention to the side of the wagon on which I sat, and carefully drove the gentle horse so that my end of the axle passed perhaps within an eighth of an inch of the centre post, and then I knew that there must be room enough at the other end to clear the other side of the door. So by attending strictly to my own end of the axles, the other end took care of itself without watching.

Men clamor for their rights and forget their duties. But if all men did their duties all men would have their rights. If you keep close to your own side of the passage way, you can drive through narrow places and not trespass on others' rights.—[The Christian.]

THE longer I live, the more expedient I find it to endeavor more and more to extend my sympathies and affections. The natural tendency of advancing years is to narrow and contract these feelings. I do not mean that I wish to form a new and sworn friendship every day, to increase my circle of intimates; these are very different affairs. But I find it conduces to my mental health and happiness, to find out all I can which is amiable and loveable in those I come in contact with, and to make the most of it. It may fall very far short of what I was once wont to dream of; it may not supply the place of what I have known, felt, and tasted; but it is better than nothing: it seems to keep the feelings and affections in exercise; it keeps the heart alive in its humanity; and till we shall be all spiritual, this is alike our duty and our interest.—Bernard Barton.

A MAN'S first care should be to avoid the reproaches of his own heart; his next, to escape the censures of the world; if the last interferes with the former, it ought to be entirely neglected, but otherwise there cannot be a greater satisfaction to an honest man than to see those approbations which it gives itself seconded by the applause of the public.—Addison.

AND think that he is mainly wise,
Who takes what comes of good or ill,
Trusting that goodness underlies
And worketh in the end—His will.—Alice Cary.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FOURTH MONTH 29, 1899.

THE PLAIN PEOPLE PAY.

"PLAIN people," those of whom Lincoln spoke, cannot too definitely or too fixedly regard the fact that all public waste is at their expense. It is a fact very much obscured, and even denied, for it is part of the plan of those who commit the waste that those who must pay for it shall not understand what is being done.

Any one who doubts that it is the workers who carry the burden of government error, extravagance, waste, and destruction can, by a simple study of the elements of the problem, be soon convinced. All so-called "wealth" is the product of labor. There is practically no wealth which is not such product. All we have, contributory to our subsistence, or comfort, or luxury, is the outcome of toil. The imagined increase of wealth by revaluation, as when the "markets" rise, or its decrease, as when they fall, causes no real change in the existing stock of the world's products; they remain the same in bulk, and in character, after the market has fallen or risen, that they were before the shift in valuation occurred.

"Capital," so called, is but the product of labor, unused, and now usable to promote new labor. Capital has no other origin than that of past, performed, completed labor, whose results are now available for the support of further effort.

These are, it is true, simple and familiar statements of economic facts. But let us apply them a moment. Suppose that a great part of the community, including many of those who are at the time of life when strength and ability to labor is greatest, are drawn off and set not to make but to destroy, who is it that must replace the things destroyed? Obviously, those who remain laboring. When cities are burned, who rebuilds them? Not the destroyers. When villages are "shelled," when canals are cut, when railroads are torn up, when crops are laid waste, when trees are cut down, when homes are ruined, how are all these repaired and replaced, supposing it is ever done? Certainly, it is the plain people, who labor, who do not destroy but build up, that must make good all this loss.

We are at present spending millions of dollars, and even hundreds of millions, to destroy, in one place or another, the results of labor. The cost of doing this must be paid, and day by day it is paid, in the simple, actual, real toil of those who rise early and labor late. It can be paid for in no other way. There is no magic in government, no necromancy in taxation. In the end, as in every other case, it comes back to a settlement, and those who produce must yield up their hard-got productions to square the account. The farmer brings his wheat, the mechanic his wages, the artisan his finished work, and every other worker, male or female, old or young, pays over the something which he has been busy in making. Thus is the waste and injury account squared, and it cannot be squared in any other way. Those who flourish as destroyers, on sea or on land, are kept, and their destructive work is paid for, out of the earnings of the plain people.

WE have published private letters from soldiers serving in the Philippine Islands, disclosing the barbarities of the war, and we could fill pages of the INTELLIGENCER with others that are appearing in the daily newspapers. They are mostly written as "home" letters, and were not intended for publication; they give frank descriptions of the scenes of blood and destruction. We believe they ought to be widely read, and we only refrain from printing more of them in our own columns because we fear that most of our readers would rather not have a mass of such details. The killing of men, women, and children, "every native we met," is testified to by one soldier; the burning of a "big church," and the killing of over a hundred men inside, is described by another; others describe the "looting," (a word derived from the robberies by the English troops in India), of houses, and the accumulation of vast quantities of plunder, and still others various shocking features of the war. It seems impossible to suppose that the people of the United States mean to continue this chapter very long.

WE value highly the series of Old Testament Lessons which have been in progress since the first of the year, for use in First-day schools, and which are regularly published in the INTELLIGENCER. They are intelligent, reverent studies of the Biblical materials, with all the light which the discovered monuments, inscriptions, tablets, etc., have shed upon them, and we doubt whether anything better can be easily found anywhere. A careful following of these Lessons, with the aid of some, if not all, of the authorities suggested as helpful, will be certain to give a good knowledge of the Biblical account.

It may be set down as certain that if we are to look at Cuba and the other islands that have come partly or entirely into our control merely as fields for "exploiting," as opportunities for our advantage, our whole experience will be unhappy. We might help the peoples of the islands; we can help them if we will, but the policy of grasping, self-seeking advantage is certain to fail.

THE announcement under the heading "Swarthmore College," on the inside page of the cover, speaks for itself and states the whole case very clearly. An encouraging start, we think we may say, has been given to the Fund, and it is to be hoped that it will, in due time, have a satisfactory increase.

BIRTHS.

WALKER.—Fourth month 4, 1899, to Ivins C. and Mary R. Walker, of Norristown, a daughter, who is named Ellen Lee.

MARRIAGES.

BONSAL—OVERDEER.—At the residence of the bride's mother, Fourth month 19, 1899, Charles Albert Bonsal, of West Chester, Pa., son of the late T. Vincent and Mary M. Bonsal, of Philadelphia, and Katharine F. Overdeer, of Gettysburg, Pa.

LINDSAY—JONES.—Third month 30, 1899, at the home of her parents, in Frederick county, Maryland, by Friends' ceremony, Ida M., daughter of Hiram B. and Mary E. Jones, and William A. Lindsay, Jr., she being a member of Pipe Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends.

LUKENS—PANCOAST.—At the residence of the bride's father, in Germantown, Philadelphia, Fourth month 18, 1899, under the care of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, William Briscoe Lukens, son of Ephraim C. and the late Anna N. Lukens, and Mary Hurley Pancoast, daughter of David and the late Elizabeth Bickham Pancoast.

DEATHS.

FAIRLAMB.—Fourth month 17, 1899, Jonathan T., son of the late R. Crosby Fairlamb, aged 52 years. Interment at Media, Pa.

GAUSE.—At the home of her son, Whitson Gause, near Providence, Lancaster county, Pa., Twelfth month 5, 1898, Elizabeth Whitson Gause, aged 75 years.

STACKHOUSE.—At his late residence in Southampton township, Bucks county, Pa., Sixth-day, Fourth month 14, 1899, of Bright's disease, John H. Stackhouse, Sr., in his 56th year; a son of the late Charles and Hannah Stackhouse, of Horsham township, Montgomery county, Pa.

WATSON.—Suddenly, of heart failure, Fourth month 12, 1899, at his home on Hamilton Avenue, Trenton, N. J., John Watson, in the 70th year of his age.

He was born at Carversville, Pa., and came to Trenton to reside nearly 31 years ago. He was interested in his meeting, also in Friends' Association. M.

WOOLMAN.—At 1708 Race street, Philadelphia, Effie H., wife of George S. Woolman. Interment at Orange, N. J.

DOUKHOBOR NOTES.

THE removal of the Doukhobors who have been in Cyprus is now in progress. A report elsewhere printed in full, presented to London Y. M. Meeting for Sufferings, gives the details. The ship, the Lake Superior, the one that brought the second party from Batoum to St. John, was expected at Larnaka, Cyprus, on the 15th, and is probably on its way by this time.

At the meeting of the Committee in London, John Bellows said that the captain and crew of the Lake Superior were greatly struck with the religious character and consistency of the Doukhobors whom they had conveyed from Tiflis to Canada. The captain remarked to William Bellows, "Remember, if these people don't go to Heaven, you won't." William Bellows will accompany the emigrants from Cyprus to Canada.

There are still some 2,000 to 3,000 Doukhobors in Russia, in the province of Kars, who are in the same situation as those who have come away. They are to be brought over at once, to Canada. A grant of 130,000 acres of land will be made them by the Government—on the same terms, we presume, as to the others.

We have received one more contribution to the Fund in our hands.

THE "INTELLIGENCER" FUND.

Cash, per J. C.,	$100.00
Previously acknowledged,	349.25
Total,	$449.25

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

THE following communication was some time since sent to the President:

RICHMOND, IND., Third month 22, 1899.
To William McKinley, President of the United States:

The Indiana Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, at its last meeting held at Waynesville, Ohio, Ninth month, 1898, directed a letter of sympathy and congratulation to be sent to the Czar of Russia on his proposed Disarmament Conference.

As no expression of unity with this Disarmament Conference has been sent to thee as the chief Executive of our government from our Indiana Yearly Meeting, we, as Friends, have felt that a responsibility rests on us to inform thee that this most vital subject had occupied our attention and to send thee a copy of the letter to the Czar.

We believe that the real support of this conference must come from the expressed wishes of the People, and our desire is that the President and the People of the United States fulfill to the utmost their part "to improve this opportunity of the century to inaugurate a movement that shall become, as the years go by, a stronger and stronger defense for peace and good will, and the best and unhindered development of arts, commerce, and religion."

ANNA M. VAUGHAN,
JOSEPH C. RATLIFF.

In sending the above, A. M. V. writes:

It may look a little lame that the letter to the President is not signed officially. It was an oversight that a letter was not sent to the President at the same time that the letter was sent to the Czar. From various reasons we failed to get the subject into our business meeting till last monthly meeting, but I wrote to all the monthly meetings of our Yearly Meeting, on my own request to introduce the subject into their meeting. Our own monthly meeting approved, and most of those I wrote to have approved, (all have approved who have replied).

The Friends' Meeting property at Fallsington, Bucks county, Pa., has been improved by the construction of new walks and drives. At Wrightstown, on the 15th instant (the Newtown Enterprise says) a number of interested members of the Friends' Association met at the meeting-house, and planted a number of trees on the property.

John J. Cornell and wife have a prospect of attending the approaching Concord Quarterly Meeting, at Wilmington, on the 2d proximo, (next Third-day), and Abington, at Horsham, on the 4th.

The Yearly Meeting of (Orthodox) Friends, held at Fourth and Arch streets, Philadelphia, began its sittings for business on the 17th inst., and closed on the 21st. The attendance was good, and the meeting reported very satisfactory. Several visiting Friends were present, among them being Eliza H. Varney, of Canada; Cyrus W. Harvey, of Kansas; Eli Harvey, of Kansas; Thomas Ellmore and Katharine Stanton, of Indiana; Hannah and Rachel Stratton, of Ohio; Benj. Lightfoot, of Pittsburg; Elisha Steer, of Ohio; Dr. Richard H. Thomas, of Baltimore; Ellwood Conrad, of Ohio.

FROM AIKEN, S. C.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

DURING a brief sojourn in this place near the Schofield Industrial and Normal School, and as guests in the pleasant home of its founder, we have had a most interesting, encouraging, and hopeful insight into its daily work. Many improvements are noticeable since a visit made some years since, before the industrial departments were added, and before the Farm was one of its acquirements. Chief among the industries taught are printing, harness-making, carpentering, shoemaking, sewing, laundry work, etc. These are of great significance and give promise of a better future for the colored people who have so much to overcome in the way of generations of dependence. Nothing in the present outlook is so apparent and so hopeful as the improved condition socially and morally of the class who have availed themselves of the benefits of this training in better living. The boys and girls of these schools will compare favorably with the same class everywhere. They are neat and tidy in their dress, and an evident and praiseworthy desire is shown to make the most out of the little they have.

In general deportment, in respectful attention, and courteous manner, they are not inferior to the best. Very seldom do we find young people so responsive to any kind and friendly advances, and indeed in some cases it is most touching and pathetic. No one can remain here for any length of time and give anything of their heart to them without being impressed with this. They are as essentially a part of this—as it is sometimes styled—black man's country, as its sunshine, its tropical plants, and its singing birds.

We have been delighted and so much entertained by the daily devotional exercises in the chapel in which teachers, pupils, and visitors join. They yet produce in an inimitable way the plantation melodies, like which there is nothing in all the wide world, and which, we trust, they will never let die. They are the expression of a life and of a people and conditions that will never be repeated. I am sure we will carry home with us in our finer sense some lingering echoes of those that we have heard and a memory of the trustful dependence and simple faith which they breathe and which are a rebuke to our conventional interpretations.

The Friends have cause to congratulate themselves that they have in a degree been the pioneers in this Christian work of helping to regenerate a people who have known oppression and wrong, and should forever bear it in mind that here we have some work that we cannot afford to neglect.

The season here is not quite so far advanced as sometimes at this time of the year, but it is very springlike and warm, and every day is a delight in the fresh, green foliage, the blooming flowers, and the fine concerts of the feathered songsters.

We shall find another spring unfolding, perhaps, when we come home, making two in our little year.

SARAH M. CARVER.

Aiken, S. C., Fourth month 21.

THE CYPRUS DOUKHOBORS.

At the meeting of the Meeting for Sufferings, (corresponding to our Representative Committee), of London Yearly Meeting, at London, on the 7th instant, the following report was presented.

THE Doukhobor Committee have to report that the long-continued sickness which prevailed among the immigrants in Cyprus, so disheartened them as to leave no hope of their ultimately settling in the island, and the committee have therefore chartered a vessel, the Lake Superior, which has already conveyed some 2,000 Doukhobors from Batoum, to take these also to Canada.

The steamer is now on her passage from Liverpool, probably passing Gibraltar to-day, and is due at Larnaka on the 15th, when she will at once take on board the 1,030 (or thereabouts) of the immigrants, of which our Society has had the care, under the able management of Wilson Sturge.

This reëmigration will necessitate our calling up a portion of the guarantee fund; one-fifth its amount meeting the immediate requirement. We do not anticipate more than a very trifling further call upon the guarantors in any case.

It must be remembered that before the Doukhobors left their homes in the Transcaucasus, communication between them and the committee was extremely difficult and imperfect; so that while these poor people were driven to extremity by their sufferings on the one hand, the committee, on the other hand, had no means of making clear to them the position in Cyprus, and of warning them against the sudden move en masse which involved them in such illness and loss of life after landing in the island without preparation for their housing, etc.

The committee, therefore, have had to face a position they had been powerless to prevent, and to make the best of it. They are thankful that at the present moment there remains no serious illness, and no infectious complaint, among the poor people, to hinder their early removal to Canada, where the authorities have done everything in their power to smooth the way for their coming, providing food and shelter for their immediate needs, and finding work for such of the men as may not be able to begin at once the cultivation of the lands that are allotted to them.

Three Russian ladies, who have given their services gratuitously as nurses during the late period of sickness among the Cyprus Doukhobors, generously volunteer to accompany them in the long voyage from Larnaka to Quebec, in case their help should be required; and the Dominion Government generously gives them passes, as it has done in the case of the nurses who accompanied the previous parties of Doukhobors, over the Canadian Pacific railway lines.

The Doukhobors take with them the tools, baggage, and tents they now have in Cyprus, for use in the new settlement.

JOHN BELLOWES, Clerk to the Committee.

SOUTHERN CALIFORNIA SCENES.

From a Private Letter.

WE find Santa Barbara a very pretty place. This morning we went out to the Old Mission, and saw and heard the monks. I don't think I have any Catholic blood at all in my veins, but my heart always gives a little jump at the thought of these old Padres. Invariably the missions are picturesque.

On Easter Sabbath I drove thirty miles, from 10.30 a.m., to 6.30 p.m., up to Mesa Grande, nearly five thousand feet above the sea. A cousin teaching school there came down to San Diego to see us, and I drove home with her and had quite a thrilling little visit. She lives (boards) right in the midst of the Government Reservation for the Indians. The little brown, adobe huts were every where in sight, and their inhabitants were wonderfully interesting to me. Some of them are quite civilized, and others live on acorns, and depend upon stealing for their luxuries. While I was there the white people in the neighborhood gave a party for the old Indians, and I wish you might have seen the guests as they arrived,—the old women bare-footed, their long white hair uncombed; the men attired in wonderfully queer garments, in all stages of decay. Their manners are none of the best, for they have a way of taking cakes, pies, etc., by the middle and shoving them into their dresses, or into sacks brought for the purpose. But the children are cute, and quite clever, some ways. They are learning English, and seem to approve of Uncle Sam, and the Government schools.

While we were at Pasadena we went up Mount Lowe. Part of the ascent is by trolley, over deep and dreadful canyons, around sharp curves, always making abrupt ascent until we reach Alpine Tavern 5,000 feet above the sea. It is a wonderful feat of engineering, and a most interesting trip.

But the prettiest place I have seen since I came to California is Smiley Heights, at Redlands. It is the home of the Smiley Brothers, (Albert K. and Alfred H.), of Lake Mohonk, and Lake Minnewaska. Never before did I know what could be done in landscape gardening. They had acres of roses and all kinds of flowers in full bloom. And away up on the top of the mountain is the loveliest little lake, fringed with red geraniums, (and red geraniums in California are something worth while). As the road wound in and out this mass of shrubbery and bloom, one could catch every little while lovely glimpses of the mountains and valleys. I cannot describe it, but I wished for you all!

Santa Barbara, Cal., Fourth month 11.

FIVE thousand Indians, dissatisfied with conditions existing in the reservations of the Indian Territory, have left in a body for Mexico to establish a union reservation on a large tract near Guadalajara. The emigrants belong to the Cherokee, Creek, and Delaware tribes. They are said to have a capital of $425,000.

TRUE MISSION TEACHING.

The following extract from a private letter written by a teacher in a Chicago school, where her work is among the "incorrigibles,"—with whom she is wonderfully successful—has the ring of a true mission teacher. We should all be thankful for her self-sacrificing devotion.

MANY thanks for your interest in my work with the boys. I often feel that I am working in vain, as far as good results are concerned, and yet as I see before me each day, a dozen boys who will not stay in school in any other room, a week, and who have come regularly, hardly missing a day in my room for five months, I feel that perhaps after all I am doing something.

I have obtained from friends many copies of [juvenile newspapers], for such luxuries are unknown in the boys' homes, and they delight to look at them before school and sit in perfect rapture when I read to them the stories. Then they beg to take copies home at night to read, and I find that it keeps them from spending their evenings on the street, or in low theatres.

They have everything to overcome within and without, for they are badly born and their associations are of the most pernicious kind, while they have all been smokers, since they were five or six years old.

They live by the old Testament doctrine, "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth." The sweeter one of Christ's time, is still beyond them, but I hope to make some little impression upon them in time.

CHILD CULTURE.

A Friend greatly interested in the right kind of child culture gives in a private letter this good advice to a young mother. This mother, much impressed by it, desires it passed on to others through the INTELLIGENCER.

MAY the baby have a healthy body and mind, and may its parents have the wisdom to let it alone, and give it plenty of good air and sunshine and love, and allow it to grow naturally and develop into what it was intended to be, and not try to make it over. If she is a rose don't try to make a lily of her. Just keep the weeds away and slugs off. It grieves me to see so much over-education of the young. Forcing their immature brains and piling knowledge upon them until all the joyousness of their early life is taken from them. Children old before their time! oh! the pity of it! and they can only be young once. Nature will revolt, and there will be untold suffering if it is not stopped, and those who are responsible will wonder why their children should die so young, or live to wish they were dead. I am glad physicians are becoming aroused to the danger. Our teachers are suffering as well as the children.

MANY persons have doubtless been surprised in reading the letters of our soldiers from the Philippines to read of pianos, carriages, silk dresses, etc., as forming part of the booty carried off from the deserted habitations of the Filipinos. It is difficult to reconcile such evidences of civilization, not to say taste and luxury, with the "barbarous" and "semi-savage" character of the people we are fighting, as described in the cable dispatches.—Baltimore Sun.

SECRETARY James G. Blaine, on April 11, 1889, instructed the American Samoa commissioners at Berlin that the plan of governing natives without their consent was "not in harmony with the established policy of this government."

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PEACE CONFERENCE AT ABINGTON.—On the afternoon of Fourth month 16, (following the Abington First-day School Union), the Philanthropic Committee held a Conference at Abington meeting-house on the subject of "Peace and Arbitration." Isaac Michener presided, and Arabella Carter acted as secretary. After the minutes of the previous meeting were read, Elizabeth W. Ely read extracts from an article on "The Failure of Philanthropy," and while this may sound somewhat pessimistic, yet the trend of thought was rather encouraging than otherwise, since it suggested a remedy inasmuch as it placed "Christian Godliness" as the proper motive for philanthropy.

Elizabeth Lloyd, of Newtown, then gave an excellent talk on the subject of the day, in which she contrasted America's present efforts at annexation of the Philippines with the peaceful measures adopted toward Hawaii, with a far preferable result in the latter case. Self-preservation is said to be the first instinct in man, but self-renunciation is Christ's first law, and by the observance of this the Hawaiian Islands were not only Christianized by the missionaries, but were civilized as well, and to-day are Americanized, so forming no such difficult problem as the Philippines are likely to prove, they being subjugated by force, and not by justice and right. The whole world is ours to Christianize, but not one inch for war. This is God's way of taking up the "White Man's Burden."

Alfred H. Love followed, saying in part that what man creates, he may abolish, but what God creates is unchangeable. Slavery was abolished, and so may the incubus of war be removed, since it is man made, and without God's sanction. Arbitration comprehends mediation and conciliation as well. He spoke of the inconsistency of teaching and training a boy for morality when he is a child, and then when he is eighteen years of age, the country demands him for use in war.

A petition expressive of sympathy for the Czar of Russia having been presented for signatures, the meeting desired the president and secretary to sign on behalf of the assembly. This was done, so helping in a little way to lengthen the list, already 50,000 strong.

Alvin Haines expressed his appreciation of what had been said by both speakers. While he bore arms during the Civil War, yet now he realized there was a far better way of settling difficulties. James Q. Atkinson added similar remarks, and Alfred H. Love spoke of the encouragement it was to receive such a unanimous endorsement of the petition as was given by this assembly.

Although the afternoon was very stormy and the attendance was smaller than usual on such occasions, yet deep interest was maintained throughout the session.

ARABELLA CARTER.

NORRISTOWN, PA.—The Friends' Association held its meeting, on the evening of the 18th instant, at the home of Isaac and Martha Richards, on Swede street. The attendance was larger than usual.

Winfield W. Conrad, of Port Kennedy, read an account of the establishment of Valley Meeting. It was held first at the home of Lewis Walker, the ancestor of a numerous family. Later he deeded an acre or more of land, now the graveyard. The article, prepared by Joseph J. Walker, about 1893, contained many interesting reminiscences.

William R. Jamison read a selection, "The Power of Cheerfulness," and Charles Platt another, "Lessons of the Hour." An essay on the "Influence of Quakerism on the World," taking a hopeful view of the topic, was read by Isaac Richards. Martha Platt read a sketch of the life of Benjamin West, the celebrated painter, giving interesting incidents of his early life.

A proposition from Plymouth Friends to hold the last summer meeting of the Association at their meeting-house, in order to aid in starting a similar organization there, was read. It would necessitate going to Valley Meeting in the fall instead of at midsummer, as has been done for several years. The whole matter was laid over until the next meeting, which will be held at Friends' Home.

MILLVILLE, PA.—The Young Friends' Association met at the meeting-house Second month 12. The opening exercises included a period of silence, and the reading of the fourth chapter of Ephesians by the president, Henry W. Eves. Roll-call was followed by reading the minutes of last meeting.

"Making the Most of Life," from J. R. Miller's writings, was read by S. Jennie Kester. "Three Ways of Praying," was read by George M. Henrie, "His Coming," by Reba E. Eves. Alberta Kline read "The Preacher's Vacation," and James Sands recited "The Beggar Child."

The question, "Why did our Society increase more rapidly at its rise than at the present time?" was considered. The discussion was opened by William Burgess and Henry W. Eves, and elicited interesting remarks from others present. Current Topics were reported by Charles Eves.

On Third month 12, the Association was opened by the president reading the fifth chapter of Timothy. Roll-call and responses were followed by reading and approval of minutes of preceding meeting. The program consisted in a series of questions asked and answered by George Eves, Arthur Henrie, and Beatrice W. Eves.

J. Lemuel John read from the "Life of Peter Yarnall," Julia E. Christian, "The Path of Duty"; Charles Eves read "The Culture of the Cross," Sarah Rote recited "No Room for Boys," Emma H. Eves read an essay on "Harmony." The question, "What is Inspiration?" was discussed by William Burgess and other members.

FRANCES M. EVES, Correspondent.

FLEMING, PA.—The Young Friends' Association meeting, Third month 27, was opened by the president reading a part of the fourth chapter of Proverbs. Roll-call was responded to with extracts, or the description of some Biblical city. Mary Fisher gave some description of the life of Lot, another made the statement that the lesson to be taken from the experience of Lot's wife is "that the backslider cannot escape punishment."

A short paper concerning the Doukhobors and their settlement in Canada was given by Myra Underwood. A poem, "God's Answer," giving as the divine answer to the petitions of his sorrowing, distressed children, "Work thy way out into light," was read by the secretary.

Florence N. Cleaver read an interesting account of Joseph Nichols and the people called Nicholites, (formerly in Maryland). Sue Underwood told of the ancient rites of eating. "The Angel of Patience," from Whittier, was read by Eva W. Cleaver.

The report of the Philadelphia Young Friends' Association meeting of Third month 13 was read by the secretary. The president read the 43d Psalm. After the reading of the program for next meeting, adjournment.

N. M. FISHER, Sec.

BROAD CREEK, MD.—Friends' Association of Broad Creek Meeting (Harford county, Md.), met Fourth month 9, and was opened by the president reading the 23d Psalm, and the comment of J. R. Miller, author of "By the Still Waters" and other religious works. The roll was then called, and minutes of last meeting read and approved.

"A Plea for the Oppressed" was read by Emma C. Scarborough. This selection was a plea for the suffering Cubans and others, with an earnest entreaty that these national differences might be settled according to the teachings of Jesus Christ.

The secretary read an essay prepared by Beulah C. Clement, "The Power of Kind Speech." A thought presented was that there are times when there is as much harm done by kind words unspoken as by the unkind word spoken.

Next was a reading, a poem, by H. Rebecca Reynolds, entitled, "I hear the Angels Whisper," after which Virginia L. Gorrell gave an interesting sketch of the life of George Fox.

G. McCoy read a paper on "Early Quakerism," written by Dr. O. Edward Janney, of Baltimore. It was much appreciated.

Next was a Bible story entitled "Moses," written and read by Anna M. Jones, a little girl of ten years. Though given in a child's language, the story was complete and in harmony with that which we find recorded in Scripture. Emily Reynolds then read a very pretty selection entitled "Heaven." Referred questions were then answered, viz.: "Who was the Quaker poet?"—John H. Stokes. "Why do Friends use the plain language?"—Wm. M. Scarborough. "Why did Friends emigrate to America?"—Sarah R. G. Jackson.

Referred questions for next meeting were then read and given to William G. McGoy, Beulah C. Clement, S. Rosene Stubbs, William M. Scarborough, and Charles E. Jackson. The program for next meeting was read, and after a few moments' reverential silence the meeting adjourned, to meet again First-day afternoon, Fifth month 14, at 2 o'clock.

SARAH R. G. JACKSON, Secretary.

LANGHORNE, PA.—The Langhorne Young Friends' Association met at the home of Mary Bunting, Fourth month 20.

The president, John Wildman, called the meeting to order, and the minutes of the previous meeting were read by the secretary, Anna R. Paxson, and approved.

After transacting the business of the evening, the program was opened by C. Grace Marple, with a paper entitled, "The Gods of Greece," in which she said that "the Greek Gods were treated more like human beings than heavenly deities; they were held in love and companionship rather than in fear and reverence, and they gave no book of teachings to their people."

Louisa P. Osmond read a memorial of Louisa J. Roberts, for many years one of the editors of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. She was an ardent worker in the Society of Friends, and also among the Indians and the Negroes. She wrote for Scattered Seeds, and the Lesson Leaves.

"What are the duties of young Friends in the Society?" was the question answered by Edward Palmer, in a short but forcible paper, which called forth discussion upon the subject of the younger members attending business meetings and serving on committees.

Sara E. Allen read an article on "Reforms, Public and Personal," which said that individuals could not substitute "public reforms" for "personal reform."

After Eddie Gillingham had recited "The Corn Song," in a pleasing manner, the secretary read from the INTELLIGENCER extracts from the minutes of the Rising Sun and the West Chester Friends' Associations. This was followed by discussion upon the question as to what constitutes the difference between religion and morality.

J. Howard Marshall then announced that Wm. W. Birdsall had consented to be present at our next meeting and would give a talk.

It was decided to hold the next meeting on the 27th of Fifth month, in the meeting-house on Maple Avenue, and to extend an invitation to all who are interested.

Fifty-five persons answered to roll-call, and after a few moments of silence the meeting adjourned.

A. R. P., Sec.

SPEAKING of London life, Julian Ralph says: "Wherever men tinker, mend, make, or trade in a small way, they are maddening to deal with. There is an American woman in London who, after repeated disappointments, at last got a plumber into her house to look at a leaking pipe. She turned the key in the door and pocketed it. 'Now,' said she, 'I've got you here at last, and I mean to have you do this work. You can send for tools and help by one of my maids, but out of this house you don't go until this pipe is repaired.'"

CONGRESSMAN Charles Curtis, of Kansas, is an Indian of the Kaw tribe, (a news paragraph says). He is a Republican from the district embracing Topeka, and has now served three terms in Congress, and holds a certificate for a fourth. He is a lawyer by profession, an earnest and accomplished speaker, and the most conspicuous "friend at court" of the red men.

THE yearly drink bill in England is increasing steadily, but in France the increase is a much more appalling one. In 1880 the French had only 256,000 public houses outside Paris: now they have 425,000. During the same period, and not unnaturally, the annual number of suicides has risen by 50 per cent.; and the criminal prosecutions have risen from 371,000 to 509,000.

Educational Department.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

At the regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association, Fourth month 16, a paper on St. Peter was presented by Emma Waln. Discussion followed, "Resolved that the Teachings of Jesus are practical to-day." Affirmative led by Caroline S. Hawke, 1901; Negative, G. Arthur Seaman, 1901.

The Senior Class in Biology has taken up the study of Histology. At present they are watching the daily development of three dozen eggs in an incubator.

The Senior Class in Social Science will shortly begin bi-weekly visits to various places of interest in connection with their work. The county jail at Media, Pa., and the "School for Feeble-minded Children at Elwyn, will be the first to receive attention.

The Class in Pedagogy has made several visits to the classes in the Swarthmore Preparatory School to gain an idea of practical methods of teaching.

Calvin F. Crowell, '99 recently presented a paper at a regular meeting of the Joseph Leidy Scientific Society on the subject "The Cocoanut and its Products." '99.

WESTTOWN SCHOOL REPORT.—The annual report of the Committee in charge of Westtown Boarding School was presented to the Yearly Meeting (4th and Arch streets), on the 21st instant. In the spring term of 1898 there were 158 students at the school, 82 of them being boys and 76 girls. In the fall and winter term of 1898-99 there were 170 pupils, 88 boys and 82 girls. The total amount of income of the school during the year was $42,903.49, while the total expenditures were $46,483.10, thus leaving a balance against the institution of $3,579.61. The net income from the farm was about $1,500.

Approval was given in the report to the plan of the Westtown Old Scholars' Association to raise a fund of $100,000, to be known as the Westtown Centennial Memorial Fund. Half of the interest from its investment will be at the disposal of the Committee in charge of the School, and the other half will be used at the discretion of the Westtown Old Scholars' Association. The W. O. S. A. proposes to hold a reunion of all those who have ever attended the School on the 10th of next Sixth month. The school will celebrate its centennial year on the 6th of Fifth month.

GEORGE SCHOOL CHANGE.—Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, who has been connected with George School from its opening, in charge of the Department of Physics, has resigned, and will leave that position at the close of the school year. He expects to devote the coming year to study, in the department of History, and will probably spend part of the time abroad. This is preparatory to an important engagement to which he has been invited in another Friends' institution.

PRINCIPAL RESIGNED.—Reuben Grant Bennett, who has been Principal of Locust Valley Academy, Long Island, for two years, has resigned that position, intending to devote himself more particularly to his special branches, in Applied Science. He is a graduate of Swarthmore College, 1897, having previously graduated at Franklin College, New Athens, Ohio.

MAYOR VAN WYCK of New York has shown good sense in disapproving a bill permitting a canvass of the public schools for subscriptions to build the American Boy man-of-war. Solicitation of funds from pupils should not be allowed for any purpose, he says. Especially not for such a purpose as that.—[Springfield Republican.]

PROFESSOR George Frederick Wright, the geologist of Oberlin College, recently made a study of Niagara Falls and he estimates that the gorge made by the falls since they began their recession occupied less than 10,000 years in its formation. He based his conclusions on the supposition that one-quarter of an inch was worn away from the side of the gorge annually by atmospheric agencies.

LITERARY NOTES.

"THE NEW WORLD" quarterly magazine, (Boston, Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), in its latest issue, Third month, has an impressive list of contents, headed by an article on "The Study of Early Church History," by Prof. A. C. McGiffert, of Union Theological Seminary, New York, whose "History of the Apostolic Age" made so much stir when it appeared two years ago. The next article is one on "Archæology and the Higher Criticism," by Dr. J. P. Peters, formerly of the University of Pennsylvania (now rector of an Episcopal church in New York City), in which he gives an intelligent and helpful summary of the results of recent archæological research in reference to the Bible. The researches in Egypt, he says, "have thrown almost no direct light upon the Bible," and he adds that, "We are not yet able to date with certainty the period of the exile, or to prove, from Egyptian sources, the presence of Israel in Egypt." The discoveries in Phœnicia do not include anything of great antiquity. From northern Syria we are just beginning to get results, the oldest inscription so far being of about 1500, B. C. The most important discoveries have been in Assyria and Babylonia, and these Dr. Peters describes more fully. They discredit the historical value of Daniel and Esther; on the other hand, they support the "accuracy of some of the historical facts recorded in the fourteenth chapter of Genesis." Dr. Peters discredits the methods of Prof. Sayce; he calls them "impossible and unscientific." On the whole, Dr. Peters advises caution, at present, in forming theories on the points in dispute among Old Testament students; more light is needed, and this further digging and more discoveries may supply.

Another article which we find in this issue is that on "The Spiritual Development of Paul," by Prof. George A. Barton, of Bryn Mawr College; we trace in it an expansion of the lectures delivered by Prof. Barton at the Wilmington Summer School, in 1897.

The address of Dr. George Dana Boardman, "Disarmament of Nations, or Mankind One Body," delivered before the national gathering in Washington, in 1890, after being "out of print" for some time, has been reprinted in a fourth edition, by Howard M. Jenkins, (921 Arch street, Philadelphia), in order that it may be kept in circulation. (It was reviewed in the INTELLIGENCER of Third month 11.) The present pamphlet, it is proper to say, is much expanded from the original address, Dr. Boardman having added important new matter, and a Prefatory Note.

The pamphlet deserves a general circulation. It is, at every point, we think, so far as it relates to present-day affairs, in harmony with the peaceable principles held by Friends. (Dr. Boardman makes in one place a passing allusion to old wars, which he thinks may have been justified, but he insists that there is no justification for war, now, with the world's present enlightenment.) It quotes freely from Whittier, and speaks at length in eulogy of William Penn. The pamphlet is elsewhere advertised.

An interesting description of the Hawaiian Islands is given in Harper's Weekly, by Caspar Whitney, and it is quite a relief from the war papers that have overwhelmed us so long.

Julian Ralph's article in Harper's Magazine, on "Keeping House in London," is very entertaining. It is a continuation of the articles by the same author, which have appeared in recent numbers of the Magazine, and shows the amusing difficulties which an American encounters in setting up a domestic establishment in England.

The volume of "Thomas Carlyle's Letters," elsewhere noticed in this issue, is handsomely illustrated.

The April number of the Popular Science Monthly is liberally contributed to by Delaware county (Pa.) writers. Dr. Spencer Trotter, of Swarthmore College, has a delightful paper with the title, "The Coming of the Catbird," describing the spring and early summer bird migrations as they may be observed in the Delaware Valley; and Dr. Martin W. Barr, principal of the Training School for Feeble-Minded Children, one of the most useful and successful of our institutions for the defective, has an instructive article with the title, "Mental Defectives and the Social Welfare." The latter has several illustrations.

Charles Scribner's Sons, New York, will publish in this country the new biography of Oliver Cromwell, by Samuel Rawson Gardiner, the English historian of the Commonwealth, and earlier period. It is to be elaborately illustrated. They are the American publishers, also, of Hilaire Belloc's "Life of Danton," which is reported to be having a large sale. The author will be well remembered as a University Extension lecturer in Philadelphia, two years ago. His book is regarded as an important contribution to the literature of the French Revolution.

The London Academy, commonly considered the best literary periodical in England, recently offered a prize for a list of the twelve best books of the season. In a recent issue the result of the contest was given. The "Letters of Robert Browning and Elizabeth Barrett Barrett," to which we recently referred in the INTELLIGENCER, received a large majority of votes.

SOCIAL SCIENCE.

HOME INFLUENCE ASSOCIATION.

THE Home Influence Association of Philadelphia closed its meetings for this spring on Third-day evening, Fourth month 18. The president, Florence M. Lukens, gave an interesting report of the address of Horace Fletcher, author of "That Last Waif," at the Third month meeting of the Philadelphia Auxiliary of the Mothers' Congress. Horace Fletcher is working for the up-lifting of humanity by the right education of the young, and pleads for social quarantine through the free kindergarten. A committee was appointed at the Auxiliary meeting, which has for its object the establishment of a free kindergarten in each of the six hundred churches of Philadelphia, before the opening of the twentieth century.

The address of the evening was by Dr. James B. Walker, on "Personal Hygiene." Dr. Walker said we are surrounded by an environment which we cannot escape, and by which our bodily condition is affected,—the atmosphere. Some may seek the air that suits their special conditions, but the bread-winner must take it as he finds it. Employers should, for reasons of policy if not humanity, use those appliances which will give a reasonably pure air to their employees. Yet they cannot be greatly blamed, when in public halls and school-rooms so little thought is given to ventilation. The air of occupied rooms is constantly being vitiated, but it will become purified if the outer air is permitted entrance.

Organic poison is found in all houses having modern conveniences of drainage, etc. Bacilli of typhoid, diphtheria, tuberculosis, etc., are generally present, but care and proper ventilation, and isolation of the sick, with due care of diet, etc., will make us proof against them. Bath-room doors must be kept shut and bath-room windows open. Bedrooms should have air from the outside, not from other parts of the house. Typhoid germs may be breathed into the throat and then washed into the blood by pure drinking water.

The sunlight is a great purifier. A working-room into which sunlight does not enter should not be allowed to exist. Heavy curtains not only exclude the light but collect and hold poison. Living-rooms, bed-rooms, nurseries, school-rooms, work-rooms, should be flooded with sunshine. Plants are wholesome in a room in daytime, but their chemical process being reversed they are not good companions at night. Because of the moisture they give off, they are good in sick rooms.

Avoid drafts as you would poison. They bring on catarrhal illness, which attacks the weakest part, and are the foundation of nine-tenths of existing ills.

Those who oppose filtration are opposing nature's method of purification. Drink freely: water is our great solvent; it washes the blood. Do not wash food down before it is masticated, but water taken properly with food is beneficial. A glass of hot water with a pinch of salt is excellent to wash out the mucus of a diseased stomach, but a normal stomach does not need it.

Beware of heavy flannels that are too warm for our heated rooms and warm, unseasonable days. It is better to have lighter underclothing and a variety of weights in outer garments.

Disease is not hereditary, though weakness of condition may be. If there is an inclination to take cold easily, a cold sponge bath each morning will be helpful. If the system is not strong enough to react readily, do not give it to the entire body, but only to the waist, or even confine it to the neck and chest. Avoid drafts, get as much pure air and sunlight as possible, keep the feet dry, and the mind tranquil, and a healthy condition will prevail. W.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

THE marriage certificate of John Sotcher and Mary Lofty, who were married in 1701, and whose wedding was attended by William Penn, (the meeting for the purpose was specially appointed, so he could be present), has recently been found. Persistent search had been made for it by descendants, especially by Jane C. Chace of Valley Falls, R. I., who is a descendant, (she was a Moon, of Bucks county), but unavailingly, until a few weeks ago, a visitor at the rooms in the Washington Headquarters building, at Morristown, N. J., found the certificate among the collections deposited there,—this being quite an inappropriate place of deposit.

John Sotcher was steward at Pennsbury, William Penn's country place, (on the Delaware, above Bristol), and Mary Lofty was the housekeeper. A large family descended from them, though apparently few, if any, are now living named Sotcher. Two daughters married Kirkbrides, and have a long line of descendants in that and other names.

Prof. William L. Pearson, of Penn College, Oskaloosa, Iowa, (Orthodox Friends') who had been East for several months, in the interest of that institution, has returned home, and the American Friend says that "he has succeeded in securing many gifts to the College," and that "his patient work has materially increased its resources," but adds that "Friends do not yet realize the importance of the work," etc.

Prof. Pearson's presentation of the case of the College we heard with interest. It showed how difficult the situation is for such institutions, without adequate endowment. He said, in reply to a question, "Yes; salaries are low, but, worse than that, our resources have been inadequate to punctually pay even the sums promised."

James and Rebecca Pound, of Sparta, Ontario, have recently been lovingly reminded by their friends of the esteem in which they are held. James completed his 81st year on the 25th instant, and Rebecca will be 79, in a few days. Their seven children, all married, are all living, and they themselves have settled into a quiet, retired life, cheerfully active, and interested in the Society of which they are members.

One of their daughters is Tryphena P. Way, whose husband, Henry H. Way, D.D.S., came from eastern Pennsylvania, and is located at St. Thomas, Ontario.

In an address as president of the Women's Christian Temperance Union, at Doylestown, Pa., on the 8th instant, Elizabeth Lloyd searchingly reviewed recent public events, and summed up by saying:

"Under existing circumstances our immediate duty is three fold: to do all in our power to relieve the suffering of Cubans, to protest against the continuance of the war of subjugation in the Philippines, and to teach that under all circumstances and in all climes total abstinence from every form of sin is the best preserver of health."

Dr. William I. Hull, and his wife, of Swarthmore College, are intending to sail early in Sixth month,—a few days before the College Commencement,—for England, to be absent during the summer. Friends will accompany them on the voyage out, and for a time in London.

Beatrice Magill, another of the Swarthmore Faculty, will also spend the vacation abroad. She intends to sail on the 3d of Sixth month, in the Spaaradam, for Rotterdam, and will give some time to art study in Holland.

Rebecca B. Nicholson, of Camden, N. J., who has had large experience in conducting parties on tours, is organizing an extended trip, to start from Philadelphia Sixth month 27, to Southern California, the Yosemite Valley, Oregon, Alaska, etc., returning by the Great Northern Railroad to Minneapolis, and to Philadelphia by Eighth month 15. This will occupy just fifty days. Rebecca says she took out a party, in 1897, "reaching San Francisco only five hours late, when those that were in special trains were that many days late."

Our friend John William Graham writes the INTELLIGENCER from Lynmouth, on the North Devon coast of England, 8th inst., where he has been enjoying the Easter vacation. "We are having holiday on this lovely coast," he says, "and have to-day visited the Doone Valley of Blackmore's story."

COMMUNICATIONS.

DIVERSITY OF OPINION.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

How is it that even amongst us Friends there are quite different views about public affairs? I find some sign of it in the letters printed by the INTELLIGENCER, though most of them are of one mind concerning the question of the Philippines. Newark, N. J. S.

[The essential answer to this question is that the majority of people are influenced by the daily newspaper they read. Most of the papers have been "floating with the current," preferring to be "popular," and so fomenting war movements. For months the facts of the public situation have not been fairly or fully dealt with in the Imperialist dailies. Those who follow them implicitly are of course influenced by them.—EDS.]

AN INTERNATIONAL COURT.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

The war demon dies hard, as some one has expressed it, but is doomed. If the coming Peace Congress at The Hague shall result in the establishment of an International Court for settling differences between nations, it will have met its doom. The world moves. Not only the outward, physical world in its orbit round the sun, but the world of thought and enlightened sentiment, and enlightened sentiment in this late day of the Christian era, can surely devise some means for settling questions without the barbarism of war. There are reasons, besides its inhumanity to man, why it should be entirely abolished. Industries have multiplied, and the individual is of more value to himself and more value to the State. War engenders animosities. Ireland, now treated with leniency, yet remembering former injuries, is not easily pacified. France is waiting for opportunity to regain her lost provinces. We hear of arbitrament by the sword. Such arbitrament does not endure.

Pacific settlements lead to amity and friendship. "Peace has her victories no less renowned than war." May her banners wave until mankind comes to recognize its universal brotherhood. E. AVERILL.

West Vienna, N. Y.

ENDOWMENT FOR LAING SCHOOL.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

The following communication was received by New York's committee on the Education of Colored People, and the Clerk was directed to forward a copy to the INTELLIGENCER.

ANNA M. JACKSON, Clerk.

[The communication follows.]

"After reading, some months ago, Abby Munro's pathetic appeal for an Endowment Fund, it occurred to me, Why could not Friends of the different yearly meetings make a trial, at least, for an endowment fund for the Laing School?

"Knowing the many and increasing calls for help among us, I have hesitated to express my thought until now, when the committee asks for suggestions as well as reports.

"In this effort every meeting should join. Unfortunately many can give but little, but 'many a little makes a muckle,' and this can be an increasing fund each year, until the end is attained.

"I hope we have now a sufficient sum to pay salaries for this year, and in the summer some movement for an endowment might be started.

"The need is so apparent that it is unnecessary to enlarge upon this subject."

For Friends' Intelligencer.

ADDRESS TO THE STARS.

A GORGEOUS sunset crimsoned all the West,
And to the zenith cast its fiery rays.
Then as the evening hour drew gently on,
One by one the shimmering stars lit up the heavens
Till the whole firmament was full of light.

Ye twinkling luminaries, swung in space,
Upheld and guided by a power divine,
Tell me, if in your distant realms afar
Ye hold communion with your sister stars?
Does the same light flash from your distant orb
That show'd to the wise men of Judea
The manger where the infant Christ was born?—
The seed and substance of the living God,
And sent to suffer for the sins of men.
Is there an atmosphere existing there,
And teeming with vitality like ours?
Does man there lord it o'er his fellow-man,
And make, as here, accumulated wealth
The passport to the higher walks of life?
Do war and pestilence invade your sphere,
And storms and earthquakes rock you to the core,
Volcanoes spurt their hissing, seething mass
Of fiery vapor to your very skies,
And shake you up with consternation dire?

Or are ye, twinkling stars, a paradise
For souls, emancipated from the clay,
That soar to distant fields of pleasure there,
And bask forever in eternal joys?
Ye stars, that fill infinity of space,
Boundless, illimitable, none can see,
No mind conceive the vastness of the plan
By which you're guided on your distant course;
There countless stars 'round countless suns revolve,
System on system, countless worlds extend
Through the vast realms of nature's broad expanse;
And the controlling power a Deity.

Strange! that the erring mortal cannot see
The handiwork of God in nature's plan;
That all the parts of a stupendous whole
Are but the working of a master mind
That guides the planets in their mazy flight,
And holds, as in the hollow of His hand,
The destiny of nations and of men.
When night her sable curtain closes 'round,
And worldly cares press on thee as a weight,
Go out beneath the starry canopy,
And hold communion with thy Maker there.

London Grove, Pa.

BENJAMIN W. SWAYNE.

"BENEVOLENT ASSIMILATION!"

Springfield Republican.

To the Editor of The Republican: Our best friends are those who tell us of our faults. Judging from the recent issues of your excellent journal, I think that our common country has the best of reasons, on the principle of the above familiar adage, for reckoning you among its very best friends. You are surely not among those who hesitate, "because the war is upon us," to speak out frankly as to its causes, and our duty to bring it to an end at the earliest possible day. These things being so, you will not surely fear to assume the responsibility of publishing what an interested reader feels it his duty to say of the position of our country in the crisis which is now upon us. I can say this better, at this time, in the words of others than in my own.

A correspondent from abroad, a well-known legal writer, and an American by birth, writes me a long letter, of which it would do the public good, I am sure, to read every word. I give the spirit of it in this quotation: "As to the morality of our present course in the Philippines, it appears to me much like that of a man who should force his way into a house to rescue the householder from a robber, and after beating the robber, knock down the women and children, and bedrudge the householder until he submitted to make him a deed of the house and a transfer of all the rest of his possessions, and give himself and his wife and children into slavery. To complete the parallel, it remains but to imagine this Samaritan on his way home from prayer-meeting, at the time, with his Bible under his arm, and a pious text in his mouth. The private person who should act in this manner we should make no difficulty in disposing of. Nothing he might say about 'manifest destiny,' or 'benevolent assimilation' would avail him." I might quote much more, but will not intrude upon your necessarily limited space, when there is so much, at this time, that sadly needs to be said.

I pass then to the striking lines of another foreign correspondent, whose words will be none the less impressive because expressed in the form of a sonnet:—

"BENEVOLENT ASSIMILATION."

What sacred call hath Freedom's chosen land
With fire and sword to make ten thousand slaves?
To teach the gospel of the Christ who saves,
By dragging prostrate foes with red right hand
Before his shrine? What mission to command
That they do homage to a flag which waves
In lawless conquest o'er their brothers' graves?
How shall these untaught pagans understand
The learned subtleties of clerk and priest,—
That chains can bind in Christian brotherhood!
That those who love God most may spare men least!
That messages of love are writ in blood!
That wars are needful, since we must increase
The power of those who own the Prince of Peace!

OAKES BURLEIGH.

If this is a specimen of the poems of this writer, I bespeak for her great success in the volume now nearly ready for the English press.

Will not my countrymen heed these warning words? Will they continue, through greed and lust of conquest (but thinly veiled under the hypocritical pretense of the propagation of our Christian faith), to turn a deaf ear to the earnest, entreating voices of the best and most thoughtful statesmen of our country, and the stirring appeals of the poets and prose writers on both sides of the sea! EDWARD H. MAGILL.

Swarthmore, Pa., Fourth month 2.

A PLEA FOR THE FEET.

Harper's Bazar.

THERE is scarcely any part of the body as sensitive and appreciative as the feet, but, like the English "slavey" or lodging-house drudge, they are always "put upon" and never complain. They are really just as tender as the hands, though, having been covered from infancy with hard leather and ill-fitting hose, they have grown used to limited space and care. The bones are very delicate and beautiful, the pores very large and absorbent, and the whole surface full of nerves.

They should be kept, nails and all, as clean and soft as the hands, then the skin would seldom harden into uncomfortable thicknesses.

A dainty little lady of fifty years declares that her fresh complexion and bright eyes are due partially to well-kept feet. "I never let them get cold, for that chills the whole body. I have knitted slippers for night use over the floor, and take plenty of exercise every day, with deep breathing, and warm under-clothing, especially below the waist-line. Then I wash them every night in plenty of warm water, and rub them with witch-hazel or alcohol; sometimes I give them a bath of cold water and sea-salt, always drying with brisk friction. I used to have corns. How do you think I cured them? By dancing. I danced them away; for a poor circulation causes corns oftener than tight shoes. I rub my feet with vaseline at least once a week, and change my stockings every other day." Stockings can be washed with soap and hot water very quickly, but should always be dried in the sun, never in a sleeping-room over night, as many people do. It is most unhygienic.

Most women walk on their heels, and physical culturists lecture till weary about the ugly protuberant abdomens, displaced viscera, and strained nerves. The cause lies in the tight, narrow-toed, high-heeled shoes to which women have been slaves since the time of the Crusades. It hurts to walk properly, unless all corns are removed, smooth stockings assumed, and broad-toed shoes worn from that moment on. A badly darned stocking is like a tack in the shoe. Weak ankles should be rested every day by placing a pillow over the instep as one lies face downwards on a lounge. Salt and water massage is good, and one gymnasium teacher advises walking, whenever possible, upon tip-toes; this can be done in one's room or when working about the house.

Very soon, with rest, exercise, cleanliness, and cosmetic care, these patient little slaves, which we systematically neglect, although we depend so much on them, will reward us with renewed strength.

CHICAGO has one policeman to every 701 of population, Pittsburgh one to 720, St. Louis one to 784, San Francisco one to 627, Philadelphia one to 625, Boston one to 417, and old New York one to 398.

WHEN THE SUN DIES OUT.

OUR sun is now a yellow star similar to Capella, and hence it will eventually become bluish-white like Sirius and Vega, says Professor T. J. J. See in the Atlantic Monthly. The secular shrinkage of the sun's radius will cause a steady rise in its temperature, and when the body has reached the stage of Sirius, where the temperature is perhaps doubled, the light emitted will become intensely blue. The temperature may be expected to go on rising till a small radius is attained, and finally when the dense mass, intensely hot, becomes incapable of further shrinkage, on account of increase in the molecular forces resisting condensation, a cooling will gradually ensue, after which the body will liquefy and then rapidly decline in splendor. The sun will thenceforth be wrapped in everlasting darkness, and the chill of death will overtake the planetary system. A condition of darkness thus follows close upon a period of intense brilliancy, and hence the obscurity of such bodies as the companions of Sirius, Procyon, and Algol. The most obscure satellites are thus associated with some of the brightest and most intensely luminous stars in our sky; and here the smaller of the two masses, as in the case of the planets of the solar system, have developed most rapidly.

In view of this approaching extinction of the sun's activity, it becomes a matter of interest to inquire how long its heat will sustain life upon the earth. Though it is difficult to submit the subject to accurate computation, it is easy to see that the exhaustion of the sun's light and heat certainly will not occur for several hundred thousand, and perhaps not for several million years. Thus the ultimate doom of our system need occasion no anxiety among those now living, but the result is philosophically interesting to those who look several million years into the future.

As experiment has shown that the sun's vertical rays falling continuously upon terrestrial ice would melt a layer three centimetres in thickness per day, it follows that a similar shell of ice would form over the earth in case the sun's light and heat were cut off; thus in a month the whole earth would be frozen like the polar regions, and only the deeper bodies of water, containing a great amount of heat, would remain in a liquid state. The oceans themselves would freeze over within a few years at the latest, and the winds and even the tides would cease to agitate the terrestrial globe, which would henceforth spin in its orbit as a rigid lifeless mass.

THE Queen of Italy, says a gossip, weighs 176 pounds; Queen Victoria, 171 pounds; the Queen of Spain, 147 pounds; the Queen of Belgium, 143 pounds; the German Empress, 136 pounds; the Queen of Portugal, 132 pounds, and the Czarina of Russia, 129 pounds.

"A NOTABLE evidence of the growth of temperance sentiment in connection with armies," says a leading Methodist journal, "is the announcement that the Grand Duke Vladimir has issued an order prohibiting the sale of brandy in the regiments of the Russian army."

STATISTICS show that there have been 250,000 deaths from the bubonic plague recorded in India during the past two years. The total is believed to be greater than this, as the natives are known to have concealed many deaths.

THE CONSCRIPTION IN EUROPE.

THE Economist, of London, one of the most thoughtful of the English newspapers, recently had an article on the continental armaments, which no one can read without dismay. The writer calls attention to the steady and enormous increase in the armies and navies of Europe. Within the present year an immense addition to the armies of both Germany and Russia is proposed. There is always some weak point which has to be strengthened, some designing neighbor whose force has to be equalled. But more alarming than the increase of force is, the Economist says, the increasing power and importance of what is called "the general staff," that is, the small group of officers who are in control of each army, and arrogate to themselves exclusive knowledge of what force and what measures are necessary for the defence of the country, and begin to treat the civil power with a certain contempt. Illustrations of this are best seen in France in the Dreyfus affair, but they may be found everywhere. In Germany popular liberty has already been practically suppressed by the military power. The Economist says:

"The 'staffs' are perpetually advising for sound reasons increases in the proportion of artillery and cavalry, both of them very expensive arms; they ask for new barracks or fortifications, and they suggest improvements in diet and equipment. More officers, too, and non-commissioned officers are needed for more men, short service implies strenuous work, which soon exhausts equipments, and behind all these sources of an outlay which bewilders the treasuries, there is another, sometimes more expensive than all. Scientific discovery never ceases, some one is always inventing more rapid cannon, or machine-guns which will pour more bullets, or a rifle which will fire fifteen shots while the old one fires twelve, and the moment the new weapons are proved and tested satisfactorily they have to be accepted. If not, the Power which does accept them may master the whole continent, for soldiers, however brave, will not stand to be shot down in masses by superior machines, to which their own machines can make no adequate reply. The Dervishes are among the bravest men in the world, but the slaughter caused by British Maxims and rifles cowed even them, and European soldiers in this respect are not more staunch than Arabs. There seems, indeed, to be no limit to the expenditure except the positive exhaustion of the treasuries, and if these huge armies are determined to spend all revenue upon their own organization, that may be a long way off yet, for, though economists suspect, they do not yet know, where the productive limit of taxation is."

The writer adds that in his belief the peace proposals of the Czar will be more seriously discussed at the coming conference than most people imagine, and that a vigorous effort in the direction of disarmament may result from it.

THE streets of Havana, it is represented, are less dirty than they were under Spanish rule. Franklin Matthews writes to Harper's Weekly, that they are "as clean as those of New York City under the Tammany regime."

Czar's Response to American Addresses.

A WASHINGTON despatch, (18th inst.), says the Secretary of State has made public the following note, addressed to him by Count Cassini, the Russian ambassador:

Russian Embassy, Washington, D. C., April 17, 1889.—Mr. Secretary of State: Since the publication of the circular of the 12th of August of last year, which his Excellency Count Mouravieff, addressed to the representatives of the foreign Powers accredited at St. Petersburg, numerous evidences of grateful recognition have come from the United States to his Majesty, the Emperor, my august master, in the form of addresses, letters, and telegrams.

His Majesty the Emperor of Russia, is pleased to see in the unanimity of the sentiments which attend the courteous acquiescence of all the Governments in taking part in the conference of The Hague an additional pledge for the success of efforts tending to cause the growth of the fruitful principle of universal peace in the mind and in the public life of all nations.

Deeply affected by the expressions which have reached him from the United States, and which prove how completely the ideas of peace, founded upon the development of the moral and material well being of the peoples, find a warm response in this great country, his Majesty the Emperor, has deigned to charge me to convey his most sincere thanks to all those who have sent his Imperial Majesty the expression of their sentiments with regard to so highly a humanitarian achievement.

In hastening to fulfill this order of my august master, I beg your Excellency to be pleased to accept the assurance of my highest consideration. C. CASSINI.

Married Five Times.

THE Smyrna (Del.) Times reports the death of an old lady, in her 91st year, who had been five times married, her fifth husband surviving. It says (19th inst.):

"Mrs. S. E. Mustard, wife of Captain John Mustard, died on Friday, after a long illness, in the 91st year of her age. She was in every way a worthy woman, whose virtues were best known at home; kind in her bearing and religious in her temperament.

"Her maiden name was Jester, born and reared in the vicinity of Milford. Her first husband was named Ryland, who died a young man, her second, Mr. Beauchamp at Odessa, who died in early life. Subsequently to this she became the wife of Robert Palmatory, who was considerably her senior. Captain John Eaton, who had moved from his farm in West Kenton hundred to Smyrna was the next one to seek her hand to make his home happy, but he only lived a few years. Twenty-five years ago she became the wife of Captain John Mustard, and was in every way a worthy companion.

"The last several years she was subject to considerable affliction. It is rare for two persons to reach such an advanced age as they, he [her husband] being between three and four years her senior."

Covered Buttons.

Harper's Bazar.

THE first maker of covered buttons was Mrs. Samuel Williston, of East Hampton, Massachusetts. In early life her husband prepared for the ministry, but his eyesight failing, he was compelled to give up all study and support himself. He opened a general country store, and his wife gave a great deal of attention to a notion-counter. One winter day, in 1826, she was sorting her stock, when it suddenly occurred to her to cover some of the wooden buttons, then in general use, with cloth. They attracted much attention among the customers of the little shop, and were finally known to all the neighboring towns, and became very popular. Williston and his wife contrived machinery to do the work, the first ever employed in America. An immense factory sprang up, and made half the covered buttons of the world, and Williston died worth several millions. And the source of all this wealth originated with a bright New England woman.

The Armenian Want.

It is distressing to hear that the misery of the Armenians continues, in many places, acutely. The English Friends' committee continue to call attention to extreme cases, and we suppose they still send some funds forward. In a leaflet, a few days ago, they print a letter from a missionary at Bitlis, R. M. Cole, dated 18th of Second month, last. He says a number of people have died literally of starvation.

"I learn from the deacon of our church here in Bitlis that his own brother-in-law, Simon Avedissian, died from starvation this last week, and his aged mother went in the same way only a few days before.

"Simon had been a successful shoemaker in Constantinople for years; but, like thousands of others, was exiled from that city to this, his native city, where for these two years he has tried to eke out an existence, though if he got work at all he could make only a piaster (about 4 cents) a day, in place of living as a master workman at the capital. Not able to pay rent, he had to take up this cold corner, and that until death seemed their only portion. I was impatient with our deacon that he had said nothing to us about it, since my arrival from America, so we might have saved them. The deacon now tells how he kept doing for them, so far as his ability would permit, whenever he knew their special straits. Sometimes he has sought to take up a contribution in the market, but so modest and shrinking was the man, he would put a stop to it if he could.

"It seems when his mother was buried, he too was so faint from want of food it was a wonder two deaths instead of one had not resulted at the same time. He could not go to the funeral, but only spoke of being ill, while in fact he was on the verge of starvation and died shortly afterwards, leaving a wife and daughter of nine years, and a baby boy of seven months."

Canvassing for Marriages.

INTERESTING testimony as to the attitude held by some clergymen regarding the marriage ceremony, says the New York Evening Post, was given recently at a legislative hearing in Milwaukee, on a bill to require the procurement of a license by parties desiring to be married, with a provision that five days must elapse between the granting of the license and the performing of the marriage ceremony, during which time the license must remain on file. The latter provision is intended to prevent the hasty marriage in Wisconsin of runaway couples from other States, who cross the States boundary line to escape the restrictions of marriage laws elsewhere.

These incursions of brides and grooms are very large, according to the Registrar of Vital Statistics of Milwaukee. In that city alone last year 1,700 couples from States other than Wisconsin were married, and of these 1,600 came from Chicago. To capture the fees attending these marriages there is much rivalry among some of the Milwaukee clergymen. The Registrar said that the ministers divide with the carriage-drivers the fees they receive, and that he had been offered money to send couples to certain ministers to be married. The son of one of these marrying clergymen volunteered testimony that his father was accustomed to marry many people, and had left cards at the hotels and on the excursion-boats. He could see no wrong in that practice, nor in the custom of tipping the drivers who brought couples to the house. It was done in all cities, he said.

Only We Genteel.

T. W. HIGGINSON, writing in Harper's Bazar, discusses the tendency to take a narrow, neighborhood view of the good manners and good standing of other people.

"In that very amusing book of English reminiscence, 'Collections and Recollections,' a country woman describing a city lodger who had seen better days, said, 'I am positive she was a real born lady, for it took her hours to peel her potatoes'; while a witness at the trial of a London swindler, said that he 'had always regarded the man as a perfect gentleman because he had rooms at the Langham and dined with the Lord Mayor.' Mr. Cecil Rhodes would now aim far higher than Lord Mayors and Langham Hotels, and he has certainly peeled his own potatoes very well by all accounts; yet the phrase "English gentleman" is still of dubious application in his case. Even Mr. [Philip Gilbert] Hamerton, who uses the word with much professed liberality, could hardly include him in his definition.

"Mr. Hamerton, it will be remembered, could not quite agree with Dr. Thomas Arnold, who could find no gentlemen in Europe, outside of England; for he graciously admits that there may be half a dozen or so, since he himself has known nearly that number. 'There was much truth,' he says, 'in his [Dr. Arnold's] observation. It was not quite absolutely true. I have known two or three Italian officers and one Savoyard, and a Frenchman here and there, who were as perfect gentlemen as any to be found in England, but they were isolated like poets, and were, in fact, poets in behavior and self-discipline.'

"Mr. Hamerton was not remarkable for his sense of humor, and he undoubtedly felt himself to be uttering, in these words, a very handsome disclaimer in behalf of his nation. To an American it looks otherwise. It is as if one should say: 'It is not quite absolutely true that all the honest men live on my side of the street. There are as many as two or three, on the other side, who have never, so far as I know, picked a pocket.'"

Cost of Living in England.

IT costs more to live in England, unless you live poorly, Julian Ralph says, in Harper's Magazine, than in this country. He proceeds:

"Living, in a word, is cheaper for the English poor than for our own, and dearer for the well-to-do than in America, because there are here two standards of living. The unit of value for the well-to-do in England is the sovereign, or the five-dollar piece, whereas our American unit of value in housekeeping and practical affairs is a dollar. The unit of value with the English poor is a sliding standard that runs from a penny down to a farthing, just as in America it is a nickel.

"No American of middle circumstances who has made his home in London will dispute my statement that it costs more to keep a family there than it does at home. Men's clothing, wines and liquors, servants, flowers, and a very few minor articles are cheaper in England, but these advantages are offset by the higher cost of all other necessities. The cheapest cut of beef is twenty-five cents a pound, the best fish sell for as high as fifty cents a pound, butter is thirty cents a pound, coffee is forty cents, strawberries never go lower than eight or ten cents a basket, and good small fruits generally are very much dearer. Peaches are a quarter of a dollar apiece, milk is eight cents a quart, cream is fifty cents a quart, oysters fetch a dollar to a dollar and a half a dozen, bread is about as cheap as at home, loin of pork is twenty-five cents a pound, the cheaper mutton (from New Zealand) is twenty cents a pound, and English mutton fetches seven cents more.

"These are all West End prices, but they are not high prices. They are the quotations of a very careful buyer."

CURRENT EVENTS.

SOME stirring events were reported from the Philippines, last week, after our report closed. On the 12th (reported 18th), a party of men from the gunboat Yorktown, fifteen in number, in charge of Lieut. J. C. Gilmore, were captured by the Filipinos. They had gone to Baler, on the east coast of the island of Luzon, for the purpose of rescuing and bringing away the Spanish garrison there (consisting of eighty soldiers, three officers, and two priests), but on landing were surrounded and taken prisoners. Their subsequent fate is as yet unknown.

On the 20th instant, a force of about 200 Filipinos attacked the outposts of one of the United States volunteer regiments (that from the State of Washington), near Taguig, but were "compelled to retire," with severe loss. On the 21st another fight occurred, the South Dakota regiment being engaged. "The heat is intense," the dispatch said, "and there were several prostrations among the troops."

On the 23d, a detachment of the 4th United States Cavalry was sent to reconnoitre east of Malolos, and encountered the Filipinos. Reinforcements were sent, and the engagement became bloody, it being reported "the most severe and desperately contested that has occurred since the fighting with the Filipinos began. It is known that the American loss was eight men killed and forty-three wounded." Amongst the killed was the colonel of the Nebraska regiment, John M. Stotsenburg. He was the son of Judge John M. Stotsenburg, of Indiana (a friend of Peace and Arbitration), and grandson of the late Evan C. Stotsenburg, of Wilmington, Del.

Further active movements by the United States troops, with severe fighting, and loss, are reported since the above.

THE desire of the volunteer troops serving in the Philippines, (whose time is now out, under the terms of their enlistment), to come home, is general. An absurd report was circulated in some of the "Jingo" newspapers, (especially the New York Sun, which is very violent), that they had been urged to this by a "plot" in the United States. General Otis has cabled that he has no evidence of any "plot." Many letters are published in the Western and Southern newspapers from the men, saying they wish to return. A member of the Tennessee regiment, Crandall, whose letter is published in a Memphis paper, says: "We all want to come home very bad. If I ever get out of this army I will never get into another. They will be fighting 400 years, and then never whip these people, for there are not enough of us to follow them up." The writer concludes by saying, "the people of the United States ought to raise a howl and have us sent home."

THE trial of United States Senator Quay was concluded on the 20th instant, somewhat suddenly, the defense not offering any testimony. The jury was out about twenty hours, and returned on the 21st with a verdict of acquittal. Governor Stone immediately gave him the appointment of United States Senator, to fill the vacancy caused by the failure of the Legislature to elect. The United States Senate, in similar cases, in recent years, has refused to seat Senators so appointed, the last case, that of Corbett, of Oregon, in 1898, by a non-partisan vote of 50 to 19. The clause of the Constitution authorizing the Governor to fill vacancies refers to such as occur "by resignation or otherwise, during the recess of the Legislature."

THE Governor of California, Gage, announces that he has appointed "Dan" Burns United States Senator to the seat vacated by Senator Stephen M. White. This is a case like that of Quay, in Pennsylvania, the California Legislature having failed to make election. It is now said that the Governors of Delaware and Utah, who are both Democrats, will make appointments from these States, their cases being the same, and there will be two of each party before the Senate, when it assembles next winter.

It was announced, last week, that Thomas B. Reed, of Maine, for some time Speaker of the United States House of Representatives, had determined to retire from Congress, and take up the practice of law in New York City. The reason assigned most prominently is his wish to accumulate an estate; he is to have, it is said, a guaranteed income of $50,000 a year, in the law firm of Simpson, Thacher & Barnum. The Washington correspondent of the Boston Transcript says the true reason for his retirement from public affairs is his disapproval of the course of the Administration, especially with regard to Expansion, and his unwillingness to further occupy a position of so great responsibility, while this policy prevails.

THE cessation of active war operations in Cuba has permitted a partial resumption of industry. The sugar crop for 1899 is officially estimated at 307,903 English tons, against a total for 1898 of 232,032 tons. The tobacco crop is said to be of good quality, and more abundant than for two years past. The money, $3,000,000, given from the United States Treasury, in response to the demands of the Cuban "troops," is about to be disbursed, and it is believed that many of them will go back to peaceful pursuits, though many, it is feared, will not.

THE Assembly of New York, on the 23d inst., passed the Senate Anti-trust bill by a vote of 105 to 2. The purpose of the bill is to prevent monopolies in articles or commodities of common use, and to prohibit restraints of trade and commerce. It provides penalties for violations of the provisions of the act, and directs procedure to enable the Attorney-General to procure testimony in relation to such violations.

THE law passed by the Pennsylvania Legislature two years ago (April 12, 1897), known as the "Direct Inheritance Tax Law," was decided to be unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of the State, on the 22d inst. The case involved was that of the estate of Marmaduke C. Cope, of Philadelphia, who died Ninth month 5, 1897, his executor's account showing an estate of $917,519.88. The court holds the law unconstitutional because it exempts estates of $5,000 and under from tax, this being an "inequality."

THE jury at Charleston, S. C., in the United States Court, trying the party of men who set fire to the postmaster's house at Lake City, and shot him and his family, could not agree, and were discharged, on the 22d instant, after being out twenty-four hours. In dismissing the jury, Judge Brawley was moved to tears, as he referred to the crime. The case goes over to the next term of court for retrial.

Judge Brawley is a one-armed man, a veteran of the "Confederate" army. He directed the trial with courage and fairness.

SEVERAL lynching cases of peculiar savagery have occurred. At Newman, Georgia, on the 23d (First-day), "in the presence of nearly 2,000 people," a negro, Sam Hose was "burned at the stake." Before the torch was applied his ears were cut off, and he was otherwise mutilated; "before the body was cool, it was cut to pieces, and the bones crushed into small bits." He had killed a woman, Mrs. Cranford, and was charged with criminal assault upon her. The same night, or next morning, another colored man, Elijah Strickland, "a preacher," was hung, near the same place by a crowd, and his body also mutilated. He was charged with complicity with Hose, but strenuously declared his innocence.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

A DISPATCH from London on the 22d says: "Dr. James Martineau, the venerable Unitarian minister and scholar, yesterday celebrated his ninety-fourth birthday. He hopes to be able to attend, as he has been wont to do for many years, the opening of the Royal Academy. Though feeble in body, his mind continues alert to everything. It is an illustration, perhaps, of the growing toleration of the most misunderstood and most hated of English sects, that even the established church journals join in congratulations to Dr. Martineau."

—Edward Atkinson, of Boston, the well-known statistician and writer, recently announced that he had not been able to secure a copy of "Senate Document No. 62." This is the official publication that contains dispatches relating to Philippine affairs. It appears to be withheld from the public. The Springfield, Mass., Republican says it was only able to get a copy, "through the persistence of an agent who camped on the trail of the Commission on public documents, and announced his intention of staying there until one was forthcoming."

GOVERNOR William Amos Poynter, of Nebraska, is known about his home as the "farmer governor," owing to his having spent twenty-one years in tilling the rich prairie soil.

WITH a population of 5,500,000, London has every day 120,000 strangers. Some may remain a week, some a month, but all the year around there is an average of 120,000 visitors who are within the metropolitan boundaries.

NOTICES.

* * The Committee on Philanthropic Labor of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends will meet in the meeting-house, 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, Seventh-day, Fourth month 29, 1899, at 1.30 o'clock p. m.

The sub-committees meeting as follows:

The Indian, in Room No. 2, at 10 a. m.

Peace and Arbitration, in Room No. 3, at 10 a. m.

Colored People, Race Street meeting-house, at 10 a. m.

Improper Publications, in Room No. 4, at 10 a. m.

Purity, in Room No. 3, at 9 a. m.

Women and Children, in Room No. 5, at 9 a. m.

Temperance and Tobacco, in Room No. 1, at 11 a. m.

Educational and Publication Committee, in Room No. 1, at 9.30 a. m.

Legislation Committee, in Race Street Parlor, at 10 a. m.

JAMES H. ATKINSON, } Clerks.
ELEANOR K. RICHARDS, }

* * Communications intended for Women's Branch of New York Yearly Meeting may be addressed to me at Chappaqua, New York, care of Robert S. Haviland. EMILY P. YEO.

* * Westbury Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee has arranged for a Conference to be held in the meeting-house, East 15th street and Rutherford Place, New York, on Seventh-day, the 29th, at 3 p. m., to be addressed by Dr. Lyman Abbott.

Subject, "The Disarmament Conference."

HARRY A. HAWKINS, } Clerks.
MARY W. ALBERTSON, }

* * A Conference under the care of the Philanthropic Committee of Philadelphia Yearly and Bucks Quarterly Meetings will be held in the meeting-house at Makefield, Bucks county, Pa., on First-day, Fourth month 30, 1899, at 3 p. m.

The meeting will be addressed by Prof. F. H. Green. Subject, "Temperance."

All are respectfully invited to attend.

On behalf of Committee.

SUSANNA RICH, Clerk.

* * The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor, will be held in the meeting-house at Middletown, on First-day, Fourth month 30, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. William W. Birdsall is expected to address the meeting on the subject, "Literature, and its Influence on Character." CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

* * The following compose the Committee to assist in securing homes for strangers in attendance at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting:

Charles E. Thomas, 868 N. 26th street.

Tamar Hartley, 1511 Swain street.

Martha D. Hough, 1340 Spruce street.

Matilda K. Lobb, 1702 N. 18th street.

Sarah L. Haines, 1513 Marshall street.

Joseph M. Truman, Jr., 1500 Race street.

Rebecca B. Comly, 1529 Centennial avenue.

* * The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has arranged for the following meetings during Fourth month:

30. Sandy Spring, Md.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

* * The Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches will attend meetings as follows:

FOURTH MONTH:

30. Fairhill, 3.30 p. m.

FIFTH MONTH:

21. Merion, 10.30 a. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY

Pittsburgh.

BEYMER-BAUMAN

Pittsburgh.

DAVIS-CHAMBERS

Pittsburgh.

FAINESTOCK

Pittsburgh.

ANOROS } Cincinnati.

ROKSTEIN }

ATLANTIC }

BRADLEY }

BROOKLYN } New York.

JEWETT }

ULSTER }

UNION }

SOUTHERN } Chicago.

SHIPMAN }

COLLIER }

MISSOURI } St. Louis.

RED SEAL }

SOUTHERN }

JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO

Philadelphia.

MORLEY

Cleveland.

SALEM

Salem, Mass.

CORNELL

Buffalo.

KENTUCKY

Louisville.

THE truth of the matter is, there are so many mixtures of Zinc, Barytes, Whiting, etc., sold under misleading brands of "White Lead" and "Pure White Lead," that in order to obtain Pure White Lead it is absolutely necessary to make sure that the brand is right.

Those named in the margin are genuine.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

* * First-day evening meeting to-morrow will be at 35th street and Lancaster Avenue, at 7.30 o'clock. The company of Friends generally is invited, and that they extend an invitation to others.

* * A Circular Meeting, under the care of a Committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting, will be held at Chichester, Delaware county, Pa., on First-day, Fifth month 7, 1899, at 3 o'clock. MARY P. HARVEY, Clerk.

* * The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has made the following appointments for Fifth month:

7. Woodlawn, Virginia.
14. Huntingdon and Eastland, Pa.
21. Pipe Creek, Md.
26. Deer Creek, Md.
28. Broad Creek, Md.

On behalf of the Committee.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

LAST TOUR TO OLD POINT COMFORT, RICHMOND, AND WASHINGTON UNDER PERSONAL ESCORT.

The last six-day personally-conducted tour to Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington via the Pennsylvania Railroad will leave New York and Philadelphia on Seventh-day, Fourth month 29.

Tickets, including transportation, meals en route in both directions, transfers of passengers and baggage, hotel accommodations at Old Point Comfort, Richmond, and Washington, and carriage ride about Richmond will be sold at rate of $34.00 from New York, Brooklyn, and Newark; $32.50 from Trenton; $31.00 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other stations.

OLD POINT COMFORT ONLY.

Tickets to Old Point Comfort only, including luncheon on going trip, one and three-fourths days' board at that place, and good to return direct by regular trains within six days, will be sold in connection with this tour at rate of $15.00 from New York; $13.50 from Trenton; $12.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

LAST PERSONALLY-CONDUCTED TOUR TO WASHINGTON VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The last of the present series of Pennsylvania Railroad three-day personally-conducted tours to Washington, D. C., will be run on the 11th of next month (May). The rate, $14.50 from New York, $11.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points, includes transportation, hotel accommodations, and Capitol guide fees. An experienced Chaperon will also accompany the party.

For itineraries, tickets, and full information, apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

GETTYSBURG, LURAY, AND WASHINGTON.

PERSONALLY-CONDUCTED TOUR VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged for a five-day Personally-Conducted Tour to Gettysburg, Luray, and Washington on Fifth month 6. A full day will be spent at Gettysburg, three hours at Luray, affording ample time to make the tour of the wonderful caverns, and two days at Washington.

The party will be under the guidance of one of the company's experienced tourist agents. A chaperon, whose especial charge will be unescorted ladies, will also accompany the party throughout. Round-trip tickets, including transportation for the round trip, hotel accommodations at Gettysburg and carriage drive over the battlefield, luncheon, transfer, and admission to the Luray Caverns, luncheon, transfer, and hotel accommodations at Washington, and dinner going and supper returning, at Broad Street Station in connection with tickets from Trenton and points east thereof, will be sold at the extremely low rate of $25 from New York, $24 from Trenton, $22 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points.

For itineraries and full information apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad Street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Phila.

A POSTAL CARD RECEIVES PROMPT ATTENTION.
JOHN S. CONRAD,
LAUNDRY,

2103, 2105 COLUMBIA AVENUE, PHILA.

It Takes Longer....

TO REACH THE BOTTOM OF A BARREL OF

FRANKLIN MILLS FLOUR,

A Fine Flour of the Entire Wheat, because it nourishes as it goes, and being rich in brain, bone, nerve and muscle making substances of the entire wheat, less of it is required. It is a little off white—that's where the richness lies, in its tint.

If your grocer does not keep it, send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied.

See that the Flour delivered bears our label; avoid substitutes.

Send for Booklet.

The genuine made only by the Franklin Mills Co., Lockport, N. Y.

THE VIEWS OF FRIENDS.

Tracts and Leaflets for Circulation.

QUAKERISM: ITS BELIEFS AND MESSAGES. By William Edward Turner (Editor of the British Friend). 40 pp. 10 cents. 5 copies, 40 cents. By mail at these prices.

THE MEETING FOR WORSHIP. By Howard M. Jenkins. Small pamphlet. 12 pp. Single copies, 2 cents; 50 copies, 50 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

RELIGIOUS VIEWS OF FRIENDS. By Howard M. Jenkins. (Chicago Congress Paper, 1893.) 24 pp. 2 cents; 50 copies, 75 cents; 100 copies, $1.00. By mail at these prices.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER ASSOCIATION
Limited,
921 Arch Street, Phila.

The Dinner Pail

is a little 8-page monthly, published by "Silent Workers," an incorporated company of Friends, in the interest of helpful educational work they are doing for the world. Character-building is their aim; "Others" is their motto. Annual subscription 25 cents; stamps will do. Can you spare this much for "others," or send postal for sample copy. Address "Silent Workers," 934-936 Harrison street, San Francisco, Cal., U. S. A.

"The Dinner Pail will be whatever its friends make it," writes an interested Friend.

John C. Hancock & Co.,

N. W. Cor. 9th and Master Sts.
(P. & R. R. R.)

DEALERS IN BEST GRADES OF

LEHIGH AND COAL FREE BURNING Telephone Connection.

AQUILA J. LINVILL,

Dealer in Choice Lehigh Coal
1827 North 10th Street, Philadelphia.

Please mention FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, when answering Advertisements in it. This is of value to us and to the advertisers.

"SOME students one day disjoined ten or a dozen bugs of different kinds," says Dr. Munhall, "and then artistically constructed one bug out of parts of all the others. The professor of natural history in the university was old and quite near-sighted. They placed their bug on a table, and calling him in, said:

"Professor, we have made a most extraordinary find! Here is a bug, the like of which we have never seen or heard about. Can you tell us what it is?"

"The professor, adjusting his glasses, took a look, and then said, 'Young gentlemen, this is a humbug.'"

SIR William Long tells a story of an old Scotch body who could not abide long sermons. She was hobbling out of the kirk one Sunday when a coachman, who was waiting for his people, asked her, "Is the minister dune wi' his sermon?" "He was dune lang syne," said the old lady, impatiently, "but he wauna stop!" [Exchange.]

A PATRIOT in Kansas, willing to sacrifice himself, is said to have written the following letter to Governor Stanley: "Dear Sir: I understand you said you was going to take a week off and tear up the big pile of letters written you asking for jobs. If everything else is gone, I would like a job tearing up the letters."

UP-TO-DATE.—"We are going to have the most realistic missionary sermon at our church next Sunday." "Indeed." "Yes, indeed. The church is to be decorated with rifles and Gatlings."—[Indianapolis Journal.]

A COMMISSION appointed to investigate railroads in Wisconsin reported that, with one exception, the dining and buffet car service was not a paying investment.

NOW READY

The Family of William Penn
Founder of Pennsylvania
Ancestry and Descendants

By Howard M. Jenkins.

AUTHOR OF VOLUME ONE, MEMORIAL HISTORY OF PHILADELPHIA, HISTORICAL COLLECTIONS
RELATING TO GWYNEDD, ETC.

THIS work presents the results of a careful collation of known authorities, consultation of the Friends' records in Great Britain and Ireland, and an examination of the now-unequalled Collections of Penn Papers in the Library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia.

Some of the information gathered is to be found in fragmentary form in some scores of printed works, many of them rare, but a large part has been drawn from the family letters. These letters, unprinted until used by the Author in the preparation of this work, are necessarily unique.

Apart from any literary merit or demerit, the work is a systematic and practically complete statement of the Ancestry and Posterity of WILLIAM PENN, the Founder, and as such must have a definite and permanent value in the lists of Biography and Genealogy.

*Pp. 270, octavo. 19 full-page illustrations. Handsomely bound. $3.50 net. By mail, 20 cents additional.
*The print is from type, and copies are likely to be scarce.

HOWARD M. JENKINS
PUBLISHER

921 ARCH ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.
Headley Brothers, 14 Bishopsgate St., Without, London.

Hanscoms'. Our prices are the lowest, our quality as near perfect as can be had. Shall we mail you a price catalogue for comparison?
No liquor or other offensive goods or methods resorted to.
1311 Market St., Phila.

Macbeth lamp-chimneys—more light and don't break.

Can't you get 'em?

What's your dealer say about 'em?

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Ellwood Heacock,

UNDERTAKER
and EMBALMER

ESTABLISHED 1860.

TELEPHONE 5807.

1313 Vine Street, Philad'a.

Calls outside of city answered promptly.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY MILK.

CONSHOHOCKEN Special attention given to serving
DAIRIES. families. Office 603 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Penna.

JOSEPH L. JONES.

Swarthmore.

For rent or sale, Queen Anne Cottage, 12 rooms, steam heat, and open fire grates. The location is very delightful, directly overlooking the athletic grounds of the College, and very close to the meeting-house; one acre of ground, and plenty of fruit. Apply to DAVID SCANNELL, 814 Arch Street.

LIZZIE J. LAMBERT,

Successor to E. SHOEMAKER,

Millinery. 533 NORTH ELEVENTH STREET,
Philadelphia.

CAROLINE RAU, 736 Spring Garden St.,
Philadelphia.

Plain Millinery

MEDIUM FELTS AND STRAW BONNETS.

JENNIE S. MARSHALL,

INSTRUCTOR IN PIANOFORTE,
1614 Tioga St., Phila.

CHARLES BURTON,

Practical House and Sign Painter,

Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, }

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to.

CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

JOSEPH T. FOULKE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

OFFICES: { 623 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.
{ Ambler, Montgomery Co., Pa.

JOHN FABER MILLER,

325 SWEDEN STREET, NORRISTOWN, PENNA.

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practicing in Montgomery and Philadelphia counties.

M. L. PHILIBERT,
French Steam Dyer, Scourer,
AND DRY CLEANER.

Cleaning of Blankets and Lace Curtains
a specialty.

210 S. EIGHTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Branch Office, 727 South Second Street.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844. }
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 6, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
{ Number 18.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XVIII.

"THE care of this world," with its distrust, unthankfulness, and anxious forebodings, is a canker-worm that eats into the very vitals of the soul.

From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, Advices on Liberty and Benevolence.

REGRET.

As one should lightly rugged ways descend,
O'er trailing, tangled vine and hidden snare,
And in her arms a brimming jar should bear,
Till quick mis-step half of its wealth should spend
On barren rocks, and evermore should bend
Her long regretful glances back to where Her treasure so was lost, with little care
For what was left, or where her steps might tend,—
So thou, O Heart! who mournest waters sweet,
Thy cup hast wasted in unheeded ways;
Who gropest onward, turning wistful gaze
Forever back, unguiding still thy feet,
Though over treacherous path thy footstep strays,
And ever grows thy treasure's waste complete.

—Annie Steger Winston, in S. S. Times.

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.¹

FOR nearly twenty summers the grass has grown green upon a low mound in a quiet corner of the Friends' burial-ground at Lincoln, Virginia. The spreading branches of a stately oak protect it from the summer's heat, and afford shelter for the song-birds of the south-land, who sing a requiem over this

"low green tent
Whose curtain never outward swings."

A plain head-stone with a simple record reveals the fact that all that was mortal of Samuel M. Janney was here hidden from our sight, after an earthly pilgrimage of nearly eighty years.

To us who are nearing the "border land," and who were privileged to know him here, the memory of such a life is full of grateful recollections. It is with a desire that the younger generation may have a deeper knowledge of his purity of character,—his attractive personality joined to infinite tact,—and above all, the rare spiritual perceptions which governed him in all things, that this memoir is attempted.

He was born in Loudoun county, Virginia, on the eleventh of First month, 1801, being the eldest child of Abijah and Jane Janney. His grandfather, Israel Janney, was a great-grandson of Thomas Janney, who was the founder of the family in this country. The mother of Samuel M. Janney was of Scottish descent, being the daughter of John and Hannah McPherson. When he was twelve years of age his mother was removed by death. There is abundant testimony to her great loveliness of character.

¹[This paper was prepared by E. F. R., at the request of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER.]

In rearing a large family, Abijah Janney adopted as a ruling principle in parental government the power of love and a good example. At a very early age Samuel M. Janney seems to have been desirous of doing the right and avoiding the wrong. He early learned to read, but the country school which he attended until he was about fourteen years of age, afforded scant opportunity for rapid improvement. He had access to very few books. There were scarcely any in the neighborhood. It was therefore under difficulties that he obtained even the rudiments of an education.

This country school was about three miles from Goose Creek meeting-house. The building was of unhewn logs, with an immense stone chimney on the outside of the house. A large fire-place opened on the inside capable of receiving a back log four feet in length. The windows were low and wide, and but few in number, and the outside door opened directly into the school-room. The desks were placed against the wall in a continuous row on three sides of the room, and in front of them were long benches made of slabs, with the flat side upward. There was a small high desk for the use of the teacher. Some pegs driven into the wall at one end of the room served for the boys' hats and the girls' sun bonnets, and a bench underneath for the dinner baskets and the water bucket. The room was as bare of appliances and ornamentation as a school-room well could be, being entirely destitute of maps, charts, globes, or black-boards. A large white oak stood near the house, and a smaller one not far off, and still farther away stretched an immense tract of woods, behind which loomed up the Blue Ridge mountains. A cool spring, a little below the house, from which a rippling brook ran through the meadow beyond, supplied the water for the school.

Some years later Samuel M. Janney commemorated this interesting period of his life in a poem, entitled "The Country School-house," for which he received a prize, offered by George P. Morris, editor of the New York Mirror, for the best poem or essay.

Some stanzas from the poem are here given:

"Near yonder oak that rears its blasted head,
Its aged trunk with verdant moss o'ergrown,
A school-house stood (that day long since has fled),
Where many an hour of blissful youth I've known.

"A little lovely glen with flowrets sown,
Whose mingled sweets the passing winds inhale,

A crystal stream with alder shrubs o'ergrown,
Meandering slowly, wanders thro' the vale.

"While all around the mighty forests rise,
Where nature's choir continual concert keep,
And towering hills, whose heads invade the skies,
And frowning rocks, and precipices steep.

"The school boys' heart when roving thro' these fields,
To fame's report, and honor's voice unknown,
More lasting bliss, more true enjoyment yields,
Than does ambition seated on a throne.

"But soon, obedient to the teacher's call,
Back to the school they slowly wend their way,
Reluctant leave the chase, the quoit, the ball,
And sylvan shade that seemed to court their stay.

"And when the sun low verging to the west,
Casts the long shade of evening o'er the plain,
With joy they hear once more the kind behest,
That calls to blissful liberty again.

on the North Fork of the Beaver Dam Creek, which takes its rise in the Blue Ridge mountains, and comes tumbling down into the Loudoun Valley, enriching the low-lands, giving motive power to mills and factories, and slaking the thirst of the flocks and herds that roam the valley. Near by stood "the mill," for the Janneys were millers for many generations. The subject of this sketch used to say to his little grandson, "Eat some bread with thy dinner, my pet boy. Remember, thee belongs to a family of millers, and bread is the staff of life."

(It seemed very fitting when this "pet boy" had attained to manhood, that he should have found his wife in Margaret Miller, a daughter of Francis and Caroline Hallowell Miller. So now the old injunction may be repeated with special fitness to the little Samuel M. Janney, third.)

About this time his uncle, Phineas Janney, of Alexandria, Va., who was a commission merchant, GOOSE CREEK FRIENDS MEETING-HOUSE, VIRGINIA.

In the village of Lincoln, Loudoun county, Va. Here, during most of his life, Samuel M. Janney attended and ministered. His home, "Meadow Lawn," is close by, and the boarding school, Springdale, about one-fourth of a mile away. The burying-ground, in which his remains lie, is to the left of the picture, across the public road.

"With many a gambol now they homeward go,
And tell some tale of wonder by the way,—
Or, loitering, linger where the wild flowers bloom
Or watch the glories of departing day."

It is a faithful description of the school-house of his youth. Long years afterward, when he had passed the "noon-day mark" he sometimes re-visited the romantic spot which had inspired his muse, and would point out the sunny slope in the meadow by the brook-side, where he was wont to gather the luscious wild strawberries—

"Or else, perhaps, more pleasing still I trust,
He roved delighted with some youthful fair,
Or sought the fountain to assuage her thirst,
Or plucked the wild rose to adorn her hair."

The home of Abijah Janney and the birth-place of his eldest son was more than a mile distant from the school-house. Nothing now remains of the house but the ruins of the stone chimney. It was situated and an importer of iron, gave him a position in his counting house in that city. Phineas Janney was a "gentleman of the old school." He was of fine presence, suave and courtly in manner, "given to hospitality." No wonder that he and his gentle wife drew around them friends and relatives to a home where the "latch string" was always out. They were childless, and the young nephew from Loudoun naturally became their protégé. The atmosphere of intelligence in Uncle Phineas's home, together with the advantages of a good library, was especially attractive to him. His fine, sensitive nature quickly responded to the refining influences by which he was surrounded. From this time onward his eager thirst for knowledge induced him to devote all of his spare time to reading and study. He attended a night school to learn the French language. As an example to the children of this day, who have such extensive opportunities for study, it may be mentioned in passing, that with only his evenings to devote to it, he became proficient in French, and spoke the language with so correct an accent, that he was complimented by a distinguished French scholar.

A deep and lasting impression was made upon his mind at this time by the reading of the Bible, especially that portion of it which relates to the spotless life of our great example, Jesus Christ. As he approached manhood he continued to read almost everything that came in his way. The activities of religious people in the city were very congenial and attractive to one of his ardent temperament, yet he felt no desire to become a member of another body, fully satisfied that Friends were more nearly his ideal standard of Christianity. He was especially favored with the religious services of two ministers of Alexandria, Edward Stabler and Dr. Elisha C. Dick. Speaking of Edward Stabler he said: "He was a remarkable example of uprightness and purity in conduct and conversation, had great fluency of expression, and was sometimes eloquent." His son, William Stabler, was among Samuel M. Janney's intimate friends, and was frequently his traveling companion in his religious journeys.

On the 22d of Fourth month, 1825, the first great sorrow of his young manhood came to him. His step-sister, Rachel Ellicott, passed "over the river" into the other life. She was a lovely young woman of twenty-one summers.

From the effects of a pulmonary disease she had for a long time been slowly wasting away. As the close drew near she was calm and peaceful, sent for her brother to give him her parting words, and gently went to rest. He says of her: "Thus passed away from earth to Heaven, a pure and lovely being, who had once been the object of my ardent attachment and sanguine hopes, but whose lingering illness had sobered and chastened my feelings towards her, until I regarded her with a brotherly affection and Christian sympathy."

His interest in the colored race was excited at an early age. In 1824, he was one of the teachers in a First-day School for colored children, which met in the second story of the Friends' meeting-house in Alexandria. At this period of his life he gave much attention to the subject of slavery. In connection with others who formed themselves into a Benevolent Society, he made a specialty in rescuing from the slave-traders persons who were illegally held in bondage. He wrote essays, and assisted in getting up a petition to Congress to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia.

(To be Continued.)

LOOKED at in the light of history and with due knowledge of human nature, there is no new problem. No question has arisen in our time, or can arise, which is essentially new. There are new lights, new opportunities, new forms of duty, new kinds of bane and blessing; but, essentially, they are phases of relationships and responsibilities which are as old as human society upon the earth.—[Christian Register.]

From The Outlook, Fourth month 22.

THE OLD TESTAMENT PROPHETS.

BY DR. LYMAN ABBOTT.

SAYS George Adam Smith: "In vulgar use the name 'prophet' has degenerated to the meaning of 'one who foretells the future.' Of this meaning, perhaps, the first duty of every student of the Bible is to earnestly and stubbornly to rid himself. In its native Greek tongue 'prophet' meant, not 'one who speaks before,' but 'one who speaks for, or on behalf of another.' It is in this sense that we must think of the 'prophet' of the Old Testament. He is a speaker for God. The sharer of God's counsels, as Amos calls him, he becomes the bearer and preacher of God's word. Prediction of the future is only a part, and often a subordinate and accidental part, of an office whose full function is to declare the character and the will of God."

I ask the reader of these papers to comply with this counsel, and earnestly and stubbornly to rid himself of the idea that a prophet means one who foretells events. The Greek word prophets does not justify this interpretation. It means, primarily, not one who speaks before, but one who speaks on behalf of another. The Hebrew word of which it is a translation has the same significance. That the prophets did not regard themselves as foretellers is clear from the character of their writings, only a very insignificant part of which is taken up with predictions of any kind. In those predictions they did not always agree with one another, and the events do not always occur as they were anticipated. When Jonah told the people of Nineveh, "In forty days Nineveh shall be destroyed," he foretold what did not come to pass. "God," says the sacred writer, "repented of the evil that he had said he would do unto them," and, as a historic fact, Nineveh was not destroyed for many years after the date at which, according to the story, the prophecy purported to be delivered. Nor did the prophets themselves regard accuracy of prediction as the test of their prophecy. On the contrary, they distinctly repudiated this test. One of the greatest of the prophets, the author of the book of Deuteronomy, written six or seven centuries before Christ, by an unknown author, declares that though the prophet has accurately foretold future events, and his witness is historically sustained, if his teaching does not sustain loyalty to Jehovah, not only is it to be counted of no value, but he himself is to be counted worthy of death. "If," says he, "there arise among you a prophet, or a dreamer of dreams, and giveth thee a sign or a wonder, and the sign or the wonder come to pass, whereof he spake unto thee, saying, Let us go after other gods, which thou hast not known, and let us serve them; thou shalt not hearken unto the words of that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams: for the Lord your God proveth you, to know whether ye love the Lord your God with all your heart and with all your soul. Ye shall walk after the Lord your God, and fear him, and keep his commandments, and obey his voice, and ye shall serve him, and cleave unto him. And that prophet, or that dreamer of dreams, shall be put to death." If the prophet's message is luminous with truth, if it is inspiring, if it presents to the people a grander conception of God than they have before entertained, and calls them back to a more righteous life in his service, then, and only then, is the messenger to be accepted. Not by any magical quality, but by its religious spirit and character, is the teaching of the prophet to be measured. Such is the standard which the prophets themselves raised as that by which all prophetic writings are to be judged.

It is not difficult to see how the other conception, that the prophet is primarily a foreteller, became prevalent. In the first place, he was in some sense a foreteller. There are two ways by which an individual or a nation may determine a course of action in a time of doubt; two ways, for example, by which we may judge in our present National crisis what course America ought to pursue. We may consider the condition of the Philippines and their relation to us and our interests, and may ask ourselves what course toward them will promote our welfare, what will be safe or what advantageous for us, what is likely to be the result next year, or for the next twenty-five years, if, on the one hand, we annex the Philippines, or if, on the other hand, we let the Philippines go. We may try to stand on the edge of the year, peer into the future, and determine what any specified course will bring forth. This is the method of the opportunist, the man of expediency. We may, on the other hand, ask what do justice and liberty demand, what is the duty of America toward a half-emancipated people, what opportunity for service is given to us, how can we best promote that kingdom of justice and liberty which God has enabled this Nation first to establish within its own borders, next to extend over this continent, and now, apparently, to push forward among the islands of the sea. Asking this question, we can enter upon the course which the answer to this question indicates, with courage, not because we think we see good coming from it to ourselves, but because we believe that good always inures to those who walk in the paths of righteousness.

The second was the course which the Hebrew prophet pursued. He was never an opportunist, he never even attempted to consider what the result of any proposed action would be to-day or to-morrow. He considered only what was just. Or, if he discussed questions of expediency, he determined them by the fundamental principles of righteousness. This made him a foreteller. When Thomas Jefferson, long before he or any other man could have anticipated the Civil War, looking upon slavery, said, "I tremble for my country when I reflect that God is just," Thomas Jefferson was a true prophet, not because he had a magical vision of future events, but because the sense of divine justice and the consciousness of human iniquity made him feel sure that unless the Nation rid itself of its iniquity it would suffer penalty inflicted by divine justice.

Let the reader, then, of these papers understand, whether he agrees with it or not, the writer's point of view. This is that, though a prophet does sometimes predict, and though his prediction is sometimes wonderfully fulfilled, his prediction and its fulfillment constitute neither the measure nor the value of his prophecy. The prophet speaks to fear, warning men of danger; he speaks to hope, inspiring them to life; but he does not to any great extent give detailed information respecting events to come. This is not his function; for no such purpose was he sent into the world. He is not a foreteller, but a forth-teller. He speaks, not of the future, but for another; and that other, God. "Just as a dumb or retired person," says Ewald, "must have a speaker to speak for him and declare his thought, so must God, who is dumb in respect to the mass of men, have his messenger or speaker; and hence the word 'prophet,' in its sacred sense, denotes him who speaks, not of himself but is commissioned by God." In this sense prophets have lived from the time of Moses to the present time. Every true Christian teacher ought to be in some sense a prophet, not forecasting future events, not foretelling what is to happen, but communing with his God, and getting direct from the Father the message which he presents to those who listen to him, because he is the interpreter of another; and that other, God.

The prophets of the Old Testament, then, are, first of all, men of God. Not men who have reached the conclusion, by philosophical inquiry, that there is a God, but men who have talked with him, walked with him, lived with him, and received their message from him. There is something said in the Bible about prayer, or man's speaking to God; there is much more said about inspiration, or God's speaking to men. These Hebrew prophets were men with whom God talked, men who came forth from God, bringing their message from him. In this faith they speak. Because of this faith they were accustomed to say, "Thus saith the Lord." "Hear the word of the Lord, ye rulers of Sodom," cries Isaiah. "The Lord God hath spoken, who can but prophesy?" says Amos. The extent to which this consciousness of the divine presence underlies the speech of the Hebrew prophet is indicated by the fact that the single phrase, "Thus saith the Lord," occurs more than two hundred times in the Old Testament.

And yet we are not to forget that this message which came forth from God came into, not merely unto, the prophet. It became a part of his nature, and came forth from him mixed with his own thoughts. It partook of his own nature. These prophets were no machines, no amanuenses writing at dictation. They were men inspired with God's spirit, conscious of God's presence, possessing some thought or feeling or passion which they believed was God given, and bringing their message to their people in their own language, and colored by their own personality. The differences in the form and even the spirit of their utterances is quite as great as is to be found in the utterances of any other class of writers. The sternness of a Carlyle is in Amos; the gentleness of a Whittier is in Hosea; the popular enthusiasm of a Wyckliffe is in Micah; the statesmanlike quality of a Cranmer is in Isaiah; the pathos of a Tennyson in his most pathetic moods is in Jeremiah; the radiant happiness of a Browning in his most optimistic moods is in the Great Unknown. God speaks in these prophets, but if we would understand their message we must understand the men.

And we must understand the age in which they lived and the conditions under which they wrote, for they are preëminently men of their age. Concerning the events of their age, they speak; to the men moved by those events they bring their messages; by those events they are themselves educated. It is, therefore, necessary to study them in connection with the events in the midst of which they live, and concerning which they speak. Without some knowledge of their times, their utterances are often sure to be misunderstood, and not infrequently are almost unintelligible. As it would be impossible clearly to comprehend Jeremy Taylor's "Liberty of Prophecy" without any knowledge of the life of England in the seventeenth century, Dr. Eliphalet Nott's famous sermon against dueling without knowing the story of Hamilton and Burr, the anti-slavery poems of John Greenleaf Whittier and the anti-slavery addresses of Theodore Parker and Henry Ward Beecher without knowing that slavery existed in republican America, so it is impossible to understand the scathing denunciations of Amos, the tender pleadings of Hosea, the manly and virile pathos of Jeremiah, the hopeful visions of the Great Unknown, the Puritanism of Malachi, and the ecclesiasticism of Zechariah, without knowing the history of Israel from the days of Jehoshaphat to those of the Restoration after the exile.

Something more, however, than an understanding of great religious principles and the great national events to which the prophets apply them is necessary to a comprehension of the prophetic teaching. Spiritual sympathy with them in their struggle against the vicious tendencies of their times is necessary to a comprehension of their spirit, and, except as their spirit is comprehended, their teaching cannot be. Each of them might have said to their auditors, as Paul to the throng at Lystra, "We also are men of like passions with you." They were men, and into their human life the reader must enter, sharing it with them. Patriots were they, loving their country with devotion; but they loved righteousness even more, and when they saw their country growing corrupt, they denounced the corruptionist, however high in station, with the fiery indignation of men who, because they love Jehovah, hate that which is evil. They shared the fears and hopes of the men of their time, and yet had an experience both of fear and of hope which transcended that of the commonplace auditors to whom they addressed their warnings and their encouragements. Men of great courage of conviction were they—none braver in human history than these ancient Hebrew prophets; Elijah denouncing King Ahab, and challenging him to conflict before the people; Nathan going to King David with his parable and saying to his face, "Thou art the man"; Amos breaking in upon the high festivities of the people with his message of stinging rebuke; Micah denouncing the rich for their oppressions of the poor. Great men were they—among the greatest of the world's leaders: sometimes statesmen, yet never politicians; sometimes poets, yet never sentimentalists; great thinkers, but never mere scholastic philosophers; reformers, yet not impracticables; historians, but neither partisans nor opportunists.

Each had his peculiar message—Isaiah the wisdom of maintaining political independence, Amos the supreme value of righteousness, Hosea the divineness of pitying love, the Great Unknown, the redemptive power of suffering. Yet a common truth runs through all their messages and makes of them one great message: that God is a righteous God; that he demands righteousness of his people and that he demands nothing else; that no forms or rites or ceremonies can possibly compensate for wrong-doing; that whatever individual and whatever nation conforms to the laws of righteousness secures the favor of God, and, in that favor, is assured of strength, life, well-being; that whatever individual and whatever nation disregards those laws insures for itself penalty, and, if it repents not, destruction—this is their message, repeated with every variety of inflection which varieties of temperament can produce, and applied with every change of application which changed circumstances can demand.

BLOCH'S GREAT BOOK ON MODERN WAR.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE following is one of a series of articles on the general subject of Peace and War, written by Professor P. Mieille, of the Lycée de Tarbes, Hautes Pyrénées, France. These articles are appearing in a daily journal called "Les Pyrénées," published in the town of Tarbes, and present, upon the whole, an encouraging view of the general aspects of the Peace question the world over, in which the author is deeply interested. Prof. Mieille is also the inventor of the new system of International Correspondence between students, professional men, and others, as one of the important aids in the acquisition of a practical use of foreign languages.

I propose to translate some of these articles, having the greatest general interest, for the columns of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER.

EDWARD H. MAGILL.

Swarthmore College.

FUTURE WAR IMPOSSIBLE.

We said, in the beginning of our campaign for Peace, that we would strive to avoid all vain declamation in our denunciation of war and of an armed Peace. Peacefully resolved, but before all practical, we have not received the proclamation of the Czar and the announcement of the Conference with the simple hope that there would come from it the Millennium, dreamed of in their simplicity by the early Christians. As we have said with reference to the doctrines of Count Tolstoy, we firmly refuse to admit any other arguments than those which can resist examination and pass the test of practical reason. Without denying the value of sentiment and enthusiasm,—precious qualities of our race,—we have preferred to appeal only to simple, good sense, so sure of the strength of our cause, that to state it in its simplicity, freed from all the artifices of language, and destitute of all the ornaments of rhetoric, has appeared to us the surest means of gaining it, without appeal, in the minds of our readers. To-day we desire to show the impossibility of war. We will do it, citing always our authorities as we have previously done, and depending only upon arguments derived from facts.

War impossible! Such might be the sub-title of the recent work from which we shall draw our facts, and of which we find a critical analysis in "War Against War," and the "Review of Reviews."

This work has for its title, "Future War, in its Technical, Economical, and Political Aspects."¹ Its author, M. Bloch, is one of the most distinguished economists of the Slavic world, and connected with him are named with bated breath the military specialists who have aided him in the technical part of his work, which, we may say in passing, is composed of six volumes octavo.

This work of M. Bloch has, it appears, produced upon the Czar such an impression that from the day when the reading of it had brought conviction to his mind, he has resolutely taken his stand in favor of peace, and with what sincerity and what ardor he has done this his proclamation is a proof.

"Future war," etc., is the keenest and most formidable appeal against war and militarism, but it is less a work of polemics than an exposition of facts. Almost no abstract arguments; facts, figures; with the impartiality and calmness of science militarism is extended upon the dissection table—shall we not say the table of vivisection?—and its muscles are laid bare, its wounds displayed; all its organism, with its most secret defects, brought out and thoroughly examined. And from this examination comes this conclusion: the great war, that general war of which so much is said, is hereafter impossible! But we let M. Bloch speak, limiting ourselves to condensing as much as possible the result of his researches, technical, economical, and political. He begins with this syllogism:

In the present condition of armaments and fortifications, no war between the great Powers of Europe could be terminated in less than two years, perhaps three, according to the testimony of experts.

Now, no war could be prolonged so long, in consequence of the lack of resources in men, in material, in money, and in provisions, considering that the losses of men, and the expenses of material would be tripled by the scientific conditions of future battles.

Therefore, war being powerless to settle in a definite manner international conflicts, statesmen will no longer dare to engage in it, especially re-trained as they will be by revolutionary and social movements, which would be the inevitable consequence of every prolonged war, whether victorious or not.

Examine, says Bloch, the changes which have been made since 1870 merely in the small arms. Thirty years ago the dangerous zone of the ball extended only a few yards beyond the point of its fall. To-day the ball has a trajectory so great that the dangerous zone in the line of fire exceeds 600 metres, and will soon reach, and even surpass a kilometre. Now, as it is improbable that upon the crowded battle-fields with which the future threatens us, a ball will meet no one in its passage of 1,000 or 1,500 metres, we can almost establish it as a principle that one ball out of two or three will have a victim. Detailed and precise calculations, with their drawings, show that the gun of five millimetres, modelled in 1892, is thirteen and a half times more effective than the Mauser of 1871. And that is not all. The introduction of arms of small caliber allows the soldier to triple his charge of cartridges, and one can imagine the destructive force of an arm thirteen and a half times more powerful, supplied by a triple number of cartridges.

The artillery has been rendered no less terribly effective. Let us take, for example, the French artillery: the French cannon of 1894 is exactly twenty times superior to the cannon of 1870. But since then the number of our field pieces has risen from 780 to 4,513; whence we see that the destructive power of this artillery has increased in the proportion of 116 to 1. And this proportion will be 232 to 1 with the new cannons of rapid fire. What we say here of the French artillery applies as well to the triplicate as to the duplicate artillery.

The statistics of General Muller show us that with an average of 140 cartridges per cannon, the armies of the five Powers which a great war—the great war—would bring into the field, could kill more than 11,000,000 men. And with 500 cartridges apiece, one could kill—allowing a margin for lost shots—the immense number of 41,000,000 men.

Judge, then, after the frightful mortality of the war of 1870, of the mortality of the future war. This mortality, says the author, would be increased in an incredible proportion by the difficulty of rescuing the wounded on the field of battle. The guns of small caliber, 6, 5, and 3 millimetres, of which the firing in rapid succession would literally mow down battalions and entire regiments, would establish between the two hostile armies a dangerous zone so mortal that it would be impossible to venture there, and the wounded would remain on the field of battle, losing all their blood and yielding to the tortures of despair and thirst.

Let us add that at four or five hundred metres, the ball of small caliber strikes four or five men, two or three between eight and nine hundred metres, and is still mortal beyond one thousand metres. So it is all over with the beautiful assaults and brilliant deeds of arms. The legendary exploits of our old legions, carrying with the bayonet fortified towns, making an assault upon points bristling with cannon, are things of the past, that we shall see no more. War is no longer to-day anything but a scientific moloch, crushing its victims in its entrails of burning fire, and no longer giving them the supreme consolation of a heroic death. Death from a distant ball, from an invisible enemy, without the excitement of battle, without the intoxication of combat, that is what future war reserves for the flower of European youth.

According to Bloch, experts agree in declaring that with the new inventions of fortifications even on the field of battle, battles will last three times as long, and may be prolonged for entire weeks, ending only with the exhaustion of the ammunition of one of the combatants. As we have said, it is admitted that with the use of the repeating guns, the assault of fortified points will become absolutely impossible, or the last resource of despair.

The consequence of future war will be no less disastrous in an economical point of view. Already the evil of an armed peace is undermining, like a contagious fever, our unhappy Europe. The great patient still enjoys the semblance of vigor; but gradually its vitality is becoming exhausted, and in spite of the infinite resources of its robust constitution, one can foresee the day, if no remedy is applied, when the New World, triumphant, will pronounce, with ironical pity the funeral oration of the old.

[¹ A Russian work. Prof. Mieille gives its Russian title.—Ers.]

Gold, which is the blood of nations, flows through all the pores of militarized Europe, flows to be swallowed up in the gulf of armaments which never surrendered its prey.

(1) Seven billions¹ are annually absorbed by the military budgets, and these seven billions represent only a part of the sacrifices which militarism imposes upon Europe. Who can calculate the sum of productive labor which is lost by the enforced idleness of millions of young men? Who could guess how many useful inventions, which would change the face of the world, are retarded, and perhaps forever lost, by the application of modern inventions to the discovery and perfecting of engines of destruction. Imagine the impulse given to commerce, to industry, to agriculture, by merely one-half the money squandered in senseless preparations for an impossible war!

According to careful statistics, established by the average figures of the expenses occasioned by the last great wars, the daily cost of future war would rise, for the five great powers, to nearly one hundred and five millions; or for one year, nearly forty billions. And if, as most specialists believe, the great war could not terminate in less than two years, it would be necessary to calculate upon an expense of from eighty to one hundred billions.

Nor is that all. The most moderate calculations estimate at about five millions a day the amount of assistance that the five powers would be obliged to distribute to civilians to prevent the poor of that part of the population from literally dying of hunger. One can say without fear of exaggeration, that the results of this monstrous war can be summed up in two words: ruin and famine. Ruin for the greater part of the industries, especially for those of luxury, which constitute, at present, the principal part of the fortune of France; ruin for commerce, ruin for agriculture. And as a result, no longer merely hideous bankruptcy, as said Mirabeau, but hideous famine. We do not wish to make too dark this picture already sufficiently gloomy in itself, and we do not insist; the reader will judge for himself.

Let us pass to the political consequences of this war, which senseless persons, I call them insane criminals, claim as a deliverance. Let us imagine what would be the internal condition of each of the great powers after a struggle of two years. Everything inclines us to believe that they would be neither conquerors nor conquered, or rather that the combatants, equally weakened, would retire to their respective homes equally exhausted. Let us suppose that of the three or four millions of men which each power has placed in the field, one-half have survived. Let us suppose them returned to their homes. What will they find there except desolation and poverty? The resources of the government exhausted, commerce destroyed, the workshops closed, the fields uncultivated, perhaps the cities burned and plundered, the villages consumed, the half of the population begging their bread, as after the great wars of Louis XIV.

Can one believe in good faith that these millions of unhappy ones would be easily resigned to their fate? Can one dare to hope that they would not make use of the perfected arms which have been placed in their hands to try to ameliorate their lot? The motto of the Lyons silk weavers of 1832: "Live working, or die fighting!" would it not become that of all the European paupers? For industry ruined, the public credit destroyed, work will necessarily fail, and perhaps for long years. And the governments, whatever they may be, deprived of resources, will no longer be able even to have recourse to the uncertain and dangerous palliative of national workshops.

It would be revolution; still worse, complete anarchy. This revolution, what would check it? Would it be the middle class? But the middle class would have lost its power. Of the hundred thousand officers who had come from that class, there would survive scarcely one-tenth, demoralized, weakened, incapable, after the disaster, of exercising the least moral effect upon the people.

Would it be the people themselves? Alas! what could be expected from a people famished and without work? Poverty is an evil counsellor, and every change is received with enthusiasm by one who has nothing to lose, as the insurgents of Milan cried out last May, "to die by the ball is better than to die of famine and poverty."

Have we not reason to say that a war which would involve in its result such consequences, is a suicidal, monstrous war, a capital crime against humanity itself? Is it too much to hope from the good sense of the governed, from the wisdom of governments, to believe it impossible?

It is the work of a sage, of a wise man, and of a philosopher, this beautiful book to which we perhaps owe the Rescript of the Czar. But it is also the work of a patriot. And patriot ourselves, patriot even to the inmost fibre of our French heart, we would wish to spare to our dear country these painful and perhaps mutual experiences.

And to conclude, we will leave to the meditation of our readers these words of Mr. Block:

"Let the people know the truth, let them consider the magnitude of the danger, and they will do everything to render war impossible."

P. MIEILLE,

Professeur au Lycée de Tarbes, Hautes Pyrénées, France.

It is the little word you speak, the little thought you think, the little thing you do or leave undone, the little moments you waste or use wisely, the little temptations which you yield to or overcome—the little things of every day that are making or marring your future life.—Selected.

¹ The sums of money are reckoned in francs, not in dollars.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 6, 1899.

COUNSELLING TOGETHER.

PHILADELPHIA Friends are about to assemble, at Race Street meeting-house, for their annual gathering. It is well to pause and consider the purpose of this gathering. Is it for religious service, for examination into the affairs of the organization, or for social commingling?

It is for all of these, and for more than these: First, we hold that every service should be a religious service if our lives are dedicated to the cause of Christ; being ever mindful of Paul's injunction to "do all (things) to the glory of God." It is, secondly, a near duty to see to it that the condition of our membership in each of our meetings is in accordance, or measurably so, with the principles we profess. As members of our religious household, our interest and care should extend over all, that we may be mutually helpful to each other. Some weary of this routine, but no one should, for just as our daily food is important, and ever recurring, for our physical needs in our homes, so do our moral and spiritual natures need the constant watchfulness that constantly sustains character, and carries it through to life's desired end,—a continued and eternal dwelling with the Infinite.

And, in answer to our third query,—it is of no small importance to meet face to face annually, Friends from our different meetings. To give them the warm greeting of brotherly love and sisterly affection, cheers the heart and stimulates to greater faithfulness when cares press hard, and anxieties will not be thrust aside. To know that we are a part of a body of people whose aims are similar, whose tastes are congenial, and whom we can always meet on a social plane as members of the same religious household. This is an inspiration that helps us to surmount obstacles, and enables us also to share our pleasures. Let us not then underestimate these occasions as social opportunities. But "more than these," the things of the world; it is here we face a grave problem. Yet it is one we cannot ignore. However we may decry it we are of the "world's people" in one sense. We must take our place as best we may in the ranks of those who are striving for better conditions for the entire human race.

Shall we not counsel together as to the best methods for us to work towards this end? We are passing through a grave crisis. Evil doing is abroad in the world. Yet we are conscious of the growth of goodness—when we compare time by centuries—but it is exceeding slow. How can we as a Religious Society hasten this growth? is a question for us to consider. It is no time for idle dreaming, but a time for wise action. "In the multitude of counsellors there is wisdom" is the assertion of the wise man of olden time. Shall we not hope that this may be our experience in the coming yearly meeting? Let all seek quietly and prayerfully for that guidance that alone can make us wise, so that any counsel we may have to give will lead, at least, to "safety."

SOMETHING like dismay is felt by those interested in the Forestry work at the intimation that the Pennsylvania Commissioner of Forestry, Dr. J. T. Rothrock, is to be removed by Governor Stone. Dr. Rothrock has been for years past the central figure of the movement in Pennsylvania, and his full acquaintance with the subject, both as a student of botany and a practical woodsman, his untiring perseverance, and his single-minded devotion, have put the work in this State in a most hopeful situation. It is recognized by all acquainted with it that Dr. Rothrock's removal at this time would be most unfortunate, and it is to be hoped that Governor Stone can be induced to see that his retention is demanded by the public interest.

THE reports of the Conference held at Richmond, Indiana, in Eighth month last, have been sent out upon lists furnished to the several monthly meetings in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting. The list may not have been entirely complete, and if any have been omitted, notice should be sent at once to the INTELLIGENCER office, with shipping directions.

THE usual General Conference of Friends' Associations will be held on Second-day evening of Yearly Meeting week, (15th instant), at the meeting-house, 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia. The program is elsewhere announced.

BIRTHS.

BYCRAFT.—At Coldstream, Ontario, Canada, Third month 8, 1899, to John and Mary E. Bycraft, a son, who is named George Hemmingway.

COLES.—At Maple Shade, N. J., Fourth month 28, 1899, to Henry B. and Deborah Walton Coles, a son, who is named Charles Benjamin.

HERR.—At Moorestown, N. J., Third month 26, 1899, to Henry C. and Rachel L. Herr, a daughter, who is named Edith Strohm Herr.

MARRIAGES.

DARLINGTON—HOOPES.—At the home of the bride in Westtown township, Pa., Fourth month 27, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Minnie B., daughter of Ellwood Hoopes, and Charles R., son of the late Francis Darlington, of West Chester, Pa.

GAWTHROP—HAYES.—At the home of the bride's parents, Fourth month 20, 1899, under care of Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends, Frederick Herman, son of Newlin Gawthrop, of Wilmington, Delaware, and May Amelia, daughter of William M. and Rachel H. Hayes, of West Chester, Pa.

LEWIS—BOSLER.—At the home of the bride, Ogontz, Montgomery county, Pa., Fourth month 29, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Davis Levis Lewis, son of George D. and Hannah A. Lewis, and Carolyne Comly, daughter of Joseph and Cynthia G. Bosler.

DEATHS.

SAUBE.—Suddenly, on Sixth-day morning, Fourth month 21, 1899, at her residence in Harrisburg, Pa., Sara Hoopes Saube, in the 40th year of her age.

She was the daughter of the late Francis Pratt and Abigail Hoopes of West Chester, and wife of Emil Saube, of Harrisburg. Her early life was spent in London Grove township, Chester county; later she graduated at the West Chester Normal School, and became a popular teacher for a number of years. A member of the Society of Friends by birthright, she always manifested her interest by attending its meetings whenever convenient.

Generous, companionable, and cheerful in disposition, she had a wide circle of friends, as was evident from the large number of people who gathered to pay their last respects at Harrisburg, West Chester, and London Grove, where funeral services were held.

"The Spring is here with leaf and flower,
And golden clouds and sapphire sky,
And oh, 'twas hard, with all so fair,
To know the loved must die.

"The eye sees nought of Nature's bloom
Nor heeds the smiling day,
When one who made existence bright,
Alas! has passed away.

"Farewell; 'tis hard to give thee up,
But, like a hallowed spell,
Thy image ever in our hearts
With hope and faith shall dwell."

F. R. B.

WALTON.—In London Grove, Chester county, Pa., Fourth month 5, 1899, Howard J., son of Howard J. and the late Jennie Michener Walton, aged 3 months and 25 days.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT

No. 20.—FIFTH MONTH 14.

SINAI AND THE LAW.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Ye shall not make other gods with me; gods of silver or gods of gold, ye shall not make unto you.—Exodus, xx. 23.

Scripture Reading.—Exodus, xx., 1-18.

It is necessary at this point to return to the subject of the time and authorship of this portion of the Bible. It was pointed out in Lesson 2, First Quarter, that there is no basis for the tradition which assigns the authorship of the Pentateuch to Moses. Again in Lesson 3, First Quarter, some of the reasons were given for believing that these books are of a composite character, the final writer having collected and incorporated into his narrative materials of earlier times. The books did not reach the complete form until the fifth century before the Christian era. At that time a representative of the Jewish priesthood brought together a full statement of the ceremonial law, together with the accepted tradition of its origin. This was cast into narrative form, and incorporated several other writings which dealt with similar or connected subjects. Two of these, which were among the most important, were written about or before the beginning of the ninth century before Christ, and therefore over three hundred years earlier. These writings make up the narrative portion of the Pentateuch. The priestly writer has used them as an introduction to that which seemed to him of greatest importance, namely, the laws and institutions of Israel. He has, however, embodied in them numerous additions. Such cases are the story of creation (Genesis, 1), the covenant with Noah after the flood, the institution of circumcision (Genesis, 17), and a number of genealogies. It must be understood that the ninth century writers themselves drew for their materials on still older tradition, either oral or very probably in some cases written.

A third document, dating from the latter part of the seventh century, B. C., was incorporated almost entire in the completed Pentateuch, and was substantially the same as the book of Deuteronomy. It was written with a purpose similar to that of the priest of the fifth century, and the materials, therefore, are largely parallel to the legal portions of Exodus, Leviticus, and Numbers. The author of Deuteronomy evidently drew for historical matter on the same ninth-century writers who have already been referred to as contributing to the other portions of the Pentateuch.

There is to be noted an important difference between the two earlier and the two later writers whose works are thus compounded into one: The earlier (known as "J" and "E" because of their respective use of the words "Jahweh" and "Elohim" for God) lived in a time when religion was still comparatively simple, and when the relation assumed by man toward God was much more direct and informal than it afterward became. The later writers, and especially the latest, lived when ecclesiasticism had taken firm hold. Men must approach God through the church; a priestly intermediate was necessary in all dealings with Him, and indeed in many of the usages of everyday life. On this account the writers of the ninth century are often called the "prophetic" and those of the later dates the "priestly" writers. The remaining portions of the Pentateuch consist largely of the code of the ecclesiastical period of Hebrew history. Tradition attributed the whole of it to Moses; but it deals with social, moral, and religious conditions which have no bearing on the formative period of Hebrew national life with which the great leader was associated. It is distinctly the law of developed society, and is altogether out of place in a study of the life of fugitive nomads, their conquest of a permanent home, and the slow evolution of their national life. For these reasons it seems best to postpone such study as may be deemed profitable of the legal portion of the Pentateuch until we reach that time in Hebrew history to which they definitely apply.

There is, however, a nucleus of ancient law which may be separated from the more modern ceremonial code in which it is incorporated. The "Ten Words," or "Ten Commandments," are pronounced by all students to be of great antiquity. Both this and a code of laws regulating the social life of the people (Exodus xx., 23, to xxiii., 38), are attributed by one of the ninth century writers (E) to Moses, apparently on the basis of still older traditions. Moreover, these, together with some details concerning the construction of a desert tabernacle and ceremonies pertaining distinctly to desert life, have plainly to do with conditions such as those told of in Exodus. We may assume that the substance of these portions of the Law constitute the revelation to Moses at Sinai.

The great oasis of Sinai was the home of the Hebrew fugitives for nearly a year. No doubt it was a region thoroughly familiar to their leader from his early experiences. "They stood in a vast sanctuary, not made with hands,—a sanctuary where every outward shape of life, animal or vegetable, such as in Egypt had attracted their wonder and admiration, was withdrawn. Bare and unclothed, the mountains rose around them; their very shapes and colors were such as to carry their thoughts back to the days of old creation, from everlasting to everlasting, before the mountains were brought forth, or even the earth and the world were made."—(Stanley.) "The sacred mountain . . . rose in awful grandeur before the whole camp; a stupendous height of granite rocks, torn into chasms and precipices, and shooting aloft in a wild confusion of pinnacles."—(Geikie.) Between the heights of Sinai on the south and those of Horeb on the north, stretched the great plain where the camp was pitched. Soon after the arrival of the caravan there occurred a terrific storm of thunder and lightning which shook the very earth and filled the hearts of the Hebrews with terror. It seemed to them that the very voice of God himself spoke in those awful crashing peals which echoed from peak to peak, and the flashing lightning strokes seemed the very sword of that Jehovah who was a "Man of War." After the storm was over Moses withdrew to the mountain to pray and to listen to the voice of Jehovah. It was there that the memorable revelation was given to him which definitely distinguished the Hebrew religion from all others of the time. It was, essentially, that Jehovah, the God of the children of Israel, demanded personal righteousness. The ten commandments link together clearly for the first time the ideas of duties to God and duties to man. The first four have to do with duties to God: I am thy God, (1) Thou shalt have no other gods; (2) Make to thyself no image; (3) Thou shalt not use the name of thy God to deceive; (4) Remember the Sabbath. The others deal with human relations, (5) Honor thy parents; (6) Do not murder; (7) Do not commit adultery; (8) Do not steal; (9) Do not bear false witness; (10) Do not covet. Such recognition of the necessity for basing relations with God on a foundation of righteousness toward men represents a very long step in advance. In many of the Semitic and other religions of antiquity licentiousness was a part of the worship offered to gods, human life was an acceptable sacrifice, and man's dealing with other men was a thing wholly apart from religious life. The revelation of the connection between God and personal righteousness is the special glory of Moses. As it was revealed to Abraham that his God was one, so now it is further revealed to his descendant that the worship of Him involves that mastery of passion and desire which is expressed in the word righteousness. The religion was not a perfect one. The commands were commands from without. A man might obey the letter of them and yet be ungenerous, unkind, unloving. But they contain the germ of Christianity itself. This germ nurtured by the prophets finally bloomed in that which contained the whole "law and prophets": Thou shalt love thy God—thou shalt love thy neighbor. From the outward observance of commandments written on tablets of stone to self-government according to commandments written on tablets of the heart—this is the development from Moses to Jesus: this is the subject matter of our study in the lessons to follow.

The rulings in the Book of the Covenant (Exodus xx., 23 to xxiii., 33) are to a considerable extent expansions and applications of the "Ten Words," or penalties for violation of their provisions.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

Fifth Month 14.—No. 20.

JESUS BETRAYED AND ARRESTED.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Put up again thy sword into its place, for all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword.—Matthew, xxvi., 52.

Read the Scripture, John, xviii., 1–14.

REVISED VERSION.

As was explained in the comment on the last lesson, we pass in the "International" program, over the remainder of the fifteenth, and all of the sixteenth and seventeenth chapters of John. The sixteenth is the prayer which Jesus offered, beginning, "Father, the hour is come," in which, near the close, he made supplication for those who followed him,—"that they may all be one; even as thou, Father, in me, and I in thee, that they also may be in us. . . . The glory which thou hast given me I have given unto thee; that they may be one, even as we are one; I in them and thou in me."

Completing his discourse, and ending his prayer, Jesus left the "upper room," and "went forth with his disciples over the brook Cedron, where was a garden, into the which he entered, and his disciples." It was still the night of the 6th of April, or—being perhaps past midnight—early morning of the 7th. The garden was Gethsemane. The brook Cedron, (commonly called Kidron), is a stream whose valley lies at the western foot of the Mount of Olives, between that and Jerusalem, and which, first bearing south, turns then eastward and falls into the Dead Sea.

The garden of Gethsemane is located by tradition, and a space, nearly square, about 150 feet by 160, east of the Kidron, has been walled in, and designated as the Garden. Writers on the subject, however, point out that there is no sufficient authority for fixing it in this place and Thomson, ("The Land and the Book," i., 432), explicitly disapproves the place "The position is too near the city, and so close to what must always have been the great thoroughfare eastward that our Lord would scarcely have selected it for retirement on that momentous and anxious night. In the broad recess of the valley of the Kidron, therefore, "several hundred yards to the northeast of the present Gethsemane," he is inclined to locate the garden, "in some secluded spot," which he hopes "will forever remain undisturbed by the idolatrous intrusion of all sects and denominations."

In the garden, or just before entering it, several incidents occurred, besides the betrayal and arrest. Peter's denial of the Master was predicted to him, as recorded by Matthew, Mark, and Luke, but not by John. Jesus endured the agony of realizing his near terrible death, and thrice going apart, prayed, "O. Father, if it be possible, let this cup pass away from me; nevertheless, not as I will but as thou wilt." He was "strengthened" from above,—as Luke describes it, an angel appeared unto him,—but yet his agony was such that "his sweat became as it were great drops of blood falling down upon the ground."

Each time, as he came back to his companions he found them sleeping, and exhorted them to watch and pray.

The party of Roman soldiers who had been sent to arrest him approached Jesus in the garden. They had lanterns and torches, (though it appears from the chronology fixed upon that the night had a full moon), and weapons. Judas, who "knew the place," and knew also that "Jesus oft-times resorted thither with his disciples," had arranged that the soldiers should seek him there.

The narrative of the betrayal and the arrest should be read as given in the several gospel accounts. Others add facts of value to those presented in the text from John which we are now studying. Matthew says, (xxvi., 47), "a great multitude" accompanied the party, and he records the incident of the betrayal with a kiss. Judas had said to the officer, "Whomsoever I shall kiss, that is he." And then, "straightway he came to Jesus, and said, 'Hail, Rabbi!' and kissed him," (in the Greek, "kissed him much") and then the soldiers "came and laid hands on Jesus and took him." Following that it was that Peter, "having a sword," drew it and struck off the ear of the high priest's servant, Malchus, and then Jesus rebuked him, and made the declaration—a most impressive and significant one—which forms the Golden Text. How came Peter to have a sword? it may be asked. Certainly the disciples did not go armed. The reasonable supposition is that he had at the moment, or a little time before, in expectation, secured the weapon. It is fair to observe that Matthew does not say it was Peter who struck the blow, but assigns the act (xxvi., 51) to "one of them that were with Jesus;" and also that Mark says (xiv., 47) it was "a certain one of them stood by," while Luke says (xxii., 50), "a certain one of them." But, at any rate, Jesus made his own testimony emphatic; whether it was Peter or another who had made the exhibition of the "natural man" and had so failed in the Christ teaching, the Master declared to him, "all they that take the sword shall perish with the sword." Those who rely on outward force instead of inward power will in the end share the failure of the force system. Christianity itself is here typified and proclaimed. It rises triumphant above the wreck and decay of barbaric conditions.

Jesus was then bound and led away to Annas, who was father-in-law to Caiaphas, "who was high priest that year." Matthew says that "all the disciples left him and fled," and Mark makes nearly the same statement.

The treachery of Judas is fixed in history for all time as exemplifying the basest action of man. What induced him? Why did he so betray his Master? John says he was covetous and dishonest from the beginning. According to Matthew and Mark it was the temptation of money, the "thirty pieces of silver." Luke says Satan had entered into him. There is an extensive literature on the question. Some have suggested that Judas, confident of the miraculous power of Jesus, meant to compel him to display it conspicuously in his own defense. Others have thought that Judas had—in a contrary direction—become doubtful of the Messiahship of Jesus, and wished, after all, not to disturb the priestly system.

Judas, it is remarked, was "the only southerner" among the twelve disciples. He came, it is supposed, from Kerioth, in the tribe of Judah.

"I FOR ONE," said Senator Hoar, of Massachusetts, in a speech at Boston, on the 19th ultimo, "do not believe that the temper and character of the American people have changed in a twelvemonth. I believe that the principles of the Constitution, and the principles of the Declaration, the doctrines on which the Revolution was fought and won, are still dear to the heart of the American people."

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

[On account of recent change in the arrangement of times and places for holding Whitewater Quarterly Meeting, the following information is given:]

Times and places of holding Whitewater Quarterly Meeting, Indiana Yearly Meeting of Friends:

The Third month Quarter is to be held alternately at Milton and Duck Creek, at Milton in 1900, and Duck Creek in 1901.

The Sixth month Quarter is to be held each year at Richmond.

The Ninth month Quarter is to be held at Westfield in 1899, at Huntington in 1900, at Lincolnville in 1901, and following in that order, commencing again at Westfield in 1902.

The Twelfth month Quarter is to be held at Fall Creek, each year.

By direction of Whitewater Monthly Meeting of Friends, held at Richmond, Indiana.

ANNA M. VAUGHAN, Clerk.

Fourth month 26, 1899.

Westbury Quarterly Meeting was held in New York, Fifteenth street and Rutherford Place, on Seventh-day, the 29th ult., with a large attendance. In the meeting for worship remarks were made, successively, by Joseph A. McDowell, Henry W. Wilbur, and Robert Hatton. In the business sessions of the men's and women's meetings, which followed, the Queries were read and answers thereto, with other customary business preliminary to the approaching yearly meeting. In the men's meeting the subject of dispensing with the formal answering of the queries, introduced by Edward B. Rawson, called forth a lively exercise.

The Executive Committee of New York Yearly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor also held a meeting on the afternoon of the 29th ult. The various superintendents of departments made reports, the substance of which will be presented in a general report to the yearly meeting. Accompanying this report, it was decided to present to the yearly meeting "An Appeal for Purity," recently issued by the American Purity Alliance, for presentation to various religious and philanthropic bodies, and to the secular and religious press.

A message of sympathetic greeting to the Peace Conference, soon to convene at The Hague, was adopted and directed to be forwarded to the Chairman of the American deputation at The Hague.

A minute was also adopted expressive of much regret on account of the official opinion of the Attorney-General of the United States, which would practically nullify the law enacted by Congress to abolish liquor selling in army "canteens," and asking the President to direct that the laws be executed in accordance with the obvious intent of Congress.

Under the auspices of Westbury Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee, a largely attended public meeting was held on the afternoon of the 29th ult., at Fifteenth Street meeting-house, and addressed by Dr. Lyman Abbott, on the "Disarmament Conference." His address, which was much appreciated by the large audience, was an earnest, effective plea for a permanent International Arbitration Tribunal. He was followed, successively, by Aaron M. Powell, Samuel B. Haines, and Henry W. Wilbur. The meeting was of a most encouraging character.

Isaac Wilson has a prospect of attending Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, also Nine Partners, and Shrewsbury, and Plainfield Half-Year's Meetings, on the way.

Shrewsbury and Plainfield Half-Year's Meeting will be held at Shrewsbury, N. J., on Fifth- and Sixth-days, the 11th and 12th inst. A Philanthropic meeting will be held in connection therewith.

Easton and Granville Half-Year Meeting will be held at Granville, Washington county, N. Y., Fifth month 17 and 18.

VISITS TO FRIENDS IN INDIANA.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

HAVING been prevented by sickness from attending our quarterly meeting, which was held at Duck Creek, we felt drawn to join William W. Foulke and Anna M. Starr, (who had also been prevented from attending by indisposition), to visit in the love of Truth some meetings within the verge of Whitewater Quarter. We set out in our carriage on the afternoon of Fourth month 7, and drove to William's home at Richmond, Ind. The next day, he accompanying us, we drove to the Duck Creek settlement of Friends in Henry county, where we were kindly entertained by our cousin Samuel Hoover, and wife.

Next day being First-day, we attended meeting there, where we were joined by Anna, who had come by rail. The house was well filled and the audience attentive. In company with others we dined at Levi and Mary Cook's. In the afternoon had an appointed meeting, although it was not as large as the one in the morning, owing to a Sabbath-school convention nearby; we felt it to be a precious time. After meeting, called on Levi Wood's family, his wife not being able to attend meeting. Lodged with Warren Hinshaw and wife. Next day her mother, Martha Kenward, accompanying us, we called on our dear aged friends Jonas and Rachel James, and also on their son Thomas, whose wife has been much afflicted for several years. After sometime spent in social converse we felt drawn into the quiet, and words of sympathy and encouragement were given. Dined with Albert and Luella Kenward, who have an interesting family of children growing up around them. In the evening held a parlor meeting at our cousin's, Edward and Hannah Strattan, some of the neighbors being present. Spent the night with them. Next day took dinner with another cousin, Margaret K. Wood, and son. Then on to Fall Creek settlement. Spent a pleasant evening and the night with Morris and Margaret Hardy.

On Fourth-day morning called on Woolston Swain and family. His aged wife has been an invalid for a number of years. We found her in a very sweet frame of mind, bearing her afflictions with cheerful patience, several times saying, "I am greatly blessed and have so much to be thankful for." They also have an afflicted daughter. We felt drawn into deep sympathy with him and daughter, whose life work seems to be to care for the afflicted ones, and who are so nobly and tenderly fulfilling that duty. After spending a short time socially, without any prearrangement, or forethought, a hush seemed to fall on all, and we were drawn into that living silence where the Divine Love is felt to flow from spirit to spirit. Some feeling words were spoken, and we parted in tenderness and love. Dined with Anna Rogers and daughter, her husband being in Florida. Here Anna and I rested for a few hours, while my husband and son spent the afternoon in social calls on the aged and afflicted. Toward evening drove to Charles Swain's, where a parlor meeting had been appointed. A number gathered, and all seemed to feel that it was good to be there. Here we spent the night.

On Fifth-day morning called at the home of Albert and Sarah Lewis. She had been confined to the house for some weeks with grippe. Found her improving, but not able to go to meeting. Attended their monthly meeting. Quite a number were present from the Duck Creek Meeting. Among the first to welcome us as we alighted from the carriage, was our dear friend Jonas James, who although 86 years of age had that morning ridden eighteen miles to attend the meeting, expecting to return in the afternoon. We felt our meeting here to be a favored season, the dear Father having been in our midst. This ended our labors at this place. Before starting on our long drive across the country to mingle with our friends at the Camden Meeting, we with a number of others took dinner at Morris Hardy's. Here we parted with Anna M. Starr, she not feeling able for so long a ride. Drove about nine miles to Markelville, where we staid with uncle Joseph Weeks. Next morning took an early start and reached Camden about sun set. We felt somewhat wearied with our journey, but spent a pleasant evening, and the night with Warren Gregg and family, their five bright little daughters and aged parents adding much to our enjoyment.

Next morning we called on dear old Mary Meredith, or Anna Mary, as she is lovingly called, who is in her ninetieth year, and so deaf and blind that it is almost impossible to converse with her. She said in a sweet spirit of resignation, "I wish I could go home now, while you are here. I don't know why I stay so long, but I am trying to be patient and wait until the call comes." She enjoys the INTELLIGENCER very much, says the print is so plain that by sitting in the sunshine she can read most of it. In the afternoon, Seventh-day 15, we attended their monthly meeting which was held at the home of Isaac and Mary E. Underwood. In consideration of their age and inability to get out, the meeting is held at their home during the inclement season. Although their meeting is small and they sometimes feel discouraged, we feel that there is still a precious seed there, that with proper care will spring up and bring forth an abundant harvest. Earnest efforts were made to encourage them to be faithful to duty.

Passed the night with Josiah Jones's family, and on First-day morning called on John Edmonson and wife, she being in very poor health. Then on to meeting, which was held in the meeting-house, which was well attended, and the labors seemed to be appreciated. In the afternoon a parlor meeting was held with dear Aunt Mary, which she much enjoyed. After spending the night with David and Hannah Hoover, and their children, we started on our homeward trip, arriving at William Foulke's that evening. Found his family in good health. Next morning set out for our Ohio home, where we arrived a little after noon. We were from home eleven days, and traveled about two hundred miles. We all felt richly repaid for leaving the cares of farm, and home and going at the Master's bidding. For he who said the laborer is worthy of his hire is ever ready with his sweet reward of peace, which is more precious than silver or gold.

MARGARET K. SHOEMAKER.

Fair Haven, Ohio.

THE ADDRESSES TO THE CZAR.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

THE Philadelphia committee who launched "the message of sympathy to the Czar," desire to thank all those who sent in signatures. We know (through experience) that no small amount of trouble has been taken in obtaining them. It may interest them to know that twenty or more States have been represented, twenty-three universities and colleges, (principally by their presidents), and some, or all, of their faculties, six bishops, some fifty or sixty clergymen of various denominations, one chief-justice, an ex-Senator of the United States, heads of institutions, lawyers, doctors,—between six and seven thousand persons in all. The roll has been expressed to our ambassador at St. Petersburg, the Hon. Charlemagne Tower, to be presented to the Czar; and the way was opened by letters sent before. A duplicate message was forwarded to Hon. Andrew D. White, ambassador to Germany, and one of our representatives to the Hague Conference. All belated signatures will be carefully forwarded by mail.

William Penn's "Holy Experiment" in government is a common heritage, "the only government," said Thomas Jefferson, "ever administered on Christian principles." Let us go forward, not backward, towards that model. William Penn (not his successors) took up the white man's burden towards an untamed and uncivilized race, and performed the task not by modern methods of brute force, but by the Golden rule of Heavenly wisdom. As long as that was applied, the burden was light and the yoke was easy to White and Red man alike.

J.

Philadelphia, Fifth month 1.

SOMEONE says: "A life that finds no time for pleasure is a mistake; but a greater mistake is the life that devotes all its time to pleasure."

IN a mission school in China are fifty girls that were rescued from rivers into which their parents had thrown them to drown.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

NEW YORK AND BROOKLYN.—At the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn, held Fourth month 23, a paper was presented on "The Influence of Geography and Climate upon Character."

The writer said, in substance: "Climate includes the state of atmosphere as regards heat and moisture which prevails at a given place, together with its general meteorological conditions, in so far as they exert an influence upon plant and animal life. Geography means location, environment, natural advantages, etc., including the special significance of these factors in determining international, commercial, and social relations. Temperate climates, with their seasons, facilities for easy communication, and diversity in topography, are the conditions most conducive to high human development and progress. The Hebrews and Greeks stand as examples of nations having enjoyed and profited by such natural advantages. The United States, in still larger degree, enjoys all the most advantageous natural conditions. Hence it becomes incumbent upon us from our rich, natural endowment and the height of civilization which this has made it possible for us to attain, to extend a helping hand to peoples less favored."

In the discussion many interesting points were raised as to the relative influence of climate and geography and of religion, of race characteristics, and of various incidental factors which play so large a part in a nation's progress. All these are doubtless powerful influences, working together towards the same end, but through and with them all the spirit of Divinity in man is a strong, controlling force, which, coming out in love to man and in noble ideals, has wrought much of our higher civilization.

MARY A. NICHOLS, Correspondent.

TRENTON, N. J.—A regular meeting of Trenton Friends' Association was held Fourth month 24, with the president, W. Maxwell Marshall, in the chair.

After roll-call and reading of minutes some time was given in speaking of the two valuable members who have so recently passed away, William Hancock and John Watson. This was opened by the president presenting a sketch of the life of each.

William Hancock was a man who possessed that happy faculty of making all feel he had a kindly interest in them. He was a practical Christian worker, and, as one of our members expressed, "A whole-souled, broad-minded Christian gentleman," ever ready to do a kindness, not alone in word, but in deed. He was always willing to do that which would promote the interest of this Association, and was particularly devoid of show and ostentation. Many a burden was lightened because of his tokens of kindness and sympathy. His religion was the kind which makes the world better—deeds, not creeds.

"In John Watson we have had removed from among us one of our most earnest workers, a man of bright intellect, and one who was a firm believer in the principles of Friends. His interest in this Association was great, and up to the time of his death he was actively connected with it. His presence alone was a source of strength, but he was a ready speaker, impressing one at once with the earnestness of his thoughts. The nature of his disease was such that he knew he might receive the call any moment, and his calmness and resignation were the outcome of complete submission to the Divine will."

At the thought of the loss this Association had received by the passing away of these two sincerely regretted members, a deep feeling of solemnity pervaded the meeting.

After the necessary business of the meeting was disposed of, Daniel Willits having been appointed to open the discussion following the reading of the paper by Dr. Hull at the Conference of next Fifth month, the literary program was taken up and was as follows: "A sketch of the life of Thomas Chalkley," by Harvey T. Satterthwaite. This was an interesting account of that prominent Friend.

A paper on the "First Query in the Discipline of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting," was read by Carrie Preston. The writer said that, "as we sit in solemn silence before God these meetings should be attended in dedication of heart, and while it is necessary to have the Queries, it often seems like mere form." Regarding attendance, she said many do not attach sufficient importance to the attendance at religious and business meetings, and urged the importance of the young being encouraged to help bear the responsibility, in order that the society may advance. She also said Friends should be quite as particular to take their seats in meeting promptly, as they would be to keep a business engagement.

The discussion which followed showed that the Queries are a subject of much importance.

After a few moments' silence, the meeting adjourned.

FLORENCE H. TITTENSOR, Sec. pro tem.

HOPEWELL, VA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association of Hopewell was held at Hopewell, Fourth month 23. The sixth chapter of John was read by the president, at the opening of the meeting. Minutes of last meeting were read and approved.

Edward L. Irish, on behalf of the Membership Committee, reported three new names. Howell M. Bond, being appointed for history, read a portion of the life of William Penn. Daniel W. Lupton read a piece entitled "His Way." Ann B. Branson read "Meetings for Worship," taken from Friends' Discipline. Current Topics, by William E. Branson, were well selected and instructive.

Referred question: "What should be the duty of the public in regard to the protection of our dumb animals?" was answered by David P. Lupton, who thought the first duty of the public is to educate ourselves along that line which will develop a higher plane of thought concerning them. Wrongdoing oftentimes is but ignorance, even in the care of our dumb animals. If there is not already a law to prevent cruelty to animals, there should be one in our State, and organizations to see that it is carried out. Those who have animals in their care should treat them with kindness, give good food and handle gently.

Sarah B. Hardisty, Daniel T. Wood, and David W. Branson contributed much to the interest of the meeting by reading selections.

The meeting closed after a few moments of silence.

ANNIE J. REES, Sec.

HUNTINGTON, IND.—The Young Friends' Association met Fourth month 21, at the home of Margaret and James Plummer. The meeting was called to order at 8 o'clock by the chairman, Eva Moore.

After the business of the evening was transacted, a paper was read by Lauretta Nichols. Her subject was "The Struggle for Power between Pope and Emperor." The paper was purely historical, and very instructive, giving a brief account of the Popes to the present time. After general discussion the meeting adjourned to meet Fifth month 19, at the home of Lauretta and Benjamin F. Nichols. Reader, — Joseph Plummer.

WILLIAM C. MOORE, Cor. Sec.

WOODSTOWN, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association of Woodstown held their regular meeting in Friends' meeting-house, Fourth month 27. The president, Mary E. Borton, opened the meeting by reading from the 15th chapter of John. The minutes of the last meeting were read and approved.

Professor J. Russell Smith, of George School, then entertained the audience by giving his lecture, "Friends in the Anti-Slavery Movement," accompanied by lantern slides. The pictures thrown on the canvas could not be otherwise than of great interest to Friends, and added much to his history of the past. The subject, he told us, was a broad one, and could be told but briefly in the time allotted. He spoke of the many Friends who had been interested in the work, and of Whittier's being the only poet of his time to come boldly forth and write for the slave.

This lecture was along the line of work lately gone over by the Association, and was much appreciated by them. After the announcement of the program for the next meeting, and a period of silence, the meeting adjourned.

E. L. D., Secretary.

WESTERN FIRST-DAY SCHOOL UNION.—Western First-day School Union was held at New Garden, Pa., on the 22d of Fourth month, and was felt by all to have been a very interesting and instructive occasion.

The eleven schools included in the Union sent statistical reports. The morning session was devoted to the transaction of the regular business, and in the afternoon the following program was carried out: A valuable paper on "Inspiration and its Use," by Annie M. Lawrence; "Concrete Teaching," by Jane P. Rushmore; a "Talk on the Lesson Leaves," by M. Florence Yeatman, and Henry S. Kent, who was in attendance by invitation, presented an excellent object lesson on "Seeing and Hearing."

All the exercises were exceedingly interesting and practical, and brought forth much profitable comment. The Union adjourned to meet the fourth Seventh-day in Tenth month next, at London Grove.

W.

MILLVILLE, PA.—The Young Friends' Association convened Fourth month 9, and after a period of silence, the 40th chapter of Isaiah was read by the president. After roll-call the secretary, Mary R. Eck, made her report.

Laura Davis read "The Tapestry Weavers," and Fred Eves "Value of Society Membership." An excellent paper was prepared and read by Edith H. C. Heller, subject "Worship God in the beauty of Holiness." It was appropriately followed by an essay by Anna Wildman on "Life and its Fulness."

Mary R. Eck read from the 11th chapter of the Life and Letters of James and Lucretia Mott. Expressions of appreciation were offered on their helpful lives.

"To what extent are forms and ceremonies helpful to religion at the present time, and is it possible to dispense with them wholly?" This subject was opened by an interesting paper by Ellen Russell. Current events were reported by Jessie John and remarks by William Burgess were followed by adjournment.

F. M. E., Correspondent.

FLEMING, PA.—The Young Friends' Association meeting, Fourth month 16, opened with the reading of a poem, "April," by the president. At roll-call each member gave some particular evidence to prove that the world is growing better. This proved to be an interesting exercise.

The question, "Are our business methods of to-day in harmony with the Christian life?" was considered by Edith W. Cleaver and others. There was quite an interchange of thought on this, some to the effect that, though we are sadly lacking in this respect, yet there is reason for encouragement, for these, like all other devices of mankind, are subject to changes. What we need is to carry our religion with us more into our business affairs.

"What can we, as a body, do against the alcohol and tobacco habit?" was referred to Florence N. Cleaver, who simply referred it to others, asking for information. A number participated in the discussion, and the prevailing opinion was that we should encourage home influence. It is there the work should be accomplished, then the influence will go out to others.

Sue Underwood read some account of the "National University" proposed to be erected at Washington.

Individual opinions concerning the book "In His Steps" were given by Jennie Fisher, and others. We believe that the work is calculated to do much good, making religion practical, instead of theoretical. Those who had read the book testified to the benefit they had derived from it.

"The Waiting Light" was read by Mary J. Fisher. "Prophecies of Easter," by Florence N. Cleaver, and "A Moment in the Morning," by the secretary.

Lucretia M. Way, of Half Moon, was present; her encouraging words were much appreciated. Closed with silence.

N. M. FISHER, Sec.

ALL the days of the week are used as days of rest: Christians use "Sunday"; Greeks, "Monday"; Persians, "Tuesday"; Assyrians, "Wednesday"; Egyptians, "Thursday"; Turks, "Friday"; Jews, "Saturday."

Educational Department.

BALTIMORE FRIENDS' SCHOOL.

THE corner-stone of the new building for Friends' School in Baltimore was laid on the 24th ult. (A description of the building, as proposed, appeared in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, Third month 25.)

In the corner-stone, in a copper box, were placed circulars of Friends' School, Park Avenue, from 1889 to 1899, containing names of teachers and students and school committees; catalogue and circulars of Friends' Elementary and High School, 1866, 1867, 1868, and 1898-1899; photographs of the teachers and students in the primary department of Friends' School, Park Avenue; copies of Friends' Discipline; copies of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, and other newspapers; names of school and building committees; professors and teachers for 1899-1900, and architect and contractors of school building, etc.

Jonathan K. Taylor, chairman of the building committee, and also of the school committee, put the stone in place, and spoke briefly, saying in conclusion: "In the presence of the Creator of the Universe and this company of spectators we have laid the corner-stone of the Friends' new school, Park Avenue and Laurens street. And now may our united prayers ascend to Him who is ever ready and willing to listen to his children that the act thus performed may redound to the benefit of mankind and to the glory of God."

After the laying of the stone, the large company present adjourned to the lecture-room, where a number of persons spoke, including Jonathan K. Taylor; Prof. John W. Gregg, of New York, who is to be principal of the new school; Eli M. Lamb, Principal of Friends' Elementary and High School; Alice C. Robinson, Dr. O. Edward Janney, Dr. Henry Branch, of the Ellicott City Presbyterian Church, and Dr. E. S. Todd, of the Strawbridge M. E. Church.

By arrangements recently consummated the new school is to unite with itself the Friends' Elementary and High School, conducted by Eli M. Lamb. The equipment of Professor Lamb's school, now on McCulloh street, has been purchased by the committee, and all of the interests of that school will be transferred to the new school, which will be known as the Park Avenue Elementary and High School. Eli M. Lamb becomes Associate Principal.

The corps of professors and teachers will also include John W. Gregg, principal, and Prof. Stephen C. Harry, mathematics and astronomy; Frances E. Hartley, classics; Rachel E. Lamb, rhetoric; Emma J. Broomell, elocution, literature, etc. Primary teachers, Helen H. Ely and Louisa P. Blackburn; kindergarten, Hannah T. Yardley, Dora Curtiss, and Louise Thomas. The school will be opened in Ninth month next.

CHANGES IN TEACHERS.

A. Davis Jackson, of Lancaster county, Pa., now a student at Swarthmore College, in the graduating class, has been appointed Principal of the Locust Valley Academy, L. I., for the coming year. He has had experience as a teacher, at George School, (where he graduated in the Class of 1895), and previous to his attendance there.

Belle Hannum, who has been for two years Principal of Bacon Academy, Woodstown, has been appointed at George School to the vacancy caused by the retirement of Mary Underhill, teacher of mathematics.

Reuben Grant Bennett, who has been for two years Principal of Friends' Academy of Locust Valley, has been appointed at George School, to fill the vacancy caused by the retirement of Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, in the department of Physics and Chemistry. He was highly commended by Dr. Hoadley and Dr. Day for his work at Swarthmore, which included original investigation of importance.

Anna M. Ambler, teacher of Latin and mathematics at Abington Friends' School for some years past, has resigned, and has been appointed Principal of Friends' School at Camden, N. J.

Carlie McClure, who has been Principal of Friends' School at Salem, N. J., for two years past, will leave that position at the close of the present school year to accept one in Friends' Academy at Locust Valley, L. I. She is a Swarthmore graduate, of the Class of 1893.

FRIENDS' SCHOOL AT PLYMOUTH.—The success of Friends' School at Plymouth has been encouraging, the Norristown Herald says. "Improvements were made last year and the previous year. Those in charge are seriously considering the propriety of putting an additional story on the building."

The school is in charge of Prof. Benjamin Smith, assisted by Helen Livezey.

LITERARY NOTES.

HEADLEY BROS., of London, have just published "The Story of William Penn," by Frances E. Cooke, author of "An American Hero," etc. It is a biography, in easy and familiar style, of the great Founder of our Commonwealth, (would that we had him back in direction of our affairs!) and has several pictures,—among them the interesting old farmhouse, still standing, called King's Farm, near Amersham, Bucks, where Penn and Gulielm Maria Springett were married in 1672.

We have no doubt the little volume (price in London 1 shilling, 6 pence), will be read with pleasure by many who would not care to take the time for the more extended biographies. We could have suggested some corrections in statements of fact, especially in the early part of the narrative. The description (p. 2) of Captain Penn, (later the Admiral), as becoming "wealthy," and building himself "a house on Tower Hill," is quite misleading, as, also, is the inference (p. 3) that he first fought, in the navy, on the royalist side, the fact being that the navy, when the breach between King and Parliament occurred, was promptly secured by the latter, and never supported the royalist cause. On page 11, Buda should be Breda, and on page 79, the lieutenant of the Tower is called Sir William, instead of Sir John, Robinson. (His name is correctly given on page 86.)

In Scribner's Magazine, this month, Senator Hoar continues his Political Reminiscences. He speaks in this installment of Senator Sumner's death, and pays his character a deserved tribute. "It has been said," he says, that Charles Sumner was not practical. He was the most practical of modern statesmen. Everything he did ought to have been done; everything he tried to do and failed to do ought to have been done. The progress of the cause of the negro stopped when he died."

Joel Chandler Harris continues his "Chronicles of Aunt Minervy Ann,"—sketches of Southern life; and F. Hopkinson Smith has a pleasant article, "Between Showers in Dort," describing and illustrating the little old Dutch town.

Professor Angelo Heilprin, of the Philadelphia Academy of Natural Sciences, one of our best-known geographers, is the author of a series of illustrated papers on "Alaska and the Klondike," the first of which appears in this month's issue of the Popular Science Monthly. In the same number, Ira Remsen, professor of chemistry at Johns Hopkins University, and one of the leading chemists of the country, treats of liquid air.

The Atlantic Monthly opens with an article upon the Australian Extensions of Democracy, by H. de R. Walker, who discusses the management of affairs, especially financial, in the five great Pacific colonies of England. Professor William James concludes his "Talks to Teachers" on Psychological subjects with a discussion of the Will in its double shape of impulsion and inhibition, action and restraint, and shows the complicated and contradictory actions that result from these complex conditions. Jacob A. Riis, in "The Battle with the Slum," picturesquely details the advances that have been made in New York during the last twenty years in improving the condition of the helpless poor, the difficulties encountered, the opposition overcome, and the reasons for hope that the good work and the good results will remain permanent.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

- THROUGH NATURE TO GOD. By John Fiske. Pp. 195. $1.00. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (Received through John Wanamaker, Philadelphia.)
- HISTORY OF THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD COMPANY, with Plan of Organization, Portraits of Officials, and Biographical Sketches. By William Bender Wilson. In Two Volumes. Illustrated. Pp. vi. and 418; vii. and 322. $5.00. Philadelphia: H. T. Coates & Co.
- THADDEUS STEVENS. By Samuel W. McCall. (American Statesmen.) Pp. vii. and 369. $1.25. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.
- JAMES RUSSELL LOWELL AND HIS FRIENDS. By Edward Everett Hale. With Portraits, Facsimiles, and other Illustrations. Pp. viii. and 303. $3.00. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (Received through H. T. Coates & Co.)

FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS CONFERENCE.

A GENERAL CONFERENCE of Young Friends' Associations will be held in Race Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Second-day, Fifth month 15, 1899, at 8 p. m.

Addresses: "The Religious and Public Life of William Penn," Gilbert L. Hall, Swarthmore Association; Discussion opened by Daniel Willits, Trenton Association. "William Penn and His Holy Experiment," Joseph S. Walton, Philadelphia Association, Discussion opened by New York-Brooklyn Association. Wm. W. BIRDSALL, Chairman.

ALICE LEE BARNES, Secretary.

ANNA S. ATKINSON, Secretary Executive Com.

THE DOUKHOBORS.

THE steamship Lake Superior was expected to leave Larnaka, on the 19th ult., for Quebec, with the whole of the Cyprus colony on board. She is now nearly due at Quebec. On the same day the Lake Huron was to leave England for Batoum, at the eastern extremity of the Black Sea, to take on board about 2,000 more from the Kars district, to proceed also to Canada.

The English Friend, Wilson Sturge, reports all well among the Cyprus emigrants. He will probably stay some two months longer in the island, to arrange for the harvesting of the crops and the disposal of the farms.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

THE article on Highlands Creek Meeting, published in the INTELLIGENCER some weeks ago, was contributed by E. Hicks Trueblood, not by Ellwood Trueblood. (The name was given E. H. Trueblood.) A suggestion in a friend's letter leads us to mention this.

A subscriber in California says: "The INTELLIGENCER, we feel, is a source of strength and comfort to us in our home so far from our old friends, and we are especially pleased with the share it has taken in reference to the war with Spain, and with the—to me—inexcusable course that has been followed in the Philippines."

Prof. Benjamin F. Battin and his wife, who were for several months at Berlin, engaged in study, have gone to Jana. We have some interesting notes from Prof. B., on the bird life of that part of Germany, which we will print next week.

Mary Travilla and Sarah R. Paiste, of West Chester, Pa., are among the company of those who are purposing to go abroad for the summer. They will sail on the 10th of next month, in company with Dr. Hull and wife, of Swarthmore.

NEW YORK NOTES.

At a meeting of the Board of Managers of "The Penington," on the 29th ult., arrangements were completed for the purchase of the house and lot No. 215 East 15th street, immediately adjoining Fifteenth Street Friends' meeting-house, now occupied by "The Penington." After the yearly meeting has been held, at which time all the available space for "The Penington" is already engaged, the managers have decided to make alterations and additions which will materially increase its facilities for the entertainment of Friends and Friendly people. It already fills a place of usefulness much appreciated by Friends.

The Young Friends' Association of Plainfield Meeting had their meeting on Fourth-day evening, at which Aaron M. Powell, by invitation, read a paper on "Elias Hicks,—the Preacher, the Philanthropist, and the Man."

ADDRESS BY DR. JOSEPH MAY.

At the rooms of the Universal Peace Union, 1305 Arch St., Philadelphia, Fourth month 28. Stenographic report for FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, by George B. Cock. (Dr. Joseph May is minister of the First Unitarian Church of Philadelphia.)

OUR gathering here to-day, as we are doing, a little company, while the city is full of excitement in the celebration of a representative military character, expresses our moral attitude. We cannot—at least I cannot—even by participating outwardly in such an occasion, I cannot any longer, even by looking on at such a great parade, give my countenance to anything that glorifies war.

I have not always seen the truth of this position so clearly as I see it to-day; yet I am not wholly unworthy of the terms in which I have been welcomed; and to-day I feel myself to be in the extreme sense a peace man. It is hard to be shut out, even by what seem to us the truest and highest sentiments from the great, prevailing sympathies of our people; and there is something in the cheer of a popular festival like that of to-day which by warming our hearts can and does, unquestionably, enkindle some sentiments that are worthy and are beneficial.

As to the great Civil War, the memories of which are stirred again to-day, certainly it is more nearly justified in my judgment than any other. It presents a very difficult question to one who feels that all war is crime. But if it could not have been avoided when it came, even that war might have been averted; and how much better so! It was pointed out very strikingly in an address in this city some years ago by the Hon. Andrew D. White, now ambassador to Germany, a man not only of warm human sympathies, but of the broadest culture, and especially of the profoundest historical learning,—it was pointed out how much better it would have been, if, before the causes of the great Civil War came to a head in an actual conflict, our citizens could have come together and jointly agreed upon such measures and upon such sacrifices on the part of the whole nation, as might have prevented that war. "Suppose," he said, "the nation had accepted the cost of emancipating all the slaves then in the country, what an enormous economy of money, and how the two sections would have been drawn together by the generous consent of the northern section to assume a portion of the losses which emancipation would have imposed upon the southern one." Coming from such a man, the suggestion was to me most striking. And just so, also, of the American Revolution. Mr. White, on that occasion clearly hinted, and other scholars have indicated, how much better it would have been if our fathers could have kept their patience under great provocations yet a little while longer. They had the best sentiment of England with them; they had many of the greatest and most influential English statesmen with them. There is every reason to believe that it might have been possible to avert the terribly desolating and exhausting war which actually followed.

MORAL EFFECTS OF WAR.

The worst consequences of war are always its moral effects. No matter how justifiable its causes, war always lowers the finer moral tone of peoples. And this was perfectly true of the Revolutionary War. It left among our people a legacy of hatred which those of my age can well remember. I was brought up in Lexington, where the first bloody encounter of the war took place; and even the schoolboys of that period,—a period more than half a century after the war,—were filled and permeated with antipathy to the very name and thought of everything British. The Revolution also left us a legacy of false pride, which has been most injurious to our national character.

The Civil War seemed to leave less moral evil than either of the others in which we have been engaged. I think it did leave less, simply because its causes were really of a higher character. Our armies quickly disbanded; the North quickly forgave the South, and reinstated her in fellowship; our nation seemed, indeed, ennobled in some respects, through the self-sacrificing spirit in which thousands and thousands of men had gone forth to uphold the government. But we have lately seen, I think, that that war also bequeathed to us of its evils. Especially it is plain that it sowed the seeds of militarism in our people; it made the military class prominent and influential; it gave us renewed and dangerous confidence in military methods. The young of the generations since have grown up in an atmosphere of admiration for military power and for military heroes like Grant, Sherman, and Sheridan, which caused our youth last year to respond to the government's call with an alacrity which was wholly unjustified by the objects of the Spanish War. The humanitarian sentiment throughout the country, with a marvelous inconsistency, accepted war as its practical expression.

I will not speak of the War with Spain except generally. Grant every reason ever alleged for it, and it remains certain that it need not have been waged. Spain was manifestly yielding to all our demands, reasonable and unreasonable: a little patience and she was certain to consent to evacuate her possessions in this hemisphere. Last summer I read an article in the London Times—an editorial—in which it was said that "If the Americans had been better accustomed to the language of diplomacy they would have seen that Spain was yielding to their demands just as fast as a nation could;" and I have no doubt this was strictly correct. That great paper, in other words, perceived that there was no occasion for our entering upon a war; or, at any rate, that it might have been postponed. Religion and humanity called upon us at least to move more slowly. Common sense urged us to delay military action until we were better ready. Had we done so, had we delayed four or five months, there would have been no war; for Spain would have yielded. But, my friends, our politicians did not want that: they wanted war, for political reasons; and I believe for commercial ones. They hurried it on; and—what we have most to deplore—there proved to be so much of the war-spirit among our people that it was accepted with eagerness.

THE WAR IN THE PHILIPPINES.

Of our present war in the Philippines I can only speak in terms of utmost horror and reprobation. It seems to me to have no justification whatever. It is a war of aggression, pure and simple. Mr. Frye said last night in New York "The Philippine territory is honestly ours,"—"ours," as Mr. Croker said, "by right of conquest;" but there is not even that right; the islands have never been conquered by us, nor even by Spain. But even if we succeed in conquering them, (as I suppose we shall go on to do), that will give us no right over them. The burglar who overcomes a householder, and secures his booty, has no more right to it than before he entered the house. Admitting it was right for us to destroy the Spanish fleet, that act gave us no right to appropriate the lands of the Filipinos, and to impose on them a government not invited nor accepted by themselves. There was never a more absurd, as well as unprincipled, bargain since Judas betrayed his Master, than ours, to buy from Spain for $20,000,000 the title to subjugate the Filipinos. It was not even necessary; neither the exigencies nor the laws of war imposed such a payment upon us. I never heard of money being thrown away by Americans so utterly and rashly as that $20,000,000. It is most plain what we should have done,—not to have required the Filipinos to submit to us as our first condition, but to have said to them: "Now we are here and have driven your oppressors away from you, if we can serve you as a sister people, if we can help you to establish free institutions and a stable government,—we will gladly do it in the spirit of sisterhood."

THE FILIPINO RIGHTS.

But it was said the Filipinos are not fit for self-government. How do we know that? And if it be true, how would it give us the right to attack them, to waste their lands, destroy their wealth, and efface the civilization they had achieved? They could not have done worse by one another than we have already done by them. The most we were justified in doing was that we should offer our assistance,—even the assistance, if you please, of our military power,—to defend them from the aggressions of others. Had we done this in good faith, no doubt it would have been accepted; but from the beginning we plainly showed the spirit of conquerors and the purpose of conquest. Very soon our officers, inspired, probably, by our Administration, refused all coöperation with the Filipinos; at Washington their representatives were coldly repulsed; their remarkable memorials (which sounded strikingly like the documents of our Revolutionary fathers), were uncivilly rejected; our Administration took distinctly the attitude of despotism toward them. There seems much reason to believe that our Administration privately cherished the intention of taking possession of the Philippine Islands before ever Admiral Dewey sailed to Manila. It is not much wonder that the Filipinos attacked our force as they did. It was incredibly foolish in them; but even that should not have led a mighty nation to the prosecution of a desolating war upon a people manifestly so inferior, and contending for the very principles on which we pride ourselves as those on which our nation is founded. Suppose their attack forcibly repelled: we ought then to have forgiven it, and still to have held out to them the hand of fraternal kindness and help. It would have been an example of magnanimity which would have electrified the world, and would have promoted the democratic idea incalculably through the manifestation of our confidence in it, and as a noble fruit of free principles as realized among us. Now we have proclaimed to the world that while we maintain our own political freedom we have no general confidence in democratic principles. The very first time we have come into contact with a population outside our own continent in such a way as to test our republicanism we have discarded our fundamental principles and thrown them to the winds. Nothing could more have discouraged the populations of Europe from their aspirations to political freedom than our present attitude and conduct in the Philippines.

Let me incidentally point out another of the legacies of warfare and of our infidelity to our principles here at home. Since our first ancestors landed on this continent we have been in relations with one, and almost all the time with two, inferior races. Nothing could exceed the inconsistency with our religious and political principles shown in the way in which the population of America have, from the beginning till this moment, treated the Indians and the negroes. Recent efforts at their education have shown it to have been always perfectly practicable to civilize and educate both those races to respectable citizenship. Both Indians and negroes, at the Hampton, Carlisle, Tuskegee, and other schools rapidly civilize. It is actually wonderful that centuries of degradation and oppression still leave in them the capacity so quickly to become civilized men and useful citizens. This being the case, my friends, what an utter disgrace it is to the generations of our predecessors and to ourselves that the condition of those two races has remained as it has been almost till now! How inefficient our Christianity! How cold our humanitarianism! How little we have had of the spirit of brotherhood which should have impelled us to share with them the advantages we ourselves possessed! What might we not have done in four centuries,—or two centuries,—if we had made it our duty to raise those peoples to the level of civilized and Christian manhood! But you know their pitiable histories. It is hardly yet a generation since we were holding the blacks as slaves and denying them every right of human nature. The Indians we maltreated in almost every possible way; and through incessant warfare and under cruel oppression have almost exterminated them. I heard General Miles himself say, and emphatically repeat, that in all his experience among the Indians, every single warlike outbreak of theirs had been caused by the injustice, dishonesty and cruelty of the white men. That great soldier declared there need never have been any trouble with the Indians had they only been treated with justice, consideration, and strict honesty, and with fidelity to agreements made with them. Nothing could have been more emphatic than the language that he used. But instead of sincere, brotherly, affectionate efforts to educate them and to make them citizens, we have kept them uncivilized; robbed them of their natural rights and maintained a perpetual warfare with them, which has destroyed the majority of them and kept up in them all the worst sentiments towards us.

(Conclusion to Follow.)

STORIES FROM MT. PLEASANT "SHELTER."

In the Laing School Visitor, for Fourth month, A. M. N., (Anna M. Nicholas, teacher of industries, etc.), tells the following pathetic stories of the old people who have "passed on."

DADDY PETER.

THE winter has been one of quite unusual severity; and all the extremely poor—and especially the aged—have suffered untold miseries induced by the frosts and the cold.

Those at the "Shelter," although more comfortable than many others, have found the demand upon their feeble stock of vitality too great to be met.

"Daddy" Peter Washington kept up bravely, until after the death of Mary Palmer, whose grave he helped to dig; but when the "big freeze" of February came, and the snow lay upon the ground for three days, his strength rapidly declined, and he kept his room for a few days. Then "he done tuck to he bed," as Nancy said, and it became evident that he was nearing his end.

We did all that we could, and his friends rallied about him; then dropsy set in, and a fortnight more of "hard trial" closed his earthly career. He was the first inmate of the Shelter, and was much over ninety years old; he was sadly missed by the others.

MARY BERRY.

"I was a stranger, and ye took me in." We spoke in the February Visitor of the entrance of an old negress—Mary Berry—into the Shelter. She had walked a long distance, leaving nothing behind "wort totin along, missus."

She said in her expressive language, "I's been too hard punish by de frost." And indeed a running ulcer upon her leg, brought on by cold and impoverished blood, and her weak and starved condition, attested to the truth of her assertion. She was safely domiciled in "Daddy's" vacant room, where she sank down upon a cot, and rested and slept away the rest of the day.

Old Tira and Sallie were very attentive and sympathetic, bringing her some of their best to tempt her to eat. For two days Tira watched the new comer, and talked to and questioned her. Old reminiscences came to both, and they suddenly recognized each other as long-separated sisters-in-law, Tira having married Mary's brother away back in old "slavery days." They literally fell upon each other's necks, and great indeed was the rejoicing; Tira insisted upon her sharing the half of her room made vacant by the death of Mary Palmer.

Here the two old women visited and chatted over the old times and relationships, and acquaintances, much as two of their more cultured white sisters would have done, and enjoyed each other's companionship.

But days of rest and comfort could not overcome the effects of her long and terrible "punishment," and one day, after the doctor had pronounced her "much improved," an unlooked for stroke of paralysis ended her plans of happiness in the "Shelter," in the society of "my own dear sister," as she styled Tira.

We buried her on Friday, and felt truly sorry for the old woman, now more lonely than ever, after parting with the sister so long lost and so lately found.

This is the fourth weary old pilgrim buried from the "Old People's Shelter," since its opening in November, 1897.

CURRENT EVENTS.

DISPATCHES from Manila, on the 28th ult., announced that two Filipinos, officers on the staff of General Luna, who has been in command of their forces, or a part of them, came through the American lines with a flag of truce, that morning, to consult with General Otis on terms of peace. They asked for a time in which the Filipino Congress might assemble, to consider the situation. General Otis is understood to have refused the overture, and said he did not recognize the existence of a Filipino government. The two officers told him that if peace was forced upon them by further fighting it would not be permanent.

A FURTHER conference between General Otis and the Filipino officers in Manila, on the 29th, was fruitless, Otis declining the Filipinos' proposition for a three weeks' cessation of hostilities, to enable them to summon their Congress. "Full amnesty" was, however, promised by him. It was "believed that the envoys would return with fresh propositions." The Congress was to meet on the 1st instant at San Fernando, a place north of Malolos, at which the "capital" has been fixed.

A STATEMENT prepared at the War Department shows that 198 men were killed in the Philippines from February 4 to April 28, and 1,111 wounded; a total of 1,309. The number who died of disease is not stated. Filipino prisoners report that there are 75,000 refugees north of San Fernando, and that smallpox is spreading among them.

STILL later dispatches from Manila announce that Aguinaldo repudiates the supposed "peace" overtures, alluded to above. He has telegraphed to the Filipino Junta at London that his "government" has nothing to do with the present negotiations, and that under no circumstances will he accept an American protectorate. Some of the military authorities at Manila have expressed the opinion that the movements of the Filipinos are meant to "gain time," as the rainy season is now beginning, when the operations of the United States troops will be increasingly difficult, and this is not at all unlikely.

THE payment of the $20,000,000 due to Spain in settlement of the terms of the Paris treaty was made on the 29th ult. Four Treasury warrants of $5,000,000 each were given to Jules Cambon, the French Ambassador at Washington, who has represented Spain in all the negotiations.

THE report of the Wade Court of Inquiry was made to the Secretary of War on the 29th ultimo, but its contents will not be made public until it has been read by the President. It is said, however, that it finds that the charges of General Miles against the refrigerated beef are not sustained by the evidence, and that the "canned roast beef" was good when supplied to the Government, being spoiled by unfavorable conditions.

THE widow of the late Robert Louis Stevenson, the English author, has written an earnest letter condemning the "shelling" and slaughter of the natives in the Samoan Islands, especially at and near Apia, by the English and American war-ships, in the present complications there. Her son, Lloyd Osbourne, (step-son of R. L. Stevenson), has also written to much the same effect. They regard the old chief, Mataafa, whom the English and American officials will not recognize, as the true leader of the Samoans, and the one whom the people desire for king.

THE danger of a war in South Africa between the English forces and the Boer people, (the Transvaal Republic), has been considered serious. Efforts are apparently making by the party headed by Cecil Rhodes to bring about a collision. The increase of the English troops in South Africa is earnestly urged. The Boers have been strengthening their military forces and fortifying their frontier. They have, however, made some concessions to the "Uitlanders," the foreign element engaged in gold-mining. A "monster petition," bearing 21,000 names, had been sent by these people to Queen Victoria, asking the British Government to interfere in their behalf. Lord Salisbury, the English Premier, seems earnestly desirous to keep the peace. Joseph Chamberlain, the Colonial Secretary, a strong "Imperialist," is considered to favor the movement to crush the Boers and their republic.

ENGLAND and Russia have concluded an agreement, calculated to keep the peace in China. It was signed on the 28th ult., at St. Petersburg. The British government undertakes not to press "concessions," railway or other, in the North of China, and the Russians agree to the British demand that no part of the basin of the Yangtse river be alienated. The purpose is to put an end to the battle of "concessions," railway and other, which has been raging for the last two years. The Russians desire to develop the region opened by their great Trans-Siberian railway, and perhaps to borrow money in England for further internal improvements.

IN Parliament, at London, on the 1st instant, Lord Salisbury, in the House of Lords, and A. J. Balfour, in the Commons, announced the conclusion of the agreement at St. Petersburg. Lord Salisbury desired that the particular matter now agreed on should not be overestimated. "But," he said, "I attach very great importance to the signing of this agreement, because it is a sign of the good feeling so desirable between the Governments of Russia and England," and he expressed the hope that the good feeling thus illustrated would extend to the peoples of the two nations, and that it would "lead to future agreements on other matters."

A TORNADO did great damage in Missouri, at the town of Kirksville, in Adair county, in the northern part of the State, on the 27th ultimo. The early reports announced a great loss of life, and later ones confirmed this. The number of dead and fatally injured, it is said, will reach fifty-five, and may be in excess of that, many persons being still missing. The property loss at Kirksville is said to be about $200,000. Two hundred families were made homeless. Newtown, in Sullivan county, also suffered.

A VIOLENT labor disturbance has occurred in Idaho, at a mine at Wardner. A large body of miners, "union" men, who resented the employment of "non union" men, went to the place, on the 29th ultimo, and blew up the reduction mill with powder. The damage done is estimated at $250,000 to $300,000. One man was accidentally killed. Soldiers have been sent to the place.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

PROF. H. V. HILPRECHT, formerly of Philadelphia, and his American exploration party, have resumed operations at Nippur, Babylonia, on the lowest part of the temple of Bel, "Father of the Gods," and hope to settle a number of disputed points. The expedition will be gone two years.

—A monument to Pasteur has been unveiled at Lille, France, the cradle of his discoveries. Many eminent bacteriologists took part in the ceremony, including Prof. Ray Lankester, Prof. Delbruck, of Berlin, and Prince Oldenburg, of St. Petersburg. The statue represents a peasant woman holding up her child, which has just been bitten by a mad dog, to Pasteur, that he may inoculate and save it.

—The California Legislature, at its last session, extended school suffrage to women, with only one dissenting vote in the House and six in the Senate. The bill was strongly supported by President Jordan, of Stanford University, and President Kellogg, of the California State University. California is the twenty-fifth State to give women the school ballot.

—The practical value of the wireless system of telegraphy was shown in England, last week, when the crew of the Goodwin Sands lightship were able to communicate with shore and give warning of the sinking condition of the ship as the result of a collision.

—An internal-revenue tax of $200,000 was paid last week in Boston on the inheritance under the will of Edward Austin, who left an estate valued at $10,000,000. It is said to be the largest individual war-revenue tax ever paid in Massachusetts.

—The Governor of Missouri has signed a bill prohibiting employment of non-residents as deputy sheriffs, deputy constables, or as police officers. The bill is intended to prohibit the importation of Pinkerton detectives to the State.

—An Eastern loan agency, having a branch in St. Louis, reports, the Globe-Democrat says, "that many farmers are taking up their loans which draw seven or eight per cent. and are renewing them at five per cent."

—The German newspapers express the hope that the United States will take advantage of the insurgent peace negotiations and quickly end the war in the Philippines.

—The Treasury Department has ruled that the act excluding Chinese from this country must be enforced to the letter.

No lamp is a good one without the chimney made for it.

Go by the Index.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

Colored Dress Goods

Several lots are offered at substantial reductions—fresh and seasonable fabrics in late and stylish patterns:

Mixed Suitings—of light weight, 43 inches wide, in combinations of blue-and-white, black-and-white, brown-and-white, and green-and-white. Have been $1.00; now 50 cents a yard.

All-wool Suiting Serge—49 inches wide, in navy—very desirable. Has been 75 cents; now 58 cents a yard.

All-wool Check Suitings—in several neat designs, 47 inches wide—just the thing for prevailing style in gowns. Have been $1.00 a yard; now 75 cents.

One special lot of Check Suitings, striped Cheviot Mixtures and Serpentine Novelties—a fine selection of choice fabrics. Have been $1.25 and $1.50; now closing out at $1.00 a yard.

Samples sent upon request.

Mail orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

Hanscoms'. Our prices are the lowest, our variety the most complete, and quality as near perfect as can be had. Shall we mail you a price catalogue for comparison?
No liquors or other offensive goods or methods resorted to.
1311 Market St., Phila.

THREE elephants in the London Zoo earn £2,000 a year, by carrying on their backs the visitors to the Gardens. The elephants are stationed in different parts of the Zoo, and there seems to be a bit of professional jealousy between them. Apparently they are on very good terms between hours, but when business is brisk, and the largest one is coining money, for he is the favorite, the other two try to lash him with their trunks as he passes.

LAST PERSONALLY-CONDUCTED TOUR TO WASHINGTON VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

The last of the present series of Pennsylvania Railroad three-day personally-conducted tours to Washington, D. C., will be run on the 11th of next month (May). The rate, $14.50 from New York, $11.50 from Philadelphia, and proportionate rates from other points, includes transportation, hotel accommodations, and Capitol guide fees. An experienced Chaperon will also accompany the party.

For itineraries, tickets, and full information, apply to ticket agents; Tourist Agent, 1196 Broadway, New York; 789 Broad street, Newark, N. J.; or address Geo. W. Boyd, Assistant General Passenger Agent, Broad Street Station, Philadelphia.

CHARLES BURTON,

Practical House and Sign Painter,

Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street,
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to

CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

JOSEPH T. FOULKE,
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW,

OFFICES: { 623 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.
Ambler, Montgomery Co., Pa.

JOHN FABER MILLER,

325 SWEDR STREET, NORRISTOWN, PENNA.
ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practicing in Montgomery and Philadelphia counties.

NOW READY

The Family of William Penn
Founder of Pennsylvania
Ancestry and Descendants

By Howard M. Jenkins.

AUTHOR OF VOLUME ONE, MEMORIAL HISTORY OF PHILADELPHIA, HISTORICAL COLLECTIONS
RELATING TO GWYNEDD, ETC.

THIS work presents the results of a careful collation of known authorities, consultation of the Friends' records in Great Britain and Ireland, and an examination of the now-unparalleled Collections of Penn Papers in the Library of the Historical Society of Pennsylvania, at Philadelphia.

Some of the information gathered is to be found in fragmentary form in some scores of printed works, many of them rare, but a large part has been drawn from the family letters. These letters, unprinted until used by the Author in the preparation of this work, are necessarily unique.

Apart from any literary merit or demerit, the work is a systematic and practically complete statement of the Ancestry and Posterity of WILLIAM PENN, the Founder, and as such must have a definite and permanent value in the lists of Biography and Genealogy.

*Pp. 270, octavo. 19 full-page illustrations. Handsomely bound. $3.50 net. By mail, 20 cents additional.
*The print is from type, and copies are likely to be scarce.

HOWARD M. JENKINS
PUBLISHER

921 ARCH ST., PHILADELPHIA, PA.

Headley Brothers, 14 Bishopsgate St., Without, London.

Friends' Book Association,
OF PHILADELPHIA

Publishers, Booksellers, Stationers,
Blank Book Manufacturers,
Engravers, and Printers,
Artists' Materials,
Kindergarten, School Supplies.

All Books furnished at as low prices as they can be purchased elsewhere. Friends' Books and Literature a specialty. Also everything relating to the Kindergarten and School.

Swarthmore.

For rent or sale, Queen Anne Cottage, 12 rooms, steam heat, and open fire grates. The location is very delightful, directly overlooking the athletic grounds of the College, and very close to the meeting-house; one acre of ground, and plenty of fruit. Apply to DAVID SCANNELL, 814 Arch Street.

Trade-mark
Cross-Cross
CEREALS

Seven food products—prevent and relieve diabetes, dyspepsia, debility, etc. Ask dealers. Unlike all others. Look for cross-cross lines. Pamphlet and sample offer mailed free.
FARWELL & RHINES, Watertown, N. Y., U. S. A.

K. C. WHOLE WHEAT FLOUR.
Prevents constipation and liver troubles.
GLUTEN CRISPS,
New health breakfast food.
PANSY Pastry Flour, Finest made.
FARWELL & RHINES, Watertown, N. Y., U. S. A.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

ASTOR LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATION LIBRARY

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 13, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 19.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XIX.

THE danger [of "love of money"] depends not upon how much a man has, but upon how much his heart is set upon what he has, and upon accumulating more.

From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, Advices on Liberality and Benevolence.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

SONNET: LIFE.

I SEEMED to see the children of the earth,
Each soul a shining star,—each heart a flower ;
And every soul with wierd, unearthly power
Sent forth its spectral ray ; some souls gave birth
To glorious halos,—others in their dearth
Of sparkling radiance, feebly seemed to glower ;
Such souls as these wore each a withered flower,
And by the flowers knew I grief and mirth.
One face I loved, in beauty bright and fair,
No golden halo showed, and hidden there
A cankered bud disclosed a heart of pride ;
While one I had forgotten seemed to shine,
And showed a heartsease in its light divine,
More perfect far than all the rest beside.

SARAH P. BYRNES.

Paris, April 7, 1899.

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.

ON the 9th day of Third month, 1826, he was married to Elizabeth Janney, daughter of John and Elizabeth Janney. The latter were not living at the time, the mother having died when Elizabeth was seven years of age, and the father when she was nineteen. Accompanied by his second wife, he had gone to the West Indies in search of health, but died on the return voyage, and was buried at sea.

The wedding ceremony of Samuel M. and Elizabeth Janney took place in the Friends' meeting-house in Alexandria in the presence of a large number of their friends and relatives. A goodly company of the elderly Friends were entertained at the wedding dinner, by the step-mother of Elizabeth Janney, and a still larger number of young people in the evening. Then followed a series of "companies," given in honor of this popular young couple, by their numerous friends and relatives in that aristocratic, hospitable old Virginia town.

The wedding journey which they took a few weeks afterwards was quite an extended one for that day, when much of the traveling was by stage and canal boat. Samuel M. Janney's account of it is preserved. They went to New York, and up the Hudson as far as Albany. The steamboat was crowded with Friends returning to their homes from New York Yearly Meeting, some of them having come from Canada. From Albany they took a hack, and went to New Lebanon Springs, where they climbed to the summit of the highest hill, and were well repaid by the view of the valley below. A little beyond Lebanon, embowered in green trees, was the Shaker village, where our travelers were hospitably entertained. They were struck with the perfect neatness which everywhere prevailed, and purchased several articles of Shaker handiwork. Among them was the silver pen with which Samuel M. Janney wrote the account of their wedding journey. They proceeded in a hack going to Troy, Saratoga, Glen's Falls, and Lake George. On the way they stopped at Glen's Falls to visit a cave which had attained celebrity as the place where Cooper located one of his most interesting scenes in "The Last of the Mohicans." It is said to be the cave, where Cora and her companions were concealed from the Indians, and afterwards captured by them.

Next they traveled westward by canal boat to Utica, visited Trenton Falls, took stage for Auburn and Rochester, visiting Genesee Falls, and then by packet boat went to Lockport, Buffalo, and Niagara Falls. They visited the Tuscarora Indians, who had a reservation of six thousand acres of land, and then numbered about two hundred and sixty Indians. While there they visited, in his own cabin "Cusick," a Tuscarora chief and interpreter, and a man of much respectability in the tribe. He was a professing Christian. In the war of the Revolution he had been under Lafayette's command. In speaking of him, Cusick used to say : " Many a time in the battle I threw myself between him and the bullets, for I loved him." He held a lieutenant's commission from General Washington, that entitled him to a pension, which he received for several years. Then Congress passed a law that the recipients of such pensions should swear that they could not live without the pension. This the old chief refused to do. He said "now here is my little log cabin and it's my own ; here's my patch, where I can raise corn and beans and pumpkins ; and there is Lake Oneida, where I can catch fish ; with these I can make out to live without the pension, and to say I could not, would be to lie to the Great Spirit." So the pension was given up.

The travelers resumed their journey by taking steamboat down the St. Lawrence river, passing the group known as "The Thousand Islands," but which really comprises one thousand six hundred and ninety-two islands. Reaching Montreal, they visited the French Catholic Cathedral, and saw the service performed by about one hundred priests and attendants, who were dressed in the most splendid apparel. Samuel M. Janney says: "The chanting of so many voices in unison with the peals of a fine organ had an imposing effect, as they echoed and reverberated through the aisles, and along the vaulted roof of this extensive building. But the forms and gestures made use of appeared to be absurd in the extreme and foreign to the simplicity and meekness of Christianity." The travelers visited at Montreal also the Convent of the "Gray Nuns."

Their next point was Quebec and the Falls of Montmorency. Then by stage they traveled through the New England States to Boston, where they spent several days in sight-seeing. While there on First-day afternoon, being the 9th of Seventh month, they went to a Unitarian church to hear a eulogy on the life and character of John Adams, who had died on the 4th of the month. They now proceeded (again by stage) to New Bedford and Fall River, and by steamboat through Long Island Sound to New York. After spending a day or two in that city they went to the Catskill Mountain House, and visited the Falls. The wild and romantic scenery of these mountains was fully appreciated. Returning to the Hudson river, they went on board "the elegant barge, Lady Clinton," in the afternoon, and the next morning found themselves again in New York. After making a short stay here they proceeded homeward.

They were absent fifty-eight days and traveled two thousand, eight hundred and thirty-four miles. It was, it will be seen, a remarkable journey for a young couple of the Society of Friends, in that day, and as such is worthy of this much notice.

Speaking in his later years of his marriage, Samuel M. Janney said: "It has resulted in a union that I regard as the greatest of my temporal blessings. In prosperity and adversity she has been a safe counsellor, a sympathizing companion, and a help-meet, steadfast in love and devotion." The result of this union was eight children, of whom four died in infancy, and one after reaching manhood. After the loss of these children, he said, in a letter of condolence to a friend who had lost all of her children: "It seems to me we have a deeper interest in the future life, since we have contributed the pure, innocent spirits of our children to augment the number who have entered the mansions of bliss."

In the year 1828, he entered into partnership with his brother-in-law Samuel H. Janney to build and conduct a cotton factory at Occoquan, Va. For the two years following he continued to reside in Alexandria, they having a commercial house in that city. He then removed to Occoquan, and for the next nine years regularly attended the Alexandria Meeting, generally going on horseback. Their inexperience in the business, failing health, and other causes combined to make this venture an unsuccessful one.

MEADOW LAWN. SAMUEL M. JANNEY'S HOME.

He purchased the place and removed there, after leaving the boarding-school, Springdale, which was closed in the spring of 1853. At Meadow Lawn he resided until his death. It is about a hundred yards from the meeting-house.

Twice after engaging in this business, was he compelled by slight hemorrhages from the lungs to seek the healing waters of the Red Sulphur Springs, in Monroe county, West Virginia. The first time he went on horseback, a distance of 350 miles, and with his ink-horn fastened to his saddle in front of him, beguiled the tedious hours of travel with writing. The second time that he made the journey, he went in a carriage, accompanied by his wife and other members of his family. The result of both journeys was very beneficial. More than a quarter of a century later, he and his wife accompanied their invalid son John to the Red Sulphur, making the journey in carriage, taking with them also a saddle horse. Again did the waters have a remarkable healing effect.

His first appearance in the ministry was in the year 1832, in the Alexandria meeting. He took for his text: "The Lord is in his Holy Temple, let all the earth keep silence before him."

His first published work was "Conversations on Religious Subjects between a Father and his Two Sons." A few years later he published a small volume of Poems. He was encouraged by his friends to do so, and the edition of one thousand copies was readily disposed of. His taste for poetry, however, gradually declined, and he concluded that he would succeed better in prose. This proved to be the case.

In 1839 he removed to Loudoun county, Va., for the purpose of opening a boarding school for girls.

"Springdale" was about a quarter of a mile from Goose Creek meeting-house, and a path which led across a little stream, through the field, and over a stile, was trodden twice a week by the "Springdale girls," perhaps thirty in number, with the teacher bringing up the rear.

This employment of teaching was so much more congenial to him than a commercial life that the change brought great peace to his mind.

The heavy cloud which hung over him at this time was his inability to meet all of his indebtedness before leaving Occoquan. But he determined in time to pay it all, and for twenty years he patiently labored to be able to say that he owed no man anything. And he succeeded. In all those years of struggle, he says that he "had the hearty sympathy and affectionate aid of his wife, who generously allowed the income from her own estate to be appropriated to the payment of his debts." The writer of this article well remembers the last work that he did for the accomplishment of this object. He was engaged in writing his important work, the Life of William Penn. When, in the narrative, he reached the time of the death of Penn, he became so deeply absorbed in the recital, the whole scene became so real to him, that he was entirely oblivious as to time. He forgot that it was Fifth-day morning and the time of meeting. When it suddenly occurred to him, he put on his hat and with his quick step went up the hill to Goose Creek meeting-house, where the meeting had for some time been in session. Going to his usual place at the head of the meeting, he explained and apologized for being so late, took his seat, and no doubt held sweet communion with the All-Father.

(To be Continued.)

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

NO. 21.—FIFTH MONTH 21.

THE NOMADS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord is slow to anger and plenteous in mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression.—Numbers, xiv., 18.

Scripture Reading.—Exodus, xxxiv., 1–14.

THE sojourn at the oasis of Sinai was of about a year's duration. In the course of it there occurred an outbreak of idolatry, a portion of the people making for themselves an idol like those worshipped in Egypt, and performing before it the idolatrous rites to which they had, perhaps, been accustomed in their days of slavery. This occurred during a temporary absence of Moses, but with the sanction of his brother Aaron, who had been left to represent him. The authority of Moses was sufficient, on his return, to restore order, and the image was destroyed. It seems possible that Aaron, however, nursed some sense of injury and anger, for we find him concerned a few months later in a seditious movement against the authority of Moses. (Numbers, xii.)

The organization of the nation which took place during the sojourn at Sinai was very simple. Seventy elders were selected who acted as judges in cases of dispute, all matters of importance being subject to appeal to Moses. The army, too, was reduced to a certain simple order with captains and other officers. As previously stated, the nation was divided into five groups for ease of sustenance. (Numbers, ii.) The religious organization was also simple, and, as is almost always true among Semites, was closely related to the social organization. Certain families were set aside as a religious order, a certain part of the army to guard the ark of the covenant, and a certain portion of the nation to camp immediately about the tabernacle. The ark and the tabernacle which contained it can hardly have reached the elaboration described in Exodus xxv., xxvi., during the nomadic period. Probably the latter was at first no more than an ordinary tent set apart for religious purposes. (Exodus xxxiii., 7.) The ark contained the stone tablets having the ten commandments upon them, and certain other objects connected with the religious experiences of the Israelites. In the course of time the rude tent was to grow into the grandeur of Solomon's temple. For this nomadic period it was the rallying-point of the loyalty of the new-made nation.

"And it came to pass on the twentieth day of the second month in the second year . . . the children of Israel took their journeys out of the wilderness of Sinai." Their course lay northward toward the promised land of their inheritance. Their movements were slow and the journey was broken by numerous stops at the oases of the wilderness. At one point they were smitten by a plague which killed many. (Numbers, xi.) At another occurred the plotting of Aaron and Miriam against their greater brother. (Numbers, xii.) Their sedition was a failure, and Moses pardoned this sin against himself even more readily than he had pardoned the sin against Jehovah in the idolatry of the golden calf.

Approaching now the southern boundaries of Palestine, spies were sent to bring report both of the fertility of the land and of the prospects of easy conquest. Meantime the host moved on to Kadesh-Barnea, south and west of the Dead Sea. The spies penetrated into the mountain lands of the Amorites, afterwards known as Judea, going on even to Hebron, the former home of Abraham. They brought back glowing reports of the land, made the more attractive to them because of their experiences in the waste and desert lands of the Sinaitic peninsula. But their reports of the inhabitants spread dismay among the Israelites. It would seem that they had expected fertile fields to await them uninhabited, and now that they "saw war" they showed that the slavish fear born of Egyptian servitude still manacled their arms and dulled their weapons. In spite of the protestations of a few of the bolder spirits (Numbers, xiii., 30), they drew back from the invasion and turned their faces once more to the wilderness. It was plain that the stern school of desert life must be brought to bear for a considerable period before the Egyptian slaves should become Hebrew freemen. They continued the nomadic life for perhaps a generation, probably centering their movements about the oasis of Kadesh. Here they experienced battle and defeat; rebellion set one faction of them over against another; pestilence smote down many. The trials, the hardships, hope deferred and faith half-dimmed by disappointment, but rising again triumphant under heroic leadership—all these hammer blows, in the course of years, forged out a strong and enduring nation from the unpromising material whose experiences we have been following. Miriam was buried at Kadesh, and Aaron not far away at Mt. Hor. The course of the wandering nation was marked out with the graves of those who had come up out of Egypt. The young men grew old and the children took their places. At last their leader felt them to be ready for a new attempt to seize the fertile lands of the Jordan valley. Avoiding by a detour the land of Edom, where they were refused passage, they passed up on the east side of Jordan to where the Arnon river flows by the land of Moab to the Dead Sea. North of the land of Moab was the mountain country of the Amorites: a name applied in a general way to the inhabitants of the high lands of western Palestine, those of the plains being known as Canaanites. These names, however, were sometimes used interchangeably. It was the sight of the Amorites of southern Palestine which had so discouraged the Hebrew wanderers on their first attempted invasion and who had defeated them near Kadesh. From the west of Jordan the Amorites had invaded the territories of the Moabites and Ammonites and had conquered a space between them including several cities. The Hebrews made their first attack upon this body of Amorites and were successful, thus coming into possession of their first permanent territory.

The chief effects of the nomadic period on the Israelites were the cultivation of independence of spirit, which had been largely lost in slavery times; the formation of a national spirit, which involved a willing obedience to authority, sharply distinguishable from the obedience of the slave; and lastly the strengthening of faith in God, which had been almost lost in the bewilderment of Egyptian polytheism. This faith deeply impressed by the unhopd-for deliverance at the Red Sea passage, had been directed by the genius and inspiration of Moses to the building up of righteousness and character. The ten commandments are the special monument of this period, marking as they do the point where religion is definitely recognized as dealing not merely with man's relations with God, but also and equally with man's relations with man.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 21.—FIFTH MONTH 21.

JESUS BEFORE THE HIGH PRIEST.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He came unto his own, and they that were his own received him not.—John, i., 11.

Read the Scripture, John, xviii., 15-27.

REVISED VERSION.

THIS lesson follows directly that last given, in the eighteenth chapter of John. It was still the night following the passover supper, but past midnight, and therefore the morning of the sixth day of the week, and 7th of the month, the day of the Crucifixion.

After his arrest, Jesus was taken, bound, by the soldiers to the residence or "palace" of Annas, who was the father-in-law of Caiaphas, the Jewish high priest. Why to Annas is not clearly explained, except on the ground of his being—as he was—the most influential man of all the Jewish hierarchy, the "power behind the throne." He had been high priest himself for seven years (A. D. 7-14) and five of his sons, besides his son in law (Caiaphas) subsequently were made high priests. They formed a great family; they were Sadducees; rich, aristocratic, powerful, wielding the authority of the church, "worldly" people, in fact, resenting vehemently any proposal that threatened to disturb their control, or affect their position.

It must be remembered that Jesus had denounced the church administration. As the prophets had done, in earlier time, he spoke severely and plainly of the corruption, extortion, and oppression with which it was honey-combed. All accounts agree that the (Jewish) people suffered under this, and that they therefore the more readily listened to Jesus. It was the hierarchy, the ecclesiastical power, that his new system especially threatened, and that now intended his death.

An examination before Annas took place while the members of the Sanhedrin were gathering. It is probable that Annas and Caiaphas occupied the same "palace," and in its courtyard occurred the denial of his Master by Peter. One of the disciples, assumed to be John, had followed within the courtyard, and at his entrance, at his request, the girl who kept the door admitted Peter also. As she did so, she asked, "Art not thou, also, one of this man's disciples?" And Peter, (so far from being a "rock" on which to build, a foundation firm and immovable), lied, and said "I am not!"

The examination before Annas was brief; at least there is little said of it in the account. The members composing the Sanhedrin were hastily got together, and Jesus was taken before them, Caiaphas, the high priest, presiding. While the hearing before him went on, Peter was again twice challenged, as he stood warming himself before the "fire of coals" in the courtyard, as a follower of the accused Galilean, and as often repeated his denial, cursing and swearing the second time, both Matthew and Mark say, to emphasize the lie. And then, "immediately the cock crew," Peter remembered what Jesus had told him the evening before, and Matthew says, "wept bitterly."

The word "sanhedrin" means an assembly; it does not necessarily imply a legal body, a court, acting by authority. As a matter of fact, this assembly of the church officials had at that time no judicial power; it was suffered to exist, and within certain limitations to act, by the Roman officials. It has been compared (Geikie) in the instance we are considering, to a "vigilance committee," and strictly speaking it was little more than that. It derived its importance only from the submission of the Jews, who regarded it as part of their church system, and from the tolerance of the Roman rulers. What it now proposed was to accuse Jesus of some crime punishable by death, to judge him guilty, and to demand of Pilate, the Roman governor, that he be immediately executed. And this, practically, was what took place.

John gives no account of the hearing before Caiaphas, but Matthew and Mark dwell upon it somewhat, and especially speak of "false witnesses" who had been procured to come forward and testify against Jesus. These witnesses, however, failed to provide the evidence needed for the purpose, and the Council were baffled. But later, two witnesses declared that Jesus had said he was able to destroy the Temple and rebuild it again in three days, and, finally, upon the demand of Caiaphas (Matthew, xxvi., 63), Jesus made answer, according to the record, which Caiaphas pronounced blasphemy, and the Council declared him "worthy of death." Then according to the account in Matthew—John does not record it—they abused him, they did "spit in his face, and buffet him: and some smote him with the palms of their hands, saying, Prophesy unto us, thou Christ, who is he that struck thee?" (Mark and Luke give much the same account.)

The night had now passed; according to the account in Luke, the day had broken when the hearing before Caiaphas and the Council began. Following Matthew it would seem that the hearing was before daybreak, but that as the light of the morning appeared the Council reached its conclusion, and directed that Jesus be taken before Pilate, and his death for blasphemy be demanded.

The whole of the action described in the lesson is essentially oriental, and characteristic of the time in which it occurred. The trial was, of course, a mockery of justice, according to our modern systems, when seen in their integrity, though not more unjust, doubtless, than sometimes goes on in our very midst, where the accused person is poor, unknown, and is without influence, and when the more elaborate processes of the law, with their great cost, cannot be invoked for him.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

SIGNIFICANCE OF PLAIN SPEECH.

THE language of Scripture is not only a peculiarity of the Society of Friends,—it is one of their most important principles; important, because most conspicuous and engaging, from being the language of Love; when, in connection with plainness of behavior and apparel (both being important principles) we show forth in life and conversation the fruits of the spirit—patience, temperance, brotherly kindness, and charity.

When we lay down any of our live testimonies and adopt the forms and methods of the world, we weaken our position, destroy our influence with those we hoped to serve, and put to shame Him whom we profess to follow.

Some of our esteemed and earnest members,—those who are zealously laboring for the continuance of the Society, and the widening of its borders, seem willing to lay down this principle, saying, there is no religion in it. There is no intrinsic value in the ensign of a nation, yet there is a deep meaning in the Flag wherever it may be displayed.

There is no religion in plain speech, behavior, and apparel themselves, but a power for good is exercised when these are faithfully adopted. Let us remember the words of Admiral Penn, just before he died: "Son William, if you and your friends keep to your plain way of preaching, and your plain way of living, you will make an end of the priests to the end of the world." We all use the Scripture language, Thee and Thou, in our petitions to our Heavenly Father. In the family it is becoming—and but few would dispense with it there. Why not adopt it in the world of mankind,—are we not all children of one God?

At this time we are in a revolution that is shaking all religious and national institutions, and testing their faith in infinite love; and many are looking to Friends inquiringly; thus showing that the same Divine Power is operating upon the hearts of mankind, perhaps more effectually than at any former period.

Then let us place such a value on these principles, and so highly esteem our privilege of spreading them, as to show those with whom we mingle that these badges are an aid in keeping our lives unspotted from the world.

Our religious building was wisely erected,—its foundation is the Rock of Divine Revelation, and under the revealings of the spirit of Truth the principles and testimonies it has always held have been maintained through opposition and suffering; these are the pillars, lintels, and other indispensable parts, constituting the beautiful structure which you and I desire to have perpetuated. Shall we take out a lintel, a joist, or a brick, and weaken and deface this spiritual house of ours? When one brick or stone is removed, how much easier it is to take out the second; and when any important parts are displaced, the structure will be marred and impaired.

"Friends inherit privileges won by patient suffering and devoted fidelity to conviction; it is right we should prize them, and seek to hand them on in their integrity, undimmed by the changed conditions of our day, to those who follow after."

JOSEPH POWELL.

BOOKS.

Epistles of London Yearly Meeting, 1839, 1869.

BOOKS may be regarded as companions; they become associated with our retired thoughts, and insensibly infuse somewhat of their spirit and character into those who converse with them. It behooves us to exercise a sound discretion as to what publications we admit into our homes; that neither we nor our children may be hurt by that reading which would tend in any degree to leaven our minds into the spirit of the world, and to unfit us for the sober duties of life. The books which we introduce to the young require particular care: they may give a bias to the mind, and materially influence the future character. Some of those which, we fear, find access to our families are calculated to give false views of life, and to lower that standard of morals which Christianity upholds; and others, though they may not stimulate evil passions, are adapted to lessen the attachment of our youth to the principles of their education, or even to rob them of their tenderness of conscience, and to alienate them, it may be by slow gradations, from the fear of God.

THE Master has told us that we are to enter into our closet and shut the door and pray to our Father which is in secret. This is the moment for us to come into contact with the divine forces that are around us. Up to this point, circumstances have acted upon us; now is our chance, our opportunity, to retire into ourselves, to generate spiritual power by contact with the divine, and in this strength to react in turn upon our circumstances.—Dr. W. W. Newton.

☸

GIVE the children pets. Teach them to be kind and gentle to these pets; to love them, to care for them regularly and tenderly. It will help mould a perfect character.—Selected.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 13, 1899.

"CANTEENS" AND WAR.

THE disappointment and disapproval expressed throughout the country over the "opinion" given by the Attorney-General of the United States in relation to the "canteen" system in the army is natural and reasonable. The public opinion which procured the passage by Congress of the law abolishing these liquor saloons among the soldiers had a right to expect that the law, when enacted, would be carried out in good faith, but the action of the Attorney-General has been made the means, instead, of balking and defeating it.

No one can say that intoxicating drink should be put to the lips of any young man, by the public authority, whether he be a civilian in ordinary dress or a soldier in uniform, and the resentment of the "canteen" system by those who have at heart the advancement of sobriety and the diminution of drunkenness was a manifestation of a healthy feeling. And yet this remains to be said,—it has already been suggested, we think, if not plainly said, in the INTELLIGENCER,—that there can be no very material improvement of war conditions, by depriving them of alcohol. As a matter of fact, deprivation is impracticable. Alcohol is, and is always likely to be, easily within reach of the officers; they may have drink when and in what quantity they choose, and the majority of them, it may be assumed, will not vote to deprive themselves of it. The utmost that can be done, therefore, is to keep it from the men, and even this, if the "canteens" could be wiped out, would not be fully accomplished.

War and war procedure, the operations of camps and campaigns, the execution of sieges, assaults, and battles, can never be made temperate. Whether they are provided with "canteens," or are not so provided, there can be nothing sober about these activities of war. The "shelling" of towns and villages, the slaughter of women and children, the wholesale destruction of human life upon "orders" given, are proceedings which alcohol may or may not make a little worse, (to do so seems impossible), but which in their evil qualities stand by themselves, independent of any merely alcoholic form of intoxication. That quaint old Pennsylvania German, Jacob Ritter, who preached in our Friends' meetings during many years of his blameless life the gospel of Christ, but who was in his earlier years a soldier in the Revolutionary army, said that he saw the officers mix gunpowder with the rum dealt out to the men, in order to inflame their passions, but our modern experience goes to show that even if this were considered an effectual means to the desired end, it is quite unnecessary, since the willingness of trained troops to use unhesitatingly the modern implements of slaughter is all that could be asked by anyone.

There was, last year, and there still survives, we fear, a theory that war may be a purification, and that those engaged in it may be so temperate in their lives as to perfect the chain of its virtues. We have already said above what we think of this theory—that it is fallacious. Ridding war of intemperance, even if it were possible—which it is not—would not make war appreciably less evil. It is a case of trying to cure a terrible disease by alleviating a secondary symptom.

THE Managing Editor of FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER is at present expecting to be absent from the office, during the summer months, this year. He will sail, if nothing prevents, for England on the 24th instant, and will return about the 1st of Ninth month. He hopes to go to The Hague, for a few days next month, to observe—from the outside—the great Conference, but will spend nearly all his time in England and Wales, and very largely among Friends. Letters intended for him, and addressed to him as usual, either at the office of the INTELLIGENCER, or at his home, (Gwynedd, Pa.), will receive appropriate attention at other hands, but anything intended for the paper should not be sent to his name, but be addressed to the INTELLIGENCER, at this office.

He hopes to write for the INTELLIGENCER, of course, during his absence, and he trusts that the advantage of his taking the holiday may be apparent.

REFERRING to the paragraph in this column last week, it now seems to be understood that Governor Stone will not remove, but will continue, Dr. J. T. Rothrock as Forestry Commissioner of Pennsylvania. This will be very encouraging and satisfactory to those interested in the forestry work, and is, indeed, a matter of deep interest to all who value the prosperity of the State. No one thing now in progress will contribute more to the wealth and happiness of the people than the successful reforestation of its waste lands.

THE suggestion by Dr. May, in his address, that the spirit of the border "Indian fighters" is to be seen in the warfare in the Philippines, finds its commentary in this passage from a recent Manila dispatch:

"Major General Lawton is advancing. He has organized a band of forty scouts to go ahead of the column. The band is under W. M. Young, an old Indian fighter, who killed five Filipinos last week."

BIRTHS.

MITCHELL.—At their home, 3316 Race street, Philadelphia, Fourth month 26, 1899, to George L. and Mary Keeney Mitchell, a son, who is named Carrol Thompson Mitchell.

MARRIAGES.

SMEDLEY—BLATHERWICK.—At the residence of the bride's parents, Blue Anchor, N. J., Fourth month 27, 1899, Nathan C. Smedley, son of Margaret A. and the late Albin

M. Smedley, and Mary Eleanor Blatherwick, daughter of George W. and Anna L. Blatherwick.

DEATHS.

GILLESPIE.—At the home of her son, in Nevada, Story county, Iowa, Second month 4, 1899, Penelope Gillespie, aged 82 years, 2 months, and 16 days; a member of Whitewater Monthly Meeting, Indiana.

She was the widow of Norillo Gillespie, who died in 1878, was the daughter of Joseph and Betsey Johnson, and granddaughter of Benjamin and Rachel (Moorman) Butterworth, all four of whom came to Warren county, Ohio, from South River Monthly Meeting, near Lynchburg, Campbell county, Virginia, in 1812. She and her husband moved to Laporte county, Indiana, in 1835, and to Marshall county, Iowa, in 1854, and settled on a farm now largely covered by Marshall town. She was a woman of meek and gentle nature, knowing the law of kindness. Was allied to the Terrells, Lynches, Clarks, and Anthonys. C. B.

JOHN.—At his home in Penrose, Whiteside county, Ill., Fourth month 19, 1899, in the 68th year of his age, Dr. Abia Comly John, son of the late Elida and Sarah H. John.

His was an eventful and loving life, and in his long practice as a physician he had won the affections of the people among whom he lived. He was a member of Illinois Yearly Meeting of Friends. *

MARTINDALE.—At West Chester, Pa., Fourth month 15, 1899, Willard Foulke Martindale, only son of Chester P. and Bertha Foulk Martindale, aged 5 days.

WILSON.—Of heart trouble, First month 22, 1899, Charles Wilson, son of the late Samuel R. Wilson, of Sandiford, Philadelphia county.

Although not a member, he had a kindly feeling for Friends and showed an interest by attending the circular meetings at Frankford where his father and later his mother were members.

WRIGHT.—Fifth month 5, 1899, John C., son of the late Isaac K. Wright, in his 69th year; a member of the Monthly Meeting held at Green Street, Philadelphia.

MARY WILLIS KIRK.

At Fair Hill, near Sandy Spring, Maryland, Fourth month 29, 1899, Mary Willis Kirk died after an illness of some weeks.

She was born at Stanmore, near York, Pennsylvania, in 1819, where her parents, Amos and Mary Farquhar, resided. While she was yet a child, they moved to Sandy Spring, living at Fair Hill. She spent much of her time with her sister Margaret E. Hallowell, in Alexandria, Virginia, who was the wife of Benjamin Hallowell, then engaged in his school for young men. She learned from him to value those higher studies at that day little opened to girls, and he delighted to watch her bright mind develop and expand. When very young she became a teacher herself, an occupation she was admirably fitted for. Later she returned to Sandy Spring to assist her brother, Doctor Charles Farquhar, in the establishment of a girls' boarding-school at Olney, but his early death closes a very promising beginning.

Again making Alexandria her home, she married while there, in 1850, Richard S. Kirk, and Fair Hill, her old home, became her home ever after, for later on her husband purchased the property, then held by Baltimore Yearly Meeting, the purpose being a school for the education of girls. For years she, with her brother William H. Farquhar, taught there, and still all over the country are women who owe to her their correct start in life, for her ability to impress upon others some of her own integrity of character, thirst for knowledge, and aspiration for higher things, was wonderful. Her usefulness in this line was closed by the Civil War, when all Southern schools for the time suspended.

At this time in her life, and later on she had many and severe trials, in which a less noble nature might have faltered and failed. She swerved not; but conquered all difficulties by that heroic spirit that marked all her actions. Books were her constant companions, choosing the best authority, she would turn to the old poets; her exquisite taste in therefrom, and her reading and reciting, added another charm to her society. She would speak of outliving her contemporaries, but her loving and admiring friends increased with her years. The aged sought her, the young gathered around her, and the little children were glad to be near her.

England's Queen was her own age, and she always felt interested in watching her course through her life, while we thought that had her lot been thus cast, with her handsome face, her dignified, stately manner, she would have "graced a throne." And she was truly queen in her realm, and the crown she wore was studded with imperishable jewels, her many virtues. Those left to learn to do without her, for a while, and who will find the lesson hardest, are her ever-devoted son, Charles F. Kirk, a daughter, Sarah E. Kirk, her own relations and those of her husband, who felt it a high privilege to follow her almost to "the open door leading to the great Eternal forevermore."

M. B. M.

Olney, Md.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

ABINGTON Quarterly Meeting was held at Horsham, Pa., on the 4th instant, the attendance being large. The day was pleasant, and many found the trolley line which now passes the house a convenient way of reaching the place. In the first meeting the burden of ministry was borne by John J. Cornell, who spoke at length from the text, "What shall I do to be saved?" and was considered much favored in his message. Other visitors included Harriet E. Kirk, of Philadelphia, who spoke in the first meeting, Joel Borton, of Woodstown, N. J., who spoke briefly near the close of the business meeting, and John Wildman, of Langhorne. The business was mainly the reading of the queries and their answers, in the consideration of which a number of Friends took part. The committee on clerks presented the names of Elizabeth W. Ely for Clerk, and Walter H. Jenkins for Assistant Clerk, who were approved. (The meeting is held in joint session.)

Concord Quarterly Meeting was held at Wilmington, Del., on the 2nd instant. The day was unseasonably warm, but there was a fair attendance of members. Several visitors were acceptably with us. John J. Cornell spoke most earnestly and logically, declaring many gospel truths. Margaretta Walton also ministered with acceptance. Several ministers of this quarter spoke briefly.

In the business session the answering of all the queries received serious attention. The reading of the minutes of the previous quarter recalled the subject of the letter sent to the Emperor of Russia, and his reply to all such communications, recently published in the INTELLIGENCER, was read as a fitting response thereto. Some excellent words and good suggestions were given relative to this most interesting subject.

After a session of over four hours, meeting adjourned, and Friends were ready to partake of the lunch provided. This accommodation has become a feature of each of our quarterly meetings, the meeting itself having made an appropriation for this purpose.

Southern Quarterly Meeting will be held at Easton, Maryland, Fifth month 31, and Sixth month 1, at the following times: Fifth month 31, 2 p. m.—Meeting for Worship and Discipline. Sixth month 1, 9 a. m.—Meeting of Ministers and Elders; 10

a. m.—Meeting for Worship, often called "Youths' Meeting."

The time of holding the Fourth-day meeting has been changed from 10 a. m. to 2 p. m., to accommodate those who come by train. Friends can now leave Philadelphia and Camden, Del., in the morning, (reaching here in time to dine with Friends here who will meet the train with carriages), attend all meetings, and return the next afternoon.

We have no minister living in the limits of this quarterly meeting. We are always very glad to have any come among us, either at quarterly or other times. The presence of ministers or any Friend is always pleasant and profitable to us, and we hope that any who can will visit us. K. E. Y.

SOME RECENT BOOKS.

EDWARD EVERETT HALE is an admirable literary artist for a work such as this, in his volume on "James Russell Lowell and His Friends," (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $3.00). His style is lively and entertaining, and his full knowledge, his habit of historical accuracy, his wholesome humor, and hopeful attitude toward human affairs, all contribute to make the narrative both valuable and pleasing. The book is certain to be attractive to all those who are interested in the name and fame of Lowell—and indeed what American is not?—or in the friends he had, or the times and circumstances amid which he lived. It is not merely illustrated but enriched by the large number of portraits, views of places, (there are several of "Elmwood," Lowell's home at Cambridge, which has been purchased for preservation as a park), facsimiles, etc., and all of them have a real relation to the text, and enhance its interest to the reader.

Dr. Hale, of course, is well equipped for the work, in his knowledge of the subject. He was a little younger than Lowell—three years—but he knew him very well, and besides knew "all about him," including his ancestry, his family, his early and later career, and the "friends" with whom he was associated. In Lowell's young manhood there was a group of young men and young women, ten or twelve, who formed, as is very often the case, a closely attached little circle. One of these was Dr. Hale's brother Nathan Hale, afterward famous as conductor of the Boston Daily Advertiser, and another was their sister, Sarah Everett Hale, while two others were William A. White and his sister Maria. The last became the wife of Lowell, and is known not only by her marriage to him, but by her exquisite poem, "The Alpine Sheep," written on the death of their oldest child, and by her beautiful portrait. It was she who accompanied Lowell to Philadelphia, when he came here to live a while in 1844—1845, for they had been married "in the end of December, 1844." She wrote for the Anti-Slavery Standard, as her husband did; she died at "Elmwood" in the Tenth month, 1853. Her portrait, already mentioned, is one of the treasured pictures in many collections, and Dr. Hale says of her that "she was exquisitely beautiful; her tastes and habits were perfectly simple; her education, as I look back on what I know of it, seems to me as perfect as any education can be."

Dr. Hale's narrative of Lowell's life, as has already been intimated, is increased in interest, at every step, by a wealth of detail, entertainingly told, about the many interesting persons with whom Lowell was associated. He speaks of Prof. Agassiz, George Bancroft, Carlyle, the Channings, Lydia Maria Child, James Freeman Clarke, Richard Henry Dana, Emerson, Edward Everett, Hawthorne, Holmes, Howells, Longfellow, Motley, Charles Eliot Norton, W. W. Story, and many others. One of the illustrations is a facsimile of a letter from Lowell to Dr. Hale, dated at Elmwood in the Eleventh month, 1890. It begins: "M. Guizot [the French author and statesman] asked me, 'How long do you think the American Republic will endure?' My answer was, 'So long as the ideas of its founders continue to be dominant.'"

John Fiske has added to his philosophic work a small volume, "Through Nature to God." (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.00.) It is in three parts: "The Mystery of Evil," "The Cosmic Roots of Love and Self-Sacrifice," and "The Everlasting Reality of Religion." We cannot, in the comparatively brief notice to be here given, attempt an analysis, or adequate discussion of the book. In the Preface, Dr. Fiske explains that the second part is, with a few changes, the Phi Beta Kappa address delivered by him at Harvard University, in 1895, and intended as a reply to Prof. Huxley's famous Romanes lecture, delivered at Oxford in 1893. "The detection," he says, "of the part played by the lengthening of infancy in the genesis of the human race is my own especial contribution to the Doctrine of Evolution." The third part of the volume aims to show that "that other influence" alluded to by Tennyson, "that inward conviction, the craving for a final cause, the theistic assumption, is itself one of the master facts of the universe, and as much entitled to respect as any fact in physical nature can possibly be."

The whole of the book is a maintenance of the belief in a divine order; the author especially insists upon "that sublime conception of the Unity of Nature, by which the minds of scientific thinkers are now coming to be dominated." "When," he says, "we have once thoroughly grasped the monotheistic conception of the universe as an organic whole, animated by the omnipresent spirit of God, we have forever taken leave of that materialism to which the universe was merely an endless multitude of phenomena. We begin to catch glimpses of the meaning and dramatic purpose of things; at all events, we rest assured that there really is such a meaning."

The name and fame of Thaddeus Stevens are so associated with the State of his adoption, Pennsylvania,—to which he came when he was twenty-three years old, in 1815,—that it seems remarkable no Pennsylvanian has yet prepared a satisfactory biography of him. However, Representative Samuel W. McCall, of Massachusetts, has now contributed to the American Statesman series, (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. $1.25), a good biography, mainly occupied, as the nature of the series to which it belongs required, with his public life, and especially with his service in Congress from 1859 to his death in 1868. In this period of nine years occurred the tremendous crisis of the civil war, and the hardly less difficult period of Reconstruction, and throughout both Thaddeus Stevens was the master mind of the popular branch of Congress.

Thaddeus Stevens was a very able, almost a great, lawyer, and he was a very earnest partisan, whose partisanship was redeemed by unusual independence of character, and by his unwavering devotion to human rights. He was always the friend of the oppressed; he defended without a fee many a fugitive slave, and indicted friend of the fugitive; he spoke eloquently for Castner Hanway in his trial for "treason" in the Christiana riot; and it will not be successfully denied that he was faithful and fearless in the performance of duty as it appeared to him. In one of the later speeches of his career in Congress he said: "I believe that we must all account for deeds done in the body, and that political deeds will be among these accounts. I desire to take to the bar of that final settlement the record which I shall this day make on the great question of human rights."

He was almost an old man when he returned to Congress in 1859 to enter upon the herculean labors of the nine years following—he was sixty-seven years of age. But his force, in the midst of many men of great ability, was admitted by all. "Thad. Stevens" was one of two or three whom President Johnson particularly insisted would better be hanged. His prepared speech had "a directness and energy combined with a terse felicity of expression for which it is difficult to find his match among American orators. Nobody, said Mr. Sumner, could express more in fewer words, or give 'to language a stronger bite.'" He was a striking figure, even when he was past three-score and ten. "No stranger," said Senator Dawes, of Massachusetts, "would pass him on the street without turning for a second to look at an unmistakably great character."

ENCOURAGE THE CONFERENCE.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I HAVE for many years been an interested reader of the INTELLIGENCER, and years ago an occasional contributor to your columns, but have now reached an age which only a minority of the human race ever reach, (eighty-two years), and perhaps had better keep the silence I have of late years maintained. But I have read with such intense interest the communications on the subject of the late war with Spain and its resulting consequences, that I can hardly refrain from writing you once more. And more especially on the outlook of the approaching great convention, invited by the Czar of Russia, which may result in a great blessing to the world at large.

Of course every effort that can be made, whether by a great potentate or an obscure individual is laudable, and should meet with encouragement by the whole human race, and the more so when coming from so great and influential a source. Whether it is possible for such a proposition to meet with immediate success, or not, is not the question now, but it is possible to encourage it, and it is possible for more or less good to grow out of it. There must be a beginning to every effort, and from the beginning every advance must come, be it greater or less. For any one to say or suggest that the Czar has behind the proposition an object for his own aggrandizement, is a mere insult to him, and the one who makes the suggestion insults himself and the human race by making the suggestion. It is a shame that the suggestion ever was made. The Czar is entitled to the thanks of the whole world for having had the courage to use his immeasurable influence to make the suggestion.

Of course the desired object cannot all be accomplished at once. It may require an age to accomplish the desired end. But if it does, it is nothing against the value of the accomplishment. "The world was not made in a day." Nor was it developed and furnished as it is, in another day. We must not lose sight of these truths.

But another great fact, and, it seems to me an evident one, is that human nature is the same now as it was whenever the world was created, and mankind placed upon it; for with the help of the extremely limited early education that was my privilege to get, I have never been able to decide how long ago that event took place. But it is evident by the best evidence we have, war was initiated when Cain killed Abel, and has existed ever since. Whether it will not end until the world does, is the question now. The beginning of war, at the time of the killing of Abel, was on the same grounds that wars are being made between nations now, and with no better excuse.

In all that has been said, it seems to me that ex-President Harrison's conclusions on the subject of the outcome of the Czar's proposition, although not spoken in the phraseology of Friends, is the nearest to the truth as the case now stands, of any that I have seen, viz: That wars will not cease while the devil remains unchained.

But in all our thoughts and yearnings for good to the human race, we must not forget or ignore the facts as they evidently exist and always have done. If we cannot change the whole nature of facts and things as they exist, we can do our best to cut off the sharpest points, if only one at a time, and thus do something to ameliorate the condition by degrees and open the door wider and wider for further improvement in the future ages.

It seems to me that a great step has been taken, out of which great good may yet develop, and let us buckle on our peace armor. We can do it vigorously and still keep within the line of Friends' principles. It would be difficult for me to say or do anything outside the line of those principles. I have never seen the necessity of doing any such thing to accomplish my desires, and never expect to meet any such necessity.

HAMPTON DODGE.

Detroit, Michigan.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

FISHERTOWN, PA.—The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held Fourth month 23. The meeting was opened by the superintendent reading a part of 1st Peter.

The minutes of last meeting were read. A selection was read by Ardelle Blackburn, containing these words: "Not high-sounding words of praise does God want, but rather worship God by doing good." "Sunshine" was recited by Mary Hammaker.

A short poem was recited by Jessie Blackburn. A selection entitled "Contentment" was read by Florence Way, teaching us to be contented with our lot, whatever it may be.

A selection, "What is worth while," was read by Margaretta Blackburn, followed by a recitation by Clement Way.

A poem, "His Best," was recited by Harold Blackburn.

A selection was read by Verdie Cleaver, followed by a poem, "We know not what is before us," read by secretary.

A selection, "Age and Youth," was read by Dorsey Blackburn.

The subject for discussion, "The Power we exert over others by Influence," was opened by Elias Blackburn followed by a talk by Rebecca Blackburn, and a selection by Margaretta Blackburn, on the same subject.

Sentiments were given by most of the members present. The attendance was much larger than any previous meeting.

Meeting closed to meet last First-day in Fifth month.

MARY J. BLACKBURN, Sec.

PENNSGROVE, PA.—On the afternoon of Fourth month 23, Pennsgrove Young Friends' Association met at the house of Pusey Coates, with fourteen members and a number of visitors present. In the absence of president and vice-president, Alva C. Brosius called the meeting to order, and Samuel H. Broomell opened the exercises by reading the 2d chapter of 1st Corinthians, followed by silence and singing, "Hide Thou Me." The minutes of the last meeting were approved as read.

The secretary read a paper on the life of David H. Barnes, which Elwood Pusey, of the History Committee, had taken from FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. His life had here one great usefulness and much of it spent in visiting religious meetings of the Society.

Alice R. Coates, representing the Literature Committee, read an article on "Small Things," from T. DeWitt Talmage's book "The Pathway of Life," teaching us that whatever we do, do well.

After a short intermission, Alva C. Brosius read a well prepared paper on the Fourth Query of the Discipline. A good selection, entitled "What a Lie Cost," was read by Sara M. Pusey.

The report of the Executive Committee was read, after which the nominating committee's report was read and names of new officers accepted. The calling of the roll was responded to with very good sentiments. After singing "Rock of Ages," and observing a brief silence, the Association adjourned, to meet next month at the home of Daniel Lukens.

EVA COATES BROOMELL, Sec.

ABINGTON, PA.—The Abington Friends' Association met at the home of Edwin L. Hallowell, Fourth month 22, 1899, with a good attendance. The minutes and Executive Committee's report were read, followed by reading from the Scripture, by Frances Calston.

The exercises were opened with the discussion of the book, "In His Steps, or What Would Jesus Do?" Arthur C. Smedley gave first a brief outline of the book, and then expressed his opinion upon detailed parts of it. While realizing the value of the author's purpose in requiring what he did of his parish, he could but see what a burden our lives would become if we stopped before each action, and asked ourselves the question "What Would Jesus Do?"

Anna Hallowell expressed quite the reverse opinion of the book and its intended good. To her the manner in which the author pictures his own actions and those of his parish, seemed to be only sensational, and productive of no good whatever. Also, she said, how much more beautiful life would seem if we preferred a course which would gather the good out of everything, rather than hunting for and condemning all that which is evil.

Others presented many helpful views, which brought the one great thought uppermost,—that in any case we should each bear in mind the duty which is before us, and guard our daily actions by that which is best within us. And if we do this we are as faithful disciples of Christ as it is possible for mortals to be.

Hannah More's "Faith and Works" was then read by Lilian T. Saunders, and Anna Roberts recited "An Old Man in a Stylish Church." Israel Hallowell read a paper which opened the discussion of the question "Are our present business methods in harmony with Christian life?" Carrie Mather then read her paper on the subject, and generally expressed the belief that although the department stores seem to kill smaller stores which keep but a single line of goods, still none of us would like to return to the old way of going from store to store buying the necessary brooms and buckets and taking them with us up the street to the next stopping-place. A brief general discussion ensued and Horace Stapler recited "An Old Fashioned Receipt."

FRIENDS' HOME, NEWTOWN, PA.

Now erecting at Newtown, under charge of Bucks Quarterly Meeting, at the cost of Edward M. Paxson. (Description was given in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, Fourth month 22.) Architect, Edwin F. Bertolett. Builder, Garret B. Girtton.

Jennie Saunders read a part of the memorial of Mary Levis, after which Elizabeth W. Ely gave some of her impressions of Cuba. These were very interesting, and one item which pleased her hearers particularly was that the United States officials have forbidden the sale of intoxicants to any of the American soldiers.

Owing to so long a program, one or two of the appointments were postponed until the next meeting, to be held Fifth month 27, at Isaac Mather's, to which all interested Friends are invited. The meeting adjourned.

MARY PRISCILLA HARPER, Sec.

NEWTOWN, PA.—Newtown Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Ellie J. Burroughs, on Fourth-day evening, Fifth month 3. The meeting was called to order by the president, who read a few verses of 10th chapter of John. Laura W. White read a very interesting article on "The Remnants of Friends in Germany." This was a letter written to Benjamin F. Battin and published in the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, First month 28, 1899.

The question, "What do you believe to be the most important Reform movement at this time?" was answered by Phebe Eves and Thomas W. Stapler. Phebe Eves thought that the Temperance question was one of vital importance; it is not of mushroom growth, but of many years of patient toil, and one that is progressing rapidly. Woman's suffrage, which surely is coming, may also be ranked in this class. But the past year has shown our citizens plainly the need of political reforms, not only in our cities but in our State and National government. The system of "spoils" is not only a political but a moral question, and is eating out the very heart of the nation. Thomas Stapler made a few remarks, in which he said that the most important question of to-day is our war with the Philippines, and although he is very much opposed to war, he thought that an immediate disarmament would bring stagnation on our country.

A beautiful poem, entitled "The Quiet Meeting," was then read by Elisha Worthington. Under Discipline, Abbie Rice read three of the "Scriptural Bases of Queries," and Sarah Wilson gave her opinions of each.

This closed the literary part of the program for the evening. The Executive Committee report was then given, the program for next meeting being: Question, What have Friends done for the Indians? Martha Wilson. Is the giving of prizes, as followed by certain lines of trade, conducive to the good moral condition of the people? Ellie J. Burroughs. Scriptural Basis of the Queries, R. Anna Reeder and Elizabeth S. Kenderdine. Current Topics, Maude Kenderdine. Paper, George H. Nutt. After a few minutes of silence the Association adjourned to meet at Thomas Stapler's home in Sixth month.

M. R. W.

MOORESTOWN, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association of Moorestown met in Grange Hall, Fourth month 14, with a large attendance.

After transacting the regular business, Clement M. Biddle entertained the meeting with an interesting account of his visits to Egypt and the Holy Land, giving details of experience with the natives, and observations of the country. Of especial interest was the view obtained from the Mount of Olives extending north and south from Samaria to Philistia, while beyond the Jordan could be seen Mt. Nebo and Machairus. A nearer view embraced the towns of Jerusalem, Bethany, Bethlehem, and Jericho. The description given by the speaker of the historical interest attached to these and the Garden of Gethsemane, made more appreciable the parable and sayings of Jesus.

He spoke of the visit to Hebron, at which place is the Cave of Machpelah where Abraham and Sarah, and Isaac and Rebecca are buried. Mohammedans keep guard over this spot; Christians are not allowed to enter.

The account of the visit to Egypt was also very interesting, especially the ascent of the pyramids, the trip up the Nile, and the visit to Thebes and Luxor.

At the close of the meeting those present took pleasure in viewing the numerous specimens and objects of antiquity collected during these visits.

A. M. L., Sec.

MANSFIELD, N. J.—A meeting of Mansfield Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Franklin S. Zelle, Fourth month 20, with thirty members present.

At roll-call, Ethel Zelle, (daughter of our host), in response to her name, welcomed us with some appropriate verses, written for the occasion. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved. The names of four new members were added to the roll. The Executive Committee reported the program for next meeting.

Peter E. Harvey gave the Rise of the Society of Friends by reading portions of Sewel's History, Sarah A. Biddle read from the Discipline a portion regarding the duties of parents and children, showing that obedience is one of the first things to be early instilled into the mind of the child, as essential to future control. Mary L. Browne gave an interesting sketch of the life of Elizabeth Fry. The question "What Influence does the Young Friends' Association have upon the Home?" was answered in a well written paper by Joanna Shreve. She said in part, that "if the Young Friends' Association in its endeavor to disseminate the principles of Friends and introduce and discuss subjects of current interest in all reform work, does not have a tendency to elevate the home life, and render it purer and sweeter thereby, then must we consider our Association in every sense of the word a failure, for of what value are all the intellectual attainments possible to obtain in this world, unless tempered by the pure spirit of Christ, without which, all else is as dross."

Mabel E. Harvey recited the poem "God's Way is the Best." After a brief silence, the meeting adjourned to meet at the home of Abraham Scott, Fifth month 25.

M. E. GIBBS, Sec'y.

EDUCATIONAL.

GEORGE SCHOOL NOTES.—About an acre and a half in an open space on the old "Indian ground," in the South Wood, near the Neshaminy, has been set apart for a botanical garden. It will soon be enclosed by a wire fence. Already a number of plants donated from the gardens at the University of Pennsylvania, have been set out, under the direction of Belle Vansant, of the department of Biology.

For some weeks past, during recreation hours, the boys have been having special practice for the athletic exercises which took place Sixth-day afternoon, 5th.

The Junior oratorical contest for the Alumni prize was held Seventh-day evening, 6th. The following were the participants: Mildred M. Eves, "A Lesson from History"; J. Russell Hibbs, "The Value of Sacrifice"; Ella Gillingham, "National Songs"; Alfred B. Creivitt, "Two Historic Nights"; Iva B. Stradling, "The Power of the Voice"; A. Russell Burton, "An Appeal for Equal Suffrage"; Maude Esther Rice, "A Dream of Love." The judges, Principal Louis B. Ambler, of Abington, Thomas Briggs, of Newtown, member of the Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education, and Phebe Eves of the class of '96, and now teaching in the Newtown High School, decided in favor of Maude E. Rice.

SCHOFIELD SCHOOL CLOSING.—The closing exercises at the Schofield School, Aiken, S. C., will be held on the 26th instant. A closing address will be delivered by Richard Carroll, recently elected a trustee of the school, a prominent colored minister.

TELESCOPE AT GEORGE SCHOOL.—A three-inch telescope has been added to the equipment of the George School. It was imported from France by Williams, Brown & Earle, of Philadelphia. The instrument is about four feet long, and is mounted on a tripod. It has three eye-pieces, varying in magnifying power from twenty to over a hundred diameters. It shows very distinctly the spots on the sun, the mountains and craters on the moon, the moons and belts of Jupiter and the rings of Saturn. It serves also to distinguish many of the double stars and to resolve the larger nebulae into stars.

FRIENDS' SCHOOLS, FOURTH AND ARCH YEARLY MEETING.—The report of the Committee on Education, at the recent session of the Arch Street Yearly Meeting, referred to 18 schools, with 257 pupils. The Superintendent, Anna Walton, reported two to four visits to each school, during the year, and the holding of monthly teachers' meetings. The meeting appropriated $2,000 for the Committee's use.

RUSSIA in Europe has a forest area of about 500,000 acres. One-third of the country, indeed, is forest. The whole of the forest area of Russia is under careful crown management, and effective measures are taken to prevent waste. One peculiarity of the management in Russia is that certain forests are recognized as necessary to protect the water supply of rivers, and in these the felling of timber is under very strict regulation, the object being to preserve them for all time.

ACAPULCO, on the west coast of Mexico, is called "the most important Pacific port in the Americas," and also "the second finest harbor in the world," that of Sydney, Australia, "alone outranking it." Sydney is far larger, but not better sheltered. Cortes discovered the harbor in 1531.

LITERARY NOTES.

OUR friend W. W. H. Davis, Doylestown, Pa., has just issued another valuable contribution to the history of eastern Pennsylvania. It is an account of the opposition, made in the upper end of Bucks county, and the adjoining parts of Northampton, just a century ago, to the assessment of the special tax laid by the federal government, under the laws of Congress of July 9 and July 14, 1798. This opposition, led by John Fries, a "vendue crier," who had been a captain of militia in the Revolutionary period, was so vehement, and so far took on the character "by force of arms," that it was called a rebellion,—though nowadays we should think it but a trivial episode,—and Fries and two others, John Getman and Frederick Heany, were tried for treason, and sentenced to be hanged, but were pardoned by President John Adams.

W. W. H. Davis, who long ago began collecting the data bearing on the subject, has embodied in his volume, "The Fries Rebellion, 1798-99," all that can now be ascertained on the subject, and has added much explanatory matter, in the text and in foot-notes, to make the account clear. The passage of the tax laws, the development of opposition among the rural German people with whom Fries had influence, between Quakertown and Bethlehem, the resistance to the assessors of the tax, the mobs at the taverns, the disorderly march of the improvised military force of "rebels," the capture of Squire Everard Foulke, and other assessors, the rescue of prisoners from the custody of the United States Marshal, the arrests, the trial in Philadelphia, before Judge Richard Peters, the conviction, sentence to death, finally the pardon,—all this is set forth in full detail. (Doylestown, Pa.: the Author.)

Some change has been made in the North American Review. The issue for this month appears under the editorship of George B. M. Harvey, (who succeeds David A. Munro), the size of the page has been enlarged—quite to its advantage in appearance—and other improvements are made. The list of contributions this month is impressive. Of course we have several discussions by the war and naval people of the best way to put other nations under foot, but there are some also of a non-pagan sort. "Ian Maclaren" writes of "The Religious Situation in England," ex-Speaker Thomas B. Reed of the Nicaragua Canal, William D. Howells of "The New Poetry," and Nicholas Estevanez, formerly war minister of Spain, has a very interesting and forcible article on "What Spain can teach America." There are two timely articles on "Wireless Telegraphy." The work of the "Joint High Commission," which recently was considering United States-Canadian questions, is reviewed by "A Canadian Liberal," who writes as one having authority, though he is not flattering always to his own country.

William D. Howells praises very highly the poetry of James Whitcomb Riley, in the current North American Review. He says: "Probably the most widely read American poems in their time were Longfellow's 'Hiawatha' and Whittier's 'Snow-Bound'; but Mr. Riley's poetry is much more widely read than either. It reaches the lettered as well as the unlettered; it has had the courage of the familiar, the homely, qualities which are the most widely felt, and it is not because it is American (although we like it so), but because it is human that it finds its way over the fruitful levels where men are all equal. I do not prize it less than the new English poetry in form or spirit, for I think Mr. Riley a very great artist, with insight as subtle as the best of the new English poets, and sympathy as generous."

The Review of Reviews, this month, devotes considerable space to a survey of recent developments in American cities.

The editor comments on the reflection of Mayor Carter Harrison in Chicago, on Mayor Jones's remarkable triumph in Toledo, on the Detroit project for municipal ownership of the street railways, and on the general situation in Boston, San Francisco, Minneapolis, Cleveland, Denver, St. Louis, Philadelphia, Pittsburg, and New York. Dr. Shaw also contributes a special study of the new San Francisco charter—a remarkable document in its way, and George E. Hooker gives some interesting facts about Mayor Quincy's administration of Boston.

The front-page picture of Harper's Weekly, last week, was an illustration indeed of present-day conditions and contradictions. It was a drawing from a photograph taken in Manila—a United States soldier asleep in a church, in front of the altar. The man, with his belt of cartridges about him, lies on a spread of straw, and back of him rises a painted picture of the Crucified One extended on the cross. "A Respite from War in the Sanctuary of Peace," is the title given it.

In the Literary Era, (Henry T. Coates & Co., Philadelphia), the Historical and Genealogical Department, edited by Albert Cook Myers, grows in importance, and promises to be a valuable monthly discussion of the subjects which it treats. The editor of the Department is a graduate of Swarthmore, '98; his graduation thesis, on the Emigration of Friends from Ireland to Pennsylvania, presented much interesting material, and will we hope ultimately be published in book form.

The Century announces that it will issue three special numbers—that for next (Sixth) month to be an "Out-of-doors Number," the one following a "Story-teller" Number," and Eighth month a "Midsummer and Travel Number." An article by Henry Van Dyke, and several striking pictures of Niagara Falls, by the French artist, Castaigne, will be features of the first of the series.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

PAUPERIZING THE RICH. An Inquiry into the Value and Significance of Unearned Wealth to its Owners and to Society. By Alfred J. Ferris. Pp. xiv. and 432. $1.25. Philadelphia: T. S. Leach & Co., 29 N. 7th street.

1698—THE BICENTENNIAL CELEBRATION OF THE FOUNDING OF THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF THE CITY OF PHILADELPHIA—1898. Edited by William Williams Keen, M. D., LL.D. Pp. 511. $3.00. Philadelphia: American Baptist Publication Society.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

In their collections of data concerning persons who have written books on Friends, the committee of Young Friends' Association of Philadelphia have had an interesting letter from A. C. Bickley, of London, author of numerous articles (upwards of fifty) on Friends in the "Dictionary of National Biography," and of a book, "George Fox and the Early Quakers." He is not a Friend, but a Churchman. Referring to the late Joseph Smith of London, the bibliographer, and his great work in collecting his "Catalogues" of Friends' books, A. C. Bickley says:

"I esteem it a great honor that I had an opportunity of calling Mr. Gladstone's attention to Mr. Smith's monumental work, and suggesting that he be rewarded by a national grant. This Mr. Gladstone, on account of the nature of Mr. Smith's work, was unable to do, but to mark his appreciation of a work so valuable to all students of English history and theology he sent Mr. Smith £50 ($250). I only mention this because I think it may interest you to know how a high Churchman like Mr. Gladstone was could appreciate the labor of one whom he regarded as a schismatic in religion."

Dr. George Dana Boardman, whose great address on "Disarmament," just now reprinted, we have noticed, though so staunch an American, was born in Tavoy, Burma, where his father was a missionary, in 1828. When but six years old he was sent home alone, on a sailing ship, "suffering many trials from the unfeeling crew of the vessel." When he became a minister (he is a Baptist), he was settled in charge of a church in Barnwell Court-House, S. C., but he was obliged to quit his charge at the end of five months, on account of his outspoken condemnation of the assault on Charles Sumner, by Brooks, in the United States Senate, in 1856. For thirty years, 1864-1894, he was in charge of the First Baptist Church, at Broad and Arch streets, Philadelphia, —whose building is now replaced by the tall structure of the United Gas Improvement Co.

Dr. Rothrock, at the interesting Spring meeting of the Pennsylvania Forestry Association, in this city, on the 5th inst., spoke of the decrease of hickory. This is a distinctively American wood; there is nothing equal to it for strength and lightness in the world. American carriage-wheels, of light weight, are made great by their hickory spokes and felloes. But the hickory is fast disappearing. Formerly it was abundant in Pennsylvania; then the cutters sought it in Kentucky and Tennessee; now they have pursued it southward to the Gulf region. A large wheel-making firm wrote to Dr. Rothrock, recently, asking what was to be done next. What can be done, except to renew the hickory forests?

The Spring meeting was held in the Commercial Museums building, on south Fourth street, and Dr. W. P. Wilson, the Director of the Museums, delivered a brief talk, illustrated by views on the screen, showing some curious and interesting members of the forest families. Dr. Wilson, and those associated with him, have built up in these Museums a collection of objects relating to commerce and industry, of such dimensions as to amaze the ordinary visitor. The great Exhibition to be given in this city next fall (Ninth to Eleventh months), under the auspices of the Museums directory, will be an object lesson to the country.

COMMUNICATIONS.

TAXES AND HONEST USE OF THEM.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I HAVE no money to throw away, but there is nothing for which I would rather spend my money than for taxes which are honestly expended for the good of the Commonwealth.

The above sentiment, expressed by a thoughtful member of our community, strikes me as being very full of significance at this period. It is sad to have to say it, but many people regard their taxes as obligations which they only meet when they cannot avoid them, not as one of the first of their duties in "loving their neighbors." On the other hand, it is true that so much corruption in the use of public funds tends to weaken community feeling, and promotes individual selfishness. Surely much education is needed along this line.

A. H. P.

EXPRESSION URGED.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

It has been on my mind for some time to make an appeal to Friends that they give voice to their disapproval of the methods in use to put down the so-called rebellion in the Philippines. I have sometimes been much disappointed by a seeming inclination to pay too much attention to the policy of the moment. In other words, to compromise with rather than stand directly for the right. We must not forget that where much is expected much should be given, and that the world at large have every reason to expect much from us in the way of standing for the truth.

E. T. B.

Philadelphia.

In Iceland men and women are in every respect political equals. The nation, which numbers about 70,000 people, is governed by representatives elected by men and women together.

THE ANTI-SLAVERY REPOSITORY.

THE Anti-Slavery Repository at the Home for Aged and Infirm Colored Persons, Philadelphia, is an attractive addition, and Friends are solicited to assist in perfecting it by the donation of engravings, photographs, etc., of those active on either side of the Anti-Slavery struggle, relics and mementos bearing on it, as well as the barbarisms which it opposed, also biographic and other works of historical value. Address Robert Madger, Philadelphia P. O., central, or J. M. Truman, Jr., 1500 Race St.

METEOROLOGICAL SUMMARY FOR FOURTH MONTH, 1899.

Mean barometer,	30.109
Highest barometer during the month, 6th,	30.439
Lowest barometer during the month, 8th,	29.639
Mean temperature,	53.6
Highest temperature during the month, 14th, 26th,	81.
Lowest temperature during the month, 2d, 3d.	29.
Mean of maximum temperatures,	64.6
Mean of minimum temperatures,	42.6
Greatest daily range of temperature, 25th,	31.
Least daily range of temperature, 7th,	12.
Mean daily range of temperature,	21.6
Mean relative humidity, per cent.,	60.2
Mean temperature of the Dew Point,	37.6
Total precipitation in inches, rain and melted snow,	1.43
Greatest precipitation in any 24 consecutive hours, 0.99 inches of rain, on the 7th and 8th.
Number of days on which .01 inch or more of rain fell, 3
Number of clear days 16, fair days 10, cloudy days 4.
Prevailing direction of wind from the Northwest.
Thunder storm on the 26th.
Solar halo on the 4th and 14th.
Snow, very light flurries, on the 1st and 2d.
Frost, heavy on 22nd, light on 28th.

SENSIBLE TEMPERATURE DATA.

Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m., 60.5 on 26th and 30th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 27.5 on 3d.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a. m., 43.4.
Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 64.5 on 26th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 30. on 2d.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p. m., 46.6.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer for this month, 45.

NOTE.—The monthly mean temperature for this month, 53.6° is 2° above the normal, and 3° above the corresponding month of 1898.

The amount of precipitation, 1.43 inches, is 2 inches less than the normal. No appreciable amount of rain fell from the 16th to the end of the month.

JOHN COMLY, Observer.

Centennial Avenue, Philadelphia, Fourth month 30.

SOMETHING UNUSUAL.

HE hunted through the library,
He looked behind the door,
He searched where baby keeps his toys
Upon the nursery floor.
He asked the cook and Mary,
He called mamma to look,
He even started sister up
To leave her Christmas book.

He couldn't find it anywhere,
And knew some horrid tramp
Had walked in through the open gate
And stolen it, the scamp!
Perhaps the dog had taken it
And hidden it away,
Or else perhaps he'd chewed it up
And swallowed it in play.

And then mamma came down the stairs,
Looked through the closet door,
And there it hung upon its peg,
As it had hung before.
And Tommy's cheeks turned rosy red,
Astonished was his face,
He couldn't find his cap—because
'Twas in its proper place!

—Emma E. Marean, in Youth's Companion,

For Friends' Intelligencer.

BIRD NOTES IN GERMANY.

THE change in surroundings from the great city of Berlin to this small university town, nestled in the valley among the high mountains, has been doubly accentuated by the signs of coming spring, the most welcome of which is the song of the birds. Most written-about bird-songs yield the precedence in power, variety, and compass to the birds of the middle belt of North America; but what I have already heard here surpasses that noted in the Delaware Valley at this season of the year.

For the past few mornings I have been awakened about 4 o'clock by a chorus of songsters in the little park "Paradise," which lies along the bank of the Saale river in front of our windows. It is a morning song of praise—an oratorio, with a grand, full choir and several leading solists of greater clearness and power. As with mortals, there are some birds which join the chorus late and whose voices are correspondingly sleepy. This matin-song continues until the dawning light makes the work of the day possible, and the melodies give way to chirps and calls, an interchange of gossip and business, and the humdrum talk of the day.

At twilight, when leisure has been again earned, the even-song is sung. Most of these feathered friends are strangers still in name; but as the German's folk-music means so much to us, so their bird-song finds a ready response in our hearts. Two soloists deserve special mention, one in the early morn and one at night-fall; their songs are rich, full, running through several bars and strikingly melodious. They are capable of notation in our scales and show a higher evolution of the elements of music than many simple folk melodies; for example, those of the Magyar plains, which Chopin has so beautifully interpreted and developed.

Last First-day a walk on the Weimar road brought us to a forest where, as is general in Germany, the underbrush had been cleared away. The woods were literally carpeted with anemones, hepaticas, orchids, ivy, violets, daisies, and other spring beauties. Coming through the vale out on to the plateau above, we were on the battle-field of Jena. Near its highest point is the Napoleon Stone; and here as in several other places we had a chance to observe the larks. It is said that in England they rise until out of the range of vision, never ceasing their song; but I had never seen them fly high. Here they rose almost perpendicularly to a height of perhaps two hundred feet and then poised themselves by fluttering their wings—a kind of treading in mid-air. They remain a long while—I timed several for over ten and one for thirteen minutes—occasionally dipping or rising a few yards, and keeping up a constant flood of song which is a voluminous trill as if a dozen birds were singing at once.

B. F. B.

Jena, Germany, Fourth month 20.

ORIZABA, in Mexico, 18,200 feet high, is "the highest peak in North America." Its native name (Indian) is Citlaltetpetl, the star mountain.

ADDRESS BY DR. JOSEPH MAY.

(Concluded from Last Week.)

AND now observe what I was about to refer to. The worst penalty of the evil that we do is the evil which it works in our own characters and sentiments; and at home and abroad we are just now having a striking illustration of this truth. I can hardly bear to bring up before your minds the picture of the recent appalling atrocities perpetrated in Georgia. That a whole community of nominally civilized Christian people should be so permeated with savage sentiments as to make such acts possible at this period of the world's history is amazing; it is absolutely bewildering. One knows not what to think or say, of such an outburst of blood-madness. Not only that a certain number could perpetrate the act of hacking to pieces and burning alive a fellow-being, but that thousands should flock to the spectacle and should possess themselves of disgusting relics of it as souvenirs. It is too shocking to dwell upon unnecessarily.

But, observe; this moral condition of the Southern population is only a legacy from the wicked institution of slavery. It is the terrible retribution which our maintenance of slavery wrought upon the white race. It held back their own civilization and filled them, men and women, with sentiments worthy of brutes, rather than of human beings. It rendered nugatory a true Christianity. And there seems too much reason to believe that in the Philippines the same contempt of an inferior race, of a different color from ours, has animated our soldiery and led them to the commission of acts inconsistent with even the code of civilized warfare. The letters of private soldiers report too much of this to permit us to doubt it all. "Niggers" they call the patriot natives contending for their independence as our fathers contended for theirs; and they are too probably acting in the spirit which the contemptuous term implies. You will observe that the regiments chiefly employed in the Philippines are men in many cases accustomed to Indian warfare. If they have slaughtered women and children as well as men, if they have murdered prisoners in cold blood, it is their education in contempt for our Indians and negroes at home which has made it possible.

I cannot express my sorrow and chagrin at the position our nation is in, in conducting this war of aggression and subjection against a people in every way inferior to us, who had committed no act justifying war even on the common principles of nations,—of whom two years ago we had scarcely even heard. The reaction of such wickedness upon our own character as a people cannot fail to be of the most unfortunate description.

In a meeting more varied than this in its composition, I might be asked, "What would you do as things are?" I find good men professing to deplore the war, yet reasoning, "Now we are in it we must see it through. Having required the Filipinos to submit, we must make them submit." I see no justice, no right, surely no religion, in such a claim. If we have been doing wrong and are doing wrong, the first thing is to stop that wrong ; and as a mere practical matter, we might surely do this now, after the demonstration we have already made of our power and determination. I would have our Administration call a halt in our atrocious warfare, arrange an armistice, and at least make an honest attempt to effect an understanding with the Filipino people by which the war should be ended and an orderly plan be adopted for placing the Filipinos on their feet as a nation. We ought never to have made the insolent demand that they should unconditionally submit to us. We ought now to withdraw it. But of course we shall not. I fear the majority of our people now demand their subjection as a preliminary to all else. Let us only hope that, weak and helpless, those poor brothers of ours, before their country is utterly laid waste, may submit to the inevitable, and let our cruel Administration have its way ; and when peace is restored and our power over them established, may our best public sentiment be felt, much more effectively than it has hitherto been felt, to secure justice and wisdom in the methods we adopt among them and to hasten the day when we shall retire from a position so inconsistent with our principles as a people, and one fraught with so many moral perils to ourselves as that of the domination of one free people over another.

CORRUPTION IN OUR POLITICS.

He who remembers the era of reconstruction in the South, the era of carpet-bag government there, must look forward with grave anxiety to the administration of the best possible government of the Filipinos by the United States of America,—themselves the prey of their own corrupt politicians.

My friends, we are in a most sad and trying period of our national history ; one more difficult and portentous, it seems to me, than our nation has ever been in. It reveals tendencies in our national character that are highly dangerous ; it reveals the weakness of the hold on our people of our best political principles and, especially, of the finer principles of morality and religion. I confess I am at times almost ready to despair. But that we must never do. Still we are in God's world ; his providence is over us ; his truth is before us in all its power ; our task is the same as it has always been, although it looks heavier than we had thought it, and our way may be longer than we were expecting.

I fear our greatest error in the past has been that we have devoted too much the energies of our thought to the theological and the personal side of religion and too little to the ethical side and the side of philanthropic service.

The attitude and utterances,—or the silence,—of our ministers during these two wars of to-day has been most surprising,—most disheartening. If all our churches had been devoted, first and above all, to the propagation of the principles of morality and of brotherhood ; to the bringing in, practically, of the kingdom of God on earth as a realized fact ; if the precepts of Jesus, the lessons of the Beatitudes, had been made our first and commanding law ; if we had taught our children mildness, gentleness, forgiveness, love ; we should not have been where now we are.

Let us go back to the beginning, if we need to ; let us make religion practical and moral ; let us make Jesus literally our pattern, our Saviour from the sin in our hearts,—not from its penalties. Our way will, indeed, be long ; you and I may not see on earth its end ; but we may do what in us lies and whatsoever we do shall not fail of its utility.

And, discouraging as the facts of to-day appear, I am, somehow, possessed with the vivid hope that the future is rapidly to brighten. The self-consciousness of the peoples, I deeply believe, is beginning to abhor war and to see its flagrant inconsistency with religion and civilization. Even such an event as the Czar's Conference, even though it should effect little practically, will turn the minds of the peoples toward the hatefulness and wickedness and wastefulness of war. International courts of arbitration are a thing almost within sight. We must go on insisting on our principles,—urging them in season and out of season with prophetic ardor and insistency,—leaving results to God, and trusting confidently in the coming of his millennial morn.

"God's ways seem dark ; but, soon or late,
They touch the shining hills of day ;
The evil cannot brook delay,—
The good can well afford to wait.
Give ermined knaves their hour of crime ;
Ours is the future, grand and great,
The safe appeal of truth to time."

PROHIBITION IN KANSAS.

Chicago Record.

THE prohibition law still prevails in Kansas, but its enforcement is a matter of local option. Towns are "wet" or "dry," according to the demands of public sentiment as to the closing of the saloons. In the large cities, generally speaking, there are breweries and distilleries, and the drinking places are wide open night and day, as in the States that have no prohibition law. There are, however, exceptions. Very little liquor is publicly sold in Topeka, for example, and in Lawrence, Leavenworth, and a large majority of the second class cities and towns none is sold except on the sly. Prohibition is not a dead letter nor a failure by any means, and I am told by almost everybody I ask that any proposition to repeal the law would be defeated by an overwhelming vote.

In some of the cities are singular exhibitions of inconsistency. In Pittsburg, a mining town in southeastern Kansas, for example, the city government licenses a number of saloons in direct defiance of the State statute that prohibits their existence, and the proceeds, upwards of $1,300 a month, are devoted to the support of the schools. At the same time Pittsburg furnishes an unanswerable argument for the enforcement of the prohibition law, for its police expenses and the dockets of its police courts are larger than those of any other town of similar size in the State.

This is a universal rule. Wherever there is a dry town the police force is idle and the police court sits but once a week. In the "wet," towns it sits every morning, and has plenty to do.

A temperance argument of equal force can be found in the poor-houses. In some of the "dry" counties none is needed. In all the "wet" counties they are found well filled.

The prosecuting attorneys throughout the State are usually the autocrats who decide whether a community shall be "wet" or "dry," and their action is generally governed by public sentiment. Sometimes it affords a political issue, and candidates are elected with the understanding or upon a pledge that they will carry out a certain policy, and thus the majority rules. As I have said, the great majority of towns are "dry," but many alternate between the two conditions according to circumstances. When the enforcement of the liquor law is lax,—a tragedy, a shooting scrape, a murder, a case of wife-beating, a fatal accident that can be traced to liquor, the embezzlement of money by some fast young man—will so shock the moral sense of the community that the saloons will be shut up for a year or two; but the effect and the recollection of such events soon die away, and the drinking places gradually open, first the back door and then the front door, until something else occurs to close them.

THE SOBER SECOND THOUGHT.

Springfield Republican.

IN 1896 Patrick A. Collins, of Boston, one of the most prominent and progressive of Massachusetts Democrats, was Consul at London. Senator Hoar went abroad that year, and was in England when Mr. Collins gave a banquet to a number of our consuls abroad. In a speech at Boston the other evening the Senator thus characterized the occasion:

"Every man who was present was proud to be a representative of the great republic. He felt that he had over him a flag honored everywhere, by land and by sea, representing everywhere not only the power and the glory of 75,000,000 of Americans, but representing also the hope of humanity the world over. Nobody thought then of doubting that we were a world power, or thought of his country as isolated and hemmed in and hampered in her continental home. The whole tone and thought of that meeting, without a dissenting voice, without a break in its harmony, was that the mission of the United States was moral, and not a mission of force; that our country stood among the nations of the world as the great peacemaker and the great peacekeeper; that wherever that flag floated, it floated to represent peace on earth and good will to men. We should have as soon thought three years ago of asking the Saviour of mankind to come down from the Mount and take service under a Roman centurion, and go into the employ of Tiberius, in order not to be isolated, as to have asked the American people to descend from its lofty height to engage in the diplomatic quarrels of Europe or the scuffles for empire in Asia."

Yet, during the greater part of the past year we have seen, not merely the masses, but a large proportion of the educated class which has furnished our leaders, carried away with the notion that the American Republic had been a failure, that the policy of isolation from foreign complications, upon which we had always felicitated ourselves, was a dreadful mistake, and that the only worthy ambition of the United States was to "become a world Power." More extraordinary still, a Protestant church, which had always denounced Mohammedan and Catholic methods of spreading religion by the sword, has through many of its most prominent clergymen retranslated Christ's injunctions to his Apostles so as to make it read, "Go ye into all the world, and shoot the Gospel into every creature." A leading representative of one of the largest denominations, expressing bluntly the feeling which was more vaguely phrased by most of his type, thus interpreted modern American Christianity in the Philippines: "The only thing we can do is to thrash the natives until they understand who we are, then is the time to send the Christ there."

Happily there are signs, as the year since the outbreak of the war with Spain closes, that the sober second thought has come to the people. The cruel test of experience has been applied to the rose-colored theories about the beauties of the "world-power" role. The fact is recognized that "forcible annexation" of the Philippines, "by our code of morality, would be criminal aggression," just as much as would have been the same course towards Cuba, which President McKinley, speaking the sentiment of the people, declared, in his message to Congress last April, "cannot be thought of." The truth has been driven home that a war of conquest by Americans means the same policy of cruelty towards the natives, misrepresentation by our authorities, and suppression of the facts by official censors, which always characterized the operations of the Spaniards.

THE average yield of sugar to the acre of cane is greater in the Hawaiian Islands than in any other cane-growing country in the world. It varies, however, a great deal; the average yield of Maui, for instance, is about three and one-half tons of sugar to the acre; Hawaii's average is lowered by the smaller producing qualities of her leeward or dry side, but would not go lower than four tons; Kauai, from four to five tons; and Oahu, six to seven tons.

THOUGH it is fully understood that the capitalization of the many Trusts and great incorporated combines is enormously watered, it is hoped by those who organize them that ultimately the fraudulency will be overlooked and the whole capital regarded as legitimate, and entitled to a return. Prof. E. W. Bemis, in his recent book on "Municipal Monopolies," says, it is easier to keep water out of capitalizations than to get it out after it has once got in.

KING HUMBERT, of Italy, is a vegetarian. He lives entirely on vegetables and fruit. The doctors have forbidden him to drink coffee, and his beverage is Bordeaux and plenty of water. The king never feels so well as when his fare is bread, potatoes, and oranges. Peaches are his favorite edible. The queen has made repeated attempts to become a vegetarian, but finally has given up in despair, being fond of "a generous diet."

THERE is a two-fold benefit in spraying for scale and similar insects with a solution in which Potash Whale Oil Soap is used. Potash is one of the essential foods of plants, and as much of the spraying mixture reaches the soil as well as the branches and foliage of the trees, the soil is benefitted by its application.—Meehans' Monthly.

RICHARD CADBURY, the wealthy English cocoa manufacturer, recently deceased, (a Friend), personally maintained some thirty home missionaries, and secretaries of adult schools, and philanthropic and other institutions in Birmingham, where the cocoa works are located.

THE Sunday School Times says: "If a man wants to be on the winning side, let him be on the right side. If a man is on the right side he will be on the winning side. The right side is God's side, and God's side is sure of a triumph in the end, however it looks to the world just now."

Searching the Mails.

Springfield (Mass.) Republican.

THE Postmaster-General cannot consistently stop with Mr. Atkinson's productions. He must sift the mails at San Francisco more closely. He must penetrate to the interior of every letter and every newspaper wrapper and every package and tear out and cast away all seditious matter, which means anything calculated to convey the impression that the administration is not unanimously supported at home and that the war is not unanimously regarded as helpful to the nation, and its institutions of government, and its commerce and its soldiers.

The incident is instructive as revealing with more startling clearness than ever the despotic tendencies of the imperialist policy. It uncovers the temper which brooks no opposition and will tolerate no criticism. The mailed hand of the rule of blood and iron is being gradually disclosed, which will next fall heavily upon freedom of speech within the old borders of the United States. It is impossible that a national career of conquest can be persisted in without the impairment of that most cherished privilege under the Constitution.

The Samoan Shame.

THE widow of Robert Louis Stevenson, the English author, (she was a California woman, a widow, before her marriage to him), has written a letter to the Westminster Gazette, London, from Funchal, Madeira, on the bombardment of Samoan villages by British and American war-ships. She says:

"President McKinley allowed no firing on Cuban towns unless they gave active cause of offence, and Commodore Watson was ordered not to attack undefended Spanish cities. Does the President keep his humanity for civilized countries alone?"

Mrs. Stevenson declares that the Samoan villages are inhabited in time of war by non-combatants, who have to choose between the shells of the war-ships and "taking to the bush." Under such conditions, she says, delicate women can hardly exist, while children die like flies. She comments severely on the attitude of the "Chief Justice," Chambers, an American, who has been involved in the troubles. She speaks further of "the scenes being enacted in these bombarded villages; the exodus of panic-stricken people rushing hither and thither, shells bursting everywhere, the cries of bed-ridden and helpless wounded people burning alive in their blazing houses, women in the pangs of child-birth, mangled children crawling on the sands, the sea before them and the bush behind them. And we read that the woods also were shelled. Who is to be held accountable for these deeds, that disgrace both England and America?"

Colonies Unprofitable.

A VALUABLE paper in the current issue of the Popular Science Monthly is that by Jacob Schoenhof, on "Colonial Expansion and Foreign Trade." He shows that the colonies of the great nations of Europe are not profitable but expensive.

"The three powers, France, Italy, Germany," he says, "point a lesson of unmistakable significance. The figures speak for themselves. No amount of expense can make the African and the Asiatic consume an appreciable amount of European merchandise. No amount of cultivation can make the tropics endurable to the northern man. Labor and exertion on his part under the rays of a deadly sun and miasma-breeding soil are entirely out of the question. Those who would make the endeavor in the manner of the temperate zone would only succeed the sooner in reaching the end of white man's settlement in the tropics, disease and death.

"Many point to the Dutch East Indian settlements as a successful commercial enterprise. But, taking the best construction given to the story from the trader's point of view, the present satisfactory conditions have been reached after a great deal of disappointment, loss, and bloodshed. A large revenue is acquired from Government sales of colonial produce; still, with all this added to the other revenues from land tax, excise, and other duties, the Government has a deficiency of over 10,000,000 florins a year in her East India possessions. The budget for 1898 shows an expense account of 146,150,164 florins, which is met by a revenue from all sources of but 135,204,203 florins."

The "Sample" Business.

THE sample season is at its height, says an article in Harper's Bazar, and every week the New York dry-goods stores are sending millions of little pieces of spring and summer fabrics all over the country. In one establishment alone 150 yards of silk are turned into samples every day. As for cotton goods, the great maw of the cutting-machine greedily devours the sheer fabrics as if it were a monster trying to gorge itself with syllabub. The samples sent are chosen out of the multitude of colors and designs by women who are called selectors. To be a good selector one must have a knowledge of human nature as well as of the fashions. Each girl who occupies this important position has charge of a certain territory, and she soon learns what is the general trend of taste in that locality. For individual preferences, of course, she must depend on the letters, which come in shoals. But some of these would give an inexperienced person absolutely no clew either to the writer's wish on that especial occasion or even to her personality. This is the time when the selector falls back on experience and intuition. She reads between the lines, and promptly comes to some definite conclusion.

A False and Unjust Theory.

[From "What Spain Can Teach America," by Nicholas Estevanez, formerly Minister of War of Spain, in the "North American Review."]

It is evident that the Americans, the conquerors of to-day, will not fall into the errors of religious intolerance and commercial monopoly, which are unsuitable to these times. Nevertheless, they make equally grave mistakes by treating the Porto Ricans and the Filipinos in an overbearing or unsympathetic manner. In general, the Anglo-Saxons of both hemispheres hold the theory which divides races into superior and inferior, a theory which is as false as it is unjust and dangerous. Even if it had a solid foundation and a scientific demonstration, it would only be humane and wise to elevate those who are not favored by nature or circumstances, instead of abasing and humiliating them. I foresee that the Americans will have difficulties in the Antilles, especially with the negro race, as they already have in the Philippine Islands, because they believe the natives unworthy of freedom. A great people like the Americans, a people who have cultivated federal principles ever since the foundation of their government, are obliged by self-respect to respect all autonomies. A people who have not self-government are not in the plenitude of their dignity and rights. The republicans of North America should treat all the inhabitants of their new possessions in a democratic spirit, and without humiliating and mortifying any by overbearing conduct. Man does not live by bread alone.

President Lincoln on War.

IN 1864, in the early summer, a Great Fair was held in Philadelphia, in aid of the Sanitary Commission. The buildings stood on Logan Square. On the 16th of Sixth month, President Lincoln came to visit it, and at a collation prepared for him he made a short speech. In opening he said:

"War, at best, is terrible, and this war of ours, in its magnitude, and in its duration, is one of the most terrible. It has deranged business totally in many localities, and partially in all localities. It has destroyed property and ruined homes; it has produced a national debt and taxation unprecedented, at least in this country. It has carried mourning to almost every home, until it can almost be said that 'the heavens are hung in black.'"

An Essay on Water.

Laing School Visitor, Mt. Pleasant, S. C.

THE following is the production of a little country boy. I think no one will doubt its originality :

WATER.

I think that water is one of the greatest blessings that our kind God has made. Water is good to everything that can breathe. It is better than wine. Without water we soon must die. Plants often die for want of water. Mankind cannot live more than a week without it. Cows often go crazy when they can't get it. Dew is water also. The dew makes the earth look green in a summer morning. Water is delicious. Some people makes their living out of the water. Great fishes lives in deep water, such as the whale from which oil is made. Water is useful in shipping rice and cotton.

Three forth of the earth surface is covered with water and only one forth is land. Water is used in different ways, to drink, to wash with, and to swim in, and to drown people in. Lakes, rivers, seas, gulfs, bays, oceans are all water. Water was used in discovering America. Water was the grave of De Soto, the man who founded the Mississippi river. Water keeps fishes alive.

Ducks are fond of water. So am I. Water is good to keep you clean. No more to say on the subject of water. From J. L.

"Alcoholism" and Degeneracy.

DR. CESARE LOMBROSO, the Italian writer on insanity, has a very strong article in the Popular Science Review, this month, on "Insane Characters in Fiction and the Drama," in the course of which he says :

"Alcoholism, too, has taken on enormous proportions: Not that the ancients did not drink, but rather that pure alcohol had not yet been introduced ; while in the middle ages it passed for one of the most efficacious remedies—aqua vita, living water. Dr. Beard has made a most judicious observation in America which I have been able to verify in Sicily—that there must be a very advanced degree of civilization, or rather of degeneracy, produced by civilization, for inebriety to be transformed into that aggregation of disasters, especially of the nervous system, which is called alcoholism. Now we have not alcoholism only, but morphinism, cocaineism, all stimuli of the nervous system, which are used by barbarians as potent excitants, but not to the point of producing stable alterations except in rare cases, like the 'amuck' of the Malays.

"And now, we all of us, at least in the capitals and the great centers, find ourselves consumed by a feverish activity which makes the mind labor much more than Nature intended it should, under which is produced all this mass of neurasthenics, hystericals, besides the multitudes of moral insane, profoundly egotistical persons, without affection and wholly directed by a powerful passion for gold, for which they sacrifice everything, even salvation !"

Peaceable People in Borneo.

DR. WILLIAM H. FURNESS, of the University of Pennsylvania, entertained the Comparative Literature Society yesterday, (says a recent dispatch from New York city), with an address on the folk lore of Borneo. In his account of the people of Borneo, who are savages of a higher order of civilization than the term "savages" implies, he said that they live in co-operative communities, and sometimes as many as 400 persons will live in a house a quarter of a mile long. Each household is presided over by an "Orang Tuah," who, in turn, is governed in a measure by the chief of the tribe, known as the "Penghulu." The government of the household is conducted in the quietest manner. Dr. Furness has lived on several occasions in these houses for several weeks, and he has never seen anything approaching a violent quarrel between two members of the same house, nor has he seen the Orang Tuah or the Penghulu submit any of the members to harsh treatment.

Too Many Teachers.

BOSTON, it is stated, is educating more persons to be teachers than it has use for, and the problem is worrying the Board of Education and the Superintendent. It appears that there are annually falling vacant, on the average, about fifty places in the primary and grammar schools, of such a character that it is safe to appoint to them beginners at teaching, such as the graduates of the Normal school. But there are now in attendance at the Normal school 261 pupils.

At the present time, not only most of last year's graduates, but a majority of those also of 1897, and considerable numbers of those of earlier years, are waiting for opportunities which do not come. The Superintendent's remedy is to limit the annual admissions to the Normal School to seventy-five, these to be chosen by competitive examination. He argues that if there is to be disappointment among those aspiring to be teachers, it is better that it be faced at the threshold of the Normal School course than at its conclusion.

THE mother of President Loubet, the French "Chief Executive," as has been repeatedly mentioned, is a wrinkled old woman, a "peasant," who wears sabots,—wooden shoes. He visited his native town, Montelimar, which is where she lives, the other day. There was a grand procession, the whole town was "en fete." As the President's carriage drove by the balcony on which she was standing, looking down at him, in spite of the procession which was in danger of being spoiled, and in spite of all the pomp and the ceremony he was expected to observe, he stopped, jumped out, "and running up the balcony, caught the trembling little old lady in his arms, hugging and kissing her before all the world."

THE United States Government, it is remarked, has officially recognized the Mormon religion by appointing Elias Kimball, a Mormon, chaplain of the Second Corps of Engineers. He was commissioned in 1898.

THE average capitalization of the Massachusetts street railway is $44,683 per mile ; in the Central West the average is over twice as large, or $91,500. The actual cost in Massachusetts would be about $35,000 a mile.

AN inheritance-tax law enacted in Michigan provides a tax of five per cent. on all inheritances over $500, except to lineal descendants, who are exempt up to and including $5,000, when a tax of one per cent. is imposed.

MARK TWAIN'S lawyers have bought for him the old frame house in which he was born at Florida, Mo. It is said that he will renovate the place and restore it to the condition it was in during his boyhood.

THE Northwestern Plow Manufacturers' Association, at Chicago, on the 8th instant, ordered that 15 per cent. should be added to the selling price of manufactured goods, owing to the advance in price of raw materials.

THE Pacific says : "Some preachers fail of success because they do not live up to what they preach. The man who practices what he preaches will be a magnet in drawing men to Christ."

Ex-SECRETARY John Sherman declares, in a letter written on the 8th instant, that his health would not permit him to accept the nomination for Governor of Ohio. He is seventy-six years old.

It will have to be admitted that while not ideally fitted for self-government, the Samoans could hardly do worse if left to themselves.—[The News, Detroit.]

THE Morning Star says "Many Christians are against war in general, but are always found favoring war in particular cases."

DR. WILLIAM LAMBERT RUSSELL died, at Barre, Massachusetts, on the 6th instant, of mumps, aged ninety-nine years. He was the oldest Harvard graduate.

AN effort is making among some of the Methodist churches to induce women to remove their hats in church.

CURRENT EVENTS.

ACTIVE operations in the Island of Luzon were resumed last week by General Otis's forces, and the town of San Fernando, to which the Filipinos had removed their capital, was taken. There are the usual reports of small losses to the United States troops, and of severe ones to "the enemy." A dispatch on the 7th says the United States troops were "much exhausted by the campaign," and that the companies which should have one hundred men each, averaged "less than fifty." The negotiations with the Filipino "envoys" appear to have come to nothing. The dispatches tell very little of the "Commission," of which President Schurman, of Cornell, is Chairman. It was intimated some time ago that "financial" means would be used to bring the Filipinos to an agreement,—meaning that the leaders might be bought.

THE "civilized" condition of the Filipinos, in some places at least, is indicated by the description of San Fernando. A despatch, 7th, says it "is the most picturesque and wealthy town the Americans have entered since the occupation of Manila. It is largely built of stone, the river is close at hand, and high hills almost surround it. Many sugar factories indicate a thriving industry in that respect, and there are numerous fine residences. General MacArthur's permanent headquarters is established in the best house in the town, which is richly decorated with frescoes and carved woods."

EDWARD ATKINSON, of Boston, has written several pamphlets on current questions, arising out of the war upon the Filipinos. Copies of these he sent by mail to the United States Commissioners at Manila, and to the "general officers" of the army. The pamphlets made extensive citations from the proceedings of the United States Senate, and quoted the language of President McKinley concerning Cuba, in his message to Congress, in 1897. It was decided at Washington that the pamphlets were "seditious," and they were taken out of the mails at San Francisco, by order of Postmaster-General Charles Emory Smith.

GENERAL Guy V. Henry, who has been the Military Governor of Porto Rico, has resigned, and is on his way home. He is succeeded by General George W. Davis. Rear Admiral John C. Watson, who has been stationed at Mare Island, San Francisco, has been ordered to Manila, to relieve Admiral George Dewey, in command of the fleet there. The latter desires to return to this country.

THE report of the "Wade Court of Inquiry" on the beef furnished the army has been made public, having been approved by the President. It censures the late Commissary-General Eagan, for purchasing so great quantities of the so-called "canned roast beef," it being "practically untried and unknown" as an army ration. (His purchases amounted to 7,000,000 pounds.) It censures also several subordinate officers. It reflects upon General Miles for delay in his complaints of the beef, and says his allegation that the refrigerated beef was treated with chemicals is not sustained. No further proceedings are to be taken. Newspapers that strongly condemned the beef regard the report as "white-washing."

A CLEVELAND despatch alleges that plans are being drawn for "a big railroad trust, which is to include all the lines between Boston and Chicago." It says that "it is not the purpose to have all the lines under one management exactly, but to apportion them among the Pennsylvania Company, the Vanderbilt interests and the Baltimore and Ohio Company, when it shall have been reorganized, giving to each system the lines which it can use to the best advantage." Later despatches deny the statement, but in such cases denials always follow the first announcement.

A VERY extensive iron and steel "deal" has been arranged, the Carnegie works being the chief feature. They pass into the control of H. C. Frick, and others, Andrew Carnegie retiring. A charter for a new company, called the Carnegie Company, has been secured at Harrisburg, with a capital of $100,000. This is to be increased, it is said, to $200,000,-

000. Andrew Carnegie has entirely sold out. He gets, it is stated, $150,000,000, of which fifty millions is to be cash, and the remainder mortgage bonds. He said, in London, on the 8th instant, that he sold "in pursuance of a policy determined upon long since not to spend my old age in business, struggling for more dollars. I believe in a useful, dignified and unselfish reign after sixty."

GOVERNOR JONES, of Arkansas, has expressed himself as favorable to the suggestion that a Convention of Southern Governors and Attorney Generals be called to discuss plans for concerted action in the matter of anti-trust legislation, and it is probable that such a Convention will be called at an early date.

THE committee of the German Reichstag to which was referred the Meat Inspection bill which had been approved by the German Cabinet and Ambassador White has disapproved the measure, and reported in favor of a bill quite hostile to the imports of American meats. The army beef scandals in this country were used as arguments by those who wished a restrictive law. Word was sent out from Washington on the 8th that agitation of the army beef question ought to be stopped, now, as "no good result" could come from further debates over it.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE New England Historical Genealogical Society, (centring at Boston), which last year first opened its doors to women as members, has now, for the first time, invited a woman to address it. On the 3d instant, Anna Davis Hallowell, of West Medford, read an admirable paper on the life and work of Lydia Maria Child.

—A dispatch from Guthrie, Oklahoma, on the 4th instant, says: "Chief Keokuk, of the Sac and Fox Indians, died of small-pox to-day. The tribe now numbers only 312 full-bloods, 108 having died of small-pox. Keokuk, 'The Watchful Fox,' was a son of the greater Keokuk, Chief of Sac and Fox Indians, after whom Keokuk, Iowa, is named. The elder Keokuk died in Kansas in 1848, aged sixty-eight years. Keokuk's loyalty to the whites, and opposition to Black Fox, resulted in his being poisoned by a member of Black Hawk's band. Black Hawk was for a time Keokuk's prisoner, having been turned over to him by the United States government as the principal chief of the Sacs and Foxes."

—This distressing story was sent from Montreal on the 28th ultimo: "Seven years ago, Thomas Stewart, then ten years old, lost the sight of one eye, the blade of a penknife having been accidentally run into it. Dr. Alexander Proudfoot attended him. Recently the doctor advised the removal of the useless eye as the only means of preserving the other intact. This was agreed to, and the delicate task was intrusted to Dr. Proudfoot, who is assistant oculist and aurist to the General Hospital. The operation took place at the family residence, and at its conclusion it was found that a terrible mistake had been made—the healthy eye had been removed. On recovery from the effects of the anæsthetic, the patient found himself blind."

—The reports of the famine existing in large districts of the eastern provinces of Russia grow worse. (This was a few weeks ago.) Scurvy is ravaging the population in some places. According to a local newspaper, in the province of Kazan, that disease is spreading rapidly among the rural population. There have even been cases of death from starvation. From Simbirsk, a Dr. Babushkin, in a published letter, declares that it will take the peasants at least ten years to recover from their economic ruin, and that the number of cattle has been reduced to nearly one-third.

—The need in Armenia, in many places, is reported as continuing. C. S. Blackburn, of the American Mission at Urumia, in Persia, (whither many Armenians fled), reports on the 25th of Third month, the most terrible want of food, and continuance of misery.

—President McKinley left Washington on the 8th instant for the Virginia Hot Springs, where he will remain two weeks. A despatch says, "he expects to be absent from the capitol the greater part of the summer, public business permitting."

NOTICES.

* * A General Conference of Young Friends' Associations will be held in Race Street meeting-house, Philadelphia, on Second-day, Fifth month 15, 1899, at 8 p. m.

Addresses: "The Religious and Public Life of William Penn," Gilbert L. Hall, Swarthmore Association; Discussion opened by Daniel Willits, Trenton Association. "William Penn and His Holy Experiment," Joseph S. Walton, Philadelphia Association, Discussion opened by New York-Brooklyn Association.

WM. W. BIRDSALL, Chairman.

ALICE LEE BARNES, Secretary.

ANNA S. ATKINSON, Secretary Executive Com.

* * To-morrow (First-day) evening, meetings will be held at Race above 15th street, 4th and Green streets, 17th street and Girard avenue, and 35th street and Lancaster avenue, all at 7.30 o'clock.

* * Friends desiring accommodation at the meeting-house, or elsewhere, during New York Yearly Meeting, please communicate with

ELLA B. McDOWELL,
226 East 16th street, New York City.
or ELIZABETH B. CAPRON,
White Plains, N. Y.

* * The annual meeting of stockholders of Friends' Book Association of Philadelphia, will be held in Room No. 4, 15th and Race streets, on Second-day, Fifth month 15, 1899, at 7.15 p. m., when an election will be held for Directors to serve for the ensuing year.

SAMUEL B. CHAPMAN, Secretary.

* * Quarterly and Yearly Meetings will occur as follows:

- FIFTH MONTH:
15. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.
 25. Bucks Quarter, Buckingham, Pa.
 29. New York Yearly Meeting.
 30. Burlington Quarter, Crosswicks, N. J.
 31. Southern Quarter, Easton, Md.

* * An adjourned meeting of the Association for the promotion of First-day Schools within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, will be held in Race Street meeting-house, Fourth-day evening, Fifth month 17, at 8 o'clock.

It is desired to make the occasion one of especial value to First-day school teachers. All interested are invited.

JOHN L. CARVER, } Clerks.
MARY H. FORMAN, }

* * The following compose the Committee to assist in securing homes for strangers in attendance at Philadelphia Yearly Meeting:

Charles E. Thomas, 868 N. 26th street.
Tamar Hartley, 1511 Swain street.
Martha D. Hough, 1340 Spruce street.
Matilda K. Lobb, 1702 N. 18th street.
Sarah L. Haines, 1513 Marshall street.
Joseph M. Truman, Jr., 1500 Race street.
Rebecca B. Comly, 1529 Centennial avenue.

* * The Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches will attend meetings as follows:

FIFTH MONTH:

21. Merion, 10.30 a. m.
AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

* * The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has made the following appointments for Fifth month:

14. Huntingdon and Eastland, Pa.
21. Pipe Creek, Md.
26. Deer Creek, Md.
28. Broad Creek, Md.

On behalf of the Committee.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
BRYNER-BARKER
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR } Cincinnati.
ROKSTERN }
ATLANTIC }
BRADLEY } New York.
BROOKLYN }
JEWETT }
ULSTER }
UNION }
SOUTHERN } Chicago.
SHIPMAN }
COLLIER }
MISSOURI } St. Louis.
RED SEAL }
SOUTHERN }

JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY
Cleveland.
SALEM
Salem, Mass.
CORNELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

THE brands of White Lead named in the margin are old friends, tried by many generations of use and proven the best. They are made by the "old Dutch process" of slow corrosion, and, with pure Linseed Oil, there is no other paint as good.

There are other brands made by quick or patent process and numerous mixtures of Barytes, Zinc, Whiting, etc., which are branded and sold as Pure White Lead. Make sure that the brand is right.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

Publisher's Department.

* * Pillsbury's Vitos, a wheat food, is being advertised in the INTELLIGENCER. If any of our readers will write to Pillsbury-Washburn Flour Mills Co., Minneapolis, Minn., and ask for book of Pillsbury Vitos Recipes, they will be sent a copy by return mail. This book contains about thirty recipes for serving Pillsbury's Vitos at breakfast, dinner, tea, and supper, prepared by Fannie Merritt Farmer, Principal Boston Cooking School, and Isabel Howard Neff, Teacher of Domestic Science, Cincinnati Public Schools. Each recipe is simple, accurate, and complete, and all are the results of experience.

* * The works of the Pettit Ornamental Iron and Fence Company, which have been familiar to many patrons at 1217-1221 Callowhill street, Philadelphia, have been removed to 46 North 11th street

* * Arguing for the use of whole wheat flour (such as that made by the Franklin Mills, at Lockport, N. Y.), a writer in the Christian Nation, New York, says:

"I went with a friend into a familiar New York city restaurant, something less than a year ago. There was a new face back of one of the counters, among the waiting girls. Said my friend, 'That girl's rosy cheeks tell the story of a new arrival from over the sea.' Her sister had served there, and her cheeks, when she first came over, had been as beautifully tinted as the new arrivals, but the bloom had flown, as a frightened bird from its bush. Travel throughout Ireland and Scotland as I have done, and you will observe two things: First, that the distinguishing characteristic of the young men and young women is their complexion, the tint of rich red blood mounting to the cheek 'as a rose in a garden of lillies'; and second, the almost utter absence of white flour. When you come back to America, and note the almost utter absence, comparatively speaking, of wholesomely prepared whole-wheat flour, and the everywhere-abounding presence of the done-to-death white flour, the cause of the sickliness and ill health and increased mortality among our people is immediately apparent."

* * Readers of the INTELLIGENCER will do well to patronize those who advertise in its columns.

* * A friend recently inserted in the INTELLIGENCER, for one time, the advertisement of a woman wanting a place. A few days later, he said: "I had 22 replies to the advertisement, by persons wanting help, and probably ten of them would have been satisfactory places."

CHARLES BURTON,

Practical House and Sign Painter,

Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, }

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to

CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

JOSEPH T. FOULKE,

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

OFFICES: { 623 Walnut Street, Philadelphia.
Ambler, Montgomery Co., Pa.

JOHN FABER MILLER,

325 SWEDR STREET, NORRISTOWN, PENNA.

ATTORNEY-AT-LAW.

Practicing in Montgomery and Philadelphia counties.

LIZZIE J. LAMBERT,

Successor to E. SHOEMAKER,

Millinery. 533 NORTH ELEVENTH STREET,
Philadelphia.

CAROLINE RAU, 736 Spring Garden St.,
Philadelphia.

Plain Millinery

MEDIUM FELTS AND STRAW BONNETS.

JENNIE S. MARSHALL,

INSTRUCTOR IN PIANOFORTE,
1614 Tioga St., Phila.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 20, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 20.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XX.

THEY who would contend for the faith once delivered to the saints need to do it in the spirit of the saints, whose righteous zeal and holy earnestness knows no rancor.

From an editorial article in The Friend, Philadelphia.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

"FATE."

IF all our ends are fixed by Fate,
If all we do will naught avail,
If every striving, small or great,
Is but an empty, idle tale,—
What then, but cease those efforts vain,
Receive our good, endure our pain?
What then but fold our hands and wait?

H. M. J.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

THE meeting of ministers and elders, on the 13th instant, convened in the Cherry Street house, at 10 a. m. The attendance was quite full, Bennett S. Walton acting as Clerk. (This meeting is unitedly held, men and women in one body.)

Among those present, by consent of the meeting—very cheerfully given—were Cyrus W. Harvey, a member of the smaller, (or Wilbur), body, of Kansas; and two Friends from England, J. Wilhelm Rowntree, and A. Neave Brayshaw, of York.

The afternoon session was closed earlier than usual, by the sad incident which is elsewhere mentioned, the sudden death of Aaron M. Powell. His wife and sister, (Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond, of Swarthmore College), were both in the meeting when it occurred. The Friends of the meeting, excepting those who were endeavoring to be of assistance, quietly remained seated, in perfect order, and the Clerk presently read a concluding minute.

FIRST-DAY MEETINGS.

In Race Street house, First-day morning, there was, as usual, a very large attendance; before 10 o'clock, (the hour of gathering being 10.30), there was standing room only. Many stood outside in the yard, during the meeting. After it had settled, Rachel M. Lippincott offered prayer. David Ferris spoke of the sudden departure of our friend A. M. P., and paid a touching tribute to him. He said: "He was one of those who kept his work accomplished. For more than fifty years he was devoted to the work of raising fallen humanity. No type was too low to be beyond his sympathy and love. He was always prepared for the call to come up higher. A sweet, a loving, a devoted spirit has gone from our sight."

Isaac Wilson followed, at length, taking his text from Genesis: "It is good and very good." Cyrus W. Harvey then spoke, dwelling upon spiritual gifts, gifts of prophecy, etc. Lydia H. Price spoke, also Joseph Elkinton, and the meeting closed with prayer.

In the Cherry Street end of the house, the attendance was also very large, more than could be seated. James C. Strengtham, of Brooklyn, plead for a life of practical righteousness. Elizabeth Lloyd followed, and a number of Friends, including Isaac H. Hillborn, Matilda E. Janney, Samuel Jones, Peter Smedley, James Shilldrake, and Chalkley Webster, spoke, or offered prayer.

An overflow meeting in the Friends' School lecture-room of the school building was addressed by Thomas W. Sheward and Joseph S. Walton. In the afternoon at 3, the house was too small to hold those who came to attend the annual First-day exercises.

Beside a number of selections given by all the schools in unison, remarks on the Beatitudes were made by Joseph S. Walton, Mary Travilla, and J. Eugene Baker, followed by a selection from West Chester School, entitled "To the Czar." An address by Isaac H. Hillborn and the concert repetition of the Lord's Prayer concluded the exercises.

SECOND-DAY, FIFTH MONTH 15.

In men's meeting, at 10 a. m., there was about the usual number in attendance on the first day of the meeting. After a short time devotionally spent, the representatives were called, and—at this and the subsequent call, before the close of the session—only seven were found to be absent, for two of whom explanation was given.

Minutes were read for Isaac and Ruth Wilson from Westlake Monthly Meeting, Canada, and for Uriah Blackburn and Hannah M., his wife, elders, from Dunning's Creek Monthly Meeting, Pa. The minute given by Cyrus W. Harvey, a minister, of Spring River Monthly Meeting, Kansas, (Wilbur body), by his monthly and quarterly meeting was also read, and he and two English Friends, John Wilhelm Rowntree and Alfred Neave Brayshaw, who expressed a desire to sit in the Yearly Meeting, were made welcome to do so.

The epistles from New York, Baltimore, and Illinois Yearly Meetings were read, and called forth expressions of satisfaction. A committee to respond to them, and for other duties, was appointed.

In the afternoon the representatives proposed the appointment of Emmor Roberts as Clerk, and Isaac H. Hillborn and Alfred Moore as Assistant Clerks, who were united with. They also proposed the names of the men to form part of the joint committee on Treasurer's account, etc., which were approved.

The report of the Committee on Philanthropic Labor was read. It will be printed in full in the INTELLIGENCER. In connection with it an Appeal, on Purity, prepared by Aaron M. Powell, as President of the American Purity Alliance, was read.

In connection with the report the subject of Peace and Arbitration was brought up. Edward H. Magill proposed the sending of a message forming an International Court of Arbitration to the Conference at The Hague. Howard M. Jenkins desired to do this, but also to have proposed a restatement of the testimony of Friends on Peace. It was decided to refer both subjects to a joint committee of men and women Friends, to report at a future sitting.

In the women's meeting in the morning, at the opening, Margaret P. Howard offered prayer, and Lydia H. Price spoke briefly. The representatives all answered but eight, and for four of these reasons for absence were given. A committee was appointed to assist the Clerks in gathering the exercises. The minutes of the visiting Friends were read. The epistles from the other six yearly meetings were all read and favorably discussed. In the afternoon session, at the opening, the representatives proposed Sarah Griscom for Clerk, Matilda Garrigues for Assistant, and Emma D. Eyre for Reader, who were all approved. The committee on epistles was appointed, as usual, and it was proposed that only one epistle, to be prepared jointly by men's and women's meeting, be sent to those yearly meetings which sit without separation as to sex; this was agreed to, and the proposal was subsequently approved by men's meeting.

THIRD-DAY, 16TH.

In men's meeting, the remaining three epistles—those from Genesee, Ohio, and Indiana Yearly Meetings—were read. Comment was made upon them by several Friends; it was said that this epistolary interchange had a real value, and should be maintained in the life; the epistles now read, it was remarked, contained matter lively and edifying.

The report of the Committee on First-day Schools was then read. It will be printed in full in the INTELLIGENCER. Joseph Powell regarded the report as a good one. W. W. Birdsall said the most satisfactory feature of the report was the establishment of four new schools, and dwelt upon the importance of establishing new meetings when necessary changes of residence obliged Friends to leave the old ones. Cyrus W. Harvey spoke on the First-day school work, the need of distinctly teaching Friends' principles and testimonies, and of consecration on the part of those engaged. David Newport, Lewis V. Smedley, Edwin L. Pierce, and others spoke, Lewis especially offering words of encouragement to the committee for its work. Walter Laing, Allen Flitcraft, Joel Borton, J. Leedom Worrall, and Ezra Lippincott added brief exhortations.

The report of the Committee on Education and the Disposition of the Income of the Samuel Jeanes Fund was read. It will be printed in full. Remarks were made upon it by Isaac Eyre, Walter Laing, and others.

The report of the Correspondent of the Yearly Meeting, appointed to correspond with Isolated Friends, was read. The printing of the list of isolated members in the "Extracts" was approved. The preparation of a letter to isolated members and the subject of care over distant groups by a joint committee of the seven Yearly Meetings were referred to the Committee to prepare the General Epistle.

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.

(Continued from last week.)

A NOTABLE incident in the life of his family occurred in the Eleventh month, 1842, it being a visit from Lucretia and James Mott, who were visiting meetings in Maryland and Virginia. Edward Needles, of Baltimore, kindly brought them in his carriage from Baltimore to Goose Creek. In the course of their visit, Lucretia held a meeting by appointment at the court house in Leesburg, (the county seat of Loudoun county), which Samuel M. Janney attended.

In the course of her address Lucretia said: "I have lately been to London, and while there I saw a procession in which a banner was carried bearing this inscription, "Bread or Blood." The time may come when a procession will march through your streets carrying a banner with the inscription "Give me Liberty or give me Death." "A word to the wise is sufficient." The court-house was crowded, many holders of slaves being present. Her sermon was kindly received, and made a great impression.

For fifteen years Samuel M. Janney conducted Springdale Boarding School for girls. If he failed in manufacturing cotton, he certainly succeeded in this. He and his faithful and devoted wife were "Cousin Samuel" and "Cousin Elizabeth" to all of his pupils, and the love and esteem in which their memory is held to-day by scores of matronly women is echoed and reëchoed by their children and children's children.

[Of this period a friend says: In the past few years, when many reminiscences were published, and tributes paid to the early schools and teachers of our Society, regret was felt that some of the old pupils of Springdale did not contribute their testimony to its merits and the large amount of good it had accomplished in the cause of education,—not only within our own borders, but at a distance, its patrons not being confined to Virginia, but Maryland and some other States were well represented.

During the early years of this school many of its pupils were those having no connection with Friends and an untold, though silent, influence for good, went forth from those halls.

We who enjoyed the privilege of receiving instruction in this school gratefully remember the tender and parental care extended over us by our revered teacher and his beloved wife, and the kindness of his family to those who were inmates of this home; and I am sure I voice the sentiment of all who are left of that large number in saying that in each heart are cherished many precious memories of those days; of him who so faithfully labored for our spiritual as well as intellectual advancement; and of those who were from time to time his earnest and efficient assistants and co-workers at Springdale.—A. M. S.,—Waterford, Va.]

Of a genial and sociable nature, easily approached, quick at repartee, no wonder that Samuel M. Janney was a prime favorite,—not only with the school girls, but with all the young people of the neighborhood. In social intercourse his pleasant, hearty laugh rang out with all the zest and freedom of those much younger in years. No wedding festivities in his neighborhood were complete unless "Cousin Samuel" was there,—not only to contribute his share of joyousness to the occasion, but also to impress upon the minds of the young couple the sacredness of the marriage vow, and the importance of asking the Divine blessing upon their union.

If he rejoiced with those that rejoice, no less did he mourn with those who mourned. Many are witnesses to his gentle ministrations and loving, sympathetic words in times of sorrow, or trouble, or bereavement.

Very soon after his first appearance in the ministry (1832) he began to visit other meetings, under a sense of religious duty,—first within the limits of his own meeting as companion to George Truman, of Philadelphia, then to those belonging to his own yearly meeting. From this time forward he was frequently absent from home, often weeks at a time, attending to this required duty. In the latter part of his life he was frequently attended by his daughter Cornelia.

During all this time he never failed to lift up his voice against slavery. He had in his employ an intelligent colored man by the name of Talbot Gant, who catered for the Springdale table, especially for the meats, which he bought from the neighboring farmers. He was a keen, shrewd purchaser, and his employer, sometimes thinking that he drove too hard a bargain with the neighbors cautioned him upon the subject, and said to him, "Now, Talbot, I do not wish thee to be too close with my friends in buying their beef—I wish to pay a fair price for it. I am afraid, Talbot, that thee does not understand the Golden Rule." "Oh, yes Mr. Janney," he quickly replied, "I know all about the 'Golden Rule.'" "Well, what is it, Talbot?" "Why, Mr. Janney, it is this way: 'Do unto others as you think they would do unto you.'"

Perhaps it would not be inappropriate in this article to speak a little more at length about Talbot Gant, in order that younger readers may form some idea of the atmosphere by which the subject of this sketch was surrounded. Talbot was formerly a slave, but had been freed by his master and sent West. Being desirous of settling there, he very naturally wished the company of his wife. She was a slave. He came back to Virginia and stole her away, hoping to elude the vigilance of her owners. But in this he was disappointed. They were both arrested, she was returned to her mistress, and he was sent to jail in Leesburg, Va., where he was afterwards tried for "stealing a slave." The Friends generously contributed means to enable Talbot to engage counsel,—Thomas Nichols in an especial manner rendered him very effective aid. John Janney, a distinguished lawyer of Leesburg, together with others, was engaged to defend him. The trial attracted much attention, especially the defense put forth by lawyer Janney. He said in substance: Long ages ago, "In the beginning," as it is called in Holy Writ,—the Lord God said, "It is not good that the man should be alone"—and there was a marriage in the Garden of Eden, and in the presence of Almighty God. Adam took Eve to be his wife, with the command that he should cleave unto her and that "they should be one flesh." If that was a true marriage, none the less so was this, when Talbot Gant and Maria, in the presence of the same Almighty Power, took each other as husband and wife, promising to be faithful unto each other until death." This defense created a profound impression and Talbot was cleared of the charge of stealing. He immediately went to work to buy his wife, and succeeded. They were afterwards both employed at Springdale Boarding School, until they removed to Xenia, Ohio, where they became prosperous and respected citizens.

In the Eighth month, 1849, a southern Methodist minister, William H. Smith, President of Randolph-Macon College, delivered in the court-house at Leesburg a lecture professedly on education, but chiefly in defense of slavery. He took the ground that slavery is right in itself, and sanctioned by the Bible. Samuel M. Janney replied to the address in an article which was published in a Leesburg paper. He was soon after "presented" by the Grand Jury, alleging that he maintained that "owners had no property in their slaves." He defended himself so successfully that

SPRINGDALE BOARDING SCHOOL, NEAR LINCOLN, VA.

Established as a School by Samuel M. Janney, and conducted by him for fifteen years. The building is still standing, and otherwise used.

the Court determined to quash the proceedings. At about this time, under the encouragement of his friends, and especially that of Samuel S. Randall, he commenced writing the Life of William Penn. The success realized was far more than he anticipated. He afterward wrote The Life of George Fox, the History of the Society of Friends, besides numerous less extended works.

In the autumn of 1854 a boarding-school for both sexes was opened at Springdale, under the care of Samuel M. Janney, the school for girls having been discontinued eighteen months before. S. M. J. warmly advocated the natural method of educating boys and girls in the same classes, and the experiment at Springdale for that year was a great success. A pleasing rivalry sprang up between the two sexes in their studies, which resulted in great good to all. Friendships were formed which terminated in a more intimate relationship, affecting the whole after life of many of the pupils of that year.

On the 8th of Third month, 1858, the greatest sorrow of his life came to him in the death of his first born, his son John. He was in the thirty-second year of his age, and had been a companionable and sympathizing son. His father was overwhelmed with grief. He mourned for him as a mother mourns

"For a little one gone away."

For many months it seemed impossible for him to fix his mind upon business, and it was only by prayerful effort that he was enabled to do so.

In the spring of 1861 came the Civil War. His home was on the border,—only twelve miles from the Potomac. Nearly all of the Friends in this large settlement in Loudoun county remained loyal to the national government, and as they were within the rebel lines nearly all of the time during the war they were subjected to many hardships. The opening of the war found the subject of this sketch and his widowed daughter-in-law conducting a country store in what is now the village of Lincoln, he having given up his school some time before. The care of the store devolved almost entirely upon his daughter-in-law, he furnishing means to carry it on, and giving his name to the firm. The unusual circumstance in the South of a store conducted by a woman secured it from being raided by the soldiery or the bands of guerrillas who frequented the neighborhood. Proverbial southern gallantry was not lost sight of even in war time.

Rarely a day passed that "Confederate" soldiers or guerrillas did not come to the store, and to the credit of them be it said, they never took any goods from this store without paying for them. Many of them were from the far South, not accustomed to seeing a lady at the head of a store,—not accustomed to hearing the peculiar language of the Friends. One Fifth-day morning, two intelligent young Mississippi soldiers came into the store just before meeting time. They waited until all the Friends were served, and had gone into meeting, then they commenced to buy some caps. They stood at the counter a long time,—talking, asking questions,—the writer thought an unreasonably long time. Finally she said to them, "Young men, do you want these caps or not? It is our custom to close the store at 11 o'clock on Fifth-days and go to meeting, and it is past the hour already." "Oh! we beg your pardon. Certainly, we want the caps." "Here," (throwing down some gold pieces on the counter), "we were only talking so long to hear you say thee."

(To be Continued.)

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT

No. 22.—FIFTH MONTH 28.

THE TIME OF CONQUEST.

GOLDEN TEXT.—All that the Lord speaketh that must I do. — Numbers, xxiii., 26.

Scripture Reading.—Numbers, xxiii., 1–27.

DURING the nomadic period of Hebrew history occurred the death of Menephtah of Egypt, and after a period of anarchy the accession of Rameses III. During nearly all of this time Egypt was obliged to wage war for her very existence. Indeed, for a time a royal Syrian adventurer seems to have made himself master of most of lower Egypt, and though the native Egyptians succeeded in driving out the invaders, they were beset again and again by the desert Semites, by the African Libyans, and by a coalition of the people of south-eastern Europe. As a consequence the authority of Egypt over Palestine practically disappeared. The Hittites seem to have taken part in the last great attack upon Egypt, and their empire to have been almost destroyed in its failure. Palestine, therefore, lay open to the first invader. Some of the western peoples, driven back from the borders of Egypt in the tremendous effort which, though successful, left Egypt well-nigh exhausted, may have settled in Palestine and have been absorbed by the native population. The Philistines of the south-west of Palestine may have been a group of these western invaders, which kept itself distinct, or they may have been, as already indicated, the residue from an earlier immigration.

As to the Canaanites of the plains, and their brother Amorites of the hills, they were without cohesion, community of worship, or any of the elements of a national life. Each city, accustomed to a foreign governor, was an isolated unit, which gathered to it only the country population of its immediate vicinity. Moreover, the whole land had been harried again and again by the wars of the contending empires on either side, taking part with neither side, but the prey of both.

Yet the hill country especially, saved in part by its situation from the ravages of war, had prospered. "The Canaanites (or Amorites) who inhabited the central highlands had long ago succeeded in subduing to agricultural uses the rugged ridges of many of the innumerable hills, and by a careful system of irrigation had made the slopes and valleys also permanently productive. . . . Enriched especially by vine and wheat culture, many of their numerous villages had grown into cities, each of them a centre of independent government, having its petty prince or king."—(McCurdy.)

The Assyrian empire of upper Mesopotamia, centering about Asshur and Nineveh, was originally

LENOX AND
 TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
 385

an offshoot of Babylonia, and did not become wholly independent until about 1500 B. C., a time at which the Hebrews were still in Egypt. Just previous to this time Babylonia became subject to a foreign people from the north, and Assyria, which up to this time had been at least friendly, was alienated from the mother country. Hostilities soon broke out between the neighboring empires, and Babylon was reduced to partial subjection (about 1400 B. C.), and in the years following large conquests to the northward were added to the territory of Assyria. After this period of expansion Assyria sank for a time to quiescence. Babylonia regained her independence, though her position remained secondary. This period of comparative quiet on the part of both Assyria and Babylon was the time of the conquest of Palestine by the Hebrews. It will be recalled that Babylonia had formerly claimed all the territory to the westward as far as the Mediterranean. This claim was renewed on the part of the conquering Assyrians at a later time, with important results to the nation. For the time, however, the great powers of the world were all inactive. Egypt, wearied and weakened by long-continued wars, did not again take any important part in Hebrew history until the reign of Solomon. The Hittite empire from this time onward was almost entirely confined to Asia Minor, and although there is in the Bible narrative a suggestion that some hundred of years later their arms were not unknown in the Holy Land (ii., Kings vii., 6), yet they do not figure appreciably in the affairs of Israel. The power of Babylon was broken, not to be repaired until the time of the great conquerors of the seventh century before the Christian era. Assyria had not yet appeared in the politics of Palestine. It was perhaps the only period in many centuries when opportunity offered for a comparatively feeble folk to build up a really powerful kingdom between the great world-powers of Egypt and Mesopotamia.

We left the Hebrew people in the last lesson with only a small holding wrested from the Amorites, but including a few important cities, as Heshbon, the capital. This territory had been seized by the Amorites from the king of Moab, who therefore felt no call to take sides with his former enemy in resisting the advance of the Hebrews. But once established on his borders the invaders became an object of suspicion. Balak, king of Moab, did not feel that his strength was equal to that of the Hebrews, so he did not venture to attack them. He therefore resorted to the curious expedient of sending for the prophet Balaam to curse them. The home of Balaam was far to the northward, beyond the Euphrates (Numbers, xxii., 5), but it is evident that his fame had traveled far. The tale is familiar of his weak yielding to the king's entreaties, and his curious experiences upon the journey, and the necessity that was laid upon him to bless those whom he was hired to curse.

The main interest of the narrative, however, lies in the recognition on the part of the Biblical writer of the universal nature of inspiration. There is no denial that the Gentile prophet was a true prophet. It is distinctly recognized that God spoke to him, and the implied condemnation of his course lies in his refusal to follow God's commands. For it is ⁱⁿ after his unwilling obedience (Numbers, xxi., 24) he conspired with the king of Moab for the ruin of the Hebrews by introducing among them the licentious rites of the Midianites. (Numbers, xxi., 16.) The recognition of the lofty ideals of Balaam is made most conspicuous in the writings of the prophet Micah, where is preserved a dialogue between Balak and Balaam not related in the original story. Balak's questions, "Shall I come before the High God with burnt offerings? Will he be pleased with rivers of oil? Shall I give my first-born for my transgression?" are answered by the Gentile prophet in the spirit of a later age and a higher inspiration than that of even the chosen nations of his time. "He hath showed thee, oh man, what is good; and what doth the Lord thy God require of thee but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." (Micah vi., 5-8.)

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 22.—FIFTH MONTH 28.

JESUS BEFORE PILATE.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice.—John, xviii., 37.

Read the Scripture.—John, xviii., 28-40.

REVISED VERSION.

At daybreak, or shortly after, the Sanhedrin sent Jesus to Pilate, themselves going also. Reaching the place, the "hall of judgment," they did not enter, "lest they should be defiled," and Pilate came "out unto them," demanding what accusation they brought against the prisoner.

The Sanhedrin, we must understand, had not power to impose a death sentence, and therefore they took Jesus to Pilate. A court, or judicial proceeding, under Roman law, could be held any time after sunrise, and the Jews were obliged to wait awhile, after the proceedings before Caiaphas. It was now early morning of the sixth day of the week, and 7th of the month, which is commonly called (by English speaking people) April. The time of the hearing before Pilate was probably 5 to 8 o'clock.

The official residence of Pilate, to which Jesus was taken, is supposed to have been the fortress or castle of Antonia, and to be the same referred to in Acts, (xxi., 31) as "the castle."

Pontius Pilate was the Roman governor, or in stricter phrase "procurator," (personal representative and director of the imperial authority), for the province of Judea. (He had been for Samaria, also.) He served ten years, from 26 to 36, A. D. The Emperor of Rome during this period was Tiberius, who succeeded Augustus in 14, and reigned until 37. Concerning Pilate there is an extensive literature, and a mass of traditional matter, mostly fabulous. His wife, traditionally called Procla, or Claudia Procula, and who (Matthew, xxvii., 19) cautioned him to "have nothing to do with that righteous man," has been commonly regarded a Christian, and in the Greek Church she is made a "saint." Pilate himself, according to a persistent tradition of the East, embraced Christianity also, and he too, in the Ethiopic Church, was made a saint. It is certain that Pilate, in his administration at Jerusalem, was harsh and rapacious, that popular outbreaks which were thus caused were cruelly suppressed by him, and that finally, in 36 A. D., Vitellius sent him to Rome to be judged by the Emperor. What resulted from this is uncertain. Several of the early church writers, including Justin Martyr, Tertullian, and Eusebius, say that Pilate sent to Rome, for his own justification, an account of the judgment of Jesus, but the so-called "Report" and "Acts of Pilate," as well as two reputed letters of Pilate to (the emperor) Tiberius, are said by scholars to have no claim to authenticity.

The trial before Pilate is described by all four of the gospel writers. It took place outside the enclosed rooms of the palace, Pilate probably coming forth to sit in the judgment chair, upon what was known as "the pavement"—a floor of fitted stones. When (in verses 33-38), Pilate questioned Jesus, he appears to have done this privately, or at least not in the presence of the Jews, by calling Jesus within, into the "judgment hall." After the questioning, they returned outside, as said in verse 38, and Pilate said, "I find no crime in him."

The account of the trial should be read in the several gospels, as there are additional points contributed by each writer. Its striking features, apart from the one great fact of the Trial itself, are Pilate's hesitancy, the Sanhedrin's clamor for execution, and finally their choice of Bar-Abbas, the robber, to be released instead of Jesus. The condemnation of Jesus by Pilate, turned, it would seem, upon the assertion that he claimed to be king of the Jews, thus denying the Roman authority. But the record says that he claimed no such thing. "My kingdom," he declared, "is not of this world,"—that is, it is a rule spiritually exercised, not outwardly. If it were a worldly rule, then would his servants fight—he would have organized an armed opposition. His "kingdom" had its throne above; it was one which would reach and govern the consciences of the soul-life. "To this end have I been born, and to this end am I come into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth," he said. He was the Prince of Peace, not a captain of soldiers.

Luke explains, (in chapter xxiii., verses 6-15), that when Pilate learned that Jesus was of Galilee, he sent him to be judged by Herod, who was the procurator of the province of Samaria, and was then in Jerusalem. But Herod, though he questioned Jesus, did not choose to exercise judicial authority in the case, and sent him back again—still in guard of the soldiers, and bound, no doubt.

Again Pilate declared to the accusing Jews, (Luke, xxiii., 15, 16), that he found nothing in Jesus worthy of death, and that therefore he would chastise and discharge him. But this would not serve their purpose; they demanded his death; "they were instant, with loud voices, asking he might be crucified. And their voices prevailed. And Pilate gave sentence that what they asked for should be done."

The words of the Golden Text afford a fitting conclusion. "Every one that is of the Truth heareth my voice." The Truth, the great eternal verities of God, is that which we need to be of. And being of it, we shall hear the Christ voice, the divine word, the Spirit of Truth. This was the voice which appeared outwardly through Jesus, and may be heard inwardly ever, by him who attentively listens for it.

GROWTH ends for most men, not when a certain year comes, but when a man consents to stop growing. God wills that we shall be free, but we fail to fulfill his purpose, because we take it for granted that the limitations of life are inevitable. Some of them are. Most of them are not.—Outlook.

36

THE Lord is good; a stronghold in the day of trouble; and he knoweth them that trust in him.—Nahum, i., 7.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

ISOLATED MEMBERS.

In this age of steam and electricity, when better mail facilities, also the telegraph and telephone, all combined, seem to obliterate what we have called isolation,—that is, regarding some of our membership,—distance is almost annihilated, all our members are closer united, and should draw all nearer to the All-Father. Yet we miss the friendly feeling through the clasp of each other's hand, and the near public silent waiting on and with the Father. When, as we realize the many blessings we receive from the unfoldings and advance of science, and the greater enlightenment of the human family, we are more clearly shown,—yes, we are convinced, that our "Isolated Friends" are really those who neglect to wait upon God, and do not endeavor to know him, be they in our midst or be they far from us. They may study to improve and train the physical and intellectual powers, but at the same time they may dwarf or impede the growth of the spirit, through not embracing every opportunity to worship God in spirit and in truth. How appropriate therefore is being gathered in a state of silent waiting, when the mind, withdrawn from all temporal concerns, is engaged in secret prayer to God. In this frame of mind he opens to us our conditions by the influence of his Holy Spirit, when being brought into humility and contrition, we are enabled from a sense of our wants, to ask of him light to guide us in the paths of duty, and strength to perform all that he requires of us.

We sometimes suggest to young members (when settling where there is no Friends' meeting), particularly if they have children, would they add Faith, Hope, and Love to their hungering and thirsting for a meeting; would they often sit down at their own firesides; and there might be in their vicinity one, two, or more families near them, and in a like hungry condition, who when gathered in "My Name," under the Divine power or Gospel of Christ, they would realize his promise to be true. He would be felt to be with them.

JOSEPH POWELL.

Fourth month 25, 1899.

A BLESSED SECRET.—It is a blessed secret, this of living by the day. Any one can carry his burden, however heavy, till nightfall. Any one can do his work, however hard, for one day. Any one can live sweetly, patiently, lovingly, and purely till the sun goes down. And this is all that life ever really means to us, just one little day. Do to-day's duty, fight to-day's temptations, and do not weaken and distract yourself by looking forward to things you cannot see and could not understand if you saw them. God gives nights to shut down the curtain of darkness on our little days. We cannot see beyond. Short horizons make life easier and give us one of the blessed secrets of the brave, true, holy living.—Christian Work.

36

It is a part of my religion to look well after the cheerfulness of life, and let the dismals shift for themselves.—Louisa M. Alcott.

A WORD FROM IOWA.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

It is one of the convictions of Friends that war under any and all conditions is wrong. Yet God in his Providence has caused many of the greatest boons to the human race to come through its devastating fires. Liberty and self-government to a continent followed Saratoga and Yorktown. The emancipation of a race was insured at Appomattox. Man's extremity is thus seen to be God's opportunity. From what may seem to us utterly bad, God may cause to arise the aspirations of a generation.

Thus feeling and believing, it seems to me the better part not to pre-judge, certainly not to impugn directly or indirectly, the natives actuating a policy with which we may not agree. The contention that nothing good can come from what our convictions have condemned has placed us in a false position more than once. In 1776 advocacy of peace at any price made many Friends "Tories," and apparent advocates of a continuance of English rule, thus alienating their sympathies from a people "struggling for liberty"; now a similar position leads many Friends to express strong sympathy for the half-civilized "Tagalo," likewise supposed to be "struggling for liberty"; and thus in either case placing the Friend in a position of apparent antagonism to the land of his birth or adoption. A consistent advocacy of "Peace on Earth, good will to men," need not make us Pharisaical, neither should it cause us to indulge in many "we told you so's."

There is little division of sentiment as to the desirability of universal Peace and its preservation and perpetuity. War is dreaded like a pestilence and comes like a calamity to all alike. The question is, How are the issues threatening war to be met? If for any cause they become so grave that war comes, a nation's loyalty solidifies its sentiment, and other issues are laid aside for a more appropriate season. In this emergency, whether justly or unjustly, if the policy pursued is opposed or criticised to any considerable extent, it is unfortunate that its practical effect is to embarrass the Executive and encourage the nation's enemies, and thus prolongs and intensifies the conditions deprecated. It is true that to one of strong adverse conviction it is difficult to keep still, but there are many times in such emergencies that silence will prove to be golden. From the moral standpoint of our Society we should take the sober second thought before indulging in much anti-expansion talk, because so much of it savors of mere partisan politics. There is no doubt that many take this position through strong conviction, but many more see in it an opportunity to embarrass the administration and win political advantage for future use.

I would place no embargo upon the expression of an honest conviction, but feel that it is a duty on the part of one who believes he has a message to offer, to use the best attainable judgment as to when and how it is presented. The advocate of Peace as a principle, and of Arbitration as the best means of preserving it, will find his message to possess ten-fold more power in moulding public thought and feeling when its blessings are manifested in happiness and prosperity. The time to guard against the possible dangers of storm is when the skies are clear. We should desire to place ourselves and our Society in a position to win respect and have a message to deliver that will be heard and heeded; but we close the door on our opportunity when we look to Hong Kong or Madrid for our news from the Philippines rather than to Washington, or when we represent the American soldier to be a wanton slayer of defenceless women and children, and the government that sends him a tyrant and oppressor, while the half-savage Tagalo is a patriot, fighting for home and country.

Surely we can maintain our testimony in favor of Peace and Arbitration as the rightful court in which to adjust national differences without impugning the motives of our fellow-citizens. If we cannot, then is the fault more ours than theirs.

Marshalltown, Iowa.

F. P. MARSH.

[Our dear friend expresses his views so kindly and considerately that we think we can add a few words without entering into argument.

1. When we speak of war as the occasion of blessing, we reverse the real order. Such gains as appear at the end of war, (for example, the freedom of the American slaves, 1865), are not the gifts of the war, but of the condition which exists when passion has spent itself. An agreement reached at the end of a quarrel does not confer credit on the quarrel. The war of 1861-65 never should have happened. Under John Woolman it would not. The (white) people of the United States are now much more unified than they were in 1860, but it is unsupposable that in order to thus unify them it was necessary they should slay one another for four long years.

2. Much the same thing may be fairly said of the War of Independence, 1775-83. The independence of the Colonies should not have cost a war. Under the rule of William Penn it would not. Justice, fair dealing, would have avoided it.

3. With reference to the officials, who are from time to time established at Washington, they are servants, not masters. This—as Abraham Lincoln phrased it—is a "government of the people," and there is no safety for them except in continual vigilance.—

EDITORS INTELLIGENCER.]

WHAT matter, friend, though you and I
May sow, and others gather?
We build, and others occupy,
Each laboring for the other?

—H. W. Teller.

IRRESOLUTION on the schemes of life which offer themselves to our choice, and inconstancy in pursuing them are the greatest and most universal causes of all our disquiet and unhappiness. When ambition pulls one away, interest another, and inclination a third, and perhaps reason contrary to all, a man is likely to pass his time but ill who has so many parties to please.—Addison.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 20, 1899.

AARON M. POWELL.

It is with a sense of great loss, and of real personal bereavement, that we refer to the death, elsewhere particularly mentioned, of our dear friend Aaron M. Powell. His sudden departure from amongst us is an event which has caused deep sorrow amongst those who first sustained the shock, and which will spread widely the like emotion, for he had many friends in many places, united to him by ties of affectionate feeling. His generous activities in behalf of the human family had extended over a long term of years, and into various fields, and in all of them he had gained the respect and regard of other earnest and unselfish workers. In the older effort for the abolition of slavery, in the temperance reform, and in the brave work to diminish the flood of impurity, he had exerted himself patiently and effectively, with the unflinching gentleness and tact which were a part of his nature.

The loss to the Society of Friends is very serious. We are indeed ill able to spare him. His ministry was appreciated and welcomed wherever he found his steps directed, and its spiritual quality, its gentleness and refinement, its clear and orderly presentation, and breadth and depth of thought, all contributed to enhance its value. In the last ten years or more he especially realized the call upon him to speak in behalf of the Friends' principles and testimonies, and the only regret that could be experienced concerning it was that we could not look forward for him to many years of vigorous and sustained services. His labors, now, have been cut short with a suddenness which has shocked all. And yet it may be truly said of him that he died at the post of duty. He was engaged in his Master's work when the end came.

The writer of these lines cannot appropriately close them without a personal word. His intended visit abroad had been a subject of warm interest to our friend, who had taken especial pains to promote its objects, and help make it pleasant. It will be a melancholy message that must now be conveyed to friends and co-workers with whom he had long been cordially associated.

THE special First-day School Lessons following the "International" selection of texts will not be continued after the close of the present quarter. As has been the custom with these selections they are taken one-half the year from the New Testament, and the remaining half year from the Old Testament. This year, the lessons after Seventh month 1 will be from the Psalms and the Prophets, and therefore not very far removed from the subjects which are being treated of in the Old Testament series prepared by the Friends' First-day School Committee, and which we are regularly publishing. Two lessons from the Old Testament we think is hardly necessary to print weekly, in the INTELLIGENCER, and therefore, as stated, we shall not follow the International selections after they leave the New Testament.

BIRTHS.

EDMUNDSON.—At Maple Grove, Indiana, Fourth month 9, 1899, to Frank E. and Clotilda Dietrich Edmundson, a son, who is named Charles Dietrich.

FOULKE.—Fifth month 4, 1899, to Charles W. and Martha Foulke, of Richmond, Ind., a daughter, who is named Eleanor W.

GROSS.—Third month 30, 1899, to Herbert A. and Deborah Lamborn Gross, of Kensington, Ohio, a daughter, named Edith P.

DEATHS.

CHAMBERS.—At Toughkenamon, Pa., First month 22, 1899, Elizabeth L., widow of Mahlon Chambers, in her 83d year; a member with Olive Street Friends, Philadelphia.

CLOUD.—Fifth month 10, 1899, Flora M., wife of Harry C. Cloud, of West Philadelphia, aged 45 years; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

Interment at Drumore Meeting ground, Lancaster county, Pa.

COOKE.—Suddenly, at her home, near Salem, Ohio, Fifth month 30, 1898, Mary H., wife of Edwin Cooke, and daughter of Charles I. Hayes, in her 40th year.

EDMUNDSON.—At her home near Huntington, Ind., Fourth month 12, 1899, Clotilde D., wife of Frank E. Edmundson, and daughter of Charles C. and the late Carolina Dietrich, of Philadelphia, aged 32 years, 5 months, 14 days.

She was an active and useful member of Maple Grove Monthly Meeting, and of the Young Friends' Association, she and her husband having been received into membership with Friends, Second month 10, 1897. She was educated in the Friends' school at 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, and was a graduate of the Training School for Nurses of Philadelphia Hospital.
S. C. M.

HAYES.—At his home, in Salem, Ohio, Seventh month 9, 1898, Charles I. Hayes, in his 71st year.

He was the only son of Israel and Lydia (Lord) Hayes, both deceased, of Fallowfield, Chester county, Pa.

STILES.—At her residence in Camden, New Jersey, Fifth month 3, 1899, Ann M., widow of Levi B. Stiles, in the 68th year of her age; a member of Handonfield Monthly Meeting of Friends.

This dear friend, who has so lately been translated to the higher life we feel merits more than a passing notice. In the home circle she was the loving, tender, devoted mother; in the social life a gentle, sympathizing friend.

Quiet and unobtrusive, she ever exhibited those qualities of mind and heart which will long endear her memory to us.
L. M. T.

WALTON.—At Hummelstown, Pa., Fifth month 12, 1899, Emma J., widow of Allen Walton, in her 67th year.

YARNALL.—Fourth month 30, 1899, at her home in West Marlborough, Pa., of gripe and pneumonia, Mary D., wife of Martin B. Yarnall.

She leaves a young husband, and twin boys less than a year old, to miss her tender ministrations. A large number of sympathetic friends and relatives attended the funeral. Enoch Hannum and other Friends were favored with fitting words for the sad occasion.
*

AARON MACY POWELL.

Very suddenly, at Friends' meeting-house, 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, Fifth month 13, 1899, Aaron M. Powell, of Plainfield, N. J., (and New York City), in the 68th year of his age; a minister of Shrewsbury and Plainfield Half-Year's Meeting, N. J.

He had come to Philadelphia in the morning, to attend the Yearly Meeting, and he was at the sitting of Ministers and Elders, in the forenoon. At the afternoon sitting, about 3.15 o'clock, he rose in the middle gallery to speak, and had uttered but a few sentences when he paused, and in an instant fell forward upon the rail in front. A Friend who was sitting on the facing seat, had perceived, when he ceased speaking, that something serious was threatened, and hastening forward, partly supported him as he fell. A physician was present in the meeting, but efforts to revive him were of no avail.

Aaron was born at Clinton, in Dutchess county, N. Y., on the 26th of Third month, 1832. His father, Townsend Powell, a Friend, was a farmer, and removed, when Aaron was about thirteen years old, to Ghent, in Columbia county, where the family home continued, and where George T. Powell (a brother) now resides. His mother was a Macy, and he was named after her brother, Aaron Macy. When he was about twenty, he was attending the Normal School at Albany, N. Y., intending to teach, and to pursue his studies at Antioch College, Ohio, whose president, then, was Horace Mann, for whom he had great admiration. But at this time his interest was drawn into the Anti-Slavery work. Stephen S. and Abby Kelley Foster, on a lecture tour, came to Ghent, and were entertained at his father's house, and he was so impressed with the exigent nature of the situation that he gave up his plan of a college education, and became an Anti-Slavery speaker. He continued in the work until the close of the Civil War, in which the slaves were freed, and was for some years afterward editor of the Anti-Slavery Standard until its discontinuance. Then he was drafted into the Temperance reform, and for twenty years was connected with the work carried on by the National Temperance Society in New York; he was associate editor, during this time, of the National Temperance Advocate.

In the course of his temperance work his sympathy and co-operation were asked by Josephine Butler and others in England, in behalf of the movement to abolish the "State Regulation," (which implies recognition), of Vice, and to this work, for several years past, he has given his efforts. He was President of the National Purity Alliance, organized by his efforts, and he was editor of The Philanthropist, the monthly journal published in New York in the interest of the work. He arranged for and presided over the National Purity Congress held at Baltimore, in Tenth month, 1895. He made several trips abroad to attend gatherings of a similar character, his last one in 1898.

His interest in the Society of Friends, always cherished, had caused him in his later years to take an active part, as his strength and engagements permitted, in its affairs. His ministry was acceptable. He was active in the Philanthropic movement, and he took a deep interest in the Friends' Religious Congress at Chicago, in 1893, and in the subsequent like gatherings, at Chappaqua, Swarthmore, and Richmond.

He was a frequent contributor to FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, and was warmly and actively interested in the cause it represents. His interest in all good works, including Peace, Temperance, and Prison Reform, was most earnest, and he only gave his principal effort to Purity because it seemed especially to have claimed him. He has had but moderately good health for several years, and has been obliged to husband his strength, working however many times fully to its limits. He felt that so much needed to be done he must do himself all that was possible.

His wife, Anna Rice Powell, survives him. Their only child, a daughter, many years deceased, lies buried in the Friends' ground at Ghent. His own remains were removed thither on Second-day, 15th, from Philadelphia, and the burial took place there on the afternoon of the 16th. On First-day evening, 14th, a gathering of friends was held at the home of Samuel S. and Sarah J. Ash, in Philadelphia, and loving testimonies were borne to our departed friend.

H. M. J.

FRIENDS IN THE WEST.

NEBRASKA HALF-YEAR MEETING, LINCOLN, NEB.

SEVENTH-DAY afternoon, Fourth month 22. The meeting for ministers and elders convened; the company of Joshua L. Mills of Illinois was very acceptable. Soon after settling into silence a desire was voiced that we each and all should come to the Heavenly Father as little children, asking for guidance throughout the several sessions of the Half-Yearly Meeting. Later our attention was called to the power of that influence which had drawn us from our homes and places of business, that we might mingle with others of the same faith, and worship our Heavenly Father, hoping thereby to gain strength to be more helpful to one another and to the world at large. We were led to feel that unselfish, loving interest is one of the strongest ties that binds our little meetings together. It was perhaps this same feeling of love that prompted the children to hold meetings, over two hundred years ago, when their parents were imprisoned for thus gathering.

The statement made during the business meeting, that our elders were mostly people advanced in years, and were often prevented from attending meeting by the infirmities of age, gave rise to a discussion as to whether it might not be profitable to add some from the younger walks of life. After answering the several queries and disposing of such business as claimed the attention of the meeting, we spent a short time in exchanging friendly greetings, and separated for the night.

First-day morning the hall in which we met was well filled. The solemnity that overspread the meeting was by no means lessened when a Friend appeared in prayer, earnestly desiring that we might be enabled to uplift the banner of Justice and Mercy; that we might be better prepared to perform the duties laid upon us.

Another Friend felt that there were those in the room who doubted the existence of the blessing of Divine Love. Such were referred to the Scripture: "Art thou he that should come, or look we for another?" This one told his servants to "go forth, heal the sick, cleanse the leper, raise the dead, cast out devils, freely ye have received, freely give," and his commands were obeyed; what more evidence is needed? This testimony seemed to open the way for the reading of the 14th chapter of the Gospel of John. The reader spoke of the time when he first began to desire to lead a better life. He sought the truth in many places, in different churches, and then he began to secretly consult the Scriptures, all to no avail. He felt himself mocked by the "Lo! here's" and "Lo! there's." One day, while reading, the reply came to him which Jesus made to the Samaritan woman: "Whosoever drinketh of the water that I shall give him shall never thirst, but the water I shall give him shall be a well of water springing into everlasting life." He was impressed that he must look to the divinity within himself for help. Soon after, in a quiet Quaker meeting, a great light came to him, a revelation, that each must build on his own foundation, not on another's, not even on the Bible, for the same spirit that inspired the Bible may inspire each human being. Divine visitation has not and will never pass away. The same angel spirit that hovered over the earth at the birth of Jesus, hovers over our nation to-day, pleading "Peace on earth, good will towards men."

A stranger read the 13th chapter of Luke, and exhorted us to be ready for the coming of our Lord. After which the meeting closed with a feeling of thankfulness for the strength received.

At 2 p. m. the First-day School Conference convened. After the routine business was disposed of, an interesting program was presented, consisting of recitations, select readings, and a paper entitled "It's an ill wind that blows no good." The latter referred to our opportunities for work along the lines of Peace and Arbitration, and called forth some little discussion. Arrangements were made for its publication.

Second-day morning, after a short devotional meeting, the queries were read, some of which drew forth helpful thoughts and suggestions. We were admonished to remember that homage to our Creator is a permanent duty. We have queries that inquire about the payment of our financial debts, and we should also remember our obligations to our Heavenly Father. A strong testimony was born, against tobacco users inflicting the evil effect of nicotine poisoning on the inmates of their own homes, who never use the weed themselves, but often share the evil effects of its use. A question came up from the body of the meeting as to what "a free gospel ministry is," and do we violate our testimony in that respect, if we contribute to the support of a paid ministry. A free gospel ministry is one where the spiritual bread, freely received, must be freely handed forth as opportunity presents. Paul labored with his own hands to supply his physical wants, and we believe in following his example. As to contributing to the support of a paid ministry it is largely a matter of conscience and of circumstances.

Directly after the morning hour we listened to the reading of a very acceptable epistle from Prairie Grove Quarterly Meeting, also to a letter from our friend David Wilson, of Wenona, Ill.

An address from Genoa Monthly Meeting to the International Peace Conference to be held at The Hague, was read and directed to be endorsed by the clerk, and forwarded through the proper channel.

The close of the business was followed by a season of worship. We felt strengthened and repaid for any and all efforts made in behalf of the meeting. The only painful thought seemed to be that of parting with our friends, some of whom we might never meet again on a like occasion.

Committee, Hamptonetta Burgess, Mary O. Sargent, Katie E. Shotwell.

THE leading merchants and manufacturers of Milwaukee are becoming ashamed of the name popularly given to their city, "Beer City." They say, "the beer that made Milwaukee famous" is a damage to the prosperity of the city.

HEREAFTER, postmasters in making their monthly reports to the Second Assistant Postmaster General with regard to the mail-carrying service, must state whether the carriers employed on the routes are temperate,

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

SHREWSBURY AND PLAINFIELD H. Y. M. .

THE several sessions of Shrewsbury and Plainfield Half Year Meeting were held at Shrewsbury, N. J., on the 10th, 11th, and 12th instant.

On Fourth-day, the 10th, the meeting of ministers and elders convened at 3 p.m. Although not large, it was felt to be a profitable season. Isaac Wilson, who was acceptably with us, gave valuable counsel. He felt that the duty and concern of the elders should reach beyond those "young in the ministry," even to those whose serious thoughts and desires after good, if encouraged, would in time develop into such qualities as would fit them to be ministers or elders. He encouraged the idea of having the young Friends attend these meetings, that they may become disabused of the feeling entertained by so many that they are of such a superior order of religion that others than ministers and elders must be kept out.

There was a fair attendance at the Fifth-day meeting in spite of the rain, at which there was no desire to murmur as it was so much needed. Isaac Wilson's message this morning was one to search all hearts. He said as it was more blessed to give than to receive, it should be our duty when we go to our meetings not to consider how much we could receive from the meeting but if there was not something we could give to the meeting, and through this giving to receive our blessing. The requirement may be only a silent service, it may be a living silence, or it may be a message, however small and simple, that is given us, not for ourselves, but to be handed forth for the benefit of those who are gathered with us, and that we should consider it dishonest for us to keep for ourselves what is given us for the good of others. He felt that the greatest cause of the decline of our Society was our lukewarmness and our indifference about heeding the admonitions of duty that come to us.

Frances N. Williams desired that we do not, like Ananias and Sapphira, hold back a part of what is required of us, but that we ask of our Heavenly Father what he does require of us; and, abiding in his strength and his love, go forth and do it. After the meeting for worship the usual routine of business was transacted. The answers to the queries as they came from the monthly meetings were considered and a summary prepared to forward to the yearly meeting. The statistical report showed that our losses were somewhat in excess of our gains.

On Sixth-day morning the Philanthropic Committee of the Half-Year Meeting met at 10 o'clock. Reports of the work done by our monthly meeting committees during the year were presented and considered. Peace and Arbitration, Temperance and the Colored Schools of the South were the subjects that had received the most attention.

In the meeting for worship at 11 o'clock, Isaac Wilson took for the subject of his discourse the thought, if Jesus Christ should come to Shrewsbury what would he find? His view was not a discouraging one, and much valuable counsel was given about keeping our heart's gardens dressed and in order that such an influence shall go out from us as to raise the standard of purity and goodness all around us. He emphasized the thought that Christ is among us now, and it is for us to be the humanity in which the Divinity of Christ may dwell, just as it dwelt in Jesus in his day; that God designed the human and the Divine to be united, and that which God had joined we should strive not to sunder. M. F. V.

Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting was held at Race Street meeting-house on the 9th instant. The attendance was only moderately full. In the meeting for worship Samuel S. Ash spoke, and was followed by Walter Laing. Cyrus W. Harvey, of Kansas, a member of the "smaller" body of Orthodox Friends in that State, spoke acceptably. Other Friends appeared in testimony and supplication.

The business meeting was held in the manner usual in this quarter, separately, the men Friends withdrawing and proceeding to the Cherry Street end of the house, the women remaining in the Race Street end. In men's meeting Cyrus W. Harvey was welcomed to sit with them, and spoke briefly in regard to the testimony on the ministry. The queries and their answers were considered, as usual at this time.

Edwin L. Pierce presented the minute granted him by Green Street Monthly Meeting, setting him at liberty to visit meetings in New York and elsewhere, which was endorsed by this meeting.

The monthly meeting of Friends of Philadelphia (Race street), at its last sitting, approved the report of a committee which proposed that the monthly meeting be held unitedly, — without separation as to sex, — in the Tenth, Eleventh, and Twelfth months of the present year. The further course of the meeting will be determined after trial of the three months.

A BETTER WAY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I DO not want to enter into controversy with any one, and especially wish to avoid it in such a case as that of the present war, concerning which it seems to me all Friends should see eye to eye. What I want to say is simply this: There should be, and is, an easy way out of the Philippine trouble. It is for the United States not to persist in conquering and annexing the Islands, but, instead, to give them our protection, while they organize their own government.

I have read, just now, an interview with Dr. Alfred Russell Wallace, the distinguished English naturalist. It appeared in a London newspaper, recently. Dr. Wallace knows the Malay people well. He says:

"Surely it is possible [for the Americans] to revert to their first-expressed intention of taking a small island only as a naval and coaling station, and to declare themselves the protectors of the islands against foreign aggression. Having done this, they might invite the civilized portion of the natives to form an independent government, offering them advice and assistance if they wish for it, but otherwise leaving them completely free. It might be advisable first to leave the great island of Mindanao, mostly inhabited by Mohammedans, to form its own separate government; and some guarantee might properly be asked for the fair treatment of the uncivilized portion of the population, such as the presence of a few American residents as protectors of the aborigines. By some such method as here suggested the great republic of the West might aid in the production of a new type of social development adapted to the character of the Malayan race."

Why is not this most excellent advice? Why are we persisting in the war upon the Filipino people? How can any one be so misled as to think it right to go on in this way?

In the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER of Third month 18. (page 216), there was a most interesting account of what had been done in the "Straits Settlement," the Malacca Peninsula, south of the Philippine Islands, under the direction of Sir Andrew Clarke, an English official, to pacify and organize the native people, and establish good government of their own. It is a splendid example for us. I hope the article was read by all; it was entitled, "A Practical Pacification."

Fifth month 10.

S. R. S.

LETTER FROM PORTO RICO.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I HAVE thought for some time that Friends ought to feel an interest in this island and its truly interesting people. Just now, the people are much in the same position as our neighbors in the South after the Civil War. They are poor, and there is a very large illiterate population, only one person in fifteen being able to read and write.

A Peabody or a Slater is needed to establish a school fund, to operate Teachers' Institutes, and establish Normal Schools. In the whole Island there are some 540 schools, but all are ungraded and of the character of a poorly managed rural school. There are no school-houses, schools being held in the houses of the teachers. There are no desks, and often not enough benches for the pupils. Often there is but one book to a class of twenty. The instruction is therefore largely oral.

There is no college on the Island, and no School which can fit a pupil for a college in the United States. Schools are kept open all summer without vacation. General John Eaton, who is Director of Public Instruction, aided by the Governor General, Guy V. Henry, [now returned to the United States], is doing everything to bring order out of chaos.

The people are dark stained with straight hair, docile, peaceable, laborious, affectionate in their families, and when young, bright and eager to learn. Just now, every young person is ambitious to read and speak English, as the colored people were anxious to read at the close of the Civil War.

The State religion sits very lightly upon the people, so lightly that some observers have, with Father Sherman, thought them entirely without religion. The Rev. Hugh P. McCormick, who has spent thirteen years in Mexico, thinks differently, and considers them a naturally religious people, but almost wholly free from superstition. He tells me that in this respect there is the widest possible difference between these people and some of the Spanish Americans, who are very superstitious and among the lower classes bigoted also.

Another point, and I will close this letter. These people have differentiated on their little Island, until they are distinct from all the world. They are not Spanish, not African, not Indian,—not Anglo-Saxon certainly, they are, or they call themselves Portorriquencous. So peaceable are they, that they never rebelled against Spain in 450 years. I have thought, from their peace-loving qualities, their freedom from superstition, their good domestic qualities, that this would be a good field for Friends' missionary enterprise, remembering that Friends' principles once flourished in the West Indies. This has been the purpose in my writing this letter.

E. G. GROFF, Major and Brigade Surgeon.
Ancibo, Porto Rico, May 3.

Current Literature.

SOCIAL IDEALS IN ENGLISH LETTERS. By Vida D. Scudder. Crown 8vo. Pp. 329. $1.75. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. 1898.

This book is a refreshing and wholesome inversion of the every-day mental standards. It is a searching spiritual inventory of the departing century. It calmly ignores the "wide world of the obvious," and follows with keen scrutiny the unobtrusive but significant forces which are making the future. Its reading of recent English literature in the light of these ideas is most suggestive and inspiring.

The English literature with any sense of social ideals is somewhat scanty until the present century. The "Vision of Piers Plowman" in the fourteenth century, More's "Utopia" in the sixteenth, do indeed witness to the existence of social ideals, but show small sense of the possibility of social change. Dean Swift in the eighteenth century most bitterly criticised existing social conditions, but at the same time hopelessly accepted them as unchangeable. In fact, to have living social ideals it is necessary to recognize that the social world moves; but very few people and very few times have been granted an insight into this truth. To most men the social conditions into which they are born are the very hub of the universe, itself motionless, around which all else revolves.

But the French Revolution, that stormy prelude to the nineteenth century, introduced radically new social conceptions. However little actual progress it registered towards any satisfactory social ideals, it demonstrated with immense emphasis that "the old order changeth." That change was not necessarily progress was, however, demonstrated, with no less emphasis in the next half century. The search for the true line of advance for social development is the problem of our time, and the large Victorian literature which deals with it is of the most vital and absorbing present interest. It is almost too recent to be interpreted with any assurance that we discern its true value, and present conclusions are largely made up of personal predilections and beliefs. But some cardinal points concerning it have, of recent years, become too plain to be doubted. The chief of these is the realization that the acceptance of individualism as a social ideal is on the wane,—that the burden of social welfare is coming to be accepted as a function for the social body to assume, and that men are more and more regarded as their brothers' keepers.

Miss Scudder's book leaves discreetly indefinite the prophecy which is to be extracted from this literature. It is full of faith that it is a glad prophecy,—that society is growing into nobler aims, happier conditions, fuller life. It also assumes that the social change we are approaching is a momentous one. But it does not descend into the arena of current controversies, and is all the stronger in inspiration for refraining from partisanship.

A. J. F.

An article on the Negro Question, by J. L. M. Curry, is announced for the next issue of the Popular Science Monthly, (Sixth month). He was for some time United States Minister to Spain and is now Director of both the Peabody and the Slater Educational Funds, (for the promotion of education among the colored people), has had exceptional opportunities for studying the Negro in the South, and his conclusions are of especial value on this account. Dawson, the San Francisco of the North, is the title of an article by Prof. Angelo Heilprin, which will appear in the same issue. It gives a graphic picture of the curious aspects of life which may be seen in this latest of the mining camps.

Educational Department.

THE INTEREST GROWING.

AN increased interest is taken, we feel quite sure, in the Educational Department of the INTELLIGENCER. We hear, now, from more schools, and the Department is becoming more generally a medium of information and suggestion for all concerned in educational work. This is what we wish. We are always desirous to hear from schools and teachers, and others.

Why do not our Friends' teachers write us on educational subjects? Let us have their views (briefly), as well as facts about their work. It was one of the cherished plans of our late lamented friend Henry R. Russell to write for us, and he had the work in his mind when he contracted his fatal illness. Surely there must be others who have something to say. The Friends ought not only to be good educators, but be able as well to state the why and wherefore of their operations.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

The Senior Contest for the Furman Prize in Declamation was held on Seventh-day evening, when the following program was rendered:

"Boat Race from 'Mortal Antipathy,'" Mary G. Ball; "How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix," Mabel Clara Gillespie; "Commencement of a District School," Helen M. Fogg; "Warwick, the Kingmaker," Anna C. Holmes; selection, "The Bird's Christmas Carol," Elizabeth E. Willets. The judges awarded the prize to Helen M. Fogg.

The Junior Orations for the Sproul Prize have been submitted, and the following speakers have been chosen: Anna Gillingham, Joseph C. Haines, Mary S. Haviland, Katharine Pfeiffer, and Margery Pyle.

On Sixty-day evening the College and Friends were favored by an interesting illustrated lecture by John Wilhelm Rowntree, of England, on the career and work of the great German artist, Albrecht Durer, (1471-1528). '99.

TEACHERS AT ABINGTON.—The corps of teachers at Abington Friends' School, for the coming year, has been nearly made up. The Principal, as already stated, will be Prof. George M. Downing. Other teachers selected are:

Clara H. Barnard, of Martin Academy, Kennett Square, Pa., History and kindred subjects; Mary Brosius Kirk, A.B., (Bryn Mawr, '97), Mathematics and Latin; Carrie B. Way, B. L., continues Grammar, Reading, and Literature; Frederic F. Windle, B. S., West Chester Normal School, '97, succeeds Arthur C. Smedley in Science and Mathematics; Rachel S. Martin, continues Principal of Primary; Alice Kent Gourley, Painting and Drawing; Jessie M. K. Gourley, Matron.

TEACHER AT GEORGE SCHOOL.—Winifred Craine, L. B., has been appointed teacher of rhetoric and composition at George School, the coming year, in place of Mary E. Speakman, who resigned. She is a graduate of the University of Michigan, and has taught with success four years in the High School of Columbus, Ohio.

HORSHAM FRIENDS' SCHOOL.—Arbor Day was appropriately observed by the school on Sixth-day, Fourth month 28. Most of the exercises, consisting of readings, recitations, essays, etc., were held in the school-house, after which pupils and visitors went to the school-yard and proceeded to plant a tree. Just before the planting, addresses on trees were made by two of the pupils, and after the planting the whole school joined in a concert recitation, which was followed by a "Tree Planting Song." The tree was named Sarah P. Smith, in recognition of her years of faithful, interested, and intelligent labor for the best interests of the school.

The present school term closes Sixth month 9. The work done during the year has been satisfactory to both patrons and school committee. The coming year the school will be under the charge of S. Frances Moore as Principal, and Martha M. Parry, Assistant. The present Assistant, Emily W. Coale, has been appointed Principal of the Mickleton Friends' School, N. J. *

PROFESSORSHIP AT SWARTHMORE.—Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, who closes his work at George School this year, has been appointed the incumbent of a new chair of History at Swarthmore College. He will enter upon his duties in Ninth month, 1900, devoting the time intervening to study.

EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE AT PROVIDENCE, R. I.—Friends of the other body will have their National Educational Conference at Providence, R. I., next month, 28th to 30th. President Isaac Sharpless, of Haverford College, is president of the Association.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

EASTON, MD.—On Second-day evening, Fourth month 24, our Association was called to order at the home of John C. Bartlett. After the minutes had been read and accepted, the committee organized for the purpose submitted the names of Samuel D. Yeo, president, Laura B. Shinn, vice-president, and Anna White, secretary, as officers for the new term.

Lelia L. White read a selection, "Digging for Hidden Treasure," by Charles Reade. The history of the origin of the Discipline was told in a paper read by H. Lizzie Willson. In the writings of early Friends frequent mention is made of holding their meetings in open air. No regular code of discipline had been adopted by Friends at this time, and in cases of immorality or breaches of their Christian testimonies, the delinquents were admonished by those whose religious experience and weight of character qualified them for such services. In 1657, '58, and '59, documents containing Advices to Friends in relation to the testimonies of truth and the order of their meetings show that the principles of the Society were then in a great measure developed. The earliest collection of rules and advices in manuscript was formed in 1704, and in 1797 the compilation was issued in print.

Quite a lively discussion followed: subject, "Are we responsible for the wrongs we might prevent?" affirmative, Pauline de W. Bartlett and Samuel D. Yeo, negative W. Harry White, and Helen C. Shreve. In the absence of both appointees on the negative side, Henry Shreve and other members spoke in favor of that side. Wrongs are constantly being righted, said one of the affirmatives, in scientific lines, and the thorough investigations now being made for the causes and cures of disease are universally encouraged. Yet the most flagrant political and social evils are permitted to exist. It is so comfortable for us to rest at our ease and say that it is no concern of ours if our neighbor is so indiscreet as to get into trouble. But we should rise above our selfish interests. It is only an excuse that we are inclined to say, like Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?"

An illustration given in defence of the negative side was the plan of government in the old feudal castle. Every man's domicile, it was said, is his castle, and should be safe from the interference of the outside world. The sentiment was expressed that if we make living examples of ourselves, it will do more good than all the precepts and advice we could give, and interference with affairs which do not concern us. The general discussion was very interesting.

The sentiments given as the closing exercise were followed each by a brief sketch of their author. The usual silence ended the meeting. ANNA WHITE, Sec'y.

SOLEBURY, PA.—The Young Friends' Association of Solebury met for the last time before the summer vacation on First-day, the 7th inst. The minutes of the preceding month were read by Martha Simpson, in the absence of the secretary. The report of the Executive Committee of appointments for Ninth month was presented by Seth T. Walton, as follows: Paper, Edith Michener; Oration, William E. Roberts; Paper, George H. Ely; Recitation, Marion M. Rice. The president appointed the following persons to serve in Ninth month on the various sections: History, Martha Simpson; Current Topics, John S. Williams; Literature, Florence K. Blackfan; Discipline, Annie M. Smith.

At this meeting the report on History was given by Martha C. Ely, Current Topics by Edith B. Slack, Literature by Seth T. Walton, Discipline read by Florence R. Kenderdine. "Can the germ of the Divine in each human soul be developed without any external aid?" was answered by Agnes S. Ely. Several present made remarks upon this subject. A reading was given by Ely J. Smith, and an interesting talk by J. Russell Smith, of George School, followed. After a short silence the meeting adjourned until the second First-day in Ninth month. F. R. K.

FLEMING, Pa.—Our Young Friends' Association met Fifth month 7, at 3 o'clock p. m., with a good attendance, and was opened by the president reading a poem, entitled "Lost Opportunities."

The roll-call was responded to by repeating beautiful extracts. Chapman Underwood answered the question, "Who was John?" by giving a brief history of his life.

A paper was read by the secretary, subject, "Our gifts from God, our Gifts to God," followed by some remarks from others. Bertha K. Cleaver gave from the INTELLIGENCER some very interesting accounts of old meeting-houses.

Current Events were produced by Florence N. Cleaver, consisting of some account of the "Peace Conference and its Object"; "Peter the Great and his attending Friends' meeting"; "The expelling of liquor dealers from the churches in Louisville, Kentucky." It was remarked that there are many things to convince us that the world is growing better. We see more widely extended the feeling of the Brotherhood of Man.

Mary J. Fisher read a beautiful poem entitled, "Make Somebody Glad." Another poem from Bertha K. Cleaver, "A Psalm."

We appreciate very much, the kindness of Howard M. Jenkins in sending for the use of our Association three copies of the address "Disarmament of Nations; Or, Mankind One Body," by George Dana Boardman.

Closed in silence.

N. M. FISHER, Sec.

CORNWALL, N. Y.—The regular meeting of Cornwall Friends' Association was held at the home of Edward Jones, on First-day afternoon, Fifth month 7.

The program was opened by an original paper, entitled "Our Simple Faith," prepared by Elizabeth K. Seaman. This was followed by selections, read by Theodore Barton and Rowland Cocks, and sentiments by nearly all those present.

It was decided to have the life of Samuel M. Janney read as a selection at the Association as it appeared in the INTELLIGENCER.

It was thought best to abandon the evening Socials which have been held during the winter and to let a lawn party take its place.

Ten new names were added to the roll, making our membership thirty-seven.

After a period of silence the meeting adjourned to meet at the home of Quimby Brown, Sixth month 4.

EDWARD COCKS, Secretary.

FRANCE has demanded valuable mining concessions in China as indemnity for the imprisonment of a missionary.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

OUR friend Charles Bond, of Johnsville, Bucks county, Pa., brought us, the other day, a copy of the London Yearly Meeting Epistle of 1793. These epistles were printed on a four-page sheet, and sent out generally to Friends, wherever found. This one is signed by George Braithwaite, "Clerk to the meeting this year." It contains some good paragraphs on war, and might be read with interest, if reprinted.

A reader of the INTELLIGENCER, residing abroad, writes us: "E. and I look forward each week to the coming of the paper that is the closest connection we know with the relatives, people, and institutions we love best. When this reaches you, it will be nearly time for the Yearly Meeting, and you may be assured we shall have you all in mind at that time."

"I had a pleasant excursion with the Landmarks Club," writes a friend from Pasadena, Cal., on the 30th ult., "to the San Fernando Mission. The party of about 100 to 150 were taken the one-and-a-half miles from the station to the Mission in a variety of vehicles. We were in a hay-wagon, which carried thirty-two. Some one on the street called to our driver and asked after his 'large family'; he replied that he had 'a white man's burden.'"

"The ruins are of wide extent, and when in its prime the place must have looked like a walled city. It was on the road near the Mission that the Spanish officials surrendered California to General Fremont, in 1847. As the two commanders approached each other the Spanish general drew his sword and flung it away from him, and General Fremont did the same with his.

"There were lively times at these Missions, and great suffering, it is said, among the Indians, who were treated as slaves. As many as 12,000 were said to have been corraled at night, inside of the walls of the San Fernando Mission.

"Reports of buried treasures have led to much digging in the wine-vaults and in the church. The olive trees were quite large, and the groves covered a large space. Now the ruin is general, and the Landmarks Club, which aims to preserve the Mission building, has a large undertaking before it."

A letter from Martha Schofield, Aiken, S. C., 14th instant, has this paragraph: "My pen is crowded with work. We need $800 to finish up the term, and I am sending this fact to many who have given some time in the last ten years. We go over all names and remind them of our needs. The work of Commencement, with many duties, is upon us, and I have had to give much time to a county Teachers' Association, which closed a three days' session yesterday—held in our chapel. The mercury above eighty degrees most of the time, and I think it thickens the ink as well as ideas. But I have one rule for myself which helps me greatly,—to live above weather and never complain of it, but go on just the same."

We have, from time to time, mentioned the building of new meeting-houses in England. It is now proposed to build one at Harlesden, in the north-western suburbs of London, called Willesden Junction. A meeting for worship was first held there in 1891, in a school building, and has been regularly maintained since. There is now a membership of 149, besides a number of attenders. An Adult School, and Children's School are held every First-day. The new house is expected to cost, with the ground, about $20,000, of which $12,500 is subscribed. The meeting-house will seat 220, and there will be three class-rooms, to seat 100 each.

Numerous petitions asking for Disarmament, and the establishment of an International Court of Arbitration, have been forwarded from Media, Pa., directed to Hon. Andrew D. White, United States Ambassador to Germany, and United States Peace Commissioner, The Hague, Holland.

G. L.

ROBERT H. WALTER, of Newburyport, Mass., a nephew, is contesting the will of the late Professor O. C. Marsh, of Yale, the eminent scientist, who made the University his beneficiary.

THE NEW CRUSADE.

As if some maiden dead for centuries past,
Drawn from the dusty couch whereon she lay,
And slowly gathering life, should rise at last
Warm with the breathing beauty of to-day;
As if some planet lost for many an age
Could light the world with its forgotten gleam,
And take through heaven its shining pilgrimage
To its old place; so dawns on us this Dream.

For so the dead Past springs resuscitate
To enrich the present with its buried gold;
We raise the early issues in the late,
And in the new Crusade revive the old.
We too, though armed but with the Spirit's sword,
Go to reclaim our sacred things from loss;
We too may fight the battle of the Lord,
And swell the mustering legions of the Cross.

The great thought thrills us like a breath of God,
Startling the inmost silence of the mind,
And rolls from sea to sea, and sends abroad
A sound as of a rushing mighty wind;
A sound that shall go out to all the world,
Echoing for ever, ever to increase,
Till War's red banner shall at length be furled
Leaving alone the silver flag of Peace.

So earth shall yet shake off her ancient chain;
Old wounds shall so be healed, old wants sufficed,
For Love wakes now, and Hope is born again,
And a new star is in the crown of Christ.
Who knows what golden years may spring to birth
When prophesying angels sing again:
"Glory to God in heaven, and Peace on earth,"
And all the listening nations cry "Amen"?

—Gertrude Ford.

GAINING WINGS.

A TWIG where clung two soft cocoons,
I broke from a wayside spray,
And carried home to a quiet desk
Where long forgot it lay.

One morn I chanced to lift the lid,
And, lo! as light as air,
A moth flew up on downy wings
And settled above my chair,

A dainty, beautiful thing it was,
Orange and silvery gray;
And I marvelled how from the leafy bough
Such fairy stole away.

Had the other flown? I turned to see,
And found it striving still
To free itself from the swathing floss
And rove the air at will.

"Poor little prisoned waif," I said,
"You shall not struggle more;"
And tenderly I cut the threads,
And watched to see it soar.

Alas! a feeble chrysalis,
It dropped from its silken bed;
My help had been the direst harm,—
The pretty moth was dead!

I should have left it there to gain
The strength that struggle brings;
'Tis stress and strain, with moth or man,
That free the folded wings.

—Edna Dean Proctor.

THE complete skeleton of a mastodon has been exhumed near Roxbury, Virginia, and the authorities of William and Mary College have taken steps to secure it.

ENTRANCE TO A CARRIAGE DRIVEWAY.

Meehans' Monthly.

THE approach to a residence is one of the most important considerations that confront the landscape gardener, as first impressions will naturally have effect on later ones.

Some tastes will lead persons to construct massive gate-ways, which in themselves may be truly magnificent, but which in relation to landscape effect will appear out of place unless the artist can so arrange trees and plants near-by to bring all into harmony.

In the case of a large estate, nothing should appear cramped, hence the entrance will be broad and the corners well rounded. On the lawn these corners afford opportunity for massing shrubbery; and a little further in from these may be an open group of well-selected trees. The choice of these trees and the future of the shrubbery, are matters of considerable importance. To the writer's eye, the absence of strict formality is desired, and the trees should therefore be graceful, like the elm, Wier's Maple, Cut-leaved Birch, Yellow Locust, etc.; and the shrubs be not continually sheared and rounded.

Evergreens in careful assortment take the place of the shrubs very acceptably, and make the entrance attractive summer and winter; and larger ones may also be used in place of the deciduous trees,—pines are perhaps most fitting.

Vines on walls and gate-posts are always pretty; but especially desirable are the loose-clambering ones like the Virginian Creeper. Let the latter be mingled with English Ivy for a back-ground and winter effect.

Flower-boxes for stone posts filled with summer plants and vines can be easily and tastily arranged and are admired by every one. In winter, they may be replaced by evergreens of dwarf nature or small specimens of larger ones, like Himalayan Pine, Lawson's Cypress, and Scotch Pine.

The main idea should be to construct the entrance as a whole, bringing in pretty features to enliven it and connect all with the estate in harmony.

DISLIKE OF MENTAL EFFORT.

From an address by ex-President C. B. Hulbert, of Middlebury College, Vermont.

PEOPLE recoil from mental exertion, and therefore repel books that tax the brain. "Load our shoulders, fill our hands, play on our sensibilities, but don't set us to thinking"; this is the demand. Says a leading publishing house in New York city: "Three-fourths of the youth of our country are habitual readers of the dime-novel class of books; but not one in fifty has any taste for the standard book. The trashy, sensational book sells by the tens of thousands, while the book of science, of history, of poetry, by the most popular authors, sell by the hundred or by the thousand."

Why is this? Not because they love trash; but because they hate thought. They prefer to have skillful hands play on the strings of their sensibility rather than to read books that dislodge them from their mental indolence and force them to think. Intellectual laziness is the prolific source of ignorance. The multitudes are not living uniformed, and without discipline and culture, because they are debarred by circumstance from our schools of learning: it is because, in their aversion to intellectual labor, they debar themselves from the means and opportunities of knowledge and culture placed within their reach.

I have spoken of the University of Common Sense in which all the people are included; but I must confess that it is over-patronized by hosts of people who are unworthy of these advantages. In their abuse of privileges in the institution they attend they are forbidden, by every law of honor, to complain of students in our academies and colleges who are guilty of the same offense. Let the common people desist from their favorite employment of throwing stones at our schools of learning because they contain students who misuse and abuse their opportunities, while they themselves are as really vulnerable for their neglect and disregard of opportunity. Mental laziness is not now and then; it is always: it is not here and there; it is omnipresent. Hence the universal demand upon authors of school books and Sabbath-school books; upon teachers of every grade of school, and upon preachers in the pulpit, to "explain, simplify, bring down, illustrate; remember our minds are infantile, do our thinking for us, make our work easy."

THINGS TO REMEMBER.

[This is from the "Christian Commonwealth," and is, on the whole, a very good list.]

REMEMBER that happiness, when it comes at all, usually comes to those who do not go in search of it.

Remember that in the struggle of life it is always possible to turn one kind of defeat into another kind of victory. Try it and see.

Remember that if you cannot realize the ends of your being in one way, you can in another. Realize something!

Remember that there is nothing noble in being superior to some other man. The true nobility is in being superior to your previous self.

Remember that, as you grow older, nature's tendencies are laying their grip upon you. Nature may be on your side when you are young, but against you later on.

Remember that you can get the better of tendencies if you fight hard enough, although you can never get the better of nature's laws.

Remember not to talk too much about yourself.

Remember that having fine sentiments is a poor substitute for being a man. Thoughts are gifts; but your life and your acts speak for you.

Remember to judge people by what they do, not by their sentiments—especially yourself.

Remember that you may have your best friends amongst those who disagree with you. Men can disagree with their heads and agree in their hearts.

Remember that the easiest person in the world to deceive is yourself. You can make yourself believe almost anything about yourself if you try it.

Remember that the self of the selves is never deceived. It keeps a record of what you are, and it puts down everything. An act can never be undone. It has to stay.

Remember that the true way to conquer prejudice is to live it down. Do not talk about it with others ; do not talk about it to yourself.

Remember that prejudice hurts the one who cherishes it much more than the one against whom it is aimed.

Remember that to give up the struggle when it is in part over, because you cannot get the chance you want, may show that you deserved no chance at all. Take what chance you can get, and fight it through.

Remember that to keep chafing because fortune favors others more than you is the way to get even less out of fortune. Be a man !

Remember that great yearning and noble ambitions usually die away just about the time they are most wanted. Act on them now.

Remember that it is brave to be in the minority. That is where the strong usually are. Weak natures like to hide behind a majority.

A MOTHER-MADE MAN.

A WELL-KNOWN man was introduced at a great public meeting as a "self-made man."

Instead of appearing gratified by the tribute, it seemed to throw him, for a few moments, into a "brown study." Afterward they asked him the reason for the way in which he received the announcement.

"Well," said the great man, "it set me to thinking that I was not really a self-made man."

"Why," they replied, "did you not begin to work in a store when you were ten or twelve?"

"Yes," said he, "but it was because my mother thought I ought early to have the educating touch of business."

"But then," they urged, "you were always such a great reader."

"Yes," he replied ; "but it was because my mother led me to do it, and at her knee she had me give an account of the book after I had read it. I don't know about being a self-made man. I think my mother had a great deal to do with it."

"But then," they urged again, "your integrity was your own."

"Well, I don't know about that. One day a barrel of apples came to me to sell out by the peck, and, after the manner of some storekeepers, I put the specked ones at the bottom and the best ones at the top. My mother called me and asked me what I was doing. I told her, and she said : 'Tom, if you do that, you will be a cheat.' And I did not do it. I think my mother had something to do with my integrity. And, on the whole, I doubt whether I am a self-made man. I think my mother had something to do with making me anything I am of any character or usefulness."

"Happy," said Dr. Lorimer, who told the story, "the boy who had such a mother ; happy the mother who had such a boy so appreciative of his mother's formative influence !" — [Exchange.]

WOMEN'S SCHOOL VOTE.

THOSE who have made the small school vote of women an argument against giving them full suffrage, should ponder the recent utterance of State Superintendent of Public Instruction, Mr. Skinner, on the women's school vote in New York State. In an open letter, he says of the education law now pending in the Legislature :

"The bill contains no provision abridging in any way the right of women to vote at school meetings, as granted by the present school law. So far as my power extends, no legislation of any character will be permitted which takes away any of the rights of women under the present law. It may be true that women generally do not avail themselves of the privilege, and fail to vote except in small numbers. This criticism may also apply to men. I have always found, however, that where women exercise the right of suffrage at school meetings, they are generally found upon the side which represents the best interests of our schools."

Helen Kendrick Johnson claims that a class of voters who only vote occasionally must be a danger to the State. That depends on what sort of voters they are. There is a large class of respectable men who do not generally vote, but who, once in a long while, when corruption has become intolerable, do turn out in force and bring about a change, as in the case of Tammany a few years ago. This element among male voters is sometimes called the "Quaker vote." The fact that these refined and intelligent men have the right of suffrage is not a danger to the State ; it is a distinct advantage to the State. It would be a greater advantage if they voted at every election ; but even their occasional voting does good. It has been the same with the women's school vote. They do not go to the polls in large numbers, except when there is some important issue at stake ; but then they turn out, and vote on the right side.

Mrs. Johnson says the women's school vote has accomplished nothing which could not have been accomplished better without it ; but this is contradicted by well-known facts. Gov. Roosevelt says that a new school-house was badly needed in his home town of Oyster Bay, but all efforts to get one failed until the mothers of the children were allowed to vote on the question. Then they got their new school-house at once. This is only a sample of many similar cases.

It should also be remembered that the women's vote is small only where it is limited to school suffrage. In the States where the women have full suffrage, they vote as generally as the man.

Alice Stone Blackwell.

"TWENTY-FIVE years ago," says the Kansas City Journal, "a Russian lad of sixteen years arrived in Hays City, Kansas, direct from the River Volga. He was dressed in a sheepskin coat, and his first act on stepping from the train was to light his pipe with flint and steel. Last week Hays City inaugurated a fine electric light system, of which this Russian lad is the sole proprietor."

An Oklahoma town was surveyed, lots sold and many of them occupied by about 800 people within twenty-four hours

JOHN AND THE STAMP.

The Children's Friend.

THERE was a boy who "lived out" named John. Every week he wrote home to his mother, who lived on a small farm away up among the hills. One day John picked up an old envelope from the kitchen wood-box, and saw that the postage stamp was not touched by the postmaster's stamp to show that it had done its duty, and henceforth was useless.

"The postmaster missed his aim that time," said John, "and left the stamp as good as new. I'll use it myself on my next letter, and save two cents."

He moistened it at the nose of the tea-kettle, and very carefully pulled the stamp off.

"No," said John's conscience, "for that would be cheating. The stamp has been on one letter; it ought not to carry another."

"It can carry another," said John, "because you see, there is no mark to prove it worthless. The post-office will not know it."

"But you know," said his conscience, "and that is enough. It is not honest to use it a second time. It is a little matter, to be sure, but it is cheating. God looks for principle. It is the quality of every action that he judges by."

"But no one will know it," said John, faintly.

"No one?" cried conscience. "God will know it, and he, you will remember, desires truth in the inward parts."

"Yes," cried the best part of John's character. "Yes, it is cheating to use the postage stamp a second time, and I will not do it."

John tore it in two and gave it to the winds; and so he won a victory. Wasn't it worth winning? It is often such little tests as these that reveal character.

I STAY my haste, I make delays,
For what avails this eager pace?
I stand amid the eternal ways
And what is mine shall know my face.

—John Burroughs.

THE working men's insurance laws have had a very good effect in German cities in diminishing tuberculosis by compelling the wage earning classes to join sick clubs and thereby putting them in the way of taking better care of their health, and providing them with medical attendance and nursing at an early stage when tuberculosis is not yet incurable.

THE theory that mosquitoes play an important part in communicating malaria, which has been advanced by Professor Robert Koch, the celebrated bacteriologist, will form the subject of a comprehensive investigation by an expedition which he will lead into the tropics.

THE Churchman, (N. Y.), comments upon "the definite abandonment of the field of religious journalism by the Outlook, and, to a less extent, by the Independent. The former, it says, does not wish any longer to be considered a "religious journal," having become a literary magazine.

THE city of Ida Grove, Ia., is having a well dug at the pumping station twenty feet in diameter and about twenty-five feet deep. It is only about thirteen feet to the water level, so it is expected that the new well will have about twelve feet of water constantly.

THE number of criminals in penitentiaries in Iowa in 1884 was 1,260. After four years of prohibition under ex-Governor Larabee the number was reduced to 607. After the passage of the "Mulct law" the number had increased to 1,560.

Peace Crusade Work in Boston.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

IF peace does not come to all the world soon it will not be because the women of Boston have been unmindful of the great responsibilities of war. Two very enthusiastic meetings were held on the 9th instant, both in charge of women. The first was held in Tremont Temple, and was the last of the series of noon meetings. It was in charge of the women of the W. C. T. U. There were several hundred present who listened to "forty-five minutes of superb talk," as the meeting was characterized by Mary A. Livermore. The speeches at the meeting were all high and pure in tone, and not one of the speakers made in any way a criticism as to the policy of the Administration.

Mrs. Katherine L. Stevens presided, and Mrs. Alice Harris sang "Fear Not Ye, Oh Israel."

The leading address was made by Rev. William T. McElven. In his opening remarks he complimented the women on their helpfulness in the Peace Movement. He said there was only one position which the ministry could take on this great question. The day was surely coming when cannons, bayonets, and guns will be found only in museums, as relics of the past.

Other speakers were Mrs. J. K. Barney, and Rev. E. D. Burr. Mrs. Barney has circled the world, a trip covering a distance of 35,000 miles, for the W. C. T. U.

The W. C. T. U. meeting was followed by the Massachusetts Woman Suffrage Association meeting at the parlors of the Woman's Journal, Park street. All remarks tended to foster a movement for peace the whole world over, by the establishment of a high court whose purpose it would be to settle all disputes among nations. The coming Conference at The Hague is the first step towards such a tribunal. Mary A. Livermore presided, and introduced the first speaker, Mrs. Edwin D. Mead, who spoke of the Czar's Peace Conference as being the first time in history of an establishment of a peace tribunal where great politicians and business men could meet together in the common cause of peace. Mary Clement Leavitt was next presented, and said in part that her observations in her trip around the world had taught her that the standing armies of Europe are absorbing the life of the nations. If England, Russia, Germany, and the United States combined on the question of peace, justice, and righteousness, all the smaller nations would be compelled to do what is right by their people and within their own territory.

"The dream of scientific evolutionists is the federation of the human race," so said Rev. Samuel R. Fuller, who was the next speaker. He then went on to say that the mothers of this country had a duty to perform in training up their children toward peace. He advised mothers not to give their boy a soldier cap if they wished to inculcate a love of peace in him, and to have him read peace-loving stories instead of stories of war. In this way he would become faithful to the cause of justice and peace.

After two or more short addresses by prominent women, he meeting closed.

Boston, Mass.

State Conference of Religion.

It is proposed to call at an early day a State Conference of Religion, to be held at some point in the State of New York soon to be announced, somewhat of the character of the "World's Parliament of Religions" at Chicago a few years ago. Representatives of a dozen different denominations, including both branches of Friends, have approved the proposition to hold such a Conference. A preliminary meeting of these representatives is to be held in New York, at the United Charities Building, on the 23d inst., to organize committees, and consider and arrange details for the Conference. It promises to be an occasion of much interest.

[The foregoing paragraph was sent us by our friend Aaron M. Powell, just too late for last week's issue. He added, in connection: "I have been asked to serve on the Executive Committee, but have felt obliged to decline, on the score of health, with the other demands upon my time and strength." —EDS. INTELLIGENCER.]

Prohibition in Kansas.

BISHOP MILLSPAUGH, of Kansas, (P. E. church), speaks as follows of Prohibition in that State:

"When I went to Kansas I felt satisfied that there was no better way of handling the liquor traffic than by the high license system, but I am now quite as well satisfied that I was mistaken. I have changed my opinion of the Prohibition law since I have seen its workings, and I regard it as very desirable. It is especially so from my own spiritual standpoint. For instance, Topeka is a city of 50,000 inhabitants, so that it is quite a town. You can walk the whole length of Kansas avenue, the principal street of the city, and not see a single saloon on either side. What is the effect of all this? The young men are not tempted to go into the gilded hells where sweet music and every allurements are held open for them. There are no temptations for the young, and there is nothing to lead the man, who does not drink habitually, to take a drink just for the sake of being sociable.

"I find it easier to do missionary work in Topeka than I found it in Minneapolis or in Omaha (both under $1,000 license for saloons). The young men you approach are more inclined to listen and give one respectful hearing. There are more men in the church, both as members and as mere attendants, in proportion to the population. This means something, and it is to be credited largely to the effects of the temperance legislation.

"The largest wholesale grocer in Kansas is a Prohibitionist, but himself not a teetotaler. He gives it as his judgment as a business man that there is 25 per cent. more business done by the grocery, dry goods, and hardware trades in Kansas than there was before Prohibition was established.

"There is no probability that Kansas will ever go back upon the Prohibition doctrine."

A Word From Lincoln.

Springfield Republican.

PROF. LAUGHLIN, of Chicago University, was asked to meet a number of imperialists at dinner at the Union League Club there a day or two ago, and he took along with him this quotation from Lincoln's writings:

"No man is good enough to govern another man without that other's consent. When the white man governs himself, that is self-government; but when he governs himself and also governs another man, that is more than self-government—that is despotism. Our reliance is in the love of liberty which God has planted in us; our defense is in the spirit which prizes liberty as the heritage of all men in all lands, everywhere. Those who deny freedom to others deserve it not for themselves, and under a just God cannot long retain it."

When the discussion was well under way the professor whipped out the quotation and passed it around the table. All were Republicans, and it is stated that the face of each one was a study as he read Lincoln's words. Some doubted the genuineness of the quotation, and when proof was forthcoming there was silence, until a great McKinley editor present announced his determination to answer Lincoln through the columns of his paper.

The Scottish Dialect.

A SCOTCH servant lass proceeded to the neighborhood of Oxford, where she was engaged by an English family. One wet day, happening to step into a heap of mire, she returned home with her clothes covered with dirt. "What have you been doing?" asked her mistress. "Oh, I stapped into a humplock o' glaur," said the Scotch girl. "And what's glaur?" asked the mistress. "Just clairts," said the girl. "But what's clairts?" asked the mistress. "It's just clabber," replied the girl. "But, dear me, what's clabber?" queried the mistress. "Clabber is drookit stour," retorted the girl. "But, dear me, what is drookit stour?" asked the amazed mistress. To which the girl replied, "Weel, weel! 'ave nae patience wi' ye ava! Ye sud ken as weel as me it's just wat dirt!"—[Scottish American.]

The Carpenter's Work.

JUDGE M——, a well known jurist living near Cincinnati, loved to tell the following anecdote of a young man who understood the risk of doing a shabby job even when directed to. He had occasion to send for a carpenter, and a sturdy young fellow appeared.

"I want this fence mended. There are some unplanned boards—use them. You need not take time to make it a neat job. I will only pay you a dollar and a half."

Later, the judge found the man carefully planing each board. Supposing that he was trying to make a costly job, he ordered him to nail them on just as they were, and continued his walk. When he returned, the boards were all planed and numbered ready for nailing.

"I told you this fence was to be covered with vines," he said, angrily; "I do not care how it looks."

"I do," said the carpenter, gruffly, carefully measuring his work. When it was done, there was no other part of the fence as thorough in finish.

"How much do you charge?" asked the judge.

"A dollar and a half," said the man, shouldering his tools.

The judge stared. "Why did you spend all that labor on that fence, if not for money?"

"For the job, sir."

"Nobody would have seen the poor work on it."

"But I should have known it was there. No; I'll only take a dollar and a half." He took it, and went away.

Ten years afterwards, the judge had a contract to give for the erection of several magnificent public buildings. There were many applicants among the master-builders, but the face of one caught his eye.

"It was my man of the fence," he said. "I knew we should have only good, genuine work from him. I gave him the contract and it made a rich man of him."

The Exhibition of 1899.

THE Philadelphia Exposition of 1899, the first of its kind in this country, is to be held under the joint auspices of the Philadelphia Commercial Museum and the Franklin Institute.

The Congress of the United States, the Legislature of Pennsylvania, and the Councils of Philadelphia have formally endorsed it, and made liberal appropriations towards the buildings, which will be largely added to by private subscription.

The Exposition will open on September 14, and will be held in West Philadelphia on grounds lying between the Philadelphia Hospital property and the Schuylkill river, below the South street bridge, and in the neighborhood of the University of Pennsylvania.

The grounds are easily accessible, being reached by trolley line within ten minutes' time from City Hall; also by the Pennsylvania Railroad. The principal entrance to the Exposition grounds is at the northwest corner of the tract, where electric cars enter from Thirty-fourth street.

Conclusions at Hull House.

At a Conference of Social Settlement Workers, at Hull House, Chicago, on the 16th instant, speakers united in declaring that the aim of social reformers should be to teach the masses how to recover the lost art of living. It was pointed out that trained teachers were unsuccessful instructors in social settlements, because they adhered too closely to the educational curriculum. The efforts to teach residents of the slums in classes, the experts declared, had proved a failure. It was unanimously agreed that the best results were attained by calling the people together and have knowledge imparted in illustrated lectures.

THE Westinghouse Electric Company has received an order to equip a trolley line between Philadelphia and Atlantic City. The company will be known as the West Jersey & Seashore Electric Railroad, and it is expected that it will be in operation before the summer rush commences.

CURRENT EVENTS.

DISPATCHES from Manila on the 8th instant, sent by way of Hong Kong, 12th, disclosed that the violent efforts recently made by direction of General Otis against the Filipinos had worn out some of the troops. The 1st Nebraska regiment asked General McArthur to be relieved from duty at the front, being exhausted. (This news was forwarded several days earlier, but was suppressed at Washington.) Their request says that only about 300 men are left "fit for duty," and that at roll-call no less than 160 men were reported sick. Since February 2, when the fighting began, this regiment alone has lost 225 in killed and wounded.

It appears to have been the policy of General Otis to send the volunteers from the Western States to the front. The regular troops have been kept in and about Manila. It is now announced that the regulars are to go forward. There has been much comment and criticism on the policy adopted by General Otis.

THE reports of the most recent military operations in the Philippine Islands indicate the great exhaustion of many of the American troops, on account of the heat, the jungle fighting, the difficulty of procuring food, etc. The rainy season has begun, when the rainstorms are terrific. Admiral Dewey is to sail for home at once. Aguinaldo, one report says, has "disappeared"; the Filipino Junta in London say he has withdrawn to a more inaccessible place in the mountains, and that the struggle for independence will continue, "at all costs."

THE official report of United States Admiral Kautz on the engagement, April 1, at Samoa, of the American and British forces with the Mataafa warriors in which several Americans were killed, has been made public by the Navy Department. Fuller light on the Samoan situation shows plainly that the plan of the three nations, (United States, England, and Germany), joining to rule the Samoans has worked badly. The people want Mataafa, (who is their "Grand Old Man"), for Chief, but another, Tanu, is forced on them.

AFFAIRS in Cuba remain in an unsettled condition as respects the Cuban army's disbandment and surrender of arms, and dispatches from Havana and Washington have represented that the situation causes uneasiness. The money, $3,000,000, sent to be paid the Cubans has not yet been given them, because of their refusal so far to give up their arms. It has been represented that General Gomez, the old Cuban commander, and General Brooke, the American "Governor General," had disagreed, but this is denied, the latter saying that General Gomez is acting in good faith, and endeavoring to secure disbandment, and the return of the men who have been in arms to industry. The latter is announced to be preparing a "manifesto" on the subject.

THE discovery of an alleged plot against the South African Republic has moved President Kruger to act promptly, and the arrests already made by his order include eight ex-British officers. More warrants have been issued, and the conspiracy will be thoroughly probed. Great interest has been excited in London by the episode. Cecil Rhodes denies knowledge of it. Arrangements had been made for a conference, probably at Cape Town, between President Kruger and Sir Alfred Milner, Governor of Cape Colony and British High Commissioner for South Africa, regarding the alleged grievances of the "Outlanders" (foreigners), in the Transvaal.

A FRIGHTFUL railway accident occurred on the 12th instant, on the Reading road, a few miles south of the city of Reading, Pa., by which 29 persons were immediately killed, and others injured. A special train following an express ran into the latter and "telescoped" several cars, the occupants of these being the sufferers. Sixteen citizens of Norristown, Pa., were among the killed. The rear train was following closely, and running at a high rate of speed; the front one had stopped upon signal from a tower. The responsibility for the accident has not been fixed.

A JUDICIAL decree in the United States Circuit Court at Baltimore authorizes the issue by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company of full-paid and non-assessable stocks and bonds for the purpose of retiring the old issues, and when this shall have been completed the company may apply for a close of the receivership.

THE New England Homestead's May report on the winter wheat crop shows that it is much injured. An average condition of only 72.6 is indicated, or the lowest in the records of this service, and comparing with 87.8 a year ago. Acreage, through the plowing in of land where damage has been great, will be heavily reduced. Fully half the Michigan counties report a loss in acreage, ranging from 5 to 35 per cent., and Indiana, Missouri, and Kansas make worse reports. Hence, notwithstanding the much larger acreage sown, the yield may not reach last year's figures.

A MEMORIAL meeting for Aaron M. Powell was held by the Social Purity Alliance, (Philadelphia), on the afternoon of the 16th instant, in the Church House, (Episcopal), at 12th and Walnut Streets. The meeting was directed by Arch-deacon Brady. Among those who spoke of A. M. Powell's good work as President of the American Purity Alliance were Samuel S. Ash, Lydia H. Price, Isaac Wilson, Charles M. Stabler, and Hannah Clothier Hull.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE increased preparation for war made by so comparatively poor a country as Japan is astonishing. One of the country's officials, now in this country, says: "Japan is building or has just completed some fifty-two war ships, comprising four battle ships, six first-class armored cruisers, thirty torpedo boats, and a dozen destroyers." Another official said, "a navy and an army costs, and we have to cast about to devise means to pay for it all."

—At a recent meeting of the faculty of the department of arts and sciences at Cornell University it was decided that the presentation of theses before the conferring of degrees should be made optional. Many of the departments were opposed to the abolition of the custom entirely, and finally the conclusion was reached that those who have demonstrated special merit along certain lines of study should be encouraged in the preparation of theses. Under this new rule it will be considered a distinctive honor to be invited or permitted to write a thesis.

—The Pope, according to a correspondent of the London Mail, speaking recently on the present state of ritualism in the Anglican church, remarked: "The English now accept the rites of the Roman church. Soon they will accept the substance of our holy religion. What is now happening in the Anglican church, added to the progress of Roman Catholicism in England, confirms my hope that England will assuredly re-enter Roman Catholicism."

—The parallel to King George's war on the American colonists continues singularly close. As the king then armed the Indians to fight against the patriots, so now, as is reported from Manila, we are to arm the savage Maccabebes to war upon their more civilized neighbors.—Springfield Republican.

—A collection of five hundred varieties of snakes from Brazil has been awaiting entrance at the port of New Orleans. They range from the size of earthworms to that of boas. The collection is to be exhibited in New York and then go to the Paris exposition.

—Dr. E. Benjamin Andrews (former president of Brown University), has declined the presidency of the State College of Agriculture of Colorado, and will continue in his present capacity as Superintendent of Schools of Chicago.

—Governor Sayres, of Texas, as soon as the Legislature adjourns, will address a letter to the Governors of all the States asking a meeting with their Attorney-General for the purpose of agreeing upon an effective anti-trust law.

—After trying it for six weeks, the London Mail has given up its "Sunday" issue. It does this, it says, in deference to protests of religious people and bodies.

NOTICES.

* * The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting-house at Stanton, Del., on First-day, Fifth month 28, 1899, at 2.30 p. m.

Subject, "Temperance." To be addressed by Joseph S. Walton.

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

* * Nottingham First-day School Union will be held at Penn Hill, Lancaster county, Pa., Seventh-day, Fifth month 20, at 1 p. m.

* * A Conference under the care of the Philanthropic Committee of the Yearly and Quarterly Meetings will be held in the meeting-house at Fallsington, Bucks county, Pa., on First day, Fifth month 28, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. The meeting will be addressed by Prof. F. H. Green. Subject, "Temperance."

SUSANNA RICH, Clerk.

* * The Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, held at Race Street, will take place on Fourth-day next, the 24th, in the evening, at 7.30 o'clock.

* * A Conference will be held at Plymouth Friends' meeting-house on next First-day, the 21st inst., at 2.30 o'clock. Subject, "Temperance and Tobacco." Under care of Abington Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee.

JAMES Q. ATKINSON, Clerk.

* * Friends desiring accommodation at the meeting-house, or elsewhere, during New York Yearly Meeting, please communicate with

ELLA B. McDOWELL,
226 East 16th street, New York City.
or ELIZABETH B. CAPRON,
White Plains, N. Y.

* * Quarterly and Yearly Meetings will occur as follows:

FIFTH MONTH:

- 25. Bucks Quarter, Buckingham, Pa.
- 29. New York Yearly Meeting.
- 30. Burlington Quarter, Crosswicks, N. J.
- 31. Southern Quarter, Easton, Md.

* * The Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches will attend meetings as follows:

FIFTH MONTH:

- 21. Merion, 10.30 a. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

* * The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has made the following appointments for Fifth month:

- 21. Pipe Creek, Md.
- 26. Deer Creek, Md.
- 28. Broad Creek, Md.

On behalf of the Committee.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

AQUILA J. LINVILL,
Dealer in Choice Lehigh Coal.
1827 North 10th Street, Philadelphia.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMAN
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHARLES
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR } Cincinnati
EOKSTEIN }
ATLANTIC }
BRADLEY }
BROOKLYN } New York
JEWETT }
ULSTER }
UNION }
SOUTHERN } Chicago
SEIDMAN }
COLLIER }
MISSOURI } St. Louis
RED SEAL }
SOUTHERN }
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MOBLEY
Cleveland.
SALEM
Salem, Mass.
CORNELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

"THERE is a vast difference between an unsupported assertion and a demonstrated fact."

Our assertion that Pure White Lead made by the "old Dutch process" of slow corrosion is far superior to White Lead made by patent or quick processes, has been demonstrated by the experience of competent, practical painters everywhere. Comparative tests made by employees or parties interested do not prove anything.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

NATIONAL PEACE JUBILEE—WASHINGTON.

REDUCED RATES VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

On account of the National Peace Jubilee, to be held at Washington, D. C., Fifth month 23, 24, and 25, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company has arranged to sell excursion tickets from all stations to Washington at rate of single fare for the round trip, except that the rates from New York, Philadelphia, and Baltimore will be $8.00, $5.00, and $2.00 respectively, with proportionate rates from intermediate and adjacent points.

Tickets will be sold Fifth month 22 and 23, good to return within ten days from date of sale when properly validated by the agent at Washington.

STOP-OVER TICKETS.

STOP OVERS AT PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, AND WASHINGTON ON PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD THROUGH TICKETS.

In addition to its excellent train service, the Pennsylvania Railroad offers the traveler between New York and Chicago, and New York and St. Louis the privilege of a stop-over of ten days at Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. This stop-over is granted on all through first-class tickets reading via those cities. Persons desiring to stop-over must deposit their ticket with the station agent immediately on arrival.

To those who have business to transact in these cities, or to persons who have never visited the National Capital, this privilege is a valuable one, and should appeal to all through travelers between New York and the West, and Chicago or St. Louis and the East. The stations of the Pennsylvania Railroad are centrally located in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and access to any section of the cities is easy, by either the regular street car lines or by the Pennsylvania Railroad cabs, to be found at the Philadelphia and Washington stations.

THE Woman's Institute, in London, has published a "Lexicon of Employment for Women," from which it appears that there are in England women cab and omnibus drivers, street porters, "walking posters," cattle dealers, auctioneers, and one locomotive engineer.

Boys' Wash Suits

We offer fifteen hundred Wash Suits for Little Boys, strictly new goods, in the latest and most desirable styles and fabrics, at $1.00, $1.50, and $2.00 a suit

Usually the prices would be $2.00, $3.00, and $4.00, but we have marked them for quick selling.

A good Wash Suit as low as 50 cents each.

Also, a thousand pairs of Little Boys' Trousers, at 25, 50 and 75 cents a pair.

Special Values in Hosiery

Women's fast black Cotton Hose, gossamer weight—reduced from 25 cents to 19 cents a pair.

Women's fast black Rembrandt ribbed Lisle Hose, with white split feet, sizes 8, 8½ and 9 only—real value, 37½ cents; here at 25 cents a pair.

Children's fine fast black ribbed Cotton Hose, with double knees, sizes 5 to 9½—at 12½ cents a pair.

Extra quality Children's fast black ribbed Cotton Hose, with unbleached feet and double knees, any size—at 12½ cents a pair.

Mail orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

CHARLES BURTON,

Practical House and Sign Painter,

Office, 907 N. Thirteenth Street, } Philadelphia, Pa.
Residence, 1714 Woodstock Street, }

Richards & Shourds, Jobbing attended to.

CARPENTERS, BUILDERS, AND CONTRACTORS.
1125 Spring St. (first street above Race), Philad'a., Pa.
Thompson Shourds, 2212 Wallace Street.
Charles W. Richards, 1220 Angle St., Tioga.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844. }
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 27, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 21.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXI.

THOUGH meetings are sometimes held in silence we tenderly beseech all Friends not to neglect their attendance; for the hungry soul will labor for bread, and the thirsty for the water of life; and the diligent hand will make rich in that treasure which is of an enduring substance.

From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, chapter on Meetings for Worship.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

AARON M. POWELL.

THIS form laid low, in beautiful ripe manliness?

This deep-toned, gentle voice with sweet compelling power to persuade Hushed from its labor?

This matchless tact, grown strong by love and service,
Yet fine and sensitive to handle God's most delicate work
Lost to humanity's cause?

This gentleness and courage so nobly joined they seemed a seamless garment

Worn with all dignity and kindness—

All these rich, ripe graces lost to God's service?

Not so! in other, fairer fields he still shall serve.

Our Father! we question not thy wisdom and thy love

We only ask, "Anoint unto thy service here

Others thy servants,

With a like strength, fidelity, and untiring love."

Philadelphia.

PHILADELPHIA YEARLY MEETING.

(Continued from last week.)

IN women's meeting, Third-day, (16th), the proposition from men's meeting concerning a Peace testimony, and message to The Hague Conference was considered. Much unity was expressed, and it was felt to be an opportunity in which we should not fail to emphasize the peaceable teachings of Jesus. The report of the committee on Philanthropic Labor was read and fully approved. In connection with it, testimony was borne to the beautiful character of Sarah H. Peirce who had labored faithfully in this committee as long as strength permitted, and who has passed from earth since our last Yearly Meeting.

In men's meeting, at the opening of the afternoon session, the report of the Committee on the Joseph Jeanes fund, (aid to "Homes"), was read. There were also read the reports of the trustees of the Joseph Jeanes fund, the trustees of the Samuel Jeanes fund, the trustees of the John M. George fund, and of the trustees of the Yearly Meeting, (now incorporated, and succeeding all the other separate committees of trustees). The report of the committee on George School was read and approved.

FOURTH-DAY, 17TH.

In men's meeting, in the morning session, on opening, Allen Flitcraft offered prayer. It was decided to appoint a joint committee to report next year a plan for the gradual renewal of some of the standing committees, including that on George School. The minutes of the Representative Committee for the past year were read. They reported, besides routine business, that $40,836.18 had been received from the estate of Jacob Fretz, to be applied to the use of George School.

The several monthly and quarterly meetings were directed to forward to the Representative Committee lists of their record books, and where deposited.

John Wilhelm Rowntree, before withdrawal from the meeting of himself and companion, A. N. Brayshaw, spoke briefly, expressing satisfaction with their visit, and dwelling on a few points in the Friends' system—the First-day schools, etc.

In the afternoon, the committee appointed on Second-day on the subject of Peace and a Message to The Hague Conference, proposed the following message, which was directed to be forwarded by cable:

"The Yearly Meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, now in session in Philadelphia, United States America, to the International Peace Conference at The Hague:

"May your counsels be divinely directed in the early consideration of the establishment of an International Court of Arbitration, tending to the ultimate reign of universal peace. (Signed) Emmor Roberts, Sarah Griscom, clerks."

The consideration of the queries and answers was then begun, and the first and second were considered, the summaries adopted being as follows:

1. "Our religious meetings for worship and for discipline have been regularly held, except some omissions noted in all our reports, for which various reasons have been assigned. Those on First-day have usually been attended by many of our members. Those held at other times have been with some exceptions small. The hour has been mostly observed, and the behavior of those assembled very generally becoming."

2. "Love and unity have been very generally maintained, and tale-baring and detraction discouraged. When differences have become known endeavors have been used to end them."

In the consideration of the answers, Charles Bond, Cyrus W. Harvey, and others spoke. Joel Borton said mid-week meeting should be changed to the evening if it would suit those in attendance better, and where there was no meeting in town or village one should be established or moved from the country. The sitting closed with a brief exhortation by Enoch Hannum.

In women's meeting, the reports of the Trust funds were read and approved. The report of the Boarding Home Committee showed that ten of the quarterly meetings have homes for aged or dependent Friends. Gratitude was expressed to our Heavenly Father who had put it into the heart of a generous Friend to thus apply a large sum of money in promoting the comfort and happiness of many in their declining years. Caln and Southern Quarterly Meetings have not found it expedient to build homes, but believed their best interests were served by finding comfortable boarding places for Friends in their various neighborhoods. The spirit of love which actuated, or should actuate, our giving, makes it doubly precious to the recipient ; we were also urged to remember the little individual charities which are productive of good to both giver and receiver, for if self-denial be practiced that we may share with others, a growth toward nobler character is promoted. While our order excludes the frequent collections of money which other churches practice, the hope was expressed that we would embrace opportunities for giving. We should save that we may give ; thus is a wise economy promoted.

In connection with the subject of Peace, a Friend desired that we might be faithful to our testimony even to the discountenancing of military parades, where there is always such useless expenditure, and where the young and susceptible may be captivated by the warlike spirit.

The first and second queries claimed the attention of the meeting. The answers to the first showed that the severe winter had interfered with the regular holding of some of our meetings in some country neighborhoods, but while this was the case there was encouragement in seeing a renewed interest in many neighborhoods. If the complaint is made that our meetings are not attractive, we must remember that they are not intended to be places of intellectual entertainment, but opportunities for spiritual refreshment, where those who come seeking to be spiritually strengthened, will always find food.

Love and unity appear, by the answers to the second query, to be maintained ; the large Yearly Meeting itself seemed an exhibition of those virtues wherein condescension and all-embracing charity were apparent. Love toward God and to one another was the burden of many exhortations, and we were counseled not only to refrain from saying the unkind thing, but to take the positive stand, and let it be known when a noble act had been done or a sweet and tender word had been uttered ; many a one's course in life might be directed toward the right if his good traits were made prominent and encouraged.

The minutes of the Representative Committee were read and approved, also the cablegram to The Hague.

FIFTH-DAY, 18TH.

The usual mid-week meetings for worship were held in the morning. The Race Street and Cherry Street houses were well filled. In the former there was ministry by Joseph Powell, Isaac Wilson, Joseph Fussell, Elizabeth Lloyd, and Keziah Wilkins. In the latter several Friends spoke, Cyrus W. Harvey being one. The democracy of faith, he said, is as broad as the Declaration of Independence ; the grace of God is given to all without liturgy or the mediation of man. All men are enlightened by the Christ within. At Girard Avenue, also, there was a good meeting, Enoch Hannum and others speaking.

In men's meeting, in the afternoon, at the opening, the following cablegram reply to the message sent the day before was presented and read :

"The Hague, May 18, 1899.—American Commission at Peace Congress send thanks, and will do everything possible in the line suggested. White, President ; Holls, Secretary."

There were many expressions of satisfaction at the prompt reply, and the favorable reception of the message.

The consideration of the queries was resumed, and the third, fourth, and fifth disposed of, the following being the summary answers :

3. "A testimony in favor of the free ministry of the Gospel and against the system of a professional ministry appears to have been generally maintained."

4. "Concern has been felt to bring up those under our care in the simplicity queried after ; to encourage them in the frequent and reverent reading of the Holy Scriptures ; to guard them in other ways from hurtful influences and to be ourselves good examples in these particulars, but deficiencies in many ways have been acknowledged."

5. "Friends have been very nearly clear of the manufacture and sale of all intoxicating liquors, and, with some exceptions, clear of their use as drink, and careful to discourage the same. Caution has been felt respecting their use as medicine. Five instances have been reported of signing applications for licenses to sell, and two instances have been reported of property being rented for the sale of liquors. The unnecessary frequenting of taverns has been generally guarded against, and endeavors have been used to discourage the attendance of places of harmful diversion. Moderation and simplicity at marriages, funerals, and other occasions are encouraged."

The sitting concluded with the consideration of this query and its answers.

In the women's meeting a proposition was considered to appoint a few Friends to work in conjunction with those of the yearly meetings with which we correspond in encouraging our distant and isolated members. Many of these so separated long for the fellowship of those of their own faith and for the friendly words and ways, and it was thought that meetings might be established where companies of earnest Friends reside.

The response to the cablegram sent yesterday was read, calling forth renewed satisfaction that we had added our word to the increasing demand for peaceful methods among all people. The First-day School report was read, showing a living interest in this vital work.

After answering the fourth query an earnest protest was made against the use of the plumage of birds as adornment for hats or bonnets ; against the slaughter of the innocents which must be, that the graceful aigrette may wave over the head of youth or even over the gray hair, thus robbing our orchards and woodlands of sweet singers in following a caprice of fashion. A gratifying expression of unity with these views came from our younger members, which must lead us to believe that a greater care will in the future be exercised. With regard to the enjoyment of the silence of our meetings a Friend expressed the belief that this feeling may be cultivated in little children by encouraging them to review at night the events of their day and see wherein they have fallen short of their ideals of right. This habit of turning to the inward monitor, which the father and the mother are privileged to teach their children, will lead to a reverent attitude of mind and enjoyment of silence. The answers to the fifth query showed that we are generally clear of the use of intoxicants, but a Friend called us to a more faithful care in regard to using wine in cooking, which a few may not yet abstain from. Such use may endanger the safety of our children and lead those in our employ into temptation.

SIXTH-DAY, 19TH.

In men's meeting, the Clerk presented a memorandum, as follows :

"A donation of $100,000 to the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends, held at Race and Fifteenth streets, has been received from the estate of Samuel Jeanes, to aid in assisting Quarterly and Monthly Meetings and isolated members of restricted means, in repairs or construction of meeting houses for Friends of that branch of which he was a member, and who bear testimony to the saving power of obedience to the laws of God in the heart."

A number of Friends spoke in appreciation of the gift and a small committee was appointed to prepare a suitable minute of acknowledgment. The Treasurer was directed to pay the money over to the Trustees of the Yearly Meeting.

The report of the committee to audit and settle the Treasurer's account was approved. The balance on hand at this time is $1,548.62, and the expenditures during the year were $3,637.87. It was recommended that $3,000 be raised during the ensuing year. The committee also recommended Edmund Webster as Treasurer and Alfred Moore and Anna M. Griscom as Correspondents, and Alfred Moore, Franklin W. Hallowell, T. Ogborn Atkinson, Joseph T. Bunting, Anna J. Lippincott, Eleanor Foulke, Cynthia S. Holcomb, and Anna M. Bunting as the eight Trustees of the Yearly Meeting to take the places of those whose terms expire this year, (all are reappointments). The several names were united with.

The sixth, seventh, and eighth queries and their answers were considered. The draft of a general epistle was read and approved, also a letter to isolated Friends.

At the afternoon session, the remaining queries, with their answers, were considered.

The summary answer to the ninth was as follows :

"We believe our members generally have maintained a testimony in favor of peace and arbitration, and against war and the preparations for and excitements to it; against fraudulent or clandestine trade, oaths, and all forms of lotteries and gambling."

In connection with this David Ferris said that if all who bore the name of Friends had been faithful in their testimony against war for the last two years we would not have had the present war.

The draft of a Testimony concerning Peace was reported by the committee and approved, also a minute acknowledging the gift from the Estate of Samuel Jeanes. At about 5.15 o'clock, the Clerk read the closing minute as follows : "Thankful that such a large number of Friends have been again permitted to enjoy the privileges of our annual meeting, and for the love and unity manifest throughout its sittings, we now adjourn, to meet again at the usual time next year, if consistent with the Divine orderings."

In the women's meeting, after the report of the committee appointed to audit the Treasurer's account, it was proposed that an appropriation should be made to the two Southern Schools at Aiken, and Mount Pleasant S. C., and also to Beach Street Mission Philadelphia. After considerable discussion $100 was given to each of these.

The eight trustees whose time expired were reappointed. The gift from the estate of Samuel Jeanes was accepted with appreciation of the benefit it would be in constructing and repairing meeting-houses.

The remaining queries were answered and briefly commented upon.

The voice of thanksgiving was heard as the meeting drew near its close, and grateful hearts were uplifted as the bond of love and sympathy between the younger and the older Friends was realized to have existed among us from day to day.

Amid solemn silence the Clerk read the concluding minute : "Gratefully we acknowledge the constraining power of the love of Christ, under which we have taken counsel together, accepting his guidance. May we walk and not faint, for he will give strength to his people; he will bless them with peace."

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.

(Continued from last week.)

It sometimes happened that the store of Samuel M. Janney & Co., was almost the only one open between the Potomac and the James. But this condition of affairs was no temptation to him to put an exorbitant price upon their goods, or to sell out the entire stock to a speculator. "We must only make a fair profit," he would say, "and not take advantage of the necessities of our friends and neighbors."

As there was always danger of his being taken as a hostage for some Secessionist of prominence, his family felt much less uneasiness about him when he was north of the Potomac. After the battle of Ball's Bluff,¹ the Confederate pickets having been withdrawn for a few days from the Potomac, he went to Baltimore, attended the yearly meeting, and afterwards reached his home in safety. But the next day, while at dinner, he was arrested and sent to Leesburg. Being taken before General Evans of the southern army, the following conversation took place :

"When did you come from Maryland?" "Yesterday." "What did you go for?" "To attend Friends' Yearly Meeting." "Don't you know that your first duty is to your country?" "No, my first duty is to my God." "Why did you not apply for a permit to pass our lines?" "Because I was pretty sure that I could not obtain one."

He was not sent to jail, but was kindly entertained by the wife of a member of General Evans's staff, one of his old pupils.

In Eleventh month, 1864, he again desired to go to Baltimore to meet a yearly meeting's committee.

¹On the 21st of 10th month, 1861, a few miles from S. M. J.'s home.

It was at this time that a "pass" from the President of the United States was sent to him which enabled him to cross the river without difficulty. This little slip of paper, wholly written by the President, and signed by "A. Lincoln," is now a much prized relic in the possession of a grandson who bears his grandfather's name.

In Eleventh month, 1864, General Sheridan issued an order, applying to this portion of Virginia, "to destroy and consume all forage and subsistence, burn all barns and mills, with their contents, and drive off all stock." Among the horses driven off was Samuel M. Janney's riding horse, "Old Bill," then past twenty-one years of age. But at night fall he came galloping home. This horse was taken by soldiers, either National or "Confederate," seven times during the war, but he always managed to get back home. Notwithstanding his age, he was still spirited, and seemed determined not to fight on either side. Many besides his owner were interested in his safety, for at times he was the only horse in the neighborhood to go to mill.

Perhaps Samuel M. Janney's experience at another time in rescuing this horse from the soldiers, may be of interest. It was in the autumn time. The blockade was then so strict that no goods could be brought over for the store. The old stock had been sold out and it was thought a suitable time for the members of the firm to make a little trip into a neighboring county to collect money due them. With "Old Bill" and a light carriage they set forth, reached a friend's house in Fauquier county, (a Union man but a slave owner), where they were kindly entertained for the night. In the morning some of the slave children came running to the house exclaiming, "O! Mr. Janney your horse is done gone! The Yankees have got him!" Sure enough, it was even so. A large scout of Federal cavalry was sweeping through the county, one of the soldiers had a lame horse, and seeing "Old Bill" in the field jumped over and caught him. What were the travelers to do? Fourteen miles from home and no horse! They quickly determined to go after him. Their host lent them the only horse that he had, a condemned artillery horse that had become perfectly deaf from cannonading. He had a very large frame, but was not much more than a skeleton. Like Mark Twain's horse that he used in the Holy Land, this one might also, very appropriately have been named "Baalbec,"—he was "such a magnificent ruin!" But as a matter of fact he was named "Burnside." Our travelers heard firing in the distance, drove toward it, but were soon halted by Federal pickets as a skirmish was going on with "Mosby's men," the famous and dreaded Confederate cavalry of that part of Virginia. They waited by the roadside until the troops returned, and then as six thousand horses,—four abreast,—passed by, they watched for "Old Bill." The writer of this was the first to recognize him, and cried out to the soldier, "Stop! you have our horse!" The soldier replied, "I am very sorry, madam, but you see how lame my horse is." (He was leading it.) It was suggested that they wait until the General, who was riding in the middle of the column, came up. They did so and made known their business to him. He evidently mistook them for rebels, and said with all the authority which attaches to glittering stars, crimson sash, and white gloves, "Come on to Warrenton and I will see about it." As they rode along, following this long column, a part of the rear guard closed around them and behind them, and they were prisoners. And then, as officers began to ride up to the carriage, the occupants were not long in discovering that the regiment nearest them was from Pennsylvania. When they halted for dinner and found out that their prisoner was Samuel M. Janney, what a change! "Why, my father knew you," said one. "And so did my grandfather," said another. "Why you were in our town once, and preached in our meeting-house." "Yes, and my mother knows you, too."

It is needless to add that their horse was promptly returned. The boys gathered around the carriage, offering their assistance, and no "Quarterly Meeting Friends" were ever more hospitably waited upon, and started off on their homeward journey.

This narrative, already too long, ought to end right here. The travelers should have reached the

*Allow Samuel M. Janney, of Loudon Co. Virginia, to pass into and out at Point of Rocks, or Berlin, and go to Baltimore
May 3, 1864 A. Lincoln*

"PASS" GIVEN BY ABRAHAM LINCOLN TO
SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

house of their friend that night. But they didn't. On the return trip they missed a gate and lost their way. A dark night came on,—a large tract of woods was before them, and they were compelled to camp for the night, sitting in their carriage and securing their horses to the road-side fence. The desolateness of that night was never forgotten. The whole country seemed deserted. All of the available men were in the Southern army, and their vast plantations were covered with a luxurious growth of rag-weed. No crops were growing anywhere—no cattle in the fields. The stars came out one by one, and then the moon came up. The ruins of a large stone mansion that had been burned stood a short distance away, and when the open window spaces were flooded with moonlight the effect was startling. It was as if the former occupants had re-visited it, and were holding midnight revels there. No sound, save the baying of dogs in the distance, broke the stillness of that long night, as the travelers kept watch and ward.

Day dawned at last after a sleepless night. In the early morning they found their way back, quite ready for the breakfast which awaited them, having fasted since the morning of the previous day. "Old Bill" survived the war, and lived to be thirty-six years of age, when he was mercifully given a soldier's death.

At the request of his friends, Samuel M. Janney went to Washington to endeavor to obtain redress from Congress for the stock driven off, and the property burned belonging to Union people in Loudoun county. He was very effectively assisted in this arduous undertaking by his valued friend James M. Walker, of Waterford, and his cousin, Charles P. Janney. The live stock had been driven to York, Pennsylvania, sold, and the proceeds of the sale covered into the United States Treasury. It was not until 1872, after much anxiety and labor, not only on the part of this committee, but of others also who rendered assistance, that an Act was passed by Congress appropriating $61,821.13 to pay the loyal citizens of Loudoun county for stock driven off. The property burned under Sheridan's order has not yet been paid for.

Just before the close of the war a raid was made in the county of Loudoun for subsistence for the Confederate cavalry. Horses belonging to other neighbors were seized, harnessed to Samuel M. Janney's wagon, and a colored man in his employ, by the name of Oscar Carey, was impressed to drive. Oscar was a man of more intelligence than the most of his race, and took great delight in using long and high-sounding words. Upon his return he said to his employer: "Mr. Janney, the ignorance of those North Carolinians is something surprising. I approached one of them, one day, and I said to him, 'Sir, can you inform me what are the probabilities in regard to the duration of hostilities?' And, Mr. Janney, if you will believe me, he didn't understand one word of what I said. I just had to come down and ask him how long he thought the war would last."

Whatever may have been Oscar's short-comings, we trust that he is forgiven, for he sheltered in the barn of his employer many a poor hunted fugitive slave, who was trying to find his way to "the north" and freedom. He would privately inform his employer of such arrivals, and he in turn would lay the case before his wife, whose generous, sympathetic heart always responded to these calls in behalf of oppressed humanity. She who would promptly order food to be sent to the barn, when the weary hunted one would, as soon as darkness fell, push on to another station on the "Underground Rail Road."

"Found peace in Love's unselfishness."

(To be Continued.)

To love others is the true counterpoise of our unsteady natures. Towering and infirm self-love is likely to collapse at any moment. The outflow of the heart upon others is in the ordering of God, the most infallible way of securing sanity of mind, as far as right human relations can secure it.—New York Observer.

THE man who has injured you will be the last to forgive you.—The Christian Instructor.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS. 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT

No. 23.—SIXTH MONTH 4.

JOSHUA—THE CONQUEST.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Be strong and of a good courage.
—Joshua, i., 6.

Scripture Reading.—Deuteronomy, xxxii., 1-13; xxix., 43.

THE account of the death of Moses is given in the closing chapters of the book of Deuteronomy. His removal marks a great change in the condition of the people who had followed him. He had been their leader in war, indeed, but far more than this he had been law-giver and prophet. Through him the nation had seen God; by his help they had learned His will. He had stood between them and God's wrath. He had been the chosen instrument for the delivery of God's blessings. He had been priest and king as well as general. There was no one among the Hebrew hosts who could take his place. Only his lowest office could be filled. Joshua, who had been the close and loyal friend of Moses throughout the period of wandering, was capable of leading in war; but the kingly dignity which made Moses the master of men, and the close walk with God which made him stand to the people as God's interpreter, were beyond his power. Because there was no strong man fitted to take the place which Moses had filled in the higher needs of his people they fell apart from each other in their new home, and a long period of anarchy and confusion followed.

The story of the conquest is told in the book of Joshua. Although Jewish tradition did not include it with the first five books of the Pentateuch it shows evidence of the same structure and authorship. "The book divides itself naturally into two parts, the first (Chapters i. to xii.) narrating the passage of the Jordan by the Israelites, and the subsequent series of successes by which they won their way into Canaan; the second (Chapters xiii. to xxiv.) describing the allotment of the territory among the tribes, and ending with the closing events of Joshua's life." (Driver.) In the former section the work is chiefly derived from the prophetic writers of the ninth century (J and E), while the latter section is in the main the work of the later or priestly writer (P). The first chapter of Judges and the first five verses of the second chapter should rather perhaps be appended to the book of Joshua than occupy the present position, since they continue the account of the conquest, dealing chiefly with the successes of the tribes Judah, Simeon, and the sons of Joseph. That this portion of Judges is concerned with a period parallel with and not subsequent to the book of Joshua may be seen when we observe (Judges, i.,) that the Israelites are still at Gilgal, close to the point where the passage of Jordan occurred, while the book of Joshua represents the Israelites as conquering the whole land.

It is not desirable in these lessons to take up the bloody details of the conquest of Canaan. War has not changed essentially in the many centuries that have passed from that day to this. Then as now it involved the breaking up of peaceful homes, the destruction of the toil of years, fire, murder, and pillage. The sword ran as a flame through all the land. We are given to understand that God commanded the utter extermination of the tribes of Canaanites (Joshua, ix., 24), and the historian indicates that with one exception this was accomplished. This exception, the Gibeonites, escaped the general destruction by stratagem (Joshua, ix.). We are given to understand also that the whole army of Israel labored together in the conquest. The conquest of the south is told in the tenth chapter and of the north in the eleventh. The account of the capture of the central portion is much less distinct. Before crossing the Jordan certain Hebrew tribes had requested that their allotment should be on the east side, and after the conquest of the west, and after the general division of the land, they returned to the first-conquered territories to the north of Arnon. This in a general way is the account brought together from various sources of the conquest.

To a writer after the establishment of the kingdom this orderly conquest and division under direct divine supervision seemed no doubt most probable. But the various incidents woven into the tale show that the conquest was much less complete than indicated by the historian. In the account of the conquest by Joshua of South Canaan, henceforward to be called Judæa, the king of Jerusalem is included among those defeated and slain, and the capture of Jerusalem by the tribe of Judah is told in Judges, i., 8. But we know, according to the later story (ii. Samuel), that Jerusalem (Jebus) was not taken until the time of David. Again, in the book of Judges we find that to the tribes of Judah and Simeon are ascribed the conquests which in Joshua are completed under united Israel. The story of the capture of Debir by Othniel (Joshua, xv., 13-20) under Joshua, is told again in Judges, i., 8-15, as occurring after the death of Joshua. The whole story as told by the historian under the late kingdom is rather the ideal conquest which ought to have been than the actual conquest which was.

Taking account of the conditions made plain in subsequent histories (Judges-Samuel), we may be sure that the conquest was at first only partial, and that the spread of Hebrew territory was very gradual. It was accomplished by the movements of individual tribes, as they found themselves in need of more room or as special opportunities favored them, rather than by united Israel. The exact location of the various tribes when the conquest was finally completed cannot be perfectly known. The strong tribe of Judah occupied the south. The tribes of Simeon and Levi were perhaps partly destroyed by the Canaanites in return for some savage act of treachery. The remnant of Simeon either coalesced with Judah or with some of the nomadic Arab tribes of the southern border. The Levites were scattered abroad among the other tribes. The tribe of Benjamin, which was to supply the first king to the Hebrew nation, with the point at Jerusalem, were the strong tribes of the house of Joseph, Ephraim and lay just north of Judah. Separated from the latter by a wedge of Canaanite cities Manasseh. The Danites were first on the slopes of Mt. Ephraim, but afterward (Judges, xviii., 11) sought a home in the north. Some of the tribes of Manasseh, with those of Reuben and Gad, were east of Jordan. The others were in the north of Palestine.

It may be that man must develop physical courage before he is capable of higher virtues. We cannot feel that this period or the one which follows it has any great lesson other than that involved in the slow beginnings of national life. After the comparative peace of the nomadic people we are in the midst of merciless war. After union we see division. But the union which depended on the life of one man is not the kind that makes nations, though it no doubt made possible the more perfect union forced upon the Hebrews in the course of time by the dangers of common enemies. Of this progress we will learn in future lessons.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 23.—SIXTH MONTH 4.

THE CRUCIFIXION.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Son of God, who loved me, and gave himself for me.—Galatians, ii., 20.

Read the Scripture, John, xix., 17-30.

REVISED VERSION.

WE have come, now, to the supreme crisis in the outward life of Jesus,—to his cruel and ignominious death upon the cross. Between the last and the present lesson there are sixteen verses intervening, in which the scourging, the crown of thorns, and the purple garment, are mentioned, and then we have the record of Pilate's hesitation over the sentence, and his struggle with the persecuting mob. He had already said (xviii., 38) that he found "no crime" in Jesus, and again he went out, and said, "Behold, I bring him out to you, that ye may know that I find no crime in him." Jesus therefore came forth, wearing the crown of thorns and the purple garment, and Pilate used the memorable words, "Behold the man!" But still he hesitated, and yet again he declared, "I find no crime in him. Take him yourselves and crucify him."

The contention ended with the delivery of Jesus to his persecutors, and they set forth for the place of execution. Jesus at first bore the cross on which he was to suffer, but, as the account in all the other three gospels states, a man who was in the throng was compelled to carry it for him. The man was Simon, a foreign Jew, "coming from the country,"—from Cyrene, in northern Africa, now a part of Tunis. (It is a tradition that he and his family became Christians.)

The place where Jesus was crucified, it is believed, was the knoll outside the Damascus gate, on the northern side of the old city, which the Jews called Golgotha, the place of the skull. There is, at this place, a peculiar formation of the rocks, which seen at some distance resembles a skull. There has been not a little learned controversy over the matter and various places have been suggested. The Church of the Sepulchre, inside the city, has been claimed to be over the spot. But the place now most generally agreed on is that just described. It is near the grotto called Hezekiah's. The road to the northern country runs near. The name Golgotha is Hebrew, and the Latin name Calvary, (having the same meaning), has become most familiar of all. It is used in Luke, in the old version, but not in the Revised.

It was nine o'clock in the morning when the procession left the place of judgment, and set out on its mournful way. It was three in the afternoon, (such is the suggestion), when the event we are studying was complete. The verses which we have taken from John's account are supplemented in several particulars by the other gospels.

The method of death by crucifixion was to fasten—to nail—the victim upon the four arms of the cross, the upright and the cross piece each in their two sections, and then to raise the cross, and place its base in a hole dug for the purpose. We can hardly endure the thought of inflicting death in such a manner. The victim might linger many hours, in the most intense torment. We may reflect that it is the principle of love and mercy taught, and exemplified by Jesus, which has made it hideous in our eyes to crucify.

While enduring his suffering, Jesus several times spoke, according to the account. He prayed (Luke, xxiii, 34): "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." His mother was witnessing his death, and he said to her, "Behold thy son!" indicating "the disciple whom he loved," John, and added to John, "behold thy mother!" The time passed on, and "at the ninth hour," he cried out in his pain, (Matthew, xxvii., 46; Mark, xv., 34): "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?" Later, he said, "I thirst," and a sponge filled with sour wine, or vinegar, as our translation makes it, was held up to him on a stem of the hyssop plant. He received it, and spoke again, "It is finished." Finally, according to the account in Luke, (xxiii., 46), he cried in a loud voice, "Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit."

These last words have great significance. They may be taken in connection with those which (John, xx., 17), Jesus spoke to Mary Magdalene at the tomb, on the day of the Resurrection. His prayer on the cross was addressed to the Father; he said to Mary, "say unto my brethren, I ascend unto my Father and your Father." The great thought of the Fatherhood of God was thus presented emphatically, in the supremest moments, by the Son.

The narrative of the Crucifixion is meagre in all the gospels, but in the main details they closely agree. It is difficult to add to them, by way of comment, anything that would increase their impressive character. The life of Jesus led up to this end. He crowned his service to mankind by suffering such a death. Whether we choose to look at his death as a purchase of God's pardon, or as a propitiation of God's wrath, or as an act through whose influence God's children are led to him, for the reconciliation (II. Cor., v., 19), which he desires,—in any of these aspects the death on the cross is of supreme import, and justifies the estimate which the Christian world places upon it. Any Christian, whether he think himself "orthodox" or not, can say, "Jesus who loved me, gave himself for me,"—gave up his life, suffered an ignominious and cruel death, in my behalf. He taught by word, and by example, and he crowned all teaching and all action by the final surrender of himself.

It is destiny—and who can resist his fate? It is destiny—phrase of the weak human heart!—dark apology for every error. The strong and the virtuous admit no destiny. On earth guides conscience; in heaven watches God. And destiny is but the phantom we invoke to silence the one, to dethrone the other.—[Bulwer.]

LET a woman once look at her domestic trials as her hair-cloth, her ashes, her scourges—accept them, rejoice in them, smile and be quiet, silent, patient, and loving under them, and the convent can teach her no more; she is a victorious saint.—H. B. Stowe.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

A FRIEND from Waynesville, O., writes: "Our quarterly meeting (Miami), just held, Sixth-day, was very rainy, but Seventh- and First-day were pleasant. Wilson S. Doan was with us on Seventh-day, as were also several of the members of White Water Quarter, this being the time of the meeting of the Representative Committee. Lunch was provided at the meeting-house on Seventh-day of which all partook, ninety-nine in number.

A bi-centennial memorial meeting was held at Abington meeting-house, (Montgomery Co., Pa.), on the 11th instant, at the close of mid-week meeting. It was considered as a commemoration of the two hundredth year of the fine old house,—one of the best in our Society's possession.

The minutes of the monthly meeting show that the erection of the house was in a forward state at the close of Eleventh month, 1697, and auditors "to inspect into the accounts of E. Bolton and Samuel Cairt concerning the building of the meeting-house at Abington," were appointed 25th of First month, 1700. It is evident therefore that the building was finished between those dates.

A historical paper was read on the occasion (11th instant), by William J. Buck.

EARNESTNESS is in itself power. A man who is in earnest in his advocacy of a cause or of a truth has power in behalf of that truth. His earnestness is both impressive and contagious. Even though the truth or the cause would not seem to justify such earnestness, if a speaker thinks it does, and evidences this in his utterance and action, he will be sure to carry with him more or less of his hearers. Until a man is himself in earnest in behalf of what he advocates, he will fail of power as an advocate, even though he represents what is all-important to himself and to others; but when a truth possesses and controls a man, and others see this, then he is a power in its behalf. There is no other such power over our fellows as the power of devotion and earnestness on our part.—Sunday School Times.

THE only final comfort is God, and he relieves the soul always in its suffering; not from its suffering—nay, he relieves the soul by its suffering, by the new knowledge and possession of himself which could only come through that atmosphere of pain.—Phillips Brooks.

To cultivate hopefulness is a duty, quite as much as it is a duty to cultivate morality. It belongs to the Christian's discipline in righteousness. Rational optimism—the optimism of the Christian faith and the Christian spirit—is grounded in the reality and perfection of God.—Philip Moxom.

THE secret of conversational success is to defer to one's listener. A clever man imparts information by asking questions, and obtains it without doing so.—H. S. Merriman.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, FIFTH MONTH 27, 1899.

It is hard to have enough faith, in the presence of trying circumstances. But there have been men and women who did thus have. Bishop Westcott (of the English Church), writing of George Fox, says: "He taught the Friends to trust to principles, and leave consequences to God: to confess their ideal, even when attainment was for the time impossible."

There is suggestiveness for the present time—as for all time—in these words of the Bishop. And it is interesting to note the sentence with which he follows them: "We cannot wonder therefore that the Society of Friends have achieved results wholly out of proportion to their numbers."

THE action taken by Philadelphia Yearly Meeting, last week, concerning the Peace Testimony held by Friends, and in reference, also, to the important work of The Hague Conference, will be gratifying, we are sure, to Friends generally, and to all those, without regard to religious bonds, who desire to see the betterment of the world's conditions. We shall print, of course—a little later—the Testimony and Appeal adopted by the meeting on the general subject. It will be found, we believe, to measure up the line of the testimony held by the Society in the past, and to be adaptable also to the circumstances of the world in the present time. Principles must have their application, if they are to live and have real value.

It was, we think, some time ago mentioned in the INTELLIGENCER that Aaron M. Powell was engaged in the preparation of a volume of his Recollections. The work made good progress during the past winter, and was well advanced when he laid down his pen. His life was one of much interest, and his experiences, in connection with many distinguished men and women, in the anti-slavery and temperance reforms, must make the work, when published, valued by many readers.

HOWARD M. JENKINS sailed on Fourth-day of this week, 24th inst., from New York, in the steamship St. Louis, of the American Line, for Southampton. He may remain abroad long enough to attend the opening sessions of the Friends' Summer School at Birmingham, which begins Ninth month 4.

Correspondence relating to the INTELLIGENCER whether concerning its editorial or its business department, should be addressed, "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia," and not to any of the editors by name, as this is liable to cause delay. Letters for Howard M. Jenkins personally may be addressed to him, as usual, at this office or at his home, (Gwynedd, Pa.), and will receive such attention in absence as may be necessary.

DEATHS.

ANDERSON.—At her home near Morrow, Warren county, Ohio, Fourth month 26, 1899, Jane Anderson, aged 84 years, lacking one week; a member of Miami Monthly Meeting.

She was the widow of John Anderson, daughter of Jonah and Priscilla (Whitacre) Cadwallader, and granddaughter of Robert and Patience (McKay) Whitacre, was born on the next farm to that on which she died, both having been parts of her grandfather Whitacre's large tract of land, on which he settled as early as 1806, near the mouth of Todsfork. She was the oldest of twelve children, only four of whom survive her, and she leaves quite a family of her own children.

The writer hereof paid her a visit a few months ago, and found her excellent company, with mind and memory good. Her situation and some physical infirmities kept her mostly from meetings several of her last years, but at some meeting times, and especially at the time of her last yearly meeting, she would dress as for meeting and sit down in her own home for an hour's communion with her Father and Comforter.

C. B.

COATES.—Fifth month 15, 1899, in Russellville, Chester county, Pa., Ruthanna, relict of Warwick Coates, in the 84th year of her age.

Funeral on Seventh-day, 20th inst., from the residence of her daughter, Susanna Wood, where testimonies were borne by Mary H. Way, Margaretta Walton, Enoch Hannum, and a neighboring minister from another society. A meeting was held in the house at Homeville, when silence was broken by two of the above Friends and Chalkley Webster, of Collamer, and Alice Coates of Little Britain.

The deceased was for many years an acceptable overseer and elder in Homeville Preparative and Monthly Meetings. Thus has gone from works to rewards a fully ripened life, and grain ready for the reaper when the summons came. Remaining children are Susanna Wood and Pusey Coates, of Russellville, and Dr. Truman Coates, of Oxford, Chester county, Pa.

* *

GREEN.—In Philadelphia, Fifth month 19, 1899, after a protracted illness, Cynthia Shoemaker, wife of Benjamin Green; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

HARTLEY.—At her home, in Iowa City, Iowa, Fifth month 15, 1899, Lydia J., wife of Joseph Hartley, in the 63d year of her age.

She had been a member of the Society of Friends for a number of years, having joined the Society, of which her husband was a birthright member, when a young mother, that her children might be brought up within it.

She was a member of the meeting at Benjaminville, Ill., until the family removed to Iowa, and became members of the meeting at West Liberty.

K. P.

HEACOCK.—At Alliance, Ohio, Fourth month 18, 1899, Rachel, wife of Barton Heacock, in the 79th year of her age.

HEACOCK.—At Alliance, Ohio, Fifth month 10, 1899, Barton Heacock, in the 82d year of his age.

Interment at West Friends' burial-grounds, near where they were married, nearly sixty years ago. They journeyed together for years, endeavoring ever to serve their Divine Father and walk in the Christian pathway. They were lifelong members with Friends, and valued elders of West Monthly Meeting. Through life they had many trials as well as pleasures. Of their twelve children only three survive them; they are Clarkson, Isaac B., and William A., who live near Alliance and Beloit.

We feel they have spent useful lives, and now pass from works to rewards, our loss being their eternal gain. She had been in rather feeble health for some years, but her thought was ever to minister to others' comfort and pleasure.

He kept unusually strong and active for his years, but the day following her death he was taken very ill and our Heavenly Father saw fit to take him home too; thus they were separated but a little time, and we in submitting to the Lord's will rejoice that they were spared to us so long.

L. M. H.

KENT.—At his home, near Lincoln University, Pa., Fifth month 3, 1899, Joseph H. Kent.

Deceased was the eldest son of Joseph and Maria J. Kent, the latter for many years a minister in the Society of Friends, and was born Fourth month 3, 1832. He was married Eighth month 1, 1865 to Lydia, daughter of Joshua and Mary Matthews, of Harford county, Md., who passed before him years ago into the spirit land.

Two daughters survive them,—Annie M., in the old home, and Mae, wife of Edwin Newcomer of Philadelphia.

MACY.—At his home in Harveysburg, Warren county, Ohio, Fifth month 7, 1899, Nathan Dicks Macy, aged 85 years, 9 months, 17 days; a member of Miami Monthly Meeting.

He was born in North Carolina, and when about two years old was brought by his parents, David and Sarah (Dicks) Macy, to Ohio. On his mother's side he was descended from the Terrells, the Lynches, the Chileses, and the Clarks, early Friends of Old Virginia. Was twice married—neither wife a Friend—and was the father of our friend Sarah Lukens, of Harveysburg, Ohio, and the grandfather of our friend Charles E. Lukens, of Chicago. Was a man of quiet, industrious habits, enjoyed almost uninterrupted good health; his mental powers were well preserved, and he plied his trade of harness-making till very nearly the end of his days. The second wife, and two daughters by the first wife, survive him. C. B.

OFFLEY.—On Fifth month 30, one year ago, (1898) there passed from earth to the rest of paradise, one of earth's saints, Martha Edmondson Offley.

Compelled by a long and painful illness to exchange a busy and useful life for one of entire inactivity, her patience and cheerfulness were unfailing, and her life continued to all a benediction to the end. None could be with her and not feel the influence of her lovely character and childlike faith, that seemed to surround her as a halo, for "she wore the white flower of a blameless life."

To her devoted children, who can never cease to mourn her loss, what fairer inheritance could she have bequeathed, than the memory of such a mother! To them she will ever be a guide and an inspiration.

"Thy dead, oh bury them
Deep in thy heart, ay deep,
For then, though dead, they'll live
Till thou dost fall asleep.
Yea, in thy heart they'll rise
Again like angels pure,
And o'er the rugged path
Of life, will lead thee sure." M. C. G.

POULSON.—At Chicago, Ill., Fifth month 13, 1899, at the home of her son, Thomas Poulson, Anna Metta Poulson, in the 92d year of her age; a member of Chicago Executive Meeting of Friends.

TAYLOR. In Philadelphia, Fifth month 18, 1899, Marie B., wife of Jesse W. Taylor, in her 84th year.

VALE.—Mary Ann Vale, wife of Isaac Vale, departed this life, Fifth month 2, 1899, aged 83 years, 1 month, and 16 days.

She was the daughter of Asahel and Mary Walker, of Warrington, York county, Pa. She leaves a husband and six children to mourn the loss of a loving, helpful wife and a good Christian mother.

In 1888 they moved near Webber, Jewell county, Kan. Here she resided until an All-wise Providence called her home. Her remains were followed to their place of interment in Friends' Cemetery at Clear Creek, Illinois, by a large number of relatives, old neighbors, and friends. L. L. K.

WALKER.—At his home in Selinsgrove, Snyder county, Pa., Fifth month 4, 1899, Garretson Cook Walker, aged 64 years, 1 month, and 1 day.

He was a birthright member of Warrington Meeting, York county, Pa.; he leaves a wife and three sons, Levi, Lewis, and Asahel. He was the youngest son of Asahel and Lydia G. Walker, and the first one of a family of five to be called home; three sisters, Ruth Anna Bloom, of Curwensville, Pa., Lydia Jane Larew, of Portis, Kansas, Phoebe A. Smith, of York, Pa., and Lewis P. Walker, of Longford, Kan., survive him.

He was a man of meek and gentle nature, knowing the law of kindness; he passed peacefully to rest. A short time before he was called, he raised both hands up, and said, "Oh, I see the gates," and quietly went to sleep. To his oldest sister, Ruth Anna, who was with him a short time before he died, he said, "I have no fear of death; I am ready and patiently waiting for the summons to come." K.

WATSON.—In Brooklyn, N. Y., Fifth month 17, 1899, Caroline M. (Wilkins) Watson, widow of John Davis Watson, formerly of Philadelphia; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, (Race street.)

YEARLY MEETING COMMITTEE REPORTS. FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS.

To the Yearly Meeting:

THIS Committee met and organized soon after its appointment last year, since which time it has held three meetings.

Delegates were sent to the General Conference held at Richmond, Indiana, in Eighth month, whose report at the following meeting was very satisfactory. The papers prepared for the Conference on the subject of First-Day Schools contained many valuable suggestions for practical work. The series of illustrated lessons which were there given were of the best, showing the most careful study of the subject chosen, and the best means of presenting it.

The Committee is mindful that its duties are of an important character, and that their proper performance has an influence for good on the future of our Society; therefore it hears from the seventy-six schools reported as being within our limits with much interest. We find that in general they are working according to their best light and ability, and life and earnestness characterize the work in many even of the smaller schools. In one of the larger sections the committee decided to come into closer contact with the work, and individually or collectively visited nearly all of their schools or communicated with those identified with the cause in the rural districts. In all of them the work goes on with more or less encouraging results. Evidences are not wanting to prove that the seed sown is bearing good fruit, testimony having been borne to the fostering care and strengthening influence that the school has afforded to some.

From one school there comes the assurance that they are growing in the knowledge of their duties as members of the Society of Friends. There is much expression of appreciation in many of the reports of the usefulness of the Lessons Leaves, and allusion is made to the good service done by those bearing upon the principles and testimonies of Friends.

The Circulating Libraries have received an accession of two and now number twelve. Many of the schools express the highest appreciation of them,—one section says: "This system of libraries is heartily commended, their operation it is thought fully demonstrates the wisdom of their introduction."

We are gratified to report the establishment of four new schools within the year, in all of which interested workers are endeavoring to advance the cause, and the four are reported as being in a good condition.

The expenses of this committee have been $187.55, for which draft has been made upon the Treasurer of the Yearly Meeting.

The committee is pained to note that the work seems to be retarded in some districts from a lack of interested leaders. The cry from these quarters is for more to come forward to the service, as the faithful of former years pass on. Still there is a remnant in all which we would encourage with the belief that the Father still cares for his work and will yet raise up those who will carry it on in his name.

Some of the schools are reported to us as small, owing to certain conditions beyond their control; but the few are quietly devoting themselves to duty as they feel it to be, and are full of hope and confidence that no sincere effort for good is ever wholly lost, but will accomplish that whereunto it is sent.

On behalf and by direction of the Committee.

MARY McALLISTER, } Clerks.
ALFRED W. WRIGHT, }

Philadelphia, Fourth month 1, 1899.

EDUCATION AND SAMUEL JEANES FUND.

To the Yearly Meeting:

Seven meetings of our Committee have been held, attended by the greater part of the members thereof, and they have been characterized by that earnestness which is so desirable in a body entrusted with the important work placed in our hands.

Our first duty has been to promote, as far as possible, the cause of education among us, endeavoring to use all available means to this one purpose, exercising a care that in whatever way the funds placed at our disposal may be used they shall ultimately tend to the culture and intellectual strength of our members. We are encouraged to believe that there is a continual advancement in this direction; the earnest endeavor on the part of those in charge of our schools to make them the very best possible, to fill the teachers' positions with good, conscientious persons, competent not only to give the needed instruction, but to inculcate the true principles of morality and uprightness, and to be to those under their care consistent examples of such,—care in these particulars has given to these schools an unquestionable standing for good.

The schools have all been visited by some of the members of this Committee, and we are pleased to report that with a few exceptions they are in a good condition; in the localities where these exceptions exist, the small number of Friends' children, and the excellent condition of the public schools, have made the need of the Friends' school less apparent than in former years. We are also pleased to note that they are exercising great care in raising their standard of usefulness to such a degree as to invite the attention and support of those desiring to place their children where a careful and guarded education can be had. Through the income from the Samuel Jeanes Fund, together with money drawn from the Yearly Meeting treasury, we have been enabled to meet the urgent needs of the schools for financial assistance, and to aid the local school committees to increase the size and efficiency of their schools, greatly to our satisfaction.

We have also exercised a care for those members who are not in close proximity to any of these schools seeking coöperation with monthly meetings, where such cases exist, that their education be not neglected.

A regular course of lectures on scientific subjects has been given to many of the schools, hoping in the near future to reach the remainder; this method has been adopted with a view of obtaining more practical results therefrom.

The Teachers' Class, established last year, has been carried through this with a marked degree of success; twenty-three young women desiring to become teachers have availed themselves of the opportunities afforded, and have rendered efficient aid in many schools by substitute work and filling vacancies therein.

Two educational conferences have been held in Philadelphia, continuing to prove, we believe, of advantage to our teachers, and others interested in them. Assistance has been given to the circulation of the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, to endeavor to place that paper in the possession of such persons as would not otherwise be able to receive it, and we feel confident the money has been well expended.

We have also thought it wise to continue aid to the circulation of Scattered Seeds, to enable the publishers thereof to pursue the lessons for the little ones, having found that they are meeting a want felt in our Society.

Four cases of books are now prepared for the use of monthly meetings and schools desiring them. Much care has been taken, by a sub-committee having this in charge, to place in these libraries suitable books which are in accord with the expressed wishes of the donor of the fund.

As we are enabled each year to meet the requirements presented, endeavoring earnestly and conscientiously to perform the work of the proper disposition of the funds given us, our hearts grow more thankful for the opportunities afforded to our younger membership to obtain a guarded education, sufficient for the needs of their life work; and oftentimes the desire arises in our hearts that it shall not distract the thoughts and attention from the higher duties of life; but that by cultivating the intellect it may open the door to greater usefulness in our Religious Society and deepen a sense of responsibility towards our fellowman.

Orders have been drawn on the Treasury of the Yearly Meeting for the following amounts:

Aid to Schools,	$1,260.56
Teachers' Class,	500.00
Conferences and Lectures,	297.56
Incidental expenses of Committee, .	38.43

Total, $2,096.55

Drafts have been made on the Income Fund, as follows:

Aid to Schools,	$7,525.00
Teachers' Class,	1,250.00
Conferences and Lectures,	707.72
Dissemination of Literature, . . .	710.00

Total, $10,192.72

Orders have been drawn on the Trustees of the Samuel Jeanes Fund for $9,000.

LEWIS V. SMEDLEY, Clerk.

REPORT ON ISOLATED MEMBERS

To Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends :

Copies of the Epistle to our Isolated Members, prepared last year, were mailed to over five hundred Friends. To these nearly eighty replies have been received, and interesting extracts from many of them were published in the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER. About fifty letters were returned because the persons addressed could not be found.

Since then the monthly meetings have carefully revised the lists of their absent members, and as there have been many changes within a few years, it is recommended that the names and addresses be published this year in the "Extracts," as a matter of interest to other yearly meetings, as well as to our own members.

The time is at hand when some plan must be adopted for the organization and oversight of meetings in neighborhoods where several Friends reside, who belong to different yearly meetings; and the suggestion has been made that steps be taken towards the formation of a joint committee composed of members of the seven yearly meetings, which should have such meetings under their especial care.

Respectfully submitted,

ELIZABETH LLOYD,

Correspondent for Isolated Members.

Philadelphia, Fifth month 15, 1899.

PHILANTHROPIC LABOR.

To the Yearly Meeting :

The three general meetings of the Committee on Philanthropic Labor have been held with only a fair number in attendance, although many who are unable to meet with us as a committee are active workers in their localities and give help and strength to the cause there.

Our method of work remains unchanged; being supplemented by the coöperation of committees appointed in nearly all quarters and in many monthly meetings, not only on the subjects we have to labor, but on others; as prison reform, capital punishment, etc.

The communication from Friends' Anti-vivisection Association of London, England, referred to this committee by the late yearly meeting, was read and referred to a committee, who reported that while vivisection may sometimes be justifiable as a means of gaining knowledge not otherwise to be obtained for the alleviation of disease and suffering among mankind, we earnestly protest against this practice for the purpose of teaching or illustrating what is already known; and we are in favor of legislation forbidding its use in our schools and colleges, except in medical colleges under careful restrictions. An acknowledgment was sent to the Association.

The delegates who attended the meetings of the Philanthropic Union held at Richmond, Indiana, last Eighth month, reported that the sessions gave evidence of earnest work done in the past and inspired those in attendance with a desire to labor still more zealously in the future. The meetings of 1900 are to be held at Chautauqua, N. Y.

Orders have been drawn on the Treasury of the Yearly Meeting for $417.76.

INDIANS.

The Indian Committee has not accomplished much in the way of active labor, but they have not been unmindful of the concern committed to their care. Some attention to the general subject of Indian Rights, both individual and tribal, has been given by individual members of the committee, and one large box, containing simple remedies, sewing material, reading matter, etc., has been sent to each of the Field Matrons on the Winnebago and Omaha Agencies in Nebraska. These were paid for from the fund left to the care of the Indian Committee by Benjamin H. Coates. There is always a call for reading matter from the Field Matrons, especially that which is illustrated.

The Philanthropic Committees in the various quarters generally report no attention to this subject during the past year. While the removal of the Indians from the immediate vicinity of our membership has lessened the interest which close intercourse gives, at the same time the committees feel that, so long as there is work to be done in this field, Friends should be foremost in doing it, both individually and as a religious body.

In some of our quarters, Indian children from the Carlisle School find sympathetic homes during parts, and in some cases all, of each year, but aside from this and the comparatively insignificant work of the Indian Committee, Philadelphia Yearly Meeting no longer takes that position in this philanthropic field which for many years it occupied. We desire that the Indian Committee should be strengthened by the hearty sympathy and active support of our membership generally.

TEMPERANCE AND TOBACCO.

The reports show that no change has been made in the plan of work on the subjects of Temperance and Tobacco, the principal feature still has been that of holding Conferences, usually on the first day of the week. These, while not as numerous as in the past, have generally been well attended and instructive occasions, although in some places our members take no interest in them. In some localities, the work has been along the line of preventing of licenses. That this phase of the subject, together with the question of the repeal of all Liquor Laws, should receive more consideration at these meetings, papers are being prepared to be used whenever they are called for, by those having care of the meetings. Literature in the form of tracts and pamphlets has been purchased and well distributed, as we think this avenue still furnishes a way to reach the indifferent and to awaken an interest in these important subjects.

The Societies of Temperance Workers continue their meetings at Girard Avenue and in West Philadelphia in Philadelphia Quarter, but are not so well attended as those actively interested think they should be. The Society at Woodstown, Salem Quarter, discontinued its meetings during the past autumn and winter. If those having charge of children would feel the responsibility of taking them to these meetings, the general interest and benefit would be much extended.

The communication from Clarkson Butterworth, of Indiana Yearly Meeting, referred by the Yearly Meeting of 1898 to this committee, was given careful consideration. As it had reference to labor towards "the repealing of all laws which make the drink business the source of public revenue," the committee, while united that such action was desirable, did not feel that the way opened to act in any other manner than has already been used, of education and calling attention to the prolific sources of immorality the system fosters.

A few practical Temperance lessons for use in the First-day schools and in the Home, prepared by Jesse H. Holmes, were examined and authorized to be printed for distribution.

Letters were sent to Congress in favor of prohibiting the sale of liquor on Government Reservations and in Government Buildings, and in opposition to the repeal of the laws giving prohibition to Alaska.

The communication from the Women's Christian Temperance Union, referred by last Yearly Meeting to this committee, had reference to the scientific Temperance instruction in schools, especially the elementary department. An appeal was sent to the Yearly Meeting's Committee on Education asking it to use its influence to secure at least as great an amount of this instruction in Friends' schools as is required by law in the public schools. To this a favorable reply was made.

A protest in regard to the interpretation of the Attorney-General placed upon the section of the Army Reorganization Bill prohibiting the sale of liquor in the canteen, was prepared and forwarded to the President of the United States, asking him to have this decision rescinded and prohibit all sales of intoxicating liquors according to the letter and spirit of the law.

THE COLORED PEOPLE.

The Sub-Committee on Colored People has continued its care during the year, and realizes there continues to be a field where much is needed to be done, and the laborers are few. The need for education among these people is paramount, and we sent out an appeal as usual to our different monthly meetings, requesting a continuance of aid in money and clothing, for the help and maintenance of the two schools founded by Friends at Aiken and Mt. Pleasant and carried on by the same devoted workers, who are so well known to us.

Reports from several quarterly and monthly meetings have been received, which show that many have responded, both in clothing and money, all of which has been forwarded to the schools mentioned.

One Conference has been held; one night school has been organized and kept up during the winter, and three sewing schools are reported which are doing good work among the colored children.

The committee working in behalf of the colored people at the "Star Centre," situated at Seventh and Lombard streets, Philadelphia, have established a work bureau, through which those who are in need of situations may be brought in communication with those needing help, especially in country districts. This committee reports sufficient encouragement to continue the work. Notes of commendation from employers have been received, as well as expressions of appreciation from the colored people for finding them good homes. There have been eighty-nine applications for help, twenty-five of these being supplied through this committee.

The deplorable race conflict in the South has aroused our concern and impresses upon us even more forcibly the necessity of keeping up the work already begun. We recognize the fact that prejudice against the colored race is the main obstacle in the way of the educated colored people and would call attention to the need of overcoming this by outgrowing it ourselves.

IMPROPER PUBLICATIONS.

On the subject of Improper Publications, six quarterly meetings have reported that an active interest is among us. Six Conferences are reported to have been held.

Magazines and pamphlets have been distributed to bridge-tenders, fishermen, and in barber shops. A barrel of literature was placed on an out-going vessel for the use of the sailors.

A few copies of Scattered Seeds, 25 copies of Dumb Animals and 15 copies of the Philanthropist have been subscribed for and distributed in schools and to individuals.

A report from one quarterly meeting states that one of its monthly meetings has acted upon our suggestion in regard to the distribution of helpful literature; that the committee for the purpose has been instrumental in passing along several numbers of the INTELLIGENCER as well as magazines, also in sending packages of old INTELLIGENCERS, etc., to distant points, the person receiving them being willing to distribute in his locality.

Appreciation is shown by the recipients of this literature, and we trust that some good may result therefrom.

PEACE AND ARBITRATION.

The Committee on the subject of Peace and Arbitration report three regular meetings of the committee have been held during the year, in which they have endeavored to give this subject their most serious consideration.

Since last report we have distributed a considerable amount of peace literature through the medium of the First-day schools, and a circular letter addressed to the respective superintendents, calling their attention to the importance of this subject, especially at this time, when the disastrous war spirit seems to so hold our country under its influence.

Six conferences have been held in Concord Quarter, two in Salem and one each in Abington, Haddonfield, and Western, the latter an all-day meeting. These are reported as having been profitable and interesting occasions.

Fishing Creek reports that the subject has received attention upon the occasion of various meetings by way of readings, recitations, and original papers, and many thoughts thrown out against military display of any kind.

Haddonfield reports a committee appointed to address President McKinley on the importance of appointing delegates to the Czar's Conference for National Disarmament.

Concord reports having sent a letter of sympathy and encouragement directly to the Czar, while Friends in Philadelphia and Salem Quarter sent letters numerous signed expressing their sympathy with, and approval of, his proposition looking toward universal peace.

Our committee has endeavored to emphasize the need for Friends to maintain their testimony against all wars and fightings, believing that there is a better way of settling difficulties than by the inhuman practice of war. We have been anxious to help on the better day when nation shall not take up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more. We have especially desired that in this time of trial Friends might prove true to the great Christian principle of which peaceableness is an evidence, and that, in an appropriate manner, at a suitable time, they might let their testimony be once more publicly declared, with clearness, emphasis, and dignity. The committee has itself taken no action toward such a declaration, and now earnestly commends the subject to the consideration of the Yearly Meeting, hoping that way may open at this time for the renewed presentation of our testimony for Peace to the members of the Government of the United States, and to our brethren and sisters generally throughout the land.

WOMEN AND CHILDREN.

Much individual labor has been reported in regard to work among women and children besides that of the committee. Reports were received from the Friends' Home for Children, Progressive Aid Society, The Northern Association for the relief and employment of Poor Women, Penn Sewing School, Lancaster Avenue Sewing School, the Diligent Circle of King's Daughters, and Female Association for the Relief of the Sick and Infirm, all of which during the past year have been useful and helpful in their respective avenues of work. The need of assistance in both money and workers is felt by nearly all of these associations.

The Beach Street Mission, Philadelphia, was somewhat interrupted in its work during the past winter, owing to unavoidable circumstances in connection with the room. They are endeavoring to secure a room in which to reopen next Fall, but so far have failed to find any place which would answer their purposes at the price which they feel warranted to incur.

The saving fund department has been successfully continued, and effort has been made by visiting and arranging for the usual picnic to hold the interest of the children, and we hope by Fall to be ready to reopen with renewed vigor.

The Home Influence Association during the year have considered the following subjects: "Every Mother a Kindergartener," "The Influence of the Home in Temperance Reform," "The Training of our Children for Citizenship," "Against the wearing of the Feathers of Song Birds," "Our Relations to Servants."

The Boys' Reading Room in West Philadelphia was discontinued during last winter.

PURITY.

On the subject of Purity, in addition to individual work a number of meetings devoted to the subject have been held by many of the Quarterly Meeting Committees which we think have been profitable. A number of copies of the Philanthropist have been purchased and circulated. The "Letters to Fathers" was printed as directed, 5,000 copies being distributed among our members and others.

Accompanying our report is "An Appeal for Purity," which was read at our meeting in Fourth month last and it was united with to forward same to our approaching yearly meeting with the request that it be read therein.

During the last year we have lost by death, Sarah H. Peirce, G. Sherman Potts, Anna M. Green, Catharine A. Kennedy, all of whom were active workers on this Committee, and we feel it proper that we should bear our testimony to their faithfulness to this service, and also to their labors in other portions of the general work of our Society and humanity.

Signed for and on behalf of the Committee.

JAMES H. ATKINSON, } Clerks.
ELEANOR K. RICHARDS, }

Philadelphia, Fourth month 29, 1899.

EVENING MEETINGS, YEARLY MEETING WEEK.

FRIENDS' ASSOCIATIONS' CONFERENCE.

SECOND-DAY evening was devoted, as usual, to the semi-annual conference of Friends' Associations. President Bird-sall, of Swarthmore College, was chairman, and Alice Lee Barnes, of Baltimore, secretary. The minutes of last autumn's West Chester Conference were read and approved.

The chairman outlined briefly the work of past conferences and then introduced the first speaker, Gilbert L. Hall, of Swarthmore Association, who presented a paper on "The Religious and Public Life of William Penn." The paper traced the significant events in Penn's life, from the occasion of his receiving his first vivid religious impressions, at the age of eleven; through his experiences of persecution at Oxford; his return home and his painful difference with his father; his visit to France; his apprenticeship at the law in London; his union with the Friends; his imprisonment, release, and efforts at proselyting; the accusations of popery made against him in the reign of James II.; his work on the continent and in America; the events leading to his death. The paper quoted at length from the letter of Penn to the king of Poland, in which he set forth doctrinal views.

Daniel Willets, of Trenton, opened the discussion which took the direction, later, of an expression of opinion by several in regard to the political and public duties of Friends in the present day. Some felt that the activity of Penn ought, even now, to be taken as an example, inciting Friends to an active participation in practical politics. Others reminded the conference of the changes that have occurred in the conditions under which government is administered. In the colonial days, the members of the Society of Friends composed a considerable majority of the voting population, and it was the natural result that their principles should control the spirit of legislation and administration. The present day brings very different conditions. Friends are scarcely a noticeable element at the polls; their influence must be exerted in other ways. Thomas H. Speakman, William P. Bancroft, Lukens Webster, Charles Paxson, Ellis W. Bacon, Mary R. Livezey, and others, participated in the discussion.

The second paper, "The Holy Experiment in Government," was presented by Dr. Joseph S. Walton, principal of Friends' Central School. "Seldom," he said, "is a man's life such as to make his biography worthy of study from two widely separated points of view. Such a man was William Penn the Christian, and William Penn the statesman. The former thought has occupied the earlier part of this meeting. We turn now to that plan of government, which, it has been declared by some of the world's greatest statesmen, has been a greater influence for good in the history of Pennsylvania than soil, climate, or any physical resource. It was a singular combination of aristocracy and democracy, the former yielding gradually and gratefully to the latter. It was an early setting forth of the principle that correction is only the coarsest function of government."

"In Penn's more radical opinions he was two centuries in advance of his time. He saw the future legislative body of two houses; he had a clear conception of the referendum, of which he secured for Pennsylvania the spirit, if not the form; two centuries before the time of Hamilton, he recognized the need for that distinctly American institution, the Supreme Court, and foreshadowed it in his appellate council of twelve. The eighteenth century lawmakers followed his lead; our present government is full of suggestions that emanate from him; and most of all, its basic principle that government rests on the consent of the governed."

Mary A. Nichols, of New York, opened the discussion on this paper by suggesting the need for purpose in conference, lest it pass into mere devitalizing gossip. Nothing is right merely because Penn did it. Men did not make principles; principles make men. William Penn succeeded for many reasons, but most of all because he had the courage of his beliefs. The major points of his influence may be summarized as: (1) His high ideal of the function of government, (2) His Indian policy; (3) The separation of church and state; (4) The absence of property qualifications for voting. From these four might be derived a multitude of details.

An active and interesting discussion followed, bearing principally upon the relations of Friends to government and politics of the present day. In closing the meeting, William W. Birdsall said: "Failure may be real or apparent. Many a man fails in his own desire and yet succeeds far better than he had planned. Our government is not bad, although bad men have crept into it. It assures us peace, comfort, and safety; a government founded by a man who seems to have seen further than others of his time, and who has given to humanity as much as any other man has ever given. Let us remember with what equipment he did this. He had ability, he had training, he had a soul attuned to the eternal harmonies."

FRIENDS' BOOK ASSOCIATION.

REPORT AND ELECTION OF OFFICERS.

To the Stockholders of Friends' Book Association of Philadelphia:

The Board of Directors in presenting their annual report at this time have the satisfaction of stating that the business of the store shows an improvement in results over the preceding year. The gain is not large and has been accomplished mainly through a reduction of expenses. The balance-sheet presented by the Superintendent shows a net profit on the year's business of $260.34, the "Guarantee Fund" remaining as heretofore at $3,000, and the balance to the credit of "Publication Fund" on closing the books for the year amounting to $1,893.43.

The close competition in business has reduced the profit derived from school-supplies and shows that this item cannot be relied upon to any great extent to maintain the store. The Board again expresses the hope that Friends generally will recognize the importance of the work undertaken by this Association, and show their appreciation of it by an increased patronage of the store.

No new books have been published during the year. Friends' Almanac has been enlarged by fuller information in regard to Meetings and First-day Schools, and by the addition of a list of the Educational Institutions under the care of the Society within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting.

A donation of ten shares of the Association's stock has been made to it during the year, and the Board would again request that transfers be made of stock standing in the names of deceased stockholders.

During the year resignations were received from three of the Directors who were elected at the last annual election, viz, Clement M. Biddle, M. Florence Yeatman, and Alice L. Darlington. Two of the vacancies were filled by the Board by electing Elizabeth Y. Webb and Samuel C. Lambert; one vacancy existing.

Signed by direction of the Board.

SAMUEL B. CHAPMAN, Secretary.

At the annual election held Fifth month 15, 1899, the following Directors were elected to serve for the ensuing year: Robert M. Janney, David L. Lukens, Isaac Roberts, Hannah R. Grubb, Matilda S. Ellis, William W. Birdsall, Samuel B. Chapman, Edward C. Dixon, Charles F. Jenkins, Joseph S. Walton, Elizabeth Y. Webb, and Samuel C. Lambert.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PHILADELPHIA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held 8th of Fifth month. The minutes of the previous meeting were read, and it was suggested that the names of new members be mentioned, after which the minutes were adopted. The History and Current Topics committees had nothing of interest to report. The Literature Committee mentioned that it was holding its meetings at private houses, with the view of increasing the attendance, also there was a number of books it desired to secure. The wish was expressed that the committee should feel free to ask for funds for the purchase of the same.

The Executive Committee of the Building Committee reported that it expected the Association Building would be formally turned over by the contractor before the 1st of Seventh month. It recommended that a house committee be appointed through a nominating committee. The building in due time should be placed in the hands of a house committee, to be composed of not less than five or more than ten persons. It was decided that the exact number to compose the House Committee should be left to the discretion of the nominating committee, which was appointed as follows: Emma Waln, Isaac Roberts, Anna J. Lippincott, Charles Paxson, John C. Craig, Nathaniel E. Janney, Robert M. Janney, Ellis W. Bacon, and Alice P. Chambers, this committee to report at Sixth month meeting of the Association.

It was thought advisable to follow the custom of the past of holding the Sixth month meeting a week prior to the regular time, and it was decided to meet on 5th of next month. The Executive Committee reported the election of William Wright to membership, and announced the program for the evening.

The first paper was a review of the remaining chapters of Frederick Storrs Turner's book, "The Quakers," by Elizabeth W. Collins, member of Swarthmore Association. She summarized and commented upon them in an interesting manner. It was a matter for regret that there was not a larger attendance of members to hear this interesting paper. "History shows that all happenings are guided by the Divine hand. When the human race is prepared to rise higher in the scale of being, God has raised-up some great teacher to make his truths clear to the world. Among such teachers was George Fox. He believed that he was called of God to turn men's thoughts away from an external form of worship to the communion of the individual soul with its Maker. The light within, conscience, moral sense, these are not delusions, but heavenly institutions which God in his mercy has given us to know and feel. There are certain convictions held by the race as a whole which may safely be called self-evident, religious truths, and these are a belief in God, in duty, and of the presence within man of a power which enables him to distinguish right from wrong, to know and to do God's will. The Bible becomes a revelation to the reader as he is enabled to enter into its meaning by the enlightening influence of the Spirit of God. The 'inward light' as ultimate and supreme authority is being recognized more and more, and the life of the human spirit is seen to be in perfect harmony with the Divine."

It was thought if we would bear in mind that Christianity was greater than Quakerism, we would be urged to do all we could for the cause of Christianity. Our attention was called to the fact that Jesus advised his disciples it was necessary for him to go away that the Comforter might come unto them. As long as he was with them to direct them they were not dependent upon the light within their own hearts as we are to-day.

The second number of the program was a review of Fernando G. Cartland's book, "Southern Heroes—Friends in War Time," by Sarah C. Pennypacker. This work is dedicated to those heroes who unswervingly adhered to their religious principles. In the preface the author expresses a desire that the book may be an instrument in the hands of God to convince the minds of many of "the reasonableness of peace and the unrighteousness of war." In the opening chapters an allusion to the career of George Fox is made and to the influence of Quakerism during the settlement of this country. We are told that Southern Friends "moved cautiously in the matter of slave-holding, for much besides monetary interest was at stake."

It seems strange to us of to-day that any members of our Society should need to be educated in regard to the sin of slavery. Care was needed to prevent divisions in meetings, and a separation from the brethren of the North. There was a gradual progress, and in 1758 North Carolina Yearly Meeting issued a minute providing for negroes' meetings for worship. In 1770 another was issued declaring the importation of slaves as "iniquitous" and disapproving of their purchase from traders. In 1786 the entire system was formally condemned and gradually manumission followed, until in 1818 it is recorded "none held as slaves." This state of affairs was gained through pecuniary loss and a lowering of worldly position, for slavery had made equally obnoxious the laborer and those who espoused his cause. It was prophesied that the judgment of the Almighty was coming on the Southland, and Friends were warned to escape. Sometimes whole meetings from Georgia, the Carolinas, Maryland, and Virginia emigrated to the West.

The secession movement in North Carolina was opposed by Friends. The ordinance requiring every free male over sixteen years to appear publicly, and renounce allegiance to the Government of the United States, and to support, maintain, and defend the Confederate States, the alternative being banishment within thirty days, had a peculiar bearing upon Friends in the State. An effort was made to have their cause espoused but to no avail. In 1862 the general trial came, and those who did not serve in the army were fined $500. Many bought their liberty, and the meeting decided to be lenient with such, but some refused to purchase liberty even at that cost. In many cases those who had paid the exemption tax were arrested and forced into the army. The closing chapters of the book are devoted to individual cases of suffering for the principles of peace. The sufferings were such as all martyrs have experienced.

Nathaniel E. Janney, by request, spoke of his personal experience during the Rebellion. He said no one could get any idea of the situation, either by reading a book or by a recital. We were reminded that as citizens of the United States we were paying for the means whereby people in the Philippine Islands are being driven from their homes.

After the usual period of silence, the meeting adjourned.

ESTHER S. STACKHOUSE, Sec'y.

HORSHAM, PA.—Both president and vice-president being absent at the meeting of Young Friends' Association, James Q. Atkinson acted as president for the day. Silas G. Morris read the first chapter of I. James.

A beautiful paper was read by Bessie Walton, entitled, "The Voice of Duty." She told us that Christ is still alive in every bosom, and his presence is manifested by the indwelling voice which we all know is sometimes hard to obey. We should show more sympathy to those around us for, "each good word and each good deed toward our fellow-men is a step upward, while all angry deeds and thoughts are the small beginnings of a ruined life." Susan H. Jarrett remarked upon the truth of this statement and said: "We can never stand still but must always be moving either backward or forward."

William F. Morgan read an extract from the "Life of Christ," relating to the place with which the Saviour is most intimately associated, the summit of the hill upon which Nazareth is built, giving views of the life and feelings of the great Teacher.

Recitations were given by Joshua Paxson, Paul Satterthwaite, and Marguerite Hallowell.

Susan H. Jarrett read a paper on the life of Elizabeth Fry. She was a true student of nature and said, "I love to look through nature up to nature's God." Among the rules of her daily life were, "Never to be irritable," "Never lose any time," "Never err from the truth," and "Never speak ill of a person."

George Parry read "The White Man's Burden," by Rudyard Kipling. Several very good sentiments were given, and the meeting adjourned.

At our next meeting, Fifth month 28, we expect to have Isaac H. Hillborn give a talk on the Tabernacle, to which all are cordially invited.

A. T. J., Sec.

BUCKINGHAM, PA.—Buckingham Young Friends' Association held their Fifth month meeting at Doylestown meeting-house on First-day, the 21st, with about the usual number in attendance. After silence, the president read the 96th Psalm.

The business of the Association was transacted, after which the program for the day was taken up. Lewis W. Fell read from the Discipline as regards "Parents and Children," which was followed by a recitation by Edith M. Atkinson. Samuel Hart, of Doylestown, read a paper, "Should Friends' Testimony against hireling ministers prevent them from attending meeting of other denominations, or from contributing to their collections?" Remarks on the subject were made by Dr. Joseph Foulke, Albert S. Paxson, Mary A. Watson, Thomas W. Trego, and Elizabeth Lloyd. Caroline Fell, of Virginia, then gave an address.

The next on the program was a paper by Albert S. Paxson, "Early Quakerism in Old England." After the usual silence the Association adjourned to meet at Buckingham, on the third First-day in Sixth month.

W. L.

RISING SUN, MD.—On the afternoon of Fourth month 7, West Nottingham Young Friends' Association met in the Friends' Normal Institute, Rising Sun, this place of meeting being more central.

The president opened the meeting by reading the 10th chapter of Mark. The minutes of last meeting were approved as read. After this was the roll-call, many responding with sentiments. There being no deferred business, the regular exercises were then considered.

The first question on the program was "How does Friends' interpretation of the Scriptures differ from that held by other denominations?" Edwin R. Buffington replied that he considered we should each keep within our own borders. That it is not for us to judge others and their connections, but to rely upon the dictates of our own conscience. We each have the same great end in view, and while there may be points wherein we differ, these are not essential. Man being a free agent is at liberty to enter into the religious field of labor trusting to the Intelligent Life within for guidance.

An account of the Doukhobors who are now settling within the borders of Canada, was given by Janette Reynolds.

A paper prepared by Hannah P. Buffington, in answer to the question, "What do we understand by Trine's latest book, 'In Tune with the Infinite'?" was read by Walter R. Buffington. To live in tune with the Infinite is an ideal attainment, but not beyond the actual living when we come to realize our own deific nature as part of the great Infinite. Just as the sun's rays that fall across the floor cannot exist without the great sun itself, in like manner are we rays from the great Infinite.

"What is meant by being true to thyself?" was answered in a very satisfactory manner by Elizabeth R. Lincoln.

A selection, entitled "The Duty of Happiness," was read by Sarah S. Buffington. Many beautiful thoughts were portrayed throughout this.

Time being limited no voluntaries were offered. Under the head of new business, the president appointed a committee of five to appoint officers for the ensuing year.

After observing the usual silence the Association closed.
L. JANETTE REYNOLDS, Sec.

Educational Department.

WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL.

THE Centennial History of Westtown School, prepared under the oversight of a Committee of the Alumni of the School, is now in press.

The authors have had access to the minutes of the School Committee, which are continuous from the date of their first meeting in 1795; they have also received many old letters written in the latter years of last century, and the early years of this, so that the history contains much that has the element of freshness to those of the present time.

The book will contain 200 pages of text, and 56 full-page illustrations, including among the latter many portraits of superintendents and teachers. Among these are Philip and Rachel Price, Enoch Lewis, Elihu Pickering, who resigned his position in 1801, Benjamin Hallowell, and others who have been more recently identified with the school.

The book is issued in commemoration of the Centennial of the school, and it is not the expectation of the Committee to realize a profit from its sale.

In order that it may be within the reach of all who are interested in Westtown history, and the development of education among Friends, the price has been fixed at $1, if left at 304 Arch street, or at 15th and Race streets, or $1.10 if sent through the mail.

As the edition is a limited one, it may be well to order copies in advance. The book will be published early next month. Subscriptions should be sent to Davis H. Forsythe, 26 W. Coulter street, Germantown, Philadelphia, or to Henry Tatnall Brown, 5127 Wayne Avenue, Germantown.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.—The Engineering Corps commenced last week the annual survey of the College property. The work is under the direction of Prof. Stine. Owing to the illness of Dr. Trotter work in the Biological Department has been suspended for the past week.

The regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on First-day evening last. The discussion of the evening was, "Resolved, That Society as composed to-day is Christian." Affirmative, Lucy Bancroft, 1900; negative, Mark Thistlethwaite, 1902. Paper, "Elizabeth Fry," by Alice W. Titus, '90.

MARTIN ACADEMY, KENNETT SQUARE.—The closing exercises of Martin Academy were given in the Friends' meeting-house on Sixth-day afternoon, the 19th inst.

The whole week was a very busy one at the Academy. Regular final examinations began on the 11th and continued until noon on the 19th, except the time occupied in other exercises. The first of these was on Third-day afternoon, the 16th, at 2 o'clock, when the Junior Class, 19 in number, gave a public entertainment. The class did themselves credit. After Scripture reading by the secretary, Helen R. Lewis, and reciting in concert the class Psalm, (the xix.), the program was rendered.

On Fourth-day afternoon the Middle Class gave their class field-day exercises, which consisted of games and other exercises, followed by refreshments.

On Sixth-day afternoon, the 19th, occurred the regular Commencement exercises, when Genevieve Rakestraw, Martie S. Eves, A. Ethel Kindt, and Ethel V. Fox received their diplomas from the Academy. The meeting-house was filled to overflowing with an appreciative audience of friends of the graduates and patrons of the school. The program included essays or orations by the graduates, and an address by Prof. Joseph S. Walton, of Philadelphia.

By an oversight in the arrangement of the calendar the Commencement week was the same as Yearly Meeting week; thus many Friends were deprived of the pleasure of attending. Those in charge of the school were gratified to see so many parents and patrons present.

This ends a very successful year in the history of the Academy. The attendance and grade of work have been very gratifying and encouraging.
S.

SUMMER MEETING AT OXFORD.—The "Summer Meeting" of the University Extension work in England will be held at Oxford, from the 29th of Seventh month to the 23d of Eighth month. Many distinguished and learned persons will take part. There will be lectures on the History, Literature, Art, Science, and Economics of the period 1839-1871. Outline program gratis, full program with lists of lodging-houses, etc., price 20 cents, from John Nolen, Secretary, 111 South Fifteenth street, Philadelphia. Tickets and all information from J. A. R. Marriott, M. A., University of Oxford.

LITERARY NOTES.

THE next number of the Popular Science Monthly will contain an article on "The Philippine Islands and American Capital," by Prof. J. Russell Smith, of George School. It deals with the Islands question strictly on the economic side. It opens with a discussion of the prosperity the United States has enjoyed. There is then a comparison of the Philippines with tropic America, a region which we can profit by without politically controlling. The aim is to show the great superiority of this region over the Philippines, so that there is no industrial reason why we should desire to control them, even if they came to us free of their many burdens of all sorts.

McClure's Magazine for next month will contain an account of Marconi's latest and most marvelous experiments in telegraphing without wires (especially in telegraphing across the English Channel), prepared by Cleveland Moffett with Mr. Marconi's own assistance. It will describe popularly all the apparatus and methods employed, and will be fully illustrated from photographs taken expressly for McClure's.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

SOME COLONIAL MANSIONS AND THOSE WHO LIVED IN THEM; With Genealogies of the Various Families Mentioned. Edited by Thomas Allen Glenn. Vol. I. 9½ x 7¼ ins. Pp. xix. and 459. $5.00. (Illustrated.) Philadelphia: H. T. Coates & Co.

QUAKER CAMPAIGNS IN PEACE AND WAR. By William Jones. 7¾ x 5¼ ins. Pp. xiv. and 412. Price 6 shillings. (Illustrated.) London: Headley Brothers.

SILVERTON TALES. By Alice Brown. 7½ x 5¼ ins. Pp. 339. $1.50. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

THE QUEEN OF THE SWAMP AND OTHER PLAIN AMERICANS. By Mary Hartwell Catherwood, 7¼ x 5 ins. Pp. 331. $1.25. Boston: Houghton Mifflin & Co.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

JOHN WILHELM ROWNTREE and Alfred Neave Brayshaw, the two Friends from England, who have been visiting in this vicinity, attended Yearly Meeting, last week, until Fourth-day near noon, and then took train for the West. They expect to be back in England in the early part of Eighth month. J. W. Rowntree is a member of a well-known Friends' family at York, England; his uncle, John Stephenson Rowntree, was for some time the Lord Mayor of that city. A. N. Brayshaw is a teacher in the Bootham Friends' School, at York.

The list of those in whom the readers of the FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER are interested, who are going across the Atlantic this summer, seems to be quite a long one. Besides a number who have been mentioned, several others are going whose names have reached us. Among these are Anna J. Lippincott and Susan W. Janney, of this city, and Benjamin F. Penrose, wife, and two friends, of Cheltenham, Montgomery county, (Pa.).

The Committee formed in Philadelphia to support the purposes of the Disarmament Conference has designated Dr. George Dana Boardman and Howard M. Jenkins as delegates to attend at The Hague, and in conference with others there to forward the movement for International Arbitration in any way that may be found practicable. Dr. Boardman, with his wife, expects to sail in a few days. The credentials for the delegates are signed by ex-Senator George F. Edmunds, chairman of the Committee, John H. Converse, vice-chairman, and George Gluyas Mercer, secretary. It is the expectation of H. M. Jenkins that he will reach The Hague sometime in advance of Dr. Boardman.

COMMUNICATIONS.

CITIZENS: NOT FIT FOR CITIZENS!

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

UNDER our Constitution, we cannot keep citizenship from those who are born in our territory, and yet among the extraordinary reasons given for the proposed retention of the Philippine Islands is that the inhabitants are unfit for self-government. That is, they, or at least their children, are to be made citizens of the republic for the reason that they are unfit for American citizenship! Our "imperialists" are weaving a tangled web for us. E. A. R.

Crosswicks, N. J.

FROM A. D. MUNRO.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I have to-day received word from Anna Jackson, that she has sold the Wilkes' county bond, which has so long been in her possession. I am anxious, that our share should be placed with the one thousand dollars which we have toward our Endowment Fund. We need only $362, to finish up our term, and I am sure, with a little effort, that can be raised. We are doing all we can to bring it about, and ask our friends to do the same. Some have quite unexpectedly come to our aid within a few weeks, and shown a great deal of interest, for which we thank them most sincerely. Will not others do the same, that when we close our school-room door, we may be relieved of anxiety and be ready for the rest which we so much need?

ABBY D. MUNRO.

Mt. Pleasant, S. C.

BOND SOLD FOR COLORED SCHOOLS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

The North Carolina (county) contributed by Aikens Palmer to the New York Committee on Education of Colored People in the South has been sold for five hundred and seventy dollars ($570). It is the hope of the committee that this money may be added to the Endowment Funds of the Laing and Schofield Schools. It is to be given half to each school.

ANNA M. JACKSON, Sup't.

FRANKLIN T. CARPENTER, Treas.

ENDOWMENT FOR THE LAING SCHOOL.

FROM a private letter from Abby D. Munro, we take the following extract on a subject that should appeal to Friends as being essential if this excellent school is to have a continuance. She says:

"There has certainly been more general interest manifested in our work this year than for several years. Funds have come in more freely than last year, and more concern on the part of the patrons seems to be felt. It seems to be a growing realization that we need an Endowment Fund, and I hope that matter will be well agitated. It is our only hope for the future. My days for extra work are over, I think. That is, I cannot go on through winter and summer without stopping. I shall have to call a complete halt for rest through the summer months, and it seems to me my work wouldn't be half as hard if there was less anxiety in regard to the funds. It would not take a very large fund to relieve us almost, if not entirely."

OUR EXAMPLE.

WE scatter seeds with careless hand,
And dream we ne'er shall see them more;
But for a thousand years
Their fruit appears,
In weeds that mar the land,
Or healthful store.

The deeds we do, the words we say—
Into still air they seem to fleet.
We count them ever past;
But they shall last;
In the dread judgment they
And we shall meet!

—Keele.

OUTLOOK.

NOR to be conquered by these headlong days,
But to stand free; to keep the mind at brood
On life's deep meaning, Nature's altitude
Of loveliness, and Time's mysterious ways;
At every thought and deed to clear the haze
Out of our eyes, considering only this:
What man, what life, what love, what beauty is,—
This is to live, and win the final praise.

Though strife, ill fortune, and harsh human need
Beat down the soul, at moments blind and dumb
With agony, yet patience! There shall come
Many great voices from life's outer sea,
Hours of strange triumph, and, when few men heed,
Murmurs and glimpses of eternity.

—Archibald Lampman.

A CHAPTER OF INDIAN HISTORY.

THE burdens which the average white man bears for the Indian is illustrated just now in the "throwing open" to settlement of the reservation of the Southern Utes, in south-western Colorado. There has been a struggle to drive the Indians,—a small tribe, about 1,000,—off their reservation onto poorer land, for many years, and the Indian Rights Association has more than once helped defend their rights. They had a good Agent, a resolute and unpurchasable man, named "Dave" Day, one of those who by good deeds really do take up others' burdens, who helped the progressive part of the tribe to secure allotments from the better land on the mountains. The Washington correspondent of the New York Evening Post, (Francis E. Leupp, who is very familiar with Indian affairs), speaking of this, says:

"Colonel Day grasped the situation at a glance, and took pains that his Indians should understand it also. The pros and cons were fully and fairly set before them, and in order that those who felt uncertain about adopting the white man's ways should not be frightened off by the novelty of it all, he pledged himself to stand by and instruct in agriculture and home-making any of the Indians who accepted allotments. He also declared to them that as far as lay in his power he should see to it personally that the Indians were fairly treated in the distribution of land, and that they should get the very cream of all on the reservation.

"The Indians who knew him best believed him, and the proportion of the tribe who agreed to take allotments and become citizens was so large as fairly to paralyze with alarm the little gang in Durango, who had been plotting against them. Day kept his word to the letter. He knew in advance what it would cost him to do so; for his old neighbors, finding that they could not use him, declared a boycott against him, trying to break up his business, and make the place socially as uncomfortable as possible for his family. This last feature of the war waged upon him had as little effect as the other, for Mrs. Day shared her husband's clear grit, and preferred to see him go down with his flag flying than have him surrender to the gang. His bondsmen applied at Washington to have their names taken from his papers; but Secretary Hoke Smith had some backbone, too, and he reminded these fellows that bonds were not obligations to be wilfully thrown aside any more than to be lightly entered into. Charges of all sorts were brought against the agent in the mad struggle to get rid of him; but he invited the fullest investigation of each one, and the official report invariably cleared him. When the commission to allot lands was appointed, the friends of the Indians in the East insisted that Day himself should be one of the Commissioners, and he was appointed. He was thus able to carry out all his promises to the Indians, and when the survey was finished, and the lands distributed, the Utes had the best of everything.

"Meanwhile the non-progressives had been moved off into the diminished reservation, where they continued their tribal life. Congress, in response to persistent appeals, in which Day joined, made an appropriation looking to giving these Indians a better water supply, for the diminished reservation was a pure alkali desert. It is safe to prophesy that in a few years, if irrigation shall in the interval have caused this arid and forlorn region to blossom, a descent will be made upon it by the same class of citizens who succeeded in getting the eastern end of the reservation opened to white settlement. It would not be surprising if the next form taken by the scheme should be the crowding of the Indians down into that part of the diminished reservation which lies in New Mexico, thus clearing Colorado of all Indians still maintaining the tribal relation. New Mexico, being a territory only, has no vote in Congress and no share in the presidential electorate. It has already the Navajos, a number of Pueblo Indians of various names, and at least two tribes of the Apache nation. The general movement now in Indian affairs is towards putting the Indians as far as possible into the few remaining territories, and as soon as one of these territories becomes a State either moving the Indians out of it or throwing open their lands either wholly or partly to white settlers."

PLUTOCRACY IN ENGLAND.

Saturday Review, London.

WHILE the children of the Morning are periodically laid low by epidemics of cholera or bubonic plague, we of the West suffer from a moral malady scarcely less dangerous and far-reaching in its effects. Like many other undesirable innovations, this fever for making money quickly is of transatlantic origin and growth. In a country with no aristocracy, no traditions, and no sense of proportion, it is natural that riches should command a respect which no other qualities are present to inspire. It were an affectation to pretend to despise lucre, and absurd to involve all its possessors in one sweeping condemnation. At almost every epoch in the world's history, notably amid the culture and materialism of ancient Rome, as also in the palmy days of the Grand Monarch, money has been rated beyond its intrinsic value. It is only the rarest exception, such as a Castilian grandee, a Blanc d'Espagne, or a Highland gentleman, whose character is proof against the melodious charm of clinking gold.

Without austerity, however, we may be permitted to enter a protest against the monstrous lengths to which the present plutocracy is being carried, particularly in view of the degrading and demoralizing influence which it must have upon the nation. There are in England so many far more fascinating idols, that it is inexcusable to neglect them all in favor of the golden calf. Even the apotheosis of physical force were preferable, despite many concomitant evils. This country would appear to have drifted into a mental attitude comparable only to that which obtained at the time of the South Sea Bubble. The example of a few fortunate men, possessed of neither knowledge nor genius nor any advantage other than a modicum of low cunning, is inspiring a dangerous emulation on every hand; the sober and industrious are abandoning their honorable toil, which has contributed to the edifice of our national prosperity, undermining their character, and imperilling their integrity. In a few cases, no doubt, a successful stroke brings them in more than they could hope to earn by years of patient effort, and it inspires them and their neighbors to fresh risks of the same or probably of a more dangerous nature.

But it stands to reason that when the gains of speculation are merely an abstraction from the pockets of the losers, there must be far more disappointment than realization. And the winner degenerates even faster than the loser. His sudden rise is comparable only to that of an imprudent aeronaut. He grows giddy in the unusual atmosphere; his head swells until it seems almost as though it must burst; he loses all sense of proportion; and when he returns at last to solid earth, it is a long time before he is fitted to resume his former avocations.

German Children Drinking.

It appears from an investigation lately carried on by the authorities of Bonn, Germany, that, out of two hundred and forty-seven pupils of the age of seven in the primary schools, there was not a single one who had not drunk, at some time or other, wine, beer, or brandy; while twenty-five per cent., although never tasting brandy, habitually drank beer or wine. Eight per cent. of the children received glasses of brandy from their parents, "to make them strong"; while some even were confirmed cognac drinkers. The New York Times, in reporting these facts, adds that it was also ascertained from this inquiry at Bonn, that "the more children are accustomed to alcohol, the more indolent are their mental processes," which certainly is what we should expect.

—Fifteen hundred deaths have occurred recently in the famine stricken districts of Russia.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE Conference invited by the Czar assembled at The Hague, the capital of the Netherlands, on the 18th instant, that being the Czar's birthday. The place of meeting is one of the queen's palaces, called the Huis den Bosch, (the House in the Woods), two miles from the city of The Hague. M. de Beaufort, Netherland Minister of Foreign Affairs, opened the meeting. M. de Staal, Russian Ambassador to Great Britain, was appointed president of the Conference. Both made formal addresses. The session on the 18th lasted but twenty-five minutes, and was very harmonious; "the apparent unanimity displayed was considered to augur well for the outcome." Nine secretaries were appointed. It was decided that the sitting be secret.

A SECOND session was held on the 20th. A dispatch said that the assignment of subjects and committees for the Conference indicate that mediation and arbitration are to be given the first place in the work of the Conference, and that the advocacy of this subject will fall principally upon the British and American delegates. The efforts to make the laws of war as humane as possible will take second place, and disarmament third place.

THERE are indications, on the surface, at least, that the German Emperor is unwilling to appear to discourage The Hague Conference. On the 18th, at Berlin, at a luncheon "in honor of the birthday of the Emperor Nicholas," he gave a "toast," saying: "With the toast to the Czar's health which I propose every year with heartfelt sincerity, I would to-day couple my hearty good wishes upon the opening of the conference at The Hague, which owes its origin to his Majesty's initiative."

He then spoke to the Russian ambassador in much the same strain. He referred to the "identical instructions" given the Russian and German delegates to the Conference.

A DISPATCH from The Hague, 22nd, announced that the chiefs of the delegations to the Conference had agreed upon the presidents of the various committees, and they would be announced the following day. "The opinion is gaining ground that substantial results in the cause of arbitration and humane rules for warfare will be accomplished by the Conference."

THE United States Philippine Commission at Manila, on the 22nd instant, submitted to the Peace Commissioners from Aguinaldo a draft of the form of government which President McKinley is prepared to establish. According to this plan, a Governor General and Cabinet will be appointed for the islands by the President, and later an Advisory Council will be elected by the people. Major General Otis has refused the request of the Filipinos for an armistice, and the military operations against them continue.

MANY letters from United State soldiers in the Philippines have now been published in newspapers in different parts of the country. They repeat, over and over, the statement that in different actions "no prisoners were taken," all Filipinos being killed. The Topeka, Kansas, Capital, admits this to have been the case, on the authority of a number of Kansas soldiers, and justifies it by saying that the Filipinos would not yield. It says that at the battle of Caloocan, (early in Second month), "costly experience having taught the General commanding that these insurgents [the Filipinos] could not be trusted, he gave an order to shoot all prisoners." A returned volunteer, Morrison, interviewed by the Denver News, on the 15th, says: "The soldiers do not take any prisoners if they can help it. If an officers is not about, the soldiers kill all they can draw a bead on. There are many cases where details of soldiers have taken prisoners out to dig holes for the dead niggers, and the soldiers made them dig their own graves also, and then shot them. It looks cruel, but you ought to be over there."

IT seems that some of the soldiers whose letters have been published making these disclosures, have "got into trouble" over them, and some have written to their relatives asking that no more be made public. The Colorado volunteer, Morrison, quoted above, says the officers "do not allow the men to see some of the newspaper articles."

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY, on the 20th instant, after a conference with Secretary Alger, cabled instructions to Governor-General Brooke at Havana to proceed immediately with the distribution of the $3,000,000 to the Cuban troops in accordance with the understanding reached with Gen. Gomez that surrender of arms to the various municipal authorities would be accepted.

A DESTRUCTIVE fire occurred at Dawson City, in the Klondike region, on the 26th of last month. The loss is variously estimated at from $1,000,000 to $4,000,000. The inhabitants of the town are reported in great distress. One hundred and eleven buildings were destroyed. The fire, it is reported, occurred at 3 o'clock in the morning. Owing to the fact that logs and canvas were the principal material from which the buildings were constructed it spread rapidly. An unsuccessful attempt was made to extinguish the blaze before an alarm was sounded. The fire was caused, it is said, by the accidental upsetting of a lamp.

A DISPATCH from St. Petersburg on the 19th instant, says: The Czar presided yesterday at a meeting of the Council called to discuss the question of abolishing transportation to Siberia, on the ground that it had become prejudicial to the interests of the country and was a serious obstacle to the progress of Siberia. As an outcome of the deliberations the Czar ordered a commission to meet for the purpose of considering the question of substituting another penalty for transportation to the Siberian mines.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

A HOT SPRINGS, Va., dispatch says it was officially stated there on the 17th that "President McKinley has not yet given consideration to the subject of an extra session of Congress." The President and wife returned to Washington from Hot Springs on the night of the 20th.

—Henry Probasco, of Cincinnati, who has expended an estimated $700,000 in charity and philanthropic work, is living in a rented house and supporting himself on a meagre salary as an officer of a cemetery company. Among his gifts was a $120,000 fountain for Cincinnati, a $10,000 fountain for Clifton, a suburb of that city, and $30,000 to an Episcopalian church in that suburb.

—The thirty-fourth anniversary meeting of the National Temperance Society, held in New York City last week, and presided over by President Joshua L. Baily of Philadelphia, dealt particularly with Attorney-General Griggs's interpretation of the anti-canteen law. The board of managers of the society will petition President McKinley to revoke the order of permission.

—General Ludlow, Military Governor of Havana, has cancelled the grant made to Count O'Reilly by the King of Spain a hundred years ago, under which the Count and his heirs had the right to collect 50 cents for each head of cattle killed at Havana. The heirs were receiving about $150 a day under the concession.

—Mrs. Lydia Bradley, founder of the Bradley Polytechnic Institute at Peoria, Ill., has deeded all of her property in Peoria county to the institute, making a gift estimated at more than $1,000,000. Mrs. Bradley a few years ago provided twenty acres of ground and $500,000 for buildings and equipment.

—Prof. N. P. Gilman, author of "Profit-Sharing" and "Socialism and the American Spirit," is preparing a volume on employers' institutions for the benefit of workmen, which will be issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., in the fall, under the title "A Dividend to Labor."

—A despatch from General Otis, at Manila, on the 17th, said of General Lawton's operations against the Filipinos, that "he had constant fighting, inflicting heavy loss and suffering." There were a "few casualties" among the United States troops.

NOTICES.

 A Circular Meeting under the care of a Committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting will be held at Middletown, on First-day, Sixth month 4, 1899, at 3 o'clock.

MARY P. HARVEY.

 The Friends' Book Association acknowledges receipt of the following contributions to the Children's Country Week Association:

The "Seek and Save Band" of the Second Presbyterian Church, Germantown, $7.00
A Friend, 3.00
A Friend, 2.00
The Misses Blanchard, 100.00

Amount, $112.00

JOHN COMLY, Superintendent.

Fifth month 22, 1899.

 The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting-house at Stanton, Del., on First-day, Fifth month 28, 1899, at 2.30 p. m.

Subject, "Temperance." To be addressed by Joseph S. Walton.

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

 A Conference under the care of the Philanthropic Committee of the Yearly and Quarterly Meetings will be held in the meeting-house at Fallsington, Bucks county, Pa., on First-day, Fifth month 28, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. The meeting will be addressed by Prof. F. H. Green. Subject, "Temperance."

SUSANNA RICH, Clerk.

 Friends desiring accommodation at the meeting-house, or elsewhere, during New York Yearly Meeting, please communicate with

ELLA B. McDOWELL,
226 East 16th street, New York City.
or ELIZABETH B. CAPRON,
White Plains, N. Y.

 Quarterly and Yearly Meetings will occur as follows:

FIFTH MONTH:

- 25. Bucks Quarter, Buckingham, Pa.
- 29. New York Yearly Meeting.
- 30. Burlington Quarter, Crosswicks, N. J.
- 31. Southern Quarter, Easton, Md.

 The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has made the following appointments for Fifth month:

28. Broad Creek, Md.

On behalf of the Committee.

MARTHA S. TOWNSEND.

It is impossible to run at an altitude of 17,000 feet above the sea.

It has been found in Switzerland that in building a railway laborers could work only one-third as long at a height of 10,000 feet as a mile lower.

The latest census of England gives the list of female teachers as 130,000—three times as many as male teachers. About 35,000 women are engaged in the postal service, 4,500 in printing offices, and 4,721 in mines.

Of every 100 Prussians more than 34 (34.4) have accounts in savings banks. There are altogether 7,642,977 such accounts. In 28.48 per cent. of the cases, however, the amount deposited is under $15. The value of the deposits is 4,967,000,000 marks, or more than a billion dollars.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMAN
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR } Cincinnati.
ROCKFORD }

ATLANTIC
BRADLEY } New York.
BROOKLYN }
JEWETT }
ULSTER }
UNION }
SOUTHERN } Chicago.
SHIPMAN }
COLLIER }
MISSOURI } St. Louis.
RED SEAL }
SOUTHERN }

JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.
MORLEY
Cleveland.
SALEM
Salem, Mass.
CORNELL
Buffalo.
KENTUCKY
Louisville.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

He gains wisdom in a happy way who gains it by the experience of others. In painting why not avail yourself of the advice of those who have had the greatest experience—the painters.

Competent, practical painters everywhere use Pure White Lead and Pure Linseed Oil. They know they cannot afford to use anything else.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

YELLOWSTONE PARK, UTAH AND COLORADO.

The date of departure from Philadelphia of a party for an early summer tour to the Yellowstone National Park, Utah, and Colorado is Fifth-day, the 8th of next month (June). After a week in the Yellowstone National Park, there are to be interesting visits to Butte, Montana, Salt Lake City, Utah, and Glenwood Springs, Manitou, the summit of Pike's Peak, and Denver, Colorado. There will also be a party on the same date for the Park and return. These tours are so planned that those participating in them will get home in time for the opening of the summer season at our eastern resorts. A book giving all particulars of these early tours will be sent to any address without cost by Raymond & Whitcomb, 1005 Chestnut street, Philadelphia.

STOP-OVER TICKETS.

STOP OVERTS AT PHILADELPHIA, BALTIMORE, AND WASHINGTON ON PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD THROUGH TICKETS.

In addition to its excellent train service, the Pennsylvania Railroad offers the traveler between New York and Chicago, and New York and St. Louis the privilege of a stop-over of ten days at Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington. This stop-over is granted on all through first-class tickets reading via those cities. Persons desiring to stop-over must deposit their ticket with the station agent immediately on arrival.

To those who have business to transact in these cities, or to persons who have never visited the National Capital, this privilege is a valuable one, and should appeal to all through travelers between New York and the West, and Chicago or St. Louis and the East. The stations of the Pennsylvania Railroad are centrally located in Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, and access to any section of the cities is easy, by either the regular street car lines or by the Pennsylvania Railroad cabs, to be found at the Philadelphia and Washington stations.

GEORGE B. COCK, Telephone 1-42-25 D.

LAW
CONVENTION } STENOGRAPHER.
SCIENCE }

14 South Broad Street, Philadelphia.
Residence, 216 W. Coulter Street, Germantown.

Desirable Silks at Low Prices

An offering of carefully selected Silks—the dependable kinds, such as are always found at these Stores—and at the lowest prices possible for high-grade qualities:

Wash Silks—of good quality, as low as 40 cents a yard.

Corded Wash Silks—the most popular patterns in single and cluster cords, on grounds of blue, pink, lavender and gray. Very stylish—at 50 cents.

Japanese Silks—of light weight, but very strong; in a great range of patterns—stripes and figures on various colored grounds. Superior qualities at 55 cents a yard.

Twenty-five styles of 24-inch Black Figured India—a bright, rich quality—in large assortment of medium and small designs; has been considered exceptional value at 75 cents; here at 65 cents a yard.

A fine, soft-finished Black Satin Marveileux—the right weight for present season—well worth $1.25; here at $1.00.

Two numbers of 26-inch Black Surah—double warp, fine twill, the correct silk for a cool gown or shirt waist—at 85 cents and $1.00 a yard.

White Habutai Silk—27 inches wide—very heavy and glossy, and well worth 75 cents—here at 50 cents a yard.

Black Taffetas—a worthy quality—at 48 cents a yard.

Samples sent upon request.

Mail orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 3, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 22.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXII.

THE Divine Son lived a human life, died, and rose again, for the behoof of every other son in human form, that he might bring them to the Father's house and arms.

From "A Remarkable Faith," by "Three Friends," the chapter on "God our Father."

DON'T WORRY.

WHY shadow the beauty of sea or of land
With a doubt or a fear?
God holds all the swift-rolling worlds in his hand,
And sees what no man can as yet understand,
That out of life here,
With its smile and its tear,
Comes forth into light, from eternity planned,
The soul of good cheer.
Don't worry:
The end shall appear.

—Elizabeth Porter Gould.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

THE meeting of ministers and elders convened on Fifth month 27th, at the usual place, at 15th street and Rutherford Place, under a solemn covering of Divine Love. While life was manifested in an unusual manner during the sittings, as evidenced by earnest discussion when questions of interest claimed attention, this sweet feeling of unity was not disturbed. Cyrus W. Harvey, a Kansas Friend with a minute from the Wilburite branch, was welcomed, and greetings were heartily extended to Margaret Howard, of Philadelphia, who was present with a minute, and also to Lydia Price from same meeting, present without minute, as were also John J. Cornell and wife, of Baltimore.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS.

The thirty-first annual meeting of New York First-day School Association was held that evening, with Edward Cornell as chairman and Amy J. Miller secretary. The calling of representatives from the eighteen schools comprised in the meeting showed fifty present; the reports showed the total membership to be 493, with an average attendance of 345. Nearly all are in session during the entire year. The report of the Executive Committee showed $380.00 collected during the year, with a balance on hand of $143.09. There are now thirteen circulating libraries, which seem to fill the needs and are much appreciated. Plainfield pays school-tax for one scholar at Laing School.

The epistles from Baltimore, Illinois, Ohio, and Indiana were read, and after comments on them the meeting closed.

FIRST-DAY MEETINGS.

On First-day morning the Conference Class met at 10 o'clock, led by Henry Wilbur, who, after reading the lesson, left it with the class. Much interesting matter was voiced by Esther Barnes, John Shotwell, Frances Williams, Edward B. Rawson, Anna K. Way, and others. John Shotwell said the way of the transgressor is hard in politics as in other places, for surely he who sins (at the polls) shall as surely die. Frances Williams spoke of the first sermon of which we have any record, viz, "If thou doest well, shalt thou be accepted; if thou doest not well, sin lieth at the door." Let us take as a pattern him who went about doing good to the bodies as well as to the souls of men. If we can in truth say the Lord's Prayer, we can not harbor resentment or anger when we ask forgiveness for our sins. Esther Barnes said that conscience is the lamp from which Divine Light shines, and when this is kept clear then are we at peace with God and man.

At 11 o'clock the regular meetings for worship were held, both in New York and Brooklyn. The former was opened by feeling thought on the subject of prayer; following which John J. Cornell gave a strong doctrinal discourse on four heads,—first, "What is religion?" He defined it as "a life lived in conformity with and obedience to the highest conception of Divine law." Second, "How obtained?" He showed that this was by direct unfolding of God's spirit to our own, through the medium of Christ's spirit within and our yielding to its guidance." The third question, "What is its object?" he answered by saying that it is "to save man from the commission of wrong, for he cannot of himself direct his steps aright." Its effects he declared to be good works, for it is declared "by their fruits shall ye know them." If, then, man is saved from commission of sin here, then will there be no need of pardon in the life to come. The many of quiet life, who have not the temptations which assail those out in the world, show a patient, cheerful endurance of suffering which is just as much a true living. "Other sheep have I not of this fold," said Christ, and this must make us charitable toward all men. Though there are certain laws to which all must conform, there may be morality without religion, but there can be no religion without morality. The evidence we give of the life we live is the proof of what we are.

Lydia Price spoke helpfully concerning a condition of discouragement she felt to exist, bidding all to leave the dead past and look to the living present and the golden future. Arise and clasp the hand of Infinite Good and press forward. What we term blasted hopes may enrich, deepen, and broaden our life, and prove stepping-stones by which we may rise to higher things.

At Brooklyn Meeting, Edwin L. Pierce, of Philadelphia, opened with prayer, and Cyrus Harvey spoke at length, and very acceptably.

In the afternoon a union of the First-day Schools of the Yearly Meeting was held. Amy Willets presided; the 100th Psalm was given in concert by all children, following which Amy Willets spoke of the possibility of growth, and of the circumstances in the life of Jesus: he felt that he must be about his Father's business, and so shall we by following his example be enabled to "make a joyful sound unto the Lord." Selections were given by the various schools, following which a member of Manasquan School recited "Somebody's Mother," and the "Legend Beautiful" was given by a member of Chappaqua School. The New York afternoon school lightened the exercises by singing. A talk by Edward Cornell was readily appreciated by the children, and all schools joined in reciting "Shares."

At 4 o'clock meeting John J. Cornell was the first speaker, taking as his text, "I am the Way, the Truth, and the Life," showing how this may be put into practical operation. Following him Cyrus Harvey gave a strong sermon to substantiate the faith we uphold, declaring Friends to be a priesthood of believers, with the law engraven on our hearts, for He said, "I shall pour out my spirit unto all flesh." Salvation is solely by faith, doing away with all rituals, sacraments, and outward forms. Only by believing on the human as well as divine side of Christ can we fully live, for by denying the human, we leave him out of touch with human frailties and weakness, denying his sympathy with and understanding of humanity. Margaret Howard said that "all are children of God, but the consciousness of sonship makes happiness."

The evening was devoted to a meeting of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn, a report of which is given elsewhere.

SECOND-DAY, FIFTH MONTH 29.

Women's meeting opened with words of loving counsel by Esther Barnes. The representatives sent by constituent meetings were found to be all present except six, four of whom sent good reasons for absence. Minutes for Margaret Howard, a minister, and Anna R. Way, her companion, both of Philadelphia, were read, and words of unity and welcome were accorded these and other friends present without minutes. Frances Williams compared this gathering to a gathering around the Lord's table, and exhorted all to gather up the fragments and take them home to smaller meetings that nothing may be lost. Marianna Chapman desired that each builder of this spiritual house shall cheerfully bear her burdens, that it might be beautiful in God's sight when yearly meeting ended.

A minute for Cyrus W. Harvey was read and recorded. Sarah M. Haviland felt that this visit came with no uncertain sound, and meant a cementing of brotherhood. The minutes of the previous yearly meeting were read, following which the epistle from Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was read and elicited words of appreciation, especially as regards the committee on isolated Friends and the establishment of meetings.

It was felt to be a privilege that Philadelphia Friends should have had the sad and holy joy of being with Aaron M. Powell when he was called from us. Mention was also made of his last words, which so truly expressed the motive of his life.

As Nine Partners Half-Year Meeting feel their present apportionment of quota burdensome, the work of revision was referred to the Auditing Committee, men and women uniting in judgment. The subject of furnishing entertainment for all who come to yearly meeting was discussed in both meetings, and a joint committee was appointed to decide the question, as a complaint had been received from the smaller meetings regarding the expense.

In men's meeting the routine business was the same; John J. Cornell explained his presence without a minute as due to his absence from home during the time of his monthly meeting. The epistles from Genesee, Ohio, and Indiana were read.

On the opening of the afternoon session, Thomas Lawrence spoke of a feeling of sadness due to vacancies, realizing that not again would the living presence of Aaron M. Powell be felt. He seemed to be something of an Elijah, said the speaker, engaged in every phase of good work; and it was questioned, Is there any one that can utter the request that Elisha did, "I pray thee, let thy mantle fall on me"?

The report of the Visiting Committee was given. Henry Haviland feels that perhaps some meetings have grown dependent upon visiting Friends, and become religiously lazy. The epistles from Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Illinois were read. Henry Wilbur felt it was a most encouraging thing to say in epistles that we are maintaining our principles. He deprecates the fact that there is a tendency to separate religious and secular affairs; if we cannot apply religion and spirituality to temporal affairs, religion is as sounding brass.

In women's meeting, in the afternoon, the report of the representatives gave Emily P. Yeo her former place as clerk, and Amy Willets that of assistant clerk. The Baltimore epistle was read, and the report of Book Committee given. The meeting then entered upon the consideration of state of Society by answering the first, second, third, and fourth queries, showing an encouraging view. Anna Way felt that we should observe the times and seasons of spiritual refreshment just as much as times for physical refreshment, to keep normal health. Elizabeth Stover felt that we do not find in meeting just what we need, forgetful that the fault is ours since we comprise the meeting.

Frances Williams believes "free gospel ministry" means giving freely of what is received, even though it be a crumb. There is doubtless many an Ananias and Sapphira who takes away from the meetings that which should be left there.

The proposition from men's meeting to join with other yearly meetings in appointment of a committee to look after isolated Friends and establishment of meetings, where practicable, met with great unity, and a joint committee was appointed, and meeting adjourned.

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.

(Continued from last week.)

WHEN the Emancipation Proclamation gave freedom to the slave, and all legal hindrances to their being taught were swept away, no one was more prompt to inaugurate the movement of opening schools for them than Samuel M. Janney. He gave notice among the colored people of his neighborhood that they might meet at the little red brick school-house, which stands on the meeting-house green, in the capacity of a Sabbath School. Forty men responded to the invitation. The women had to wait. On the next First-day there were seventy-five and they were taken up-stairs on the men's side of the meeting-house. A week from that time the number had increased to one hundred and fifty, and both sides of the house, up stairs, had to be appropriated. All were men,—no room for women yet,—blackboards were brought in and teachers of all ages volunteered their services. It was a novel sight to see a class of a dozen big men, striving so patiently to learn the alphabet, which was being taught them by the dear little granddaughter Clarissa, a sweet child of some eight summers. She has long since joined the "innumerable throng" but her memory is cherished by the colored people of Lincoln with a touching constancy.

Samuel M. Janney's next thought was for the establishment of day schools for the colored people. His wife donated the ground and the stone for a school-house and the colored men supplied a part of the labor. There being no public schools in the county at that time the funds were lacking to carry it on. Long Island Friends generously came to the rescue, and furnished the money for the salary of the teacher and the building of the house.

Of course it was necessary at first to employ white teachers. Isabella Skillman, of New York, was one of the early teachers of this school. It was a sight long to be remembered to see this lovely young woman moving about in the school-room, with a quiet dignity and a charming manner that secured for her the most profound respect from the forty colored men who were her pupils. She seemed to them so like an angel of light that had been sent to them that they almost worshipped her. Upon one occasion, when the snow lay deep upon the ground, and it was thought imprudent for their teacher to walk to the school-house, they came in a body to her home, and informed her that they had made a "wide path" for her with their feet, and that "now Miss Belle could go."

If she, who walks with the angels now, can look down upon the scene of her former labors, she will behold an enlarged building, with competent colored teachers, a graded school, and nearly one hundred boys and girls striving for an education which was denied their ancestors.

In the spring of 1869, Samuel M. Janney was appointed by President Grant to the position of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, for the Northern Superintendency (the State of Nebraska), with headquarters at Omaha. The acceptance of this office was a deep trial to him, and nothing but a sense of duty, and a heartfelt interest in the Indians, could have induced him to exchange the quiet of his comfortable home for the vexatious care and laborious duties of the place. When he announced to his wife, upon his return from Baltimore, that he had, with her consent, agreed to accept the office, a member of the family inquired what salary was attached to it. He replied: "I really did not think to ask; but in Washington I was given the information."

He went to Omaha in Fifth month, 1869, and his family followed a few weeks later. For the two and a half years that he spent in Nebraska his labors were constant and arduous. He never refused to listen to delegations of Indians who visited his office to lay before him their grievances, nor was he ever neglectful in making an effort to obtain redress for them. During one winter he spent several weeks in Washington, where with the assistance of the Friends' Indian Committee, he was able to get a bill through Congress to pay the Winnebago Indians $232,000 which had been wrongfully taken from them years before.

TO-HEE, OMAHA INDIAN.

Just before entering upon the duties of his office as superintendent, a murder of a white man named Edward McMurty was committed on an island in the Platte river, and near the Pawnee Reservation. Four Indians of the Pe-ta-how-e-rat band of the Pawnee tribe, named Horse Driver, Little Wolf, Blue Hawk, and Yellow Sun, were accused of the murder. The story of this case will show how difficult it is for an Indian to have justice meted out to him. When they were taken to the jail in Omaha, one of the officials said: "Why, this is not the right Blue Hawk! There is another Indian in the tribe of the same name; he was the one to be arrested. This Blue Hawk is a very good man." "Oh well!" the constable replied, "It does not make any difference, his name is Blue Hawk; one Indian will do as well as another."

It was generally conceded that Yellow Sun was the guilty one, and during their imprisonment of twenty-two months, the other three Indians would have nothing to do with him, saying that he was the author of all their trouble. They would not sit on the same side of the cell, or eat with him. When the superintendent visited the jail, as was his custom on First-days, it was pitiful to see Yellow Sun kneel at his feet, clasp his knees, and look up in the most imploring manner, mutely asking protection. As the evidence was only circumstantial, the Indians were finally released on bail, their agent Jacob M. Troth, and the superintendent becoming their bail.

It is an interesting fact in connection with old Yellow Sun, that years and years before, he had a young brother of whom he was very fond. The boy was lying on the grass by the roadside, when a young white man coming along, who was desirous of trying his new pistol, shot the young Indian dead. Yellow Sun never forgot it. No doubt he sought revenge by shooting McMurty.

The superintendent's visits to the jail were much appreciated by the other prisoners. At one time he told them that he would not be there to hold a meeting on the next First-day. "Oh! Mr. Janney," said one of the women prisoners, "the day is so long when you do not come."

His brother, Asa M. Janney, to whom he was devotedly attached, was Agent for the Santee Sioux. One First-day when Samuel M. Janney was at this Agency, he was invited to hold a meeting for the Indians, in the Episcopal Church. The rector of the church translated his sermon and prayer, sentence by sentence, into Dakota. A young Indian presided at the organ, and another acted as usher. Both men and women wore the dress of civilians. The meeting was a very impressive one. At the close of the service the Indians requested their agent (who was about to leave them) to stand at the door, in order that all might take him by the hand and say good-by.

A brief description of the scene at the payment of an annuity to the Winnebagoes, may interest some of the readers of this article. All around the house on the grass, either standing or sitting, in little groups, were many of the men, women, and children of the tribe, which numbered about thirteen hundred. They were attired in the gay, fantastic dress of the Indians, consisting of leggings, moccasins, blankets, and robes, without any covering for the head except ornaments of feathers, tails of animals, plumes, etc., which they considered indispensable when in full dress. They are very fond of rings, and some had twenty or thirty on each hand. Among the variety of ornaments for the ears was that of two or three brass thimbles strung one above the other. Another had come into possession of some clock-wheels, and had converted them into ear-rings. Many of the squaws had papooses, either strapped on a board, or carried in blankets on their backs. In the Council House, sitting in a half circle and according to rank, were the chiefs of the tribe, some twelve or fourteen in number; Indian policemen in uniform were also admitted to preserve order.

The Superintendent and his clerk together with the Agent, Howard White, had places assigned them at a table in front of the chiefs, with the money before them. Nearby stood the interpreter, Mitchell St. Cyr, a half-breed, whose duty it was to call each name. Then the "Crier" for the tribe, named Standing Buffalo, who was stationed at the door and whose voice was something stentorian, would shout the name to the assembled crowd, and the proper Indian would come forward to receive his money.

TO-HEE IN CIVILIZED DRESS.

It was sent him from Philadelphia, by Friends.

Crowds of them were huddled about the windows, peeping in, with eyes and mouth wide open with astonishment to see a "white squaw" helping to count such a "heap" of money. And away over the many little hill-tops of that beautiful rolling prairie, still came the Indians on their fleet little ponies, with hair streaming and blankets flying in the wind,—presenting altogether a picturesque sight long to be remembered. The entire day was occupied in making "the payment."

(To be continued.)

It is easy in the world to live after the world's opinions, it is easy in solitude to live after our own; but the great man is he who, in the midst of the crowd, keeps with perfect sweetness the independence of his character.—Emerson.

POETRY comes nearer to vital truth than history.
—Plato.

HOME LIFE IN COLONIAL DAYS.¹

It was an excellent idea in the author of this book to give, in connection with her intelligent and animated description of old-time life, an array of pictures of real old-time things. There are nearly one hundred and fifty of these illustrations, and we are assured that they are in every instance "from real articles and scenes, usually from those still in existence."—"From the lofts of woodsheds, under attic eaves, in dairy cellars, out of old trunks and seachests, from mouldering warehouses," she has gathered articles which represented the Colonial days,—“strangely shaped bits, and combinations of wood, stuff, and metal.”

That is, they seem strangely shaped to us, now. But to our great grandparents they were familiar, and seemed most reasonable and natural. The use of some of them, indeed, reached down "within the memory of those now living," and they do not seem so queer, so "quaint," after all, to such as can remember half a century or more backward. There is, for example, a picture of candle-dipping, and that did not quite go out of fashion in southeastern Pennsylvania until near the time of our civil war, when coal oil began to be plenty and cheap. There are candle-moulds, too, and the snuffers on the tray—no extinguisher, apparently—and these all were companions of the tallow candle. We can remember, too, the "Dutch oven," the warming pan (which is still cherished and even used), the porringers, the apparatus for carding and spinning, and many other things here shown, which, though they were probably "Colonial," did not cease to be used until the colonies had become States and had gained a respectable age.

Mrs. Earle begins her study with consideration of the homes of the colonial people, and gives several views of old houses, one of them, the Fairbanks House, at Dedham, Mass., built in 1636, almost a century earlier than any dwelling we have left standing in Pennsylvania, except the little Letitia House, set up in Fairmount Park, which dates from 1682. Of these pictures of old houses we remark that nearly all of them are from New England, the exceptions being one or two from Virginia, and one, the Suydam house, Bushwick, Long Island (built 1700). Pennsylvania has no representatives, though some good ones might be had. There is another remark, also, which is germane,—that these houses are all of well-to-do people, except a single log-cabin of a very poor type. There are still to be seen, within fifty miles of Philadelphia, or less, some well preserved log houses, quite habitable, built no doubt a considerable time before the Revolution.

We might remark, too, as to Mrs. Earle's domestic utensils, household furniture, and out-door tools and implements, that they are very largely those of the region east of the Hudson, and while many of them are typical, some are provincial. The extensive collection which Henry C. Mercer has gathered and is still gathering, at Doylestown, Pa., in the charge of the Bucks County Historical Society, and which promises to become one of the most interesting and valuable historical exhibits in the country, would offer to the observer a good many articles not known in New England. That region of thin soil, harsh climate, and spare diet has always had much to learn of the Middle States in regard to good living. John Adams, when he came to Philadelphia in 1774 to attend the first Continental Congress, was amazed and indeed dismayed at the eating and drinking that went on in the houses to which he was invited; and the accounts we have left us in the diary of William Black, the Virginian, who came here in 1744, show that well loaded tables were the rule thirty years before John Adams's alarm for his digestion, as they had been undoubtedly much earlier still.

No generalization can be made concerning the book under notice that would do justice to its mass of interesting details. Mrs. Earle has patiently gathered a vast amount of material, and a great merit of her work is that she has presented the facts with precision and accuracy. A fatal defect of much of the writing done about social conditions is that it is vague, sketchy, and inaccurate. In this study of the subject, the pictures and descriptions of the tools, utensils, etc., hold us to the point. She treats of the homes of the colonists, the houses; of the manner in which they were lighted; of "the kitchen fireside"; the serving of meals; food "from forest and sea"; a whole chapter is devoted to Indian corn; another to flax culture and spinning; and one to wool culture and spinning; one to hand weaving; others to girls' occupations, to dress, to travel, transportation, and taverns; to the observance of "Sunday," to "colonial neighborliness," and to old-time flower gardens.

It is evident that in dealing with subjects such as these, the abundance of detail forbids citation more than a spoonful out of the sea. Every chapter is interesting. That on the cookery of corn is from the New England standpoint, and we are told of "corn porridge," but the word mush is not used. No one in this part of the country would call mush corn porridge; indeed the word porridge is hardly known. "Pumpkin bread," Mrs. Earle says—half pumpkin, half Indian meal,—was early used in New England, and "is eaten in Connecticut to this day." The squash is a native vegetable, its name Indian. "Beans were abundant, and were baked by the Indians in earthen pots, just as we [in New England] bake them to-day." The potato came into use slowly; a farmer of Hadley, Mass., raised eight bushels in 1763, and thought he had a great crop. Apple-trees were promptly planted by the first settlers, and in Maryland (as elsewhere) twenty years after they came "the fruitful orchards" were conspicuous.

We can assure our readers that if they wish to study "old times" intelligently, and to get a clear idea how Americans, especially those east of the Hudson, really lived in the Colonial time, and somewhat later, they cannot do better than to add to their pleasure as well as their knowledge by an acquaintance with this admirable book.

BELIEVE me, the talent of success is nothing more than doing what you can do well; and doing well whatever you do.—Hyperion.

¹ Home Life in Colonial Days." By Alice Morse Earle. Illustrated by Photographs gathered by the Author. New York: The Macmillan Company, 1899.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS. 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

NO. 24.—SIXTH MONTH 11.

BOOK AND PERIOD OF JUDGES.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord raised up Judges which delivered them out of the hands of those that spoiled them.
—Judges, ii., 16.

Scripture Reading.— { Judges ii., 6-23.
iii., 1-5.

LIKE the preceding books of the Bible the book of Judges, though historical in form, is plainly written with a purpose which is ethical rather than historical. The writer has gathered together the stories of the Hebrew heroes belonging to the age immediately following the conquest, and has set them in a kind of formula; "The children of Israel did evil in the sight of the Lord . . . and served Baal. Therefore the anger of God was hot against Israel and he sold them into the hands of . . . the king of Mesopotamia" or of Eglon, king of Moab, or of Jabin, king of Canaan, or of another of the various oppressors who successively gained power over the Hebrews. And then, after the punishment had been sufficient, "the children of Israel cried unto the Lord," and "the Lord raised up a deliverer who delivered them." This formula is used to introduce the hero-tales of each of the so-called "judges," many of whom were, however, noted only for some special exploit of daring, and were by no means recognized as in authority by the tribes in general.

As indicated previously, the first chapter of Judges and six verses of the second chapter are of the nature of an appendix to Joshua, and were evidently added by a later hand, since they do not at all fall in place with the rest of the book. The remainder of the second chapter and six verses of the third form a general introduction to the tales which are to follow. This and the formulas already mentioned were probably written in the seventh century before Christ, incorporating the much older hero stories; and these most probably date from the period of special literary activity in the ninth century before Christ, at which time appeared also the writings (J and E) which were afterward included in the Pentateuch. The period of Judges falls mainly between 1200 B. C. and 1000 B. C., the latter date being about that of the founding of the kingdom under Saul.

From the introduction (Judges ii., 6 to iii., 7) it is plainly to be seen that the conquest of Palestine was by no means so thorough and conclusive as indicated in the book of Joshua. In some parts of Palestine no doubt the Canaanites were exterminated or driven out; in others they were defeated and reduced to slavery. But in other cases the results were less decisive. The Hebrews and Canaanites lived side by side. They mingled and intermarried. While finally, instances are not lacking, as in the case of Jerusalem, where the Hebrew invaders were repulsed altogether. Taking the land as a whole, then, the children of Israel were everywhere brought into permanent contact with the Canaanite civilization and with the Canaanite religion, the former indeed being more developed than their own. In passing from nomadic life to the more settled duties of agriculture they had much to learn from their predecessors; and this learning could not be confined to matters of agriculture solely. With the Semitic peoples religion has close contact with all things else. A government divorced from the church would be incomprehensible to them; the idea of separation of business life from religious life would be an impossible one. The God of the Hebrews to the mass of the people was the God of the desert wanderings. The monotheistic idea which had impressed itself so strongly on their leader had not deeply influenced them. Moreover, even Moses had probably not grasped that idea in its fullness. Even in the ten commandments we find the recognition of the existence of other gods—the commandment being that they shall not be served: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me." Also in the so-called "song of Moses" we read "they provoked Him to jealousy with strange gods . . . they sacrificed . . . to gods whom they knew not, to gods that came newly up, whom your fathers feared not." The idea that gods were especially attached to lands was a very common one among Semites. So when the Hebrews came to work side by side with the Canaanites they were easily led to pay worship to the gods of the fields they had taken. In so doing they did not, from their own point of view, desert their own Jehovah. They continued to do homage to him, but added to their time-honored worship the sacrifice to the overruling powers of their new home. In many cases they doubtless had their tribal God in mind in the new forms, and considered themselves as merely changing the manner of their worship and not its object. This change would perhaps have been of slight importance if the God of the Hebrews had been of like kind with the gods of the Canaanites. But as we have tried to impress in preceding lessons, the distinguishing feature of the revelation as given to Moses was that God is a righteous being and demands personal righteousness of his worshippers. It is not meant that this revelation was given to no others of the religious thinkers of ancient days. We have noticed in a recent lesson that the same idea appears in the words of the Gentile prophet Baalam (Micah vi., 5-8). But in no other case among Semites, or indeed in all the world, was this idea made fundamental and all-important. Consequently the resort to the worship of the Canaanites, with the adoption of its immoral and degrading ceremonies, involved the loss of all that gave special importance and value to the religion of Israel. If the worship of Jehovah was to be separated from personal responsibility for conduct, from self-command, what was left was in no way superior to the worship of the Canaanites. And the strength of Israel lay in its unity; its unity was wholly bound up in the community of religion. Therefore when they lost, even in a measure, that common bond, they were not able to hold their position against their enemies. When they forgot their God and served the Baals and Asherahs, then Jehovah was incensed against them and sold them into the power of their enemies. This lesson of the necessity for unity had to be repeated many times. Some of the stories told in emphasis of this lesson will be taken up in future lessons, in which also we will see the progress toward political unity.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

No. 24.—Sixth Month 11.

THE RESURRECTION.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I ascend unto my Father and your Father, and my God and your God.—John, xx., 17.

Read the Scripture, John, xx., 11–20.

REVISED VERSION.

THE remaining verses of the chapter from which the last lesson was taken should be read. They describe the closing scene, after Jesus had yielded up his spirit, the application to Pilate by Joseph of Arimathea for the body, its preparation for burial, and the interment in Joseph's "new tomb," in a garden near the place of Crucifixion. The first ten verses of the chapter from which the present lesson is taken describe the visit of Mary Magdalene to the tomb, the discovery that the stone had been rolled away, her summoning of Peter and John, and their entry into the tomb, where they found the grave clothes lying, but the body gone. The two disciples went away, but Mary remained.

It is worthy of notice that John, "the beloved disciple," who wrote the gospel which has been called the "Gospel for Christians," refers to the Resurrection with much fuller detail than any of the other three gospel writers. As the most spiritually minded of the friends and disciples of the Master, his account thus has special claim upon us. That Jesus arose, that he passed by "translation" from the physical death which is the common lot, into a new life, in the form, and perhaps in the very flesh, in which he had been appearing, teaching, and acting, is the obvious meaning of the account. In the early time of the Christian church this was regarded as of the highest importance, since it signified to doubters the crowning miracle, possible only to one who could actually and physically triumph over death.

In his first epistle to the Corinthians, (Chap. xv.) Paul has elaborated the Christian teaching of his time on the subject, and in the course of his explanation has left to us many passages of remarkable beauty and spirituality, (used often in the ritual of churches), which have brought comfort to many in the hour of bereavement. He declares that "it," the person, the entity of life, is "sown in weakness" but is "raised in power." "It is sown a natural body; it is raised a spiritual body," he says, and he adds that, "flesh and blood cannot inherit the kingdom of God; neither doth corruption inherit incorruption." He employs the beautiful and expressive figure of the grain which is cast into the ground, and which dies that new life may come up.

It was a grand and comforting promise which fell from the lips of Jesus, when he said: "Ye shall know the truth and the truth shall make you free." The freedom which comes through the truth has, among its many blessings, also made those who accept it and follow it free from the fear of death. Jesus did not overcome by abolishing death, but he taught men, both by word and by deed, that life and love have the greater and more enduring power, and that in the glorified life beyond the grave there shall be neither sorrow nor the power of death. "I am the resurrection and the life: he that believeth in me, though he die, yet shall he live: and whosoever liveth and believeth in me shall never die." (John, xi., 25, 26). In all the ages there has been but one voice that has brought such a message to the human soul,—the voice of the Holy Spirit through Jesus.

We need to firmly hold the great truth of which the Resurrection is the type. To all these come, and must come, seasons of sorrow for others departing, and the one season of supreme experience for themselves, when they must yield up their stewardship and depart into another country. When those we love pass from us we need to hold fast our faith in the immortality of the soul.

Alas for him who never sees
The light shine through his cypress trees:
Who hopeless lays his dead away
Nor looks to see the light of day
Across the mournful marbles play;
Who has not learned in hours of faith
The truth, to sense and flesh unknown,
That Life is ever lord of death,
And Love can never lose its own.—Whittier.

We need to hold it fast that we may the better comprehend many of the hard, sometimes bitter, experiences of this life. We need to have faith that this life is but a time of preparation, of discipline, of development of character, for a higher, purer, holier life beyond. Only in and by this faith can we understand the mystery of our present life, or even faintly apprehend its deep significance. We need, above all, to make a part of our inner life the truth declared of old, yet ever new, that "in the way of righteousness is life, and in the pathway thereof there is no death." We may quote again from Whittier:

Suffice it if—my good and ill unreckoned,
And all forgiven through Thy abounding grace—
I find myself by hands familiar beckoned
Unto my fitting place:
Some humble door among Thy many mansions,
Some sheltering shade where sin and striving cease,
And flows forever through heaven's green expansions
The river of thy peace.

THE WESTTOWN CENTENNIAL.

MANY of our readers will be interested in the one hundredth anniversary of the establishment of Westtown Boarding School, which is to be celebrated there on Sixth month 10, 1899. The Committee in charge gives through the columns of The Friend this kindly invitation:

A cordial invitation is herewith extended to all old scholars, their husbands, wives, and children, and others who have been identified with the School, to participate in this occasion and to become members of this association, whether now connected with our religious Society or not. Those specially interested in the subject of education among Friends are also invited. All who have contributed to the Westtown Centennial Memorial Fund are particularly invited to be present.

Ample preparations are being made to care for and entertain a very large gathering (about three thousand people). Everything needful for the day, including tent, conveyances, and a substantial luncheon will be provided by the Westtown Old Scholars' Association, without charge. A prominent feature will be the presentation of the Westtown Centennial Memorial Fund. There will be addresses by entertaining speakers. The school buildings and grounds and specimens of the handiwork of the scholars will be on exhibition.

Please extend this invitation to any who should attend, but who may not have received it.

On behalf of the Board of Managers of the Westtown Old Scholars' Association. SAMUEL L. ALLEN.

SOMEWHERE the things that try us
Shall all have passed away;
And doubt and fear no longer
Impede the perfect day.—A. C. Shaw.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 3, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer" same address.

NATIONS AS "NEIGHBORS."

LET us hope that one of the results of the Conference at The Hague may be the broadening out of international good feeling. The participation in the Conference by the smaller nations, as well as the larger, is a hopeful feature; in past times it has been too much the rule for the "Powers" to dispose of the others according to their own ideas of their interests.

A powerful persuasive against the quarrels and wars of nations would be the existence of a greater degree of kindly feeling between the peoples who compose the nations. Whether we name this feeling Human Brotherhood, and endeavor by some expansive growth of our Christian sympathies to take all mankind into our regard, or whether we simply labor to remove the prejudices which people in one land very commonly entertain against people in another, and to establish instead the truth that if every nation has its imperfections, all have also points of excellence,—whichever way our effort is made, it ought to do good. The great need is to give to the masses in each country a kindlier feeling toward the masses in other countries. It will then become more and more difficult for the fomenters of war, those who expect to profit by war, to create the conditions out of which it comes.

Perhaps it is true—we fear it is true—that most persons have some nation in their mind against whom they feel a strong prejudice. They may not be able to explain the reason for it, but the prejudice exists. In olden times, the hostility of the English and French peoples was extreme. In more recent days the hatred of France for Germany has been intensified by the unhappy seizure of Alsace and Lorraine, at the end of the war of 1870. In Austria and Hungary the ill feeling between the German and the Czech race elements have been the cause of violent dissensions within the empire, and threaten further trouble.

The cure for these things, of course, is for the peoples who compose the different nations to come to regard one another as "neighbors" in the Christian sense. Some progress toward this may be made in the Conference now assembled.

FINANCIAL SUPPORT OF OUR MEETINGS.

DURING the sessions of our late most excellent yearly meeting, a question arose in reference to the ability of some meetings relative to their support of the various concerns that arise needing money to conduct them. When we consider how small a portion of our worldly substance,—and no one is expected to contribute beyond his ability—is set apart for meeting expenditure, it might seem as if a false idea prevailed on this point. It should be considered not only a duty, but a privilege and pleasure, and every member should be so trained, to give even the mite, if able to do no more, to the support of the religious household that claims him a member.

We are exempt from the large expenditures that many other denominations consider incumbent upon them to maintain, inasmuch as we have no system of salaried ministry, and we have been most generously aided in many of the concerns that we feel it is vital for us to sustain, so we should feel it our duty to freely contribute to any cause that claims the support of Friends as an organized body, else we will impoverish ourselves in spirit as individuals and as a society. To share what we have is a Christian's privilege, and especially to aid in well conducting every phase of work engaged in by our own "household of faith" should be esteemed a favor.

Our young people, earnest in their efforts on behalf of the causes in which our Friends as a body are engaged, feel greater interest in our Society when they receive from it hearty coöperation and judicious support in their work. And let us all unite in this, those who live remotely where calls are less frequent, and those who live in cities and towns where demands for aid in all directions are constant and pressing.

"To save that we may give," should be a well-known motto in every Friends' household, where simplicity and living within one's income, should enable us to freely and cheerfully sustain our body in every good work.

THE editors of THE INTELLIGENCER on consulting with friends of the Doukhobors, concluded that the fund which they have collected could be used at this time more advantageously, than if held longer. On the 29th ultimo, they sent a draft for $288, (the amount received to date), to Prince D. A. Hilkoﬀ and W. F. McCreary, chairman of the local Winnipeg Relief Committee. These friends were asked to use one-half of the fund for the sick, of whom there are quite a number, purchasing supplies for them and relieving their necessities as far as possible. The other half of the fund was to be applied to the purchase of cows, which are much needed. The pressing needs of the Doukhobors and their efforts to help themselves are set forth in another column. THE INTELLIGENCER is prepared to take charge of and promptly forward other funds which may be contributed for these people.

BIRTHS.

GREGG.—At Morrisville, Pa., Fourth month 28, 1899, to John W. and Agnes Woodman Gregg, a daughter, who is named Edith Woodman Gregg.

MARRIAGES.

BUSHONG—KEENE.—At Friends' meeting-house, Ruthersford Place, under the care of New York Monthly Meeting, Fifth month 25, 1899, Dr. Charles H. Bushong of New York City, son of Gilbert and Edith K. Bushong of Eden township, Lancaster county, Pa., and Nora E., daughter of Rebecca J. and the late Samuel Keene, of Collamer, Chester county, Pa.

DEATHS.

COMLY.—Fifth month 28, 1899, at her mother's residence, Philadelphia, Sarah Waln Comly, daughter of Emma R. and the late Seth I. Comly, and granddaughter of the late Thomas Ridgway.

COX.—At his home in Baltimore, Md., Fifth month 7, 1899, John Roberts, son of Mary L. and the late John R. Cox.

MATTHEWS.—In Baltimore, Md., Fifth month 11, 1899, Priscilla Matthews, aged 82; a member of Baltimore Monthly Meeting, and formerly an elder of Gunpowder Monthly Meeting.

MENDENHALL.—At Richmond, Ind., Fourth month 14, 1899, Elizabeth Mendenhall, aged 65 years. She was the daughter of Absalom and Alice Mendenhall, both of them worthy elders of Whitewater Monthly Meeting. Elizabeth was born in Clinton county, Ohio, in 1834, and commenced active life as a school teacher at the early age of seventeen years, and continued in this occupation for many years. About 1876 she became the bookkeeper for W. C. Starr & Son, in Richmond, Indiana, where she continued for three years, when a serious accident by falling out of a carriage disabled her for a year. She then kept books for the grocery house of Van D. Brown. But her nervous system becoming shattered, she was soon compelled to relinquish business, and for twenty years was greatly afflicted, being confined to her bed, and entirely helpless; but her mental faculties kept clear, and her memory unimpaired.

The loss of her devoted sister Sarah, who was her untiring nurse, and who preceded her to the Better Land by about a year, was a great shock to her. Her life was one of unselfish service to others, whilst able to labor, and of long submission to helplessness at last, and death was a welcome messenger to her. Blessed are those who have been faithful followers of the "Inward Light," when they are "judged by the deeds done in the body."

A. M. S.

MICHENER.—At Cottageville, Bucks county, Pa., on Fifth-day, Fifth month 25, 1899, Dr. Isaiah Michener, aged 87 years and 4 months; a member of Buckingham Monthly Meeting of Friends.

At the age of twenty-five he began the practice of veterinary surgery, which he continued until within a few months of his death. He occupied a prominent place in his profession, was a frequent contributor to professional journals, and the first President of the United States Veterinarian Medical Association. He was thought to be the oldest practicing veterinarian in the United States.

WILSON.—At his home near Hockessin, Del., Fourth month 28, 1899, Stephen Wilson, in his 77th year; a member of Centre Monthly Meeting, Del. He was truly an upright and conscientious man in all his dealings; his calm and quiet manner will long be remembered.

H. M. M.

WOOD.—On Second-day, Fifth month 22, 1899, Mary, wife of Caleb Wood, in her 78th year.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

GRANVILLE HALF-YEAR MEETING.

THE Half-Yearly Meeting of Friends held in Granville, N. Y., commenced with the usual business meeting (ministers and elders), Third-day, Fifth month 16. On Fourth-day Philip Dorland, of Saratoga, spoke on the subject of "Eternal Life," and explained how it is "knowing God" which constitutes life eternal, and to know God is to live a life of obedience to him. If we are truly obedient to his commands, we shall experience the joys of life eternal even while living in this world.

Aaron Flansburg, of Cambridge, spoke from the text, "The words which I speak unto you they are spirit and they are life." He gave an interesting testimony from his own experience, and drew analogies between the most common duties of life and the deepest spiritual truths. One has a duty to perform even when making a chisel, for if not tempered rightly it cannot be used to cut the marble, but will be a most disappointing failure. So must our lives be rightly tempered to perform the duties required of us. He illustrated the truth that one poor and humble in this world's goods, but rich in the spiritual life, can be of the greatest help to those suffering under affliction and despair. He gave an illustration also of the weakness of an infidel's arguments when met by those of an uneducated Christian who is yet learned in "the wisdom of God."

Charles Robinson, superintendent of the Chappaqua Mountain Institute, spoke from the text, "God is in his holy temple, let all the earth keep silence before him." He beautifully illustrated the need we all have of times of silent "waiting upon the Lord," both for strength and guidance. A little child's gradual growth in knowledge illustrates the growth of our spiritual nature.

A seed planted in the ground does not lie there inactive. So God places in the soul of every child a spiritual seed. Our natures are both human and divine. From his experience with youth he believed there was in all a natural tendency toward religion; still man may choose to live only the human, without the divine. The natural man is unable to develop himself. Jesus has taught us that we must receive this divine life from God, and in its development we must coöperate with God, who will enable us to overcome the evil in ourselves. We have a measure of the divine attributes of God. But one of our attributes is the capability of suffering. Can God suffer? Jesus Christ, who was the highest manifestation of God on earth, suffered, and, in a measure, we may suffer like him in our love and sympathy for others. He paid a touching tribute to his Christian grandmother, who performed no public works, but whose life was a living sermon, not only to her own family, but to all with whom she came in contact. The cry of "let this world alone" is misleading, as we need to use all our faculties and all our opportunities in living the Christian life before the world here, and in preparation for "the mansions prepared" for us by Jesus Christ.

Fifth-day meeting, at 11 a. m., Philip Dorland

"THOUGH many a flower in the wood is waking,
The daffodil is our doo-side queen;
She pushes upward the sward already
To spot with sunshine the early green."—Bryant.

spoke on the subject, "What are we here for?" and said if we understood this question rightly, and lived according to God's will, instead of being a "vale of tears," this life might be joyous and happy.

Aaron Flansburg spoke from the text, "There is joy in Heaven over one sinner that repenteth." He spoke feelingly of the Lord's call to himself and testified to the all-sufficiency of God's help to enable us to overcome every evil.

Charles Robinson spoke on the subject of love. "God so loved the world that he gave his only begotten Son," etc. As the parent's love for the child calls forth love from the child, so does God's love work in our hearts. We are not created and placed here for mere selfish enjoyment, not even for the satisfaction of living Christian lives for ourselves alone, but our Christian love must show itself in action. He testified to the power and helpfulness of the Scriptures, and exhorted his hearers to learn of the power of the inward revelation of God's spirit, as made known to us in the silence of inward communion. He paid a beautiful tribute to the late Aaron M. Powell, whom he had known intimately from childhood. He said his whole life, almost from boyhood, had been given to the service of his fellow-men; helping the oppressed, uplifting the fallen, sparing himself no labor which could benefit others. He mentioned his five journeys to Europe and his sudden death, while speaking in meeting, adding, "he has indeed entered into his rest."

He gave thanks for the broader feeling of Christian brotherhood which prevails between the churches of to-day. He gave a remarkable instance of the guidance of God's spirit. As he was nearing his home one day, he seemed to hear the command to "stop." It was repeated, and he turned his steps away from his home until, when approaching a cottage, he felt the command to enter it and deliver a message. He reasoned against the impression without avail, and when a pale, weary mother opened the door to admit him, he apologized to her, saying he knew not why he was there. She replied that doubtless it was to see her sick son, who was then very low, but she informed him that her son (who had been wild and thoughtless before his illness) refused to see any more ministers, as several had called on him. C. Robinson told her she need not consider him a minister, and requested to see the son if he would consent to an interview. He did so on the condition that he (Robinson) should speak no word on religion! He said he could not express his feelings as he saw the tears running down the face of the Christian mother, and heard her son's reply. He sat by the bedside in silence, until at length the sick son reached out a thin hand to him. He grasped it and began to speak loving words to the sufferer, not concealing the fact that he seemed very near the end of his earthly life. Then he asked him of his thoughts of the future, and he replied he knew nothing of it, and knew nothing of God, having never seen him. He asked if he loved his mother, to which he quickly replied "Yes," and spoke of her great care and love for him. "But," said Robinson, "who gave her such an undying love for you but God, who is love, and who loves you even more than an earthly parent can." "God loves me?" exclaimed the youth, incredulously. "A sinner like me?" C. Robinson very lovingly assured him of God's love for him, and entreated him to open his heart to him, accept his love, and learn what it was to be truly happy. With a smile lighting up his countenance, the young man replied, "I didn't think God loved me. I am so glad to have you tell me this."

The meeting closed with prayer from Aaron Flansburg and Charles Robinson. L. J. M.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

PEACE AND IMPERIALISM.

I WOULD like to be understood as to my position and testimony on the questions of Peace and of Imperialism, now so vitally claiming the earnest attention of the nation, and particularly of our Religious Society; as almost the only religious society which has held a testimony against all war from its foundation. Friends, read the advices of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting on war, and ask yourselves, "How far do I unite with them, and how far have I been faithful in upholding them?"

I said in our late Yearly Meeting, and on reflection I firmly believe it, that if all under the name of Friends had, during the past two years, faithfully and earnestly maintained this precious testimony, the war with Spain would not have been. I further said that if all under our name would be faithful now and continue so, our beloved country would be checked in the imperial policy now inaugurated, and we would recede from the position of governing any people or nation without their own consent. I feel as the good and venerable Charles Elliot Norton, of Harvard, has beautifully and feelingly expressed himself: "Less than one hundred days of war has resulted in revolution in the United States,—the foundations on which the republic rested have been unsettled; the principles upon which the government depends have been violated. We the one great non-military power of the world have suddenly joined the ranks of the nations burdened with great armies and navies. Whatever disposition may be made of the Philippines, we are already, through holding them, brought into entangling relations with the nations of the Old World, and run the risk of losing the inestimable boon of freedom from the complications of the politics of the Old World. Our hearts have been heavy with a new weight of care, and the very brightness of the sunshine has but deepened by contrast the cloud of our sorrowful thoughts—sorrowful that our nation should have turned its back upon its old ideals, and should have chosen that ancient path, familiar to the Old World, worn by the bloody feet of hapless generations; the path of aggressive war, of foreign conquest, of alien territorial aggrandizement; the path that leads from trouble to trouble." Now I would ask F. P. Marsh, and other dear friends who have thought right to uphold or apologize for our government in prosecuting this most cruel, unjust war, Have I or any Friend in writing against it impugned your motives? You may be perfectly sincere and honest in the course you pursue; many thousands of those engaged in this war, I doubt not, think they are patriotically serving their country.

We grant your sincerity and right to toleration. But, friends, do not ask us to abate our earnest testimony against this deplorable war. I do honestly believe that the army in the Philippines has been the slayer of defenceless women and children; that our soldiers under orders have shot down prisoners in cold blood; and we cannot look to our authorities at Manila or Washington for the truth in this matter, for we know the dispatches have been censored and the facts suppressed. We have indisputable evidence from the soldiers' letters to parents and relatives that these enormities have been perpetrated. The people of our country should know the truth and should feel it a duty to protest against this iniquity in order to save our beloved country.

" Shall freemen lack the indignant thought,
Shall Mercy's bosom cease to swell,
Shall Heaven bleed, shall Truth succumb,
Shall tongue and press and soul be dumb?

" No; guided by our country's laws,
For truth and right, for suffering man,
Be ours to strive in freedom's cause,
As Christians may, as freemen can."

We cannot oppress and rob another people of their liberty without endangering our own. If Imperialism rules our nation a despotic government will succeed. Our fate hangs wavering in the balance. "Choose ye whom ye will serve. If the Lord be God serve him."

DAVID FERRIS.

LETTER FROM HANNAH A. PLUMMER.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

SPENDING a few weeks in this smoky city, I have been especially interested in the Carnegie Libraries. I thought your readers might perhaps be interested in some further notice of them than has appeared in the daily papers. A few years ago Andrew Carnegie gave $1,200,000 for libraries, to be built in the city of Pittsburg. The main library is in the East End, at the entrance to Schenley Park. The music hall, science museum, and art gallery are all under the same roof with the library. As it has outgrown its present quarters in four years, Andrew Carnegie recently donated for an extension of this building, $1,750,000. Seven branch libraries are to be built in different parts of the city, so that the people remote from the main one may be more easily accommodated. Three are now completed, and in operation. The city generously maintains all these libraries. A. Carnegie maintains the art gallery and science museum.

Yesterday I went with the Librarian, Edwin H. Anderson, and his wife, to visit two of these. They are in the more crowded districts, where children throng the streets. These buildings are near the school houses. After school hours and in the evenings and on Friday afternoons the children flock into the libraries and into the children's reading rooms. They have free access to the shelves and can select their own books. There are a number of tables of graduated heights, and they quietly seat themselves to read or to study up some question in connection with their lessons. The librarians and attendants are always on the alert to secure new pictures and other objects of interest, and place them upon the walls that the children's interest may be kept alive to what is passing in the world around them.

These branch library buildings are of brick and stone of approved architecture, and present a good appearance, so that they seem to raise the tone of the neighborhood, being object lessons of good work and good taste. The interior is designed by the librarian, whose experience of a library's needs has qualified him for this designing, and who has charge of all the libraries.

On one side of the entrance hall in these district libraries, is a large reading room with reference books on shelves around the room. A number of tables are in these, all well lighted. On the opposite side of the hall is the children's reading room, with choice books carefully selected, arranged about the walls. Back of these rooms is a large room running across the whole building. In this are the book stacks, arranged so that they all converge toward the desk in the center of the building. This circular desk in which the librarian sits commands a view down all the stacks into both reading rooms through glass partitions, and of the front hall and doors. On each side of this circular desk is a turnstile, so that the borrower goes in one and delivers his book and out of the other with his new book. In one of these, and perhaps there will be in others, is a lecture room, accessible from the outside, where university extension or illustrated and other lectures may be given.

It is easy to imagine how much all these privileges and opportunities may mean to a neighborhood. How the next generation may reach a much higher level than the present one. How education and intelligence may improve the surroundings, make cleaner streets, more comfortable and beautiful homes, and elevate and ennoble humanity. In a sermon I listened to here recently, the minister made this statement: "The slum is not a poor tenement, it is a condition of mind." If the condition of mind is improved then we may suppose the poor tenement may improve. It is said here that Andrew Carnegie always paid the highest wages in the steel business. If he had paid much higher than the other mills could afford, that would have made trouble with other mills. If he could have done this, it is a question whether the people would have received as much good from it as they will receive now from his generous benefactions. Whether he was wrong in his getting I may not judge, but he is certainly wise in his giving, and we may be glad that he is not hoarding it. It must be a great pleasure and satisfaction to administer upon one's own estate, instead of having it wasted in litigation, as it too often is after death.

From what I hear in this great mill of the world, it is as often the upper workmen who are the oppressors, as the capitalist. When a poor man becomes rich he begins to look at the question of capital and labor from a different standpoint, showing that human nature is the same in rich and poor. One who has known what it is "to want and to abound" can truly say, "Give me neither poverty nor riches." Prosperity has its trials and its tests as well as adversity. There are pleasures among the lowly which the rich never know, and there are trials among the rich which the poor can never guess. There are troubles on the mountain top which are unknown in the valleys. Poverty is to be deplored and remedied as much as possible, and great wealth should not be striven for. It may harden the heart, though not necessarily. Let us not stir up envy and heart-burning and covetousness, but let us try to find out where wrong lies, and endeavor to bring about better conditions, in the spirit of love which would unify, not antagonize and separate.

Since being here I have attended three lectures by Susan Blow,—“the Mother of Kindergartens,” as she is called. I understand that she has recently published a book “for mothers,” certainly it must be valuable if it is as interesting as her lectures. Mothers of young children would no doubt find this book very helpful and suggestive.

What an event is the Peace Conference at The Hague, let us uphold the hands of those engaged in it, if only by our unexpressed desires. What we sincerely and earnestly desire helps in a way to bring results. What we truly desire we are, and whether we realize it or not, is among the silent forces.

What shall we do without our leader in good works—our dear friend Aaron M. Powell? Let us hope there is an Elisha who will take up his work and carry it on; the work will never be finished perhaps; there will always be need of a succession. Let us each fulfill our allotted task, which may be well advanced when it drops from our hands. This would be the most fitting memorial, and surely most pleasing to him,—hearts dedicated to the Father's service in the rescue and saving from peril of those in dangerous places. All good is of slow growth and requires continuous persevering and patient labor. Let each of us find and do our part. We may say with Jean Ingelow.—

“I am glad to know I am not bound
To make the world go right,
But only to discover and to do
The work that God appoints.”

Pittsburg, Pa., Fifth month 24, 1899.

THE following is from an address by an Episcopal clergyman at the dedication of a Jewish Temple:

“Many are the things which divide men; but there are more and deeper and holier things which are common to the hopes and needs of all. The differences between you and me are most marked—a chasm that many consider impossible to bridge; and as you are honest in your convictions, you expect me as being equally honest in mine to abate not one jot or tittle of them on this and all occasions. I believe with my whole soul that God manifests himself in humanity—not in any exceptional instance, but in all men, according to their capacity to receive Him.”

“TRUE peace must have its foundation in righteousness.”

MINUTE: AARON M. POWELL.

MINUTE of the Board of Managers of the National Temperance Society, adopted Fifty-day, May 18th, 1899.

This Board has learned with sincere sorrow of the death of our late esteemed colleague, Aaron M. Powell, of Plainfield, N. J. The death messenger came to him suddenly in a meeting of Friends in Philadelphia, and just as he had risen to speak, thus fulfilling a desire which he had often expressed, “to die in the harness.”

Aaron M. Powell was born in Dutchess county, New York, in 1832. He had an early ambition for a college education, but before this cherished object could be accomplished he became deeply interested in the Anti-Slavery cause, and threw himself into it with a whole-souled devotion which was never relaxed until the chains of the slave were severed by the Proclamation of Emancipation. For several years he was the editor of the Anti-Slavery Standard, and both as speaker and writer was closely associated with Garrison, Phillips, Curtis, Whittier, and other leaders in the Anti-Slavery movement.

In December, 1872, he was elected District Secretary of the “National Temperance Society and Publication House,” and editor of the National Temperance Advocate, and continued to fill these offices until May, 1893. At the same time he took an active interest in the cause of Peace and International Arbitration, and for each of these philanthropic movements, he was for many years an earnest advocate, both by pen and tongue.

The latest and most conspicuous work to which he gave his attention, was that of the American Purity Alliance, of which he was the founder and the president from the year of its formation to the day of his death. In furtherance of this work, he edited its organ, The Philanthropist, and traveled extensively both in this country and in Europe, addressing conferences and other meetings, while at the same time he was actively engaged with his pen.

But the bounds of his humanitarian efforts were by no means limited to the associations named. The Freedom of the South, the Indians of our Western plains, and the persecuted Armenians came in for a large share of his active sympathy, and wherever there were wounds to heal, wrongs to redress, or sufferings to alleviate, he gave not sympathy only, but did yeoman service to the extent of his ability.

Aaron M. Powell was a diligent observer and student of all the great public questions of the day, and opinions conscientiously formed were firmly adhered to. At the same time, he was very tolerant, and always ready to consider the opinions of those who differed from him. He was a forcible and lucid speaker, never rising to oratorical flights of imagination, but was intensely practical; his manner was quiet, self-possessed, never declamatory, modest, and very respectful and deferential, but without fawning. He always secured the respectful attention of those he addressed, and seldom failed to carry conviction. He was particularly happy in addressing Congressional and other Legislative Committees, and in this service year after year represented the National Temperance Society, and with excellent effect.

By the gentleness and urbanity of his manner, and by the warmth and sincerity of his friendship, he established himself in the confidence and affection of those with whom he was associated in philanthropic work. His untiring and unselfish devotion to the right “as God gave him to see the right,” has, we reverently believe, earned for him the high encomium—“well done, good and faithful servant.”

The Board directs a copy of this minute to be sent to the beloved partner of his life, with the assurance of our profound sympathy in her sore bereavement.

JAMES B. DUNN, General Secretary.
New York, May 19, 1899.

THE lives that make the world so sweet
Are shy, and hide like a humble flower;
We pass them by with our careless feet,
Nor dream 'tis their fragrance that fills the bower
And cheers and comforts us hour by hour.

—Unknown.

EVENING MEETINGS, YEARLY MEETING WEEK.

GOOD LITERATURE AND TEMPERANCE.

THE meeting of Third-day evening of Yearly Meeting week, under the auspices of the Committee on Philanthropic Labor, was devoted to the subjects of Good Literature and Temperance. Jesse H. Holmes presided, and opened the meeting with a feeling tribute to the work of Aaron M. Powell in these lines of philanthropy.

The first subject was presented by Joseph S. Walton, Principal of Friends' Central School. He spoke of the need that exists for careful supervision over the reading in which children of the best homes indulge. The danger among the children of Friends is not so much from the so-called trash as from the habit of desultory reading. First of all we must teach a taste for good reading, and the opportunity to do this comes as often as the eager request for a story. Boys, especially, need the presence of action in their stories as in their play. Let parents see to it that in the oral story and in the book the action is vigorous and of a healthful influence. It is not difficult to teach the young to love good stories, if the stories are but well told. It is not hard, when the love of good stories is established, to teach the love of good books. And yet the vital point lies right here, in the ability to recognize those elements that are good and uplifting. Some never learn it; to some it comes very early in life. But it can never come without something of reaching. Children should be taught, not only to read good books, but to read them thoroughly; therein lies the secret of intellectual strength. Moreover, if the appreciation of a good book is to be spontaneous, it must be because we have trained ourselves to the habit of high thinking; and in this training there is no more powerful factor than our daily conversation. Let us not talk below the level that we ought to hold.

Dr. Walton's address was thoughtfully discussed. Elizabeth Lloyd expressed the hope that those of mature years who find themselves unappreciative of good literature may place themselves under the influence of those who have come to love it. The presence of good books in the home is a valuable incentive; still better is the possession of noble passages in the memory. William G. Hubbard, superintendent of the American Railway Literary Union, explained the work of that organization in driving trashy literature from the news-stands. Alfred Love, David Ferris, and others also spoke.

The subject of Temperance was opened with a paper by John L. Carver. He said, in brief: "What are we going to do about it? We have much to struggle against, within and without; and we have the choice of two methods, suppression and inflection; force and tact. The liquor interests have used force only after tactful diplomacy has thoroughly paved the way for it. The saloon has rather bent than forced public opinion to its support. Its progress has been made many times by way of political corruption, but more often by appealing to the masses with false but attractive ideals of pleasure. Here, then, is one point at which we may take hold; and by the very nature of the case we must do so tactfully. We must be content, at first, to draw men towards the ideals to which we hope ultimately to lead them. We must meet on their own plain the men whom we would help. We cannot, with real success, prohibit indulgence in one pleasure until we have substituted a better. Here, then, is something that we may undertake now. Results will come slowly; but they will be sure, for they will rest upon changed ideals, and men's hearts will be with us while they reach higher and a little higher for life's pleasures."

Florence Conrad Griscom took for the text of her excellent paper, "What would Jesus do?" Are our methods good enough for us? Are they worthy of him and of our profession? Do we care with an interest that is vital, energetic, forceful? Is it really our affair that every cradle is in danger? Mild attempts against the saloon in many States have failed. There is no way but to strike at the root, and kill it. Personal influence and example are needed everywhere; to give them freely is the duty that we owe to ourselves, to humanity, to God. As for party, call it by any name, so that it builds on God as its foundation. As for methods, what would Jesus do?

In the discussion that followed, the thought was expressed the drink evil has two principal features, the legal and the social. Prohibition is the means of disposing of the first. The second is more difficult to overcome, but success here depends upon success in the other point.

Thomas H. Speakman suggested woman's suffrage and independent voting as requisite to overcome present slavery to party, by reason whereof the traffic flourishes. Everett Griscom repudiated the theory of heredity and the effectiveness of tact. Alfred Love appealed for a better enforcement of those regulations that are already on the statute books. The chairman, in closing the meeting, spoke of the need for many methods in fighting the evil. It is worth while to make use of every one that helps.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOLS.

An adjourned meeting of the Association for the Promotion of First-day Schools within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was held at Race Street meeting-house on the evening of Fifth month 17. John L. Carver, clerk, read a part of the tenth chapter of Mark, after the meeting had gathered into the usual silence.

The report of volume thirty of Scattered Seeds was read and accepted. It shows a circulation of 5,182 copies, and expenses for 1898 of $1,687.08, which, through help from the Samuel Jeanes Fund, have just been equaled by receipts. Evidences of appreciation continue, but several First-day schools have reduced their subscription lists, owing to decline in their members. On the recommendation of the editor, a committee was appointed to nominate persons to serve on the Scattered Seeds and Mission Committee.

Epistles from the associations of New York and Illinois were read and considered. The epistle of this association to those with which we correspond was read and approved.

The remainder of the evening was devoted to the needs of teachers, several of those who have been especially successful in work with the various grades, speaking by appointment, upon methods that they have found valuable.

Abby Mary Hall, of Swarthmore, spoke of work with little children of from three to five years of age. If we are to have earnest men and women to take the places of those who are passing away, we cannot begin too early to draw them and hold them to us. To do this, we must have, first of all, a warm and all-embracing love for children. We must be filled, too, with faith in the importance of the work; and we must not permit ourselves to become discouraged because of the restless hours that, now and then, will come. Regular attendance of the teacher is, perhaps, most necessary of all in the primary grades. There is a wide field from which to teach. If the Bible is chosen, the stories are more delightful for being told, rather than read. We probably gain more in teaching passages of Scripture, than in committing to memory isolated texts.

Mary E. Borton, of the Woodstown school, who in ten years has promoted one hundred and thirty-eight little ones, as they have acquired the ability to read, spoke of the helpfulness of good pictures in illustrating Bible stories and other teaching. Care is needful, too, that the lesson be not allowed to become too long. It may be, sometimes, the wisest thing to abandon the line of thought that has been planned, and take up another that is better because it answers the demand of the little minds at that moment. The lessons in Scattered Seeds have been found most valuable, and the blackboard has been used to advantage.

Work with older classes was discussed by Mary B. Paxson and Joseph S. Walton. The former made two principal points: (1) Emphasize the social life of the class. To do so stimulates attendance and discussion in class; it stimulates conversation out of class upon the subject of study, and so leads to the habit of higher thinking and more earnest speaking. (2) Make class work eminently practical, as opposed to dogmatic or too much historical teaching. Bring before the class examples of practical Christianity, the adaptation of Jesus's teaching to modern conditions. We assign historical topics for our pupils to investigate; why not assign them moral problems to think over and discuss?

Joseph S. Walton spoke briefly of the need that we respect the budding faith of the young man or young woman. There is always a right way of combatting unbelief, but it requires patience and tact to find it.

There was brief discussion of the earlier papers, but the hour of adjournment arrived too soon to permit of full expression. The need for preparation was especially emphasized and Jesse H. Holmes said, "Primary teachers are fortunate in that they must prepare. Sometimes in teaching older classes we depend too much upon spontaneity, and failure is the sure result. Emma Speakman Webster, Charles Platt, and Sarah M. Carver also spoke, alluding to the power of the good story, when properly told.

PEACE AND ARBITRATION, AND COLORED PEOPLE.

On Fifth-day evening of Yearly Meeting week, a meeting in the lecture room of Friends' Central School, under care of the Philanthropic Committee, considered first Peace and Arbitration, and later the Colored People.

There was little opportunity for discussion, but those present listened with deep interest to two notable addresses. Joseph S. Walton presided, and introduced John M. Shrigley, President of the Williamson School, who spoke on Peace and Arbitration. He said in part:

As patriots of the highest class we must stand for peace as against the popular ideas of life and drum patriotism. Let us not be misled by the arguments with which Napoleon persuaded himself that his wars were for the good of humanity. There are too many politicians whose ideal, like that of Pyrrhus, is the conquest of the world. To die for one's country has too long been extolled as the highest sacrifice. It is time men learned that finer degree of patriotism that lives for one's country.

In the past we have been too timid in the expression of our opinions. We accept too readily the war spirit that pervades juvenile reading; and we do not stop to protest against the military attitude of those writers who furnish text-books in history for our schools.

Preparedness for war will lead to war. Such is the evidence of history and the admission of military and naval leaders of the present time. If we must have an army and navy, let them be organized on a police basis. From the time of Abbé St. Pierre to the present, there have been noble men and women working for arbitration. The cause was never more hopeful than in this day of the International Conference at The Hague.

A brief but earnest discussion followed, in which David Ferris, Alfred Love, Elizabeth Lloyd, Lukens Webster, Dr. Sarah T. R. Eavenson, and others participated. In response to a general request, Dr. Walton said a few words about the growth of the ideal of patriotism, from blind loyalty to a leader up to a broad and profound love for a whole people, such a love as few men in America save Abraham Lincoln, have attained.

The Colored People claimed the attention of the meeting during the second hour. The committee could scarcely have been more fortunate in the choice of a vitally interested person to present the subject. William E. Benson, the son of a one-time slave, but a graduate of Howard University, Washington, held the attention of the meeting for nearly an hour, while he told, in a modest manner, of his own work among his people.

Returning to Alabama to take up business with his father, he realized that his seven years of absence at school and college had possessed him of ideals that the home neighborhood was utterly unable to appreciate. The young man undertook the task of raising his community out of its poverty, ignorance, and helplessness. After patient effort, the latent force of sinew was set in motion, and directed in the building of a neat school-house to substitute for the cabin that had served the purpose. This was the beginning of the Kowaliga Industrial School, in the interest of which William Benson is now visiting the North.

The institution purposes to train the young men and women of the community for usefulness in their present surroundings, not to send them out into the world. The people have been poor in the midst of rich resources. They could neither make nor repair the simplest tool. The crops of a summer would be mortgaged in advance for the debts of a past winter.

The school is capable of accommodating about 300 pupils. It gives a training in the English branches, but most of all, it trains for the duties of life, there in the community. In this it is building for itself a stronger and ever stronger foundation.

The institution aims to become a religious center, but it finds the necessity for moving slowly against the superstition and the moral code that have been the outgrowth of centuries. As a business center the school is exerting an influence for provident management; it is teaching the people how to earn and more than all, how to save. The mechanical departments are striving to produce those implements for which money has previously been sent to northern cities.

Colored people and white are received on perfect equality. Those interested in the work realize that in such neighborhoods the solution of the race problem depends upon equality. Neither white nor black can advance securely without the other.

At the conclusion of his address, the speaker exhibited, with the lantern, a number of pictures, showing progress in the erection of the school building, and typical scenes in the life of the people. In closing he paid a pleasing tribute to his father, whose rise from slavery to competence and to appreciation of the real good in life, has been the foundation of his own work and ideals.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PLYMOUTH, PA.—A Conference to consider the subjects of Temperance and Tobacco was held at Plymouth Meeting-house on the afternoon of the 21st instant, with an attendance encouraging to Abington Philanthropic Committee, under whose auspices it was held; the interest manifested in the subject was evidenced by the deep attention paid to the speakers, and by the discussion which followed.

James Q. Atkinson, clerk of Committee, opened the meeting by a few remarks in which he named Chalkley Styer for presiding officer. Some of the children of the First-day School of Plymouth were prepared with exercises, the first of whom, Laura Holt, read an impressive temperance story. Abbie Webster read, "The Path Across the Fields," and Elizabeth J. Webster recited in a most acceptable manner "The Boy and the Sparrow," adding a little lesson in mercy to the other subjects named for consideration; the children's exercises added greatly to the interest of the meeting.

After these the minutes of the last Conference were read by the Secretary; and Hiram DeWalt of Philadelphia was then introduced, who spoke on "Citizenship" and its responsibilities, bringing a new phase into the Conference, at least one not sufficiently realized by many. He said in part that "foreigners realize citizenship more than native born Americans do. These are too apt to lose their rights by giving them to ward-healers; cited there responsibility of citizenship as evidenced in Luke, xv., 15: 'And he went and joined himself to a citizen,' quoting many other passages proving that religion and politics should go hand in hand now as in olden time." He spoke of his endeavor to prove in the courts the inherent right of a citizen, and believe if it is merely of man it will come to naught, but if of God it shall prosper.

In reply to one petition the answer was, "The question of legality is too well settled," but the question of religion was too well settled for discussion in Christ's time, so He was crucified, but the question has lived and grown by his crucifixion; so will the other. We provide that Indians shall not have right to become enslaved by this habit, but our citizens are not so cared for.

An excellent paper was read by Florence Conrad Griscom on "The Best Method," taking the stand that only by seeking to know "What Jesus would do" in the case, can the proper mode of procedure be found.

The subject of Tobacco was then introduced by Dr. Townsend, who spoke of the waste of the saliva being injurious, leaving all moral questions out. Thomas J. Whitney felt the state of our Society is deplorable when we are not clear of aiding by signing licenses as shown by the late Yearly Meeting. Joseph Fussel upholds the decision to do as "Jesus would do"; nothing is wrong that is in favor of right, we cannot go wrong if God is on our side. Arabella Carter felt we must seek to know if we are on God's side, not so much whether he is on ours; to formulate our plans according to his desires, not making them first then asking if he would approve. That if we do as Jesus would, we would not so utterly condemn but would stoop to understand conditions as he did, and have pity with unfortunates seeking to stand, but hampered by heredity. James Q. Atkinson believes we are advancing, and that we must first see that our boys are kept pure and clean; and that the girls help them, and keep them so. After remarks by others the meeting closed under a deep covering of silence.

ARABELLA CARTER, Sec.

TRENTON, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Friends' Association was held Fifth month 22, with the president, W. Maxwell Marshall, in the chair.

After roll-call and reading of minutes, a few remarks were made concerning the conference that met in Philadelphia, Fifth month.

A paper on the Discipline of the Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was prepared and read by Dr. Laura H. Satterthwaite. The writer says "she is a member of the Society of Friends because believing the foundation stones of their structure are 'Mind the Inner Light' and the remaining building material, freedom of thought and liberty of expression, with a current of charity and love with no sound or unsound individual doctrine forming any part of the structure, though within its walls there could or ought to exist amicably all views provided sincerely expressed and the one uttering them living an upright life."

After a few remarks the meeting adjourned to meet Ninth month.

MARY D. BRANIN, Sec.

MICKLETON, N. J.—The meeting of the Young Friends' Association, held Fifth month 13, 1899, was opened by the President reading from the 12th chapter of Ecclesiastes, followed by the reading and approval of last month's minutes. A letter was read from Howard M. Jenkins, stating that he had sent three copies of a pamphlet on "Disarmament of Nations; or Mankind one Body," which we received with much appreciation. Hannah A. Heritage read one of the papers which was read at the Richmond Conference, called, "Our Smaller Meetings." Hannah L. Peaslee read a selection entitled "Into My Keeping." Martha R. Heritage read from the INTELLIGENCER entitled "Domestic Science as a Study." Reta Haines then gave a beautiful recitation, entitled "Stand by the Anvil." Milton Heritage recited "Keep Watch on Your Words," which was much appreciated by all. Martha White read a very interesting collection of current topics she had gathered during the past month.

The sad news of the death of Aaron M. Powell cast a solemnity over our meeting.

We were encouraged by the presence of visitors whose company we are always glad to have.

The appointments were read and the roll called. Meeting then adjourned.

E. L. D., Sec'y.

CHRISTIAN ENDEAVOR SOCIETY AT SCHOFIELD SCHOOL.—At the last meeting of the Christian Endeavor Society of the Schofield School, S. C., it was most interesting to hear the expressions of thankfulness from the students. One young girl being educated by S. V. L., of New York, said: "It is easier to be good here, with so many trying to help us, but our test will come when we leave school, for then we will find when we try to do good there will be evil to be met, but let us overcome evil with good, and when our teachers are not with us to see us, or our parents, remember the 'eyes of the Lord are in every place, beholding the evil and the good.'"

One of the young men arose with these words, "Do you remember last winter when we met in Carter Hall dining room? One evening a gentleman was there and spoke just one minute, and he said, 'What am I living for?' What am I living for? I have studied over that ever since; thought over it until I feel now if I ever come to be anything it will be because of what he said and my trying to answer it." That young gentleman was a member of Girard Avenue meeting, Philadelphia, and called to see the school when passing through Aiken. Neither knows the other's name. One minded the light, the other was prepared to receive. Both must have their reward.

HUNTINGDON, IND.—The Young Friends' Association met Fourth month 19, at the home of Benjamin and Lauretta Nichols. The meeting was called to order by the chairman, Ella Moore. After the usual business was transacted, a letter from Anna A. Atkinson was read. The letter expressed a desire that our Association ally itself with the Central Organization. Pearl Rall and William Moore were selected to represent us in the Executive Committee.

The appointed reader, Joseph Plummer, being unavoidably absent, James Plummer read an excellent article entitled "Life." Many phases of life were portrayed in their true aspect, and the article was worthy of much consideration. The discussion was especially interesting, and brought forth the different ideas of life. The meeting adjourned, to meet in five weeks at Maple Grove, Emma Brown being chairman. Paper by Michael Moore. Subject, "The Fallacy of Resisting Evil."

WILLIAM MOORE, Cor. Sec.

HOPEWELL, VA.—A regular meeting of the Young Friends' Association, of Hopewell, Va., was held at Friends' meeting-house in Winchester, at the request of the Friends from that meeting. The president read the fourth chapter of Matthew. Roll was called, and minutes of last meeting were read and approved. One new name was reported for membership.

Tacy Branson read an instructive paper on History. Current Topics report was presented by D. Arthur Robinson.

Referred Question, "How are we to judge the measure of religion in another?" was answered by Edward L. Irish reading a beautiful selection from J. R. Miller's works.

Referred Question to the audience, "Since the circulating library has been among us, what do our Friends think has been its influence? Can it be improved upon, and how?" A general expression followed, some thinking the books beneficial, while others thought a better selection could be made for the primary class.

Lydia W. Irish, by request, read a selection, "Ministry." Daniel T. Wood read a selection, "Creator's Work," from the English reader.

The meeting closed after the usual silence.

ANNIE J. REES, Sec.

Educational Department.

GEORGE SCHOOL.

THE Manual Training Department has been enlarged by the addition of three new metal-working machines,—a 17 by 17 inch by 4-feet planer, a 20-inch upright drill, and a 14-inch engine lathe. This new machinery, together with the 10-inch lathe, vises, and small tools which have been in use for several years, has made it possible for the Department to offer a new elective course in Manual Training, which, besides metal work, will include mechanical drawing and a short course in wood-turning and pattern-making. The machines are being set up, and aligned by the teachers and students.

The Junior Recital on the evening of Fifth month 20 was an event of unusual interest, reflecting much credit upon those who took part. It was largely attended by the people of the vicinity.

Principal and Mrs. Maris entertained the Senior Class in their parlor on the evening of the 19th.

Sixth-day, 26th, the school held a pic-nic in Hulmeville Park. The principal amusement of the day was boating on the Neshaminy.

On Seventh-day, 27th, eight boys and eight girls took advantage of the opportunity offered to pass entrance examinations.

The old board walk from the school to the station has been torn up and the ground is being prepared for a new and much wider one.

Commencement will take place at 10.30 on the 15th of Sixth month. A special train will be run from the Reading Terminal.

Principal Maris has been requested to preside, and to deliver an address at the exercises connected with the unveiling of a monument at Ann Arbor, in memory of Professor H. S. Frieze, who was at the head of the Latin Department when Professor Maris was a student in the University of Michigan.

The George School catalogue for 1899 and 1900 is in the hands of the printer, and will be out in a few days.

The closing meeting of the Young Friends' Association was held on the evening of the 27th, on which occasion we were favored with the presence of William P. Bancroft, chairman of the General Committee. The following program was given: Recitation, "The Wine Cup," Frances Preston; Oration, "The Power of Silence," Ethel Brinton; Reading, "Ruth," Ethel Perdue. The remainder of the evening was occupied in the consideration of several of the Queries by Professor Charles M. Stabler, Professor Smith, Mildred Eves, William Smith, Horace Way, Isabel Fulton, Malcolm Farquhar, Ethel Brinton, Bertha Stover, and Curtis Eves.

The Bristol, Newtown, and Doylestown trolley road, which passes the school grounds, has been completed as far as Wycombe station, on the North East Penn road, and cars are running regularly to that point. Work on the Doylestown end of the road is progressing rapidly. **

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.

At the regular meeting of the Joseph Leidy Scientific Society, held Fifth month 4, Dr. Day entertained the Society with some experiments with a graphophone, and Professor Hoadley exhibited one of the original phonographs. Professor Stine gave a very interesting talk on lithographs and three-color prints, and explained the process of making each. Harry N. Benkert, 1901, presented a paper on "Naval Architecture."

The student body, and especially students of Letters, hail with enthusiasm the new elective in Ancient and Modern Classics, which will be offered next year by Dr. Appleton. In this course the best English Translations of Homer, the Greek Drama, and Dante will be used as texts.

Mary E. Seaman, '99, attended the semi-annual College Settlement Convention, held in New York city, Fifth month 6th. She is the winner of the Lucretia Mott Fellowship, and expects to study Social Science at Newnham College, Cambridge, England, during the coming winter. Anna B. Eisenhower, '99, will pursue a course of study in Mathematics, Greek, and English at Radcliffe College, Cambridge, Mass., at the same time.

Several members of the Senior class will spend next winter abroad, engaged either in study or teaching. In addition to the winners of the Fellowships, Annie B. Parrish, '99, will spend next year in Berlin, studying the German language and literature; and Marshall Pancoast will spend two years in Hawaii as a tutor in two Boston families who reside there.

At the regular meeting of the Oratorical Union the following officers were elected: President, Joseph C. Haines, 1900; Vice-President, Percival Y. Fogg, 1901; Secretary, Helen Duer Walker, 1901.

The June number of the "Transactions" of the American Society of Civil Engineers is devoted exclusively to a paper, read before the Society by Henry B. Seaman, C. E., Swarthmore, 1881, and to discussions of the same by many of the most prominent engineers of this country. The paper is entitled, "The Launhardt Formula and Railroad Bridge Specifications." '99.

LITERARY NOTE.

ALICE BROWN, the author of these "Tiverton Tales" (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), has several veins of literary production. She writes delicate, feeling verse; pleasant recollections of summer saunterings in England; and stories that show a kinship with those of Mary E. Wilkins. Her present book brings before us the quaint types found in New England village and rural life, and the eleven tales are told with unusual art and many a touch of humor and pathos. The peacefulness of the countryside breathes from her pages. Those who know the author's nature pictures in her poems will expect to find beautiful, tranquil passages in her prose. Such a one is that describing the little house of worship on the hilltop of Tiverton. "It is sweet indeed. A soft little wind seems always to be stirring there, on summer Sundays a messenger of good. It runs whispering about, and wafts in all sorts of odors: honey of the milkweed and wild rose, and a Christmas tang of the evergreens just below. It carries away something, too—scents calculated to bewilder the thrift hunting bee: sometimes a whiff of peppermint from an old lady's pew, but oftener the breath of musk and southernwood, gathered in ancient gardens, and borne up here to embroider the preacher's drowsy homilies, and remind us, when we faint, of the keen savour of righteousness."

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

POEMS OF HENRY TIMROD. Memorial Edition. With Memoir and Portrait. 8 x 5 1/4 inches. Pp. xxxviii. and 193. $1.50. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

HERMIONE AND OTHER POEMS. By Edward Roland Sill. 7 x 4 1/4 inches. Pp. 109. $1.00. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

APPEAL FROM THE SCHOFIELD SCHOOL.

My spirit draws near you with the power of the Great Spirit impelling me to lift up my voice as one crying in the wilderness, "help my people, help my people, help them now."

The newspapers give facts too horrible to repeat, and against that darkness we must put more light, more intelligence, more ways of earning a living, more knowledge of the things which can lift from slavery to freedom. We develop manhood, broaden womanhood, awaken to the responsibility of parentage, and show duties of law-abiding citizens.

We must cease to call them poor, stop thinking them incapable of efforts to lift themselves up. Help them see that all races must be classified, not in proportion to money or titles (church ones), but in respect to character, ability, and business training, by their having a standard for social relations and maintaining self-respect in choosing associates.

As Educators we must select those with ability and fitness for leaders; we must train and develop the powers that the Divine implanted.

There is no mass of ignorance anywhere that God has left without one or two in it capable of work and influence; no darkness that one light will not illumine, if ever so little. Other generations cannot have so great a work; everyone kindled now with the spirit of doing, and trained for it, will have wider scope than those who come after.

The Schofield School is making leaders, the influence cannot stop in any one life, even though some may seem failures. All failure is impossible; some habit, some spoken word, some example will leave a mark sometime for the betterment of another.

For centuries the Gulf Stream has kept its path through the ocean; the training, disciplining, unfolding, and developed power of this generation will course as surely through the great sea of ignorance.

It is the thirsty who know the value of drink, the hungry who know the worth of bread. The needs press upon us; we are on higher ground, but as the throng below struggle and strive to reach our helping hands, we bend low, even on our knees, in our efforts to come in nearer touch with spirits, minds, and hungry hearts reaching to us for help.

You are behind us, we are on the brink; as ye give unto us so we shall give unto them, remembering that it is more blessed to give than to receive. MARTHA SCHOFIELD.

—A number of Spanish poets and prose writers have formed a project of crowning Ramon de Campoamor as king of poets. He is eighty-two years of age.

—Fire losses continue to run far ahead of last year's figures. The New York Journal of Commerce figures for the four months past are $49,893,000, compared with $37,958,000 during the same time last year, and $42,062,400 in 1897.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

NIGHT, DAY, ETERNITY.

ERE wholly fails day's dying light,
The moon, 'mid heaven's mighty hosts
Leading the starry ranks of night,
Sends softly down her banner white,
Bringing to earth's wide isles and coasts
A blessed truce from noise and strife—
A breath-space for the inner life.

Sweet thoughts, by daylight banished hence,
Return to comfort and to heal
The weariness of soul and sense,—
And on the lips of turbulence

The starlight sets its silver seal :
Dim pinions fan the fragrant damps
And fire-flies light their living lamps.

The pale moon-flower bursts, and flings
Its perfume in a sudden gush ;
Moths flit on silver dusted wings,
And scores of fair and happy things
Rejoice in the harmonious hush ;
A bird that dreams of caroling
Chirps faint with head beneath his wing.

Amid the glare and strife of day
I stand confused as in a dream,
And all uncertain seems the way
Failing to find the faintest ray
From Spirit's unrefracted beam.
Awhile I joy at fleeting spark,
Then grieve while groping in the dark.

But later, at the day's decline,
With outer darkness grown intense,
I realize that all is mine,
And that eternal arms entwine
And fold me in Omnipotence.
A Radiance by Spirit given
Directs, ennobles, guides to Heaven ;

Illumes my newly-wakened thought
With a glad consciousness of power :
And knowing now that I have caught
The blessed Truth in sorrow sought,
With joy I welcome Wisdom's hour !

"For in her hand is length of days, Peaceful her paths, pleasant her ways !"

She whispers me for future years :—
"Eternity is spanned by Love !"
Nor day, nor night hath any fears
Nor any power to elicit tears,
If, conscious of the light above,
I learn that time has ceased to be,
And all is Love's Eternity !

With Love henceforth to guide my feet
I break seeming shackles of the past,
Ascend the throne and take my seat
A royal monarch, truly meet
To govern self, equipped at last
By power of God, to do and be
That where unto He calleth me.

Wilmington, Del.

C. G. M.

VICTORIA'S EIGHTIETH BIRTHDAY.

England's venerable and honored Queen attained her eightieth year on the 24th ultimo. Appropriate celebrations were held throughout the British empire. The Archbishop of Canterbury preached a thanksgiving sermon at St. Paul's cathedral, London. Assurances of regard and affection were received from the crowned heads of Europe and from President McKinley. The Poet Laureate, Alfred Austin, composed the following Ode for the occasion :

AN INDIAN SUMMER.

SPRINGTIME was flowering in your fair young face
When first the sceptre laid on you its load ;
Springtime and seedtime and how well you sowed
In the rough furrows life's long duties trace,
Scattering with lavish heart the smiles of youth and grace.

Though April sandalled with its flowers your feet,
And sang its amorous descant in your ears,
You, with a foresight wiser than your years,
Bethought you of the time more serious sweep,
When mellow fruit if stored and stacked, is ripened wheat.

With heart as tender as the bud half blown,
Yet in the very season of young love,
Kneeling, you sought its impulse from above,
Choosing for consort of your earthly throne
A soul akin to yours, a mind to match your own.

Glowed your summer o'er the land,
You, with your people round you, could forecast,
Rich fruiting future planted in the past,
Engaging promise of rule, rightly planned,
Of freedom round your shores, and on the sea command.

Then slowly comes the time when summers wane,
And from the sunshine something seems withdrawn,
As pensive shadows lengthen on the lawn,
When only bindweed lingers in the lane,
The one sweet thing that then unwithered doth remain.

But there is beauty in autumnal bough,
No less than in dear April's dewy leaves,
When, with its store of golden girdled sheaves
Piled, stands the main where one time passed the plough,
And ripened labor reaps fulfillment of its vow.

For, though no more the oblivious cuckoo calls
From land to land, nor longer on the spray
Of yellowing elm the throstle vaunts his lay,
The ring dove's mate, as fades the leaf and falls,
Reiterates its note of love that never falls.

From hamlet roofs blue spires of smoke once more,
As dies the day in mist along the dale,
And widowed evening weeps behind her veil,
From long replenished ingle heavenward soar,
And lamps are early lit and early latched the door.

Season—it is less earthly than divine,
When love's rich guerdons with the days increase
And cares are softened 'neath the crown of peace,
When all we have won 'twere easy to resign—
A season like to this, loved lady, now is thine.

Through life's successive labors, one by one,
Still moving on to-day, no more you roam,
Seeking fresh tasks, but fruit of harvest home.
Fruit blent with flowers, warmed by October's sun,
Are round your throne entwined and harvest hymns begun.

Oh ! what a harvest, lady, now is yours.
Empire and fame and glory, and above
Glory and fame a universe's love—
Love rooted deep in reverence that insures
Remembrance of your name as long as time endures.

Long may the Indian summer of your days
Yet linger in the land you love so well,
And long may we, who no less love you, dwell
In the reposeful radiance of your gaze,
A golden sunset seen through autumn's silvery haze.

ALFRED AUSTIN.

WORD FROM THE DOUKHOBORS.

LETTERS from Prince D. A. Hilkoﬀ, dated at Winnipeg, Canada, addressed to Joseph S. Elkinton, Philadelphia, are published in The Friend. Prince Hilkoﬀ acknowledges two remittances of two thousand dollars each. Under date of 6th of Fifth month, he says :

"The Doukhobors have begun to plough and dig. Six blacksmith shops and a lot of wagons have been made from lumber bought for that purpose. I told the Doukhobors of the receipt of two thousand dollars, and we had several meetings to discuss what it should be used for. The Doukhobors asked me to tender their heartfelt gratitude for the help extended. It was decided to expend seven hundred dollars in buying oats and barley for seed, and the remaining thirteen hundred dollars for oxen. The oats and barley are already bought now at Yorkton, and in its neighborhood. The immigration agent, James S. Crerar, to whose care I sent the money, not being able to go myself, is kindly helping them with his advice and knowledge of the country where to buy best. I got a letter from him that five yoke of oxen were already bought; that will help the people with their ploughing, as they are sorily handicapped for the want of cattle and have to draw the ploughs themselves, putting twenty-two people, women and men, to one plough. The women find it easier to break the land with a plough than to dig it with a spade, as there is not much sod where they are ploughing, because the land they are breaking is burnt-off timber land.

"I am happy to inform you that C. Cox and H. Morgan of the Local Council of Women of Montreal have sent four hundred and fifty-six dollars and eighty cents to be used buying milch cows for the children. The money is now at Yorkton, and the cows are being bought. Milk for the children is very necessary, considering they do not eat meat, and having no poultry have no eggs.

"I forget to tell you that it was decided to spend fifty dollars on poultry, if such can be had at Yorkton or in the neighborhood. The idea is to buy hens and eggs and hatch chickens. . . .

"Please accept my sincere appreciation of your and the Society of Friends' efforts in the help and sympathy extended my suffering countrymen, the value of which is more than I can express, and shows the practice of the true spirit of the principles of your exalted organization. I am happy in remembrance that the help and sympathy shown to my suffering-for-conscience-sake countrymen one hundred years ago by the Society of Friends is still being promulgated now, and thus, although men and events pass away, the true spirit abideth, and works always the same."

GOVERNMENT IN THE FILIPINOS.

In a discussion of the Philippine situation, Charles Francis Adams writes as follows to Thomas W. Higginson. The letter was read at a meeting at Cambridgeport, Mass.

FOUR months ago the situation admitted of easy shaping. The choice then lay open to us between two policies—one the traditional, accepted American policy as respects foreign and adjacent nationalities in a less advanced stage of development than ourselves, and the other the now well-matured British policy of dependencies. We were free to elect between them. For myself, I admit I did then hope we should adhere to the ancient ways, basing our action towards the Filipinos on the essential principle of the Monroe Doctrine, which, as I understand it, is little more than the inhibition of foreign interference with communities struggling into independent existence within the sphere of American influence, either territorial or otherwise. Then, falling back on our precedents, we would have applied to the Spanish possessions in the Philippines the precise principles applied by us to Mexico in 1865-6.

This seems to have been a wise and far-seeing policy then; and I am one of those who think it would have proved a wise and far-seeing policy now, had it been tried. We should have used our utmost endeavor to make a Diaz out of Aguinaldo—a friend and ally. At least an opportunity would have been given to see what he and his followers could do under our protection. Leaving our navy at Manila, and being represented there only by its guns and a resident commissioner, with a company of marines for a guard, we would have watched the course of events, seeking to build up an independent, self-sustaining government in the Philippines now, as an independent, self-sustaining government was built up in Mexico thirty years ago. This would have been in complete accordance with American teachings and the American policy.

Unfortunately, instead of this, the administration for reasons which doubtless seemed to it good, insisted, as a condition precedent, upon the absolute submission of the Filipinos, and their unquestioning acceptance of our sovereignty. But, if they would be good and obedient, we promised them sugar-plums. Complications ensued, as complications generally ensue when nations suddenly depart from their traditional maxims and hereditary policies, and the establishment through Aguinaldo of a government like that of Diaz has now plainly become impracticable. We have destroyed that which was most virile, energetic, and promising in the native conditions we found. Under these circumstances, what remains for us to do?

As I understand it, having abandoned the American policy, distinctive and prescriptive, the administration is now bent on adopting as a substitute for it the more recent British policy; that is, following closely the precedent recently created in the case of Egypt, it is proposed to give the Filipinos a stable, beneficent government, framed on a British model, at the head of which will be a Governor-General, supported by a sufficient, and necessarily in this case, a large military force, the duty of which official will be firmly to guide the Filipinos in the path of development and autonomy to the greatest extent possible. This is exactly what Lord Cromer is doing in Egypt. The only practical question, therefore, for us to consider is, what objection exists to such a form of government, and what we, who were not primarily in favor of it, have to propose in its place.

I must frankly confess that I, for one, am here brought to a halt. I do not fancy this abandonment of our own ideals, and this almost servile imitation of the English; for I still think our policy was in the long run much the better and the wiser of the two—that more productive of final fruitful results. I believe in teaching people to walk alone by making them walk alone, and not by everlastingly holding them up. I do not believe that the English policy of dependency in Egypt, any more than in Hindustan, will ever develop a robust, aggressive, self-sustaining race. On the contrary, it can have no end but a state of permanent tutelage—and a state of tutelage is not good for any class of human beings. It emasculates. Nevertheless, under the guidance of the administration, and through the force of circumstances, the choice seems to have been made; and I am forced to say I do not see what course is open to us, save to accept it. The mischief is done; the mistake is irretrievable. We have unwisely, without a trial even, abandoned the American old, and we have weakly adopted the British new. Instead of being originators, we have accepted the role of imitators. So, having had our bed made for us, we must e'en lie in it as best we may.

Under these circumstances, the true course for the anti-imperialists would seem to be to develop to the utmost extent possible, though under the English system, the policy and principle of autonomy—the fact of native home rule. We should endeavor to limit the interference of the United States to an absolute minimum; and, as I understand it, this also is now the wish of the administration; so far as it has a wish or policy of its own. Here a wide field for the exercise of useful influence is open to us. The secret tendency in Congress undoubtedly will be to break down the barriers, and bring the Asiatic archipelago within the area of domestic politics; that is, it will be treated, so far as possible, as a domain to be exploited—the refuge of our “statesmen out of a job.” This we must endeavor to counteract. It is the civil-service struggle over again; and, here as there, President McKinley and his cabinet will need all the outside support they can possibly hope to receive, not to find themselves crowded to the wall. The result, judging by recent experiences, will at best be more than doubtful. The chances are, in fact, all in favor of the spoilsmen.

CURRENT EVENTS.

A NEW president has just been elected at Yale University. Prof. Arthur T. Hadley, the distinguished authority on Economics, has been chosen to succeed Dr. Timothy Dwight, who lays down the office because of advancing years. President Hadley is the first layman chosen to this high position, and the action of the Board of Trustees is looked upon as the sign of a new era for Yale, now near the beginning of her third century. Prof. Hadley's work on railroads has been designated as the standard by the Russian government.

THE detailed scheme of arbitration which is to be proposed by the United States delegates at The Hague, was carefully wrought out at the State Department before the Commissioners sailed from New York. The details of the American project cannot be divulged now, as a matter of courtesy to the Conference, but it can be stated that the American project is remarkable at once for its simplicity and comprehensiveness. It differs considerably from what is known as the Olney-Pauncefote proposition as set out in the arbitration treaty which failed of ratification. It provides for a permanent tribunal of arbitration, an impartial arbitration being thought more probable thereby than if arbitrators were chosen in the heat of controversy.

DR. DANIEL G. BRINTON, of Media, Pa., Professor of American Archaeology at the University of Pennsylvania, has presented to the University his entire library of ethnology and archaeology. The gift is a very valuable one, including as it does many rare works and otherwise inaccessible pamphlets on the subject to which Dr. Brinton has devoted his life.

MANILA advices indicate that the near approach of the wet season finds the insurrection taking a new lease of life, the rebels showing more aggressive activity. The “rebels” construe the peace negotiations to mean that the Americans have had enough of fighting.

TWO Montgomery county coroners' juries, on the 27th ultimo, returned a verdict holding the Reading Railway Company primarily responsible for the recent collision of passenger trains at Exeter, Pa., by which twenty-nine persons lost their lives. The juries find that mistakes were made by employés, but that they were insufficient to have caused the collision had a proper system of signals been in use on that portion of the line.

ADMIRAL WALKER, president of the Nicaragua Canal Commission, has submitted the report of that Commission to the President. It is expected that the President will now announce the appointment of the new Isthmian Commission to carry on the work of the canal survey.

AN order has been issued at Manila re-establishing the Philippine courts, which have been closed since the American occupation. Spanish will be the official language of the courts.

CAPTAIN DREYFUS is to be granted a new trial. He is to be brought back to France for the purpose. If the trial is a public one, as it seems likely to be, acquittal may be the result.

THE United States Embassy at Brussels has reported to the State Department that the Belgian Government has rescinded the interdiction upon the importation of American cattle.

ROSA BONHEUR, the celebrated painter, whose “Horse Fair” is so familiar, died in France on the 26th ultimo, aged seventy-seven.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

REV. WILBUR F. CRAFTS, a Prohibition leader and member of a Reform Bureau at Washington, has written a paper on “McKinley's Cabinet Making,” in which he criticizes the President for his selection of his Cabinet officers, and also for “dispensing intoxicating drinks, using illegal Sunday trains” and otherwise, in the opinion of Dr. Crafts, failing to enforce regulations which would elevate the moral tone of the Administration.

—The South Mills of the Illinois Steel Company, at South Chicago, have just broken the world's record of steel rail making in a twelve-hour run. The new record is 1,310 tons. The former record was also held by the South Chicago plant. The men engaged in this record breaking run composed the ordinary night shift.

—Already this season 4,000 Galicians from Austria have arrived at Halifax, bound for the Canadian Northwest. Thirteen hundred of them arrived on the 21st inst., on the Hamburg-American steamer Phanica, which left Hamburg on May 11.

—The California Growers' Association, which controls all the grapes produced in the five central counties of the State, has fixed the price of the second crop of muscatel wine grapes at $10 a ton, which is $4 more a ton than they brought last year.

—The ages attained by some of the coniferæ are scarcely less extraordinary than their colossal bulk. The greatest longevity assigned to any tree is perhaps credited to the celebrated taxodium of Chapultepec, in Mexico, one hundred and seventeen feet in circumference, which is thought to exceed in age the baobab of Senegal, inferred to be five thousand one hundred and fifty years old. In Lombardy there is a cypress tree which is said to have been planted in the year of our Saviour's birth. There is even an ancient record that it was growing in the time of Julius Caesar. Near the ruins of Palenque are trees whose age is estimated to be from four thousand to six thousand years. The mammoth tree has been estimated to live four thousand years in California.—Ladies' Home Journal.

NOTICES.

* * A Circular Meeting under the care of a Committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting will be held at Middletown, on First-day, Sixth month 4, 1899, at 3 o'clock.

MARY P. HARVEY.

* * The Circular Meeting at Frankford, Unity and Wain streets, will be Sixth month 11, at 3.30 in the afternoon.

The company of Friends is invited. Fifth street and Third street Trolley cars are within two squares, and Pennsylvania Depot not very distant.

* * The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has made the following appointments for Sixth month :

4. Dunning Creek, Pa.
18. Ridge and Back Creek, Va.

* * The Committee on Philanthropic Labor of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends will meet in the meeting-house, 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, Seventh-day, Sixth month 10, 1899, at 1.30 o'clock p. m.

The Sub-Committees meeting as follows :

The Indian, in Room No 2, at 10 a. m.
Peace and Arbitration, in Room No. 3, at 10 a. m.

Colored People, Race Street meeting-house, at 10 a. m.

Improper Publications, in Room No. 4 at 10 a. m.

Purity, in Room No. 3, at 9 a. m.

Women and Children, in Room No. 5, at 9 a. m.

Temperance and Tobacco, in Room No. 1, at 11 a. m.

Educational and Publication Committee, in Room No 1, at 9 30 a. m.

Legislation Committee, in Race Street Parlor, at 10 a. m.

JAMES H. ATKINSON, } Clerks.

ELEANOR K. RICHARDS, }

* * A Circular Meeting under the care of a Committee of the Western Quarterly Meeting, will be held at Marlborough, on First-day, Sixth month 11, 1899, to convene at 3 o'clock.

SAMUEL H. BROOMELL, Clerk.

* * Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches has made the following appointments :

SIXTH MONTH :

11. Radnor (appointed meeting), 3 p. m.
25. Haverford, 10 a. m.

SEVENTH MONTH :

9. Schuylkill, 10.30 a. m.
23. Germantown, 10.30 a. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

* * The hour of meeting at 35th and Lancaster Avenue, will be changed after to-morrow (Sixth month 4), from 11 o'clock to 10.30 o'clock, until further notice.

* * The annual picnic of the West Philadelphia First-day School will be held at Castle Rock Park, on the line of the West Chester trolley road near Newtown Square, on Seventh-day, Sixth month 3. If it rains on that day the picnic will take place on the 17th. As it is a very romantic place, and a very pleasant ride, it is hoped that a number of Friends will see their way clear to meet with us on that occasion.

TYPEWRITERS

REBUILT nearly equal to new

Fully guaranteed. Prices 50 per cent. to 75 per cent. below list. Catalogue free.

Philadelphia Typewriters Exchange,
135 S. 5th Street, Philada.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY
Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMANN
Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS
Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK
Pittsburgh.

ANCHOR } Cincinnati.
ROCKSTEIN }

ATLANTIC }
BRADLEY }
BROOKLYN } New York.
JEWETT }
ULSTER }
UNION }

SOUTHERN } Chicago.
SHIPMAN }

COLLIER }
MISSOURI } St. Louis.
RED SEAL }

SOUTHERN }

JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO
Philadelphia.

MORLEY } Cleveland.
SALEM } Salem, Mass.

CORNELL } Buffalo.
KENTUCKY } Louisville.

DWELLING house in the city of Elizabeth, N. J., built one hundred years ago, has always been painted with Pure White Lead and Linseed Oil—nothing else.

There is not a crack, blister, blemish or imperfection of any kind in the paint. Makers of mixtures, beat this record if you can!

Be sure the brand is right. Those in margin are genuine, and made by "old Dutch process."

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

ANNOUNCEMENT.

We will continue the manufacture of Custom Shoes and carry a Select Stock of our own reliable work.

SAMUEL DUTCHER,

(SECOND FLOOR.) 45 N. 13th Street.

WATCHES.

As one of the oldest houses in the watch trade—established three generations ago—and up to date in every feature of the business, we are able to offer the best and most serviceable watches for the least money. Give us a call.

GEO. C. CHILD,

1020 Chestnut St.—2d Floor.

Established 1820 at 824 North Second Street.

S. F. Balderston's Son, WALL PAPERS.

All Grades. Estimates Given.
Window Shades Made to Order.

902 Spring Garden St., Philadelphia, Pa.

Carpetings, Linoleum, Window Shades, etc.

Benjamin Green,
33 N. Second St., Philad'a.

WALL PAPER of Attractive Styles

Popular Prices
Samples Free to any Address

A. L. Diamant & Co.,
1624 Chestnut St. Philadelphia, Pa.

CLEMENT A. WOODNUTT,
Undertaker
and Embalmer,
1728 GIRARD AVENUE, PHILADELPHIA.
Telephone 2-28-28-A.

Desirable Silks at Low Prices

An offering of carefully selected Silks—the dependable kinds, such as are always found at these Stores—and at the lowest prices possible for high-grade qualities :

Wash Silks—of good quality, as low as 40 cents a yard.

Corded Wash Silks—the most popular patterns in single and cluster cords, on grounds of blue, pink, lavender and gray. Very stylish—at 50 cents.

Japanese Silks—of light weight, but very strong ; in a great range of patterns—stripes and figures on various colored grounds. Superior qualities at 55 cents a yard.

Twenty-five styles of 24-inch Black Figured India—a bright, rich quality—in large assortment of medium and small designs ; has been considered exceptional value at 75 cents ; here at 65 cents a yard.

A fine, soft-finished Black Satin Marveilleux—the right weight for present season—well worth $1.25 ; here at $1.00.

Two numbers of 26-inch Black Surah—double warp, fine twill, the correct silk for a cool gown or shirt waist—at 85 cents and $1.00 a yard.

White Habutai Silk—27 inches wide—very heavy and glossy, and well worth 75 cents—here at 50 cents a yard.

Black Taffetas—a worthy quality—at 48 cents a yard.

Samples sent upon request.

Mail orders receive prompt and accurate attention.

Address orders "Department C."

Strawbridge & Clothier,
PHILADELPHIA.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 10, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 23.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXIII.

LET us Search the Scriptures for ourselves. . . .
The great Inspirer of Scripture is ever its true interpreter.

From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, chapter on Reading the Scripture.

"AS A MUSTARD SEED."

THERE is no little, and there is no much :
We weigh and measure and define in vain.
A look, a word, a light responsive touch
Can be the ministers of joy to pain.
A man can die of hunger, walled in gold,
A crumb may quicken hope to stronger breath,
And every day we give or we withhold
Some little thing which tells for life or death.

—Susan Coolidge.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

(Continued from last week.)

ON Second-day evening, the 29th ult., was held an Educational Meeting, over which Albert A. Merritt presided. William W. Birdsall, President of Swarthmore College, was the first speaker, telling in an interesting and conclusive manner of the work already accomplished and still needed in the way of higher education. Isaac H. Clothier, of Philadelphia, spoke from the standpoint of a business man, and Professor Albert R. Lawton as one intimately associated with such institutions, both as student and instructor. The short remainder of the evening was occupied by T. B. Pandiaw, a native of India, of noble lineage, but who has denounced all caste conservatism to labor for the up-building of the low-born Pariahs, whose lot in life is beyond conception pitiable. This noble missionary is placing before the public in a way never to be forgotten the sufferings and degradation of this unhappy class, who, though by law no longer slaves, are in reality worse, since no one needs care for their welfare, and the oppression of caste faces them on every side. They may not drink from the wells of the upper class. They must walk on the shady side of the street, for if their shadow fall upon the nobility, the penalty is death by hanging. Such a state of affairs exists in Great Britain's territory,—and she the friend of freedom !

THIRD-DAY, FIFTH MONTH 30.

On Third-day morning Yearly Meeting joint session was held to consider the reports of joint committees, with William Willets acting as clerk and John William Hutchinson as assistant clerk. This was impressively opened by prayer from John J. Cornell, after which a Friend presented the concern felt by Cyrus Harvey to address the young people at a special meeting. It was decided to hold such a one at 2.30 that afternoon, and have the regular afternoon meeting convene at 4 o'clock. The report of the Philanthropic Committee was read by sections. Feeling reference was made to the death of two superintendents, John L. Griffin and Aaron M. Powell, since last report, as the latter said on the passing away of the former, "The workers go on, but the work remains." Attempts have been made by petitions to secure the abolishment of vivisection. The first section of the report, "Work among women and children," showed the Young Friends' Aid Association had completed its twenty-fifth year of good work ; the Mission School, the Kindergarten, Brooklyn Helping Hand, and Sewing School have been in successful operation, besides minor work attempted and accomplished.

The report on Purity work spoke of the many meetings attended and addressed by the devoted superintendent, Aaron M. Powell, who also attended the International Conference in London, last Seventh month. An appeal for purity sent by the American Purity Alliance, of which this devoted Friend was president, was read, and led to much interesting discussion on the subject. Emma Willets said, "The first step in children's lives must be taken by parents : the responsibility lies with no one else. Marianna Chapman felt that this report and appeal had come like a last call from our departed. Let it sink so deep that we may realize, "He being dead, yet speaketh." Another expressed the belief that "they best mourn and respect the dead who live as he would have them."

The report on Demoralizing Publications, Anna Rice Powell, superintendent, showed that various appeals had been made, and gratefully acknowledged help from Baltimore Yearly Meeting. Charles Underhill said he believed it was time that Friends take a stand, and felt sure the Mayor of the city would aid in this work if approached rightly. Much unity with this suggestion was expressed, and a small committee was accordingly appointed to formulate a suitable petition against improper advertisements.

The Section on Temperance showed good work done, but Friends continued rather lethargic on the subject, for while the superintendent, Henry W. Wilbur, had offered to lecture throughout the limits of the yearly meeting, only two meetings had sent for him, but elsewhere he had delivered fifty lectures during the year. Congress had been petitioned to abolish army canteens ; and then when the Attorney-General's adverse decision seemed to demand further action, President McKinley had been petitioned to abolish the curse. Rum contributes to the social evil, and the greatest danger is to young women and girls. Cyrus Harvey spoke of his three years' experience in the Civil War, which taught him that the two evils go hand in hand.

Work among colored people was considered, Anna M. Jackson, superintendent, having delivered four illustrated lectures during the year. Between six and seven hundred dollars had been used during the time, benefitting both Southern schools. Discussion showed the opinion to be that the colored race are not as likely to prove drunkards as are the white; they are impure, but the teachers must come from among their own race. An instance was cited of a young colored girl, who after two months' training in Schofield School, went back home and started a temperance society which reformed her father and rejuvenated the whole neighborhood. Another Friend felt a concern for the poor whites, and desired that the scope of the committee should be enlarged. Samuel M. Janney said, in 1872, that he had never known an adult white to receive the rudiments of an education, but since then many have availed themselves of the privilege.

Abolition of the death penalty was next considered. A petition had been made to the legislature for its abolishment. William M. Jackson thought the American people needed more education on this line than on any other. He believes the lynch law is incited by the sanctioned State laws, which hold human life so cheaply. In Indian affairs the superintendent reports but little work done. Prison reform showed much good done. Nine Partners Meeting has taken interest in the prison there, though the actual reformatory work has been done by the W. C. T. U. The Howard Institute in London sent an appeal regarding convict system of chain-gangs and attendant ill-usages. Boys of seven and ten years are chained beside stout hearty men, and so compelled to keep up beyond strength and power. The committee had sent an appeal to Southern States, where such barbarities exist, against this contract system. The meeting directed that an appeal against chain-gangs be sent to the Associated Press with desire for publication.

The Peace and Arbitration report shows the Doukhobors have been aided in endeavors to escape military life. Belief was expressed that there was a hopeful outlook for the Peace Conference. Of the $300 appropriated last year, $250 were given the Southern schools. In this connection, but later in the sittings, the Philanthropic Committee reported that Anna Rice Powell had been appointed to succeed Aaron M. Powell as superintendent of Purity, and further desired that Charles F. Underhill be added to the committee that he might become superintendent of Demoralizing Publications. This was accordingly done.

At 2.30 o'clock a large number gathered, and a feeling appeal was made to young people by Cyrus W. Harvey. He said in part that the planting of Christianity in a land where ritualism was rife, meant much. It meant a struggle, for freedom did not come at once. There was no exercise of priestly power among Christ's followers.

The early Friends were a Young People's Christian Association, for at a very early age the people testified. Under the government of the Most High comes peace, and spiritual worship must always precede spiritual work. There surely is a weak place in Quakerism, and it may be that it is just because the young people are not receiving the gift.

When God calls, too many are like Lazarus of old, bound hand and foot in grave clothes. He never makes a mistake in his call; he sees who is suitable for the work he has in view. Thirty times in the New Testament occurs the word "conscience," showing that the apostle considered it important.

He believes the Christian life is an evolution, a growing to better things, working from an inner cause to outward life; that Jesus meant to deal with human nature as human nature required. People lean on sacraments, but by living the Quaker faith we can realize that we have power equal to the infallibility of the Pope.

At 4 o'clock the joint session again convened and listened to the report of the Committee on Education, which shows the interest of Friends to be visibly increasing; the training at Swarthmore has done much to produce suitable teachers. Lectures have been given to aid Swarthmore. $500 had been appropriated for the use of the committee, and the amount of voluntary contributions exceeded this sum by ten times. A nominating committee was appointed to reorganize this committee. William W. Birdsall spoke of the appreciation felt by Swarthmore's active workers of the work done by this committee, inaugurating as it did the raising of money. Henry Haviland spoke of the needs of Swarthmore, saying that the $3,000 raised by New York are but as drops on the tongue of a parched and thirsty man, when we want to give him a full drink.

The report of Friends' Boarding Home and Home Association was very encouraging. The work of the Penington was only limited by lack of space, so a property adjoining had been bought and another building planned to occupy vacant space back, to be ready for occupancy in Ninth month, presumably.

In the old building there is a possible accommodation for seventeen persons, and in the new thirty-two may be accommodated. The Penington will be self-supporting; nearly 2,000 meals having been prepared, and 58 persons have obtained accommodations. Of the $10,000 contributed for the work of this committee, $7,000 have been used, with a balance now on hand of $3,000.

The minutes of the Representative Committee were read; three members of this committee, Daniel Underhill, Jane E. Capron, and Aaron M. Powell, having passed beyond during the last year. Endeavors have been made to secure a penal code to commute death sentence to imprisonment for natural life. A Memorial had been introduced by Aaron M. Powell concerning the Czar's invitation; this was sent to the Russian Government and to President McKinley.

MEMORIAL MEETING.

In the evening a meeting was held under the auspices of the Philanthropic Committee to review

(Continued on page 455.)

IN MEMORY OF AARON MACY POWELL.

For the meeting held by the Philanthropic Committee of New York Yearly Meeting, on the evening of Fifth month 30th.

DEAR FRIENDS :

Whittier has perpetuated in his spirited poem, "The Exiles," the story of "Goodman Macey," who in 1660 received into his cottage the hunted, persecuted Quaker, and replied to the priest demanding his surrender :

" No priest who walks the earth
Shall pluck away the stranger-guest Made welcome to my hearth ;"—

then, having defied priest and sheriff alike, flees with his good wife from their cottage home, and in safety reaches the island of Nantucket.

The Macy in my brother's name indicates his lineal descent from this true-hearted man. A steadfast sense of justice is among "the things that endure"; and it may be that this persisting principle which survives from generation to generation, and appears again and again, was ready in the soul of the young farmer boy, for quick response to the appeal made in behalf of the slaves in our Southern States. For he was only eighteen years of age when a visit from Stephen and Abby Kelley Foster on their anti-slavery mission, stirred his soul to its depths, and took him away from his plow and away from his cherished desire for college education, into the active service of this great cause. He served an apprenticeship for a few years, to test and somewhat train his powers of persuasion; but he was not far past twenty when he was regularly appointed an agent of the American Anti-Slavery Society, and he was actively engaged in this mighty work until in 1863 emancipation resulted from the Civil War. He was editor of the National Anti-Slavery Standard the last few years of its existence. Many of you were among his co-workers and know the toils and pains of that long struggle against the tide of popular opinion. There was this priceless compensation for all that was hard and disheartening—the intimate association with men and women called to this great service, whose souls had been tried as by fire, purged of selfishness, with vision cleared for glimpses of the infinite things of God. He loved to testify, as many others have done, that whatever he had been able to do for the anti-slavery cause, it had done immeasurably more for himself.

During those early years of apprenticeship, he was still giving himself in part to the work of the farm and garden, at Ghent, New York, his home after his thirteenth year, a very beautiful country home, with near green slopes, and the whole range of the Catskills, blue in the distance along the western horizon. He had a hungering and thirsting mind as well as a heart roused to the claims of the slave. A pleasant picture comes to me from out those early years. While he plied his hoe among the garden weeds, his little sister sat in the shade of an umbrella changing her place with his progress, and read aloud to him from books often quite beyond her understanding, but leaving germs of thought to develop in her maturing mind. This only sister of his was enough younger to receive from him almost fatherly care in the shaping of her own intellectuall tastes and spiritual aspirations. She has known all these years that it was he who turned her footsteps towards the hills of God, and that every glimpse of eternal things, in the effort to go on and up was gained because he went before, and led the way. All these years deep gratitude has mingled with love.

The genius for coöperating with God, which urges men to find out ways for righting the wrongs, and relieving the miseries of the world, claims them for every beneficent work. My brother had to work in the temperance cause, for the furtherance of peace and arbitration, and for the equal rights of women.

His religious home among Friends was very dear to him. He believed in the power of their testimonies.

The seasons of silence which are their privilege were to him times of soul-renewing. He was faithful concerning "tale-bearing and detraction." If conversation tended toward any harsh comment upon people, he would quietly say: "Let us keep all unpleasant pictures in the background." He felt deeply the present need that Friends shall stand to the world for moderation and simplicity. He sometimes smilingly quoted, what I believe is an English epitaph: "My riches consist, not in the extent of my possessions, but in the fewness of my wants."

His life had the completeness that comes of that blessing of blessings—a perfect home in marriage. Every joy was multiplied, and every burden divided in that place of peace—that home whose law was love and coöperation. The seal of sanctifying sorrow was upon it since the early death of the one child who perfected its harmonies. The father-love for this precious daughter, when it could no longer minister to her, poured itself out upon the young, and made their vital interests, in a very special way, his own. Thus it was, that when the work of Mrs. Butler came to his knowledge, work for the rescue and for the safety of the young the world over, it appealed to the very tenderest chord of his soul; and like the bereaved mother across the Atlantic, this childless father consecrated all the rest of his years to the enlightenment of the public whose ear he could gain, concerning this appalling subject. He entered into the labors of the "New Abolitionists." You know somewhat of his work in this field, how he has watched the legislators whose insidious plans have threatened from time to time, indeed are always threatening, to fasten upon our own country the debauching laws of Europe for the protection of vice; how he has studied the working of these laws in his journeys abroad; how he has appealed and appealed again to the shrinking and indifferent public to arouse to the awful dangers of ignorance, and the awful sin of indifference in this matter. His last printed word of appeal will perhaps claim the attention of this meeting. Sons and daughters of his soul there are up and down the earth, to whom he has bequeathed his unfinished work.

THE LATE AARON M. POWELL.

It was his wish to be permitted to work to the end,— "to die in harness," as he had sometimes said. Gently, and most mercifully was this prayer granted him. And it is true that he has lived so much "in the spirit," that scarcely a change seems to have come to him;—the Heavenly home could hardly be strange to him.

ELIZABETH POWELL BOND.

THE DIFFERENCE.—An incident is related of two old men who in early life had been intimate friends. One chose what this world can give, and had obtained the object of his choice. The other sought God; and though he had known affliction and suffering, and had far less of earthly comfort than the man of the world, yet as the latter listened to the story of the patient endurance and the glad hope of his old-time friend, he exclaimed:

"Yes, yes; you wonder why I cannot be as quiet and happy too; but think of the difference,—he is going to his treasure, and I—I must leave mine."—The Common People.

"THERE are many inward voices; but the voice that cannot be silenced is the voice of God."

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.

(Continued from last week.)

UPON one occasion, while at the Otoe Reservation, the payment of the annuity was interrupted to attend the funeral of a young married Indian. The inmates of the Agency were awakened early in the morning by the loud wailing of the Indian women, which indicated that the man was dead. Fears were entertained by the Agent, Albert Green, that a fine young pony belonging to the deceased Indian would be sacrificed, in accordance with the custom of the tribe; therefore he, with the superintendent, the clerk, and white employes, determined to attend the funeral, hoping to save the pony's life. Sure enough, when the procession appeared the pony brought up the rear. Having been devoted to death by the "laying on of hands,"—that is, by dipping the hands in liquid paint and leaving the impress on the horse,—it was useless to plead for his life. After the grave was dug by women, the body deposited therein, the remains of his little child dug up and put in the grave with his father, all of the man's property that was of any value also placed there, the grave was filled and the doomed pony was led away to be killed. Women did the work. Then they cut off the pony's long, flowing tail, fastened it to the top of a pole, which they planted at the head of the grave and the funeral obsequies were over.

OMAHA AGENCY.

The Indians of Nebraska were quick to discover that their superintendent desired to do them good, and many of them became very much attached to him. After he had left the work and returned to his home, a Pawnee Chief came to the office and asked for "Ar-tib-et" (Grandfather).

When told that he was gone and that the Indians would see him no more, he dropped his head upon his breast, became mute, and a look of deep sorrow came over his face. To comfort him, one of the clerks showed him a picture of his "Grandfather."

machine and kept the house in nice order. Each woman had a family of children, who never quarreled.

The journey that the superintendent was obliged to make in the payment of annuities to the seven tribes, and in the settlement of difficulties, were fatiguing and exposing. He was often obliged to cross the Missouri river at a very early hour in the morning, with a long railway and stage ride to be taken afterwards. The accommodations at that time for travelers on the prairie were by no means luxurious.

Another troublesome matter was the carriage of the money. As the payments were made "per capita," it was necessary to take a great many small

INDIAN TENT SCENE.

He looked at it a long time, and then passed his hand caressingly over the face many times.

The superintendent was sometimes the object of especial attention from individual Indians. At one time, while staying at the house of Thomas Lightfoot, Agent for the Iowas, and Sac and Fox Indians, the superintendent and his clerk received an invitation to dine from an Iowa Indian, which they accepted. He came for them with his wagon and two horses and conveyed them to his farm-house on the banks of the Missouri. His two wives were daughters of Chief White Cloud. He explained to the superintendent that it was much the better way to marry sisters,—“they agreed together so much better.” The younger and favorite wife invited the writer to walk with her on the bank of the river. She was a well-dressed woman, with a refined manner, and spoke English. She said it was a trial to her when Joe took another wife, but that he did it to save her from doing any rough work. She sewed on the sewing-bills. They were not only bulky, but heavy. To relieve him from this the writer, who was then his chief clerk, and generally accompanied him to the agencies, constructed a skirt, lined with pockets, and undertook to carry the whole amount, sometimes as much as fifteen thousand dollars, on her person. Although it was a weight upon her,—in more than one sense,—yet it was a great relief to him. This service was sometimes rendered by his daughter Cornelia, who was also one of the clerks in her father's office.

At all of the agencies, as he visited them, he was kindly and comfortably cared for, but the long continued strain upon both mind and body became too burdensome, and in the latter part of the year 1870 he wrote to the “General Committee on Indian Concerns” as follows:

“Having nearly reached the end of my seventieth year, it seems proper that the declining period of my life should be passed in some degree of tranquility, though I feel desirous to labor according to my ability in the Good Master's service.”

He offered his resignation, to take effect the 30th of Ninth month, 1871. This letter claimed the deliberate consideration of the committee, and after an expression of much feeling and regret at parting with his services in his present position, his resignation was accepted.

(To be Continued.)

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 25.—SIXTH MONTH 18.

OTHNIEL, EHUD AND BARAK.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Then they cried unto the Lord in their trouble, and he delivered them out of their distresses. —Psalms, cvii., 6.

Scripture Reading.—Judges, v., 1-31.

"THE Judges were begotten by the necessities of their age and environment. A common danger—most frequently an invasion—threatened a town or tribe. At such a critical moment as this, some man of superior courage, energy, or wisdom arose, and rallying his tribesmen led them out to victory." (Kent.) As to the oppressors we are told (Judges, iii., 1-6): "These are the people whom the Lord left whereby to try Israel (namely, all those Israelites who had no experience of all the wars of Canaan), solely for the sake of the successive generations of Israelites, to teach war to them (only to those who previously had no experience thereof); the five princes of the Philistines, and all the Canaanites, and the Phœnicians, and the Hittites inhabiting the mountains of Lebanon. . . . They served whereby to try Israel to know whether Israel would heed the commandment of the Lord which he gave their fathers by Moses. So the Israelites dwelt in the midst of the Canaanites. . . . and took their daughters as wives, and married their own daughters to their sons, and served their gods." (Polychrome Bible translation.)

The first of the series of oppressors, according to the narrative, was the king of Syria on the Euphrates. The deliverer raised up after eight years of subjection was Othniel the Kenezite of Debir. His leadership in the capture of Debir from the Canaanites is told in the first chapter of Judges (i., 13) and also in the book of Joshua (xv., 17). Debir is in the extreme south of Palestine. It seems very strange that a leader from this part of the country should deliver Israel from an oppressor in the mountains far to the north of the whole land. It is probable that some confusion of names has substituted the name of a country far away in the north for some Amalekite or Bedouin tribe which made invasion from the desert. After victory we are told that "the land enjoyed peace forty years." This period of forty years is the Hebrew generation, and the number occurs on many occasions. The Hebrews were forty years in the wilderness. Each of the principal Judges ruled for either twenty, forty, or eighty years. Moses was forty days on Sinai, the rains of the flood lasted forty days, Jesus was forty days in the wilderness. It is one of several general numbers which are constantly made use of somewhat as we make use of a dozen, a score, or a hundred.

After the death of Othniel, the Israelites again offended, and this time the king of Moab was the chosen scourge by which they were chastened. When the period of oppression was over they were delivered by Ehud of the tribe of Benjamin, who gained private access to the king by some pretence and stabbed him to death. Escaping he gathered the tribes together, seized the fords of Jordan and won a great victory over the enemy.

The next oppressor was the king of the Canaanites, who "pressed the Israelites cruelly for twenty years." We are now introduced to the first prophetess in the person of Deborah, the wife of Lapidoth, who "was wont to sit under Deborah's Palm, between Ramah and Bethel, in the highlands of Ephraim, whither the Israelites resorted to her for justice." (Judges, iv., 4, 5.) The prophetess summoned to her Barak of the tribe of Naphtali, situated along the upper part of the Jordan valley. We are told nothing of his previous history. Doubtless he had made a name among his people and was known to Deborah as a leader. On his arrival she urged him to assemble the warriors of his tribe and those of the neighboring tribe of Zebulun and meet the army of the Canaanites in the Kishon valley on the plains of Esdraelon. This was the great battle ground of the ancient nations. It was there that Thothmes III., of Egypt, defeated the allied Syrian forces about 1500 B. C. Later occurred here the battle of Gideon with the Midianites, that of Saul against the Philistines, of Josiah, king of Judah, against the Egyptians. Still later upon the same plain occurred the struggle of the Jews with the all-conquering Romans, the rout of the Greeks by the united Moslems, the repulse of the crusaders by Saladin, and finally, in 1799, an army from the west crossed and recrossed it for the last time under Napoleon I.

It would seem from the song of Deborah and Barak which tells again the tale of the battle, that the other tribes were called also to the standard of revolt, but failed to respond in time. This song is doubtless much older than the prose narrative. Indeed, the latter was probably derived from the former and from some other traditions of the conflict.

The account of the victory is somewhat obscure. We may infer that a great storm threw the chariots of the enemy into confusion, since we read in the song that the brook Kishon "swept them away," and that the "stars in their courses fought against Sisera." The Canaanite general fled on foot and took refuge in the tent of a wandering Kenite. The wife received him and treacherously slew him—in his sleep, according to the prose tale. For this deed she is exalted "above all women." The song brings in sudden and strong contrast the bleeding figure in the tent and the anxious mother of the dead general peering forth from the lattice with indefinable foreboding of evil.

The effect of the victory was more than a mere deliverance from oppression. The conquest of the plains of Esdraelon brought together the tribes of the north and south. "What in a century or two might have yawned to an impassable gulf, they (Naphtali and Zebulun) had bridged once for all by their loyalty to the ideal of a united people and a united fatherland." (G. A. Smith.) Again, we are told, "the land enjoyed security for forty years."

Although in these wars only a few tribes were united, yet the few fought for the benefit of all and the sense of national unity was strengthened. The necessity for union against the common enemies was plain to the leaders, appreciation of it grew among the people, and the basis of such union could be no other than the religion of Jehovah.

Although low ideals are manifest in these hero-stories—note especially the treachery of Jael to the sacred guest-right—it is to be seen that they are all told in the service of righteousness. The point of each tale is that evil brings punishment and that righteousness is rewarded, and that the idea is involved also that God's punishments are dealt out for the purpose of producing amendment.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 25.—SIXTH MONTH 18.

THE NEW LIFE IN CHRIST.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Let the peace of God rule in your hearts.—Colossians, iii., 15.

Read the Scripture, Colossians, iii., 1-15.

REVISED VERSION.

FOR this lesson the "International" selection of texts leaves the Gospel of John, and passes to one of Paul's epistles, that to the Christian congregation at Colossæ. The first fifteen verses of the chapter are taken.

The epistle to the Colossians is supposed to have been written at Rome, during the first two years of Paul's imprisonment in that city, A. D. 61-63.

Colossæ was a place in Asia Minor, on the river Lycus. It was near Ephesus, and the cities of Hierapolis and Laodicea, both specially named in the epistle, were also near. Colossæ had been, at an earlier time, an important place, but Strabo, in the century preceding the birth of Jesus, describes it as much decayed. The congregation of Christians here had not been gathered, it is inferred, by Paul himself, for his language in the epistle (ii., 1) intimates that they had never seen his face in the flesh. He wrote to them, because Epaphras, a Colossian "presbyter," had come to him at Rome with the report that a schism was sprung up in the church, a preaching and spread of doctrine which undermined the simple Gospel. This was partly mystical, partly ritualistic, and it was tainted with the idea (the "Manichean" doctrine) of the inherent vileness of the flesh,—an idea nowhere sanctioned in the Scripture. Paul's letter treats the condition reported by Epaphras by expressing earnestly his views of Christian truth, and the lesson we have here presents an important part in his earnest admonition. "To a cumbrous ritualism he opposes a spiritual service; to inflating speculations a sublime reality; to hampering ordinances a manly self discipline; to esoteric exclusiveness a universal Gospel; to theological cliques an equal brotherhood; to barren systems a new life, a new impulse, a religion of the heart." (Farrar)

The counsel in the fifteen verses of the lesson is that of the higher life, of an aspiration, an endeavor toward things divine. He earnestly labors with the little meeting. He assumes that in becoming Christians they have taken on a new character. "If ye died," he says, in a verse (ii., 20), just preceding the present lesson, "with Christ, from the rudiments (or elements) of the world, why, as though living in the world, do you subject yourselves to ordinances?" He means apparently that if they had laid off in a death, like that of Jesus outwardly, the coarse and perishable things, why should they make themselves again subject to the rule of such conditions,—“ordinances” of an unspiritual life. It is a question which might well be pondered by Friends in the New World, as well as Colossians in the Old.

"If ye were raised, together with Christ," he says, "seek the things that are above. Set your mind on the things that are above, not on the things that are upon the earth." And he shows the spiritual meaning which he intends, by saying, "For ye died, and your life is hid with Christ in God." They had not died physically, of course; they were men and women of flesh and blood; he is addressing them in a spiritual sense, entirely; they had died, he assumes, as to the old things, the lower conditions, and had arisen into a new and better atmosphere, that in which, as Jesus had said thirty years before, the truth would make them free. Thus their lives became hidden in, clothed with, the Christ love,—received the baptism of the divine spirit.

This was the ideal form of the change which he ascribed to them, but the word brought by Epaphras suggested the need of earnest counsel, energetic admonition, lest they should fall back into the old life, and should submit to its entanglements. His words therefore become at times very pointed, as in the present lesson. He names the weaknesses of the flesh in plain terms. He urges them to keep their passions in subjection. Put on a heart of compassion. Above all things, put on love, for this is the bond of perfectness in the Christian life. Let the peace of Christ rule in your hearts. Let the divine word—the Holy Spirit—dwell in you richly, in all wisdom.

The lesson is, in fact, one of those which present the spiritual side of Paul. The several passages which teach the Indwelling Spirit, the Christ power, the power of God manifested within, are notable. Besides those which have been pointed out, there is the exhortation, with the declaration following, in verses 10-11 in which it is said that the Christian has put on the new man, in which there cannot be distinction of nationality, or condition, or class, "but Christ is all and in all,"—not of course, the outward teacher and preacher of Nazareth, but the Spirit which made him the Anointed One, the Christ essence and power. When this is in us, we may and we will rise above the impulses of our baser nature. It is by union with this, by participation in the strength of Him who is the source of all strength, that we may be made Christians indeed, pure, clean, perfected.

WHEN a man understands that the cleanness of his heart and the integrity of his mind are a part of his simple human service to the world, that he is a moral drone unless he keeps truth with the life of God within him; when he understands that his highest life is not his own merely but the world's concern, that purity is the world's need, that righteousness is the time's demand, then, to each one of us, my brothers, the making of a man becomes the most serious, sacred, and reasonable interest upon earth.—Selected.

36

"THERE is no wealth which we will so regret to have squandered, at the last, as that of time itself. These moments, that seem so free and abundant to all of us now, will sometimes appear more precious than nuggets of gold."

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 10, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer" same address.

"SUCCESS" OF NATIONS.

THE "success" of nations, in the true sense, must be judged by the same rule that we would apply to persons. Let us take for example the man who is aggressive, domineering, and grasping; let us suppose that he goes on in such manner, acquiring the property of others, adding to his own luxury, diminishing their comfort, that his plans succeed, he wins his law-suits, he rises upon the ruin he has wrought. Would we judge him really successful? Only by a corrupted and debased standard. Only by the rejection of those principles of action which we are continually striving to teach.

The nations which are most successful are those which most steadily pursue the march toward right living—which in their own system of law and method of organization best develop the good qualities of their own people. Where we see nations making themselves, as we have described the individual above, truculent, aggressive, and predatory, it is in vain that they show that their fleets are strong, their armies large, their operations "successful." Napoleon, in his campaign in Italy, stripped the cities he took of their pictures, and other works of art, to enrich the collections at Paris, but the act, none the less, was and is condemned as robbery. That he was able to do it did not dignify it, or excuse it.

The nations that best promote the individual welfare of their people, that embody in fact the motto of Pennsylvania, "Virtue, Liberty, Independence," are those which are truly successful. They are like the man whose home is well ordered, whose family life is a centre of industry, intelligence, and goodness. We have had in the century closing two examples among nations of successful endeavor in this direction. They have endeavored to build upon a foundation of justice and truth. One of these is the United States, the other is the Swiss Republic. Without speaking of the former—its situation clouded for the moment by untoward events—there might be much said for Switzerland, and much encouragement drawn from its real success. For many years it has pursued its way without war, external or internal. It has so far succeeded in establishing a rule of reasonableness and kindness that though its people are diverse in "race," in language, and in religion, they hold steadily together in the bond of the republic, for the common good. The Swiss cantons are partly German, partly French, partly Italian. They speak variously these three languages. They are partly Protestant and partly Catholic. Some of the cantons are rich, some are poor. Some are prosperous cities, some are mere mountain patches in which a small and hardy population gets a bare living. But all the same they unite in harmony. Surrounded as they are by military nations the case is a wonderful evidence that a sincere endeavor to live in peace, and to labor for a common purpose, is possible to succeed.

THE quotation in the "Good Word" for last week was credited, by a mistake of the printer, to "A Remarkable Faith." It should have been, of course, "A Reasonable Faith."

WE are always glad to receive reports of Quarterly Meetings and other gatherings of Friends, but desire that our contributors should remember that our space is limited, and therefore the introduction of poetry and matter foreign to the business of the meetings and social visits connected therewith, are not advisable. We regretted not to be able to use a late report for this reason.

BIRTHS.

MITCHELL.—In New York, Fourth month 24, 1899, to Ferris A. and Jeannette Sutton Mitchell, a son, who is named Wesley Gardner.

MARRIAGES.

BROOMELL—COLES.—At the residence of the bride's parents, in Woodstown, N. J., under the care of Pilesgrove Monthly Meeting, Fifth month 25, 1899, Edward Broomell, of Russellville, Chester county, Pa., son of Samuel H. and Mary E. Broomell, and Tacie D. Coles, daughter of Lippincott and Mary Coles.

DEATHS.

BARTRAM.—In Newtown, Delaware county, Pa., Fifth month 31, 1899, Thomas P. Bartram, aged 71 years.

GIBBONS.—At the residence of his son-in-law, W. W. Ovington, near Salem, Ohio, Edward J. Gibbons, aged 80 years, 4 months, and 28 days.

LANE.—At his late residence in West Philadelphia, Pa., Fifth month 29, 1899, John G. Lane, in his 71st year. Interment at Millbrook, N. Y.

MATLACK.—In Camden, N. J., Sixth month 4, 1899, Hannah W. Matlack, aged 67 years, wife of Richard Matlack, and daughter of the late Joseph and Lydia Moore White, of Woodstown, N. J.

MOORE.—At White Plains, N. Y., Sixth month 2, 1899, Jonathan Robeson Moore, aged 85, son of the late Dr. John and Catharine Moore; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

REEDY.—In West Chester, Pa., Fifth month 31, 1899, Jenny L. Reedy, formerly of Darby, Pa. Funeral from Friends' Boarding Home, West Chester, on Sixth month 2, and interment at Friends' cemetery, south of the borough.

STEINBACH.—At her home, Berne, near Leesport, Pa., Fourth month 16, 1899, Mary D. Steinbach, widow of the late Aaron Steinbach, in her 76th year.

She was a member of Exeter Monthly Meeting, and upheld Friends' principles, remarking, "we come to meeting to wait upon the Lord." Although her husband was a deacon in the Baptist Church, she used the plain language, and with his approbation. Their home was always open to visiting Friends who enjoyed their hospitality. Being very industrious, after the decease of her husband, who had been an employé of the Reading Railroad Company, she made hundreds of the little red danger flags, one of which was carried by every train. Her long and useful life was closed by the infirmities of age.

BLOCH'S GREAT BOOK ON MODERN WAR.

II.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

As the Peace Conference is now sitting at The Hague, the following articles of the series by Prof. Mieuille, begun Fifth month 6, will be appropriate. His contrast between the radical views of Count Tolstoy and the Doukhobors, and the more moderate and, at present, practical views likely to prevail at the Conference, will be found of especial interest.

EDWARD H. MAGILL.

Swarthmore College.

FUTURE WAR IMPOSSIBLE.

Can the refusal of conscientious individuals to serve in the army, solve the problem of war? It is at least the course recommended by the illustrious Russian writer, Tolstoy, as celebrated for the uncompromising character of his doctrine of non-resistance as for the numerous works which have made of him the Shakespeare of contemporaneous Russian romance. In several articles published by the Daily Chronicle and War Against War in England, and by the Vita Internationale in Italy, he demonstrates with the rigorous and pitiless logic which the readers of the "Kreutzer Sonata" well understand, that it is impossible that this conference end in anything else than a failure, because the governments which will be represented there, by many hypocritical discourses, think only of concealing behind a pretence of humanitarianism the fact that they are founded upon force, and that by force alone can they continue to exist. Of course, we leave to Count Tolstoy all the responsibility of his affirmation, which besides, he willingly assumes. But we think it would be interesting to throw some light on a side of Russian society as yet but little understood, by making known to our readers a doctrine, which, although utopian to-day, will appear perhaps less so to the next generation.

The Doukhobors base all their religious faith on these words of Christ: "If any one smite thee on the right cheek, turn to him the other also." And they apply it literally. Also, and it is upon this ground only that they resist the authority of the government. They are entirely opposed to military service, and absolutely refuse to take up arms. Forcibly enrolled, we have seen them submit to imprisonment, to insult and blows, to the terrible punishment of the knout, with the firmness and resignation of the early Christians, with the courage of the martyrs of the early day.

These ideas are those which Count Tolstoy espouses and endeavors to promulgate. To a member of the Swedish parliament who suggested to him the idea of inducing the Russian government to submit to the Conference a proposition to substitute for obligatory military service a species of service in the public works for all those who, by reason of their religious opinions, should refuse to be soldiers, the illustrious Russian writer thus replied, on the 15th of last February:

"The idea expressed in your letter, that the easiest and surest means of arriving at general disarmament would be the individual refusal of each citizen to take part in military service, is perfectly correct. I even go so far as to believe that it is the only means which peoples have of delivering themselves from the horrible miseries of a constantly increasing militarism."

And the courageous thinker goes on to say that the idea of disarmament is a thousand times more utopian and more impracticable than the idea of the refusal of military service, since the one depends upon a fancied agreement between brigands armed to the teeth not to make use of the pistols and daggers with which they are equipped, while the second gains in force and power in proportion as men acquire a more just sense of their dignity, and of the inviolability of human life. This idea will triumph when the moral slavery in which they are still stagnating shall appear as detestable to men as the physical slavery of the serfdom of other times.

"As long," says Tolstoy, "as there shall be armies, great or small, these armies will be necessary; for no nation can be sure that there will not arise in a neighboring nation a Bismarck or a Napoleon, who, violating all treaties, will take possession of all which he desires. The moment we refuse to consider total disarmament, it is pure hypocrisy to speak of partial disarmament, for we know that victory is on the side of great battalions, and the object of all governments is to secure victory."

"Do you sincerely wish the suppression of war?" he cries: "Then suppress armies; compare war to a public plunder; proclaim the inviolability of human life; strike out of the vocabulary the word soldier, . . . otherwise all your efforts will be in vain, and you will build upon the sand."

While rendering homage to the sincerity and the purity of the motives of the eminent Russian writer; bowing respectfully before the ideal generosity of his conception; confessing ourselves even powerless to resist the logic of his arguments; we are obliged to acknowledge that the ideas of Count Tolstoy, do not bear the examination of practical reason. Certainly one cannot deny that when the day arrives when the murder of a man beyond our frontiers would be regarded with as much execration as the murder of a fellow citizen the question of war will be very nearly resolved. But we have not reached that point; and to-day the question does not present itself at all in the terms in which it is presented by the illustrious author of "Peace and War."

This Peace Conference is not called to suppress war; it will consider only whether it ought to be and can be suppressed. It is not even a question of dismissing a single cavalryman or foot-soldier. The Czar has simply said to the other governments: "We are ruining ourselves; the military expenses are constantly increasing; the people are crushed with taxes; poverty is an evil counsellor, and leads straight to anarchy. Is it not time to stop, to decide upon a statu quo, at least temporary, to proclaim a truce? And meanwhile, could we not seek the means of avoiding both the occasions of conflict, and the reasons for taking up arms? Can we not agree to establish a Tribunal of Arbitration, after the example of those whose respected decisions constitute already precedents for the international justice?

Those who may be inclined to treat as chimerical the proposition of the Czar, cannot avoid finding it eminently reasonable and practical if they compare it with the doctrine of Tolstoy and his disciples. And yet, this doctrine is only the application, pure and simple, of the maxims of the Gospel! And our poor Europe calls itself Christian! But Christian or not, Europe suffers; it is in agony under the iron gauntlet of Militarism; all the microbes of disorder and anarchy are multiplying and swarming in its blood, exhausted and impoverished by periodical bleedings. Should we await the safety of the palliatives which the Czar advises, or have recourse at once to the remedy, more energetic but perhaps mortal, of Tolstoyism?

The solution of the Doukhobors is not ours, at least for the present. We persist in the belief that, although less heroic, the remedies which Nicholas proposes are all the more sure on that account. Let the powers accept the principle of Arbitration; let them agree to decide that every recourse to arms must be preceded by a reference to international arbitrators; let the people be imbued with the idea that justice is of universal application, as well as humanity; let them be once thoroughly convinced that the duel between nations is like that between individuals;—only a vestige of the barbarism of other times. Then war will be ready to disappear; and the Doukhobors themselves, if any of them still remain, will acknowledge that for non-resistance of evil it is better to substitute the suppression of evil, and they will no longer wish to cry out, "War against War!"

P. MIEILLE,

Professor at the Lyceé de Tarbes, France.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

BLUE RIVER QUARTERLY MEETING.

It was my recent pleasure to attend Blue River Quarterly Meeting held at Highlands Creek, Ind., and while I know that the proceedings are usually reported for the INTELLIGENCER, perhaps some observations from an unofficial source may also be acceptable.

The meeting was held on Seventh-day, Fifth month 27, and the writer could but wonder what eastern Friends would think of representatives coming from a distance of over 280 miles. To make the comparison more plain, let Philadelphia Friends consider a trip to western Pennsylvania or to Johnstown, a full day's or night's travel on the railroad. Some of the representatives traveled this distance and some less, but most of them had at least 200 miles to go, and yet there were but few representatives who were not present.

The Meeting for Worship was addressed by David Wilson, Edward Coale, and Mary G. Smith. The business meeting that followed had much of interest, though but few subjects occupied its attention.

On First-day, the two meetings held for worship were indeed events that need more than passing notice. The warm, clear summer day was an ideal one and the people of Washington county, Ind., and vicinity poured forth by the hundreds. Estimates were made that there were from 1,000 to 1,500 persons present and some thought even 2,000. A largely attended First-day school was the first event of the day and it was a pleasure to see the active enthusiasm of both young and old and interest that all displayed. The Meeting for Worship that followed was attended by sufficient to crowd the building, it was stated by at least 500, and among this number were many of other denominations, including two clergymen. The silence was broken by Thomas Trueblood who appeared in supplication. He was followed by Edward Coale who spoke at some length. Mary G. Smith also had something to offer.

Then came a basket dinner on the grounds around the meeting and the inner man's wants were bountifully provided for.

At about 2 p. m., another Meeting for Worship was called, this time out of doors under the beautiful shade trees. To the writer this was new, but exceedingly pleasant. The silence out in the summer shade with the music of the birds was very impressive. It was broken by Elizabeth H. Coale, who appeared in supplication. Edward Coale followed, speaking at some length and quite acceptably. A feature of the occasion was the outpouring of the younger generation and the close attention given to all that was spoken. I wish that every Friend could have been present and could have received the renewing of the spirit, and the strengthening that such an event inspires. It would settle all doubts that Quakerism was far from decay and would send each home with a desire for increased effort in our religious work.

This article would not be complete without some note of the whole souled welcome given by the Friends around and near Salem, Ind., to their visitors, and the hospitality so freely and fully offered. This, outside of the meeting held, does much to increase one's love for our Society, and I can only repeat that I wish more of the eastern Friends could visit Blue River Quarterly Meeting and receive its warm and inspiring welcome.

C. J. E.

Chicago, Sixth month 1, 1899.

LETTER FROM NEW MEXICO.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I HAVE been thinking of late that some word from this far-away place would be of interest to a few at least of your many readers, and it will also show you that we do not want to be entirely forgotten. This is the fifth spring I have spent in this valley and I have never before experienced anything so unpleasant. There has been no rain worth mentioning since last Seventh month and the wind has swept over the valley this past spring carrying clouds of dust and sand. The grass has not started on the ranges and the scarcity of food and water is causing train-loads of sheep and cattle to be shipped to the north for pasture. Fruits of all kinds promised to be very plenty, but a hard freeze on the night of the fifth of this month ruined it. Market gardens were nearly ruined, causing a scarcity of early vegetables, and provisions of all kinds are higher than usual. Alfalfa escaped with the least injury and will soon be in bloom. Farther up the valley it was frozen, and below us, at Las Cruces, the river has afforded little water and the crop is very poor. There has been plenty of water here, so far, for irrigation. The past season has been very unfavorable for invalids and many have died. Others were sent back to their homes by the physicians who were conscientious enough to tell them their true condition and the hopelessness of it.

A notice of the death of Aaron M. Powell appeared in our daily paper, and caused us to regret that so useful a member of the Society has passed away.

The Territorial Convention of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union was held at Albuquerque last month. We were greatly favored with the presence of Mrs. Stevens and Miss Anna Gordon, who were on their way to San Francisco. Mrs. Stevens spoke very earnestly to us of the help the Temperance cause has always received from the Society of Friends and of the high estimation in which we, as a society, are held. In fact we find this to be the case wherever we go.

I have joined a small reading circle for sake of more knowledge and companionship. In connection with other reading we have been studying the Old Testament. I have found the lessons in the INTELLIGENCER of great benefit and they have shown me what a true study of the Bible is, and they make the old way seem very childish and superficial.

FANNIE C. LOWNES.

Albuquerque, New Mexico, Fifth month 19, 1899.

MISSION WORK OF QUAKERISM.

From "Old-Fashioned Quakerism," the little volume by the late William Pollard, of England.

LET us have no misgivings as to our quiet service and our silent waiting. For silence is often the audience-chamber of God, as his children soon discover, when they are delivered from the bondage of conventional systems. We have to show that prayer, and praise, and worship are not questions of words, and outward performances, and that words do not form their only or even their best and truest expression.

Let us pray for a living, anointed ministry, in all departments of service; and let us show by our activity, under the power and guidance of the Spirit, that it needs no clerical order to do the work of the church.

Let the Gospel message, through us, be a message not of mere theology, but of power and light and life. We hold that people are not to be saved by believing a doctrine, however deducible from Scripture, but by believing a Person who can be known, and trusted, and loved. Let us faithfully proclaim this heart-reaching truth. In this day of unsettlement and upheaval, when human theologies are crumbling away, there must be a large place for this old-fashioned Quaker teaching. To do the aggressive work that belongs to our church, we need mission meetings everywhere, of the true sort; based not on the Methodist model, but on the Quaker model.

And perhaps there is no mission meeting so truly on this model,—so simple, so natural, so suited to the times in which we live,—as the Friends' Adult School. We think of it chiefly in connection with the poor; but its principle is as fitted for the rich as for the poor, for the cultured, as for the uncultured. It means simply a social meeting of Christian or seeking people, gathered on a footing of equality, and seeking to be one another's helpers in the Lord. It needs no eloquent lips, no professional training, no harmonium, no hymn book, no manual of theology other than the Bible, to make such a meeting a quiet but real success. Its one essential requirement is that compound of living faith and human love which we call Christian sympathy; and this, as we know, is one great essential in all service for Christ. There is an urgent need for the wide extension of this unpretending work, and the fact may yet come to be fully recognized, that in each Adult School there are germs of a church,—which should be nurtured and developed, under the fostering care of the meeting.

If in the manifold opportunities and duties that lie around us, we are content to mind our calling, and seek to serve, as our forefathers served, we may yet look for a grand resurrection of the spirit of true Quakerism; and may hopefully take our part in promoting a real revival of primitive, unclerical Christianity throughout the world.

LIVING, like reading, is largely a matter of emphasis. As, in reading a sentence, a strong voice or a distinct articulation counts nothing if the emphasis is placed on the wrong word; so, in one's daily life, a strong vitality or a distinct purpose is of no value if the emphasis is laid upon the wrong thing. To learn where to place the emphasis in a sentence, one must first learn the meaning of the sentence: to learn where to place the emphasis in life, one must first learn the meaning of life.—S. S. Times.

96

"UPON what does the happiness of our lives depend: Our wealth or poverty? No, for there is no more happiness (and no less) in the palace than in the cottage. Upon intellect or education? No, for the ignorant are often more cheerful and contented than the men of mind. Upon opportunity? No, for happiness is not a thing of chance. Only upon character does happiness depend, and our characters are in our own hands."

BUNYAN pictures a man with a muck rake. His head is bent down and he sees none of the beauties of earth or sky. All his days are spent grubbing in the soil. The person who gives up his life to gathering gold becomes a man with a muck rake. He sacrifices life's best things for the sake of dirt.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

FLEMING, PA.—Our Association meeting, held Fifth month 28, 1899, was opened with the reading of the 17th chapter of John by the president, followed by the reading and approval of the minutes of last meeting. After roll-call there was a pretty selection from Florence N. Cleaver, entitled the "Rhyme of the Seasons." Sue Underwood read a late report from the Young Friends' Association held at Horsham, Pa.

The Question, "What is True Heroism?" was referred to Edith W. Cleaver, who said that those who fight unseen battles, or in other words, "rule their own spirits," are truly heroic. Ann Moore, of West Branch Monthly Meeting, was present, and said that the true heroes are those who do their duty bravely every day, be it great or small.

Chapman Underwood answered the Question, "How many books in the Old and New Testaments?" Mary J. Fisher gave some late news concerning the Doukhobors.

The Question "Which has the greatest influence on the formation of character, Education, Environment, or Hereditary Influence?" was answered by the Secretary, who dwelt upon each one separately, and the influence it has to bear upon the individual for good or for evil, of the importance of each one, but especially of education, for the acquiring of which the individual is responsible, while the other two are beyond his control; he must have the education both intellectual and spiritual, to be able to turn to good account his environments and hereditary effects, in order to secure a well-rounded character. Others remarked that all three conditions are necessary for the formation of character.

Voluntary work consisted of the reading of an account of Booker T. Washington and his work, by Eva W. Cleaver, and a Poem, "Example," by the secretary.

A few words of encouragement were given by Ann Moore, whose visit was much appreciated. She spoke of the faithfulness of "the few." NANNIE FISHER, Sec.

LANGHORNE.—The last regular monthly meeting of the Young Friends' Association previous to adjourning for the summer was held Fifth month 27, in the meeting-house on Maple avenue.

After a brief period of profound silence the meeting was declared open, and in the absence of the secretary, Sara Allen officiated and proceeded by reading the minutes of the last meeting, which were adopted as read.

Then followed a recitation by Eddie Gillingham, which was succeeded by a paper on "Education," by Louisa Osmond. President Wildman said that the subject of the paper was an excellent one, and offered wide room for discussion. Prof. W. W. Birdsall responded by showing the attitude of Friends toward the promulgating of education, and spoke of the great good accomplished by George Fox, who very early in his ministry set up schools both in England and America, and regarded his accomplishment in the advancement of education as a most notable one. He gave the Puritans the credit of inaugurating the public school system, but claimed that the work done in the Friends' schools is the best, because of the strict observance of religious concern. In his closing remarks he took occasion to refer to his college friend and noted journalist, Robert Underwood Johnson, who recently had told him that while he had gotten far away from Friends since leaving school, he keenly realized the true view of life then instilled, which tinged and deepened and widened his character.

Emma Morrell was next on the program, and gave a reading entitled, "A Word from Angels." The address of the evening followed, by Prof. Birdsall, who paid high tributes to the work that is being done by the Young Friends' Associations and First-day Schools, and again briefly referred to George Fox, who was the founder of Quakerism in 1648-66, telling how in those early days in spite of severe and cruel persecutions, he and others labored and succeeded in establishing the Society of Friends in England and America. He said that it was through the efforts of the Friends that the people were set free from the domination of the priesthood, and that they also struck the shackles from the slaves. He laid special stress on the purity of life which from the beginning so honorably distinguished them as a class, that unquestionably exercised a sanitary influence on the public at large, widely leavening the mind of Christendom.

The advantages of Swarthmore College, as a place where the true principles of Quakerism are inculcated, naturally came in for a friendly word from Prof. Birdsall. In speaking of the organization of First-day Schools, the Professor narrated an unsuccessful effort of his own in a meeting-house where William Penn once preached, and where to-day a First-day School is slowly growing. That schools recently started at Lansdowne and Ambler are flourishing, and how the teachers of First-day Schools at West Chester last year spent their vacations in endeavoring to open new schools. He also regarded it as a sacred duty for Friends to open First-day Schools when removing into localities where there are none, thereby keep alive and perpetuate Quakerism—which influence should surround the young at the age when most susceptible to evil influences. "It is just possible that some time it may come to pass that Quakerism may fail, because of the actions of those who follow us," said Prof. Birdsall. He also referred to the plainness of dress as being regarded as a uniform, and the speech a mere dialect. Notwithstanding these utterances, he contended in his closing remarks that there was no time since the days of George Fox when the people were more ready for Quakerism.

At the conclusion of Prof. Birdsall's address President Wildman extended an opportunity for asking the speaker questions.

A unanimous vote of thanks was extended to Prof. Birdsall for his excellent address. * *

NORRISTOWN.—A very large audience assembled at Friends' Home, Swede and Powell streets, last evening, the occasion being the meeting of Norristown Friends' Association. Many visitors from surrounding meetings were in attendance, and every effort was made by the efficient matron, Caroline Eyre, and all concerned in its management, to make the guests of the evening cordially welcome.

A prominent feature of the program was an essay on the "Lesson Leaves in Use," by Mary R. Livezey. The writer regards them as excellent, recalling attention as they do to the beautiful lessons of Old Testament history, the topics being treated in a way that is calculated to remove superstitious reverence for the Bible, and give it true place in Christian development. Remarks were made by Isaac Roberts and others.

Mary Ann Lownes read an essay, "First-Day School Teaching," by Abbie Hall, of Swarthmore, relating more especially to the instruction of younger pupils.

"What Shall We Do to Make Our Meetings More Interesting?" was very intelligently answered by John F. Kinsey. Suitable comments were made by Emma B. Conrow and others.

Annie Ambler read a quaint old letter written by a Nantucket maiden to her parents in 1745. Elizabeth Y. Cooper vouched for its genuineness.

Ellwood Roberts presented copies of Dr. George Dana Boardman's pamphlet on "Disarmament and Arbitration," from Howard M. Jenkins, and in doing so mentioned that the donor, one of the most useful members of the Society, had been sent kindly greetings in the name of the Association on his departure for a three months' sojourn in Europe, where he will travel among British Friends and faithfully represent the body of American Friends to which he belongs, now in close sympathy with those on the other side of the Atlantic.

A discussion took place on the distinction (if any) between morality and religion, participated in by many of those present. The topic was opened by Charles Simpson. The general feeling was there can be no morality without religion, whatever is good in human conduct resulting from the operations of Divine Grace on the heart and life.

The next meeting will be held at Plymouth meeting-house, when an adjournment for the summer will occur. The first fall session will be at Valley Meeting.

Do not prevent others from enjoying what you yourself do not care to enjoy.

Educational Department.

FRIENDS' SUMMER SCHOOL.

THE sessions of Friends' Summer School, for religious study and the help of First-day school teachers and others will be held at Birmingham, England, Ninth month 4th to 15th, 1899.

The last Summer School, at Scarborough, was designed to be helpful to those who, in any way, are called to be teachers. Those who know most of the difficulties as well as the delights of teaching, will most surely appreciate the need of often sitting in the seat of the learner; and to such it is desired to offer again the possibility of enjoying, for a short time, the refreshment of invigorating teaching. This, however, is not all. While deeply sensible that as a body Friends have allowed their intellectual equipment for God's service to be too much neglected, the Committee feel that it would be fatal to exalt the preparations of the mind at the expense of the deeper preparation of the spirit. If, therefore, the medium of a Summer School has been chosen as that best fitted to accomplish the ends in view, it should be clearly understood that the Committee do not thereby limit the ideal of the gathering to an intellectual treat. That all who attend may be drawn into a closer communion with the Divine Spirit, and into a fuller consciousness of the responsibilities and privileges of our high calling of God in Christ Jesus, is motive for, and, it is hoped, may be the outcome of, a second Summer School.

Birmingham is healthily situated about 500 feet above the sea, and is surrounded by country which is well suited for summer excursions. Such historic localities as Kenilworth, Warwick, and Stratford-on-Avon, any many other places of archaeological interest in the pretty rural districts of Warwickshire and Worcestershire (offering special attractions to the photographer) are within easy reach, and to these half-day excursions will be arranged by road, rail and, cycle. The Committee of the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens have kindly promised the free use of their grounds to members of the School, and the gardens will be found a pleasant resort for those who do not incline to be frequently taking excursions. Facilities will also be afforded for golf, tennis, etc.

The following are among the subjects which the lectures are expected to cover: (1) "The Growth of Revelation on Moral Questions, in Old Testament and Christian Times." (2) "Spiritual Illuminations: Its Privileges and Responsibilities"—(a) A Course of Lectures on Francis of Assisi; (b) A Course of Studies in the Lives of Great Mystical Teachers, (i) John; (ii) Tauler and Boehme; (iii) Terstegen; (iv) Isaac Penington. (3) "The True Conception of the Church." (a) Lectures on the Spiritual Conception of the Church; the Eucharist in the light of recent New Testament Study. (b) The Responsibilities of a Free Ministry. (4) "Lectures on the Old Testament"—(a) Israel and its Enemies; (b) The Poetical Literature of the Old Testament. (5) "Lectures on the New Testament"—(a) Studies in the Synoptic Problem; (b) Luke as a Historian; (c) Pauline Theology.

Among the lecturers will be John William Graham, Dr. J. Rendel Harris, John Wilhelm Rowntree, and others known in America.

For information as to membership, tickets, lodging, etc., address Edward Grubb, General Secretary, 22 Crosby Road, Birkdale, Southport, England.

BALTIMORE FRIENDS' ELEMENTARY AND HIGH SCHOOL.—

A reception was given last night in the lecture-room of the Park Avenue Friends' Meeting-House, in honor of the new faculty of the Friends' Elementary and High School. The school combines Professor Lamb's School, on McCulloh street, with the Friends' school heretofore conducted in connection with the meeting. At the reception last night there was a large attendance of students, patrons, and friends of the two schools during the hours from 8 to 10 o'clock. Refreshments were served by the ladies. Jonathan K. Taylor, chairman of the school committee, welcomed the visitors in a short address, and congratulated those present upon the flattering prospects of the new school.

The new faculty, in whose honor the reception was given, includes the following: Principal, Prof. John W. Gregg, graduate of Cornell University, history; associate principal, Prof. Eli M. Lamb, now principal of the Friends' Elementary and High School; Prof. Stephen C. Harry, graduate of Johns Hopkins University, mathematics and astronomy; Prof. Wm. S. Pike, of Harvard University, chemistry, physics, biology, and physical culture; Frances E. Hartley, graduate of Ann Arbor College, Michigan, classics; Anna M. Berger, modern languages; Rachel E. Lamb, literature, rhetoric, etc.; Emma J. Broomell, graduate of Ann Arbor, Michigan, reading and literature; principal of primary department, Helen H. Ely, of West Chester, Pa., State Normal School, assisted by Louisa P. Blackburn, at present principal of Friends' School, Park Avenue; principal of kindergarten, Hannah T. Yardley, assisted by Dora Curtiss and Louise Thomas; Elizabeth Walton, music. The teachers of drawing, painting, and manual training are not yet selected.

It has been decided to build a roof-garden for the Kindergarten. Arrangements are in process to provide a room sufficiently large to allow the students all to eat their lunches at the same time, and to provide hot lunch for those who desire it. In addition to the gymnasium, 30 by 62 feet, and other large play-rooms, besides the large yard connected with the school, it is designed as soon as practicable to procure a lot in the suburbs of the city for a play-ground, requiring a larger range, so that the school in this respect, as well as in all the departments of learning, will be fully provided for. The building now in course of construction at a cost of $35,000 will be completed and furnished in time for the opening of the school in September.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE NOTES.—The final examinations, which take place this week, mark the close of the Spring term. These examinations will be made the basis for the awarding of the three honor scholarships, named respectively for Deborah Fisher Wharton, Samuel J. Underhill, and Anson Latham, to one member from each of the three undergraduate classes.

In 1900 a new chair in the Department of History will be inaugurated. This will offer a course in Ancient and Biblical Literature, and will be filled by Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, a graduate of Johns Hopkins University. Dr. Holmes will come to Swarthmore fresh from a year's study and travel abroad.

Dr. Percy Moore, of the University of Pennsylvania, has had charge of the Department of Biology during the severe illness of Dr. Trotter.

Doctor Appleton recently read before the Sophomore Class in English Milton's Comus, and gave interesting reminiscences of his pilgrimage to Ludlow Castle, where the beautiful pastoral play was performed in 1634.

The great interest which is being shown in the game of golf has led to the organization of a golfing club among the devotees of the game, and this is to become a part of the Athletic Association.

'99.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

ISAAC WILSON writing from Bloomfield, Ont., under date of Fifth month 29, says:

I must intimate our misfortune last night in the burning of my barn, by lightning, with most of the contents. Some insurance, but a considerable loss. Stock saved except one horse and two calves, but we have much to be thankful for.

The address of Edward H. Magill through the Seventh and Eighth months will be care of Prof. Thomas A. Jenkins, Vanderbilt University, Nashville, Tennessee.

The address of Beatrice Magill until Ninth month 1, will be, care of Brown, Shipley & Co., Founders Court, London.

THE Trustees of Amherst College, appointed to select a new President of the College, have extended an invitation to Rev. George C. Harris, President of the Andover Theological Seminary and professor of that institution, to accept the position.

Literature.

"OLD SWEDES' CHURCH" is the title of a booklet issued for the recent two hundredth anniversary of the quaint, historic old house of worship near the banks of the Christiana Creek at Wilmington, Delaware. Robert Shaw, whose beautiful drawings are rapidly coming into public favor, contributes ten pen sketches of the picturesque old church and its graveyard. They breathe the very spirit of tranquility and repose. The text is mainly from the pen of Henry C. Conrad, of the Delaware bar. A letter from the late Ambassador Bayard, who was a lifelong parishoner of Old Swedes, is quoted. It contains this tribute to the first settlers and their living descendants: "While I have never heard of a very rich man among them, yet I have never heard of a pauper. I cannot recall the name of a statesman or distinguished law-giver among them, nor of a rogue nor a felon. As good citizens they helped to form what Mr. Lincoln called the 'plain people' of the country, and I have lived among their descendants, and know their civic virtues have been transmitted."

A Poet's Last Verses.—In these days when the affairs of the hour so fill our thoughts, it is good to turn to the utterance of one whose eyes were fixed upon the things that endure. Such a one was Edward Rowland Sill. A graduate of Yale, a student of Harvard Divinity School, a teacher of English literature, beloved by many discerning and sympathetic spirits, passing from the world he so loved, in 1887, at the age of forty-six, this rare man left a small body of fugitive verses which is held in high estimation. Elizabeth Stuart Phelps said: "I do not think that the loss to our literature, in missing the full blossom of his powers, has ever been fully estimated."

Three slender volumes hold his poetic message, the third and, we are told, final one having just been issued under the title "Hermione and Other Poems."

Sill's work forms a permanent contribution to American poetry. It has beauty, sincerity, delicacy and charm. His finest pieces are perhaps included in the former volume, yet the present one gives us some choice lyrics. Here is his picture of a star shining on a child at prayer:

"A far-off lucent world, so bright,
Stooping to touch with tender light
That little gown at evening prayer:
It seems a condescension rare,—
Heaven round a common child to glow!
Ah! wiser eyes of angels know
The star, a toy but roughly wrought;
The child, God's own most loving thought."

Louise Chandler Moulton has paid this tribute to the poet's rare character: "He had a cultured and inspiring mind, and his friends remember him with unusual tenderness of affection. I, who never had the pleasure of knowing him, can well understand from his work how high and noble was his nature; and since it is the pure in heart who shall see God, one fancies him gone on into the divine life, scarcely changed from the man to whom life was divine even here." (Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

The current Scribner's continues the delightful letters of Robert Louis Stevenson. Here is his strong testimony as to the true spiritual life: "I wonder if you or my father ever thought of the obscurities that lie upon human duty from the negative form in which the Ten Commandments are stated, or of how Christ was so continually substituting affirmations. 'Thou shalt not' is but an example; 'Thou shalt' is the law of God. It was this that seems meant in the phrase that 'not one jot nor tittle of the law should pass.' But what led me to the remark is this: A kind of black, angry look goes with that statement of the law of negatives. 'To love one's neighbor as one's self' is certainly much harder, but states life so much more actively, gladly, and kindly, that you can begin to see some pleasure in it, and till you can see pleasure in these hard choices and bitter necessities, where is there any good news to men? It is much more important to do right than not to do wrong; further, the one is possible, the other has always been and will ever be impossible; and the faithful design to do right is accepted by God; that seems to me to be the Gospel, and that was how Christ delivered us from the law."

The Review of Reviews has an important article on "Oliver Cromwell and the National Church of England," by W. T. Stead. Ford Madox Brown's picture of "Cromwell on his Farm" is given, as are several other copies of noted paintings of the famous Protector. One of these represents Cromwell dictating to his Latin Secretary, John Milton. The serene, spiritual face of the poet and the stern, determined look of the soldier make a striking contrast. Cromwell's claim to our high admiration is thus stated: "Cromwell is no fair-weather saint. When all goes well with us we are apt to forget him, and the baser souls among us even treat his memory as their ancestors treated his corpse. But whenever the nation finds itself in deep waters, when our security is threatened by foreign enemies and our peace by the lawless forces of anarchy in high places or in low, then there springs instinctively from the popular heart the yearning cry for Cromwell. Papist, ritualist, republican, or socialist, however much they may abhor this, that, or the other act or characteristic of the lord protector, forget them all when in extremity. Then they only remember that Cromwell was, of all men who ever spoke our tongue the supreme embodiment of masterful, practical common-sense. He was the man in whom hope shone as a pillar of fire after it had gone out in other men. He succeeded where all others had failed. He was conscious rectitude triumphant, the hero-saint of English patriotism."

W. D. Howells in the May number of the North American Review, in writing of "The New Poetry," has this to say of the Pennsylvania poet, Lloyd Mifflin: In the volume of sonnets, called "At the Gates of Song," this poet makes his appeal to the best in us, with a mastery of his instrument as extraordinary as the sense is high and noble. What strikes one most in this very striking group of poems is the power, both pictorial and intellectual, which represents a new quality of thinking and feeling, or a new way of rendering the serious and significant aspects of life. If such a book were altogether to fail of recognition it would be the most damaging witness against a time which I think has been unjustly accounted prosaic. But a little more courage to know what is undeniably great, although it is our own, seems to me still desirable in our criticism, and when that comes this poetry will have its reward.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

CONTEMPORARY SPAIN AS SHOWN BY HER NOVELISTS. A Compilation by Mary Wright Plummer, with an Introduction by Edward E. Hale, D.D. 7½x5 inches. Pp. xiii. and 200. New York and London: Truslove, Hanson, & Combs.

THE FIRST BOOK OF BIRDS. By Olive Thorne Miller. With Eight Colored Plates and other Illustrations. 8x6 inches. Pp. 149. $1.00. Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co. (Received through H. T. Coates & Co., Philadelphia.)

"Who plants a tree for future years
Stays not with his own joys and tears,
But reaches out with thoughtful care,
With ardent hope and earnest prayer,
To make more bright and glad the morn
Of generations yet unborn;
The paths of future days to bless,
Which his own feet may never press,
With gifts of love the work is fraught,
'Tis prompted by no selfish thought.
A giver he of blessings free
Who plants a tree."

LORD, to thy signal-light the trees
In leaf and flower reply;
Let not my heart, more dull than these,
Alone unawakened lie. —John B. Tabb.

THE SILENT YEARS.

A MASTER, followed by a band
Of twelve disciples through the land,
Teaching as never man had taught,
Of truths beyond our human thought ;
A wonder-worker, at whose word
The blind eyes saw, the deaf ears heard,
And death itself, its long reign o'er,
Unloosed its icy hand of power ;
A King ; who held no earthly throne
Yet claimed all nations as his own ;
A victim lifted up on high
That all the world might see him die ;
A risen Saviour, by the sea
Walking with men in Galilee—
Thus to our eyes the Lord appears
Throughout the three mysterious years
Which sum the ministry and death
Of Jesus Christ of Nazareth.

Yet there were other years than these—
A child beneath the olive trees,
A lad who learned and who obeyed,
A worker in a humble trade,
A Man amid the life of men,
Who knew its drudgery, its pain,
Its homely joys, its heavy fears,
For thirty silent, loving years.
Ah ! here as deep a message lies
As in the cross and sacrifice.
And here the Son of God is shown
The Son of Man, and claims his own.

Yea, even as thirty is to three,
So, if our eyes had power to see,
Not only by the church's door
Christ stands, but oftener in the roar
Of busy marts, by plane and loom,
Within the factory's crowded room,
Where laborers drudge with arm and tool,
On wharf and ship, in shop and school.
And claims each worker, by this sign,
"I too have toiled ; thy toil is mine ;
I too have lived thy life of care
And borne the burdens thou dost bear ;
Not from My cross I call to thee,
But from thy side—come, learn of Me !"

O Son of Man ! grant us to see
Thy full, divine humanity !
We exile Thee in shrines and creeds
Far from the many and their needs,
Forgetting that Thy chosen spot
Was just the common, human lot ;
Yet still Thou comest back again
To stand among Thy brother-men,
And still, if we would serve Thee best,
Love to Thy brethren is Thy test ;
Yea, on Thy cross we look to see
Thy hands, nail-pierced so cruelly,
And find them still the hands that drove
The plane, and blessed in holy love
The household meal—the hands that thus,
Divine yet human, hold for us
All help for human life below,
All hope for that to which we go.

—Priscilla Leonard.

IF WE KNEW.

If we knew the cares and trials,
Knew the efforts all in vain
And the bitter disappointment—
Understood the loss and gain,—
Would the grim external roughness
Seem, I wonder, just the same ?
Should we help, where now we hinder ?
Should we pity where we blame ?

—Arabella Carter.

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

(Continued from page 442.)

the life and labors of Aaron M. Powell,—John W. Hutchinson presiding. Letters were read from Wm. Lloyd Garrison, Eldridge T. Garret, Anna Garland Spencer, Charlotte L. Lewis, Grace H. Dodge, White Water First-day School, Frances Robinson, Mary Travilla, Isaac H. Clothier, Leona M. Whinnery, chairman of the Ohio Philanthropic Committee, George Powell ; many of these being personal friends as well as co-laborers in the cause he espoused. They contained many tributes to his inestimable worth. "He stands second to none in his century ; his modest manner, and genial, winning way, made him magnetic and his words more potent." "A pure-minded, tender-hearted husband, his wife being his alter ego." "A life of unfeigned religion, saturated by love to God and to man." "He never turned his back on a good cause, nor put his hand to a bad one." "The highest honor we pay him is to keep on with the work." "The little things of life were never pushed aside because great moral reforms were needed." "A life of sacrifice commenced when young by giving up a college education to labor for the abolition of slavery ; he has entered the company of the redeemed of all ages, no purer spirit than his being there." His brother rejoiced that his example was with us so long that it cannot be diminished.

Aaron Morrison, chairman of Indiana Philanthropic Committee, also sent a tribute. A sketch of his life [printed elsewhere in this issue.—EDS.] had been prepared for the occasion by Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond, of Swarthmore, in which she—his only sister—bears testimony to the fact that he "turned her toward the hills of God, because he led and showed the way." He had often said his "wealth consisted not in great possessions, but in his few wants." Gently and mercifully was his desire granted that he might work to the last. Lydia Price said it was a joy to look upon his countenance after death, for the lines of blessedness and peace were deepened. When the breath left his body it seemed as though those present were indeed in Heavenly places. Dr. De Costa, of the Episcopal Church, felt to say "amen" to all that had been voiced. The speaker believed a tremendous responsibility rests with Friends of the United States to bring forward someone to bear the banner aloft as he carried it. William C. Billeu said his last words seemed to gather the essence of his life. He never seemed ruffled, always so gentle in a city where nervousness runs riot ; absolutely unselfish, he kept himself in the background. He never asked what was popular, but only what was right and required of him. The Lord's name has been honored by the work of this loved servant. Henry Blackwell felt after the first shock "it was a sheaf of corn fully ripe." With his shrinking, unpretentious manner he would doubtless prefer to be forgotten, while the principles for which he lived should arouse enthusiasm. William W. Birdsall quoted Dr. Furness, "You may serve the Truth all you life, but you will never be able to do for Truth as much as it has done for you." What the Truth did for Aaron M. Powell, and through him for us, let us see to it that the Truth does for us. Robert S. Haviland paid a tribute to him as a friend. Emma Willets spoke of the power behind his gentleness, and begged mothers to teach children as he would desire. S. Elizabeth Stover believed there was an echo in each young heart that all were better for having known him. Edward Hutchinson felt that they of Plainfield Meeting realized their privilege in having had him amongst them, and their individual responsibility for all time, to live worthily.

(To be concluded.)

SAMUEL M. JANNEY'S SELF-POSSESSION.

[The following note is contributed by Jacob M. Troth, of Commonwealth, Ga.]

SOON after my removal to Virginia, in 1857, I attended Fairfax Quarterly Meeting, held in Alexandria. The old house was filled to its utmost capacity, and as is usual in those meetings held in Virginia, the gathering was made up largely of persons not members. In his sermon on that occasion Samuel M. Janney dwelt at some length on the views of Friends in regard to negro slavery. It will be recollected that it was a critical subject at that time, in that place, and during a part of his discourse there was a hum of subdued criticism among members of his audience. I was fearful of more decided demonstrations; but Samuel proceeded with his discourse with perfect self-possession, apparently unconscious of the evidences of disapprobation, and there were no more serious consequences.

During the continuance of the war, all religious meetings and First-day schools were suspended in our locality, except the meetings of Friends held at Woodlawn. These were regularly held with, (if my recollection is correct), one exception.

For some time after the close of the war, the situation in that respect remained unchanged. No religious opportunities of the kind mentioned were available to that community except the meetings of Friends. Some of us felt there was a responsibility resting upon us in the matter. On returning to our homes from a social visit, my wife, Sallie E. Lloyd, and Ella Walton, after some conversation on the subject, decided to organize a union First-day school (Friends here had none, up to that time) on the next First-day, and gave notice at once, which was easily done, as the two young women were teachers, and could send word through their pupils and otherwise. It resulted in a good attendance; other denominations taking part, and it developed into a very large school, the adult class consisting at one time of about one hundred. Samuel M. Janney was much interested in this movement, and gave us the benefit of his counsel, and the encouragement of his presence whenever he was within reach of us.

MORAL poise is a rare and excellent thing. Most of us tend to be one-sided in our virtues—that is, our virtues are all of the same kind. We ought to offset them by some sort of ballast on the other side.

THE MAN WITH THE BRANDED HAND.

A POEM by Whittier, "The Branded Hand," is addressed to a Massachusetts seaman, Captain Jonathan Walker, and was written in 1846. And who was Captain Jonathan? His story is one of deep interest.

He was of Harwick, on Cape Cod, and he had a coasting vessel. About 1840, he contracted to build a section of a railroad in Florida. Among his workmen were several negroes. Several of these, being slaves, longed for freedom, and at length, in 1844, they persuaded him to aid them in escaping to the island of New Providence, (British), where they would be free. The attempt was made, but after doubling the Capes of Florida, Captain Walker was prostrated by a violent sickness. The wrecking sloop Catharine came upon them and took them back to Key West. He was put in irons on board a vessel for Pensacola, and thrust in the hold. At Pensacola he was placed in a cell, the floor of which was still saturated with the blood of a man who two days before had committed suicide. Here he was chained to the floor, and was not allowed a bed, a chair, or a table. The United States Court tried and convicted him; he was sentenced to be branded on the right hand with the capitals "S. S."; to stand one hour in the pillory, undergo an imprisonment, and pay $600 for each slave, (there were seven), and pay all costs.

He bore the branding and pillory without flinching. It was said that a "renegade Yankee" applied the branding-iron to his hand. He lay eleven months in prison with a heavy chain on his leg, which the jailer would not remove even for the purpose of changing his clothing. His Northern friends, by a herculean effort, raised a sufficient sum to liquidate his fines, and in the summer of 1845 he was set at liberty.

Whittier's poem begins:

"Welcome home again, brave seaman! with thy thoughtful brow and gray"—

Captain Walker was a man of forty-six when the incident occurred. He died in Michigan, Fourth month 20, 1878, and visitors to Muskegon, in that State will find in the cemetery there a monument to him.

"I remember," says a writer in the Boston Transcript, "seeing 'the man with the branded hand,' more than thirty years ago, when he was visiting his brother in his native town on Cape Cod. He had the letters S. S.—slave stealer—branded on the palm of his right hand." He was a large, noble-looking man, and I well remember the almost superstitious awe with which we children regarded him."

"THE old words, memento mori (remember death) cannot be written too plainly over the doorway of the temple of our contemplation. Let us remember death, not to be frightened from the natural course of life, from the great highway in the light, into some artificial and dreary way which has been created in the years of fear and dread by those who dared not face the issues of a normal world and a simple life, but rather that your feet stray not from the path of duty nor your life falter by the way. To live as though this day were thy very last will be, then, to make thee worthy of another, or here, or there."

PRAISING ONE'S SELF.

A GOOD and wise writer has said: "Do not blow your own trumpet; nor, which is the same thing, ask other people to blow it. No trumpeter ever rose to be a general." The last sentence is one which they should remember who are conscious of having been playing the role of trumpeter. We would better, therefore, learn to be silent about ourselves. Anything we do that is really beautiful or noble will find a way to declare itself. If we have in us worthy qualities, they will proclaim their own worthiness, just as flowers reveal their hiding-places by their fragrance. Goodness cannot be hid.

Jesus taught: "Let your light so shine before men, that they may see your good works, and glorify your Father." Light is not talk, but the effluence of life—our life is to shine before men, not our words. The aim is not to glorify ourself, but our Father. Jesus gave other exhortations—that we should not do our righteousness before men to be seen of them; that we should not send a trumpeter before us when we do our alms, in order that people may know of it; that we should not pray so that people may see us and know how pious we are.

Thus talking about one's self is not only a violation of good taste, but is also a violation of the spirit and the teaching of Christ. At the same time it defeats its own very purpose, dimming the light it seeks to enhance.—Selected.

Discovery of Valuable Pictures.

A MOST remarkable transaction in picture dealing has just occurred. An aged negro, named Marcel, who keeps a curiosity shop in Missouri, has long boasted of possessing a collection of rare paintings of the highest value. Not much serious attention was paid to his assertions until the other day, when a lawyer arrived from New York on a special mission to see Marcel, to whom he explained that he called as the representative of George Gould. He offered to strike a bargain there and then, offering $600,000 for nineteen of the paintings, subject to an examination of them by experts, who would report satisfactorily on their authenticity. But at the same time he paid $5,000 cash down for the first option in this sale. Marcel refused to part company, even for a short time, with his paintings, unless they were insured. There was some difficulty before an insurance company could be found to accept the risk, but finally the Express Company consented to insure the nineteen paintings for $200,000. This collection is now on its way to New York for examination. The discovery, for such it is regarded by most people, excites the greatest interest. Marcel refuses to disclose the exact sources from which the pictures reached him, beyond saying that they were once the property of great families of the old Louisiana aristocracy, now reduced nearly to poverty. The paintings sent to New York for examination include "Mary Magdalene" and "Christ with the Cross," by Rubens; "The Coast of France," by Turner; two Corregios; and examples of the work of Raphael, Claude Lorraine, and Van de Velde.—[Exchange.]

The Pansy.

THE pansy is a lover of cool weather. It gives its largest, finest flowers, and its most profuse crop of them in the spring and during early summer, and, if the plants have been properly treated, again in the fall. It would no doubt continue to bloom as freely during the summer as in spring or fall if the weather conditions were the same. But as soon as the intense heat of midsummer comes on, the vitality of the plant begins to be affected, and this accounts for the indications of "dwindling," mentioned by my correspondent. Its flowers become smaller and smaller, until they are wholly unlike, in all respects, the magnificent specimens of May and June. And as the heat of the season, generally accompanied with more or less drought, increases, the plants seem to die off by inches. The red spider, encouraged by dry weather, which he delights in, adds his efforts to the work of the heat, and the luxuriant plants of spring are hardly recognizable in July and August.—[Harper's Bazar.]

Rosa Bonheur's Art.

THESE words by the late Rosa Bonheur are instructive: "I pursue my artistic education, working very hard in that part of Paris stretching behind the Parc Monceaux, and which at that time was mostly fields, farms, and dairies. There I studied cows, sheep, and goats. I had found a delightful corner of wild scenery at Villiers, close to the Parc de Neuilly. I boarded with an honest peasant woman and spent several months at her place. Telling the story of my first essays would be telling the story of all beginners. The rapid movements of animals, the shimmer of their coloring, their subtle character (for each animal has an individual physiognomy) had to be caught, so before undertaking the study of a dog, horse, or sheep I first made myself familiar with the anatomy, the osteology, the myology of the animal. I even attempted some dissecting work, and I cannot recommend enough to those wishing to paint animals to adopt the same method. Again, I studied the aspect of animals from plaster casts, copying them chiefly by lamp-light, which gave them neat and vibrating shadows. This is an excellent study. To those who are kind enough to recognize in me a sincere artist I have but to say that whatever I am is due to this conscientious training."

To Produce Miniature Oaks.

THE Japanese gardeners make a secret of the means by which their curious, tiny trees are produced, but, like many other mysteries, the secret has been discovered by the curious Occidental. It is simple enough, consisting only in the cutting of the roots when they first begin to sprout.

Suppose a miniature oak tree is desired. The Japanese gardener takes an acorn and an orange. He carefully scoops out the interior of the orange and fills the skin with rich mold. Exactly in the center he places the acorn, leaving a round hole in a line with the sprouting plant. He puts his orange in a sunny place and waters it every day.

Very soon the first shoot appears, and a short time afterwards the roots break through the orange skin. These are shaved off continually. The tree grows to about five inches high and then stops. In a year it is a perfect miniature oak. When the roots cease to grow the ends are varnished over and the orange imbedded in a pot or vase. The tree becomes more gnarled and stunted every year, and is trained to whatever shape is desired.

Trolleys for Freight.

POSSIBLY the greatest advance in the use of the trolley-car is in Pittsburgh, where an express company, using specially made trolley-cars for transportation, has begun business. These express-cars, which are similar to trolley mail-cars, but with large sliding doors on the sides, are run on all the street railroads in Pittsburgh and Allegheny. The work of receiving and delivering packages is a little slow at the start, but it is expected to deliver a package, or to receive one and give a receipt for it, in about the time it takes for a passenger to board or leave a car. At the suburban terminals of the trolley lines the express-cars are met by automobile wagons, which continue the delivery for miles into the country where the condition of the roadway permits. These wagons are electrically charged to run seventy-five miles, and they travel at a rate of from twelve to fourteen miles an hour.

It was only a tiny seed,
Carelessly brushed aside;
But it grew in time to a noxious weed,
And spread its poison wide.

A New Penn Document.

Philadelphia Ledger.

THE American Philosophical Society has a collection of documents relating to the early history of the city and Commonwealth of much greater interest and value than is suspected by many of the present generation of its membership. During the last year or two, in going over its archives, some very rare papers have been discovered, the very existence of which was before unknown or undistinguished on the catalogue. Some of these have been made the subjects of papers read before the society during the past year.

To bring some of these interesting historical papers to the members, selections have been made from them and they have been placed in glass covered cases, where their titles or a page or two of the printed matter can be read. Several have been framed and hung upon the walls.

Among the latter class is an official document executed by William Penn, interesting not only because it is not known to have been printed, and has no marks of ever having been recorded, but also as showing some mental traits of the great founder of the Commonwealth. It is a parchment commission, dated 6th day of Sixth month, 1684, the day on which Penn went on board the ketch Endeavor to set sail for England, and empowered the Provincial Council to act in his stead during his absence. The paper stated that this was done to show the confidence he had in them. On the back of the parchment, and bearing the same date, Penn limited the power conferred to choosing officers, and making all laws enacted void until confirmed by him, thus showing that, while his first impulses were generous, his prudence, or "sober second thought," overcame his generosity. The records of the Provincial Council at New Castle show that this commission was read on the 18th of June.

New Method of Marketing.

A NEW method of marketing vegetables is rapidly growing in favor in California. In the Pajaro valley, quite a business has been developed by fruit-evaporating factories in buying onions, potatoes, squash, and other vegetables to be evaporated or dried by much the same method used in evaporating fruit. When the process is properly done, the vegetables appear to lose little if any of their flavor or virtue as food, while their bulk and weight are both greatly reduced. These evaporated vegetables were first put up for the Alaskan market, but the business is being developed more largely for export to other parts of the world. The saving in freight rates on these dried vegetables is very material and sometimes more than offsets the cost of evaporating and packing. A carload of dried canned potatoes contains 3,000 bushels, but would hold only 500 bushels in their natural state.

This industry is also in operation near Mayville, Mich., where potatoes are forced through a sieve into "strings," dried, and packed in cans eight inches each way, that weigh five pounds and contain half a bushel of potatoes that originally weighed thirty pounds.

Co-operative Stores in Iowa.

Coöperative stores, tried in several places in this country, and generally resulting in failure, are doing a successful business in Iowa, according to reports recently made, covering the results in 1898. There are about twenty of these stores in the State, morally, if not physically, united, and acting as a unit in the one very important matter of buying their goods. At stated periods each store estimates its needs, and the combined orders are obtained from one wholesale house at a marked reduction. This is regarded as better than the tentative plan of establishing a wholesale depot, at least until the stores become more numerous and of greater resources.

The oldest of these stores in the State has been in operation for ten years in Rockwell, Cerro Gordo county. Last year it did a business of $365,000. Its business is quite varied, and includes dealing in grain and live stock. Another store did a business of $40,000, and one exceptionally profitable store reported for last year a profit to the stockholders of 60 per cent., the profit, of course, representing savings.

Good Treatment and Confidence.

City and State, Philadelphia.

THOSE who are used to dealing with weaker races learn that the first essential is to gain their confidence by perfectly frank dealings, and by convincing them that one's intentions are honorable and disinterested. What other secret was there than this in Livingstone's marvelous success when traveling unharmed and unarmed among the wild tribes of Africa, or William Duncan's conversion of an entire tribe of Metlakahla Indians from degraded barbarians into reputable and completely self-supporting people? It was a desire so intelligent and so sincere to treat justly and sympathetically the barbarous people with whom these benefactors of their race came in contact, and a determination to bring them into a better condition, that they themselves soon were convinced that the men who so came to them could be thoroughly trusted.

Telegraphing Without Wires.

Harper's Weekly.

THE world of science and the associated world of trade and news have been considerably stirred by the report of the success of Signor Marconi, electrician and inventor, in telegraphing from the South Foreland Light-house on the English coast to Boulogne-sur-Mer, in France, without a connecting wire. The distance is thirty-two miles, and is the greatest distance that Marconi's mechanism has as yet overcome, though his experiments have been successfully conducted for many months. The principles of which he avails himself were discovered by other investigators, but he has been highly successful in devising an apparatus by which they are put to practical use. It takes some knowledge of electricity to understand precisely what his apparatus is, though it is described as so simple that a boy can make and use it. His messages are carried by electrical waves, which he excites with a transmitter at one point and reads by means of a receiver at another. The distance which the waves will travel depends, apparently, on the height of the vertical conductor of which he makes use. With a conductor eighty feet high he can signal eighteen miles. His messages will pass through mountains without hesitation, and are not effected by storms. His system is now practically useful to enable ships at sea to communicate with one another and with the shore, for telegraphing through mountains, and for other purposes. What the ultimate development of it may be is past guessing, but it is not expected to supersede the telegraph, and copper stocks are not as yet affected.

St. Francis' Ideal.

"It was" (in the opinion of St. Francis of Assisi) "the highest right, the one certain duty of man . . . to make all heathens Christians and all wicked men just, and all the world a garden of the Lord. It was the easiest, briefest, most certain mode of mending all miseries. Were it a robber among the woods of Apennine, or a Pagan leader, or any other enemy of any Christian State, the formula of Francis was sublime in its simplicity—not hang him, fight against him, subdue him, as said the other commonplace superficial people, but—convert him. Instead of punishment or pain for his body, unbounded blessing for his soul. Only make him a Christian; this was his panacea for all evil. Instead of sacrificing whole masses of men-at-arms, great gleaming armor-clad knights and bowmen and spearmen, whose children looked out for them wishfully across all the Western seas, Francis would have sacrificed, had he got his will, a few generations of solitary monks, himself the first—and all the foreign Eastern alien races would have become our brothers in the faith!"—Mrs. Oliphant's "Life of St. Francis of Assisi."

—The National University Committee has recommended that due reference be made in the approaching Fourth of July celebrations to George Washington's bequest in 1779 toward the National Post Graduate University.

A Catamaran.

HAVING read to her pupils a description of the sinking of the Merrimac, the teacher, so the Kansas City Star asserts, some days later asked her pupils what the word "catamaran" there used meant. These are some of the answers:

A catamaran is a mounting lion.

The Catamaran is a savage officer in the Filipose Islands.

A catamaran carries clubs in a golf game.

The catamaran is the place in Chicago where the Cat Show was held.

The Catamaran was a convention hall prise.

The catamaran is the proper name for a catboat and war ram together like the Catadin.

Hobson obtained a catamaran from the Spanish officers, which was all he had to eat.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE special despatches from The Hague to the London morning papers agree that the American scheme meets with much favor, as being eminently practical. Sir Julian Pauncefote, the head of the British delegation, has modified the British proposal, and now suggests that the Administrative Council should not be International, but should be appointed by the Government of the country where the permanent Court assembles.

According to the correspondent of the Daily News, the Arbitration Committee has unanimously recommended the American scheme to the Conference. The correspondent of the Daily News adds:

"This is a speedy and brilliant victory for the partisans of peace, as nobody doubts that the Conference will ratify the unanimous vote of the committee."

THE Rockport Granite Company, of Gloucester, Massachusetts, has issued a notice that after the 19th inst. the company will recognize the demand of their striking employes for a nine-hour day, and that the labor in excess of this time, performed at the request of the company, will be rated as time and half.

REPRESENTATIVE BURTON, of Ohio, Chairman of the River and Harbor Committee of Congress, thinks that a new bill will be presented at the coming session of Congress. The necessity for improving the Delaware and Patapsco rivers at an early date seems to make the bill a necessity.

DURING a severe electrical storm at Lansing, Michigan, on the 5th inst., lightning struck the workshops at the State Industrial School for Boys, and the fire which followed damaged the buildings and contents to the extent of $15,000.

THE new buildings of the Children's Homœopathic Hospital, on Franklin street, below Thompson, Philadelphia, was formally opened on the 6th inst.

THE new Spanish Minister to the United States, Duke d'Arcos, was formally presented to the President on the 3d instant.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE Society of Friends, at its yearly meeting just ended, adopted the following statement: "We desire to reaffirm our testimony that prison discipline should look towards reformation, and that all use of prisoners for the profit of contractors, without regard to their physical or moral welfare, wherever it occurs, deserves our earnest condemnation, and that we know of nothing more deplorable or cruel in the treatment of convicts than is practiced in the chain-gangs of some Southern States."

—Another order has been placed by the Egyptian States Railway with the Pressed Steel Company for 200 more cars of the same pattern ordered some time ago, which are now on their way to Jersey City, whence they will be taken on transports to the land of the Nile. The first order of 100 cars was made up into two trains of fifty cars each.

—Cows south of the Ohio river will not average above three pounds and fourteen ounces of butter to the 100 pounds of milk. The cows of Texas only show 11 per cent. of solids in their milk. Cows through Indiana and the strip running east and west will produce milk that runs four and one half pounds. Cows in Minnesota and Manitoba will produce milk that will give out five pounds and five ounces of butter to the 100 pounds.

—Advices from Dawson, dated April 29, state that there are evidences of the most wonderful output yet recorded. Five thousand men are in waiting at Dawson to take the first boats up the river. Half of them are miners who have from $1,000 to $50,000 each in dust. The White Pass and Yukon Railroad Company has issued bills of lading on more than a million dollars' worth of gold that is to come out on one of the first river steamers.

—It is reported at the State Department that the negotiations now in progress at London between Ambassador Choate and Lord Salisbury relate entirely to the arrangement of a modus vivendi to avert the danger of a hostile collision on the Alaskan border during the present season, at least. It is expected to resume the negotiations for the settlement of the whole boundary question when Sir Julian Pauncefote returns to Washington from The Hague.

—Frank Thomson, President of the Pennsylvania Railroad, died at his residence near Merion, on the 5th inst., aged 57 years. He was Thomas A. Scott's chief assistant in making railroads for the transportation of troops during the Civil War. His powers of organization and leadership were exerted in behalf of the Pennsylvania railroad during nearly all the active years of his life, and did much to place it on its present high basis.

—Beautiful and world-famous, the Lakes of Killarney, with their surrounding woods, meadows, hills and valleys, are for sale and in peril of becoming private property. It is suggested that the Irishmen in New York City, by popular subscription, purchase Killarney, maintain it as a national park for the people of Ireland and thereby perpetuate the world-wide interest that has centered about Muckross Abbey, Dinnis Island, the Tore Waterfall, and the Gap. The plan has met with pronounced success thus far.

—The books that had the largest sale in this country last month were "David Harum," "A Day's Work," "Aylwin," "When Knightwood was in Flower," "Red Rock," and "Mr. Dooley," in the order named. Only two of the authors of these books are famous—Rudyard Kipling and Thomas Nelson Page. Watts-Dunton, the author of "Aylwin," has had no previous popularity in this country.

—The London Daily News, looking upon the American locomotive in England as an innovation that needed explanation, has made an exhaustive inquiry into the subject and now says that our product is of superior workmanship, of greater drawing power, of greater speed capacity, of greater endurance, of superior design, and more economical in operation. This sounds very much like a death knell over England's boasted mechanical superiority.

—Secretary of the Treasury Gage, in an interview on the President's recent civil service order, says that every change made was urged by the head of the department affected as the result of administrative experience. The order, he declares, is not a step backward, and there is no politics in it.

—Warrants were recently issued at Harrisburg for the arrest of the persons charged with conspiracy, perjury, and corrupt solicitation in connection with the contest for United States Senator and the consideration of the McCarrell Jury bill in the recent session of the legislature.

—New York has established a State College of Forestry. One of its labors will be to replant the tracts denuded of pine and other valuable conifers. It set out a large area this spring, and is rearing 3,000,000 seedling pines for future use.

HAVE mercy, O men! O ye that strength possess,
Bridge firm with pity and charity for span
The void of egotism, of selfishness,
Whose gulf so sternly sunders man from man!
Help with grand aid the unconsummated plan
Of centuries moving to millennial goals!

NOTICES.

* CENTENNIAL AT WESTTOWN. — The Friends' Boarding School at Westtown is now one hundred years old. The Old Scholars' Association, recently formed, will celebrate the event with suitable exercises at the School on Sixth month 10.

It is expected that the largest gathering of Friends and Friendly people since the time of George Fox will be present on that occasion. Some six thousand people have been invited, and acceptances already received indicate that more than three thousand will be present.

The principal feature of the day's exercises will be the presentation to the School of an endowment fund of One Hundred Thousand Dollars by the Old Scholars. Those interested who have not contributed to this fund should communicate with the President of the Association, Samuel T. Allen, No. 1107 Market street, Philadelphia. There will be other addresses by members of the Westtown Committee and by Isaac Sharpless, President of Haverford College, Francis B. Gummere, Ph.D., Charles Potts, and Ruth E. Chambers.

All Old Scholars of the School and their husbands, wives, and children are invited to attend. Special trains from Jersey points and Broad Street Station will furnish ample accommodations for all.

ALBERT T. BELL, Registrar,
Westtown Old Scholars' Association.

* The following meetings will be held in Sixth month:

15. Haddonfield Quarterly Meeting, Medford, N. J.
22. Fishing Creek Half-Year Meeting Millville, Pa.

* The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting-house at Newtown, Delaware county, on First-day, Sixth month 18, 1899, at 2.30 p. m.
CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

* The Circular Meeting at Frankford, Unity and Waln streets, will be Sixth month 11, at 3.30 in the afternoon.

The company of Friends is invited. Fifth street and Third street Trolley cars are within two squares, and Pennsylvania Depot not very distant.

* The Committee on Philanthropic Labor of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting of Friends will meet in the meeting-house, 15th and Race streets, Philadelphia, Seventh-day, Sixth month 10, 1899, at 1.30 o'clock p. m.

The Sub-Committees meeting as follows:

The Indian, in Room No 2, at 10 a. m.
Peace and Arbitration, in Room No. 3, at 10 a. m.

Colored People, Race Street meeting-house, at 10 a. m.

Improper Publications, in Room No. 4 at 10 a. m.

Purity, in Room No. 3, at 9 a. m.

Women and Children, in Room No. 5, at 9 a. m.

Temperance and Tobacco, in Room No. 1, at 11 a. m.

Educational and Publication Committee, in Room No 1, at 9.30 a. m.

Legislation Committee, in Race Street Parlor, at 10 a. m.

JAMES H. ATKINSON, } Clerks.
ELEANOR K. RICHARDS, }

* Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches has made the following appointments:

SIXTH MONTH:

11. Radnor (appointed meeting), 3 p. m.
25. Haverford, 10 a. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

ARMSTRONG & McKELVY } Pittsburgh.
BEYMER-BAUMAN } Pittsburgh.
DAVIS-CHAMBERS } Pittsburgh.
FAHNESTOCK } Pittsburgh.
ANCHOR } Cincinnati.
ROKSTEIN }
ATLANTIC }
BRADLEY } New York.
BROOKLYN }
JEWETT }
ULSTER }
UNION }
SOUTHERN } Chicago.
SHIPMAN }
COLLIER }
MISSOURI } St. Louis.
RED SEAL }
SOUTHERN }
JOHN T. LEWIS & BROS CO } Philadelphia.
MORLEY } Cleveland.
SALEM } Salem, Mass.
CORNELL } Buffalo.
KENTUCKY } Louisville.

UGAR is not improved by the addition of sand; neither is White Lead improved by the addition of Zinc and Barytes, yet there are hundreds of such mixtures branded and sold as "White Lead," "Pure White Lead," etc.

You can avoid these by making sure that the brand is right. Those named in the margin are genuine.

FREE By using National Lead Co.'s Pure White Lead Tinting Colors, any desired shade is readily obtained. Pamphlet giving valuable information and card showing samples of colors free; also folder showing picture of house painted in different designs or various styles or combinations of shades forwarded upon application to those intending to paint.

National Lead Co., 100 William St., New York.

* The First-day evening meetings this month are at Race street above 15th street, at 7.30 o'clock. The full attendance of our members and others is always pleasant.

* A Circular Meeting under the care of a Committee of the Western Quarterly Meeting, will be held at Marlborough, on First-day, Sixth month 11, 1899, to convene at 3 o'clock.
SAMUEL H. BROOMELL, Clerk.

* The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has made the following appointments for Sixth month:
18. Ridge and Back Creek, Va.

TYPEWRITERS

REBUILT nearly equal to new

Fully guaranteed. Prices 50 per cent. to 75 per cent. below list. Catalogue free.

Philadelphia Typewriters Exchange,
135 S. 5th Street, Philada.

M. L. PHILIBERT,
French Steam Dyer, Scourer,
AND DRY CLEANER.

Cleaning of Blankets and Lace Curtains
a specialty.

210 S. EIGHTH STREET, PHILADELPHIA.

Branch Office, 727 South Second Street.

It is habitual for Kansas to overdo things. If it is a cyclone or a drought, a crop of corn or a plague of grasshoppers, a stack of mortgages or a gas well, a great moral reform or a sorghum mill, a race horse or a regiment of fighting men, Kansas always excels, or, at least, she thinks she does, and that is the same thing. Her orators are the most eloquent, her cranks are the most obstreperous, her soil the most fertile and her skies are the bluest in the world. In the exuberance of his oratory, one of the brilliant sons of the State recently exclaimed: "God said, 'Let there be light,' and there was—Kansas." The entire people appear to contemplate their own virtue and valor in a similar spirit.—[Chicago Record.]

A VALUABLE PUBLICATION.

THE PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD 1899 SUMMER
EXCURSION ROUTE BOOK.

On June 1 the Passenger Department of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will publish the 1899 edition of its Summer Excursion Route Book. This work is designed to provide the public with short descriptive notes of the principal Summer resorts of Eastern America, with the routes for reaching them, and the rates of fare. It contains all the principal seashore and mountain resorts of the east, and over fifteen hundred different routes or combination of routes for reaching them. The book has been compiled with the utmost care, and altogether is the most complete and comprehensive handbook of Summer travel ever offered to the public.

It is bound in a handsome and striking cover, in colors, and contains several maps, presenting the exact routes over which tickets are sold. It is also profusely illustrated with fine half-tone cuts of scenery at the various resorts and along the lines of the Pennsylvania Railroad.

On and after June 1 it may be procured at any Pennsylvania Railroad ticket office at the nominal price of ten cents, or, upon application to the general office, Broad Street Station, by mail for twenty cents.

CONVENTION NATIONAL EDUCATIONAL ASSOCIATION, LOS ANGELES, CAL.

REDUCED RATES VIA PENNSYLVANIA RAILROAD.

For the National Educational Association Convention, to be held at Los Angeles, Cal., July 11 to 14, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company will sell excursion tickets via direct routes from points on its line, to Los Angeles, Cal., and return, at rate of single fare for the round trip plus $2.00 membership fee. These tickets will be sold, good going, June 24 to July 7, and, when stamped by Joint Agent at Los Angeles, good to return, arriving at final destination, until September 5.

For further information apply to Ticket Agents.

Please mention FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, when answering Advertisements in it. This is of value to us and to the advertisers.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 17, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 24.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXIV.

WHEN we love one another, we seem near together, and can almost behold the faces of the absent as in a glass.

MARY S. LIPPINCOTT.

From a private letter dated Eleventh month 7, 1873.

I WONDER.

I WONDER and wonder at even,
As the twilight fades away,
If children have birthdays in heaven,
Or if they are young alway ;
And whether the angels name them,
Knowing the name we knew,
And if the mothers may claim them,
When there's no more work to do.

And I wonder will the morning
That dawns beyond the sea,
With the glory of its dawning
Give my little one to me ?
Yet while I wonder, weeping,
On the hidden yet to be,
I trust the Lord is keeping
My little one for me. —From "Unity."

NEW YORK YEARLY MEETING.

(Concluded from last week.)

ON Fourth-day morning, the 31st ultimo, public meetings for worship were held at Fifteenth street and Rutherford Place, New York, and on Schermerhorn street, Brooklyn. In the former meeting Margaret Howard, Lydia Price, and others spoke.

In the afternoon was held an adjourned meeting of the First-day School Association, with Charles F. Underhill and Amy J. Miller, clerks, since Edward Cornell had resigned. The principal feature of the session was a paper by Jane Rushmore on "Success in First-day School Work," and discussion on the topic. The writer said we make too great a mistake when we do certain specific work and then rest on our oars, and feel that our work is done, saying, "the duties are ours, the results are God's." In regard to the present Old Testament series of lesson leaves, she feels that they should not be condemned, since the Old Testament leads to the New. Teachers are born, not made ; but there are not enough of the first class, so some must be manufactured to supply the demand. The requisites are pure and consistent lives, full knowledge of subject, terse expression, alertness, and consecration to the work, with not too much humility. With all these requirements, no teacher is fully successful without methods ; yet no material devices can avail if the teachers are not true to the work. It is an element of weakness to have no fixed aim and end. Certain practices have outlived their usefulness, and as the Sunday-school movement long antedates the First-day schools, it may be well to look into and study the methods of the former, and if their greater experience shows better results, let us borrow. Zeal and enthusiasm are great aids, and interest on the part of all attenders means great success. We need to believe thoroughly in the work. The same lessons cannot suit all conditions, and the sooner we realize the necessity of adaptation, the better. Little children are fond of moralizing, and here is the teacher's chance ; older ones want history, while some may want merely incident, and again others want the germs of Eternal Life. So the teacher must be accommodating,—either work herself or have the class work, as suits best. In closing, the speaker invited discussion on "Use of lesson helps," "Adult work," "Reasonable changes," and "Work for infant classes."

After a full and interesting discussion of these subjects, the New York Epistle to other associations was read, and with some comment approved. It voiced the opinion that social customs should grow out of the First-day schools, so that the child's companions may be among Friends. Henry R. Russel was spoken of as a consecrated worker in this cause, and more such as he are to be desired. Remarks were made regarding the desirability of attendance at meeting on the part of First-day school students, and the belief was expressed by Joseph Willets and Anna Jackson that schools are a strength to the meeting. The association then adjourned until the Seventh-day preceding the next yearly meeting.

In the evening was held another meeting of the Philanthropic Committee, at which letters from Lyman Abbott, Edward Stabler, Jr., and Dr. O. Edward Janney, of Baltimore, were read, concerning the death of Aaron M. Powell. The latter said it was a comfort to have had the friendship of this man, and to know that we may again meet him if we, as he, have walked with God. The principal topic of the evening was "New Phases of an Old Problem," discussed by Henry W. Wilbur. During the Civil War the strong drink was taken from sailors, and surely the government should care as much for its citizens as for its sailors. In 1864, however, the canteen was established, and wine and beer were regularly placed on store lists. After effort, a section of the Re-organization Army bill became a law, but temperance rejoicing soon ceased, for liquor men did not mean to let this stand. The Attorney-General's opinion pleased liquordom, and the War Department keeps civilians as bar-tenders. It shows we are under army laws despotism. Beer is now being sent to the Philippines by the ship-load, one Chicago brewer expecting a large part of his entire output to be consumed by American soldiers in those distant islands. Washington sustains two saloons for congressmen, and in the new library building there is given food for brains and also that which takes away the brains. But a bill will be introduced into the next Congress to prohibit sale of liquor on government grounds.

There is nothing stronger than our own Discipline in regard to our duty in this respect; first by individual abstinence, second by public duty at the ark of the American covenant—the ballot-box. The speaker referred to Aaron M. Powell, saying: "He never pitched lower than the highest octave of truth," and if Friends had stood by him as they might, his heart might have beaten longer in the flesh. The speaker believed the united conscience of the people is seeing the necessity of making it easy to do right, and hard to do wrong. C. H. Meade then spoke, referring to Joseph A. Bogardus as one who, taking a stand, never flinched. He admired the sturdy integrity of Friends. He believed that if the sale of liquors in the streets of New York is right, then it is right to have army canteens, and to kill the Philipinos with bullets. If a drunkard is right, the saloon is right, for "by their fruits shall ye know them." The drunkard is the fruit of the saloon, the saloon of the law, the law of the law-maker, and the law-maker of the voter, so here we have the chain. John Shotwell said: "He that commiteth sin serveth Satan," and much sin is committed at the ballot box. David Haviland spoke of the "word in season" which may accomplish much. Daniel Gibbons felt that if it were possible to keep liquor among the poor classes, it would soon be stamped out, for it is the air of respectability which gives it life.

FIFTH-DAY, SIXTH MONTH I.

In women's meeting the epistle from Genesee was read, in which boys' brigades were deplored, and equal suffrage urged as assuring the downfall of the liquor traffic. John J. Cornell having expressed a desire to visit this meeting, Joshua Washburn accompanied him at this time, and he acceptably spoke to anxious mothers, who may have undue anxiety lest their boys be led astray. He entreated them not to be discouraged if sons turn from mothers' counsel. Work on faithfully and trustingly. He felt that some are called to the ministry and are pleading excuses, and seeking to work along philanthropic lines, seeking the peace which cannot come without complete surrender, as though their judgment of what is fitting is better than His, forgetting that he has promised, "As thy day, so shall thy strength be."

The epistle from Indiana was read, telling of the quickening life felt in joint session, and referring to John L. Griffen's life, which made the world better. We are needing another Emancipation Proclamation to free us from rum; it deplored also the increasing quantities of tobacco raised in the West.

The Ohio epistle was also read; and the Illinois epistle bears the encouraging news that the young people are coming forward in the meeting. The report of the committee to address the Mayor of New York was read and heartily approved by both branches; it read as follows: "To Robert A. Van Wycke, Esteemed Friend:—New York Yearly Meeting of the Society of Friends now in session desire to call thy attention to the use of indecent pictures on theatrical and other posters advertising, and respectfully requests thee to use the influence of thy great office to secure the enforcement of existing ordinances which provide for the suppression of this demoralizing practice. Signed by direction and on behalf of New York Yearly Meeting of Friends, William Willets, Emily P. Yeo, Clerks.

Jane C. Washburn introduced a proposition to send a memorial to The Hague Conference. This was approved in both branches and a committee appointed to formulate a message and report later. The report of joint committee on refreshment and lodging was that in their judgment no change should be made, which was approved; as was also the report of the auditing committee, bringing forward again the name of Phebe Anna Thorn as Treasurer. The meeting then considered the answers to the remainder of the queries; the fifth shows marriages are performed with due solemnity, but four were accomplished not in accordance with our Discipline. The sixth shows avoidance of liquor as beverage and in preparation of food; but more care might be beneficial in regard to attendance at places where such is sold. The seventh encouragingly showed proper and seasonable care and assistance extended to those who need it, and due regard paid to the education of children to fit them for business. Sarah Haviland said that many would desire education in Friends' schools if they could afford it. One Friend advocates loan funds for the help of those who need it, and there are few but will return it as soon as possible. The eighth answer showed that Friends conduct their business in a way becoming our religious profession, being just in promises and payment of debts. The ninth also satisfactorily showed care to be taken seasonably to deal with offenders in spirit of meekness in accordance with Discipline. Rachel W. Lippincott believed she has heard through her spiritual ear a cry for sympathy, and entreats that we depend not so much on human sympathy, for the Heavenly Arm will never fail. "Be thou faithful unto death and I will give thee a crown of life." The report of the nominating committee on Educational Committee was approved, as was also that of the Visiting Committee, which showed 250 visits made during the year. All meetings were visited. It was thought best to discontinue this committee for a year, and let the whole meeting constitute itself a visiting committee.

In men's meeting, under discussion of the answer to the first query, much concern was felt regarding the feeble state of the Society there manifested. There should be no hesitancy to receive those unaccustomed to our ways or not materially "well off." The value of the social impulse was dwelt upon.

In the afternoon some routine business was transacted in both branches. A devotional half hour in women's side, in which prayer and loving counsel found lodgment in willing hearts, left the meeting in a state of mind befitting the closing session. The report of committee on the cablegram submitted the following: "To Andrew D. White: The New York Yearly Meeting, in session, commends the action of the American Commissioners." This was approved and directed to be signed by clerks. The report of committee to examine the Treasurer's account and raise quotas was also approved. The Women's Yearly Meeting's epistle to Philadelphia and Baltimore was read, stating they were gladdened by members from their yearly meetings, though saddened by the absence of good workers they have been wont to have among them, believing that Peace is steadily gaining ground, with faith in its ultimate triumph. The statistical reports show a decrease in membership. The reading of the joint epistle spoke of this 204th annual session being unusually large, with business meetings full of interest; the four members gone home, and the memorial meeting being an inspiration to the living, as it was a beautiful tribute to the dead. An impressive closing minute was read, including Aaron M. Powell's last words, "Each man has his own life to live."

The evening was devoted to a social gathering, under the auspices of the Young Friends' Association of New York and Brooklyn. The number entertained at the Seminary reaches 226 by Second-day evening, and more followed afterwards, besides those entertained by private families. Sojourners from other meetings left with grateful feelings that will be pleasant memories for many days and years to come.

A NOTABLE LIFE-RECORD.¹

MANY of our readers will doubtless remember the visits of William Jones, of England, to this country in 1887 and 1889. In the latter year he addressed the students of various of our colleges on the subject of Peace and Arbitration. The writer heard him at Swarthmore, and has cherished the memory of the man's simple, sincere earnestness and winning charm. In this record of his life which he has just put forth, William Jones writes with the same simplicity and charm. From his pages one gathers impressions of noble, philanthropic Quaker character; and the author's modest recitals of deeds whose good effects were widespread must place his book high in the list of humanitarian literature.

William Jones' great-grandfather was a noted old Welsh bard; his grandfather had seen Nelson fall at Trafalgar; his father saw Bonaparte at St. Helena. After ten years as a soldier his father joined the Quakers, finding them to be "carrying out in actual practice the identical Christian principles with which he had become imbued from the spiritual Welsh hymns of his grandfather."

In 1870-71, William Jones was chosen by English Friends of prominence to administer the great sum of £160,000 raised by them for the relief of the non-combatant French peasantry who were rendered destitute by the ravages of the armies of the Franco-Prussian War. He and his assistants distributed vast quantities of supplies,—seed-corn, cattle, farming implements, food, medicine, etc. Among those who took great interest in his mission of mercy was the distinguished Catholic leader, Archbishop Manning. This great churchman introduced the author to Cardinal Antonelli, of the Vatican. In the palace of the popes our plain Quaker had what he terms the most notable interview of his life. There Cardinal Antonelli, reputed the keenest diplomatist of his time, entered into an inquiry concerning the procedure of Friends' meetings for business. After the Cardinal had obtained a clear idea of our simple, beautiful methods of carrying on the affairs of the Society, he thanked William Jones cordially for instructing him upon a matter on which he had long wanted light. Here is an extract from the narrative of this incident:

"The Cardinal being an Italian gentleman of the old school, than whom no more courteous being exists, his manner was so thoroughly kind and genial that all feeling of reserve was taken away, the charm of his bearing and his smile causing me to feel quite at ease in his presence. . . . Question followed question, with a power and skill tempered with refined courtesy, which, whilst taxing my own resources to the utmost, far from causing any unpleasant feeling, served only to deepen the admiration and regard I felt for the capacious intellect, the genial, kindly heart, which could thus throw off all reserve, and enter with the freedom and familiarity of an intimate friend, into questions closely touching the sacredness of the inner life."

As he passed out of the Vatican the narrator met the Pope upon the stairs. This is his brief picture of the great pontiff of the oldest church in Christendom:

"I saw him carried by four bearers in scarlet, in his sedan chair, from which he alighted at the foot of the marble staircase, which the old man slowly ascended. I passed close by him, and thus had a good view, but no word of salutation passed between us. With his mild aspect and benevolent countenance, arrayed in a white flannel costume, edged with scarlet, and a very broad-brimmed hat, he reminded me of some good old 'Friend' of former times."

William Jones passed through many strange and memorable experiences as commissioner from the Society of Friends in England to administer relief to the Bulgarian and Turkish peasantry after the barbarous outrages of 1877. These memories make one of the most readable portions of the volume.

In 1887 and 1889 he visited our republic, as has been said above, in the interest of International Arbitration. He was welcomed by our foremost citizens, and his book contains charming records of visits to distinguished Americans. Of his interview with John G. Whittier, he says:

"He expressed his entire approval of my Peace mission to America, adding that Friends of all shades of thought, whether 'Hicksite' or 'Orthodox,' would gladly receive me and help on my work. They were all lovers of Peace alike. He gave expression to the thought that a mission like mine, in which all could freely unite, might have a reconciling tendency upon the separate sections of the Society of Friends in America. He said, 'It will help to break down the present stand-off attitude towards each other, and by causing them to work together shoulder to shoulder, they will learn to appreciate and love the good that is in all.'"

Frances E. Willard impressed our author as a remarkable worker in all fields of good. "Few women ever scored a deeper mark on their times and their nation than this gifted daughter of the western world. To none has it been given more cordially to be accepted, as a great organizer and leader, by the almost universal consent of the women of both hemispheres."

¹QUAKER CAMPAIGNS IN PEACE AND WAR. By William Jones, Hon. Commissioner of the Society of Friends' War Victims' Fund in France in 1870-71, and in Bulgaria in 1876-77. Illustrated. London: Headley Brothers, 1899.

The book contains vivid recollections of John Bright and other English Friends of distinction. A passage from the closing pages is appropriate in these days, when all are looking with anxious eyes towards the outcome of the Peace Conference :

"It would be contrary to all experience if this proposal of a European Conference, in order to seriously discuss the desirableness of gradual Disarmament, were not strenuously opposed by the large and influential class who are more or less interested in the maintenance of the military system. But by the over-taxed and conscripted victims of militarism, as well as by every lover of Peace, this 'Olive Branch from the Neva' was hailed as a boon fraught with untold blessings."

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.

(Continued from last week.)

It was with less regret that he left the work in which he had taken such a deep interest, when he found that he was to be succeeded by Barclay White, who brought to the office such an intelligent understanding of its duties, and so high an ability to perform them.

[We follow with the notes furnished by Howard White :

When the writer first went to Nebraska, in 1869, as Agent for the Winnebago Indians, and met Samuel M. Janney in Omaha, soon after he had assumed the position of Superintendent of Indian Affairs, he appeared to be a man about seventy years of age, rather frail, but full of energy and interest in his new work. He was untiring in his efforts to benefit the Indians under his care, and when visiting them was anxious to gain all the personal knowledge within his reach. I have known him, in inspecting the work, to ride on horseback over a rough country where it was impossible to drive, though at his advanced age it must have been quite a tax on his physical strength.

He was a ready and entertaining speaker, and well equipped with general information. On one of my early visits to Omaha I accompanied him to a general educational conference, which was being held in one of the large halls of the city. We arrived while the proceedings were under way, and the chairman recognizing the new government official, and knowing the State from which he was appointed, called upon him for a speech upon the public school system of Virginia. He promptly responded, and his remarks were so well expressed, so forceful and full of information, as to make a very favorable impression upon the large audience.

Samuel used to say, during the first year that he was in charge of the northern superintendency, that the Winnebago Indians caused him more trouble and anxiety than all the other tribes combined. These Indians were restless and demoralized, owing to their many removals from different agencies in Wisconsin, Minnesota, and Dakota to Nebraska, which brought them in contact with bad whites and with the soldiers at the military posts near the reservations. At every council held with them during that period some disagreeable subject was brought to his attention. For example, there was no tillable land within reach of their villages in the timber near the river, and in order to start them at farming so they might become self-supporting, it was necessary to move them on allotments of land on the prairie. It was with great difficulty that they could be induced to leave their villages; their fire-wood was near at hand; they were living in idleness, even their food being purchased with their income from the Government, and they could see nothing to be gained by moving and scattering over the prairie; they therefore refused to go. It was thought that their tribal income could be applied to better purpose by using it to stock their farms and build them houses, and in order to induce them to move it was necessary to diminish the quantity of rations and agree to assign to each family a small timber lot in addition to the farm land. They made a practice of always finding fault with some or the government employes, even when there were no grounds for so doing. There were frequent charges of pony stealing from the Omaha Indians, and various complaints of depredations upon the settlers, all of which had to be listened to and investigated. A number of the Indians were charged with murder on one occasion, and we had great trouble in discovering the guilty parties in order to hand them over to the State authorities for trial, as they were screened and protected by the other Indians. It was a time of great anxiety to us.

SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

The situation improved greatly during the latter part of Samuel's administration; the Indians came to recognize him as a fair and just man, and had great respect for him.

The position he held was not without its personal dangers. There was always great risk in carrying the large sums of annuity money, amounting to thousands of dollars across the wild, unsettled country, a distance of twenty-two miles from the nearest railroad station. At the time of the murder mentioned above, and before we had heard of it, while the superintendent and agent were driving through the timber land in an unfrequented road on a tour of inspection, we passed a tepee where the leader of the gang of murderers was staying, and we learned some time afterward that this man on seeing us concluded that we were coming to arrest him and picked up his rifle, intending to shoot us as we approached, announcing to those in the tepee that he would not be taken alive. He was forcibly restrained by two or three men who happened to be there at the time. We passed on without knowing of our danger, and did not learn until the next day that there had been a murder committed by the Indians.

In the first council held by Samuel M. Janney with the Winnebagoes, he took occasion to explain to them some of the teachings of Jesus, and to refer to the elevating and civilizing influence they had on those who lived up to them; Little Thunder, in his remarks in answer to the superintendent's speech, said that they had heard there was such a good man as the one about whom their new Grandfather had just spoken, but that he "had never been seen that far up the river."

ELIZABETH JANNEY.

HOWARD WHITE.]

The 11th of Third month, 1876, was the fiftieth anniversary of his marriage. A goodly company of children, grandchildren and other relatives assembled to celebrate the day. It was a delightful reunion.

From a letter received from his valued friend, Benjamin Hallowell, a few days later, extending his congratulations, the following extract is made:

"The terms in which thou speaks of the event are so beautiful that I feel that I must quote them. 'We do not expect to have any ceremony or make any display. We esteem it a great favor that we have been permitted to live this long together in perfect harmony, and to enjoy all the needful comforts of life. My wife, who is sitting by my side, joins me in an affectionate remembrance of thee.' How plainly it brought the scene of your marriage at the meeting-house in Alexandria, although fifty years ago. Both of the parties and their families being very popular, the meeting was unusually large, many who were not members being present, old and young, a number sitting up-stairs in the youths' gallery; but it was an orderly, solemn meeting. Anthony Charles Cazenove, (an aged Presbyterian) sat in the ministers' gallery. After the meeting had concluded, Cazenove came down, shook hands cordially with Elizabeth and thee (her first) and said, in the goodness of his heart, 'I did wish so much that some one would ask a blessing on the precious couple.' The blessing was asked by many hearts, though not vocally."

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 26.—SIXTH MONTH 25.

REVIEW.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord alone did lead him, and there was no strange god with him.—Deuteronomy, xxxii., 12.

Scripture Reading.—Deuteronomy, xxxiii.

IN the first quarter we studied the Hebrew tradition of the youth of the world, and marked the fact that it is distinguished from other like tradition in its recognition of one God, and him a moral Being. We studied also the development of the first Hebrew family as told by historians of a later day, and observed that the distinguishing feature of their conception of its founder was a profound sense of the nearness of God. The same characteristic was observed also in the story of his earliest descendants, though in a lesser degree. The lessons of the first quarter closed with the removal of the family to Egypt, and with a brief study of the political and social conditions of the Nile country.

The second quarter takes up the story of the Egyptian bondage. A change of dynasty brings to the throne a king unfriendly to the Hebrews, and their comparatively easy conditions are changed to a most galling slavery. They are withdrawn from the service of the flock, and are driven to forced labor in the tremendous building operations of the nineteenth dynasty. A Hebrew child, by a curious chance, is brought up in the royal Egyptian household, and masters the learning of the Egyptian universities. In sudden, fierce quarrel, in which he takes the part of a fellow-Hebrew, he slays an Egyptian, and flees to the desert to escape punishment. He falls in with one of the nomadic priest-princes of the desert, and becomes first his servant and finally his son-in-law. In the desert solitudes of Sinai, where he led his flocks from valley to valley, the traditions of his forefathers came back to him, mingled and colored by his Egyptian experiences. His loyalty of race is renewed and strengthened, but most important of all his soul reaches out after that great Friend who has been known as the Friend of his forefather Abraham. And it was granted to him, as it has been to many of his race since, to feel God's presence strongly. There was an impelling force in that sense of God's presence which pressed upon him the duty of awakening to new life the almost extinct religious sense of his people, so that after some natural drawing back from the great mission, he returned to Egypt to fulfill this duty. It was almost immediately made plain to him that Israel could never be brought to serve his God while wearing Egyptian chains. His first plan, which involved only a "Haj," or religious pilgrimage, expanded to a demand for the entire freedom of his people. After a struggle, the details of which are uncertain, the children of Israel set out for the wilderness of Sinai, were pursued by Egyptian troops, and were saved from them in a most wonderful manner. This help, un hoped-for on the part of most, left a deep and lasting impression upon the Hebrew people, and is again and again referred to by the prophets in their efforts to hold the Israelites loyal to Jehovah. After the Red Sea deliverance the caravan moved on to the oasis of Mt. Sinai, where they remained for a year. During this time they organized a simple government and a religious ceremonial adapted to the nomadic life before them. The period is chiefly to be noted, however, for the greater and clearer revelation of himself vouchsafed to Moses by the Father of Souls. In addition to the strong sense of the presence of God, together with a more or less vague sense of his unity, which did not, however, exclude a recognition of the existence of the gods of other peoples, it was made plain to Moses that an obedient walk with Jehovah involved right relations with men. This revelation, vast as was its importance, was by no means given as fully as to later times. The ten commandments were not looked upon as applying beyond the confines of the Hebrew people themselves. They must not kill a Hebrew,—an Egyptian or a Canaanite was another matter. Their neighbors' goods they must not covet; but Jesus of Nazareth had not arisen to expound as to the real meaning of the word "neighbor," so they were not prevented from turning greedy eyes upon the fields of the Canaanites. The time was not ripe for the recognition of universal brotherhood.

From Sinai the nation moved northward toward Palestine, but was repulsed from its borders by the Amorites of the hill country west of the Dead Sea. A generation of nomadic life followed, in which the hardships of the desert taught courage and independence to the children of Israel. Finally, passing around the lands of the Edomites and Moabites, they established themselves on the east of the Jordan, and then gradually forced their way into the coveted territory of west Palestine, dwelling there among the many still unconquered Canaanites. Under these new conditions the influences of the Canaanite religion in many cases drew the Israelites away from the pure and comparatively simple worship of Jehovah. This weakening of the chief bond of union among the tribes resulted in repeated subjection to other nations.

In the next quarter we will take up more fully the struggles of the Hebrew leaders for religious, and finally for political unity, and the growth of the kingdom.

We have noted that the time was not ripe for the full comprehension even of such outward law as the ten commandments, the application being confined to those of the same nation. What shall we say of our own time? The light which in this ancient day shone through a glass darkly, grew clearer and clearer in the days of the prophets, until the day-star arose in the message of Jesus that love of God and of man include the whole law, and all that the prophets tried to make plain. A new commandment he gave which rendered the ten unnecessary: "That ye love one another." All this illumination has been before the world these two thousand years. How is it that we, who claim to dwell in the tents of those who stoned the prophets, who claim to be heirs of that kingdom rejected by the Jews, still narrow the ancient command, "Thou shalt not kill," to mean only "Thou shalt not—unless government orders it?" How is it that the Christian world which shall not covet, casts envious eyes on the fair lands of weaker folk and invokes the law of force against them? Those who speak in the name of the Master incite to bloodshed and conquest in his name.

It is not for us to climb into the judgment seat and to pronounce condemnation on those who still narrow the gospel to their own race, or to their own color, or to their own civilization. But this at least we may do: turn a watchful eye each to his soul within, and make sure that none of the false standards of market-place or threshing-floor shall take the place of that which God hath set in his temple—the heart of man.

NEW TESTAMENT LESSONS.

[FOLLOWING THE "INTERNATIONAL" SELECTION OF TEXTS.
PREPARED FOR "FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER."]

NO. 26.—SIXTH MONTH 25.

REVIEW.

GOLDEN TEXT.—He that hath my commandments and keepeth them, he it is that loveth me.—John, xiv., 21.

THE twelve lessons of the Quarter, preceding this Review, have all been taken from the Gospel of John, except one, the passages in the last lesson from the third chapter of Paul's epistle to the Christian congregation at Colossæ. The activities of Jesus, his miracles, his ministrations, his teachings, his arrest, trial, crucifixion, and resurrection, have been studied in the light of John's account. The lessons have given but a small part of the account, and they have in some instances been separated from one another by matter of importance, whose study has been necessary in order to make the view complete. But altogether there has been one distinct and definite teaching presented by these lessons,—that of the Golden Text above,—he that hath, he that holds in his heart the commandments of the Master, the precepts, the principles, the influences, that are divine, and that keepeth them,—lives by them and up to them to the best of his strength,—he is the real Christian.

This is a thought which is stated and restated many times, as we have seen, in the words of Jesus. The Christian is he who follows the Spirit, the Christ. "The light of Christ within, who is the light of the world," and so a light to you, says William Penn (in his Preface to the Journal of George Fox), "leads all that take heed unto it out of darkness into God's marvellous light; for light grows upon the obedient." The thought, here, is one familiar in the rise of our Society. "The early Friends," says J. S. Rowntree (in a paper read at the Scarborough Summer School) "were in entire agreement with the Apostle John, 'If we say that we have fellowship with God, and walk in the darkness, we lie, and do not the truth.' " It is "hardly possible," he adds, "to exaggerate the stress they threw upon this feature of their teaching"—that an upright walk was needful to exemplify, to preserve, and to develop the spiritual life. Many other persons, he proceeds, had declared the doctrine of the Divine Immanence—some of them considering it a philosophical dogma rather than a religious principle directing conduct—but few, if any, had insisted as the Friends did, “that doing the Divine will was the condition for knowing God’s truth.”

A little consideration must serve to convince any of us that to walk in the light, forward toward the light, is to come step by step into a fuller knowledge of the truth,—that “the path of the just,” as the Proverb declares, “is as the shining light that shineth more and more unto the perfect day.”

The teaching and the example of Jesus were all to this effect. He emphasized always the actuality of the Christian life. He declared the need, not of merely accepting doctrine, or holding opinions, or observing ritual, but of carrying into living practice the rule of purity and goodness. “Blessed are the pure in heart for they shall see God.”

The humility, the serene, simple willingness to serve, which was manifested by Jesus in the Washing of his brethren’s feet, is a lesson that deserves emphasis in the review. If, as was said when those passages from John’s account were considered, we are to regard any of the proceedings of the evening in the “upper room” obligatory as memorial “ordinances” upon successive generations of Christians, then it is quite certain that the Washing has more authority than the Supper. It is not in the Gospel accounts of either Matthew or John, who were present, that Jesus is described as using the words suggesting to his companions the observance of the Supper; it is in the account by Luke, who was not present, that the words occur, “This do in remembrance of me.” But as to the Washing, John, a witness of what occurred, says that Jesus, after he had finished, used these words: “If, I, then, the Lord and Master, have washed your feet, ye also ought to wash one another’s feet. For I have given you an example that ye also should do as I have done to you.”

This seems clear and emphatic. It seems strange that those who consider the reported words in Luke to establish so important a rite for all time, should ignore the more clear and definite injunction in John. If one is obligatory, certainly the other is much more so. Yet there are few professing Christians (the Dunkers do it) who think themselves under obligation to wash one another’s feet.

The simple explanation in each case, both as to the Supper and the Washing of feet, is that Jesus used them for the time as symbols having spiritual significance. It is, in this case as in many others, the spirit that is essential.

[These Lessons will now be discontinued, as the selection of the “International” Texts passes into the Old Testament, and will treat of matter not very far removed from that in the regular Lessons prepared by the General Conference Committee.—EDS. INTELLIGENCER.]

“DISTRUST one who assents to all your opinions. Such apparent mental coincidences are apt to prove to be but the connivances of insincerity.”

“JESUS presents an example of courage and vigor and confidence and cheer and unselfishness which claims the imitation of every person striving after excellence.”

THE kingdom of God is not a business set up in rivalry with worldly business, but a divine law regulating, and a divine temper pervading, the pursuits of worldly business.—James Martineau.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

OUR LOVED FRIEND'S LAST WORDS.

“Each man has his own life to live.” . . .

SUCH were the last words spoken, only a few weeks ago, by one well-known to many and revered by all the readers of THE INTELLIGENCER.

These words being uttered, suddenly that life of heroic service passed, as in the twinkling of an eye, from this present to a higher plane of life, whither our earthly vision cannot penetrate.

The eye of Faith, however, can pierce the veil of flesh and give evidence that his helpfulness, his strength, his purity, his love, are deathless, and are more active now than ever before in the service of his Lord and Master. Those last words of Aaron M. Powell sound like a prophet’s voice, ringing out of the silence, and bidding each one of us fill out the thought which died away upon his lips.

Just what words he was going to speak about life, we can never know; but what an inspiring text these words may become to us, if we will take them apart into the deep silence of our own souls, and ponder reverently upon them! Let them be a nucleus around which helpful thoughts may gather regarding the life of him who had uttered the words. He had his life to live, and how did he choose to live it? Through free and deliberate choice he sacrificed his own inclinations and pleasures, and took up the cross and followed the Master in the pathway of service to mankind; he gave his time, his talents, his hands, and his heart to the work of helping the world to grow better and happier. And what was his reward?

Even in this life, he had riches which could not be measured; not only the gratitude and reverence of his fellows, but an ever-increasing capacity himself of loving and giving; these are the things which make life rich indeed.

Filled with the inspiration which every one must receive from meditating upon such a consecrated life as this, let us recall his last words, and appropriate them as a legacy from our tried friend and true,—“Each man has his own life to live.” I have mine, thou hast thine; are we living our lives in any true sense of the word? Are we holding ourselves in such an attitude that it is possible for us to receive the Divine blessings? And then are we giving out again the best that we have? Are we increasing in the capacity of loving? For by this “we know that we have passed out of death into life, because we love the brethren.”

Let these last words of our dearly beloved friend go sounding in our souls until they become filled with a new, deeper meaning, which shall bring to us a consecration and a renewal of strength. They may be to us nothing more than words,—just empty sounds, attracting our attention for a moment, and then dying away in the distance; or, if we will, they may be a talisman, charming us away from the low level of self-indulgence up to the mountain heights of love and service.

E. W. C.

Do not prevent others from enjoying what you yourself do not care to enjoy.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 17, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

"PAGAN."

SOME one has asked the question, "What is a Pagan? How does a pagan differ from a heathen?" Perhaps these are questions for Webster or the Century. But they suggest some forms of reply that might not be found in the dictionary pages.

Heathen is a more general term, we should say, than pagan; it includes the latter. The heathen are those who have not the truth of Christianity; a pagan is one of those who have it not in reality yet might have it.

The word Pagan signifies to us, under existing conditions, one who makes an opposing force to the force of Christianity. He may be very far removed in his circumstances and situation from the paganus of the Latin, (from which we get our word), for instead of being a "countryman," or a peasant, or a rustic, he may be highly "cultured," a well kept, a thoroughly "smart" person. If he is an idolater, not a Christian worshipper, if his ideals are contrary to the teachings of the founder of our religion, if his actions go to thwart and defeat the objects which Christianity presents to us, then it is quite immaterial whether he is country or city bred, whether he knows much or knows little, whether his garb is old-fashioned or in the very latest style.

Idolatry, of course, does not consist merely in making a brazen image and setting it up as an object of worship. Idols may not be of metal, and they may not be tangible to the finger, or perceptible to the eye. Our ideals are our idols. That which we love most is the idol we have set up. "For where your treasure is," said Jesus, "there will your heart be also." This treasure may be one of many things; not necessarily gold, not necessarily what we call "wealth." It may be pride. It may be sensuality. It may be lust of power. It may be gluttony, or a thousand forms of physical indulgence. The modern form of paganism is very largely, perhaps essentially, one of selfish luxury as distinguished from self-denial. The thought is abroad that to eat, to drink, to be richly clad, to be servilely waited upon, to "enjoy life," to become one of a favored and indulged "leisure class," is the great object of the heart's desire. That strenuous note, that swelling and swollen roar, which comes up to us daily in the chronicles of the world's doings, conveys no teaching stronger than this, that the only thing worth while is to minister to our own physical pleasure.

To point the definition of Pagan, then, we must first realize what the essential conditions of Christianity are, and we must then turn to observe who and what oppose them. The non-Christian is the pagan. He may be here or there. He may live close by the sanctuary, and even appear much within its doors. He may have openly set up no brazen or other image, and yet he may be essentially so devoid of humility, of kindness of love for God and man, that his paganism is real and undeniable. Such examples of the un-Christian rule as Sardanapalus with his excesses, or Caligula with his horrors, or even Bonaparte with his slaughters, present the antithesis of Christian good, and every one that is like them, no matter when or where, or who follows after them, no matter at what distance, is of the pagan company. Christianity presents a real and a definite pattern; if this is not accepted it is rejected, and he who rejects it is the Pagan, just as in the early centuries of the Christian era.

It has often been said, but the remark bears repetition, that those who go from home should not leave their principles behind. The saying, "When you go to Rome, do as the Romans do," has been wrested from its right meaning and proper application—as so many sayings are—and made to serve the purpose of our excuse for disregard of rules of right living. Things which many would not think of doing at home they would venture to indulge abroad, and it has been truly said that the viciousness of great cities is fed and maintained much less by those who live in them, than by visitors. Some one put the question, in a conversation overheard by the writer, "Will you not go to the races at Paris?" The person addressed was a "church member" in an American city, who had never been to a "horse race" in his life, and who regarded the observance of the first-day of the week as a divine commandment. But his questioner insisted that "in Paris" there could be no possible harm in attending the races, on "Sunday"—that the surrounding conditions changed the moral principle. There is great danger in teachings like these.

It is one of the frequently cited sayings of the advocates of international aggression that "trade follows the flag,"—that in order to sell goods to foreign peoples it is necessary first to subjugate them. This is, of course, a fallacy, and the experience of the United States in the extension of its foreign trade proves it to be so. In the decade preceding our war against Spain our sales abroad largely and continuously increased. We did not send war-ships ahead of the peace-ships; it was not necessary. The trade with China is an example in point. In the year ending Sixth month 30, 1889, we sold to China (including Hong Kong) to the amount of not quite 6½ millions of dollars; in the year ending Sixth month 30, 1897, these sales had grown to 18 millions of dollars.

The experience with other countries is of the same character, and any one who needs light upon the subject may readily study the figures for himself. It did not need that we should coerce the world with armies and navies, in order to sell our products; on the contrary, such sales cost, in money as well as principle, far more than they return.

THE managing editor has safely arrived in England, and is making pleasant visits among Friends near London. The first of his intended letters appears elsewhere in our columns.

IN our last issue the poem "If We Knew" was wrongly credited as to authorship. It was written by Dr. E. E. Phipps; also, in the second paragraph of the letter from Hannah A. Plummer, read First-day afternoons in place of Friday afternoons.

BIRTHS.

JENKINS.—At Nashville, Tenn., Sixth month 2, 1899, to Dr. Thomas A. and Marian M. Jenkins, a son, who is named Francis Arthur.

MARRIAGES.

CHEYNEY—JAMES.—At the residence of the bride's mother, Susan F. James, West Chester, Pa., by Friends' ceremony, on the evening of Fifth month 31, 1899, Algernon Roberts Cheyney, son of Jesse S. Cheyney of West Philadelphia, and Lila Pancoast James.

CHURCH—GILLAM.—At the residence of the bride, near Langhorne, Bucks county, Pa., on Fifth-day, Sixth month 1, 1899, under the care of Middletown Monthly Meeting, Watson P. Church, of Newtown, Pa., and Mary Gillam.

YOUNG—WILSON.—In Philadelphia, Sixth month 7, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Dr. James K. Young and Dr. Mary T. Wilson.

DEATHS.

ACTON.—In Salem, N. J., Sixth month 6, 1899, Casper W. Acton, in his 76th year.

ARMITAGE.—In Lambertville, N. J., Fifth month 21, 1899, Emeline S., widow of Joseph D. Armitage, in her 81st year. Interment at Solebury Friends' ground.

CONROW.—Sixth month 5, 1899, Dr. Abraham E. Conrow, aged 40 years. Interment from Westfield, N. J., meeting-house.

EVANS.—Sixth month 11, 1899, Owen Evans, aged 73 years. Interment from West Grove meeting-house, Pa.

HUTCHINSON.—In Philadelphia, Sixth month 10, 1899, Anna W., wife of John Hutchinson, of Haddonfield, N. J., where the interment took place.

HUTTON.—At Richmond, Ind., Fourth month 26, 1899, to Walter J. and Jessie Winder Hutton a daughter, who is named Miriam Alice Hutton.

LAWRENCE.—At Macedon, N. Y., Sixth month 3, 1899, Phebe Fritts, wife of Walter Lawrence, aged 75 years; a valued member and elder of Farmington Executive Meeting. Hers was a life of humble, patient goodness *

MATHIS.—At Moorestown, N. J., Sixth month 5, 1899, Elizabeth G., widow of Bartin C. Mathis, in her 93d year. Interment from Medford meeting-house.

PENNINGTON.—At her late residence, near Kelton, Pa., Third month 29, 1899, Margaret J. Pennington, aged 55 years; a member of West Grove Meeting.

THAYER.—At Great Neck, Long Island, Sixth month 2, 1899, to George A. and Elizabeth H. C. Thayer, a son, who is named William Willets Thayer.

WILSON.—At her home, Fifth month 28, 1899, in Friends' settlement at Clear Creek, Ill., Theodora, daughter of Morris A. and Emma L. Wilson, aged 25 years.

She was a birthright member of Clear Creek Monthly Meeting, and much interested in religious and temperance work and a successful teacher in both First-day and public schools. Fourteen weeks before her death, she was taken with the grippe and very reluctantly gave up her school. Later her disease developed into consumption. Though at times a great sufferer, she bore her prolonged sickness with patient, Christian resignation.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

I.—AN ATLANTIC VOYAGE EASTWARD.

THE steamships that cross the Atlantic from the American to the European ports, and contrariwise, run with almost the regularity and certainty of the ferry-boats that cross the Delaware to Camden or the Hudson to Jersey City. There is some variation in the length of the voyages, according to the season, or on account of exceptional weather, but the average speed of each vessel is well ascertained, and speaking generally the hour of departure being known, the time of her arrival can be definitely anticipated.

The St. Louis, on which I have just crossed from New York to Southampton, is one of the two splendid ships which Philadelphia enterprise, capital, and skill added about four years ago to the fleet of the American Line,—the other being the St. Paul. These are very large; they are each 11,629 tons, and are exceeded in size only by three or four late-built leviathans of other lines.

A steamship of this class is, in fact, simply a great floating hotel. The sea makes its outlook; the sense of floating and of motion creates novelty, and to many (not to me in the least) produces most inconvenient effects; but otherwise the several hundred passengers are simply guests for a week of a most admirably appointed and kept house of entertainment. Every provision is made for their comfort. The ship is clean, handsome, and well ventilated. How it might be in winter, or in time of severe storm, I cannot say, of course; but now, when the fine weather permits the doors on the upper decks to be open, and there is an unchecked circulation of air—as of people—there could hardly be a more satisfactory house on shore, in point of good accommodation and freedom from all that is unpleasant.

The incidents of a safely-accomplished ocean voyage such as this do not have a wide range. There is strict attention to the weather, much conversation about the smoothness or roughness of the sea, and still more upon the manner in which each passenger is affected or unaffected by illness. The ships that are seen,—not those "that pass in the night,"—are valuable contributions to the entertainment of the company, as they can often be watched a long time before they finally disappear below the horizon,—the little circle which in all directions bounds the vision. The ability or inability to go to table, the attentions of the deck stewards and the state-room stewards to those who are unwell, the making of acquaintances, the listening to stories, the speculation on the day's "run" of the ship, the watching for whales, porpoises, sea-birds, or even an iceberg, are features of the trip which every sea-traveler describes, and which the present writer has found repeated in his experience.

We have met and passed a few vessels; on one day, the Servia, of the Cunard Line, going east like ourselves, was passed quite near, and on another, a sailing-ship, a barque, under full sail, also going east. One iceberg was seen, in the night, by the ship's crew; it seemed to me early in the season to encounter these visitors from the North, but the officers tell me some may often be met at this season, increasing in number, of course, later on. There are over three hundred first-cabin passengers, and the list shows from what widely separated parts of the country they came—from Boston and San Francisco, Baltimore and Vancouver, besides Philadelphia, New York, and other cities. The ship makes something less than twenty miles an hour, and as the distance from Sandy Hook to the Needles (the entrance to Southampton harbor), is 3,190 miles, a full seven days with a few hours added, is needed. (The reader must remember that the day, as we travel against the sun's course, is to us some forty minutes less than the allotted twenty-four hours.) The ship's runs have been: 440 miles, 451 miles, 439 miles, 444 miles, 451 miles, and (at noon on the 30th) 451 miles.

I add a few lines as the voyage draws toward a close, though there is really nothing of great importance to say. We had run up to noon of the 30th, 2,676 miles from Sandy Hook, and we shall probably get to Southampton about 4 p. m., to-morrow, 31st. My plan at present is to go directly to London, where I hope to find the Friends still engaged in the proceedings of the Yearly Meeting. It will close, probably, on Sixth-day, the 2nd. I shall remain in London, I think, a few days, and then go to The Hague for a brief visit. I have engaged, with some others of our Friends, including Dr. Hull and his wife, of Swarthmore, and Mary Travilla and Sarah R. Paiste, to attend a Conference in London, 21st to 25th of next month, relative to the legal protection of young women from vicious traffic. In this our dear friend Aaron M. Powell was deeply interested, and at his suggestion and request, I undertook the service, though the subject is one of which I have no special knowledge.

The voyage has been almost uniformly fine, and I have enjoyed it very much. I close this as we are nearing the English coast. At noon, to-day, 30th, we were distant from the Needles, outside of Southampton harbor, 541 miles. H. M. J.

THE final test of religion at that great day is not religiousness, but love; not what I have done, not what I have believed, not what I have achieved, but how I have discharged the common charities of life.
—Drummond.

PROSELYTING.

A Paper by Margaret P. Howard, read before Philadelphia Young Friends' Association, at Fifteenth and Race streets, Fourth month 10th, 1899.

THE work of the Society of Friends is an exceedingly broad one. It aims at no less an object than that which was the life work of the Founder of Christianity itself. It seeks to project into men's minds the thought that shall help them to perceive their divine kinship, for so long as the thought is absent there can be no realization of the possibilities which are within reach.

As the mind dwells upon the theme we naturally turn to the life of one who was a remarkable illustration of what may be accomplished when the life conforms to the principle of Truth which we profess.

When George Fox had been brought to the conscious knowledge of the hidden springs of the Divine Life, and felt laid upon him the command to go forth bearing his testimony, he had no thought other than the hope that some might be helped to perceive beyond question the same manifested Presence. We are informed that many in all the different organizations of Religious Faith were hungering for something deeper and higher than they had yet experienced, and the Testimonies which he presented seemed to open the springs of life, and many were gathered to the Standard of Truth. It was no part of his intention to establish another sect; that was an after consideration, compelled by circumstances.

I cannot for a moment entertain the thought that that motive is a worthy one which seeks acceptance for our principles and testimonies on the mere ground of additional numbers.

The plain, simple truth of the "Divine Revealing" in the individual heart was at so great variance with the prevailing theological teaching that strong antagonism, followed by bitter persecution, fell to the portion of the early advocates of our faith.

When the excitements incident to their arrests, trials, imprisonments, distraint of worldly estate, and other sufferings had subsided, there followed a period of quietism and a settlement upon a policy of administration of church affairs (especially in the direction of outgoing in marriage) that cost the Society much loss of valuable members. While these conditions prevailed there was not much drawing power to attract new members.

And yet I would have us ever keep livingly before us that what may be construed and applied with so much unreasonableness, may also, under other conditions, when humility and love are the ruling factors, produce the most desirable results.

There is at the present time an earnestness and activity manifest in various directions amongst us, which is most encouraging. With our standard lifted high, our aim to live clean and blameless lives, our willingness to occupy all fields which give promise of helpfulness and the betterment of our kind,—surely these are conditions that should constitute a drawing power.

I feel very strongly that every opportunity should be made use of, for the more wide-spread presentation of the Truth as we understand it; if we go forth with a message of "sweet reasonableness" we may aid in deepening the religious life of others, for multitudes are everywhere seeking a more reasonable and practical interpretation of religious faith.

But they may not be prepared to unite with us in what has seemed to us the best method of maintaining in their integrity the things which have been committed to our stewardship, our manner of worship on a basis of silence, and the transaction of church affairs under a religious sense.

I grant that these things demand of us deep strivings after high ideals.

The thing sought is the very essence of spiritual life, and we know that it exists in many combinations of intellectual understanding.

To sum up the matter,—the conditions which existed during the first sixty years or more were exceedingly favorable for bringing in a large following; the long period of quietism and rigidity in disciplinary matters which succeeded was not favorable; the new life which is reviving amongst us gives promise of fulfilling more perfectly the command to "Let your light so shine, that men, seeing your good works, shall glorify your Father which is in Heaven."

There are yet many of those who profess the Christian name who set doctrinal belief higher than the life lived in conformity to the inward sense of righteousness; and in every community where this presentation of religious requirement is held, there is of necessity a class who are not and cannot be drawn into the churches, who gladly receive the message of Truth which plainly sets forth that the moral obligations are the foundation upon which must rest the spiritual superstructure.

Individual faithfulness to the call of service, in whatever direction there may be a qualification, seems to me to be the only practical way of spreading our principles and testimonies, the requisites for membership resting not only in an intellectual acceptance, but in a life reasonably consistent with the profession made.

Let us hope that we may so faithfully and livingly follow the "Divine Revealing"—that many may rise up and call us blessed!

WESTTOWN'S CENTENNIAL.

On the 10th instant old Westtown School, near West Chester, Pa., celebrated its hundredth anniversary. Old teachers and students and their friends to the number of nearly 3,000 gathered in the large tent to hear the historic and literary exercises that had been prepared. The only drawback to the pleasure of the day was the rainfall during the morning.

The program was as follows:

A brief interval of silence. Opening remarks by Samuel L. Allen, President; welcome by William F. Wickersham, Principal; Report of the Treasurer, Walter J. Buzby; Report of the Auditing Committee, Watson W. Dewees, Chairman; Report of the Registrar, Albert T. Bell; Report of Board of Managers, Samuel L. Allen, Chairman; "Westtown's First Century," Charles Potts; Presentation of the Westtown Centennial Memorial Fund ($100,000, of which a third or more is yet to be raised), by Samuel L.

Allen, Chairman of the Collecting Committee; Acceptance of the W. C. M. F. on behalf of the Westtown Committee, by Charles Rhoads; "The Centennial Poem," Prof. Francis B. Gummere, Ph.D., of Haverford College; Recess, during which annual subscriptions may be paid; Address, Ruth E. Chambers; "Westtown's Second Century," Isaac Sharpless, Sc.D., President of Haverford College; Count of those present who entered in the earlier Decades, Joshua L. Baily; Report of Nominating Committee, Henry W. Leeds, Chairman; Election of officers; Adjournment.

We give Prof. Gummere's poem in full:

"Let us now praise famous men, and our fathers that begat us."
—Ecclesiastes, xlv., 1.

Not these the faces, and not these the forms,
Sought by an inward eye, though this the scene;
Across a century of suns and storms
Another throng behold, with other mien.

Midway they stand between the old and new,
Too near for hero, and too far for friend.
In the long journey of their lives, how few
Chasm and peak, perils of chance that lend

Color and outline to each human tale!
How few the jocund words, the voice of cheer
Not theirs the pilgrim's visage, stern and pale,
Not theirs the boon laugh of the cavalier.

No Endicott with that uplifted sword
To bar their way, and wrest the word of might,
Calling up terrors of his vengeful Lord
Upon the simple children of the Light.

Not theirs the martyrdom of mob and jail,
Stripes, anguish, fever, death: not theirs to prove
In shock of battle faith's celestial mail
And smite whole armies with the sword of love.

No cry of Fox rang down those peaceful days,
No Barclay's wrong to make their pulses leap;
How see them, know them, as they went their ways,
A simple folk, to plant and till and reap?

Faces that watch us from no canvas still,
And hands that fashioned no memorial stone,
And feet that lingered on no muses' hill,
Nor wandered on those strenuous paths and lone

Of old philosophy; no bud, no spray
Of shade or color; hard and pitiless noon!
So this the pit from which was digged our day,
And here the rock from which our lives were hewn!

Nay, strong old fathers of our Quaker breed,
Not this we leave you! Let the higher mood
Bring keener vision, that our eyes may read
That noblest of all records: They were good.

Full many a life has won its martyr crown
Unscourg'd of mobs and in no prison hurl'd,
That fought the tyrants of his own heart down,
And kept itself unspotted from the world.

And such were they! And here by hall and grove
The peace, the memories of that spirit brood;
And yonder youth still hear those words of love:
"Obey the still, small voice: hold fast the good."

Hold fast the good! When time shall turn its page
A century hence the record new to write,
Be said of us: "They kept their heritage,
And lived not all unworthy of the Light."

Ruth E. Chambers, in her address, said that the highest aim of every sound institution of learning should be to teach its pupils to be, rather than to do or know. She dwelt too upon the silent lessons to be drawn from the stately groves about this venerable school. "The external surroundings of Westtown," said she, "are of no trivial importance. Who can reckon the influence of these lofty pines, or can tell how many partially-developed natures have been strengthened and steadied by the natural beauties of this place? For myself, I am not sure but what one sunset seen from yonder path did more for me than a whole session of school work.

"One impulse from a vernal wood
May teach you more of man,
Of moral evil and of good,
Than all the sages can."

The strong address of President Sharpless took for its central thought the growth that must be made in the coming century of Westtown's history. "The vast mass of intricate regulations which Thomas Scattergood imported from Ackworth," said the speaker, "have rightly been buried in a sealed tomb, and the ingenious codes which the Prices, the Passmores, and the Sharplesses of the past sought to bind around the growing sense of responsibility of boys and girls, have been shaken off with evident profit by a freer age. But the central purpose of Westtown still remains as the perennial source of all policy and methods, the development of spiritually guided men and women with faculties so educated as to do their full work for the world."

An interesting feature was the calling upon members of early classes to rise. Seven aged Friends were present who were Westtown pupils between 1820 and 1830. Of these the oldest was Philip P. Sharpless, of West Chester, a member of our branch. Forty-nine survivors of the next decade arose; and of those who had been at the school since 1840 there were too many to be readily counted.

At the conclusion of the exercises an excellent luncheon was served, and the afternoon was spent in visiting the various buildings, exhibits, etc. As the rain ceased many roamed beneath the noble trees which are the pride of Westtown's lawns. The great gathering was an impressive one. The venerable and the middle-aged were for the time all old pupils once more; happy school-days were recalled, long-parted friends met once more; and Westtown was started upon its second century with every high hope and grateful benediction.

THE DOUKHOBORS.

THE receipt of the little fund collected by the INTELLIGENCER has not yet been acknowledged, so that we have no late news from the Doukhobors. The following letters received by way of England give an account of some of the trials and difficulties besetting the immigrants.

LETTERS RECEIVED BY JOHN BELLOWES, LONDON, ENGLAND.

YORKTON, ASSINIBOIA, Fifth month 16, 1899.

My Dear Bellows: Just a line to tell you that all the Cyprus lot are gathered here, in a wooden house and tents brought with us from Cyprus. I was given to understand that there would be enough accommodation for us here—but there is not. Fortunately we have tents, but not enough, as our baggage has not all turned up yet. We feel the cold a good deal, and to-day it is very wet, and of course our tents are not of the best, and let in the water a little. A good many of the sick are in the house, but not all. The weather has been unusually cold for the time of year, I believe.

There is a good deal of sickness. A young woman of the Elizavetpolski died here the day we came in, and yesterday morning a boy of our party died.

Fever, diarrhoea, dysentery, and rheumatism are the principal complaints. The dysentery has increased, and conditions here are not very favorable. Our people are anxious to get to work—but Hilkoŭ tells me we must probably wait about a month doing nothing. We shall manage somehow, by hook or by crook, to get our able-bodied away on foot, and, if necessary, carrying provisions with them. The reason he gives is want of funds for transport, feeding at that distance, stock, and implements. A sufficient amount of money spent now would surely save a good deal of expense later on. Do you think Friends in England, Russia, and America understand this?

But yesterday evening arrived two brothers from the Southern allotment. They are both of the Lake Huron party, and therefore fellow-exiles. The exiles, that is, Lake Huron and second Lake Superior parties, were to have settled in the Northern allotment (which cannot at present be reached on account of floods). But they report that there is no room for us there. A good district which had been allotted was taken back by the Government. They have, it seems, settled seventeen villages, but there is not suitable land enough for more. We want to go and see some land about twenty-four or twenty-five miles from here.

There are a number of the Elizavetpolski (Lake Superior No. 1) here still, and the agent here is anxious to get them away. We are therefore at present in this position: We cannot get to the place we were supposed to settle. We cannot do much towards helping those who are in the Southern allotment. We now hear that there is no land ready for us anywhere; sickness is considerable and is increasing, and funds are low.

Don't suppose, however, that we have lost spirit—nothing of the kind—I only think it right to let you know the state of affairs. Ann Rabety¹ is here with us now—we left Archer at Winnipeg. We all arrived on Saturday, 13th. We expect Elizabeta Markoff,¹ Soulershtsky, Dr. Mercer² of the Lake Superior, Sasha Satz, and perhaps others, to arrive from Winnipeg to-night. Hilkoŭ left for the Southern allotment on Sunday.

Your Friend,

ARTHUR ST. JOHN.

WRITTEN AT YORKTON, ASSINIBOIA.

Fifth month 16, 1899.

Dear Friend: I arrived here this evening from Winnipeg and on having a talk with St. John I find him under the impression that there is no land for the Cyprus people yet arranged for, and it is at his suggestion I write this note to reassure you on this point. There is land reserved for the Doukhobors in the so-called South Reserve (Southwest of Fort Pelly) for over 1,000 homesteads, and it is part of this land on which the Cyprus people should be settled.

Since I left Hilkoŭ to go to Quebec to meet the Lake Superior the arrangements then contemplated seems to have been somewhat modified, and it is perhaps this that is the cause of St. John's impression.

The spring here is very late and the weather unusually unsettled for the time of year, which is creating some difficulties for all newly-arrived settlers—principally in the matter of transport—but things seem going fairly well on the whole, and the Doukhobors actually on the land are hard at work getting the land plowed for potatoes, oats, barley, etc.

Excuse further particulars now—I believe St. John has written you pretty fully so far as the Cyprus folk are concerned.

Thy Friend,

HERBERT ARCHER.

¹Russian Volunteer Nurses J. B.

²Dr. Mercer is a young surgeon from Blackburn who has voluntarily given up his post on the Lake Superior to go with the sick Doukhobors whom he tended on board.

By the will of the late Catherine M. White, who died last week in Evanston, Illinois, the Art Institute of Chicago is made richer by about $200,000. Her estate, valued at half a million dollars, was left to Chicago educational institutions.

Educational Department.

SWARTHMORE COMMENCEMENT.

THE twenty-seventh annual commencement of Swarthmore College was held on the 13th instant. A large number of friends and patrons of the College were present.

The program of exercises was as follows: Opening address by Joseph Wharton, President of the Board of Managers; oration, "The Strenuous Life," by Marshall Pancoast; oration, "I am More Holy than Thou," by Emily R. Underhill; oration, "The Price of Progress," by Mary E. Seaman; address, "Education as a Liberator," by Hamilton Wright Mabie, L. H. D.

The three honor scholarships named respectively for Deborah Fisher Wharton, Samuel Underhill, and Anson Lapham, were given to Mary Haviland, Elizabeth L. Gillingham, and Edson S. Harris, they having passed highest in the examination in their several classes.

Hamilton Wright Mabie in his eloquent address referred to "the fine note of idealism" pervading the orations of the three graduates who had spoken. He urged a devotion to education in the noblest sense, the education of nature and of life. We should not be satisfied, he said, with receiving academic diplomas, but, with these as a basis, continue the education of mind and soul through all our days; with high ideals to guide us in our work, yet not without a wise recognition of the achievements of man in the past.

President Birdsall conferred degrees as follows:

MASTER OF ARTS—Helen Bright Smith, A. B., 1895, Media, Pa.

MASTER OF LETTERS—John Edwin Wells, B. L., 1896, Philadelphia, Pa.

CIVIL ENGINEER—Joseph Thorn Freeman, B. S., 1893, Rochester, N. Y.; Edgar Harper Firth, B. S., 1896, East Williston, N. Y.; Hanson Zimri Wilson, B. S., 1896, Port Jervis, N. Y.

BACHELOR OF ARTS—John Pearl Broomell, Baltimore, Md.; Anna Belle Eisenhower, Norristown, Pa.; Edith Flitcraft, Woodstown, N. J.; Gilbert Lewis Hall, Brentwood, N. Y.; Mary Elizabeth Seaman, Brooklyn, N. Y.; Benjamin Abraham Thomas, Abrams, Pa.

BACHELOR OF LETTERS—Mary Evelyn Armstrong, Lansdowne, Pa.; Mary Gertrude Ball, Merchantville, N. J.; Anna Bradbury, Richmond, Ind.; Emily Willets Carter, Buffalo, N. Y.; Helen Moore Fogg, Philadelphia, Pa.; Mabel Clare Gillespie, Allegheny, Pa.; Marie Katharine Lackey, Atlantic City, N. J.; Mary Gray Leiper, Wallingford, Pa.; Jane Eachus Linvill, Philadelphia, Pa.; Alice Lippincott, Riverton, N. J.; Helen Supplee Moore, Atlantic City, N. J.; Marshall Pancoast, Mickleton, N. J.; Annie Bogardus Parrish, Woodbury, N. J.; Emily Rushmore Underhill, Glen Head, N. Y.; Elizabeth Eames Willits, Glen Cove, N. Y.

BACHELOR OF SCIENCE—In Science,—Levis Miller Booth, Chester, Pa.; Calvin Freeman Crowell, Moorestown, N. J.; Abner Davis Jackson, Nine Points, Pa.; Walter Heulings Lippincott, Riverton, N. J.; Annie Lodge, Philadelphia, Pa.

BACHELOR OF SCIENCE—In Engineering—Richard Jones Bond, Upper Darby, Pa.; Jacob Serrill Verlenden, Darby, Pa.

SWARTHMORE PREPARATORY SCHOOL.—The exercises of the sixth annual commencement of the school were held on the 9th instant in Swarthmore Hall, when diplomas were awarded the nine graduates by Principal Arthur H. Tomlinson. The honor speakers were as follows: "Savonarola," Morrison J. Oswald; "Make Your Life a Challenge," Norman S. Passmore; "Joy in Our Life Work," Annie G. Harshberger; "Nature's Benedicite," Annie S. Hawke; "Thought, Our Common Birthright," William E. Hannum; "Still Achieving, Still Pursuing," Ruth Walden. Those who received diplomas were Annie Gertrude Harshberger, Norman Sumner Passmore, Lucie Slater Howard, Cleora Marjorie Haviland, Morrison Jackson Oswald, Hallie Gundaker Hurlburt, Annie Shoemaker Hawke, William Evans Hannum, and Ruth Walden.

THE old school-house in East Haddam, Conn., in which Nathan Hale taught the year after his graduation at Yale, is to be preserved by a patriotic society.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

SWARTHMORE FIRST-DAY SCHOOL.—At the closing session Gertrude K. Walton read this paper:

"It seems well to give thought for a few moments to the First-days during the vacation period. The children of members of the Society of Friends have enjoyed the privilege of a home training sufficiently to make the Sabbath a day to love and not to dread. Owing to this very fact it becomes more difficult for these parents to discern between wholly unrestrained liberty and guarded freedom. To combine the profitable and pleasing, to direct wisely and yet not arouse antagonism on the part of the child; these are high accomplishments for parents to acquire. The children are now without the help they have been receiving each day from the secular and First-day school teachers, and although a little less care and attention may be needed as to the clothing of these little folks as they play around their homes, their hearts and souls need our unceasing vigilance. I know it is not the desire of these kind First-day school teachers who have been endeavoring so faithfully to show the little folks the right paths to follow, who have taught them of the spiritual forces within them that they need to cultivate, the moral strength they can claim if they will,—it is not the desire of these teachers for their students to spend their summer Sabbaths in a wholly thoughtless manner. I want you to remember that the meeting is still here though the First-day school be closed, and that it is something for the little ones to learn how to sit quietly through the meeting hour, and something for those yet older to learn how to use the silence most profitably. Coming now perhaps more especially from the desire of your parents and teachers, I feel sure that as you grow older you will come because you want to, because you find it makes you feel better satisfied with yourselves and with the day, and you will realize later in life what a great benefit it has been to you. Then a walk to the woods and streams where insects, birds, and so many of mother Nature's children may be found, will all result profitably and help to cultivate a reverential spirit. Good books, suitable for all ages, are abundant and accessible. A part of each Sabbath in companionship with some of these is wise.

"The week-day schools are also closing, so that more leisure is suddenly thrust upon you than you know how to use. Undoubtedly there will be plenty of time six days of the week for all wisely romping games which must claim a part of the time of vigorous, healthy childhood; let the First-day be spent more quietly and calmly, but pleasantly, and as you grow older you will recall the passed Sabbaths with a special delight. Let us all, the older and young, keep for our text through the vacation days, Barrie's little Joey's text—'Thou, God, seest me.'"

PHILADELPHIA.—The last meeting of Young Friends' Association for the season was held Sixth month 5. The President being absent on account of sickness, the first Vice-president, Emma Waln, presided. The minutes of the preceding meeting were accepted as read. The standing committees made interesting reports. The Executive Committee stated it had secured printed applications for membership, and announced the evening's program. The report of the Nominating Committee was read and accepted with the substitution of the name of Henrietta D. E. Walter for that of Mary Janney, who requested to be excused from serving on the House Committee. This report recommended, (1) that the House Committee shall consist of nine members, five women and four men; (2) that the term of office shall be three years, three members retiring each year; (3) that the following shall constitute the committee, to serve one year: Henrietta D. E. Walter, Robert M. Janney, Emma Waln; to serve two years, Anna A. Emley, Anna P. Supplee, Wm. W. Birdsall; to serve three years, Charles E. Hires, Joseph C. Emley, Isabel Chambers. It was decided that the Executive Committee should consider rules governing the House Committee, as to when and to whom it should report and that some restriction be made as to the number of its members which shall be members of the Society of Friends, etc. The Building Committee made an interesting report as to the purposes for which the various apartments of the several floors of the Association Building were designed.

Joseph M. Truman, Jr., gave an illustrated talk on "Meeting Houses and Some Friends of Philadelphia." We were told that the faithfulness of a few Friends, and sometimes it was only a family, had resulted in the establishment of a meeting. Data as to the purchase of ground and the building of meeting-houses were given and pictures of the old buildings long since removed and of the modern meeting-houses were shown. Also pictures of some of the prominent Friends in the early days of our city were shown and exceedingly interesting and sometimes amusing was the recital of the characteristics of these individuals.

The President invited all to remain after the close of the meeting that we might spend a few moments together socially.

The meeting then adjourned to meet at the regular time in the Fall.

ESTHER S. STACKHOUSE, Secretary.

NEWTOWN, Pa.—Newtown Friends' Association held its last meeting before closing for the season at the home of Thomas W. and Elizabeth G. Stapler. Martha Wilson opened the exercises by reading "Habits of Life," a selection from the American Friend. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved. Elizabeth G. Stapler, one of the delegates to Friends' Association Conference held in Philadelphia Fifth month 15, read a report of that meeting from the INTELLIGENCER. Mary Wilson read a paper in answer to the question, "What have Friends done for the Indians?" The writer failed to find evidence of Friends having done much to aid the Indian from early colonial times until 1869, when, encouraged by Grant's administration, they became more active, and have since assisted them in many ways.

"Is the giving of prizes, as is done by certain lines of trade, detrimental to the morals of the people?" was answered by Ellie J. Burroughs, who thought that though the giving of prizes to make an article sell is not a desirable way of doing business, the plan is adopted only as another way of advertising. In the discussion that followed, the thought was expressed that there was danger in the plan, as it tended to increase the desire existing in so many to get something for nothing. "The Scriptural Basis of the Queries" was continued by R. Anna Reeder and Elizabeth S. Kenderdine. George H. Nutt read a paper on "How Friends Appear to the Outside World." This article, written as it was by one who until recently knew almost nothing of Friends, was very interesting to the Association, most of whom have always lived in a Friendly community.

At a suggestion from Elizabeth G. Stapler that the Association do something toward procuring literature and distributing it to those who are in need of it, a committee was appointed to take charge of the matter.

The executive committee presented the following program for the next meeting: Biographical sketches of Aaron M. Powell; Review of a late publication, "In Tune with the Infinite," by Sarah J. Reeder; Reading, by Lydretta Rice; the conclusion of "Scriptural Basis of the Queries," by Evan T. Worthington; Current Topics, Mary T. Hillborn. The roll was called and the meeting adjourned to meet Tenth month 4, at the home of Abbie K. Rice. A. E. W.

MANSFIELD, N. Y.—The Young Friends' Association was held at the home of Abraham Scott, Fifth month 25th, with thirty-five members present, beside a number of visitors. Elizabeth B. Zelle read from the Discipline, extracts from the Gospel ministry. A "History of Friends' Dealing with the Indians," was prepared by Elizabeth Pray, and read by her son, Courtney Pray. This was an interesting account of William Penn's dealing with the Indians. In response to the question, "Should God send His Son to this world to-day? How would He be received?" Cyrus S. Moore gave a brief history of the Creation and of the wickedness of the people during the successive ages before the birth of Jesus, then of the manner in which he was received. His disciples are ready to welcome his coming. Are all ready? This is the question. It would be an everlasting disgrace at this age of the world to reject the Son of righteousness.

Thomas A. Bunting responded to the question, "How can Friends best display their Loyalty to their country in the present national crisis?" He thought Friends should advocate peace, always, as it has been one of our principles from the foundation of the Society. The power of the peace principles of Friends has a wide application in diminishing the causes for struggle and strife, in making us willing to do justice to all men, and in providing the means for the settlement as well as individual controversies by arbitration. In this particular the world is coming somewhat to our ideals.

Readings were given by Mary A. Harvey, "After Many Days"; and Anna Scott, "The Quaker of the Olden Time." A recitation, "An Order for a Picture," was given by Amy Bowne. It was decided to postpone our meetings for two months only, as our young people are anxious to attend one meeting during the summer vacation, ere they return to their different schools. After a brief silence we adjourned to meet at the home of William L. Biddle, Eighth month 24.

MARTHA E. GIBBS, Secretary.

LITTLE BRITAIN, PA.—Penn Hill Young Friends' Association held the last meeting of the season on Fifth month 28, 1899. It was opened by the reading of Matthew, 20th chapter. Day Wood reported for the History Committee. Phebe L. Coates read an article from Young Friends' Review. Mary Smedley read an account of a journey from Buckingham, Bucks county, to Little Britain, Pa., made by Sarah Watson, in 1813. This was particularly interesting, as the descendants of many of the families she visited still live in this vicinity. "What can the home do to help the meeting?" was answered by Raymond Good. These points were given: the influence of the older members of the home; encouragement of First-day Schools by regular attendance; careful supervision of reading matter for youth, and discussion of religious matters in the family. "Books and Reading, how are we most benefitted thereby?" was presented by Jennie Brown. If the old saying be true, "Of making books there is no end," what a wonderful, limitless expanse of reading material, in this day of inexpensive literature, is found to be within the easy grasp of him who desires to obtain it!

He speaks truly who says books are companions; they are friends who can be depended upon at all times. Books of biography are very important; they inspire us to do right, to follow the example of the good men and women who had to struggle against adverse circumstances.

After roll-call the association adjourned to meet the first of Tenth month.

P. L. COATES, Cor. Sec.

COMMUNICATIONS.

TWO OPINIONS ON THE EASTERN QUESTION.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I AM convinced that no one living has a greater horror or a more utter disapproval of wars than I have; but until a majority of the peoples of the earth share this opinion, wars will come and must be met, the point being how best to meet them. I feel bound in this connection to say a few words in regard to the present situation. In a brief reply made by your journal to "A Word from Iowa," signed F. P. Marsh, the editors say, "In reference to the officials who are from time to time established at Washington, they are servants, not masters." I would ask in what relation do the engineers and conductors of a fast railroad line stand to the railroad company or to the people who travel by it? Are they not the servants of these? And yet to them are entrusted the care, the safety, and the responsibility of the train; and when it is speeding through or over perilous places, they dare not change the schedule no matter how much the passengers may clamor; and the more they clamor or attempt to interfere, the more danger to the train. Such seems to be the case now; this crisis came upon the country almost with the shock and suddenness of a terrific bolt of lightning from a clear sky; the president and other officials had not time to weigh plans or to digest measures; they must act promptly and decisively. They may have made great and grave mistakes; but is it not the part of all patriotic citizens to give their intentions at least the benefit of the doubt? If we cannot stand by their side, we can keep out of their way; if we cannot uphold their hands, we need not drag them down. We Friends must continue to maintain and proclaim most earnestly on all possible occasions our unswerving belief in, and devotion to, peace principles; but this we can surely do without either open or covert criticisms of the administration, and we may also devoutly hope and pray that the great Author of the Universe will, "out of this seeming evil," eventually educe good.

C. H. M.

Sandy Spring, Md.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

The calm and sensible letter of F. P. Marsh in your last issue gave me much pleasure. It is a relief amid the feverish sentiment that prevails with many to find there are calm and clear minds who have not "bowed the knee to Baal." With our Society we uphold the principles of Peace. With the faith of our fathers we hold to the Light Within. It leads us also onward to many improving ways; new and onward ways they may be, challenging the intellectual life as their grand, progressive force moves over mankind.

When we turn to the Inner Light whose convincing force bears testimony that abstract truth is inter-bound in ways that slowly unfold to the human consciousness, will we not read the guiding hand that has called our clean, fresh country to this new unfolding? What so capable of moulding the priest-ridden life to a more just development than the active, rational thought of Protestant America? True, we have our dark scenes of wrong, but we have our Tuskegee, our Hull House, and the grand spirit of open, religious honesty. The truth will be winnowed from all those points, and the action of the real peace party of America will be beautifully clear as the near results are shown. There is no doubt that the ultra-liberalism of our country, both in Congress and among the tender hearts of an active and impulsive people, have been principally the cause of the sad and blind opposition of the Tagal race.

The hand of Providence is guiding to the overthrow of false creed and the building up of nations to the liberal advance of the centuries to come.

LAVINIA P. YEATMAN.

Norway, Chester county, Fifth month 28.

METEOROLOGICAL SUMMARY FOR FIFTH MONTH, 1899.

Mean barometer,	30.069
Highest barometer during the month,	30.358
Lowest barometer during the month,	29.712
Mean temperature,	63.9
Highest temperature during the month, 28th,	90.
Lowest temperature during the month, 4th,	45.
Mean of maximum temperatures,	74.
Mean of minimum temperatures,	53.8
Greatest daily range of temperature, 6th,	30.
Least daily range of temperature, 18th,	5.
Mean daily range of temperature,	20.2
Mean relative humidity, per cent.,	66.3
Mean temperature of the Dew Point,	50.1
Total precipitation in inches, rain,	2.30
Greatest precipitation in any 24 consecutive hours, 0.77 inches of rain, on the 11th.
Number of days on which .01 inch or more of rain fell, 11.
Number of clear days 11, fair days 13, cloudy days 7.
Prevailing direction of wind from the Southwest.
Thunder storm on the 16th, 17th, 29th.
Frost, light on the 4th.
Solar halo on the 6th and 16th.

SENSIBLE TEMPERATURE DATA.

Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m.,	66.5 on 30th
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m.,	43 on 4th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m.,	55.1.
Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m.,	67 on 30th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m.,	46 on 3d.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m.,	56.5.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer for this month,	55.8

NOTE.—The monthly mean temperature for this month, 63.9° is about 1° above the normal, and 2.7° above the corresponding month in 1898.

The amount of precipitation, 2.30 inches, is about one-half the usual rain fall for Fifth month.

JOHN COMLY, Observer.

Centennial Avenue, Philadelphia, Fifth month 31.

A PICTURE OF MY MOTHER.

A typical sonnet by the poet whose book, "At the Gates of Song," William Dean Howells has praised so warmly, as we noted in last week's issue. Lloyd Mifflin lives near Columbia, Pa., and is descended from old Quaker stock, his ancestors having been Westtown pupils.

UPON this old Daguerreotype appears

Thy face, my mother, crowned with wondrous hair;
What reconciliation in thine air;
And what a saintly smile, as if thy fears
The Lord had taken from thee, and thy tears;
'Tis my delight to still believe thee fair;
And thou wast loved, I know, for often here,
I saw my father's eyes, at eighty years,
O'erflow with love when'er we spoke of thee—
We spoke of thee, I said, not he—not he!
He could not speak! . . . O peace be with thee,
then,

Madonna-like, thy babe upon thy knee!
My gentle mother, lost on earth to me,
Shall I not know thee somewhere once again?

—Lloyd Mifflin.

THE NUN'S RETREAT.

WITHIN the convent's sheltering walls,
Time, like a silver streamlet, falls
With murmur sweet.
There never worldly stir or strife
Disturbs the even pulse of life
With quickened beat;
But yet a deeper peace to seek,
The church commands the sisters meek,
And sets apart one hallowed week,—
Their blest "retreat."

Then e'en the mild and gentle words,
Which oft like quiet songs of birds
Their tasks beguile
And fall so soft upon the air,
From lips whose custom'd speech is prayer,
Are hushed awhile.
With inward thought, with outward sign,
They seek a deeper life divine,
And guard the heart, as 'twere a shrine,
From jest or smile.

How oft amid the scorching heat,
And hurry of the noonday street,
Once more I see
Those saintly faces pure and sweet
And mind me of the nun's "retreat,"
Till over me
The peaceful shade and coolness falls,
And quiet of those convent walls,
From anxious care that frets and galls
Our spirits, free.

But not for all those sisters know
Of calm content, would I forego
The fret, the pain,
The baffling, oft despairing strife
Which wakes to dream of larger life
The heart and brain.
I cannot think these struggles blind
Of eager soul and questioning mind,
That make us one with all mankind,
Are given in vain;

And not to win a barren peace,
Would I from cheerful converse cease,
And pure delight;
Nor could I feel, if set apart
From beatings of the common heart,
The wave of might,
Inflowing from the life of souls
Which, moving through our clay, controls
The human tide that upward rolls
Into the light.

And yet from all life's dust and heat
 Each one should have his calm retreat,
 Where, free from care,
 The soul may rest upon the sense
 Of that Unseen Benevolence
 Which, everywhere,
 With all our noble purpose blent,
 Works on to frame the thing we meant,
 Through ill-shaped deed and high intent,
 Such rest is prayer!

—Oakes Burleigh.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

SAMUEL M. JANNEY AND THE INDIANS.

I WAS much interested in the Indians, and speaking to our friend Chalkley Gillingham one day, asked if there was nothing that Friends could do for their aid, and if so, offering my services. In reply he said the Indian Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting, of which he was a member, had had an interview with President Johnson making the same inquiry of him, and offering their services. They were answered abruptly that there was not, but General Grant, at that time a member of the Cabinet, was present, and taking them aside, they had a very satisfactory interview with him.

The result was that when General Grant was elected President, he sent the famous letter, on the 14th of February, 1869, to Benjamin Hallowell, secretary of the Friends' Indian Committee, in which he said if he would send him the names of persons whom the Friends would recommend, and for whom they would become responsible, he would appoint them Indian Agents. This offer resulted in the coöperation of the six yearly meetings of our body in the recommendation of five of their members as Agents, with Samuel M. Janney for Superintendent. Samuel was very reluctant to accept the appointment; but his associates in the committee insisted, and he finally yielded.

President Grant, in his instruction to the Agents, said: "I send you as missionaries as well as agents," which seemed appropriate, as his policy was to "educate, civilize, and Christianize the Indians." He also requested us to occupy the field as soon as possible.

Samuel arrived in Nebraska some little time before me. I arrived there on 30th of Fifth month, 1869, and went directly to his lodgings in Omaha. It was Seventh-day, and he informed me promptly he had given notice of a meeting to be held in a house he had procured for the purpose. The next morning I attended it with him, and thus enjoyed the privilege of attending the first Friends' meeting held in the State of Nebraska. That afternoon I left on the train for Columbus, arrived there in the night, and next morning went with my predecessor Charles H. Walley, to the Pawnee Agency, which was "turned over" to me that day, Sixth month 1st, by C. H. W. There was a Sabbath School attended by the Indian scholars and white children, and likewise an Episcopal Mission there; the pastor of the church in Columbus preached there once a month immediately after the adjournment of the Sabbath School.

I had appointed several Friends as employés, among them Samuel Walton as trader, and Ella Walton and Sallie E. Lloyd, teachers in the Indian School, for there was a large Industrial Indian School there (as Friends are aware), and the next First-day with what Friends were there, the school children, all the employés, and some of the village Indians, we held a Friends' meeting, which was continued from that time weekly as long as I continued in Nebraska. When it was discontinued at the Agency it was established in the district school near my residence, and if I am correctly informed has been maintained ever since, and was the first Friends' meeting established in Nebraska. Bishop Clarkson, out of deference to Friends, discontinued the Episcopal Mission, leaving the responsibility of Christianizing the Indians entirely with Friends.

JACOB M. TROTH.

AN INTERESTING INSECT.

THERE is a little insect very much in evidence just now which has an interesting life-history, especially in association with that other little citizen who has so many points in common with mankind, including domestic economy and (must we say it?) predatory warfare—the common ant. The subject of our study is the plant-louse or aphid, familiar to every owner of a window-garden or rose-bush. Just now they are attacking our maple and other shade trees.

The first thing to be noticed about the aphid is its color. It is usually of the color of the plant on which it feeds, and this undoubtedly serves to protect it against its enemies. I have just been examining a rose bush at my door covered with the aphid rosæ. The tender green stems are covered with the little green lice, the same shade of color as the stems. Their legs and antennæ are dark and thin, and are an exact imitation of the hairs on the stem of the bush. A closer inspection shows something much more remarkable. One branch of the bush has shot up so rapidly that the green coloring of the leaf and stem has not yet developed. The color is instead a bright, reddish-brown, a common thing in the early stage of foliage. A search for the green lice shows that they are reddish-brown—the exact shade of color of the stem and leaves on which they are feeding and hiding. Could a more remarkable example of mimicry for protective purposes be found in the whole range of nature?

Another curious fact is that connected with the birth and generation of these tiny insects. Oviparous generation is the rule in insects, but there are certain departures from the rule. In the aphides both the oviparous and viviparous exist in the same species.

These insects exhibit remarkable examples of alternation of generation, having winged and unwinged forms of both sexes. They will well repay a careful study. It is in the larvæ state that the injury is done to our trees. On every leaf will be found numerous little transparent shells or skeletons of the growing larvæ.

When these little aphides were first studied it was thought that the enemy attacking the plant was the ant, which from its color was more easily seen. A closer inspection developed a very curious fact. It was soon found that the aphides were the ants' cows and that they actually "milked" them. Sometimes as many as three or four ants may be seen around one aphis gently stroking the little insect. The fluid in place of milk is a colorless, sweet, sticky substance, commonly called "honey dew," from the fact that the drops of honey stand on the leaves like dew. It is to be seen in great abundance on all the trees infested with these insects, and on the fallen leaves, and peppered over the pavements under the trees.

Sir John Lubbock, in his "Chapter in Popular Natural History," says: "As the honey of the aphides is more or less sticky, it is probably an advantage to the aphis that it should be removed. Nor is this the only service which ants render them. They protect them from the attacks of enemies, and not unfrequently build cow-sheds of earth over them. The yellow ants collect the root-feeding species of aphides in their nests, and tend them as carefully as their own young. But this is not all. The ants not only guard the mature aphides, which are useful, but also the eggs of the aphides, which, of course, until they come to maturity, are quite useless. . . . Our ants, then, though they may not perhaps lay up food for the winter, do more, for they keep during six months the eggs which will enable them to procure food during the following summer—a case of prudence unexampled in the animal kingdom." Another wise adaptation of these little insects to each other lies in the fact that the aphides become torpid at the beginning of their period of hibernation at the same low temperature as the ants themselves.

The most practical query just now is how to rid our trees of these pests. In the first place, there are a number of insects which prey on the aphides. Its especial enemy is the common spotted "lady bird" or "lady bug." The larvæ of the lady bird, which devours the plant lice, is a little "worm" about half an inch long, one of the common varieties having black and red bands across the abdomen, and biting jaws. Care should be taken not to confound this little worm, which is carnivorous and our ally, with the vegetable-eating enemies. Another enemy of the aphis is the ichneumon fly. Two species of this fly, it is said, lay their eggs in the body of the aphis. The spider also no doubt preys on the aphides. These are some of nature's insecticides. As an artificial insecticide Paris green was tried on trees in a nursery, but without effect. Dr. S. C. Schmucker, of the West Chester State Normal School, a naturalist and biologist of accurate observation, well-known throughout the State, was appealed to. He pointed out that the aphis does not eat the surface of the leaf, but extracts the sap, and is accordingly not affected by a dry surface application. A wash or spray of tobacco water is used by the window gardener for the aphis rosæ, and it would probably answer for the tree pest. Dr. Schmucker suggests the use of the kerosene emulsion. This is made by dissolving a half-pound of hard soap in a gallon of boiling hot water until it is a thin paste. Then stir in thoroughly two gallons of kerosene and apply with a spray or brush.

JAMES MONAGHAN.

Swarthmore, Pa.

WHITE MEN IN THE TROPICS.

THE argument of Benjamin Kidd, the English writer, (an authority much quoted some years ago, and generally much overestimated), in his recent book on "The Control of the Tropics," is that the white races can not live and form self-governing communities in hot climates. The editor of the Popular Science Monthly remarks that this is equivalent to the proposition that freedom is limited by climate. Kidd also says that although the white man can not live permanently in the tropics, he must control them; and hence he gives aid and comfort to the American expansionists. This view the Popular Science Monthly discusses as follows:

"Whether Mr. Kidd recognizes the odious significance of his captivating speculation or not, it is certainly a plea and an apology for slavery and political despotism in the tropics. . . . There is reason to believe that it must be relegated to the limbo of a kindred and popular superstition. Within the past year much has been said about the genius of the Anglo-Saxon for freedom and the ethnic incapacity of the Latins for that boon of civilization. Even so great a scholar as Guizot encourages this extraordinary theory. . . . In apology for his misinterpretation of social phenomena there can be urged his ignorance of the law of evolution and of the hardly less important law of the militant origin of despotism and the pacific origin of freedom. No such apology can, however, be made in behalf of Mr. Kidd, or of any other apostle of imperialism. Not only have they at command all the generalizations of social science, but all the facts upon which these generalizations are based, to prove that neither climate nor race is a limitation upon freedom.

"If climate determined the character of the political institutions of a people, many questions would be suggested at once that would be beyond solution. Why, for instance, should a certain freedom have existed in Athens, and the most intolerable despotism in Sparta? Again, why should there be despotism in Russia and Germany as well as in Morocco and Egypt? Another series of questions equally perplexing can be raised. Why should there be more freedom in England to-day than six hundred or even one hundred years ago? The climate has not changed in the interval. Why should the institutions of Spain in the thirteenth century have been more liberal than in the seventeenth? Why was it that the freedom that existed in Germany before the Thirty Years' War had virtually ceased to exist at the Peace of Westphalia? Here also the climate had not changed. . . . The only satisfactory answer to these questions is to be found in the fact that militant activities always lead to despotism, and pacific activities always to freedom. When people get into war, the central power must exercise all the authority over life and property essential to success in battle. . . .

"Whether despotism exists, as Mr. Kidd and his followers assume, among all the indigenous populations of the tropics, only a careful investigation of the subject would permit one to say. But that it must, as they contend, always exist there, none of the laws of social evolution gives the slightest warrant. "Wherever it does exist, it had the same origin that it had in England, and in obedience to the same forces of peace and industry that operated against it in that country, it must pass away. . . . The degree of heat or humidity or the luxuriant vegetation of the tropics had no more to do with this political organization than the degree of cold, or the dryness of the atmosphere, or the comparative poverty of the soil of some of the Western States with the similar political organization of the Indians that roamed over them. None of these physical characteristics can prevent the play of those forces that drive people eventually to the adoption of that form of social organization that will best promote their happiness. As the social philosophy of evolution shows, the social organization best fitted for this purpose is the one where the largest individual freedom prevails."

Finally, the writer argues, the contention that the white man can not live and work permanently in the tropics, on which Mr. Kidd's demonstration practically rests, has slender basis in fact. He says:

"Alfred Russell Wallace, who spent twelve years in the tropics, says in a recent article that the white man can and does work in every part of them. If he does not work, it is simply for the same reason that he does not work in Europe or the United States—namely, because he does not have to. When, however, necessity lays its heavy hands on him, driving him to earn his living by the sweat of his brow, he does it in the tropical region quite as well as he does in the temperate. That is shown particularly in Queensland. But when natives can be reduced to slavery the crime is committed with slight compunction, and defended on the same ground that it was defended in the South and elsewhere. . . . The time must come when free institutions will be found as essential under the equator as farther north. Without them social evolution can not reach its highest point, nor man attain to his greatest happiness, a state that he is always seeking, no matter where he lives."

M. LOUBET, the new President, showed himself in a most delightful light at Montélimar, stopping the procession and rushing up to take his trembling old mother, standing on the terrace to see her distinguished son go by, in his arms, and kiss her again and again. It was so like a Frenchman with his mother. Madame Loubet was not at all well pleased with her son's election. "Oh, my poor Emile!" she said. "I already saw him little enough. Now I sha'n't see him at all." When one is eighty-six, and a mother, I suppose any sort of honor seems rather vain in comparison with "not seeing one's boy at all."—[Harper's Bazar.]

LAVENDER pillows are taking the place of the pine-needle cushions. They are usually covered with white linen, decorated with spikes of the lavender flowers worked in natural colors or heliotrope linen worked with flax threads of a paler tint. Lavender is also largely used in place of the malodorous moth balls, and is said to be quite as efficacious. A few drops of oil of lavender sprinkled along the edges of the carpet not only give the room a clean, fresh smell, but obviate the necessity of eternal vigilance for the appearance of carpet bugs.—[Philadelphia Ledger.]

THE New Jersey Electric Railway, comprising the Jersey City, Hoboken and Rutherford, the Paterson Central, the Paterson, Passaic and Rutherford roads, was sold on the 10th at auction, on account of the Mercantile Trust Company, of New York, for $1,500,000.

Devotion to Science.

LORD ROSSE, who built the famous telescope that bears his name, was an expert mechanic, and was also somewhat careless about his dress. On one occasion the earl was looking through the engine-room of a large manufactory. He suddenly became much interested in something he saw, and taking out his watch stood looking from it to the machine with a peculiar smile on his face. The engineer came along. "Well, what's up?" he growled. "What are you grinning at? What have you to find fault with?" "Oh," answered Lord Rosse. "I am not finding fault. I am calculating how long before the boiler explodes." "Boiler explodes? Why, you're crazy, man. You get out of this." "Well," said the earl, "if you work ten minutes longer with that screw loose there, the boiler will certainly explode." The engineer looked at the screw indicated, jumped at it, and fastened it as soon as he could. "Why didn't you say that sooner?" he demanded. "Why should I?" answered Lord Rosse. "I've never yet had an opportunity of seeing a boiler explode."—[Exchange.]

Cuban Women in Mourning.

IF there is one sight more pitiful in Cuba than any other, it is the women in black. Frequent as they are in Havana, where perhaps in some remote part of the city they even venture to hold out their hands to you as you pass—women of refined appearance, too—the women in widow's weeds are the commonest sight in the small towns and cities. It is hard to tell where they get their mourning garments. It is no exaggeration to say that of a dozen women on a street in any Cuban village nine will be in mourning. And their faces sad with grief and thin with hunger even months after the war had ceased!—[Harper's Weekly.]

A Message of Love

THERE are few places a person need fear to go if he goes in a spirit of love. The story is told of a missionary in Manchester. When he was a young man just from the country, and knew nothing of city life, he was sent to work in a district in the city which was famed for its vice. He did not know this, but set to work.

The people soon knew him, and among those interested was the policeman in his district. The policeman met him one morning and addressed him in friendly tones, telling him to be cautious in that street where he was visiting—for it was the worst street in the city. "I dare not go any nearer it than the end of it," he said, "and when we do go, we need to go in a body. And, indeed, it is useless for you to go. They are beyond redemption."

The missionary never had a fancy for policemen, and preferred doing his duty, and went and visited the street from one end to the other, and no one in the street ever said a rough word to him, but received him and listened to him with all attention, and invited him to come soon again, as no one ever came.

The policeman watched to see him coming out again, and said: "You have done what I could not, or dare not, do."

"The reason," said the missionary, "is, my message is different; yours is justice and punishment, and mine is love and pardon."—[Church Weekly.]

Another Rebuke for the Cigarette.

A PROMINENT railroad man is the latest to throw down the gage of battle to the cigarette. He is a general freight agent on a large railroad, and employs many young men as clerks. He has announced that, in the future, he will not employ any young men who are addicted to the cigarette habit, and, further than this, he expresses his intention of getting rid of all cigarette smokers now working in his department. He gives the following as his reasons for this decision: "Among the two hundred in my service, thirty-two are cigarette 'fiends.' Eighty-five per cent. of the mistakes occurring in the office are traceable to the thirty-two smokers. They fall behind with their work, and when transferred to other desks, which men who do not smoke handle easily, they immediately get along just as badly, showing that it is not the amount of work, but the inability or indolence of the performer. The smokers average 'two days off' from work per month, while the non-smokers average only one-half of a day in the same time. The natural conclusion is that the thirty-two men are holding positions deserved by better men."—[Michigan School Moderator.]

Queer Things Given to Queen Victoria.

Philadelphia Ledger.

AMONG the most curious of her Majesty's perquisites is her right to every whale or sturgeon captured on the coast of the United Kingdom and brought to land. Both of these perquisites date back to the days of the Norman kings, and it appears that in the case of the whale the monsters were divided between the sovereign and his consort, the Queen taking the head, in order that her wardrobe might be replenished with the whalebone needed for the stiffening of her royal garments.

Another of the Queen's perquisites is a certain number of magnificent cashmere shawls, which are despatched to her every year from the Kingdom of Cashmere. They vary in value, as a rule, from £60 to £250 apiece, and the Queen is accustomed to present one of them as a wedding present to every young girl of the aristocracy in whose future she is in any way interested.

Some Real Answers.

Q. WHAT caused Cæsar's death?

A. Cæsar died because he was assassinated.

Q. Between whom, and what was the result of the battle of Waterloo?

A. The battle of Waterloo was fought between the Spanish and English, and the Russians whipped.

Q. When and where were railroads first used?

A. Railroads were used in Arabia in B. C. 402.

Q. When and by whom was America discovered?

A. America was discovered by Columbus in 1492 while he was making a voyage from London to San Francisco.

Q. What were General Wolfe's words when he heard that the French fled?

A. General Wolfe said he never died so happy.—[Harper's Round Table.]

CURRENT EVENTS.

By a recent order President McKinley has taken nearly 10,000 public offices out of the operation of the civil service rules. Most critics assert that this is a distinct backward step, undertaken at the dictation of politicians. Defenders of the administration say that the order does not contain the dangers feared.

A STATUE of Frederick L. Douglas was unveiled at Rochester, N. Y., on the 9th instant. The celebrated man is buried in this city, which was long his home.

A. J. CASSATT was elected President of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company at a special meeting of the Board of Directors on the 9th inst., to succeed the late Frank Thomson. James McCrear, of Pittsburg, was chosen a Director to fill the vacancy caused by President Thomson's death.

KOBE papers contain the news that the fate of the party of scientists, missing for upwards of a month past, has been disclosed. According to these accounts, the scientists had landed near Tosang, on the Liao Tung peninsula, to pursue their investigations of earthquake phenomena and mountain flora, when they were made prisoners by Russian cavalry and shot as spies, without the semblance of a trial. Their photographic and other scientific apparatus was destroyed. There were eleven professors in the party, one German savant, and ten native Japanese, whose homes were in Kobe and Tokio. The Japanese authorities will make a thorough investigation.

THE Indiana Supreme Court decision against the trust formed by the gas companies of Portland, this State, is one of the most far-reaching in its anti-trust nature of any yet handed down by the Indiana Court, and Attorney-General Taylor declares that it makes possible action that will crush trust combines in this State for good. The Eel River Railroad case, now pending, is said to involve the same point raised against the Portland Gas Trust. The Attorney-General expects a decision compelling the Wabash to give up the Eel River Branch, a parallel line running from Logansport to Butler, Ind., and which gave the Wabash a line into Detroit.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

It is, perhaps, not generally known that potatoes are imported into this country in large quantities from Scotland and Germany; but such is the case. For the past five years, however, the Scotch yield had been so small as to preclude the exportation of any part of it; but this season the crop was large, and one ship alone brought 150,000 sacks.

—The Illustrated London News, (13th ult.), remarks upon "the way in which Rudyard Kipling was 'worked' by the press or the syndicates, especially in the matter of the prepaid telegram sent to Englishmen of distinction inviting from them messages of sympathy and appreciation."

—It is suggested that instead of breaking up the unfortunate steamship The Paris, it would confer a benefit on navigation to make her a lightship, as there is no light now on the Manacles.

—A despatch from Santa Fé, New Mexico, says that, on account of the unprecedented drouth and the recent order of the Interior Department excluding ranchmen from forest reservations, sheep are dying by the thousands.

—Secretary Gage has detailed the revenue cutter Grant to search among the Aleutian islands for the crew of the missing steamship Pelican, which left Tacoma, Washington, twenty months ago for China.

—A prominent official of a steamship line speaks as follows of the effort to make sea-travel safer:

"At a conference of representatives of the different transatlantic companies, which was held in London, it was agreed that certain lines of travel should be pursued by east and west bound steamers. This was merely a verbal agreement on honor, no penalty being provided for its violation. All the companies with the exception of the Anchor Line agreed to it, and thus far all of them have observed it closely. The idea commended itself strongly to the different steamship companies, as there can be no question of the fact that it provides an additional and very important safeguard against collision. The captains of all vessels have instructions to follow the course as closely as possible. It would require a very good reason to excuse any violation of the agreement on their part."

—The expedition sent from England about a year ago, under C. W. Andrews, to explore Christmas Island (south of Java), has returned. Among the curious things in its report is a statement that the forest is so dense that the natives never penetrate more than half a mile from the shore; and that ordinary rats, evidently from wrecked ships, have multiplied on the island, where, unable to find sufficient food on the ground, they have taken to climbing trees for fruit and other things.

—W. Korda, who has recently made a tour of Porto Rico, says that every foot of the ground gives forth some fruit or profit. The ground which is not covered by coffee or coconut trees produces plantains, bananas, tobacco, corn, peas, sweet potatoes, etc. Pure running water is met with everywhere. The coffee crop then being gathered was abundant, and promised to reach 15,000,000 pounds.

—Swiss botanists are interested in a kind of myosotis (forget-me-not), which blooms on the shore of Lake Constance, but was unknown there until a few years ago. It is only seen in the first weeks of April, and is afterwards covered by the rising water. The color varies from blue to red.

—The length of the world's railways is more than seventeen times the circumference of the earth at the equator.

—A new industry in Kansas is the manufacture of salt. A large deposit has been discovered on the line of the Santa Fé railroad near the town of Hutchinson, in the central part of the State, which the local geologists claim to be the largest in the world. More than $3,000,000 has already been invested in plants to purify it, and the output last year reached nearly 2,000,000 barrels.

—The public entrance doors of the great building of the Bank of England are so finely balanced that a clerk, by pressing a knob under his desk, can close them instantly.

—Four steamers, carrying 800 passengers and a large amount of freight, sailed on the 10th inst. for Cape Nome and St. Michaels, Alaska, from Seattle, Washington. Among them was a party of forty-five belonging to the United States Geodetic and Coast Survey.

—Albert Clarke, of Boston, Secretary of the Home Market Club, has been appointed as a member of the Industrial Commission to succeed S. N. D. North, who resigned to accept the position of Chief Statistician of the Census Bureau.

—Orders have been given the Cramp Shipbuilding Company, of Philadelphia by the International Navigation Company for two 17-knot passenger and freight steamers, 600 feet long and 60 feet beam.

—The consolidated returns of the different crop reporting agencies of the Department of Agriculture, made up to Sixth month 1, indicate a reduction of about 8 per cent. in the acreage planted in cotton, as compared with last year.

—Some people's manners are too much for them. Like badly made dresses, you can never forget that they have them on.

NOTICES.

 A Conference will be held at Friends' meeting-house, Gwynedd, on First-day, the 18th inst., at 3 o'clock p. m., under the care of Abington Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee. Subject, "Temperance and Tobacco."

JAMES Q. ATKINSON, } Clerks.
ARABELLA CARTER, }

 The next Conference under the care of Concord Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Philanthropic Labor will be held in the meeting house at Newtown Square, Delaware county, on First-day, Sixth month 18, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. Subject, "Peace and Arbitration."

CHARLES PALMER, Clerk.

 A Conference under the care of the Western Quarterly Meeting's Committee on Temperance and Philanthropic Work will be held at Kennett meeting-house, near Hamorton, Pa., on First-day, Sixth month 18, at 2.30 p. m. "Narcotics" will be the subject for consideration. All interested are cordially invited to be present.

HORACE L. DILWORTH, Clerk.

 The Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, held at Race Street, will take place on Fourth-day next, the 21st, in the evening, at 7.30 o'clock.

 The following meetings will be held in Sixth month:

22. Fishing Creek Half-Year Meeting Millville, Pa.

 Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches has made the following appointments:

SIXTH MONTH:

25. Haverford, 10 a. m.

SEVENTH MONTH:

9. Schuylkill, 10.30 a. m.

23. Germantown, 10.30 a. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

 The Visiting Committee of Baltimore Yearly Meeting has made the following appointments for Sixth month:

18. Ridge and Back Creek, Va.

 The First-day evening meetings this month are at Race street above 15th street, at 7.30 o'clock. The full attendance of our members and others is always pleasant.

About half the lamp-chimneys in use are Macbeth's.

All the trouble comes of the other half.

But go by the Index.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

"SEE, grandpapa, my flower!" she cried;
"I found it in the grasses!"
And with a kindly smile, the Sage Surveyed it through his glasses.

"Ah, yes," he said, "involucrate
And all the florets ligulate,
Corolla gamopetalous—
Composita—exogenous—
A pretty specimen it is,
Taraxacum dens-leonis!"

She took the blossom back again,
His face her wistful eye on.
"I thought," she said, with quivering lip,
"It was a dandelion!"

—St. Nicholas.

FREQUENTLY we meet men who are "as cross as bears," outwardly, and we are told that when we come to know them we will find out that they have very tender hearts. And this is true, but every new case of this kind only deepens our regret that they did not learn to cultivate outward gentleness along with the inward grace.—[Wesleyan Methodist.]

PAPA.—"See the spider, my boy, spinning his web, is it not wonderful? Do you reflect that, try as he may, no man could spin that web?" Johnny.—"What of it? See me spin this top! Do you reflect that, try as he may, no spider could spin this top?"—[Stray Stories.]

ASKINGTON.—"You did not finish the reminiscence you were telling me yesterday when you were interrupted by the kitchen roof catching fire—about your fourth cousin Joel, who blew down the muzzle of his gun. Did he live to tell the story?"

FARMER DUNK.—"No; but he left a good story for other people to tell."—[Harper's Bazar.]

"WE are very proud of our trees," said Mr. Gladstone once to a party of excursionists from Lancashire, "and are therefore getting anxious, as the beech has already shown symptoms of decay. We set great store by our trees."

"Why, then," roared a Lancashire lad, "do you cut 'em down as you do?"

"We cut down that we may improve. We remove rottenness that we may restore health by letting in air and light. As a good liberal, you ought to understand that."

Lancashire set up a roar of delight, and the discomfited interrogator came in for many a jeer from his companions.

Wheatlet
DELICIOUS HEALTHY NUTRITIOUS

MANY LETTERS are received daily from all parts of the country highly endorsing the perfect cereal food—

WHEATLET
We append one:
"After a thorough test in my own family, I can hold up my hand and say on my soul that Wheatlet is the best cereal food in the world, and I feed my five children on it."
E. C. HAZARD,
Pres. Food Mfrs. Ass'n. N. Y.
Your grocer keeps it, if not send us his name and your order; we will see that you are supplied.
Made only by the
FRANKLIN MILLS CO.
Lockport, N. Y.

JUST PUBLISHED

Disarmament of Nations; or, Mankind One Body.

By George Dana Boardman, D.D., LL.D.
OF PHILADELPHIA.

An Address, expanded and revised, delivered at Washington, D. C., in the presence of distinguished public officials.

Of great interest and value in the present crisis. A strong presentation of fact and argument. Pp 27. Price, Five Cents. $1 for 25 copies.

HOWARD M. JENKINS,

921 Arch Street, Philadelphia, Pa.

TYPEWRITERS

REBUILT nearly equal to new

Fully guaranteed. Prices 50 per cent. to 75 per cent. below list. Catalogue free.

Philadelphia Typewriters Exchange,
135 S. 5th Street, Philada.

Please mention FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER, when answering Advertisements in it. This is of value to us and to the advertisers.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 24, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 25.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXV.

THAT which is to be sought after is not silence merely, but worship,—even the worship of the Father “in spirit and in truth.”

From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, chapter on “Meetings for Worship.”

For Friends' Intelligencer.

A THOUGHT.

THE Conqueror's Crown is not for me ;
A Soldier I could never be ;
But let me give some thought or word
That blesses all as soon as heard.
I have not land or gold or power,
I cannot hold one little hour
From passing swift or going slow,
For God the Father wills it so.

I cannot make hair white or black,
I cannot keep one moment back,
But I can spend that moment sweet
In sitting at the Master's feet.
For God and Christ and Man are one,
Since God is all and we are none
But echo, whisper, spoken thought,
Divinely formed, Supremely wrought.

ESTHER S. WALLACE.

WORTHY FRIENDS OF THE NINETEENTH CENTURY.

I.—SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

BY ELIZA F. RAWSON.

(Concluded from last week.)

DURING all the following days of this lovely spring-time, when not engaged in religious service, he quietly rested in the shadow of the old trees at “Meadow Lawn,” and reviewed with old friends and appreciative neighbors, who were wont to visit him, the labors of his long life.

He could look back to the early days of Anti-Slavery agitation, when “a considerable share of his attention was devoted to the subject of slavery and the means of alleviating the condition of the people of color.” He had, with other young Friends, established in 1824 a First-day school for colored children in the second story of the Friends' meeting-house in Alexandria.

A Benevolent Association to which he belonged, together with a similar one in Washington, made great efforts to abolish slavery in the District of Columbia. He gave an instance of the operation of the law in regard to slavery, which is as follows :

“A colored man, who stated that he was entitled to his freedom, was taken up as a runaway and lodged in the jail at Washington. He was advertised, but no one appearing to claim him, he was, according to law, put up at public auction for the payment of his jail fees, and sold as a slave for life. He was purchased by a slave-trader, who was not required to give security for his remaining in the District, and he was soon after shipped at Alexandria for one of the Southern States. An attempt was made by some benevolent individuals to have the sale postponed until his claim to freedom could be investigated, but their efforts were unavailing ; and thus was a human being sold into perpetual bondage, at the capital of the freest government on earth, without a pretense of trial or an allegation of crime.”

No wonder that the heart of the young philanthropist was fired with a righteous indignation. As a minister he was most acceptable. He had traveled in that capacity extensively. “Strong in faith, earnest in feeling, and well-versed in the art of condensing the subject of his thought, there were few more effective speakers, but the feature that perhaps most strangely marked his religious life and characterized his ministry was the deep humility that blended itself with his gentle dignity and modulated the expression of his sentiments.”

He had earnestly labored in the cause of temperance and for the promotion of peace and in the interest of First-day schools.

He attended the opening of the Illinois Yearly Meeting. Speaking of the great gathering in the new meeting-house, in a letter to his wife, he wrote : “It is said that all other places of worship within eight miles around were closed, in order that their members might attend our meeting. There was much speaking in the line of the ministry. I had some service and others spoke very acceptably.”

A great sorrow of his old age was the death of his brother, Asa M. Janney. They were most congenial brothers,—living in the same village,—seeing each other every day. The loss was to the surviving brother an irreparable one. He says of him, “A more disinterested, self-sacrificing man I have never known, and he was universally beloved.”

On the 12th of First month, 1880, being on that day 79 years old, he made his last entry in his journal, in which he says :

“I feel grateful for the many favors I enjoy in the evening of life, and earnestly desire that I may, through Divine aid, hold out to the end, trusting in the Arm of Divine Power, and rejoicing in the assurance of Salvation through Christ.”

In the following Third month he attended the opening of a new meeting-house in Washington and enjoyed both the social and religious features of the occasion. His last publication was a little volume entitled “Peace Principles Exemplified,” and the last time that his voice was heard in public, was at a Peace Meeting held in the Friends' meeting-house at Lincoln, Va. And now in the evening of his life he rested from his labors.

The following lines seem applicable to him :

" An old man sat in the sunset gold
By the door of a cottage low ;
His soft white hair, his reverent air,
His holy smile, all told
His work was finished below.

" Children played at the old man's feet,
Three gentle blue-eyed girls ;¹
Their mother had played in that cottage shade
With footsteps light and fleet
And waving golden curls.

" His heart was warm toward that little band
Bright in the setting sun ;
And he said, ' Oh Lord ! I trust thy word,
I see the promised land,
And I know that my work is done.

" I thank thee for the pleasant ways
In which my feet have trod ;
I bless for all, both great and small,
But most for these, I praise
Thy goodness, Oh ! my God ! "

Then a matron stepped from the cottage door,
A matron fair to see :
Her hand she laid on the old man's head
' Father, I thank God o'er and o'er
But bless him most for thee ! ' "

And so, surrounded by loving wife and devoted children and grandchildren, the days glided peacefully by, until a severe cold developed into pneumonia, and the end came quickly. His sufferings, at times, from oppression, were great, but with a gentleness and sweetness characteristic of his whole life, he prayed for patience to endure to the end. His wife, his two daughters Cornelia Janney and Mary Ann Shoemaker, his son Phineas, his grandson Samuel M. Janney, Jr., to whom he had been as a father, and his granddaughters, Ada and Elizabeth Janney, were at his bedside. " Take me in thy arms, Phineas," he said ; and so, leaning on the breast of his youngest born, and with this sweet benediction, " May His peace rest with you all," he passed into the Great Beyond, on the 30th of Fourth month, 1880.

There was a great outpouring of people from far and near in attendance at his funeral. Tender and loving tributes were given by his friends irrespective of sect. Many colored people were in attendance.

Among the letters received by his family, was one addressed to his sister Tacie M. Jewett, from John G. Whittier, upon receiving a copy of Samuel M. Janney's " Memoirs." The writer has kindly been permitted to use it. The letter follows :

AMESBURY, MASS., Sixth month 16, 1881.

MY DEAR FRIEND :

I thank thee from my heart for the Auto-biography of thy dear and honored brother, Samuel M. Janney. I remember meeting him once only—I wish I could have known him more intimately. His works praise him—his pure and noble life has not been lived in vain. I belong to what is called the Orthodox wing of the Society, but I should have a poor opinion of anyone calling himself a Quaker, who failed to recognize Samuel M. Janney as a brother beloved.

I am with sincere sympathy, thy friend,

JOHN G. WHITTIER.

¹ Carrie, Sadie, and Mary.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

WEEK-DAY MEETINGS.

THERE are some professors with Friends who say there is no longer a necessity for other than First-day meetings. Do we not feel a need to wait upon God, to publicly worship him oftener than on one day during the week ? Our intellectual and spiritual powers are so constituted that we are not at rest and peace, unless our divine nature is often brought into harmony with the Divine power ; also, we should remember that God is perfect. He does not need our worship ; it is we who need him. These also say they can worship as acceptably when sitting at their firesides, or when engaged in business, as though they were in the meeting-house. No doubt this is true as to invalids and other states of deprivation. Yet worship where we may, it is the highest object we can be engaged in, and it must be performed in spirit and in truth. Divine communion is best known in inward stillness. It is thus the soul is prepared for the enlargement and enjoyment of spiritual gifts. There is a necessity for public and private worship in order for definite spiritual development. Faith, hope, love, will no more grow without something to minister to their growth than will the intellectual faculties or the bodily organs.

Stillness and abstraction of mind and deep inward silence and attention necessary to appreciate week-day meetings can be known only when seeking for truth and learning to love it ; and let us remember that " God is ever the teacher of his people himself." In such meetings we will be strengthened to live up to our convictions of duty, thus laying the foundation of our spiritual building upon the revelations of truth to our own souls. In spiritual matters, in things pertaining to salvation, this Divine illumination is our surest guide ; a teacher that can never deceive us, but will, as we obey it, lead us out of all error into the knowledge of the Truth. This, then, is the path in which Christ leads his followers, and by making Christ our guide we shall be enabled, while passing through this state of probation, to rise from a condition of negative innocence to a state of active and positive virtue.

The view I wish to convey is, that from the frequent worship of God, spiritual strength gained thereby will regulate our lives, and bring the animal propensities under the control and dominion of the spiritual man, which will deprive us of no real good, but will render life a scene of enjoyment and highest usefulness.

Jesus resisted temptation and thereby overcame the world. So may we overcome the world in the same manner, for we must walk by the same rule and mind the same thing. Besides this, there is no other means of salvation. JOSEPH POWELL.

" RELIGION is not the staff of the feeble ; it is not the resource of those who deceive themselves with dreams ; it is the highest expression of the deepest experience ; it is the supreme reality."

" Do the best you can and you will be able to do even better."

HENRY TIMROD'S POEMS.¹

JUSTICE has at last been done to the memory of a neglected poet, Henry Timrod (1829-1867), his complete poems having just been published by the house that has always fostered the best in American letters.

Timrod was one of the literary group who dwelt in Charleston, S. C. His songs of the romantic south-land, beautiful with melody, passion, and impetuous grace, and the old cavalier spirit, fell upon an iron age; their author did not long survive the crushing effect of the Civil War. His poet friend, Paul Hayne, edited his poetical works in 1873, narrating the story of Timrod's last days, "The peace he loved, and so vainly longed for through stormy years, has crept to him at last, wrote Hayne; and we may now think upon his "spirit infinitely exalted, and radiant in redemption,—

'A calm, a beautiful, a sacred star.' "

Timrod's verse shows the influence of the English poets. Spencer, Shakespeare, Milton, Wordsworth, Shelley, and Tennyson were his masters.

"I—who, though born where not a vale
Hath ever nursed a nightingale,
Have fed my muse with English song Until her feeble wing grew strong,"— he wrote to his fair wife, a girl of English birth.

"The Vision of Poesy" is Timrod's longest and finest work. He must have composed while under the spell of Shelley's genius, for in its passion and clear harmony it echoes that poet's cadenced rapture. The following stanza from this piece describes the true poet's attitude,—

"And he must be as armed warrior strong,
And he must be as gentle as a girl,
And he must front, and sometimes suffer wrong,
With brow unbent, and lip untaught to curl;
For wrath, and scorn, and pride, however just,
Fill the clear spirit's eyes with earthly dust."

An example of his delicate sentiment may be found in these tender lines upon some fragrant pressed flowers:

"And so, pale ones! with hands as soft
As if I closed a baby's eyes,
I'll lay you in some favorite book
Made sacred by a poet's sighs.

"Your lips shall press the sweetest song,
The sweetest, saddest song I know,
As ye had perished, in your pride,
Of some lone bard's melodious woe."

Purchasers of the volume will be aiding a worthy cause, for it is the purpose of the Timrod Memorial Association to erect, from the proceeds of the sale of the book, a suitable public memorial of the poet in his native city.

¹ POEMS OF HENRY TIMROD. With Memoir and Portrait. Boston: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

For all the other pleasures substitute consciousness that you are obeying God, and performing not in word, but in deed, the duty of a wise and good man.—Epictetus.

"You have not fulfilled every duty unless you have fulfilled that of being pleasant."

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 27.—SEVENTH MONTH 2.

GIDEON.

GOLDEN TEXT.—If Baal be a god, let him take his own part.
—Judges, vi., 31.

Scripture Reading.—Judges, vi., 1-32.

THE victory won under the leadership of Deborah and Barak was a decisive one. The Canaanites did not again succeed in uniting against the Israelites. Even when the latter were hard pressed by the Philistines on the same plains of Esdraelon there was no movement on the part of the Canaanites against their former enemies. It is probable that they were absorbed into the Hebrew communities about them and so disappeared from history. But the disappearance of the enemy within the land was followed by the appearance of an enemy from without. The same instinct which had driven the Israelites from the nomadic life of the desert into the settled lands of the Canaanites was now turned against them. They were called upon to repel attacks from the desert on the part of tribes still wandering. No doubt this danger had been present from the time of the first settlement. As already indicated, the leadership of Othniel ben-Kenaz (Judges, iii., 9-11) may have been invoked in such an attack. But the danger became great and imminent when the Midianites from Sinai invaded the central portions of Canaan from the east of Jordan. "The Arab never needs to await an excuse for a raid on a fruitful land. Year after year, shortly before harvest, they swept in on their camels, destroying the harvest and driving off the cattle. Time enough had elapsed after the days of Deborah and Barak for the spirit of national unity, called out by their victory, largely to disappear. The few tribes especially exposed to the marauders were not strong enough to protect themselves without confident and trusted leadership. On the occasion of such an incursion they could do nothing better than abandon the open country to the marauders and withdraw the population for safety to the mountains. Thither the bands of horsemen could not penetrate; and if it came to the worst, fast rock strongholds, or barricaded caverns could provide shelter."—(See Judges, vi., 2.)

As in previous instances the stress of the time called out a leader. The circumstances of his call show that the disappearance of the Canaanites as a distinct people had not involved the disappearance of their religious rites. It is very possible that their absorption into the social structure of Israel had strengthened the influence of their religion upon the Hebrews. The observance of their rites must have been common, as the historian tells without surprise of the altar of Baal belonging to Joash, father of Gideon (Judges, vi., 25), and although Joash himself took the side of Jehovah against Baal we read that Gideon feared to destroy the altar in daytime "on account of his father's family and the men of the town."—(Judges, vi., 27.)

The story of the call of Gideon to the two-fold mission—the overthrow of pagan worship and the defeat of the Midianites—is told in considerable detail. An unnamed prophet appeared among the people, recalling to them the mercies and faithfulness of their God, and rebuking them for their idolatry. At about the same time God's message came to Gideon calling him to leadership. Gideon was about his daily work, rendered more difficult by the danger from the Midianites. He had gone down into the wine-press—a kind of vault in the solid rock where the grapes were trodden out in order to extract the juice. Here he was threshing a few sheaves of wheat, safe from observation. The duty laid upon Gideon in the secret conference was first to destroy the altar of Baal and the Asherah, or sacred tree, by its side, and then to call together the tribes to drive out the invaders. The bold, striking act of the first duty would serve to mark him as leader in the second. We are reminded how Saul, a century or more afterwards, took a somewhat similar course on a similar occasion. Again, a sudden, striking action as a prelude to the summons of the tribes. In the case of Gideon the summons seems to have been all too successful, so that it was necessary to reduce the army again, and yet again, before its size was adapted to the work before it. The methods of this reduction, especially the second one, have been made the basis of a multitude of theories. Having rid himself of the cowards by the simple expedient of telling all who were afraid to return to their homes (Judges, vii., 3), he selected from those who remained three hundred by observing their method of drinking (Judges, vii., 5-7). It has been suggested that those who took water in their hands and lapped "as a dog lappeth," were more self-controlled than those who "bowed upon their knees to drink water"; also that the latter were reckless so to expose themselves to a possible enemy, while the former were able to keep a watchful eye for danger; another theory is that those who lapped were thus known to be rude, fierce men. We may comfort ourselves if these seem doubtful reasons, by the fact that as it is not possible for us to know the historical basis of this ancient tale, so it is not necessary for us to know it. The value of the whole story lies in its insistence on the constant reaching out of God toward his people—in the appearance, even in the extremity of Israel, of a champion who heard and obeyed God's voice. For those who feel it necessary to find a definite lesson in every incident, in every verse of the Bible story, there is constant difficulty and constant danger that they may read into a doubtful passage some lesson that they vain would find there.

On the other hand, if we realize that we are dealing with a human record of divine dealings with that people to whom the Divine Presence was nearest and most vivid; that the story of these dealings is told ages after the events described, by one who sought by means of it to recall a straying people to its ancient allegiance,—if these facts are clear to us we need not turn aside from the plain and simple narratives to find the far-fetched or mystical meanings which some have tried to assign to them.

After the selection of the band Gideon led them to the height overlooking the camp of the enemy.

After a secret reconnoissance of the Midianite camp, in which he apparently found a state of nervous tension arguing well for his purpose, he planned a stratagem by which he succeeded in stampeding the whole camp of the Midianites. Animals and men fled together in frenzied terror, treading down and destroying each other in their flight. At the fords of the Jordan another Hebrew army met them and completed their demoralization. Those who succeeded in crossing were further pursued by Gideon and his men, who finally captured the two chieftains or "kings" and slew them. This stirring event aroused once more the sense of national unity and with it the sense of loyalty to Jehovah. It also led to the establishment of the first kingdom among the Hebrews, as will be related in the next lesson.

ADDRESS AT SWARTHMORE COMMENCEMENT.

Graduates and Friends of Swarthmore College :

WE all know that everything around us, whether in the world of matter and of organic life, in the world of mind and spirit, or in the relations of mankind with each other, is governed and regulated by law; but perhaps we do not all sufficiently consider the differences between the several kinds of law. Let us therefore briefly review the subject of law, having regard to those differences.

As to the external, physical world,—the world of matter and force—civilized men have generally become convinced that nothing occurs without a cause lying within the possibility of human comprehension; that everything takes place according to laws which either now are understood by those who have studied them, or which it is reasonable to hope may come to be so understood through further investigation; that apparent exceptions are to be regarded with scrutiny in order that, when a real exception is found, its cause may be detected, and thus a hitherto unknown law be perhaps added to our acquisitions.

This, however, does not signify that we may expect to find the ultimate cause of natural law. More than two hundred years have elapsed since Isaac Newton discovered the famous law of gravitation, namely,—that all bodies are attracted towards each other directly as their mass and inversely as the squares of their distance, but to this day no man knows why this is so. And it is nearly a century since John Dalton, an English member of our Society of Friends, discovered the equally important law that the elements combine together in definite fixed proportions, each having its specific atomic weight, or combining equivalent. All educated men now know this, but no man knows the cause. Proximate causes, the characteristics of things, are discovered; ultimate causes remain hidden, though it be a comfort to many pious minds to refer all to The Great First cause, meaning God.

Doubtless all of you can recall instances where an unusual occurrence, or an ordinary occurrence closely observed, has set someone to thinking or to experimenting, and so to the discovery of an important natural law. Perhaps the most familiar of these is Newton's observation of the fall of an apple, pondering upon which, in connection with the moon's movements, led him to discover the great natural law of gravitation above alluded to. Franklin's observation of lightning, his experimental proof that lightning is but electricity, and his subsequent investigation of electrical phenomena and laws, is perhaps equally familiar. Volta's notice of the twitching of a dead frog's leg when in contact with two metals of unequal oxidability, and the large deductions of himself and others therefrom, form another instance. Less familiar perhaps is the observation of Helmholtz of the brighter redness of blood in cold than in warm climates, which led him to determine the mechanical equivalent of heat. Fraunhofer's discovery, that the extended solar spectrum shows numerous dark lines crossing it, was a simple observation, yet from the study of those lines arose a new and marvelous insight into the constitution of matter in the sun, in the stars, and even in the nebulae. Those indispensable appliances of our modern ways of living, the electric telegraph, the telephone, the electric motors and lights, are the results of observation of phenomena joined to study of ways and means for utilizing the indicated laws; while the recent scrutiny of the Roentgen ray which penetrates substances opaque to ordinary light, and of free etheric syntonics vibration, which enables electric communications to be carried on without wires, and through houses or hills, affords results no less wonderful and pregnant.

All goes to prove that law rules the material universe, unlimited and unchanged throughout all the space and time that our powers can penetrate, and that clues to infinite development of our knowledge of the various branches of this natural law lie all around us. The new Alexanders of science will never be obliged to weep because there are no more worlds to conquer, and none of our pioneers into the vast unknown realms surrounding our little sphere of knowledge need doubt or does doubt that if he can seize upon some hitherto unobserved phenomenon, or can grasp some new conception of a familiar one, he may boldly follow it into the unexplored regions with perfect confidence that those new domains own allegiance to the same laws which prevail here. New laws he may indeed discover, but instead of conflicting with the laws already known, these are sure to lead by unbroken sequence to those. And most encouraging to beginners is it to remember that great discoveries are not monopolized by the great captains of science, for many of the highest importance have been made by young men, whose quick perception and fresh imagination, joined with solid knowledge of established facts, qualified them to become explorers and path-finders.

Man's comfort, nay, his physical existence, depends upon his knowledge of and obedience to these natural laws, or Laws of Nature; many of them most simple and known to all, others abstruse and known to few, but all inexorable. No King Canute can escape drowning if he stops too long in his chair on the sea beach when the tide is rising; Canute must learn the laws of the tides and conform his actions to them. No ill-contrived Armada of a magnificent King Philip can escape defeat at the hands of the better built small fleet equipped by a careful Sir John Hawkins, though the Armada's vessels be named after saints, and have their sails decorated with red crosses. Even Jesus of Nazareth refused to defy natural law when he resisted the temptation to cast himself down from the pinnacle of the temple. Safety and success in all undertakings that depend upon material things are governed by Lord Bacon's axiom, "The way to command nature is to obey her."

Confidence in the persistence and uniformity of natural law is the victorious antagonist of all forms of superstition, which latter is simply belief that natural occurrences may be brought to pass or be prevented by means foreign to natural law, or to what is commonly known as cause and effect; for, as has been well said, "Natural law is not destroyed by being ignored, but eventually crashes its way through human interference."

When we turn from the laws governing inorganic matter to those of organisms, we are conscious of a change of climate; the permanence of old forms of life is not absolute, like the permanence of mere matter and force, but yields to that apparent advancement into new forms which is named Evolution, a mutability which embarrasses by its endless complications. On one hand, for instance, gneiss rock such as surrounds us here, underlying the soil and cropping out by the sides of streams or on hill tops, has been held by many geologists to be the original crust of the earth, formed upon the molten globe when its surface became cool enough to freeze into rock; our gneiss is at least of an antiquity only to be guessed at as many millions of years. Well: the quartz, felspar, hornblende, and mica of this rock are composed of familiar chemical elements combined together exactly as those elements would combine now, and the same is true of the whole series of rocks of all sorts, from the ancient gneiss or Laurentian upward, though some of them may have been formed under conditions differing from those which have recently existed. The oldest, lavas, obsidians, and tufas are closely paralleled in composition by the most recent ones. And Lyell has pointed out that all the processes of erosion, sedimentation, upheaval, and eruption which have moulded and carved the earth's surface in all the ages are the same that are now acting. The laws governing these things are unchanged, and the resulting phenomena are unchanged.

But, on the other hand, organisms change, as is clearly shown by the series of fossil forms that are preserved in the sedimentary rocks of various ages. For instance, in the rocks of the comparatively recent Eocene period, Marsh and Huxley found fossil bones of the remote ancestor of our horse; it was a small quadruped no larger than a fox, having five toes on each fore foot, and four toes on each hind foot, well adapted for giving broad tread on soft ground. This was followed in regular succession by the four-toed Eocene Orohippus, the Miocene Mesohippus as large as a sheep, with three toes and a rudiment, the larger Pliocene Hipparion with three toes, and finally by our

(Continued on page 496.)

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SIXTH MONTH 24, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

SADDUCEES.

SPEAKING of bread, Jesus cautioned his followers to beware of the leaven of the Pharisees, and of the Sadducees. The leaven he referred to was the teaching, the system, of those sects, or parties. It is a leaven which still exists.

The Sadducees were the ruling party in Jerusalem in the time of Jesus. They had long been in control of Jewish affairs. It was they who put him to death. It was they who prevailed upon Pilate, who hesitated, to send him to crucifixion.

Historians and biblical students do not entirely agree as to the origin of the Sadducees. The common theory is that they were followers of one Sadok, a famous scholar, but there is authority also for the idea that they were named from the Hebrew word tsaddik, just. They appear in Jewish history in the time of the Maccabæan Jonathan, about 144 B. C., so that when they compassed the death of Jesus, they had been known as a force in the affairs of the nation for about a hundred and seventy-five years.

They are commonly called a sect, sometimes a party; but they were much more a class. They held together, and acted together, not so much from a common doctrine as from common interest. Their convictions related less to religious, or philosophical, or ethical questions than to the policy of keeping the control of affairs in their own hands, adding to their wealth, maintaining their comfortable or luxurious life. Without any precise formulation of their belief on these points, for none were needed, they instinctively acted for themselves and for their class. The reformer who had come out of Galilee preached doctrines which would have overthrown their monopoly of power and prevented their absorption of other men's substance; hence they crucified him.

The Sadducees hated the Pharisees, because the latter, by their zeal, their vehemance, their insistence on something more than the "conformity" and outward ritual of the Sadducees, continually threatened to disturb the existing order. To the Sadducees the existing order was the only right thing possible, because it meant them. To disturb it would be abominable.

There is material for study in these lessons. Human nature, that nature which the primeval man had, was much the same, undoubtedly, at Jerusalem, about the year 30, among the Semite tribes, that it is in our own day, in many lands, among peoples descended from other tribal parents,—from Angles and Saxons of the Baltic marshes, from Celts of the west coasts of Europe, from Scandinavians of the North, from Latins of the South. The "Old Adam," if that is a good name for it, survives through all. The vigor of self-interest, the eye quality that does not look beyond self, makes Sadducees, as formerly. Of this "leaven" we were warned to beware, and whether it applies to us because of individual selfishness, or the selfishness of the class, or party, or caste, with which we are identified, the warning is equally pertinent and weighty.

THE PERPETUAL WATCH.

JOHN RUSKIN, somewhere in his excellent essays for the young, speaks with great clearness and force relative to their need of being careful of their actions, that these may not do damage to their reputations for stability of character. He says, in substance, that youth should follow the time-honored maxim of abstaining from all appearance of evil. To further impress upon them the importance of this, he adds that it is far more needful for them to lead circumspect lives than for the aged, whose time is far spent; that these can better afford to be careless of their acts, having so nearly finished their course, and that in them irregularities are more excusable.

There is some truth in this statement, but there is danger even in the admittance of the fact stated, that when one is old, and his days are few, he can be excused for departures from the straight and narrow way. Such departures do great injustice to the character that has cost a life-long struggle to perfect, and are so pathetic and sorrowful that charity hastens to cover them with the excuse of failing mental powers for, as has been truly said, "evil no sooner takes possession of the heart than folly commences the conquest of the mind."

So it is ever needful for both young and old to keep the watch, and that perpetually, which with the Divine help, alone strengthens us to hold out to the end, when we may hope to reap the reward of a Godly life spoken of by Paul, the "promise of the life which now is, and that which is to come."

THE worship we offer to a Father of universal, impartial goodness to all his children is only complete when we go forth to breathe the same spirit in our daily walks.—C. C. Hussey.

BIRTHS.

HUTTON.—At Richmond, Ind., Fourth month 26, 1899, to Walter J. and Jessie Winder Hutton, a daughter, who is named Miriam Alice Hutton.

PALMER.—At Geiger's Mills, Berks county, Pa., Fourth month 26, 1899, to Jos. P. and Margaret R. Palmer, a daughter, who is named Mary Darlington Palmer.

MARRIAGES.

BIDDLE—HARNED.—At Friends' meeting-house, Lansdowne, Pa., Sixth month 8, 1899, Samuel Biddle of Philadelphia, son of the late William Biddle, and Elizabeth Harned, of Secane, Delaware county, Pa., daughter of Sarah S., and the late Jacob L. Harned.

DARLINGTON—SHARPLES.—On the evening of Sixth month 14, 1899, at the residence of the bride's parents, under the care of Birmingham Monthly Meeting, held at West Chester, Pa., Jared Worrall Darlington, son of Jesse and the late Hannah W. Darlington, of Darling, Pa., and Hannah Mary Sharples, daughter of S. Emlen and Martha S. Sharples, of West Chester, Pa.

KIRBY—WILKINS.—At the residence of the bride's mother, Sixth month 14, 1899, by Friends' ceremony, Albert F. Kirby, son of William G. and Ella F. Kirby, and Anna E., daughter of Marietta and the late Ezra Wilkins, all of Medford, Burlington county, N. J.

LUKENS—DIXON.—By Friends' ceremony, at 219 West Coulter street, Germantown, Philadelphia, Sixth month 14, 1899, George Wooley Lukens, son of Emily E. and the late Reuben Lukens, and Susanna Hancock Dixon, daughter of Charles A. and the late Mary Anna Dixon, all of Philadelphia.

SHELDRAKE—REISSE.—At the residence of the bride, 2010 N. 18th street, Philadelphia, Fourth month 26, 1899, Charles L. S. Sheldrake, of Hub, North Carolina, son of Henry L. and C. Anna Sheldrake, of Philadelphia, and Hanna Eva Reisse, daughter of the late Adam and Catherine Elizabeth Reisse.

DEATHS.

BELL.—At Bloomfield, N. J., First-day, Sixth month 11, 1899, James Bell. Interment at Stroudsburg, Pa.

EDWARDS.—At his residence, near Woodstown, N. J., Fifth month 23, 1899, Thomas L. Edwards, aged 71 years, 2 months; a member of Pilesgrove Monthly Meeting.

This Friend entered the "life beyond" with scarcely a moment's warning, and his peaceful, exemplary character was proof of his readiness for the Master's sudden call.

GARRIGUES.—Sixth month 18, 1899, Esther Garrigues, aged 86 years; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Green street, Philadelphia.

She was the last of the children of the late Abraham Mitchell and Esther Marshall Garrigues, of Philadelphia. Although advanced in age, she continued her interest in meeting, and was quite frequent in her attendance.

ORR.—At the Philadelphia Home for Incurables, West Philadelphia, Sixth month 11, 1899, Mary Orr, in her 77th year.

TAYLOR.—Suddenly, Sixth month 8, 1899, Richard B., last of the children of Joseph G. and Phebe A. Taylor, in his 31st year; a grandson of the late Lowndes and Rachel Taylor; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia.

If thou neglectest thy love to thy neighbor in vain thou professest thy love to God; for by thy love to God the love of thy neighbor is begotten, and by the love to thy neighbor thy love to God is nourished.—Francis Quarles.

Love him and keep him for thy friend who, when all go away, will not forsake thee, nor suffer thee to perish in the end.—Thomas a Kempis.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

II.—LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

WE reached Southampton, Fifth month 31, late in the afternoon, so that I missed the sessions of London Yearly Meeting for that day altogether. This I regretted, because the afternoon had been in part occupied by the report of the "deputation," (as we would say, committee), which had been sent with a message to The Hague Conference. (The deputation, I may here mention, were kindly received by Baron de Staal, president of the Conference, who received their address, and had an extended interview with Prof. Bloch, author of the great book on War, which so influenced the mind of the Czar. I had an interesting account of the visit from one of the party, Ellen Robinson, to whom I shall refer below.)

I was able to attend three sessions of the Yearly Meeting,—at 11, and 3, on Fifth-day, the 1st instant, and 11.30, on the 2nd. This last was the closing session. I also attended a very impressive Peace meeting, in the meeting-house on the evening of Fifth-day, and one or two other meetings of associate interest to the Yearly Meeting. In all of them, it hardly need be said, I was greatly interested, and from them, I am sure, much of interest and value could be learned in reference to our own management and procedure.

The premises used by London Yearly Meeting have been described in the INTELLIGENCER. They are on the east side of London, near the Bank of England, not far from the Tower, not far from the Thames. The name "Bishopsgate Without," applied to the street here for a little distance, (perhaps three "squares" on Arch street), means outside the wall which once enclosed the old city of London. The Bishop's Gate was one of the four or five chief entrances. At No. 12 there is an alley entrance, like ours on Fifteenth street, (Philadelphia), running back by a long corridor into a court-yard, upon which the meeting-houses (for there are three—the "large," the "women's," and the "old"), with their committee rooms, retiring-rooms, etc., open. It is very compact and very convenient, a retired and pleasant place for the people of Peace to withdraw to, in their endeavor to serve God after their manner. I may add here, as a place as convenient as any, that the building and arrangements are all very complete and substantial; we could learn much by a study of some of their features. The two meeting-houses used have five galleries and wainscoting of old oak inside, and have more the appearance of a "chapel,"—though they are perfectly plain and simple,—than our American meeting-houses generally.

In the Yearly Meeting, at 11, on Fifth-day morning, the session lasted nearly three hours. It was a joint session, the women having come into the "large" house. Altogether there were probably 800 persons present, half or more being women. (The house will seat 1,000 or 1,100, I was told, and earlier in the Yearly Meeting—which began Fifth month 24, the day I left New York—it was well filled by "joint" sittings.) The clerk of men's meeting, John Moreland, presided; on his left hand was Mary Jane Godlee, clerk of women's meeting, but she took no active part in the proceedings; on his right were his two assistant clerks, Henry Lloyd Wilson and Arthur Midgley; near by was Isaac Sharp, who is recording clerk, and is also a permanent secretary for the Society, with an office on the premises. The business in this session included the report of a special Committee on Temperance, appointed last year,—a "deputation" that made visits, held meetings, etc., to deepen the feeling among Friends as to intoxicants; the report of the audit of the Yearly Meeting's financial account; and a proposed change of discipline by which it will hereafter be explicitly permissible, (some quarterly meetings had regarded the permission implied) to appoint ministers to be elders.

The consideration of these three subjects, representing as they did three features of the Society operations, I observed with great interest. I may say, in the first place, that the clerk conducted the proceedings with much dignity and ability, keeping more of a guiding hand on the meeting than is usual with us, I think, and, in the second, that in the discussions, in which perhaps from twenty to forty persons took part, there was generally a profound decorum, and the utmost mutual consideration in tone and manner. (I must use another parenthesis, here, though I am making so many, to remark that the English pitch and inflection, in speaking, permits the saying of rather direct and plain words in a gentle and persuasive manner; this was very apparent in the meeting, when speakers differed, but presented their differences in so kindly a tone that it was pleasant to hear the opposite view offered.)

The afternoon session, Fifth-day was devoted largely to reports of standing committees, etc. This was in men's meeting only, the women sitting separately. The attendance was not large,—perhaps 300 persons. The closing session, Sixth-day, was again a joint one, and the number present was nearly the same as the day before. This sitting was devoted mainly to reading the drafts of the epistles to be sent away, and the deliberateness and care with which they were treated was very striking indeed. One epistle was sent to Dublin Yearly Meeting, one to Canada Yearly Meeting, and one to all the yearly meetings in the United States, of the "other body,"—some special paragraphs applicable to their particular cases, being inserted, however, in most of them. Finally, there was the "General Epistle" addressed in the first instance to the membership of London Yearly Meeting itself. This was a somewhat longer paper than is usually sent out, and it would be read with satisfaction, I think, by Friends generally, everywhere. The other epistles had been solidly—but not long—considered, as each came up, and the clerk had signed those for Dublin and Canada in the presence of the meeting, announcing in each case, formally, that he was about to do so, and that he had done so, but when the General Epistle was reached, it was treated with even increased seriousness. Some details of routine business were put out of the way, so as not to interfere with the dignified closing, and then the clerk himself, (his assistants had read the others), read the draft as the Committee had presented it, deliberately and sympathetically. There was some discussion of it, but not much, and one slight change was proposed and made. Then John Morland said, "The clerk is about to sign the Epistle," and in a moment, "I have signed the Epistle." Three Friends, I think, had already offered prayer, and two more now did so. There were some earnest devotional addresses, quite brief, and then the clerk, having been standing a few moments, while perfect quiet prevailed, said, "I am about to read the closing minute," and doing so, the session ended. It was a most dignified closing, and undoubtedly had the effect of leaving upon the minds of all present a deep and favorable impression.

The Peace meeting, on Fifth-day evening, was an outcome of the earnest feeling experienced in the Yearly Meeting on the subject. Joseph Storrs Fry, formerly for several years clerk of the Yearly Meeting, presided, and addresses were made by some seven or eight Friends. I am not now sure that I recall all of them, but among the number were Henry Stanley Newman, (editor of The Friend), William C. Braithwaite, Herbert Midgley, Thomas Hodgkin, and Frances Thompson and Ellen Robinson. All the addresses were good, and some of them of unusual interest and force; in the latter class were those by the two women Friends, both of whom are speakers of much lucidity and ability. If we could persuade either or both of them to visit us in the United States, I am sure the cause of Peace and Peaceableness would profit thereby.

H. M. J.

London, Sixth month 5th.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

PRAIRIE GROVE QUARTERLY MEETING.

PRAIRIE GROVE QUARTERLY MEETING was held at Prairie Grove Meeting-house in Henry county, Sixth month 3, 1899.

The ministers and elders quarterly meeting was held at 9.30 a. m., with about twelve members present, seven of them from Marietta; no representatives from West Liberty present. Abel Mills, a minister from Clear Creek, Ill., was present with us, and very acceptably. T. P. Marsh, an elder of Marietta Monthly Meeting came on Seventh-day morning, and attended all of the meetings, also a young member of the same meeting was in attendance on and after Sixth-day, and he not a representative. The Friends from these usually drive across the country, but at this time there were frequent showers accompanied by high winds, hail storms, and cyclones, so it was thought best not to venture. The quarterly meeting was held at 11 a. m., with a fair attendance and a satisfactory meeting. No representatives present from Wapsinnoc Monthly Meeting at West Liberty, but some encouraging letters of excuse from those appointed, one only being able to come.

Our quarterly First-day School Conference was held as usual at 3 p. m., and a great many gathered, the house being filled and some outside. The program, which was well prepared, had been about two-thirds carried very satisfactorily when a storm of rain, hail, and some wind came which disturbed the audience so much that a very good meeting had to be dissolved.

The Young People's Association had also prepared an extra program for their meeting, to be held that evening, but the weather and the darkness of the night looked so unfavorable it was concluded not to hold it then, but announced a meeting at 9.30 a. m., on Second-day morning, which meeting was held, and the arrangements mostly carried out.

A concern had been felt by some of the Marietta members to make a religious visit among the families and members of Prairie Grove Monthly Meeting previous to the quarterly meeting, and by some correspondence with them the proposition was favorably received. On the morning of Seventh-day, the 27th of Fifth month, Thomas E. Hogue and wife of Marietta, John Cory and wife of Tama, and Nathan Edsall and wife of Hartland, three ministers and three elders, left their homes and started on the proposed visit, and after a pleasant journey arrived at Olds, in Henry county, and they were met by James Phillipps and Theodore Russell and conveyed to their homes, where they were comfortably and kindly entertained. On First-day we attended meeting with the Friends there. Several of those gathered were favored to set forth words of counsel and encouragement toward the building up of our Zion here on earth. A Parlor Meeting was arranged for that evening at Phebe Russell's, and a goodly number gathered with us and we enjoyed a very pleasant and profitable meeting. On Second-day we commenced our visits from place to place until about all of the families were visited as near as we could get to them in the uncertain weather. We were very kindly received and generously aided in getting around from family to family. At Winfield, Iowa, we met our friend Abel Mills, of Clear Creek, Illinois, and we had his company with us the balance of our time among the Friends there. N. E.

Hartland, Iowa, Sixth month 12, 1899.

FRIENDS AT SPARTA, ONTARIO.

The annual session of Friends recently held at Sparta, Ontario, was addressed by Isaac Wilson, from the text, "Be ye slow to anger." There are some religious views universally held among most every creed and belief, and these are fortunately among the essentials of belief. The speaker held forth that one of these was the fact of the unchangeableness of God. Though man's conceptions of God have very much changed and enlarged from those of bye-gone times, still the Father is the same as he has always been. He has assigned to man the task of bringing into subjection all these faculties and propensities that belong to our lower natures.

All things as created by Almighty power have been declared as good and useful to man for the legitimate purpose intended, but man continually needs Divine power to hold these in subordination to his better nature. One of the ancient conceptions of a man's strength was his ability to take a city, but it has been declared that he who controls himself is better than he who takes a city.

Am I slow to anger? Do I exercise a perfect check-rein of control over my passions? Can I withhold that profane word under provocation? Do I seek to overcome that evil habit that so besets me?

ACKNOWLEDGMENT OF MEMORIAL.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

THE following is an acknowledgment of the memorial sent by the Philanthropic Committee of New York Yearly Meeting, asking the Commission to use their best efforts to promote the establishment of a permanent International Court of Arbitration.

Yours truly,

JOHN W. HUTCHINSON.

International Conference at The Hague, Commission of the United States of America. Fifth month 30th, 1890.

John W. Hutchinson, New York City :

I am directed by the American Commission to the Peace Conference now in session in this city, to acknowledge the receipt of your favor of May 18th, with enclosure, addressed to Honorable Seth Low.

The Commission deeply appreciate and sincerely thanks you and those associated with you, for your words of sympathy and encouragement in the important work in which we are now engaged.

I remain, yours very respectfully,

FREDERICK W. HOLLS, Secretary.

SELLING RUM TO INDIANS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

IN a Genealogical search made in and around Philadelphia, last week, I found the enclosed minute recorded in Falls Monthly Meeting. It pleased me so well that I thought many other Friends might desire to have the benefit of reading such valuable minutes.

"At a monthly meeting held at the house of Richard Hough, the 6th day of Second month, 1687.

"Whereas it's offensive to see the great disorder that is amongst the Indians by reason of the rum that's sold unto them, and that Friends may keep clear of selling them any, or to any that are Indian Traders, it's agreed that Thomas Janney and William Yardley do speak with William Biles and caution him thereof."

"At a monthly meeting at the house of Richard Hough the 14th day of Third month, 1687.

"Whereas, at last meeting two Friends were appointed to speak to William Biles about selling rum, to such as sell it to the Indians, do say they have spoken with him, and his answer is that it is not against the Law, neither doth he know that it is any evil to do it, but, however, if Friends desire him not to do it, he will for the future forbear it.

"It is the unanimous judgment of this meeting that it is a wrong thing to sell rum to the Indians, directly or indirectly, or sell rum to any person, that the person so selling it believes it is to be disposed of to the Indians, because we know and are satisfied they know not, viz, the Indians, how to use it in moderation, but most commonly to the abuse of themselves and others."

"At a monthly meeting at the house of Richard Hough, the 7th day of Fourth month, 1687.

"The persons appointed to speak with William Biles doth say he hath accordingly done so, and that William Biles' answer is that inasmuch as Friends request his care for the future, he will forbear dealing that way."

The monthly meeting mentioned in the above minutes was in later years Falls Monthly Meeting in Bucks county, Pennsylvania.

1 William Biles was an early settler in that locality, being there previous to William Penn's settlement in Pennsylvania.

Many of the early meetings of Falls Monthly Meeting were held at William Biles's house. He was a valuable citizen, a minister in the Society of Friends. He occupied a position in his community that would appear peculiar to Friends of this generation—a minister in good esteem, with meetings held at his dwelling; a keeper of an Ordinary (a tavern), and selling rum to the Indians and others.!

It was a remarkable act of a Christian man that he should discontinue to sell rum to the Indians, on account of the desire of his brethren, when it was neither a violation of law nor the Discipline.

Many of the present generation may trace back to him as their ancestor with much satisfaction.

KIRK BROWN.

Baltimore, Md., Sixth month 9, 1899.

THE WONDERS OF GOD'S POWER.—We think of God's power chiefly when we are in the presence of some natural phenomenon, like Niagara, or the Grand Canon of the Yellowstone. But no one can reflect long upon the most commonplace landscape or other natural fact without being impressed by it. Nor is there a greater pleasure to most devout minds than to meditate upon such a subject. Mark off a square foot of ground some time and then examine it minutely and patiently, studying what there is in it in the way of plants or minerals, how it came to be what it is, how it is changing from day to day, etc., and you will gain new conception of the divine power and wisdom. To study God's power on a large scale, as in connection with astronomy, for example, impresses one strongly with the immensity of the divine power, but to study it in little things impresses one equally with its wonderful care of detail, its almost incredible attention to the perfection of details, and with the love of order and beauty which surely must be qualities in the divine nature.—Congregationalist.

QUARRELS are sad delayers of life. When two people going in opposite directions meet at a turnstile, the one who waits for the other to go through first saves time and energy for both.

LOVE is the greatest thing that God can give us, for himself is love; and it is the greatest thing that we can give to God, for it will also give ourselves, and carry with it all that is ours. It is the great commandment, and it is all the commandments; for it is the fulfilling of the law.—Jeremy Taylor.

THE LAKE MOHONK CONFERENCE.

THE fifth annual arbitration conference, held recently at Lake Mohonk, adopted the following platform:

We urge the immediate establishment of a permanent international Court, which shall be open to all nations for the adjudication of whatever controversies may arise between them, and which they are unable to settle by diplomacy or mediation.

In the constitution of this Court we urge the application of the same principles which experience has shown to be most conducive to the ends of justice in judicial controversies between individuals. In this highest of human tribunals the judges should be selected solely for their recognized ability, learning, and impartiality.

During the past few years the cause of arbitration has made wonderful progress. Since our last meeting a treaty between Italy and Argentina has been negotiated. This marks a great advance over all former arbitration treaties, in that it provides for the settlement of all disputes that may arise between them, questions of honor not being excepted.

Within the past year another event of transcendent importance has occurred in the summoning by the Czar of Russia of a great international Conference to consider how war can be avoided and its burdens alleviated. This Conference marks an epoch in the history of the world. It is the first great step towards the federated peace of the world. The Czar is entitled to gratitude and respectful admiration for his noble initiative.

Earnestly do we hope that the work so auspiciously begun at The Hague will go forward until at last, and at no distant day, the peace of the world shall rest on the sure foundation of justice, and nations be relieved from the well-nigh intolerable burdens of war.

We must not forget, however, that the work of that Conference is only preliminary and that the results of its deliberations must be submitted for ratification to the several governments there represented.

We therefore here earnestly resolve to do what we can to promote popular intelligence and quicken the popular conscience, to the end that when this subject comes before our representatives at Washington there shall be no doubt as to what the people demand in this time of supreme opportunity.

We believe that the gratifying progress already made, and the inspiring hopes which we confidently entertain for the future, are because men are learning the moral righteousness of peace, and because God rules the world.

MEMORIAL SERVICE AT PLAINFIELD.

IN accordance with the wishes of the many Plainfield friends of the late Aaron M. Powell, a memorial service was held at Natchung avenue, on First-day afternoon, the 11th instant. William M. Jackson presided, and many religious denominations and local organizations were represented in the large audience. After a short period of reverent silence, William D. Williams read the twenty-third and ninety-first Psalms. Several letters which had been received by the committee of the New York Yearly Meeting, were presented, after which Clara S. Rushmore read from the INTELLIGENCER the sketch of the life of Aaron M. Powell, prepared by his sister, Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond.

Among those who offered loving tribute to the memory of our dear friend were A. C. Nickerson, pastor of the Plainfield Unitarian Church, who testified to his excellent judgment and unflinching devotion to the call of duty, his noble character, and the value of his personal friendship. William M. Jackson spoke of his wonderful gift of reconciling antagonistic influences which sometimes threatened the unity of public meetings. William D. Williams paid tribute to the silent influence which was exerted by his writings, an influence which personal acquaintance served only to deepen. Isaac W. Miller, a member of the Presbyterian Church, spoke very feelingly of his long association with Aaron M. Powell as a neighbor and friend; of his sincerity and gentleness, combined with great strength of purpose in every just cause,—he was, in the fullest meaning of the term, "A Christian gentleman." Elias Underhill felt that our dear friend exemplified in his own life, that "Life is real, life is earnest," and hoped that we would honor his memory by bringing our lives in closer touch with the Divine. Charles F. Underhill called attention to one characteristic that could belong only to the pure in heart; his genuine enjoyment of the simple pleasures of life, his sense of humor, his kindly smile of sympathy when in the company of the young. Though weighed down by the griefs of humanity, he carried always in his bosom the heart of a little child.

The meeting closed with the reading of Tennyson's poem, "Crossing the Bar."

THE DOUKHOBORS.

FROM the Friend we learn of the arrival of the fourth party of Doukhobors in Canada. The Lake Huron, which sailed from Batoum on the 12th of Fifth month, and reached Quebec on the 6th of Sixth month, having on board 1,540 adults and seven hundred and thirty-eight children, the last instalment of the exiles who are likely to come in a body to America, and swelling the total to upwards of 7,000. A very sad feature of the case is the cruel hardship of leaving behind members of some families, in prison, on account of their persistent stand against yielding up their peace principles. Possibly, the Czar may be prevailed upon to use his influence for their ultimate release. Before the Lake Huron sailed from England to take up this great living freight of 2,278 persons, (the largest number, it is believed, that ever set out to cross the Atlantic in one vessel), she took on board three tons of sugar, 1,000 tins of milk, twenty chests of tea, and a quantity of lime juice, etc. Nothing but the greatest cleanliness would prevent disastrous inroads of disease, with such a herding together of emigrants, but all former experience with these exiles shows that they may be relied upon to keep the vessel in a proper sanitary condition. It was the Lake Huron which took out to Nova Scotia the first 2,000 Russians; and her first officer, speaking to a Friend in England, said: "They are not like the people we generally carry," and went on to describe their quietude, orderliness, and promptitude in doing whatever they were asked, such as cleaning down the deck, etc. They made remarkably good sailors, though they had for the most part never even seen the sea before, and they had to endure the terrible storms that cost so much loss on the Atlantic. It was amusing to our friend to hear the officer speak of a child that was born in the midst of the tremendous hurricane, and the interest she aroused on landing. "If the father and mother had taken a room when we landed, and had charged ten cents a piece to see the baby, they might have made a fortune for her, for all the women in the town came to have a look at her." The captain of the Lake Superior spoke in similar appreciation of the 2,000 he conveyed from Batoum, saying to another Friend, "Those people are real Christians. Mind, if they don't go to Heaven, you won't!"

The chartering of the Lake Huron for her present voyage, although it passed through the hands of the English Committee of the Meeting for Sufferings, was paid for by the "Kars" Doukhobors themselves. This section had not undergone such severities at the hands of the military authorities, as those who have been principally aided by English funds. When they sold up their belongings, they sent to England a draft on a London bank for over £8,450. Out of this was paid £6,750 for the steamer, besides the cost of provisions.

The Lake Huron reached the Quarantine Station at Quebec on the 6th of Sixth month, where it was detained, as a case of small-pox had occurred during the voyage; it was that of a child, who was likely to recover, but meant a detention of the Doukhobors at Gross Isle—the Quarantine Station, for at least twenty-one days, and if fresh cases manifested themselves, perhaps a much longer stay.

Prince Hilkoﬀ, with three Doukhobors, who had come from Manitoba to meet the passengers of the Lake Huron and explain some matters to them, were in waiting for the arrival of the ship, but to their disappointment, were forbidden to see their friends. Hilkoﬀ telegraphed to Quarantine to ask if the three Russians, one a woman whose aged mother was on the vessel, might go to the station, and remain throughout the stay of the passengers with them.

"It was interesting and instructive to find the entire willingness of the little party to settle down for the enforced stay, but the doctor in charge declined to allow them to come. There had been five deaths and two births during the voyage."

The prince is a very unpretending man, but intelligent and capable, as well as kind hearted. He fully bears out the high character of which accounts have been given us, and seems like one raised up for this special occasion of establishing his peace-loving countrymen in a congenial home, undisturbed by persecution.

He expressed his desire that the Society of Friends would petition the Czar to release all the Doukhobors who remain prisoners in Russia, that they might be allowed to join their relations in Canada, who are sadly grieving over the separation.

THE "INTELLIGENCER" FUND.

Amount previously reported,	$288.00
Received "Cash" through J. C., . . .	100.00

Total,	$388.00
------------------	----------

Of this amount $288 has been forwarded to the Doukhobors through the relief at Winnipeg, Manitoba.

Educational Department.

HAVERFORD COLLEGE COMMENCEMENT.

THE annual commencement was held on the morning of the 15th instant. President Sharpless and members of the Board of Managers and Faculty, and the graduating class occupied the platform. President Sharpless, in his address, referred to the prosperity of the past year, to the addition of a new professor in the department of physics for next year, and to the recent enlargement of the college library building. Progress was reported in the work of raising funds for a new gymnasium; and it was stated that a new dormitory is being erected to be named for Thomas Lloyd, the early governor of the province, one among those early Welsh settlers whose names have been given to so many places in the vicinity of Haverford. In closing, the President said:

"The very best of success in any school is the state of mind of its scholars as to future study. The highest praise is due when all have an unsatisfied desire for more. The greatest condemnation is the existence of a belief that the world holds no more intellectual conquests worth making. To excite ambition and keep it excited is a sure indication of good teaching, and the school that feeds a college, or the college that feeds the graduate courses of a university, with boys and men alert and expectant, is probably doing its full intellectual duty."

The address to the graduates was made by Professor Griggs, of Leland Stanford, Jr., University. Any action, he said, may be made noble by doing it well. No work is worth doing that is not worth doing well. The commonplace is transfigured by great devotion. It is not only growth but sanity that comes to us through earnest work. Even when we fail in our ideal, we keep our faith. Hardly a single pessimist had to earn his living by the work of his hand. If we are idle we cannot believe. If we work we come so close to the hard, yet beneficent laws of nature, that we cannot doubt.

Degrees were conferred as follows:

Bachelor of Arts—William John Bawden, Walter Elihu Blair, William Bode, Royal Jenkins Davis, Francis Algernon Evans, Rufus Horton Jones, Howard Haines Lowry, Edward Hough Lycett, Joseph Paul Morris, Herbert Clinton Petty, Malcolm Augustus Shipley, Jr., Frank Keller Walter, and Arthur Clement Wild.

Bachelor of Science—William Aldrich Battey, John Darlington Carter, Edward B. Conklin, Benjamin Satterthwait DeCou, Alfred Collins Maule, Ralph Mellor, John Howard Redfield, Jr., Elisha Roberts Richie.

Master of Arts—William Warder Cadbury, Arthur Fernandez Coca, and Ira Isbon Sterner.

The graduating class was as follows:

Classical Course—Ruth S. Baker, Ethel A. S. Brown, Emma W. Crawford, Helen M. Eastwick, Louise Eshleman, Marion Lukens, Lila McGaughan, Edwin L. Mercer, Bertha E. Shryock, Zoe W. Smith, Evelyn L. Swain, Maude Tennent, Jennie E. Wahl, Earl Evans, William Frederick Johnson.

Scientific Course—Ella R. Bicknell, Emma T. Fell, Helen Hill, Mary L. Sautter, A. Lida Scott, Katharine R. Stackhouse, Mary S. Stackhouse, Alice M. Taylor, S. Roscoe Bateman, Howard Biddle, Raymond Coryell Bisler, Dillwyn Hunter Lewis, Harry Taylor McDevitt, Thomas Miller Robb, Wilmer Mitchell Wood.

Literary Course—H. Kate Baker, S. Anna Chandler, Aida Davis, L. Blanche Dickinson, Marion J. Fine, Helen R. Johnson, Hattie Jones, Helena L. Levis, Jean MacNaughton, Rachel Pidge, Anne S. Ridings, Alice Serrill, Adele Shapley, Ethel Terry, Mary B. Walker, Jennie C. Ziegler, Charles Cadwallader Corson, Henry Corneau Diller, Louis Fussell, Louis Eyre Kirk, Cyrus Dressler Marter, Robert Logan Pearson, William Barrett Rogers, Jr.

FRIENDS' CENTRAL SCHOOL.—The commencement was held on the morning of the 16th instant. The address was given by Isaac H. Clothier. He said in part:

"If to the younger members of the school commencement day means release from work and the beginning of the joyous vacation season, it has a different significance to us of maturer years. Graduation means but the beginning of life, the stepping off from where you have been acquiring the first rudimentary tools with which to work into a place among men. With entrance into life your education has just begun. It should continue, and broaden and deepen and enrich your lives with increasing knowledge and wisdom every day while you live.

"Do not misinterpret what success is. Success in life is so often interpreted to mean success in material things. I am far from decrying that sort of success; on the contrary, I urge upon you as a solemn duty habits of thrift, of economy, in order to accumulate this world's goods for proper and high uses.

"But if that be your ultimate aim, your lives will almost surely miss the noblest fruition, and even if you prove to be successful in accumulating wealth, you may still be far from attaining true success. For while money should be a wonderful help in the accomplishment of all good things, while it is an admirable servant, it is a terrible master, and if allowed to rule instead of compelled to serve, it will almost inevitably hinder, perhaps altogether prevent, real success.

"For success in life means the development of the truest manhood, the truest womanhood, the building and uplifting of character. All material possessions are transitory and uncertain; character alone endures. Conduct of itself is not character, but it aids in forming and it also grows out of character, and it is, therefore, aside from its effects on others, most important in its influence on one's self."

Principals Joseph S. Walton and Anna M. Speakman briefly addressed the graduates, and essays were read on "The Russian Disarmament," by Dillwyn Hunter Lewis, "The Power of Beauty," by Anne S. Ridings, "The Future of the Anglo-Saxon Race," by Charles C. Corson, "Vacation Lessons," by Emma Trego Fell, "Reformers," by Henry C. Diller, and "A Poem of Night," by Lila McGaughan. Helen M. Eastwick gave a pleasing recitation.

BALTIMORE FRIENDS' SCHOOL GRADUATES.—The commencement exercises of the Friends' Elementary and High School, McCulloh and Preston streets, were held last evening in the rooms of Friends' meeting-house, Park avenue and Laurens street. Before entering upon the exercises proper the principal, Prof. Eli M. Lamb, made, in behalf of the faculty, the usual annual announcement of promotions and honors, and awarded certificates of highest honor to the leaders of the various classes as follows: Senior class, J. Howard Hopkins; junior class, Helen S. Ellis; second year class, M. Elma Lewis; first year class, Edith S. Lewis; class A, Mary A. Ellis; class B, Nellie McC. Silver; class C, Anna E. Matthews; class D, Theresa A. Callow; class E, Henry P. Wilmer; class F, Julian D. Sears.

Helen S. Ellis won the distinction of the highest general average, 98½ for the year's work, and was awarded a special highest honor certificate. Fifteen pupils who had not been absent from a school exercise during the academic year received certificates of unflinching attendance, and thirty-nine received certificates of honorable mention, their general average being above ninety.

Prof. Lamb commented upon the remarkable earnestness of the pupils, their class loyalty and the interest they had manifested in the honors recently received by former pupils in various colleges and universities. Prof. Henry E. Shepherd, ex-president of the University of South Carolina, and formerly superintendent of public instruction, this city, delivered an eloquent address to the graduates. Prof. Lamb spoke briefly to the class, and then conferred the diplomas as follows: Classical course, Ada R. Waddington, John Howard Hopkins; English course, Nellie W. Pistel, Rena Dronberg, C. Dimmock Smith, John Boyd Bland. A reception to the graduates in the lecture room of the meeting-house followed.

Most of the graduates will continue their studies in college, Ada R. Waddington being already enrolled with advanced standing in the Woman's College, and John Howard Hopkins at Swarthmore College. The school, which for thirty-five years has, under the able supervision of Prof. Eli M. Lamb, enjoyed the enviable reputation of being one of Baltimore's best known educational institutions, will, in September next, be merged into the school which the Society of Friends is establishing at the corner of Park avenue and Laurens street.—Baltimore American.

ABINGTON SCHOOL COMMENCEMENT.—The graduating exercises were held on the 16th instant, Principal Louis B. Ambler presiding. The address was given by Dr. Jesse H. Holmes, of the George School. He dwelt upon the need for true development of all our mental, spiritual, and physical faculties. Isaac Michener spoke on behalf of the school committee.

The graduates were Byron Beans, Arthur Markley Dewees, Sara Malvina Dubree, John Horace Ervien, Marie Elizabeth Jarrett, Ann Lucretia Smedley. The class motto is "Character is the Crown We Wear."

The class day exercises were as follows: President's address, Byron Beans; History of the Class, J. Horace Ervien; Class Poem, Anna L. Smedley; oration, Arthur M. Dewees; prophesy, Marie L. Jarrett; presentations, S. Malvina Dubree; closing address, Byron Beans.

Anna L. Smedley was awarded a free scholarship in Swarthmore College, she being first in her class.

Professor Ambler, who has been principal of the school the past seven years, will take a special course at the Michigan University. George R. Downing, M. S., late of the New Brunswick University, succeeds to the principalship.

SWARTHMORE PREPARATORY SCHOOL.—The scholarships offered by Swarthmore College to graduates of various Friends' schools who may enter the Freshman class without condition, deserve to be popular. We feel sure that the schools must all appreciate them. Three Swarthmore Preparatory School students took the examinations, Annie S. Hawke, Piedmont, Ala.; William E. Hannum, Ward, Pa.; and Norman S. Passmore, Oxford, Pa. The contest was remarkably close; in the final average of all the examinations there was a difference of one point (scale of 100) between the lowest and highest. The scholarship was awarded to William E. Hannum. Morrison J. Oswald, Berwick, Pa., was awarded a gold medal for highest scholarship among the boys for the year, and Margaret Campion a similar medal for scholarship among the girls. Gold honor medals were also awarded to Ruth Walden, Ruth Kennedy, Emma C. Beatty, John Wetherill, Linden Hill, Annie S. Hawke, Annie G. Harshberger, Mary Truman, Willard P. Tomlinson, Louise W. Hornor, Helen Parker, and Vernon Waddell.

Honorable mention: Frederick Simons, Ellie Simons, Margaret C. Hall, Thomas Hall, Willie Hill, George Ashton, Herbert Ashton, Leonard Ashton, Dorothy Ashton, and Hannah Monaghan.

Meritorious promotions: Norman S. Passmore, William E. Hannum, Cleora Haviland, Joseph K. Fourance, Clarenc Cook, Bramwell Geddes, Wilmer Crowell, Robert Leman

Jr., Priscilla E. Thomas, George Nobles, Preston Thomas James Monaghan, Willie Blanchard, and Nellie Wetherill.

GEORGE SCHOOL COMMENCEMENT.—The Fifth Annual Commencement of the George School took place in the assembly room of the school on the 15th instant. The room was filled with the parents and friends of the graduates and others interested. A special train leaving Philadelphia at 9.15 brought many from that vicinity. The class consisted of eight boys and fourteen girls. The following program was rendered: Reading of Scripture; "Woman in Government," Eliza Williams Gillingham; "The Eight Wonders," William Ely Roberts; "The Heroism of Drudgery," Beulah Lippincott Darby; "The Passing of the King," Marius John; Address on behalf of the committee, Annie Cooper Lippincott; Address to the graduates, Bliss Perry, subject "Power through Obedience"; Presentation of diplomas.

In the evening the Alumni supper was attended by seventy of the graduates, most of the members of the faculty, and two members of the committee. The following program was given: "George School Celebrities," Anna S. Hicks, class of '97; "Loyalty," A. Davis Jackson, '95; "The Peace Conference," Myron Eves, '96; "Politics and Politicians," Homer G. White, '98; "The Last of the Century," William T. Hilliard, '99.

PLYMOUTH SCHOOL.—The closing exercises of Plymouth Meeting Friends' School took place on the afternoon of the 14th instant in the presence of the patrons and friends of the school, ending the most successful session during recent years.

The program of exercises consisted of an essay, recitation, and part pieces, representing the undergraduate department, there being no graduating class for the present year. The participants, from the youngest to the oldest, performed their parts in a creditable manner, both in the thoroughness of their preparation and in the earnest, unassuming style of speaking. The selections, while varied in character, were especially notable for their healthy moral tone and influence. At the conclusion of the formal exercises, the company adjourned to the lawn for an hour of pleasant social intercourse.

During the coming year Benjamin Smith, principal, will be assisted by Helen C. Livezey and Elsie Oakford, the latter having joined the teaching force during the last half of the present year to meet the increased demands of the school.

UNIVERSITY OF PENNSYLVANIA COMMENCEMENT.—At the annual commencement of the University of Pennsylvania, on the 15th instant, Provost Harrison conferred twenty-five degrees in the Department of Philosophy, 119 in the college, 98 in the Department of Law, 211 in the Department of Medicine, 158 in the Department of Dentistry, and 12 in the Department of Veterinary Science. Eight honorary degrees were conferred. Hampton L. Carson delivered the oration.

SCHOFIELD SCHOOL COMMENCEMENT.—The thirty-first year of Schofield Normal and Industrial School closed on Fifth month 26th. Eleven students graduated. Essays were read as follows: "The Model Home," by Janet Mathews; "Printing," by Samuel Rice; "Shoemaking," by A. Coleman; "Methods of Teaching," by Addie Towers; "Neglect not the Gift that is in Thee," by Docia Reed.

An address by Richard Carroll, of Columbia, followed, and it proved to be one of the ablest ever delivered in Schofield School, where speakers of national reputation are frequently heard. He advised his people to be saving of time and money; to accumulate that they might own their homes. They were not poor so long as they possessed good health; that was their capital; many so-called rich men had it not and would give all their money in exchange. He urged them to live on peaceable terms with their white neighbors, whom he considered better friends to the colored people than the negro convict, who was so readily given shelter and trusted because he was black. So far as the speaker was concerned, he wanted the best example and the best advice he could get without regard to race. If they were anxious to have race prejudice abolished they must begin to reform themselves and earn the respect of the best white men by right living. When the average colored man is as intelligent, temperate, virtuous, industrious and honest as the average white man, there will be no race prejudice.

In presenting the diplomas, Principal Martha Schofield reminded the graduates of a remark made by the last speaker, that parchment certificates were not guarantees of knowledge. It was true they set forth that a certain course of study had been completed, but knowledge is power and learning is not knowledge until this possession is exercised for the good of others and their own higher development.

Close on 300 students attended Schofield School the present year, nearly 100 of whom boarded in the institution. Industrial exhibits were arranged in the printing, harness-making, carpentry, shoemaking, and dressmaking departments, which were highly creditable to both scholars and teachers.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

PLAINFIELD, N. J.—A regular meeting of the Plainfield Young Friends' Association was held on Fourth-day evening, the 7th inst., this being the closing meeting of the year. The secretary presented an interesting report of the regular and special meetings, all of which had been productive of both interest and profit. The topic chosen for consideration in Second month had been Elias Hicks, and as it proved to be a subject of too great interest to be disposed of in one evening, it was continued at subsequent meetings, with carefully selected readings from the Journal of Elias Hicks and Janney's History of the Separation. Our meetings in Fifth month will be held in most grateful remembrance, for on that occasion our dear friend, Aaron M. Powell, who had always shown the greatest interest in the welfare of our Association, and who had always been ready to grant us any favor that lay in his power, read for us his paper on Elias Hicks. It furnished a most fitting summary of our study, and all who were privileged to hear it, were able to form a much clearer estimate of this great preacher's character and work.

After the selection of a nominating committee to present names of officers for another year, the meeting adjourned until the usual time in Tenth month.

CORNWALL, N. Y.—Cornwall Friends' Association met at the home of J. Quimby Brown on First-day afternoon, Sixth month 4, with Elizabeth K. Seaman as chairman. After the reading of the minutes of last meeting the program was opened by an original paper entitled "Opportunities," prepared by Hannah S. and Marianna Seaman.

Part of the Life of Samuel M. Janney was read from the INTELLIGENCER, by Baldwin F. Brown, and another selection, entitled "A First-day Meditation," was read by Charles F. Seaman. Sentiments were given by nearly all those present. It was decided to discontinue the socials for a few months and to have a picnic under the auspices of the Association. This was held Sixth month 10, at the "Seaman Homestead."

Baldwin Brown was appointed to read an original paper at the next meeting, and Eva Ketcham read the Life of Samuel M. Janney from the INTELLIGENCER.

The meeting closed after a short silence, to meet at the "Seaman Homestead" on Seventh month 2d.

EDMUND COCKS, Secretary.

BUCKINGHAM, PA.—The Buckingham Young Friends' Association met at Buckingham meeting-house on First-day, Sixth month 18, and was called to order by the president, Geo. Watson, who after silent prayer, read the 11th Psalm. The minutes of the last meeting were read by the Secretary, Jane Atkinson. A committee was appointed to bring names before the next meeting for election of officers for the coming year. The program for the day was then taken up. Reading from the Discipline, Harriett Worthington; recitation, "Consolation," Marian Eastburn; paper, "Influence of Silent Worship," Elizabeth M. Fell. Remarks were made by Albert S. Paxson and Harriett Worthington. A paper, "Aaron M. Powell," by Anna C. Atkinson, was read by Anna J. Williams, followed by several selections on the life and character of Aaron M. Powell, by Fanny J. Broadhurst. After some remarks by Anna J. Williams, the usual silence was observed and the meeting adjourned to meet at Buckingham First-day, Ninth month 18, at 2.30 p. m.

BUCKS COUNTY NATURAL SCIENCE ASSOCIATION.—The June meeting of the Bucks County Natural Science Association was held in the Buckingham Friends' meeting-house on Seventh-day, Sixth month 3, Vice-President Alfred Paschall presiding. The meeting was opened at 11 a. m., by Agnes Cunningham, Secretary, reading the minutes of the last meeting, held at George School. Elizabeth B. Smith, of Newtown, read a paper on "Earthworms." Horace G. Woodman, a paper on "Phenomena of Buckingham Mountain." These papers were discussed by Lewis Woolman, John Ash, Alfred Paschall, Elizabeth Lloyd, Ellen Smith, Anna E. Smith, and others.

The meeting then adjourned to 2 p. m. The first exercise of the afternoon was an illustrated address by William Reinich, of Philadelphia, on "Insect Mimicry." Anna Cadwallader Betts then read a report of the spring meeting of the Delaware Valley Naturalists' Union. Mary Cunningham read a paper on "A Few Spiders and their Spinning Work," and Lewis Woodman one on "Diatoms." These papers were discussed by Elizabeth Lloyd and Florence Kenderdine.

**

Literature.

THE book, "Contemporary Spain as Shown by her Novelists," is a timely compilation by Mary Wright Plummer, a well-known member of our Society, and Librarian of Pratt Institute, Brooklyn. The editor has gone through translations of leading Spanish novels of the day, and extracted pictures of life in the sunny land in which all readers are interested just now. The five authors drawn upon are Alarcon, Bazan, Galdos, Valdés, and Valera. The topics illustrated by the extracts are Local Description, Religion, Politics, Manners and Customs, Society.

Edward E. Hale, who contributes an Introduction, has this to say of the Spanish Administration: "The general impression is, I fancy, correct, that a certain special class of politicians have taken what they call the government of Spain into their hands, and that the great body of the people have very little to do with it. It would seem to be somewhat like the way in which, in feudal times, Western Europe was governed by the barons."

A quotation from a letter written by James Russell Lowell while minister in Madrid, is instructive in connection with a book on Spain, and shows that we undervalue the Castilians. He wrote: "I like the Spaniards, with whom I find many natural sympathies in my own nature, and who have had a vast deal of injustice done them by this commercial generation. The difficulty is, that they don't care about many things that we are fools enough to care about, and the balance in the ledger is not so entirely satisfactory to them, as a standard of morality, as to some more advanced nations. They get a good deal out of life at a cheap rate, and are not far from wisdom, if the old Greek philosophers, who used to be held up to us as an example, knew anything about the matter." (New York and London: Truslove, Hanson and Comba.)

Olive Thorne Miller is one of our foremost authorities in popular bird-lore. "The First Book of Birds" is the latest of her works whose purpose is to lead us to a right appreciation of our cheery little neighbors in the fields and woods.

"This book," she says, "is intended to interest young people in the ways and habits of birds, and to stimulate them to further study. It has grown out of my experience in talking to schools. From the youngest kindergarten scholars to boys and girls of sixteen and eighteen, I have never failed to find young people intensely interested, so long as I would tell them how the birds live.

"Some of the results of these talks that have come to my knowledge have been astonishing and far-reaching, such as that of one boy of seven or eight who persuaded the village boys around his home to give up taking eggs and killing birds, and watch them instead, and who was dubbed 'Professor' by his eager followers. The effect has always been to make children love and respect the living bird.

"It has therefore seemed to me that what is needed at first is not the science of ornithology,—however diluted,—but some account of the life and habits, to arouse sympathy and interest in the living bird, neither as a target nor as a producer of eggs, but as a fellow-creature whose acquaintance it would be pleasant to make."

The book treats of the bird's various stages of growth, etc.—The Nestling, The Bird Grown Up, How He is Made, His Relations With Us. There are charming colored plates, showing the graceful poise and delicate beauty of plumage of the cedar-bird, the goldfinch, the oriole, the bluebird, the scarlet tanager, the redstart, the robin, and that merriest of early songsters, the meadow lark. There cannot be too many of such delightful and wholesome books, and we welcome every such addition to our rapidly growing out-of-door literature. (Boston and New York: Houghton, Mifflin & Co.)

Wm. Dean Howells, in the May number of the North American Review pays this tribute to William Watson's verse,—a tribute to be welcomed by all lovers of this young English poet's beautiful muse:

"Mr. Watson's work is very charming to me, because I find in it a grace that seems to have come willingly and quietly; a gentle insight; a serene thoughtfulness; most intelligent sympathy with the peculiar things that are the universal; a gracious doubt; a delicate passion; an essential repose. His unwearying and unerring art, the perfect music of his phrase, the exquisite good fortune of his diction are the minor qualities that follow the clear thought and the pure feeling. Note his veneration and affection for the masters who embody the spirit of poetry for him and whose genius he divines and announces so subtly. If one were to sum up one's sense of Mr. Watson's poetry as a whole, one might speak of it as a delicate and beautiful criticism of life in man and things, of life in books and souls."

Wonderland, '99, is the year-book of the Northern Pacific Railway, a guide to the picturesque Northwest. Its many illustrations invite one to wander in that favored region of forests, rivers, geysers, waterfalls, and mighty hills.

In a recent interview for the New York Sun, William Dean Howells spoke of the temporary lack of public interest in poetry and essays and of his conviction that poetry must again find true recognition. He said in part:

"I think the turn of poetry will come again. I think there are some signs of its coming. I don't see why a story in verse should not be done again. The 'Odyssey,' is really a novel in verse. The appeal of poetry is the most immediate and universal of any form of literature. It appeals to the young, to sensitive nerves; we do not respond to it so readily when we grow old. Something as marked as the twilight of poetry is the decline of the essay. The essayist has practically disappeared from the field, in the sense of any direct and immediate influence on the public. This, too, is a comparatively recent change. Many of the greatest minds must now be content to influence the public by influencing those who work through the press, the pulpit, the stage, and the more popular forms of literature upon the mass of the people. They don't reach the public directly, and it is no longer necessary that they should, for there are middlemen in thought, just as there are in trade. Take Tolstoy, Ibsen, Hauptman, and others; their greatness is manifest by the influence they wield in this indirect way for the regeneration of thought, and their own work might be, for the time, denied the wider audience."

"A Swiss physician, Dr. Otto Naegeli, declares that the best way to overcome insomnia is to imitate the breathing of a man who is asleep, and to make the head undergo the various movements to one side and the other which one unconsciously makes while falling asleep in a sitting posture."

COMMUNICATIONS.

AN ACKNOWLEDGMENT.

HELEN LIPPINCOTT, who was appointed Treasurer of the special fund contributed by Friends at the last Yearly Meeting, has received the following letter:

DEAR FRIEND: In helping Miss Schofield a little, I have the pleasure of writing and thanking you for the money ($36), the Friends attending the Yearly Meeting sent us through you. Your friend Miss Schofield is working hard to raise enough money to close the school term without any debt. This offering will help her out just that much, for which we are grateful. Our school has closed, and only six girls and two boys remain to clean the buildings and get out the Bulletin and reports. Last night we all went over to the Old Folks' Home for colored people, and had a little meeting,—a farewell one. The old aunties and uncles prayed their quaint prayers, using expressions like these: "Lord, look down upon us—too few to be saved and too many to be lost," and "When thou art done with us here below, slope us down to our watery graves in peace." They sang their plantation melodies in between each prayer. Then our students sang for them in their rich voices and we talked to them and tried to give them comfort and hope to feed upon during the long summer months. They have the beautiful faith that if we never see each other's faces, we shall meet at our Heavenly Father's Home, where we shall never part any more. They thanked the students of the Schofield school for coming to them Sunday after Sunday, and for the gifts they brought them on Thanksgiving day. One woman said, "If I dies it will make me pleasure in Heaven to know the children are bringing presents to some other old folks in the Home." The students are getting as much and more than they are giving in the blessings these people call down upon them. And may you and all the Friends get as great a blessing, for helping us to help these people lend a hand to each other.

Yours sincerely,

CLARA LOUISE SCHREINER.

[Abby D. Monroe, of Mount Pleasant, S. C., also acknowledges to Helen Lippincott the receipt of the same amount, and is very thankful for it.]

A WORTHY CHARITY.

A FEW of the teachers connected with the Mission school at Beach street and Fairmount avenue, desirous of giving the children an outing at the shore, have decided in favor of sending them to Ocean City, N. J. If the necessary funds can be assured in time they wish to send some of the children down the first of next month.

Contributions have been received from a few who are interested in the work, who do not wish their names published.

Donations may be sent to the Friends' Book Association, 1500 Race street; Anna N. Smith, 2423 N. College avenue; Sadie G. Smith, 2423 N. College avenue; Irene Lippincott, 647 N. Thirteenth street; Emma C. Henszey, 4 S. Forty-third street; Anna M. Ellis, 617 N. Sixteenth street, Phila.

INHABITANTS of the coast towns of England are alarmed over the encroachments of the sea. The pretty little village of Dunwich was formerly a large town, and held no small place among the commercial cities of the kingdom. All its churches and monastic institutions have been washed away by the sea, and a large forest has followed the buildings."

SIR THOMAS O'CONNOR MOORE, Bart., has been ejected from the room he lived in with his family at Cork, because he was unable to pay the rent of 25 cents a week. He is the eleventh holder of the title, which dates back to 1681.—[New York Sun.]

THE city of New York in 1899 will pay for public education $13,040,052; for police, $11,797,596; for the fire department, $4,443,664; for the health department, $1,110,538; for lighting, $2,000,000; for water, $1,420,817; for cleaning the streets, $4,575,800; for parks, $1,729,235; for paving and repaving streets, $2,520,099; and for charity direct and indirect, $7,000,000.—[Popular Science Monthly.]

For Friends' Intelligencer.

WORSHIP.

"And here we come and sit, time after time,
And call it social worship. Is it so?"

YEARS since, one put this question, and to-day I ask it, and await reply.

Oh Thou, to whom all things are plain,
Thou dost know our hearts, our thoughts;
Thou dost know if here we come,
With pure intent, with hearts aflame with zeal,
With souls attuned to thy own harmonies;
Or if, careless and lukewarm, it matters not
What fruit we bring into the house of prayer,
Or in what frame of mind we come;
Contrite and humble as the poor
Publican of old; with downcast mien;
Or puffed up in our own conceit
As was the Pharisee who loudly prayed;
Thou dost know it all,
Thou whom all profess
To worship at such times,
Be their conduct, or their motive
What it may.

Yet to the true, the humble worshipper,
How much of joy, of real happiness
He feels, when gathered into living silence,
All human passions quelled;
All outward noises stilled;
Silenced, ambition's eager voice,
Unheeded, now, its restless plea,
Then is he prepared to listen
To the "still, small voice" that speaks
Within, or hear the spoken word
Flowing from lips so consecrate
To do the Master's work,
That longer silence were impossible.
Thus from speaker to the hearer,
And from hearer back again,
There flows a living current hard to check,
Nor would one wish to stop the flow;
Heart in unison with heart,
Bound by the tie of fellowship
Which kindred souls alone can feel.
Here, then, the question asked above,
Is answered. Heart speaks to heart,
And all, as one, to the great Father,
Ruler of the Universes; to Him
Is tribute paid of worship true.

"Communion sweet,
Communion large and high."
No need of music here, of singing none,
To draw us near together,
To lift the soul to God,
The fountain head of all.

ELIZABETH H. COALE.

Holder, Ill., Sixth month 6, 1899.

"A HOLE in his right heel enabled a negro workman in the diamond fields of South Africa to secrete and steal gems to the value of $273,000. These he expressed in small parcels of fruits to a cousin in King William's Town, in the extreme south of Africa, from which place both recently departed for England."

AFTER taking a snap shot of Tenby church recently an English photographer was puzzled to find on his plate the image of a vessel dressed in bunting and upside down. He read in the newspapers next day of a launch at Pembroke, seven miles away, and concluded that he had photographed a mirage.—[New York Sun.]

"IN Mackail's new life of William Morris, we are told that Gladstone was willing to offer the laureateship to Morris; but the poet, while expressing his appreciation of the compliment, declined, saying that the proper function of poet laureate was that of a ceremonial writer of verse, and that in his opinion the Marquis of Lorne was best fitted for the place."

ADDRESS AT SWATHMORE
COMMENCEMENT.(Concluded from page 485.)

great one-toed or solidungulate Horse, fit for rapid movement over hard ground, whose splint bones give evidence of this line of descent.

Thus the law that like begets like and that species are permanent, yields to the higher law of modification to fit circumstances, which is equivalent to the survival of the fittest; since the individuals that do not change perish with their surroundings.

We can do no more on this occasion than thus glance at the biological laws governing the apparent persistence, and the real secular modifications of species. It suffices for the present purpose to point out the contrast between the absolutely fixed laws ruling inorganic matter, and the yielding or plasticity of those which rule organisms.

Consideration of the laws of mind and spirit, the so-called moral law, and all forms of religion would lead us so far beyond the limits of this discourse (which does not mean to meddle with Philosophy or Metaphysics,) that we must be content with one observation, namely,—that all correct morals and all true religion tend to advancing man's physical and spiritual status from within, somewhat as the forms of lower organic life have been advanced by external agencies. The Decalogue, the Ten Words of the Law, as the Jews call them, appear to me not so much divine commands as the enunciation by a wise man of existing law, apparent to him, to which mankind must conform. Likewise, such expressions as "The soul that sinneth, it shall die," "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword," are not divine menaces, but statements of cause and effect. Paul's remarkable exposition of law in 7th Romans exhibits his new perception of a controlling law higher than he had before known, which newly discovered law, rightly displacing the imperfect older law he had previously followed, caused him some confusion. Violation of the newly-perceived law, before he had perceived it, was not sin, though he failed while so violating to reap the benefit that obedience to it would have bestowed, but violation of the better law became sin, injury to his soul, by maiming his power to follow the light, when that violation was committed after he knew the better law.

We pass on to the purely artificial or man-made laws which have been framed to regulate the actions of mankind in their mutual relations to each other.

All communities, from the rude little primitive tribes to the great enlightened nations, have their customs and their laws; the great nations having so obviously developed from the tribal condition to their present eminence with its complicated law, that we are justified in seeking analogies between their early stages and the existing status of tribes, which, because of racial incapacity or lack of opportunity, are still savage. Study of the existing institutions of various peoples in all stages of development enables us to comprehend the growth of the system of laws of a modern nation through successive changes from the rudest ancestral simplicity to its present elaborate complication.

Who made the laws for the savage tribe, for the young republic, or the military dictatorship, and for the great State?

Did the Hebrew Elohim or Jahveh give to Moses the curious jumble of sound common-sense and priestly mummary that formed the body of Israelitish law? Did any kind of Deity inspire the Egyptian wisdom and hieratic rule? Had Chaldeans or Ninevites supernatural guidance? Granting Moses to have been inspired, to what extent were Zoroaster, Kong-fou-tse, Buddha, or Mohammed inspired, whose followers collectively far outnumber those of Moses and of Jesus?

It seems safe to assume that, even in the rudest social aggregations, some sort of popular will has always taken form as custom and hardened into law, being adopted, moulded into shape and administered by the wise prophet, the valiant warrior, or the crafty medicine man, who was obeyed by his primitive neighbors as children obey, because of their conscious need of guidance.

The rule of a monarch differs but little from this, for though his will may not be openly disputed, it is limited by the customs of his people, and he is made to feel that, unless his sway is such as his subjects approve, trouble awaits him. Either his autocracy is, as that of the Russian Czar was wittily said to be, "an absolute despotism tempered by assassination," or his people, whose industry produces wealth, obtain such control over the money grants, the taxes, or other forms of supplying cash to the government, that their will becomes potent. The old expression of monarchical rule, the arbitrary "sic volo, sic jubeo" has largely given way to the new dictum, "The King reigns but does not rule."

But if laws are no longer made by prophet or priest, and theocracies are become impossible, and if warrior or monarch may not now compel obedience to his simple will, what is the basis of modern civilized law?

The consensus of the community has become the basis of modern law, always more clearly so as time has advanced; a consensus not always easy to ascertain with precision, and not stable, yet firm enough to afford reasonable stability, while mostly plastic enough to yield to changes before they produce catastrophes. Look at Great Britain; its legislative machinery is not theoretically perfect, the popular will is not very promptly or accurately made known, yet it works after its fashion and does not fail to evolve the needful changes in time to avoid such destructive revolutionary eruptions as have afflicted other nations, the expression of whose popular will was more ignored or suppressed.

We may lay down as a principle of modern legislation that either each law is a formulated expression of a custom already established, as is the case with the great body of our commercial law, or is a declaration of the popular wills ascertained by the votes of duly authorized representatives, or, in the larger questions, is the solemn statement of a determination arrived at sometimes with little or no formality, by the majority of the people, as was the case when our ancestors declared their independence, or when step by step this nation advanced to the point of abolishing slavery. Lincoln's final action in this matter, his Emancipation Proclamation, was delayed until it had obviously become the will of the people, for he meant that when the pyramid of human freedom was set up it should stand solidly upon its base, and he wisely refused to listen to the hot counsel of those who urged such premature action as would have failed to give to it the broad foundation of almost unanimous approval. In like manner McKinley delayed as long as possible the recent unavoidable war with Spain.

Many important social problems remain to be solved by the human race, some of them even now apparent, others not yet looming above the horizon. One of the most interesting of those now before the world is that of international arbitration as the method of settling all disputes between nations, without recourse to war.

Granting for the moment (a thing which not all persons are prepared to grant), that war is always pernicious, wholly evil, and utterly unreasonable, is it possible to abolish that Ultima ratio regum, replacing it by an amicable Ultima ratio populorum in the shape of argument before some tribunal whose award shall bind the disputing parties?

There is already something loosely resembling a system of law by which the inter-relations of nations are regulated in a somewhat incoherent manner. Can that loose fabric of so-called international law, which is as yet little more than international custom, be better compacted and at the same time so extended as to comprise the maintenance of a tribunal to which all international differences must be submitted for final decision?

The cursory glance we have just given to the origin of social or human laws may help us to answer this question, for we found that laws are at present the outgrowth or codification of custom, or of the consent of the parties in interest. We observe, also, that this custom or consent has sufficed to abolish piracy and the slave trade; then why not to abolish war in general?

The inevitable and sufficient answer is, because human custom has not grown up to that point; because the necessary general consent cannot now be obtained.

The nations profoundly distrust each other. They have their several aims or ambitions, as well as their several habits of living, their confidence in their own government, their unwillingness to be turned from their course by the pleasure or interest of another. History shows them countless instances where a rapacious alien power has destroyed the goods, the lives, and the normal career of a people; they know that such scruple as an honorable man feels in dealing with his neighbor has usually been regarded as little better than imbecility in the intercourse of diplomats. They thoroughly believe that eternal vigilance is the price of liberty, and that the way to preserve peace, is to be ready for war.

We do not find in the great community of nations such common agreement in favor of international law compelling arbitration as naturally precedes the making of a law in the smaller community of a town or a single nation; apparently much deliberation must precede the formation of such a public opinion; if it were possible for the nations now to make a compact binding them all to submit all questions between them to a tribunal of arbitration, that compact would prove absolutely worthless in the case of any really vital dispute between two nations of approximately equal power. Besides, if the award of the tribunal is not to be enforced it is palpably futile; if it is to be enforced, war follows, which is the thing to be avoided.

The Czar's disarmament conference at The Hague will not produce disarmament. No one expects that, but hopes are felt that a scheme of arbitration may be agreed upon. The hope and the effort to realize it are laudable, and are in the line of promoting the public opinion, which as we have seen, necessarily precedes the formation of law. Some amelioration in the rules of war concerning neutrals, and concerning the treatment of wounded or prisoners, may be effected. For such small gains let us be thankful. And let us do what we can towards promoting that better judgment which will make possible larger gains for our successors, avoiding, meantime, such inconsiderate urgency as tends to defeat its purpose.

Whatever advance towards international arbitration may be effected by that Conference will be largely due to the efforts of the Commission from these United States (whose head, Ambassador White, is, as you know, son-in-law of our good friend and ex-President Dr. Magill), for the firm moderation and conspicuously disinterested honesty of our representatives appear to have been appreciated and to have borne good fruit. Strange to say the recently demonstrated prowess of our nation in war now gives weight to its position as an advocate for this method of preserving peace.

Our conclusions from this brief review of these several kinds of law are:

First: That the laws of material nature are rigidly fixed, quite beyond our control; that study of them and obedience to them are imperatively necessary, and result in giving us some conception of immensity and in leading to most advantageous control over the forces and materials of the external world.

Secondly: That the laws of organic life, while in a great measure fixed, are sufficiently elastic to permit many changes. Study of these laws gives us conceptions of the infinitely small, and enables us to modify the plants and animals around us and thus to nourish our friends and thwart our enemies among them, and tends to promote the bodily perfection of ourselves and of our offspring.

Thirdly: That the laws governing the social relations of mankind are of human contriving and are constantly changing. The laws of the Medes and Persians have passed away. Roman law, transported by fragments into the codes of new nations, partly survives. All governments, constitutions, laws and customs "flow from shape to shape, and nothing stands." Public opinion forms customs, and customs become laws. The task of each generation is to govern their own thoughts, aspirations, and actions so as to establish good customs and good laws, and thus lay the foundations for the better humanity of the future.

Fourthly: That we must not expect one class of laws to rule in the sphere of another class, though they may be concurrent. We must not, for instance, expect prayer, without sanitary work, to abolish yellow fever or plague in a filthy tropical city, nor faith in the grotesquely misnamed Christian Science to cure malignant diphtheria. Finally, that we must learn to detect and avoid illusions, must learn all we can of the laws of all realities and must obey those laws.

JOSEPH WHARTON.

Philadelphia, Sixth month 13, 1899.

New Words.

It is one of the most difficult things in the world to create words or terms that will be generally accepted. President Lincoln tried to have statesmen say "the abolishment" of slavery," but they compromised on "abolition." Charles Sumner, on the other hand, took the shorter word, "annexation," but the public, with its usual perverseness in such matters, insisted on "annexation." In Boston the street railway authorities call their cars "trolleys," but the Bostonian insists on "electrics." The discoverer of the X-ray has his name attached to the phenomenon by most scientific publications, but the people insist on calling it according to the algebraic symbol. And now Marconi would like to name his own discovery and call it, for very obvious reasons, "ætheric telegraphy." He is not allowed to do so. The public says, No, it shall be called "wireless telegraphy." And the scientist has surrendered. These instances might be multiplied.

Survival of Moral Teaching.

DESCRIBING the Southern (North Carolina and Tennessee) mountaineers, a writer says: "There is a certain mass of stock phrases, anecdotes always related in the same words, standing illustrations, and the like, which are of the nature of literature, and might be called the literature of the illiterate. As an instance of this we recently jotted down the following apothegm of a mountain preacher. 'Yeou caynt help a-havin' bad thoughts come inter yer heads, but yeou hain't no necessity fer ter set 'em a cheer.' The saying was repeated in a gathering of ministers in the east, and an aged man who was born in England said that he had heard the same thing from an unlearned country preacher when he was a boy. Doubtless that saying has been passed from mouth to mouth for generations."

Armenian Relief Work.

G. C. RAYNOLDS, in his recent report on the work of the committee for relief of the suffering Armenians, has this encouraging word to give:

I am glad to report that Pastor Lohmann, President of The German Aid Society for the Orient, has just informed us that he will furnish us the funds to receive another hundred children into the orphanage, and we have already begun the selection. I wish you could have seen two little girls whom we accepted a few moments since, bright and attractive, but one of them especially showing marks of insufficient food, and both with the merest remnant of shirts, and with what might have been a relic of their dead father's garment wrapped about their almost naked bodies. You would have rejoiced with us at the possibility of placing them in a comfortable environment. We plan to add a little to the buildings on the premises for the boys, and appropriate a house now used by boys, just outside the premises, to the new girls. This five hundred is an immense family for us to care for, especially while my wife and I are here alone, but having taken them in, we have but touched the fringe of the misery which these hard times are bringing so prominently to our attention.

What is the War For?

THE object of Mr. McKinley's war in the Philippines, as defined by Peace Commissioner Reid, is to establish and maintain "order" in those islands. This duty, he argues, was imposed upon us by our "conquest" of the islands and our succession by purchase to the sovereignty of Spain.

It is to be observed in the first place that we have not made a conquest of the islands. We actually hold according to Commander Ford, late fleet engineer with Admiral Dewey, "not quite as much ground as during the first of August last year." Our lines, he says, are practically "restricted to the suburbs of Manila." That is to say, we have a foothold, under protection of the guns of our navy, on one of the 1,200 islands, and are now hastening reinforcements to General Otis after 133 days of war—nineteen days longer than our war with Spain.

In the next place, there has been no disorder or fighting in the Philippines except where our troops have gone by Mr. McKinley's order, demanding the unqualified "submission" of the inhabitants and their unconditional recognition of our "sovereignty over the entire archipelago." From no one of the islands, however savage its inhabitants, has come any report of tribal wars, uprisings, or anarchy. Commander Ford says: "They have a good government, which they are operating successfully, and preserve the law and order." It may not be government up to the Ohio standard—that of Cleveland at the present time, for example—but it is more satisfactory to the Filipinos than our military rule would be, or they would not fight so desperately and die so bravely for what they consider their "inalienable right" to freedom and independence.

What then is the object of this costly and apparently endless war? It cannot be to secure the annexation of the Philippines, for Congress failed to declare such a policy and the President said that "forcible annexation is criminal aggression." Before this unauthorized, unnecessary and un-American war progresses much further, some one in authority ought to tell the American people what it is for.

Contrasts Emphasized at The Hague.

Review of Reviews.

THE occasion of the Peace Conference is seized by all sorts of movements and causes as a favorable opportunity for contrasting the actual conduct of particular nations with the high standards that their presence at The Hague would seem to imply. Thus while Turkey joins in the discussion of means for lessening military cruelty and for promoting the gentle sway of law and justice, Armenian committees have gone to The Hague to beg the conference to consider the diabolical horrors of Turkey's military methods in that unhappy region. While the Czar was receiving the rather obsequious homage of the Conference in resolutions of praise and congratulation, the people of Finland by the hundreds of thousands were calling upon the whole world to witness his violation of the compact under which when Finland became nominally subject to the Russian throne it was upon the pledge of the maintenance of the Finnish constitution and the virtual independence of the country. It is at least interesting to note the news that the Czar has decided to abolish the Siberian exile system.

Watering Plants.

Philadelphia Ledger.

WITH our city gardeners the American drags out the hose and deluges the ground about his plants and the plants themselves and rests easy, forgetting that the foliage wants water only to wash off the dust, and in wetting the soil he has lowered the temperature, checking growth until the normal is reached again. The German, on the contrary, gets out his hoe and four-tined cultivator, and by stirring the soil lets in the air and conserves the moisture already there. Compare the results of the two, and see which is the better method.

In California no rain falls from April to November, and no water is applied from above. Irrigation is resorted to in the main, but as good if not better results have been obtained by keeping the cover loose. With help hardly to be had and then rarely to be depended upon, the irrigation is a necessity; but otherwise the better product would make working the soil the preferred method. None need fear a drought if the soil is kept well worked, and thereby covered, to prevent the evaporation of the moisture. But the beginning must follow the storm, and be kept up until the storm comes again.

Cost of the Armed Peace.

St. Louis Globe-Democrat.

WHILE any step towards disarmament in Europe is improbable at this time, a powerful presentation might be made at The Hague Conference of the financial side of the case. Most of the nations of Europe are adding largely to their public debts, and disarmament for some of them may become a necessity. Annual deficits are quite the usual thing throughout the Continent. France runs behind annually about $100,000,000, Austria $80,000,000, Russia $50,000,000, and Italy $30,000,000. Minor nations like Spain, Turkey, Portugal, and Greece are not many removes from bankruptcy. The pressure for financial relief from excessive armaments grows heavier constantly, and must in time, if continued, take the form of embarrassment. Great Britain kept nearly even last year, and but for a foreign war, the United States would be paying off its public debt. But the position of this country and England in revenue is exceptional.

Sounds from a Balloon.

San Francisco Chronicle.

A WRITER in the Strand Magazine describes the astonishment he experienced when, riding over London in a balloon at a height of more than half a mile, he heard the deafening roar of the great city beneath him as it could not be heard on the ground. The noise, even at that height, was so harsh and intense as to be painful to the ear. How perfect a sound conductor the air is was shown when the balloon drifted far over the city to a wooded part of the country, where the murmur of the leaves moved by the wind half a mile below was distinctly heard.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE Venezuelan Arbitration Commission began its sessions in Paris on the 15th instant. The five arbitrators are Prof. de Martens; Baron Russell, Lord Chief Justice of England; Sir Richard Collins, Lord Justice of Appeals; Chief Justice Melville E. Fuller; and Justice David J. Brewer. Ex-President Harrison is the leading counsel for Venezuela. Sir Richard Webster the British Attorney-General, chief of counsel for England, referring to the work being done at The Hague in the matter of arbitration, said the Peace Conference sought not merely to arrange a settlement of conflicts, but the avoidance of conflicts, and expressed the hope that the present tribunal would have the result of promoting the welfare and prosperity of the two countries interested.

THE statue of Benjamin Franklin, erected on the south plaza of the Post-office building, Philadelphia, as a gift to the city by Justus C. Strawbridge, was unveiled on the 14th inst. Postmaster-General Smith made the speech of presentation and Mayor Ashbridge accepted the memorial for the city. Before the unveiling there was a meeting at which Provost Harrison, of the University of Pennsylvania, presided, and United States District Attorney Beck delivered an oration. Mayor Quincy, of Boston, also made a speech. Several of the lineal descendants of Franklin assisted in the exercises.

A DESPATCH from The Hague states that the difficulty now chiefly consists in reconciling a scheme of the other Powers with the views of Germany, but the prospect is more hopeful. Even if no agreement should be reached, an arbitration organization will nevertheless be arranged, and will remain open to such other of the Powers as are not able to sign now. In the meantime every effort will be made to meet the German views.

THE will of the late Robert C. Billings, of Boston, gives about $700,000 in public bequests, including $100,000 each to Harvard College, the Massachusetts Institute of Technology (with $50,000 added to found the Billings Student Fund) and the Museum of Fine Arts; $50,000 each to the Massachusetts General Hospital, New England Hospital for Women and Children, Children's Hospital, Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary; $25,000 to Perkins Institute for the Blind, the American Unitarian Association, the Boston Young Men's Christian Union, Home for Aged Men, the Hampton Institute, Hampton, Va.; $10,000 to the Tuskegee, Ala., Normal School; $5,000 to Atlanta University; $10,000 each to sixteen public and charitable institutions in and around Boston, and numerous other sums of $2,500 or over to various bodies.

THE investigation by Councils' Joint Special Committee of the management of the Pennsylvania Working Home for Blind Men was begun on the 17th instant. Joseph P. McCullen, who represented the blind workers, at one point caused something of a sensation by directly accusing Superintendent Hall, who was on the stand, of "robbing" the men entrusted to his charge.

EIGHT or ten masked men, on the night of the 18th instant, entered the office of the Fairmount Park Transportation Company, after the cars had ceased running for the night, and, after overpowering the receiver and five other employes, forced open the safe with powder or dynamite and abstracted $3,355.57, the receipts of two days, with which they escaped.

At a meeting of the Board of Directors of the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, Samuel Rea, first assistant to the President, was promoted to the position of Fourth Vice-President. William A. Patton, an assistant to the President, was elected President of the New York, Philadelphia, and Norfolk Railroad Company, to succeed A. J. Cassatt, resigned.

THE treaty between the United States and Great Britain in relation to trade between this country and the British colony of Barbadoes was signed at the Department of State on the 16th inst., by the representatives of the two governments. It is the first treaty framed under the Dingley law, and the first of the series of treaties which the British colonies to the south of this country are seeking to effect.

TWENTY-FIVE hundred Indian fishermen of Rivers Inlet and Skeena, British Columbia, are on a strike, and the dozen canneries on the northern coast are running about an eighth of the usual capacity. The Indians demand ten cents per fish, but the canners say they cannot give more than six.

THE tornado which swept over New Richmond, Wisconsin, on the night of the 12th inst., killed nearly 200 persons, injured 400, and practically destroyed the town. The scene is one of great desolation. Many other towns in the same section of the country were also partially destroyed.

CAPTAIN ANDREWS sailed from Atlantic City on the 18th instant, in a little boat twelve feet long, for England. He carries with him provisions for three months. He has made the trip already three times, though never before in so small a craft.

AMBASSADOR CHOATE has been assured by the British Foreign Office that an arrangement has been entered into with the United States which practically smoothes over the Alaskan disputes until the High Joint Commission meets in August.

GEORGE B. BARROW was found guilty of having abducted Marion Clarke, and was sentenced to fourteen years and ten months in the New York State Prison. Carrie Jones, the nurse girl, was sentenced to four years.

CONGRESSMAN RICHARD P. BLAND, the noted silver advocate, died at his home, Lebanon, Mo., on the 15th instant, after two months' illness.

JUDGE SIMONTON at Harrisburg has decided that the sale of liquor to soldiers at camps cannot be carried on without a license from the Courts, notwithstanding authority to do so may be permitted under the military law.

THE Berks County Grand Jury ignored the bills of indictment against the four men charged with the responsibility for the Reading railway collision at Exeter, and the accused were discharged from custody.

THE Board of Regents of the University of California have selected Professor Benjamin Ide Wheeler, of Cornell, as President of the University, to succeed Martin Kellogg, resigned.

BARON CHRISTIANI, the assailant of President Loubet, of France, in the recent outbreak, has been sentenced to four years imprisonment.

ELEVEN miners were killed at Cape Breton, N. S., on the 16th inst., by explosions in a deep mine.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

ANOTHER trolley project that promises to give an added stimulus to real estate is now being pushed by a number of Philadelphia capitalists, the line to run from Willow Grove, as an extension of the Union Traction Company's line, to New York. The road will follow the Old York road through Buckingham to Lahaska, where it will turn off to New Hope, cross the river to Lambertville and connect with a number of towns and villages in New Jersey. Agents of the projectors have been securing rights of way and options upon land and making preliminary surveys.

—At the "Conference of Educators," announced to be held at Providence, R. I., on Sixth month 28 to 30, after the President's address by Isaac Sharpless, the following subjects of interest to our Religious Society are to come under discussion: "What Denominational Influence should our Secondary Schools Exert?" "Sociology from a Quaker Standpoint;" "A Modern Thought in Friends' Educational Work," Geo. A. Barton; "High Scholarship and Modest Pretensions in College Work," L. L. Hobbs; "Education and Modern Business Life," Thomas K. Brown; "The Importance of Teaching the Principles of Peace in our Schools, with Suggestions as to Methods," Richard H. Thomas.

—The Agricultural Department has issued a circular giving the substance of reports received by it up to June 10 on the condition of foreign crops. It says that a British commercial estimate tentatively puts the world's wheat crop of 1899 at 2,504,000,000 bushels, against 2,748,000,000 bushels in 1898, a reduction of 224,000,000 bushels, or nearly 8.9 per cent. Another estimate makes a reduction of 352,000,000 bushels.

—Owing to prolonged dry weather the hay crop of Long Island is destroyed, and the farmers are selling their stock as being too expensive to keep. Many of the valuable vegetable gardens on Long Island, from which the city derives a large share of its supplies, have been very seriously damaged.

—Henry O. Havemeyer, President of the American Sugar Refining Company, last week testified before the Industrial Commission at Washington. He attacked the customs tariff vigorously. $24,000,000, he contended, is contributed by the people to the interests of the sugar growers.

NOTICES.

* * The Friends' Book Association acknowledges receipt of the following additional contributions to the Children's Country Week Association:

From Fellowship Circle of the King's Daughters, three bundles of clothing.
Also from the same, Cash, . . . $ 5.00
Previously acknowledged, . . . 112.00

Amount, . . . $117.00

JOHN COMLY, Superintendent.

Sixth month 19, 1899.

* * Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting's Committee to visit the smaller branches has made the following appointments:

SIXTH MONTH:

25. Häverford, 10 a. m.

SEVENTH MONTH:

9. Schuylkill, 10.30 a. m.

23. Germantown, 10.30 a. m.

AQUILA J. LINVILL, Clerk.

Two or three customers can compel any dealer to keep Macbeth's lamp-chimneys.

Does he want your chimneys to break?

Get the Index.

Write Macbeth Pittsburgh Pa

F. GUTEKUNST,
FINE ART IN PHOTOGRAPHY
712 Arch St., Philad'a, Pa.
Branch, 1700 N. Broad St.

The Prisoner and His Pins.

THERE was a prisoner in the Bastille once who had little hope of release, and had no high or holy thoughts to keep him company. Men have found even prison tolerable when they have nursed within their bosoms some sacred cause. But having only the companionship of his own miserable moods, this man was obliged to seek distraction somewhere. He found it by bribing his jailer to supply him with a thousand pins. Every morning he scattered these broadcast over the floor of his room, and spent the rest of the day collecting them and searching for those that had fallen into crannies.

A similar story is told of a prisoner who dried the straws of his musty bed one by one, at the rate of one a day, by exposing it to the heat of a thin ray of sunlight which came through a crack in the roof. He followed this ray with his straw, as it traveled across the flagstones from sunrise to sunset. When, at last, after many years, he had dried every straw, he was quite out of employment, and almost welcomed an accident which spilt his pitcher over his mattress and compelled him to begin all over again.—[The Classmate.]

Do not refuse the employment which the hour brings you, for one more ambitious. The highest heaven of wisdom is alike near from every point.—[Emerson.]

A CONVEYANCE bound by a river gives title to the middle of the main channel, so as to include islands lying between that and the shore, in the absence of anything to show that the islands belong to the government.—[Michigan Supreme Court.]

For the Dyspeptic, the Over-stout, the Constipated, who need no medicine so much as proper food and exercise;

for the Brain Worker, the Muscular Worker, for invalids, for well people, for young and old,

FRANKLIN MILLS FLOUR

A FINE FLOUR OF THE ENTIRE WHEAT is the most healthful flour made. It contains all the nutriment of the WHOLE wheat berry, not found in ordinary white flour, and none of the indigestible outer husk which makes cheap graham flour an unnatural food. It helps the digestive organs by feeding the nerves governing peristaltic action, is a brain food and muscle builder, makes rich blood, and is prepared in strict accordance with Nature's laws.

In addition, it is the most economical flour made. FREE booklet tells you more about it.

If your grocer does not have it, send us his name and your order—we will see that you are supplied. Refuse substitutes.

GENUINE MADE ONLY BY THE
FRANKLIN MILLS CO., Lockport, N. Y.

GEORGE B. COCK, Telephone 1-42-25 D.
LAW
CONVENTION } STENOGRAPHER.
SCIENCE
14 South Broad Street, Philadelphia.
Residence, 216 W. Coulter Street, Germantown.

MONTGOMERY COUNTY MILK.
CONSHOHOCKEN Special attention given to serving families. Office 603 North Eighth Street, Philadelphia, Penna.
JOSEPH L. JONES.

NEW YORK
PUBLIC LIBRARY
ASTOR LENOX AND TILDEN FOUNDATIONS
1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 1, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 26.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXVI.

THEY who are obedient to the universal injunction of our Saviour, "Watch," are prepared for the due fulfilling of every duty; and eminently so for that most essential one of worship.

From the Book of Discipline of London Yearly Meeting, chapter on "Meetings for Worship."

FOR ALL THY GIFTS.

THOU One in all, thou All in one,
Source of the grace that crowns our days,
For all Thy gifts 'neath cloud or sun,
We lift to thee our grateful praise.

We bless Thee for the life that flows,
A pulse in every grain of sand,
A beauty in the blushing rose,
A thought and deed in brain and hand.

For life that thou hast made a joy,
For strength to make our lives like Thine,
For duties that our hands employ,
We bring our offerings to Thy shrine.

Be Thine to give and ours to own
The truth that sets Thy children free,
The law that binds us to Thy throne,
The love that makes us one with Thee.

—S. C. Beach.

A SUCCESSFUL LIFE.¹

IN MEMORY OF AARON M. POWELL.

"THE very gentlest of all human natures
He joined to courage strong,
And love outreaching unto all God's creatures,
With sturdy hate of wrong."

In considering the life and character of our friend Aaron M. Powell, so recently called from his faithful service here to a higher, truer service in the life beyond, these lines of his friend, John G. Whittier, written in memory of Joseph Sturge, naturally present themselves as a fitting description of his rare and beautiful character. Other verses of the same poem are also so appropriate in this connection that they may likewise be quoted:

"Tender as woman, manliness and meekness
In him were so allied,
That they who judged him by his strength or weakness
Saw but a single side.

"And now he rests: his greatness and his sweetness
No more shall seem at strife,
And death has moulded into calm completeness
The statue of his life.

"Around his grave are quietude and beauty
And the sweet heaven above,—
The fitting symbols of a life of duty
Transfigured into love."

¹ Read by Isaac Roberts at a meeting of the Norristown Friends' Association, held at Plymouth meeting on the 18th ultimo.

Those of us who knew and loved him will want to keep green in our memory every incident of our intercourse with him, and to treasure in our hearts the thought of the helpful, uplifting influence that always accompanied him,—and so to record our recollections that this influence for good may be passed on to others, and to those who may come after us, that they too may be helped and blessed by it, even as we have been.

It must be a source of thankfulness to all of us who are members of the Religious Society of Friends that one branch of the Church of Christ has had the privilege of owning, in the sense of religious fellowship, so rare a type of Christian manhood, and of presenting to the helpful forces of the world so earnest and faithful a worker in all good causes. Let us believe that there are many sincere and devoted souls in every branch of the Christian Church, as well as in all the walks of life;—let us trust that the number of such may steadily increase—still, to many of us; the life of Aaron M. Powell will stand out as the most Christ-like life of which we have known,—and his character as the most fully-rounded, the most pure and loving, and morally and spiritually strong, that we have ever met. That Quakerism can in our day help to produce such a character is a cause of rejoicing for all of us who hold the principles of our religious body, and who are glad to see those principles uplifted and crystallized in character and conduct. But no sectarian limits could bind the broad and liberal spirit of our friend. While in thought and conviction truly a Friend, holding our great central truth of the Divine immanence in every soul as the great and saving truth of Christianity, he was still ever a lover of the truth, no matter where it presented itself; and being led by his life-work as a reformer into intimate relations with members of all churches, he knew that the truth was to be found in all,—and deserved honor wherever found.

One who knew him intimately in early life has related how he found him at his home when but a lad, engaged in his studies and preparing himself for some work in the future, the nature of which was then unknown to him. "I feel," he said, "that I have been called to some high and heavenly service. I do not know just what it may be,—but I am trying to prepare myself for it, so that when the work presents itself I shall be ready." The call to service came when he was only eighteen years old. Attending an Anti-Slavery meeting then, he was invited to address the meeting; and there engaging in that reform work, he did not entirely give it up until slavery was abolished. At the age of twenty-two he became regularly identified with the work of the Anti-Slavery Society, as one of its lecturers. In referring to this part of his work he once related the following incident: "At one of the first Anti-Slavery meetings which I attended Sojourner Truth, then quite an old woman, formerly a slave, was present, sitting on the platform. After some time she left her seat, and came slowly along to where I was sitting. Pausing and pointing her finger at me, she said, 'I've been lookin' at you, chile. I see you in the futur' a-pleadin' our cause.'" "This," he added, "was regarded by some at that time as a prophecy,—and so it afterward proved." As a lecturer in the "unpopular" Anti-Slavery cause he shared fully in the public opposition, the hooting, the jeers, the mob-violence,—which were the common experience of those engaged in that work,—but he also shared the fellowship and enjoyed the close companionship of those great souls, who, like himself, were dedicated to the cause of Freedom and the uplifting of the oppressed. Such men and women as William Lloyd Garrison, Stephen and Abby Kelly Foster, James and Lucretia Mott, Wendell Phillips, Lydia Maria Child, John G. Whittier, Ralph Waldo Emerson, and the other leaders in the Anti-Slavery Reform, were his intimate friends and associates, and we may well believe that intercourse with them, and service in the great cause of humanity, more than repaid him for all he was called to suffer in that cause.

When the Emancipation Proclamation of President Lincoln finally sounded the death-knell of chattel slavery, his interest was enlisted in the Temperance Reform, and for years he was editor of the National Temperance Advocate. He was also deeply interested in the cause of Equal Rights for Woman,—and also in Peace and Arbitration, but during the last few years he had devoted himself especially to the advocacy of the Purity Movement, being the President of the National Purity Alliance, and the Editor of the Philanthropist, the organ of the great reform. For just a half century was his life given to these reform movements, and the good he accomplished by voice and pen and personal influence in these various directions, all for the help of humanity, is beyond human computation.

As an instance of his earnestness in this cause, and also of the practical wisdom with which he worked, the great series of meetings held by him a few years ago in New York, Baltimore, and Philadelphia may be referred to. These meetings were largely attended and produced good results. The papers read and addresses delivered were afterwards published by him in a volume, which, it is safe to say, will do more to aid the progress of the Purity movement than any other agency. This volume contains the literature of this reform, and will remain for many years to come a storehouse of principles and facts, from which the students and the advocates of the reform may draw their arguments. This large volume, unanswerable by the opponents of the Purity cause, and a veritable stronghold of its friends, will stand as an enduring monument to the zeal and wisdom of our friend.

If we attempt to analyze his character, which to many of us seems well-nigh perfect, we will no doubt find that it was based chiefly upon his sense of justice and his love of freedom—of the freedom that comes through the Truth. The source of all his work in the interest of the great upward movements can be readily found here, and this motive power being understood, we can see clearly how naturally his work for freedom,—for all these reforms meant freedom in one form or another,—was the result. His especial gift, no doubt, was the clear vision that could discern the Truth under all conditions, and the rare fidelity of soul, which seeing, could decide always to follow where the Truth should lead, and enables us now to read that one word, "faithfulness," throughout his whole life.

One First-day morning a few years ago, he attended meeting in this house (Plymouth Meeting, Pa.). Many of us who heard him will remember how in his sermon he referred to purpose in life, and spoke of the impression made upon him by the sight of the monument to Lord Shaftesbury in Westminster Abbey, on the marble base of which are inscribed only two words, "Love—Serve." In these two words, which so impressed him, we find the keynote of his own life. In the first we see the secret of his power; he was able to see clearly and to work effectively because he loved the Truth fully. In the second we read the purpose of his life,—to serve the Truth and humanity. The early Friends frequently used a very beautiful phrase,—“the service of the Truth.” How fully was the life of our friend an illustration of the power we possess of entering into “the service of the Truth.” In the two words which he had read on Shaftesbury's tomb, and which we can so plainly read inscribed on his daily living, we find not only the keynote of his life, but also the truest message of his life to our own. The highest praise is imitation, and if we loved this great soul so lately with us,—if we honor his memory, now that he is called higher,—shall we not strive to imitate him in those great qualities which led all to love him, and especially in his love for, and service of the Truth? This loving service made his character what it was—pure and strong, and loving, uplifted above all thought of evil, redeemed from every form of selfishness. And the same cause—the service of the Truth—will do the same for all who engage in it as he did, with singleness of mind, and honesty of heart and purpose.

Surely if ever successful lives have been lived on earth, this was one. It was his great privilege to see the complete triumph of one of the great reforms in which he was engaged. Many of the great souls who had labored with him in this cause, longed to see the dawn of freedom, but did not. What a source of joy it must have been to him that his eyes beheld it, and that he had lived to see many descendants of former slaves in the full possession of all the rights of manhood! In other reforms in which he was deeply interested,—Temperance,—Peace and Arbitration,—the Equal Rights of Women, he had seen great advances made, and in that to which he gave his last years, the Purity movement, he had been able to make a beginning from which the cause should go forward to full fruition in the future.

If the great purpose of life is the development of character through noble service, then how can any life be more successful than his has been? If, as has been well said, "there is but one failure, and that is, not to be true to the best one knows," then success must be found in fidelity to the Truth as revealed to him. If the fellowship of great work, the companionship of noble thoughts, the consciousness of effective work in great causes, if these constitute happiness, how truly happy his life has been. If quiet contentment, peace, and full soul-communion in the home life; if silent communion with the Holy Spirit both in work and worship, if these constitute blessedness, how truly blessed his life has been, and how confident we may be that life has simply known transition, a happy change from loving service here, to higher, holier service in the life beyond, "the life that is life indeed."

As we contemplate the life and character of our friend so lately with us, now so greatly blessed, the thought that Whittier expressed in contemplating the life and character of John Woolman comes before us; we have "felt awed and solemnized by the presence of a serene and beautiful spirit, redeemed of the Lord from all selfishness, and we have been made grateful for the ability to recognize and the disposition to love him;" and we recall, too, the words which our Quaker poet addressed to one of his well-known friends, who, like our friend, was blessed by a quick translation from work to reward:

As a guest who may not stay
Long and sad farewells to say,
Glides with smiling face away.

Of the sweetness and the zest,
Of the happy life possessed,
Thou hast left us at thy best.

Now that thou hast gone away,
What remains of one to say
Who was open as the day?

Thou art safe on every side,
Friendship nothing finds to hide:
Love's demand is satisfied.

Keep for us, dear friend, where'er
Thou art waiting, all that here
Made thy earthly presence dear.

And when fall our feet, as fell
Thine, upon the Asphodel,
Let thy dear smile greet us well:

Proving in a world of bliss
All we fondly dream is this,—
Love is one with Holiness.

I. R.

AN ENGLISH TRIBUTE.

The British Friend for Sixth month has this tribute: The many English Friends of Aaron M. Powell, of New York, will hear with grief of his sudden removal. . . . His later years have been devoted to the cause of Purity, as his earlier ones were to the freedom of the slave. He was a pillar in the Church, and constantly presided over the largest gatherings of the body of Friends to which he belonged. His beautiful and dignified character was well known in Europe, where he had frequently visited as President of the American Purity Alliance. He was here last year and saw many Friends. His loss just now seems as though it were irreparable. He was remarkable for the dignity, the courtesy, and the tact which a lifelong devotion to the Christian life produces in gentle souls.

ENGLISH FRIENDS AT THE HAGUE.

LONDON YEARLY MEETING recently sent a deputation to the Peace Conference at The Hague. The representatives were well received by the President and presented the following address from their meeting:

"We desire to express our profound sympathy with the work of the Conference initiated by the Emperor of Russia, and having for its object the extension among the nations of the blessings of durable peace. For more than two centuries the Society of Friends has felt bound to oppose the whole system and practice of war, and to plead against the spirit that leads to war, as utterly opposed to the Spirit of Christ and to the rule, simple and practical, that we should do unto others as we would they should do unto us. We therefore greatly desire that your deliberations should be guided by that wisdom which is the gift of God, so that practical and lasting results may attend your labors. That these labors may not be in vain, but may be abundantly crowned with success, and be followed by the blessing pronounced upon Peacemakers, is our earnest prayer."

John Bellows, a member of the deputation, in his report to the yearly meeting, spoke of the interview with the President of the Conference, M. de Staal. We quote from The British Friend:

"It would be difficult to convey the feeling of calmness and rest and sweetness that encompassed them as they walked through the quiet streets of The Hague, and amid the still greater quietness of the square, to the hotel. He was struck with the calmness of the afternoon, as they walked beneath the branches of the trees, and the influence of the calmness and silence was exceedingly soothing to their spirits.

"A few moments elapsed before they were ushered into M. de Staal's presence. As they stepped forward and received each a warm handshake from the venerable old man, he himself lost all consciousness of his being the ambassador of the great Emperor of Russia, and only saw in him one treading very near the borders of eternity. As he leaned forward, the sight of his beautiful silver hair, and his languid, melancholy, touching smile, went to his heart, and he felt that the love of God was in this man, and that the choice of such by the Emperor of Russia was in itself no mean assurance that he meant the Peace Conference to be a success, and that it had the right man at the head of it. After a few brief words of introduction, they asked that they might be permitted to read the address to him; they had already sent him a copy of the translation in French. He listened in a kindly manner, and at the close he said, in French, and in a weak voice, 'I perfectly understand the English language, but you will pardon me if I reply in French, as I speak it more easily. I notice you have taken the religious basis as the ground of your address, and I am glad to receive it, because I know it is sincere.'"

THERE is a shallow faith, that faints and fails when confronted by the greater mysteries of life. But the mark of true faith is this, that it girds itself and is not afraid when it comes to the uncomprehended ways of God.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE EMPIRE OF SILENCE.

"THERE are moments when silence, prolonged and unbroken,

More expressive may be than all words ever spoken,—
It is when the heart has an instinct of what
In the heart of another is passing."

Of all forces that this world contains, that of silence is the greatest, the deepest, the most mysterious, the most awful, and the most beautiful.

We use it in widely different ways. It is our loudest applause to genius, it is our deepest way of sympathizing with those distressed. We show enthusiasm over a picture painted by talent, but before one painted by a genius we gaze, awed into silence. A lecturer holds his listeners spell-bound; "you could hear a pin drop," you say. It is the highest tribute we can pay to eloquence, the loudest applause that the world knows how to give. Of Thomas Carlyle it is wittily said, that he preached the doctrine of silence in thirty volumes. Poor Carlyle must indeed have known the lack of that blessed thing, "stillness," to have written so much in praise of it.

"Still water runs deep." Von Moltke, it is said, could be silent in ten different languages. From Solomon we learn that there is a time to speak and a time to be silent. But there are times when speech is most useful. One hastens to speak lest silence tells the tale too suddenly and cruelly.

A mother waits for news of her son who is being tried for his life. She walks the floor and wrings her hands, waiting for the messenger to bring the answer that means everything to him—to her. "What was the verdict?" she gasps;—no answer, yet what an answer!

A baby that has not mastered the art of language can tell more by a smile or a wave of the hand than the most brilliant conversationalist could express in many well-worded sentences, and express less eloquently. Our great men and women in literature have been silent ones. They have not cared to take part in the talkative, babbling crowd, but in quiet and often retirement they have given to the world as a result such essays, poems, and prose, that the world is hushed in appreciation. Thus speech is but the broken light upon the depths of the unspoken. The most beautiful poems are those that have never been written, the divinest songs those that never were sung.

Samuel Johnson was such a quiet man that his friends urged him to be less so; they entreated him to speak—promulgate his system—found his sect, but he answered: "My system is not for promulgation. It is for serving myself to live by; that is the great purpose of my learning to me."

Oh! yes; it is the great silent men and women we honor. They are the salt of the earth, each in his department silently working and thinking, looking out on the noisy inanity of the world; hearing words of little meaning, seeing actions of little worth. One loves to reflect on the great Empire of Silence. It is higher than the heavens, deeper than the kingdoms of death.

"Silence coeval with eternity;
Thou wert ere nature's self began to be;
'Twas one vast nothing, all and all slept fast in thee."

The Quakers, or Friends, find more of the divine in silence than any other religious order. In their plain garments they sit in peace and quiet. The soul speaks, communes with God in the calm stillness. How beautiful it is, this silent worship. Oh! the healing power it carries; when—

"Silence like a poultice comes to heal the blows of sound." Shakespeare writes,

"I were but little happy, if I could say how much."

Night folds its wings over a tired and talkative world and lulls it into silence. How blessed are night, sleep, and rest! If the Bible should read, "There shall be no more night there," it would sound to most of us like a curse. The darkness and the soundlessness is a boon to mankind; and then it enforces rest. Perhaps a hard master would work a tired slave longer, but he is not able; the sun is down, the moon is not risen, slave nor master can see. Both leave the field and sink into that blissful, silent sleep. When night falls, Victor Hugo says, night rises, the mother quail gathers her scared and scattered brood. Pointers and setters and men in tan-colored clothes leave the stubble and corn-fields and go home. Then you can hear the worried, gray mother piping in the cover, "Children, come home." They gather, and she calls the roll of the covey, happy if they all answer. But soon even her low piping is hushed, and all is dark for a few hours and still. It is the stillness that restores and gives back to the world hope and strength for another day.

"Peace, be still," is a sublime message that has come down to us through century after century, and it has lost none of its wonderful meaning.

Peace and stillness,—how we need them both in these loud times. Let us honor then the great Empire of Silence, the boundless treasury which we do not jingle in our pockets or count up and present before men.

From out eternal silence do we come,
Into eternal silence do we go;
For was there not a time, and swift or slow,
Must come again, when all this world's loud hum
Was naught to us, and shall again grow dumb
Through all eternity? Between two low,
Dark, stony portals, with much empty show
Of tinkling brass, and sounding fife and drum,
The endless caravan of life moves on;
Or whence, or whither, to what destiny,
But he who dwells beyond the farthest dawn
Knows, yet reveals not, evermore even he
In silence wrapt, for all the thunders roll,
Save for his deathless message to our soul.

SUSAN LYDIA WRIGHT.

To judge other people more leniently than we do ourselves, and to forgive other people more freely than we do ourselves, are two very good rules for us to follow.—Selected.

PAIN is a kind of spiritual blindfolding; and there is often no other alternative for the soul between blindfolding and blinding. We little suspect what moral crises we have passed through, unharmed, because sorrow muffled our eyes.—Exchange.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 28.—SEVENTH MONTH 9.

THE FIRST KINGDOM.

GOLDEN TEXT.—All the evil of the men of Shechem did God render upon their heads.—Judges, ix., 57.

Scripture Reading.—Judges, ix., 1-21.

IN the events of the campaign against the Midianites, Gideon had shown himself a wise and resourceful leader. He was bold, yet prudent, and cautious without timidity. If he was also revengeful and cruel, as in the slaughter of helpless prisoners (Judges, viii., 21), and the torture of the leaders of the towns which refused him aid (Judges, viii., 16), these were rather qualities of his time than of himself. He was willing, even in stress of battle, to give generous credit to the Ephraimites at the fords of Jordan (Judges, viii., 1-3). When the victory was won, he thought only of returning to his wine-press and threshing-floor; but his leadership, and the safety bought by it, had strongly impressed his tribe, and they desired to continue it. "Rule thou over us, both thou and thy son and thy son's son," (Judges, viii., 22). The idea at first was repugnant to the victorious soldier, who had felt himself only the servant of Jehovah, and he answered: "I will not rule over you. . . . Jehovah shall rule over you." But it is plain from the further account that he prevailed upon to change his decision. A great part of the spoils of the victor was given him, and he established himself in regal splendor in his native town of Ophrah. There is no reason to think that his kingship extended beyond Manasseh, his own tribe, and possibly Ephraim, a neighboring one; but his influence must have been great in all Israel, as his victory had benefited all. "The peaceable peasant was protected from the marauding nomad; Israel again became master of its own land."

But Gideon, strong man and devout though he had shown himself, was not above the degenerating influences of the idolatry about him. He had cast down the altar of Baal and had exalted in its place the worship of Jehovah. Yet so little did he grasp the great conception of the early leaders of the Hebrews, that he saw no desecration of their ideal in setting up in his native town an Ephod-idol, or image of God, before which worship was paid. We need no further evidence that the law given to Moses at Sinai was little known among the children of Israel when a leader in a leading tribe knows nothing of the commandment, "Thou shalt not make to thyself any graven image," before which to bow down in worship. The example of the leader showed its influence at once among the people. "All Israel went astray" after the worship of the showy idol. "It became a snare to Gideon and to his family" (Judges, viii., 27).

In yet another way, also, did Gideon yield to the evil influences of his surroundings. We know that polygamy was common among the Hebrews, as in the case of Abraham and of Jacob; but there is reason to think that even at this early time there was a feeling against it. The command in Genesis (ii., 24) that a man shall "leave father and mother and shall cleave unto his wife," implies a single wife. Many of the leading characters of early Bible history seem to have had but one wife, as Isaac, the prophet Hosea, the sons of Noah (Genesis, vii., 13), and Boaz, in the story of Ruth. In those cases where polygamy was practiced, the number of wives was usually small, as in the cases of Abraham, Jacob, and Moses. But we read of Gideon that "he had many wives," (Judges, viii., 30). Among them was a Canaanite woman of Shechem, who seems to have remained at her own home after her marriage. Shechem was a Canaanite city, as well as one of the chief cities of Gideon's realm.

On the death of this first tribal king among the Hebrews, it seems to have been understood that his son, probably the eldest, would succeed him. There had been no suggestion of such inheritance of power in the cases of any others of the Judges; it will be seen, therefore, that Gideon's rule was a distinct advance in the direction of monarchy. But the direct course of inheritance was broken by the ambition of a younger son, Abimelech—the son of the Canaanite wife of Shechem. By playing on the race prejudices of the people of his native city he succeeded in winning their support for his pretensions to his father's throne, and with their assistance he put to death all of his brothers, save one, who escaped. This brother, Jotham, is heard of only once, when he spoke to a group of the citizens of Shechem, in the first recorded parable (Judges, ix., 8-21). The people had gathered together for the ceremony of the coronation, when Jotham appeared at the top of an inaccessible cliff, from which he spoke or chanted his fable. The trees would have a king; but all the useful trees were too busily engaged to serve—only the useless and troublesome bramble would accept the office. After pronouncing his curse upon the fratricide and those who had aided him, he disappeared from their sight and from history.

The monarchy thus conceived in assassination was not long continued. Instead of residing in his native city, where his chief strength lay, the king withdrew to one of the Jewish towns as a residence. His rule thus seems to have been accepted without question throughout at least a part of his father's dominions. But his withdrawal from Shechem gave opportunity for the growth of a discontented faction, which finally rose in a revolt, in which some other towns joined. The uprising was easily put down by the king's army, but in leading the attack on one of the revolted towns the king was killed by a chance missile thrown down from a tower. His rule had lasted only three years, and had apparently so disintegrated his small State that no effort was made to hold it together after his death.

The story of the short-lived monarchy is chiefly instructive in illustrating the growth of national spirit shown in even a temporary kingship. This growth continued and culminated in the general demand which placed Saul on the first throne of all Israel. But this time was not yet. It is possible that if Gideon had been followed by another like him the national spirit would have centered round his monarchy, drawn by his strong and attractive personality, and the tribal monarchy might have grown to a national one. The accession of the alien and treacherous Abimelech made this impossible.

WILLIAM PENN'S PLAN FOR PEACE.

IN 1695 William Penn, solicitous for universal peace, drew up what he entitled, "An essay towards the present and future peace of Europe, by the establishment of a European diet, parliament, or estate." The fourth section is especially applicable at the present time. It reads thus :

"On a general peace, or the Peace of Europe, and the means of it. In my first section I showed the desirableness of peace; in my next the truest means of it viz, justice, not war; and in my last that this justice was the fruit of government, as government itself was the result of society; which first came from a reasonable design of men of peace. Now if the sovereign princes of Europe, who represent that society or independent state of man that was previous to the obligations of society, would for the same reason that engaged men first in society, viz, love of peace and order, agree to meet, by their stated deputies, in a general diet, estates, or parliament, and there establish rules of justice for sovereign princes to observe one to another, and thus to meet yearly, or once in two or three years at farthest, or as they shall see cause, and to be styled 'The Sovereign or Imperial Diet, Parliament, or State of Europe,' before which sovereign assembly should be brought all differences depending between one sovereign and another, that cannot be made up by private embassies before the session begins, and that, (if any of the sovereignties that constitute these Imperial States shall refuse to submit their claim or pretensions to them, or to abide and perform the judgment thereof, and seek their remedy by arms, or delay their compliance beyond the time prefixed in their resolutions, all the other sovereignties united as one strength shall compel the submission and performance of the sentence, with damages to the suffering party and charges to the sovereignties that obliged their submission).

"To be sure, Europe would quietly obtain the so much desired and needed peace to her harrassed inhabitants; no sovereignty in Europe having the power, and therefore cannot show the will, to dispute the conclusion; and consequently peace would be procured and continued in Europe."

MAKING A FORTUNE.—It is often said of certain men that they have been the architects of their own fortunes. So must every one be. But may not one fall heir to a million? He may, indeed, but that million is not a fortune to him unless he makes it so. Quite likely it may prove to be his worst misfortune. Nature may endow another with fine eyesight, but if he uses his eyes mainly in the search for things degrading, if through them, he takes delight in abominations, his eyes are his misfortune. And so of all possessions. It is what we do with them that makes them a fortune or a misfortune to us.—Sunday School Times.

ARE FRIENDS TOO SELF-CENTERED?

A Paper read by Herbert P. Worth, before Young Friends' Association, West Chester, Pa.

UNDOUBTEDLY the most active and most vigorous period in the history of the people called Friends was in its earliest day, when Fox and those who became his followers persistently and faithfully proclaimed to the world the message which they believed was given them. Their voice was heard in the market-place; they confronted the priest in his pulpit; they were unawed before kings and boldly spoke in warning tones to judge and justice as occasion demanded. They made no compromise with conscience for appearance sake; they scorned public opinion; they knew of no traditions which they must respect under the pressure of existing circumstances; they took little thought for personal comfort or safety when influenced by impressions to duty. Deprivations, threats, imprisonment, torture, could not swerve them from the course which seemed to lie so clearly before them.

They cried out against the formalities of religion; they appealed to the people to learn of the simple teachings of the spirit. They believed themselves to be the bearers of a message that must be delivered. They thought much of this responsibility and little of themselves. It was nothing that its delivery led them into dangers, or among scoffers, or upon tedious journeys over land and sea. The directness and the fervor of their utterance had its influence, and the result was that they gained more sympathizers and made more history in comparatively few years than did whole generations of the Society which followed. For the time came when they no longer had to struggle for the opportunity to exist; the laws which had been used to persecute them now protected them in their conscientious peculiarities; instead of being scorned as foolish enthusiasts, they were recognized as a respected religious society; no longer considered dangerous fanatics, they had gained rather a reputation as dignified citizens of extraordinary justice and uprightness, and this reputation, well sustained, brought to them business prosperity. A condition of comparative ease and repose, not more in worldly than in religious matters, stole over them. Much concerned about maintaining the purity and the dignity of their organization, their ear was no longer as acute as in former times to the cries of humanity without. Their very simplicity threatened to become petrified into formality. No more the objects of persecution, they gathered in comfortable satisfaction about their own religious hearthstone and were content. But, alas, this very contentment had in it the element of decay. True spirituality reached its lowest ebb. It was a period of stagnation rather than activity; numbers which had increased so rapidly in a former day remained stationary, and then began to decrease slowly but surely. No longer feeling so keenly the responsibility of a Divine mission to humanity—no longer active light bearers to the world—the Society was concerned most about itself, and this inevitably led to internal dissensions and sad separations whose unfortunate influences can scarcely be estimated, and which would never have come to a body actively engaged in a useful work. We recall this period for the lesson that it teaches and not in a spirit of censure. Over and over again we find parallels in the records of human experience. Not only religious bodies but even nations and whole races of people who have stood up and battled nobly for existence against seeming odds, opposed by warlike foes or by unfavorable natural surroundings, in the very face of which they thrived and grew, having surmounted the obstacles in their path, have settled down to enjoy comfort and repose among themselves, only to lose their real vigor and life, to weaken, to shrivel, and to die. Such is the result of self centralization, for the extreme penalty of selfishness and of self-indulgence is death.

And while we recall this period of Friends' history with regret because of lost opportunities, let us not hold exaggerated views of it. A body of people that could in the hour of need give to the world a Lucretia Mott and a John G. Whittier had been far from devoid of a tender spiritual life nor wholly asleep to the needs of humanity during its previous hundred years; a Society that had maintained through all this time an envied reputation for the integrity of its members amid the trying circumstances of life, knew of something deeper than rules of discipline and cut of coat. Thankful are we of to-day that the spirit of that truth which we believe was revealed in an especial manner to the Friends of old was not lost and that, while it may seem to us to have been obscured for a time, it was still preserved and cherished, to be handed down as a precious legacy to us, when the Society awoke to discover that its light and its life were flickering and threatening to go out. Do we recognize that there was an awakening? That the period of which we have been speaking has become a period of the past? What shall we say of the First-day school movement, organized within the active lifetime of many of those who are still its earnest supporters, and now universally fostered by the Society, striving to teach simply and practically a better knowledge of that understanding of the truth held by Friends; and what of the mission schools here and there, faithfully maintained to meet the needs of those who cannot be reached by the regular First-day schools; and of the broad effort now entered into by the meeting through its philanthropic committees to lift mankind above the burdens imposed by impurity, by the use of intoxicants and narcotics, by indulgence in gambling and kindred vices, and the issuing of vicious literature; to practically further the cause of peace and arbitration among men and nations, to better the condition of the negro and the red man, and in other ways to elevate man more nearly to the plane which he should occupy? What shall we say of the increasing interest in reverent and thoughtful study of the Bible, and what of the broad and liberal consideration of the great questions affecting religious life, in the immense conferences held by Friends in recent years? Are not all of these to be counted among the evidences of a broader outlook, of energy and vitality, of a disposition to apply in no narrow spirit the testimonies for which the Friend has always stood? We recall the past for the lessons which it may teach.

But our question has to do with the present. Our topic is in the form of a query which appeals to us not as a riddle to be guessed, nor as a problem to be solved with mathematical exactness, but rather as an inquiry which shall arouse helpful and suggestive thought.

Selfishness in an organization is in many respects very closely akin to selfishness in the individual; and who is he who is so generous, so considerate, so charitable that he can safely say, "I have no need to learn any lesson in unselfishness?" And who would have us say of the Society of Friends,—“It is so keenly alive and responsive to the needs of humanity, so thoroughly aroused to the responsibilities and opportunities of the present time, so devoted to establishing a spiritual kingdom among men, that it is free from all danger of being self-engrossed”? May we not therefore assume that Friends are by no means exempt from the need of a constant concern that as a Society their thoughts shall not be too much directed in narrowly sectarian lines, and that their energy and effort shall not be too much exerted in providing things comfortable, and gratifying to their own personal taste, either in worldly or religious affairs?

But let us be careful that in pursuing this thought we do not go to the other extreme. The religious organization is not to be neglected, nor held in light esteem. The meeting can only be that centre of spiritual vigor, that energetic power for good which it ought to be, when it has the loyal support of its members, when efforts of mind and hand and heart are put forth in its behalf. Without such effort it is weakened and inefficient.

One of the most hopeful signs in connection with the Society of Friends to-day—one of the striking evidences, indeed, of the awakening which it has experienced—is the freedom, the frankness, and yet withal the kindly spirit in which its mistakes, its shortcomings, and its needs are openly discussed amongst its members. But this disposition to self-examination must not be confounded with that spirit of carping criticism and of fault-finding which sometimes becomes a stumbling block. Neither an individual nor an organization can appear at its best under the burden of an atmosphere of criticism. The critic must needs have a care that he do not conceal his own inaction or indifference behind his fault-finding; he who clearly sees the need of a reform is the one whose influence and effort should be most effective in achieving it.

Within the knowledge of those gathered here the Society of Friends has suffered more from the indifference of those classed among its adherents than from self-centralization,—an indifference which allows a halting or spasmodic support of the organized efforts of the Society, or such support as it may seem entirely convenient to give, or perhaps an absolute condition of carelessness. To rightly occupy its field of usefulness, the Society needs a cordial, a united, a whole-hearted support. Not such as is given for the purpose of preserving a dignified organization, but

(Concluded on page 516.)

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 1, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

[Editorial Letter.]

I LEFT London on the evening of the 7th of Sixth month, and going by rail to Harwich, crossed in the night to the Hook of Holland, near the mouth of the Maas river; landing there I reached The Hague at 6.30 on the morning of the 8th.

All that I can say, as I write this, after four days' stay in The Hague, will be much better and much more fully known to the readers of the INTELLIGENCER by the time this letter can be printed. Still, I think I may safely venture to state a few facts, and give a few impressions.

The Conference, as is well known, assembled with a prevailing distrust of its accomplishing anything. The great majority of its members had little faith in the announced objects of the call, and a cynical suggestion that it could only be possible to decently inter the Czar's plans was on the lips of many. But the American and the British delegates met this from the moment of confronting their colleagues with the emphatic declaration that they had come with the purpose of doing something; that they had plans to propose, and that if the meeting should be made to fail those who were responsible for the failure must answer to the public opinion of the world.

From this initiative, which indeed was hardly possible from any but the two great nations which alone are not yet under the heel of compulsory militarism, real work was begun, and has proceeded. It is not now believed that it will be without result. Those well informed expect that a plan of general Arbitration for all nations, and probably of a Permanent Tribunal, will be agreed to. Little else—though something, probably—will be done, but unless there is greater opposition than now appears, Arbitration, in some such form as I have mentioned, will emerge as the accomplished work of the Conference. At this moment, and rather unexpectedly, Germany seems to interpose objections, but they will not prevent the work proceeding, nor, it is believed, will they balk a good result.

If so much as a good plan of Arbitration shall be the only outcome, or, indeed, if there be anything definite as the outcome, anything which plainly tends to strengthen Peace and discourage War, then the Conference will have been a great success. For the plain analysis of the case is this: (1) The assembling of the nations to consider affairs of common concern is itself a great step. That recognizes that not a few strong ones, but all, are entitled to be considered and consulted, and that the rules of general action are subjects not to be forcibly dictated, but to be adopted after fair discussion. (2) The fact that such a Conference assembles to discuss and to alleviate the world's war burdens adds to the fact of the meeting a great significance. It is not as though the meeting were one to consider questions of an economic, or of a political character; the moral gravity of this question, its religious character, indeed, makes a Conference on it notable in the history of mankind. (3) If, then, the Conference shall not be balked, but shall result in a definite step forward, even if it be but a short step, the world will see that such meetings of the nations may be used for good,—that here is an agency, possible of use, by which the woes of men may be alleviated. In such case, the holding of other such Conferences is certain, and the taking of more steps away from the dominion of war certain also.

H. M. J.

The Hague, Sixth month 12

OUR friend Anna M. Jackson requests us to state to subscribers to the Schofield School Bulletin and the Laing School Visitor that these papers always suspend publication during the summer months. Many have not understood this.

BIRTHS.

LEEDS.—Near Marlton, N. J., Sixth month 19, 1899, to Charles H. and Hannah D. H. Leeds, a daughter, who is named Marion D. Perkins.

SPACKMAN.—At Colorado Springs, Col., Sixth month 20, 1899, to Ellis L. and Katharine M. Spackman, a son, who is named Ellis Spackman, Jr.

THAYER.—At Great Neck, Long Island, Sixth month 2, 1899, to George A. and Elizabeth H. C. Thayer, a son, who is named William Willets Thayer.

MARRIAGES.

PEARSALL—DURANT.—In Philadelphia, Sixth month 22, 1899, Robert Pearsall, son of William and Hannah M. Pearsall, and Ethel, daughter of Frederick C. Durant.

SHOEMAKER—McILVAIN.—At the residence of Anna Mary M. Biddle, sister of the bride, Riverton, N. J., under the care of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia, Sixth month 22, 1899, Lewis F. Shoemaker, of Lansdowne, Pa., son of Anna M. and the late Charles B. Shoemaker, and Lucretia McIlvain, daughter of the late Hugh and Martha G. McIlvain, of West Philadelphia.

DEATHS.

COLLINS.—In Highland, N. J., on Sixth month 22, 1899, Sidney H., widow of Edward Collins, aged 91 years.

She was a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends, and formerly lived in West Chester, where interment was made in Friends' burial ground, Rosedale avenue.

DARLINGTON.—At his home at "Fawnbrook," near West Chester, Pa., Sixth month 24, 1899, Smedley Darlington, in his 72d year.

He was at one time a teacher in Friends' Central School, Philadelphia, and later established a Boarding School at Ercildoun, Pa. He was the son of Richard and Edith Darlington, and a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends.

DUNCAN.—At the residence of her son, George W. Duncan, Los Angeles, California, Fifth month 21, 1899, Keturah Duncan, widow of the late Joshua Duncan, in the 80th year of her age; a member of Third Haven Monthly Meeting of Friends, Easton, Maryland.

Having spent a long and useful life, she passed peacefully away. As the end drew near, while waiting patiently with folded hands, her very presence seemed to shed a sweet influence on all who came around her.

EVES.—At her home in Millville, Pa., Fourth month 6, 1899, after months of severe and continuous suffering, borne with patience and hopefulness, Sarah B., widow of the late Charles W. Eves, aged 66 years.

Of the ten children born to them but four survive. Deceased was the daughter of George and Margaret Masters, and a birthright member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Millville, Pa.

HEACOCK.—At Benton, Pa., Fifth month 4, 1899, Samuel Heacock, in his 75th year; a member of the other body of Friends.

Interment took place from Friends' meeting-house, Millville, Pa.

KESTER.—At Millville, Pa., Fourth month 12, 1899, Anna W., wife of Amos P. Kester, in her 71st year; a birthright member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Millville, Pa.

She had been afflicted for several years, and for many months was an extreme though patient sufferer. An aged husband and two children survive her.

She was one of the ten children of Joseph and Elizabeth Kester, of whom but one, Benjamin, is now living.

KESTER.—At the home of her son Charles, near Rohrsburg, Pa., Fourth month 1, 1899, Mary Elizabeth Kester, widow of the late Arnold Kester, in the 74th year of her age; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Millville, Pa.

Two sons and a daughter survive her. Interment was made from Friends' meeting-house, Millville, Pa.

KIRK.—In Kennett Square, Pa., Sixth month 22, 1899, Edwin Brosius Kirk, son of Benjamin P. and Lucretia M. Kirk, aged 26 years.

MILNES.—At West Liberty, Iowa, Fifth month 11, 1899, after a lingering illness, Sallie A., wife of Henry Milnes, in her 33d year; a birthright member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Millville, Pa.

She resided at Millville until after the death of her parents, Parvin and Eleanor Eves.

ROBERTS.—At Germantown, Philadelphia, Sixth month 21, 1899, Abigail Ann H., widow of Samuel H. Roberts, in her 80th year. Interment at Moorestown, N. J.

SKIDMORE.—At her home in Beekman, Dutchess county, N. Y., Loretta Skidmore, aged 93 years; a valuable member and elder of Oswego Preparative Meeting. Interment at Creek Meeting ground.

WOULD you go to wonderland?
Lo, it lieth close at hand;
Wonderland is wheresoe'er
Eyes can see and ears can hear!

—J. V. N. Dorr.

CHEERFULNESS, sincerity, industry, perseverance, and unselfishness may be acquired by practice and constant repetition, as much as the art of correct speaking or playing the piano, and are far more necessary to health.—Public Ledger.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

III.—NOTES FROM THE HOLLAND CAPITAL.

ASIDE from the Peace Conference itself, there is much of interest in this old city, the capital of the "Kingdom of the Netherlands." The city itself is neat (that is the word which Pepys, the redoubtable English Diarist, applied to it over two centuries ago, and it is the one that seems to fit best), and with a dignified but cheerful life and movement. There is no roar, as in the great cities, no crowd, no bustle or haste, and yet the place has not at all an air of being sleepy or tiresome.

Here are the Government offices, the young Queen's palace (a plain building), and the old Binnenhof, in which the States General, the Dutch Congress, meets. There are museums, parks, public grounds, statues, and monuments. If we begin our concern with history with the sixteenth century, The Hague is of great historical interest; and Motley's pages will give the student many events that centered here. The open court within the Binnenhof is the place where John of Barnewald was executed, and close by is the large house ("palace") of Prince Maurice of Nassau, the Stadtholder, who procured his most unjust taking-off. The Mauritshaus is now a public and free art gallery, in which there are some fine pictures—the best in The Hague—including a full dozen by Rembrandt, some by Murillo, a Madonna and Child by Rubens, the famous "Bull" by Paul Potter, which the French in Napoleon's time took away, but which was later brought back, and many by the most famous of the Dutch painters. I have not undertaken, and shall not, to see picture galleries much, but I found this one very interesting, and not too extensive.

The delegates to the Conference are quartered at leading hotels, most of the Americans being at the Hotel Old Doelen, in the Tournooiveld. The flags of the different nations are displayed in many directions, and the Conference is of course a great feature in The Hague's affairs. There are twenty-six nations represented, by over one hundred delegates, and with secretaries, attachés, etc., probably a hundred and fifty persons. The meetings, as you know, are entirely private, and are held in the Huis ten Bosch, the House in the Wood, a royal palace offered for the purpose by the Queen. The inside of this building is not open to the public, of course, but can be seen by some management, on the afternoon of First-day, and, with a proper order from the Department of Foreign Affairs, I visited it on the 11th. The hall in which the delegates meet is ample and handsome,— "the finest for such a purpose I know of," said F. W. Holls, one of our American delegates (secretary to the delegation) to me. The whole wall and ceiling is covered with pictures of the Rubens school of art. The room is quite packed with the seats and desks of the delegates; they sit like children in a school, with the president, Baron de Staal (the Russian ambassador at Washington) at one side, so that their profiles are presented to him, not their full faces,—unless they edge around. The fittings are neat and comfortable, but not at all costly. Practically the whole of the central building is given up to the use of the Conference, the larger rooms being used for the sections (of which there are three), the committees, the secretaries, etc., and there is a handsome refreshment room upstairs. This palace was built by the widow of Prince Frederic of Orange, and the main room is called the Orange room. Portraits of the royal family abound, and there is a fine one of Motley, our American, historian of the Netherlands, hanging in one of the rooms. The Assistant Secretary for Foreign Affairs, M. de Ruysenaert, when he gave me the order for admission, particularly mentioned this.

The park surrounding the palace, open mostly to the public, but with private grounds near the house, is very beautiful. The moist, cool climate keeps all the woods very green and vigorous, and the shade is dense. The trees are largely beeches, but along the drives from the city out there are hundreds of handsome horse chestnuts, just now in bloom, including many with the red flowers. (They were blooming in London, also, a week ago.)

There has been on view here a most interesting collection of fine paintings, eight in number, illustrative of War and Peace, and designed to help on the good cause. They are by a Dutch artist of very high repute, J. J. L. Ten Cate, of Epe, who has secured a handsome room for their exhibition to those invited by card. They are entitled (using English translations), A Queen of Peace (Wilhelmina, the girl queen of Holland), Spiking the Cannon, Peace on Earth (the birth of Jesus), The Ride to Death (something like the "Charge of the Six Hundred," with Death riding at the head), Disarmament, War against War, and Peace in Death, one (doves building nests in an unused cannon) being unnamed. They are to be exhibited later in Paris, and they should be seen in the United States. All are fine, and several very impressive, indeed,—especially the three first named after the queen's portrait. They help contribute to the favorable surroundings of the Conference, and as I saw an officer in uniform looking at them I wondered what his sentiments were.

There are or have been gathered here a good many persons interested in the Conference, most of them, I should say, hoping for its success. Most conspicuous, perhaps, is M. Bloch, the author of the great book on War, which is said to have influenced the Czar to invite the Conference. He is a rich man, a banker, and was in the Government service in the Crimean war, therefore no longer young. His book is not yet all published, nor has any edition appeared in English, but there will be one very soon. [This is the work from which Professor Magill is now making translations for our columns.] He has been delivering a course of four lectures on "The Evolution of War," the third of which I heard. He spoke in French, but fortunately there were numerous lantern illustrations. He is quite accessible and affable, and I had a pleasant call on him in his large rooms overlooking the sea, in the great Kurhaus (the leading hotel) at Scheveningen.

Another most interesting personage here in the interest of Peace is Madame Salenka, a Bavarian lady, the wife of a professor in the University of Munich. She obtained a large number of signatures in Bavaria to a congratulatory address to the Czar, and she is preparing for publication a collection of such addresses by the women of different countries. In the album containing them, which had been lent her by Baron de Staal for the purpose, I saw the original of the address sent by the women of the W. C. T. U.; it was very beautifully pen-written with illuminated letters, and was the prettiest in the collection. Madame Salenka is a most interesting woman, and has done an excellent work. She is to speak at the Women's Congress in London a fortnight hence. So also is a Dutch lady, Madame de Wasclewicz, (she was a Van Schilfgaarde, of Holland, her husband a Pole), who threw herself into the work of collecting signatures—of both men and women—in the Netherlands, to addresses of sympathy with the Conference, and secured 225,000 names! "But the grandes dames," she said—"they were the hardest to procure." Other interesting and distinguished peace people here include the Baroness Von Sultner, the author of the book which became famous four or five years ago, translated into English with the title, "Lay down your Arms"; Felix Moscheles, the London artist, and author of the recently published volume of autobiography; and M. Albert Taschard, an Alsatian, who was several years a member of the French Assembly, and who now is earnestly concerned for a more effective propaganda of peace in Continental Europe. Dr. Benjamin F. Trueblood, of Boston, the secretary of the American Peace Society, is here, and has been during nearly the whole of the Conference. I am indebted to him for many kind and helpful services.

The English church here, (of the "Established" Church of England), has had a sermon on each First-day recently, by a prominent clergyman of its faith, on a general subject of Peace, and with reference to the Conference. That on the 11th, which I heard, was the fifth of the course. There was a full hour of the ritual service, through which I sat—and stood—in order to hear the sermon, which was by the Bishop of Hereford, a venerable man. He spoke (really read, of course), the prescribed half hour; and omitting a few passages relating to the Church of England's attitude and belief, the whole of it would do admirably for the INTELLIGENCER. It was a discussion rather than an exhortation, or exposition, a discourse rather than a sermon, but it was clear, definite, and emphatic testimony to the fact that Christianity means Peace, and that war and aggression contravene the Christ rule of life. The text was from Matthew, most fit and timely, "Blessed are the peacemakers." In the company present (the church, which is not large, was crowded), were President Low and Captain Mahan, of the American delegates; and I hope the Bishop's plain and earnest words found sympathetic response from them. H. M. J.

The Hague, Holland, Sixth month 12.

THE Canadian Pacific Railway earnings for the week ending Sixth month 21, were $538,000; same period last year, $475,000; increase, $63,000.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

DEEDS OF VIOLENCE.

"AN eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth," so said the old Levitical law. Jesus said, "But I say unto you, that ye resist not evil." Again, "It hath been said, thou shalt love thy neighbor and hate thine enemy, but I say unto you, love your enemies." Still again, He said, "I have finished the work which thou gavest me to do," and yet again, when on the cross, "It is finished," that is, his outward mission on earth. What was this work? not his performance of miracles, wonderful though they were, and to all appearance, sufficient to establish his identity with the promised Messiah; the days for them were indeed passed, when he gave up his life for the cause of truth, to which, he said, he came to bear witness; but his principal work, the one that was to continue after his death, and to reach down through endless ages, was not finished then; it will still go on and on; the knowledge of the all-sufficiency, the all-pervadingness of the Father's love to the children of his care; in contradiction to the doctrine formerly promulgated of a stern God's wrath and anger against his disobedient subjects. Under which law is the world living now,—the one proclaimed by Jesus, or by Moses? A disinterested on-looker would say, I think, that although professing to be Christians, the people of the United States are following not the precepts of Him whom they call their leader, but have gone back to more ancient times, in which "an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth" was the governing motive of action. Nay more; not stopping at equal retribution for wrongs, real or fancied, they follow out another Scriptural injunction, though not in the manner intended, for they give "good measure, pressed down and shaken together, and running over."

If it is not so, why then such horrible outrages recently perpetrated in our land, not in the interest of justice, or of law, but for the purpose of revenge. Mob-law, as it is called, (but what a travesty on the sacredness of the law as intended, are its proceedings!) reigns triumphant in many places, color prejudice rules supreme, inciting to deeds of violence the very recital of which makes one shudder with horror, or burn with indignation that such deeds can be committed in this boasted land of freedom, and the perpetrators thereof go unpunished of justice, and boasting of their vile deeds. Once it was said, "Let justice be done, though the heavens fall," now it is, "Let in-justice reign, though the heavens fall; we care not, so our ends are accomplished." Recently, during a visit to a little town in the southern part of Indiana, a lady told me that a colored man seeking work in the town would be driven out or shot, sometimes both. Such a condition of things is most terrible, and I think that the publication of the details of the horrible tragedies enacted, serves only to stimulate this prejudice, and arouse antagonistic feelings, until the eyes are so blinded that people cannot see right from wrong, and taking matters in their own control, riot runs wild, and human lives are sacrificed without a thought or a care as to whether the victims are guilty or innocent. Have we as Friends, as lovers of Peace, as followers of Christ, anything to do to try to stem this tide of savagery? Have we any influence, either as individuals or as a Society, with editors to induce them to suppress details of these crimes, even though they feel bound to mention their commission? Let us ponder this question seriously, and act righteously, that the blood of our murdered brothers cry not out to us when the question is put, as of old, "Where is thy brother?" Dare we answer, as did Cain, "Am I my brother's keeper?" Dear friends, this specious plea will avail us naught, even as it did not him, who first uttered it. Pray that our condemnation be not as bitter as was his.

ELIZABETH H. COALE.

Holder, Ill., Sixth month, 1899.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

TWO CIRCULAR MEETINGS.

ON First-day, Sixth month 18th, the Circular Meeting was held by two appointments, in Frederic county, Va. At 10 a. m., the quaint old meeting-house on the Ridge was well filled by Friends and others, eager to hear the Word. It was a lovely morning, warm enough to keep off the chill, and cool enough to temper the heat. The attendance generally is very small, a remnant of those standard-bearers who sleep so sweetly in the little graveyard nearby, whose cloak of faithfulness seems well fitting their followers.

We felt it to be a solemn occasion, surrounded as it was by nature, feeling sensibly the presence of "Nature's own great God." We were refreshed by excellent discourses from David Branson, Obed Pierpont, Jonah Reese, and Eliason Brown. We felt that each had been touched by the Spirit, which met a quickening response in our hearts. After exchanges of brotherly love, we repaired to Friends' homes where we dined, after which we started for Gainsboro, seven miles away, to attend the meeting to be held at that place. As we neared the village we were made glad by the sight of many vehicles (of several ages and sizes) gathered around the Methodist church, where we were to assemble, our time-honored house on Back Creek being inadequate to accommodate the number of persons who wished to meet with us. The house is large, and was filled. We have understood that there were many who could not gain admittance, several sitting in their carriages, like doves at the windows, to catch the crumbs. That our speakers of the morning were unusually favored was evinced by the close attention of the large congregation who seemed anxious to gather the words of wisdom, goodness and purity that fell from their lips, making us feel that it was well we had been together. Although disappointed in the absence of Baltimore Friends of the Yearly Meeting Committee, we were greatly edified and encouraged by those who ministered unto us. The occasion and day closed with great thankfulness on our part to our loving Father for the renewal of our strength, feeling as we did that he had been with us in our efforts "to point a moral" to his children.

S. A. H.

Winchester, Va., Sixth month 22, 1899.

BLOCH'S GREAT BOOK ON MODERN WAR.

III.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

PROF. MIEILLE loses no opportunity to turn the attention of his countrymen to the subject of war, and to the best means of advancing the interests of Universal Peace. His earnest appeal to the young to interest themselves in public affairs, and not to allow the professional politicians to assume the control of the State, is sadly needed in our own country at this time. May all heed the warning at this critical juncture of our national affairs, and speak out in tones that our President and his counsellors cannot fail to understand. I believe that they will do it, that the people will be heard from, and therefore I believe in the future of this Republic.

Swarthmore College.

EDWARD H. MAGILL.

THE PRESENT DUTY.

Not long since a group of young men, litterateurs, journalists, professors, lawyers, etc., a group thoroughly representative of the aspirations and the ideas of young Frenchmen of the present day, addressed to the public, and especially to the young and enthusiastic members of our various literary and scientific institutions, an urgent appeal for action. The authors of this letter, or rather of this series of letters to the young, proposed as a leading object, to arouse the attention of their youthful comrades to the urgent necessity which is imposed upon the youth of the middle classes, to educate the people, and not to leave the masses to the deleterious influences of the politicians—advanced or retrograde, there being but little difference—in a word, to place themselves bravely at the head of the onward march of humanity toward Progress and Light.

I adopt as the head of this article one of the expressions most frequently found in this manifesto, upon which I propose to speak again on a future occasion. This expression is, "The duty of the present hour." And it is this present duty upon which I wish to-day to address my readers. And what is this present duty if not to arrange yourselves resolutely on the side of peace; to cry out to militarism, "Thou shalt go no further;" to make the people hear the voice of reason; to give them the word of warning; to second, in brief, the sublime work of the noble Czar Nicholas?

And it is not only upon the young of the middle classes that this duty rests. In a democratic country like ours, where all have the right and the duty to participate in public affairs, where all take their part, much more heavy, alas! for the poor and the lowly in contributing to the public revenues, all have also their part of responsibility in the government of the country, and all, rich and poor, in every walk of life, having the same rights, have the same duties.

It is then to you, and to each of you in particular, my dear readers, that this urgent appeal to the duty of the present hour is addressed. Whoever you are, financially independent or the poorest of the poor, peasant or landed proprietor, employé or merchant, single or at the head of a family, you can no more withdraw from the obligation to fulfill this duty of a man and of a citizen, than you can free yourself from the necessity of breathing. In either case it would be suicide; and the moral suicide, which would result from your refusal to obey the law of duty, is a thousand times more culpable, and has consequences a thousand times more disastrous, than physical suicide.

I say that this duty is urgent. It is because the danger which threatens is extreme. We find ourselves in the presence of these two alternatives: Either the Conference at The Hague will succeed, that is to say, the Powers will agree to organize a Tribunal of Arbitration, to check the increase of armaments, perhaps even to agree upon a truce of five or ten years, awaiting something better. It will then be peace assured, the tranquility of your homes made certain, wealth and abundance in perspective, etc.

Or, the Conference at The Hague will fail. It will be then war, with brief intervals, war so much the more probable, that the failure at The Hague will have excited the military passions, ambitions, and covetousness, and discouraged the friends of good order and of peace. It will be war! Yes, a war without pity and without mercy! The general war, of which I spoke in a previous article; scientific war, that is, without compassion; destruction, cold, ferocious, and continuous. It will be war with all its miseries, homes ruined and deserted, the economies of life-times squandered, death and desolation, despair and anarchy!

Of these two alternatives which appears to you preferable?

Do not tell me that you can do nothing about it; and that in all times the lowly have suffered from the follies of the great. I will close your mouth with these words of De Moltke:

"War has more frequently arisen from the stupid passions of the people than from the ambition of their rulers."

Consider these words, my dear readers, and tell me, if you still dare, that you can do nothing about it. But you can do everything. Each of you individually is a power, for good or evil, for the ruin or for the safety of the country; each of you can do more for the propagation of the ideas of peace than the circulars of all the governments, and than all the twaddle of diplomacy! For it is upon the awaking of the individual conscience that depends the success of the attempt of the Czar.

It would be in vain to expect that the governments, such as they are constituted to-day, would be very enthusiastic in abolishing or diminishing military expenses, if they are not constrained or driven to it by the energetic pressure of the governed. And you may be very sure that at a time not very remote the governors will throw upon the governed the responsibility for the disasters. "You have desired it," they will say; and they will not be wrong, since not to prevent an evil when possible, is to render one's self an accomplice.

To the work then, all, to the work! Each in your own sphere, in public, or in private life; to your friends, to your servants, to your family, preach peace, and the hatred of war. Say everywhere and to all, with the courage which the conscience of accomplished duty gives, that never since 1789 has French democracy had a more glorious opportunity to affirm itself as the champion of progress and a soldier for the right. Say to all that this question of disarmament is a question of life or death for your native country, and that like international arbitration, disarmament can be adopted only if energetically demanded by the people.

Each of you, my readers, contributes his part in forming this sovereign and irresistible power which is called public opinion. In vain would you seek to throw upon other shoulders the burden of your decisions and the responsibility of your mistakes. Let me repeat: in a democracy like ours the elector is as culpable as the elected when, through negligence, indifference, or ignorance, the safety of the country is compromised. Do not forget the terrible lesson of 1870, and at what an expense 38 million Frenchmen expiated the mistake of being uninterested in public affairs. Know, my readers, that you are the masters of your destiny. Peace and war are in your hands. Do not decide lightly, and still more do not say, as did the Theban of old, "To-morrow for serious affairs; to-morrow for grave decisions."

It is to-day that we must act, and without delay. All, electors and elected, are under an obligation to fulfill the duty of the present hour: to preach Peace to all around you; to insist upon Peace with your representatives in Parliament, and in all Departments of the government. I dare to hope that you will not fail in this pressing duty.

P. MIEILLE,

Professor at the Lycée de Tarbes, France.

Note.—Let every reader apply these stirring words to our present disgraceful and perilous situation in the Philippines, and apply the remedy.—Translator.

BOOKS OF REFERENCE.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

THE replies to the postals recently sent out by Friends' Literature Committee, in many cases, speak of the lack of reference books at the command of teachers and pupils in schools in rural districts. The First-day School Associations in several of the yearly meetings now send out traveling libraries. Would it not be possible for each committee having charge of these libraries to purchase a few copies of the books most particularly needed in the study of the present series of First-day school lessons? Where such committees are not in existence, can not in each yearly meeting such a committee be appointed, with the special duty of supplying First-day schools with reference books? The names, publishers, and prices are given in Quarterly No. 1, 1899, with the statement that four,—which are indicated,—will be sufficient for the work.

ANNA M. JACKSON,
Clerk of Literature Committee.

[The suggestion in the above communication is worthy of consideration. Philadelphia Yearly Meeting's committee on First-day Schools has already, we think, supplied some reference books through its traveling Libraries. We would add, however, that no school need be deterred from the study of the Old Testament lessons on account of the absence of such books; for these lessons,—in connection with the Bible readings noted,—are a complete study in themselves, and do not necessarily call for reference books. Only let First-day school classes be in earnest in their desire to learn, and they cannot fail to profit by the plan and presentation of the Lessons as issued, though of course reference books are always valuable.—EDS.]

THE daily post bag at Marlborough House contains some extraordinary letters. Recently one arrived from a French inventor of a new diving dress, begging the Prince of Wales to don it and dive into the Seine when he next visited Paris.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

GWYNEDD, PA.—The Committee on Philanthropic Labor of Abington Quarterly Meeting of Friends held a meeting on First-day, the 18th instant. Subject—Temperance and Tobacco.

The meeting was opened by James Q. Atkinson stating the subject and appointing a secretary; the regular secretary being absent we were obliged to do without the minutes of the last meeting. James Q. Atkinson delivered an address, in which he stated that he did not think we would do much as yet by voting for temperance; the time was not yet come for votes to accomplish anything.

Joseph S. Evans reported that he was unable to get an acceptable speaker. Chalkley Styer remarked in answer to J. Q. Atkinson that if voting was not the way to show our sentiment, we might as well cease our labors. J. Q. Atkinson advocated scientific temperance instruction, thinking our hope was in the coming generation. Silas Morris agreed with these sentiments. Joseph S. Evans thought we should vote as we profess. C. Wilson thought we should succeed only by educating the children in temperance sentiment. He does not believe in combining temperance and politics, but in voting for prohibition separately. Joseph S. Evans thought we should live up to our principles. He did not see how a Friend, an earnest Christian man, could conscientiously vote for either political party. Clement E. Lloyd thought the only right way to vote was for prohibition. He taught his boys to ask, first, Is it right? then, Does it pay? He thought the best way to teach children was to talk over all current events at the table. Then they are unconsciously instructed. He thought we should vote for the right man, not for a straight party ticket; that partisanship was the ruin of our country. James Q. Atkinson advocated the present laws, but asked for charity for those who saw as he did, hoping that in time they would all be converted to a right way of thinking. Chalkley Styer was not prepared to say that J. Q. Atkinson was all wrong, but thought himself and many others nearer to the right way. J. Q. Atkinson then read a temperance essay by Albert T. Mills, delivered at the Richmond Conference. After a short silence the meeting adjourned. M. L. Z., Sec.

RISING SUN, MD.—On Sixth month 4, the West Nottingham Young Friends' Association met, and was opened by the president reading a portion of Scripture. After roll-call the minutes of last meeting were read and approved. The day's program was opened by Walter R. Buffington, the subject of his paper being, "Is heart power better than head power?" Head power, he said, might be classified as the power of the human being operated and controlled by the mind or human will. Heart power we must classify differently, but shall define it as conscience. Yet we, as Friends, believing in the indwelling voice of God speaking directly to every human soul, would think of "heart power" as the voice of God, the true and only guide to all right living.

A recitation was given by Ethel Reynolds. In the absence of Elwood Nichols some thoughts were given by the different members present regarding the subject referred to him, "Explain the difference between 'inspiration' and 'revelation.'" There can be no revelation without coöperation; the human must coöperate with God before there will be any revelation. We must be willing to lay down this selfish life which stands antagonistic; then we shall more fully realize a true inspiration, the inner voice speaking to us. Ella F. Hunt recited "First-day Thoughts." Following this was a paper by Mary Richards, "What are the signs of a true faith?" "Faith is the pencil of the soul that pictures heavenly things." Our worth should be in being, not seeming; we need to be very careful that we do nothing for vain glory, but show that we are content with God for our guidance. To know our faith we should scrutinize our lives closely to see what God has done for us, and by doing an act through faith we shall be induced to try again. We must prove our faith by our works.

"What does plainness of apparel mean to Friends?" was the subject of a paper prepared by Lydia E. Reynolds. Never more than to-day has true simplicity been needed in the world, simplicity of mind and heart as well as simplicity in outward matters. The true responsibility resting with us is not only to deny that true Quakerism consists of forms, but to give something more substantial in return. Though the world is missing something by which it has been accustomed to recognize us, let us the more forcibly emphasize the essence of our religion.

"Are the teachings of Jesus practical to-day?" was the subject discussed by Albert T. Buffington. Were the world to answer this question, we might believe that the teachings of Jesus were not practical to-day. But it is not for us to reflect upon the weakness of others, but to face more bravely our own difficulties and shortcomings; for it is not very convincing to the world to talk much of Christ within and not look at all like Christ without.

Every approaching year brings its own wisdom and broader horizon, and we do believe an awakening has come, not to us alone but to the whole Christian world. To make Jesus's teachings more practical we must show a willingness to give up ourselves, that is, our preconceived ideas for a principle which, as Carlyle says, "is the only real evidence of our sincerity."

Under the head of new business, those who are to serve the ensuing year were appointed. No volunteers being offered, the report of the executive committee was read. Several visitors were present—an encouraging fact. We realize that mind has influence upon mind, to strengthen, to encourage, to uplift; being free agents as we are it rests with us whether we advance higher or fail in the grand purpose of life. After observing a short but reverential silence the association closed.

L. JANETTE REYNOLDS, Sec.

NORRISTOWN, PA.—The last session of the Association for the summer was held on the 18th ultimo, at Plymouth Meeting. The attendance was large, and the exercises developed much interesting discussion.

After routine matters had received attention, Isaac Roberts, of Conshohocken, read a memorial of Aaron M. Powell, (which appears elsewhere).

Susan J. Sheppard, Jr., read Whittier's poem, "Nauhaught, the Deacon," giving a pleasing rendition of a somewhat difficult selection.

"A History of Plymouth Meeting" was read by Ellwood Roberts. The township was settled by Friends, in 1686, and a meeting was established soon afterwards, but no meeting-house was built for twenty years or more, Friends gathering at the dwellings of members, as appears by the records of Radnor, the parent meeting. A graveyard was very early established, at the present site, and a school was maintained from the first settlement of the vicinity. Many quotations from the earlier records were given. The sketch included allusions to Jacob Ritter, Samuel Livezey, and Joel Lare, well-known ministers.

The next session will be held three months hence at Valley Meeting. A Friends' Association has been organized at Plymouth Meeting, the next meeting to be held after the summer holidays.

PRESIDENT Timothy Dwight, the venerable retiring President of Yale University, preached his last baccalaureate sermon before the graduating classes of the academic and scientific departments, on the 25th ult. The occasion was also the fiftieth anniversary of President Dwight's own graduation. Many of his old classmates were in the chapel.

THE Archbishop of Canterbury, formerly head master of Rugby School, unveiled at Rugby, on the 24th ult., in the presence of a distinguished assembly, a statue erected to the memory of the late Thomas Hughes, Q. C., author of "Tom Brown's School Days," "Tom Brown at Oxford," etc., and founder of the British settlement of Rugby, Tenn.

PROFESSOR McGiffert, of the Union Theological Seminary, against whom charges of heresy have been brought because of his book in which he treats of the Lord's Supper, will leave the Presbyterian Church without standing trial, and, perhaps, will enter the Congregational denomination.

Educational Department.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.—Theses prepared for the Bachelor's Degrees by the class just graduated:

The Industrial Revolution of the Nineteenth Century, Mary Evelyn Armstrong; The Early Lyric Poets of the Nineteenth Century, Mary Gertrude Ball; History of the Paving Industry, Richard Jones Bond; The Chemical Examination and Purification of Water, Levis Miller Booth; The Minnesinger, Anna Bradbury; The Instinctive Traits of Man, John Pearl Broomell; Socialism in the United States, Emily Willets Carter; The Determination of Nitrogen in Asphalts, Calvin Freeman Crowell; An Outline of the Evolution of the Book, Closing with the Invention of Printing, Anna Belle Eisenhower; Summer Charities for Children, Edith Flitcraft; A Study of the Anglo-Saxon Poem Beowulf, Helen Moore Fogg; Nature Poets of America, Mabel Clare Gillespie; A General Study of the Philippines, Gilbert Lewis Hall; The Present Status of Japan Among the Nations, Abner Davis Jackson; History of the English Novel to the Death of Sir Walter Scott, Marie Katharine Lackey; Social Forces in the German Literature of the Sixteenth Century, Mary Gray Leiper; Forestry, Jane Eachus Linvill; Modern Methods of Prison Reform, Alice Lippincott; The Determination of Nitrogen in Asphalts, Walter Heulings Lippincott; Important Factors in Civilization, Annie Lodge; Four English Women Novelists: Jane Austen, Charlotte Brontë, George Eliot, and Mrs. Humphrey Ward, Helen Supplee Moore; The English Pastoral, Marshall Pancoast; The Nibelungenlied, Annie Bogardus Parrish; The Social Settlement as a Factor in the Labor Problem, Mary Elizabeth Seaman; The Comparative Development of the Encephalon in Vertebrates Relative to Intelligence, Benjamin Abraham Thomas; The Progress of a Generation, Emily Rushmore Underhill; Proposed Street Railway between the Baltimore Pike and Strath Haven Inn, at Swarthmore, Pa., Jacob Serrill Verlenden; The Treatment of the Indians by the United States Government, Elizabeth Eames Willits.

MEDIA FRIENDS' SCHOOL.—The fourteenth year of school work at Friends' Select School ended on the 15th ult., and the large class-room in the building at Washington and Gayley streets was filled with pupils and their parents and friends. At 3.20 p. m., the exercises began by the reading by Principal Emma Fell Paxson of a selection from Scripture from the seventh chapter of Matthew. Then followed an interesting program, the pupils being the participants, the whole closing with an address by Dr. Joseph S. Walton, Principal of Boys' Department of Friends' Central School, which was an interesting and valuable talk suited to the occasion.

For next year, beginning Ninth month 11th, the same teachers have been re-appointed, viz., Emma Fell Paxson as Principal, Esther E. Spicer as Assistant, and Annabel Hill as Drawing Teacher.

BOYS OUT OF SCHOOL.—The idleness of boys when they leave school—an idleness which often is not wilful, but compulsory—idle, because unable to find anything to do—we regard as one of the most fruitful sources of vice, and one of the greatest evils of society. If parents would do their duty faithfully, and would train up their children right, there would be few idlers and rowdies.—Archbishop Purcell.

ACCORDING to statistics which have just been published, 643 prosecutions for lese majeste, of which 457 resulted in condemnations, were conducted in the German courts in the year 1897. Of the parties found guilty 52 were sentenced to imprisonment for terms varying from one year upward, and 259 for periods of less than a year, but exceeding three months. The offence of lese majeste is extremely elastic, and the zeal with which local officials devote themselves to the task of laying informations and urging on prosecutions is often ridiculous.—[London Times.]

Literature.

"SHOTS AT RANDOM" is a book of verses by Howell S. England, of Wilmington, Del., a member of the other branch of Friends. The pieces are varied, from poems on the present war to nature-studies and personal epistles. Some of them have a local coloring, as the story of "Simon Cranston," who married a shrew against the bidding of the inner voice and of one of the ministers.

"So they were wed in the good old way,
In Wilmington Meeting-House large and plain,
Though Hannah Shipley arose to say,
Ere meeting broke, in prophetic vein :
"God is not mocked, be not deceived,
For whatsoever a man doth sow,
That shall he reap ; though by pride upheaved,
The hand of the Lord shall bring him low." "

There are many verses in the lighter vein, products of the author's youthful muse during college days, some of them bringing in the names of classmates freely. "At Haverford Meeting" is the disappointing title of one of these ; the piece proves to be the record of a devotion other than spiritual.

In his graver verses the author speaks best, and displays gentle feeling and an appreciation of the good and beautiful. "The Widow's Guest" is a typical poem. It describes the death of a saintly and lonely widow.

"Her eyes were closed in peaceful sleep,
A smile illumed the loving face ;
Her hands were still, and silence deep
And holy sanctified the place.
"There was no stir of mortal breath,
A calm divine, succeeding strife ;
Her guest had come,—men call him Death,
She hailed in him Eternal Life."

The book is illustrated with drawings by the Wilmington artist, Robert Shaw. They are in his usual charming manner, though the printer has not done them full justice in the press-work.

It is to be regretted that the author has lowered the tone of his book by the insertion of an expression of petty malice towards one of America's foremost illustrators. (New York : Ogilvie Publishing Co.)

The Atlantic Monthly contains articles of the usual high standard upon literature and sociology. Horace Howard Furness, the distinguished Shakespearean scholar, contributes a study of "Much Ado About Nothing," in advance of its appearance in his forthcoming edition of the play. Dr. Furness touches no Shakespearean subject that he does not illuminate and adorn, and the present paper is no exception to the rule.

Jacob A. Riis continues his "Tenement House" studies with a paper on "Curing the Blight," showing how by persistent endeavor the most recalcitrant landlords have been "druv into decency," and detailing the changes for the better, and the improved conditions that have resulted from sustained and intelligent effort.

Charles Johnston discusses "The True American Spirit in Literature," analyzing and comparing the work of Mark Twain, Bret Harte, Cable, Miss Wilkins, and others, and comes to the conclusion that the atmosphere and mystery of old-world history and traditions have no place with us, and that the effect of our surroundings upon our literature is to give it power and intense light, but meagre coloring, and a total lack of atmosphere. Agnes Repplier adds a lifelike picture of Revolutionary times, taken from the contemporary diary of a Philadelphia Quaker lady.

The current Harper's Magazine contains a story "The Wrath of the Zuyder Zee," by Thomas A. Janvier. Through the mysterious crypts of Aztec treasure-houses, through the tangled sea-weed of a Sargasso sea, among the quaint villages and homes of old Provence, or rambling about in old New York, this author, wherever he goes, finds many good stories to tell. He confines himself to no particular section, to no single type. He is as much at home among the quaint fishermen of Holland as in the intricate tangle of streets in old Greenwich village, at one time the aristocratic quarter of New York.

In Thomas Wentworth Higginson's delightfully reminiscent volume, "Old Cambridge," one finds new light thrown upon Holmes and Lowell. Of Holmes as a lecturer the author writes : "He met this obstacle in lecturing, as sometimes in literature, that he made very abrupt transitions from humor to pathos, so that his hearers did not always follow him ; and sometimes when the joke was over and he had suddenly passed into deep emotion, they would not recognize the key and would laugh harder than ever."

"In comparing Holmes and Lowell," he says, "we are at once struck by the smaller number of personal antagonisms inspired by the former ; and also by a singular intellectual divergence between them. As to fertility of mind, abundance of resources, variety of knowledge, there was scarcely any difference ; the head of water was the same, and why was it that in the case of Holmes the stream flowed so much more smoothly ?" This was because, though so highly trained for literary expression, Lowell "was always liable to be entangled by his own wealth of thought ; his prose and verse alike are full of involved periods, conundrums within conundrums."

Scribner's Magazine has as a frontispiece a fine wood engraving by Gustav Kruell. It is from a very rare daguerreotype of Daniel Webster, and accompanies Senator Hoar's paper on Webster, for which he has been collecting material for many years. There are a number of unpublished manuscripts and some new material revealing how Webster prepared his great speeches. Parallel passages are given, showing remarkable divergence between the spoken and written orations.

The announcement that the illustrious Hungarian novelist, Mr. Maurus Jokai, has received a special stall for the display of his literary wares at the Paris exposition, says Literature, reminds one of the glorious days of the Revival of Learning when the book fair was no less respectable an institution than the cattle fair, and celebrated scholars made pilgrimages to Frankfort and other centres of the printing industry to look for new chronicles, new editions of the classics, and new volumes of theological and philosophical disputation.

COMMUNICATIONS.

A COMMENT.

OUR friend Jacob Troth, writing from Commonwealth, Ga., says : "I have never been more interested in the INTELLIGENCER than now, separated as I am from Friends ; and I have never felt a deeper interest in the Society and its members, in view of the great responsibility that rests upon you in common with us, owing to the fact that Society (at large) needs the efforts of every righteous person and organization to save it from threatened evil."

Quoting from a late editorial : "We must take our places as best we may in the ranks of those who are striving for better conditions for the entire human race. Shall we not counsel together as to the best methods for us, in working towards this end ? Let us seek quietly and prayerfully for that guidance that alone can make us wise, so that any counsel we may have to give will lead at least to safety."

He further says : "It has been my desire and earnest prayer that you should do just those things, both individually and collectively as a Religious Body. I realize that your dependence is upon Infinite power, Infinite wisdom, and Infinite love, as these are personified in our Heavenly Father, with the knowledge that you have access to him for qualifications for engaging in his service. This seems to me to point to Friends as important factors in the work that all conscientious children of God realize needs to be done."

"I believe that never since the organization of your Society has it had so promising a field of labor open as now. Millions of people in the world are hungering and thirsting for just the knowledge Friends possess, of the immanence and intense love of the Living God, and the processes by which they may come to a knowledge of his real presence and his earnest desire to instruct us in the right way and thereby bless us. I know in my own experience, as well as through a knowledge of current history, that the spirit of Christ is abroad in the world producing great changes in the minds of thoughtful persons. I have witnessed many evidences of it here of a most remarkable and interesting character, verifying the remark of Lucretia Mott to me on one occasion: 'Jacob, to all sincere searchers after Truth all the doors are open.'

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

OUR friends John J. Cornell and wife will leave Baltimore on the 28th for Chicago, to spend some weeks, or until the time for Indiana Yearly Meeting. To attend this meeting and some of its constituent branches, and to appoint some meetings within its limits, they have been granted a minute by Baltimore Monthly Meeting of Friends, endorsed by Baltimore Quarterly Meeting.

The Monthly Meeting at Catawissa, Pa., on the 20th instant, was attended by Watson Tomlinson, of Byberry, who gave refreshing encouragement to those present. Members from Millville Meeting, and a number from other denominations, were present.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

JUNE.

CHILD of the sun, the ripened Summer comes;
The vivid green of Spring has disappeared.
Tall grasses and the fields of ripening grain
Are waving in the wind; soft airs arise,
Bending the thistle-top; a thousand flowers
Of varied beauty bow their tiny heads
Upon the slender stalk, while yon fair lake,
When winds are still, lies like a silver streak;
Anon when tossed by angry winds, it seems
A mimic, storm-swept ocean. Maples ranged Along the coast as sentinels seem to stand
To guard against encroachment of the waves.
The hills beyond, wrapped in a misty blue,
A magic glamor lend unto the scene.
Screened by the topmost bough of stately elm
The oriole warbles softly all the day;
In door-yard trees the cheery robins chirp,
Or carry twigs, or twitter warning note
To tell their nestlings wee of danger near.
The wilding rose beside the woodland way
In native rural beauty sweeter seems
Than her rich cousin on the grassy lawn.
Thus crowned with beauty and with gentle song
The Summer and her harvest-days will glide
Into the pensive Autumn mists, and leave
The fadeless memory of her loveliness.

West Vienna, N. Y.

E. AVERILL.

THE MESSAGE OF PEACE.

BID the din of battle cease!
Folded be the wings of fire!
Let your courage conquer peace,—
Every gentle heart's desire.

Let the crimson flood retreat!
Blended in the arc of love
Let the flags of nations meet;
Bind the raven, loose the dove.

At the altar that we raise
King and kaiser may bow down;
Warrior-knights above their bays
Wear the sacred olive crown.

Blinding passion is subdued;
Men discern their common birth,
God hath made of kindred blood
All the peoples of the earth.

High and holy are the gifts
He has lavished on the race,—

Hope that quickens, prayer that lifts,
Honor's meed and beauty's grace.

As in Heaven's bright face we look
Let our kindling souls expand;
Let us pledge, on Nature's book,
Heart to heart and hand to hand.

For the glory that we saw
In the battle-flag unfurled,
Let us read Christ's better law:
Fellowship for all the world!

—Julia Ward Howe, in S. S. Times.

ARE FRIENDS TOO SELF-CENTERED?

(Concluded from page 507.)

that which will maintain and create a spiritual vigor; not such a support as delights in "peculiarities," or finds its chief gratification in the preservation of established customs, but that which is devoted in its adherence to underlying principles. If the religious organization is maintained simply because its members find enjoyment in running the machine, it is but a mere plaything. But the machine is a necessity; it needs to have proper care, to be charged with zeal and devotion, to be lubricated with kindly consideration and with love. Moreover, customs may be not bad because they are old, they may not be meaningless because they are customs. But they must stand upon their own merits. There is no merit in idly maintaining a "peculiarity," but there is merit in standing out boldly and persistently for a principle or a testimony of truth, even though it make us peculiar. There is merit in being willing and ready at all times to give evidence before the world of our affiliation with that Society which stands for those principles in which we have confidence, and the world will have greatest respect for him who does so. Let us not allow ourselves then to fall into the mistaken notion that a care for the religious organization, faithfulness to its best interests, an anxiety for its strength, a willingness to make sacrifices in its behalf, are evidences of narrowness or of a sectarian spirit. Let us not be deluded by the notion that any of these things are virtues save only when the meeting organization is viewed as a power for promoting the truth, a religious home for the development of spiritual energy, a broad channel through which help and comfort, encouragement and strength may be carried to the world, a centre from which radiates in all directions the gospel of love. Such a meeting is in no danger of being self-centered. Let Friends query each with himself—Is it such a meeting I am faithfully striving to do my share to upbuild? And truly, if we would be in the world such an influence and such a power as we ought, we must have a care as to the cleanliness of our own hearthstone. Preaching, unsupported by example, is of little effect. Friends can gain but little for the cause of moderation and temperance if they drop easily into excesses of their own; the sincerity of their plea for integrity will be measured by their own acts; their entreaties for peace will be freighted with persuasive unction only as they know of peace at home, and love and unity must truly abound in that fountain from which issues with grace a proclamation of the gospel of love to those abroad. In the now familiar words of John William Graham: "It is not very convincing to the world for us to talk much of the Christ within and not to look at all like Christ without." Let the inquiry amongst us then be deep and solemn and heart-searching.

Are we sufficiently mindful of the stranger within our gates? Are we sufficiently ready to extend not simply the hand of greeting which may be chilling in its formality, but an evidence of sympathetic and cordial interest which warms the heart? It is easy to be radiant and cordial and loving among those whose companionship we enjoy and with whom we are in active sympathy. Do we allow ourselves, at the close of meeting and on like occasions, to bask in this social sunshine while the timid and the lonely and the strange stand around on the chilly edges of neglect?

Are we ever ready to assume the responsibility which devolves upon adherents of a faith that employs no one to assume responsibility for us? Do we realize that every Friend is in some capacity a minister and a pastor in the flock? Are we willing to make the sacrifices of personal ease and comfort, the sacrifices of business, if needs be, and of social opportunity oftentimes, in order to fulfill the requirements of this responsibility?

Beholding all around in the world to-day the intense race for wealth and for distinction, with its attendant temptations and frequent evil tendencies, threatening perhaps more even than the lower vices the destruction of moral standards, do we feel it a responsibility upon us to bear as faithfully as was ever done in the past, a testimony in behalf of simplicity and of moderation, not by precept nor declamation, but by the examples of our lives?

Do we banish the last shadow of the pharisaical prayer of old? Do we scrupulously avoid that tendency to exclusiveness, which cannot be born of unselfishness,—which would sometimes seem to be disposed to keep the good that we may have within barred doors, lest some of it might escape to a hungry crowd without? Is our personal influence lent in breaking down the severe barriers of caste? Do we ever gather our cloaks about us lest we might brush against those who truly need our help?

In a word, are we truly willing to realize in our hearts what we declare with our lips,—the actual brotherhood of man? Are we anxious to minister to his needs, tenderly and unostentatiously? Are we willing to be faithful bearers of the simple message of truth? Are we willing to declare—not to those who know, but to those who need to know—the Divine character of the Inspeaking word which may be a light unto every man? There has been a recoil in the world from the severities of a harsh theology; there is a seeking to-day not so much after authority as after that which bears for itself the impress of truth. Is it truly our desire to be aroused to the responsibilities which the needs of the time impose upon us? In the closing moments of the Richmond Conference, Henry W. Wilbur said: "The world never needed us so badly as it does to-day. There never came up from the heart, worn and weary from the world's din, so loud a Macedonian cry for help, that there might be lifted from hearts, burdens; from consciences, sorrow; from intellectual doubts, despondency, and trouble." Let us once more query with ourselves, then—Is it the prayer of our hearts that we may be so imbued with the spirit of Him who said, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," that we shall be so filled and inspired with the power of love that as individuals, or as a body, we shall be saved from selfish motive? We shall then be in no danger of self-centered thought or action.

Philanthropic committees and Bible study and conferences cannot of themselves bring a vitalizing force; but it is under the influence of this spiritual vigor that through these and other agencies which must be employed as occasion demands, we shall be enabled in our day and time to render a service in establishing among men the kingdom of the Master.

A BIRD CLASS FOR CHILDREN.

THE editor of Bird Lore, Mabel O. Wright, has been so successful in forming classes among children for the study of birds that it is hoped her experience as embodied in a recent editorial will be of value to mothers and teachers who have the same end in view. She writes as follows:

One of the most frequent questions asked by those seeking to win children to an appreciation of birds is, "How, when we have awakened the interest, can we keep it alive?"

The only way to accomplish this, to my thinking, is to take the children out of doors and to introduce them to the "bird in the bush," to the bird as a citizen of a social world as real in all its duties and requirements as our own.

There is a group of people with ultra theoretical tendencies, who insist upon considering the bird merely as a feathered vertebrate that must not be in any way humanized, or taken from its perch in the evolutionary scheme, to be brought to the plane of our daily lives. In teaching children I believe in striving to humanize the bird as far as is consistent with absolute truth, that the child may, through its own love of home, parents, and its various desires, be able to appreciate the corresponding traits in the bird. How can this best be done? By reading to children? That is one way, and good, accurate, and interesting bird books are, happily, plentiful. But when the out-door season comes little heads grow tired of books, and anything that seems like a lesson is repugnant.

Then comes the chance to form a bird class, or a bird party, if the word class seems too formidable. A dozen children are quite enough to be easily handled. The ages may range from six to twelve. Arrange to have them meet outdoors once a week, in the morning, during June and July. A pleasant garden or a vine-clad piazza will do for a beginning. It is inadvisable to tire children by taking them far afield until they have learned to identify a few very common birds in their natural surroundings.

Children who are familiar with even the very best pictures of birds must at first be puzzled by seeing the real bird at a distance, and perhaps partly screened by foliage. The value of the outdoor bird class is that to be successful it must teach rapid and accurate personal observation.

"Very true," you say, "but the birds will not stay still while the children are learning to observe." Yes; yet this difficulty may be met in two ways. If you are so situated that you can borrow say twenty-five mounted birds from a museum or the collection of a friend, you will have a very practical outfit.

Choose four or five birds, not more, for one day, take them outdoors, and place them in positions that shall resemble their natural haunts as much as possible. For example, place the song sparrow in a little bush, the bluebird on a post, and the chippy on a path. Let the children look at them near by, and then at a distance, so that a sense of proportion and color value will be developed unconsciously. After this, the written description of the habits of the birds, which you must read or tell the children, will have a different meaning. This method may be varied by looking up live specimens of the birds thus closely observed.

"True," you say again, "but I cannot beg or borrow any mounted birds." Then take the alternative. Buy from the Massachusetts Audubon Society, Boston, for a dollar, one of its Audubon Bird Charts. This chart is printed in bright colors, and is accompanied by a little pamphlet describing the twenty-six common birds that are figured. Copy the birds carefully from the chart, back them with cardboard, and either mount them on little wooden blocks, like paper dolls, or arrange them with wires, so that they can be fastened to twigs or bushes. You will be surprised to find how this scheme will interest the children, who may be allowed sometimes to place the birds themselves.

For those too old for the cut-out pictures, the teachers' edition of "Bird Life," with the colored plates in portfolios, will be found invaluable. The separate pictures may be taken outdoors and placed in turn on an easel behind a leaf-covered frame, with excellent effects—a few natural touches and the transition from indoors out often changing one's entire point of view.

One thing bearing on the question of bird study. If children ask you questions that you cannot answer, as they surely will, do not hesitate to say, "I don't know." Never fill their minds with fables disguised as science, that they must unlearn.

Now a material point. When you have entertained your class for an hour, never more, lend the affair a picnic ending and give them a trifling lunch before they go; something very simple will do—cookies and milk, or even crackers! The young animal of the human species, as well as many others, is a complexity of stomach and brain, and it is well to administer food to each in just proportion.

ATTEMPTS are being made in the county of Kent, England, to exterminate the sparrow. Sparrow clubs have been formed, and money prizes are given to those producing the largest number of heads.

AN order has been issued by the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company forbidding the crews of passenger trains from chewing tobacco while on duty. A similar prohibition would be appreciated if applied to those who ride on trolley cars. —[Chester News.]

The Friendly Man.

The Commonwealth.

WE all feel the charm of his presence. He carries a pleasing face and speaks in winsome tones. His hand is never cold and limp nor hangs nervelessly at his side. He is interested in you and in all you do; never forgets your family from old grandmother to youngest babe. If you are across the street from him he gives you a salute, and in the evening he drops in to see you in a casual way. When good fortune comes to you he writes a note of congratulation, and if trial befalls you a token of sympathy is left at your door. A bunch of flowers follows the doctor's first visit to your house. After you lose your position he is "all eyes and ears" to discover something to your advantage, and his forethought never waits your asking a favor. He shares your burdens and multiplies your joys, and so goes through the world scattering sunshine and the healing leaves from the tree of life. How he is loved and what friends he makes, even in this cold and reserved world! When thinking of the beauty of his life, and of how much he is admired, we often wonder why more of us do not aim to become like him. It is a great pity that kindness and good nature are not more contagious than they are in the world. But we are often content to admire and praise the excellent in others without trying to imitate and emulate. Talk of flowers' wasting their sweetness on the desert air! There is more wasted example in the world of mankind than flower-sweetness in unfrequented plains. Many are at a loss to know how they can serve Christ; opportunities are few and transient, think they, but if they considered how well they could serve the "friend who sticketh closer than a brother," by simply acting a friend's part in life, out of love to the Supreme Friend, they would find a ministry neither limited nor unfruitful. The world and church need men—friendly men. We may never be rich nor renowned; never cross the threshold of the Senate nor walk a rostrum, but a great possibility is within the reach of all—we may be friends of our fellows.

A Short Nap Daily.

Ladies' Home Journal.

DURING the day every one should take a few minutes' sleep, preferably directly after the noon meal. The time given to it may seem too precious for one in business, but it will be more than compensated for by the mental and bodily condition that follows. Sit in an easy chair. Lying down directly after a meal crowds the digestive organs and makes one's sleep restless instead of restful. Rest the head comfortably. Tip the chair to a pleasant angle for the body, not enough to have the weight of the body on the back. Place the feet on a chair as high or a trifle higher than the one upon which you are sitting; cross the limbs at the ankle joints, close the hands together by interlacing the fingers, place the fleshy part of the thumbs together in order to avoid grasping the hands too tightly, and close the eyes. Having thus closed the circuit, it will be necessary to relieve yourself of all nervous and muscular tension; think only of your slow, measured breathing and the desire for a restful sleep.

Old-Time Words.

London News.

OLD words survive to a remarkable degree in north Derbyshire and the country districts of Lancashire. Perhaps the most interesting is "Yah," which the rustics of the Peak frequently use for "Yes," and which they employed exclusively thirty years ago, when many of them had never seen a railway. Sounded exactly like the German "Jah," it is evidently a descendant of the Anglo-Saxon "Gea," and must, therefore, be more than a thousand years old. In Lancashire the commonest antiquity in speech is "Gradeley," the meaning whereof is "really, genuinely, thoroughly." Both counties are happy in the use of "Nesh" (Anglo-Saxon: "Nesc"), an admirable word, which ought to be reinstated in polite speech, for modern English contains no exact equivalent. It means unduly sensitive to cold, and is correctly represented by the French "Frileux."

Sherman on the Philippines.

THE wise statesman, John Sherman, recently expressed his views on the Philippine war to an interviewer from the Boston Globe. Said he :

"I see not the slightest sense in our long excursion of 12,000 miles to the Philippine islands. There we have no acquaintance or affinities or anything which gives promise of a happy solution of a most foolish undertaking. Old as I am, I would be willing to take a stand against our expeditions and sacrifices in those far-away islands, which do not promise anything material or moral to reimburse us. They are nearly half-way around the world from us. The climate is deadly. The natives show that they do not want us by the courage with which they fight us. They are making a strong fight.

"We cannot too soon retrieve a profound mistake. Those Philippine Islands never were considered when we resolved to drive the Spanish out of Cuba. When we attacked their fleet out there and destroyed it, we should have come away.

"I remained in the cabinet till the May following my appointment, or about fourteen months. The Spanish fleet was destroyed in Cuba and that really concluded the war. The military operations afterward were of small magnitude compared to the number of Spanish soldiery left there. That victory, however, altered the plans of the president, or made him a convert to what he had previously opposed, namely, any extended sovereignty over the Spanish possessions.

"The Philippine natives had about taken those islands from Spain when we went there, and we appeared to the natives in the light of a faithful ally. Now we are fighting the natives as if we were the Spanish. The Chinese trade we can have by arrangement with the Russians and the English. We are, in fact, right upon the Pacific ocean, and our natural base of trade with China is from California and Washington State.

"The wealth we are taking out of our own country now to fling after those Philippine islands is fabulous. We have taken away the miners and the agriculturists to subdue the Philippine natives. Depend upon it, the other nations do not envy us, but think us foolish! Above all, we are not a monarchical people, but a republican people. We should stand by our own lines and continue the example of our country, instead of becoming another England or Germany, using up our young men and our treasure to get a foothold in unhealthy and unproductive lands."

Who Speak the English Language?

Chicago News.

LESS than a century ago the English language was spoken by hardly more than 20,000,000 people, while to-day it is the one commonly used by more than 200,000,000. Nor has there ever been a time when the spread of our native tongue was more rapid or when it had become more necessary to the commercial transactions of the world than at present.

It is not long since that the French was the court language of the world, and it may still, possibly, hold the first place in that respect, but there is not now a court in Europe at which an American Minister cannot transact all the business that devolves upon him, in his own vernacular. It is significant that the American proposals at the Peace Conference do not necessarily require translation, except for delegates from other than European countries, and it is equally expressive that the English language is the one mostly, if not entirely, used at the Venezuelan Arbitration Court now in session at Paris.

Innovations of this character are not made except at the demand of stern necessity. The extension of British and American trade and commerce has carried abroad not alone products of Anglo-Saxon looms and factories, but the language of the people who made the goods. Not only trade, but the speech, invariably follows the flag. English will eventually replace the Spanish in Cuba, Porto Rico, and in the Philippines. Among the better classes in South America our language is supplanting the Spanish and Portuguese, as it is doing with the native idioms in India and on the eastern coast of Asia. English is destined to become the language of the civilized world.

A Historic Tree.

Reading Eagle.

FEW of the hundreds who daily pass the Friends' meeting-house, on Sixth beyond Washington, are aware of the fact that inside the yard is a historic tree. It is a straight and promising elm, and stands on the south side of the gate. It is a great-grandson of the famous elm under which William Penn signed his treaty with the Indians.

The original tree stood at Fairfax Mansion, Philadelphia, and was known as the "Treaty Elm." It was blown down during a storm, March 3, 1810. Its age was 283 years, and its circumference was 24 feet.

The tree in the yard of the Friends' meeting-house was planted by Horace and Rachel D. Griscom, April 3, 1882. It was during the Bi-Centennial year, and it was a happy coincidence that a tree directly descended from the elm made famous by the Penn Treaty should be placed on ground given by the Penns for a place of religious worship and burial for the Friends of Reading.

It was secured by Rachel D. Griscom, who has been a prominent Friend of this city all her life, and it was her idea that a tree identified with the Penns should be added to those which have always been a feature of interest about the Friends' meeting-house. It was the branch of a tree raised on the grounds of the Pennsylvania Hospital, and was presented by William G. Martin, at the request of Joseph Turnpenny, one of the managers of the hospital. It has grown steadily, until now it is one of the finest about the meeting-house.

When seen at her home, Rachel D. Griscom said :

"The tree is one of the things the Friends are proud of. It was some time before it could be secured, but we are glad it has grown to be such a fine specimen, and hope that it will meet with no misfortune. Reading has many fine trees, but the Penn Treaty tree is one that the people of our city will remember and point to with pride for many years to come."

She further stated that the trees along the sidewalk, in front of the meeting-house, were due to the generosity of a stranger, who happened to pass when the present meeting-house was in course of erection. He noticed the men at work, and inquired for what purpose the building was intended, and on being told it was to be a Friends' meeting-house, he promptly responded that he would like to contribute something toward it. He was told that the Friends seldom accepted help, but he insisted upon making a contribution of $25, which was devoted to buying the trees lining the sidewalk, and the large Norway maple on the lawn.

The Friends' meeting-house is one of the landmarks of the city, reminding all that while numerically its followers are not as numerous as they once were, they were identified with the earliest settlement of the city. The use of the building has been freely granted to almost every denomination at some time as a temporary place of worship when other churches were undergoing alterations.

Water Your Horses Often.

Philadelphia Ledger.

DR. J. H. HERSTER, the well known veterinarian, says : In this hot weather too much stress cannot be laid on the importance of watering horses often and always before feeding. Nothing is so refreshing to a tired horse as a drink of pure water, not excepting his feed. By far the largest proportion of the animal body is composed of water, and the system cannot be kept in a normal condition unless it is supplied very liberally with this fluid. This need of a liberal supply of pure water is no less great in disease than in health. Too often when a horse is a little "off his feed" his water supply is restricted, adding to his misery. In any and every disease a horse will do better if allowed all the water he wants than if his supply is restricted. Do not mistake this statement. It does not mean that a horse should be allowed to drink a large quantity of water at any one time. He should be offered a small quantity every twenty or thirty minutes until he has had all he wants. Then, if a pail of fresh water is kept constantly before him he will never take enough at one time to hurt.

CURRENT EVENTS.

HULL HOUSE, Chicago, is to have a rival in a model school, which Mrs. Emmons Blaine proposes to establish during the coming year. While the two institutions will have the common purpose in view of elevating mankind, they will be different in that the model school will endeavor to occupy the same relation towards the children of the crowded district that Hull House has taken towards their parents.

One hundred thousand dollars will be devoted to the founding of this school as a sort of adjunct to the college for teachers, which the founder's philanthropy has assured for Chicago in the near future. Manual training and domestic science will be taught the children, in addition to the ordinary studies. It will be a strictly non-sectarian school, and the teachers will be the best afforded by the college faculty.

A NEW French cabinet has at last been secured. Senator Waldeck-Rousseau has accepted the post of premier. The complete organization is as follows: Senator Waldeck-Rousseau, President of the Council of Ministers and Minister of the Interior; M. Delcasse, Minister of Foreign Affairs; General the Marquis de Gallifet, Minister of War; M. de Lanessan, Minister of Marine; M. Monis, Minister of Justice; M. Caillaux, Minister of Finance; M. Millerant, Minister of Commerce; M. Leygues, Minister of Public Instruction; M. Decrais, Minister of the Colonies; M. Jean Dupuy, Minister of Agriculture; M. Pierre Baudin, Minister of Public Works.

THE Secretary of the Treasury has made regulations to govern the admission of Chinese laborers who are to be brought from China to establish and maintain a Chinese village at the Commercial Exposition to be held at Philadelphia next autumn. The Exposition managers applied for the admission of 450 Chinese laborers, artisans, actors, etc., to which number the Treasury Department objected as being more than was necessary, particularly as many such Chinese persons could be obtained in the United States from among those already domiciled here. It was finally agreed, however, that the full number asked for should be allowed.

A CONSOLIDATION of the American Spirits Manufacturing Company, consisting of eighty-five separate concerns; the Kentucky Distilleries and Warehouse Company, consisting of fifty-six concerns; the Standard Distilling and Distributing Company, which embraces fifteen concerns; the Spirits Distributing Company, and a number of the more important rye whiskey companies into one colossal central company, with a capitalization of $125,000,000, has been effected, under the title of the Distilling Company of America.

IN the course of recent reciprocity negotiations an arrangement was made between the United States and Portugal for a mutual reduction of duties on certain articles. It is understood to be similar to the reciprocity arrangement made with France about a year ago under Section 3, of the Dingley Reciprocity law.

A DESPATCH from The Hague says that the German delegates have privately informed their colleagues that they had received instructions to accept the principle of a permanent tribunal of arbitration as outlined in the Anglo-American plans. This and the speech of Colonel Gross von Schwarzhoff, plainly intimating that Germany had made up her mind against the Russian idea of disarmament, and had reached the conclusion that the time had arrived to tell the world so, are the two great events of the whole conference.

THE Chicago stock yards' strike, which at one time threatened to tie up the entire packing house district, has practically been settled by the packers granting the increase of 25 cents a day in wages demanded by the strikers.

L. M. CROGAN, member of the Texas Legislature, is authority for the statement that an English syndicate, with a capital of $100,000,000, has started to purchase all of the cattle in Texas, with a view of cornering the cattle market in this country.

IN the course of a speech at Birmingham, England, on the 26th ultimo, Joseph Chamberlain said that, owing to the enormous military preparations of the Government of the South African Republic, Great Britain has been compelled to increase the British garrison in Cape Colony and Natal, entailing additional expenditure of $2,500,000 annually.

AN explosion occurred in the chemical house of the Eddystone Print Works, near Chester, Pa., on the 22d ult., blowing the building to pieces and destroying a laboratory valued at $25,000.

MRS. BARROWS, one of the New York kidnappers, in spite of her plea of guilty and attempt to throw herself on the mercy of the court, has been sentenced to a term of twelve years and a half in Auburn Prison.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

A LAW was recently passed in Norway prohibiting the sale of tobacco to any boy under sixteen years of age without a signed order from an adult relative or employer. Even tourists who offer cigarettes to boys render themselves liable to prosecution. The police are instructed to confiscate the pipes, cigars, and cigarettes of lads who smoke in the public streets. A fine for the offence is also imposed, which may be anywhere between fifty cents and twenty-five dollars.

—Balliol, the most exclusive of Oxford colleges, has among its undergraduates a married Lancashire mill hand, 23 years of age, who worked his way into the university by studying after factory hours with the help of free libraries and university extension lectures. He passed his Greek examination eighteen months after learning the alphabet, and within six weeks after admission to college won the Brackenburgh history scholarship, worth $400 a year for four years. He is trying for an honor degree in history.

—California and Australia, says an exchange, may yet find in South Africa a rival as a supplier of fruit to the English markets. Already the finely flavored Cape grapes, both the small black and the large green, have been received with favor, and with improved methods of picking and packing would be formidable competitors to other foreign grapes. Figs, loquats, and other fruits from the same source are also being imported in increasing quantities.

—It has been definitely decided that the young Duke of Albany, grandson of Queen Victoria, is to succeed to the throne of the Grand Duchy of Saxe Coburg and Gotha on the abdication of the Duke of Edinburg and the renunciation of the Duke of Connaught.

—The largest soda ash factory in the United States is to be erected at Barberton, Ohio, by capitalists identified with the Pittsburgh Plate Glass Company. The corporation will be chartered under the laws of Pennsylvania, with a capital stock of $3,000,000, and the plant will employ 500 men.

—D. L. Moody, the evangelist, has issued an appeal for 100,000 selected books to be sent to help missionary work in India. He says there are five millions of English speaking people there who cannot be reached by the ordinary missionary methods.

—From time to time experts have noticed certain unexplainable peculiarities in magnetic instruments in various buildings. Electricians now declare, as the result of experiments and investigations, that the vagaries are due to the presence of magnetism in bricks. They are made of earthy matter containing a greater or less proportion of magnetic or magnetic iron ore.

—Thomas Edison keeps his shop supplied with everything an inventor could possibly want, a fact in which he takes considerable pride. The other day he offered a prize of $10 to any of his assistants who would need in their work an article not in the shop. The man who took the prize wanted a clothespin.

—The most picturesque figure at the Yale commencement is the Marquis Nabeshima, of Japan. He is a graduate of Cambridge University, England, and is a member of the highest nobility and of the most aristocratic family in the Mikado's realm.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 8, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 27.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXVII.

*WHAT another century will bring is hid in the future.
A humble walk with God only can save us.*

SARAH HUNT.

From a private letter, written Twelfth month 25, 1875.

THE PRESENT.

WE live not in our moments or our years—
The Present we fling from us like the rind
Of some sweet Future, which we after find
Bitter to taste, or bind that in with fears,
And water it beforehand with our tears—
Vain tears for that which never may arrive :
Meanwhile the joy whereby we ought to live,
Neglected or unheeded, disappears.
Wiser it were to welcome and make ours
Whate'er of good, tho' small, the present brings—
Kind greetings, sunshine, song of birds, and flowers,
With a child's pure delight in little things ;
And of the griefs unborn to rest secure,
Knowing that mercy ever will endure.

—Archbishop Trench.

EPISTLE OF LONDON YEARLY MEETING.

HELD BY ADJOURNMENTS FROM THE 24TH OF THE FIFTH MONTH TO THE 2D OF THE SIXTH
MONTH, INCLUSIVE, 1899.

To the Quarterly and Monthly Meetings of Friends in Great Britain, Ireland, and Elsewhere.

DEAR FRIENDS: This meeting has been well attended by Friends from many parts of Great Britain and Ireland, and by some at home from the mission fields of India, China, and Madagascar. We have also had the helpful company of visitors from the United States and Canada. As we have read the letters from the Yearly Meetings of Dublin and Canada, and from those in the United States, and have listened to the spoken words of brethren from distant parts, we have rejoiced in that Christian fellowship which is not limited by the boundaries of men's earthly location. Many of our sittings have been crowned by the sense of the presence of the Lord, and we have afresh been conscious that his joy is his people's strength. "These things have I spoken," said the Lord Jesus, "that my joy may be in you, and that your joy may be fulfilled."

Amongst the grounds of the Christian's joy are the evidences of the love of God towards man, as displayed in the simplicity of the Gospel, no less than in the amplitude of its provision, and its far-reaching and eminently practical effects on life and character. The long experience of the Christian church has confirmed the truth of the declaration, "It is good that the heart be stablished by grace," and has also illustrated the constant recurrence of a disposition to seek for establishment elsewhere than in the free, undeserved mercy of God in Christ Jesus, brought home immediately to the heart of the forgiven sinner by the Holy Spirit.

The Apostle Paul and his colleagues found themselves confronted by a strong drift of sentiment in the early church towards a return to the ritual and observances of Judaism, against which they strenuously contended. In the Epistles to the Galatians, the Colossians, and the Hebrews, as well as in other of the New Testament writings, the inspired penmen labor to exalt the work and person of the Lord Jesus, as more than fulfilling all that had been foreshadowed in type, ceremony, and prophecy. His Kingdom was not one of external observances, of circumcision or uncircumcision—of eating or drinking :—its distinctive features were "Righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost." Paul's own preaching was a witnessing to the truth that "There is one God, one mediator also between God and men, himself man, Christ Jesus, who gave himself a ransom for all." We affectionately invite those who are conscious of unforgiven sin to come to this one all-sufficient Mediator and Saviour, who "is able to save to the uttermost them that draw near unto God through him."

We would remind those who have laid hold of this "living hope," that growth and progress must accompany its continued possession. The earthly pilgrimage of the Christian is not to be a solitary one ; he has become a member of a body ; a citizen of a heavenly kingdom ; a constituent part of the household of faith. The followers of Christ are, in the words of the Apostle Peter, to be "built up a spiritual house, a holy priesthood, to offer up spiritual sacrifices, acceptable to God through Jesus Christ." It was to the whole company of Christians in Asia Minor, not to any special order, that these words were addressed : it was the whole company of Christians at Rome whom the Apostle besought "by the mercies of God," to render a holy, acceptable, and reasonable service, through the dedication of their bodies, "a living sacrifice," unto God. For the redeemed man the incarnation of Christ has consecrated all life ; to him the distinction between things secular and things religious fades away : whether he eats, or drinks, or whatsoever he does, he recognizes the glory of God to be his constant aim and object. Membership in the royal priesthood is not conditioned by the distinctions of age or sex. Especially, though by no means exclusively, in the ministries of home life, are Christian women called to fulfill their spiritual priesthood, and we desire earnestly to urge them not to be neglectful of this holy calling. And how great is the privilege to themselves and to the church, when, through obedience to the teachings of the Spirit of Truth, children are early introduced into the same honorable vocation. It is not needful for these to look forward to a future period of life in which to come to their first communion with their God and Father; it has been the experience of successive generations amongst us, that the Lord Jesus makes his own blessed presence known to the lambs of his fold, assuring them of his love, and in wondrous condescension asking for theirs in return. Thus the example of the child Samuel is reproduced, with the larger hopes and the more diversified services of the New Covenant.

The development of sacerdotal pretensions in the church was, in the first instance, closely connected with an unfaithful discharge of their priestly duties by the great body of Christians. The truest safeguard against these assumptions and the desolating consequences which commonly result from the prevalence of a ceremonial religion, is to be found in the power of humble, consecrated lives, whether in the cottage or the mansion, the school or the hospital, whether spent in the diligent prosecution of appointed service, or the patient endurance of permitted suffering, so devoted to lowly ministries for others, and so assured of the real presence of the Master, that material media are felt to be hindrances, rather than helps, to the transmission of spiritual grace. We desire, therefore, to hold fast our confession of the Lord Jesus Christ as the one "great High Priest who hath passed through the heavens," and to appeal to our friends of every age and class to be faithful in a practical recognition of the priesthood of all believers.

The rejection of the idea of a priestly caste, interposed between man and his Maker, so far from weakening will serve rather to strengthen our recognition of the true place of the Christian ministry—using the term in its wide significance of every form of service for Christ, prompted by his Spirit. The Head of the church still confers diversified spiritual gifts upon his people, to be used for the varied wants of his household, and the extension of his Kingdom. We appeal to all on whom the Lord's gifts have been conferred—and especially to our young men and young women—to prize these gifts highly, to guard them jealously, to stir them up when sloth, self-pleasing, or worldly cares are in danger of smothering them. The service of Christ is an honorable one, ever to be pursued in a lowly, trustful spirit, whether the laborer's appointment be amongst the heathen in the foreign mission field, amongst the heathen of our own land, or in upholding a practical presentation of spiritual Christian truth in connection with the affairs of our own Society, or in our intercourse with others.

Whilst the Christian ministry is far from being exclusively concerned with vocal service in the times of congregational worship, we have been impressed with the extreme importance of the right holding of these meetings, and have greatly desired an increase of an anointed ministry, "handling aright the word of Truth." A separate communication is addressed to our friends on this subject by the Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight.

In harmony with what we have already expressed in relation to the inclusion of all the business of life within the scope of Christian practice, we have considered the deplorable extent to which secret commissions are offered and taken, in commercial and professional life. We believe that a commission paid to an agent, or to anyone holding a post of trust, to induce such a person to act otherwise than as he might have done in the absence of such a payment, is wrong on the part of the offerer and the receiver. These payments are virtually bribes which inflict injustice upon honest men. We earnestly advise our friends to adhere to a true standard of integrity in all their transactions, and be willing cheerfully to make the sacrifices which this may involve.

In offering this counsel we are not ignorant of the very real difficulties in which those engaged in trade are often placed from the practices referred to. We are aware that these difficulties are acutely felt both by assistants and travelers, by young people beginning business, and by those at the head of large establishments. It has been pointed out that something may be done to remove temptation, by the payment of adequate remuneration to assistants, also that the heads of trading concerns do well to maintain a careful oversight of the accounts and acts of their agents. "Render unto your servants that which is just and equal," was the apostolic teaching to masters. George Fox was accustomed to visit the sessions, and to urge the magistrates to use fairly the powers at that time given them for fixing the wages of laborers; he was also accustomed to impress upon servants the duty of shunning idleness and of serving their employers faithfully. The same principles of justice and fairness still hold good, although their application may not at all times be easy, in the complicated business relationships of our times. "The Lord is able to give thee much more than this," was the prophet's answer to the king who queried what he was to do for the money he would lose through obeying the Divine command, and this is still true for the follower of Christ. He may remain poor through his adherence to duty, but his earthly poverty may be accompanied by wealth in spiritual possessions, especially in that peace which guards the conscience, kept void of offence towards God and man. The love of money and the temptation to covetousness, so emphatically and so repeatedly condemned in the pages of scripture, are at the root of the practices to which attention has been drawn.

Closely connected with the same dispositions of the human heart are those jealousies between nations, which lead to strife and war. It has been gratifying to learn that the efforts to help the Doukhobors to exchange their homes in Russia for a place of residence where they would be exempt from military conscription have been largely successful, and that some thousands of these persecuted people are now settling in Canada. We have been reminded by this illustration, of the terrible weight which the military system entails upon the liberties, the property, and the moral well-being of the peoples of Europe.

We rejoice that the rescript of the Czar of Russia has led to the holding of a Conference at The Hague to devise measures for arresting the growth of armaments. A deputation from this Meeting has presented an address to the delegates, assuring them of our warm desires that success may attend their efforts, and that they may share in the blessing pronounced by our Lord upon the peace-makers. We have also convened a special meeting, in which several of our members have again set forth our faith in the essentially peaceable character of the Kingdom of Christ, and the claims of that Kingdom upon its citizens, to exemplify their citizenship by a cultivation of practical brotherliness.

Our warm Christian sympathies have gone forth towards the large number of persons who attend our Meetings for Worship, as well as towards the still larger number, more or less closely associated with us through the influence of First-day Schools and Mission Meetings. We desire for all of these a growth in everything that is lovely and of good report. We have adopted fresh regulations affecting our Church Meetings, which will, it is hoped, make it more easy for such to find their religious home in association with our Society.

In the retrospect of the business which has occupied us, our hearts are raised in grateful thanksgiving for the Lord's continued goodness to us as a people. We confess that our allegiance to Him has been far less loyal than it ought to have been, and our service has too often been marred by half-heartedness, consequent upon an undue pursuit of the things of earth. Yet, notwithstanding many sorrowful evidences of weakness, the tokens of our Heavenly Father's love are all around us. He is blessing our Foreign Missions, and our First-day School and Home Mission Work. The Boarding Schools of the Society are prospering, and, in spite of much that is discouraging, our labors on behalf of temperance, international peace, and kindred objects, are bearing fruit. A distinctive place in the sisterhood of churches is still in the providence of God given us wherein to uphold a spiritual, a practical, and a catholic ideal of Christian truth.

In bidding our dear friends Farewell in the Lord, we would invite them to cherish a thankful and a hopeful spirit, and to be strong "in the grace which is in Christ Jesus."

Signed, in and on behalf of the Meeting,

JOHN MORLAND, Clerk to the Meeting this year.

CONTINUOUS REVELATION.—It is the duty of every denomination to produce its best for God. It is only by aiming at this that we can save ourselves from being too negative. True progress is secured by teaching positive truths. In nature there is a destructive power constantly at work; but the constructive forces are even more active, and the combined result is a wonderful variety of new life and being and beauty.

It may be there is a similar law in spiritual things; and if so, there is slow but continued revelation of God to man. As individuals and as a body we must live in harmony with this grand law of development and progress which we see everywhere around us.
—Joseph Freeston.

WOMAN IN THE GOSPEL MINISTRY.

FROM the twilight of the past comes the inspired story of Miriam, who by Egyptian waters watched and planned for the preservation of the man-child Moses. In her youth a type of provident, sisterly affection, she became in the flower of her womanhood, not alone a prophetess, but also a prophecy of the true relation of woman to man, when by the side of the great leader and their elder brother, she became with them a leader of Israel from bondage. Later on, we have record of the divinely-appointed Deborah, who for forty years judged Israel in righteousness; and again of Huldah, the prophetess, whom her king deemed worthy to be consulted in the perplexity of national affairs. These are among those whom Bible writ brings to us as women favored of God to voice his will to congregated masses. But not until the fullness of the Gospel dispensation came the message, "The Lord giveth the word and the women who publish the tidings are a great host." To the woman at Jacob's well Jesus first announced his divine mission; and she, proclaiming and asking, "Is not this the Christ?" became his first minister.

The house of Philip gave four daughters to the Christian ministry, and Paul mentions as his beloved co-laborers Priscilla, Phebe, Persis, Tryphena, and Tryphosa. In the history of primitive Christianity there are records of women who were active in missionary work, by their preaching converting many souls to Christianity. The Empress Helena, we are told, brought Christianity to Rome through the conversion of her son, and other royal mothers, wives, and sisters by similar work brought England, Spain, France, Russia, Hungary, and Poland under Christian rule; eloquent girls preached the Crusades to Christian princes. But during that long night of darkness and confusion—the Middle Ages—the voice of woman pleading for Christ's reign, if it went forth at all, is mostly lost to history.

Slowly from this spiritual night for the masses, the seed of gospel truth ascended. To George Fox and his coadjutors in the organization of the Society of Friends, more than two hundred years ago, woman, and through her the world, owes an incalculable debt. The Friends recognized that "Christ had enlightened all men and women with his divine and saving light," that "in Christ there is neither male nor female." If alike related to the divine nature, alike endowed with spiritual gifts, alike in all things the child of God and working for and with him, "one in Christ," there was but one just cause, Fox perceived,—that woman alike with man should be at liberty to follow the promptings of the Divine Light in her own soul. The gift of gospel ministry to woman thus accepted has been a blessed power to the church and to the world. Truly, "the Lord hath given the word, and the women who published the tidings are a great host." Elizabeth Fry, with her marvelous work in revolutionizing prison life as she found it in London, and mitigating its horrors, stands revered wherever her name and works are known. By nature reserved and timid, she was faithful to the divine monitions which unsealed her lips in religious service. Step by step she was led, until, unexpectedly to herself as to others, she carried "hope and light to the vilest and most degraded of mankind," and the world's conception of penal punishment was transformed. Lucretia Mott, with the manifold capabilities which placed her at the front as home-conserver, philanthropist, and gospel minister, beloved, and unique, is a monument to the world of the safety to the home and the church in extending the liberty of Christ to women. Elizabeth Comstock, held in precious memory by many in the State of Kansas, truly gave her life in loving service, that the gospel might reach the most desolate of God's little ones. Her labors in this State among the freedmen, in the exodus of 1878, which nearly cost her her life, should go down in our State annals.

In most of the notable gatherings of women which have marked the past fifty years, there has come an infusion of Quaker blood, and with it a spirit of soul-liberty, as leaven to the spiritually quickened, who shrank from reproach and hesitated to transcend established usages of society and of the church.

Steadily in the fabric of conservative thought a change has been wrought. In 1837 the Congregational clergymen of Massachusetts issued a protest and solemn warning against women speaking in public, known in history as the Pastoral Letter. Whittier's keen verses, having the same title, made of this a two-edged sword. Men great in heart and broad in apprehension conceived of an educational institution which should welcome its students regardless of race or sex. Upon this basis, new to the world's thought, Oberlin College opened her doors in 1833, and from them a dawn of hope sent its glow afar. But as late as 1847 the college faculty were not ready to permit the girl graduates to read their graduation essays from the platform with their young men classmates. Antoinette Brown, beloved by her teachers, who had successfully completed her theological studies in that year, passed from her alma mater unordained. But the hour had come; the age was ripe. The finger upon the dial pointed to the moment when enlargement could no longer be withheld, and at its semi-centennial celebration, in 1883, Oberlin College made such reparation as might come to one who has toiled in the ministry until after the meridian of life, by conferring her well-earned ordination honors upon Antoinette Brown Blackwell.

At a cost of such contumely that it became almost as true a martyrdom as that of rack or of flame, brave women with the aid and sympathy of brave men, had blazed the way. Some one has pithily said, "In this age we gibbet men in sermons and burn them in print." One thus martyred, after the darkest days were past, said, "My sisters, bleeding feet have worn smooth the paths where you now stand secure." From the gibbet of words, the flames of print, has come a consecrated womanhood which, publishing glad tidings, is a great host. From Susannah Wesley, denominated the true founder of the Methodist Church, to Frances E. Willard, we cannot adequately estimate the word that has burned for acceptable expression. What has been directly lost to the church must have been measurably conserved to humanity through other channels. Frances Willard's keen grief over the fact that the church, which she held as her chief joy, excludes her from its ministry, spared her for a ministry inestimably more far-reaching. The quickened world became her audience.

It is an open secret quite generally accepted, that woman's self-giving covers the major part of the strength of the church. She pours a steady current of material and spiritual force into missionary service at home and abroad. Our own desolate and erring, as well as the benighted of distant lands, have touched her heart. With baptized soul and trained judgment she reaches to protect and to save, counting it joy to spend and be spent that the light and joy of life may reach those who dwell in darkness. She is found everywhere, sustaining measures and methods for righteousness, steadily, patiently, persistently knocking at the doors that custom still closes to her; steadily, patiently, persistently planting her feet upon new vantage grounds, as the old yields to the new order of things, accepting opportunity as it has opened, for speaking to conditions she longs to reach.

It is related of Lucretia Mott that on a return passage from Europe she wished to call a meeting of the Irish passengers in the steerage. Objections were raised, whereupon she called these passengers together to explain to them what sort of a meeting she wanted, and even told them what it was she wanted to say to them in case a meeting was arranged. "Well, I don't see but that we have had the preachment from the woman priest," remarked one of her hearers as the meeting broke up. Other lips than hers have resorted to strategy that the message burning in the heart might speed on its way. To press on in service without fear of man, is duty's call to each assured in her own consciousness that she is commissioned to "preach the word" and enjoined to be "instant in season, out of season." Clothing faithfulness to the "heavenly vision" with an atmosphere of Christ-like humility carries the tried soul over the breakers which wreck when zeal without knowledge holds the rudder. . . .

"What, when a Paul has run his course,
Or an Apollos dies,—
Is Israel left without resource
And are there no supplies?"

If Miriam was one to lead her nation from bondage toward promise, shall not her sisters to-day lead from the bondage of sin toward that promise which lies beyond those waters which ever flow over stones of memorial? If Deborah was endowed to judge with righteous judgment, are the arms of the Lord shortened that he will not save to-day through Deborah whose works are owned of him? Shall not the women who to-day receive living spiritual water proclaim and say, "Is not this the Christ?" as in Samaria? Shall not the Priscillas and Phebes of to-day be beloved co-laborers of their brothers who are spiritual giants? If in Judea constituted to be "last at the cross and earliest at the grave," is woman to-day not constituted to be last to forsake when the Christ nature in man is crucified, and earliest to watch for the loosening of the bonds and the arising of Christ in the soul?

It has been truly written, "Women are believers in the Light as well as men, and so children of the Light and of the Day." If any are doubters in the largeness of liberty to which these truths lead, let them remember the record of every march of progress,—

"Where the van guard camps to-day,
The rear shall camp to-morrow."

MERCY GRIFFITH HAMMOND.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS.

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 29.—SEVENTH MONTH 16.

JEPHTHA.

GOLDEN TEXT.—But I say unto you, Swear not at all.—
Matthew, v., 34.

Scripture Reading.—Judges, x., 6–18; xi., 30–40.

The story of Jephtha is introduced by the usual formula. The Israelites again offended Jehovah and were given into the hands of the Ammonites and others whose gods they served. Again their punishment forced them to turn to their God, and again a hero was sent to deliver them. In the character of the deliverer we may observe great deterioration as compared with Gideon and with Deborah. Jephtha is a native of the lands east of Jordan, often grouped under the name of Gilead—a country especially open to attack from the east and south. There lay the lands of the Ammonites, and there was no mountain barrier between. Jephtha was an outlaw from his tribe, and was the leader of a band of robbers, a man of tried valor and skill in war. His name was widely known in his own tribe.

The Ammonites made war on the pretext of a claim to Gilead as their ancient heritage. When this danger became imminent messengers were sent to Jephtha to urge him to accept the leadership of the army of Gilead. Full reinstatement in his tribe and public honors were promised him and won his consent. Newly-installed, the leader sent messengers to the king of the Ammonites to argue the question of Israel's title to Gilead. The argument is taken almost entirely from Numbers, Chapter 21, and curiously enough, though addressed to the king of Ammon it deals altogether with Israel's relations with the Moabites and Amorites. Chemosh (Judges, xi., 24) is the national God of Moab, while Milcom was the God of the Ammonites. The king Balak, referred to as accepting Israel's conquest of Gilead (Judges, xi., 25) is a Moabite king, and the cities mentioned are Moabite cities, while Sihor was king of the Amorites. Such a presentation is plainly out of place in dealing with the Ammonites, a distinct, though related nation. It is probable that the whole passage (Judges, xi., 12–29) is an interpolation. If it is omitted the story is clearer and more consecutive. The words (Judges, xi., 11) "And Jephtha uttered all his words before Jehovah at Mizpah," form an appropriate introduction to the vow (Judges, xi., 30), but have no particular point in introducing the story of the messenger. Jephtha's vow shows us that the influence of foreign rites among the Hebrews had reached even to human sacrifice. Professor Moore, of Andover Theological Seminary, says (Polychrome Bible), "That Jephtha vows to sacrifice a human victim of his own household is as plain as words can make it." The Authorized Version of the Bible hides this fact in translating "whatsoever" for "whosoever." After the victory the Israelites return in triumph, and are met by the only daughter of their chief. We cannot but feel the shock of the meeting, and our hearts go out to the rugged warrior, when he cries, rending his garments, "Oh, my daughter! thou hast stricken me! thou, thou art my ruin!" the situation is only relieved by the stern honesty of the chieftain, and the noble pride with which the daughter accepts what she regards as the inevitable. If Israel's victory demands her life as its price, behold she will pay it. In the days when men felt it necessary to explain and excuse all acts of Bible characters on the basis of New Testament morality, efforts were made to show that Jephtha compromised his vow by consecrating his daughter to celibacy. For this there is no basis whatever; "he did to her as he had vowed."—Judges, xi., 39.

A quarrel with the Ephraimites followed, reminding us of a similar dispute at the fords of Jordan when Gideon was pursuing the Midianites. But Jephtha had no soft answer to turn away wrath. The Ephraimites were defeated in battle and scattered. The men of Gilead seized the fords of Jordan and tested all comers with the word "Shibboleth." Some peculiarity of accent betrayed the men of Ephraim, and a great number of them was slaughtered. A similar test was applied when the terrible massacres occurred, known as the Sicilian Vespers (1282 A. D.). All the foreigners in Sicily, especially the French, were to be slaughtered, the test being an Italian phrase (cecì e cicerì). All who pronounced it in the French style were doomed.

The story of Jephtha's vow and its fulfillment remind us irresistibly of the old Greek tale of Iphigenia. Indeed, there have been some who have thought that we have here a Hebrew reproduction of that legend. Undoubtedly there is much of legend about the tale of Jephtha; but his wandering life as a free-footer, reminding us of the similar period in the life of David, the call to the leadership of his tribe, his victory over the Ammonites, his quarrel with the neighboring tribe,—even his terrible vow and its fulfillment,—are in accord with the times. So, while legend may have supplied some of the details, the story itself as a whole may be accepted as a truthful picture of the times. It will be noted that Jephtha was "judge" over his own tribe only; by no means was he accepted as an authority west of Jordan. The statement, therefore, that Jephtha "judged Israel six years" needs great modification.

MAKE your atmosphere so tingle with faith, hope, courage, and cheer that every one that comes to you will have his confidence in you strengthened, will be cheered and stimulated and convinced that you are the sort to be trusted with business enterprises.—
Dorothy Quigley.

FRIENDS AWAY FROM HOME.

Epistle from London Yearly Meeting, 1853.

OF the various means of allowable recreation and mental improvement placed within our reach, few call for the exercise of greater circumspection than traveling, especially in foreign countries. In excursions, or in tarrying at watering places, whether at home or abroad, the time may be wasted, and the mind insensibly drawn into habits and associations more or less undesirable or pernicious.

It especially behooves the disciple of Christ to be careful, when thus separated from his home associations, to maintain a course of conduct in all things consistent with his profession. He is not warranted in lowering the Christian standard by doing amongst strangers that which he would hesitate to do amongst his friends. Nor can he consistently countenance by his presence or his conformity, either the superstitions or the follies which may prevail around him. And we would encourage Friends whilst thus absent from home, and deprived of opportunities of meeting with their brethren on the First-day of the week for the purpose of waiting upon the Lord, not to shrink from acting upon their own religious principles; but at stated times, whether alone or with their companions, to present themselves in reverence of soul before him. Let them never forget that his all-seeing eye is upon them, and that, in whatever circumstances they may be, the worship that is "in spirit and in truth" is his due.

GROWING TOWARDS GOD.—Godliness is a matter of education as well as of inspiration. Just as a child has powers of observation and calculation, which are developed by his work in school, so he has powers which find their proper object in the realities of the spiritual life. And as any of our powers or organs can be "atrophied through disuse," so can this organ which reaches towards the divine. If we never chose to see, we should soon lose the power to see. And if the refusal became contagious, we might have a world in which a great many people not only did not see, but even doubted if there were any who did. But their dogmatism on that point would prove only their own defect. As no power or faculty is trained without effort and toil, so this which deals with the unseen. It must be used many times in a painful, unsatisfactory way, before its use becomes spontaneous and delightful. It must grow into fullness of power; it does not leap into it.—Sunday School Times.

THE meek, the disinterested, the unselfish, those who think little of themselves and much of others,—who think of the public good, and not of their own,—who rejoice in good done, not by themselves, but by others, by those whom they dislike as well as by those whom they love,—these shall gain far more than they lose: they shall "inherit the earth" and its fullness.—Dean Stanley.

THE narrow mind, loud voiced o'er petty things,
Knows not the silent souls a-near;
Dreams not of depths or heights beyond its own
Or burdens borne in patient stillness.—L. Houghton.

CHRISTIAN IDEALS IN BUSINESS AFFAIRS.

Christian Advocate (Methodist) New York.

CHRISTIANITY is not a creed, but a life. It is in Christ that "we live, and move, and have our being." As a partaker, therefore, of the Christ life and spirit, the Christian counts it all joy and a great privilege, as well as a duty, to endeavor to walk in the footsteps of his divine Lord. His example of holy and exalted living cannot be duplicated in any merely human life, but for all that the injunction of the Christ, "Follow me," loses none of its overwhelming force as an exhortation to individual discipleship. Jesus left behind him a code of ethics of the highest type. So infinitely superior was it to the old Mosaic code that many of his hearers—Pharisees, Sadducees, and others were dumbfounded at his utterances, for they saw in the acceptance of the new teaching the inevitable overthrow of their own cherished theories of practical life. The Pharisee thought he, of all men, was righteous, because he prayed a stated number of times a day, gave alms, and performed all the duties devolving upon him by the operation of his code; but his eyes were opened to the sublime scope and importance of the new code of ethics as proclaimed by Christ, when he heard Jesus say to his followers, "Except your righteousness shall exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees, ye shall in no case enter into the kingdom of heaven." This higher righteousness was to be the condition and badge of Christian discipleship; and it is to-day the sign and seal of the true Christian.

The most potent manifestation of Christianity is found in the practical and successful application of its principles to the affairs of everyday life. There is potency in proclaiming the principles of the Christ by the tongue, by pictures, by song, by the printed pages; but all these and all other ways of presenting the truths of Christianity are of secondary value when compared to the vitalizing influence exerted by the application of Christian principles to daily affairs. The thing of overshadowing importance, therefore, is to live the life.

But it is by no means an easy thing always to live the life amid the fierce temptations and contentions of business. It requires a man of heroic mold to stand unmoved, like Gibraltar, in the storms, controversies, and competitions of trade. Not every Christian man does thus stand. Some fight against the adverse environment for awhile and then succumb, while others yield themselves without a struggle to its seductive influence; and still others who, under the guise of the saying, "Business is business," so conduct themselves in their commercial and financial relations as to lose their self-respect, are a reproach to the Church and a disgrace to their families. Such men deserve to be classified with those who, for a few pieces of silver, betray their Lord before the whole world.

The wise man said, "Seest thou a man diligent in his business? he shall stand before kings; he shall not stand before mean men." It is good enough for a proverb, but it may be applied in various ways. Sometimes the honestly diligent man succeeds in his business, and does stand before kings. This has happened frequently, and the list of noble-hearted Christian men who have achieved success in their business by only the most honorable methods, is a large and splendid one. But the dishonorably diligent man may also stand before kings, and before men who are not obscure. There is such a glamor about success, whether brought about honorably or otherwise, that many persons are dazzled by it, and frequently the lines that mark the true and the false are difficult to be distinguished. Many of the great movements in the business world to-day have been directed from their inception by so-called Christian men who have not scrupled to employ methods that would wring from their Lord the epithet he so often hurled at certain persons when he was among men, Woe unto you, hypocrites ! for ye devour widows' houses, and for a pretense make long prayer ; . . . for ye make clean the outside of the cup and of the platter, but within they are full of extortion and excess. While it may not be true that some of the great fortunes that are flaunted so ostentatiously by certain men are the product of dishonorable business methods, yet in many cases there is present a large element of doubt whether all the means used to accumulate such immense wealth were such as would meet the full approval of Christ. Goldsmith may have been uncertain in his intellectual vision when he said :

" Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey, Where wealth accumulates and men decay ; "— but his lines lead to the suggestion that many Christian men in their frantic scramble for wealth, seem to ignore and grind into the mire the great, vital, and fundamental principles of ethics laid down by Christ, when he said, "All things whatsoever ye would that men should do to you, do ye even so to them ;" while they seem to forget his word of command and promise, "Seek ye first the kingdom of God, and his righteousness, and all these things shall be added unto you."

A GOOD CONSCIENCE.

THE costliest thing in the world is a good conscience. To buy it, you may be obliged to sell everything you have. In seeking it, you may need every hour of your days. You do not possess a talent it may not require of you or a pleasure it may not ask you to give up. What is dearest to you may be the last farthing—nay, the very first farthing—needed for the purchase. Truly, a good conscience is the most expensive of luxuries.

And yet there is nothing in all this world so cheap as a good conscience. No one is too poor to buy one. The price of one is never more than a man has. And after it is bought, though a man has given for it the wealth of a Rothschild, in comparison with the joy of it he has scarcely spent a penny. Though he has lavished a lifetime to gain it, he knows that he has but begun to live. Without it all possessions are profitless and disappointing ; with it the joy of the greatest delight is doubled. Without it, a palace is a hovel : with it a hovel is a palace.

Your reason assents to this and your experience proves it. Why, then, do you permit yourself to live in forgetfulness of it? With a heedless word you wreck a day's chance of this vast good. With the deed of an hour you drive it away for many a month. If your gaining of a million dollars depended on your thoughtfulness, your unselfishness, your fidelity, your holiness, would these for a moment be lacking? How, then, can you pretend to believe a good conscience better than a million dollars? Until you have spent upon your desire to stand well with your God one tithe of the time and pains you spend in seeking your employer's good graces, how dare you think yourself in earnest in seeking the kingdom of heaven?

If what is here said is true, then, until you have accepted it with the loyal allegiance of our entire life, it is for you the greatest truth in the world.—Endeavor World.

TROUBLES REFINE OUR GROSSNESS.

WITH more than a father's affection, with more than a mother's love, God sends pain to men. Suffering comes under Divine commission. Sorrows do not riot through life. Men are not atoms buffeted hither and thither. Troubles are appointed to refine away our grossness ; to transmute selfishness into self-sacrifice ; to destroy vice, to transfigure all our life. Refused, troubles bruise without softening ; crush without maturing. Accepted and rightly used they change their nature and become joys. Tears are seeds ; planted, they blossom into joy and gladness. In his celebrated painting Delaroche has assembled a court of universal genius. Around an imaginary art tribunal stand the sages, orators, philosophers, reformers, and martyrs who have achieved eminence.

Strange, passing strange, that those who stand in the forefront, preëminent for their ability, are alike preëminent for their sufferings ! Denied his ambition and the promised land, Moses leads the immortal band. Blind, Homer feels his way. Then comes Paul, flogged and stoned out of all semblance of a man. Exiled, Danté, too, is there, whose Inferno in life best interprets his Inferno of death. There, too, is Milton, broken-hearted and blind. Now comes one who leads all that goodly company. His name is "above every name." And whence his supremacy? This is his secret. "His visage was so marred more than any man, and his form more than the sons of men."—Ladies' Home Journal.

WE ought to think and say what is right. We ought to do what is right. Our inner spirit God understands, as our fellow-man cannot. Our fellow-man is likely to estimate our inner spirit by our outer actions ; therefore we ought to do what is right as well as think and say what is right, for our fellow-man's sake, as also for God's sake. God wants us to love our fellow-man, as also to love God. Love for God is shown in right doing towards our fellow-man, as evidence of a right spirit towards God.—Sunday School Times.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 8, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

THE LONG SUMMER VACATIONS.

THE nineteenth century hastens to its close, and while it is well for us to be mindful of the many good things which have been accomplished for mankind in the past hundred years, it is also needful that we consider the harmful tendencies of this age, and send out our influence against them.

Prosperity has visited our land, and the inevitable results of over-indulgence and of immoderate love of pleasure have followed in its train; we say the inevitable results, for the pages of history show that national prosperity and national degeneracy have been wont to go hand in hand, and yet we hope and believe that future pages of history will record a world-wide prosperity, wherein vice shall have no part, because it will be a prosperity founded upon righteousness.

This nineteenth century love of pleasure has manifested itself in a multitude of ways; to one of these, the prolonged idle summer vacations of our children, we would call the attention of fathers and mothers. Little by little the vacation term has been lengthened until it has come to extend over a quarter of the entire year. Now if it be necessary for the teachers that the regular schools be closed for this length of time, then there should be provided some systematic employment for our children for a part of each day during the summer. It is too long a time for them to spend in idleness, in pleasure-seeking, in play only. If all work and no play makes Jack a dull boy, then all play and no work makes him an idle and selfish boy; and of the two results the latter is the more deplorable. While it is as natural for a child to play as to breathe, and while play is the right and necessary means by which he should develop a strong and vigorous body, it is play in moderation that is helpful and delightful; an undue amount of time for play becomes burdensome to the child himself, an anxiety to the mother, and exerts a baneful influence upon the plastic character.

A child even as young as ten, if given entire liberty for three whole months, very soon begins to feel that the days are long and tedious, and seeks his mother with the well-known words, "What can I do? I don't know what to do." Then, if the child be turned off to find employment as best he may, if the little active brain be left still to its own devices, need we be surprised to find much mischief invented, many things done for fun which should have been left undone? With each passing year of the child's life the question becomes more serious; for each time the quarter of a year is spent without system, without useful occupation, there grow strong and stronger habits of idleness, lack of application, disregard of the value of time, undue importance attached to personal pleasure. These are habits antagonistic to success in any line of work which may be followed later.

Fathers and mothers, think about these things! Place some duties for your children for each day; give them a little share in the work of the home; have them pursue a course of helpful reading; look to it that ways are provided whereby useful employment may be given to our young people during their vacation. The good results following upon such a course would be greater than we can estimate. There would be an increase of happiness, a keener enjoyment of the leisure hours, and a new sense of responsibility and usefulness. And benefits more excellent than these would be stored up in the soul-life of the child; in that secret place of the Most High there would be laid a sure foundation of character in earnestness of purpose, in an ability to distinguish between the true and the false, in the perception that to give is more blessed than to receive, to serve is better than to be ministered unto.

THE London Friend recently made this declaration: "The Church in its corporate capacity, under the spirit of God, must take control of its meetings for worship." Whereupon the British Friend comes out with the comment that this view "gives away the whole basis of Quakerism as we have known it."

IN the account of Haverford College Commencement in our issue of the 24th ultimo, the list of graduates of Friends' Central School was, by a printer's error, put immediately after the list of Haverford graduates, instead of in its proper place in the next article.

BIRTHS.

DAVIS.—At Grampion, Clearfield county, Pa., Eleventh month 27, 1898, to James F. and Jennie Davis, members of West Branch Monthly Meeting, a son, who is named Dorsey James.

PHILIPS.—At "Rockford," Wilmington, Del., Seventh month 1, 1899, to John C. and Florence Hall Philips, a daughter, who is named Caroline.

MARRIAGES.

KINKEAD—SCANTLEBURY.—At the residence of the bride's parents in Brooklyn, N. Y., under care of New York Monthly Meeting, Sixth month 13, 1899, William Lloyd Kinkead, son of Maxwell and Katharine J. Kinkead, of Altoona, Pa., and Amy Thorn Scantlebury, daughter of Edward and Mary Anna Scantlebury.

THOMAS—GERTLER.—Near Parkesburg, Pa., under the care of New Garden Monthly Meeting, Sixth month 21, 1899, Henry W. Thomas and Etta L. Gertler.

TROTH—HOLME.—At the residence of the bride's father, Sixth month 30, 1899, Joseph Elmer Troth; son of Alfred and the late Susan H. Troth, of Philadelphia, and Mary Woolman Holme, daughter of John Gibbon and the late Helena Woolman Holme, of Salem, N. J.

DEATHS.

BALDWIN.—Near Downingtown, Pa., Sixth month 13, 1899, of spinal meningitis, Emma Alice, daughter of John and Anna L. Baldwin, aged 5 months and 8 days.

GASKILL.—In Philadelphia, Sixth month 29, 1899, Martha Middleton, widow of Aaron W. Gaskill, in her 94th year; an elder of the Monthly Meeting of Friends held at Green Street.

KNIGHT.—At Byberry, Philadelphia, Sixth month 20, 1899, Oliver P. Knight, in his 56th year; a member of Byberry Monthly Meeting of Friends.

In the death of Oliver P. Knight his family have sustained the loss of a devoted husband and father, and Byberry Meeting of an earnest, faithful worker. During the latter years of his life he was particularly active in the care of Byberry Friends' Burying Ground, which through his untiring efforts is now in most excellent condition, and for many years to come will stand as a monument of his faithful performance of duty.

In reflecting upon the lives of those who have passed on to the Higher Life, we are prone to ask ourselves what lesson their life has taught us, and what act of theirs has helped us to look higher to the source from which that assistance came. The life of Oliver P. Knight teaches us two great lessons, the strict adherence to duty as it is made manifest, and assistance given to those in sorrow and affliction.

To comparatively few did he ever show one part of his nature, and that was the extreme tenderness of his heart, evidenced by his hand extended to those he loved.

"God calls our loved ones, but we lose not wholly

What he hath given;

They live on earth, in thought and deed, as truly

As in his Heaven." R. C.

LEVIS.—Suddenly Seventh month 1, 1899, at Moorestown, N. J., Margaret B. Levis, of West Philadelphia, Pa., in her 71st year. Interment at Darby.

OWEN.—At Mickleton, N. J., Sixth month 25, 1899, Hope, widow of Benjamin Owen, in her 80th year; a member of Woodbury Monthly Meeting.

The life of this dear Friend was a striking illustration of the Scripture saying, that there is no adornment of womanhood at all to be compared with the ornament of a meek and quiet spirit.

Disposed to shrink from public notice, as one who distrusted her own ability, she had occasionally for those around her in her home meeting a word of encouragement or of exhortation,—rising to her feet with some simple text and leaving it with her hearers to reflect upon it.

Patient, serene, and trustful, she passed peacefully away at a ripe old age, leaving to us an example of "faithfulness in little things" which may be profitably imitated. R.

THE DOUKHOBOR FUND.

THE INTELLIGENCER has received the following letter of acknowledgment for the money recently sent to the Relief Committee at Manitoba:

YORKTON, June 18, 1899.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

Respected Friends: I write on behalf of the Doukhobors, who have received $288 you so kindly sent them, and they wish me to express to you their deep gratitude for your kind thought and brotherly love of them. I remain

Yours sincerely, ANNA DE CAROUSO.

The balance of the fund on hand, amounting to $100, has been forwarded through the same committee at Manitoba, with instructions to apply it in whatever direction would give the greatest aid to the Doukhobors

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

IV.—A CONTINENTAL EXCURSION.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

THINKING that I should enjoy most an unhurried visit to Great Britain, and that merely passing from place to place would fatigue me without being of much interest, my plan for the summer included no more of Continental sight-seeing than a brief visit to Paris. The decision, however, to go to The Hague enlarged my plan somewhat, and I have made an excursion, covering precisely ten days. I left London on the evening of the 7th instant, and returned on the evening of the 17. My little trip included four days at The Hague, a few hours at Amsterdam, a night's stay at Cologne, the Rhine trip from Cologne to Mayence, a stay at Mayence over night, the trip from that city to Paris by way of Metz, three nights and part of three days in Paris, and the return trip by Amiens to Boulogne, across the Channel to Folkestone, and up to London.

The profound observations made, and sweeping conclusions drawn by travelers who pass through a country once have long been a subject for ridicule, and yet even in a little excursion like this one cannot but observe much, and is sure to get impressions and form opinions,—if one did not, indeed, why travel at all?

Of The Hague, I think I have spoken in a previous letter. The delegates to the Peace Conference, and others drawn there by it, fill up the hotels, of course, but otherwise do not much affect the life of the city. I liked the place very much. There is enough animation, without bustle or confusion, and noise and dust, both of which I detest, and which no sort of reasoning, I think, need include in our toleration, are altogether absent. The canals are charming features. The lake, the Vijver (fish-pond), in the center of the city, with its little island and beautiful rows of trees surrounding, is pretty. The Binnerhof stands on one side; on the other there is a street of fine residences, in one of which is the American legation. But all this and much more you can get from any good guide-book; Baedeker will give you a thousand interesting details, which there is not room for here.

At Amsterdam I saw the royal palace, a large, practically unused building, in the centre of the town, without any surrounding grounds. The Queen comes here one week in the year, and perhaps it is not surprising that she stays away fifty-one weeks. Yet it has some imposing rooms, and some fine decorations and pictures. The great reception hall is 120 feet long, 60 wide, 100 high, and if you will get an exact idea of these dimensions you will see that this is a great room. I went also to the Rijks (ryks), museum, which is a comparatively new building, quite large, its contents well arranged. In my limited time, I could, of course, only see the great paintings; there are several by Rembrandt, and others by the most eminent of the Dutch painters in the ranks below his. I could not pause to see much of the city, but passed through some of its quaint, old streets, and lingered a few moments by the canals.

The ride from Amsterdam to Cologne was fairly pleasant. At Emmerich, the German customs examination was made. At Duisburg I changed trains. We reached Cologne at 6 p. m., and after dinner I had little more than daylight enough for a view outside, and a look inside of the great Cathedral. It is, of course, truly great in dimensions, proportions, and architectural effect. Of its actual relation to human needs, other than as a curious object, a stupendous show, something much less favorable might be said,—as, indeed, of all those enormous constructions, which serve little real purpose of present use, and which in art lead, or strive to lead, along ways which the progress of mankind has left behind. Cathedrals must be studied as historical monuments in order to be rightly estimated.

The ride up the Rhine I enjoyed fully. At Bonn two friends (and Friends) William P. Sharpless and wife, of West Chester, Pa., came aboard, and their company enhanced the day's pleasure. We parted next morning at Mayence, they on their way east to Heidelberg and Baden Baden. I do not think the natural beauty of the Rhine greater than that of the Hudson, nor indeed so great, but the interest to the traveler of its old towns, its old (and new) castles, its ruins, its vineyards on the hillsides, its river craft, etc., etc., makes it, for a time at least, quite equal, and perhaps superior, to our American river. The whole day's trip,—we left Cologne at 8.45 a. m., and reached Mayence at 9 p. m., stopping only at Bonn, Coblenz, and Bingen,—was to me a succession of pleasurable and interesting sight-seeing, and even the parts below Bonn and above Bingen, where the river is wider and with lower banks, were in many places very charming. In the evening, as the twilight gathered and the shadows deepened, the "effects," as the painters say, were exquisite. But I need not tell this to many readers of the INTELLIGENCER, who have seen it all for themselves.

Only a drive through the streets of Mayence, and a hurried look at its cathedral, (the "Dom,") and its street markets, (there were fine cherries), could be had; I arrived late in the evening, as I have said, and left a few minutes past 9, next morning. It is a fine city, and I think justice is hardly done by travelers to its attractions. From there, eastward across the Lorraine country to Metz, you go through quite a rough and picturesque country, crossing the ridges, and passing quite a number of short tunnels. The country's face is a great contrast indeed to that in Holland. At Metz we changed trains, waited an hour, and had luncheon; the railway station is outside the great fortifications which the Germans have placed here since 1870, and I did not see the city itself. The ride thence to Paris is rather tedious; at least it so seemed to me as the afternoon slowly passed, and the evening wore on to nearly eleven when we entered Paris at the Gare (terminal station) of L'Est. Soon after leaving Metz we reached the French border, and the customs examination was made at Pagny-sur-Moselle. Then, after a short time, we passed from the Moselle valley over into that of the Marne, and followed it down to Paris,—a rich country, probably, but not very attractive, and seemingly without much life or prosperity,—though fatigue on the part of the observer, and the darkness, may have colored this opinion, also; if I had ridden up the valley in a flood of sunshine, it might have seemed beautiful.

I had two full days at Paris, and the early morning of the third day, leaving at 10.30. In that time, of course, I attempted no more than a general view, and this I fairly accomplished. I drove through the streets, rode on the omnibuses, took a very pleasant and satisfactory trip on the little Seine steamers, rode half round the city on the Ceinture railway, and walked a good deal. The two places which most of all seemed important to see, the Louvre and Notre Dame, I gave as good visits as I could afford out of my time. I saw many public buildings and other objects of interest, and feel that the pictures of the city and its outward life are fairly fixed in my mind,—which was all I could hope to accomplish in so brief a visit. From Paris north to Boulogne (and to Calais, also), express trains are run to connect with the Channel steamers, and so make a quick trip between the French and English capitals. The run from Paris to Boulogne, 158 miles, is made in 3½ hours, with one stop of 20 minutes at Amiens. This is rather an interesting ride, the country often picturesque, and once more I saw what I had scarcely seen since leaving Holland—cattle in the fields. In Holland there are herds and herds, literally many thousands, no doubt, enjoying the rich pasture of the deep green meadows; black and white they were, and these of Normandy red and white.

We crossed the Channel safely, though in a thick fog for more than half the passage, our whistle sounding its signals for fully an hour. Then we rode from Folkestone up to London through the fields of Kent and Surrey, in quick time, without a stop. The country was a great contrast to anything I had seen between the Hook of Holland and Boulogne,—it is so completely occupied, so well kept, so park-like, so richly green and luxuriant. Four Frenchmen were in the railway carriage with me, and they were evidently impressed with the charm of the country. As for myself, after my struggles with Dutch, German, and French, I felt as though getting back to friends and a familiar land, and therefore took an increased satisfaction in the English scenery.

Let me make a few observations. In the main, people you meet are polite and kind. Civility is seldom unreturned. But those who have but one language—English, for example—are at a disadvantage in traveling on the Continent. They should know also French and German. It is all very well to say that you can find everywhere some one speaking English. At the hotels, where English and Americans are continually stopping, and at the main railway stations, this is true, but not generally elsewhere; the mass of the people, in each country, including omnibus, car, and carriage drivers, and shop-keepers, and policemen, speak only their vernacular. I had, however, the company at The Hague, of my friend Dr. Trueblood, who speaks French fluently and German well; on the Rhine steamer there were fully a score of Americans; on the railroad from Mayence to Metz I met a New York German-American; between Metz and Paris I rode with a pleasant young Frenchman who is in business in Bombay, India, who spoke English very well; while from Paris to Boulogne there was in the same carriage a young Englishman returning from India, with whom I conversed. In Paris, at the hotel, at dinner, I ventured a question of my neighbor, and found he was an American, formerly lived at Easton, Pa., and regarded Philadelphia as his home, and knew many people whom I did. These incidents and chance meetings enlivened the trip, and made one feel less lonely; but still it is as I have said, that at every turn you find yourself at inconvenience if you cannot speak the language of the country in which you are.

H. M. J.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

FISHING CREEK HALF-YEAR MEETING.

THIS was held at Millville, Pa., on Sixth month 21st. We gathered in attendance at Millville Monthly Meeting. The encouraging, helpful presence of our ministering Friends Watson Tomlinson, and Margaretta Walton, and her companion Lucy Smith Cooper, brought to us a sense that it was good to be there. A Friend appeared in supplication, beginning the public religious labor of the day, which was continued briefly by Watson Tomlinson, and at length by Margaretta Walton, stirring the pure mind by way of remembrance, and no doubt inspiring many in the audience with a spirit of fresh energy to endure the trials of time, and to meet the obligations of life. The business was afterward quietly transacted, and Friends were ready for the next day's service, which to perform, they convened on the following morning in the capacity of a Half-year's Meeting. On coming together we were rejoiced in having with us our friend Joel Borton, a minister from New Jersey. He, with the others who spoke, engaged the thoughtful attention of the meeting upon interesting subjects relating to our situation as mortals, and the means of attaining happiness. Margaretta Walton directed a portion of her discourse to the children, making it plain to them that the check which they always feel in their minds when about to yield to an evil impulse is nothing less than the voice of God in the soul, which if attended to would shield them from harm and keep them in the right path.

The Friends then turned to consider the affairs of the meeting. In connection with the report of attendance of representatives to the yearly meeting, it was suggested that each one who had been there give the meeting some account of the proceedings of the annual gathering. Several responded, giving brief expression to what impressed them on that occasion. Joel Borton spoke in a feeling manner of the startling effect produced by the death of that worthy Friend, Aaron M. Powell. He alluded to the great loss sustained by the Society in his decease. Before we separated Richard Carroll, of Columbia, South Carolina, was granted the privilege of addressing the meeting. His object was to create an interest in his scheme of establishing an institution in his own State for colored orphans. He is a trustee for the Schofield School for colored children at Aiken, S. C.

Sixth month 23, the Youths' Meeting was large and favored. R. Anna Kester first broke the silence, followed by our ministering Friends from a distance, all of whom were enabled to speak with that ability God gives. A parlor meeting in the evening at the house of Harriet W. Eck finished the religious exercises of the week. Margaretta Walton and Joel Borton attended and spoke to those assembled. It was a season of spiritual refreshment, and Friends parted in great unity and tenderness of feeling.

Bear Gap, Pa.

G. T.

WHY DO WE GO TO MEETING?

American Friend.

WE may as well admit that the time has come, or is fast approaching, when most people will not go to places of worship unless the forces which draw them there are stronger than the rival attractions which have grown so numerous in our days. In other words, the mere custom of church-going is passing away, and people go only when they are drawn, so that the great question is, What will draw? Trained choirs, sensational preaching, church entertainments, interesting and instructive lecture courses, are some of the well-known ways of attracting attenders. Such methods, however, at once enter into competition with the opera and theatre, and the church soon degenerates into a "highly respectable show-place," and the young people have their appetites whetted for still more sensational and "professional" entertainments.

There seems to be no permanent way of drawing people to places of worship except the good old-fashioned way of making them centres of spiritual life and power. If men and women can be made to feel that our religious meetings, our divine services, are times when the soul meets God and renews its strength, they will not find it hard to leave other things and come. There are multitudes who have a genuine hunger for God, and for a sense of his presence and love, and while they are not drawn by routine church services, or by sermons made up out of warmed-over ideas, or by milk and water philosophy and theology, they are ready to be drawn anywhere where they can really have their souls fed with the bread of life. The common people heard Jesus gladly because He had a gospel for them. The common people—we are all common people—hear gladly to-day any man whose heart beats in harmony with the Divine purpose, and whose lips bear a genuine message of life and truth. Vitality and spiritual power are infinitely more attractive, even to sinners, than monotonous preliminary services and perfunctory prayers and sermons, however eloquent. Let there be one meeting-place in a city or community where the attenders feel lifted up in spirit by a true sense of God's presence, and from which they go home with souls fed and restored, and it will not be long before it will prove attractive, and draw thither both church-goers and the unsaved. Let us see to it that our Friends' meetings are such places.

AN Amsterdam paper states that the diminution in commercial value of agricultural lands in the Netherlands in the last twenty years amounts to 694,000,000 florins.

THE INDIAN LACE-MAKERS.

AMONG the most remarkable evidences of the industrial skill and perseverance of the Indians is the lace-making done by women. This industry exists among certain tribes of the North-west, and has been established within a few years. The lace is "hand-made," or "pillow" lace, and follows patterns of the most refined design, some of them obtained from Europe.

The promoter of this work is Miss Sybil Carter, an enthusiast in behalf of industrial occupation for the Indians. She has established seven schools to teach the lace-making among them,—three or four in Minnesota, among the Ojibways (or Chippewas), one among the Sioux, at Birch Cooley, in Minnesota; one at the Shoshone Agency, Wyoming; and one at Anadarka, Oklahoma, where there are several fragments of tribes. The lace is of fine quality, and highly artistic; the most intricate and beautiful patterns are readily followed by the Indian women and girls, under proper instruction, and the lace is salable to a degree which makes the schools self-supporting, though this requires Miss Carter's continued attention. The teachers are white women. The work is done mostly at the schools, but as the skill of the workers increases, they can do it in their homes.

"My work," says Miss Carter, "seems to begin where the others leave off. It begins with the people who have been left out,—the Indian mothers. Other people have taken the boy and girl and put them to school, but they have left the old woman on the reservation. They have left her completely out of their thoughts. I had occasion, a good many years ago, to make a visit with Bishop Hare all through Dakota. I was struck with the fact that everywhere Indian women were asking for work. Accordingly I established schools for teaching lace-making, and I believe it is the greatest blessing that ever came into the lives of these people, just as it was the greatest blessing that ever came into my own life, that I had to earn my own living. I have now seven schools. They all look to me for their support. The lace which they manufacture I dispose of for them.

"It is the Indian women for whom we are doing this work. It also appeals to the Indian young women who come home. Did you ever think what it is to an Indian girl to come back and have the old home cleaned up,—how it must seem to an Indian girl to come back to her dirty old wigwam from Carlisle? I have seen them come back in that way. I have seen their faces, and felt sorrow for them. One sweet young woman who had been three years at Carlisle came back. I wish you had seen the little old dirty house of her mother. She could not stay in it. She came and stayed with me in my own house. I discovered she knew very little English, so I recommended that she be taken to the Lincoln Institute.

She learned a little lace work before she went, but I supposed she had forgotten it. When she came home she picked up her lace pillow and went to work at it, and had forgotten nothing. They never forget what they learn. They are worth teaching, I assure you. I have sent this young woman now to Wisconsin, and I am flooded with letters telling how wonderfully she does. She went into the lace room and began a piece of work, and to teach the other women. They liked her very much, they said; she is so gentle and so dignified, it is a pleasure to have her for a teacher. She is of invaluable help. This is what we must do for our Indian sisters. We must give them industries, and let them work for wages."

At the Lake Mohonk Conference (where she spoke as above), Miss Carter showed many samples of the lace. She held up a piece, made by one of the "original twelve" workers whom she herself instructed, and said, "I challenge—I almost said, I defy—any woman not an Indian to make such a piece." The lace was all exquisitely clean. She was asked "if it had not been laundered." "No," she exclaimed, emphatically, "in the seven years the Indian women have been making lace there has never been occasion to launder a single piece."

The two illustrations that accompany this article are from photographs kindly lent us by Miss Carter. One shows samples of the lace, from very plain and simple "edging," sold at 25 cents a yard, up to centre-pieces, and "chalices," sold at $6 to $10 each, and handkerchiefs, $12. Work much more elaborate and costly is made.

INDIAN GIRL MAKING LACE, AT BIRCH COOLEY, MINN.

The Indian girl making the lace is Jeannette Crooks, at the reservation (Sioux) at Birch Cooley, Minnesota. The picture gives a good idea of the manner in which the work is done.

OUR DELEGATION AT THE HAGUE.

Review of Reviews.

THE great purpose of the American delegation at The Hague has been to promote the principle of arbitration. This country above all others has, both by profession and by practice, stood before the world for afterward exactly who it was that prevented the attainment of results. Last year's war had greatly increased the prestige of the United States, and had aroused no little curiosity among the diplomats and publicists of other nations gathered at The Hague as to the part that America was proposing to play henceforth in the affairs of the world at large. The American delegates on their part seem rather naively to have set forth their expectation that the great European authorities on international law assembled for the purpose of devising ways to do away with the evils of war would, of course, not think of breaking up the Conference and going home until they had done something of lasting importance. All this was the plan of arbitration as a substitute for war. A great many of the European delegates went to the Conference at The Hague in a somewhat cynical and skeptical mood, prepared to have a rather agreeable sojourn, but with very little zeal or faith touching the business for which the gathering was assembled. It was a body of men of immense talent, but it seemed at the outset to possess very little inspiration. The less widely noted of the members, as it turned out, were in most cases men who had been selected with singular care by their respective governments on account of their learning, talents, and high character. It seems to have devolved upon the American delegation, as more free from diplomatic complications than any of the others, to supply the Conference to some extent with real and practical aims. It soon became evident that the Americans were at The Hague meaning business, and determined either to help accomplish something of value or else to show the world immensely helped out by the matter-of-fact way in which Sir Julian Pauncefoot, head of the British delegation, declared that he was entirely at one with his American colleagues in his anticipations. Germany, though not so openly espousing American views, was none the less prepared in advance, as a general policy, to support any line of action that the United States and England might agree upon. But for the American delegation, the atmosphere of diplomatic suspicion would scarcely have been dispelled, and the Conference, it is to be feared, might have amounted to very little, indeed. It is not so much that the Americans led the work of the Conference as that the frank and straightforward spirit that they manifested aroused earnestness and gave direction to the purpose of their eminent European colleagues.

SAMPLES OF LACE MADE BY INDIAN WOMEN.

It is calculated that the yearly production of paper in the world is three billion pounds weight, and this emanates from not thousand eight hundred and ninety-one mills.

ADDRESS TO THE CZAR.

Part of the address of the New York State Bar Association to the Czar.

THE New York State Bar Association avails itself of this manner of expressing to Your Imperial Majesty its profound gratification at the action of Your Imperial Majesty in soliciting the attendance of representatives of all nations at a conference for deliberation on subjects of international significance. It was indeed a happy inspiration that prompted so pacific and magnanimous an act. The measure of its influence will not be unfolded for many generations, but posterity will surely point to the Congress at The Hague as the beginning of a new era in the world's history, when Reason ascended the tribunal and nations paid court to her decrees.

The Bar Association of the State of New York is a brotherhood of men whose lives are passed in the adjustment of legal controversies. Some of them sit in judgment on disputed claims, while the greater number appear before the bar of courts of justice in behalf of litigants to secure or defend personal rights. These walks, though they lead through labyrinths of litigation and confusion, are nevertheless paths of peace. The lessons they teach are lessons of patience, constancy, impartiality, and integrity. They conduct invariably to the conclusion that rules of law and equity are always adequate for the complete satisfaction of every rational demand made by one man or by any number of men upon others. Taught in this school, it need hardly be subject for surprise that the members of such a profession look forward eventually to the adjustment of all international differences by the same peaceful methods that are now applied to personal controversies; and, to that end, they hail with enthusiasm every indication that implies a movement toward the fulfillment of the manifest destiny of Christian civilization the substitution of Right for Might in intercourse between nations.

It is proper to add that the Bar Association is not wedded to any specific plan for an International Court. It will as gladly support any other scheme for such a court which has in it the necessary elements of utility and stability. Its one aim and purpose is to secure the universal recognition of the principle of arbitration and the early adoption by all nations of peaceful methods for the settlement of international differences. It would not lessen its watchful care over peacefully disposed communities while there lurks any danger from that element of society which still exists in them that thrives on others' misfortunes and seeks to multiply them by its own overt acts. In other words, it would not disband the police force or unnecessarily cripple it by reduction until it becomes clearly apparent that conditions have so far improved as to make such policy consistent with the best interests of the community. It would educate and assimilate conflicting elements as rapidly as consonant with existing conditions on the broad lines of Christian utility and philanthropy.

The brotherhood of the legal profession of the State of New York extends to Your Imperial Majesty its unmeasured congratulations upon the happy circumstance that has made Your Imperial Majesty the instrument, in the hands of Divine Providence, for the inauguration of so propitious and so grand a movement as is embraced in the conference of the nations on subjects of peaceful import. The Association also ventures earnestly to solicit Your Imperial Majesty's powerful influence and active coöperation at the coming Congress in seeking the early organization of an International Court that may eventually hold jurisdiction over grave matters of international importance and thereby secure the happy consummation of all the worthy aspirations in calling for conference the Christian powers of the world. In holiday attire, with arms stacked, the battalions of the nations already mark time to the music of a new song, yet old as the Christian centuries, that Your Imperial Majesty has renewed in the hearts of the people of all nations: "On earth, peace, good will toward men."

OUR SORROWS.

OUR sorrows beat us to the ground in the first anguish, but as we lift our faces once more heavenward the sky begins to lighten. For "they are all gone into a world of light," and the glory of that fuller life gently and silently steals upon our darkness. Time, and time alone, brings the greater consolations which God distills from the griefs that come upon us. No voice of prophet or teacher can hasten that process, though they may do much to confirm our faith in it. God's ways have to do with the making of character, and character is the fruit not only of struggle but of time. God's ways lie along the courses of truth, and truth cannot be seized with a swift hand; we must grow into it. The boy thinks his period of education interminable; but when it is accomplished, and he looks back upon it, it seems but "a little while." So is it with the discipline of sorrow. It seems to be without limit of days, and yet, from the standpoint of a fulfilled life, it will be but "a little while." However long the winter, there comes a time when the earth is green; however dark the night, there comes an hour when the sky brightens. It is a long time in our hearts; it is a short time in our lives: it is a long time in our darkness; it is "a little while" in God's eternal day.—The Outlook.

THE sheep-shearing experiment that is being tried in Sycamore, Ill., is proving successful. A gasoline engine of four horse-power runs ten clippers, which shear on an average 1,000 sheep a day. One of the advantages of the experiment is that about half a pound more wool is realized from each sheep. The test will be given to 15,000 sheep. The sheep are sheared, the wool tied and packed in large sacks holding several hundred pounds each, and ready for shipment at once. The success met with in this experiment will revolutionize the sheep-shearing business.

THE firm attitude of Great Britain appears to be having the desired effect in the Transvaal complications. The latest cablegrams from South Africa talk of various semi-official missions for negotiations between Cape Town, Bloemfontein, and Pretoria, aiming to arrange a franchise compromise on a basis of five or six years' past residence.

THE Philippine rebels have learned that the American volunteers are returning to the United States, and the Filipino newspapers show that they construe this to mean that the Americans are abandoning the war, and are encouraged thereby.

Educational Department.

CATALOGUES OF FRIENDS' SCHOOLS.

NEW YORK.—The annual catalogue of Friends' Seminary, New York City, shows an attendance, in the academic classes, of 68; in the primary classes, of 67; and in the kindergarten, of 20.

The pamphlet contains attractive pictures of the various school-rooms and of students at work. "From the Pupil's Point of View" is a series of little sketches of class-work and recreations, written by various pupils.

The board of teachers for the coming year, the 39th of the school's existence, is as follows:

Edward B. Rawson, Elizabeth Stover, Principals; Ella G. Heyer, A. B., (Vassar College), Latin and Greek; Arthur C. Smedley, B. S., (Swarthmore College), Science and Mathematics; Elizabeth Stover, M. E. L., (Ontario College, also School of Pedagogy, New York University), Superintendent of Primary Work, English; Edward B. Rawson, B. S., (Mass. Agricultural College, also Johns Hopkins University), History; Mary Helena Zachos, (Wells College, also American Academy of Dramatic Arts), Elocution and Physical Culture; Agnes E. Foster, B. P., (Syracuse University, also Art Students' League, also Artist-Artisan Institute, also Academy of Design), Drawing and Manual Training; Eugene A. Carman, B. L., (Bourges, Academie de Paris), French; Louise Ehlers, (Madcheninstitut, Hamburg, Germany), German; Alice S. Palmer, A. B., (Swarthmore College), Intermediate and Primary Work; Ella B. McDowell, (New York Normal College), Natural Science and Primary Work; Lillian J. McDowell, (Swarthmore College), Primary; Helen P. Lamb, B. L., (Swarthmore College, also Baltimore Kindergarten Association Training School), Kindergarten; Janitor, Charles B. Hoag.

BALTIMORE.—Park Avenue Friends' Elementary and High School, the re-organized form of the two Friends' schools of Baltimore, begins its first term in the autumn. The new building is now being erected on the ground adjoining the Park Avenue Meeting-house. The teachers for the coming year will be as follows:

Principal, John W. Gregg, B. L., (Swarthmore), M. A. (Cornell), History; Associate Principal, Eli M. Lamb, Mathematics; Stephen C. Harry, A. B., (Special student in Mathematics, Bucknell University, two years; A. B., Johns Hopkins University, 1894; Graduate Student, Johns Hopkins University, Mathematics and Astronomy, two years), Higher Mathematics; William S. Pike, B. E., (B. E., West Chester State Normal School, 1895; Special student Harvard, Chemistry, Physics and Mathematics, two years), Science and Gymnastics; Rachel E. Lamb, (Graduate Trenton Normal School and of the National School of Elocution and Oratory, Philadelphia), Literature and Rhetoric; Emma J. Broomell, B. S., (B. S., Swarthmore College, 1890; B. S., University of Michigan 1893), Reading; Frances E. Hartley, Ph. B., (Special Student Swarthmore College; Ph. B. University of Michigan, 1895), Classics; Anna M. Berger, (Special Student, University of Zurich, three years, and at Lausanne, one year), Modern Languages; Louisa P. Blackburn, (Harvard Examination Certificate; formerly Principal Park Avenue Friends' School), Geography and Grammar; Helen H. Ely, M. E., (B. E. West Chester State Normal School, 1889; M. E., 1891; Graduate Philadelphia School for Kindergartners, 1891; seven years in charge of Primary Department of Model School of West Chester State Normal), in charge of Primary Department; Hannah T. Yardley, (Philadelphia Kindergarten Training School, Philadelphia), in charge of Kindergarten Department; Dora Curtiss, (Baltimore Kindergarten Training School, Baltimore), Assistant in Kindergarten; Louise Thomas, Assistant in Kindergarten; Roman Steiner, (Representative of J. Liberty Tadd), Manual Training; Elizabeth Walton, (Peabody Certificate), Music; Dr. O. Edward Janney, Medical Examiner.

KENNETT SQUARE, PA.—The catalogue of the Martin Academy gives a list of 97 students in attendance during the past year. The instructors for 1899-1900 will be:

Instructors, Edgar Stinson, M. Sc., Principal, Mathematics, Natural Science and Astronomy; Grace Lillian Wright, M. A., Latin and English Studies; S. Edna Pownall, B. L., German, French, and History; Sylvia D. Linvill, Primary, and Assistant in Intermediate Department.

WILMINGTON.—The catalogue of Wilmington Friends' School shows a student-roll of 68 in the high school, 77 in the grammar department, 46 in the primary grade, and 20 in the kindergarten. Following is the list of instructors:

Principal, Herschel A. Norris, A. M., (Princeton), Latin; Caroline Ladd Crew, A. B., (Smith), in charge of Girls' High School, English and German; George W. Gordon, A. B., (Princeton), in charge of Boys' High School, French and Greek; Bertha L. Broomell, B. S., (Swarthmore), Mathematics; Frances H. Pogle, (School of Oratory, North Western University), Reading and Elocution; Levi S. Taylor, B. S., (Swarthmore), Gymnasium Director for Boys, Science and Mathematics; Clawson S. Hammitt, Free Hand and Mechanical Drawing; Anna Mary Johnson, in charge of Boys' Grammar School; Mary Jackson Hoopes, in charge of Girls' Grammar School; Laura Augusta Yerkes, B. E. Mary Wilson Pyle, Primary School; Lida Manson Kimball, (Hailmann Training Class), Kindergarten and Training Class; Allen Latshaw, (Drexel Institute), Manual Training; J. Evelyn Egbert, Secretary, Gymnasium Director for Girls.

SCHOFIELD SCHOOL.—The 31st annual report of the Schofield Normal and Industrial School, Aiken, S. C., is an encouraging one. It shows the great good that has been accomplished by the school in its influence upon the lives and character of the colored men and women who have enjoyed its advantages. The property of the institution has grown from a little frame school-house of 1868 to its present two substantial brick buildings, two frame buildings, and farm of 281 acres. Subscriptions for the past year have been received, from New York, $2,342.92; from Pennsylvania, $1,481.18; from Connecticut, $400.00; from New Jersey, $288.00; from Massachusetts, $272.29; and smaller sums from other States and scattered contributors. The Board of Trustees is as follows: Sarah W. Hallowell, Wm. T. Rodenbach, John J. Lapham, Mrs. Henry G. Lapham, John T. Willets, Anna M. Jackson, Edward H. Magill, Howard M. Jenkins, Sarah J. Ash, Sarah F. Corlies, Martha Schofield, Richard Carroll, Isaac A. Givens.

FROM Friends' Select School, Philadelphia, belonging to the other branch of Friends, we have received the annual catalogue attractive in its illustrations and statements of courses offered.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

FLEMING, PA.—The Young Friends' Association meeting was held on the 18th ult., and opened with the President reading part of the fifth chapter of Matthew. The minutes of last meeting were read and approved; roll-call was answered by each member announcing what he thought the most important event of to-day in the way of progress. "The Duty of Happiness" was discussed by different members. The thought was expressed that there is no excuse for not being happy; that the pleasures and blessings of life ought to overbalance the trials and troubles. Bearing upon this topic, the secretary read a part of a chapter from Miller on "Christ's Interest in Our Common Lives," giving much of tender sympathy and advice. Bertha K. Cleaver gave an interesting account of the First-day School Association recently held in connection with Dunning's Creek Quarterly Meeting. "What is Meant by being True to One's Self?" was given for discussion; a number of opinions were given to the effect that it means living up to the highest convictions of duty regarding one's self.

Another question was, "Why is a Prophet without Honor in His Own Country?" The reply was, because of the imperfections of human nature, and the uncharitable disposition of the majority of people regarding these imperfections. Quite an interesting account of The Hague Conference was given by Florence N. Cleaver, "What Power exists in Earnestness?" was answered by the secretary—God only helps those who earnestly and sincerely try to help themselves; in this way great power is brought to bear, and the results are often beyond our expectations. The lesson is valuable to the individual, and great influence is exerted upon others.

Expressions of appreciation of the meeting were given by some present, and prayer was offered by Mary J. Fisher. Closed in silence. N. M. FISHER, Sec.

N. B. I would like it if some Friend would give his or her explanation of the text, "A Prophet is not without Honor save in His Own Country," through the columns of the INTELLIGENCER. N. M. F.

Literature.

THE current North American Review has an article on "Universal Peace," by the Baroness Bertha Von Suttner, a lady whose name has been conspicuously and honorably associated with the movement for the advancement of woman. She states her reasons for believing that the time is at hand when war will be abolished among the civilized nations of the world. The influence which will be exerted upon the direction of national affairs by women, when women finally attain rights and franchises equal to those now enjoyed by men, will be, she contends, one of the most effective agencies in bringing about that most desirable consummation. Andrew Lang has an article on "Golf from a St. Andrew's Point of View." He has much that is interesting to tell as to the origin and the development of the popular game, and of the "historical glories" of the Ancient and Royal (and now Republican) pastime. Mrs. Schuyler van Rensselaer replies to Rebecca Harding Davis's recent arraignment of our public school system, showing that our schools have been, if not an un-mixed blessing, a most salutary influence in the Republic, and that very great progress has been made in correcting errors or deficiencies in our educational methods. Charles Whibley makes "The Tercentenary of Velasquez," recently celebrated in Madrid, the occasion for a delightful and sympathetic sketch of the life of the greatest of Spanish painters.

Charles Johnston's article in the Atlantic Monthly on "The True American Spirit in Literature," is a suggestive one. As to the religious element in our narrative literature,—he says that the attempts of George W. Cable, Mary E. Wilkins, and other native authors to embody it in their stories must result in unreality when compared with the authentic spiritual mystery thronging European literature from the "Divine Comedy" to "In Memoriam."

A beautiful passage is that picturing Ireland as the truest home of the atmosphere of the Gospels,—that sad, romantic land, "with her pensive and poignant sweetness, her unworldliness and sense of failure; where veils of soft mists shimmer with pale rainbow colors, where the hills are covered with the silvery grayness of doves' wings."

The correspondence of Bayard Taylor and Sidney Lanier is continued. Some of the Southern poet's letters are dated from West Chester, Pa., where Lanier was staying in the summer of 1876. One of Lanier's finest poems, "The Waving of the Corn," was composed here. Bayard Taylor, keenly appreciative of the peaceful repose of the landscape in old Chester County, writes to the author that the poem is "sweet, tranquil, and beautiful," and again that "the feeling of peace and blissful pastoral seclusion is exquisitely expressed." How the sensitive poet must have thrilled at this praise from Chester County's laureate!

In the current number of McClure's Magazine, Ida M. Tarbell's account of "Lincoln's Great Victory in 1864," supplies new illustration of the immense hold that Lincoln secured by his wisdom, shrewdness, kindness, and honesty, on the faith and affection of the people; and shows how, when it came to the question of Lincoln's reelection, the mere politicians and agitators could make no head against this.

"The twenty best books in the world," according to a consensus of replies recently published in London Truth, are as follows: The Bible, Shakespeare, Homer, Paradise Lost, Vanity Fair, Dante, The Pilgrim's Progress, Gibbon's Decline and Fall, Ivanhoe, Robinson Crusoe, Carlyle's French Revolution, The Imitation of Christ, Boswell's Johnson, Pickwick, Tennyson, The Arabian Nights, Virgil, Moliere, David Copperfield, and The Vicar of Wakefield. In this selection the books are supposed to rank in the order named.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

CENTENNIAL HISTORY OF WESTTOWN BOARDING SCHOOL. 1799-1899. By Watson W. and Sarah B. Dewees. 8 x 5 3/4 inches. Pp. viii. and 204. (Illustrated.) Published under the auspices of the Westtown Alumni Association. Philadelphia: Sherman & Co.

THE STORY OF GEORGE FOX AND SOME EARLY FRIENDS. By Frances Anne Budge. 7 1/4 x 5 inches. Pp. 142. Price 1 shilling, 6 pence. (Illustrated.) London: Headley Brothers.

AN ODE TO GIRLHOOD, AND OTHER POEMS. By Alice Archer Sewall. 7 3/4 x 5 1/4 inches. Pp. 73. $1.25. New York and London: Harper and Brothers. (Received through Strawbridge and Clothier, Philadelphia.)

COMMUNICATIONS.

CHILDREN'S EARLY IMPRESSIONS.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

IN a private letter recently received from a Friend in the West, there is given evidence of the value of guarded care in the selection of children's literature, inasmuch as her own enjoyment of that which is good has not only been great, but she has constantly exerted herself to introduce pure reading matter to little children.

Of one of her visits to a little boy of ten, whose face beamed with delight when she told him she would write of him to the editor of Scattered Seeds, a paper he liked very much, she was reminded of her own childhood and says:

"I suppose I was scarcely older than he is now, when my father placed a little book of poems, by Samuel M. Janney, in my hands. Its title, I think, was 'The Last of the Lenapes.' Nearly eleven years later I remember lingering in the hall at the foot of the steps at Sharon Boarding School, where I knew that John Jackson and Samuel M. Janney would soon come down from the up-stairs parlor, and although neither of them noticed me as they did so,—neither did I expect it; I would have been sadly embarrassed if they had,—yet I there saw Samuel M. Janney. The next and only time I heard and saw him was at the opening of Illinois Yearly Meeting. I enjoy the sketch of his life coming out in the INTELLIGENCER now."

[Can anyone tell us of this book of poems of Samuel M. Janney? It is not alluded to in his Memoirs.—Eds.]

LATEST of all bathing fads is the hay bath. Some one or other in the Tyrol devised it. It is a simple process, consisting merely of being immersed in fresh, uncured mountain hay. The hay must be in "burning" condition—that is, not cured. The bath is taken under roof, and not in the open air. The peasants of the Tyrol, the Etschlanders especially, attach great value to the hay bath, and they consider the short hay of the mountains to be particularly beneficial.

SENATOR W. A. CLARK said in an interview last week that he owed his success in life entirely to his early experience on his father's farm in Pennsylvania. "I learned that hard work," he said, "was necessary if a man wanted to live. The trouble with most people is that they do not realize this."

THE process of laying dust by means of oil, an idea which originated with J. H. Nichols, chief engineer of the West Jersey and Seashore Railroad, is being more extensively applied than ever by the Pennsylvania Railroad, says an exchange. Other companies in various parts of the country have adopted the idea.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

GRANDMOTHER'S ANSWER.

GRANDMOTHER, why did thee sigh last night,
When I brought a pack of cards in sight?
And why, when I asked Jack Young to play,
Did thee wipe a falling tear away?
Where is the harm, do tell me, please,
Which in a pack of cards thee sees?

Listen, my darling, and I will tell
Of the life of a man whom I knew quite well;
Full of promise,—handsome and bright
As is Jack Young who was here last night;
The only stay of a widowed mother,
A loving son and devoted brother.
One night, in calling, others came,
And 'twas proposed all join a game;
"Progressive Euchre" was its name.
'Twas his first play, but from that night
He lent himself to its delight.
Here first the gambler's greed took root
Which ripened such disastrous fruit.
Each evening now he spent away,
Each midnight found him still at play.
Larger the stakes he played for grew,
Deeper he sank before he knew;
Thinner his mother's whitening hairs,
Deaf ears he turned to all her prayers;
That fearful vice with talons grim
Had seized with deadly clutch on him.
Then came the end,—temptation's power
Too strong in an unguarded hour,—
Embezzlement—a felon's cell,
And little else remains to tell,—
Remorse—despair; here ceased the strife,
His own hand took his ruined life!

What do I see in a pack of cards?
Untimely graves in our full church-yards,
Breaking hearts, and weeping eyes,
Saddened mothers and desperate wives,
Hungry children and want and woe;
These are the pictures that come and go.
And oh, how I pray, each young man that I pass
May shun the first game, as he does the first glass!
Each gambler's career has at some time begun;
Shall it be in thy parlor, my darling one?

R.

IN AN OLD MEADOW.

How oft the housewife crossed this meadow wide
To gather healing plants, in sweet old days!
Stooping along the tangled, stony side,
Where flourished herbs, and weeds, and briery sprays.

Within her basket, wove of birchen bark,
She laid faint-scented plumes of golden-rod,
And slender culms of rushes, jointed dark,
And mallow leaves, close growing to the sod.

In dim, damp nooks, the bitter boneset grew
For her, and comfrey, with its roots of black;
And tufts of fragrant pennyroyal blew
Above the ribwort plantain in her track.

Pale catmint spikes she found in sunny spots,
And tansy leaves, like notched and heavy lace;
And wool rosets, with buds in golden knots,
Where shafts of mullein rocked with lazy grace.

Green mustard pods, and yellow roots of yarrow,
She took, with hoarhound's square and rugged stems;
Then softly mused, "I'll come again to-morrow!"
And homeward went beside the meadow hems.

—Eliza Woodworth, in Independent.

THE DOUKHOBORS.

From the Halifax Herald we take an account of the arrival of the steamer Lake Huron at Quebec.

It was a picturesque sight that was presented on board the steamer so greatly laden with human life. The decks were well covered with men, women, and children—sturdy Doukhobors, but only a rather small proportion of them could obtain places on the rail.

"Welcome, Doukhobors!" shouted Mr. Gidley in stentorian tones, and every heart on the tug, though the words were not uttered, cordially endorsed the Friend's greeting.

The sound of singing broke from the steamer's decks. It was low and melodious, but very distinct. The Herald asked Prince Hilkoﬀ, who was standing by the rail, to translate the words.

"God is with us,
He has brought us through,"— was the way in which the noble prince exile explained the words of the song. The psalm was heard for several minutes and grew stronger as the tug approached closer to the Beaver liner.

The faces that bent over the rail were intelligent and keen, young and old, child and parent, looked out with dancing eyes on the first faces from the new world that they had ever seen; on people whose liberty was a birthright, a privilege those exiles from home had come to share under the British flag.

Look at that gray-headed man near the companion-way, with grizzly beard and fur-lined coat and boots. He is a Crimean veteran, who strange enough is now numbered with the Doukhobors, who cannot bear arms without sin. He was a sailor on a Russian man-of-war. Long after the war was over he joined the Doukhobors and laid down arms for ever.

Another aged man, who had seen more than 85 years, ten of which were in exile in Northern Siberia, was pointed out by Prince Hilkoﬀ.

One face that was peculiarly attractive was observed by all. It was that of a young woman, evidently not a peasant like the others. This surmise by the reporter was correct, for on inquiry it was found that she was a lady physician, who had volunteered to cross the ocean with the Doukhobors, not as an immigrant, but to do what she could to render the voyage more pleasant.

By this time the tug was made fast to the liner, and one of the quarantine officers shouted:

"Prince Hilkoﬀ and staff and Deputy Minister Smart and staff may come aboard."

Prince Hilkoﬀ and the two members of the Society of Friends were the centre of an animated group a few feet away. Impetuously they kissed the Prince. This exhibition of exuberance of joy lasted but a few moments, for their heads were uncovered and the voice of J. S. Elkinton, of Philadelphia, was heard in prayer; thanks and supplication for continued mercies found expression in earnest tones. The psalm singing had ceased when the prayer began to ascend to the throne of grace.

Ten minutes flew away all too quickly, and then the order was given for all visitors except the quarantine officials to go ashore. There was need for hurry—ing because the Lake Huron had to go down to the quarantine wharf, where a careful examination would be made, and if all is well, a clean bill of health given to enable the steamer to proceed by to-night to St. John.

During the voyage there had been ten deaths, chiefly very young children and old people, from ordinary causes. Though ten had died, the company numbered only nine less than on the day that the steamer started from Batoum, for there had been one birth.

With regard to caring for the people when they arrive at Winnipeg, it is proposed to house about nine hundred of the first party in the Immigration Hall there; four hundred further west, at Brandon; three hundred at Yorktown. Immediately on arrival, a large gang of males will be sent out to districts where they are to settle, with full equipment of tools, horses, oxen, sleighs and provisions, to cut timber for the erection of storehouses for supplies, and dwellings, and so prepare for the families moving into the settlement as soon as possible in the spring. Arrangements have also been made whereby any of the men not required for work in the colony will get employment on railway construction, which employment will be available for these people in their own districts for the next two or three years. The expense of reaching our shores will exhaust all the people's resources—the cash in hand, the government bonuses, and the money from the sale of the first of the novels Leo Tolstoy is giving for the benefit of the Doukhobors.

Remaining in the Caucasus will be the Kars Doukhobors—who, not having been turned out of their lands and houses, like the scattered exiles, nor reduced to the same state of need as the Elizavetpol Doukhobors, will themselves be able to cover the expenses of their transport to Canada next spring. When they are all here the new settlers will probably be found to number ten thousand.

The lands chosen for the settlement of the Doukhobors comprise about twelve townships each six miles square, beautifully situated, and abundantly watered by running streams, with plenty of timber for fuel and building, and soil of the best quality, mainly a rich, black, vegetable loam, from one to two feet deep, resting upon pure clay of great depth. The Doukhobors are the finest agriculturalists in Russia: wherever they have been left alone for a short time they have prospered, making the wilderness smile with cultivation. This, and the moral character of a people who have so steadfastly adhered to their principles through the cruelest persecution of recent times, should be sufficient to inspire every confidence in them. It is hoped that a few months now will see the establishment of the united—once more united after years of suffering—Doukhobor community, in a climate similar to that to which they have been accustomed, and where they are likely to succeed exceptionally well, on the plains of the Canadian Northwest.

While we were collecting the above details, the time quickly went on, and we soon heard the impatient whistling of the tug which was waiting for us.

We were obliged to part with the interesting passengers of the Lake Huron. When the tug had pushed off from the steamer, one of the American Friends, a really true friend of the Doukhobors, the Quaker Gidley, called out: "Farewell Doukhobors!" to which they replied by a low solemn bow, and soon afterwards those sitting in the tug again heard the resounding solemn tunes of the psalms sung by the Doukhobors.

The Beauty of Rural England.

Atlantic Monthly.

ENGLAND in fine weather, like its inhabitants when in happy circumstances, has a singular look of newness and good breeding. Everything is swept and garnished, like the interior of a daintily kept house. The hop-poles make a pale-green pattern on the violet-ploughed ground. In the streams, the long willow-like weeds are combed out and starred with jasmine-looking blossoms. Fish dart like ghosts in the sunlit bright-golden water. And then the gardens of the old cottages,—cottages, some of them, of the time of Elizabeth, nay, almost of the Black Prince, with scalloped weather-tiles of delicate peach-bloom color, and brilliant, whitewashed walls, against which stand out geraniums, and pink and white mallows, and even an exquisite Japanese lily. What dainty prosperity!

And characteristically English, through the midst of it runs the Past, in the shape of an old Roman highway. You can still see slabs of it along the downs, among immense nut-laden beeches, past duck-ponds and hay-stacks. What a strange mixture of a very Present with a Past which seems scarcely Past at all!

Ruskin to Visit a Turner Exhibition.

New York Tribune.

JOHN RUSKIN has taken a warm interest in the Turner exhibition at the Guildhall, London, which is now delighting thousands of visitors every week. He placed his own Turner drawings at the disposal of A. G. Temple, the director of the Art Gallery, and eight of them are now on the walls. He has also expressed an eager desire to come up to London to see the show, and when warned by his friends of the infirmities of old age, he persists in his determination to make the journey from the Lake Country. There is now a disposition on their part to humor him, and to give him the satisfaction of seeing in his old age this remarkable collection representing every phase and period of the art of the great master whom he loved and honored. It is probable that he will come to London in the course of a few weeks, and that he will have a quiet hour in the Guildhall Gallery when the crowd of visitors can be shut out. He longs to see the collection and talks constantly about it. Those who have been with him recently report that his mind is clear and his health fairly good. He is not allowed to talk with visitors more than an hour at a time, but he is neither so feeble nor so infirm as current reports represent.

These Guildhall exhibitions are managed with great ability and pains-taking care. All the best Turners in the private galleries have been borrowed, and they are arranged with skill and judgment so as to enable visitors to study them in chronological order and to comprehend the entire range of his art. The next season's exhibition is planned nearly a year in advance, and negotiations are already in progress for obtaining various important works. The scheme is a novel one. It is to be a collection of modern religious pictures, and will illustrate many diverse methods of dealing with devotional and Scriptural scenes. It will be a reflection at the end of the century of the long cycle of religious art opening in the Middle Ages. The material from which it will be drawn is richer and more varied than is generally supposed, and the contrasts in method, treatment, and technique will be most striking. It will attract thousands of visitors during a year when American tourist travel is expected to be unprecedented.

Are We Ready for a Vacation?

Philadelphia Ledger.

At this season of the year, when so many of our citizens are exchanging the heat and glare of the city for the cool breezes of the sea, the grateful shade of the woods, or the bracing air of hills and mountains, it is well to take a moment for reflection as to the various sources of happiness and benefit thus opening up before them. Whether the anticipated vacation be a week or a month, a long summer or a single day, its results will depend quite as much upon what we bring to it as upon what it can give to us.

The change of scene, the cool breezes, the enforced rest from labor, will bring back some roses to the pale cheek and add some strength to the weary frame, but such benefits are scarcely a tithe of what might be gained were we but prepared to meet nature with open arms and open hearts, with understanding and appreciation, with loving interest and a genuine sympathy in her wonderful and infinitely varied manifestations.

Much is now being done by education and other means to make this intimate acquaintance possible. Children are trained to observe and to examine as never before; they are taught the elements of natural science in a practical and interesting manner; their knowledge of the earth, with its divisions and contours, is made clear and vivid, and thus their visits to the country, the mountains, or the seashore might easily be made a source of exquisite enjoyment in supplementing and illustrating what they have already learned in the actual scenes around them. Yet, instead of this, how often is their vacation a season wherein all mental stimulus ceases, when faculties rust and curiosity languishes, and the artificial amusements of hotel or boarding-house life form the only nutriment for heart or brain!

President Eliot, of Harvard University, says:

"Our century is distinguished by an ardent return of civilized man to that love of nature from which books and urban life had temporarily diverted him. The poetry and the science of our times alike foster this love and add to the delights of the soaring imagination and the far-reaching reason."

To avail ourselves of these opportunities, however, we must realize that more is necessary than our mere presence amid these scenes. It is not sufficient to say, "We will go here or there;" we must also prepare ourselves to do so with real benefit. A little girl traveled with an intelligent mother in Italy, and meeting a lady who announced her intention of going to Florence, innocently inquired, "Are you worthy to see Florence?" We may well ask ourselves a similar question, when arranging to visit the beautiful or interesting spots of our own land. Are we prepared in mind and heart to see them worthily—to love and appreciate their beauty, or grandeur, or sublimity; to put ourselves into sympathy with them; to absorb their sweet influences, to learn their lessons of peace and calm, and power and joy; to obtain from them that true refreshment and vitality which they are capable of affording?

It is largely the contrast between the city and the country that makes the latter so keen a delight. It is the trained eye that sparkles with gladness at nature's brilliant bloom, or gazes in solemn wonder at her sublime phenomena. It is the trained ear which listens lovingly to the songs of the birds, the rustle of the forest, and the roar of the ocean. It is the trained mind which instinctively searches for the laws of nature and seeks the explanation of her marvels. It is the trained heart which clings to her in loving sympathy which is uplifted by her majesty, thrilled by her vitality, gladdened by her radiance, purified by her innocence, calmed by her peace, and strengthened by her power.

Rosa Bonheur and Unser Fritz.

London Chronicle.

ROSA BONHEUR had many honors showered upon her since the Empress Eugenie gave her the decoration of the Legion of Honor. She was always a stanch patriot. It is related that in 1871 Frederick, Crown Prince of Prussia, rode into her chateau grounds at the head of a troop of Uhlans. Dismounting, he asked graciously that the great artist would do him the honor of receiving his visit and show him some of her pictures. A servant carried the message to her mistress, and in a few seconds returned with the answer: "The Crown Prince of Prussia is welcome to look at the pictures he wishes to see, but Rosa Bonheur cannot, and will not, entertain her country's conqueror." The Prince, as may be expected, was greatly taken aback with such an answer. For a moment he stood undecided, then said carelessly: "Well, well, so be it; but as I cannot see the artist, I do not care to see her pictures; but tell Rosa Bonheur that her courage is above that of men, for in all France there is not a householder who would have dared defy Frederick of Prussia at the head of a regiment of soldiers."

A Caution.

ONE of the most serious dangers threatening negro education in the South just now is the large number of most irresponsible people from the South who are in the Northern cities representing merely local schools, or schools that are called industrial schools. In many cases where the schools exist at all they are industrial merely in name. Besides, the North should not be called upon to support, except in very rare instances, merely local schools. There are ten thousand local schools in the South that are just as worthy of aid as many that are represented in the North. Money to accomplish the most good should go to the central schools that are training teachers who will go out themselves and show the people themselves how to build up the local schools in connection with the public school system.

The mere giving of $5 or $10 to this or that individual results in keeping dozens of irresponsible individuals in the North begging for money and no one of them secure enough to do much good. There are several men who know thoroughly the negro schools of the South because they have seen and studied them for years. With these men the Charity Organization Society is in constant communication. The society already has considerable information about colored schools on file, and is in a position to get reliable advice from its correspondents about any particular school.—Charities, (the official organ of the C. O. S., of New York.)

Idle Plutocrats.

Scribner's Magazine.

THERE are many individuals in our so-called leisure class who devote their lives to intelligent and useful occupations, but there is every reason for asserting that the point of view of the child of fortune in this country is significantly that of the idler—and a more deplorable idler than he of the aristocracies of Europe, whom he models himself on, for the reason that the foreigner is less indifferent than he to intellectual interests. Is there any body of people in the world more contemptible, and anybody among us more useless as an inspiring product of Americanism, than the pleasure-seeking, unpatriotic element of the very rich who, under the caption of our best society, arrogate social distinction by reason of their vulgar ostentation of wealth, their extravagant methods of entertainment, and their aimless, pleasure-loving lives?

Our Short Periods of Prosperity.

THE question, Why is it that when prosperity visits our country it remains with us for so short a time? is one which has engaged much thought and to which diverse answers have been given. In an article in the current number of the North American Review, entitled "Pig Iron and Prosperity," Mr. George H. Hull insists, with great plausibility, that the cause of the phenomenon is to be found in the fact that, whenever business revives in the United States there is such a demand for pig iron—an essential staple in the vast majority of our industries—and the supply is so restricted that the price of pig iron goes up to a point at which the prudent managers of the great enterprises of the country cannot afford to purchase it. The manufactories are therefore gradually compelled to suspend production, the demand for other staples dies out, and industrial depression becomes general.

International Arbitration.

A DIPLOMATIST at The Hague, writing in the June number of the North American Review about the work before the Peace Conference, insists that the institution of a permanent international tribunal of arbitration is not a Utopia. He says:

"In the past it did not exist because there was no need of it. But formerly there were also no international bureaus at Berne, dealing with the telegraph, postal arrangements, railways and literary property, because from the international point of view these spheres of life did not exist at all or were in an embryo state. They appeared when the circumstances required them. The question of an international court is now in the same position. It is necessary, not for the definite abolition of war, but for the removing of irritating disputes, which are so dangerous in view of the increasing frequency of international intercourse, and which, under unfavorable circumstances, could even lead to useless wars. When the tribunal attains its full growth, decision by arms will remain only for questions of real national honor, integrity of territory, or problems of such importance as the fate of decaying States or the change of the political status of whole continents. As an example of the latter could be quoted the last wars of Prussia with Austria and France, when the edifice of the Holy Roman Empire was replaced by the new German Empire. Such questions can scarcely be settled by a tribunal so long as the present conditions of life in the world are not radically changed.

"The importance that was attached to the idea of international tribunals in the Russian proposals shows that its realization ought to form the principal task of The Hague Conference, and that this problem should be its first consideration."

CURRENT EVENTS.

At the commencement of Yale University, on the 28th ult., the degree of D.D. was conferred on Professor George Adam Smith, of Scotland. At Harvard commencement, on the same date, the degree of LL. D. was given to Jules Cambon, French Ambassador to the United States, and to Arthur T. Hadley, president-elect of Yale; and Professor George Harris, president-elect of Amherst College, was granted the degree of D.D.

DISCUSSING the banking aspects of the fiscal year just closed, Comptroller of the Currency Dawes says: The condition of the national banks of the country during the year has been one of progressive prosperity. The changes in the items of loans and discounts indicate this clearly. At the date of the April 5, 1899, call for report of condition the loans and discounts of the national banks of the country had increased $306,316,660.43, and the individual deposits had increased $437,914,981.33 over the amounts shown by the call of May 5, 1898.

ONE of the largest mortgages filed for record in Pennsylvania has been recorded at Greensburg for $160,000,000, by a representative of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad Company in favor of the United States Company of New York. The revenue tax on the document amounts to $69,000. The mortgage is to be recorded in every county through which the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad passes, but the revenue tax need only be paid once.

CAPTAIN DREYFUS has been safely landed at Rennes, France, after intense popular excitement. During the homeward voyage he was almost silent, and displayed little interest when told of the court martial that is to retry his case. The meeting with his wife in the prison at Rennes was affecting. He is said to be greatly altered and aged in appearance since he left France.

A DISPATCH from Panama states that great preparations are being made for the reception of the canal commissioners, recently appointed by President McKinley. The universal hope is that the commission will recommend the purchase of French interests in the canal, and that the great work will be at once pushed forward to completion.

As a result of heavy rains during three days in Texas, fully 1,000 miles of rich farming land along the Brazos river bottoms was submerged, and damage of about $4,000,000 was done. It is estimated that thirty lives were lost. Many families and persons were rescued from rafts, etc.

HEREAFTER the lights at the base of the Penn statue on the City Hall, Philadelphia, are to be extinguished every evening at three minutes before 9 o'clock, and turned on again at the hour, as a method of giving the National Observatory time.

A RECIPROCITY treaty relating to the British West Indian Colony of Bermuda has been concluded at Washington, and the Bermuda Commission has left for home with a draft of the treaty, which is to be submitted to the Bermuda Legislature before being finally signed on behalf of the two Governments.

MAYOR ASHBRIDGE formally accepted the bid of the syndicate composed of Drexel & Co., and Brown Bros., of Philadelphia, and Harvey Fisk & Co., of New York City, for $5,600,000 of the $11,200,000 loan, taking the offer of 100.589 at 3 per cent interest.

It is announced that $20,000,000 more of Russian capital is about to be spent in this country. This time it is the makers of ordnance who are to be favored. While the final papers have not been signed all the preliminaries of the contract have been arranged.

It is stated in Washington that the negotiations for a modus vivendi regulating the Alaskan boundary arbitration have fallen into a state that jeopardizes a successful outcome. The Canadians have a counter proposal for every proposition made by the Americans.

TIOGA county Pomona Grange has adopted resolutions condemning Governor Stone's cut in the public school appropriation as an act "menacing to the interests of the common people and a protection to trusts and breweries."

THE Makawell Sugar Company has been incorporated at San Francisco, with a capital stock of $5,000,000, of which $1,500,000 has been subscribed. The company will do business in the Hawaiian Islands.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE Baltimore and Ohio Railroad has just passed out of the hands of the receivers. The company has been reorganized and is now solvent. The receivers spent a great deal of money on the property, and it is now in first-class condition. The company will start out under favorable circumstances, the revival of business insuring it large traffic.

—The statement of the public debt at the close of the fiscal year 1899 shows that the debt, less cash in the Treasury, amounted to $1,155,320,235, which is a decrease as compared with June 30, 1898, of $13,571,172.

The Government expenditures during the fiscal year closed on the 30th ultimo, exceeded the receipts by $88,875,990. The receipts for the year exceeded those of the previous fiscal year by $11,705,664.

—A gentleman from Honolulu, Mr. M. O. Ringdon, now visiting Washington, expresses the opinion that the Hawaiian Islands are a good country for negro laborers, and that if a considerable number of negroes of the United States could be prevailed on to go there it would prove greatly to their advantage. Already there is talk among owners of sugar plantations in Honolulu of making an effort to get negro labor from this country.

—The French statistician, Dr. Livrier, says that one-half of all human beings die before 17, that only one person in 10,000 lives to be 100 years old, and that only one person out of every 1,000 lives to be 60.

—In conformity to the established tradition that all the princes of the Hohenzollern family must learn a trade, the older sons of the German emperor are now being taught that of a joiner.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 15, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 28.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXVIII.

*As Superstition is blind, so it is heady and furious ;
all must stoop to its blind and boundless zeal, or perish by it : in the name of the spirit persecuting the very appearance of the spirit of God in others.*

WILLIAM PENN.

From his Preface to the Journal of George Fox.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

TO AARON M. POWELL.

THOU real believer in the Inward Light,
Who knowest well that God's own truth may shine
In other hearts whose thoughts are not as thine ;
Nor measurest the eternal plan of right

By the poor limits of thy mortal sight,
Thou followest thine own light. By that same sign
Thou canst perceive in others the divine.
A prayerful watcher through the clouded night

Of human wisdom, swift the beacon flame
Of earnest purpose in another soul
Meets thy clear vision. Then nor creed nor name,

Nor action, by the world misunderstood,
Can shake thy trust that towards thine own pure goal
That spirit strives,—the highest human good !

OAKES BURLEIGH.

Sixth month 23, 1899.

THE FIRST BAPTIST CHURCH OF PHILA- DELPHIA.

WITHIN a year or two the "church" organizations of Philadelphia have begun to celebrate the close of two centuries of life. They were organized here later than the Friends, of course. The Baptists began definitely in 1698. Their "First Church" dates from that year, and in the Twelfth month last celebrated its bi-centennial by a series of meetings which continued for a week. It has now published a handsome and very complete memorial volume, of which Dr. W. W. Keen, well known as a distinguished member of the medical profession, is editor, and to which he has contributed a valuable historical chapter.

To understand the genesis of the Baptist body in Philadelphia it is proper to be reminded that Rhode Island and Roger Williams are figures much earlier in the colonial annals than Pennsylvania and William Penn. The first Baptist church in America was that at Providence, R. I., established in 1639, when, so far as is known, there was not a white man living in what is now Pennsylvania. Two others were established at Newport, 1644 and 1656; then one at Swansea, Mass., 1663; then one at Boston, 1665; then one at Charleston, 1683; and—seventh on the list—

one out in the present rural portion of Philadelphia, at Pennepek (now Lower Dublin) in 1688. From the Pennepek church and its ministers there was an effort to gather a congregation in Philadelphia, and in December (then the Tenth month), 1698, nine persons formally agreed at a meeting in the little store-house of the Barbadoes Company, which stood at the north-west corner of Second and Chestnut streets (and so remained down to about 1832), to "coalesce into a church for the communion of saints." John Watts, who was in charge of the church at Pennepek, preached also for them until his death in 1702. They left the Barbadoes building soon after organizing, (a "difference" with the Presbyterians, who had used it in common with them, arose), and were housed until 1707 in the brew-house of our Quaker pioneer and patriarch—progenitor of a numerous family—Anthony Morris, "near the drawbridge" over Dock creek—now the east side of Water street near Dock. Then they secured what was called the meeting-house of the "Keithian Quakers." In the schism, threatening enough for a time, but eventually not important, which George Keith created, in 1691, one fragment of those split off the Friends held the necessity of water baptism, and those of this view in Philadelphia, sometimes called "Quaker Baptists," had a meeting-house on Lagrange Place, on the west side of Second street above Market, just north of Christ church. They were never strong, and by 1707 were willing to give the use of their house to the Baptist company. There the "First Church" continued (building a new house in 1762, and enlarging it in 1708) until in 1856 it removed to the northwest corner of Arch and Broad streets, where its brown-stone building and tall spire were familiar down to 1898, when a tall office building replaced it.

The volume now under notice presents the history of the church in these two hundred years very definitely and systematically. Dr. Keen has set down the facts for all interested in them in excellent form, and with evidence of full knowledge, derived from patient study of the "sources." Very interesting is his section on "Manners and Customs of our Church, especially in its Earlier Days." This is the counterpart of the study of our old monthly-meeting minutes presented by Dr. Ezra Michener in his "Retrospect of Early Quakerism." Dr. Keen speaks of the disciplinary authority exercised by the church over its members, not only as to questions of faith, but, very minutely, as to conduct. There was sincere piety and great strictness in early times, but there were more lapses from the moral law than it is pleasant to consider, and the minutes often record these with extreme plainness of language. "Discipline extended to the most minute affairs of the home and counting-house as well as the church; as in difficulties between husband and wife ; engaging in any brawl ; attending another church when our own was open ; absence from church ; the sale of a wife's furniture by her husband ; going to law with another member without having first followed the Scriptural rule of reconciliation ; false weights ; reflections on the character of a fellow-member ; small unpaid debts ; failure to pay rent ; lying ; and frequently in cases of business failure." All of which has a familiar sound to us Friends.

Dr. Keen remarks, and it seems to us very truly, that the records testify the earnestness of the church from an early time in respect to temperance. "It is not uncommonly found," he says, "in the old records of the New England churches that large quantities of rum and other alcoholic liquors were provided for festivals, such as the raising of a roof, meetings of ministers, etc. I think it not a little to the credit of our church that in a careful review of our written records of nearly a century and a half I find only one instance of such use of spirits. . . . In fact the church took strong ground against the use of distilled liquor, at a time when its use was so prevalent that, as I have heard my father say, the sideboard of that good old deacon, my grandfather, was always set out with decanters and glasses, and that it was considered a breach of good manners not to invite the minister and other friends to refresh themselves."

A "strong resolution" against the use of distilled liquors, except as medicine, was passed by the church so early as 1788. A temperance society was formed in 1831. In 1841 a committee was appointed to remonstrate with certain prominent members for trafficking in ardent spirits, and the same year candidates for baptism were required to approve a resolution of the church, passed in 1836, recommending "that no member use or traffic in ardent spirits." In 1883 fermented wine was discarded at the "communion table."

The first of the Baptists here were largely Welsh people. The Welsh who came to Pennsylvania in Penn's time were mostly Friends, others Episcopalians, but a number were Baptists. Among the early pastors of the First Baptist Church were Evan Morgan, Samuel Jones, Abel Morgan, Jenkin Jones, and Morgan Edwards, whose names clearly enough indicate their national blood. Even so late as 1831 separate services in the Welsh language were held in the church. The later pastors have included William Staughton (1805-1811), a native of England, whose position became somewhat unpleasant during the disturbances that led to the War of 1812, and Henry Holcombe (1812-1824), William T. Brantly (1826-1838), and Joseph Hazzard Cuthbert (1855-1861), all Southern men, under whose ministry the vexed question of Slavery was regarded as rather taboo. To Dr. Cuthbert succeeded (1864) George Dana Boardman, whose views of that institution were definitely unfavorable, and his charge of the church, continuing for thirty years, strongly gave it the impress of his energetic personality. H. M. J.

THE first requisite to a successful life is to be a good animal.—Herbert Spencer.

FRIENDS OF THIS CENTURY.¹

PRINCIPAL FEATURES OF THEIR HISTORY.

WE find early in the century that the subject of First-day schools agitated the minds of Friends and upon several occasions trial schools were started, but none of these seemed to have in their plan just what was needed for a Friends' First-day School. In an article in FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER of First month 18th, 1862, it is stated that, "A Friend believing that an important part of the education of children might be considerably promoted by collecting them for the purpose of reading the Scriptures, and religious conversations, concluded to invite several boys to meet at his residence on First-day afternoon. This was readily united with, and after a few gatherings the advantages were very apparent." It is pleasing to note that the First-day School movement elicited much favorable expression about this time ; many Friends were of the opinion that the prosperity of the Society had been very much retarded by a want of them. Many articles upon the subject appeared in the INTELLIGENCER, some prominent Friends giving encouragement, whilst other valued Friends were concerned lest the school should "produce a contrary effect from that which was desired," and "a departure from primitive simplicity and the fundamental principles of our Society be greatly increased." The oldest school in continuous existence for many years was that opened by Jane Johnson, in Tenth month, 1861, at Green street, Philadelphia. That at Denton, Maryland, was also among the first established, dating from 1860. Following these were Salem, N. J., in 1862 ; West Branch, Pa., in 1863 ; West Chester, in Fifth month, 1863 ; Goshen, in Fifth month, 1865 ; Lombard street, Baltimore, and Race street, Philadelphia, both opened Eleventh month, 1865. Among those of a later date of organization is that of Willistown, in 1870. The first school in Indiana was started at Richmond, in 1865 ; the first in Ohio, at Waynesville, in 1866 ; Boston, New York, in 1867 ; Goose Creek, Virginia, in the summer of 1867 ; Alloway's Creek, N. J., in 1867. During all this time work was pushed with varying success, but without the active sympathy of the meetings ; and many cautions and fears were from time to time expressed, as also much of encouragement. The need of conferring with sympathetic minds, as to the best methods of conducting such schools, led to the calling of a Conference at West Chester, Ninth month 14, 1867. The call was signed by Thomas H. and Lydia H. Hall, Lucius D. Price, William M. Hayes, Ann S. Paschall, of West Chester ; Thomas S. Cox, of Goshen ; Eli M. Lamb, of Baltimore ; William Dorsey, Dillwyn Parrish, Harriet E. Stockley, Abigail Woolman, Joseph M. Truman, Jr., and Lukens Webster, of Philadelphia.

At this Conference twenty-two schools were reported in operation : ten in Philadelphia Yearly Meeting ; two in Ohio Yearly Meeting ; six in Baltimore Yearly Meeting ; two in Indiana ; and one each in New York and Genesee Yearly Meetings ; in all aggregating over twelve hundred pupils. "A plan for permanent organization of the present Conference, so that there may be a unity of action and freedom of intercourse between our First-day Schools throughout the country," was left with a committee to report at the next meeting of the Conference in Philadelphia; at which Conference it was decided that within the limits of each yearly meeting an Association be formed, which should send delegates and reports to the Conference. The first regular meeting of the General Conference was held in Race Street Meeting-house, Philadelphia, Fifth month 8, 9, and 14, 1868, at which delegates were present from Baltimore, New York, and Philadelphia. The time for holding the First-day School Association within the limits of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was fixed for Fourth month 10th, 1868. The minutes of the executive committee of the Philadelphia Association, in 1869, show that this body considered "the subject of issuing a child's paper for First-day Schools." A sample copy was issued with Lydia H. Hall as editor; it was an eight page paper, consisting of two parts which could be cut asunder, making two four-page papers, one called the Scattered Seeds for children's reading, and the other The First-day School, to contain at least four carefully prepared lessons each month, adapted to as many different classes, and an essay on the testimonies of Friends for adult classes. In 1872 the executive committee of Philadelphia Yearly Meeting authorized its visiting committee to endeavor to organize First-day School Unions within each Quarterly Meeting, to which each school would report, and it in turn forward a report to the association. At the twelfth General Conference, held at the time of Illinois Yearly Meeting, Ninth month 9, 1881, its executive committee was directed to prepare and issue Lesson Leaves.

¹ Prepared for and read at a meeting of the Young Friends' Association, at Willistown, Pa., by Anna P. Smedley.

Step by step we see that the work has advanced, until the 17th session of the First-day School General Conference, held at Pendleton, Indiana, Ninth month, 1890, upon which occasion the ever-widening circle of its influence extended to the most remote corner of the organization, arousing to keener interest those who have at heart the welfare of the Society and are desirous that the world of to-day should understand more clearly and appreciate more fully the message of Quakerism.

Before we speak of the more recent work of the General Conference and the untold good resulting from organized effort, let us turn our attention to the calling into existence of other organizations, equally as important, although requiring of their members other and different duties. In 1878 Illinois Yearly Meeting, then but three years old, sent to her sister yearly meetings, through the influence of Jonathan W. Plummer, the following earnest appeal,—“A desire has arisen with us that our Society may return to its early faithfulness, energy, and usefulness, and more fully accomplish its mission in aiding by practical labor in raising the average standard of the world's morality. In former days our forefathers went under the guidance of the Inward Light into all fields of labor, spreading light and truth, opening the way to true liberty and keeping in the van of human progress.

In our day we have made our appeal for justice to the Indian race, and for peace between nations, sensibly felt as an influence, partially modifying our country's thought and its governmental policy in these respects. We believe this has been the more effective because of the united wisdom and joint effort of the whole Society, and desire that this influence may be still more clearly felt upon these and other urgent subjects by the closer union and stronger effort of our several meetings, and that the reacting influence of the work may be felt as a thrill of new life flowing back to our local meetings. We are therefore united in proposing for the consideration of the several Yearly Meetings, that once in five years, or oftener, a general conference be held composed of representatives, two or more from each monthly meeting, and a suitable number appointed by each yearly meeting, who, with other members in attendance, shall constitute a meeting representing the entire body, for the consideration of such subjects as lie outside our own membership, and which we can in united judgment labor in for the advancement of morality and righteousness among men; such as our Indian Policy; Arbitration in all its branches; Capital Punishment; Prison Reform; Intemperance; Compulsory Education, and cognate subjects.”

(To be concluded.)

From Friends' Quarterly Examiner.

YOUNG FRIENDS AND THE CHRISTIAN MINISTRY.

WE are approaching the close of a century, the nineteenth of the Christian Era. All the churches and the critics of the churches are therefore in some way or other taking stock.

The Society of Friends is in many things one of the acknowledged fortresses of the Christian Church. The smallness of its membership has to some extent its compensations in solidity and selectness.

Our one weak spot at the present moment is our "ministry." In our over-concern for its freeness and its purity on the one hand, and our almost entire neglect of its appropriate culture on the other, we have expected the impossible, and have too often drifted into the undesirable.

In reviewing our position it seems to me to be necessary to take account not only of facts, but also of first principles. In both these matters the standard set by the founders of our religious body was as intelligible and practicable as it was pure and high.

The names of George Fox, William Penn, and Robert Barclay are unquestioned representative names. What they complained of in the ministry of their day was the flood of priestism and mere professionalism that so largely dominated the Christian Church. They were human, and probably overestimated the amount of the prevailing mere professionalism. Looking back upon the saintly lives of some of the Episcopalian, Presbyterian, and other stipendiary preachers of those Puritan times, we cannot but conclude that the founders of our Society did make grave mistakes in this direction. Let us, however, make what allowances we may and ought, still there was sufficient ground for their adopting a new practice, and setting up a new standard—new, that is to say, to that age, but not new to Christianity itself. This new practice was apostolic in character, and as free from the professional taint as the Apostle Paul himself could have wished it to be. It had also another characteristic which professionalism and even priestism affected, and occasionally (let us hope, more than occasionally) possessed, but by no means uniformly carried along with them. It was, with its own inevitable exceptions, a prophetic or inspired ministry as distinguished from a mediatorial or sacrificing priesthood, and also from a mere dispensing of acquired book-knowledge by skilled, religious orators or trained theologians.

The founders of our Christian Society said that a man's authority to preach was his direct call to the work by Christ, and that his qualification was his personal spiritual knowledge and experience received in the school of Christ, coupled with his possession of an actual gift for preaching bestowed direct from heaven, no official license to preach being necessary. They, however, made it clear that they valued education as a help to the preacher, though they could not admit that a literary qualification was vital. By this means they secured preachers from all the classes, and from all shades of intellectual power. This made it easier for them to make a clean sweep of every appearance of professionalism by the abolition, as far as our section of the Church is concerned, of all fees and stipends from any source whatever.

Comparing the two systems in their relation to efficiency, we can easily see that, as a provision for speaking power and for educational work, the professional system has a decided advantage. The system of spontaneity, as ours may be called, is liable to literary inefficiency, mannerism, and even to open collapse during periods of lull or drift, where the professional may be fully maintained in at least some kind of apparent prosperity.

This is a plain statement of some of the issues involved in our choice of what we speak of as a "free gospel ministry." There can be no service in any mere silence upon the facts, nor does it follow that in facing the facts boldly we are thereby called upon to abandon or even to modify the broad principles of our position.

In these days of all the 'isms, it is, however, of the first importance that our young men and our young women should have a clear and firm grasp, not so much of our traditions as of our undying principles in regard to the "ministry," so that they may stand where they ought to stand, in the forefront of the battle in the Church's "good fight of faith."

I would therefore invite our young men in particular, but also all our members, young and old, male and female, to the following practical considerations, as I take it that we not only wish to possess a correctly ordered, but also an efficient ministry:—

(1) A non-professional ministry, real and effective, can only be replenished from the ranks of a living church.

(2) Its character and efficiency can only be sustained by the means which Paul prescribed for Timothy: "Give heed to reading, to exhortation, to teaching; neglect not the gift that is in thee. Be diligent in these things, give thyself wholly to them, that thy progress may be manifest to all" (I Tim., iv., 13-15). All of which things are covered by our modern word "culture," when that word is properly and relatively applied.

(3) There can be no question that this kind of sustenance means expenditure of time and money by the minister, and in some cases disappointment of the hopes and ambitions of parents and friends in connection with the education of their children. It was so in the apostolic age. It was so with our early Friends. It has been so many a time since. It will be so again with our present-day Friends if our section of the church is to live. All kinds of self-sacrifice are involved in the thorough development of a non-professional, inspired, and efficient ministry.

The compensations of such a ministry are large both to the minister and to those who are ministered to. One inevitable condition must, however, be complied with. There must be wide and deep, if not absolute, sympathy between the minister thus working and the church with whom he works, and whose "servant" he is "for Jesus's sake." The possible lapse of this mutuality of concern between church and minister is our most outstanding danger, e. g., the churches which have a professional ministry get hold of their young men and train them, in some cases at great cost. We, with our purer ministry, as we think, somehow lose grip of our young men for whole periods of our history. Is not this because we leave them at the mercy of a wild, spontaneous growth which is not at all the kind of spontaneity which our forefathers bequeathed to us, either through their writings or their example? And yet the young men are as valuable and necessary to us as they are to the other churches. George Fox, William Penn, Robert Barclay, George Whitehead, Edward Burrough, and, with a few exceptions, all the other founders of our church, were young men ranging from about eighteen to thirty or thirty-five years of age when they began their ministry. Men of ripe years have undoubtedly had their place of importance in our body as in all the churches, but it has been mostly, if not always, because the young men grew older. Church founders, church upbuilders, and church reformers have been all mostly so as young men before they were so as old men, and I believe that the future of our own church lies mainly in the hands and the hearts of the young men and the young women of this generation, and that very largely through their "ministry," if that future is to be "worthy of the Lord."

I shall probably be met by observers of existing conditions with two very important statements of difficulties:

(1) Although we have not what can strictly be called a creed, yet we have in charge a Great Fund of broadly defined Christian Truth. Are our young people in this somewhat unsettled age sufficiently "sound in the Faith" to represent faithfully our position as one of the churches of Christendom?

(2) If "culture" is necessary to efficiency, is not an inspired non-professional ministry impracticable for all but a very select few? Does not the very suggestion of "culture" undermine the position we have taken in regard to this branch of Christian work?

In answer to these two objections, I can only say that to the "fearful and unbelieving" these two difficulties are insurmountable. To such minds they place us not only outside the circumference of a non-professional and inspired ministry, but very nearly outside our possibilities as a church. I believe, however, that such fears and unbelief are needless and groundless.

The passing phase of unsettlement which is affecting all the churches can only result in a restatement, not in an abandonment, of any vital truth. We of all the churches should surely have no reason to doubt that the great spiritual truths of Christianity will survive, and while they will retain all their power to mould our young people, it is quite beyond the power of our young people to remould them.

So much for the first difficulty. As for the second, why should a difficulty be even felt now which was not so much as thought of by the Apostle of the Gentiles? It was in the very midst of his work and not as a long period of previous college preparation that Timothy was to devote himself to reading and the other means of equipment. And why should the humblest and least educated of our ministry suffer any neglect in the way of equipment? George Fox's testimony was to a ministry of all the talents, but not to the non-improvement even of the one. No doubt there will be amongst us the men of the "ten talents," who are called upon to strive for the possession of other ten talents in the prosecution of their sacred calling. That, however, need not restrict our ministry, nor involve the growth amongst us of the ugly exotic of a "Class ministry." It is for the church itself to see to it that no such thing as this shall weaken its power for good, or injure its very life. We are not accustomed to admire the church of Rome as a model Christian church, but it has this one striking feature, viz, that in the priest all social distinction dies. This noble sentiment is a survival from purer times—times when there was no priest in the modern sense in the Christian church, and it is a sentiment which lies at the very root of a free, inspired, and non-professional ministry, but does not by any means preclude the culture of the God-given talent.

Passing from the difficulties of the church, which are more apparent than real, I am free to confess that there is at work amongst us, especially among our young men, a sense of real difficulty in reducing our principles to practice, a difficulty in relation to the ministry which tends either to sullen quietism, to a feeling of semi-martyrdom, to disaffection, or occasionally to positive unbelief in the correctness of our doctrinal position. For my part, I believe that the sense of difficulty would vanish before an intelligent and clear grasp of our principles as distinguished from our traditions.

If our Society is to have vitality, and to increase in numbers and spiritual value as an outward and visible sign thereof, our young and strong men will have to come to the front, in Gospel ministry, will have to be prepared to make sacrifices, and, aided and upheld by the prayers and active sympathy of the rest of the members, will have to present an undivided front to the foe in all really essential matters. And the church as a whole will have to see to it that it has no part or lot, directly or indirectly, in the sacrifice of its young men, or even in the neglect of them, in this great and important relationship. Nothing that savors of obstruction, petty persecution, or cynical disregard should have room to grow anywhere within a church, and, if possible, much less so in regard to a work so vital to the church's life. The common watchword should be—

"Arise, shine, for thy light is come,
And the glory of the Lord hath risen upon thee."

I am fully aware that I am treading on delicate ground. It is, if anything, more necessary to present-day Quakerism than it was to apostolic times that the advice should be observed to "lay hands suddenly on no man." The work of the ministry is a serious matter for a young Friend, woman or man, in this very exacting age, and no Friend, old or young, is well advised who would minimize its seriousness. It is serious enough amongst our own people who know us, and who, out of love for our cherished beliefs and methods, are ready to overlook much that is defective in the matter and manner of those who make even small attempts to serve the Master in our wonted way. There is, however, a great public to which even our section of Christ's church is in duty bound to make its appeal, and this is very largely done, when done most effectively, through its ministers. It is therefore necessary that there should be a good and continuous supply in all our meetings of such ministers as rightly divine the Word of Truth. It is even more needed in our ordinary meetings for worship than in those we call "public meetings," especially as these are now almost a thing of the past, inasmuch as the public that visits them is mostly a selected public, and likely to continue so.

Any young man who realizes what he is doing undertakes a really formidable task when he essays to address a meeting for worship, and the more rightly concerned he is the more formidable he feels it. It is, however, one of those formidable things that must be done, and the best men to do it are those who most realize the formidable nature of the work. And, after all, nothing strengthens a man's (or woman's) own soul like the serious, divinely prompted, and love-inspired, determined attempt to do the apparently impossible, when the work to be done is, as under such circumstances it will be, the really possible. Duty and the love of souls should saturate every word that is uttered, the love of the souls that are actually present. If stern words are necessary, they should be directed against sin and error, and it should be made very clear that they are not directed against the sinner himself as such, but against the sin only. In the presence of God, and gathered in the name of Christ, we should each of us, and ministers in particular, pose only as co-workers with the God of Love and co-saviours with the Saviour of the World, "who gave himself for us to redeem us from all iniquity, and to purify unto himself a purchased people zealous of good works." B. ATTACK.

A NEW LIFE OF GEORGE FOX.¹

THIS little volume is the latest addition to the series written by Frances Anne Budge, which has included "Annals of Early Friends," "Stephen Grellet," "Thomas Ellwood," etc.

In moderate compass the author gives a vivid picture of the great founder of Quakerism, drawing freely upon Fox's journal, and giving much sympathetic narrative and interpretation of her own. The book is brief enough to give the reader a good view of the subject in a few sittings. As one reads he is impressed anew with the remarkable power and utter fearlessness of this godly man. The author has the gift of portraying her subject in all the striking and salient features of his character; whether it be in the vile prison-house, before hostile courts, in the hands of infuriated mobs, or during the hours of quiet communion, George Fox stands forth continually from these pages a consecrated and devoted figure.

The personal appearance of Fox is thus described:

"He was tall of stature, with a countenance of majestic sweetness, surrounded by luxuriant hair. He had a large share of bodily strength, and was said to be firm as a tree and pure as a bell. The activity of his brain showed itself in the brightness of eyes, which could fill with tears at a tale of sorrow, but flash piercingly on the perverse disputant. His voice was powerful, and he could speak for hours together to crowds assembled in the open air. His habits were remarkably active, and he seemed indifferent to exposure to weather or fatigue. When refused a lodging he would often pass a night with no other shelter than that afforded by a furze-bush or a hay-stack. He went swiftly from place to place, sometimes on foot but more frequently on horseback. He liked clean and good linen, and his costume seems to have been that worn by other gentlemen of his day, but without the trimmings which were then fashionable. His mind was one of large grasp, and he had a full share of common sense and ready wit."

The book is one to be commended to those who have not time for the larger works on George Fox.

The following sentence is worthy of note, pointing out that Fox rightly valued the graces of life,—an example that we as a people do not always follow, yet one that had rich flowering in the faultless gentleness and courtesy of the Friend whom we have so recently lost:

"William Penn says he was 'civil beyond all forms of breeding,' and this is the more noticeable because it was Fox's belief that the religion of Christ led to a simple mode of behavior as well as of attire and living."

¹ THE STORY OF GEORGE FOX AND SOME EARLY FRIENDS. By Frances Anne Budge. London: Headley Brothers.

ONE Former is worth a thousand Reformers.
—Horace Mann.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS

1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

NO. 30.—SEVENTH MONTH 23.

THE MINOR JUDGES.—SAMSON.

GOLDEN TEXT.—Beware I pray thee and drink not wine nor strong drink.—Judges, xiii., 4.

Scripture Reading.—Judges, xvi., 4-31.

JUST preceding the account of Jephtha there are mentioned two "Judges," Tola and Jair, of whom almost nothing is told. Again, after the story of Jephtha and before the tales of Samson, there are named three others, Ibzan, Elon, and Abdon. These five are known as the minor judges. Nothing further is known of them.

If it is true that something of legend has probably crept into the story of Jephtha, it must be said that it forms most of the substance of the story of Samson. It is only by a somewhat violent wrenching of the meaning of the term that the name Judge can be applied to him at all. There is nothing in the whole tale of the dignity or sobriety which we are accustomed to connect with the office. Neither is there any instance given of leadership by him, nor of special reliance on him, on the part of the Israelites. If he was at war with the Philistines, the enemies of his country, it was rather a personal feud, in which he declared war on his own account, than one in which he led his tribe or his nation. Indeed, on at least one occasion his people rejected his interference as meddling and likely to result in greater oppression. (Judges, xv., 11.)

Three things may be noted as especially remarkable in the tales of Samson:—his personal character, his strong sense of humor, and the extravagance of the feats attributed to him. Samson was a Nazarite, or one vowed to God from his birth. The Nazarites existed as a sect even down to the time of Jesus. At this later time they were noted for the austerity of their lives and for their zeal in the observance of the law. Nothing of this is to be seen in the case of Samson. The only marks of his dedication are his unshorn locks. It does not demand of him even personal purity. He is licentious and cruel. Murder and arson are a jest. Physical courage and a light heart are all he has to recommend him. The whimsical nature of Samson and of many of his adventures are unique in Hebrew history. Humor is not an element of the Semitic mind. Its nearest approach is the cruel taunt or the savage jest at the expense of some object of hate. The light humor of the western nations is beyond their ken. In the case of Samson we have the single exception among Bible characters, though even in his case there is usually a bitter and cruel substratum in the apparent lightness of his jesting.

As to the extravagance of the tales, any of them will serve for example: the rending asunder of the lion with bare hands; the slaughter of the thousand Philistines with the jaw bone of an ass; the carrying off of the gates of Gaza; the thousands slain in the fall of the temple. This is a common characteristic of popular fables in the early life of a people.

The close resemblance of the tale of Samson to certain well-known myths should not be ignored. The story of Hercules comes at once to mind, but the resemblance here is a superficial one. Much closer is the relation with the "sun-myths" or allegories so commonly found in folk-lore, in which the sun in his contests with cold and with darkness, is personified. Such interpretation of the Samson stories is suggested by his name, which means "sun-man." His long, flowing locks, the source of his strength, may well have been connected with the sun's rays; moreover, the name of his mistress, who accomplished his downfall (Delilah), is closely connected with the Hebrew word for night. The Samson stories have little ethical merit and are almost the only ones of their kind in the Bible. They "bear the marks of popular origin and doubtless had been repeated by generations of Israelite story-tellers before they were first written down."

In the tales we are introduced to the tribe of Dan, one of the smallest and least important of the tribes. The next lesson will tell of the removal of a portion of the Danites to the far north. Doubtless, however, a part of the tribe had been left in the south, where it originally settled. This territory was northwest of Judah and west of Benjamin and Ephraim. It was thus in immediate contact with the land of the Philistines, who in these stories appear for the first time as enemies and oppressors of Israel. Only by this fact can we place the period attributed to Samson. It must have been just preceding or just subsequent to the time of the Philistine conquest told of in I Samuel. It would not be profitable to go into any extended analysis of the tales. The chief incidents are as follows: (1) His marriage with a Philistine woman. In the course of this account are told the killing of the lion, the riddle and its solution, his desertion of his wife and the consequent feud between him and the Philistines; (2) Arising from this feud the burning of the grain fields of the Philistines and the subsequent slaughter of a thousand of their men; (3) The carrying off of the gates of Gaza; (4) His intrigue with Delilah and the betrayal; (5) His imprisonment, and his revenge in the overthrow of the temple. Notice that even this last act is with a jest upon his lips. "Give me strength. . . that I may avenge myself for one of my two eyes." In connection with the stories the usual formula in conclusion, "He had judged Israel twenty years," is manifestly incorrect and misleading. The tales have their value in the insight they give as to the national ideals. It will be seen that courage and lightness of heart are all that are required. Such a character could not be a popular hero in any time when high ideals obtained. Compare him with Ulysses or with Siegfried, who hold somewhat similar places in the folk-lore of Greeks and Northmen, and he takes a distinctly lower place. We must not lose sight of the fact that the high ethical tone of the Bible is due, not to the popular mind of the Hebrews, but to those choice spirits who stood as their religious leaders. Doubtless the historian of Judges included the Samson stories in response to popular demand rather than because of any special fitness for the purpose he had in mind.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

BAPTISM.

THOSE who have spiritual baptism,—immersion in, or even sprinkling with, the love of God, and his approval,—can receive no spiritual benefit from the application of water. And those who are dipped into water, or sprinkled with it, in the outward ceremony, are profited nothing unless they have received otherwise the baptism from God. John the Forerunner, who baptized with water, himself said on this subject, (John, iii., 27): "A man can receive nothing, except it have been given from heaven." "Jesus himself baptized not," is the Scripture account (John, iv., 2). Paul records that he baptized few, and was glad of it, and he adds (I. Corinthians, i., 17): "For Christ sent me not to baptize but to preach the gospel." "In one Spirit," he declares (I. Corinthians, xii., 13), "were we all baptized into one body, whether Jews or Greeks, whether bond or free; and were all made to drink of one Spirit." S.

TREES are the most civil society. An old oak that has been growing where he stands since before the Reformation, taller than many spires, more stately than the greater part of mountains, and a living thing, liable to sickness and death, like you and me; is not that in itself a speaking lesson in history? But acres on acres full of such patriarchs contiguously rooted, their green tops billowing in the wind, their stalwart younglings pushing up about their knees; a whole forest, healthy and beautiful, giving color to the light, giving perfume to the air; what is this but the most imposing piece in nature's repertory?—Robert Louis Stevenson.

"BLESSED are those holy hours in which the soul retires from the world to be alone with God. God's voice, as Himself, is everywhere. Within and without, He speaks to our souls, if we would hear. Only the din of the world, or the tumult of our own hearts deafens our inward ear to it. Learn to commune with Him in stillness, and He whom thou hast sought in stillness will be with thee when thou goest abroad."

THE world is a looking-glass
Wherein ourselves are shown,
Kindness for kindness, cheer for cheer,
Coldness for gloom, repulse for fear,
To every soul its own,
We cannot change the world a whit,
Only ourselves which look at it.—Susan Coolidge.

HOLD fast to your friends. It is one of the commonest regrets in after life that early friendships were not kept up; change of residence, neglect of correspondence, or of holiday courtesies, some divergence of taste or outward condition,—for some such cause a true friendship is often suffered to languish and die out.—Munger.

THE first time I read an excellent book, it is to me just as if I had gained a new friend; when I read over a book I have perused before, it resembles the meeting with an old one.—Oliver Goldsmith.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 15, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE WORK.

[Editorial Letter.]

THE letter and editorial article which I sent from The Hague I have not yet seen in print (they may appear, probably, in the issue for this week), but I think the rather confident judgment which I expressed as to the Conference outcome has been, and will be, well borne out. In the dispatches sent from The Hague to the Guardian, of Manchester (by W. T. Stead, editor of the English Review of Reviews, and well known in other ways), there was yesterday a summary of the probable results of the Conference, and those on the affirmative side are summed up as follows:

First, the Conference has taken up, revised, and enacted rules for applying the Geneva Convention to naval warfare.

Secondly, the Conference has revised and approved unanimously a code of rules for the conduct of war in relation to the operations of a land war, humanizing them in many respects and furnishing every belligerent with a complete code as to the treatment of non-combatants, prisoners of war, etc.

Thirdly, the Conference has established a complete code of arbitration and provided machinery for the immediate constitution of arbitration tribunals and commissions of investigation whenever disputes arise between nations which they wish to settle amicably. The tribunal of arbitration will decide the dispute finally, both parties being pledged beforehand to accept the award, whatever it may be. The commissions d'enquete will merely investigate all the facts and make a report, which can be accepted or rejected at the option of the disputants. This recognizes the principle "Always investigate before you fight." Further, the Conference binds the Powers to offer their good offices for mediation between Powers on the eve of war, and provides a special form of mediation, with the double object, first, of obviating war, and secondly, after war has broken out, of facilitating intervention for bringing it to a close.

Two negative results are also recited—one in reference to armaments, and one relating to new "weapons of destruction." As to the latter, apparently the conclusion is really final that there shall be no important restriction placed upon the development of the most effectively destructive weapons. The "dum-dum" bullet, used by the English troops in India against the tribesmen of the northern border lands, is not to be forbidden, though all the nations at the Conference united in condemning it, except—the exception seems notable, and I must explain it in a moment—the United States and England. One restriction, however, has been agreed on: for five years the throwing of explosives from balloons upon combatants is forbidden unanimously. The two English-speaking nations, it is understood, voted against restriction of destructive weapons, upon the ground that the more destructive they were made the less likely nations would undertake war. Perhaps this is a sound view, but the support of the "dum-dum" bullet, (which, though not actually explosive, is practically so, the lead being flattened out in the flesh by harder material behind it, and causing a horrible wound) by Americans and Englishmen, can only be excused—if excused at all—upon the theory just stated.

The dispatches which have been generally printed have referred to the Disarmament proposal as having failed. But this, I think, from the advices now at hand, is not correct. There has been good work done, and a good result has been achieved, even in that particular. It appears most probable that the Conference will make a definite and positive declaration that the well-being of nations demands a reduction of war burdens, and will express the hope that a future Conference may effectively deal with it. If so much as this is done, it will be a great triumph for Peace, for it will place on record the international judgment that the burdens of Militarism are so great as to call for reduction. If not actually a step in the right direction it is a look that way, and to have this is very much, for the European looking had all been in the wrong direction for a long time.

The "mediation" feature, which is part of the Arbitration plan, is the proposal of F. W. Holls, of New York, secretary of our American delegation. Its essential feature is that two nations in controversy, on coming to the heated stage of diplomacy, shall select "seconds"—one nation each—to whom they may refer their interests. It is possible that this may add to Arbitration a further deterrent against war.

I feel that it is entirely safe, now, to say that the Conference is truly a success. Nothing, I think,—unless it should be a most untoward and unfortunate outbreak of violence in some important quarter,—can arrest the conclusions which have practically been reached, and these, being such as are outlined above, are all those of Peacefulness, as far as they go. Even Disarmament is not "decently buried," as has been cynically said so many times; it is not buried at all, but carefully kept alive as a pending question, and with the favorable declaration of the Conference. Altogether, The Hague Conference is an essential and important triumph for Christian progress as against Pagan reaction.

H. M. J.

Manchester, Eng., Seventh month 1.

WHY SUMMON THE PEACEABLE?

IN the making of war there is a question that continually presents itself: Why do those who incline to war, and who continually foment it, wish to draw peaceable people into their enterprises? Why, if they must make war, not be content to make it themselves?

Cowper said, a century ago, that "war's a game which were their subjects wise, kings would not play at," perceiving that while some persons fomented the quarrel, they then drew others in to help maintain it. This is still true. The war people are not content to embroil themselves; their uniform plan is to embroil their country. The "game of war" which kings played so long must be played also by military classes, by adventurous and reckless statesmen, by persons who happen to be in power. In each case the anxiety to fight which they profess is uniformly followed by the demand that others shall join them in doing it. Their disposition in this respect has led, indeed, to the system of compulsion in the Old World, from which peaceable Christians like the Doukhobors are escaping. Under such a system men are forced to leave their productive associations, their homes, and their families, to perform military service. Most of them not only do not desire to go, but go with reluctance, yet the war-makers are insistent that they shall; they claim not merely their own liberty to fight, but the power to compel every one else to do the same.

There is another notable feature of the case. It is that the war-makers demand, besides all else conceded them, that they shall be paid while they are seeking military "glory," and that this payment shall be made out of the general purse. They are not willing to bear their own expenses, though it be their own enterprise. The cost of their wars, usually very great, and sometimes crushing, they require to be saddled upon the country, on aggressive and peaceable alike. This seems a demand almost as bad, and quite as unreasonable, as the other. If some wish to go shooting, for their own pleasure, for vent to their feelings, for expression of their hatred of one nation or contempt for another, for fame, for glory, for prominence that will make them governors or congressmen, why should they expect that the expense of this should be borne by those who have no such desire at all,—who think, on the contrary, that Christian persuasives are better than slaughter with cannon and sword, that all men and women, the world over, are children of a common Father, and that the justice we claim for ourselves is due as well to others?

These questions seem pertinent, and while we have not much hope that war advocates will be willing to flock by themselves, fight their own battles, and pay the expense from their own pockets, certainly they ought to do so. They would improve by that much their present indefensible course.

BIRTHS.

FETTER.—At San Francisco, California, Fifth month 22, 1899, to Frank A. and Martha W. Fetter, a son, who is named Frank Whitson Fetter.

MARRIAGES.

WOLFE—WEBSTER.—At Norristown, Sixth month 30, 1899, under the care of Gwynedd Monthly Meeting, Pa., S. Carbon Wolfe, of Williamsport, Pa., son of David G. and Mary A. Wolfe, of Norristown, and Eliza J., daughter of Elizabeth J. and the late William Webster, of Norristown, Pa.

DEATHS.

BACON.—On Second-day, Seventh month 3, 1899, at Spring Lake Beach, N. J., Sarah W. Bacon, in her 74th year; a first cousin of the late Joseph and Mary Bacon; a member of the other body of Friends.

CORSE.—Seventh month 7, 1899, at her late residence, Furley Hall, Baltimore, Md., Deborah Sinclair Corse, widow of William Corse, in her 90th year; a member of Baltimore Monthly Meeting.

FISHER.—In Upper Uwchlan, Chester county, Pa., Seventh month 8, 1899, Minerva Taylor, wife of Vernon L. Fisher. She was the daughter of Jesse and the late Anna Taylor, of West Goshen, and was in her 37th year; a member of Birmingham Monthly Meeting of Friends.

HOLLINGSWORTH.—At the residence of her brother, Thomas Hollingsworth, Little Falls, Maryland, Sixth month 30, 1899, Sarah Hollingsworth, in her 60th year.

JARRETT.—In Des Moines, Ia., Fifth month 26, 1899, Jesse T. Jarrett, formerly of Bucks county, in his 82d year.

LIPPINCOTT.—Seventh month 2, 1899, Rebecca H. Lippincott, aged 68 years. Funeral from Woodstown, N. J., meeting-house.

SLACK.—In Newtown township, Bucks county, Pa., Sixth month 26, 1899, after a protracted illness, Joseph Slack, in his 63d year.

THE DOUKHOBOR FUND.

THE sum of $50 has been received from Anna T. Jeanes to add to the fund in aid of the Doukhobors.

SAYS Emerson, "A purpose is a companion." And the companion is good if the purpose is good. It pushes a man right along as if it had strong hands. It nerves his heart as if it had an actual voice and were bidding him be brave. It encourages him to persevere. It assists him to climb. There is strength in it and inspiration in it and glorious help in it. A man without a purpose is a lonely man, a shiftless man, a useless man. It takes purpose successfully to carry us through the ever-varying experiences of life; and without purpose no man shall ever find heaven.—The Evangel.

THE true moment at which to call upon one's self to take any new step in virtue is at the fainting-point, when it would seem so easy to drop all and give all up; when, if you do not, you make of yourself a power.—J. F. W. Ware.

"It has certainly been a great war when there are enough heroes for the politics of the country."

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

V.—THE "WHITE SLAVE" CONGRESS.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

A MEETING of men and women from most of the countries of Europe, and from the United States, has been held in London, this week, under the designation above. It referred to the traffic which, competent authorities declare, is extensively carried on between all the European countries, in young women, who are enticed, induced, or in some cases practically kidnapped, and are taken to the cities for purposes of evil.

The very suggestion of this is shocking, but such, I have just said, is declared to be the case. The National Vigilance Association, a society formed here in London (there are hundreds of voluntary associations, for every sort of charitable and public object), has had the subject under consideration, and it was finally decided to call an International Congress, or Conference, to see what might be done to check or stop the "traffic," by a common agreement among the nations as to the laws, the penalties, the places and manner of trial, etc. W. A. Coote, the Secretary of the Association, made some time ago a tour over Europe to awaken interest in the matter and secure the attendance of delegates.

The Congress met at 10, on the 21st. (There had been a Reception to the foreign delegates, by the English, the previous evening, at the rooms of the Royal Society of British Artists, and some of the delegates, on the morning and afternoon of the 20th, had been taken to visit hospitals, etc.) The place of meeting was the large drawing-room of the Westminster Palace Hotel, on Victoria street, near Westminster Abbey and the Houses of Parliament. This was of very suitable size; probably two hundred persons could be comfortably seated, and about that many—I should guess—were usually present. Two sessions, at 10 and 1.30, were held on the 21st, 22d, and 23d, and the Congress finally adjourned about 5 on the last-named day. There were six American delegates present, Henry Chase, of Boston, secretary and executive officer of the "Watch and Ward Society" of that city; Professor William I. Hull and Hannah Clothier Hull, of Swarthmore; Mary Travilla and Sarah R. Paiste, of West Chester, Pa.; and myself. All of us, except Mr. Chase, came with credentials, signed by our late dear friend, Aaron M. Powell, as President of the American Purity Alliance, and as you will readily presume, it was through his interest in such work (upon the invitation of the National Vigilance Association) that we five delegates were present at the Congress; we felt, indeed, that we were in no small measure representing him personally, and endeavoring—very imperfectly—to do what he would like to have done.

The American delegates, however, did not take a prominent part. It was felt that the business in hand was European chiefly, and the disease to be dealt with, like that of Militarism, one which has its seat and centre on the Continent. The nations were heard in turn, and the United States came on the 22d, early in the afternoon. Mr. Chase read an excellent, short paper (the limit was fifteen minutes), giving practical details of experience in Boston (not especially as to actual "traffic" in young women, for there is not very much of this, probably, in the United States, excepting at New York and San Francisco); and I spoke a few minutes, referring to the general condition and attitude of our country on the Social Evil, and closing with a reference to the loss sustained by the work which the Congress represented in the death of Aaron M. Powell. He was known to many present, and quite a number spoke to me, and to our other delegates, of him, in terms of high appreciation.

Following my little address, Dr. Wm. I. Hull, of Swarthmore College, read to the Congress the Greeting which A. M. P. had prepared, before he came over to Philadelphia, on the 13th of last month, and which he had entrusted to Dr. H. and wife for presentation. This was all of the American hearing at that time; on Sixth-day afternoon, at the close, Dr. Hull spoke briefly and fittingly, in terms of congratulation and hope for the work of the Congress.

The proceedings on each of the three mornings were begun in the English manner by several distinguished persons. At the opening session, 21st, the Duke of Westminster was in the chair, and spoke. Following him the Bishop of London (Dr. Mandell Creighton), and H. W. Webb-Peploe, a prominent clergyman (a "prebendary") of the Established Church. At the opening on the 22d, the speakers were (Roman Catholic) Cardinal Vaughan, the Countess of Aberdeen, H. J. Wilson, M. P., (of Sheffield, an earnest and practical friend of good works; he was very kind to members of our party), and Canon Scott Holland. On the 23d, the Earl of Aberdeen presided, and the other speakers were Lady Battersea, Dr. Adler, the chief Jewish rabbi of London, and Lord Kinnaird. All these spoke with force, and interestingly; it was, of course, a pleasure to hear and see them. Among the Continental delegates were several of considerable distinction, including a young Russian, Prince Serge Volkonsky, who told me he had attended courses of lectures at Cornell University; Count von Bernstoff, chamberlain to the German Emperor; M. Berenger, a member of the French Senate; Pastor Olbers, chaplain to the king of Sweden; Count von Moltke, of Denmark, and others. Many of the delegates were women, and represented serious and valuable organized effort in behalf of young women. The countries represented in the Congress were Austria, Belgium, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Norway, Russia, Sweden, Switzerland, Great Britain, and the United States.

The proceedings of the Congress were interesting, and I think they will be of service. The papers presented abounded in facts; most of them were by persons having exact knowledge of their subject. The conclusions were to form an international organization, through which to endeavor to secure an international agreement, and a uniform system of law and legal penalties referring to those who carry on the "White Slave" traffic. The proceedings were generally in English, but many of the delegates, especially those from France and Switzerland, including Senator Berenger, spoke and read only in French, and their remarks were usually interpreted for the benefit of those who did not understand that language. Among the English speakers whom I have not named were Percy W. Bunting, chairman of the council of the National Protective Association, a barrister, and editor of the Contemporary Review; Mrs. Sheldon Amos, the widow of a distinguished London professor, and authority on social subjects; Mrs. Henry Fawcett, who read a most interesting paper; Prof. James Stuart (formerly of Cambridge University), now M.P. for the Shore-ditch division of London; Samuel Smith, M.P.; and others. Prof. Stuart is a most earnest and energetic man, and one of the strong advocates of all those movements of progress which readers of the INTELLIGENCER sympathize with; Mr. Smith, in his brief address (at the close of luncheon on the 22d), represented on many points—pure literature, the abolition of indecency in posters, etc., and modesty in women's dress—the very ideas of Friends.

I must mention that a subject which would not stay out of sight was that of the "State regulation" of evil houses. Many delegates were most earnestly opposed to this system. But it is the general rule on the Continent of Europe. Prostitution is not "against the law," there. It is recognized and "regulated." England abolished this system of regulation in 1886, after having it in operation several years, and it is not likely that it can ever again be established there, though efforts will be made, no doubt, to that end. Such a system is, of course, hideous; that it should exist at all only testifies to the hold which social vice has upon a community, and to the sad need which exists of elevating the moral tone. In Switzerland especially the issue has been made most sharply, and the opponents of the existing "regulation" are too earnest in the cause to allow any discussion of the subject without declaring their principles. But in this Congress, called to consider a particular proposition—the checking of the "traffic"—the presentation of argument or appeal concerning the regulation system was really not "in order," and no allusion to the subject was made in the declarations which were adopted.

The foreign delegates were entertained at luncheon, each day of the Congress, very handsomely, in the large dining-room of the hotel, sitting down at 12, and rising just before 1 o'clock. There was time, in each case, for some brief speeches before leaving the room. They were also invited to receptions on the evenings of the 22d and 23d (the one on the 20th is mentioned in the early part of the letter), the former invitation being by the Duke and Duchess of Westminster, from 10 to 12 p. m., at the great city home which they have, Grosvenor House, esteemed one of the handsomest residences in London. The kindness of this invitation was increased by the fact that the greater part of the guests were the personal and social friends of the hosts, and that the "foreign delegates" were simply added to the list, so that they had the opportunity of seeing a great society "function," and many of the most distinguished society people. Mr. White, the United States Secretary of Legation at London, was very kind and attentive to our American party, and helped materially to their enjoyment of the occasion.) The reception on the evening of the 23d was at the residence of Mr. Bunting, (named above), on Euston Square, and was a very pleasant occasion.

I think I have given the substance of the Congress, but my account is necessarily brief and imperfect. It is to be hoped that good will come of it.

London, Sixth month 24.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

ON SEEING A TURNER LANDSCAPE.

WE live in a world of inexhaustible beauty. It is God's own world, and everywhere the Divine Omnipresence is manifesting itself in an infinite variety of beautiful forms. We are created with eyes to see and capacity to enjoy the beauties of this world, and yet, like Wordsworth's Peter Bell, we are all too prone to go through life with eyes closed and feelings untouched by the marvels of nature.

"He roved among the vales and streams,
In the green wood and hollow dell;
They were his dwellings night and day,—
But Nature ne'er could find the way
Into the heart of Peter Bell.
In vain, through every changeful year,
Did Nature lead him as before;
A primrose by a river's brim
A yellow primrose was to him,
And it was nothing more."

God does not want his children to miss the blessings of his love. He works in many ways to open the blind eyes, and to rouse the human soul to a consciousness of its rightful inheritance. He sends his messengers unto every age, bidding them draw aside a little further the veil which hitherto has concealed from view the deep and hidden mysteries of creation; bidding them call all men to look and see what new beauties God has deigned to reveal to his people.

Who are these heavenly messengers chosen by God for such exalted service?

They are the men and women whom we all know,—those immortal names which were not born to die—those great personalities which appear every now and then upon the stage of this life, and who differ from the mass of men in their persistent habit of living very close to God; so close that he is able to make himself known to them, and to impress their souls and minds with the truths which he yearns to cast abroad among his children.

From very ancient times, even down to our own age, these messengers have come to teach us through literature, through art and music about the unity of Nature,—that it is all the work of one beneficent hand, and that all the varieties of creation are but parts of one great whole, whose author and maker is Jehovah, God. The messages of Truth may be given to us over and over again, but unless we realize them and make them our own, we can never attain to that sympathy with all created things which is able to lift us above that dead and monotonous level where Peter Bell, and all such as he, grovel hopelessly.

We have no excuses for living without appreciation and sympathy with Nature, for not only has God spread out before our eyes the riches of land and sea, and the glory of his heavens, but he has also endowed poets and artists with deep insight and given them the power to interpret nature in words that breathe and in pictures that speak eloquently,

Long centuries ago—five or six hundred years, perhaps, before the beginning of our era,—there lived in the distant land of Judah a Hebrew poet whose soul was so intent upon the message he had to proclaim, that he quite forgot to hand down his name to posterity along with the poems which he wrote; God's truth was the only thing which he thought it worth his while to perpetuate. We will name him Mother Nature's own poet, for she was to him a living, benignant presence, and spoke to him memorable things; he felt all creation pulsating with life.

"And the hills are girded with joy,
The pastures are clothed with flocks;
The valleys also are covered over with corn;
They shout for joy, they also sing."

Again, where he tells of the escape of Israel from Egypt, he describes all Nature as sympathizing with the great deliverance:

"The sea saw it and fled;
Jordan was driven back.
The mountains skipped like rams,
The little hills like young sheep.
What aileth thee, O thou sea, that thou fleest?
Thou Jordan, that thou turnest back?
Ye mountains, that ye skip like rams;
Ye little hills, like young sheep?
Tremble, thou earth, at the presence of the Lord,
At the presence of the God of Jacob;
Which turned the rock into a pool of water,
The flint into a fountain of waters."

Passing down the years even to our own century we meet with another inspired messenger of God, who used other means to attract men's thoughts to the beauties and wonders of Nature.

When the privilege comes into our lives of looking upon a painting by Turner, then must we feel like giving thanks to Him who sent into the world such an interpreter of Nature as this; and we must feel an impulse quickening within us, which bids us go and commune with Nature ourselves, more humbly and more reverently, that she may show to us also some of her hidden treasures, and bestow upon us a portion of her kindly spirit,—that spirit which seems to be breathing gently through the soft misty atmosphere of the Turner landscape, and expressing its blessings of verdure and shade through the dainty, graceful foliage,—that spirit whose smiles we see reflected upon the placid sheet of water, blue as the skies above it, and which calls to us from the receding, never-ending space in the background,—God is here, God is everywhere, God is all!

E. W. C.

DON'T look for the flaws as you go through life—
And even when you find them
It is wise and kind to be somewhat blind
And look for virtue behind them.
For the cloudiest night has a hint of light
Somewhere in its shadows hiding.—E. W. Wilcox.

THE income of the principal charitable institutions having their headquarters in London amounts to over £7,000,000 per annum.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

LETTER FROM DR. JAMES TYSON.

WITH a motion almost unappreciable, amid the cheering of the crowd on the wharf and the waving of handkerchiefs from ship and shore, the great Hamburg-American steamer dropped away from her moorings. The scene was gay and animated, though tempered with sadness, for on many faces was evident the effort to repress tears which would well up through smiles. In a couple of hours more the broad ocean surrounded us with the loneliness which is always felt at sea, even in the presence of so large a company as that which made up the list of the Augusta Victoria, many of whom were destined for the North Cape of Norway as well as for other ports of Europe.

With fair weather and a staunch ship the ills of the sea were not serious, and the first-day of the week found us nearly in mid-ocean. The day did not differ from others except that in the evening religious services of an informal and interesting kind were conducted by our fellow passenger, John Wanamaker, whose large experience in affairs and among all classes enabled him to draw upon resources, adapted to the occasion and the varied company assembled.

Fifth-day night, little more than a week after leaving New York, found us at Cherbourg, where many landed and traveled by special train to Paris. Only the last three or four hours of the ride were by daylight, so that it was only then that opportunity was presented for noting some of the characteristic scenery of Normandy. But even in our rapid transit on the fresh June morning, the varied shades of green and brown on the hills and valleys, the picturesque houses and walled gardens, were a refreshing picture which it will always be pleasant to recall. More than once was the beautiful "Angelus" of Millet called to memory by a man and woman working in a field, and it was plain whence came the suggestions to the artist. Here, as often elsewhere, came the wish that we could stop and live amid these scenes long enough to become thoroughly familiar with the country and its people.

We were not strangers in Paris, and therefore did not attempt the many things incident to a first visit. Observations in the street may be said to have been among our most interesting occupations. Objects of these were the extraordinary differences in Physiognomy and custom which characterize the residents of Paris. There were faces of every variety of expression, though a brutal face was rarely met. The stature of the men seemed below the American average, while the well-developed muscular type with the manly and often handsome bearing characteristic of Englishmen and Americans was also less frequent. The dress of the men is varied, the very long frock coat being often found, though less common than the short sack, and the cut-away somewhat suggestive of the coat formerly worn by Friends. The hats are even more varied and often fantastic in their shapes, including straw hats, uncouth caps, and silk hats of every variety, and even the very ungainly stove-pipe with flat brim such as is often seen in the pictures of the revered Abraham Lincoln. Indeed, I should not say that the dress of Parisian men as met on the streets sustains the reputation for elegance and good taste usually associated with the French people. The women uphold the national reputation better, all except the hardest working classes exhibiting the neatness and gracefulness we have learned to expect in the dress of French women.

The out-door holiday life of the French people always impresses the stranger, and at no time more than of a Sabbath afternoon, when the great drive and promenade of the Champs Elysées is crowded with vehicles and pedestrians so that it is dangerous for the latter to cross the street. This crowded condition is the more marked as the gendarme, or French policeman, does not seem to be nearly as supreme in his authority to stop vehicles that pedestrians may pass as does the London, New York, or Philadelphia policeman. A more satisfactory feature of the French street at once noted by the stranger here is the constancy and distinctness with which the streets are marked at the corners in large white letters on blue enamelled signs. This is quite general in Europe and in all my experience I know no city so poorly provided in this respect as Philadelphia. The feeble efforts recently made at home in this direction show the quality of work by the fact that the white letters are already beginning to fall off, while the names appear to be altogether absent just where one most needs to find them.

The Salon, now open, naturally attracts the attention of every visitor. It is commonly known that the annual exhibition thus named includes two societies of artists—the Société des Artistes Français, and the Société Nationale des Beaux-Arts. The two societies have their exhibits apart but under the same roof in the Palais des Machines. In the Champs de Mars, too, where this building stands, the great exhibition of next year is to be held, and the place is now a scene of great activity. An immense number of large iron buildings is being rapidly erected, and the exhibition will practically occupy the ground from the old Palais de l'Industrie on the north side of the Seine across to Champs de Mars on the south side. Doubtless an effort will be made to make this World's Fair surpass all previous ones, but it is evident to any one who knows the ground and who had the privilege of seeing the Columbian Exhibition at Chicago in 1893, that the natural advantages far exceeded those at Paris. The possibilities there offered by the proximity of Lake Michigan can probably be nowhere equalled.

To return to the Salon for a minute,—the present exhibition is regarded as inferior, partly because, it is said, the best works of art are being held back for exhibition next year. Many fine works in sculpture and painting are present, however, and the exhibit is well worth a couple of days' study. Descriptions of such work are only interesting to the reader when written by a master, I will therefore not attempt any, but I cannot refrain from alluding to a statue entitled "Militarism." It is an armored and helmeted figure more than life-size, bounded by sharp lines and angles as armored figures must be, and therefore totally without beauty, mounted on a base made of three tiers of heads, the foundation layer being naked skulls, the upper and second row of heads exhibiting the most agonized expression the artist could create. It is far from being an object of beauty, and perhaps not even a work of art, but nothing could more vividly portray the horrors of militarism.

That Paris is a beautiful city goes without saying. Yet perhaps there is no city in the world in which there is greater uniformity of architecture, except old Philadelphia, with its uniform red brick houses in rows miles in length. In Paris, miles of buildings of like architectural effect are seen, but they are white buildings of massive construction with large doors and windows and many stores, so that the effect is correspondingly fine. Then the city is clean in the highest degree, the avenues and boulevards are lined with rows of shade trees, mostly horse chestnuts, and there are many parks and gardens, provided with fountains and otherwise adorned. There are also many palatial residences surrounded by extensive grounds, and often through an open gate can be seen a handsome and extensive garden, the existence of which would not be otherwise expected, so common is it to surround them with high walls, though others again have low walls surmounted with open railings through which one can see the beautiful interior dense with trees, shrubbery, and flowers. J. T.

Paris, Sixth month 26, 1899.

"So far as I have encountered them," said a citizen of the world, "a characteristic of great men is that they have time. They are not in a hurry. They don't act as if every minute you stayed was valuable time lost to them; they don't fret and fidget. What time they do devote to you appears to be time that they can spare, and take things easy in, and be comfortable. The work seems to be incidental and it seems as though they could turn to it when the time came and get through it with ease; and they always seem, besides, to have strength in reserve. It is certainly a characteristic of the great man that he has time."—New York Sun.

WHEN we come to count over the qualities that endear our friends to us, we naturally think of the bright and cheerful talker who has been foremost in giving us enjoyment. The sunshiny men or women, boys or girls, who bring bright words, who can talk on all sorts of subjects without seeming hopelessly bewildered, because the subject on hand is not a local one, will be always as welcome in society as flowers in May.—Christian Instructor.

A GERMAN savant has constructed a bacillus-proof house. The supply of air is first forced through a pipe, it is then filtered through cotton wool, and, lastly, is driven against a sheet of plate glass coated with glycerine. This is supposed to catch all the bacteria which have not been seized by the cotton wool. It is built entirely of glass, that the heat of the sun may kill any stray microbes that have entered by chance.

A LARGE folio Book of Common Prayer, of 1652, which belonged to Bishop Creighton, who was Bishop of Bath and Wells, England, in 1670, has been returned to its old home in the palace at Wells, and added to the many historic treasures of the library. It is an excellent specimen of the binder's art, having been bound by S. Mearns, the binder to Charles II.

"LIGHT wall paper saves gas bills. According to statistics in a scientific journal the different values of fabrics and finishes in the way of light needs are in the following proportions: Black cloth, 100 candle power; dark brown paper, 87; blue paper, 72; clean yellow paint, 60; dirty wood, 80; clean wood, 60; cartridge paper, 20; whitewash, 15."

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

MILLVILLE, PA.—The Young Friends' Association met Fifth month 14. The opening exercise was the reading of the first chapter of Titus, by the president. This was followed by roll-call and responses, and the report of the Secretary, Mary R. Eck. The literary program consisted of a recitation by Nellie John and a selection by George Sands, "Love Much"; Rachel S. Eves read "The Doukhobors as Christians"; W. W. Eves, "The Example," by Dean Elizabeth Powell Bond; Ida E. Eves read an essay on "Middle Age." Current Events and discussion by the members concluded the exercises.

The next meeting was held at the meeting-house at Millville, Sixth month 11. A period of silence preceded the reading of the sixteenth chapter of Luke, by the President, Henry W. Eves. Arminta Kitchen served as Secretary in the absence of Mary R. Eck. Ellen Russell read from the "Life and Letters of James and Lucretia Mott"; "The Garden," a poem, was read by Jesse John; Margaret Eves read a carefully prepared essay on "Forms and Ceremonies," followed by reading "Tale-bearing and Detraction," by Charles Eves, and "The Power of Redemptive Love," by Francis M. Eves. The question, "What relation has the home to the church?" was discussed by members of the Association.

The members expect to continue the Association throughout the summer, and hope to maintain the interest in that and the other religious meetings. F. M. E.

WRIGHTSTOWN, N. J.—The Philanthropic Committee of Burlington Quarterly Meeting held a very interesting and instructive meeting at Upper Springfield Meeting-house, near Wrightstown, N. J., Sixth month 18.

This meeting-house is one of the oldest in our quarter; a portion of it was built in 1727; the other part has no date affixed. Both ends were opened (which is very unusual at this place) to accommodate the people.

Lukens Webster and wife, of Philadelphia, were present, and he gave us one of his interesting and stirring addresses on his usual topic, Temperance.

The teacher of the public school nearby and her pupils were also present, about 25 in number; they gave us some good selections, both individual and class exercises, which added much to the interest of the meeting. This teacher is from Philadelphia; she was dismissed from her situation there by the school-board for endeavoring to introduce temperance in the public schools of that city.

Some of the children of the First-day school had some good selections. A First-day school is held here every First-day in the year, and is kept up by one or two ardent and earnest workers.

One speaker said we must educate, and must agitate the subject of temperance and keep it before the people. We are looking and hoping for the coming generation to be better than the present, and to this end we must educate the people, showing them that total abstinence is the only safe ground to stand upon.

Representatives were present from Trenton, Mansfield, Old and Upper Springfield meetings. Persons were present from Juliustown, Pemberton, and Wrightstown, as were the farmers from nearby, who seemed anxious that a similar meeting be held at the same place one year hence.

F. S. ZELLEY, Clerk.

HORSHAM, PA.—At the last meeting of the Young Friends' Association Anna D. Hallowell opened the exercises by reading the twenty-fifth chapter of Exodus, after which two recitations were given, one by Emma Comly, "The Starless Crown," the other by Jervis Smith, "In His Service."

Isaac H. Hillborn then gave us his interesting talk on the Tabernacle; he exhibited a representation of this ancient Jewish temple which, he told us, he had made as carefully as he could by following the description given in the book of Exodus. He began by telling how the Children of Israel became slaves by selling themselves and all they had for food during the famine, which Joseph had foretold after he was sold into Egypt. He then told the story of Moses. When the Ten Commandments were given to Moses and the question arose among the people, "Where are they to be kept?" the priests asked every one who had a willing heart to contribute something towards building the Ark of the Covenant and the Tabernacle in which to keep it. This, when made, was the first church built for worshipping, in congregational form, the one true and living God. The incense which was burned in the holy of holies, a division of the Tabernacle, was a symbol of the prayers of the righteous which will fill the whole house and make sacred the atmosphere. Every part of the Tabernacle was made of the purest and best materials, and no one was allowed to go into the church and perform devotions unless he was pure and clean.

The Ark, after it was captured by the Philistines, was never placed in the Tabernacle, because the Jews felt that it had been contaminated. Just one thousand years later Solomon built his temple; and after its destruction two others were built on the same place, showing that the church of the living God is built upon the eternal rocks of Christ, the revelation of the Father made to his children.

Several sentiments were given, and the meeting then adjourned, all feeling very grateful to our friend Isaac H. Hillborn for giving us such a beautiful and instructive lesson.

ANNA T. JARRETT, Secretary.

HUNTINGTON, IND.—The Young Friends' Association met Sixth month 25, at Maple Grove. In the absence of the appointed chairman, Emma Brown, William Moore was chosen to act for the day. After routine business was transacted Michael Moore read an interesting paper on "The Fallacy of Resisting Evil." We should not strive to overcome evil by opposing it, thereby making it more prominent, but by encouraging the good. The farmer does not attend to his corn by simply pulling out the weeds, but he carefully hoes the soil up around each stalk, thereby making it thrive. Friction overcomes momentum. The thoughts presented were worthy of much consideration. After some discussion the meeting adjourned to meet at Maple Grove, Seventh month 23.

WILLIAM C. MOORE, Cor. Sec.

CORNWALL, N. Y.—Friends' Association met at the Seaman Homestead, on Sixth month 2, at the appointed time. The meeting was called to order by the chairman, Elizabeth K. Seaman. A paper entitled "The Debasing Influence of War," was prepared and read by Baldwin F. Brown, and the Life of Samuel M. Janney was read from the INTELLIGENCER, by Alice May Brown. Sentiments were given by nearly all those present. The terms of the present officers having expired with this meeting, the following officers were appointed for the next three months: President, Baldwin F. Brown; Secretary, Blanche E. Brown; Treasurer, Olive A. Barton.

Alice May Brown was appointed to have a paper for the next meeting, and Edmund Cocks to read the Life of Samuel M. Janney. After a short silence the meeting adjourned to meet at the home of Theodore Ketcham in four weeks.

EDMUND COCKS, Secretary.

An eminent physician says that no person should be permitted to drink tea or coffee until he or she has attained the age of eighteen years. In the young these beverages unduly excite the nervous system and have an injurious effect upon the digestive organs.

QUEEN VICTORIA has overcome her dislike to the electric light, which is now in use in all her palaces. The Albert Memorial Chapel at Windsor Castle (where the Dukes of Albany and Clarence are buried) is now being lighted by electricity, which will shortly be extended to St. George's Chapel.

A CORRESPONDENT at The Hague writes that in the whole arbitration matter the United States has scored a signal success, most of the ideas of the American delegates having been adopted. Their representations in Berlin secured Germany's assent.

LONDON, Ontario, has been placed under martial law, the mayor reading the riot act, and soldiers being put on guard everywhere. The trouble arose over the street car strike, which was declared May 22.

EDUCATIONAL NOTES.

SWARTHMORE PREPARATORY SCHOOL.—The list of instructors and matrons for next year at this school will be precisely the same as last year. Arthur H. Tomlinson, Principal, geometry; Hanna F. Mitchell, Vice-Principal, Reading and Grammar; Alice W. Jackson, English and Latin; Samuel C. Palmer, Athletic Director, Greek and Latin; Edward M. Noble, Arithmetic and Geography; Eleanor M. Hartman, French, German, and Piano; Mary L. Haines, Drawing and Painting; George Satterthwaite, Arithmetic and Spelling; Amy A. Way, Primary; Mary P. Green, Kindergarten:—all Friends but two.

MILLVILLE, PA.—The Friends' School at Millville, Pa., closed a successful year's work on Sixth month 16, 1899. The large school-room was filled with bright, expectant children and their parents and friends.

The exercises included addresses, essays, and recitations creditable to both teachers and pupils. In the evening the two graduates, Cora E. Wright and Amelia B. Heacock, delivered their essays, subjects "Doing Worthily," and "Out of the Darkness into the Light." Sarah T. Eves, a member of the school committee, addressed the students, and Emma H. Eves presented the diplomas with appropriate remarks. A brief address by the Principal, Henry W. Eves, concluded the exercises.

Literature.

THE robustious muse of authors like Kipling is not the only kind the world wants to hear; poetry of the delicate, meditative order will always be secure of its admirers. It is perhaps to our women poets that we must look just now for the most frequent utterance of the tender and reflective vein. Louise Imogen Guiney, Alice Brown, Lizette Woodworth Reese, Florence Earle Coates,—these and other poetesses are to-day handing on our finest traditions in verse. To their ranks now comes a new sister in the person of Alice Archer Sewall, with her volume of beautiful lyrics, "An Ode to Girlhood and Other Poems."

The title poem is a piece to be read by pensive maidens on a summer afternoon in some old garden; and they will find its lines no less fragrant than the roses and lilies about them, its music no less sweet than that of the birds flitting among the tall hollyhocks.

Subtle and fine is her apostrophe to girlhood, recognizing that the charm of budding womanliness is, after all, beyond the power of words.

"How can I write of you, whom to express
Is to remove from you chief perfectness?"

There are echoes of Wordsworth's splendid Ode on Intimations of Immortality in this lesser poem; something, too, of his serene happiness in the contemplation of childhood's thousand joyous and wistful ways.

"And little lambs and all the soft-cheeked flowers
Make occupations fit for the new hours
That come without regret and pass away
Without regret. For oh ye are so gay,
The most celestial heavens may express
In you their holiness."

Of the other poems adorning the white pages of this delicate book, "Madonna and Child," "How Love Came," "The Elm Tree," "Youth," "Lullaby," and "The Wedding Gown," best illustrate the author's characteristic mood of exquisite contemplation.

The perennial and unfailing hopefulness of life's earlier stages she thus voices,—the spirit of Youth is speaking,—

"I am the spirit that denies
This earth to be no more Paradise.
I deny that God walks not with men.
I have met Him at even and talked with Him
then.

I deny that one cannot race on through earth's heat
And come out healthy and clean and sweet.

I deny that God's path is so overgrown
That a child could not toddle straight to Him alone."

There is much need for such clear poetic vision and sane high-heartedness in these days when doubt and despondency are all too rife. (New York and London: Harper & Brothers.)

Some hitherto unpublished statements relative to the origin of the idea which has resulted in the Peace Conference at The Hague, will appear in the August number of the Catholic World Magazine, under the title of "The Peace Conference, and What it Might Have Been." "An attempt to insure and perpetuate human peace without the aid of the Prince of Peace is a foredoomed undertaking," says the article.

Because of the failure of the Czar to send an invitation to the Vatican to be represented at the Peace Conference, on account of the objection of the Italian Government to even an implied recognition of the Pope's temporal power, the article recites, an unjustifiable slight was placed upon Leo XIII., who originated the Peace Conference idea. "This will be news to many," the story continues, "but it is an undeniable, incontrovertible fact, which is here advanced on the highest authority."

"The Reminiscences of Julia Ward Howe," which have for some months formed an engaging feature of the Atlantic Monthly, will be published in a volume later by Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

"The Mettle of the Pasture," by James Lane Allen, is announced for publication in the autumn by the Macmillan Company. The Bookman says that it promises to be "the largest and most important work that its author has yet written, and with all its deep seriousness, it will partake of the sunny humor of the warm South."

Laurence Hutton will spend the better part of the summer in England, according to Literature. He has rented for the season Professor Max Mueller's house at Oxford, where he intends writing a descriptive essay upon the "Literary Landmarks" of the old university town, so wonderfully rich in associations of that nature.

PUBLICATIONS RECEIVED.

THE TEMPERANCE PROBLEM AND SOCIAL REFORM. Fourth Edition. By Joseph Rowntree and Arthur Sherwell. 8 x 6 inches. Pp. xxiii. and 626. Price 6 shillings. London: Hodder and Stoughton.

WORDSWORTH AND THE COLERIDGES, WITH OTHER MEMOIRS LITERARY AND POLITICAL. By Ellis Yarnall. 9 x 6½ inches. Pp. ix. and 331. Price $3. New York and London: The Macmillan Company.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

ANNA JANNEY LIPPINCOTT, Susan W. Janney, and the son and daughter of the former, reached Southampton, England, by the steamship Bremen, of the North German Lloyd line, on the 18th of Sixth month, and after a stop at Winchester, proceeded to London, next day. They remained in London for some time, and then proceeded to the Continent.

Dr. W. I. Hull, of Swarthmore College, and Hannah Clothier Hull reached Liverpool, by the Cunard ship, Umbria, on the 17th of Sixth month, and after a visit to friends at Manchester, proceeded to London, on the 19th. They were accompanied by Mary Travilla and Sarah R. Paiste, of West Chester, Pa., who, after about a fortnight in London, proposed to leave for Paris on the 3d of the present month, and to return about a month later for a tour in England. Dr. Hull and wife did not propose to go on the Continent.

Phebe C. Wright and Sophia U. Willits were at Westminster Friends' meeting, London (as also were the Friends named above), on the 25th ult. They had arrived in time for the Women's International Council, which they were proposing to attend.

In the evening of the 25th (6.30), several of the Philadelphia Friends, and Isaac Howland and wife of Brooklyn, N. Y., attended the meeting held at Chelsea, at the home of Percy and Edith Bigland, on Tite street. This is usually small, but on that evening twenty or more gathered, and Mary Travilla had an acceptable communication, and another of the American visitors spoke briefly.

Howard M. Jenkins, after returning from his short trip on the Continent, remained in London ten days, and left on the afternoon of the 27th for Ackworth, in Yorkshire, to attend the "General Meeting" of Ackworth School. He there met John William Graham, and on the 29th accompanied him to Manchester, where he expected to be—and in that neighborhood—for several days.

Our friend Rebecca B. Nicholson sailed on the 5th instant, from New York, for a tour of the Continent, and England, Scotland, Wales, and Ireland. She expects to return in Ninth month.

COMMUNICATIONS.

REPLY TO AN INQUIRY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

I THINK that the little book of poems by Samuel M. Janney, referred to in the last issue of the INTELLIGENCER, is the same as that mentioned in the catalogue of Friends' Historical Library of Swarthmore College. It was printed in Philadelphia in 1839, and, if I remember rightly, is entitled "The Last of the Lenapé, and Other Poems."

It is hoped that Friends appreciate the value of having as complete a collection of Friends' works as can be gathered and placed at Swarthmore, which is certainly a most favorable and convenient location for such collection. This Historical Library has now the largest number of Friends' books of any library in this country; and it is hoped that anyone having works by, or relating to, Friends, will feel an interest in assisting the growth of this Library, and thus make it a more valuable repository of Friendly literature and whatever refers to the history of our Society.

ALBERT A. MERRITT.

[In response to an inquiry in this column in the issue of Seventh month 8, we have received the above letter, and from another source a copy of the little book "The Last of the Lenapé and Other Poems," for both of which we acknowledge our indebtedness.—EDS.]

PEACE.

Put off, put off your mail, O kings,
And beat your brands to dust!
Your hands must learn a surer grasp,
Your hearts a better trust.

Oh, bend aback the lance's point,
And break the helmet bar;
A noise is in the morning wind,
But not the note of war.

Upon the grassy mountain paths
The glittering hosts increase—
They come! They come! How fair their feet!
They come who publish peace.

And victory, fair victory,
Our enemies are ours!
For all the clouds are clasped in light,
And all the earth with flowers.

Aye, still depressed and dim with dew;
But wait a little while,
And with the radiant, deathless rose
The wilderness shall smile.

And every tender, living thing
Shall feed by streams of rest;
Nor lamb shall from the flock be lost,
Nor nursling from the nest.

—John Ruskin.

SONNET.

Written for the Westtown Centennial, 1899.

BY LLOYD MIFFLIN.

LET me, though least of those who sing to-day,—
Whose father trod these floors and held them dear,—
Let me, in this rememberable year,
Upon his well-loved Alma Mater lay
My veneration as a wreath of bay
About the feet of Learning. We revere
Her groves illustrious, and her halls austere,—
Oh, that her principles had wider sway:
That Nations, like to brothers, might embrace;
That war be banished from the thoughts of men,
And ignorance, with all its evils, cease;
That right and mercy guide the human race,
And through the world th' angelic spirit, Peace,
Reign in all hearts, as was the dream of Penn!

METEOROLOGICAL SUMMARY FOR SIXTH MONTH, 1899.

Mean barometer,	30.054
Highest barometer during the month, 23d,	30.301
Lowest barometer during the month, 28th,	29.850
Mean temperature,	75.2
Highest temperature during the month, 6th,	98.
Lowest temperature during the month, 17th,	56.
Mean of maximum temperatures,	85.
Mean of minimum temperatures,	65.4
Greatest daily range of temperature, 5th, 19th,	28.
Least daily range of temperature, 10th,	8.
Mean daily range of temperature,	19.6
Mean relative humidity, per cent.,	65.2
Mean temperature of the Dew Point,	60.9
Total precipitation in inches, rain,	1.61
Greatest precipitation in any 24 consecutive hours, 0.44 inches of rain, on the 20th and 21st.
Number of days on which .01 inch or more of rain fell, 9
Number of clear days 10, fair days 10, cloudy days 10.
Prevailing direction of wind from the Southwest.
Thunder storms on the 1st, 5th, 8th, 9th, 15th, 20th, 21st, 25th, 28th.
Hail on the 1st.
Solar halo on the 26th.

SENSIBLE TEMPERATURE DATA.

Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m., 75 on 8th and 15th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m., 54.5 on 11th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 a.m., 65.6.
Maximum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m., 74.5 on 7th.
Minimum temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m., 56.5 on 16th.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer at 8 p.m., 65.9.
Mean temperature of wet bulb thermometer for this month, 65.8.

NOTE.—The means of the daily maximum and minimum temperatures, 85° and 65.4°, respectively, give a monthly mean of 75.2°, which is 3° above the normal, and 2° above the corresponding month in 1898. The amount of precipitation, 1.61 inches, is 1.75 inches less than the normal.

JOHN COMLY, Observer.
Centennial Avenue, Philadelphia, Sixth month 30.

BISHOP GRANT, of the African Methodist Episcopal Church, and Rev. M. M. Moore, saw the President last week, with reference to affairs in Liberia. They are both anxious that the United States should assume a protectorate over the black republic. A representative of Liberia is on the way to this country to urge the same thing.

JUDGMENT has been postponed in the case of Admiral Cervera and most of the other officers whose conduct in the battle off Santiago resulting in the loss of the Spanish fleet, has been the subject of inquiry by special court-martial. All of the officers have been liberated except Captain Diaz Moren, who was commander of the Cristobal Colon. General Paredes is to be prosecuted.

THE House of Commons rejected the amendment to the London Government bill permitting the election of women as councillors, by a vote of 246 against the amendment to 177 in its favor. The House of Lords amendment, providing for the exclusion of women from the office of councillor was then formally agreed to.

THE GREATNESS OF SIMPLICITY.

SIMPLICITY is the elimination of the non-essential in all things. It reduces life to its minimum of real needs ; raises it to its maximum of power. Simplicity means the survival,—not of the fittest, but of the best. In morals it kills the weeds of vice and weakness so that the flowers of virtue and strength may have room to grow. Simplicity cuts off waste and intensifies concentration. It converts flickering torches into search-lights.

All great truths are simple. The essence of Christianity could be given in a few words ; a lifetime would be but continued seeking to make those words real and living in thoughts and acts. The true Christian's individual belief is always simpler than his church creed, and upon these vital elements he builds his life. His simple faith he lives,—in thought and word and act. Like the lark, he lives nearest the ground ; like the lark, he soars highest toward heaven.

If the mind and heart of the preacher were really thrilled with the greatness and simplicity of religion, he would, week by week, apply the ringing truths of his faith to the vital problems of daily living. The test of a strong, simple sermon is results,—not the Sunday praise of his auditors, but their bettered lives during the week. People who pray on their knees on Sunday, and prey on their neighbors on Monday, need simplicity in their faith.

No character can be simple unless it is based on truth,—unless it is lived in harmony with one's own conscience and ideals. Simplicity is the pure white light of a life lived from within. It is destroyed by any attempt to live in harmony with public opinion. Public opinion is a conscience owned by a syndicate. Adjusting life to one's own ideals is the royal road to simplicity.

Nature, in all her revelations, seeks to teach man the greatness of simplicity. Health is but the living of a physical life in harmony with a few simple, clearly defined laws. Simple food, simple exercise, simple precautions will work wonders. But man grows tired of the simple things, he yields to subtle temptations in eating and drinking, listens to his palate instead of to nature,—and he suffers. He then dines with dyspepsia, and sits like a child at his own bounteous table,—forced to eat only the simple food that he scorned.

Simplicity is the characteristic that is most difficult to simulate. The signature that is most difficult to imitate is the one that is most simple, most individual, and most free from flourishes. The banknote that is the most difficult to counterfeit successfully is the one that contains the fewest lines and has the least intricate detail.

Simplicity in acts is the outward expression of simplicity in thought. Men who carry on their shoulders the fate of a nation are quiet, modest, unassuming. They are often made gentle, calm, and simple by the discipline of their responsibility. They have no room in their minds for the pettiness of personal vanity. It is ever the drum-major who grows pompous when he thinks that the whole world is watching him as he marches at the head of the procession. The great general is simple and unaffected as a child.

To true simplicity, to preceive a truth is to begin to live it ; to see a duty is to begin to do it. Nothing great can ever enter into the mind of a man of simplicity and remain merely a theory. Simplicity in a character is like the needle of a compass,—it knows only one point, its North, its ideal.

Let us seek to cultivate this simplicity in all things in our life. The first step toward simplicity is,—simplifying. The beginning of mental or moral progress or reform is always,—renunciation or sacrifice. It is surrender or destruction of those phases of life that have kept us from higher things. Reform your deit and you simplify it ; make your speech truer and higher and you simplify it ; reform your morals and you begin to cut off your immorals. Make simplicity the keynote of your life and you will be great, no matter though your life be humble and your influence seem but little.

Simplicity is never to be associated with weakness and ignorance. It means reducing tons of ore to nuggets of gold. It means the light of fullest knowledge ; it means that the individual has seen the folly and the nothingness of those things that make up the sum of the life of others. He has lived down what others are blindly seeking to live up to. Simplicity is the sun of a self-centred and pure life.—Saturday Evening Post.

WOMEN RECEIVED AT WINDSOR CASTLE.

A NUMBER of the American, colonial, and continental guests of the International Congress of Women having expressed a desire to pay their respects to the Queen, Lady Aberdeen arranged a trip to Windsor this afternoon, when her Majesty assented to the suggestion that she should drive slowly through the quadrangle of the castle and receive a few of the more prominent delegates. It was about twenty minutes past 3 when the delegates took up a position in front of the private entrance. A quarter of an hour later her Majesty appeared, and Lady Aberdeen made the presentations.

Miss Susan B. Anthony, who, with Mrs. May Wright Sewall, the newly-elected President of the Congress, enjoyed the privilege of presentation, said to the correspondent of the Associated Press this evening : "I had never seen the Queen before, and could not but feel a thrill when, looking into her wonderful face, I saw her, as her life is going out, welcoming the women's movement which is the precursor of the twentieth century. What pleased me most was when her Majesty said :

" ' Now, I cannot have these ladies who are visiting me return without giving them a cup of tea.' Sir Arthur Bigge, the Queen's Private Secretary, replied :

" ' But, your Majesty, they are here in hundreds.' "

" ' I do not care,' said the Queen, ' if they are here in thousands. They must all have a cup of tea when they come to see me.' "

"And we had it in the Queen's palace, as a recognition of the great womanhood of our country."

Mrs. Sewall said : "The Queen looked ten years younger than when I saw her ten years ago. Every line in her face displayed serenity, sweetness, and pleasure. She looked us each full in the eyes with a quick, keen glance. Her voice is melodious, and there is a total absence of certain lines of the mouth shown in most photographs of her, indicating disdain. The whole bearing of her Majesty was a symbol that she who has governed the mightiest of empires for sixty-three years, has finally recognized intuitively that she crowns her work in recognizing the claims of her sex to equal rights with men. With what womanly pride we joined in 'God Save the Queen'! The impression we all carried away of the greatest woman of the century was of strong intellect governing fine and womanly sentiment."—Public Ledger.

MANNERS OF COLLEGE GIRLS.

THE mother of a feminine undergraduate spoke to me lately of the difficulty she found in persuading her daughter to keep her things in order. The young lady had become accustomed at college to leaving her belongings scattered about her room, knowing that the faithful and long-suffering chambermaid would come in and straighten out the chaos as often as might be necessary. When her mother pointed out to her that in her own home the maid had not time to perform these labors of Sisyphus, our Junior replied: "I have no sympathy with menials." Poor girl! However well versed in Latin or Greek she may be, she has learned a very small fraction of the true lessons of life if she has no sympathy with the toilers of this world, the hewers of wood and drawers of water.

The undemocratic spirit shown by this remark is one which we note with pain in some college-bred women, though not in the majority. It shows itself in a lack of appreciation of the institutions of our country, in a disbelief in universal suffrage, and an opposition to the enfranchisement of women. The conceit of a feminine Sophomore, when it does show itself, is even less agreeable to the onlooker than that of her male prototype. In justice to our girls, however, it should be said that they display conceit less often than our boys. All the world must have patience with a Sophomore, whose self-sufficiency is temporary, and forms a part of the equipment of youth for fighting the hard battles of life.

The manners of women are in a transitional state owing to the great changes which their condition and status in society have undergone, and are still undergoing. The new has not fully come, the old has not entirely passed away. Our college girls see the new worlds of power and opportunity that are opening before their sex; they are so dazzled by the prospect that they are in danger of losing sight of the old kingdom of woman, the home, and of forgetting that their sex stands above all things for the altruistic principle. This principle finds its first development in the home, in the family, and while it may spread out later, till it takes in the whole earth, the growth must be in the natural order, from the individual to the family, thence to the community, next to the State.

Even chickens brought up away from the hen need an artificial "brooder," or mother; and do not our college girls need a "house-mother" if they cannot have their very own mamma, rather than an elder sister? Let them by all means be taught by accomplished professors and tutors, men and women, but let them also come under the influence of elder women, who have taken a degree in the School of Life, and, if possible, of those who have received one of the highest forms of education, the education of wifehood and motherhood. With the restoration of a true home-life ideal, and with the establishment of a chair of manners, we need fear no lack of gracious behavior or of consideration for others in our college girls—God bless them!—Florence Howe Hall, in The Independent.

Daniel Webster's Oratory.

Senator George F. Hoar, in Scribner's Magazine

IN one respect Daniel Webster is the most striking figure in our history, and one of the few most striking figures in all history. That is, in the impression he made on everybody—that, great as were his achievements, he was himself greater than his greatest achievement.

Franklin, Webster, and Emerson are the three great New Englanders. Each of them was a great public teacher. If Webster did not lack, at least he did not manifest, Franklin's wonderful common-sense, as applied to common things and common life. He had not Emerson's profound spiritual discernment or wonderful poetic instinct. But his intellect seems like a vast quarry. When you have excavated the great rocks at the surface, you know there is an inexhaustible supply left. When he died the people felt as if the cornerstone of the Capitol had been removed; as if the elephant had died that bore the universe on his back.

Emerson's portraiture of Webster at Bunker Hill is made up of a few strokes. But it reveals the whole secret. Great as were the things that Webster said, profound as was his reasoning, lofty as are the flights of his imagination, stirring as are his appeals to the profoundest passions of his countrymen, there is a constant feeling that Jove is behind these thunderbolts. That is the contrast between him and so many other orators. Even in Choate and Phillips you are admiring the phrase and the elocution, and not the men. In Webster you are thinking of the man, and not the phrases. The best things that he said do not seem to his listener to be superior, and rarely seem to his listener to be equal, to the man who said them. There is plenty of reserve power behind—

... "Half his strength he put not forth, but checked
His thunder in mid-volley."

A Cow's Spectacles.

A cow in spectacles! This, you think, must, indeed, be a funny sight. Surely some one must have been playing a trick on that dignified animal, and you wonder that she did not resent the disrespect shown to her with a poke from her horns!

But the truth is this cow is very glad of the spectacles, for she is not an English cow, feeding in green, sunny meadows, among buttercups and daisies, but a native of the cold country of Russia. Here the snow lies on the ground for more than half the year, and the cattle wandering over the great steppes have to crop their scanty meal from the small tufts of grass which here and there can be seen pushing above its snowy counterpane.

The rays of the sun on the snow make it shine with dazzling brilliance, which causes what is called "snow blindness" to unprotected eyes. Arctic explorers and alpine climbers in early times used to suffer much from this complaint until it became the custom to wear smoked glasses. The Russian cows endured much misery and pain from the same causes, until a man, whose heart was touched by the sight of their sufferings, hit upon the happy idea of inventing large spectacles, which could be securely fastened on to the cow's nose.

At the present time, in traveling these wide snowy steppes, stretching for hundreds of miles, one may see thousands of these cows placidly and contentedly feeding, their eyes protected from the glaring whiteness of the snow by great smoked goggles. They look funny, certainly, but even cows are too sensible to object to a ridiculous appearance if it adds to their health and comfort!—Sunday Reading.

Bicycle Riders at Church.

A FRIEND sends us the following clipping from the London Daily News, inviting wheelmen to stop in at the wayside churches, and adds:

"From the testimony of some Friends who find it easier to attend our meetings on wheels, I thought a similar invitation might tend to make them, or rather us, feel more at ease."

This notice is prominently fixed outside Merstham church: "To cyclers, women and men.—You are quite welcome to enter and worship in your cycling dress. You need not make the fact that worship has begun any excuse for mock modesty in not liking to come in. You can slip in quite as silently as you can slip along, without disturbing the worshippers, if you have any real desire (1) to remember your Creator, (2) respect the Great Designer's reasonable command to keep holy the Sabbath day, and (3) thank your Heavenly Father for providing you with the pleasures of the road. You will find a seat, a Bible, a prayer and hymn book, quite handy. You need not remain for the sermon or instructions unless you care to do so; you do not sin in cycling on Sunday, but you most certainly sin against God and wrong your neighbors if you neglect your clear duty, which is to adore publicly your Saviour Jesus the Christ, and to invoke the Holy Spirit to grant you His aid in all your undertakings. The success of British artisans, business and professional men, is due to the fact that they leave one day in seven on which to rest and recreate the body, soul, and mind. At the back of the church there are five automatic cycle racks fixed."

How Kipling Became a Prohibitionist.

RUDYARD KIPLING tells how in an American concert-hall he saw two girls made drunk by their companions. Kipling had not been a total abstainer, but of that scene he wrote:

"Then, recanting previous opinions, I became a Prohibitionist. Better it is that a man should go without his beer in public places, and content himself with swearing at the narrow-mindedness of the majority; better it is to poison the inside with very vile temperance drinks, and to buy lager furtively at back doors, than to bring temptation to the lips of young fools such as the four I had seen. I understand now why the preachers rage against drink. I have said, 'there is no harm in it, taken moderately,' and yet my own demand for beer helped directly to send these two girls reeling to God alone knows what end. It is not good that we should let liquor lie before the eyes of children, and I have been a fool in writing to the contrary."

Date Palms for Arizona.

DR. ZWINGLE, representing the Agricultural Department, is now in Morocco on a mission which the department hopes will launch a new and profitable industry in the most arid sections of our Southwest. It has been found that date palms with some irrigation will grow as well in Arizona as in Arabia. Early Mormon settlers in the Territory proved this many years ago; but the trees were not of the best variety, and date growing never developed as an industry. The Agricultural Department has prepared to push the experiment on an extensive scale, however. Dr. Zwingle is making a close study of the African date palm, selecting the very finest varieties and those best adapted to our arid region. These young trees will be carefully shipped to Arizona, where they will be planted and cared for under the close supervision of the department's experts. The plants will cost the department about five dollars each, laid down in Arizona.

The Ideal American Citizen.

Scribner's Magazine.

THE American citizen of the finest type is essentially a man or woman of simple character, and the effect of our institutions and mode of thought, when rightly appreciated, is to produce simplicity. The American is free from the glamor or prejudice which results from the conscious or unconscious influence of the lay figures of the old political, social, or religious world; from the glamor of royalty and vested caste, of an established or dominant church, of aristocratic, monkish, or military privilege. . . . For Americans of the best type, those who have learned to be reverent without losing their independence and without sacrifice of originality, the problem of living is simplified through the elimination of the influence of these symbols and conventions. Their outlook is not confused or deluded by the specious dogmas of caste. They perceive that the attainment of the welfare and happiness of the inhabitants of earth is the purpose of human struggle, and that the free choice and will of the majority as to what is best for humanity as a whole is to be the determining force of the future.

"Sunday" Newspapers.

THE Christian Advocate thus comments upon the recent successful agitation against the "Sunday" papers in England:

"We can say to our English friends and foreign religious exchanges that Sunday newspapers are among the greatest foes of Christianity, and that in various particulars. They fill the streets of cities and large towns with the cries of the venders; they bring into the house on Sabbath morning a vast amount of dissipating, agitating matter; they are so huge that they are broken up and distributed among the members of the family, expelling religious conversation, and to a considerable degree all conversation, except when topics inimical to the spirit of religious worship are suggested by the paper itself. . . .

"Some of them contain professed sermons in one column, and advertisements that, judged by their purpose, their suggestiveness, and their consequences, might have been indited by the arch-fiend himself. By these means they are the universal promoters of dissipation on that day. Often indirectly, and sometimes directly, they disparage the Church by declaring that if it cannot overcome all these things it is because of dullness in the pulpit. For this in some instances there is a foundation, but in more there is none; and the allegation is like that of saloon-keepers, who first deprave the appetites of their customers, and then declare that if men will leave home for the saloon the fault is with home cooking. Sometimes it is, but no wife ever lived who could prepare food in such a way as to keep a drunken husband from the saloon.

"English Christians have shown a capacity to unite against this evil, but we warn them that competition, rivalry, and the growing fear of being ridiculed in the press, will within a few years bring on another conflict, in which the Sunday publishing press and its patrons will succeed;—unless public regard for the Sabbath is maintained. What was known as the American Sabbath was brought from England, and not from the Continent."

Poverty No Barrier to a College Education.

Ladies' Home Journal.

I HAVE yet to learn of anybody's coming unhandicapped by disease or great debt, and then going away because he could not earn a living at college. And I have yet to hear any one of them say the game was not well worth the candle. It is hard work, of course, but a college man, like every one else, is happier with his time well filled. In fact, most of the men I knew who worked their way through college enjoyed their four years quite as much as their more fortunate fellows; indeed, I am not sure the latter class are always more fortunate, for, in addition to getting as much, if not more out of his books, the man who earns his own way is acquiring practical experience and a confidence in himself with which to pitch into the big world later in life.

CURRENT EVENTS.

REPRESENTATIVES of twenty-six wholesale drug firms in the Middle West, having an actual capitalization of $8,000,000, and doing probably one-fourth of the wholesale drug business of the country, have voted unanimously against joining the proposed drug trust.

On the 4th instant a silver wreath, the gift of the Government of the United States to that of the Netherlands, was laid upon the tomb of Hugo Grotius, in the Nieuwe Kirck, in Delft, Holland, by the American delegates to the Peace Conference. Ambassador Andrew D. White in a scholarly address paid a tribute to Grotius, "to carry out whose ideas are now assembled delegates from all nations." After tracing Grotius's work and the effect of his ideas, the speaker said: "From this tomb of Grotius I seem to hear a message to go on with the work of strengthening peace and humanizing war, and, above all, to give to the world at least a beginning of an effective, practical scheme of arbitration."

At the end of his address he laid on the tomb of Grotius, in behalf of his colleagues, a wreath of silver oak and laurel leaves, bearing the inscription:

"To the memory of Hugo Grotius, on the occasion of the Peace Conference at The Hague, in reverence and gratitude from the United States."

THE report of Captain Watkins of the stranding of the American Line steamship Paris has been made public by the local Board of Steamboat Inspectors. Captain Watkins makes no attempt to evade responsibility for the accident, but, on the contrary, says frankly that the stranding of the ship was the result of an unaccountable error on his part. The accident, he says, was not due to any want of thought or anxiety about his vessel, but resulted from a mistake he made in calculating the position of the ship. The local inspectors of steam vessels have suspended Captain Watkins's license as master of ocean steamers for two years.

THE members of the International Peace Conference were entertained at a magnificent banquet in the palace at Amsterdam, on the 6th inst. At the banquet Queen Wilhelmina proposed a toast as follows: "I sincerely rejoice to see assembled around me to-day the delegates to the Conference, and to be permitted to renew my wishes for the success of your work, due to the initiative of the Czar of the Russias. I am glad to offer you the hospitality of my residence. I drink to the health of all the sovereigns and chiefs of the States of which you are the representatives."

THE proposed arbitration convention has been laid before the Peace Conference at The Hague, and after some changes had been agreed upon an adjournment was taken until the 17th instant, to allow time for the delegates to consult their Governments. It is said that the Conference will adjourn at the end of this month, the members agreeing to reassemble in the spring, and that during the interval Emperor Nicholas will visit the principal European courts.

CHIEF JUSTICE LORE, of Delaware, in an address at Wilmington recently declared that the Filipinos and Cubans should be allowed to govern themselves, and that the Philippine Congress compared favorably with the Japanese. The address caused considerable criticism after the meeting.

THE rains have been so severe in Luzon that the country around Manila is flooded, and, in some cases, it is impossible to forward supplies to the troops. The Thirteenth Infantry camp is under water, the men sleeping on boxes and the company cooks standing in water to their knees in preparing the meals.

REPORTS from Spain indicate a serious condition of affairs. Rioting is going on in several towns, martial law has been declared in places, and the government fears a general revolution.

THE Grand Duke George, brother of the Czar, died on the 10th inst., of consumption. He was 28 years old.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE coal production and consumption of the world during the past fifteen years are presented in some tables just prepared by the Treasury Bureau of Statistics. These show that while the United Kingdom is still the largest coal producer of the world, the United States is a close second, and if the present rate of gain is continued, will soon become the leading coal producing country in the world. The coal production of the United Kingdom in 1897 was 202,000,000 tons; that of the United States, 179,000,000 tons; Germany, 91,000,000; France, 30,000,000.

—The late Robert C. Billings, of Boston, left a large estate to various public institutions. His wealth is found to be much larger than was at first supposed; the public gifts of all kinds aggregate $1,500,000. The large beneficiaries are Harvard College, Massachusetts Institute of Technology, Museum of Fine Arts, Massachusetts General Hospital, New England Hospital for Women and Children, Roxbury District; Children's Hospital, Massachusetts Eye and Ear Infirmary, and the Perkins Institute, and Massachusetts School for the Blind, Kindergarten for the Blind, American Unitarian Association, Boston; Young Men's Christian Union and the Hampton (Va.) Normal and Agricultural Institute. All these beneficiaries will receive sums varying from $25,000 to $150,000.

—A National Park or Forestry Reserve Association for the Governmental preservation of over 7,000,000 acres of land in Northern Minnesota will be formed in Chicago this month. It is a step towards the creation of great national reserves for the preservation of native forests and streams and the perpetuation of game.

—Extracts from a Skaguay paper report a large gold strike near Dawson by Professor Lippy, formerly of Oberlin and Kinsman, Ohio. Lippy is said to have two and a half tons of gold in his cabin. He is said to have refused a million dollars for his claim last year.

—A Board of State Tax Commissioners has been appointed for Michigan. The Commissioners are given supervisory control over officers administering the general tax laws, and are empowered in certain cases to review assessment rolls and correct them by raising and lowering assessments and adding property.

—The steamer Roderick Dhu brought from Hilo the most valuable collection of bird skins ever made in the Hawaiian Islands. The collection is said to be practically priceless. It is consigned to the National Museum at Washington. It has taken Professor Henshaw five years to gather the bird skins.

—The Western paper manufacturers have determined to combine against the Eastern trust to save themselves. It is understood the paper mills west of Pittsburg will be absorbed entirely or operated in connection with the Strawboard trust.

—A letter has been received from United States Consul John P. Bray, of Melbourne, Australia, by James J. Lindsey, of Baltimore county, who represents the Tysons in that and Cecil county, stating that James Tyson, who died April 24 last, left an estate valued at $15,000,000.

—Mr. Balfour has assigned a civil list pension of $200 a year to a retired Welsh policeman, Charles Assheton, who has found time to write a history of Welsh literature, and to win literary prizes at the Eisteddfods, and is now at work on a Welsh bibliography.

—Manchester, Clay county, famous by reason of the Baker-White feud, is to have telephone connection with the outside world. Clay is one of the oldest of mountain counties, but has been completely cut off from civilization, not having a mile of railroad, telegraph, or even an ordinary turnpike.

—Dr. Nathaniel Greene, President of the Rhode Island Society of Cincinnati, and grandson of Major General Nathaniel Greene, of Revolutionary fame, died at his home in Middletown, Rhode Island, on the 8th instant, aged 90 years.

—Grasshoppers have become a great plague in Spain, invading even the cities. In Austria 5,000 soldiers were ordered to assist in destroying them.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 22, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 29. }

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXIX.

EVERY man's religion begins and ends in God, and from our thought of Him flows every religious belief we hold.

JOHN WILLIAM GRAHAM.

From his paper read at the Manchester Conference, 1895.

DEVOTIONAL POEM.

GREAT Source of life and purity,
All human praise excelling,
Whose empire is infinity,
The humble heart thy dwelling.

The winds and waves confess thy might,
Which curbs the raging ocean,
Which bade the planets spring to light,
And still directs their motion.

All nature owns thy sovereign sway,
From thee each power deriving;
Shall man alone then disobey,
With whom thy spirit's striving?

On him alone hast thou conferred
Each high and holy feeling.
The riches of thy living word
Within his heart revealing.

Oh! let me then devote to thee,
The powers which thou hast given,—
And may they all incentives be
To lead my soul to Heaven.

—Samuel M. Janney, in "The Last of the Lenape," etc.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

WORSHIP AND RELIGION.

THE great object of worship and religion is to direct us individually within ourselves, that we may understand the great truth to which Jesus alludes when he spoke of the kingdom of heaven which a heavenly husbandman had sown in his spiritual kingdom, and of which an apostle also testified, when he declared, "Ye are the temple of the living God, and the spirit of God dwelleth in you." Our view of God should not be such as to shut Him out from this life, for He has spread out before us the visible world as a monument of his wisdom, power, and goodness; we are called to a knowledge of God and Christ now, a spiritual condition that will control every passion, and set bounds to the indulgence of every propensity belonging to the animal nature of man. It invites us to look within ourselves, in the spirit's sanctuary, that we may hold communion with a Being whom the heaven of heavens cannot contain, but who condescends to dwell with the pure in heart, the humble and contrite spirit.

We are also invited to meditate on the workmanship of this beautiful creation; and its study is not incompatible with true devotion to God,—for every page of the great volume of nature is full of living and instructive truth.

Such an exercise of the intellect is profitable to us, for it leads to humility, and while it makes manifest the feebleness of man, exalts our view of the wisdom, goodness, and power of the Creator, and shows us that "Order is heaven's first law." On whom now rests the burden and responsibility of the continuance of the Society of Friends in its usefulness, and in the maintenance of its valuable principles and testimonies? We should not consider that heavier accountability rests on one than upon any other member; when those who are at present indifferent come to realize their individual responsibility, and are obedient to the inspeaking power or word, they will be shown a beautiful relation between mind and matter, between the works of God and our capacity to contemplate them. "The heavens declare the glory of God, and the firmament showeth his handiwork." When in silent waiting on him, they will learn that God is perfect, that while he does not need our worship, we need to worship him; and that "He is a spirit and must be worshiped in spirit and in truth."

On this voyage of life we need the spiritual graces; physical and intellectual culture, be they ever so advanced, are not satisfying or perfecting, if the spiritual be neglected. We should be mindful that our spiritual nature needs aliment, as wisely and regularly sought, as the physical structure needs food, wisely and regularly administered for the security of its healthful condition.

The Christian character is easily distinguished from anything of an opposite nature, by its simplicity and purity. When the blessed Jesus was engaged in the work of his mission, he told his disciples,—“By their fruits ye shall know them; men do not gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles.” The Christian is known by his fruits. “Not every one that saith Lord, Lord, shall enter into the kingdom, but he that doeth the will of my Father which is in heaven,” was another declaration of Jesus, pointing to the same thing, and showing that a profession to religion does not always imply that we have come into the kingdom. Let our religion be an every-day religion. Let it consist wholly in the practice of righteousness, and then we will neither be deceived ourselves, nor be able to deceive others. If we love God, we shall show it by our love one for another. If we are the disciples of Christ, we shall let our light so shine before men, that others seeing our good works, will glorify our Father in heaven. A religious life consists in love to God and love to man, not merely in profession with a religious denomination; and it is vain for us to say that we love our people and our God, if we do not manifest it by worshiping with our brothers when we have the ability to do so.

On various occasions, when sitting with Friends in their meetings for worship, we have been encouraged in the belief that there is an increasing number of faithful followers of Jesus Christ within our Society; and many who have not assumed the name are convinced of the truths we hold, and enjoy sitting in our meetings, silent or otherwise.

In this age, Christianity has become more fully what its founder intended; not a belief in a creed, but the application of the principles of Christ to the business of life. At this time the call is loud to all Christians, to set their light before the world. The twentieth century, I believe, is to be the most spiritual in all the Christian Era. But before it can be realized it must be acknowledged, not as coming from man's works, but as coming from God, the source of all good and of all power.

The Truth is coming to the people, Christ within must be recognized as the fountain head of reform and of all good government. Let us all live up to our convictions of duty, laying the foundation of our spiritual building upon the revealings of truth to our own souls; let Christ within be our hope of glory. May our minds be fully impressed with the conviction that pure religion consists in fulfilling all the duties and obligations of life that devolve upon us, as believers in the existence of a Supreme Being to whom we are accountable, and as followers of Jesus Christ.

When offering this message of encouragement to increased faithfulness, to all interested in the Society of Friends, I have been led to the account furnished in the Scriptures of a meeting of the disciples on a certain occasion, when it is said that Jesus came and stood in the midst and said unto them, "Peace be unto you." It was on this occasion that the disciples received the commission, "Go ye, therefore, and teach all nations, baptizing them in the name of the Father, and the Son, and the Holy Ghost, teaching them to observe all things whatsoever I have commanded you: and lo, I am with you alway, even unto the end of the world." That was Christ in his inward and spiritual appearing, as the eternal word and ever present Saviour; and he will be with us in our silent meetings, if we will open our hearts to him, when he will come in bringing the same message, "Peace be unto you." This is sufficient to give us a true knowledge of the Creator and the duties and obligations that we owe to him and to our fellow-creatures. For it is in the silence of the soul that the spirit divine operates; and if we make not use of this power thus bestowed upon us the day may come when the temptations and dangers to which we are exposed will overcome us, and we may have to adopt the same language as did one of old,—“Oh that I were as in months past, as in the day when God preserved me; when his candle shined upon my head, and when by his light I walked through darkness!”

Feeling it to be increasingly incumbent on us in this day to bear practical testimony to the simplicity of the Gospel of Christ, I can find no more fitting words in which to express the depth of my concern, than the following quotation: "In the conflict between light and darkness, truth and error, which is to-day being so fiercely waged, may we be found, like David of old, not trusting to armor which we have not proven, and which will be unfitted for the service to which the Lord has appointed us. Rather let us hold fast to those more spiritual methods, which, in the past, he has enabled us to use so effectively in his service. Then we may reverently believe, that, united in the fervent love for a common Master, and his blessed cause, which so strongly characterized our people in the beginning, we may once more put shoulder to shoulder in his name. Thus shall we realize his wisdom to guide, and his power to strengthen us for the work of our day; and the shout of a King will be again heard amongst us."

Philadelphia.

JOSEPH POWELL.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE LORD'S PRAYER: ITS UNIVERSALITY.

A GRACEFUL trellis stood on a well-tended lawn. The bright sunlight of a June morning had coaxed a wealth of bloom from the vine that entwined its supporting bars, and hid its form with a mantle of green leaves that waved joyously in the passing breeze. Some happy birds darted in and out of its grateful shade, and the tender beauty of the flowers added sweetness to the song. Scattered among the dark, rich green of the leaves were bell-like flowers, tinted and veined by a mysteriously exquisite art, and as they bent in the breeze they gave of their sweetness, and the air streamed wide from them perfumed with grateful fragrance.

It was the hour of the morning collection; the students had assembled, and after the period of devout silence the leader arose for the Scripture offering. Pausing for a time as if to master some powerful emotion, the leader began the offering in such feeling tones that all knew his message was to be no common-place utterance.

"Our Father which art in Heaven,"—as the words of the world-wide prayer reached through the chapel, each young heart throbbed in response, each bright, expectant face melted into tender reminiscence, and no other sound broke the sacred quiet. The whole being thrilled to the words and the hour, and thought sought for the secret of the wonderful power. What is the Rock of Ages on which human souls have been building for centuries? The words are simple and common-place for the most part, but what other prayer or formula so voices the human needs? Are its words so potent that one foreign to all its sacred associations would be profoundly moved by the infinite sweetness of their tender melody?

Life-long we have heard the prayer, "Our Father"; we were taught to repeat it in earliest years, and about these words cluster memories of our childish hopes and griefs, and somewhere beyond our childish vision there arose a city "not made with hands."

"Our Father," sang the chorus to the tone of the great organ offering up its adoration in majestic harmonies; "which art in heaven," was the refrain in clear soprano notes of melting tenderness that seemed to mount to the vaulted dome of the great cathedral in melodious entreaty; and in the sacredness of that Sabbath morning there came to the hearers a new guiding and controlling uplift for coming days, a new meaning to the conventional assembling of themselves together.

"Our Father which art in Heaven,"—the place is small and lowly, but through its opened windows come the rustle of corn and the mellow light from fields of ripened grain, and the chirp of insects joins the poorly-tuned chant of the rural worshippers. Out of the silence a chosen speaker arose, and with head bowed reverently, offered a prayer: "Our Father,"—he preached,—and a glory seemed to dwell within the plain and humble walls, where meek and contrite hearts had builded a temple as precious as Solomon's.

"Pater Noster,"—banners are waving, gleaming in the fitful light of myriad candles; the air is heavy with incense, richly-clad priests lead the procession of white-robed boys; and the unlettered worshippers looking up past the shrines of saints and the glittering tributes of idolatry, feel a sacred presence near, as in unfamiliar tongue the fresh, childish voices tremblingly raise the "Qui in coelo."

"Unser Vater in dem Himmel,"—the worshippers join in gladsome chorus whose phrases are like waves of harmony, in that grand tongue whose words are the music of that human freedom which Luther taught the world!

"Our Father which art in Heaven,"—it was the voice of sorrow raised in supreme agony from the bedside of a passing soul, and its "Thy will be done," seemed to transcend the border land of sense and enter beyond the veil.

Thus the memories of the joys and sorrows of our lives; the memories of lowly life; the memories of contrite worship; the memories of pomp and pageant; the memory of organ-tones and sweetest singers; the memories of history; the memories of all lands and tongues, join with the memories of our childhood days in one universal hymn of praise and supplication. "Give us this day our daily bread," passed from childish repetition into the earnest supplication of maturer years, the years of toil and heat and drought; and when the struggle deepened it was not "bread alone" which drew out the pleading cries, but the "word" which should make strong and grant faith to strive onward in the dark and maddening conflict.

"Lead us not into temptation, but deliver us from evil," came to be the words which voiced the inward agony when the heart burned with strange and fierce ambitions and glowed with passion. Then came these sweet, healing words of prayer to the turbulent, storm-tossed soul, like sweet, calming music, such as the mariner hears when across the wildly-tossing waste of waters memory awakes the sound of bells of a calm Sabbath evening, with the summer twilight coming on in tender beauty.

"For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory,"—when life came to know the gathering frosts on a loved father's brow, when there had been partings and an empty home,—these were the words prophetic of victory over death, and the glory of the prayer passed into the beatitudes of the heavenly life. Angel father, sainted mother, loved wife, before the throne of Him who taught us to say "Our Father," their prayers of entreaty now blessed to hymns of praise, acclaim,—"For thine is the kingdom, and the power, and the glory, forever. Amen."

"Our Father," the words spoken by the Master, seemed far away; but childhood's visions, life's struggles, the sacred memories of our dead loves, the sainted glory of heaven, rise between the lines and are read amongst the words, and the heart is profoundly moved.

Unbidden came the memory of that form entwined with luxuriant vines, crimsoned with flowers of rare beauty and fragrance.

Prayer of the Son of God, the form on which earth's fairest flowers bloom, through which her richest vines trail,—the vines of human sentiment, the flowers of human loves, of a life, of ages!—twined through and over thy words thou hast grown to wondrous power and beauty, for thy beauty is the charm of memory, and thy power is the strength of human hopes!

WILBUR M. STINE.

Swarthmore, Pa.

JOHN WOOLMAN.

From the sketch of him by Frederick Storrs Turner, in "The Quakers."

THE Christian fraternity which, even in its "Quietist" stage [the reference here is to the Society of Friends in the eighteenth century.—Eds.] produced John Woolman, deserves the admiration and gratitude of the whole church of all time. Nor must we overlook the fact that we owe our knowledge of him to his journal and other writings. There must have been in the society in which a character of such rare loveliness was developed, many kindred souls who wrote no journals; who, less endowed than he, were called to no public service, but who were illumined within by the same celestial light, and shone like him, in their more retired spheres, to the glory of God, and benefit of their fellow-men.

The limits of this work forbid an attempt to sketch the life and character of one whose journal Channing pronounced beyond comparison the sweetest and purest autobiography in the language. Edward Irving and Crabbe Robinson were hardly less emphatic in their praise. One of our leading reviews regarded Woolman as the man who, in all the centuries since the advent of Christ, lived nearest to the Divine pattern. Whittier, the Quaker poet, almost worships the "serene and beautiful spirit, redeemed of the Lord from all selfishness." Charles Lamb said, "Get the writings of John Woolman by heart." These eulogiums will surprise those to whom the very name has hitherto been unknown; but let them read his journal and then judge. Possibly they may not at first altogether agree with such high praise. The character, though pure, true, and loving, may seem a little too sombre. They may take offense at his excessive scrupulosity, and quarrel with the asceticism to which it led. The Christian life, to please human nature, must be brighter, more joyous, more diversified.

But if this be the common feeling, if Woolman seems too much a man of sorrows, let us make this excuse for him: it was not for himself he sorrowed, but for others, and he had a high Example in this. If he felt wickedness and the woes of mankind too deeply, to the lessening of his own joy, and impairing of his bodily health, was he not at least trying to imitate the Divine Master, whom he loved? A second and a third perusal of his journal will probably modify the first opinion; and the reader may come to see that, even if we allow he was mistaken in some small details, in his life and character as a whole a heavenly wisdom shines out, which is to mere human sagacity as clear sunlight is to the glimmer of gas lamps struggling through a fog. In political economy higher, more important, and valuable truth can be learned from the pages of this uneducated tailor, than in the scientific treatises on the subject. Wisdom in him was not a separate faculty; it was love shedding its light upon facts.

If one tries to express the man in one word, that word must be the embodiment of the very spirit of Christianity. It is impossible to tell from his writings what his dogmatic belief was, or whether he had any. He may have been Unitarian, Arian, or Trinitarian. He may have regarded the Bible as verbally infallible, or he may not. The phraseology of what is called evangelical Christianity is not found in his pages. Substitution, vicarious atonement, he never alludes to; even the historic facts of Scripture are not mentioned; although, in the absence of any trace of scepticism, it is probable that he accepted the history as he read it. But this we know about the man, that from his childhood he had communion with the invisible God, that "to give himself up wholly to the service of God, to place his whole trust in God, and in all things to act on an inward principle of virtue," became the constant aim and practice of his life. Through "the revelation of Jesus Christ" he saw "the happiness of humility," and when increasing trade presented the prospect of wealth, he deliberately turned away, and became a journeyman tailor. So he lived and labored, embracing in his wide-reaching love the negro slave, the Indian savage, the poverty-stricken miners, the factory workers, and agricultural laborers of England; loving them all, not as a professional philanthropist, but because he could not help it; loving them as a mother loves her child.

If Woolman differed at all from the general Quaker sentiment it was in a wider tolerance. He "found no narrowness respecting sects and opinions, but believed that sincere, upright-hearted people, in every society who truly loved God, were accepted of him." "All true Christians [he said] are of the same spirit." Thomas à Kempis and John Huss were both, in his belief, "sincere-hearted followers of Christ."

FRIENDS OF THIS CENTURY. PRINCIPAL FEATURES OF THEIR HISTORY.

(Concluded from last week.)

WE learn that Ohio was the first to respond favorably, while Baltimore proposed that the Representative Committee of each Yearly Meeting be left to discharge the duties of this Philanthropic work. Accordingly the representatives from the three yearly meetings met in Salem, Ohio, on the 29th of Eighth month, 1881, and held two interesting sessions. They recommended the appointment of a Central Committee composed of members from each of the Representative Committees. From reports we gather the following items connected with the advance of the work. On the 22d of Ninth month, 1882, the Yearly Meetings of Illinois, Ohio, Baltimore, and Indiana, were represented in a conference held at Waynesville, Ohio, at which time the "Friends' Union for Philanthropic Labor" was formally organized. The second conference of the Union was held in Baltimore, in 1883, when five interesting sessions were reported. Very soon we notice that the work was transferred from the various representative committees to special committees. The third conference was held in Mt. Pleasant, Ohio, in 1884, at which time and place the sessions of the First-day School General Conference were also held. The fourth conference met in Philadelphia, in 1886, although Philadelphia Yearly Meeting did not enter into the work until Fifth month, 1891, when a committee upon the subject was appointed. The Conference held at Lincoln, in 1892, was the first one at which Philadelphia Yearly Meeting was represented by delegates. It is ever apparent that as we are prepared to meet each new development and are willing to move onward, progress goes before and points the way. Thus was the Union made sensible of the necessity of action along other lines of work, in order to counteract that tide of evil influences which seemed to be sweeping over the land.

The following departments have since been added: "Mission Work among Women and Children," "Purity," "Demoralizing Publications," "Tobacco," "Work for Colored People," "Gambling, Lotteries, and Kindred Vices." Having entered upon the broad field of Philanthropy with the earnest desire for the elevation of the human race, and after twenty years of united action among devoted and consecrated workers, the Union feels deeply the truthfulness of the poet's utterance,—

"For right is right, since God is God,
And right the day will win,
To doubt would be disloyalty,
To falter would be sin."

At the time of the General Conference held at Lincoln, Virginia, in 1892, a part of the regular program was a presentation of the aims and objects of the Young Friends' Association as given by the members of Philadelphia in a regular meeting of their Association held during that Conference. From a paper read upon that occasion we extract the following:

"The Young Friends' Association of Philadelphia was organized in 1888, and grew out of the desire on the part of interested First-day School workers for a more complete knowledge of the history and principles of the religious body of which they were members. The need of this fuller knowledge has no doubt been felt by all who take an interest in our First-day Schools, and who wish to see these schools introduce into our church-body young people who shall understand our principles and appreciate the true worth and dignity which belong to consistent membership in the Religious Society of Friends. In order that we may be able to teach these principles, we must of necessity, have a clear understanding of them ourselves, and this must be gained at the cost of application and study."

We have but to examine the preamble of our constitution to understand the objects of the Young Friends' Association; we have but to notice to what extent the movement has spread throughout our various meetings, until we feel sure Philadelphia Friends are seeing in such results many of their hopes realized. Following closely upon the event just recorded was the organization of our own home Association, that of Willistown, in Twelfth month, 1892. During the winter of 1894 a call was issued by the Philadelphia Association for a conference of "Young Friends' Associations," composed of delegates, and others interested in the work, appointed from the various organizations then in existence. Of the progress of the work and its attendant success you are all as familiar as myself. Its usefulness, in disseminating our principles, and in insuring a closer bond of union among the members throughout the Society is known to you all. Whether by so doing the Young Friends' Association has found its place, and is filling it, we leave the good results which it has wrought to make answer.

There yet remain for our consideration two other organizations which hold their regular meetings at the time of the First-day School General Conference and Friends' Union for Philanthropic Labor, namely, "Friends' Religious Conference" and "General Educational Conference." The former was the outgrowth of another gathering,—“The First Religious Congress,” held under the auspices of the Society of Friends, at Chicago, in 1893, in connection with the World's Parliament of Religions. In Eighth month, 1894, during the Chappaqua Conferences, the Friends' Religious Conference held its first sessions as an organized body. Upon this occasion was called into existence that germ of life which finally developed into the “First General Educational Conference of Friends,” which convened for the first time at Swarthmore in the summer of 1896. The names of these Conferences define the nature of their work, and they need no words of mine to portray the fullness of their meaning.

I have endeavored to point out the principal features which have in any way influenced our work within the present century, limited time allowing of but slightest mention of much that is of importance. If we could but pause a moment to consider how the record of the past one hundred years will compare with that of the earlier history of Friends, would we find so much of a decline as Friends have feared? The work of the present is very different from what the past required at the hands of those patient sufferers for the “Truth's Sake,” but are we not fulfilling our mission when we give forth to the world what the age demands of us? So long as the world has need of the Society of Friends, will we have a work to do; and from among the ranks of the Society will come forth earnest, consecrated workers ready and willing to assume the grave responsibility required of them. As we enter upon the closing year of the Nineteenth Century and see what a field of usefulness the steady onward march of the ever-passing years has unfolded before us, the many honored lives the Society of Friends, during the century, has given to the cause of humanity; the high aspirations and hopeful outlook which the large and enthusiastic gatherings at Lincoln, Chappaqua, Swarthmore, and Richmond, have prompted; the earnest feeling among the young people, of loyalty to the Society we love;—we realize that it all tends to mark an important epoch in the history of the Society.

The words of Colonel Eli F. Ritter, in speaking of the Society of Friends, during a “song service,” from the pulpit of a Methodist Episcopal Church of Indianapolis, Indiana, come to us not only as a note of warning but of inspiration as well, when he says:

“No church has ever wielded such an influence for good upon the world as have the Friends, and no church has commanded higher respect of mankind. This was done not by song or music or outward service or profession, but by a Life.”

Willistown, Pa.

ANNA P. SMEDLEY.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 31.—SEVENTH MONTH 30.

SOCIAL CONDITIONS.

GOLDEN TEXT.—The Lord recompense thy work, and a full reward be given thee of the Lord God of Israel.—Ruth, ii., 12.

Scripture Reading, Ruth i., 1–22.

In addition to the accounts of the various “judges,” three tales are told illustrative of the social conditions of the age of judges. These are the story of the migration of the Danites; that of war against the tribe of Benjamin; and the pretty pastoral of Ruth, the Moabite.

The tribe of Dan, finding itself cramped for room, sent five men as spies to go through the land seeking out a city as rich and as defenseless as might be, where wealth and a home might be won at the least possible cost by the usual process of rapine and homicide. On their journey, which lay to the northward, the spies paused and were hospitably entertained at the house of one Micah, on Mount Ephraim. They found here installed as household priest a Levite whom they had known in the south, and on inquiry found that he presided over a shrine of considerable local importance, having idols and paraphernalia of value. The spies passed on and discovered in the far north the city of Laish, inhabited by a small, peaceful community. "The people lived a life of quiet security, far removed from the Phœnicians, to whom they belonged, without any dealings with the Aramæans—hence alike unprotected and unmolested." The Danites returned home exultant, reporting a fair land and a people "unsuspicious of danger." Six hundred of the tribe, with their households, soon set out on the quest of the new home. On the way they halted at the house of Micah, secretly removed the idols, and tempted the priest to join them by offers of higher position and greater honors. After dispoiling the altar in spite of the protests of the master—for was he not weak?—they resumed their march, and, coming to Laish "upon a people secure and unsuspicious of danger," they slew them without quarter and burned the town. They then re-built the city and called it Dan, establishing there an altar for the Ephod and Teraphim, which they had siezed, with the false Levite as chief priest. It is of interest to know that according to tradition this Levite was Jonathan, the son of Moses's son, Gersham.

The tale of the outrage at Gibeah is still more revolting in its details of violence, lust, and blood. The conscience of even that bloody time was stirred so that the tribes of Israel joined in punishing the guilty city and the tribe which sustained it. Then, lest the tribe of Benjamin should be lost altogether, all Israel joined in further outrage in order to supply them with wives.

These two stories give a vivid picture of the insecurity of life and property, the total lack of other considerations than brute strength, which prevailed during the period of judges. We see from the story of Micah that the national tabernacle at Shiloh was by no means the sole centre of the nation's religion, which clustered rather, round a hundred heathen idols. We see, too, that the hiring priest is by no means a modern product. The services of Jonathan, grandson of Moses, were on sale to the highest bidder. It was nothing to him that he had broken bread daily with the household of Micah for many days and had been treated by him "as his own son." His ears were open to the bribe, "Put thy hand to thy mouth . . . and be our priest," and he was rewarded for his betrayal by honor and dignity. It is hard to realize—and yet it is true—that in the deterioration of character, the lowering of ideals, there inheres the direst of punishments. We think of something spectacular when we think of God's punishments, but it is seldom that they come in this way; far more commonly they came without observation, as in the loss of enthusiasm, of faith in men, of faith in one's own manhood. "Not as the world giveth give I unto thee." "This is the condemnation that light has come into the world and men have loved darkness rather than light." Meanness is its own punishment as virtue is its own reward. No other punishment is meted out to Jonathan.

Yet this time, so full of violence and disorder, of betrayal and blood, was not without its homely, human side. Men lived, labored, and loved, children were born and shouted among the vineyards. Homes nestled in the valleys or around the hilltops, where the sacred ties of motherhood, of fatherhood, of brotherhood, bound loving hearts together. There is no more beautiful story of faith and love than the ancient story of Ruth set in that time "when the judges judged." A family of Judah moved over into the land of Moab, where the father and two sons died, the sons leaving Moabite wives. Naomi, the mother, resolved to return to Judah. One of the daughters-in-law remained behind, but the other cast her lot with the mother of her husband. At Bethlehem, in Judæa, Ruth is loved and married by Boaz, a kinsman of her dead husband. This is the skeleton of the story; it is impossible to convey the exquisite simplicity, purity, and pastoral beauty of the tale.

Many students attribute the authorship of the book of Ruth to the period of the exile (586–537 B. C.), or even to a later period. On the other hand, however, the book tells us that David, the national hero of the Jewish people, was a descendant of Ruth—a Moabite! This fact would hardly have been made prominent during the period of rigid exclusiveness following the return from exile. Moreover it seems unlikely that an account of the cordial welcome of a Moabite into the land of Israel should have been written after the promulgation of the stern law, "an Amorite or a Moabite shall not enter into the congregation. . . . Thou shalt not seek their peace nor their prosperity all thy days forever."—(Deuteronomy, xxiii., 3.) As we have seen, this law was first published and enforced in the sixth century before Christ, just before the exile. The story was probably written during the period of literary activity which followed the reign of Solomon. "The basis of the narrative consists, it may reasonably be supposed, of the family traditions respecting Ruth and her marriage with Boaz. These have been cast into a literary form by the author, who has, no doubt, to a certain extent, idealized both the characters and the scenes. Distance seems to have mellowed the rude, unsettled age of the judges."—Driver.

REMARKS AT THE "WHITE SLAVE" CONGRESS.

By Howard M. Jenkins, on behalf of the American delegates, at Westminster Palace Hotel, London, Sixth month 22, 1899.

THE delegates from the United States of America, present at the Congress, desire to express their hearty thanks for the welcome extended them, with others, and, moreover, their absolute sympathy, not only with the particular object for which the Congress has been convened, but with that principle of a clean life which underlies, and must underlie, every movement of the kind, and without which such undertakings would be in vain.

You well know, no doubt, that in the United States every subject such as we here consider comes within the legislative authority, not of the Nation, in the Congress at Washington, but of the several States, in their legislatures. There might be, therefore, forty-five American codes of law referring to the matter. But—and I say this with satisfaction—the laws of the several States concerning the social evil do not greatly differ. They may vary in some details, but in general they are all underlaid by one common principle—that sexual vice is against public policy, is detrimental to society, and therefore in all its forms is, and ought to be, “against the law.” Practically it may be said that the mass of the American people (and here let me remind you that the United States now has a population greater than any European nation except Russia, and has one city larger than Paris, and of nearly the rank of London, with two others in the rank of Berlin and St. Petersburg),—practically it may be said that the American people do not conceive of Prostitution except as a vile, a degrading, and an unlawful thing, and do not conceive or know of a system by which lawfully it can exist. Like other defiances of law and of public sentiment, it does exist, of course, but only thus.

I may therefore say, in a word, that the idea of “State regulation,” of the partnership of Society in the business of demoralizing its own membership, is practically unknown to and unconceived by the mass of the American people. In narrow circles the idea may be familiar, possibly it might even have support; but among the people at large it would be regarded as monstrous and abominable.

The attitude of American public opinion on this, as upon other subjects, is due in no small degree to the part which American women have always taken, and to the increased share which they are now taking, in social and public affairs. Women with us are not only earnest friends of reform, they are also intelligently active in pressing reform forward. They are accorded practically, in the law, in our social system, and in politics, the same rights as men, excepting the suffrage,—and even it fully in several States,—and they thus form a barrier in their many organizations, (first of all, no doubt, as to numbers and efficiency, the Women’s Christian Temperance Union, long since made international in its scope),—they form a barrier, I say, to the growth of such Vice as we here confront, one which I believe it cannot overcome. The principle—the divine principle—that a clean life, la vie blanche, is as truly incumbent upon one sex as upon the other, upon a man as upon a woman, and that transgression of the virtuous order is sinful and degrading for each party to it alike, this principle needs only to be stated with us in order to be conceded. Some might secretly cavil at it, but they could not openly and definitely teach with success an opposite doctrine.

The American delegates listened yesterday, at the luncheon, and again to-day, with lively interest and satisfaction, to the unofficial addresses made by Prof. Stuart, M.P., and Mr. Smith, M.P. They do not, and could not, conceive of the possibility in the United States that official recognition—implying official sanction—could be given to the degradation of both sexes through prostitution; and, on the other hand, looking at the steps which lead toward vice,—the contaminated and sensational literature, the indecent pictures and posters, the corrupted stage,—they join, as great numbers of American men and women do, in the earnest condemnation of the practice I have referred to. The reform of these things is fundamental work. We believe most heartily what has been said already in this Congress, that the roots of the evil which we here confront run deep, and in many directions, and that the advocates of better things must search for them patiently, and cut them wherever found.

THE JOYS OF CAMPING OUT.

MUCH of the tediousness of highly civilized life comes from its smoothness and regularity. To-day is like yesterday, and we think that we can predict to-morrow. Of course, we cannot really do so. The chances are still there. But we have covered them up so deeply with the artificialities of life that we lose sight of them. It seems as if everything in our neat little world were arranged, and provided for, and reasonably certain to pass. The best way of escape from this tedium vitæ is through a recreation like angling, because it tempts us out into a wilder, freer life. It leads almost inevitably to camping out, which is a wholesome and sanitary imprudence.

It is curious and pleasant to my apprehension, to observe how many people in New England, which has been called, at least in part, the Land of Steady Habits, are sensible of the joy of changing them—out of doors. They turn out from their comfortable farm-houses and their snug suburban cottages to go a-gyp-sying for a fortnight among the mountains or beside the sea. You see their white tents gleaming from the pine-groves around the little lakes, and catch glimpses of their bathing-clothes drying in the sun on the wiry grass that fringes the sand-dunes. Happy fugitives from the bondage of routine! They have found out that a long journey is not necessary to a good vacation. You may reach the Forest of Arden in a buck-board. The Fortunate Isles are within sailing distance in a dory. And a voyage on the river Pactolus is open to any one who can paddle a canoe. . . .

The people who always live in houses, and sleep on beds, and walk on pavements, and buy their food from butchers and bakers and grocers, are not the most blessed inhabitants of this wide and various earth. The circumstances of their existence are too mathematical and secure for perfect contentment. They live at second or third-hand. They are boarders in the world. Everything is done for them by somebody else.

It is almost impossible for anything very interesting to happen to them. They must get their excitement out of the newspapers, reading of the hair-breadth escapes and moving accidents that befall people in real life. What do these tame ducks really know of the adventure of living? If the weather is bad, they are snugly housed. If it is cold, there is a furnace in the cellar. If they are hungry, the shops are near at hand. It is all as dull, flat, stale, and unprofitable as adding up a column of figures.—Henry Van Dyke in The Century.

It is a proof of fine breeding to appear happy and cheerful, even if this does not correspond with one’s physical or mental moods. We have no right to inflict gloominess upon our companions.—Anon.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 22, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

SUPERIOR "RACES."

THE notion that some "races," or peoples, are "inferior;" and that others upon this account acquire a right to dominate them, and to use them for their own advantage, is one full of mischief, and almost wholly unjustified. Its mischief lies in the fact that thereby aggression and spoliation are promoted; nations which conceive themselves superior are drawn into acts which, if they saw things in their true relation, they would not undertake.

The real superiority of races and of nations must be found in their moral quality, in their approach to those standards of action which are called Christian, and which may exist under other names. Nations are superior or inferior, not by some conventional standard of "civilization," but by their perception and application of those principles upon which men may, and in a measure do, make their inhabitancy of the earth orderly, peaceful, and happy. Those nations who violate the rights of others, however the act may be cloaked by the claim of superiority, are like individuals who do injury to other individuals in person or estate; they are insulters, assailants, or robbers.

Within its own field, like a family within its own home, every people has its rights. The brown man and the black man have their habitat, the place wherein they dwell, and where, usually, their forefathers dwelt, in ages past. They have no less right there than Americans have in the United States, or Englishmen in England. Their manner of life, their system of government, may differ from ours without necessarily being bad. Perhaps they may administer their cities, or choose their senators, quite as creditably as we. Because it is common for men with us to wear block hats, it does not follow that men everywhere should do so. Because the dress of one-half our population is semi-annually dictated by persons in Paris, or other European cities, there is no good reason why we should send navies to compel the women of the South seas to subscribe for Parisian fashion plates. Our houses in this region are very commonly built of stone, but it is not therefore imperative upon the Japanese to abandon their houses of bamboo. We live a large part of the year closely shut up, but in a milder climate people may as well or better live in the open air. Our diet is to a considerable degree meat, and there are many millions who subsist and do well entirely on vegetable food.

Peoples thus vary, and they have the right to do so. They have peculiarities, and who shall say that they must all be alike? Some are taciturn, some are demonstrative; some are brusque, some are polite. If, underneath all, there lie the primal good qualities of men, if the actions and the customs are ordered upon right principles, the variations are a sign of the versatility of the human race, and no way to its discredit. The "white" man cannot say to the brown, or to the black, "Thou shalt be made over on my pattern, or I will destroy thee." Such change as may be desirable, such progress as is real, such civilization as has value, must be accomplished by those processes of Christian influence which are themselves beneficent. These we, and all others, have the right to employ. They are always in order, and moreover they are usually welcome. In every land, the messenger who brings glad tidings, who does good, whose purpose and work are helpful, is kindly received. The exceptions to the rule are few. It is brotherly love that conquers, and that tends to fuse the races of men, not supercilious assumption of superiority, and violent processes of despoilment.

In my description of the meeting-houses at Devonshire House, London, in the issue of 24th ult., I said they had fine, not five, galleries. The name of the Clerk (men's meeting) is John Morland—as correctly printed in one place.

H. M. J.

BIRTHS.

TAYLOR.—At Wilmington, Del., Sixth month 23, 1899, to Franklin and Mary E. Taylor, a son, who is named Franklin, Jr., and a daughter, who is named Ruthanna.

DEATHS.

ACTON.—In Salem, N. J., Seventh month 15, 1899, Rachel N., widow of Casper W. Acton, aged 77 years.

COLAHAN.—At her residence, 3942 Spruce street, Philadelphia, Seventh month 8, 1899, Mary Dorethea, widow of John B. Colahan, and daughter of the late Thomas Zell.

COLLIER.—At Crosswicks, N. J., Seventh month 11, 1899, Elizabeth B. Collier, in her 71st year.

CUTLER.—In Chester, Pa., Seventh month 16, 1899, Caroline V., widow of David Cutler, aged 51 years, 6 months, and 21 days. She was the daughter of Daniel and Susan Zavitz, of Coldstream, Ontario, and had removed to Chester with her daughter Arletta, wife of Charles Palmer, in order to educate a son and daughter at Swarthmore College. She was a valued member and elder of Chester Monthly Meeting. Interment at Coldstream, Canada.

HUTCHINSON.—At Pasadena, California, Seventh month 6, 1899, William S. Hutchinson, in the 69th year of his age.

LLOYD.—In West Philadelphia, suddenly, Seventh month 13, 1899, Lydia B., wife of Samuel Lloyd, aged 66 years.

PIERCE.—At Liberty, Sullivan county, N. Y., Seventh month 8, 1899, Charles Pierce, son of John W. and the late Rachel M. Pierce; a member of Chappaqua Monthly Meeting of Friends.

WARRICK.—At Moorestown, N. J., Seventh month 8, 1899, William H. Warrick, in his 52d year.

WHITE.—In Philadelphia, Sixth month 18, 1899, of diphtheria, Walter S., son of Horace G. and Ella K. White, aged 11 years and 6 months.

Walter's was a beautiful nature. Not often has the Good Father bestowed upon one so youthful more to admire. Gentle in manner and attractive in person, with a tender and loving heart, and joining with these the budding graces of a rare, bright mind, he found many friends. These looked upon him and wondered to what field of usefulness coming time would assign him. Although intelligent beyond his years, he was unobtrusive, and seemed more anxious to acquire knowledge than to impart his own.

"A child of beauty nipped by death,—
Oh no, upborne to milder skies,
Where no rude wind with icy breath
May blight a flower of paradise." H.

WHITSON.—At Westbury, L. I., Sixth month 10, 1899, Samuel Whitson, in his 83d year.

DEBORAH SINCLAIR CORSE.

The death of this beloved Friend, which was mentioned in our last issue as having occurred on the 7th inst., removes from Baltimore Monthly Meeting its oldest birthright member, and one whose long life was made beautiful by good works and a faithful devotion to the welfare and happiness of her family and of others for whom she labored.

She was ever ready to offer encouragement and assistance to those in need, without thought of reward or commendation. Her death was symbolic of her life. In her peaceful, quiet country home, amidst the beauties of nature, and in the house where she had lived for over fifty consecutive years, surrounded by all her large family of children, the change came—without a struggle—as her soul passed quietly from earth to Heaven.

V. S. M.

THE DOUKHOBOR FUND.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER has previously acknowledged on account of this fund, $438.00

Joseph H. and A. Lawton, 50.00

$488.00

We have forwarded, Seventh month 18, 1899, to the chairman of the local Relief Committee at Winnipeg, Manitoba, a draft for $100, being the balance to date remaining in our hands. The Committee has been requested to apply this in whatever way will give the greatest aid to the Doukhobor immigrants.

PROFESSOR AXENFELD, of Perugia, has discovered that three-fifths of all men of distinction are first-born children: the other two-fifths are either second or third children, or else the youngest of very large families. Among the first he points out Luther, Dante, Raphael, Lionardo da Vinci, Confucius, Heine, Schopenhauer, Goethe, Ariosto, Mohammed, Shelley, Erasmus, Milton, Byron, Moliere, Carlyle, Rossini, Talleyrand, Buffon; among the last Loyola and Franklin, both thirteenth children; Schubert, a fourteenth child, and Volta, a seventh child.

MEN are apt, I know, in after life to lay the blame of their scholastic shortcomings at the door of their teachers. They are often wrong in this, and I am quite aware that there are some pupils who are knowledge-proof.—Lowell.

WISDOM is a fox who, after long hunting, will at last cost you pains to dig out; 'tis a cheese, which by how much the richer has the thicker, the homelier, and the coarser coat. 'Tis a sack posset, wherein the deeper you go you'll find it the sweeter. Wisdom is a hen, whose cackling we must value and consider, because it is attended with an egg. But, lastly, 'tis a nut, which, unless you choose with judgment may cost you a tooth and pay you nothing but a worm.—Dean Swift.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

VI.—THE ENGLISH FRIENDS' SCHOOL AT ACKWORTH.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

THE boarding school maintained at Ackworth, in Yorkshire (about 170 miles north of London), is a well-known institution. It was opened in 1779, having been promoted by that famous physician and valuable Friend, Dr. John Fothergill, of London,—who is, in fact, regarded with veneration as its founder. It was he, no doubt, more than any other, who was instrumental in securing the property for the purpose, the original buildings having been erected for a foundling hospital some twenty years before the purchase by the Friends, and having been closed because of failure of financial support.

The "General Meeting" at Ackworth occurs in the Sixth month, at the close of the school year, occupying two days. The committee in charge attend, there are exercises by the pupils, and many friends and "old scholars" come. It is an occasion such as has no precise example with us in our schools and colleges, though resembling somewhat the proceedings of our Class Days and Commencements. On the 27th, in the evening, a number of visitors had already gathered. I reached Ackworth from London at 6.45, and was kindly met by our friend John William Graham and his wife. On the school "terrace"—the open court yard—the boys were having an exhibition of athletics, and later they gave some musical selections, on the violin. (Music is taught in the school, in recent years.) The long-protracted daylight permitted these open-air exercises almost until what we should think a reasonable "bed-time."

The next morning there was a meeting for worship at 10, in which several Friends spoke. The meeting-house, which will hold probably 800 persons, was well filled, the scholars occupying the central portion. After the meeting had closed the General Committee in charge of the school began its sitting, adjourning at 12.15 until 10.30 next day. Then there was a boys' swimming contest in the bath-house, a new structure, with a fine pool. Dinner was spread at 1.30. At 3 the company gathered again in the meeting-house for an exhibition by the scholars, "Speech Day," as it is called. There were black-board exercises, recitations, a scene from Shakespeare, etc. Then the large company proceeded to a new hall, "the new reading-room," where there was an "opening" address by Henry Thompson, of Arneside? a well-known Friend; and member of the General Committee. He announced the name of the new building, "Fothergill Hall." A little later, the Old Scholars' Association had afternoon tea in the meeting-house, and at 7 o'clock that Association held its annual meeting, which occupied the evening.

The following day there were Scripture examinations in the different class-rooms, from 9 to 10; then at 10.30 the General Committee resumed and concluded its business, the Head-Master, Frederick Andrews, delivering his address. He spoke, I may say at this point, in detail, and with much frankness, of the school work and management, its needs, its prospects, its difficulties, its sources of encouragement. Each point was candidly elaborated for the committee, and other friends of the School. Ad-journment was followed by dinner, and then there were cricket matches, one of which, between an eleven of the girl students and some of the old scholars, we were able to watch for a while, before taking our train late in the afternoon for Manchester.

Interested in educational work, and acquainted somewhat with our American Friends' boarding-schools, I was of course glad to visit and observe Ackworth. Let me add, now, some facts concerning it, many of which were stated or alluded to in the several meetings during the two days whose proceedings I have summarized.

There is accommodation for 300 scholars, and this number is usually present—180 boys, 120 girls. In recent time, non-members have been admitted, and in the last school year (1898-9) about one-fifth of the whole number were of this class. The session begins about the middle of Eighth month, and closing, now, at the end of the Sixth, there is thus only about half the vacation usual with us, the cooler weather of the English summer making it practicable to pursue school work without discomfort. There is a vacation at Christmas, but practically the School is open ten full calendar months in each year.

The charges to the pupils are to be raised somewhat; this was one of the important matters discussed and determined in the Committee—the Yearly Meeting, whose authority is superior, having left the subject to the Committee. Future rates will be from 18 pounds, say $90, up to 48 pounds, say $240, a year. The non-members will practically all be at the highest rate. (The rate at present is from 18 pounds up to 45 pounds.)

The reason for the increase simply is that the Committee has not been able recently to square its annual account, and some deficit, "floating debt," in American parlance, has accumulated—about $3,000. The annual statement shows that the cost of conducting the school last year was £10,235, say $51,000, of which the salary list took £3,537, or about $17,650. There are (I think I am correct in saying) thirteen teachers for the boys' side, and nine for the girls'. The "house expenses" reached nearly £4,000, or something less than $20,000, and it may be interesting to observe that there were consumed, of flour, "218 sacks, of 20 stones each," costing £305 3s. 1d.; of meat, 33,548 pounds, and of fish, 3,298 pounds, the two items costing £1,037 2s. 10d.; of milk, 16,542 gallons, costing £627 2s. 5d.; of butter, 4,098 pounds, costing £213 4s. 4d.; of cheese 336 pounds, and of tea 576 pounds. (The English tea-drinking is indicated in this item, which is nearly at the rate of two pounds a day; coffee and cocoa together made only 274 pounds for the year, or about one-half the tea).

The School's work is somewhat below the range of that—for example—at George School. The children are from nine to sixteen years of age. They are not, as a rule, prepared to enter College when they leave, though Frederick Andrews mentioned some instances where they had been so. There is not much actual coeducation; the two sexes have their separate dining-rooms, and separate class-rooms ("school-rooms" they are called), and men teachers teach the boys and women the girls, there being, however, some exception to this last statement in the fact that a teacher of science, and one or more in foreign languages have classes of each sex. Furthermore—with this exception—a teacher has full charge of his or her class in all studies, the year through. Of languages other than English, the course includes Latin and French. There is instruction in Manual Training and an interesting exhibition was made in one of the rooms of articles which the scholars had made,—useful and ornamental, much like those shown at George School in the annual exhibitions.

The Committee in charge is largely self-perpetuating. There are 36 men members, and 8 women. One-fourth of these retire each year, so that the term of service is four years, and there is a provision, whose usefulness is very questionable, by which at least one year is required to elapse before a member is eligible for reappointment. The appointments are made at these General Meetings, by an election, by vote of numbers, in which the holding-over Committee members participate. The quarterly meetings are expected to send representatives to the General Meeting, but, as appeared at this time, some of them do not always do so.

From the addresses made by the Head-Master, and by Henry Thompson, and other sources, some further interesting data were derived. The competition of other Friends' Schools, and of the "Board" Schools (corresponding practically to our public schools) is felt, and the falling-off in birthright members is a factor also. The number of non-members' children in the School tends to increase. (Frederick Andrews told of a boy, the son of a wine-merchant, who was a scholar, and who took the total abstinence pledge in the School; the father, when the boy was to leave, asked if he could be got a place among Friends, so that his bringing-up might continue to be that of abstinence.) Speaking of religious matters in his address, Frederick Andrews mentioned his observation as to emotional experiences among the scholars. He had found that waves of prayer-meetings, etc., were apt not to affect the character in any permanent way; but, instead, there was a tendency among those participating to regard such meetings as sufficient in themselves, and so to be less careful as to their general conduct. The home training, "especially in humble, and lower middle classes," one speaker considered much less desirable than that at Ackworth, and he urged therefore that the children be sent "as early as possible."

The fixing of the rate of payment, between the lowest rate and the highest, is done by "agents," one of whom is appointed by each quarterly or monthly meeting. These agents are presumed to know the financial circumstances of parents, and to be able to fairly fix the charge. The actual School cost of each child, per year, on the average, is £35 5s. 11d., and the average payments by children £28 10s. 7d., so that there remains thus £6 15s. 4d. per child, to which is to be added an item of "extraordinary expenditure," £1 os. 3d., making a total deficiency for 290 children, of some £2,255, which must be covered by income of invested funds, subscriptions, etc. The quarterly meetings are asked to make voluntary "subscriptions," annually, and these amounted last year to £733, 11s., 8d., or about $3,650. But the invested fund, the "endowment," is not large; the income from it last year was only about $1,075.

The property includes two farms, one of which is rented, and it with rented houses, etc., produced an income of £713 2s. 6d., or about $3,500. One farm is not let, and its administration last year showed a loss of nearly $1,000. The land surrounds the School buildings and grounds in such a way that it could not well be placed in a tenant's control.

The school buildings include several of the original erection. They are placed around three sides of a square, the open side looking southward across level rural country and a little stream, the Went. The oldest of them, like old stone buildings generally in England, have acquired in time a rich coloring of dark brown, verging in places upon positive black. In one of them there is a fine old hall, used as a library, etc. The real estate of Ackworth (exclusive of furniture, machinery, library, farm stock, etc.), stands on the balance sheet at £34,255, or about $171,000. The total assets of the school are stated at £48,698, or about $243,000, of which sum $30,000 only is invested funds. Within the last year or two, subscriptions approaching £10,000 have been made for improvements,—including the new Fothergill Hall, the bath, electric lighting, etc., and an improvement of the dormitories is strongly urged.

Ackworth was, of course, the forerunner of West-town, being opened just twenty years earlier, and the latter was modelled upon it. For a long time the system in the two was much the same. There were no vacations; the teaching went on continuously through the year, and scholars entered and departed at any convenient time. The old discipline was strict, and the living plain. Teachers now in service at Ackworth looked back on their experience as scholars or as young teachers with great satisfaction in the more gentle and kindly discipline of to-day. A peculiar feature is the "Master" or "Mistress" "on duty." These are teachers serving throughout the year, and taking charge of the scholars out of school hours. They are to oversee the discipline, and to provide occupation or amusement for the scholars,—encouraging and leading sports, planning walks, extra studies, etc. Much attention is paid to out-door sports; the girls, as well as the boys, are taught to swim, and to play cricket and other games. One rule is that there shall be "no loafing," and the "Master on Duty," and the corresponding "Mistress," are expected to see that all are kept busy in some way.

The girls are in charge of a Mistress, but she is responsible to the Head Master. Frederick Andrews, who fills this position, and who is held in high esteem, has been at the head of the School for a number of years. All I saw left on my mind the impression of a very carefully-conducted and hard-working School. I am indebted to many for kind attentions during my two days' visit.

The Old Scholars' Association is an important adjunct—indeed a pillar of strength—to the School and its work. It has now nearly 1,900 members, and is striving to make the number 2,000 by next year. The secretary, J. Spencer Hodgson, has labored with much earnestness and success to build up the Association. The president is changed each year, and for the coming year will be a woman, Mary Caroline Pumphrey.

Dalton Hall, Manchester, Seventh month 3.

BLOCH'S GREAT BOOK ON MODERN WAR. IV.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER : —

ALTHOUGH the series of articles on Peace by Professor Mielle do not all have reference to the great work of the Russian Economist, which turned the Czar's attention to the need of partial disarmament, as the general title has been used thus far, I will continue it in this fourth number. The subject of this article is "Women and Disarmament." Although our author may be hardly prepared to take advanced ground as to the equal rights of woman, it will be seen that this line of reasoning leads naturally to the recognition of woman on an equality with man in all the affairs of state. When that comes to be generally recognized, the world will have made a great advance towards the prevalence of Universal Peace.

Swarthmore College.

EDWARD H. MAGILL.

WOMEN AND DISARMAMENT.

Whatever opinion one may have of the advantages or disadvantages of the mingling of women—some day to be enforced upon us—in the political life of civilized nations, it seems to me that their right to take part in the war against war cannot be contested. And I will go further and say that not only is it the right of our mothers, wives, and sisters to enroll themselves in the League for Peace, but it is for them the most sacred of duties. For if man can find in war the compensations of glory and of booty, mothers and wives have never seen in it, and never can see in it, anything but a source of despair and tears. We have dwelt with pity many times upon the terrible spectacle which the day after a battle presents to eyes even the most accustomed to the horrors of war. The heart-rending cries of the wounded have forced from more than one great warrior, from a Turenne, a Marceau, aye, even from a Moltke, words of execration against this human carnage. But who will count the sum of sorrows, who will measure the depth of the abyss of despair for which every battle is responsible to woman, that eternal victim of the inhumanity of man? The symbolic lamentation of Rachel weeping in Rama for her children slain, and unwilling to be consoled, is only a too faithful image of the lot which the next war reserves for the Rachels of modern days. [Think of the certain fate of a large portion of the 100,000 young men of our country soon to be exposed to the deadly climate of the Philippines and the bullets of the Filipinos, and for what? For a childish sentiment on the part of our government about lowering a flag where, as the flag of a nation claiming freedom for itself, it has no moral right to float.—TRANSLATOR.]

Is not the League of women for disarmament more legitimate and more appropriate than the League of those liable to service? They speak of tax of blood. Is it not a tax of flesh and blood that all mothers pay? Who better than they understand the price of that flesh and blood which they themselves have brought forth? Ask them if they consent, if they have ever consented, to see nothing but food for powder in that beloved offspring, nursed in the tenderness of their hearts. Ask the mother if it was to give him as food to the minotaur of war that she watched and wept over the cradle of her child; ask her if she sees only a target for the Mauser, the Martini, or the Gatling gun in the robust and handsome boy on whose arm she is proud to rest?

They speak of patriotism. League of wives and mothers, you are the true patriots! And if on the day of the danger of your country you give ungrudgingly, I do not say your blood,—that heroism is easy, men are satisfied with it,—but what is to you more precious a thousand times, the flesh of your flesh, the blood of your blood, will they refuse you the right to be consulted upon peace or war? But this right you have; the Jeanne d'Arcs, the Jeanne Hachettes, and a thousand other heroines have consecrated it. It is yours to use it in spite of the raillery of fools. I say so much the worse for the imbeciles. We know the objections of the one party and the raillery of the other. Neither are of any account.

But, says one, war is just what women like: See the fabulist:

"Two cocks were living in peace—
A hen comes up,
And, see, the war begun!"

No disarmament possible, says another, so long as women shall have to that degree the love of plumes. Go have them vote the suppression of embroidery and tinsel! Don't you see that by nature they pounce upon the red pantaloons like the bull?

We see that all that is not very wicked, and we must not be astonished that some jokes of comedians, together with all the wit of a dozen table d'hotes, have not been able to prevent the elite of the women of France and of foreign lands from taking the place in the movement for peace which rightfully belongs to them. For France in particular this place is important. Of the fourteen Peace Societies which France contains, five were founded and are presided over by women, to wit:

- 1st. The International Union of Women.
- 2d. The International League of Women for Disarmament.
- 3d. The League of Women for Peace; President, Mme. Princess Wisniewska.
- 4th. Equality; President, Mme. Vincent.
- 5th. The International League of Peace and Liberty.

These societies reckon among their members an elite of women of which any country whatever would have a right to be proud. If one meets there but few of the articulated dolls of the demi-monde, or of the monde without the demi, one sees there no longer the spectacled and blue-stockinged visages at which our grandfathers were frightened, and by which they wish to frighten our grandchildren. The distinguished women who assemble there never fail to be charming; but having renounced the legend which gave to them the brain and the plumage of the bird, they have assumed, with a knowledge of their duties, also a knowledge of their rights, and they demand their part of action and responsibility. Paying their share of the tax of the flesh they demand their share of the control of the shedding of blood.

Among the first these societies sent to the Czar their enthusiastic endorsement, and their influence cannot fail to make itself felt by public opinion. I have no need to add that the Fronde and its brave editorial corps are fighting in the front rank of the good fight. Is not the fact characteristic that the first political woman's journal is devoted actively to the cause of peace, and does it not make us augur well for the future?

Abroad, too, the women do not remain inactive. We see in England the ladies of the aristocracy and of the gentry seated upon the platform at their public meetings, by the side of their husbands or their sons, and speaking after them, always called out and applauded. The oratorical talent of the English ladies of high life is remarkable. This is one of the most agreeable souvenirs of my stay in London. Having permitted myself to be enrolled in the two rival societies, the Primrose League and the Liberal Woman's Association, I often attended their meetings for the great pleasure which I had in hearing the feminine orators. But I beg you to excuse the parenthesis, and continue:

In Italy, in Germany, in Austria, women belonging almost always to the highest ranks of society, as Madam Selenka of Munich, the Baroness of Luttnar of Vienna, have taken the lead in the movement of women for Peace. Their conferences throughout Germany are well attended, and it is a pleasure to observe that they obtain followers as well among the intellectual and cultivated of the aristocracy and the middle classes, as among the working women of the lower class. Let us note in passing that the Empress Dowager of Russia, the present Czarina, and the Princess of Wales are zealous advocates of Peace, and that all three have several times openly expressed their especial sympathy for France.

The movement of women for Peace is then fully entered upon everywhere, and it only requires a greater number of signers to render it decisive. Ah! if the women were willing! I will not go so far as to induce them to make a strike against their husbands, like the women of Athens in the time of Lysistratus. It is a revolutionary means, of which they will not wish to make use except as a last extremity. But if they were only willing, if they knew how to employ in the service of right and justice (which is, in short, their proper service, since it is that of the weak and the oppressed) their thousand methods of seductive persuasion!

The League of Mothers and Wives, the League of Sisters and Fiancées,—what forces for social renovation, forces now squandered and lost!—permit us to appreciate the courageous action of the valiant ones enrolling themselves in the Peace Societies. Ah! if the women only wished! we said just now. But they do wish, and by their first enthusiastic movement they have placed themselves in the advanced guard. Women of France, women of all countries, one same sentiment unites them, invincible and profound, the love of those sons, brought forth in suffering, reared in deep sorrow and often in tears, those sons, sometimes ungrateful, whom they wish no longer to see slaying each other in the bloody game of war. That love, stronger than death, will it not be one day stronger than hatred, stronger than war?

P. MIEILLE,

Professor at the Lycée de Tarbes, France.

NOTE.—In his next paper our author does not forget to refer to the extensive movement for Peace among the women of the United States.—Translator.

Educational Department.

SWARTHMORE COLLEGE.—Charles F. Woods, Ph.D., Johns Hopkins, has been appointed Assistant in the departments of French and German. Dr. Woods received his degree in 1897, and has since been Professor of French and German in the Woman's College of Richmond, Virginia, and Assistant Professor of the same languages in Richmond College. Frank E. Craig has been appointed Assistant in Engineering, Shop Practice. He received a thorough training in one of the larger manufacturing institutions of New England, and later entered the Polytechnic Institute at Worcester, Massachusetts, from which he was graduated in 1898. During the last year he has taught in the Agricultural College of Rhode Island, and at the State Reform School, Morganza, Pa. W. S. Cummings, M. D., has been appointed Director of Physical Training for young men. Dr. Cummings is a graduate of the Medical School of Tufts College, and has had a somewhat extended experience in teaching Gymnastics and Athletics, having been connected with several New England Colleges and Preparatory Schools. He was trained for this work largely under the direction of Prof. R. J. Roberts, of the Boston Young Men's Christian Association, and like Prof. Roberts, aims rather after all-round development than at the production of athletes. Dr. Cummings attributes his own somewhat remarkable physical development largely to participation in out-door sports.

PHILADELPHIA FRIENDS' SCHOOLS.—We have received the annual catalogue of the Friends' Central and allied schools of Philadelphia, comprising the following:

At Race and Fifteenth streets, Kindergarten, Primary, Intermediate, and Central or High School; at Girard Avenue and Seventeenth street, Kindergarten, Primary, and Intermediate; at Lancaster Avenue and Thirty-Fifth street, Kindergarten, Primary, and Intermediate; at Greene street and School Lane, Germantown, Primary and Intermediate.

We give the list of the various principals: Joseph S. Walton, Principal Boys' Department, Central or High School; Anna W. Speakman, Principal Girls' Department, Central or High School; Elizabeth M. Roberts, Principal Germantown School for Girls and Boys; Mary H. White, Principal Girard Avenue School for Girls and Boys; Anna R. Richter, Principal West Philadelphia School for Girls and Boys; Ellen M. Greene, Principal Intermediate for Boys; Annie L. Clement, Principal Intermediate for Girls; Sarah T. Price, Principal Primary School and of Kindergarten.

Pupils prepared at Friends' Central School are now pursuing advanced study in Swarthmore, Haverford, Amherst, Bryn Mawr, Vassar, and Wellesley Colleges, and the Universities of Pennsylvania, Yale, Harvard, Princeton, and Cornell.

ABINGTON FRIENDS' SCHOOL.—The annual catalogue is an attractive booklet, stating the courses of study and giving lists of alumni and pupils. The teachers for next year will be as follows:

George M. Downing, M. S., Principal, Mathematics and History; Clara H. Barnard, Science and Penmanship; Mary Brosius Kirk, A. B., Mathematics and Latin; Carrie B. Way, B. L., Grammar, Reading, and Literature; Frederic F. Windle, B. E., Science and Mathematics; Emma A. Carey, French, German, and Music; Rachel S. Martin, Principal of Primary; Alice Kent Gourley, Drawing and Painting; Jessie M. K. Gourley, Matron.

SWARTHMORE PREPARATORY SCHOOL.—The matron for next year, Elizabeth S. Truman, and Assistant Matron, Margaretta B. Longshore, are both the same as last year, and both are Friends.

Conferences, Associations, Etc.

EDUCATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THE following is taken from The Friend, Philadelphia:

The Friends' Sixth Educational Conference was held at Providence, R. I., on the 28th–30th ultimo. Some of the subjects presented in well-prepared papers and addresses were, viz: "Literature in School and College," "The work the College has done for the Church," "What Denominational Influence should our Secondary Schools Exert?" "Education and Modern Business Life," "The Relation of Friends' Academies to their Colleges," "High Scholarship and Modest Pretensions in College Work," "An Illustrated Lecture on American Archaeology," "Sociology from a Quaker Standpoint," "Modern Thought in Friends' Educational Work," "The Bible in School and College," "The Importance of Teaching the Principles of Peace in our Schools, with Suggestions as to Methods; or, Militarism, its Character, Cause, and Cure."

The last-named was read by Dr. R. H. Thomas, of Baltimore, and is treated as the diagnosis of a well-nigh universal disease from a medical standpoint. This admirable brochure on a subject claiming such world-wide consideration at the present time is a most happy and forceful pleading for the recognition of a vital Christian principle, and is worthy of the widest circulation. Copies (printed separately from the proceedings of the Conference) can be had in a short time at Friends' Institute, Twelfth street below Market, Philadelphia. The discussions following some of these papers were exceedingly instructive.

The study of the best modern prose and poetry was commended by a teacher who has been very successful with children between six and twelve years of age. Taking a year for such writers as Whittier, Longfellow, Lowell, Tennyson, or Ruskin.

The best selections from one of these authors was kept continuously before the child, with the result that an accurate, permanent, and fond appreciation of their writings was acquired.

The need of giving our children some practical acquaintance with the history and church methods of our Society was approved, as well as a clearer and fuller knowledge of the Bible.

The Hebrew language and modes of expression as preserved in the Old Testament had been much neglected as literature of the finest order and most influential in shaping the character of our civilization, as well as Christianity. It was recommended that a careful acquaintance with the various portions of the Scriptures might rightly find a place in the school curriculum—side by side with the ancient classics.

"Modern Thought" was presented as giving many advantages for a friendly solution of the serious problems now confronting the religious world. Modern business methods, the formation of trusts and similar tendencies in commercial circles, have now to be considered in fitting children for the duties of life, and some valuable suggestions were made as to what is required of those who fill responsible positions in connection with corporations.

The welcome extended by Augustine Jones on the part of the Friends' School of Providence, R. I., in whose capacious Alumni Hall the Conference was held, as also of the Governor of the State, was most cordial, and the whole atmosphere and spirit of the various sessions was stimulating and spiritually comforting as the great underlying principles of Quakerism were frequently brought to view, and increasingly valued by the assembly.

The best and concluding words on teaching children were spoken by Prof. Goddard, of Maine, who has been appointed to fill the chair of Pedagogy in the Normal School at West Chester.

He said the unconscious part of our lives and influence had about the same relation to the conscious as the submerged portion of an iceberg has to that which is in sight. It was only as the principles of right conduct and thinking so impregnated our whole being that they unconsciously controlled our lives, and not only our own, but others, that we could fulfill the high calling of instructors.

MICKLETON, N. J.—The Young Friends' Association met Seventh month 15. In the absence of the President, the Vice President, Martha White, filled the chair; and in the absence of the Secretary, M. Elma Livezey acted. The meeting was opened by the reading of the twenty-fifth chapter of Isaiah, followed by the reading of the minutes of last meeting. Esther L. Rulon read from Janney's History the account of Robert Barclay, of his life and death and of the death of his much-loved father. James G. Engle read "Hiawatha's Fasting." An exercise entitled "If We Try," was recited by three little boys, showing that even the drop of dew has its work to do; so if we but really try we can accomplish much. The chapter from the Discipline on "Representative Committees" was read by Rachel M. Haines. This was followed by a paper on the life of Frances E. Willard. For years she taught school and filled places of lesser importance until she became President of the World's W. C. T. U., in the year 1879. From that time her duties became greater, until in Second month, 1897, at the Hotel Empire, New York, she passed away from this life, to reap the harvest of her sowing.

"Nell's Letter," a little poem, was recited by Mary Rulon, followed by Benjamin C. Heritage, who read the current items, which had been collected by James Pancoast. The Secretary next read the appointed questions for the meeting in Eighth month, and the reports of the History and Literary Committees. This was followed by the calling of the roll. Meeting then adjourned until Eighth month 12. We were glad of the company of several friends; the presence of visitors always gives encouragement.

M. ELMA LIVEZEY, Secretary, pro tem.

RICHMOND, IND.—The Young Friends' Association held its last regular meeting before closing for the summer, Sixth month 18, in the First-day School room, where we have been meeting for more than a year. The subject was "Peace and Arbitration." Being a children's meeting it was opened by two young girls, each reading a lesson from the Scripture and an article on the subject. A number of the children took part in the meeting, as did also several of the adult members. Our business meetings are always held the fourth Fifth-day in each month, and generally at the homes. The last was held Sixth month 15, at the home of Edward Thistlethwaite. We have no arranged program for our First-day evening meetings. These meetings are often both profitable and interesting. We think all the meetings are profitable, but it always adds interest to the meetings for each member to contribute something, if only a text, and when this is not done the meeting is not of so much interest. At our last business meeting we discussed the importance of each member taking part in the exercises of the meetings, and it was felt that while we do not take a pledge, as the Endeavor Societies do, that each one feels it his duty to throw in a mite, yet we hope each will feel a renewed interest when we meet again in Ninth month. Two socials are arranged for, to be held in the country at the time of our regular business meeting, during the two months for which our meetings have adjourned.

LAURA E. MOORE, Cor. Sec.

THE person who delves among good authors and their thoughts, lives two lives to the one of his neighbor, to whom the richness of a cultivated mind is unknown.—F. W. Norcross.

LITERARY NOTES.

"HERBERT SPENCER at seventy-nine" is the title of an instructive account of the great philosopher's life during the last ten years, which will appear in the next number of Appletons' Popular Science Monthly. A brief history of his life work, the various occurrences attending its completion, and a number of interesting and characteristic facts regarding his habits and peculiarities, combine to make a very readable story. A fine engraving, made from Mr. Spencer's latest photograph, accompanies the article. The same magazine will contain an article by Appleton Morgan, on the result of the last five years of legislation against drunkenness. Two very surprising conclusions may be drawn from the author's statistics: first, that the fewer the places where liquor is sold the larger the consumption of liquor; and, second, that the larger the consumption of liquor the less the drunkenness.

We recently noticed Alice Brown's latest book, "Tiverton Tales," in these columns. This author's famous book, "Meadow-Grass," and her volume of poems, "The Road to Castaly," formerly published by Copeland & Day, have now been added to the list of Houghton, Mifflin & Co.

A new and complete edition of "The Life and Works of the Sisters Brontë" is to be issued by Harper & Brothers, at monthly intervals. The edition will be after the style of the "Biographical Edition of Thackeray's Complete Works," to be entitled "The Hawthorn Edition." Mrs. Humphry Ward contributes a preface to each novel of the three sisters. The edition includes also Gaskell's "Life of Charlotte Brontë" with annotations by Clement K. Shorter, the eminent Brontë authority.

To everyone, but especially to those whose reading time is limited, the value of an unbiased journal of criticism must be apparent. Literature is such a journal. Its criticisms of new books are written by men whose opinions are looked up to the world over. Its literary news is authoritative, and the special articles which appear in its columns are from the pens of the best known men of letters in this country and England.

THERE are many people to do the great deeds that must be done. What this weary old world needs is more people who will remove the pebbles from the pathway of those who are foot-sore, and lift by even a finger's weight the burden on some weary back. It may be just that pebble that would wound the foot and just that finger's weight which would make the burden intolerable.—Harper's Bazar.

THE British steamer Holbein, which arrived at Liverpool on the 16th instant, picked up Captain William A. Andrews, known as the "lone navigator," who left Atlantic City on the 18th ult., in a little craft named The Doree, barely twelve feet in length, to attempt to cross the Atlantic. Captain Andrews was found exhausted about 700 miles from the Irish coast. His boat was left adrift.

THE Texas Cotton Exchange estimates that the loss of cotton in the Brasos river bottoms will reach 200,000 bales, worth $5,000,000. At the same time the rains which produced the great flood have so benefited upland cotton that the crop this year will be the best ever harvested.

COMMISSIONER WILSON, of the Internal Revenue, has issued a circular absolutely prohibiting banks from affixing stamps to checks unstamped when presented, and requiring them to return the same to the drawers.

PROFESSOR DOUGLAS HYDE, who is at the head of the movement in Ireland to reestablish the Gaelic language as the language of the Irish people, is coming to the United States to seek help in that work.

THE Spanish Cabinet, after a long discussion, has accepted the offer of the Queen Regent to assist the finances of the country by giving up another 2,000,000 pesetas from the civil list.

At least twelve persons have died in New York city and vicinity from injuries and diseases brought on by accident in the celebration of Independence Day.

COMMUNICATIONS.

"THE LAST OF THE LENAPE."

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER :

WE again acknowledge, with thanks, several kind replies relative to the above book. One from Dr. S. Taylor, of Woodstown, N. J., one from D. W. Branson, Va., and a copy of the book itself presented by Edward Stapler, Jr., of Baltimore. Elizabeth N. Coale, of Ill., gives a full description of the book, and speaking of its two principal poems says "that 'Tewinissa' is a beautiful story containing an excellent moral." Of the other, and main one, she quotes thus from Samuel M. Janney :

"The incidents in this poem ('The Last of the Lenapé,') were related to the author by his valued friend, Dr. Joseph Parrish, of Philadelphia, who derived them from a tradition preserved in his family. They took place about the year 1683."

"The Last of the Lenapé,' nearest resident to Philadelphia, died in Chester county, in the person of 'Old Indian Hannah,' in 1803. She had her wigwam many years on the banks of the Brandywine, and traveled around selling baskets, etc., and followed by her dog and pigs, that stopped wherever she did. She lived to be nearly one hundred years old; had a proud and lofty spirit to the last; hated the blacks, and scarcely brooked the lower classes of whites. As she grew old, she quitted her solitude, and dwelt in friendly families."

He adds, "that the families who took care of this last of her tribe, were descendants of Hannah Chandler, who had been so signally befriended by the Indians, as mentioned in the poem. She was buried near the forks of the Brandywine, in an Indian burying ground, eleven miles from where she died."

THE NATIONAL RELIEF COMMISSION.

THIS Commission, which served the same ends in the late war with Spain as did the Christian and Sanitary Commissions of the Civil War, has issued an extensive Report. John H. Converse, of Philadelphia, was the President of the organization, and its officers and executive committee included many prominent churchmen and philanthropists of this and other cities, among them Isaac H. Clothier, Joshua L. Bailey, and David Scull.

The report shows that under the management of the Executive Committee and its efficient Secretary, Dr. M. S. French, the Commission did a great and good work during the recent war. It stretched out the helping hand to the sick and well. It corrected some evils. It supplied many wants. The Executive Committee was faithful to the trust committed to its care.

The men who represented the Commission in the field for the most part paid their own expenses and were liberal in their personal gifts. They gave their valuable time to the work, and suffered in health in the discharge of their duties. Their letters and reports were carefully written. Their observations and recommendations led to the correction of some evils and to the supply of many urgent needs. The third part of the report is interesting as giving an account of the various phases of relief and the many agencies used, and the large number of organizations coöperating with it. Those who read the report will cordially commend those who worked so faithfully in this good cause.

CONTRIBUTIONS TO BEACH ST. MISSION.

WE have received the following donations towards the seashore outing of the children of the Beach Street Mission : L. B. P., $5.00; A. P. H., $5.00; H. P. T., $2.00. We have only four children as a commencement, as we have received so few contributions. I hope there will be sufficient to continue it.

E. C. HENSZEY.

THE Northern Pacific has broken its record of land sales in the year just closed. The figures are : Eastern district, Minnesota, North Dakota, Montana, 1,421,000 acres; last year, 946,000. Western district, Washington, Oregon, and Idaho, 728,000 acres; last year, 616,679.

YET AM I NOT FOR PITY.

FOR me there are no cities, no proud halls,
No storied paintings, nor the chiselled snow
Of statues; never have I seen the glow
Of sunset die upon the deathless walls
Of the pure Parthenon; no soft light falls
For me in dim cathedrals, where the low,
Still seas of supplication ebb and flow;
No dream of Rome my longing soul enthralls.
But, oh, to gaze in a long-tranced delight
On Venice rising from the purple sea!
Oh, but to feel one golden evening pale
On that famed island from whose lonely heights
Dark Sappho sank in burning ecstasy!
But once—but once—to hear the nightingale!—

Yet am I not for pity. This blue sea
Burns with the opal's deep and splendid fires
At sunset; these tall firs are classic spires
Of chaste design and marvellous symmetry
That lift to burnished skies. Let pity be
For him who never felt the mighty lyres
Of Nature shake him through with great desires.
These pearl-topped mountains shining silently,—
They are God's sphinxes and God's pyramids;
These dim-aisled forests his cathedrals, where
The pale nun, Silence, tiptoes, velvet-shod,
And Prayer kneels with tireless, parted lids;
And through the incense of this holy air,
Trembling, I have come face to face with God.

—Ella Higginson.

THE HAWAIIAN ISLANDS.

EXTRACTS FROM LETTERS.

THINKING a sketch of a visit made to the volcanoes and craters of some of the Sandwich Islands would be of interest to the readers of the INTELLIGENCER, I forward this extract from a letter written by one who recently visited the islands. ISAAC HICKS.

"We left Honolulu to visit the great crater Kilauea, in Hawaii, which was the principal object of taking this long trip. The seas about these islands are always in a state of agitation, caused by the trade winds and ocean currents, and are said to be the roughest waters in the world. Our experience fully justified this assertion, as we were tossed and tumbled on the little steamer in a way that made our journey of over five hundred miles, the distance to Hawaii from Honolulu, one of great discomfort. There are no piers on these islands, and landings are effected by the aid of small boats. This is both difficult and dangerous, as the little boat is tossed up and down beside the gangway, often rising and falling fifteen feet. The passengers have to watch their chance and make a wild leap for the boat as she reaches their level. Few accidents occur, but it is an exciting experience, as the least lack of care in the boat's crew would result in upsetting the boat, leaving the passengers to the mercy of the man-eating sharks, so plentiful in these waters.

On the windward side of these islands, where the great waves break on the rockbound shore, even the small boats cannot effect a landing. The plan there is to have a huge crane from which a box is lowered to the boat, into which the passengers climb as best they can, and are then hoisted from sixty to two hundred feet and swung to a rocky ledge upon the shore.

We had a day's staging over the lava beds before reaching the crater of Kilauea, from the summit of which, the next day, accompanied by a guide, we made the descent to the floor of the crater. It is covered with the great lava flows which are tossed about in every form like the angry waves of a stormy sea suddenly congealed. A fair trail is made across this chaotic formation, and we had no difficulty in going about the three miles over this desolate plain. At the time of our visit the volcano was unusually quiet, and only steam and smoke were escaping through fissures on every hand. In some places the lava was so hot that we had to hurry over it to prevent the burning of our shoes, and a piece of paper held to a crack blazed immediately. This crater is the largest active one in the world. It is about nine miles in circumference and about nine hundred feet deep.

We made this expedition on horseback. On our return from the volcano we went down the other side of the island, the side where the rain falls. Here we rode through thirty-one miles of magnificent forest. Such ferns I never saw before,—leaves over ten feet in length, and growing in the greatest luxuriance; also tree ferns with trunks twenty to thirty feet in height. The heat and constant moisture gives the tropical vegetation the greatest possible development, and great trees of many varieties, some covered with flowering creepers, overhang the road and fill the air with strange perfumes.

From the island of Hawaii we went to the island of Maui, and made a short stay at the quaint little native town of Wailuka. Thence we went on and made the ascent to Haleakala, the largest crater in the world. The volcano is 10,000 feet high, twenty-one miles in circumference, and the crater is between 2,000 and 3,000 feet deep. It is not now active, but the great black lava streams which show upon its sides, and extend far out into the sea, are evidences of the mighty energies which have been in play at no distant date. The trip to this crater was the most difficult and tiresome which I have ever undertaken. It is fifteen miles to the summit; there is no road, and the trail during the last four miles of the ascent rises 1,000 feet to the mile. The exertion of this steep climb in the rarified atmosphere is a severe strain upon man and beast. We had three guides and were all seated upon powerful mountain horses, accompanied by one pack animal to carry provisions, etc. We spent the night on the edge of the crater, sleeping in blankets upon the hard rock and protected by a sheltering ledge of lava. It was very cold, and in the morning we found ice one-fourth of an inch thick in the water pails.

It is impossible adequately to describe the grand view from this mountain summit, which is above the clouds, or to do justice to the solemn grandeur and majesty of this crater, which lies before us like a picture of desolation. It is filled with lava streams and volcanic sand, and there are seventeen extinct cones, some of them rising to the height of 800 feet, but at that great depth looking like truncated ant hills, suggesting a cemetery of volcanoes.

Before our return from Maui we made a pedestrian trip up the romantic and beautiful valley of Iao. We took with us a saddle-horse to enable us to ford the mountain torrent, which crosses the path three times, and is both deep and swift; and it was amusing to be ferried across, with all our provision, by this patient animal. We had a very delightful day; reaching out our hands we could pluck all the guavas we wished. We ate our lunch in the midst of the wildest and most beautiful scenery.

We found the hotel very much crowded, but succeeded in securing a nice cottage near the hotel, with every convenience. This is a delightful climate; there is always a breeze in Honolulu; the birds are singing, and the nights are cool. We wear summer costume of the lightest kind. We enjoy pineapple at breakfast, and have grapes, bananas, figs, and lemons in abundance, but do not like poi, the native dish, though we enjoy baked taro. This is a root of the Arum Esculentum, resembling the calla lily. It is very productive, and a small patch will give nearly all the food the indolent native requires. The chief production at present is sugar, and all other industries have to yield to it; even coffee trees are uprooted to give place to the cane, for while the profit from coffee is about 40 per cent., sugar often affords 80 per cent. on the capital, and very extensive and costly buildings are erected for its manufacture.

We were surprised at the great prosperity and development of these islands, and at the wealth of many of the inhabitants. The trade to foreign countries is enormous. The native population is decreasing fast; they are a quiet, inoffensive race, but are destined to give place to the energetic foreigner. Lava constitutes their building stone, and their lumber is brought from the States of Oregon and Washington. Honolulu is on Oahu, the fourth island in size and the most important, containing two good harbors, the best of which is Pagopago, a naval station of the United States. Since these islands are part of our country a great interest is awakening for a better acquaintance with them.

HOMES FOR EPILEPTICS.

A GROUP of Homes for Epileptics was recently opened at Chalfont, in Bucks, England (near Jordans, the historic place of the Friends), and the address made on the occasion by the Duke of York, grandson of the Queen, presented some interesting details, which we give below. The Homes are the gift of a London journalist, Passmore Edwards (who has been a most liberal patron of charitable work), and others.

H. M. J.

The Duke of York said: "As President of this Society, I wish to say a few words concerning its formation and the objects it has in view. Many of you present are aware of the distressing nature of the malady known as epilepsy, how it incapacitates the unhappy person subject to its influence, and by its very nature debars the sufferer from the remedies which are most effectual for its relief. It is the unanimous opinion of medical men who have made a study of epilepsy that an active and occupied life is the best antidote to the deterioration, moral and mental, which usually accompanies this disease; but, as you can well understand, it is very difficult for the epileptics to obtain employment. Their education has been neglected during childhood on account of the nature of the malady, so that on arriving at mature years they are unable to find employment, and in our poorer households become a burden to their families, to whom their existence is also a constant source of anxiety. It is to help these sufferers that this Society has been formed.

"Some fifty years ago, at La Force, near Bordeaux, the experiment was first tried by Pastor Bost of forming a colony where those suffering from epilepsy could live, and where they could occupy themselves in farming and gardening, and so enjoy a healthy outdoor existence. This idea of Pastor Bost was afterwards taken up in Germany, and resulted in the establishment of the famous Bielefeld Colony, which began with four patients, and has since developed into a well ordered and prosperous community of one thousand four hundred epileptic people. Following the example of Bielefeld, many other establishments had sprung up in Germany and other countries, and in England we have this colony of Chalfont. There are, it is computed, forty thousand epileptics in the United Kingdom, and the object of the National Society is to give them opportunities which are denied them in ordinary life, opportunities to forget their infirmities, and to fulfill their functions as men and women religiously, socially, and industrially.

"When fully developed the colony at Chalfont will be an industrial village whose inhabitants, though unhappily afflicted, will be usefully and healthfully occupied. Though this Society has been started but a few years, it has already been attended with the happiest results. In the farm, the garden, and the workshops every member of the community has the opportunity for the exercise of useful industry. They play cricket matches with local teams, and there is not the slightest doubt that considerable improvement has taken place in their condition, especially among the younger patients. Up to the present it has not been possible to provide for patients belonging to the better classes, who are able to pay for their maintenance. The need of some provision of this kind is urgently required, and it is to be hoped that accommodation may be furnished at no distant date to assist these sufferers as well as their poorer brethren. In 1895, the first complete year of the existence of the colony, the average number of colonists in residence was twenty-four, and the expenditure was £1,719. In 1898 the average was fifty-six and the expenditure £2,407, so that while the maintenance of the first twenty-four colonists cost £1,700, the maintenance of an additional thirty-two colonists added only £700 to the expenditure. Consequently all those who by their generosity have enabled the committee to enlarge the colony have the satisfaction of knowing that while they have helped to increase the number of colonists they have diminished considerably the relative cost of maintenance, and in like manner future extensions will doubtless be followed by similar satisfactory results. Before concluding my address, I wish to mention how much we are indebted to those friends who have so kindly and liberally assisted the Society by the gifts of the four new Houses which are to be declared open to-day. The Milton House for boys and the Pearman House for girls are the gift of Mr. J. Passmore Edwards. The Greene Home for men is presented by Mr. Frederick Greene; while the Dearmer Home for cases requiring special care and treatment, is the gift of Mrs. Dearmer."

TEMPERANCE SPEECHES.

The American Friend.

IT is always difficult to keep reform movements up to date. The methods that worked well at the beginning of the movement are continued long after they have fossilized, and "the sling and stone" which the Lord blessed in the first battle with the giant are used long after the giant himself has resorted to gunpowder and dynamite. This is very apparent in the general run of temperance speeches and addresses. They are cut on the old pattern. The speakers go to work much as Charles Dudley Warner did when he tried to kill the bear,—“he aimed at him all over,” and “fired at him in general.” We get a sad picture of drunkenness, a harrowing tale of some particular drunkard, a funny story to relieve the strain, a few statistics, a burst of moral indignation against brewers and rum-sellers, some poetical figures about the “upas tree,” or the “devouring minotaur,” who threatens our children, and an appeal to vote as we pray, and to be faithful in fighting this devastating evil that threatens our fair land. Now this is all very well as far as it goes, but the general public has been regaled with this sort of thing until it is tired of it. People often wonder why temperance meetings are not more popular, and why there is a sigh when a temperance meeting is announced. They are tired of this way of killing the giant, for it never seems really to kill him! Even little children demand change and variety in the stories that are told them, and they will not listen unless they are interested, and we must realize that “men are only lads grown tall.”

The time has come to study the liquor problem, to study it critically, scientifically, and to deal with it with modern weapons. Our temperance speakers ought to be thoroughly familiar with all temperance legislation the world over. They ought to know the latest conclusions of men who study social economics. They ought to know, not imagine, what place the saloon fills in politics, in the slums, and in the higher circles of society. They ought to know what effect the different laws to regulate or prohibit the traffic have had upon the traffic itself, and upon the condition of society where the law is in effect. The moral talk to stimulate public sentiment, the attempt to aim at the giant all over, and the humorous and pathetic descriptions have their place, but they can never get beyond a certain point; they fail to produce practical results.

The question is a larger one than we used to realize, and the evil is so thoroughly entrenched that it must be treated with all the intelligence which can be commanded. There are men now at work who have studied the liquor problem as profoundly and as critically as the great scientific doctor studies the causes and remedies of diseases. When these men speak they are listened to. They have no lack for an audience, and their hearers go home with some "new ideas." We need some men of this sort for our yearly meetings and for work all through the year. It is a field into which our young men should be called. We have passed good temperance resolutions for years, and our sentiments are good and our tracts are readable, but we need now to come up with the advancing procession, and to do this we need some speakers who have modern reform methods, and who know the giant they are fighting, and who know the spot at which he is mortal, and aim for that.

THE LAND OF LEAST HAPPINESS.

"THERE is less misery and less happiness in America than in any other country in the world," Lord Morpeth wrote of the United States, after a visit to our country for the purpose of seeing what our life really was. He found among us a degree of physical well-being with which no part of Europe could compare. He also found a lack of cheerful enjoyment of our good things which puzzled him. He was not alone in this conclusion. An American artist, who had seen much of the poverty of Central and Southern Europe, told me that he once took his stand where he could watch the throng which passed him on Chestnut street, to study the expression of the faces which passed him. In hardly one, he said, did he see such evidence of the enjoyment of life as he found in the poorest classes of the Old World. People who had had a scanty breakfast, and did not know where their dinner was to come from, showed brighter faces than do the well-fed and "comfortable" people of this New World.

In Europe the signs of want are often painful. Ragged, barefooted, and evidently ill-fed people are to be seen on all the streets and highways, except, perhaps, in the city districts inhabited by the wealthy alone. Those who have labored among the poor of East London, for instance, tell us they find the poorest in America vastly better off than are the people of that large district. But the Londoner, in spite of hunger and rags, retains a certain jollity, of which Sam Weller is the type, and which an American is apt to lack, whether he be well off or ill. The American has far more, but he gets less out of it.

The chief reason for this is the needless worry which characterizes all classes in our country. We sometimes call this an excessive devotion to business, but we do it too much honor. If the American loved his work more, he would fret over it less. He would get more daily satisfaction out of doing it well, and would acquire the contentment which falls to the man who has got well through his day. It is just because the American too commonly measures his success, not by the work itself, but by the gain it will bring him, that his labor brings him no happiness. He has set up a goal of success which lies far ahead of him, instead of one he can reach every day, and the crow's-feet gather about his eyes as he strives toward it. The mediæval workman who adorned his workshop and boasted of his craft as of high honor got far more enjoyment out of life than does he who makes the money it brings the test of his success in it.

When the Centennial building was in course of erection somebody proposed to inscribe around its central dome a text from Isaiah: "Thou hast multiplied the nation, and not increased the joy," in recognition of this national fault of worry. But, as both the context and the margin show, that is not the right rendering. The Hebrew word rendered "not" also means "to them," and the prophet goes on to describe the true and solid joy that the nation has in life: "They joy before Thee according to the joy in harvest, and as men rejoice when they divide the spoil." The joy of work well done, of battles well fought, of faithful discharge of the day's duties, is that which can brighten the faces of honest people. That we can have every day in life, and, in getting it, escape the burden of the anxieties which disfigure the face and wear out the heart.

Let us not forget that Dante kept the lowest place in his Inferno for those who in this life were grumbling and discontented without a cause.—Robert Ellis Thompson, in Saturday Evening Post.

WHEN THE NINETEENTH CENTURY ENDS.

A curious blunder is constantly being repeated in reference to the current year, 1899. This blunder is of specially frequent occurrence among speakers, as they seek to "improve the occasion" of these graduation days. It finds expression in phrases like these: "The last year of the present century"; "the last class('99) to receive a diploma in the 19th century"; "this closing year of the 19th century"; and in six other instances which I have noted during the last fortnight.

The fact of the case is that the 19th century does not end till midnight on December 31, 1900. The first day of the 20th century is January 1, 1901.

The Christian era was not used until the sixth century, when Diogenes Eniguus, a Roman abbot, began to reckon events from the supposed date of the birth of Christ. Gradually, the new, or Christian, system superseded the so-called era of Diocletian, which was then in vogue in Southern Europe. Events occurring prior to the sixth century were converted into the corresponding date of the Christian era. Not till the 18th century was there general agreement as to what month or what day of the month should be reckoned as the beginning of the year. But, wherever the Christian era was introduced, the first year was always reckoned as the year 1 and the last year of the first century was of necessity the year 100. It is so reckoned in all chronological tables, and in fact—a century meaning a period of 100 years—could be reckoned in no other way. The second century begins with the year 101 and ends with the close of the year 200. In like manner goes on the succession of the centuries to the present.

The last class to graduate in the 19th century is the class of 1900, which will not receive its diplomas until about a twelvemonth from now. The class of 1901 will have the proud distinction of being the first class to graduate in the 20th century.—Edwin A. Grosvenor, in the Springfield Republican.

Moral Value of Manual Training.

North American Review.

To train the hand means to train the powers of the eye, and to bring the muscular and nervous systems into working accord. Some kinds of manual training give the whole body useful exercise. All kinds rest the brain and relieve the body after purely intellectual work, while cultivating them in another fashion and developing the creative instinct. And they teach directness of purpose, concentration of effort, accuracy of observation, and also mental and moral precision and honesty. The teacher, and even the pupil himself, may think that a book lesson has been learned when it has not been, or that an idea has been mastered when it has been only half grasped or wholly misunderstood. But this cannot happen with manual work. A tangible thing is done, and rightly done, or it is not. A stitched seam is straight, a leaf is correctly drawn, a carpenter's joint is true, or it is not. Neither deception nor self-deception is possible in the workshop, and the spirit of accuracy, system, conscientiousness, self-reliance, and helpful coöperation that it develops is carried over into the other class rooms. Moreover, the workshop may cultivate taste as well as skill; and, although it does not teach trades, it celebrates the dignity of manual labor, and often develops individual likings and aptitudes for it. The same is the case with the lessons in "domestic science" given to girls. They are not taught to be "professed" cooks or dressmakers. But their fingers, eyes, and palates are trained; the importance of cleanliness, neatness, order, and exactness is impressed upon them; respect for household work and interest in it are awakened; and these great benefits are augmented by such instruction in hygienic and alimentary laws as could hardly be made to seem practical and important without the help of the cooking stove.

Jewish Philanthropists.

Harper's Bazar.

A JEWISH mendicant is a rare spectacle in New York, and the appeal of any Jewish fraternity to their Christian brothers almost unknown. The Jews look after their own poor. It is part of their religion—charity, according to their creed, being nothing more than justice—the rich looking after the indigent, as the strong of the Anglo-Saxon race look after the weak, without question and without demur or boasting. The almost phenomenal generosity of the Baron and Baroness de Hirsch, which in New York alone has resulted in the gift of many millions to our poor, has not perhaps been equalled in numbers by any of our citizens, though proportionately to their means no Jews of wealth have failed to reach their standard.

It is the fashion among so-called humorists to ridicule the love of getting among the Hebrew shop-keepers, making it seem a characteristic of the race, and ignoring altogether the generosity of the better class, who even in this country and at this day give their tithes according to the Old Testament injunction, beginning to do so as boys earning their first salaries, and all this as naturally and as much as a matter of course as the rest of us pay our car fares. More than that, the best of them make no distinction between the needy Christian and the needy Jew when trouble arises, thus proving a brotherhood of man of which the rest of us only talk in apostrophes.

The Name "Yankee."

It appears that the term "Yankee," is no longer as restricted in its application as it formerly was. A New Orleans paper, reporting a conversation with a resident of that city who had recently returned from a visit abroad, says:

"I was really amused to notice how the term 'Yankee' widens in application as one gets further and further away from the habitat of the real thing. In New York a Yankee is commonly supposed to be a native of Connecticut, Vermont, or Massachusetts, and I notice that the name is applied to mean skinflints rather than to the people in general. In Saint Louis a Yankee is understood loosely to be anyone from the extreme Northeast. Here in New Orleans the term includes pretty nearly everybody above Mason and Dixon's line—in short, 'Northerner' and 'Yankee' are more or less synonymous.

"Now comes the real absurd part of it, although quite in line with what I have just remarked. While I was in London I found myself continually referred to as a 'Yankee' by natives who had learned I was from New Orleans. 'I think you Yankees are very charming people,' said a big wholesaler, who wanted to be extra pleasant. 'I know several from your State.' I tried to explain at first, but I soon got tired of that. I was sure to be greeted by a stare of amazement. 'But I thought all Americans were Yankees, doncher-know? would be the usual protest. Later on I met a very intelligent hotel-keeper at Berne, in Switzerland, and in the course of conversation he remarked that he had an extremely agreeable countryman of mine staying at his house the previous season. 'As you are both Yankees,' he said, 'you may, by chance, know him.' 'Where does he live?' I asked. 'In Buenos Ayres,' replied the hotel-keeper."

An Indian Asylum.

Springfield Republican.

AN incident of the civilization of the red man is that he is developing insanity, just as white folks do, and therefore the government has bought 160 acres of land near Canton, S. D., whereon to build an asylum to accommodate all the insane Indians of the United States. It is wrong, however, to lay the decadence to the red man, which really belongs to the inferior white blood, for Indian Commissioner Jones says there are no insane Indians of pure race,—every inmate of the new asylum will be a half-breed. It is the vices of civilization that do the business, and that are making havoc with several tribes, says Mr. Jones. The richest tribes are dying off of luxurious idleness; this is the case with the Osages in Oklahoma. It is the Sioux of whom Mr. Jones says the best things; they work hard for their living and it agrees with them; they are making rapid progress in education, and bid fair to make good citizens.

A Queen's Charity.

Harper's Weekly.

WE hear less about Portugal than about Spain at any time, and of late have heard less than usual. The Queen of Portugal is a sovereign deserving a long mark for her interest in hospitals and hygiene, and also in the welfare of the children of poverty. At Alcantara she founded, in 1893, a dispensary peculiarly for meeting the demands of childish invalids, as pleasantly situated as possible, and spaciouly planned, combining a diet-kitchen, consultation-rooms, surgical halls, and much of the departmental work of a hospital. Almost every day the Queen herself goes to the establishment and takes a personal share in the labors of the charity—now waiting in the kitchen distributions, and again assisting in the surgery. Several well-known women of her court are equally practical. The general charge of it is committed to a religious order, a favorite of the Queen's, but the eminent Portuguese physician, Dr. Silva Carvalho, heads the staff of medical workers. In one year (1895) there were given in the building 8,559 consultations, 63,704 rations from the diet kitchen, 32,521 bandages, 76,480 prescriptions, and 470 vaccinations. The milk and vegetables are furnished gratis by the Queen, and the medical supplies are also defrayed by her. Fifteen hundred babies were treated in one twelvemonth. It is said that there is not any royal charity of the sort in Europe so efficiently managed, with the additional active coöperation of the founder.

A Priest-Ridden Land.

ACCORDING to a lecture on Siam delivered recently in London by John Bartlett, that Asiatic country has more than its share of priests. The population of Siam, he said, amounted to about 6,000,000, and a curious feature was the large preponderance of Chinese, more especially in Bangkok. The Chinese practically controlled all the trade and commerce of the place. There were hardly any Siamese merchants. One million of the people were in the priesthood. He had traveled up river through the main territory of Siam for a distance of 350 miles, and during the journey it had been absolutely impossible to get out of sight of a temple. In each temple there were from ten to 300 priests, supported entirely by the people. Of the 1,000,000 priests only 300,000 were actively engaged. The remaining 700,000 were passing through the priesthood. Siam was a great stronghold of Buddhism, but the King was very tolerant of other religions.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE staff correspondents of the American newspapers stationed in Manila, have united in a formal complaint cabled by way of Hong Kong, against the press censorship system at Manila. They declare that the despatches made public in Washington incorrectly represent the existing conditions and err in the declaration that "the situation is well in hand," and in the assumption that the insurrection can be speedily ended without a greatly increased force. They especially charge: "Prohibition of hospital reports; suppression of full reports of field operations in the event of failure; numbers of heat prostrations in the field; systematic minimization of naval operations, and suppression of complete reports of the situation."

SECRETARY HAY has received all of the protocols of the proceedings of The Hague Conference. Included among the papers is the draft of the arbitration and mediation treaty, which is regarded as the most important achievement of the Conference. The document, like all of the proceedings, is in French. As there is occasion for haste in completing the work of the Conference, our Government will by cable empower the American delegates to sign the protocols in the name of the United States. The treaties will, of course, require to be submitted to the Senate for its approval.

A NEW HAVEN despatch says that President Hadley, of Yale University, is about to organize a council, which will share with him the responsibilities of the affairs of the University.

It is announced that the Westinghouse Electric and Manufacturing Company, of Pittsburg, Pa., will build works at Manchester, England, and employ 5,000 men. George Westinghouse will direct the enterprise. Baron Kelvin, professor of natural philosophy at Glasgow University, who acted as electrician for the Atlantic cables, 1857-58 and 1865-66, for the French Atlantic cable 1869, for the West Indian cables, 1875, and for the Mackay-Bennett Atlantic cable 1879, will be the technical adviser of the company in England.

A SEVERE test of the new automobile carriage was begun on the 13th inst., when John D. Davis and wife, of New York city, started in a gasoline automobile to cross the continent. They hope to reach San Francisco in about eight weeks. The route will be through Albany, Utica, Syracuse, Rochester, Buffalo, Cleveland, Toledo, Chicago, Des Moines, Omaha, Denver, Ogden, Reno, and Sacramento. The travelers expect to get across the Rocky Mountains over the old post roads which parallel the Union Pacific Railway system.

AN extensive strike took place among the conductors and motormen of the Brooklyn Rapid Transit Company on the 17th instant. At the time of our going to press there was still much disorder prevailing.

SAMUEL J. TILDEN'S estate, according to the report of Lawrence Godkin, just filed, passing upon the accounts of the executors of the will, amounted to about $8,500,000, not as large by several millions as was anticipated. The deceased had directed that after payment of $1,500,000 in special bequests, the residue should be used in establishing a free library in New York city. Owing to litigation over the will on the part of decedent's nephew, George H. Tilden, the New York Public Library, Astor, Lenox, and Tilden foundations, received from the estate $2,859,031.15, which is $5,000,000 less than the amount Mr. Tilden desired should be devoted to his grand scheme for a public library.

A PUBLIC library building is to be presented to the city of Washington by Andrew Carnegie. It is to cost a quarter of a million dollars; many architects are in the competition for plans.

THE Reading Railroad Company detectives are certain that they have just succeeded in breaking up the most dangerous set of railroad thieves, which that company has ever encountered. All who have been captured are employes, and the detectives say that their plunder will aggregate nearly $10,000. The method of the gang was to plunder packages of freight en route and carefully replace box-lids or wrappings so that the theft would not be discovered until the goods reached the consignee. This was done during the hours that the trains lay on lonely sidings, and was so skillfully managed that it was only by chance that the capture of the thieves was accomplished.

CONSOLIDATION of the wrought steel and iron tube industries of the country have been effected. The new company will be known as the National Tube Company. It is the largest of the kind in the world, and is the third in rank as a steel and iron corporation. It is exceeded only by the Krupp and Carnegie interests.

THE Czar of Russia has issued a manifesto declaring his second brother, the Grand Duke Michael Alexandrovitch, to be the heir presumptive to the throne. President McKinley has cabled his condolence to the Czar on the death of the late Grand Duke George.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

THE American liner Paris has been moved from the rocks on which she was wrecked, and it is confidently expected that the vessel can now be saved and repaired. She is to be docked at Southampton.

—Scientific men are manifesting much interest in the preparations now making by the Coast and Geodetic Survey, which is charged with the magnetic survey of the United States for determining the accurate deviation of the compass at sea. Recent accidents at sea and the severe competition of ocean liners have called attention in a striking way to the need of accurate values of the deviation of the compass needle at sea. The values of the deviation of the needle generally used are almost wholly dependent on the observations made on land, and little has been done by the United States to secure observations at sea.

—The late Bishop John P. Newman, D.D., LL.D., of the Methodist Episcopal Church, was one of the most eloquent preachers in the Methodist Church. He was especially known through his intimacy with President Grant and his pastorate of the Metropolitan Church in Washington, at which President Grant and many high government officials were regular attendants. He was also chaplain of the United States Senate during three Congresses, and was appointed by President Grant inspector of United States consulates, making in that capacity a tour of the world. He was elected to the bishopric of the Church in 1888.

—It is learned that Queen Wilhelmina personally thanked Ambassador White, the head of the American delegation to the Peace Conference, for the American tribute to Grotius, and expressed special admiration for the Ambassador's speech on the occasion of placing the tribute on Grotius's tomb at Delft.

—On account of insufficient appropriations by the Legislature, the Trustees of the Pennsylvania State College have been compelled, along with other measures of retrenchment, to discontinue for the present the twelve-weeks winter lecture course in Agriculture and the Cheese-making course.

—The new plant of the Scott Paper Co., Philadelphia, was destroyed by fire on the 10th instant, which spread to the lumber and coal yard of Jesse Lukens & Co., adjoining. While the loss of the Scott Company is estimated at $100,000, which is partly covered by insurance, Lukens & Co. sustained a loss of $15,000, fully insured.

—President H. G. Burt, of the Union Pacific system, whose recent incognito ride in a baggage car was noted in the papers, frequently uses this method of travel. He believes in "getting down among the men," and not long ago appointed himself a member of a wrecking crew, doing good work in several minor smash-ups.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873.

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 29, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 30.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXX.

THE happiness of man, and his progress in the spiritual life, depend less upon his opinions and more upon his principles, than is generally believed.

SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

From his "Dissertation on Christian Testimonies."

TO ONE ARISEN.

IN MEMORY OF AARON M. POWELL.

OH, Friend beloved ! so loving, brave, and true ;
So loyal ever to the Spirit's light :
Who followed duty through the darkest night,
And what thou dared to dream of, dared to do !
How blest wast thou in all thy journey here ;
How blest in that swift, voiceless call, that came
As God's own angel, to bid thee in His name
To come to higher service, His holy presence near !
We loved thy gracious spirit, and now we know,
Since thou hast been translated, thou hast gone
Away from us but for a little space ;
And He who led thee here and blessed thee so,
We trust will lead us to that Heavenly dawn
When we shall hear thy voice and meet thee face to face. I. R.

Seventh month 23, 1899.

WORSHIP AND MINISTRY.

London Yearly Meeting on Ministry and Oversight, has issued a letter this year to the "Congregations and Individual Members of the Society of Friends," from which we extract the following :

DEAR FRIENDS,

A strong desire for the fuller life and usefulness of our meetings for worship has taken hold of our meeting this year. The subject is of unique importance, and we have concluded to embody the feeling of the meeting in the present Letter, to which we ask your earnest attention.

The meeting for worship is the central feature of our church-life,—our chief means alike of uttering our message to the world and of nourishing the life of our own membership. Here, under the headship of Christ, without priest or ceremony or pre-arranged service, we meet with one another and with God, and may experience living, spiritual communion. Such a meeting is both the loftiest and truest form of congregational worship, and we are thankful to believe is increasingly experienced among us ; but our meetings too often fall far below our ideal, and dishonor the nobility of the truth which we profess. Where this is the case, the lack cannot be on God's side ; the fault must lie with ourselves. Have we not often forgotten that our spiritual freedom is a heritage for free men,—for men of conviction and energy, who will rise to their responsibilities ? Unfree spirits will come under the tyrannies of indifference, pre-occupation, routine, and the like, which beset even a Friends' meeting.

True worship is intensely active. It consists in offering ourselves to God,—body, mind, and soul,—for the doing of his will. We have a gift to bring to him, and not only a grace to receive. If we have not individually brought this gift, we need seek no further for one great cause of weakness. An active attitude of soul is of the very essence of a good meeting. May we come into the presence of Christ as disciples,—in earnest devotedness and lowly teachableness,—and into the presence of one another as brethren—in a living fellowship of love and sympathy. "One is your Teacher, and all ye are brethren."

Gathering in this active spirit of worship and fellowship, we gain vision to see beyond the meeting itself to the ends for which it exists ; and find it easy to pass out of the self-sufficing worship, which may be indulged as a spiritual luxury till it enervates the soul, into the larger life of sympathy and service, wherein we can be used by the Holy Spirit for his work. We realize that we have met with one another and with God, not as a matter of routine, nor for selfish enjoyment, but in order that the power of the Spirit may break forth to the awakening and conversion of souls, the refreshment and inspiration of disciples for the service of God, and the enrichment of their Christian character. These great purposes should be constantly ringing in our ears as we assemble. By our success in attaining them will our meetings be judged. It has been well said, "The churches that convert most men, and best use the men they have converted, realize religion in the most efficient way."

A meeting cannot allow the Christ-like passion for seeking and saving the lost to be dulled without imperilling its own life. Nor can it fulfill its ministry unless the building-up of Christian character steadily progresses. It follows that there should be a continual drawing in of those not in membership with us ; and we would urge Friends, by personal invitation, distribution of notices, house to house visitation, and in other practical ways, to use our meetings for worship as agencies for the spread of the Gospel in the districts round the meeting-houses. It follows also that, in realizing the true objects of our meetings, the necessity will be felt for an outpouring of spiritual power to meet the needs of all who gather. We shall hunger after a living waiting upon God and a heart-searching ministry, which, as they are experienced, will crowd out all merely dead silence and unanointed utterance.

If the ministry is to be convicting and converting, full of freshness and power, able to inspire with noble ideals, to help the struggling soul into the peace of God, to comfort the weary, to teach the new duties that the new age brings, it must be a word fitly and sincerely spoken, a message flowing from heart to heart, in the freshness of Divine guidance. To some the guidance comes in clear and powerful impressions of duty; to others in ways that are scarcely perceptible, as in a purifying of the power of judgment. The true minister will not rise unless he believes he has a definite message,—short it may be, but pointed,—some clear-cut thought that has come before his mind with impressiveness, or that has been with him for some time, and he believes should be handed on to others. The purified judgment will suppress utterances that are obviously unsuited to the place and time.

For Friends' Intelligencer.

THE PATRIARCH ABRAHAM.

ABRAHAM, the "Friend of God," the "Father of the Faithful," the progenitor of a long line of patriarchs, beautiful and venerable as he appears in all these relations, yet shines conspicuously as the kind brother, the considerate neighbor, the righteous judge, the pleader for mercy, the dispenser of justice.

Witness the interview between him and Lot, at the time their respective herdmen were at strife, because their master's "substance was great, so that they could not dwell together." From the account it would seem that Abram (he was not yet named Abraham) was the leader, the ruling spirit of the two, for it says he went, and "Lot with him;" in another place, "and Lot also, which went with Abram," etc. His, certainly, was the stronger mind. But it is not this superiority that has arrested my attention lately, so much as the kind, forbearing, peace-loving disposition manifested by him towards his kinsman, when their herdmen were striving, and when many a one would have espoused the cause of his own servants, and have exacted a so-called justice, or the vindication and establishment of his own rights over the claim of those with whom he was at variance. He did not speak even of arbitration, but plainly and simply, yet positively, stated what must be done. "Let there be no strife, I pray thee, between thee and me, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen, for we be brethren. Is not the whole land before thee? Separate thyself, I pray thee, from me: if thou wilt take the left hand, then I will go to the right; or if thou depart to the right hand, then I will go to the left." Can a more noble course be imagined? Any sacrifice, any relinquishment on his part, to maintain peace and good fellowship with his kinsman; no insisting on "rights;" no grasping after more territory, in the fear that Lot might, in time, possess more than he; no jealousy of the latter's supremacy, should he gain it. He made no choice of location, but allowed Lot to select his own place, himself taking what was left, and being satisfied with his allotment; and why? for the sake of peace and love.

Where in modern times, these times of "expansion," can we find a counterpart to this nobility of character, this eliminating of self, this desire for an amicable adjustment of the difficulties naturally arising from the striving of the herdmen? We do not find that Abraham even thought what a loss it might be to himself, financially, to settle matters in this way. All his endeavors were for peace and good feeling.

Notice, also, in his discourse with Lot, how he puts himself and his herdmen in the first position, as though he and his might have been most in the wrong, if wrong there was: "between me and thee," "between my herdmen and thy herdmen."

Space forbids a detailed account of this grand patriarch; and though in some instances he exhibited weaknesses, of which he doubtless subsequently repented, and was ashamed, we can but see that even these failings were on the side of peace; and as if to offset these weaknesses, we see his firmness at the "battle of the kings," when Melchizedek met and blessed him, and the king of Sodom wanted to divide the spoils. He would take nothing, "from a thread even to a shoe-latchet," "save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me." Nothing could induce him to swerve from the high standard he had raised for himself. And was he lowered in the estimation of his neighbors by such integrity? Nay, verily; all respected, all revered him; even, when "a stranger and a sojourner" with the children of Heth, he desired to buy a burying-place for his loved Sarah, they would not sell it to him; but because "he was a mighty prince among them," they would allow him his choice of sepulchres. This he would not accept, but would pay for it. He was honored of God, who said to him, "Fear not, Abram; I am thy shield, and thy exceeding great reward," a saying amply verified to him. "And I will establish my covenant between me and thee, and thy seed after thee, in their generations, for an everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee and to thy seed after thee."

Yet not to Abraham alone is such promise given, "but in every nation, he that feareth Him, and worketh righteousness, is accepted with Him."

Oh! that individuals and nations might emulate the example of Abraham in his love of peace, and his strivings to do the right!

ELIZABETH H. COALE.

Webster City, Iowa, Seventh month 11, 1899.

MORE than half the pain and discomfort of ordinary lives come from the petty unkindnesses and slights among kindred and friends. More than half the wrecks of what were once promising friendships are caused, not by the discovery by one or other of great deficiencies in mind or character in the friend, but by petty tricks or deceptions revealed, or small neglects, or those slights—hardest of all to pardon, and never, we fear, quite forgotten—that are done, not to one's self, but to the near and dear ones whose feelings we would safeguard at any time at the expense of our own.

Be kind in time. Be kind even at the risk of personal inconvenience. Be kind to the infirm and old and uninteresting. Be kind to the people you don't like. Forbear the irritating word. Send your thought just a second or two ahead of your speech, that want of tact may not effect as much mischief as positive ill will.—Catholic News.

AN IMPORTANT WORK ON TEMPERANCE.¹

THE primary object of this extensive examination of the whole Temperance problem, a stout book of 626 pages, is the consideration of Temperance legislation in relation to the general social question. It is an authoritative work by scientific experts, and hence takes rank as a notable contribution to social science.

Lady Henry Somerset has thus stated the value of the book: "We are on the eve now of a struggle which will probably be the decisive one, but which will be fierce and prolonged. At this point, therefore, it seems to me of supreme importance that the temperance forces should unite. Too long they have been severed and weakened by differences which I believe must be overcome before their attack can be efficient, and it is for this reason that I, in accordance with many others, hail the appearance of a remarkable book, which is the most valuable addition to the literature of the temperance cause that, to my mind, has yet been given."

The temperance movement has been in existence since 1826. During its early and humble stages the philosopher De Quincey foresaw its future magnitude, writing: "The most remarkable instance of a combined movement in society which history perhaps will be summoned to record is that which, in our own days, has applied itself to the abatement of intemperance."

The authors show the extraordinary fact that the per capita consumption of alcohol in the United Kingdom is greater than it was in 1840, when the agitation against liquor was in its infancy, thus—

	1840—Gallons.	1898—Gallons.
Spirits,	0.97	1.04
Wine,	0.25	0.41
Beer,	28.59	31.41

It is well known that drunkenness prevails chiefly in the seaport and mining districts of Great Britain. An interesting map shows the comparative status of the various shires as regards the liquor habit. Northumberland, Durham, and Lancashire are the worst in this respect, and are appropriately shown in dark color. Salop and the Welsh counties Glamorgan-shire, Monmouth, and Pembroke follow close behind. The white, or most nearly sober, counties on this map are Oxford, Cambridge, Suffolk, Huntingdon, and Wilt shires.

In considering the solution of the drink problem the authors discuss the questions of reduction of licenses, compensation, local veto, public control, advantages and defects of high license, conditions of the poor in cities as adding to the evil, the establishment of places of popular recreation free from the sale of liquor, etc., etc. Drawing illustrations from observation in many localities, from the public laws, and from opinions of statesmen and philanthropists, and offering valuable original suggestions of their own, the writers have made a volume that will for a long time to come be a store-house for the reformer and the social scientist.

¹ The Temperance Problem and Social Reform. By Joseph Rowntree, author of "Temperance Legislation," etc.; and Arthur Sherwell, author of "Life in West London," etc. Fourth edition. London: Hodder and Stoughton.

Canon Wilberforce says of the work, "Without endorsing all the conclusions arrived at I consider Messrs. Rowntree and Sherwell's book a most valuable contribution towards the solution of the greatest social problem of our day, and I trust that it will be widely read and studied."

The London Outlook thus strongly sums up the importance of the book: "Were we asked to name the book of the year on domestic politics—that is to say, the book of most urgent national importance—we should without hesitation name this unpretentious survey of a problem which is at once the despair and disgrace of British public men. Here, at least, is a survey of the problem which, were it mastered by the electorate and through them by Members of Parliament, must bring order out of present chaos and make England a cleaner, sweeter place to live in."

For Friends' Intelligencer.

EXPERIENCE IN A MID-WEEK MEETING.

OUR meeting was small, about one-half the usual attendance. In the early part we felt discouraged,—queried in mind, What are we coming to? and remembered the large meetings formerly convened here; and mentally queried, What can we do to encourage and draw others of our membership to meet with us on these occasions? Our minds were filled with desire to act, and with faith in works of our own, when we were suddenly reminded of what interesting and comforting occasions these little meetings have generally been to us, and the Source whence we obtained the comforting power, when Divine life overspread our little assembly. The feeling of discouragement, and any reliance in man's wisdom, had passed away, and true spiritual worship was realized. Love clothed our spirits; we were reminded of the time when probably not any of the present company enjoyed silent meetings or attended those held in the middle of the week. Those who maintained them at that time have nearly all passed on, and we are now blessed through their faithfulness.

Then the income of the spirit was felt to abound in a good degree; we were set free from the bondage of self love; charity prevailed, and our intellectual strength was subdued, and we basked in the strengthening Light or power of God. Our faith in the Divine was renewed, we realized that it remains true,—"there is one Lord, one Faith, and one Baptism"; which baptism is spiritual, and may reach and draw to us the absent ones on account of whom we are so deeply concerned. It may not only reach but teach them more effectually than any reasoning or encouraging word given them in our intellectual persuasiveness,—for what force is more powerful than prayer? We had now come to know of the "one faith." We were filled with his love; all discouragement had left us: the meeting closed—we returned to our homes with the feeling that our time had been profitably spent.

Then, absent Friends, can we not all come to know of the at-one-ment by living in harmony with each other, and with the Divine Power? It all depends upon whether we overcome difficulties or whether the difficulties overcome us. Following Christ, we learn that not by escaping the depths, but by coming out of them victorious over self, shall we merit the reward that awaits those who overcome as he overcame the world. JOSEPH POWELL.

Seventh month 15, 1899.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 32.—EIGHTH MONTH 6.

THE BOOKS OF SAMUEL.

GOLDEN TEXT.—I will raise me up a faithful Priest, that shall do according to that which is in mine heart and in my mind.—I. Samuel, ii., 35.

Scripture Reading, I. Samuel, iv., 1-18.

THE two books of Samuel, like the two books of Kings, were originally one book. The separation into two books is of comparatively recent date. They owe their title to the fact that Samuel is a leading character in the earlier portions of the first of them. There is no reason whatever for the belief that they were written by him. Indeed both the author and the time of authorship are wholly unknown. Mention is made in the books of "Kings of Judah" (I. Samuel, xxvii., 6). Now there were no kings of "Judah" until the separation of the kingdom after Solomon, in the 10th century B. C.; wherefore it may be safely concluded that the books were written after that time. Analysis of the contents of the books shows that the writer had access to older material, and that he combined it in the usual style of eastern composition, not always with great care as to continuity or consistency. Several old songs are quoted, as the "Song of Hannah" (I. Samuel, ii., 1-10) and the "Song of the Bow" (II. Samuel, i., 19-27).

The subject matter of the books includes the early life of Samuel, the founding of the monarchy under Saul, the relations of Saul and David, and the kingship of David. The first of these periods is a continuation of the period of Judges, when "there was no king in Israel; every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Judges, xxi., 25). We are introduced first to the household of Elkanah, a man of Ephraim. Account is given of the birth of Samuel and of his dedication to the Lord as a Nazarite. "I will give him unto the Lord all the days of his life, and there shall no razor come upon his head." (I. Samuel, i., 11.) The words are much the same as those used in the case of Sampson, being the usual formula for such dedication (See Numbers, vi., 2-5). There could hardly be a greater contrast than that between these two, dedicated under the same vows. It would seem that the time of Samuel may have been earlier than that of Sampson, since in the time of the latter the Israelites were already in subjection to the Philistines (Judges, xiii., 1; xv., 10-13), while the events which led to that subjection are related in connection with the early life of Samuel. On the other hand, however, Josephus definitely states that Eli became high priest and governor of the Israelites after the death of Sampson. According to the same authority the events of the story of Ruth occurred during this period of Eli's priesthood.

Less than a score of miles from Ramah, the home of Samuel, was the national sanctuary of Shiloh. Here were located the tabernacle, and the ark of the wanderings. To what extent the national character of the sanctuary was recognized we cannot say with any certainty. Certainly it had no such exclusive sanctity as was afterward assigned to the Temple at Jerusalem. We have seen already that local shrines were not unknown, as in the cases of Gideon, of Micah, of the Danites at Dan. On the other hand, we would infer from the whole account in I. Samuel, that Shiloh was recognized in some measure as belonging to the whole nation. To this sanctuary Samuel was taken as a child and became a kind of subordinate priest (I. Samuel, ii., 18). It is to be noted that he was not of the house of Aaron, from which priests were to be appointed under the so-called Mosaic law, neither was he of the Levites who were set apart to serve the priests. (Numbers, xviii., 1-7, iii., 6-10). There are many other indications that the laws, afterwards written down in Leviticus and Deuteronomy were unknown even to the priests in the early days of the Hebrew nation. In the further story of Samuel we are told that he was asleep in the temple "where the ark of God was." This fact is obscured by mis-translation in the ordinary version of the Old Testament. Now under the law none but the priests might venture into this place on pain of death. (Numbers, iii., 10; xviii., 7.) Again both Samuel and Saul offered sacrifice at altars on the "high places;" that is, on the hilltops, where the Canaanites were accustomed to build their altars and to set up their sacred trees. But the law in Deuteronomy (xii., 5-14) forbids the offering of sacrifice at any place except at the shrine especially appointed. This same general ignorance of the law is observed throughout the period of Judges and down to the time of the later kings of Judah. Elijah also offered sacrifices on the "high places" at a time after the reign of Solomon. These facts can be explained only on the assumption that what was afterward called the law of Moses was unknown, at least in many of its details, during this whole period. On the other hand, some of the observances which were afterward incorporated in those laws were common, and may very well date back to the great hero-leader.

Eli, the high priest, was an old man and the duties of his office were in the hands of his two sons. Better examples there could not be of the "hireling ministry." They were priests indeed "for revenue only." Every sacrifice offered to God must be shared with them and their share was the first consideration—the Lord could wait (I. Samuel, ii., 15, 16). Nor were still grosser sins wanting to condemn these unworthy priests. The aged father protested, mildly but in vain. Finally an unknown prophet appeared (I. Samuel, ii., 27-36) who laid condemnation upon the family of Eli and foretold its downfall. The prediction was accomplished in an attack on the Hebrews by the Philistines, in the course of which the two sons of the high priest were slain and the ark of Jehovah was captured. The battle took place near the plains of Esdraelon, so often the scene of conflict, and the defeat was a crushing one. The Israelites were reduced to the condition of a subject people, all arms being taken from them, and even working in metal forbidden (I. Samuel, xiii., 19-22).

In the opening chapters of I. Samuel we see that, as in the case of previous books, the purpose of it is ethical, not historical merely. The formula of the book of Judges might have been used again. The children of Israel transgressed . . . and the Lord sold them into the hands of the Philistines. The transgression of the people in general is an implied one only. The definite sins for which punishment came speedily were the sins of the priests. The evils of an hereditary priesthood, or what was subject to the same evils, a priesthood assigned as a livelihood to a class, was at the basis of the Friends' testimony against the hireling ministry. It was directed against those who take the disgraceful attitude predicted of the house of Eli in its downfall: "I pray thee put me into one of the priests' offices that I may eat a piece of bread." We have no testimony against any earnest, dedicated soul who accepts a livelihood from his fellow-Christians that he may help to spread the gospel; it is only against those who take up the work for what they can get out of it, whether in money, position, or power. But we recognize the peril to those whose livelihood is involved in their gospel message, that they may prophesy smooth things to their own generation and confine their condemnation to evil in generations gone by. We do not escape the danger in our own Society—we only lessen it. And it is the duty of the earnest teacher of these lessons to impress above most things this lesson: that like Jesus of Nazareth we too were born to this end, came into the world for this cause—"that we may bear witness to the truth"—that truth that is revealed to each for the healing of all.

A NEW VIEW OF PROHIBITION.

APPLETON MORGAN in discussing recent legislation against the drink evil, in the forthcoming issue of Popular Science Monthly presents an aspect of the question that will perhaps set people to thinking. He writes:

"Our conclusion, so far as a conclusion could be said to have been reached, was that the failure lay in misapplication of ways to means, rather than of means to ends—namely, that an attempt to abolish the crime (or misdemeanor) of drunkenness by punishing, not the criminal, but the community in which he committed the crime, and to prevent law-breaking by legislating out of existence the neutral instrument which happened to form the particular temptation to the particular law-breaker (or with which he found it convenient to commit the crime), was quite too logical to be practicable; as, for instance, law abolishing the use of spoons, as so many temptations to house-breakers; or of railways, because trespassers on railway tracks were often killed; or steamboats, because steamboat boilers sometimes burst, would be quite too logical for public convenience. Whence it followed that there was no demand for prohibitive liquors laws, and therefore only failure had resulted from attempting to enforce them."

THE DOUKHOBORS.

Extracts from letters written to The Friend by William Evans, of Moorestown, N. J., who with Joseph S. Elkinton, of Philadelphia, has been visiting the Doukhobors in Manitoba.

ABOUT noon we came to the log-houses erected in the middle of last winter, by the Canadian Government, for the first ship load of immigrants. The carpenters lived in tents while the logs were being got out and fitted together. The homes consist of a series of one-storied rooms, placed in close juxtaposition, the whole being about one hundred and fifty feet long by twenty wide, and covered with pole rafters, on which a thick coat of clay is laid. The chinks between the logs are filled with clay or mortar, and each room has a door and window. Bunks are fitted at the sides, wide enough to accommodate two persons, and one above another as in a sleeping-car, and fitted with curtains. The floor is of logs, hewed flat on the upper side. Large iron kettles of the capacity of a barrel were suspended near the buildings, for use in washing, and two wells had been dug at a little distance, the water in which appeared to be eight feet below the prairie surface and was cold and free from alkaline contamination. A log stable also stood near and a few cows and horses pastured hard by. We spent First-day at this village. Their visible religious observances seemed mainly chanting of psalms, followed by a discourse or repetition from one of their number. The singing, at a little distance sounded very pleasing, with a quaver which brought to mind the Æolian harp, now low and plaintive, then swelling into the bolder notes of a reed instrument. The people seem to take their principal social pleasure in this way, and may often be heard as they pass in groups from one village to another. There were no pastimes indulged in, repugnant to our First-day education, no petulant nor quarrelsome outcries from the children, but a friendly, subdued conversation at each others' doorways; and if we happened, in passing, to pause, some one would quickly bring a light portable bench and ask us to be seated.

[At a religious meeting] J. S. E. addressed them, and was ably interpreted by the Prince. Occasionally there would be responses, mostly by the elder, Verigin, and bowing by all the Russians. After a time of silence, J. S. E. knelt in prayer, and at its conclusion, all knelt upon one knee, and bowed their heads nearly to the ground. They then explained through the interpreter that the bowing was not to man, but in acknowledgment of the blessing of the Divine Spirit; and signified their entire assent to the spiritual truths that had been declared; and said that before they left Russia they had been told there was a people in this country called Quakers, who held spiritual views like their own, and that they were glad to be acquainted with them; and that they were thankful to this people, not only for having helped them pecuniarily, but for giving them their sympathy in a strange land. Their demeanor and actions showed plainly the sincerity of their feeling and expression.

From the beginning to the end of our interview there was no indication of listlessness or inattention, but a serious and earnest entering into communion of feeling, which was very remarkable. Finally they asked through the Prince that our Society should intervene with the Czar for the release of their relatives who are banished to Siberia. And here one of the most interesting parts of the whole deeply impressive occasion manifested itself.

Six matronly women left the line in which they had stood, and advanced in front of us, who were, the Prince said, the mothers or relatives of some of the banished ones. We explained to them that our Society had already addressed a memorial to the Czar, invoking his clemency for those in his dominions who, from conscientious motives, could not carry out all the government requirements, and that when we returned home, we would present their request to our people, and do what we could for them. The women quietly wiped their tears, and one with noble features said they were the mothers of sons who were in banishment, and they earnestly hoped that our people would do what they could for their help. . . .

gitsky. He was in the Russian navy for some years, but even while there felt the iniquity of war, and was imprisoned by the Government for adhering to his convictions, in a narrow cell, as a lunatic. Later he was taken to a military post on the boundary between Russia and Afghanistan, where he passed a number of months. His persistent refusal to serve as a soldier, exasperated the authorities, and he was told he must travel back to Moscow alone, and report to the officials there. He rode on horseback over a desert for 300 miles, obtaining food and water at posts 70 miles apart. When he reached Moscow he was informed that his term of service had expired. After his liberation he took charge of the arrangements for the transportation of the Doukhobors, and performed the work to the great satisfaction of the officers of the Lake Huron, and received much commendation from quarantine and Government officials at Halifax and St. John. During the voyage he daily traveled up

DOUKHOBOR WOMEN PLOWING.

(From a photograph furnished us by Harry V. Haight, Halifax, N. S.)

In the morning of Seventh-day, the 17th, we struck tent after the rain had ceased; and, our toilet performed at the brook-side, we drove to a Doukhobor village of seven tents. As we approached, nineteen men and women were engaged in drawing a plough; stout wooden pieces across the draught rope being fitted with smaller ropes or "breast straps," so as to work two and two, excepting the leader. Four others were pulling a light harrow. They had made many good straight furrows, but when they recognized Dimitri Alexandre, as they always styled the Prince, they left the plough, and soon the whole population were gathered about us. J. S. E.'s religious expression and sympathy were evidently very grateful to them; then, while the Prince was imparting information respecting the ship-load in quarantine, and other news which they had no daily paper to convey, we looked in upon a few sick folk in the tents. . . .

On awakening on the morning of Sixth month 19, we heard the sound of an arriving vehicle, and soon the Prince recognized the voice of Leopold Soulerand down the decks, clad in oilskins, and bearing a hose with which the planks were deluged with water, while twenty picked Doukhobors with brooms, scrubbed with enthusiasm. In this way the population of the ship, over 2,000, were kept in health. He is a laughing, breezy man, full of resources, and his experience in the navy has qualified him in different ways for leadership among the Doukhobors. Not long before our encounter with him, he and a party of Doukhobors came to a river swollen from rains, 120 feet wide, and no boat or raft for their transport. He got a man on the opposite shore to fling a stone across, to which a string was attached, and by aid of the string a stout rope was drawn over, and fastened to a tree on each bank. Next a second rope was stretched and secured a few feet above the first. Soulergitsky himself then walked the lower rope, using the upper as a hand-rail. He laughed heartily as he described to the Prince the apprehensions of his men, when they essayed to follow him over the unstable bridge; but all made the crossing safely. He and the Prince had much to communicate to each other, and to discuss respecting the disposition of the 2,300 from quarantine. This was the more important as D. A. Hilkoﬀ was expecting, after meeting the new arrivals at Quebec, to take passage for Switzerland, to visit his family.

The air being cool, a little fire in the log-house where we breakfasted was quite agreeable. A number of women, whose children had been left behind for a time in the hospital at St. John, and for whom J. S. E. had then interested himself, came into the room to express their obligation, and about twenty handkerchiefs were consigned to our care, for the acceptance of women Friends. We then drove three miles to another log-house village, where, the people expecting us, were outside, and apparently in their best attire. J. S. E. addressed them feelingly, and there was much fervent, religious response to his remarks and prayer. It seemed difficult, indeed, to close the meeting, such was the interest felt and shown on both sides.

We saw near by two blacksmith shops, erected by the Doukhobors, the forges and bellows purchased with funds sent from Philadelphia, and it was in one of these that our wagon tongue was neatly repaired. Two complete ox-wagons made by the immigrants, and the ox-yokes also were in evidence. Other mechanics had made kegs from sections of logs, by hallowing out the interior and inserting heads. A saw-pit had been constructed, and lumber placed to season on house roofs. Cabbage plants were growing in hot beds, and much ground sowed with rye. It was easy to see that both men and women were possessed of varied industrial abilities, so as not only to be able to provide for their own wants, but as opportunity offered, could dispose of some of their manufactures to others. We were told that every article of clothing they wear, including caps for the men, and boots and shoes, are their own workmanship, and that their food costs them about two dollars per month per capita.

The children seemed cheerful and lively and wonderfully restrained, under parental care, from any display of selfishness or quarrelsomeness; but in no instance do I recall seeing a parent chide or correct a child. There seemed throughout the whole community no evidence of unhappiness or of impatience; but the indications all were of religious restraint, and of apparent thankfulness for release from a country where they were unable to carry out their convictions unmolested, and of hopefulness for the future in their newly chosen land.

God's word laid up and hid in the heart is one of the surest preventives of sin. If a man rejoices in the way of God's testimonies, as much as in all riches, he will not be too greedy for illegal gain. Meditation on God's precepts will increase our respect for his ways.—Christian Standard.

"MANY do with opportunites as children do at the seashore; they fill their little hands with sand, and then let the grains fall through, one by one, till all are gone."

DR. TRUEBLOOD'S OBSERVATIONS.

"As to the feeling in Europe about the Philippine problem," said Dr. Trueblood, in answer to the question, "the masses of common people know nothing and care nothing about it, so far as I was able to discover. The politicians and others interested in colonial extension are, of course, anxious that the United States should follow in their footsteps.

"But the thinking classes, especially those interested in the cause of justice and peace, with no exception, spoke with disapproval of the American policy in the Philippines, saying that the nation had not only taken a step backward, but had greatly lessened its influence on civilization. Many of them look upon the American aggressions in the East as a great crime, and others call it a calamity from which our nation cannot soon recover. A prominent editorial writer on a great London paper said to me: 'You have not taken the Philippines so much as they have taken you.'"—Boston Herald.

Be patient towards all men. The cold hammer fashions the hot iron. He who would govern others must first learn to govern himself. Passion is blind. Cool, deliberate, and at the same time energetic action makes itself felt in every department of life.

Be patient towards your brethren. Some men are slow to see into good things. They want to do right, but it takes them a good while to determine what is required of them. Every member of the body of Christ is not an eye. To get out of patience with these dull ones will not help either them or you. Give them time and they will do their duty. We all have our infirmities. Let us bear with each other.

To be patient you must have patience. The stream cannot flow if the fountain is dry. The fruit will not grow without the tree. Resolutions alone against impatience will not answer. You must pray as well as resolve. Ask God not merely to help you in your outward conduct, but to give you the inward grace. Unless you get that you will fail, as you have failed before. Be determined on victory in this.—World's Crisis.

It is one among the pious and valuable maxims, which are ascribed to Francis de Sales: "A judicious silence is always better than truth spoken without charity." The very undertaking to instruct or censure others, implies an assumption of intellectual or moral superiority. It cannot be expected, therefore, that the attempt will be well received, unless it is tempered with a heavenly spirit. "Though I speak with the tongues of men and of angels, and have not charity, I am become as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal."—T. C. Upham.

RESOLUTION sicklied over with the pale cast of thought never accomplished much in the working-day world. The self-doubter is the predestined failure. It is better to go cheerfully on as far as possible, even if one brings up square and sharp against a limitation, than to stop short for fear of a possible barrier.—Vogue.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, SEVENTH MONTH 29, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

THE DOCTRINE OF REPOSE.

IN these days of noise and all unrest it may be fitting to direct attention to the value of bodily and spiritual repose; not the repose that is akin to inertia, but such reasonable conservation and direction of our forces as is consistent with the truest accomplishment of duty. There has been a great deal said of late about "the strenuous life," and an urging of our youth to a constant pursuit of the great prizes of the world. But is such advice of the soundest kind? Perhaps our nervous American atmosphere will always foster a sufficient strenuousness on the part of the young and the ambitious. Is there not rather a need for the restraining voice, preaching to our restless time the Doctrine of Repose?

The dignity which is an inseparable part of character in the greatest men and women has grown out of a quietude of power, an unresting yet unhesitating performance of each day's work, a conscious self-restraint that in time becomes unconscious. Who does not admire the man strong and noble and steadfast through all the hours, who yet gives us an impression of calm, controlled endurance? The sweet patience and unfailing tranquility of the wise mother,—who does not feel himself the better in that fine presence? These qualities are not altogether matters of inheritance or temperament; they may be acquired by all who will avoid restlessness, who will hold themselves superior to petty discouragements, and will keep before their thoughts the assurance that life is great and good and sweet.

We see all about us people who succumb to chance worriments, people who have never really gotten control of themselves. They make themselves and their neighbors uncomfortable, they form habits of fussiness and inquietude; and though they cannot be accused of positive wrong-doing, their state of mind and their habitual attitude seem to serener souls truly pitiable. What a healing balm after an experience of these weaker ones is the coming of some strong, sane friend on whose equanimity and godly cheerfulness we can depend absolutely!

"For while the tired waves, vainly breaking,
Seem here no painful inch to gain,
Far back, through creeks and inlets making,
Comes silent, flooding in, the main."

The world has always been blest with some who stood among their fellow-men stately and serene, like the unshaken oak among its lesser brothers of the forest. Fox and Penn were such figures; Wordsworth and Tennyson were such; he whose gracious smile and beautiful courtesy we knew until so recently was of this high company. There are still among us those whose presence is as a benediction. Constant incentives to us are those and these, teaching us the worth of repose amid excitement, telling us, if we will but hearken, that God rewards those most richly whose hearts are attuned to the harmonies of life,—who, like Matthew Arnold, strive daily for the accomplishing of—

"Toil unsever'd from tranquility."

AN essay on the subject of the so-called "ordinance" or "sacrament" of the Supper, prepared by John William Graham, M.A. (Dalton Hall, Owens College, Manchester), is in the press of James Clarke & Co., 13, Fleet street, London, and will be issued at once. It has the title, "The Lord's Supper: A Historical Study from the Standpoint of the Society of Friends," and is a calm and serious discussion of the evidence of authority in the Scriptures for the observance of the Supper, and of the place claimed for it in the rituals of the churches. It may not be known that many church writers have candidly owned the slenderness of the authority for the "ordinance," and as to that have practically conceded the ground taken by Friends.

WE have received, through the kindness of our friend Charles Thompson, of Morland, Cumberlandshire, a copy of the Extracts from the Minutes and Proceedings of London Yearly Meeting of 1899. The report is a full and valuable one, containing, besides the minutes of meetings, much information as to charities, temperance, peace movements, the Doukhobors, etc. The Testimonies Concerning Deceased Friends are models of interesting and uplifting Quaker biography.

THE Central Committee and other committees in preparation for the conference at Chatauqua in 1900, met at Whittier Hall, Asbury Park, on the 21st and 22d instant, with a good attendance. Important work was done, a full report of which we shall print at a later day.

THE attention of Friends is called to the notice, on another page, of Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting, to be held at Valley Meeting-house, on the 8th proximo.

DEATHS.

BOND.—In Wilmington, Del., Seventh month 19, 1899, Mary J., wife of Joseph A. Bond, and daughter of the late Norris Maris; she was a member of Wilmington Monthly Meeting.

CADWALLADER.—In Unionville, Centre county, Pa., Fourth month 30, 1899, Phebe J. Cadwallader, wife of William S. Cadwallader (formerly of York county), and daughter of the late Isaac Hicklin, of Chester county, Pa. She was a member with Friends, and although not a frequent attender of meeting, her principles were in unison with those of our body.

Hers was a beautiful life, a life of devotion and self-sacrifice to her children and invalid husband.

Greatly do we miss her cheerful face, her kindly interest, her words of encouragement; yet we feel that she has gained a rich reward. * *

FUSSELL.—At Narbeth, Seventh month 23, 1899, Laura Lewis, wife of William Henry Fussell; a member of the Monthly Meeting of Friends of Philadelphia. Interment at Friends' ground, Newtown Square.

KIRK.—At Weldon, Pa., Sixth month 17, 1899, Joseph Kirk, aged 59 years, 7 months, and 4 days.

LEEDOM.—At Media, Pa., Seventh month 21, 1899, Hannah A., widow of William Leedom, in her 76th year.

POPE.—At Bristol, Pa., Seventh month 18, 1899, Gertrude, wife of Rowland Pope, and daughter of the late Caleb and Evangeline Ardmore, aged 47 years.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

VII.—DAYS IN LONDON.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

WHEN I left London, on the 27th ult., there had been just twenty-seven days since my coming ashore at Southampton, and omitting the ten days on the Continent, I had spent seventeen in London. Three of these had been First-days, and three were given to the "White Slave" Congress, so that eleven were left for sight-seeing.

I must confess that I did not work hard at sight-seeing on all the eleven days. To go from morning till night looking at things that are interesting and novel is a strain, mental as well as physical, which calls for one younger and more ardent than myself. So there were two or three of the eleven in which my principal achievements were to walk a little, read a little, write letters (this is not so readily done in the midst of travel engagements), and take rides on the top of an omnibus. * * *

The first week in the great capital I had my home at Chelsea, in the West End, enjoying the kind hospitality of friends whom I had known of, but now met for the first time. Percy Bigland, the artist, whose picture, "The Quaker Wedding," in possession of our friend Isaac H. Clothier, has introduced him to many Americans, Friends and others, has his home in Chelsea, near the river, and almost within a stone's throw of the Carlyle house, in Cheyne Row. Chelsea is, in fact, an artists' neighborhood; in Tite street, near the Biglands', are, with others, the homes of two famous American painters; J. S. Sargent and E. A. Abbey.

Going from the delightful Tite street home—filled with artistic objects and adornments, and a most serene, Friendly atmosphere—into the city, the ordinary route of the omnibuses takes you by Westminster, the Abbey, the Houses of Parliament, the Government offices, Whitehall, the "Horse-Guards," etc., then by Trafalgar Square (which and "the Bank" may be considered the two great centres of London), and Charing Cross; then into and through the Strand and Fleet street, by the Inns of Court, up Ludgate Hill to St. Paul's and so to the Mansion House, the Bank (of England; "the Old Lady of Threadneedle street"), and the Royal Exchange. This is a great ride; looking back at it, now, I see that it was a most impressive and interesting experience to have taken it, as I did, from Chelsea to Bishopsgate (east of the Bank perhaps half a mile), in part or in whole, several times. It is a long trip, and the taking it helps to explain how some of my days were spent without doing very much more. To get the "sights" of London, to know its great tides of human movement, to feel one's self in the presence of its principal historical monuments, there is no better way. And one must reflect that London is the great city of the whole world; there is none other so large. Its population, now, is computed at something like five millions,—nearly as many as the whole of the State of Pennsylvania. So that to see and mingle with the life of its greatest thoroughfares is an experience which one may regard with respect and even with enthusiasm, and the impressions of which one must not expect to repeat in a lifetime.

* * *

The places of interest which one must see in London include, of course, Westminster Abbey, St. Paul's, the Tower, and the Houses of Parliament. All these I "did" fairly well. I went to the Abbey to see its monuments, on one of the days when you may go yourself—without a "verger"—into "the chapels"; and this is by much the most satisfactory way. One evening I heard there the 7 o'clock service; it is to us plain people very formal; there is a large proportion of music and ritual, and the sermon at that time was unimpressive in a high degree. The visit to the Tower had the added pleasure of the company of our friends Dr. Hull and wife, and Mary Travilla and Sarah Paist. St. Paul's I visited one afternoon by myself, and heard part of the afternoon service; the monuments are few compared with those of the Abbey, though many are of interest, and excepting the crypt, it is easy to see all. One fact that strikes you, both here and at the Abbey, is that large and showy memorials have been placed for comparatively unimportant people, while room has become hard to find for some whose fame is likely to endure. A small bust of Tennyson is barely squeezed upon a shelf in the Poet's corner at the Abbey.

The interior of the Houses of Parliament I saw (in company with other Philadelphia friends), very satisfactorily, our conductor being John Edward Ellis, M. P., of Scarborough (member for a Nottinghamshire division), who kindly gave an hour from his many pressing engagements to this. He knows the buildings, old and new, thoroughly,—their history, associations, present uses, etc.,—and we greatly enjoyed visiting them under his charge. I was also twice in the galleries of the House of Commons (through the courtesy of J. E. Ellis, and of H. J. Wilson, M. P., whom I have mentioned in connection with the "White Slave" Congress), and heard discussions of pending measures by most of the leading members; and though the subjects under consideration were not of great importance, the procedure was of course very interesting to an American visitor.

* * *

On the three First-days of my stay I was punctual in attendance, both from inclination and duty, at the meetings of Friends. The first one (Sixth month 4),

I went at 9.30 o'clock to the Adult School at Westminster, of which Percy Bigland is a teacher, and at 11 attended Chelsea Meeting. This is usually held in the home of Thomas and Anne Warner Marsh, in Chelsea Walk, but (their house being under alteration) it was held for several weeks at the home of the Biglands', in Tite street, usually at 6.30 p. m., at which time I was present on the 18th and 25th ult.,—but on the 4th, as said above, at 11 a. m. The number who came in varied from ten or twelve to twice that many, and the little meeting was impressive and uplifting, with a large proportion of silence, but ministry and prayer also. Anne Warner Marsh, a sweet-spirited Friend and winning speaker, Irene Ashby, a young woman earnestly intent on social betterment, and Mary Travilla, spoke in the three meetings which I attended.

On First-day, the 18th, after again spending part of an hour in the Adult School at Westminster, I attended the meeting there. The house is in St. Martin's Lane, just north of Trafalgar Square. It is the most convenient and accessible of the London meetings for most American visitors,—who usually find quarters in the sections of London between St. Paul's and Westminster. A gateway on the street admits to a corridor, then to a pleasant "lobby" and conversation room, then to the meeting-house itself, a fine room, with oak wainscoting. The attendance, on the 18th, was probably fifty or more. Four Friends, Anne Warner Marsh and three men, spoke, none of them at length, and the General Epistle of London Yearly Meeting was read.

On the 25th I went to Devonshire House meeting (12 Bishopsgate, where the Yearly Meeting sits). The attendance there on First-days is not large; the location, almost at the east end of London, is not convenient for many Friends. There were, I think, less than fifty present. Mary Ann Marriage Allen, a mission-worker and evangelist, whose interest in the colored people of our Southern States and in other classes, has several times brought her to America, was present, and had the principal ministry. She had just come back from Palestine, and she had been previously in Cyprus, where she saw the Doukhobors embarked for Canada. There were communications from two men Friends.

There are several other London meetings,—Stoke Newington, Kingston, Wandsworth, Croydon, Peel, and others,—but most of them are distant from the centre of the city; it is very much as if one lodging at Fifteenth and Race streets, or at The Penington, were to set off for Frankford or Flushing, and the late rising hour and breakfast of London do not favor long and early trips on First-day morning.

* * *

Part of one day I spent with our friend William Tallack, at his pleasant home at Upper Clapton, in the northeastern part of London, close to the line of Essex. He has long been the secretary of the Howard Association, whose labors are especially directed to the oversight and reform of prisons and similar places of detention. He is an authority on the subject, and remains, after years of service, fresh, energetic, and active. His correspondence with the INTELLIGENCER, and attentions of various kinds, had made our acquaintance by letter of long standing, though I now met him for the first time. I found him an animated and very interesting talker, with a fund of information and reminiscence concerning Friends. He made some fifty years ago a visit to the United States, with an overland trip, by wagon, from California to the Mississippi Valley. We walked out, across the little river Leigh—from which this part of London draws its water supply—into Essex, and saw, at a little distance northeastward, the district where William Penn spent his childhood, Epping Forest, Wanstead, and Walthamstow. The hawthorn was still in bloom, and the scarlet plumes of the chestnuts abounded. W. Tallack is an interested and intelligent student of nature, as well as of men, and his exact knowledge is refreshing as compared with the vague generalities of information which so many of us possess. He is, too, though no longer a young man (I suppose I may say this with propriety), a vigorous English pedestrian, as I fully discovered in our afternoon walk.

* * *

The picture galleries and the parks I partially neglected, but I twice visited the great National Gallery in Trafalgar Square—one of the best in Europe; and I saw at a private view a collection of pictures by two Cornish artists, and also the annual exhibition of the Royal Society of Painters in Water Colors. A reception to the foreign delegates to the W. S. Congress was held, as I think I mentioned, at the picture-filled rooms of the Royal Society of British Artists; and in the great rooms of Grosvenor House (the Duke of Westminster's) there are many famous paintings, to which one could give a hurried inspection on the evening of the reception there.

* * *

One afternoon, under the kind charge of a young barrister of the Inner Temple, I visited the precincts devoted to law and justice. His chambers are in Goldsmith Building, Inner Temple, and close at hand is the grave of Goldsmith, whose dust lies in this secluded spot. We saw the quaint and venerable Temple Church, the Inns of the Middle and Inner Temples, and—across the street—the great building of the Law Courts, with its fine, but not useful, entrance hall. Several of the court-rooms (they are adjoining, and readily visited, one after another) we entered, and pausing a while, saw the processes by which suitors are supposed to obtain their rights. There were jury trials, examinations of witnesses, arguments before appeal justices, pleadings by counsel, etc., etc., in progress in the several rooms, and I got, I think, a fair general and superficial view of an English court.

* * *

One morning five of us American Friends visited Bunhill Fields, in East London, and saw the monuments to De Foe and Bunyan, and, in the little detached ground, the solitary low stone that is the memorial of the dust of George Fox. On another day, nine of us made that other Quaker pilgrimage, one of the most delightful possible to us on a June day in England, to Jordans. I must speak more at length of this latter visit than the present letter will allow.

I did not do all in London that I desired, and as I write I contemplate the possibility of a short further visit there, before I return. The manuscript and other treasures in the Friends' collections at Devonshire House were only glanced at in an hour's visit, the day I left London.

Manchester, Seventh month 10.

A FOREIGN LETTER. BICYCLING IN ENGLAND.

A letter from Edward C. Wilson, son of our friend Isaac Wilson. He is conducting a party of students through Great Britain on bicycles. George M. Lamb and William C. Tyson, of Baltimore, now students at Swarthmore College, are of the number.

It has been suggested that some notes on our wheeling pilgrimage through England and Scotland might be of interest to readers of the INTELLIGENCER. Our party of nine young men sailed from New York Sixth month 17, by the Atlantic Transport Line steamer Marquette. The ocean experience was novel to most of the party.

Besides the hundred and twenty five passengers registered as "first-class," there were over eight hundred others called by the sailors "third-class passengers." These were made up thus: 637 cattle, 140 dray horses, and 95 racing horses. Except that excursions among these proved always interesting we should scarcely have known that they were aboard. They were placed two decks lower than the passengers, and mostly fore and aft, though two lines extended nearly the entire length of the ship on either side.

Ocean voyages are all much alike. I shall not try to repeat much that has been better written on this point. Suffice it to say that when the sea grew boisterous I believe our respect for Columbus increased as our appetites failed.

On the eleventh morning, after a foggy night in the English Channel and the Straits of Dover, we rose early to find our great ship slowly making her way among the various strange craft anchored in the lower Thames. Our first view of the low Kentish country to the south, the toy-like cars of the trains moving near us, and the old, substantial buildings of Gravesend, proved most interesting.

Having been unsuccessful in "catching the tide" it was necessary to land all passengers at Tilbury, where a special train awaited us. London afforded a marked contrast to our quiet life aboard ship. It being our intention to visit London more thoroughly in Eighth month, we remained only one night in the great city. I was much favored in being able to call upon Mary Trayilla and Sarah R. Palste, who in company with Dr. Hull and wife are spending the summer abroad.

On the morning of the 29th (Fifth-day), we wheeled away to the north, passing through several outlying business centers that were formerly villages apart from London, but which are now incorporated in that "largest city of the world." It was not difficult to adjust our road etiquette to meet the English conditions. The text, "Turn to the left in meeting and to the right in passing," just reverses our American rule. The grade rises rapidly from London, and at Barnet our first stop was made. Here, eleven miles from the metropolis, was fought one of the most severe battles of the Civil War. The Earl of Warwick, the Kingmaker, met Edward IV. here in 1471, and was defeated and slain. The monument, a simple column of limestone about twenty feet high, stands on the village green. As we rested at the base of the shaft we recalled the bloody struggle that so set back the course of English civilization. We shall run across several of the battlefields of this Thirty Years' War. At St. Albans, our stopping place for the night, two battles of the war were fought.

Our stop at St. Albans was most interesting. The hotel, The George, is a rambling, quaint place, built, I believe, about 1473; it has only been added to at times, and the original structure is very little altered. To the south, in the valley of the Ver, we examined what is left of the walls of the ancient Roman town of Verulamium. St. Alban, a Roman, was executed here in 304 A. D., for his espousal of Christianity. He was the first in England to suffer martyrdom in the cause.

There is a fine abbey church here, one of the largest in England, that dates back to the reign of King Offa II. who founded the abbey in 795, to commemorate the martyrdom of St. Alban. The materials used were largely old Roman bricks taken from the ruins of the luxurious villas. Near the cathedral stands what is said to be the oldest inhabited house in England.

Our course lies northward through Bedford, Cambridge, and the cathedral towns of Ely, Lincoln, and York. Of these I hope to write later. E. C. W.

Cambridge, England, Seventh month 2.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

A FRIEND from Chicago writes in a private letter:

We have had the company of John J. Cornell and wife for the past three weeks, and his service has been helpful in our meeting; some notice was given for last First-day, and an increased attendance was noticeable. Several were not familiar with our custom, but a feeling was expressed that they were glad they came. John gave a practical and beautiful presentation of the Beatitudes, to which an attentive ear was given.

JASON WEBB of Cumberland, Ky., is the head of what he believes to be the largest family in the world. He has 19 children, 175 grandchildren, and 100 great-grandchildren. His brother Miles Webb, who died at 78 (Jason is still flourishing at 80), has had more than 400 descendants, of whom 225 were either grandchildren or great-grandchildren. Other members of the family have been almost equally prolific, and adding to direct descendants other relations, the Webbs in the district of Cumberland number altogether about 12,000 persons.

RECENT observations among Indians show that in South America, as well as in North America, the red woman lives longer than the red man. But the average duration of life is only seventeen years for both sexes in the South, and 22 per cent. of the Indians die during the first year of life.

WHAT SHALL CHILDREN DO IN VACATION?

Ellen Lee Wyman, in Trained Motherhood.

WHEN we hear the wail of regret from parents that vacations are so long the question will arise, Why is this? Is this wail because of regard for the children's educational welfare or regard for the parents' convenience? Too many parents regard the children's liberty a troubled period of special care and anxiety. This is really too bad, for with the right spirit so much may be accomplished and enjoyed. Mothers may make this an opportunity for much pleasure and profit. They should feel it a responsibility and a privilege to have their children entirely under their direction, and they should make it a study to meet this opportunity with systematic plans. Any mother is clever enough to do this if she gives the subject her best attention and effort. Whatever may be the environment or conditions, have some rallying points or times during the long summer days. Here is a suggestive program followed by a mother for several vacations. In the early morning after the simple breakfast she would work with them in the garden, combining instruction and amusement by calling attention to the facts pertaining to the plant and animal life all about them, at the same time leading them to appreciate the satisfaction of achievement by accomplishing a certain amount of work as evidenced by neatly weeded beds and well-trained borders. Then the children had their liberty for the rest of the morning to dig or build or play—usually bare-foot and without the restriction of keeping clean. It is a real luxury to children to get just as dirty as circumstances allow.

Hands and faces were required to be clean for lunch. Often a little hand-lunch would be enjoyed about half-past ten or eleven, which always tended to smooth irritation and promote happiness. After regular lunch, when it was too hot to play, the children would all lie flat on their backs on the grass or on the porch, sometimes in the cool shaded rooms, while the mother read from some entertaining book for an hour or so. Then after a short play, bathing and dressing followed, and the cool of the day was enjoyed in walking, riding, or lounging. Twice a week German lessons took a morning hour. To be sure this was in an out-of-town home. What to do with city children in a city house or flat is a difficult problem, indeed. One feels like throwing up the hands with a cry of Don't! Don't keep the children in the city if by any means, by hook or by crook, you can get outside the city limits with them. If you cannot get away with them for all summer, take them out for all the time you can. It is a good thing for all concerned to get away from the regular routine and have a little change—something new to eat, something new to see, and think and talk about. Of course, "there is no place like home." You and your children will appreciate this fact all the more forcibly by standing off a bit to get a good look at it.

I know a group of boys from ten to fourteen years of age who spent a happy six weeks one summer through an arrangement by their wise fathers.

A graduate from a manual training school was engaged to be with the boys every morning. One of the fathers offered space in his large shaded grounds for the boys to build a house. The plans were considered, drawn, and calculated; computations of all kinds were made, even to the number of nails needed and kinds of tools required. With their teacher the boys visited lumber yards, nail factories, and tool shop. The necessary purchases were made, and after some preliminary practice with the tools, work was begun. Never were there happier, more contented boys than those six during the weeks of construction. Every part of the little "twelve-by-fifteen" building, from its under-pinning and its doorstep to its gable and its last shingle, was as complete as could be made under the strict requirements of the interested young teacher. Occasionally the party took a day off to visit some building or institution of interest, once to witness the whole process of publishing a big daily paper; again to go all through some large rolling-mills; again to spend a day in the woods.

At the end of the term the completion of the wonderful house was celebrated by a banquet served under its roof by the mothers and sisters, and then the boys slept there all night.

Oh, it was fun! So wholesome and good, too!

Teach your little girls to mend, sew, and embroider. Begin pretty Christmas work. Let them make some of their own garments or pretty clothes for their dolls. I know of a number of lovely bedspreads made of nine-inch squares of unbleached cotton cloth, embroidered with kindergarten patterns done in outline stitch with red working cotton. These squares can be worked with great interest by little fingers, and then they are stitched together, and the stitching covered by feather-stitching.

These vacation days afford frequent opportunity to give the little girls and big girls practical instruction in home duties, in the kitchen, and in the other departments.

If you have no children of your own or not enough to keep you busy, lift up your eyes to the pleading faces of hundreds of little ones who are starving—actually starving—for the fresh air, green grass, and clear skies which you might so well afford to offer them for a few days or weeks. Oh, think of the real happiness you might give, of the wide circles of influence you might start!

To be sure, all this is not planning for an easy, restful time for you, "Trained Mothers"—that is not the point. You must make hay while the sun shines. You must make men and women of your boys and girls while you have them in the plastic stage. The greater your devotion, the more earnest your effort, so much the richer will be your harvest, the more blessed your reward.

Few of the million passengers or more who make their daily journey in a London bus or street car know that the horses which draw them are nearly always American or Canadian. Great Britain buys more than 20,000 horses from the United States every year. Nearly all of these are heavy draught horses. The truth is, since the coaching era came to an end, the British farmer has neglected the harness horse in favor of the hunter.

LITERARY NOTES.

IN the attractive number of the Atlantic Monthly for Eighth month, John Muir pictures the wonders of the Yosemite National Park. The primeval forests, the canons, lakes, and streams, the polished pavements, the monumental boulders, and the marked effects of glacial action with which the park abounds, are all described in vivid and glowing language.

In "His Brother's Brother," T. W. Higginson writes delightfully about the late John Holmes, the less famous, but to many minds not less able, younger brother of the Autocrat; and furnishes bon-mots, anecdotes, and quotations, which go far to justify his friends' belief as to the position that John Holmes might have achieved had he chosen to enter the literary arena.

J. A. Riis, following his previous articles upon Tenement Houses and their owners and managers, takes up the question of the Tenant, who and what he is, and how shall he best be taken care of. He finds the slum tenants to be practically all foreigners. Of these the majority at the present time are Italians, to whose characteristics and of those of the Jews, the next most numerous clientage, his paper is chiefly devoted.

Ex-Senator Henry L. Dawes treats the Indian Question, asking, Have we failed with the Indian? and answers his own question in the negative, rehearsing the results and the encouraging prospects of our later and present Indian policy.

W. Cunningham discusses "The Prospects of Universal Peace," in connection with the Peace Congress now in session, and points out the difficulties and conflicting interests that continually threaten collision among the nations, and the safeguards resulting from the people of different countries learning to know and to understand each other.

The leading article in the new Popular Science Monthly is a reply to Comptroller Coler by Franklin H. Giddings, Professor of Sociology in Columbia University. While Professor Giddings agrees with the comptroller in his main contention that it is economically wrong for private organizations to use the taxpayer's money without any public accounting, he believes that there are a number of considerations which partially justify this arrangement, and perhaps make it the best one possible under present conditions. The Teachers' School of Science, which was founded some years ago in Boston by a few public-spirited scientists, is described with a number of its organizers and officers in an interesting article by Frances Zirngiebel. Prof. Edward Orton, president of the forthcoming meeting of the American Association for the Advancement of Science, contributes an important article discussing the true function of the association. "Are Jews Jews?" by Joseph Jacobs, President of the English Hebrew Historical Society, is a reply to Professor Ripley's articles, in which the latter took the ground that the Jews were not a distinct race, but simply a people. Dr. Jacobs marshals a number of facts which he believes contradict Professor Ripley's conclusions. "Practical Philanthropy," by Harriet A. Townsend, takes up the subject of how the philanthropist can best make his philanthropy truly philanthropic.

The current number of Scribner's Magazine contains the conclusion of Senator Hoar's article on Daniel Webster; more letters written by Stevenson from Bournemouth, many of them to William Archer, the critic; a short paper on "Japanese Flower Arrangement," by Theodore Wores, illustrated from paintings by the author; poems by E. S. Martin and J. Russell Taylor; also a brief article by the eminent painter, John La Farge. Stevenson wrote thus of the public taste in letters: "That is the hard part of literature. You aim high, and you take longer over your work, and it will not be so successful as if you had aimed low and rushed it. What the public likes is work (of any kind) a little loosely executed; so long as it is a little wordy, a little slack, a little dim and knotless, the dear public likes it; it should (if possible) be a little dull into the bargain. I know that good work sometimes hits; but, with my hand on my heart, I think it is by an accident. And I know also that good work must succeed at last; but that is not the doing of the public; they are only shamed into silence or affectation."

La Farge's article contains an excellent passage concerning the art of literary expression from the painter's standpoint. "When the artist," says he, "uses words he finds that they are tools whose use he does not know—living tools that refuse to work, that stumble over each other, that lead him astray, that turn on him sometimes, or actually direct his path, instead of being led by him; until at length he recognizes that they are old acquaintances in new forms. They are the signs of thought, of ideas, and perceptions. They are not these last themselves. And he becomes both delighted and timid; pleased, because words express differently and yet like his tools; timid, because how long and difficult and endless perhaps are their full use and mastery. He sees also that each one is an abstraction; that each phrase, and often each word, has involved the consumption, the absorption, the waste of hundreds of sensations concerning still more objects. To put into record merely the impressions of nature, he has only a few notes, and he knows that these external appearances that delight him are written in an infinite gamut. Before the accurate and full description of anything that he sees could be worked out in words, it would have decayed and been born again many times. He sees that the essence of these tools is to generalize, and thereby to leave over in each thing something that is inexpressible. All this reminds him of the failures and inadequacies of his own art, wherein (in those moments of despair which are the consequence of passionate attachment) he feels that he has felt all, and that his miserable means only allow him to express a part."

Lucky is the poet who can say with Horace that he has, in his works, reared unto himself, "a monument more enduring than bronze." The approval of one generation may be unanimous and the next may consign the unfortunate verse writer to oblivion. A notable case of this kind is recalled in the current number of Literature.

Fifty years ago Robert Pollok's poem, "The Course of Time," was one of the popular books of the day. In 1869, it had reached its seventy-eighth thousand, and there was still a large demand for it.

There seemed every reason to believe that the poet had achieved a lasting fame. Over his grave his friends placed an obelisk with the inscription:—

"His Immortal Poem is his Monument."

"Alas! for prophecy," says Literature. "Poor Pollok, it is to be feared, is remembered now only by the few. Yet he has not been entirely forgotten. At the time of the celebration of the centenary of his birth a proposal was made to erect a memorial to him in the vicinity of the place where he was born in Scotland, and the scheme has received a fair measure of support."

In the new Century John Burroughs gives a fascinating glimpse of the wild life about his slab-sided cabin near the Hudson river at West Park. In "The River of Tea," E. R. Scidmore writes of the Yangtze-kiang, and especially of the city of Hankow, where Russian and Siberian merchants have supplanted the English. In a learned paper on "The Churches of Auvergne," Mrs. Van Rensselaer introduces effectively, the picturesque episode of Peter the Hermit's preaching of the first crusade. John R. Musick gives a description at first hand of a town "In the Whirl of a Tornado." One of the more striking features of the magazine is "The Night Walk," a poem by George Meredith. Paul L. Ford's "Many-Sided Franklin" treats this month of "Franklin as Jack of All Trades." In this connection Franklin is shown to have been ahead of his age in his abhorrence of war and eagerness to mitigate its miseries. No one would have been better pleased than he by the Czar's proposal of disarmament. He argued in favor of the abolition of privateering, claiming that "the practice of robbing merchants on the high seas" was "a remnant of ancient piracy." In 1783, in the framing of the treaty of peace with Great Britain, he advocated that the misery of war should be henceforth limited to the actual belligerents.

In his review of the disturbed political conditions in France, resulting from feeling over the Dreyfus affair, Arnold White, the London correspondent of Harper's Weekly, draws a picture which vividly recalls the days of the Commune. Not only has this famous case influenced France politically, but the very name of Dreyfus has come to be the rock upon which religious creeds stand or fall.

"Among the Catholics," says Mr. White, "to question his treachery is regarded as tantamount to infidelity and disobedience to the Church. On the other side, the Jews, the intellectuals, and the Protestants acclaim Dreyfus as a hero: almost as a Messiah."

Sir Edwin Arnold has just completed a very important literary work, the translation from the Persian of "The Gulistan, or Garden of Roses," one of the greatest of the Persian classics, by the Sheikh Sa'di of Shiraz. Of Sa'di Sir Edwin Arnold says: "The sheikh was really the Horace and Marco Polo of the Far East combined into one rich and gracious nature. Ancient enough to carry with him a fine flavor of the Old World, he is as modern and as much for all time as the Roman poet himself or the American Emerson."

COMMUNICATIONS.

THE STANDARD OF THE MINISTRY.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I WAS very much interested in an article in the current issue of THE INTELLIGENCER, entitled "Young Friends and the Christian Ministry," by B. Attack. I want to add a sentiment on this subject. The call to the service of the Master does not come to all alike, and I have long believed that in time past Friends prominent in authority in the church have set the standard so high as regards the call to the ministry that young Friends have in consequence been deterred from even giving expression to a sentiment in our meetings.

That highly-enlightened Friend, the late Benjamin Hallowell, once said that if an individual was capable of receiving a Divine truth the fact carried with it an obligation to give expression to it for the benefit of others. So I think that young Friends have been led to expect too much in the way of a supernatural call to the ministry.

The apparent failure of our testimony in favor of a free ministry is the result of two causes: first, a lack of faithfulness on our part; and, secondly, the setting of too high a standard, as above stated. Were this not so, I believe our meeting would seldom be held in silence. A word dropped by a dear friend of mine, a Baptist minister, is a strong argument in favor of a free ministry; said he, "I have to preach to please the people."

If I may be allowed a homely illustration of my thought on the ministry, it is in the advice of the Irishman to his son on going out into the world. He said, "My son, when you see a fight, pitch in; and when you see a head, hit it!"

Thus, when we see the hydra-head of the saloon and kindred vices make its loathsome appearance, we should hit, not expecting to be particularly pleasing to the saloon man.

Iowa City, Ia.

JOSEPH HARTLEY.

FRIENDLY MODE OF EXPRESSION.

Editors FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER:

I think it would be better for Friends to keep to the Friendly modes of expression.

We see occasionally articles in THE INTELLIGENCER written by members where Mr. and Mrs. are used instead of the proper names. This may seem a small matter to some, but it would be more pleasant to many Friends to keep to our plain way. By deviating in the little may be the means of our giving way in the more important things as regards our religious duties.

Friends have always been a peculiar people, and as we are or become the humble followers of Jesus Christ, we cannot fall in the ways of fashionable society or follow the popular forms and customs of the worldly-minded.

I wish to encourage the members of our Religious Society to be willing to take up the cross in order to be obedient to the Divine Spirit, and to follow the guidance of Him who always leads aright and brings to the faithful love, joy, and peace.

ALLEN FLITCRAFT.

Chester, Pa., Seventh month 17, 1899.

PERSONAL AND OTHER NOTES.

DR. HORACE HOWARD FURNESS, perhaps the foremost of living Shakesperean scholars, has received the honorary degree of Doctor in Letters from the University of Cambridge, England. In bestowing the degree, Dr. Sandys, the Cambridge public orator, referred not only to the great scholar himself, but also to the high estimation in which the father, Dr. William H. Furness, was held in England, for his intellectual attainments, his rare gifts as a spiritual leader, and his championship of Abolition.

Of the Philadelphia Friends traveling abroad, the following notes may be of interest: Mary Travilla and Sarah R. Paiste proceeded from London to Paris on the 8th, and after a few days would go to Switzerland. They would return to England, and go to the Lake District about the middle of Eighth month. Anna J. Lippincott and Susan W. Janney, with their companions, were at Keswick on the 7th, intending to proceed for a tour in Scotland, as far north as Inverness. Dr. and Hannah Hull were at Cambridge on the 10th, intending to remain a few days, and then go to Ely, Canterbury, and Oxford. Howard M. Jenkins, after spending a fortnight at and near Manchester, left on the 14th for Gloucester, Bristol, and Street (in Somersetshire). He intended to spend a few days in Wales, and then go to the Lake District. William F. Wickersham, principal of Westtown School, and William C. Allen, of Moorestown, N. J., reached Liverpool by the Pennland, from Philadelphia, on the 6th instant. The latter expected to spend a few weeks on the Continent, and to return in Eighth month.

YOUNG FRIENDS' MEETING.

MOORESTOWN, N. J.—At a meeting of the Young Friends' Association held in Moorestown, Sixth month 9, 1899, Isaac H. Hillborn, of Philadelphia, gave an illustrated lecture on the "Building of the Old Jewish Tabernacle," together with the history and associations connected with the Hebrew people.

The particular events of their forty years of wandering through the wilderness were portrayed by the speaker, and he spoke of the ten commandments delivered to Moses, five of which relate to the love of God and five to the love of man. Moses was commanded to speak to the people and ask all those who were willing to give as a free offering gold, wood, and brass to build a tabernacle, wherein was to be kept this holy covenant.

This was the first building ever erected for the worship of one God congregationally, and was used five hundred years, after which Solomon's Temple was built, 1000 B. C. The Ark of the Covenant was recovered after its capture by the Philistines, but was never again placed in the Sanctuary; it is believed by some to have been placed in David's tomb.

Jacob died in Egypt, and the Israelites to fulfill their promise to bury him in the cave of Macpellah with Abraham and Isaac, carried his body in all their forty years' wanderings.

This interesting and instructive lecture was very much appreciated by the large audience. After the usual silence the meeting adjourned, all being invited to remain and enjoy the social hour and refreshments.

ADA M. LIPPINCOTT, Secretary.

A MEXICAN cactus (anhalonium lewinii) is eaten by Indians during their religious ceremonies to incite visions. An English naturalist, Dr. Dixon, has been testing upon himself its extraordinary properties, and reports that the air seemed filled with vague odors of perfumes, a halo of musical sounds surrounding him, and a marvelous display of ever-changing brilliant colors passed clearly before his vision.

THE wild horses of Arabia will not admit a tame horse among them, while the wild horses of South America endeavor to decoy domesticated horses from their masters, and seem eager to welcome them.

It is averred by a famous Chinese doctor that nervousness is kept out of the Celestial Empire by the use of soft-soled shoes. The hard soles worn by the Anglo-Saxon race are said to be the cause of their extreme nervous temperament.

THE DESIRE OF NATIONS.

"And the Government shall be upon his shoulders, and his name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, Mighty God, and Everlasting Father, the Prince of Peace."—Isaiah.

Earth will go back to her lost youth,
And life grow deep and wonderful as truth,
When the wise king out of the nearing heaven comes
To break the spell of long millenniums—
To build with song again
The broken hope of men,
To hush and heroize the world,
Beneath the flag of brotherhood unfurled;
And he will come some day—
Already is his star upon the way.
He comes, O world, he comes!
But not with bugle cry nor roll of doubling drums.

Nay, for he comes to loosen and unbind,
To build the lofty purpose in the mind,
To stir the heart's deep chord;
No rude horns parleying, no shock of shields,
Nor, as of old, the glory of the Lord,
To half-awakened shepherds in the fields,
Looking with foolish faces on the rush
Of the great splendor when the pulsing hush
Came o'er the hills, came o'er the heavens afar,
Where on their cliff of stars the watching seraphs are.

He will arrive, our Counsellor and Chief,
And with bleak faces lighted up will come
The earth-worn mothers from their martyrdom,
To tell him of their grief.
And glad girls, carolling from field and town,
Will go to meet him with the labor crown,—
A new crown woven of the heading wheat,—
And men will sit down at his sacred feet,
And he will say, the King,
"Come, let us live the poetry we sing!"
And these, his burning words will break the ban—
Words that will grow to be
On Continent, on sea,
The rallying cry of man.

EDWIN MARKHAM.

BIRTH-DAY SONG.

From "Shots at Random," by Howell S. England.

'Tis thy natal day, my bride,
Let me then a song provide
Breathing only love for thee,
Who, at blooming twenty-three Stands so loving at my side.

This to-day has been my thought,—
That since first thy love I sought
Five sweet years have come and gone,
And in hurrying swiftly on Each hath greater blessing brought.

As a maid to me thou bore
All thy love's unstinted store;
In thy wifely duties good,
In thy tender motherhood,
I have loved thee more and more.

And our love high Heaven has blest,
In our little family nest,
Baby prattle fills the air;
Baby feet on hall and stair
Run in many a cunning quest.

Now, on this, thy natal day,
Humbly, darling, let us pray
God to give us wisdom meet
So to guide these little feet,
That they may not go astray,—

So these little lives to train,
That each active heart and brain
Ne'er may fail the Voice to hear
Speaking to the inward ear
Nor its messages disdain.

And, my love, accept from me,
These sweet flowers that bloom for thee,
Beautiful and frail and fair,
Pure as is the love I bear
For my wife at twenty-three.

A MORNING GREETING.

My neighbor met me on the street,
She dropped a word of greeting gay,
Her look so bright, her tone so sweet,
I stepped to music all that day.

The cares that tugged at heart and brain,
The work too heavy for my hand,
The ceaseless underbeat of pain,
The tasks I could not understand,

Grew lighter as I walked along
With air and step of liberty,
Freed by the sudden lilt of song
That filled the world with cheer for me.

Yet was this all? A woman wise,
Her life enriched by many a year,
Had faced me with her brave, true eyes,
Passed on, and said, "Good-morning,
dear!"

—Margaret Sangster.

HOLMES AND LOWELL.

IN his youth, a favorite book of Oliver Wendell Holmes was Pope's "Iliad," and he was fond of quoting from it. His memory was at all times retentive and ready, and abundantly stored with good and pleasant things. When he began his twelve lectures on the English poets he recited at the end of the first lecture one of his own poems. This was so kindly received that at every lecture afterwards he closed with a recitation of his own verses. "Poets," he says, with more affection and sympathy than satire, "read (and recite) their own compositions in a sing-song sort of way; but they do seem to love them so, that I always enjoy it. It makes me laugh a little inwardly to see how they dandle their poetical babies, but I don't let them know it." He very often read and recited his own poems in public, and in most charming fashion, for he was able to present upon the platform all the variety of feeling which he could conceive at his desk. He always carried his audience with him surely, easily, and retained this power to old age. He often referred to his poems as "babies," and held them in memory, and loved them passionately. When he found them in magazines and newspapers they seemed always to strike him as new; and he would read and recite them with childish glee. He was especially fond of reading and reciting certain of Whittier's poems, and seemed to be unusually affected by them. When questioned as to whether he had more satisfaction from having written his "Essay on Puerperal Fever," or "The Chambered Nautilus," he said, "I think I will not answer the question you put me. I think oftenest of "The Chambered Nautilus," which is a favorite poem of mine though I wrote it myself. But in writing it I was filled with a better feeling, the highest state of mental exaltation and the most crystalline clairvoyance, as it seemed to me, that had ever been granted to me—I mean that lucid vision of one's thoughts, and of all forms of expression which will be at once precise and musical, which is the poet's special gift however large or small in amount or value." Hear the last verse of this immortal poem, which some of you can repeat, and with which many of you are very familiar :

" Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
As the swift seasons roll !

Leave thy low-vaulted past !

Let each new temple, nobler than the last,
Shut thee from Heaven with a dome more vast,
Till thou at length art free,

Leaving thine outgrown shell by life's unresting sea."

Whittier thought this Dr. Holmes' best poem, and most people will agree with him, though "The Last Leaf" is more widely known and perhaps more a favorite with general readers. Lincoln knew it by heart, and repeated it at times, saying that for pure pathos he knew nothing to surpass this stanza :

" The mossy marbles rest

On the lips that he has pressed

In their bloom ;

And the names he loved to hear

Have been carved for many a year

On the tomb."

I have not been able to get much directly from books as to Lowell's memory, or his disposition to repeat or to quote what he enjoyed in prose and poetry, and so I wrote to Rev. Edward Everett Hale, an intimate personal friend of the poet, who is now publishing in the Outlook an interesting series of papers on "Lowell and his Friends," asking some questions, to which he makes reply as follows :

"Lowell's memory was very accurate, and he was really an omnivorous reader. But I do not think that he was specially fond of quotation in public address, and I doubt very much whether, after his boyhood, he consciously committed to memory many passages in literature. I do not recollect any long quotation which could not have been readily looked up, as, for instance, the quotations from Chaucer in his Boston lectures. His charming wife, Miss Maria White, was a person of many interesting accomplishments. I should rate as the very first her power of repeating poetry from English literature of all ages. The very first letter of Lowell's, speaking of her, refers to her exquisite repetition of some of the old English ballads. I know perfectly well that all the young people who knew her were interested in her on this account. I never knew exactly how or why ; but she was a well-educated girl, who very early in life must have taken an interest in the best English literature. When I knew her, which was perhaps when she was eighteen years old, she knew more old English ballads by heart than I know now by name."

In the opening paper of the series above named, Mr. Hale says of the child Lowell : "His mother, who was an invalid, but a person of remarkable nature and accomplishments, had the sense, courage, and exquisite foresight which placed the little boy, almost from his birth, under the personal charge of a sister eight years older. Certain general instructions were given by father and mother, and under these the young mentor was largely left to her own genius and inspiration. A daily element in the business was the little boy's nap. He was to lie in his cradle for three hours every morning. His little nurse, eleven or twelve years old, might sing to him if she chose, but she generally preferred to read to him from the poets who interested her. The cadences of verse were soothing, and so the little boy fell asleep every day quieted by the rhythm of Shakespeare or Spenser. By the time a boy is three years old he does not feel like sleeping three hours in the forenoon. Also by that time this little James began to be interested in the stories in Spenser, and Mrs. Putnam, the sister, once gave me a most amusing account of the struggle of this little blue-eyed fellow to resist the coming of sleep and to preserve his consciousness so that he might not lose any of the poem."—J. P. McCasky.

ADVANTAGES OF COLLEGE TRAINING.

ONE of the best papers read at the recent National Educational Association, at Los Angeles, was that by David Starr Jordan, President of Stanford University, entitled "The Usefulness of the University."

President Jordan said in part : "It is certain that to speak of 'over-education' is a misuse of terms. If education is rational and effective there cannot be too much of it. It is not men trained and efficient who enter into destructive competition. It is the ignorant and ineffective who make the struggle for existence so dire a battle. Whatever leaves men weak and ineffective cannot justly be called education. There is nothing more useful than wisdom, nothing more effective than training, nothing more practical than sunshine. Surely no one can claim that the American people are too wise, too skillful, or too enlightened for their own good. Yet to give wisdom, skill and enlightenment is the main function of higher education. It cannot give brains, courage, and virtue where these qualities were wanting before. It cannot make a man, but it furnishes the best known means to help a man to make himself. The gain through self building often outweighs in value the original material. It may be more important even than the finished product, as effort is greater source of strength and happiness to a man than final achievement. What these critics usually mean to attack is misfit education, the training or straining of the memory rather than the acquisition of power to think and act. They mean that the colleges give schooling rather than training. They 'teach young people how to talk rather than how to live.' This is still true to some extent in some places, but the whole tendency of university improvement is toward reality and practicability. These critics have not watched this movement. They do not draw their idea of a university from the powerful, well organized institutions of the day, which lay hold of every various power of humanity, and seek to draw it into effective, harmonious action. Rather they picture to themselves the starveling colleges of their youth, where callow boys were driven against their will over race courses of study, no part of which appealed to their own souls or was related in any direct way to their lives.

"Such colleges and such ideals of education exist in our time in certain forgotten corners, but they are in no sense typical of the American university of to-day. Harvard University, Cornell University, the great and growing State universities of the West are as firmly and thoroughly devoted to the needs of America democracy as the modern harvester is to the needs of the American wheat fields. No doubt inferior methods, dull, stupid traditions, can be found here and there under the names of higher education, as rusty and outworn machinery exists under the name of agricultural implements. It is not by these that the best we have should be judged. No one knows better than our college authorities the misfits and failure of education. No one strives half so hard to prevent them, though in all large enterprises no one can avoid a certain percentage of failure.

"Not all the critics in business life taken together have done one-tenth as much to make education practical as has one of the great university Presidents of our time. Under the hands of Eliot and White and Angell and Tappan, and others like these, the whole face of higher education in America has changed in the last twenty years, and the change has been in every way towards greater usefulness and greater practicability."

To Banish Flies.

New Voice.

THE nuisance of flies begins when hot weather is really down upon us, and in view of what has been said in recent years about their mission in carrying diseases it becomes more urgent than ever to discover some means to banish them from our living and cooking-rooms. It is said that a little oil of lavender and water sprinkled through a common atomizer about the rooms will drive the flies away. However efficacious this remedy may be, it can not be surpassed by several of the mosquito-killing pastils. Besides destroying mosquitoes these pastils kill the flies as well and drive from their hidden dens nearly all vermin in the rooms. There are several varieties of these pastils, which can be made at home. One good compound is made by mixing one part of benzoin, one part balsam tolu, five parts charcoal, one and a half parts common insect-powder, and half a part saltpeter. Add sufficient water to this mixture to knead into a stiff paste. Then roll the mixture into suitable pastils and dry them. One of these pastils will burn for some time in a room, and the fumes emitted will destroy the flies and mosquitoes without injuring furniture or fine curtains.

Songs of Birds.

Bird Lore.

THE songs of birds have attracted a good deal of attention in recent years, and observation seems to confirm the theory that each generation of birds learns the song characteristics of its species by association with its own kind.

This fact was brought quite clearly to my mind several years ago, when in a Western town I was taken to a neighbor's to see his birds. Four cages swung in the shelter of a commodious porch. One contained a red-winged blackbird, that had been taken from its nest when very young, and brought up by hand. His associates were a canary, a blue jay, and an oriole. The canary had been purchased at a bird store, and had there learned its song. The blue jay and oriole had been taken from neighboring nests, and had, no doubt, picked up the characteristic notes of their species from the many other members of their kind that inhabited the vicinity, but it was many miles to the nearest swamp or low land where one might find a red-winged blackbird. This red-wing had learned perfectly the notes of his caged companions, and had picked up some notes of other birds in the neighborhood, but not one note of the red-winged blackbird did he know.

Large Charity.

Harper's Weekly.

It is computed that more than $25,000,000 has been given or bequeathed during the last year to educational institutions and libraries in the United States. An observing contemporary notes that one benefit from the transfer of this great sum to uses of public education is that by helping to make independent of State and local aid the institutions which it goes to, it helps to make their teaching less subject to the influence of transient public sentiment. Where the support of a university depends on the will of a legislature, the instruction that it gives in such subjects as political economy, social economy, and history is liable to be affected by political considerations; but an institution that stands on its own pecuniary legs has nothing to consider in its choice of doctrine further than to teach what makes most for sound learning and coincides most accurately with apparent truth.

The Oldest Family in the World.

ABOUT a dozen of the 400 barons in the British House of Lords date back to 1400, the earliest being 1264. The oldest family in the British Isles is the Mar family of Scotland, 1093. The Campbells of Argyle, to whom belongs the present Duke of Argyll, began in 1190. Talleyrand dates from 1199, Bismarck from 1270, the Grosvenor family, the Dukes of Westminster, 1066; the Austrian house of Hapsburg goes back to 952, and the House of Bourbon to 864. The descendants of Mahommed, born 570, are all registered carefully and authoritatively kept in Mecca by the chief of the family. Little or no doubt exists of the absolute authenticity of the long line of Mahommed's descendants. In China there are many old families, also among the Jews.

When it comes to pedigrees there is one gentleman whom the world must acknowledge as representing the most ancient lineage of all. This is the Mikado of Japan. His place has been filled by members of his family for more than 2,500 years. The present Mikado is the one hundred and twenty-second of the line. The first one was contemporary with Nebuchadnezzar, 666 years before Christ.—[Exchange.]

The Art of Flower Arrangement in Japan.

Scribner's Magazine.

IN Japan the art of flower arrangement is as highly regarded as music, poetry, or painting; and in order that one may become expert therein, it is deemed necessary to devote quite as much attention, time, and study to this as to any other form of art. We look upon flower arrangement in general as merely the result of individual taste, but a Japanese regards it from a very different point of view. He is governed, in this accomplishment, by numerous and well-defined rules which can only be acquired by long and patient study. It would be impossible, without this knowledge, to compose an arrangement of flowers which would meet with the approval of competent critics. It would, in fact, be quite as hopeless as for a musician to compose great masterpieces of music without previous training and careful study. The art of flower arrangement is not only practiced by women and girls, but by men as well, for it is an accomplishment indispensable for all who would make any pretense to learning and culture.

In spite of the fact that flowers are so inseparably associated with everything Japanese, it would be a mistake to assume that Japan is a land of flowers; for wild as well as garden flowers are far more profuse in many sections of this country. Japan is, however, rich in cultivated flowers that are grown in great profusion in garden and nursery in the suburbs of all the cities.

Flower sellers, carrying their fragrant burdens in huge baskets, are met with everywhere, and they are patronized by the poor as well as by the rich, for the prices are low enough to bring them within the reach of all. Although there are many varieties of flowers, few, comparatively, are used in flower arrangement, for the Japanese limit their choice to those with which they are most familiar, and such as are most closely associated with the different months or seasons, seldom or never using rare or unknown flowers.

A Charming Old City.

Boston Weekly Transcript.

Do you know New Bedford—that city built under the trees? Old though the houses, some of them, look to be, the gigantic trees that arch and shade so many of the streets their entire length seem centuries older. And once in a while it is your good fortune as you drive through the city, if you are mounted aloft, to get a glimpse over the high fence that surrounds one of these old houses, into a garden filled with old-fashioned flowers, and that never knew a lawn-mower, and never will while its present owner lives. And if you look sharp as you bowl along you may see seated in the garden or standing in its walks some sweet-faced old Quakeress who is almost oblivious to the outside world. Then you have seen New Bedford as it was half a century ago—but you don't need to go a dozen steps farther to see a new house, or an old house made over, that is as modern as any to be found in the country. And the hobnobbing of these two extremes, the harmony between the old and the new, makes one of the charms of this old city of the whaling industry, and the loss is yours if you don't sense it. And then drive almost as you may in almost any direction, in ten minutes from City Hall you are in the farming district—with good roads before you and the sweet roadsides filled with wild roses and elderberry bushes that are in full bloom. And you keep getting glimpses of the ocean that sends up continually cooling puffs of air that make of New Bedford an ideal summer resort; by this time you will know the quaint old place well enough to want to know more of it, and the more you do know it the more charm you will find in it.

Women Workers Displacing Children.

Popular Science Monthly.

A RECENT report of the United States Labor Commissioner, Hon. Carroll D. Wright, states that the number of women laborers is increasing, but that women are more generally taking the places of children than of men; that the encroachment of women upon the occupations held by men is so far very slight, and only in conditions where women are better adapted for the particular work in which they are employed.

"Women," he says, "are considered by many employers to be more reliable, more easily controlled, neater, more rapid, industrious, polite, and careful, and less liable to strike than men. Wyoming and Utah are cited as the only States which have laws according to men and women equal wages for equal work. There is still much economic injustice as to compensation for women's work, although some progress has been made within the last few years."

The agitation of the question of "equal pay for equal work," if it has not as yet accomplished much for the woman wage-earner, has at least revealed the fact that women as a class are not as well trained for the work they attempt as men. The number of unskilled women in all branches of trade presents a problem which may well engage the attention of the philanthropist. The necessity of earning to "keep the wolf from the door," the pleasure resulting from financial independence, and a desire to add to "pin money" have all tended to increase the number of girls and women who are seeking employment outside the home.

English Flower Gardens.

London Spectator.

THE revival of gardening is among the most interesting movements in the out-door life of modern England. It is more than a revival, for the flower garden of to-day is more beautiful and contains more flowers and finer flowers than any garden the world has ever seen. It is more permanent than a taste. It is an art well understood in thousands of country houses, not only by the servants, but by the owners.

The modern flower gardening has its "schools" in which the formalist and naturalist compete on principles well understood, and in their competition advance the common cause in the service of the beautiful. At the present moment the "naturalists" are in the ascendant. They have developed and improved hundreds of the hardier out-door plants; they have shown how and where they should be planted.

Poets Are Practical.

THE hitherto prevalent idea that a poet must necessarily be an irresponsible dreamer, incapable of entering into the sordid business of the world, is rapidly dying out, and now Alfred Austin comes to the front with the statement that contrary to this idea the great poets, as a general rule, have been and are hard-headed, practical men. In commenting on these remarks, a writer in the current number of Literature cites a number of famous cases in support of this view. "Owen Meredith" was an ambassador, as Chaucer had been before him. Samuel Rogers was a banker, and the great Dante himself was largely interested in the government of Florence. While it is true that an equal number of notable names may be ranked on the other side of the argument, it seems clear that the poets have been wronged by this common impression, and that good or even great work is not incompatible with a knowledge of the world's affairs and a capability for looking after one's worldly interests.

Imprisonment for Debt.

COMMENTING on a discussion in the House of Commons, the Manchester Guardian criticises some "new rules" relating to imprisonment of debtors.

"As Sir Charles Cameron rightly said, the new rules have greatly aggravated the condition of imprisoned debtors, and assimilated them to some extent to the conditions attending imprisonment for criminal offences. We should be less disposed to question the propriety of the new rules if the theory upon which debtors are imprisoned were the practice upon which they are imprisoned. Theoretically we have abolished imprisonment for debt; practically hundreds of persons are sent to prison every year for nothing else. In theory the law does not allow a person to be imprisoned simply for a debt, but only for his contumacy in refusing to pay a debt which he is able to pay. In practice this resolves itself simply into imprisonment for debt, for in very many cases the debtor is committed to prison without any real proof being adduced of his ability to pay his debt."

Plumage of Birds.

BIRDS that frequent the desert are often sand colored, says the Boston Transcript. Some that take shelter in the deep shadows cast by the rocks are dark or black. The woodcock is colored so like his surrounding that hunters say they detect it only by its eyes. The willow grouse, as well as some other birds, turn white in winter. The ornithologist who accompanied the Peary expedition is authority for the statement that the change in plumage of Northern birds is remarkable because in some cases so radical as to take place in a single week without moulting. In such wonderful examples of protective coloring the plumage corresponds to the color of the Arctic moss and shrubbery where the birds nest. In the case of the snow bunting the change is gradual, and is effected by the wearing off of the tips of the feathers. Nature is so fond of lavishing ornaments on birds that even those of quite neutral tint have their colors disposed in patterns, crescents, bars, or mottled effects.

THE offer of Pierpont Morgan to light the interior of St. Paul's Cathedral with electricity has been accepted, and experiments in lighting the vast building have now been made. These, says the London City Press, have proved satisfactory, and arrangements are in progress to equip the Cathedral with a complete installation of electricity. It is estimated that the cost of the work will be £5,000, which is the amount of Pierpont Morgan's offer. If, however, that sum is exceeded, the balance will be met by the donor.

THE Vienna Chamber of Commerce has petitioned for the introduction of telegram postcards and telegram letter-cards. They would be posted in the usual way, and the messages written on them would at once be telegraphed or telephoned from the post-office to the receiving-office, and there transferred to the other cards, which would be delivered with the ordinary letters.

CURRENT EVENTS.

THE street-car strike at Cleveland, Ohio, continues as we go to press. There has been violence and bloodshed, and great excitement.

THREE persons were killed, sixteen seriously hurt, and one hundred prostrated by a flash of lightning while a gymnastic and bicycle tournament was being held at Charlottenburg, Germany, on the 23d instant.

THERE was an eruption of Mount Etna, on the 19th inst. After loud subterranean noises, the crater vomited forth dense columns of smoke, which were followed by enormous masses of sand. A strong earthquake shock occurred in the morning, and was followed during the ensuing fifteen minutes by a number of other severe shocks. The damage done by the earthquake shocks was light, but at the village of Rocca di Papa, fifteen miles southeast of Rome, it was more serious. A number of houses in that place fell.

THE Homestake Mining Company has filed in the County Clerk's office at San Francisco a certificate of the increase of its capital stock from $12,500,000 to $21,000,000. Lloyd Tevis is President of the company, which has mines in the Black Hills, South Dakota.

OFFICIAL announcement has been made that Elihu Root, of New York, had been tendered and had accepted the office of Secretary of War, which will be vacated by the retirement of General Alger.

CATHARINE DILLON, of Bristol, Pa., almost on the threshold of her 107th year, died on the 23d instant. She was the widow of Edward Dillon, and was born in Ireland July 27, 1793.

THE Secretary of the Interior has disapproved a recommendation of the Commissioner of the General Land Office for the sale of all the public lands in Alabama by public auction. These lands aggregate 522,373 acres.

PRESIDENT MCKINLEY and wife will leave Washington about the middle of the present week for a short visit to the Hotel Champlain, near Plattsburg, New York.

A NEW YORK despatch says that the Lafayette Monument Commission has been advised of the approval by the French authorities of sculptor Bartlett's model for the monument to be erected at the Paris Exposition by the school children of the United States.

THE final act, embodying the conventions and declarations of the Peace Congress at The Hague, has been made public for the approval of the respective Governments. The United States will not, it is believed, give its official sanction to the prohibition of the use of the "dum dum" bullet.

A "DR." LEONARD was sent to jail for sixty days for practicing "clairvoyancy," and held in bail for trial on a charge of practicing medicine without a license at Atlantic City.

AN explosion in the coal mine of the Redstone Coal Company, at Grindstone, Pa., on the 24th instant, killed two men outright and entombed two others, who are believed to be dead.

PROF. BENJAMIN IDE WHEELER, of Cornell, at a meeting of the Board of Regents of the University of California held last week, accepted the presidency of the University, the regents granting every request and condition made by him.

—Three thousand copies have been printed of the new map of European Turkey, made at the Sultan's expense. It took twenty years to complete the task.

—Lady Shelley, widow of Sir Florence, the poet's son, has just died at her place on Buscombe Cliffe, England. Only recently she presented to the public a portion of the grounds for a park, which will shortly be opened.

NEWS AND OTHER GLEANINGS.

To London, as to almost every large city, the question of a water supply has been a serious problem. Londoners now see a way to solve it. The Engineer of the County Council has informed that body that underneath London is an immense lake, in a chalk basin 2,500 square miles in extent. The annual rainfall that sinks to this lake, 100 feet below the surface of the ground, amounts to 280,000,000,000 gallons, which would give a daily yield of 767,000,000 gallons. An artesian well has already tapped the lake at Clapham, and it is pointed out that all that is necessary to insure a water supply is to sink a sufficient number of wells. The wonder is that London should have existed for more than 2,000 years and never discovered that the great lake was beneath it.

—At the Paris Exposition of 1900, the United States Commission, under the direction of Ferdinand W. Peck, Commissioner General, will exhibit in the Department of Social Economy whatever is done by employers to improve the conditions of their working staff. The coöperation of the League for Social Service has been secured to collect material in the section devoted to "Movements for Improving Industrial and Social Conditions," Dr. Josiah Strong, President of the League, and Dr. W. H. Tolman, Secretary, having been appointed Special Agents in that Department. This material will be interpreted by means of monographs, presenting a word picture of existing industrial conditions, and will show what is being done to improve them. Photographs are particularly desired, because they will be made into lantern slides, and by means of a device will be shown in sets of four, with a fifth slide explaining in French and English the other four.

—William McCabe, a resident of Riverdale, Md., has kernels of corn which were found among others in a mountain cave of Arkansas, and said by those versed in fossil signs, to be 5,000 or 6,000 years old. John E. Burton, the sender of the precious grains, has in his office, in Milwaukee, Wis., 16 ears, in every respect like the other corn, save that the grains are much larger, and in color a dark chocolate. He raised the corn from the original seed, discovered in a cave hermetically sealed in some ancient and curious pottery.

The corn was planted in 1898, and the growth seemed to be marvelous. In spite of the unfavorable season, this ante-diluvian maize grew to the height of 10 feet, and some to 15 feet, the stalks measuring in circumference 7 inches, with leaves 5 feet long, when other grain shriveled and perished under the heat of the sun.

—The work on the Simplon Tunnel, the longest in the world—it will surpass Mont Cenis and St. Gothard—proceeds "with such speed that it is expected that the railway passing through this new opening in the Alps and uniting Italy with the centre of Europe will be inaugurated in 1904. For this event, the influence of which will be felt far beyond the borders of Italy, Milan, which will benefit more than any other town, is preparing great festivities, the principal attractions of which will be furnished by the international exhibition."

—It is not uncommon for beekeepers in Eastern Pennsylvania to move their colonies to the marsh districts along shore to get the benefit of the stores in the smartweed blooms. Some go into camp for this just as sugarmakers do in the wilds of Maine, extracting the combs day by day, coming out at the close of the brief season with barrells of nectar to be fed back, ripened and sealed over when the hives are again on the stands at home.

—A Pilot Grove dog of the field spaniel breed carries his master's bank book, with the money to be deposited each day, waits until the cashier enters the deposit, and when given the book returns home. He will deliver the book to no one except the cashier or his master.

—A College of Social Science is to be opened in Boston. It is to be free of teaching from the standpoint of authority, and is to arrive at truth rather by investigation. Another novel feature will be its position as a bureau of discussion and publication instead as a college in the ordinary sense.

—It takes the tusks of 75,000 elephants a year to supply the world's piano keys, billiard balls, and knife handles.

—Dr. Colles, an eminent surgeon of Dublin, who died in 1843, was remarkable for his plain dealing with himself. In his fee book he had many such candid entries as the following: "For giving ineffectual advice for deafness, 1 guinea." "For attempting to draw out the stump of a tooth, 1 guinea." "For telling him that he was no more ill than I was, 1 guinea." "For nothing that I know of, except that he probably thought he did not pay me enough last time, 1 guinea."

—Some say the original Shamrock was the White Clover; some the Wood-sorrel, or oxalis; some the Dutch Clover; some the Medick or Black Nonesuch; some the Buckbean; some the Water-cress. It is curious that Arabs have a trefoil called Shamrock. George Wither, in his "Abuses Stript and Whipt," speaks of the Irish people as eaters of "Shamrootes." Is not the Shamrock, here referred to, the water-cress? I find record of it as being so named.—Meehans' Monthly.

—Overripening of the cream will take from the keeping quality of butter, says Dairy Instructor Sorenson, of New Zealand. The amount of casein in the butter of a portion of cream ripened mildly in eighteen hours was 9 per cent.; in another portion ripened forty-eight hours it was 1.14 per cent. It is the quantity of casein that determines the keeping quality.

—Brooklyn's solution of her water question is the erection of a forty-eight inch main from Milburn Reservoir to Spring creek, a work that would cost about $10,000,000 and take at least a year and a half to finish. Filtering plants are also desired.

—The feeding value of any leguminous crop, Jared G. Smith says, is always greater than its fertilizing value. A greater profit can be secured in the form of marketable meat products without materially lessening the influence of the leguminous crop on the succeeding one in rotation by plowing under only the stubble.

—The largest nugget of gold ever found is the one unearthed by two miners at Hill End, New South Wales, 1872. It weighed 640 lbs. and realized nearly £30,000. The miners were living on food which they had begged when they discovered their ready-made fortune.

—An engineer says that during the last fifty years the size of steamships has been multiplied twentyfold, the horsepower employed to drive them has been multiplied forty-fold, and the speed with which they traverse the sea has increased threefold.

—William Oxley Thomas, the new president of Ohio State University, spent ten years in getting his diploma from Muskingum College, being so poor that to get one year's study he had sometimes to work three years to save the money required.

—In Westphalia there is a public school which recently celebrated the 1100th anniversary of its foundation. It was established in the year 798, as a convent school.

—Professional etiquette prevents French Judges and judicial officials from riding in omnibuses.

—Covent Garden, London, has been in the possession of the Bedford family for 300 years.

NOTICES.

* * Philadelphia Quarterly Meeting will be held on Third-day, Eighth month 8, at 10 o'clock a. m., at Valley meeting-house.

Special arrangements have been made to convey Friends to and from Maple Station on Chester Valley Railroad, a short distance from the meeting-house.

Members of the Select Meeting can take the 1.36 p. m. train from Twelfth and Market streets, on Second-day (the 7th), for Maple Station (without changing cars at Bridgeport), where Friends will meet them.

Friends residing at Germantown can take the 12.55 p. m. train from Main Street Station, making connection with the 1.36 train from Twelfth and Market streets, at Columbia Avenue Station.

Tickets are good for returning to the city on Second-day evening, for those who will take the 7.32 train from Port Kennedy.

On Third-day a train will leave Chelton Avenue Station, Germantown, at 6.56 a. m., making connection at Columbia Avenue with the train leaving Twelfth and Market streets at 7.21 a. m.

Tickets good for going on Second- and Third-days can be purchased at Twelfth and Market streets, Spring Garden street, Columbia Avenue, and Chelton Avenue Station, Germantown; and returning to Twelfth and Market streets, also to Germantown (by exchanging cars at Columbia Avenue Station). These will be issued at 60 cents the round trip.

The return train, Third-day, will leave Maple Station at 4.26 p. m. Ask for special tickets to Friends' Quarterly Meeting at Maple.

It is very desirable, and the committee hope, that all Friends who possibly can will avail themselves of the liberal arrangements thus secured,—otherwise such favorable conditions may be withdrawn.

CHAS. E. THOMAS,
EDMUND WEBSTER, } Committee.
JOSEPH W. THOMAS, }

* * A Circular Meeting under the care of a committee of Concord Quarterly Meeting will be held at Newtown, Pa., on First-day, Eighth month 6, 1899, at 3 o'clock p. m.

MARY P. HARVEY, Clerk.

* * Circular Meetings will be held at the following places:

Mullica Hill, Seventh month 30, at 10 a. m. Emma W. Peaslee, Waddington B. Ridgway, Elma H. Livezey, Lydia A. Bradway, John Bishop, Anna P. Ridgway, Joseph B. Livezey, Committee.

Mickleton, Eighth month 6, at 10 a. m. Sarah C. Wilson, Waddington B. Ridgway, Anna P. Ridgway, John Bishop, Sarah J. Powell, Priscilla M. Lippincott, David B. Bullock, Samuel Powell, Virginia B. Test, Charlotte S. Bishop, William P. Test, Committee.

Cape May, Eighth month 20, at 11 a. m. (Ocean View Station.) Ocean City the same evening. Elizabeth D. Lippincott, Henry Lippincott, Rachel M. Lippincott, John Heritage, Mary E. Borton, David B. Bullock, Lydia A. Bradway, Joel Borton, Hannah A. Heritage, Charlotte S. Bishop, Martha R. Heritage, Committee.

Alloway's Creek, Eighth month 27, at 10 a. m. Ellen B. Haines, Edwin A. Holmes, Warner Underwood, T. Eliza Underwood, Mary Robinson, Hannah B. Griscom, William T. Hilliard, Eliza G. Hilliard, Louella Waddington, Joseph Miller, Committee.

Greenwich, Ninth month 3, at 10 a. m. Elizabeth L. Engle, David B. Bullock, Emma W. Peaslee, Sarah J. Powell, John G. Borton, Elma H. Livezey, Samuel Powell, Lydia A. Bradway, Joseph B. Livezey, Committee.

The first named, in attendance, on the above committees, will please report in writing to the Clerk promptly after each meeting. The Committee adjourned to meet at "The Friends' Home," Woodstown, Ninth month 7, 1899, at 9 a. m.

* * Friends wishing to attend Quarterly Meeting at Gwynedd, Eighth month 10, will be met at Gwynedd Station, train leaving Reading Terminal at 8 a. m.

* * A Conference under the care of the Philanthropic Committee of the Yearly and Quarterly Meetings will be held in the meeting-house at Yardley, Bucks county, Pa., on First-day, Seventh month 30, 1899, at 2.30 p. m. Subject, "Temperance and Tobacco." All interested are respectfully invited to attend. On behalf of Committee.

SUSANNA RICH, Clerk.

* * The Friends' Book Association acknowledges receipt of the following additional contributions to the Beach Street Mission for taking children to the sea shore:

S. P.,	$1.00
Sarah C. Wilson,	2.50

Previously acknowledged,	$3.50
	12.00

$15.50

JOHN COMLY, Superintendent.

Seventh month 24, 1899.

Further additional donations for the sea shore outing of the children of the Beach Street Mission have been received:

F. S. Patton,	$15.00
M. G.,	10.00

$25.00

L. L. Eavenson, 1 box soap.
Lit Bros., 8th and Market, 2 bathing suits.
A. P. Suplee, 1 bathing suit and underwear for children.

Further donations will be very acceptable, as the funds are quite limited.

E. C. HENSZEY.

* * The Friends' Book Association acknowledges receipt of the following additional contributions to the Children's Country Week Association:

Marie C. Jenkins,	$5.00
Sarah C. Wilson,	2.50
Abington Friend,	10.00
Abington Friend,	5.00

$22.50

Previously acknowledged, . 145 00

Amount, $167.50

JOHN COMLY, Superintendent.

Seventh month 24, 1899.

* * Westbury Quarterly Meeting's Philanthropic Committee has arranged for a Conference, to be held on Seventh-day, the 29th, at 2.45 p. m., in the meeting-house at Westbury, L. I. Sarah Bancroft, of Wilmington, Del., will read a paper, subject "Opportunities."

HARRY A. HAWKINS,
MARY W. ALBERTSON, } Clerks.

FRIENDS' INTELLIGENCER

Established 1844.
The Journal, 1873. }

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH 5, 1899.

{ Volume LVI.
Number 31.

A GOOD WORD EACH WEEK.

XXXI.

EVERY act of worship that proceeds from the influence of Divine love upon the heart, must be acceptable to the Most High, who selects the sacrifice which He requires.

SAMUEL M. JANNEY.

From the chapter on "Christian Ministry," in his "Conversation on Religious Subjects."

THE SILENT VOICES.

WHEN the dumb Hour, clothed in black,
Brings the dreams about my bed,
Call me not so often back,
Silent Voices of the dead,
Toward the lowland ways behind me,
And the sunlight that is gone!
Call me rather, silent voices,
Forward to the starry track
Glimmering up the heights beyond me
On, and always on!

—Tennyson (his last poem).

For Friends' Intelligencer.

REMEMBER THE SABBATH DAY.

ONE of the bitterest controversies Jesus had with the Pharisees was in regard to the Sabbath. They had the day closely hedged about with rules and regulations as to what it was lawful to do and what it was not lawful to do,—rules so strict and conventional that all life and joy and freedom were crushed out of that holy day, which Moses instituted for his people as an ever-recurring season of joyousness and rest.

The centuries that have come and gone since those days when the Pharisees acted as religious dictators in the land of Judæa have witnessed many changes, theological and social, and yet human nature, withal, retains many of the features which characterized it in those years long past, and life presents many questions now, as it did then, and the controversy regarding the Sabbath still goes on.

A question which has claimed the attention of mankind through many centuries cannot be trivial, nor one to be passed by inconsiderately by any man; but, on the contrary, it is of so great importance in the formation of character, both individual and national, that it behooves every man to face this question thoughtfully and reverently, and come to a clear, firm decision regarding his attitude towards the Sabbath day.

Men are not wearying their brains now over just the same questions which puzzled the Pharisees; we are not, for instance, called upon to consider just how far it is right for a man to travel on the Sabbath day, or whether it is lawful for the sick to be healed, or for food to be prepared on that day for eating, but we are obliged to decide whether it is right to publish Sunday newspapers, whether the theatres and various places of amusement shall be opened on that day, whether base-ball and golf shall be legalized sports for the Sabbath.

To these and many more such propositions there are thousands of people, and even ministers of the gospel among them, who say—yes, let us have the newspapers and the sports, and let us give perfect freedom in our land for all people to spend their Sabbaths in those ways which will be to them most restful and most pleasant. These advocates of pleasure and misnamed liberty have triumphed in some of the European countries, and we all have read about, or it may be have witnessed with our own eyes, scenes on the continent which do dishonor to the Sabbath. Do we want to add liberty to liberty in our own country, until similar scenes shall be enacted here among us?

Each individual is created free to choose what course in life he will, but when the hour comes for him to decide on which side he will take his stand regarding the Sabbath question, let him stand still and take the shoes from off his feet, for the place whereon he standeth is holy ground; let him wait upon the Lord and pray to be led by the light that never faileth; then, surely, that light will shine as brightly as it did for Moses out of the burning bush, and the answer will come to mind which Jesus gave as a rule for all men to follow,—“It is lawful to do good on the Sabbath day.” Is it good to put into the hands of the people such literature as fills up the endless pages of the Sunday papers? It should not be called literature; it is not worthy of such a name; it is, as a rule, nothing more than trash, calculated to draw the minds of its readers away from everything to which they ought to turn their attention on the Sabbath day.

The same principle holds good in regard to having the theatre and other places of amusement open to the public on the Sabbath. Not only does this practice take away from many their right to one day out of the seven for rest and renewal of strength, but it intensifies that pleasure-seeking, trivial spirit of our age which has grown so rampant, and threatens to take away from the Sabbath all the reverence which has clothed it for ages, and which has made it a bulwark of strength for the nations. In those countries where license has taken the place of reverence towards the Sabbath day, national character has deteriorated, for character can only grow stronger and purer in man and in mankind by our turning consciously and frequently to Him from whom cometh down every good and perfect gift.

Does not the call come to the Society of Friends more clearly than to any other religious denomination, to stand firm upon the side of reverence for the Sabbath? Why upon us more than upon others does this burden rest? Because we of all people lay most stress upon the silent waiting upon the Holy Spirit; the distinctive mark of Quakerism is the doctrine of the Light within,—that the Father who seeth in secret will teach his children to know the Truth if they will but wait upon him in quietness and faith; but with all his yearning love he cannot teach and guide them when they are giving all their attention to the noisy occupations and diversions of the outside world.

Let us then, dear Friends, emphasize the truth that one day in seven is not too much to cease from business and outward pleasure and grow still, that we may receive the blessings which make life rich indeed. Let us by example, even more than by precept, show the need there is of attending places of worship each Sabbath day, of living and eating simply on that day, of giving our time to helpful reading that will open up clearer views of God and duty, of taking with our loved ones thoughtful walks in quiet places where God can speak to us through his works, and where we can draw near to him in reverence and sympathy; and of omitting no act of service which may fall to our lot to perform, which may add to the spiritual growth of even the lowliest of our brethren.

Swarthmore, Seventh month 21. E. W. C.

"TURN ON THE DARK!"

From a lecture on The Gospel of Sorrow, by Rabbi Joseph Krauskopf, D.D.

STUDY the origin of civilization and the rise of progress, and you find that both are the slow distillations from things evil, both the result of man's constant necessity of escaping the trial and tribulations of existence. Had the plan, forever proposed by fault-finders with God's manner of running the universe, been acted upon; had the need of food and raiment been dispensed with, or had they grown spontaneously and ready for use out of the soil; had human beings sprung into life, full-grown, by a process of earth-sprouting; had there never been a need for toil or sleep or night, for cold or rain or storm; had there been perpetual sunshine, perpetual flowers, perpetual singing of birds, whispering of brooks, wooing of zephyrs,—the thus perpetual-joy-afflicted man, if by any possibility at all he could have escaped being a brute, would soon have yearned as much for sorrow as the now sorrow-afflicted yearns for joy. The perpetual ease would have been the thing of evil; sorrow would have been yearned for as a thing of joy.

The getting of food is probably the most prolific source of human tribulations, yet no greater calamity could possibly have befallen man than had nature undertaken to dispense food untoiled for. There is no experience more common than that, wherever nature does most for man, man does least for himself; wherever nature does least, there man, driven on by hunger, cold, pain, exerts himself to master them, and thereby makes the largest progress. It is this fact that largely accounts for the vast difference in culture between the peoples of the tropics and those of the temperate zones; between the peoples of the New England States, for instance, and those of Cuba. It is this fact that accounts for the frequent intellectual differences between the struggling classes and the luxuriantly blessed.

Human progress, towards divine ends, is manifestly the goal set for man on earth. It is equally manifest that towards that goal he must be driven, frequently by the whip and spur of pain. Where that rod is spared, a mind atrophies, a soul dies. One of the Yellowstone Park stage-drivers speaking, one day, of the intense cold that prevails in that region during winters, told of a memorable experience he had while driving a mother with babe at her breast over one of those Montana winter roads. The woman was overcome by the cold, and gradually sank into that lethargic state that invariably precedes death by freezing. He tried repeatedly to arouse her, but failed. There was only one way of saving both mother and babe, a cruel way, but it had to be taken. He stopped his horses, snatched the babe from her arms, dragged her from the wagon to the roadside, jumped back into the wagon, put his whip to the horses, and fairly flew over the snow and ice. The mother, robbed of her babe, and left behind on the roadside, was frantic with fear and anguish. She screamed and yelled and called, but the driver laid on the whip only the more violently. She sprang up, and rushed forward as fast as her feet would carry her, but to no avail. On, on, the driver flew; faster and faster came the screaming and yelling mother behind. At last he stopped, lifted her gently into the wagon, restored the babe to her, wrapped both tenderly in his own coat. The enforced anguish and exertion had saved the lives of both mother and child. It is thus that God often deals with man. . . . We often say of a person, suffering tearlessly under some great calamity, if she could but cry she would feel better; I often see selfish and heartless persons to whom I fain would say, "If you, my dear man or woman, had but occasion to cry, you would act better, and feel better. You are too hard against human kind, because fortune deals too softly with you." That rich man's child, whose bedroom was brilliantly illumined by electric lights, and made additionally resplendent by mirrors and other shiny objects, who, suffering with headache, turned to its mother and said, "Please, mamma, turn on the dark"—that child told in its simple and childish way the method God pursues in humanizing man, in ennobling minds, and in softening hearts,—he "turns on the dark." There are hearts that, like certain plants, never flower until "the dark is turned on." In the glare of the sun of fortune, in its scorching heat, they are shriveled and withered. When, however, "the dark is turned on," they revive, they stand glorified within and under a divine radiance.

And as sorrow guides our steps and leads our hearts to our fellow-men, even so it leads us to our God. As it civilizes the mind and humanizes the heart, it spiritualizes the soul. As it roots civilization and laurels humanity, it crowns religion. . . . One hour of genuine sorrow will often lead men to the throne of God where years of exhortation utterly failed. They who never found God at their bank, never saw him in their spacious palace and garden and park, never heard him in the song and laughter of their dear ones, soon learned to find and see and hear him on the sick-bed, in the cemetery, amid the ruins of their one-time fortune. Sorrow tore the bandage of unbelief from their eyes, stripped the dross of skepticism from their souls, washed out the eyes with floods of tears, taught them to look up and beyond, and afforded views and visions such as had never been seen in the hours of joy. Like Moses, they entered the thick darkness, and found that God was there.

LIGHTS AND SHADOWS OF ALMS-GIVING.

WHATEVER issues, grave or otherwise, may claim our attention, or however urgent they may be, there is one always present and always pressing for an answer.

The poor we have with us always. No matter how prosperous the times or how abundant the means of relieving want and destitution, there are yet those who from various causes are not permitted to sit at the feast, but can only look on while others rejoice in plenty. When women and children go hungry and cold in a land of plenty, conditions are not what God intended them to be. He acts impartially, and if all his children do not fare well and receive the blessings of comfort and happiness, it is because in some way man's duty is not being performed. It is evidence that human rights are being in some way trampled upon or held in abeyance, or that there are those who have so abused or misapplied the plentiful gifts of Providence as to leave remaining nothing but the dregs of life, producing bitterness in the soul.

It is the province of selfishness to turn everything to its own use, regardless of the rights of others, thinking that this will result in the most enjoyment and the greatest success. Herein lies the greatest mistake in life. "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again," is not vindictive law, but eternal justice.

In the "City of Desolation," according to the old mythological story, a bountiful feast was spread, around which many hungry souls were gathered, anxious to partake; but no sooner was the attempt made than with whips of scorpions they were driven famishing away. They were those who in life reveling in plenty had driven the worthy poor from their doors. The Christian philanthropist to-day finds his duty to comprise much more than alms-giving. He may be open-handed, yet sadly fail in duty after all. He may "feed the hungry and clothe the naked," and yet not reach the solution of the vital question underneath, Why the hunger and the cold?

The wise physician considers the symptoms of his patient in his effort to locate the trouble. Likewise the Christian philanthropist being called upon to treat those other ills of life, observes first outward conditions, then seeks for the causes. He observes a family in want, the cause of which he finds to be a drunken husband and father; that which should buy bread for the wife and children buys drink to scorch and consume the mind and soul of the unfortunate head of the family. This failure of duty makes it necessary that the hand of charity be extended in help to that wife and those children, to relieve their immediate needs; but the higher duty is only well done when that father is returned to his family, master of himself, and prepared to meet the responsibilities he has assumed.

Our philanthropist finds another who having from some cause lost his work, and failing in finding other work, is, with his family, reduced to want. He may be able to endure want and privation for himself, but the thought of his starving children drives him to desperation, and creates grave danger of his becoming a criminal before the law. Here again there is need of alms-giving, but the higher duty, as before, calls for far more. It calls for better government and citizenship, for laws and business methods to facilitate the employment of labor at equitable wages, for an increased measure of Divine Light, and a stronger power of correct thought, for a better appreciation of the rights of others and the consistency of purpose to grant them.

It is thus soon found that the causes of poverty are complex and many. Whatever adds to the sum of human evil, does its part in degrading life and in bringing sorrow and distress to some household. The greed that gets what it can and holds for self alone, the passion of appetite that demands gratification though others go hungry, the sloth that sits idly by while the opportunities come and go and are not improved, the course of reckless dissipation that steals away respect and strength and courage and produces disease and disability, the desire to get something for nothing and to risk what has already been gained, the operation of laws and the practices of society that discount some of the attributes of true manhood or womanhood, all these and many more are potent factors in producing the conditions so much deprecated and so needful of improvement.

Experience teaches that want destroys self respect. The strife for the means of living is apt to become so urgent as to leave little time and less heart to meet other and higher duties of life. Under misfortune, thought and feeling are liable to deteriorate to a lower plane; conceptions of right to become obscured or distorted, those actions to seem excusable which in comfort and happiness conscience would quickly condemn. Thus little by little life may become embittered and distorted and its currents be diverted from their intended channels into those of hate, lawlessness, and anarchy.

Communities are sometimes stirred to their depths by some act of desperate lawlessness, and as quickly as possible enforce the most rigorous penalties of the law upon the perpetrator. They are shocked because humanity should become so depraved, and the individual alone is held responsible.

It has been said that the highest type of manhood requires many generations for its development, resulting as it does from the convergence of many favorable influences. Is the converse true, and are generations of mistakes capable of producing the monstrosities of life? Perhaps if society could honestly and impartially know itself, and could properly weigh the influences it has brought about, it would see cause for solemn thought, and appreciate as never before the responsibilities of government and good citizenship.

Our laws provide for a fund to meet the outward necessities of the poor. It furnishes some of the supplies of life to those who show their need. It is charitable on its face, but being mechanical in its methods it calls for no responsive feeling of thankfulness in the recipient. It soon becomes considered as a sort of pension, indeed, granted them because of some vague right on their part to ask it. The dispenser of this fund is almost unconsciously forced into an attitude of doubt and suspicion. Thus the helpful spirit on the one hand and the thankful one on the other are both lost in the cold business nature of the transaction.

I once saw a vine that began its growth under a newly-erected house, ten feet or more away from a small, open window, through which a little light penetrated. In its effort to fulfill the law of its existence it stretched a long, tender, translucent stem with little colorless leaves, towards this light, scarcely resembling its kind, until reaching the sun's rays it caught its color and spread its leaves, and was no longer a doubtful quantity. Could the lesson here taught be applied, the doubtful lives and the difficult problems in this higher world would cease to perplex and annoy a busy people. THEODORE P. MARSH.

Marshalltown, Iowa.

A TRIBUTE TO AARON M. POWELL.

THROUGH the INTELLIGENCER I desire, on behalf of the Committee for Philanthropic Work of the Illinois Yearly Meeting, to present a tribute to the memory of our eminent friend, Aaron M. Powell. We realize that in his death our cause has lost one of its most earnest and conscientious workers, and our Society one of its strongest and most influential members. We have recognized in him a man keenly alive to the best interests of humanity, possessing in a high degree the faculty of presenting his views with such force of reason, yet with such kindness, as immediately to arrest the attention and secure the honor and respect of those with whom and for whom he has labored, even though they were of different faith and conviction. Such men as he can speak plainly without giving offense,—an attainment that gives much greater power of shaping and correcting the thought of those coming within the radius of their influence. Western Friends who were so fortunate as to meet him and hear his inspiring words during his last visit with us and at the Illinois Yearly Meeting, will cherish his memory as that of one of the highest exponents of the Society of Friends, and they will ever remember him as a conspicuous example of the manhood best fitted to elevate the standard of life. It is not enough to know what is true and good; this must be supplemented with the power to lead others to know also, and to inspire them to weave their knowledge into life; for in this way does the world grow in righteousness.

May the life and labors of our deceased friend be an inspiration unto all of us to more earnest effort upon the lines he so ably and consistently supported.

With reverent memory,

THEODORE P. MARSH,
Chairman of Philanthropic Committee.

FIRST-DAY SCHOOL SCRIPTURE LESSONS, 1899.

FRIENDS' LESSONS IN OLD TESTAMENT.

No. 33.—EIGHTH MONTH 13.

SAMUEL.

GOLDEN TEXT.—As long as he liveth he shall be lent to the Lord.—I. Samuel i., 28.

Scripture Reading, I. Samuel, iii., 1-21.

WE return a little from the later events of the last lesson to the boy who was "lent to the Lord" for his whole lifetime. Very little detail is given of his life in the Temple. He "ministered before the Lord, being a child." He "grew on, and was in favor both with the Lord and also with men." The one event which is minutely told concerning his childhood is that of the Lord's message to him concerning the high priest. There is no picture in the Bible more familiar nor one more touching than this. Poets and painters have drawn inspiration from the story; and the hosts of the unknown who have heard it told at their mothers' knees have felt the power of it. The boy had grown up pure in the midst of evil, because the spirit of the Lord was with him, and because he inclined his ear to hear. Yet it is not true that others may not hear the same voice. He who spoke to Samuel was not Samuel's Father alone. His voice is in all ears, His light in all eyes. We may dull the hearing by directing it to the sounds of the marketplace and threshing-floor; we may fail to see, if we love darkness rather than light; but the blessing promised to the pure in heart is a promise for all generations—they shall see God. In the days of Samuel we are told that "the word of the Lord was precious," "for there was no open vision." Doubtless then as now, unusual and striking instances of the Lord's presence and power were rare, commanding interest and awed obedience; but it is plain that then as now there was scant knowledge of and respect for that "still, small voice"—that knowledge of Divine will which cometh not with observation, that light "which lighteth every man." But so close was the boy Samuel to the great Soul of the world that the Divine message came to him as an uttered speech. It came with such vivid impression that he believed himself to hear a human voice. When it was made known to him from whence the message came, and he gave it his attention, the revelation was no new one. Again, the warning so often repeated—that the sinning soul shall die. The secret sin may be unrevealed, the hidden weakness may never be known; but dry rot of the soul ends in destruction as surely as more spectacular dissipations. The doting fondness of the patriarch, which excused the open iniquity of the sons, called down a condemnation which his long service could not cancel. Yet the patient loyalty of the old man, when the doom of his house is made known to him, touches us nearly: "It is the Lord: let Him do what seemeth Him good." In such patient acceptance of punishment lie the greatest possibilities of our natures. The highest success comes from great power of accepting discipline. The Lord chasteneth those whom He loveth. It is a great mistake to think that His punishments are sent in wrath. They are sent in love.

We have noted in the last lesson the form in which the punishment of the house of Eli appeared. The Philistines were victorious in a great battle and the land became subject to them. The Ark of Jehovah was carried into captivity, and though the superstitious fears of the Philistines led to its early return, it was discredited and neglected. The feeling among the Hebrews was that their God had been tried and found wanting. In the defeat, due to their own disunion, they read the defeat of their God Himself. Unlike the aged priest, the nation did not at first accept the punishment as a righteous one. But in the end it forced them into combination under leadership. The Ark rested for many days at Kirjath-jearim without honor, while the Israelites worshipped strange gods.

Meantime what of Samuel? We know nothing of his labors during this long period. But when he reappears as an old man, we may infer from the authority he wields throughout the land that he had labored widely among his people, and not in vain. The altar where he had served was overthrown. Doubtless he had seen, with more or less clearness, that another and more permanent altar to Jehovah must be set up in the hearts of the people before there could be that unity of feeling and purpose necessary for the regaining of their independence. From this unknown period of his life dates the institution of the so-called schools of the prophets. They partook more, perhaps, of the nature of the fanatical zealots still to be found among Eastern peoples, than of that of the prophets of later times. They went to and fro among the people with musical instruments, with which they accompanied their chanting. We are not told much of the substance of their songs and prophecies. But we know that they centered about Samuel; and we may suppose that they were among the instruments he used in arousing the national spirit and religious zeal of his people.

The words with which he breaks the long silence are doubtless the words of his leadership throughout the unknown period of his life: "Put away false gods, return to the Lord and He will deliver you" (I. Samuel, vii., 3).

We are confronted at this point with the difficulties of the double narrative which is woven into one in the books of Samuel. In the seventh chapter we have an account, comparable to those in Judges, of a recall of the people to Jehovah and their deliverance from the Philistines, under the leadership of Samuel; so that "the hand of the Lord was against the Philistines all the days of Samuel" (I. Samuel, vii., 13). We are told that in his old age his sons ruled and were unworthy, so that the people demanded a king. In his denunciation of this demand he points out all the evils that were really present at the time the book was probably written, under the kings of Judah, while at the same time he yields to the wish of the people, though it is a sin, and promises them a king (I. Samuel, Chap. 8).

In the next chapter, the ninth, we are introduced to Saul, who seeks for some lost asses. He is ignorant of the existence of Samuel (I. Samuel, ix., 5-7), who, by the previous account, had judged Israel for many years, and whose home was only a short distance from that of Saul. At the same time the Lord has announced to Samuel the coming of Saul, and that he is to be the saviour of the people from the hands of the Philistines. (I. Samuel, ix., 15, 16). The proposal of the kingship comes in this account in a message from the Lord to Samuel, and not from a sinful people. The Israelites are still under the oppression of the Philistines. (I. Samuel, ix., 16; see also Chaps. 13 and 14.) Chapters ix., 1-27; x., 1-16; xi.; xiii., 1-7, xiii., 15; xiv., 46, give a connected story, which is from the oldest sources. The remaining portions are mutually consistent and give also a fairly connected account, which is, however, quite different from the other. The first narrative is spirited and alive with incident; the second is formal and lifeless. This interweaving of two narratives continues throughout the book. We will note it again in several instances; it must be kept in mind if we would weigh the account according to its true value. If any timid ones fear that the value will be lessened by recognition of the facts, they should remember that a value based on ignorance is only a fictitious value; that the only safety is in the truth—which makes free.

INTERNATIONAL ARBITRATION PLAN.

THE Arbitration Committee of the International Peace Conference on the 22d ultimo adopted the arbitration scheme as a whole. The sections relative to averting war are as follows:

Article 1. In view of averting as much as possible a resort to arms the signatory Powers agree to use all their efforts to insure a peaceful solution in international differences.

Article 2. The signatory Powers decide that in case of grave disagreement or conflict they will, as far as circumstances permit, before taking arms, apply to the good offices or mediation of one or several friendly Powers.

Article 3. Independently of this, the Powers deem it useful that one or several disinterested Powers shall, as far as circumstances permit, spontaneously offer their good offices or mediation either before or during hostilities, and that such interference shall not be considered unfriendly by the quarreling parties.

Article 8. The signatory Powers agree to recommend the following special form of mediation: That quarreling States should, respectively, choose two mediating Powers in view of preventing a rupture of friendly relations during the mediation, which is not to exceed thirty days. Quarreling Powers shall have no direct intercourse between themselves on the subject of the quarrel, which will be left entirely to the consideration of the mediator.

HUIS TEN BOSCH—"THE HOUSE IN THE WOOD."

THE Peace Conference finally adjourned on the 29th ultimo, after the various governments had signed the conventions concerning arbitration. We present a picture of the Palace in the Wood, where the Conference held its sessions. Of this palace The Peacemaker says:

It is known as the childhood home of the young Queen of Holland. It is a mile and a half from The Hague, a royal villa, erected by the widow of Prince Frederick Henry, of Orange, in memory of her husband. The interior is worthy of a visit. The dining-room is embellished with grissailles. It contains Chinese, Saxon, and Delft porcelain. In the Chinese room is tapestry of rice paper; in the Japanese room, bright-colored embroidery with birds and plants. The

THE HAGUE CONFERENCE.

Manchester (Eng.) Guardian.

ONE or two papers which are commonly thoughtful in their judgments have lately described The Hague Conference as a failure. In face of the Arbitration Project, incomparably the most important document of its kind ever drafted, such a conclusion seems particularly unfortunate. The chief difficulty to some minds is the fact that arbitration under the Project remains purely voluntary, but to make that a stumbling block is to miss the whole significance of the Project. To reject the Arbitration Project on that ground is to reject the whole of international law, which has been built up from the beginning without physical sanction. After all, is it a fair view even of ordinary criminal or civil law to say that it rests solely on a physical sanction? Surely the moral sanction

THE HOUSE IN THE WOODS.

Orange saloon paintings are by artists of the school of Rubens, the best, by Jordæns, representing the triumphs of the young prince over vice, sickness, and other enemies of youth.

This is one of Queen Wilhelmina's eight palaces. The royal family has not lived here for over twenty years. It is kept in exquisite order. It was built in 1400. The ball-room is an object of beauty with its high, vaulted ceiling.

In the famous room in which the Peace Conference is meeting, among the groups and allegorical figures, there is one connected with the Peace of Westphalia. It is especially appropriate and emblematic. It is on the entrance door to this hall, where Peace is seen entering this room to close the Temple of Janus.

"It is foolish to get discouraged because reform in a simple term does not correct the errors of generations. Like everything else, reform must have time."

is infinitely more important in upholding a law than the physical sanction. In other words, the average citizen obeys the law not because he is afraid of the policeman, but because he believes it to be a good law, if not always absolutely, at any rate relatively good. It is not unreasonable to hope that international law may develop on the same lines.

Of course the law-abiding spirit in international relations must be a growth. It is the virtue of an idea as distinguished from the mere fact that it must change and can grow; and to refuse to admit that this idea has made enormous progress at the Conference is simply to knock one's head against a wall of very hard facts. No one has ever believed that the Peace Conference would make it impossible for nations to do wrong. Its proudest boast is that it has made it more difficult to do wrong, a little easier to do right. How much still remains to be done the protests at The Hague of the Armenian, M. Tchiraz, reported by our correspondent yesterday, show only too clearly.

We can understand the bitterness of feeling which the Conference must cause in the mind of an Armenian, a Filipino, or a Finn. The Conference at The Hague was precluded from discussing the question of peace in some of its most important and most practical aspects. It had to cry "Peace" when there was no peace. All this is true, and yet one is not going to bandy reproaches of hypocrisy. There are some people whose character is so bad that their neighbors begin to suspect them of hypocrisy on the first symptoms of reform. The Great Powers are in much the same plight.

Yet there are worse evils than inconsistency, and the inconsistency of what the Powers have done at The Hague with what they have done elsewhere is not a reproach to, but a justification of, the Conference. It is a poor reason for shutting up churches on Sunday that there is so much evil on week-days. It is reserved to the forces of Liberalism in every country to make the most of all the opportunities of reform—many of them splendid opportunities—afforded by the Conference, and to see to it that the undoubtedly genuine zeal in the cause of peace displayed by all the Powers at The Hague shall not be the passing mood of a moment of repentance, but a permanent state of the political mind.

THE GRACE OF EQUANIMITY.—If one desired to commend this rare grace of equanimity, there would be no lack of argument. Its nobleness of dignity would be alone sufficient. To be serene when others are appalled, to be calm when others are excited, to be self-poised when others bend before the sudden fury of a popular excitement, to be clear eyed and steady handed when the winds rage and the foundations of the State seem to be trembling, to have the strength and elasticity of steel which bends, but does not break, and comes back to its own form when a temporary pressure passes—all this implies an intellectual and moral nobleness of character corresponding with the dignity by which it is expressed. It is at once a virtue and a grace, which might be used to justify the old contention of the Greeks that the beautiful and the good are one.—The Church Standard.

THE air from the sea of affliction is extremely beneficial to invalid Christians. Continued prosperity, like a warm atmosphere, has a tendency to unbind the sinews and soften the bones; but the cold winds of trouble make us sturdy, hardy, and well-braced in every part. Unbroken success often leads to an undervaluing of mercies and forgetfulness of the giver; but the withdrawal of the sunshine leads us to look for the sun.—Spurgeon.

THE harvest of grains and fruits is not more regular or abundant than the yield of human affections, sympathies, fellowships; but here also there are differences of seasons and of soils. We must improve our spiritual husbandry; we must enrich the ground from which good qualities spring; we must expose our inmost life to the quickening Sun.—Charles G. Ames.

FRIENDS' WEDDINGS.

The Friend.

PROBABLY in no other thing is the testimony of our Religious Society to the single mediatorship of Christ between God and men made more distinct before a witnessing assembly, than in our mode of solemnizing a marriage. A covenant performed "in the presence of the Lord" as the one Mediator, "and of this assembly" as legal witnesses to satisfy the law of the state, has an authorized and ample confirmation, to which the intervention of other priesthoods than that of the great High Priest of our profession can make no addition. They are indeed an intrusion, and a usurpation of the prerogative of the true Mediator of every covenant that is made (as a true marriage must be) between God and the contracting parties. "What God hath joined together" is a union exclusively of his, and not man's, performance. Man cannot confirm it, in its Divine relation, but it is man that can "put asunder," when out of that relation.

Thus the Society of Friends stands almost, if not quite, alone among all Protestant bodies, as being consistently Protestant—if Protestantism means emancipation from the sacerdotal system and principle. Others generally recognize and employ their pastors a priesthood for ratifying the covenant of marriage, to say nothing of what is called "Christian burial" and "the sacraments." These recognize a priestly office in the pastor. But our view of all those ordinances being spiritual allows our holy Mediator the sole conducting of them. In all Divine relations its words are: "Let nothing stand between your souls and God but Christ." This principle seems made very practical in a Friends' wedding. May it never be encroached upon or stultified in the least by aping of those modes which covet a priesthood, or an elaborate ceremony which hugs close to its ways.

HURTFUL is the tenderness of that husband whose very affection makes a drooping, dependent, clinging, characterless vine of the woman that God has endowed with a personality capable of standing by his side, equal with himself before God and man, a co-laborer and fellow-sufferer, a sharer of his joys and sorrows, joint partner with him in the work of enlarging the boundaries of life. I doubt the happy outcome of the marriage that is centered simply in the dream of two made one, with no tender concern for the world, no hope to make its woes less and its joys more by means of the proposed alliance.—Jenkin Lloyd Jones.

THE wisest people and the best keep a steadfast faith that the progress of mankind is onward and upward, and that the toil and anguish of the path serve to wear away the imperfections of the immortal pilgrim, and will be felt no more when they have done their office.—Hawthorne.

SIMPLE as childhood seems, there is nothing harder to know; and responsive as it is to every influence about it, nothing is harder to guide.—G. Stanley Hall.

Friends' Intelligencer and Journal.

EDITORS:

HOWARD M. JENKINS. LYDIA H. HALL. RACHEL W. HILLBORN

PHILADELPHIA, EIGHTH MONTH 5, 1899.

Please address business letters to "Friends' Intelligencer, 921 Arch Street, Philadelphia." Communications and contributions to "Editors Friends' Intelligencer," same address.

THE INVASION OF PRIVACY.

"THERE are—or there should be—men and women who reserve something for private life; there are—or there should be—confidences denied to the world." This commendable utterance, by a writer of note, appeared in a recent article protesting against the now too-common practice of revealing to the world, through the publication of private letters, the inner life of individuals whose expression was meant at the time only as confidences given to dear friends.

We share in this feeling of protest against the invasion of privacy, and we would plead for it in many directions. Especially the privacy of the home life; this should be jealously guarded lest its chief charm be broken. In the olden time, when it used to be said that, "every man's house is his castle," the inference was drawn that in it he was safe from enemies that would do personal harm; but a greater harm lies in robbing the occupants of their inmost thought, their most sacred confidences, and spreading these abroad as food for the shallow-minded and irreverent. Next to the individual communion with the Divine, should be the communion of loved ones in that most blessed of all institutions, the true home; and as we should instinctively refrain from intruding upon the one, so, second only in importance, should we hold sacred the privacy of the other.

In other relations, also, should private rights be respected. As Friends, we have our business meetings, and we believe there is still virtue in the good old English custom of holding them for members only. An occasional visit may be permissible from those not of the fold, but the rule of restriction is a good one and should not be lightly set aside, for, as in a family council we prize the privilege of being free from the restraint of the presence of the stranger who may not unbidden intrude, so in the affairs of the church, we can better understand each other when not conscious of the gaze of onlookers not wholly in touch with our methods, and we can arrive perhaps at a truer judgment. When the world has need of the thoughts and revealings that have been privately received, we have faith to believe that the Great Revealer will point out the way and the time, and until then let us be comforted, that there is yet a place in the world for individual and collective privacy.

WE would call the attention of Friends to our condensed report of the General Conference Committee meetings for the Chautauqua Conferences of 1900, held at Asbury Park on the 21st and 22d ult., which appears on page 613 of this issue of the INTELLIGENCER. The names of the various committees on the programs have not all been decided upon, and are therefore not yet given. The subjects to be presented, although claiming much attention, have not been sufficiently perfected for announcement. All of these details will appear later. The report of the committee on Educational Work has not yet reached us.

THE other branch of Friends' New York Yearly Meeting, has received the large sum of one hundred thousand dollars, by the will of the late John G. Lane, of Poughkeepsie, N. Y. The testator directed that the interest from the fund shall be used for educational purposes. Surely a noble bequest!

BIRTHS.

HEACOCK.—At Alliance, Ohio, Seventh month 1, 1899, to William A. and Lucretia M. Heacock, a daughter, who is named Alice Sarah.

HOGGE.—Near Lincoln, Va., Seventh month 4, 1899, to George and Gulielma P. Hoge, a daughter, who is named Rachel Louise.

LUKENS.—At Roanoke, Virginia, Sixth month 8, 1899, to Charles T. and Lucy C. Lukens, a son, who is named William Courtland.

THOMAS.—At Indianapolis, Ind., Seventh month 12, 1899, to Charles D. and Charlotte Thomas, a son, who is named Thornton Swain Thomas.

DEATHS.

BUNTING.—Suddenly, Seventh month 25, 1899, at Gulf Mills, Pa., Isaac Bartram Bunting, of West Philadelphia, aged 62 years.

CROASDALE.—After a lingering illness, at her residence in Newtown, Bucks county, Pa., Seventh month 29, 1899, Elizabeth B., widow of the late J. Wilson Croasdale, and daughter of Thomas F. and Mary Eastburn Parry, formerly of Philadelphia, in her 68th year; a member of Makefield Monthly Meeting. Interment at Middletown Friends' graveyard at Langhorne, Pa.

HOWARD.—Near Trumansburg, N. Y., Seventh month 27, 1899, Chas. W. Howard, formerly of Philadelphia, husband of Margaret P. Howard. He had been an invalid for many years, bearing his sufferings with great patience. Interment at Trumansburg.

HUMSTONE.—At Rifton Glen, N. Y., Seventh month 25, 1899, Juliette Humstone, widow of the late John Humstone, and daughter of the late Gabriel Coutant, in her 85th year.

Funeral from her late residence, 49 Garden street, Poughkeepsie, N. Y., Sixth-day, the 28th inst., at 2 p. m.

She was a member of Oswego Monthly Meeting, and one of the most faithful and earnest in support of Friends' principles. She was indeed a living epistle of divine truth and love. There was always an even temper, and a manifest confidence in her ability to do necessary things at the right time. Many have profited by her example and have learned to beware of extremes, seeking temperance in all things. Such lives bless the world and inspire others to seek the kingdom of righteousness and peace, and they show the irresistible power of spiritual impulse.

LUKENS.—At her late residence near Pendleton, Ind., Seventh month 7, 1899, Annie G. Lukens, in her 75th year; a valued member of Fall Creek Monthly Meeting of Friends.

IN MEMORIAM: MARY JANE BOND.

There are many women whose lives, fragrant with good deeds, are never known outside of their own circle, but whose example would help to sweeten and refresh the world. One of such was the dear Friend named above.

It was the privilege of the writer to know her from birth, and through all the experiences of a life so recently closed on earth. Naturally modest, sweet, and reverent, she won the love of all who knew her from childhood onward, but it was only in natural womanhood that the unusual strength and firmness of her nature were fully revealed.

Essentially womanly, she developed in her married life all those higher qualities which form the basis of a happy home, and of permanent and reliable friendships. As daughter, sister, wife or friend, her life was a consecrated one, given with rare devotion and unselfishness to those nearest to her.

When her duties to these had all been worthily and faithfully performed, she longed for a wider sphere of action, in the hope of doing more good. Failing health denied this yearning of her heart, and her wider sphere is found only in the realms of the Spiritual world. As she approached the borders of Eternity a glimpse of the Beyond seemed to open to her vision, and the exclamation of "How Beautiful!" came to the lips closing in death.

Her perfected soul may yet, by the influence of a noble life, lead others into the "wider sphere" she could not enter on earth.

LAURA LEWIS FUSSELL.

So similar in character were these two women, that what is said of the one applies to the other. In conscientiousness, in devotion, and in excellence, they were kindred in spirit, and were equally beloved. They will remain alike, each in her own circle, an exalted and uplifting memory, to lead those they loved best ever upward and onward. L.

NEWS OF FRIENDS.

THE meeting-room of the Chicago Central Meeting of Friends was well filled on First-day, Seventh month 23, by an attentive company, mostly members of the Society, and those who were in sympathy with their principles. John J. Cornell and Abel Mills were in attendance. In the one case we were invited to be more tolerant and patient with the views set forth by other; and quite as much is there a need to be patient with ourselves.

And again, we were enjoined to individual duty. One cannot do the service for another; each one is called to perform his own service. Also had the company of a woman from Oklahoma, probably of the other branch of Friends, giving largely of her experience, including mission work in the prisons of the West. In an animated spirit she exhorted all to service—along some line of duty. I would suggest, that with a company so much imbued with the principles of Friends, with more faithfulness and devotion, our meetings would grow in strength and power.

John J. Cornell has the prospect of attending the meeting of Clear Creek, Ill., First-day, 7.30.

T. W. W.

From Pasadena, California, a private letter says: The N. E. A. Convention came off in good form and the weather was fine. The membership foots up at last report about 5,000, and up to expectation. There has been a general expression of pleasure by the excursionists and appreciation of the many attentions received. Most of them have worked hard to take in as many as possible of the side trips. Our Philadelphia cottage (Elizabeth Evans's house) has been full, most of them Friends, and majority of the Mary Ward, Westtown, excursion. An Institute of Indian Education is being held this week.

EDITORIAL CORRESPONDENCE.

VIII.—MANCHESTER AND NEIGHBORS.

BY HOWARD M. JENKINS.

AFTER my visit to Ackworth I came with our friend John William Graham and his wife to Manchester, and enjoyed in their home at Dalton Hall a fortnight's visit, arriving on the evening of the 29th ult., and departing on the morning of the 14th instant. I became in this time quite well acquainted with this great English metropolis of the cotton manufacture, and with several near places of interest.

Let us first speak of Dalton Hall. It has been more than once described in the INTELLIGENCER. It is a "hall of residence," for about forty students (young men only) and Friends primarily, pursuing the general course of study in Owens College, which is one of three colleges organized as the Victoria University—the others being at Liverpool and Leeds. At Dalton Hall, besides the principal, John Wm. Graham (who succeeded Theodore Neild, two years ago), there is a staff of some six instructors and tutors, who give special instruction—"coaching"—to the students. The institution has new buildings, well adapted to their purpose, and very delightfully located in the southern suburbs of the city, in Victoria Park,—a "residence park," controlled in some particulars by those residing within it. The buildings of Owens College are about a mile away, on Oxford street, northward and nearer the city centre.

At the time of my visit most of the students at Dalton Hall had completed the year's studies, but some, chiefly in the medical school, remained. At the end of July, however, the Hall will be closed for the vacation, and J. W. Graham and his family will go to Patterdale, in the Lake Region, for their rest and outing, to resume duties in Ninth month, after the close of the Friends' "Summer School" at Birmingham.

* * *

The collegiate work was just at its annual culmination in Manchester when I arrived. The "Degree Day" of Victoria University occurred on the 1st of Seventh month, when degrees were publicly conferred in Free Trade Hall, (Manchester was the home of Richard Cobden, the great opponent of import duties on breadstuffs, etc.), before a large audience. On the preceding evening the Lord Mayor and his wife gave a reception in the noble rooms of the Town Hall, to the members of the Headmasters' Association, (the Principals of the leading schools of England), at which a distinguished company of educators was present, many of them in academic gowns, which with their various colors of material,—scarlet, purple, etc.,—lent gaiety to the crowded halls. Among the company were Prof. and Mrs. Sidgwick, of Cambridge University, the former a distinguished teacher and author, and the latter (sister to Arthur J. Balfour, Government leader in the House of Commons), well known as the Principal of Newnham Hall, at Cambridge, one of the first of the women's colleges in England, where some of our Swarthmore women graduates have, very fitly, pursued post-graduate study. Mrs. Sidgwick was among the number—six or seven—on whom Victoria University, on Degree

Day, conferred an honorary degree, and no one was more heartily received by the large audience, as she appeared on the platform to receive the diploma. She was good enough to invite me very cordially to visit and inspect Newnham, and this, I am sure, it would be a great pleasure to do.

Owens College I had the opportunity of seeing in company with one of the Governors (akin to our Trustees, or Managers), and in charge of the Principal, Mr. Hopkinson, formerly a barrister and M. P., and members of the faculty. The buildings are all comparatively new, having been built since 1870, and they are well adapted to their purpose. Two new ones are under erection, a physical laboratory which will equal that of Johns Hopkins, at Baltimore, and a great hall for Degree Day and other meetings. The faculty of Owens includes and has done so, a number of England's famous teachers and writers; among them Prof. Stanley Jevons and Sir Henry Roscoe, the chemist. The original endowment of the college, 1845, by John Owens, was £100,000, but this has been in time multiplied by eight. It has about 1,200 students, some eighty professors and instructors, and includes schools of medicine and law, as well as of arts and science. It may be interesting to medical students to know that the course leading to B.M. (Bachelor of Medicine) takes five years, and that a sixth year is required for M.D.

* * *

There are several galleries and museums devoted to art in the city. One of these is the new Whitworth Gallery (public) in Whitworth Park, not far from Dalton Hall. The collection is small, but well arranged and interesting. In the "great hall" of the Town Hall are the twelve wall paintings by Madox Brown, representing scenes in the history of Manchester. Brown was of the "pre-Raphaelite" school, and his pictures have that peculiarity of style, but they are very notable works. An interesting place is the Free Museum in Ancoats Hall, which is an educational institution, designed for popular use, and in which the collection of pictures illustrate the processes and methods of art as well as its beauties—its technique as well as its æsthetic quality—and are very judiciously and effectively arranged, and are explained by labels, etc.

* * *

But such details fail to give a true idea of Manchester. It is a city remarkable for vigorous and resolute public action. Its whole aspect and tone disclose that it is occupied and directed by an energetic community. The construction of the great ship-canal, by which the city has become a port for ocean-going vessels, is a most emphatic evidence of this energy. This canal, opened five years ago, extends along the Mersey, and enters it at Eastham, opposite Liverpool. It is 35½ miles long, and 26 feet deep, with a minimum bottom width of 120 feet. The constructors nominally are a company, incorporated for the purpose, but as the cost was seventy-five millions of dollars (instead of the estimated forty millions), the whole credit of the city had to be placed firmly behind the enterprise, or it would have ended in disaster.

Many ocean ships now bring cargoes to the city docks; the canal revenues, at first much too small to pay guaranteed interest, are increasing; and the growth of the city, which had been rather discouragingly checked before the canal was built, has been going on in recent years rapidly. Though the great enterprise entailed a serious burden, the city people declare it a work well done. Manchester, including Salford, which is essentially a part of it, now has not less than 750,000 inhabitants, and promises a large increase yet.

Not only Salford, however, but other towns and cities clustering near, belong by interest and business relation to Manchester. In this part of England five millions of people engaged in manufacturing—largely cotton and wool—are compactly situated. In the great Exchange at Manchester the cotton interests of England are represented, and on two days of the week especially—the Third and Sixth—the throng of buyers and sellers of cotton and cotton goods crowds the great hall, 200 feet long and 190 wide; two thousand or more dealers were on the floor on the afternoon of my visit.

Manchester has the air of a solid city. It has a very great capital at command, and its tradition is that there has almost never been a serious financial failure. The warehouses and banks are massive structures,—blackened as everything is in the centre of the city by the descending soot of years, and so looking more somberly serious. The system of street railways—"tram" cars—is excellent, covering the city and suburbs in all directions, is well managed, and electricity will soon be substituted for horses. (It will be, probably, the overhead trolley system, though there has been some urgent argument for underground wires.) The streets are well paved, mainly with Belgian block, and the sidewalks are mostly of flags. I am not going to say that I should like myself to live in Manchester, but I cheerfully bear testimony to the business energy and civic courage of the people who do live there.

* * *

The cathedral of Manchester is not one of the great cathedrals of England. It is one of the smallest, being only 220 feet long and 112 broad. It was, in fact, only a parish church until 1847, when it "was raised to the dignity" of its present name. Parts of it date, however, from the early half of the fourteenth century, and as we are now at the close of the nineteenth, it has what Americans must consider a fair tale of years behind it.

Near the cathedral is a most interesting old building, the Chatham College and Library. It is a typical English manor-house, built about the time of that Yorkist monarch, Henry IV., 1422-61, a while before Columbus sailed westward; and being of good stone, well laid, it has survived the tooth of time, little injured. The interior is of great interest, especially the dining-hall, and the room now used for a reading-room. Whoever visits Manchester should go without fail to the Chatham College. It is a "foundation," now, upon the gifts left it by Humphrey Chatham, a Manchester merchant of the time of James

I. and Charles I., and has been such since 1651,—a “blue-coat school” for orphan boys, who are clothed, fed, educated, and trained for “trade or business.” There is a free library, of some 40,000 volumes, regarded as probably the first of its kind.

There is, too, another old hall, not nearly so familiar as this, in Selford—which, as I have explained, is physically part of Manchester. This is Ordsall Hall, once the home of the Ratcliffes, a Catholic family, whose fortunes declined about Humphrey Chatham's time. I cannot very consistently recommend any one to spend much time reading Harrison Ainsworth's “historical novel” of “Guy Fawkes”—the story of the “Gunpowder Plot,”—but it is Ordsall Hall that is depicted in that rather lurid tale, and the description of the place is not without interest. It is of something like the same period as the Chatham Hall, and like it has much fine old oaken work in the interior. It has passed, in recent years, into the ownership of Earl Egerton, of Tatton Park, in Cheshire, who is now carefully restoring the quaint old building, the architect being Alfred Darbyshire, of Manchester, who was kind enough to call my attention to it.

* * *

The Friends have a large meeting in Manchester, and a fine, substantial house,—the largest, probably, in point of accommodation of any in England outside of London. They have a pleasant “Friends' Institute,” with reading-room and library, etc. All these are near the centre of the city, a little distance from Albert Square, on which the Town Hall fronts.

* * *

From Manchester I made visits to Southport, a seaside place which has some resemblance to Atlantic City; to Oldham, a factory town, some six miles away, but actually in touch with Manchester by fully built up streets; to Birkenhead and Liverpool; to Eccles, a suburban place where the Monthly Meeting (Hardshaw East) met; and to Knutsford, in Cheshire, the “Cranford” of Mrs. Gaskell's pen. There are Friends and Friends' meetings at all these places, except—I think—Knutsford. I may try to tell something specially of some of these visits in another letter.

THE exercise of patience involves a continual practice of the presence of God, for we may be called upon at any moment for an almost heroic display of good temper; and it is a short road to unselfishness, for nothing is left to self. All that seems to belong most intimately to self, to be self's private property, such as time, home, and rest, are invaded by these continual trials of patience.—Frederick W. Faber.

❖

ONLY a faith which is sufficient to believe beyond the seeing, and a love which is able to walk childlike and lowly with its God, are willing to acknowledge the stupendous mystery without losing their heart and trust.—Henry Wilder Foote.

❖

QUIET minds cannot be perplexed or frightened, but go on in fortune or misfortune at their own private pace, like a clock during a thunder-storm.—R. L. Stevenson.

FOREIGN CORRESPONDENCE.

II.—A JOURNEY TO NORWAY.

A JOURNEY from Paris to Cologne, Berlin, and Hamburg by rapid trains by day, even though uneventful, is still interesting. Everywhere the luxuriant vegetation of the late spring, the harvesting of heavy crops of hay, and the picturesqueness of the houses combine to capture the eye, interest the mind, and refresh the body. Northern Germany is, however, far less interesting than France and Belgium, as the flatness of the country makes more monotony. With no place at home can this flat but well-tilled country be so aptly compared as with our fertile plains of Kansas and Nebraska.

At 1.30 on the 2d inst., the tender, Blankenese, received its complement of passenger, booked for the Norway trip of the Augusta Victoria, and at 4 we boarded the steamer, and were welcomed with music and parade of officers and men in the freshest of attire. As we descended the Elbe to take the steamer evidences of the wealth of Hamburg appear, in the pretty villas on terraced and wooded heights on the one bank, and in the stacks and chimneys of great manufactories on the other.

On the next morning the Norwegian coast came into view opposite Stavenger, in latitude 58° north; and by noon we reached the pilot station at Kōpervic, where was taken aboard the pilot, who was to guide us through the Bōmme-fiord into the Hardanger-fiord, and through this to Odde, our first stop. The Hardanger-fiord makes a tolerably perfect horse shoe, at the end of the inner limb of which is situated Odde. Though the fiord here is quite narrow, the water is deep and permits the anchorage of the largest vessels.

The fine scenery begins at the pilot station, whence we sailed among many islands with rugged, rocky shores, past Hangesund, a great centre of the Norwegian herring fishing. These rocky shores, to the distant view at least, are without vegetation, except moss and dwarfed trees. They rapidly increase in height until the tops and valleys between them are snow-clad. The melting snow makes numerous cascades of great beauty. Though the shores are so barren-looking, numerous cottages and farm-houses are scattered, at places thickly, along the lower slopes and feet of these mountains. If I were asked what were my first impressions of Norway, I should say the rugged mountains, the extended snow-fields,—snow falls at comparatively low altitudes, as the mountains often do not exceed 1,500 feet,—and the waterfalls. Nowhere have I seen so many of the latter, so large and so beautiful, or so close together. Yet our own northeastern coast, that of Maine and the Canadian shores north of it, furnish a similar rock-bound country, but without the waterfalls, and at this season at least, without the snow. These falls in Norway are of exquisite beauty. So milk-white are they that at a distance they seem like long, white stretches of snow; and often it is only when we come near enough to see the moving water that their true nature comes out.

Our arrival at Odde is announced by the firing of a gun, which starts wonderful echoing reverberations among the adjacent hills. A vast difference in the passenger list has taken place since we reached Europe. Many passengers who sailed from New York were bound for various places on the Continent, and perhaps not more than a hundred Americans remained for the Norway excursion. Many Germans joined us at Hamburg, so that the German language is the one chiefly heard at present. Among the passengers in whom Friends will be interested are Edward M. Needles and family, of Philadelphia.

On the 4th instant, we went to the Buar glacier, and to the wonderful Lotefas or Lote fall. The former trip we found somewhat laborious, involving a four hours' climb over a rugged path crossed by streams which could scarcely be traversed on the stepping-stones without getting one's feet uncomfortably wet. The glacier, too, when it was reached, proved somewhat disappointing, being moderate in extent as compared with many in Switzerland.

