II. RESPONSE TO TAYLOR'S GROUNDS OF APPEAL

Standard of Appellate Review 3

PART I: NO ERRORS IN THE EVALUATION OF EVIDENCE

GROUND 1: No error in the Trial Chamber's evaluation and reliance on uncorroborated hearsay evidence 6

GROUND 2: No error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the sources of hearsay evidence 9

GROUND 3: No error in law in the Trial Chamber's approach to the credibility of witnesses 11

GROUND 4: The Trial Chamber did not reverse the burden of proof concerning material facts 12

GROUND 5: The Trial Chamber was correct in its treatment of payments to witnesses and reasonable in its assessment of their evidence 13

PART II: NO ERRORS IN THE PLANNING CONVICTION

GROUND 6: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding that the Prosecution had successfully challenged the truth of Adjudicated Fact 15 from the AFRC trial 22

GROUND 7: The Trial Chamber properly found that Charles Taylor and Sam Bockarie jointly planned an attack on Kono, Makeni and Freetown 29

GROUND 9: The Trial Chamber committed no factual or legal error in finding that the Bockarie/Taylor plan had Freetown as the "ultimate destination".... 43

GROUND 8: The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated the possibility of SAJ Musa's involvement in executing the Bockarie/Taylor plan, and that after SAJ Musa's death, Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan as contemplated by Taylor and Bockarie 50

GROUND 10: The Trial Chamber did not err in fact or law in finding that SAJ Musa's plan to attack Freetown was abandoned 58

GROUND 11: The Trial Chamber correctly considered and applied the actus reus of planning when convicting Taylor of planning the Bockarie/Taylor plan..... 63

GROUND 12: No error of law or fact in finding Taylor received daily updates on the Bockarie/Taylor plan 69

GROUND 13: The Trial Chamber correctly found that the Bockarie/Taylor plan substantially contributed to the crimes committed in Freetown 78

GROUND 14: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding that Taylor had the requisite mens rea for planning based on his awareness of crimes being committed by the RUF and/or AFRC material facts 83

GROUND 15: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding that Taylor instructed that the Freetown operation be made "fearful" and that "all means" should be used or in finding that he had the requisite mens rea for liability as a planner 86

PART III: NO ERRORS TO INVALIDATE THE AIDING AND ABETTING CONVICTIONS

GROUND 16: The Trial Chamber correctly defined the mens rea for aiding and abetting 97

GROUND 17: No legal or factual error in finding that throughout the Indictment period the RUF/AFRC had an operational strategy to commit crimes or that Taylor possessed the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting..... 112

GROUND 18: Mens rea for aiding and abetting 126

GROUND 19: The Trial Chamber correctly found that Taylor had the requisite knowledge in assisting the commission of crimes..... 127

GROUND 20: No error of fact in finding Taylor knew about the delivery of supplies.. 131

GROUND 21: The Trial Chamber properly held that Taylor's military assistance to the RUF, RUF/AFRC constitute assistance to crimes 135

GROUND 22: The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor's supplying materiel which was used to secure further arms and ammunition utilised in the commission of crimes, amounted to practical assistance to the commission of those crimes 141

GROUND 23: The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor facilitated the transportation of arms and ammunition to the RUF, RUF/AFRC that played a vital role in their military operations 148

GROUND 24: The Trial Chamber committed no error in finding that Taylor provided persons who had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes by the RUF and RUF/AFRC 179

GROUND 25: The Trial Chamber committed no error in finding that Taylor provided safe haven to the RUF in Liberia, returned deserters or other "aliens" in Liberia to the RUF/AFRC in Sierra Leone and that these actions assisted the commission of crimes 182

GROUND 26: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding that Taylor gave military or operational advice to the RUF and AFRC and that such advice constituted assistance to crimes 186

GROUND 27: The Trial Chamber correctly found that Taylor's provision of communication devices, radio training and "warning messages" amounted to practical assistance which as part of the overall operational support he provided substantially contributed to the commission of crimes..... 195

GROUND 28: The Trial Chamber correctly found that the provision of a guesthouse for the RUF in Monrovia constituted practical assistance that taken cumulatively with the other operational support Taylor provided had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes..... 200

GROUND 29: The Trial Chamber committed no error in finding that Taylor assisted crimes by providing herbalists in conjunction with all other forms of operational support he provided..... 203

GROUND 30: The Trial Chamber committed no error in finding that Taylor assisted crimes by providing medical support to RUF/AFRC members 207

GROUND 31: No error of law or fact in finding that Taylor assisted the commission of crimes by providing sums of money 211

GROUNDS 32 & 33: No error of law or fact in the Trial Chamber's findings on diamonds... 216

GROUND 35: [Withdrawn by Taylor] 222

PART IV: ISSUES RELATING TO ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN THE JUDICIAL PROCESS

GROUND 36: Taylor fails to show that the Trial Chamber did not deliberate in this case 222

GROUND 37: The Trial Chamber ensured that Taylor's trial was conducted in full accord with Rule 26bis and fundamental guarantees of due process 226

GROUND 38: Taylor has failed to show that Trial Chamber II was irregularly constituted after Justice Sebutinde was elected a Judge of the International Court of Justice 232

GROUND 39: Taylor fails to establish any error of law, procedure or fact in the Chamber's dismissal of his request for disclosure and/or an investigation pursuant to Rule 54 (Wikileaks Motion) 238

PART V: NO ERRORS UNDERMINING THE FAIRNESS OF THE PROCEEDINGS

GROUND 40: The Trial Chamber committed no error in its treatment of payments and incentives received by Prosecution witnesses..... 241

PART VI: MISCELLANEOUS GROUND

GROUND 41: The Trial Chamber properly entered cumulative convictions for rape and sexual slavery 249

PART VII: ALLEGED SENTENCING ERRORS

GROUND 42: Taylor fails to establish that the 50-year sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber was manifestly unreasonable in all the circumstances 252

GROUND 43: The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error by noting Sierra Leonean law on sentencing practice 261

GROUND 44: The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion in deciding the factors to be taken into account in aggravation 263

GROUND 45: The Trial Chamber properly weighed and rejected the evidence regarding sympathy and compassion as a mitigating factor 267

I. OVERVIEW

Introduction

1. Pursuant to Article 20 of the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("Statute") and Rules 106 and 112 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules"), the Prosecution files these Respondent's Submissions ("Response")[1] to the appeal of Charles Ghankay Taylor against the Judgement dated 18 May 2012,[2] as revised by the Corrigendum[3] issued on 30 May 2012,[4] and the Sentencing Judgement[5] dated 30 May 2012, in the case of The Prosecutor v. Charles Ghankay Taylor, Case No. SCSL-03-01-T. On 19 July 2012, the Prosecution and Mr. Taylor filed their respective Notices of Appeal.[6] On 1 October 2012 both Parties filed their Appellant's Submissions.[7] The Appeals Chamber ordered the Parties to file their Respondent's Submissions on 23 November 2012.[8]

2. Mr. Taylor ("Taylor") was found guilty pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute of: (i) aiding and abetting the commission of the crimes set forth in Counts 1 to 11 of the Indictment,[9] and (ii) planning the commission of crimes set forth in Counts 1 to 11 of the Indictment that were perpetrated during the attacks on Kono and Makeni in December 1998 and in the invasion of and retreat from Freetown between December 1998 and February 1999. Trial Chamber II sentenced Taylor to a single term of imprisonment of fifty (50) years.

3. Taylor is appealing all convictions against him and the sentence of fifty (50) years imprisonment.[10] The Prosecution opposes all of Taylor's Grounds of Appeal. None of his Grounds of Appeal demonstrate any error of law invalidating the Judgement, and/or error of fact or procedure occasioning a miscarriage of justice, pursuant to Article 20 of the Statute and Rule 106 of the Rules. Where the Trial Chamber relied only on circumstantial evidence, it reached the only reasonable conclusion available to it. Taylor's Appeal should be dismissed in its entirety.

4. Before responding to each of Taylor's Grounds of Appeal, the Prosecution makes the following preliminary submissions. The Prosecution has attempted to present a holistic and comprehensive response within the context of Taylor's cross referencing in numerous Grounds and repetitive arguments in others. To the extent possible, the Prosecution has responded with minimum repetition. Some of Taylor's Grounds fail to properly develop an issue for appeal; some references are incomplete, inaccurate or misleading. The Prosecution has noted all those it has identified. Similarly, some submissions are mere repetitions of arguments adversely decided at trial which do not warrant appellate intervention.

5. It is clear from the Chamber's exhaustive assessment of the evidence before it that the challenged findings and conclusions are right in law and within its discretion to resolve evidentiary differences and reach factual findings. The Judgement must be considered in light of this comprehensive approach and the Chamber's discretion as the primary fact finder. Taylor's piecemeal approach to the findings and conclusions do not establish errors of law, factor or procedure in regard to the Chamber's proper application of the correct law to the totality of the evidence.

II. RESPONSE TO TAYLOR'S GROUNDS OF APPEAL

Standard of Appellate Review

6. It is incumbent upon a party to demonstrate in an appeal how the Trial Chamber erred. The Appeals Chamber has repeatedly reiterated that it has the inherent discretion to dismiss a party's submissions which are evidently unfounded without providing detailed reasoning in writing. Submissions that are obscure, contradictory, vague or suffer from other formal and obvious insufficiencies may be, on that basis, summarily dismissed without detailed reasoning.[11] As the Prosecution argues below, several of Taylor's Grounds of Appeal suffer from these deficiencies and should to be summarily dismissed.

7. The standards of review on appeal for errors of law and fact are dealt with in paragraphs 8 to 11 herein as well as in paragraphs 10-12 of the Prosecution Appellant's Submissions, and for an appeal against sentence in paragraphs 196 to 197 of the Prosecution Appellant's Submissions.

[11] RUF Appeal Judgment (AJ), paras. 36-44. See also Munyakazi AJ, para. 10; Krajišnik AJ, paras. 16, 17.

8. In regard to procedural errors, the Appellant must state in what manner the error has occasioned a miscarriage of justice. Procedural errors that could be corrected, waived or ignored (as immaterial or inconsequential) without injustice to the parties are not regarded as procedural errors occasioning a miscarriage of justice.[12]

9. In regard to alleged errors in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion, the Appeals Chamber will only disturb a decision where it is established that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in the exercise of its discretion by: misdirecting itself as to the legal principle or law to be applied, taking irrelevant factors into consideration, failing to consider relevant factors or to give them sufficient weight, or made an error as to the facts upon which it exercised its discretion.[13]

10. It is well established that a conviction may be based on circumstantial evidence.[14] A circumstantial case consists of evidence of a number of different circumstances which, taken together, point to the guilt of the accused person because they would usually exist in combination only because the accused did what is alleged against him.[15] Where a conclusion is based only on circumstantial evidence, that conclusion must be the only reasonable conclusion available.[16]

11. Credibility of witnesses and the weight of the evidence is a matter for the trier of fact. "Corroboration" is not a term of art, but one of common sense. It relates to whether the trust of the trier of fact is restored in the testimony of a witness whose evidence there is reason to approach with caution. Whatever restores trust in the witness personally restores it as a whole. If independent evidence supports some aspects of the witness's account, sufficient to restore trust in the truthfulness of the witness, then the trier of fact may reasonably accept the trustworthiness of the witness's testimony in its further respects, even where unsupported by other evidence.[17] While the Trial Chamber may not have expressly defined its concept of corroboration, it is evident from the Judgement that the Chamber approached the matter of corroboration in the manner just stated.

PART I: NO ERRORS IN THE EVALUATION OF EVIDENCE

12. Taylor's contentions, set out in Grounds 1 to 5 of his Appeal, that the Trial Chamber systemically erred in evaluating evidence should be dismissed for the reasons set out below. Taylor refers back to Grounds 1 to 5 inclusive in his other Grounds of Appeal. To mirror Taylor's submissions, and to avoid undue repetition, the Prosecution will also refer back to these Response submissions, as necessary, when responding to the specific factual findings which Taylor alleges are invalidated because the Trial Chamber: based them on uncorroborated hearsay evidence;[18] failed to evaluate the motive of the source or which are based on hearsay from unidentified sources;[19] incorrectly approached witness credibility;[20] allegedly reversed the burden of proof;[21] and did not approach the evidence of witnesses who had received payments with caution;[22] which the Prosecution has dealt with in the context of the individual Ground of Appeal to which they relate.[23]

13. At the outset, the Prosecution recalls that "it is primarily for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible and to decide which witnesses' testimony to prefer, without necessarily articulating every step of its reasoning".[24] The Trial Chamber, being the primary trier-of-fact, had the responsibility to evaluate witnesses' testimony, resolve any inconsistencies and to consider whether, having taken into account the totality of the evidence, the testimony was reliable and credible.[25] The task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence at trial is primarily left to the Trial Chamber, who is best placed to assess it, including the demeanour of witnesses. The Appeals Chamber will only interfere [22] This includes those in Taylor Appeal Ground 5 as necessary.

[23] The Prosecution has considered that any reference to a Judgement paragraph mentioned only in Grounds 1-4 of Taylor Appeal and/or the Taylor Notice and not developed in the factual findings to which it relates as set out in Parts II and III of his Appeal Brief have been abandoned.

with those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous.[26]

GROUND 1: No error in the Trial Chamber's evaluation and reliance on uncorroborated hearsay evidence

(i) Overview

14. The Trial Chamber properly relied on uncorroborated hearsay evidence in making findings of fact essential to its determination of guilt. This Ground of Appeal should therefore be dismissed. As held by the ICTR Appeals Chamber, "It is well established that, as a matter of law, it is permissible to base a conviction on hearsay evidence".[27] Moreover, as will be shown, while it is not an error to rely on uncorroborated hearsay, Taylor often mischaracterises evidence as being uncorroborated when it was corroborated. Consequently, Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention.

(ii) Arguments

15. The Chamber recognised that it was required by law to approach hearsay evidence with caution, contrary to Taylor's assertion.[28] The Chamber expressly noted its practice of considering hearsay evidence with caution and outlined in detail the factors it had taken into account in assessing the probative value of such evidence[29] which were in line with Appeals Chamber jurisprudence.[30] Indeed, Taylor himself recognised that the Chamber had directed itself to approach hearsay evidence with caution, undermining his own argument.[31] Similarly, the Trial Chamber also directed itself that it must take "particular care" when relying on the evidence of a single witness.[32]

16. Moreover, the ICTR and ICTY cases relied on by Taylor to support his position[33] do not evidence a categorical exclusion of uncorroborated or unsourced hearsay evidence as a rule of law.[34] They are simply examples where the Trial Chambers concerned, in light of the particular facts and circumstances, exercised their discretion not to rely on uncorroborated or unsourced hearsay to find an allegation proven. They do not support the position that it is an error of law to do so. Indeed in eight of the examples cited, it was not only because the evidence was unsourced or uncorroborated hearsay that the Chamber did not rely on it.[35]

[34] Two of the cases are wrongly cited as they are not examples of the exclusion of hearsay evidence as the Defence stated at fn. 17 of its Notice of Appeal: Hadžihasanović & Kubura TJ, para. 272 is just a statement of factors considered by the Chamber when admitting such evidence; Strugar TJ, para. 322 is not a finding regarding reliance on hearsay evidence, the finding is at para. 324 and the fact that the Exhibit contained hearsay evidence was not the only reason it was not accepted, see para. 323.

17. Taylor extends the scope of the ICTY Prlić Decision, which held that a conviction cannot be based solely or in a decisive manner on a deposition, far beyond the principle the decision upheld, and he argues that a Trial Chamber cannot base any "directly incriminating finding" on hearsay.[36] The Prlić Decision related to a different situation, specifically, whether the transcript of the Prosecution's questioning of the accused, Prlić, when he was a suspect, should have been admitted in proceedings where he was one of several co-accused in a joint trial.[37] The Prlić Decision related to the admissibility of this transcript, and not its weight, which the ICTY Appeals Chamber expressly noted would be properly determined by the Trial Chamber when the trial record was complete.[38] As such, this case is inapposite.

18. Contrary to Taylor's submissions,[39] it is not the law of this Court, the ICTR nor the ICTY that a Trial Chamber cannot rely on uncorroborated hearsay evidence in convicting an accused. It is well established that a Trial Chamber has the discretion to cautiously consider and rely on hearsay evidence to establish an element of a crime.[40] As held by the ICTR Appeals Chamber, "It is well established that, as a matter of law, it is permissible to base a conviction on hearsay evidence".[41] As set out in the Fofana and Kondewa ("CDF") Appeal Judgment, and the Sesay et al. ("RUF") Trial Judgement, when deciding whether to convict on the basis of hearsay evidence, the ultimate issue for the Trial Chamber is whether the evidence is reliable for the truth of its contents in the sense of being voluntary, truthful and trustworthy.[42] In determining the probative value of such evidence, a Trial Chamber can consider factors such as whether the hearsay is first-hand or removed, whether it emanates from identified or unidentified/anonymous sources, the opportunity to cross-examine the person who made the statement, whether the hearsay statement is corroborated, the potential for errors of perception and the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness surrounding the statement.[43] As a result, contrary to Taylor's submission, corroboration is only one of many potentially relevant factors in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the probative value of hearsay and is not mandatory. Indeed, as a matter of law, a Trial Chamber may convict an accused on the basis of a single credible witness.[44]

19. The Prosecution agrees with Taylor[45] that corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with another credible testimony.[46] However, Taylor is incorrect when he argues that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to specifically define corroboration,[47] as a Trial Chamber is not obligated to detail every legal principle in its judgement before applying it. As will be demonstrated in response to Taylor's Grounds of Appeal detailing the specific factual findings which he argues are uncorroborated, Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error in the Chamber's approach to corroboration.[48]

20. It is abundantly clear from paragraphs 166, 168 to 169 of its Judgement that the Trial Chamber exercised the appropriate caution when relying on uncorroborated hearsay evidence. In these paragraphs, the Chamber noted its correct practice of examining such evidence with caution, recognising and expressly taking into account whether the hearsay statement is corroborated, among other factors. As recognised by the Appeals Chamber in RUF, a statement by a Trial Chamber at the beginning of its judgement correctly setting out the factors it is legally obliged to, and has, considered in relation to issues such as hearsay evidence, is sufficient to demonstrate the exercise of this caution whenever it considered such evidence throughout its judgement. Specifically, the Appeals Chamber found that the Trial Chamber in RUF had exercised the appropriate caution when relying on hearsay identification evidence and the evidence of a single witness, as it had set out at the beginning of the Judgement how it had approached the assessment of this kind of evidence in general. This is clear as the paragraphs cited by the Appeals Chamber demonstrating the Trial Chamber's correctness were the general paragraphs setting out its overall approach to such evidence rather than the factual findings themselves.[49] The situation in RUF is therefore identical to this case and so Taylor's argument that the Trial Chamber failed to apply the requisite caution before relying on hearsay evidence must fail.

(iii) Conclusion

21. In light of the above, the Trial Chamber did not err in law by relying on uncorroborated hearsay evidence.

GROUND 2: No error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the sources of hearsay evidence

(i) Overview

22. The Trial Chamber consistently assessed the reliability of the sources of hearsay evidence, contrary to Taylor's contention, and committed no error of law warranting appellate intervention.

(ii) Arguments

23. The Trial Chamber adequately assessed the reliability of hearsay evidence. Having set out the criteria by which it evaluated such evidence, the Trial Chamber made reasonable determinations of fact based upon it. It was not required to repeat the criteria by which it weighed hearsay evidence each time it dealt with such evidence in the Judgement. It is implicit in the Judgement that the Trial Chamber assessed the reliability of the source of the hearsay, as a function of circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, in addition to evaluating the reliability of the witness providing the evidence.[50] Moreover, Taylor's assertion that hearsay evidence from an anonymous source can almost never be accorded any independent evidential weight is legally incorrect.[51]

24. As the Trial Chamber correctly stated at paragraphs 168 to 169 of its Judgement, and as discussed in the response to Ground 1 above, the way a Trial Chamber assesses the [50] Contra Taylor Appeal, paras. 38, 40. The Trial Chamber applied this approach to Bockarie. Contra Taylor Appeal, paras. 40-41, there is nothing to support Taylor's general allegation that Bockarie had a motivation to exaggerate or lie about Taylor's backing. See, e.g., the response to Ground 23, para. 453 below. It is implicit in the Judgement that the Trial Chamber assessed Bockarie's reliability as a function of circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, as it did with all sources.

probative value of hearsay evidence is to evaluate all the circumstances surrounding it, which include whether the hearsay emanated from identified or unidentified or anonymous sources and the context and circumstances under which it arose, in keeping with Appeals Chamber jurisprudence.[52] The motive of any source and whether this source has been identified are but two of the factors a Trial Chamber can take into account when determining the reliability of the hearsay evidence, but, as with corroboration, are not mandatory and will depend on the circumstances of the case.[53] A Trial Chamber is not precluded from cautiously relying on hearsay whose source is unidentified if it finds the hearsay nevertheless reliable.[54] In addition, a party can challenge the credibility and reliability of the hearsay and the motive of its source by cross-examining the person before the Court. The task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence at trial is primarily left to the Trial Chamber who is best placed to assess it. The Appeals Chamber will only interfere with those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous.[55]

25. The cases relied on by Taylor to support his position do not evidence, as a matter of law, a categorical exclusion of hearsay evidence when the source is unknown or the motive of the source has not been tested separately to the probative value of the hearsay. Rather, they demonstrate that when assessing the probative value and reliability of hearsay evidence the source of the hearsay is one of the factors to be considered.[56] The cases cited by Taylor in footnote 53 of his Appeal Brief are simply examples where the ICTY or ICTR Trial Chambers, in the exercise of their discretion, have not relied on such evidence. They do not support the position that it is an error of law to rely on unsourced hearsay per se.[57]

(iii) Conclusion

26. In light of the above, Taylor has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in law in assessing the reliability of the sources of hearsay evidence.

GROUND 3: No error in law in the Trial Chamber's approach to credibility of witnesses

(i) Overview

27. The Trial Chamber made no error in law by conducting a general credibility assessment of 22 witnesses at the beginning of its Judgement. Taylor has thus failed to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention.

(ii) Arguments

28. Contrary to Taylor's claim, it is not an error of law to select significant witnesses for general credibility assessments at the outset of a judgement.[58] How a Trial Chamber chooses to organise its judgement falls squarely within its discretion. Indeed, in addition to this Trial Chamber, the RUF Trial Chamber and various ICTR Trial Chambers have also set out generalised credibility assessments relating to certain witnesses at the outset of their judgements.[59] This is a matter of style and not an error of law. Furthermore, it was not prejudicial to Taylor that 20 out of the 22 witnesses the Trial Chamber selected were Prosecution witnesses, given the burden of proof upon the Prosecution and the significance, in the Chamber's estimation, of these witnesses to the Prosecution case. (Moreover, in terms of numerical ratios, it is noteworthy that the Prosecution called 94 witnesses and the Defence only 21.)

29. The Prosecution agrees that in reaching its decision, the Chamber was required to evaluate the credibility of all witnesses, whether or not the parties raised specific challenges to their credibility. The Chamber's generalised credibility assessments of 22 significant witnesses at the outset of its Judgement, however, did not violate this requirement.[60] The justification for this Ground of Appeal is unclear, since the Chamber, having made general credibility findings with respect to these witnesses, nevertheless found certain of them to be unreliable in relation to the proof of specific facts.[61] It was unnecessary in such cases for the Chamber to revisit its generally favourable assessment of the witnesses' credibility.[62] Moreover, in light of the Chamber's findings of unreliability in relation to specific events,

See, in particular, Taylor's reference to the fact that having found TF1-371 a generally credible witness and having relied extensively on his evidence, the Chamber found it was unable to accept his evidence as proving certain allegations beyond doubt, for example Gullit's presence at a meeting in December 1998 (Taylor Appeal, para. 51).

Taylor's argument that the general credibility categorisations were as a rule dispositive is untenable.

30. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber did not err by failing to revisit its "generally credible categorization" for witnesses it found to be unreliable in respect of specific events.[63] The law is clear: a Chamber can find a witness credible on some aspects of his testimony and not others.[64] The fact that a Trial Chamber does not believe a witness in respect of one aspect of his testimony does not mean that it should reject all of his testimony, or that it should "re-evaluate" its assessment of credibility in light of any negative findings.

(iii) Conclusion

31. In light of the above, the Trial Chamber did not err in law in its approach to the credibility of witnesses.

GROUND 4: The Trial Chamber did not reverse the burden of proof concerning material facts

(i) Overview

32. The Trial Chamber applied the criminal standard and incidence of proof correctly, and did not reverse the burden of proof concerning any material facts. Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention. This issue is also addressed in the response to Ground 9 below.

(ii) Arguments

33. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Chamber did not reverse the burden of proof in relation to any of Taylor's convictions.

34. First, Taylor often misunderstands or misinterprets the Trial Chamber's language and cites it out of context. As the ICTR Appeals Chamber has held, in determining whether or not a Trial Chamber reversed the burden of proof, the impugned language must be put or read in its proper context.[65]

35. Moreover, contrary to Taylor's claim, language used in a judgement is not the only way to determine whether the Judges applied the correct burden of proof.[66] Rather, it is only the starting point of any such analysis.[67]

[67] Musema AJ, para. 209.

36. As the ICTR Appeals Chamber has held in the context of alibi evidence, language which on its face implies that the Chamber shifted the burden of proof, while inappropriate, is generally not fatal when viewed in the broader context of a Trial Chamber's findings. This is especially the case where the Trial Chamber accurately refers elsewhere in the Judgement to the appropriate burden of proof.[68] Consequently, Taylor's contention that the use of inappropriate language automatically reflects that the Trial Chamber has reversed the burden must be rejected. To the contrary, the Trial Chamber's findings must be viewed in their totality. Moreover, before any such analysis is embarked upon, the Appeals Chamber must be certain that the language referred to is actually inappropriate, as often it is not, as will be shown in response to each time the Defence raises this issue set out below. To this end, the Prosecution recalls that the Chamber did correctly set out the burden of proof at paragraphs 158 to 159 of its Judgement.

(iii) Conclusion

37. In light of the above, the Trial Chamber did not err in law in its approach to the burden of proof.

GROUND 5: The Trial Chamber was correct in its treatment of payments to witnesses and reasonable in its assessment of their evidence

(i) Overview

38. Taylor erroneously alleges that payments to witnesses TF1-360, TF1-362, TF1-532, TF1-337, TF1-334, TF1-579 and TF1-274 required the Trial Chamber to automatically view their evidence with caution,[69] and that, because it did not, every factual finding that relies on these witnesses should be rendered invalid in whole or in part.[70]

39. As the cases cited by Taylor show, when assessing credibility, the ad hoc courts have considered payments on a case-by-case assessment as one of several factors that might render a witness's testimony unreliable. In keeping with these cases, the Taylor Trial Chamber consistently and carefully considered payments and/or benefits to each of these witnesses as one of several factors in its credibility assessments. The Trial Chamber then appropriately exercised its discretion and reasonably found six of these seven witnesses to be generally credible.[71] Moreover, the so-called uncorroborated factual findings which Taylor alleges should be overturned are in large part corroborated, often explicitly in the very paragraphs that he states are unsafe. For all of these reasons, this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

(ii) The Trial Chamber was correct in law when it addressed witness payments as one of several factors that could potentially affect credibility

40. Taylor incorrectly argues that the Chamber erred in law by disregarding the alleged principle that substantial payments to witnesses, in itself, automatically requires that their testimony be treated with caution.[72] The ICTY and ICTR cases he cites[73] actually show that caution was applied not to receipt of payments and/or benefits per se, but as a result of the Trial Chambers' careful analyses of numerous factors that could affect the witnesses' credibility, with receipt of payments and/or benefits one of the several factors considered.[74]

41. Taylor's assertion that the Trial Chamber should not have "subjectively" determined the extent to which payments and benefits "coloured the testimony" of the witnesses at issue[75] ignores the fact that witness credibility assessments involve numerous "subjective" determinations fully within the Trial Chamber's discretionary power. Such determinations include whether a witness's demeanour during testimony indicated truthfulness, the plausibility and clarity of the witness's testimony, and whether the witness had any motivations to lie.[76] Thus the "subjective" determination regarding whether payments and benefits affected a witness's credibility is properly within the Chamber's discretion. The jurisprudence recognises that the Trial Chamber enjoys an advantage by seeing and hearing the witnesses as they testify and so is best placed to determine issues of credibility.[77] The Appeals Chamber will therefore defer to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence, interfering only where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous.[78] Here, no such error was made.

42. The Taylor Trial Chamber properly followed the procedure adopted by the Chambers in the cases cited by Taylor and followed by Trial Chamber I in RUF.[79] The Trial Chamber expressly considered the allegations of "improper incentives" for witness testimony and noted that the issue was raised by the Defence in its motions, Final Trial Brief, Closing Arguments and during cross-examination.[80] It took into account whether the benefits conferred went beyond that which was "reasonably required" as well as the cost of living in West Africa and station in life of the witness receiving the payment.[81] As demonstrated below, for each witness at issue, the Trial Chamber thoroughly explained its case-by-case credibility analysis, expressly considering the evidence of payments and any personal interest factors that may have influenced the witness's motivation to tell the truth. It also considered other factors that might impact the reliability of their evidence, including whether or not the witnesses were accomplices, the source of their evidence, and consistency in light of the extensive cross-examination to which each of these witnesses was subjected.[82] For example, Mongor's cross-examination took place over six days and covered 546 pages of the trial transcript.[83]

43. Only after considering all of the relevant factors did the Trial Chamber determine that the evidence of some witnesses for both the Prosecution and Defence should be treated with caution.[84] The Trial Chamber properly exercised its discretion after carefully considering all of the factors that might prevent the witnesses from testifying truthfully. It simply did not find that payments and other factors relating to the witnesses at issue (except for TF1-579) rose to a level that warranted their evidence to be treated with caution.

44. When assessing Perry Kamara's credibility (TF1-360), the Chamber considered the detail of his evidence, his demeanour and the consistency between his evidence-in-chief and cross-examination.[85] The Chamber extensively addressed issues the Defence had raised in connection to Kamara, including payments he had been given by the Prosecution.[86] After detailed analysis and consideration of the totality of the evidence, the Chamber determined that Kamara was a generally credible witness, but noted aspects of his testimony that it would not rely upon because of credibility issues relating to those specific parts.[87] The Chamber properly assessed Kamara's evidence and, in effect, treated portions with caution.[88]

45. The Prosecution notes that the issue of benefits relating to witnesses TF1-362 and TF1-532 (Isaac Mongor) were not included in Taylor's Notice of Appeal for this Ground[89] and should therefore be dismissed. However, should the Appeals Chamber elect to consider these benefits, the Prosecution now addresses how the Trial Chamber treated their evidence. The Chamber considered numerous factors relating to TF1-362's credibility, including the witness's candour and detailed testimony, the explanations the witness gave for inconsistencies and why the witness had initially lied to the Prosecution.[90] It also comprehensively addressed the matter of benefits received, including the examples Taylor cited[91] which the Defence had already raised along with other allegations in its Contempt Motion.[92] The Chamber explicitly stated that in its view, the Defence had not established any impropriety with regard to the support the Prosecution gave the witness.[93] All of this demonstrates that the Chamber carefully assessed the reliability of TF1-362's evidence, properly exercised its discretion to reasonably conclude that the witness was generally credible[94] and thus, the testimony did not warrant caution.

46. In assessing Mongor's credibility, the Trial Chamber had the benefit of extensive cross-examination. It also carefully considered Mongor's immunity letter from the Prosecution, as well as his explanation as to why he was not fully forthcoming about Taylor's involvement in the Freetown invasion in initial interviews,[95] both of which were issues that had been raised by the Defence in its Final Brief.[96] The Chamber specifically stated that it accepted Mongor's testimony that he did not testify for monetary gain.[97] Only after considering all of these factors did the Chamber conclude that his evidence did not require cautious treatment.

47. The Trial Chamber closely considered the Defence attacks on payments made to Mustapha Mansaray (TF1-337) or on his behalf[98] as well as Mansaray's detailed and forthright testimony when recounting the payments he received. It also noted that he provided consistent information throughout the interview process.[99] After weighing all of these factors, the Chamber acted within its discretion in concluding that the Defence had not established any impropriety regarding the support provided to the witness and his family.[100]

48. The Trial Chamber noted that Alimamy Bobson Sesay (TF1-334) provided coherent and detailed testimony and was generally consistent.[101] It considered his testimony on cross-examination about payments he received and noted that he was forthright and candid when questioned on the matter. It then concluded that the payments were not unreasonable, nor did they appear to influence Bobson Sesay's testimony.[102] The Chamber also considered the witness's involvement in numerous, serious crimes but noted his candour about his complicity and a lack of motivation to lie. After considering all of these factors, the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in finding Bobson Sesay to be generally credible.[103]

49. Taylor has curiously included TF1-579 in this Ground of Appeal, alleging that the Trial Chamber should have automatically treated his evidence with caution because of payments and/or benefits.[104] In fact, the Trial Chamber held that his testimony must be considered with caution and could not be relied upon without corroboration, then acted accordingly.[105] While payments were not amongst the specific reasons cited as to why caution should be applied, the Chamber noted questions about his payments and considered it as one of the factors in his credibility assessment before reaching its conclusion.[106] Taylor fails to show how the Chamber's cautious treatment of TF1-579's evidence renders the findings reliant upon his evidence invalid.

50. For Dauda Aruna Fornie (TF1-274), the Chamber addressed each of the numerous issues the Defence raised in its Final Brief regarding his evidence such as inconsistencies and misidentification,[107] as well as payments, demonstrating it had carefully considered all factors that might impact his credibility.[108] The Chamber also cited to testimony adduced in cross-examination showing the nature of the payments.[109] Acting within its discretion, the Trial Chamber found that the payments did not appear to be unreasonable, nor did they influence Fornie's testimony.[110]

51. The Trial Chamber correctly and carefully analysed all of the relevant factors which might affect the credibility of each witness at issue. It then acted within its discretion in determining not to treat their evidence with caution, except for TF1-579, whose evidence was treated with caution. This determination was within its discretion, reasonable and should be given deference by the Appeals Chamber.

(iii) The Trial Chamber's factual findings should not be overturned

52. Taylor erroneously alleges that the Trial Chamber failed to treat the evidence of the witnesses at issue with any caution despite the payments and/or benefits they received.[111] As discussed above, the Chamber was thorough and reasonable in making its credibility assessments, and, indeed, did treat the evidence of TF1-579 with caution. Just because the Chamber did not use the words that this evidence had to be treated "with caution" in relation to the other witnesses does not mean it accepted everything they said without scrutiny. In its Judgement the Chamber consistently evaluated the detail, quality and circumstances of their evidence, looking for corroboration and considering the totality of the evidence when evaluating whether particular evidence was reliable. In some cases, it concluded it was not.[112]

Mongor's source was second-hand, and the Trial Chamber deemed his account on that point to be inaccurate); 4169, 4171 (because TF1-362's evidence was "vague and inconsistent" and contradicted the evidence of TF1-371, the

The Chamber acted as a reasonable fact finder both when it assessed the credibility of these witnesses and when it cautiously assessed the evidence that they gave.[113]

53. Taylor erroneously analogises this case to Nchamihigo[114] to support his assertion that the findings relating to the witnesses who received what he—not the Trial Chamber—deems "substantial" payments are unsafe and should be reversed in whole or in part because the Chamber did not exercise "any" caution.[115]

54. Taylor's reliance on Nchamihigo is misplaced. As discussed above, there is no principle on par with accomplice evidence that payments per se mean a Chamber must treat a witness's evidence with caution. Further, as Judge Pocar rightly pointed out in his Partly Dissenting Opinion, it was unwise for the Appeals Chamber to conduct a de novo assessment of the accomplice witness's credibility without having heard his testimony. Judge Pocar called this an "incorrect intrusion" on a prudent and cautious and therefore correctly made assessment by the Trial Chamber. As such, it violated the appellate standard of review that accords deference to a Trial Chamber's credibility assessment.[116]

55. The Prosecution recalls that it is within a Trial Chamber's discretion to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, witness testimony.[117] Even uncorroborated accomplice evidence may be relied upon, provided such evidence was first considered cautiously.[118] The Prosecution notes that Taylor has merely listed witnesses of "doubtful credibility" and enumerated paragraphs which purportedly erroneously rely on these witnesses.[119] This is insufficient to substantiate an error of the Trial Chamber.[120] Nonetheless, a close examination of the alleged "uncorroborated" findings Taylor lists in footnote 140 of his Appeal Brief actually shows how cautious the Trial Chamber was in its assessment of the evidence. Most of the evidence in the paragraphs cited is either corroborated, often explicitly in the very paragraph Taylor states is unsafe, or demonstrates that the Chamber first looked for factors that would indicate veracity before it relied on such evidence.[121] The Prosecution notes that Taylor cites no uncorroborated findings for TF1-337 or TF1-579.[122]

[121] Perry Kamara (TF1-360): Corroborated by other witnesses within the para. range: Judgement, paras. 2626, 3394-97, 3399-3401, 3404, 3408-09 (see also para. 3410 showing additional corroboration), 3413, 3416-17, 3445, 3449-50, 3664-66 (also corroborated by evidence in paras. 3654-63), 5587-88, 5591, 5718. Findings based on evidence discussed in other paras., not just Kamara's evidence: Judgement, paras. 2629 (see paras. 2621-28), 3481-86 (see paras. 3394-3480), 5593 (see paras. 5581-92), 5719-21 (see paras. 5706-18). Paras. relating to the External Delegation showing that Kamara's evidence was corroborated by Kallon, Musa, TF1-168 and others: Judgement, paras. 6183-87, 6189, 6191-92 (as mentioned above in fn. 112, Kamara's evidence on one aspect was not relied upon in light of more direct evidence). TF1-362: Here, the Trial Chamber evaluated the nature of the evidence and indicators that it was truthful before relying on the evidence. Judgement, para. 5717 refers back to the earlier finding at para. 1424 that previously found TF1-362's account of the training of children at various bases in Sierra Leone was credible. The previous finding referenced in para. 1424 refers to para. 1377, which notes that TF1-362's evidence about the training of children at Bunumbu was "first-hand" and "unequivocal". The other para. 5717 finding (re. Yengema) refers back to the finding at para. 1694, which is premised on the evidence stated in paras. 1692-93. Although not specifically corroborated as to location, it is corroborated by the totality of the evidence that civilians died during training and those who attempted to escape were killed. Isaac Mongor (TF1-532): Corroborated by other witnesses within the para.: Judgement, paras. 3125, 3399, 3664, 5587-88, 5591, 6792. Findings based on evidence discussed in other paras., not just Mongor's evidence: Judgement, paras. 3129-30 (see paras. 3089-3128), 3481-86 (see paras. 3394-3480), 3665-66 (see paras. 3654-64), 5593 (see paras. 5581-92). Judgement, para. 3383 is a recitation of Mongor's evidence that should be read with paras. 3379-93, which support the para. 3393 finding. Judgement, para. 3447 should be read with paras. 3445-48, which show corroboration of Mongor's evidence by eight other witnesses. Alimamy Bobson Sesay (TF1-334): Three of the challenged findings do not rely on TF1-334's evidence: Judgement, paras. 4579 (see paras. 4566-4573), 4583 (see paras. 4574-78), 5666 (see paras. 5660-65). Corroborated by other witnesses: Judgement, paras. 3394-96, 3398, 3400-01, 3403-04, 3462 (corrob. in part by Kamara; note, however, that Kamara's evidence was deemed to be more direct and his evidence was accepted in regard to Bockarie being the one who gave the order); 4388-93, 4556-60, 4562-64, 4581-82, 5581-86 (see also paras. 5587-93 which show further corroboration), 5652-59 and 5667 and 5711 (must be read with paras. 5709-10 as well as 3465-77 which show that his evidence was compatible with the totality of the evidence the Chamber had earlier accepted), 5718 (must be read with paras. 1157-63 showing corrob. in part by TF1-375, Kamara and TF1-029), 6344 (must be read with paras. 6340-43 which support that Taylor did have influence on the AFRC and RUF, also corrob. in part by Exh. D-24). Findings based on evidence discussed in other paras., not just Bobson Sesay's evidence: Judgement, paras. 3481-86 (see paras. 3394-3480), 4394-96 (see paras. 4365-93), 6345 (see paras. 6340-44). Findings which discuss additional indicators of truthfulness that the Chamber considered in relation to Bobson Sesay's evidence: Judgement, paras. 4562-65 and 4581-82 (see particularly para. 4565, the Chamber evaluated the quality of the evidence and declined to rely on it to determine the impact the SLA men had on the commission of crimes in Kono), 5581-93 (particularly paras. 5582-85), 5652-59 and 5667 (see particularly para. 5654 which considered Defence allegations and para. 5656-57); 5713 (the Chamber did not rely on this aspect of his evidence); 6343. Dauda Aruna Fornie (TF1-274): Corroborated by other witnesses within the para. range: Judgement, paras. 2626; 2765 and 2769 (must be read with paras. 2754-68); 3384 (must be read with para. 3385, partly corrob.); 3394-3400; 3405, 3410 and 3413 (must be read with paras. 3403-04 and 3411 which show corrob. in part); 3416-18; 3419 (must be read with subsequent paras. incl. 3420); 3445-47; 3449; 3456 (must be read with paras. 3454-57); 3554-56; 3801, 3804-05 (must be read with paras. 3783-3803, which show extensive corroboration); 3936-37, 5325, 5330 (must be read with paras. 5312-30); 4612-13 (must be read with paras. 4614-15); 4800, 4802 (must be read with paras. 4789-4801, and the Arms and Ammunition section, esp. re. the Burkina Faso shipment evidence, all of which corroborate that Taylor did what he could to support the RUF even if he did not have much ammunition); 5587-88, 5591, 5593 (must be read together). Findings based on evidence discussed in other paras., not just Fornie's evidence: Judgement, paras. 2629 (see paras. 2621-28); 3481-86 (see paras. 3394-3480); 3606 and 5126 (see paras. 3554-64 and 3568-72); 3609 (see paras. 3586-91). Judgement, paras. 3440-42 analyse the reliability of Fornie's evidence in light of allegations raised by the Defence as discussed in para. 3438; the Chamber made no specific finding from Fornie's evidence and in para. 3444, stated it would consider the general evidence in the context of specific orders Bockarie allegedly made). The Chamber was cautious with Fornie's evidence re. communication with Yeaten and Taylor during the Freetown operation (see Judgement, paras. 5122-29) before making its findings at Judgement, paras. 5126, 5128 and 5130.

[122] Taylor Appeal, fn. 140.

(iv) Conclusion

56. The Chamber acted within the proper exercise of its discretion in conducting careful credibility assessments of witnesses TF1-360, TF1-362, TF1-532, TF1-334, TF1-274, TF1-337 and TF1-579, which included considering payments as one of numerous factors that could potentially impact their credibility. Taylor has failed to demonstrate a legal error or that the Trial Chamber was unreasonable in its assessments. Further, the findings are well corroborated and reliable due to other factors that show cautious treatment of the evidence. For all of these reasons, the Appeals Chamber should defer to the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence as no basis has been established to overturn the factual findings which rely in whole or in part on these witnesses.

PART II: NO ERRORS IN THE PLANNING CONVICTION

57. The Trial Chamber correctly convicted Taylor of planning the crimes committed during the late 1998 attacks on Kono and Makeni and during the invasion of and retreat from Freetown as a result of a proper application of the law to its reasonable factual findings.

58. Taylor's three broad challenges to his planning conviction focus on the Trial Chamber's alleged misunderstanding of the actus reus of planning, its alleged factual errors concerning whether the "Bockarie/Taylor plan" was actually carried out and its alleged failures to find that Taylor had the requisite mens rea. These challenges are without merit. They are based on an erroneously narrow view of the applicable law and a fragmented view of the facts. Taylor seeks to impermissibly relitigate arguments made and rejected at trial and to substitute alternative interpretations of the evidence.[123] In the context of the Sierra Leonean conflict,[124] the Trial Chamber correctly and reasonably found that the "Bockarie/Taylor plan" was criminal[125] involving the commission of the crimes charged in Counts 1-11 of the Indictment.[126]

[123] Taylor Appeal, paras. 78-82. In para. 78, Taylor states there "two overarching errors". However, it is clear from paragraphs 79 to 82 that three criticisms are made.

[124] See the responses to Grounds 11, 15 below for a full discussion of the particular meaning of the terms "fearful" and "all means" in the Sierra Leonean conflict.

[125] As discussed more fully in the response to Ground 11 below, an accused need only design an act or omission and not necessarily a crime or underlying offence per se if he has the intent that a crime or underlying offence be committed in the execution of the plan, or if he is aware of the substantial likelihood that a crime or underlying offence will be committed (see Judgement, fn. 1105; Kordić & Čerkez AJ, paras. 31, 976). The objective of a plan is irrelevant if it is to be achieved by an act that constitutes a crime, or if an accused is aware of the substantial likelihood a crime will be committed in achieving the plan (see Boškoski & Tarčulovski AJ, paras. 169-172; Kordić & Čerkez AJ, paras. 26, 30). As discussed in the response to Grounds 14 and 15, an accused must have directly intended that crimes be committed pursuant to the plan, or must have been aware of the

GROUND 6: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding that the Prosecution had successfully challenged the truth of Adjudicated Fact 15 from the AFRC trial

(i) Overview

59. Taylor has failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred in law or in fact when it found that the Prosecution had successfully challenged the truth of Adjudicated Fact 15[127] with credible and reliable evidence. This Ground of Appeal should therefore be dismissed.

(ii) Taylor distorts the meaning of Adjudicated Fact 15

60. Taylor's submissions attempt to expand the meaning of Adjudicated Fact 15 far beyond any reasonable interpretation to mean that "the RUF had not been part of the AFRC operation in Freetown of January 1999."[128] Taylor cites to paragraphs from the AFRC and RUF Trial Judgements that are not part of the evidence in this case to support his position. Nowhere in the AFRC Adjudicated Facts Decision or at any other time in the Taylor trial, did the Trial Chamber find that the RUF was not part of the January 1999 Freetown invasion. In fact, after the AFRC Adjudicated Facts Decision, the Defence made the same incorrect arguments about Adjudicated Fact 15 in its Rule 98*bis* Motion,[129] arguments contested by the Prosecution[130] and rejected by the Trial Chamber in its Rule 98*bis* Decision of 4 May 2009. In that Decision, the Chamber did not dismiss any of the charges against Taylor related to the 1999 attack on Freetown.[131] Thus, over two months before the start of the Defence case, Taylor was again on notice that, despite his inaccurate interpretation of Adjudicated Fact 15, his responsibility for the Freetown invasion was still a very live issue in the case.

61. Moreover, this inaccurate interpretation of Adjudicated Fact 15 is inconsistent with Agreed Fact 31, never withdrawn by the Defence, that "[O]n or about 6 January 1999, inter alia, RUF and AFRC forces attacked Freetown."[132] Taylor is now taking a position contrary to the Agreed Fact which was operative throughout the trial and before the Trial Chamber at the time it wrote the Judgement.

substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed in the execution of that design (see Judgement, para. 469(ii), Kordić & Čerkez AJ, paras. 29, 31; Nahimana AJ, para. 479).

[126] Taylor's challenges to the Trial Chamber's factual findings are baseless for the reasons more fully discussed in the response to Grounds 6-15 below.

62. In his Reply to Prosecution Response Regarding AFRC Adjudicated Facts, Taylor noted that:

> ... a certain volume of evidence has already been led in respect to the issues contained in the proposed adjudicated facts. This evidence could be used to challenge any rebuttable presumption created. Therefore, the Prosecution is not prejudiced by the admission of these facts even though it has essentially closed its case.[133]

63. Thus, Taylor's current argument that the Trial Chamber improperly relied on evidence from the Prosecution case is exactly contrary to what he argued in convincing the majority of the Trial Chamber to take notice of Adjudicated Fact 15. Indeed, his concession in the Reply makes clear that his current arguments that he was deprived of any notice that Adjudicated Fact 15 was in issue,[134] and that the Prosecution first challenged it in its Closing Brief, [135] are mistaken and provide no basis for any claim of prejudice.

64. Contrary to Taylor's current position,[136] the Prosecution did not wait until its Closing Brief to challenge Adjudicated Fact 15. The Prosecution put Taylor on notice that it objected from the outset by opposing the Defence Motion seeking its admission as it was central to the charges against Taylor and because there was already contrary evidence on the record.[137] Throughout the trial, the Prosecution continued to challenge any suggestion that the RUF played no role in the Freetown invasion, including in the evidence it introduced in its case-in-chief, its Response to the Defence Rule 98*bis* Motion[138] and the cross-examination of Defence witnesses on the involvement of the RUF in the Freetown invasion.[139] The Prosecution's submissions in its Closing Brief simply summarised its position.

65. Facts judicially noticed under Rule 94(B) are only presumptions that may be rebutted by the introduction of credible and reliable evidence at trial.[140] An adjudicated fact is not irrebuttable proof of a fact as seems to be implied by Taylor.[141] Rather, it is a time-saving measure that simply relieves the moving party of the initial burden to provide evidence on the point, but does not prove the point over contrary evidence.[142]

66. Admission of adjudicated facts from previous proceedings does not affect the Chamber's function of assessing their relevance and weight in light of the totality of the evidence in the trial.[143] Facts that are judicially noticed are accepted conditionally and:

> remain to be assessed by the Trial Chamber to determine what conclusions, if any, can be drawn from them when considered together with all the evidence brought at trial. The Rule 94 (B) mechanism does not allow a Trial Chamber to simply defer to the assessment of the evidence by another Chamber on the ground that this mechanism was fashioned to favour consistency and uniformity in the Tribunal's case-law.[144]

67. Indeed, Taylor himself recognised this in his Reply to Prosecution Response Regarding AFRC Adjudicated Facts in the first place, noting that "[a] presumption of accuracy for adjudicated facts is only one more factor to consider when weighing all the evidence at the conclusion of the case."[145] Consequently an adjudicated fact can be challenged by evidence admitted before judicial notice was taken. By taking judicial notice of an adjudicated fact after the close of the Prosecution case, the Trial Chamber was therefore not rejecting the relevant Prosecution evidence that had been brought as Taylor suggests.[146]

68. Critically, as stated above, Taylor expressly recognised before the Chamber took notice of Adjudicated Fact 15 that the Prosecution had previously led contrary evidence,[147] and that this evidence from the Prosecution case could be used to challenge the Adjudicated Fact, notwithstanding that it had been led prior to judicial notice being taken.[148] Therefore, Taylor's current position that the Prosecution could only challenge it by calling evidence after judicial notice, contradicts what he argued in order to gain admission of the Adjudicated Fact.[149]

69. Taylor relies on the pronouncement by the Trial Chamber in its AFRC Adjudicated Facts Decision that the Prosecution may challenge the adjudicated facts by "cross-examining Defence witnesses or by calling rebuttal evidence"[150] as indicating to him that these were the only two ways the Prosecution could do so and therefore, as the Prosecution did not call rebuttal evidence, he had no notice that Adjudicated Fact 15 was in issue and was prejudiced when the Trial Chamber found that the Prosecution had successfully challenged it.[151] These arguments must fail for the following reasons.

70. First, in its AFRC Adjudicated Facts Decision, the Trial Chamber did not state that the Defence had proven Adjudicated Fact 15 such that it was no longer at issue. Rather, while noting that the Defence motion was "intended to streamline the Defence case", it held that the Prosecution "may have the option to challenge [any adjudicated facts judicially noticed] by cross-examining Defence witnesses or by calling rebuttal evidence."[152] Indeed, the Trial Chamber expressly noted that facts judicially noticed under Rule 94(B), like all rebuttable evidence, could be challenged at trial unlike those under Rule 94(A) which need not be proven again.[153]

71. Secondly, Taylor ignores his own argument that the Prosecution could challenge Adjudicated Fact 15 by cross-examining Defence witnesses on the issue, which it did.[154]

72. Thirdly, the AFRC Adjudicated Facts Decision cannot be interpreted as indicating that the only two ways to challenge an adjudicated fact are by calling rebuttal evidence or by cross-examining Defence witnesses. As recognised by Taylor at the time he sought its admission, in the unusual circumstance that an adjudicated fact is admitted mid-trial, it can also be challenged by evidence led before judicial notice is taken. Taylor's reliance on the Mladić case is misplaced,[155] since it does not hold that the non-moving party can only challenge an adjudicated fact with evidence admitted after it has been judicially noticed. Rather, Mladić concerns the more usual situation where judicial notice is taken of adjudicated facts at the pre-trial phase, which was not the case here.

73. Furthermore, the Prosecution was not obliged to expressly indicate its intention to challenge an adjudicated fact.[156] A party requests the Chamber to entertain a challenge to an adjudicated fact by introducing credible evidence to the contrary; there is no requirement to state on the record that this is being brought to challenge the adjudicated fact in question.[157]

74. Finally, Taylor has not shown that the Trial Chamber erred by citing paragraph 540 of the Prosecution Closing Brief when it found that the Prosecution had sufficiently challenged the truth of Adjudicated Fact 15 so as to require the Chamber to reconsider the matter. This paragraph refers to the evidence of TF1-375 which the Trial Chamber relied on as rebutting the adjudicated fact[158] and to the testimony of Issa Sesay, whom Taylor chose to call. Sesay confirmed that RUF fighters were with Rambo Red Goat,[159] who led them into Freetown.[160] Moreover, the Chamber's deliberations and findings on the role of the RUF in the Freetown invasion (see below) make it very clear that the Chamber did not only rely on the evidence cited in this paragraph of the Prosecution Closing Brief to find that the RUF, and specifically Rambo Red Goat and his troops, were involved in the Freetown invasion.[161]

75. In light of the above, Taylor has not demonstrated any error in the Trial Chamber's finding that the Prosecution evidence led before Adjudicated Fact 15 was judicially noticed could successfully rebut it. The Trial Chamber correctly held that adjudicated facts judicially noticed under Rule 94(B) are merely presumptions that may be rebutted by evidence at trial. Moreover, as shown below, the Trial Chamber reasonably relied on all the evidence it heard to find that the Prosecution had successfully rebutted Adjudicated Fact 15.

(iv) No error of fact in the Chamber's finding that the RUF was involved in the Freetown invasion

76. The Trial Chamber's finding that the RUF was involved in the Freetown invasion is based on a careful and reasonable assessment of the totality of the evidence.[162] This included its finding that Taylor planned the operation with Sam Bockarie,[163] that the commander of the troops in the city, Gullit, was taking orders from Bockarie,[164] the 448 jet warnings that helped the attacking forces avoid being caught in the open by air attacks,[165] and the presence of RUF and Liberian forces, including those led by Rambo Red Goat, among the attackers in the city.[166] Taylor's attempts to challenge this finding[167] are without merit because they fail to establish that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same conclusion. All of the arguments he advances are simply inappropriate attempts to relitigate arguments reasonably

Both of these witnesses testified that there were RUF fighters amid the forces led by Rambo Red Goat into Freetown, Judgement, paras. 3159, 3223-25. rejected at trial. At no time does Taylor address the standard for appellate review and identify why the Trial Chamber's findings are unreasonable or wholly erroneous.

77. Taylor's reliance on the evidence of TF1-567 and Exhibit P-149 is completely misleading.[168] This evidence concerns RUF forces under Boston Flomo (aka "Rambo" or "RUF Rambo") attacking Waterloo in an unsuccessful attempt to enter Freetown.[169] This does not contradict the Trial Chamber's later findings that a smaller group of fighters led by Rambo Red Goat managed to enter Freetown despite the main RUF group under Boston Flomo being unable to bypass the Nigerian forces.[170]

78. Taylor erroneously argues that, as TF1-375, Kamara, Bobson Sesay and TF1-371 gave vastly inconsistent accounts of events, no reasonable trial chamber could have concluded that Rambo Red Goat entered Freetown.[171] The Trial Chamber very carefully and reasonably assessed the evidence of these witnesses before finding them corroborative. Contrary to Taylor's submission, Bobson Sesay's evidence was far from being diametrically opposed to Perry Kamara's. While there may have been minor differences in the testimony of these two witnesses, whom the Chamber found to be generally credible,[172] Taylor has failed to show that the key facts they describe are not compatible.[173] To the contrary, both recounted exactly the same events. Both testified that Boston Flomo was unsuccessful in his attempt to reinforce Gullit's troops in Freetown but one former SLA member called Rambo Red Goat managed to enter Freetown with a group of fighters,[174] which Bobson Sesay testified included RUF fighters.[175] The Chamber carefully and reasonably considered the Defence argument at trial about why Bobson Sesay's evidence about Rambo Red Goat should not be believed before dismissing it.[176] Moreover, the Trial Chamber found that both witnesses were in Freetown during the invasion where they each saw Rambo Red Goat.[177] The Trial Chamber also noted that Bobson Sesay was ordered to receive Rambo Red Goat in Freetown[178] and found that he was present during the conversation when Boston Flomo told Gullit he was sending Rambo Red Goat upon Bockarie's instruction.[179]

79. Furthermore, contrary to Taylor's position, the testimony of TF1-375 corroborates Kamara and Bobson Sesay's evidence concerning Rambo Red Goat.[180] The Trial Chamber never found these three accounts were identical on every detail[181] but that their description of key facts was compatible.[182] In this regard, the Prosecution recalls that TF1-375 corroborates Bobson Sesay's testimony that the fighters with Rambo Red Goat included RUF.[183] Recalling its concerns about TF1-375's testimony, the Trial Chamber only relied on his evidence to the extent it was corroborated by Perry Kamara and Bobson Sesay.[184] Taylor has not shown any reversible error by the Chamber in this regard.

80. Taylor misstates TF1-371's evidence when he argues that this witness contradicted Kamara and Bobson Sesay's testimony about the movement of Rambo Red Goat's group. Contrary to Taylor's submissions, the Trial Chamber correctly found that TF1-371 testified about Boston Flomo, "RUF Rambo", rather than Rambo Red Goat.[185] However, as Rambo Red Goat was part of Flomo's group, the Trial Chamber reasonably found that part of Flomo's group successfully managed to link up with Gullit through Rambo Red Goat.[186] Moreover, TF1-371[187] also corroborated Bobson Sesay and Kamara's testimony[188] when he said that Flomo received the order to reinforce Gullit's troops from Bockarie.

81. Taylor has failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred by finding the evidence of these four witnesses corroborative of the fact that Rambo Red Goat entered Freetown with a small number of RUF troops during the invasion of the city. The testimony of Komba Sumana, cited by the Trial Chamber in its findings about Rambo Red Goat's entry into Freetown, provides further corroboration that indeed some fighters sent from behind the RUF lines managed to enter Freetown during the invasion in January 1999.[189]

82. Taylor misstates the evidence when he argues that Bobson Sesay was the only witness to testify that Rambo Red Goat's troops committed crimes charged in the Indictment.[190] Kamara, who the Chamber found generally credible,[191] testified that "Gullit ordered Red Goat to make the area fearful after leaving him in charge of Freetown. The group that had remained in Freetown did not have a radio but the witness heard on commercial radio that 'these rebels' were amputating and killing civilians, raping, and burning houses."[192]

(v) Conclusion

83. Taylor has failed to show that Chamber erred in law or in fact when it found that the Prosecution had successfully challenged the truth of Adjudicated Fact 15 by introducing credible and reliable evidence to the contrary. Moreover, Taylor has not shown that no Trial Chamber could have reasonably relied upon this evidence to find that the RUF was involved in the Freetown invasion. This Ground of Appeal should therefore be dismissed.

GROUND 7: The Trial Chamber properly found that Charles Taylor and Sam Bockarie jointly planned an attack on Kono, Makeni and Freetown

(i) Overview

84. The Trial Chamber did not err in law or in fact by relying on the evidence of TF1-371, Isaac Mongor and Karmoh Kanneh to find that Taylor and Bockarie jointly planned an attack on Kono, Kenema and Freetown labelled the "Bockarie/Taylor plan". Accordingly, Ground 7 of Taylor's appeal should be dismissed.

(ii) The Chamber properly relied on the testimony of TF1-371, Kanneh and Mongor

(a) Introduction

85. Taylor argues throughout this Ground that although the Chamber criticised various aspects of TF1-371, Karmoh Kanneh and Isaac Mongor's evidence, it did not refer to such criticism whenever it accepted their testimony.[193] Contrary to the implication that a Trial Chamber should explicitly repeat what it has found elsewhere in the Judgement each time it addresses a witness's evidence, the fact finder need not articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding,[194] nor must it set out in detail why it accepted or rejected particular testimony.[195] The fact that the deliberations and findings at issue do not repeat other deliberations and findings does not indicate the Trial Chamber accepted the testimony of all three witnesses regarding the plan without careful consideration.[196]

(b) The Chamber properly assessed the evidence of TF1-371, Kanneh and Mongor

86. Taylor erroneously claims that the Trial Chamber failed to assess the testimony of TF1-371, Kanneh and Mongor with appropriate caution in light of their status as accomplices.[197] The Trial Chamber expressly noted its obligation to treat accomplice evidence with caution and the factors to take into account in assessing the reliability of such evidence.[198] The Chamber correctly stated that TF1-371 and Mongor were accomplice witnesses[199] and recalled Kanneh's senior status in the RUF on more than one occasion in the Judgement.[200]

87. The Chamber carefully assessed these witnesses, considering: TF1-371's testimony, his prior statements and prior testimony before this Tribunal;[201] Mongor's testimony, his prior statements, the fact that originally he was not forthcoming regarding Taylor's role in the Freetown invasion, money he received, the letter of immunity he received from the Prosecution and his calm demeanour throughout cross-examination, despite being pressed heavily and repeatedly accused of lying;[202] and Kanneh's clear and calm testimony and his candidness about failing to correct his prior statements.[203] Having considered all of these factors, the Chamber found TF1-371, Mongor and Kanneh to be credible witnesses generally, providing extensive reasons for such conclusions.[204]

88. Taylor's complaint that in other parts of the Judgement, the Chamber declined to rely on these witnesses' evidence[205] actually counters his complaint that the Chamber did not treat their evidence with caution.[206] As the ICTY Appeals Chamber found in Krajišnik, relying on specific parts of testimonies while rejecting other parts as not credible indicates the Chamber's use of caution when assessing the reliability of witness testimonies.[207]

(c) The Chamber considered inconsistencies and reasonably relied on corroborated evidence in relation to the meeting held before Sam Bockarie left Buedu

89. Taylor's argument that seemingly indicates the Chamber erred by relying solely on "inconsistent accounts" of TF1-371, Mongor and Kanneh to find that he planned the December 1998 offensive is misguided.[208] The evidence of these three witnesses does not exist in a vacuum. The Trial Chamber also relied on the evidence of Augustine Mallah, Abu Keita, Albert Saidu, TF1-585, Dauda Aruna Fornie, TF1-367 and TF1-567 to make the findings Taylor disputes.[209] Where there were inconsistencies, the Trial Chamber properly considered them in light of the totality of the evidence.

90. Kanneh's testimony about a meeting at Waterworks in spring 1998 is indeed inconsistent, as Taylor alleges, with Mongor's evidence that the meeting took place in November 1998.[210] The Trial Chamber assessed Kanneh's confusion with dates elsewhere in the Judgement and found it was not detrimental to his overall credibility.[211] It is clear, however, that the Trial Chamber did not rely on Kanneh's evidence to establish the date of the meeting, as it did not mention his evidence in its Deliberations section discussing this particular meeting,[212] preferring instead to rely on Mongor's date, which was corroborated in part by other evidence.[213] As a matter of law, "[i]f the Trial Chamber did not refer to the evidence given by a witness, even if it is in contradiction to the Trial Chamber's finding, it is to be presumed that the Trial Chamber assessed and weighed the evidence, but found that the evidence did not prevent it from arriving at its actual findings."[214] The Trial Chamber used caution and exercised its discretion to reasonably reject Kanneh's evidence on the date of the meeting. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[215] the Trial Chamber is not required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony.[216]

[213] Judgement, para. 3090. The Trial Chamber also relied upon the evidence of TF1-371 and Augustine Mallah in regard to the meeting prior to Bockarie's trip to Monrovia.

[214] Kvočka AJ, para. 23. As Kanneh's evidence was summarised in the section preceding the "Deliberations" section of the findings at issue, this bolsters the presumption that the Trial Chamber considered his evidence and reasonably rejected it for more credible evidence, displaying its cautious treatment of his evidence.

91. Similarly, Taylor asserts that Mongor and TF1-371's evidence regarding the motivations and circumstances leading up to Bockarie's trip to Liberia and Burkina Faso cannot be reconciled with Kanneh's account of the Waterworks meeting.[217] It is clear the Trial Chamber did not rely on Kanneh's evidence in this regard. The Deliberations section of the Judgement regarding the meeting prior to Bockarie's trip clearly shows that the Trial Chamber relied on the evidence of TF1-371, Mongor and Augustine Mallah, not Kanneh, for its findings regarding that particular meeting,[218] and, as noted above, it is to be presumed that the Trial Chamber assessed and weighed Kanneh's evidence but found it did not prevent the Chamber from arriving at its actual findings.[219]

92. The Judgement paragraph cited by Taylor that allegedly "brushed over" inconsistencies between the account of Kanneh with those of Mongor and TF1-371[220] mentioned Kanneh's evidence relating to the meeting only when it was corroborated by TF1-371's evidence.[221] In the same section of the Judgement, the Chamber explicitly recognised that TF1-371, Mongor, Saidu and Kanneh's accounts regarding the events in Liberia and Burkina Faso did not "coincide on every particular point",[222] but found that these witnesses and others effectively complemented each other on the critical elements of the allegations, and were also corroborated by reliable contemporary documentary evidence.[223] In light of all of the above, the Judgement clearly demonstrates that the Trial Chamber did in fact consider the inconsistencies at issue, and it reached a reasonable conclusion in light of the totality of the evidence.

93. The three "inconsistencies" in Mongor's evidence that Taylor alleges the Trial Chamber failed to consider[224] were not inconsistencies at all. Mongor's evidence was properly considered by the Trial Chamber in the context of the totality of the evidence.

94. First, Taylor incorrectly asserts that Mongor's account of the plan that included attacks on Joru and Zimmi "encompasses three separate phases" and is thus inconsistent[225] with the two-prong attack on Kono, Kenema and Freetown which was accepted by the Chamber.[226] The argument confuses the main targeted locations with locations situated on the way toward those targets that were also to be attacked. Joru is located in Kenema District and is therefore compatible with the plan to attack locations in and around Kenema as part of the Kenema target. In fact, the Trial Chamber specifically referred to Joru and Zimmi as part of the unsuccessful attacks on the Segbwema-Daru axis towards Kenema.[227] The Trial Chamber reasonably considered Joru and Zimmi to be part of the Kenema part of the two-prong attack so the alleged inconsistency of a "third phase" does not exist.

95. Second, Kanneh did not testify that Bockarie said he would "explicitly reject" obtaining manpower support from Liberia as alleged by Taylor.[228] Kanneh testified that Bockarie did not want manpower support from the NPFL because of problems they'd had in the early part of the war when the NPFL dominated the RUF; rather, he preferred assistance from former ULIMO-K fighters.[229] While this may at first seem to contradict Mongor's evidence that Bockarie was discussing a plan to receive NPFL reinforcements from Liberia,[230] in 1998, the NPFL no longer existed.[231] Mongor clarified that when he said "NPFL fighters" he meant Charles Taylor's men who were in Liberia.[232] In light of this clarification, Mongor's evidence did not actually contradict Kanneh's account. The Trial Chamber reasonably exercised its discretion in accepting Mongor's testimony that the plan would involve attacks on Kenema and Joru.[233] The fact that the Chamber did not mention Kanneh's evidence about manpower support in reaching this finding is not an error.[234]

96. Third, while the Trial Chamber considered Mongor's evidence in relation to the events in Burkina Faso,[235] it did not rely on Mongor in relation to the origin of the materiel, choosing instead to rely on the evidence of Kanneh, TF1-371, TF1-338, Dauda Aruna Fornie, Issa Sesay's evidence from his own trial, and Exhibits P-63 and P-67 to support the finding that the shipment came from Burkina Faso.[236] This finding was reasonable based on the totality of the evidence.

97. The Chamber is not required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony.[237] However, contrary to Taylor's submission,[238] Mongor's testimony supports rather than contradicts the Chamber's finding that "around November/December 1998, the Accused was instrumental in procuring a large quantity of arms and ammunition for the RUF from Burkina Faso."[239] Mongor testified that Bockarie had brought Taylor diamonds,[240] Taylor had made a connection for Bockarie with the Burkina Faso President,[241] and in Burkina Faso, Bockarie had met with the President so they would "be able to buy ammunition from there"[242] but he "did not immediately get the arms and ammunition from there"[243] and had brought the ammunition from Liberia.[244] This accords with the evidence of witnesses TF1-371, Marzah and Sherif that the ammunition was brought back by plane from Burkina Faso to Monrovia and then stored for a time at White Flower before being distributed.[245] There is no contradiction between the Chamber's finding and Mongor's evidence.

98. The Trial Chamber acted reasonably in evaluating Mongor's evidence on his meeting with Sam Bockarie and its findings should not be disturbed.

(e) The Chamber was reasonable in its findings regarding the Waterworks and "inner core" meetings after Sam Bockarie returned

99. Taylor misstates the evidence on which the Trial Chamber relied regarding the meetings held upon Sam Bockarie's return,[246] claiming a discrepancy where none exists.[247] TF1-371 testified about three meetings: the Waterworks forum, a senior officers' meeting at Sam Bockarie's house, and an "inner core" meeting of a few commanders in Bockarie's bedroom at lunchtime during the senior officers' meeting.[248] TF1-371's evidence reflects that the senior officers' meeting was the meeting convened immediately after the Waterworks forum, not the "inner core" meeting, and the "inner core" meeting was convened halfway through the senior officers' meeting,[249] not the Waterworks forum as alleged by Taylor.[250] The Trial Chamber summarised this evidence correctly.[251] Taylor did not.

100. Contrary to Taylor's submission, Mongor's "failure" to mention a particular meeting is not a crucial error that undermines the reliability of his evidence.[252] Mongor did not specify that he attended the meeting at Waterworks,[253] nor was he asked where the meeting he attended was held.[254] However, Mongor's evidence suggests he was at both the Waterworks forum and at the senior officers' meeting, as he testified about SYB Rogers speaking at the meeting[255] (documented in the minutes of the Waterworks forum)[256] and of Sam Bockarie showing the ammunition to the attendees.[257] This ammunition was stored at Bockarie's house[258] where the senior officers' meeting was held.[259] Further, Mongor testified that at the end of the meeting he received ammunition to use to go to his assigned target,[260] which aligns with TF1-371's account of events at the senior officers' meeting.[261] As the Waterworks forum and officers' meetings took place consecutively,[262] Mongor may not have made the distinction of separate meetings and viewed them as a continuation of the same meeting, especially after the passage of ten years. This was not clarified during testimony but is a reasonable conclusion to make and is compatible with the totality of the evidence. In any event, it does not follow that Mongor must have known that a subset of the commanders present at the senior officers' meeting met privately with Bockarie, as he neither testified to attending the "inner core" meeting, nor did TF1-371 or Kanneh place him there.[263]

101. Neither does Kanneh's "failure" to mention the Waterworks meeting undermine the reliability of his evidence.[264] It cannot be assumed that all attendees at the smaller meeting at Bockarie's house must have attended or even known about the Waterworks forum. Kanneh never said he attended the Waterworks forum, no one else placed him there, and to say he must have known about it because it immediately preceded the smaller meeting is without basis.

102. In light of the above, Taylor has failed to show a crucial error that warrants appellate intervention.

(f) The Chamber was reasonable in finding that TF1-371 and Karmoh Kanneh were testifying about the same "inner core" meeting

103. The Trial Chamber recognised the inconsistencies Taylor highlights in his argument regarding the "inner core" meeting[265] and weighed them carefully.[266] As stated elsewhere in this Response, many inconsistencies between witness accounts may be reasonably explained by varying vantage points and the passage of time.[267] It is within the Chamber's discretion to evaluate inconsistencies and to accept or reject "fundamental features" of the evidence.[268] Here, the Trial Chamber reasonably found the similarities between the accounts, including who attended the meeting, where it was, and the satellite phone call between Bockarie and Taylor,[269] to be compelling. It expressly considered the inconsistencies regarding the meeting time and whether the attendees were present during the phone call and found the differences "insignificant"[270] in light of the compelling fundamental features that were consistent between the accounts. Such differences can be reasonably explained by the passage of time and do not render the Chamber's findings unreasonable.

104. The Trial Chamber's use of inclusive language in the Judgement[271] indicates that the three inconsistencies it enumerated were not the only inconsistencies it considered.[272] The discrepancies regarding the meeting's format[273] and the number of attendees[274] are also reasonably explained by the passage of time. A Trial Chamber must consider all inconsistencies but need not specifically address each in the Judgement,[275] and it is presumed the Chamber took such into account even if they were not specifically mentioned.[276]

105. Taylor's misstatement of the evidence regarding the meetings as discussed in paragraph 99 above leads him to create inconsistencies where none exist regarding the "inner core" meeting attendees.[277] TF1-371 testified that Isaac Mongor was present at the senior officers' meeting but did not name him as one of the commanders at the "inner core" meeting in Bockarie's bedroom;[278] Kanneh said Mongor was not at the "inner core" meeting; [279] and Mongor never said he attended such a meeting.[280] Thus, all three accounts reflect that Mongor was not in attendance at the inner core meeting, explaining why Mongor would neither have mentioned such a meeting nor said Kanneh attended it.[281] Similarly, TF1-371's testimony that "one or two others" were also present, without stating that Kanneh was present, does not contradict Kanneh's testimony that he (Kanneh) was there.[282]

106. Taylor also misstates Kanneh's testimony regarding the phone call. Kanneh did not say that Bockarie and Jungle told Taylor the plan was made and accepted by the senior RUF officers at the meeting.[283] Rather, Kanneh testified that Bockarie and Jungle told Taylor that Bockarie had put the plan they had discussed in Monrovia to the senior officers at the meeting and they had discussed it.[284] In this context, Kanneh's testimony that at the meeting they discussed re-attacking Kono and going up to Freetown to free their leader and take over power[285] indicates this was the plan given by Taylor. This is not incompatible with TF1-371's evidence that Taylor instructed Bockarie on the phone to "by all means capture Freetown" and this was Operation No Living Thing – the target was to capture Freetown and nobody, including commanders who tried to contest Bockarie's authority – should stand in their way.[286]

107. Taylor incorrectly argues that Mohamed Kabbah's evidence about a phone call on 6 January undermines Kanneh and TF1-371's evidence about Bockarie's satellite phone call with Taylor at his house before the December attack on Kono.[287] Kabbah did not testify that the only place in Buedu where Bockarie could ever get satellite coverage was up "the hill".[288] He testified that network coverage changed depending on the weather—sometimes there would be no coverage in a house and the next day there would be coverage.[289] Kabbah's evidence does not undermine the satellite phone call evidence nor warrant mention by the Trial Chamber.[290]

108. The Trial Chamber did not treat Prosecution and Defence evidence differently as alleged by Taylor. The sole example given by Taylor to demonstrate this disparate treatment, Martin George, provides an incomplete picture of why the Trial Chamber found his evidence about the Waterworks meeting not credible.[291] The Trial Chamber reasonably rejected George's evidence for several reasons and gave a detailed explanation as to why it did so.[292] This issue is discussed in the Response to Ground 9 at paragraph 132 and the Prosecution incorporates those submissions here in full. Taylor fails to demonstrate disparate treatment by the Trial Chamber.

109. Based on the foregoing reasons, the Trial Chamber reasonably assessed the evidence about the "inner core" meeting and its findings should not be disturbed.

(iii) The Chamber reasonably considered the totality of the evidence to determine which testimony was credible when faced with inconsistencies and contradictions

110. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[293] the Trial Chamber relied on corroborated evidence to determine who was commanding attacks in the southern prong of the offensive, citing Augustine Mallah and Albert Saidu's evidence in support of Kanneh's testimony that he was assigned to capture Segbwema and Daru.[294] The Chamber found Mongor's testimony that he was tasked to take Joru and Zimmi credible in light of the totality of the evidence, citing several contemporaneous news reports in support of the "undisputed facts" of the RUF and AFRC's military movements toward Kenema in December 1998 and January 1999.[295] Taylor offers no support to substantiate his position that TF1-371's testimony contradicts Mallah's evidence regarding Akim's assignment.[296]

111. The disputed accounts regarding manpower support raised by Taylor in paragraph 142 of his Appeal have been addressed in paragraph 95 above.

112. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[297] the Trial Chamber made a well-reasoned decision when faced with a contradiction between Kanneh and Mongor's evidence about contact with SAJ Musa.[298] It first considered that Kanneh's testimony on the matter was "direct, detailed and consistent" and therefore "credible and reliable".[299] It then contrasted Mongor's testimony, noting his knowledge was second-hand rather than direct, there was no corroboration of an agreement for Johnny Paul Koroma to contact SAJ Musa, and "evidence concerning related events" indicated Mongor's testimony was inaccurate.[300] Such a determination as to which witness account was more credible was entirely within the Trial Chamber's purview,[301] and the articulated reasoning shows it considered the quality and source of the information as well as the totality of the evidence. The fact that TF1-371 did not mention the issue of SAJ Musa in his testimony about the meeting[302] does not prove the topic was not discussed, as the lack of mention could be due to a myriad of reasons including the passage of time.

113. Taylor provides no basis for his assertion that "serious doubts arise" because of the various names given to the operation by witnesses.[303] The RUF/AFRC often used multiple names to describe one person, place or thing. For example, the RUF area at Camp Naama was called Crab Hole and Sokoto;[304] Foday Sankoh's radio code names included "The Lion",[305] "Smile",[306] and "Toyota",[307] while Charles Taylor was "Ebony"[308] or "047".[309] Most importantly, the Trial Chamber noted Augustine Mallah's testimony that "Operation Spare No Soul", "Operation Free Foday Sankoh" and "Operation No Living Thing" were the same operation and found that this did not undermine TF1-371's evidence that Bockarie coined the name "Operation No Living Thing" after Taylor instructed Bockarie over the phone to capture Freetown "by all means".[310] The examples that Taylor cites fail to undermine this evidence.

114. Similarly, the unsubstantiated argument that a military plan cannot exist only in oral form[311] has no basis in law or fact. Interestingly, it contradicts the evidence of Taylor's own witness, Issa Sesay, who testified that the RUF held meetings where they planned operations and gave orders to the commanders who would carry out the operation, but they did not have a system of writing things down before the operation.[312] In reality, members of the RUF/AFRC relied heavily on oral communication for a number of reasons, including the remoteness and distance between locations and literacy issues. The absence of real evidence (such as a written account of the plan) does not diminish the probative value of the evidence provided to the Chamber.[313]

(iv) The Chamber was correct in its assessment of the reliability of hearsay evidence

115. The Trial Chamber was conscious that Isaac Mongor, TF1-371 and Karmoh Kanneh's evidence on Taylor's role in creating the plan was hearsay, as it noted in its deliberations that "Bockarie told them" that the plan was a plan he had discussed with Taylor and had brought back from Monrovia.[314] Further, the Chamber said Mongor's testimony was "based on Bockarie's description of a conversation Bockarie had with the Accused".[315] The Trial Chamber weighed the probative value of their evidence, and concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents, in the sense of being voluntary, truthful and trustworthy.[316]

116. Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to assess the veracity of the source of the hearsay regarding the 'plan', is misguided.[317] In relying on hearsay evidence, a Trial Chamber must take into consideration the indicia of reliability.[318] A party tests the probative value of a hearsay statement and its source's motive through cross-examination.[319] Here, the Trial Chamber was sensitive to circumstantial indications of trustworthiness in its assessment of hearsay evidence.

117. In this case, the Prosecution notes that the Defence extensively cross-examined Mongor, TF1-371 and Kanneh regarding the information told to them by Bockarie about Taylor's role in planning the invasion of Freetown[320] and notwithstanding, having considered all the factors set out in paragraphs 168-169, found this evidence reliable.

118. The Judgement and trial record are replete with circumstantial guarantees of the trustworthiness of this hearsay evidence,[321] as the evidence of Mongor, TF1-371 and Kanneh does not exist in isolation. Taylor's role in planning the Freetown operation is reasonable in light of other findings by the Trial Chamber that establish the context. This includes findings that after the Intervention in February 1998, Taylor gave key tactical instructions for the AFRC/RUF to implement, instructing to them to capture and maintain Kono,[322] and recapture Kono, which resulted in the unsuccessful Fitti-Fatta attack in mid-June 1998.[323] Taylor sent materiel to the AFRC/RUF[324] and met several times with Bockarie, giving him sizeable amounts of arms and ammunition[325] which were used by AFRC/RUF troops in Kono as well as in operations led by AFRC commanders throughout Sierra Leone.[326] After months of such intense interaction between Taylor and the AFRC/RUF leadership, especially Bockarie, a trip to Monrovia to plan a major military offensive with Charles Taylor was a logical link in a long chain of events. Taylor himself testified that he met Bockarie on his way to Burkina Faso,[327] and the Chamber found that Taylor had been instrumental in providing the RUF with that large ammunition shipment.[328] It is obvious that Taylor would be interested in how the shipment would be used and would discuss this with Bockarie, the person receiving the shipment. In this larger framework, Bockarie's statements about the plan were rational, credible, logical and sensible, and the Trial Chamber was reasonable in evaluating the hearsay statements attributed to him as reliable and truthful.

119. The reliability of these statements is further corroborated by other evidence. Several witnesses testified that when he came back to Buedu after his trip to Liberia, Bockarie and Issa Sesay said that Bockarie had met Taylor in Monrovia, brought back a large shipment of arms and ammunitions, and that the AFRC/RUF were going to launch a major military offensive.[329] Witnesses also testified that Bockarie and Issa Sesay reported concrete examples of what Taylor had said during the meeting Bockarie had with him in Monrovia.[330]

120. The Trial Chamber correctly instructed itself on the law regarding hearsay and assessed Bockarie's statements to Mongor, TF1-371 and Kanneh reasonably and with the appropriate caution in light of the totality of the evidence. Taylor has failed to show that the Trial Chamber's approach was incorrect or that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached these conclusions. Consequently these findings should not be disturbed.

(v) Conclusion

121. For all of the above reasons, Ground 7 of Taylor's Appeal should be dismissed as Taylor has failed to demonstrate any legal or factual error warranting appellate intervention.

GROUND 9: The Trial Chamber committed no factual or legal error in finding that the Bockarie/Taylor plan had Freetown as the "ultimate destination"

(i) Overview

122. The Trial Chamber reasonably found that the Bockarie/Taylor plan included an attack on Freetown. Taylor's challenges to the reasonableness of this finding, including whether the evidence regarding locations targeted by the plan was sufficiently corroborative, have no merit. Equally without merit is his assertion that acceptance of evidence from witnesses who did not mention Freetown as part of the plan precludes the Chamber from being satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Freetown was the plan's ultimate goal. Finally, Taylor fails to demonstrate that the Chamber shifted the burden of proof when considering the evidence. Taylor raised this argument in Ground 4 of his Appeal but it is addressed in this Response Ground as it relates to Freetown's inclusion in the plan. For all of the reasons set forth below, this Ground of Appeal and the Ground 4 argument relating to the plan should be dismissed.

(ii) The evidence the Chamber relied on as to the targets of the plan was corroborative

123. Taylor raises what he calls "key differences" in the evidence relied upon by the Chamber regarding the targets of the plan, erroneously alleging that they are insufficiently corroborative to show that Freetown was the plan's ultimate destination.[332] Whether evidence is corroborative is a fact-driven inquiry. Corroboration does not require witness accounts to be identical in all aspects since "[e]very witness presents what he has seen from his own point of view at the time of the events, or according to how he understood the events recounted by others".[333] Details may differ between witnesses and still be corroborative, provided that the accounts are each credible and not incompatible.[334] Many inconsistencies between witness accounts may be reasonably explained by varying vantage points and the passage of time.[335] It is within the Chamber's discretion to evaluate inconsistencies and to accept or reject "fundamental features" of the evidence.[336]

124. Here, the Trial Chamber closely examined the evidence of TF1-371, Isaac Mongor, Karmoh Kanneh and TF1-585 regarding the plan Bockarie had designed with Taylor and then discussed with his commanders.[337] All four witnesses testified that Kono was to be attacked.[338] Three said that the plan was to proceed to Makeni,[339] which is located between Kono and Freetown. All four named Kono as the first target and Freetown as the last.[340] Three testified that Kenema was a target for a second group of fighters.[341] TF1-371 detailed that the two-pronged approach involved one group attacking Koidu, moving to Makeni and then combining with the group that had attacked Kenema to attack Freetown.[342] As discussed in section (iii) below, witnesses Mallah, Keita and Saidu further corroborated material aspects of this plan regarding the target locations and the two-prong approach.

125. Taylor is correct that TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh and TF1-585 differ on the details of the plan,[343] but these inconsistencies do not render their evidence unreliable.[344] The additional details that were mentioned were locations on the way to the main targets of Kono, Makeni, Kenema and Freetown, given by witnesses from different vantage points. TF1-585's lack of detail on the intricacies of the two-prong plan is explained by the fact that she overheard Bockarie talking about the plan but was not taking part in the meeting where it was being discussed.[345] Kanneh's account includes details of the locations he was assigned to attack,[346] as does Mongor's,[347] so naturally they would mention such details where others might not. The allegation that Mongor described a third phase of the plan has been addressed in the response to Ground 7[348] and is without merit. TF1-371's account of the plan provides more detail than the others,[349] but that is understandable given his position in the RUF and does not render the Trial Chamber's finding unreasonable.

126. In addition, there is abundant evidence that corroborates the finding that Freetown was the ultimate destination of the Bockarie/Taylor plan.[350] In November 1998, Bockarie himself said, "When I take Freetown I shall clear every living thing and building."[351] TF1-367 testified that Issa Sesay explained in a meeting before the December attack on Kono that they were to force the release of Sankoh by capturing Koidu Town, "and from there we should not stop anywhere. [...] We should go to Freetown and release Foday Sankoh. That was why it was code named Operation Free Foday Sankoh."[352] Defence witness Charles Ngebeh also testified about the meeting where Sesay referred to the mission as Operation Free the Leader, and agreed that the object of the operation was to go all the way to Freetown.[353] Defence witness Sam Kolleh testified that Bockarie and AFRC officers planned a general attack and "Issa, and Rambo, Morris Kallon" were instructed to move to Freetown.[354]

127. On the basis of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Freetown was the ultimate destination of the plan[355] is reasonable. TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh and TF1-585 provided corroborative evidence, and the credible accounts of all four witnesses are not incompatible. Moreover, this evidence was corroborated in material aspects by the totality of the evidence, including Defence evidence. Taylor fails to show that the Chamber was unreasonable in reaching this conclusion.

(iii) The evidence the Chamber accepted did not contradict the finding that Freetown was the ultimate destination of the plan

128. Prosecution witnesses Augustine Mallah, Abu Keita and Albert Saidu did not mention Freetown as part of the plan. Taylor incorrectly argues that by accepting their evidence without reconciling it to the accepted evidence of the four witnesses who included Freetown as part of the plan, the Trial Chamber was precluded from being satisfied beyond a reasonable doubt that Freetown was the plan's ultimate destination.[356]

material aspects of the plan which the other witnesses had discussed: namely, the other locations targeted by the plan and the two-prong approach.[359] It was therefore reasonable for the Chamber to accept their accounts and, based on the totality of the evidence, to find that the plan was for one flank of fighters to attack Kono and proceed to Makeni while the other flank was to attack Kenema, then the groups would advance and capture Freetown.[360]

130. Taylor asserts that the Trial Chamber should have discounted the testimony of Mallah, Keita and Saidu or reconciled it with the testimony of the four witnesses upon whom it relied to find that Freetown was part of the plan,[361] but this was not necessary as their accounts were not incompatible. The failure to mention the detail of Freetown as a target does not render their accounts incompatible[362] and can be reasonably explained by the witnesses' different vantage points. All three provided more detail about the Kenema target aspect of the plan, where they were assigned to fight, and less detail about the other areas.[363] Further, Saidu was in Koindu at the time of the meeting so he was not present when the plan was discussed.[364] None of the three said that the plan did not include Freetown. The Chamber was not precluded from accepting their evidence in spite of minor differences because they were materially corroborative and did not contradict the evidence that Freetown was the plan's ultimate destination.

131. Taylor's complaint that the Trial Chamber did not provide any reasoning as to its preference for the witnesses who incorporated Freetown into the plan over those who did not[365] is without merit. First, as just discussed, the Chamber did accept the evidence of credible witnesses who did not mention Freetown as part of the plan. Second, the Chamber explained in detail why it rejected the evidence of Defence witnesses Issa Sesay, Martin [359] Mallah testified that the plan was for the first brigade to attack all the way to Kenema while another group was to attack Kono and advance toward Makeni (Judgement, para. 3092 citing Mallah, T. 13 November 2008 pp. 20222-24); Keita testified that Bockarie said the ammunition he'd brought would be used to attack Kono and then proceed to Makeni, while Keita was assigned to fight in the group attacking toward Kenema (Judgement, para. 3092 citing Keita, T. 23 January 2008 pp. 2005-08); Saidu testified that he was told that the plan was for the 1st brigade to attack Kenema and for the 2nd brigade to attack Kono (Judgement, para. 3092 citing Saidu, T. 5 June 2008 pp. 11082-86).

[360] Judgement, para. 3127. As noted in para. 124 and fn. 359 of the response to this Ground, Kono was named as a target by TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh, TF1-585, Mallah, Keita and Saidu. Makeni was named as a target by TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh, Mallah and Keita. Kenema was named as a target by TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh, Mallah, Keita and Saidu. Freetown was identified as a target by TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh and TF1-585.

George, and John Vincent, none of whom incorporated Freetown into the plan discussed in Buedu.[366] The Chamber did not consider Sesay or Vincent to be generally credible witnesses, so their evidence required corroboration before the Chamber would rely on it.[367] When testifying about the plan, Sesay said that there was no discussion about proceeding to Makeni or Freetown and the only plan mentioned was to attack Kono.[368] In contrast to Mallah, Keita and Saidu, Sesay's testimony expressly contradicted TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh and TF1-585's evidence that attacks on Makeni and Freetown were discussed as part of the plan.

132. The Chamber then looked to Martin George's evidence for corroboration of Sesay's account. George also testified that Freetown was not mentioned, but his testimony contradicted Sesay's in that he said the plan they discussed also targeted Makeni and Lunsar,[369] not only Kono. The Chamber mentioned two other concerns regarding George's evidence, including why Lunsar was mentioned but not Freetown when Lunsar was so close to Freetown, and George's contradiction of his own evidence as to whether or not Sesay attended the meeting where the plan was discussed.[370] All of these factors together led the Chamber to reasonably conclude that George's evidence on the plan was neither credible nor corroborative of Sesay's account.[371] Vincent's evidence did not corroborate Sesay's account either, as he too mentioned a plan to attack "as far as Makeni",[372] directly impugning Sesay's testimony that there was no discussion on continuing to Makeni. The three Defence witnesses explicitly contradicted each other, their testimonies were neither credible nor compatible, and the Chamber acted reasonably and within its discretion to reject their evidence.

133. Taylor erroneously takes issue with the reasoning the Chamber provided when it dismissed as "implausible" Defence witness John Vincent's evidence that Freetown was not mentioned as a target of the plan. Taylor says the Chamber viewed the goal of the operation as the release, i.e. the physical removal, of Sankoh from prison[373] and asserts that this is (1) illogical given that ECOMOG could have easily transferred Sankoh elsewhere in advance of the RUF forces, and (2) irreconcilable with the finding that the operation was designed to be "fearful" in order to pressure the government to negotiate Sankoh's release.[374]

134. As to the first point, whether or not ECOMOG could have transferred Sankoh out of Freetown before an advance is irrelevant given that the totality of the evidence demonstrates that the RUF believed Sankoh was being held in Freetown.[375] Examples of the evidence that the Trial Chamber was obliged to, and presumably did consider include Exhibits P-078,[376] P-063[377] and P-430B,[378] all of which discussed Sankoh's death sentence and/or that he was being held in Freetown. Witness Perry Kamara was in the group of fighters assigned to go to the prison to release Sankoh and other detainees.[379] His evidence shows that the forces in Freetown believed Sankoh was being held there up until the time they opened the prison.[380]

135. As to the second point, the Trial Chamber focused on the aspect of Vincent's testimony that the reason for the operation was to free Sankoh. Its reasoning in the Judgement shows that it found it implausible that the rebel forces would not try to capture the area where they believed Sankoh was being held in keeping with that goal.[381] Contrary to Taylor's argument, this does not contradict the Chamber's later finding that Taylor told Bockarie to make the operation fearful in order to pressure the Government into negotiating Sankoh's release.[382] Both methods were a means to achieve the operation's goal to free Sankoh and were not mutually exclusive as Taylor seems to argue.

(iv) The Chamber did not shift the burden of proof when considering whether Freetown was part of the Bockarie/Taylor plan

136. Taylor mistakenly asserts in this Ground and in Ground 4 of his Appeal that the Trial Chamber discounted TF1-567 and Mohamed Kabbah's evidence that demonstrated the plan only involved an offensive on Kono and misapplied the burden of proof by setting a less [375] In fact, this is exactly what happened. Sankoh was secretly transferred and the fighters were not informed, so they went to Pademba Road prison to free him, believing he was still there. See, e.g., Kamara. T. 6 February 2008 pp. 3224-26; Fornie, T. 3 December 2008 pp. 21581-82.

stringent threshold than "beyond a reasonable doubt" to find that the plan included Freetown.[383]

137. In paragraphs 3097 and 3098 of the Judgement, the Trial Chamber said, in essence, that the evidence of TF1-567 and Kabbah "[did] not negate the possibility" that a larger plan mentioning Freetown was discussed at Waterworks. Taylor misunderstands this language to be shifting the burden of proof.[384] However, when it is considered in its proper context,[385] it is clear that the Trial Chamber is considering that the evidence of TF1-567 and Kabbah, while different to the evidence of TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh and TF1-585, is not incompatible with it.[386] While not ideal, this choice of language is not fatal when it is read in its proper context. The Trial Chamber was fully cognisant of the Prosecution's burden to prove guilt beyond a reasonable doubt, as it recalled that burden when it made the finding that Freetown was the ultimate destination of the two-prong attack designed by Taylor and Bockarie in November/December 1998.[387] The Chamber did not shift this burden or set a less stringent standard of proof when considering the evidence on whether Freetown was part of the plan.

138. Exacerbating Taylor's erroneous assertion is the fact that he misstates TF1-567's evidence. TF1-567 never expressly testified that Bockarie told him that the plan involved "only an offensive on Kono" as Taylor contends.[388] TF1-567 only mentioned the Kono aspect of the plan, but he never said that was the whole plan or that there was no plan to advance toward Freetown.[389] The fact that he did not mention Freetown can be reasonably explained by his vantage point, which the Trial Chamber noted when it said, "TF1-567 did not testify that he was present at the Waterworks meeting, nor did he say there was no plan to advance toward Freetown."[390] The Chamber's finding that TF1-567's evidence did not negate that a plan to advance toward Freetown was laid out at the Waterworks meeting[391] reasonably followed from his testimony. Taylor fails to demonstrate that the Chamber did not consider TF1-567's evidence in conjunction with other evidence or discounted it.[392] Indeed, the Judgement indicates this evidence was part of all of the evidence considered.

139. Similarly, Mohamed Kabbah's evidence did not contradict the concept of a larger plan, as he was not at Waterworks but was told that an attack on Kono and Makeni was discussed at that meeting.[393] The Chamber reasonably considered the witness's vantage point, noting that Kabbah was stationed in Kono so he was told about the aspect of the plan that related to his own duties[394] and did not include the detail regarding Freetown. This did not render his account incompatible or contradict evidence that a larger plan was discussed.

140. The Trial Chamber performed a proper corroboration analysis and did not shift the burden of proof in spite of its choice of language. It is clear that the Chamber weighed the totality of the evidence and found that TF1-567 and Kabbah's accounts were not incompatible with the evidence of TF1-371, Mongor, Kanneh and TF1-585 and did not raise a reasonable doubt as to Freetown's inclusion in the plan.

(v) Conclusion

141. Taylor has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed any error in finding that Freetown was part of the Bockarie/Taylor plan. As such, this Ground of Appeal and the Ground 4 argument that the burden of proof was shifted should be dismissed.

[GROUND 8 follows GROUND 9 to mirror the order of the Taylor Appeal.][395]

GROUND 8: The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated the possibility of SAJ Musa's involvement in executing the Bockarie/Taylor plan, and that after SAJ Musa's death, Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan as contemplated by Taylor and Bockarie

(i) Overview

142. In Ground 8 of his Appeal, Taylor conflates the design of the Bockarie/Taylor plan with its implementation. Taylor's conviction for planning the invasion of Freetown does not depend on which commanders he and Bockarie discussed might be involved or who actually implemented his plan. Indeed, Isaac Mongor, who was a senior RUF commander at the time, explained very clearly in his testimony that "the plan that was brought by Mosquito [Bockarie] from Taylor was for us to attack all the other places and to advance to Freetown, but they did not select a specific group [...] that was supposed to go to Freetown".[396] Rather, Taylor's conviction for planning rests on the Trial Chamber's reasonable and correct findings, as discussed in the response to Ground 11, that he designed a plan which culminated in the capture of Freetown[397] and the plan substantially contributed to the commission of the Indictment crimes. As discussed in the response to Ground 15, by instructing that the operation be fearful and Freetown be captured "by all means",[398] and as discussed in the response to Ground 14, as a result of his continuous awareness of a campaign of crimes being committed by the RUF and/or AFRC, Taylor intended or had an awareness of the substantial likelihood that Indictment crimes would be committed in the execution of the plan.

143. Notwithstanding this, contrary to Taylor's contention,[399] the Trial Chamber properly evaluated the trial record and reasonably found on the totality of the evidence that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated the possibility that SAJ Musa might help implement the plan. Moreover, it reasonably found that after SAJ Musa's death, Musa's plan was abandoned, Bockarie and Gullit coordinated their efforts to capture Freetown and Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan as contemplated by Taylor and Bockarie.[400]

144. For all of these reasons, Taylor fails to demonstrate any Trial Chamber error that would warrant appellate intervention, and, therefore, this Ground should be dismissed.

(ii) That Bockarie and Taylor contemplated the possibility of SAJ Musa's participation in implementing the Bockarie/Taylor plan was the only reasonable conclusion on the evidence

145. Based on its assessment of the evidence before it, the Chamber reached the only reasonable conclusion available to it when it found that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated the possibility that SAJ Musa would participate in implementing the plan. The Chamber's reasoned conclusion relied on Mongor and Kanneh's evidence.[401] Mongor testified that Bockarie said when he was in Monrovia, Taylor had shown him (Bockarie) on a map the locations that the RUF and the SLA occupied at the time and had discussed a plan to launch an operation.[402] Kanneh testified that Bockarie said he had complained to Taylor about SAJ

Musa's disloyalty toward his (Bockarie's) command and the RUF. Kanneh further testified that following the Waterworks meeting, Bockarie contacted Musa and requested or ordered him to cooperate.[403] Taylor's assertion that because Mongor and Kanneh's evidence was circumstantial, uncorroborated hearsay, this finding was not the only reasonable conclusion available to the Chamber[404] must be rejected for the following reasons.

146. The Chamber's methodology in assessing uncorroborated hearsay evidence was set out at paragraphs 166, 168 and 169 of its Judgement. From these paragraphs, it is evident that the Trial Chamber exercised the appropriate caution when relying on Kanneh and Mongor's hearsay evidence.[405] The Judgement and trial record are replete with the circumstantial guarantees of the trustworthiness of this evidence. For example, as described in detail in paragraphs 249 and 250 in the response to Ground 15, the totality of the evidence demonstrates longstanding cooperation between Taylor and the RUF/AFRC and Taylor and Bockarie, which intensified after Bockarie became interim leader. This made Bockarie the pivotal and central actor in the AFRC/RUF's receipt of Taylor's support and instructions. In this context, it is credible that Taylor and Bockarie candidly discussed SAJ Musa as well as locations to attack and how best to implement the plan, and their shared interests in seeing their plan and the AFRC/RUF succeed ensured that they spoke honestly with each other.

147. Another circumstantial guarantee of the trustworthiness of this hearsay is that at the time that Bockarie told Kanneh and Mongor about his discussions with Taylor, the trial record establishes that Bockarie had reason to confide in them both. As discussed in paragraph 253 of the response to Ground 15, when Bockarie was training at Naama, Mongor was an NPFL trainer in charge of RUF recruits and subsequently became one of the most senior commanders in the RUF organisation. With such a history, Bockarie had nothing to hide from Mongor about either Taylor's involvement with designing the plan or what that plan entailed. Similarly, Kanneh and Bockarie had a long history in the RUF together, having met in 1994 and then working closely together as senior officers.[406]

[405] See also the response to Ground 1 for a more full discussion of the Chamber's treatment of such evidence.
[406] See, e.g., Kanneh, T. 8 May 2008 pp. 9351-54 (the first time he met Bockarie was in Zogoda in 1994, they were in Kailahun district together), 9358-61 (after Sankoh told them to take orders from Bockarie, Kanneh moved with Bockarie to Pendembu, then Daru, then Benguema) 9366-68 and 9376, 9385-88 (Kanneh moved to Kenema with Bockarie during the junta period), 9390-91 (after the Intervention, Kanneh and Bockarie went to Daru, and Bockarie promoted Kanneh and assigned him to Baima, 40 miles from Buedu where Kanneh visited many times).

148. The situations in which Bockarie made the statements to Mongor and Kanneh also show that the hearsay was trustworthy. The statements Bockarie made to Mongor and Kanneh were made in the context of him laying out the plan for his senior commanders who would be implementing it. There was no reason to be anything but honest with these men, as he was trusting them to successfully carry out the plan. Consequently, in light of all these circumstantial guarantees of the veracity of this hearsay, the Trial Chamber reasonably relied on Mongor and Kanneh's evidence.

149. Moreover, the Trial Chamber considered these hearsay statements in the context of the totality of the evidence set out below and drew the only reasonable conclusion that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated the possibility of SAJ Musa's participation in implementing the plan. Specifically, as SAJ Musa was in command of more than 1,000 fighters,[407] many of whom had military training, it was logical Bockarie and Taylor would want those troops to help execute the plan. Because of past differences between Musa and the RUF which the Trial Chamber fully acknowledged and considered,[408] Musa's cooperation was not a foregone conclusion, but the Chamber rightly concluded from the evidence that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated it was a possibility. That conclusion is supported by several findings: there were RUF fighters among his troops in the North,[409] Musa had accepted the arms and ammunition Taylor had sent through Superman,[410] he had accepted the Liberian reinforcements Taylor had sent who were serving under O-Five,[411] he allowed RUF radio operators Alfred Brown and Perry Kamara to travel with his forces,[412] Gullit, his deputy, was in radio contact and cooperating with Bockarie until November 1998,[413] and Musa also wanted to recapture Freetown.[414] Also, given their history, Bockarie would not have contacted Musa to attempt to get him to cooperate unless they had contemplated this possibility. Given these circumstances, it is clear that Bockarie reached out to Musa on the possibility he would cooperate.

150. Musa's refusal[415] does not negate that the Chamber found the only reasonable conclusion from the evidence was that Taylor and Bockarie contemplated the possibility of his participation. Musa's stated refusal came after Taylor and Bockarie had reached that conclusion and as a result of the action Bockarie took to secure Musa's involvement based on that possibility. The Chamber correctly weighed Mongor's evidence with Kanneh's and all of the other evidence on record to reach the only reasonable conclusion based on the totality of the evidence.

151. Taylor's attacks on the evidence from other angles also fail to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred. At the outset, it is important to reiterate that the Trial Chamber properly stated the law on evaluating witness credibility, hearsay evidence, and resolving discrepancies amongst witnesses' testimonies.[416] It then properly applied the law in its assessment of the evidence at issue.

152. The Chamber recognised that Kanneh and Mongor's accounts about the call to Musa and how he responded were contradictory.[417] Specifically, it found that Kanneh said Bockarie contacted Musa and Musa refused to cooperate, while Mongor said JPK contacted Musa and Musa agreed to run the operation.[418] Taylor complains that the Chamber failed to explain the inconsistencies. Even though the Chamber was not required to explain inconsistencies or even to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony,[419] it did so here, demonstrating its reasoned and cautious treatment of the evidence. It is the Trial Chamber's prerogative to determine which account is more credible when faced with competing versions of events, as it did here when it found Kanneh's account more credible.[420] It considered that Kanneh's evidence was "direct, detailed and consistent" and found it both credible and reliable.[421] In contrast, it considered the second-hand source of Mongor's evidence and the fact that no other witnesses testified that SAJ Musa agreed to run the operation, so it rejected Mongor's evidence in favour of Kanneh's account.[422] There is no error in the Trial Chamber's approach in this regard.

153. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[423] in paragraph 3120 of its Judgement, the Trial Chamber relied on Kanneh and not on Mongor's evidence "that following the Waterworks meeting, Bockarie contacted SAJ Musa and requested or ordered him to cooperate".[424] Taylor's argument that the discussion at the meeting about whether or not to contact SAJ

Musa would not have been necessary if Taylor and Bockarie had contemplated Musa's involvement[425] must fail as it is based on Mongor's evidence that the Trial Chamber reasonably rejected.[426] Consequently, the only party erroneously relying on evidence that the Chamber found to be "inaccurate",[427] is Taylor, not the Trial Chamber. In any event, as Musa's participation was not certain, it would be reasonable that contacting him would be a subject of discussion.

154. Contrary to Taylor's argument, the Chamber did not ignore the evidence of TF1-371.[428] The Chamber considered his evidence on the small meeting at Bockarie's house.[429] His account about what was discussed is not incompatible with the evidence accepted by the Chamber that the meeting participants discussed approaching SAJ Musa or how Musa responded.[430] A Trial Chamber is presumed to have considered all of the evidence, even if not specifically mentioned, and does not have to refer to every piece of evidence it takes into account.[431]

(iii) The Trial Chamber's finding that after SAJ Musa's death Bockarie and Gullit coordinated their efforts to capture Freetown, Musa's plan was abandoned, and Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan, as had been contemplated by Taylor and Bockarie was reasonable based on the totality of the evidence

155. As discussed above, even absent contemplation at the time that Taylor and Bockarie designed the plan that Gullit would ultimately follow it,[432] Taylor's planning conviction would remain in place. Where, as here, the Bockarie/Taylor plan, created with the requisite mens rea, substantially contributed to the crimes committed in Freetown, regardless of which RUF/AFRC forces committed them, Taylor is criminally responsible for those crimes. The identity of those who Taylor contemplated as possibly carrying out this plan is irrelevant.

156. As discussed below, Taylor mistakenly argues that the Chamber "creatively inferred" that SAJ Musa or Gullit's movements were "somehow foreseen" by Taylor and Bockarie and were incorporated into their plan.[433] Rather, the evidence supports the Trial Chamber's conclusion that following the first conversation Bockarie had with Gullit after SAJ Musa's death, Bockarie and Gullit coordinated their efforts to capture Freetown, Musa's plan was abandoned and Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan, as had been contemplated by Taylor and Bockarie.[434] The Trial Chamber's language, "Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan, as had been contemplated by Taylor and Bockarie"[435] must be considered in context. When Taylor and Bockarie contemplated the possibility that SAJ Musa would participate in the implementation of the Bockarie/Taylor plan, they contemplated that Musa and the forces he commanded, including his deputy, Gullit, would participate. The use of the word "movements" should not be exaggerated, as what was contemplated was that those forces would participate.

157. Nonetheless, the evidence would support a conclusion that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated Gullit's possible participation in implementing the plan. Indeed, they had even more reason for such contemplation given the uncertainty that SAJ Musa would participate and the past cooperative relationship between Bockarie and Gullit and the resumption of that relationship once Musa was dead, as discussed in detail by the Trial Chamber.[436] Further support for this conclusion includes that, at the Waterworks meeting, Bockarie discussed that he had been speaking to Gullit about killing SAJ Musa in a military operation.[437] Such discussion would only have occurred if Bockarie trusted Gullit's loyalty and cooperation with him. Of course, as SAJ Musa's deputy,[438] Gullit would assume leadership of the troops if Musa was killed.[439] While the Trial Chamber stated that it did not need to make a finding as to how SAJ Musa was killed, it considered the evidence that suggested he was killed by Gullit during a military operation as envisioned by Bockarie's conversation.[440] The totality of the evidence thus establishes that Bockarie and Taylor could have reasonably contemplated that if SAJ Musa would not cooperate with the implementation of the plan, Gullit might.

158. Taylor's argument that once SAJ Musa refused to cooperate, there was no longer "any slight prospect or expectation" that Gullit would follow the Bockarie/Taylor plan[441] fails precisely because of Kanneh's evidence that Bockarie proposed that Gullit kill Musa during a military operation,[442] as discussed above. The Chamber reasonably found that Bockarie's discussion with Gullit about killing Musa indicated Bockarie's desire to bring Musa's separate plan together with the Bockarie/Taylor plan.[443]

159. Finally, as discussed more fully in the response to Ground 11, Taylor's contention that the Bockarie/Taylor plan failed[444] is without merit. The finding he cites to support his statement clearly states that "without the involvement of Gullit's troops", the plan "succeeded to the extent that the attack on Kono was successful and fighters under the leadership of Rambo Red Goat were able to enter Freetown".[445] The limited success Taylor is willing to acknowledge was not the plan's only success because Gullit's troops did in fact implement the plan. Upon SAJ Musa's death, Gullit abandoned Musa's original plan and followed the Bockarie/Taylor plan, as had been contemplated by Bockarie and Taylor.[446]

160. As discussed more fully in the response to Grounds 10 and 11, Gullit and his troops successfully attacked the ultimate destination or target of the plan, Freetown. In keeping with the modus operandi of the plan, Gullit passed on Bockarie's orders to his troops to make the operation fearful. They did. The crimes Gullit's troops committed as a result of the plan spurred the international community into pressuring the government to negotiate for peace and ultimately resulted in Sankoh's release, achieving the plan's ultimate objective. The plan did not fail. Unfortunately for Sierra Leone, it succeeded.

(iv) Conclusion

161. Even though not necessary for his planning conviction, the Chamber correctly assessed the evidence and reached the only reasonable conclusion based on the totality of the evidence it considered credible that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated the possibility of the participation of SAJ Musa and the forces he commanded in the execution of the plan. Even if this participation was not contemplated, the conviction for planning stands. The plan Taylor co-authored with Bockarie substantially contributed to the crimes that Gullit's troops committed, either as intended by Taylor or with his awareness of the substantial likelihood of their commission in the implementation of his plan. Consequently, Taylor has been correctly convicted for crimes committed in the implementation of his plan. As such, this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

GROUND 10: The Trial Chamber did not err in fact or law in finding that SAJ Musa's plan to attack Freetown was abandoned

(i) Overview

162. Although Taylor styles this Ground as an error of fact and law he does not clearly argue - and certainly does not demonstrate - any legal errors. As for alleged factual errors, the Trial Chamber's conclusion that "after the death of SAJ Musa...SAJ Musa's original plan to attack Freetown was abandoned, and Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan" is based on a careful and reasonable assessment of the totality of the evidence.[447] Taylor's attempts to challenge this conclusion[448] are without merit because they fail to establish that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same conclusion.[449] Indeed, many of his arguments are simply inappropriate attempts to relitigate arguments made and reasonably rejected at trial. Further, the reference in the Taylor Notice of Appeal that "[t]he Trial Chamber's error arises from an improper evaluation of the evidence" is not developed in his appeal brief.[450] Therefore, consistent with the jurisprudence of the ICTY Appeals Chamber, this line of argument should be considered abandoned.[451]

163. As Taylor fails to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention, this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

(a) The Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that SAJ Musa's plan to attack Freetown was abandoned

164. The Trial Chamber reasonably concluded on all of the evidence that SAJ Musa's plan to invade Freetown was abandoned and Gullit's movements incorporated into the

[448] Taylor Appeal, paras. 182-206.
[449] The title of this ground alleges both errors of law and fact. However, no error of law is argued. Taylor's submissions concerning the "abandonment theory" dissolve into baseless complaints that the Trial Chamber's findings are not supported by evidence. Such complaints, properly understood, amount to allegations of an error of fact.
[450] Taylor Notice of Appeal, para. 33.
[451] Gotovina & Markač Abandoned Grounds Decision, p. 2; Strugar AJ, para. 265; Hartmann Decision on Further Motions to Strike, para. 12.

Bockarie/Taylor plan.[452] Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber developed this theory on its own without foundation is without merit, because his argument simply dissolves into a dispute about the type of evidence which he believes should have been led rather than an absence of evidence he says would support a move from one plan to the other.[453] The absence of the sort of evidence Taylor suggests was required does not imply an absence of evidence to support the Trial Chamber's conclusion.[454]

165. In so far as Taylor seeks to rely on two pieces of Perry Kamara's evidence as somehow contradicting the Trial Chamber's conclusion, neither does so.[455] Regarding the first piece, reference should be made to the Trial Chamber's actual finding rather than the selectively summarised version provided by Taylor.[456] On review of the actual finding it is clear that Kamara's evidence that "[s]ome people were in favour of contacting Bockarie, while others were not"[457] is not determinative of whether contact was actually made between Gullit and Bockarie, nor is it determinative of whether SAJ Musa's plan was abandoned. It simply indicates, from Kamara's perspective, what he considered the views of the troops to be in the period prior to contact being made.[458] The second piece of evidence concerns Gullit's failure to wait for reinforcements.[459] Again, Taylor's reliance on this piece of evidence is misplaced. The Trial Chamber accepted Kamara's evidence on this point.[460] It then specifically and extensively dealt with the issue of Gullit's failure to wait, but considered Gullit's act to be driven by military necessity and, thus, not fatal to its view that SAJ Musa's plan had been abandoned and the Bockarie/Taylor plan adopted.[461] Given that neither piece of evidence contradicts, undermines or establishes that the Trial Chamber was wholly erroneous in concluding there was a change from one plan to the other, Taylor's arguments fail.

166. Further, and contrary to Taylor's arguments,[462] the Trial Chamber was able to differentiate between the two plans and the findings it made in this regard were reasonably open to it. Based on a detailed analysis of the evidence before it, the Trial Chamber found that the Bockarie/Taylor plan was to "carry out a two-pronged attack on Kono and Kenema with the ultimate objective of reaching Freetown, releasing Foday Sankoh from prison and regaining control."[463] The Trial Chamber also found that the operation was designed to be "fearful" and to "use all means", meaning that it was to involve a campaign of terror against civilians.[464] The "fearful" aspect of the plan was designed to put pressure on the Government to enter into negotiations for the release of Sankoh.[465] In contrast, the Trial Chamber found that SAJ Musa's plan was to reinstate the army and that he had ordered his forces to "proceed to Freetown without killing, looting or burning."[466]

167. Equally flawed is Taylor's attempt to argue that it was not possible to determine that the SAJ Musa plan had been abandoned and the Bockarie/Taylor plan adopted because it was impossible to differentiate the two in terms of goal and/or the commission of crimes.[467] Taylor's argument is based on an erroneously narrow and fragmented view of how the Trial Chamber actually determined that one plan had been abandoned and the other adopted. Contrary to Taylor's view, the Trial Chamber's analysis of the transition involved a detailed and close consideration of a wide range of factors, including, inter alia, communications between Gullit and Bockarie after SAJ Musa's death, coordination between Bockarie's forces and Gullit's troops, reinforcements sent by Bockarie which joined Gullit's troops, and the implementation of instructions issued by Bockarie to Gullit.[468] On this final point, the Trial Chamber concluded that "Bockarie did instruct Gullit to use terror tactics against the civilian [466] Judgement, paras. 3123-24. Further support for the finding that SAJ Musa's plan did not involve the commission of crimes is provided by Alimamy Bobson Sesay and TF1-143. Bobson Sesay testified that "[SAJ Musa] said we should go and reinstate the army. He said we should go with these words, then we will get support from the people" (see TF1-334, T. 29 April 2008 p. 8837 (emphasis added)). This evidence indicates that SAJ Musa wanted to secure the support of the people. Clearly, the commission of crimes would not have generated popular support. TF1-143's testimony also supports the existence of two fundamentally different plans (see Judgement, para. 863).

[468] See, e.g., Judgement, paras. 3481-86, 6965, which summarise the various factors used by the Trial Chamber to determine the extent of Bockarie's involvement in the Freetown operation following the design of the Bockarie/Taylor plan. See also Exh. P-279B, pp. 2, 4 (supports the finding that the SAJ Musa plan died with SAJ Musa. On Musa's death, rather than continue with the attempt to reinstate the army of Sierra Leone and with Musa's policy of shunning contact with the RUF leadership, Gullit began cooperating with and taking orders from Bockarie. On the day Freetown was invaded, spokesperson FAT Sesay, told the BBC's Robin White that the SLPP government had been overthrown by "[w]e, the combined forces of the AFRC and RUF forces." FAT Sesay made no mention of any plan to reinstate the army but, when asked who would be the new leader, reiterated that is was the combined forces of the RUF and AFRC).

population on the retreat from Freetown, and...Gullit complied."[469] The Trial Chamber at no time measured and assessed the transition by reference to goals and crimes alone. The approach taken by the Trial Chamber was clearly reasonable given the complexity of the issues and evidence before it. Therefore, in so far as Taylor seeks to challenge the reasoning of the Chamber based solely on these two limbs, he must fail as the Chamber did not follow such a myopic approach. Further, Taylor fails to squarely challenge the reasonableness of the approach actually pursued by the Trial Chamber.[470]

(b) The Trial Chamber's conclusion that SAJ Musa's plan to attack Freetown was abandoned is supported by the weight of the evidence

168. Taylor's second argument fails to bring forth a "wealth of evidence" but instead identifies only four examples which he asserts support his claim that SAJ Musa's plan was not abandoned.[471] A close review of Taylor's arguments establishes that they essentially boil down to an assertion that his view of the evidence is to be preferred over that of the Trial Chamber. Further, many of the arguments are simply repeats of those made and rejected at trial. Crucially, however, at no time does Taylor address the standard for appellate review and identify why the Trial Chamber's findings are unreasonable or wholly erroneous.

169. Taylor's first example, which relies on Gullit's failure to follow Bockarie's instruction and wait for reinforcements, should be dismissed as it fails to address in any way why the Trial Chamber was unreasonable to conclude that Gullit's act was borne of military necessity rather than insubordination.[472] Given that the Trial Chamber dedicated 17 paragraphs of its Judgement to consider this issue, it is clear that it was a conclusion reached after a detailed and considered analysis of all the different testimonies.[473]

170. Taylor's second example, concerning alleged tensions over the absence of communications and Gullit only contacting Bockarie once he had taken State House, must fail for the same reason as the first.[474] Taylor's arguments set out in paragraphs 196 to 198 of his appeal brief effectively mirror those he ran at trial, as is evidenced by the Trial Chamber's summary of same at paragraphs 3415 and 3416 of the Judgement. At trial, the Trial Chamber

[469] Judgement, para. 3452.
[470] Given that the Trial Chamber did not differentiate between the plans by reference to goals and plans alone, Taylor's brief argument concerning crimes committed in Kono and Makeni is irrelevant (see Taylor Appeal, para. 192). This is, however, a recurring argument. See the response to Ground 11 below for a more detailed response to this argument.
[471] Taylor Appeal, para. 194. See also Taylor Appeal, para. 196.

concluded that the evidence relied on by the Defence regarding the tensions between Gullit and Bockarie did "not support the Defence contention that coordination between Bockarie and Gullit broke down at this point".[475] The Trial Chamber then proceeded to note the evidence which supported the conclusion that coordination and cooperation continued between Bockarie and Gullit.[476] Taylor advances no argument why these findings are unreasonable. Taylor simply recycles the arguments he made at first instance, arguing that the evidence he identifies should be preferred over the evidence accepted by the Trial Chamber, but does not elevate this argument to the standard required on appeal.

171. It appears that the third example – Fornie's statement that, even after SAJ Musa's death, SAJ Musa's troops wanted to take Freetown before the RUF – is alleged by Taylor to be somehow supportive of his claim that the weight of evidence does not support the theory that SAJ Musa's plan was abandoned.[477] However, Taylor does not frame his criticism of the Chamber's approach to Fornie's statement in terms of reasonableness, as is required on appeal. Instead, he simply states that he finds this statement "difficult to reconcile with...1,000 troops abruptly changing course and following the plan of an RUF commander."[478] The standard is not what Taylor considers "difficult to reconcile". It is whether he can show that the Trial Chamber acted unreasonably or reached a wholly erroneous conclusion. Taylor fails to do so.

172. The fourth example relied on by Taylor concerning Exhibit P-067 is again a rehash of an argument rejected by the Trial Chamber.[479] It should be dismissed because no argument is advanced as to why the Trial Chamber's approach was unreasonable.

173. Finally, Taylor's argument that the RUF and AFRC could have been simply cooperating against a common enemy and that therefore the Trial Chamber was not justified in concluding that this was pursuant to the Bockarie/Taylor plan[480] is not justified. Rather, given that Taylor was certainly aware that the AFRC shared a common enemy, he had every reason to include in his plan contingencies for their incorporation in the attack on Freetown.

The following were considered by the Trial Chamber to show continued cooperation and coordination: Bockarie's promise to send reinforcements, the evidence of TF1-371 and Mongor who testified that divisions and problems between the AFRC and RUF were not serious, the evidence of frequent communications between Buedu and the troops in Freetown on strategic matters and the continued attempts to facilitate the entry into Freetown of troops under Bockarie's command.

[480] Taylor Appeal, para. 202.

174. As demonstrated above, Taylor has not articulated any errors requiring disturbance of the Trial Chamber's findings. This Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

GROUND 11: The Trial Chamber correctly considered and applied the actus reus of planning when convicting Taylor of planning the Bockarie/Taylor plan

(i) Overview

175. The Prosecution notes that two thirds of the arguments advanced by Taylor under this Ground were not notified in his Notice of Appeal.[481] In an Appeal comprising over 40 Grounds, the absence of notice clearly prejudiced the Prosecution. The Prosecution requests that the arguments which were not properly notified be summarily dismissed.[482]

176. In any event, all of Taylor's arguments challenging the Trial Chamber's assessment of the actus reus of planning should be dismissed because they fail to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention. As discussed below, the Trial Chamber correctly convicted Taylor of planning the crimes committed during the late 1998 attacks on Kono and Makeni and during the invasion of and retreat from Freetown[483] as a result of a proper application of the law to its reasonable factual findings.

(ii) Taylor designed an act or omission constituting the crimes charged

177. Taylor's first argument is flawed because it fails to acknowledge that the accepted international jurisprudence takes a broad approach to the actus reus of planning.[484] The planning of conduct which constitutes the statutory crime/s charged attracts criminal liability. Further, the accused need only design an act or omission and not necessarily a crime or underlying offence per se if he has the intent that a crime or underlying offence be committed in the execution of the plan, or if he is aware of the substantial likelihood that a crime or underlying offence will be committed.[485] The objective of a plan is irrelevant if it is to be achieved by an act that constitutes a crime, or if an accused is aware of the substantial likelihood a crime will be committed in achieving the plan.[486]

[481] Taylor Notice, paras. 35, 36 provide notice of the arguments set out in Taylor Appeal, paras. 212-16. Taylor did not provide notice that he would seek to challenge the absence of a legal element in the planning conviction or his conviction for planning crimes committed in Kono and Makeni as part of the late 1998 offensive. See Taylor Appeal, paras. 207-11, 217-18.

[482] See, e.g., RUF AJ, para. 466, fn. 1198.

[483] Judgement, para. 6994. See also Judgement, para. 6971.

[486] Boškoski & Tarčulovski AJ, paras. 169-72. See also Kordić & Čerkez AJ, paras. 26, 30.

178. Set in this proper legal context, it is clear that, contrary to Taylor's submissions,[487] the Trial Chamber did find that the Bockarie/Taylor plan was a plan involving the commission of the Indictment crimes and not simply a plan to undertake "a military operation … 'a plan for the RUF/AFRC Freetown invasion'".[488]

179. Having properly directed itself that it "must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused, alone or with others, intentionally planned the criminal conduct constituting the crimes charged",[489] the Trial Chamber made the following findings in the section headed "Findings on the Physical Elements of Planning":[490]

> …in November 1998, Sam Bockarie [and] the Accused … designed a plan for the RUF/AFRC forces to carry out a two-pronged attack on Kono and Kenema with the ultimate objective of reaching Freetown, releasing Foday Sankoh from prison and regaining control. The Accused emphasized to Bockarie that this military operation should be "fearful"…the Accused told Bockarie to use "all means" to capture Freetown.[491]
> …the actual plan which established the various military targets and the modus operandi of the attack was designed during the November 1998 meeting between Bockarie and the Accused. The objective to capture Kono prior to moving to Freetown was integrated in the plan upon advice from the Accused and the aim to make the operation "fearful" was articulated.[492]

180. These findings clearly establish that the Trial Chamber found that Taylor expressly designed the modus operandi of the operation to be "fearful" and to use "all means". When set in the context of the Judgement's other findings that the word "fearful" carried considerable meaning in Sierra Leone's civil war,[493] it is evident that the Trial Chamber correctly found that all the elements of the actus reus of planning had been established.[494]

181. During the Sierra Leone war, an order to "make the area fearful" was a clear instruction to commit crimes.[495] The Judgement is replete with testimony explaining what was meant by this terrible order.[496] Further, and as more fully argued in the response to Ground 15

[496] See, e.g., Perry Kamara who explained that making an area "fearful" entailed "destruction of life and property, where there will be killings, amputations, burning of houses, destruction of bridges, setting up road blocks. All those things would happen and that will have made the area fearful" (see Judgement, paras. 646, below, by instructing that Freetown be captured "by all means",[497] Taylor intended or had an awareness of the substantial likelihood that the Indictment crimes would be committed. Therefore, by telling Bockarie "to make the operation "fearful",[498] and to use "all means",[499] Taylor was clearly stating that the modus operandi of the operation was to commit the Indictment crimes. Put another way, and using the language of the jurisprudence, "conduct which constituted crimes" was planned by Taylor and Bockarie.[500] At the very least, Taylor's use of the terms in the context of the Sierra Leonean conflict indicates his awareness of the substantial likelihood that the operation would result in the commission of crimes.

182. Further, support for the conclusion that, by using the terms "fearful" and "all means", Taylor designed a plan involving the commission of the Indictment crimes, or designed a plan with the requisite awareness of the substantial likelihood that statutory crimes would be committed, is provided by two other categories of findings.[501] The first is the Trial Chamber's findings on the modus operandi pursued by the RUF/AFRC, that is, the finding that, by the start of the Indictment period, the RUF's war strategy was one "based on a campaign of terror against the civilian population".[502] "After Operation Stop Election, and during the remainder of the civil war in Sierra Leone, the RUF and later the AFRC/RUF continued to deliberately use terror against the Sierra Leonean population as a primary modus operandi of their political and military strategy."[503]

183. The second category of findings is that regarding what Bockarie understood by the terms "all means" and "make fearful". The Chamber found that: (i) shortly after receiving the use "all means" instruction, "Bockarie named the operation "Operation No Living Thing, implying that anything that stood in their way should be eliminated";[504] and (ii) "SAJ Musa ordered his forces to proceed to Freetown without killing, looting or burning, indicating that he did not have a campaign of terror in mind, as Bockarie did."[505] Further, circumstantial evidence of the import of the term "fearful" is provided in the series of findings made by the Chamber regarding the implementation of Bockarie's order to make things "fearful" during the withdrawal from Freetown.[506] The Chamber concluded by stating that it was satisfied "that Bockarie did direct Gullit to use terror tactics against the civilian population on the retreat from Freetown, and that Gullit complied."[507] Therefore, by telling Bockarie, the leader of a rebel group whose "military campaign was inextricably linked to the commission of the crimes charged in the Indictment",[508] to use "all means" and to make the operation "fearful", a criminal plan comprising the commission of the Indictment crimes was designed. Most certainly, given Taylor's continuous awareness of a campaign of atrocities being committed by the group with whose leader he devised this plan, Taylor was aware of the substantial likelihood that Indictment crimes would be committed in the execution of the plan.[509]

184. Taylor erroneously argues that the instructions "to make the operation "fearful"[510] and "to use 'all means' to get to Freetown" were only considered by the Trial Chamber as part of its assessment of the mens rea of planning.[511] Taylor seeks to make this artificial division in the Chamber's reasoning in order to try to remove the requisite criminal element from the actus reus.[512] However, it is clear that this division did not occur. The section of the Judgement headed "Findings on the Physical Elements of Planning",[513] contains the findings that "the military operation should be "'fearful'"[514] and that Bockarie was to "use 'all means'".[515] Further, in this section, making the operation "fearful" is found to be an "aim".[516] Finally, paragraph 6959 of the Judgement, which is also in the section dealing with the actus reus of planning, states that Taylor and Bockarie "established the various military targets and the modus operandi of the attack" at the November 1998 meeting. In the immediately following sentence the targets are identified as Kono and Freetown and the modus operandi as being to make the operation "fearful". Therefore, the Trial Chamber found that the commission of criminal acts, specifically, the Indictment crimes,[517] was clearly and deliberately expressed to be central to the execution of the plan. Certainly, given his continuous awareness of a campaign of atrocities being committed by the RUF/AFRC, Taylor had awareness of the substantial likelihood that the execution of the acts he designed with Bockarie would result in the commission of the Indictment crimes.[518] Accordingly, as required by the jurisprudence on the actus reus of planning, criminal conduct was clearly part of the design of the plan.[519]

185. The fact that the terms "fearful" and "all means" also featured in the Trial Camber's discussion of mens rea is not problematic. Clearly, by articulating that the operation was to be "fearful" and that the troops were to use "all means", Taylor was also manifesting his intent. The Trial Chamber was entitled to use this evidence in its consideration of both the actus reus and the mens rea of planning.

186. Given the specific meaning that the term "fearful" had in the context of the Sierra Leonean conflict, it is clear that comparisons with ICTY cases such as Brđanin are irrelevant and that the present case can be distinguished on its facts.[520]

187. As is evidenced above, it is clear from considering the totality of the Judgement and all the applicable jurisprudence that the Trial Chamber committed no error of law and properly found all the legal elements of planning satisfied in this case.

(iii) No error in finding that the Bockarie/Taylor plan substantially contributed to the commission of crimes

188. Taylor's second argument under this Ground is equally flawed. For the reasons set out in the responses to Grounds 8 and 10 above, Taylor's argument that the Trial Chamber erred in fact when it found that Bockarie and Taylor contemplated Gullit's participation in executing the plan at the time they designed it and that SAJ Musa's plan was abandoned following his death is without merit.[521]

189. Similarly, Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber committed an error of law must fail.[522] The context of the paragraph in the Judgement in which the word "evolution" is used makes it clear that the word is ascribed no special meaning by the Trial Chamber.[523] In paragraph 6966 of the Judgement, the word is used to describe the unfolding or ongoing

The relevance of these citations to the proposition is not clear. Nevertheless, the Prosecution assumes that the argument Taylor is making is effectively a repeat of that made in Ground 8. Ground 8 is specifically referenced at Taylor Appeal, fn. 447. However, the Prosecution observes that Taylor's arguments made under Ground 10 are also related to his argument regarding "abandonment" made in Taylor Appeal, para. 215. Therefore, the Prosecution relies on the arguments made in response to Grounds 8 and 10, in so far as relevant, to meet Taylor's challenge under this ground.

implementation of the original "Bockarie/Taylor plan" in the period after SAJ Musa's death. This conclusion is supported by the fact that the immediately preceding paragraph describes the changes which occurred in the short period following Musa's death.[524] Taylor's claims about the creation of a legal fiction are, therefore, without merit.

(iv) No error in Taylor's conviction for planning the crimes committed during the attacks on Kono and Makeni

190. Taylor erroneously argues that the Trial Chamber failed to find that any crimes were committed in Kono and Makeni pursuant to the "Bockarie/Taylor plan".[525] First, the Trial Chamber found that crimes were committed in Kono[526] and Makeni.[527] Secondly, even if the Trial Chamber did not find that any crimes were committed in those locations pursuant to the plan, given that Taylor was convicted of one plan, to invade Freetown via Kono and Makeni, the multiple crimes the Chamber found committed in Freetown[528] support Taylor's conviction for planning.[529]

(v) Conclusion

191. As demonstrated above, Taylor has not articulated any legal or factual errors requiring disturbance of the Trial Chamber's findings. This Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

[524] In Judgement, para. 6965, the Trial Chamber considers SAJ Musa's "own advance" to Freetown, notes Gullit's assumption of leadership following SAJ Musa's death, recalls its finding that Bockarie "assumed effective control over Gullit's actions and that SAJ Musa's plan was abandoned". The Trial Chamber then summarises some of the factors it considered when analyzing the change from the SAJ Musa plan to the "Bockarie/Taylor plan".

[526] For Count 9, see Judgement, para. 1424. There is also credible evidence on the trial record that numerous other crimes were committed in Kono in the implementation of the plan. For Counts 2, 3 and 4, Witness TF1-567 testified that (i) the corpses of civilians were seen in Koidu Town following the attack by AFRC/RUF fighters in late 1998; and (ii) women were raped by AFRC/RUF fighters following the capture of Koidu Town during the late 1998 offensive (TF1-567, T. 2 July 2008 p. 12913; the Trial Chamber found TF1-567 to be "generally credible" at Judgement, para. 317). For Count 10, there is evidence on the record that forced mining was taking place in Kono in late 1998 (an objective of the Bockarie/Taylor plan was to take Kono to obtain the diamonds) (Judgement, para. 1720). Note fn. 3938 lists Kokuima as one of the mining sites. This location is a neighbourhood of Koidu Town. Also for Count 10, there is evidence that civilians were forced to carry arms and ammunition from Buedu to Superman Ground in Kono in readiness for the attack on Kono as part of the late 1998 offensive (TF1-567, T. 2 July 2008 p. 12913). For Count 11, there is evidence that mining equipment was looted following the recapture of Koidu Town at the end of 1998 (TF1-367, T. 21 August 2008 p. 14270).

[527] As indicated in the Disposition at paragraph 6994(b) of the Judgement, Bombali District is included in the planning conviction for Count 9 only. The Trial Chamber found that witness Komba Sumana, a former child soldier, "was present and fought during attacks carried out by RUF/AFRC rebels...at [inter alia]...Binkolo and Makeni in Bombali District during the period of approximately August through December 1998" (Judgement, para. 1540). GROUND 12: No error of law or fact in finding Taylor received daily updates on the Bockarie/Taylor plan

(i) Overview

192. Taylor erroneously alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in fact and law in finding him liable for planning based on the updates he received about the implementation of the Bockarie/Taylor plan to invade Freetown. This Ground of Appeal, therefore, rests on Taylor's allegations in his 10th and 11th Grounds where he argues that SAJ Musa's plan to attack Freetown was not abandoned and that the plan implemented was not the one he designed.[530] Since those Grounds fail for the reasons set out in the responses thereto, so must Ground 12.

193. Taylor was not held liable for planning based on an "expanded plan",[531] or on the daily updates he received. Neither the actus reus nor the mens rea for planning[532] require action by an Accused after the plan is formulated. Therefore, the updates have no impact on Taylor's planning conviction.[533] Further, the Chamber engaged in a reasoned and rigorous assessment of the witnesses whose testimony it relied on in finding that Taylor received these updates. The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground since Taylor fails to establish any error of law[534] or fact[535] warranting appellate intervention.

(ii) Taylor's planning conviction does not hinge on the updates he received

194. The Chamber's findings on Taylor's awareness of the implementation of the plan do not impact his planning conviction but merely serve to establish a clearer picture of Taylor's intimate involvement during the Freetown invasion. The Chamber's rejection of other Prosecution allegations about Taylor's involvement during the implementation of the plan,[536] and its finding that it had not been established that Taylor directed or had control over the Kono and Freetown operations in December 1998 and January 1999,[537] illustrate the caution it exercised in reaching its findings, only convicting Taylor when there was proof beyond reasonable doubt.

195. Taylor's argument is also without merit because the Chamber did not find that the plan "evolved", so the updates do not have the legal significance he attributes to them.[538] As discussed in the responses to Grounds 10 and 11, the Chamber found that it was the Bockarie/Taylor plan that was implemented and that substantially contributed to the crimes committed.[539] In the subsequent paragraph, the Chamber merely noted that Taylor was aware of how the plan he designed was being implemented.[540]

196. Below, the Prosecution addresses Taylor's unsupported contention that the Chamber erred in finding he was in contact with Bockarie, directly or through Yeaten, during the Freetown invasion. In any event, as discussed above, the impugned findings have no impact on Taylor's planning conviction.

(iii) The Trial Chamber correctly found that Taylor was in contact with Bockarie, directly or through Yeaten, during the Freetown invasion[541]

197. Taylor treats the impugned finding as two distinct findings, i.e. that he was in direct contact with Bockarie, and, separately, that he was in indirect contact with Bockarie through Yeaten. This does not adequately portray the Chamber's singular finding, but the totality of the evidence supports both limbs. Taylor fails to establish any error.

198. The impugned finding[542] is consistent with several other findings regarding updates at other times during the conflict.[543] The Chamber based this finding on the testimony of a number of witnesses,[544] many of whom were radio operators in Buedu monitoring or facilitating radio communications with Liberia, present in the radio room when such communications occurred, or present when Bockarie spoke on the satellite phone with Taylor or Yeaten[545] who was Taylor's subordinate and represented him.[546] The witnesses were careful to substantiate the basis on which they believed the communications took place.[547]

(a) The Chamber correctly considered TF1-516's testimony on direct contact between Taylor and Bockarie

199. Taylor's challenges to the testimony of TF1-516 and Mohamed Kabbah, on whom the Chamber relied in relation to direct contact between Taylor and Bockarie, as uncorroborated must fail.[548] The Chamber's finding relates to contact between Taylor and Bockarie generally, not to the specific instances thereof and the Chamber properly concluded, based on the totality of the evidence before it, that their testimony was corroborative.

200. The Chamber conducted a rigorous and reasoned assessment of TF1-516's credibility, rejected Defence allegations similar to those Taylor makes in his appeal, found him generally credible and accepted his testimony as consistent.[549] The Chamber's assessment included several relevant considerations: that TF1-516 was present during the satellite communications between Taylor and Bockarie and overheard them;[550] that he served as a radio operator for Yeaten in Liberia for two years,[551] in addition to his role as radio operator for the RUF in Sierra Leone (a fact absent from Taylor's arguments).[552] Therefore, TF1-516 was certainly in a position to know that "020" was the call sign of the radio in the Executive Mansion and that the operator there – code named Sky 1 - reported to Taylor.[553]

201. Taylor offers no support for his suggestion that others could or did use this call sign.[554] Indeed, the evidence of both Prosecution and Defence witnesses indicates this would have been very difficult, because, inter alia, the Executive Mansion was securely guarded, including by the ATU, SSS and SBUs, and there were very strict procedures about who could enter.[555]

202. The Chamber also considered that TF1-516 stated that "Sky 1" was the name of the radio operator with the call sign "020" at the Executive Mansion,[556] and that "Sky 1" reported to Taylor.[557] Taylor's contention that the Chamber heard no other evidence that "020" was the call sign of the radio at the Executive Mansion overlooks evidence considered by the Chamber.[558] The Chamber noted that TF1-585 testified that operator "Sky 1" in Liberia would send "448" messages to the RUF, and that "[s]everal witnesses confirmed that 'Sky 1' operated a radio for Taylor in Liberia, either at Taylor's Executive Mansion or at Roberts International Airport."[559]

(b) The Chamber correctly considered Mohamed Kabbah's testimony on direct contact between Taylor and Bockarie

203. Taylor's challenges to the testimony of Mohamed Kabbah must also fail. The Trial Chamber addressed and dismissed Taylor's concerns,[560] committing no error in the exercise of its discretion. Following a rigorous and reasoned assessment, the Chamber concluded that Kabbah was generally credible and credible in respect of the specific allegation.[561] Again, the Chamber relied on several considerations. Kabbah worked at various locations as a radio operator for the RUF during the conflict.[562] During the period Gullit was in Freetown, Kabbah heard Bockarie inform Taylor[563] by satellite phone that the RUF were in Freetown.[564] Therefore, contrary to Taylor's assertion,[565] Kabbah testified to the content of the conversation. The fact that this witness was present during the conversation, as noted by Taylor,[566] lends significant reliability to his testimony on the matter.

204. [See this paragraph in full in Confidential Annex A]

(c) The Chamber correctly considered the testimony of other witnesses

205. Taylor's assertion that the fact two other Prosecution witnesses, Dauda Aruna Fornie and Abu Keita, did not testify as to contact specifically between himself and Bockarie amounts to an error in the Chamber's assessment of evidence is unsupported in law or jurisprudence and is misleading.[567] The Chamber did rely on the testimony of these two witnesses in reaching the impugned finding, i.e. that Taylor was in contact with Bockarie either directly or through Yeaten.[568] The fact that they testified as to indirect rather than direct contact between Taylor and Bockarie is irrelevant and any reason as to why they did not explicitly testify on direct contact is purely speculative. Further, Kabbah testified that he was present along with Tiger, Pascal and "Foday" when Bockarie made the call to Taylor.[569] Therefore, neither of the two witnesses Taylor asserts could have testified about this instance were present.

206. Taylor fails to establish that the Chamber erred in finding he was in direct contact with Bockarie, and, as discussed below, he also fails to establish any error in finding he was in contact with Bockarie through Yeaten.

(d) The Chamber correctly assessed the contact between Bockarie and Yeaten

207. Contrary to Taylor's assertions,[570] the Chamber did not "hedge its bets" in finding that he was in contact with Bockarie through Yeaten during the Freetown invasion,[571] which finding reflects the totality of the evidence before the Chamber. Taylor's submissions on this issue simply attempt to relitigate the unsuccessful position he put forward at trial.[572] Taylor fails to establish any error in the Chamber's finding.

208. Taylor's claim that Fornie's evidence is the only evidence of Bockarie's contact with Yeaten during the Freetown invasion is incorrect.[573] The Chamber also relied on evidence from Fornie, TF1-516, Kabbah, TF1-567, TF1-585, and Abu Keita,[574] all of whom it considered generally credible.[575] The Chamber also correctly dismissed Defence challenges, as well as challenges by Taylor himself during his testimony, to some of this evidence,[576] and noted the strength of the evidence in support of its finding.[577] Further, several other findings support the Chamber's findings on the frequent contact between Yeaten and Bockarie,[578] and, as discussed below, that Taylor would have been informed about this contact.

209. Kabbah explained that even if a message from Yeaten did not specifically refer to Taylor, it was understood in the RUF that Yeaten was the conduit for the Accused's instructions as he was the Accused's "right-hand man".[579] The fact Kabbah may not have been aware of the relationship between Taylor and Yeaten as it actually transpired from other witnesses, in no way invalidates the Chamber's finding.[580] Indeed, the Chamber describes Yeaten as Taylor's "subordinate"[581] and, contrary to Taylor's contention,[582] although there was testimony Yeaten did not obtain Taylor's authorisation for every single action, the Chamber did not find that this suggested that the actions taken were covert rather than simply being consistent with his general instructions from Taylor, but without specific authorisation.[583] There was also substantial evidence that Yeaten represented Taylor.[584] Therefore, the Trial Chamber did not abuse its wide discretion in assessing evidence to conclude that Taylor would have known about Yeaten's communication with Bockarie.[585]

210. Taylor's contention that the Chamber made no findings as to the regularity of contact between Yeaten and Bockarie[586] is belied by the Chamber's statement that contact between Taylor and Bockarie, either directly or through Yeaten, was "frequent and even daily"[587] and, specifically in relation to contact through Yeaten, that "during the Freetown invasion, they spoke at least two or three times a day".[588]

(e) The Chamber correctly considered Taylor's testimony

211. Contrary to Taylor's contention,[589] the Chamber properly noted,[590] assessed and rejected his testimony denying contact with Bockarie directly or through Yeaten, and provided several reasons for its rejection.[591] Based on its assessment, even if the Chamber had not found Taylor's testimony to be inconsistent, there were other bases on which it would have reasonably rejected the evidence. The Chamber correctly noted there were inconsistencies in Taylor's testimony.[592] Taylor's attempts to substitute his self-serving interpretation of his testimony for the Chamber's[593] fails to establish any error in the Chamber's assessment.[594]

212. The Chamber relied on four, not three, extracts from Taylor's testimony in rejecting his denials, and did not misconstrue them.[595] Taylor first testified that "it would not be out of reason for [Yeaten's] operator to call Sam Bockarie".[596] Contrary to Taylor's contention, this was clearly a generic statement, no longer in response to the question concerning events around the time that Koidu and some Nigerian soldiers were captured.[597] Taylor then testified that in January of 1999 there was communication between the Government of Liberia and Bockarie immediately after the Freetown invasion and into the negotiation for the ceasefire.[598] However, Taylor later testified that senior members of his regime were not in contact with Bockarie during the Freetown invasion because they would have no reason to be,[599] and, finally, that he was not in contact with Bockarie at all during the Freetown invasion.[600]

213. Therefore, Taylor's first statement is inconsistent with the testimony that there was no contact with Bockarie during the Freetown invasion. Further, his admission in his second statement to being in contact with Bockarie immediately thereafter would also "cast doubt"[601] on his testimony that he was not in contact during the invasion. Taylor's testimony that he had given Bockarie a satellite phone[602] and loved him like a son,[603] and that he was the "point President" who "led the whole Sierra Leonean situation",[604] contradicts his denial of speaking to Bockarie during the crisis that affected the whole region and of doing "[n]othing" while Freetown was burning.[605]

214. Taylor's allegation that the Chamber shifted the burden of proof is also unfounded.[606] The Chamber set out[607] and applied the correct standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt.

The impugned statement[608] does not constitute a shift in burden,[609] it is part of the Chamber's deliberations and is an application of the principle that "[w]hen faced with competing versions of events, it is the prerogative of the Trial Chamber to determine which one is more credible."[610] The Chamber merely noted that Taylor's testimony did not raise a reasonable doubt. In reaching the relevant finding,[611] the Chamber applied the correct "beyond reasonable doubt" standard.[612]

(iv) The Chamber correctly found that Taylor passed on instructions to Bockarie to transfer the Pademba Road prisoners to Buedu and correctly found Taylor advised Bockarie[613]

215. This instruction was not the only evidence that Taylor advised Bockarie,[614] and it illustrates that Taylor was aware of exactly what was going on in Freetown.[615]

(a) The Chamber correctly found that Taylor passed on instructions to Bockarie to transfer the Pademba Road prisoners to Buedu

216. The Chamber did not abuse its wide discretion to evaluate the evidence before it in finding that Taylor directed Bockarie to send prisoners released from Pademba Road Prison to RUF controlled areas.[616] The Chamber based this finding on the evidence of Dauda Aruna Fornie,[617] as corroborated by TF1-516.[618] The Chamber noted that their accounts differed slightly,[619] yet reasonably deemed inconsequential the differences between whether the conversation preceding the instruction was conducted via radio station "Base 1" or satellite phone, as TF1-516 used the Liberian radio call signs, "020" or "Base 1", even when referring to satellite phone conversations.[620]

217. The Chamber also noted that although Fornie testified that Bockarie instructed Mohamed Kabbah to send a radio message to Gullit to send the released prisoners to the rear for their safety,[621] Kabbah failed to mention this instruction.[622] The Chamber noted that having testified prior to Fornie, Kabbah was not questioned further on his testimony concerning the release of the Pademba Road prisoners. However, this was not the reason for its acceptance of Fornie's evidence,[623] the passage of time between the event and his testimony was.[624] Taylor's concern with "strategic scheduling of witnesses"[625] could have been remedied by recalling Kabbah to testify. Further, Kabbah's testimony that he only monitored one conversation between Bockarie and Taylor is completely unrelated to whether or not he was instructed to send a radio message to Gullit.[626]

(b) The Chamber correctly found that Taylor advised Bockarie during the Freetown invasion

218. The Trial Chamber acted within its discretion to evaluate evidence in finding that Taylor ordered the release of Pademba Road prisoners[627] and in accepting testimony that (i) during the Freetown invasion Bockarie contacted Taylor and then drafted instructions for the commanders regarding military strategy;[628] (ii) Yeaten instructed Bockarie to send reinforcements;[629] and (iii) Bockarie "would contact Benjamin to consult him on some decisions before he ever took them".[630] Recalling the Chamber's findings on the relationship between Yeaten and Taylor,[631] all this evidence supports the Chamber's finding that Taylor gave advice to Bockarie.[632] Regardless, the finding on the release of prisoners alone justifies the later finding that Taylor advised Bockarie.[633]

(c) The Chamber correctly found that Taylor was in frequent contact with Bockarie during the Freetown invasion

[633] In reaching its finding, the Chamber was not required to cite to anything (contra Taylor Appeal, para. 243), having given the clear reasons for its finding in the "Deliberations" section where it referred to the evidence it relied on to establish Taylor advised Bockarie.

219. Taylor also fails to establish that the Chamber relied on the instruction regarding the Pademba Road prisoners to establish there was direct contact between himself and Bockarie.[634] The Chamber was clear that this order reached Bockarie through Yeaten, and, therefore, indirectly and was entitled to consider this as one of the instances of contact with Bockarie which led it to conclude that Taylor was in frequent contact with him.

(v) Conclusion

220. The updates Taylor received about the implementation of the plan the Chamber found he and Bockarie designed have no impact on his planning conviction.[635] Further, the Chamber committed no error in reaching the impugned findings. The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground of Appeal since Taylor fails to establish any error warranting appellate intervention.

GROUND 13: The Trial Chamber correctly found that the Bockarie/Taylor Plan substantially contributed to the crimes committed in Freetown

(i) Overview

221. In the Judgement, the Trial Chamber correctly applied the law on planning to find that the "Bockarie/Taylor plan" substantially contributed to the crimes committed by Gullit and his troops during the invasion of and retreat from Freetown.[636] In making this finding, the Trial Chamber correctly and reasonably considered that "Bockarie's effective control over Gullit's actions" was one factor which supported this finding.[637] However, when determining Taylor's responsibility for planning the Indictment crimes, the Trial Chamber was not required to determine whether any element of superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute was satisfied.[638] Taylor's extensive arguments regarding the Trial Chamber's alleged failure to make the necessary findings to establish Bockarie's "effective control" over Gullit to the standard which would be required for assessing whether Article 6(3) liability had been proven are completely irrelevant to Taylor's planning conviction.[639]

222. In so far as any of the arguments under this Ground can be considered independent challenges to the factual basis on which the Trial Chamber determined that Bockarie had sufficient control over Gullit's actions[640] such that the crimes committed by Gullit's forces were considered products of the Bockarie/Taylor plan, these should also be dismissed because they fail to explain why no reasonable trier of fact, based on the evidence, could have evaluated the evidence as the Trial Chamber did.[641] This Ground is, therefore, without merit and should be dismissed.

(ii) No legal error in the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie assumed control over Gullit's actions

223. Taylor's arguments regarding the Trial Chamber's alleged failure to make the requisite findings to establish Bockarie's effective control over Gullit can be briefly dealt with as they are based on an erroneous conflation of the legal elements of planning and superior responsibility.[642] The Trial Chamber determined Bockarie had "effective control over Gullit's actions" in the context of an assessment of Taylor's responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the Indictment crimes.[643] Planning is an autonomous form of individual criminal responsibility, separate from superior responsibility.[644] An independent examination of whether a superior-subordinate relationship existed between Bockarie and Gullit was not required in order to support Taylor's planning conviction.[645] While the Chamber used the term "effective control", it was clearly using the term in a factual sense and was not seeking to import the legal meaning behind Article 6(3) responsibility to the term. Indeed, Bockarie's control over Gullit was only one of several factors used by the Trial Chamber to determine that the plan developed by Bockarie and Taylor "substantially contributed"[646] to the crimes committed by Gullit and the forces under his command in Freetown.[647]

[646] Judgement, para. 470, citing Kordić & Čerkez AJ, para. 26.
[647] In finding that the Bockarie/Taylor plan "substantially contributed" to the crimes committed by Gullit, the Trial Chamber also relied on evidence that: (i) after SAJ Musa's death Gullit contacted Bockarie; (ii) following their re-connection Bockarie and Gullit had "frequent daily contact"; (iii) "Bockarie issued a number of specific instructions to Gullit, including instructions leading to the commission of crimes, which were implemented by Gullit and his troops"; (iv) Gullit reported to Bockarie as the overall commander; and (v) Gullit referred to Bockarie with deference (see Judgement, paras. 3464, 3481, 3485, 3611(viii), 6965).

224. In short, the legal elements of superior responsibility have no place in an analysis of the legal elements of planning. Taylor, therefore, fails to establish an error of law which invalidates the Trial Chamber's decision.

(iii) No factual error in the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie assumed control over Gullit's actions

225. Underlying all the submissions made under this Ground is Taylor's erroneous contention concerning "effective control" dealt with above. However, in so far as some of his submissions can be considered separate, independent challenges to the Trial Chamber's assessment of the facts, these should also be dismissed for the reasons set out below.[648]

(a) The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Bockarie ordered Gullit to execute soldiers

226. The Trial Chamber properly relied on Perry Kamara's evidence that Bockarie gave Gullit orders to execute captured ECOMOG soldiers near State House.[649] The Trial Chamber correctly weighed this evidence and found it credible.[650] Moreover, on one view, Kamara's evidence was not hearsay at all, if he heard Bockarie give such an order over the radio. According to Kamara, Bockarie told Gullit he had "no prison" for ECOMOG and as a result the captured soldiers were killed.[651] Even assuming that the evidence was hearsay, the Trial Chamber found that Bobson Sesay corroborated Kamara's testimony that Gullit ordered the execution of captured ECOMOG soldiers, even if Bobson Sesay did not attribute the order to Bockarie.[652] In reconciling the two accounts, the Chamber specifically considered as circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness, Kamara's position as a radio operator located in Freetown, which would have made him privy to the communications between Gullit and Bockarie, whereas Bobson Sesay, as a fighter on the ground, would not always have had that access.[653] To the extent that it can be argued that the testimony was not corroborated, as explained in the response to Ground 1, it is not an error of law to rely on uncorroborated hearsay. The Chamber also recalled that it found Kamara a generally credible witness.[654] The Trial Chamber appropriately assessed and relied on Kamara's testimony regarding this order.

[648] All of Taylor's quibbles with the evidence of individual orders ignore the overwhelming evidence that Gullit was implementing Bockarie's orders to commit crimes. Ten witnesses, from a variety of vantage points, testified that Bockarie gave orders for the destruction of Freetown: (1) Kabbah, T. 15 September 2008 p. 16171; (2) TF1-516, T. 8 April 2008 pp. 6931-32, 6935; (3) Fornie, T. 3 December 2008 pp. 21590-93; (4) TF1-585, T. 8 September 2008 pp. 15726-30; (5) Kamara, T. 6 February 2008 pp. 3234-35; (6) Lansana, T. 22 February 2008 pp. 4561, 4563, 4568); (7) Pyne, T. 19 June 2008 pp. 12281-82; (8) TF1-375, T. 24 June 2008 pp. 12612-13; (9) Mongor, T. 11 March 2008 pp. 5821, 5825; (10) Bobson Sesay, T. 22 April 2008 pp. 8299-300; T. 23 April 2008 pp. 8328-30. The Trial Chamber's findings establish that these orders were carried out.

227. Second, Taylor's argument about the "misrepresentation" of Kamara's testimony is effectively an attempt to substitute alternative interpretations of the evidence.[655] As this Chamber observed in RUF, "claims that the Trial Chamber...should have interpreted evidence in a particular manner, are liable to be summarily dismissed."[656]

(b) The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Bockarie ordered Gullit to execute Martin Moinama

228. Equally without merit are Taylor's submissions challenging the Trial Chamber's reliance on the testimony of Foday Lansana and Alice Pyne regarding the execution of Martin Moinama.[657] In relation to the evidence of both, it is well accepted that hearsay evidence may be admitted.[658] Further, and as conceded by Taylor,[659] the majority of the evidentiary difficulties were considered by the Trial Chamber during its careful analysis of the testimony of both witnesses.[660] In this careful analysis, the Trial Chamber weighed the probative value of their evidence, given under solemn declaration, and concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents. Taylor fails to explain why no reasonable trier of fact, based on the evidence, could have reached the conclusion the Trial Chamber did.

229. The other "evidentiary weaknesses" identified by Taylor in relation to the testimony of Pyne and Lansana are also without foundation.[661] The fact that Lansana and Pyne were husband and wife is irrelevant per se. Indeed, Taylor fails to explain why this fact would be relevant in this case. Further, Pyne's testimony clearly does not cast doubt on the reliability of Lansana's testimony. Lansana said he monitored Bockarie ordering Gullit to execute Moinama, whereas Pyne simply testified that she herself did not monitor such a message.[662] Both testimonies are not mutually exclusive. Finally, the inconsistencies in Lansana's evidence regarding his knowledge of Moinama's execution seized upon by Taylor amount to nothing. Lansana's testimony is clearly confused in parts but Defence counsel clarified matters during cross-examination by putting to the witness that he only mentioned that Moinama had been killed in 2007.[663] Lansana agreed. Therefore, there is no inconsistency, as the position reverts to Lansana saying in 2003 that he did not know of Moinama's whereabouts and then in 2007 advising that he had been killed. The Trial Chamber dealt with this inconsistency.[664] Taylor's arguments challenging the testimonies of Pyne and Lansana and the Trial Chamber's assessment of them, therefore, fail.

(c) The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Gullit and his troops took orders from Bockarie

230. Taylor's submissions challenging the Trial Chamber's finding that Bockarie was in effective control of Gullit's actions based on "Gullit's persistent insubordination"[665] should also be dismissed. His submissions are, in large part, inappropriate attempts to relitigate arguments made and rejected at trial and to substitute alternative interpretations of the evidence. Indeed, they are also raised by Taylor in his submissions under Ground 10.[666] Crucially, however, at no time either in this Ground or in Ground 10, does Taylor address the standard for appellate review and identify why the Trial Chamber's findings are unreasonable or wholly erroneous.[667] Accordingly, these submissions should be summarily dismissed.[668]

231. Taylor's submissions regarding the point from which the Trial Chamber found Bockarie to be in effective control are irrelevant and should also be dismissed.[669] As argued above, Bockarie's control over Gullit was only one of the factors which the Trial Chamber relied upon to determine that the Bockarie/Taylor plan "substantially contributed" to the crimes committed by Gullit.[670] Thus, any minor discrepancies in wording do not establish prejudice on this point such that it warrants appellate intervention.[671]

232. Taylor's submissions in paragraphs 278 to 281 of his appeal brief simply argue that various witnesses' testimony should have been interpreted in a different manner. The appellate standards of review are not satisfied as Taylor does not address why no reasonable trier of fact, based on the evidence, could have reached the conclusion the Trial Chamber did.

[666] The following were raised by Taylor at trial and also in Ground 10: (i) Gullit's failure to follow Bockarie's instruction and wait for reinforcements which the Trial Chamber considered an act of military necessity rather than insubordination; (ii) alleged tensions over the absence of communications with Gullit only contacting Bockarie once had taken State House; (iii) arguments relying on Exh. P-067 (see Taylor Appeal, paras. 271, 273, 274).

[671] The issue boils down to a marginal difference in time, i.e. "during" or "after". Given the facts, the difference in time can likely be measured in hours.

Such arguments, in so far as they amount to independent allegations of errors of fact, should be summarily dismissed.[672]

(iv) No error committed by the Trial Chamber in its planning conviction

233. Taylor's final arguments made in paragraphs 284 to 286 regarding the alleged error in the Trial Chamber's determination that the "Bockarie/Taylor plan" substantially contributed to the crimes committed during the invasion of and retreat from Freetown are an amalgamation of arguments made in Grounds 6 to 13. These arguments should be dismissed for the reasons discussed above in the responses to Grounds 6 to 13.

234. For the reasons more fully set out in the response to Ground 11 above, Taylor's criticism regarding the absence of findings that any crimes were committed during the implementation of the "Bockarie/Taylor plan" in Kono and Makeni is also without merit.[673]

(v) Conclusion

235. This Ground fails to allege any error of law that invalidates the Trial Chamber's decision, or any error of fact that constitutes a miscarriage of justice. Therefore, this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

GROUND 14: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding that Taylor had the requisite mens rea for planning based on his awareness of crimes being committed by the RUF and/or AFRC

(i) Overview

236. Having considered the totality of the evidence, the Trial Chamber did not err in fact or in law by finding that Taylor had the requisite mens rea for planning the invasion of Freetown. Taylor misreads or misconstrues the Judgement when he argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that his awareness of past crimes committed by the RUF and/or AFRC was sufficient to satisfy the mens rea for planning. The Trial Chamber correctly relied on his continuous awareness of a campaign of crimes being committed by the RUF and/or AFRC, and, as will be clear in the response to Ground 15, also correctly relied on Taylor's specific instructions to make the operation "fearful" and to use "all means"[674] as the basis for his mens rea for planning. Consequently, this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed as Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention.

[672] RUF AJ, para. 40.
[673] Taylor Appeal, para. 287.
[674] In Taylor Appeal, para. 298, Taylor repeats arguments he made in Ground 17 of his Appeal Brief. The Prosecution has responded to these arguments in its response to Ground 17 rather than here.

(ii) No error in the Chamber's reliance on Taylor's awareness of crimes by AFRC/RUF to satisfy the mens rea of planning

237. Contrary to Taylor's submission,[675] the Trial Chamber did find that Taylor made a plan to commit statutory crimes. This has been addressed in the response to Ground 11.

238. Turning to his mens rea, the Trial Chamber correctly set out the mens rea for planning in paragraph 469 (ii) of its Judgement. The Accused must have directly intended that crimes be committed pursuant to the plan, or must have been aware of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed in the execution of that design.[676] Taylor incorrectly argues that to find an accused guilty of planning the Prosecution has to establish his mens rea for each crime committed pursuant to the plan, for example, each murder, each rape and each act of pillage regardless of the nature of the plan in question.[677] This is not the law. This is particularly true, when, as here, an accused's plan is broad and intended to indiscriminately perpetrate a limitless number of violent crimes in a large area, and involving many perpetrators. In such circumstances, it cannot and is not required that the Prosecutor establishes every aspect of the mens rea of all crimes planned or envisaged in the plan.

239. Taylor can demonstrate no error in the Trial Chamber's finding in this regard. Specifically, in paragraph 6970 of its Judgement, the Trial Chamber expressly found proof that Taylor both directly intended that the specific crimes charged in Counts 1-11 of the Indictment be committed pursuant to the plan, and was aware of the substantial likelihood that these crimes would be committed. This finding was based on the totality of the evidence. This included his direction that the invasion of Freetown be made "fearful" and that it should be captured by "all means". As discussed in the response to Ground 15, the Judgement is replete with the testimony of credible Prosecution witnesses and even a Defence witness that, by making an operation "fearful", it was known that crimes against civilians were to be carried out, including killings, amputations, destruction of property and burning of houses.[678] Similarly, as detailed in the response to Ground 15, by finding that Taylor instructed that the attack on Freetown be carried out "by all means" the Chamber reasonably found that Taylor intended or had an awareness of the substantial likelihood that the Indictment crimes would be committed pursuant to the plan.[679]

240. The Trial Chamber also relied on Taylor's continuous awareness of a campaign of crimes committed by the RUF and/or AFRC to find that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that crimes would occur in the execution of the plan.[680] The Trial Chamber based this on the fact that as "as President of Liberia and a member of the ECOWAS Committee of Five the Accused was continuously receiving detailed reports of the atrocities committed by RUF/AFRC troops in Sierra Leone."[681] It also relied on the fact that Taylor was well aware of the crimes committed by RUF/AFRC in their military operations and that their war strategy was explicitly based on a widespread or systematic campaign of crimes against civilians. It was also based on Taylor's own statements, for example, his testimony that by April 1998 he was aware that the RUF was engaged in a campaign of atrocities against the civilian population of Sierra Leone. The Accused also testified that there were "news reports in May 1998 which made him aware that the RUF was engaged in a 'horrific campaign [...] against the civilian population of Sierra Leone."[682] Against this context of Taylor's express knowledge that the RUF had previously committed and was continuing to commit crimes against civilians in Sierra Leone at this time, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that the RUF would also perpetrate crimes against civilians in the course of the Freetown invasion as this was its war strategy or modus operandi. Moreover, it is clear in light of the above that the Trial Chamber reasonably found that Taylor was, contrary to his submissions,[683] not only aware of the past crimes committed by AFRC/RUF, but continuously aware of crimes being committed by them.

241. To the extent that the Chamber relied on Taylor's awareness of past crimes, while it may not be dispositive of intent alone, it is, contrary to Taylor's submissions,[684] a relevant consideration. As the ICTR Appeals Chamber has held, "By its nature, intent is not usually susceptible to direct proof. Only the accused himself has first-hand knowledge of his own mental state, and is unlikely to testify to his own genocidal intent. Intent thus must usually be inferred."[685] As a result, it is well established that intent may be proven through inference from the relevant facts and circumstances of a case which include the general context.[686] Taylor has not demonstrated any error in this regard.

242. Paragraph 297 of Taylor's Appeal Brief and the Baglishema Trial Judgement cited[687] are of no assistance to the issue raised in this Ground. Rather, they concern the "reason to know" standard for superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute. Notwithstanding, in paragraph 297 Taylor himself acknowledges that in some circumstances, "future crimes" can "be inferred from past conduct" and that it can be a "legitimate consideration" in determining whether a superior had reason to know that his subordinates had committed or would commit crimes.[688] Therefore, while awareness of past crimes may not on its own be sufficient to prove intent, it is relevant, as recognised by Taylor, in the evaluation of the all the circumstances under which a finding of mens rea can be drawn.

243. Moreover, the Prosecution does not dispute Taylor's position that a risk that crimes might or could be committed is insufficient for a finding of indirect intent.[689] As submitted above and as correctly found by the Trial Chamber,[690] for indirect intent the Accused must be aware of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed in the execution of the plan. However, Taylor has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber committed any error in this regard.

(iii) Conclusion

244. In light of the above, Taylor has failed to show that the Trial Chamber's approach was incorrect, or that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion that Taylor possessed the mens rea for planning the invasion of Freetown. Consequently, this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

GROUND 15: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding that Taylor instructed that the Freetown operation be made "fearful" and that "all means" should be used or in finding that he had the requisite mens rea for liability as a planner

245. Having considered the totality of the evidence, the Trial Chamber did not err in fact or in law by relying in part on the evidence of Isaac Mongor and TF1-371 in finding that Taylor

[687] Taylor Appeal, para. 297, fn. 600.

[688] In the paragraph of the Hadžihasanović & Kubura AJ cited by Taylor in paragraph 299 of his Appeal Brief, the Appeals Chamber found no error in the Trial Chamber's reliance on the accused's awareness of, and failure to punish past acts of plunder in addition to other factors when establishing his mens rea under Article 6(3) for plunder (Hadžihasanović & Kubura AJ, para. 295)(emphasis added). To this end, the Prosecution underscores that Taylor's direct intent for the crimes committed pursuant to the plan or his awareness of the substantial likelihood that crimes would be committed during the implementation of the plan was correctly derived from his continuous awareness of a campaign of crimes being committed by the RUF and/or AFRC and also from his direct instructions regarding the invasion of Freetown.

[690] Judgement, paras. 469 (ii), 6969.

had the requisite mens rea for liability as a planner.[691] Contrary to Taylor's position, these two witnesses corroborate each other, as Taylor's instructions that the operation be made "fearful" and that "all means" be used are evidence of the same thing, notably Taylor's intent, or awareness of the substantial likelihood, that the Indictment crimes would be committed during the Freetown invasion. Consequently this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed, as Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention.[692]

(i) No error in the Chamber's reliance on the testimony of Isaac Mongor

246. Taylor erroneously claims that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on Isaac Mongor's evidence that he (Taylor) instructed that the invasion of Freetown should be fearful, as it was uncorroborated hearsay[693] and lacked credibility.[694]

247. As explained in the response to Ground 1, it is not an error of law to rely on uncorroborated hearsay.[695] The Trial Chamber was clearly aware that Mongor's evidence on this instruction was hearsay.[696] Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber correctly weighed the evidence and found it credible. The Trial Chamber considered that it was given under solemn declaration and took into account the circumstantial guarantees of its trustworthiness and the totality of the circumstances under which it was given, including the longstanding cooperation between Taylor and Bockarie, and Taylor and RUF/AFRC forces in Sierra Leone, and concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents, in the sense of being voluntary, truthful and trustworthy. The Chamber's methodology in assessing all the uncorroborated hearsay evidence it heard was clearly set out at paragraphs 166, 168 and 169

[691] The Trial Chamber also relied on other evidence to find Taylor's mens rea as a planner as shown in Judgement, para. 6969 and as discussed in the response to Ground 14.

[692] In Taylor Appeal Ground 15, he repeats arguments he made in Ground 7 of his Appeal regarding inconsistencies with TF1-371's evidence of the alleged satellite phone conversation between Bockarie and Taylor, see Taylor Appeal, para. 308. The Prosecution relies on and incorporates the same arguments it set out in its response to Ground 7 in this regard.

[694] Taylor Appeal, paras. 304-05.

[695] The cases cited in Taylor Appeal, fn. 612 do not contradict this position. They are simply a few examples of cases at the ICTR where the Trial Chambers concerned, in the exercise of their discretion, have not relied on uncorroborated hearsay to find an allegation proven. They do not support the position that it is an error of law to do so. Indeed, in three of the five examples cited, the fact that the allegation was not proven was not only because the evidence was uncorroborated hearsay. In Bizimungu TJ, paras. 683-93, the Chamber also found that the Defence evidence raised a doubt in the Prosecution case regarding this allegation about which Witness LEL testified, and in Bizimungu TJ, paras. 756-64, it is clear that the Chamber had significant concerns regarding witness GHY's general credibility in addition to noting the fact that his evidence was uncorroborated hearsay; Nzabonimana TJ, para. 1454, the Chamber noted that "in this instance" it did not find the witnesses' evidence, which was uncorroborated hearsay, sufficient to support the allegation, rather than finding that as a rule all uncorroborated hearsay would not be relied upon; see also Nzabonimana TJ, paras. 68-69, 72-74.

[696] See Judgement, para. 3116, where the Trial Chamber noted that "Bockarie told him that Taylor said ... that the operation should be fearful."

of its Judgement. It is evident from these paragraphs that the Trial Chamber exercised the appropriate caution when relying on it as set out in the response to Ground 1.

248. Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to assess the veracity of the source of the hearsay is misguided.[697] In relying on uncorroborated hearsay evidence, a Trial Chamber must take into consideration the indicia which it set out at paragraphs 166 and 168 to 169 of its Judgement. In assessing the credibility of a hearsay statement, factors taken into account by a Trial Chamber include cross-examination of the witness by a party and such circumstantial guarantees of reliability as are relevant to the source.[698] While obviously the source of the hearsay him or herself cannot be tested in cross-examination, Taylor's claim that the evidence is un-testable[699] is incorrect, given, as argued below, that a Trial Chamber can test the underlying circumstances that provide circumstantial guarantees of the trustworthiness of the hearsay. In this case, the Prosecution notes that the Defence extensively cross-examined Mongor about the fact that it was Taylor who instructed that Freetown should be captured and that this instruction was relayed by Bockarie. Significantly, the Defence chose not to cross-examine Mongor about his testimony that Taylor instructed that the operation be fearful.[700] Having considered the entirety of the witness's testimony and all the factors set out in paragraphs 166, 168-169 of its Judgement, the Chamber acted within its discretion in reasonably finding this evidence reliable.

249. The Judgement and trial record are replete with circumstantial guarantees of the trustworthiness[701] of this hearsay evidence, as Taylor's instructions at the end of 1998 to make the Freetown operation "fearful" and that "all means" be used did not occur in a vacuum, but against a backdrop of longstanding cooperation between Taylor and Bockarie, and Taylor and AFRC/RUF forces in military operations in Sierra Leone. For example, from August 1990, Taylor provided the RUF with a training camp in Liberia[702] and in March 1991 he was involved in the invasion of Sierra Leone by NPFL and RUF troops.[703] After the arrest of Foday Sankoh in March 1997 and the appointment of Sam Bockarie as the leader of the RUF, Taylor began to deal with Bockarie, for example, to facilitate the delivery of ammunition, including the critical Magburaka arms shipment which had a direct impact on the commission of crimes by the RUF/AFRC.[704]

250. Around the time of the Intervention in February 1998, the interactions between Taylor and the AFRC/RUF leaders, in particular Bockarie, became more frequent. Until Bockarie's travel to Monrovia at the end of 1998, Taylor participated in all of the key tactical decisions on the military operations of AFRC/RUF. For example, the Trial Chamber found that Taylor instructed the AFRC/RUF to capture Kono.[705] Taylor directly instructed Bockarie to maintain,[706] and recapture Kono, resulting in the unsuccessful Fitti-Fatta attack in mid-June 1998.[707] Taylor also sent and or facilitated the provision of materiel to the AFRC/RUF[708] and met several times with Bockarie, giving him sizeable amounts of arms and ammunition[709] which were used by AFRC/RUF troops in Sierra Leone.[710] By the end of 1998, after months of such intense interaction between Taylor and the AFRC/RUF leadership, especially Bockarie, the latter was the pivotal and central actor in the ability of the AFRC/RUF to receive Taylor's support and instructions. In these circumstances, it is credible that Taylor would plan with Bockarie how to carry out the Freetown invasion and specifically that it "be fearful" and "all means" be used.

251. Moreover, the Judgement is replete with references to the testimony of credible Prosecution witnesses and a Defence witness that by making an operation "fearful" it was known that crimes against civilians were to be carried out. Such testimony includes:

> [m]aking an area fearful ... entailed 'destruction of life and property, where there will be killings, amputations, burning of houses, destruction of bridges, setting up road blocks. All those things would happen and that will have made the area fearful';711

[704] Judgement, paras. 4845, 5408-09, 5559-60, Taylor sent Ibrahim Bah to Freetown to negotiate the delivery of a very large shipment of arms and ammunitions to Magburaka with Bockarie and Johnny Paul Koroma, which arrived by plane sometime between September and December 1997. This large shipment was distributed among the AFRC/RUF Junta forces and used in fighting ECOMOG and SLPP forces during and after the Intervention and in offensives against civilians, including in Operation Pay Yourself, as well as in subsequent offensives in Kono where crimes were committed. The ammunition was kept by Bockarie in Kenema and used in his activities in the area, which included the commission of crimes.

And in that message he talked about some areas as well and it was not just one message" (see Judgement, para. 2067 citing Kamara, T. 6 February 2008 p. 3235). The Chamber found Kamara credible at Judgement, para. 236.

> [the RUF in Kono District adopted a policy of] "making the area fearful" which meant that 'they would kill, burn down houses so that they make sure that the people who were living in the areas when there was those things going on they would be afraid and that even the enemies against whom they were fighting would also be afraid';[712]
> [to the RUF, making an area] "fearful" meant "to kill civilians, burn houses and to instil fear into ECOMOG, or any other opposing troop that would want to get into that area easily";[713]
> [that] in order to comply with the orders given by their commanders to make the area "fearful", the AFRC/RUF forces displayed the corpses at the various junctions around Yardo Road in order to frighten off any other civilians that might have wanted to come to or remain to Koidu town.[714]

252. The Chamber also referred to Issa Sesay's testimony that "making an operation 'fearful' means destruction, committing crimes against civilians and the opposing troops."[715] There can therefore be no doubt about what an instruction to make a campaign fearful meant. Moreover, as will be seen below (see paragraphs 266-267 and 269), TF1-371 also gave evidence which the Chamber found credible that Taylor gave the same instruction the following day but using different language, specifically that Freetown should be captured "by all means".

253. Another circumstantial guarantee of the trustworthiness of this hearsay is that at the time that Bockarie told Mongor about Taylor's instruction, the trial record establishes that Bockarie had reason to confide in Mongor. Specifically, Mongor, one of Taylor's NPFL commanders, was an NPFL trainer in charge of RUF recruits at the camp in Liberia when Bockarie was trained there[716] and he became one of the most senior RUF commanders under Bockarie.[717] Moreover, Mongor had the necessary rank and experience to understand and assess what was meant by "fearful" in light of his experience of both NPFL and RUF methods of combat.[718] Indeed, he was one of the RUF's highest ranking commanders in 1998.[719]

[718] The Prosecution recalls that he is a Liberian who was captured and trained by the Charles Taylor's NPFL in 1989 and remained with them until 1991, see Mongor, T. 31 March 2008 pp. 6231-33.

Consequently, in light of all these circumstantial guarantees of the veracity of this hearsay, the Trial Chamber reasonably relied on Mongor's evidence.

254. Taylor's additional complaints about the way the Trial Chamber assessed Mongor's testimony are without merit.[720] The Chamber correctly noted Mongor's status as an accomplice and treated his evidence with appropriate caution in accordance with established case law.[721] This is demonstrated by its careful consideration of his testimony, prior statements, the fact that originally he was not forthcoming regarding the role of Taylor in the Freetown invasion, and the letter of immunity he received from the Prosecution.[722] The Chamber expressly and carefully considered the money he received from the Prosecution, concluding that "he did not testify for monetary gain".[723] Having considered all of these factors, and noting that Mongor had been subjected to a cross-examination totaling over 24 hours in which he had been "pressed heavily and repeatedly accused of lying",[724] it found Mongor to be a credible and reliable witness generally and in respect of this specific allegation.[725] The fact that the Chamber declined to rely on all parts of his testimony is, contrary to Taylor's submission, not problematic. It is well established that a Trial Chamber can rely on parts of a witness's testimony, but decline to rely on all of it.[726] Moreover, as the ICTY Appeals Chamber has held, a Trial Chamber's cautious approach in its assessment of the reliability of a witness's evidence can be evidenced by the exercise of its discretion to rely on specific parts of their testimony while rejecting other parts as not credible.[727]

255. Contrary to Taylor's claim,[728] Mongor's testimony as to when he was told about the "fearful" instruction is not inconsistent. There is nothing inconsistent about his testimony that Bockarie told him of Taylor's instructions regarding the mission in a private conversation and that Bockarie repeated that information the morning after, during a meeting with other commanders.[729] The fact that the Trial Chamber did not find that any of the witnesses who attended the commanders' meeting testified that Bockarie told them that the operation must be fearful at that meeting has no bearing on whether Bockarie said it to Mongor the previous evening. In addition, while Taylor correctly states that Witness TF1-371, who attended the meeting, made no reference to any instruction that the operation be fearful, he did testify that Taylor instructed that "all means" be used to capture Freetown,[730] which the Chamber found to be consistent in meaning with making the operation "fearful" (see paragraphs 266-267 and 269 below).[731]

256. Moreover, contrary to Taylor's submission,[732] there is circumstantial evidence that Bockarie conveyed the instruction to other commanders. Indeed, Witness TF1-367 testified that after Sesay met Bockarie in Buedu following his return from seeing Taylor in Monrovia, he convened a meeting with senior officers in Kono. At that meeting, the instruction was given to the fighters that the operation should be made fearful.[733] However, contrary to Taylor's argument, the Chamber did not rely on this to make its finding that Taylor gave this instruction, rather, as argued above, it reasonably relied on Mongor's testimony.

257. For the reasons more fully set out in the response to Ground 11 above, Taylor's argument that the Trial Chamber did not find that any crimes were committed in the only successful part of the plan, the offensives on Kono and Makeni is without merit.[734]

258. In light of the above, Taylor has failed to demonstrate that the Chamber erred in its reliance on Mongor's testimony in finding that Taylor instructed that the Freetown invasion be fearful and that this evidenced the requisite mens rea for planning.

(ii) No error in the Chamber's reliance on the testimony of TF1-371

259. Taylor erroneously claims that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on TF1-371's evidence that he (Taylor) instructed Bockarie to use "all means" to capture Freetown as it was uncorroborated hearsay.[735]

260. The Trial Chamber was clearly conscious that TF1-371's evidence on this instruction was hearsay.[736] Nevertheless, the Chamber weighed the probative value of his evidence and concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents. It is evident from paragraphs 166, 168 to 169 of its Judgement that the Trial Chamber exercised the appropriate caution when relying on this uncorroborated hearsay evidence as set out in the response to Ground 1.

261. Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to assess the veracity of the source of this hearsay[737] is misguided. The Prosecution notes that the Defence cross-examined TF1-371 about the fact that the instruction to capture Freetown came from Taylor via Bockarie and notwithstanding, having considered all the factors set out in paragraphs 166, 168-169 of the Judgement, found this evidence reliable.[738]

262. Moreover, the Prosecution relies on its submissions at paragraphs 249-250 above as to the circumstantial guarantees about the trustworthiness of the source of the hearsay, Bockarie, in light of the context of his long history with Taylor and the ongoing relationship between Bockarie, the RUF/AFRC and Taylor, especially in 1998.

263. [See this paragraph in full in Confidential Annex A]

264. Taylor's additional complaints about the way the Trial Chamber assessed TF1-371's testimony are without merit.[739] The Chamber correctly noted TF1-371's status as an accomplice and treated his evidence with appropriate caution in accordance with established case law.[740] This is demonstrated by its careful consideration of his testimony, prior statements and prior testimony before this Tribunal.[741] Having considered all of these factors, it found TF1-371 to be a credible and reliable witness generally and specifically in regard to this allegation.[742] The fact that the Chamber declined to rely on all parts of his testimony is, contrary to Taylor's submission, not problematic.[743] Moreover, the fact that the Trial Chamber declined to rely on his testimony in other parts of its Judgement underscores that it exercised full and careful scrutiny before relying on it in this instance.[744]

265. Moreover, the Chamber did not mischaracterise TF1-371's evidence.[745] In its summary of TF1-371's evidence, the Trial Chamber quotes directly from his testimony that Taylor instructed Bockarie "We should by all means capture Freetown."[746] The critical part of this sentence are the words "all means", which, contrary to the Defence submission, are the words that the Chamber cited in inverted commas throughout its Judgement, sometimes prefaced by the word "by"[747] and sometimes by "use", the choice of which does not change their meaning.[748] In any event, Taylor does not state in which way the meaning of "all means" is potentially changed. Consequently, this argument must fail.

266. In the totality of the circumstances considering the following factors, the Trial Chamber did not err, as alleged by Taylor,[749] when it reasonably found that by instructing that the RUF capture Freetown "by all means" he intended or had an awareness of the substantial likelihood that the Indictment crimes would be committed.[750] First, Taylor instructed that Freetown be captured "by all means" within a war in which the Chamber found that the RUF and RUF/AFRC repeatedly committed crimes against civilians. Specifically, it found that the RUF and RUF/AFRC military campaign was inextricably linked to the commission of crimes charged in the Indictment.[751] By the start of the Indictment period, the RUF's war strategy had "evolved" to be one "based on a campaign of terror against the civilian population."[752] Secondly, Taylor gave this instruction the day after his other command that the invasion "be fearful" which also meant that crimes should be committed against civilians, for example, amputations, killing (see paragraphs 251-252). Thirdly, the Chamber found that immediately after he received the "by all means" instruction, Bockarie coined the name "Operation No Living Thing" for the invasion of Freetown implying that "anything that stood in their way should be eliminated."[753] Indeed in his testimony, TF1-371 used the phrase Operation No Living Thing within two words of "by all means":

> He came in excited and he said, well, he had just been on line with Mr. Taylor ... and he said he gave the instruction directly to his commander this is Operation No Living Thing. We should by all means capture Freetown. That is instruction he had received to capture Freetown so as to force the government to negotiation.[754]

A few moments later, TF1-371 testified:

> Q. Now you said that Sam Bockarie said, "This is Operation No Living Thing. We should by all means capture Freetown". Did he explain what he meant by Operation No Living Thing?
> A. I mean he meant at this point in time, I mean that nobody – no commander in that operation was supposed to allow any enemy forces or capture any enemy forces to bring to his headquarters and nobody was supposed to stand in the way of > the operation. Anything that stand in the way should be eliminated and the target was to capture Freetown to force the government into negotiation.[755]

267. While the Prosecution recalls that the Chamber found that on cross-examination TF1-371 clarified that it was Bockarie who coined the name "Operation No Living Thing" rather than Taylor, it does not affect the fact that, in this context, the phrase "by all means" could not have meant "by all available military means" as Taylor suggests.[756] Moreover, when questioned about what happened to civilians during the invasion of Freetown, TF1-371 testified that civilians were killed, houses burned and amputations carried out and that this was consistent with TF1-371's description of Operation No Living Thing.[757]

268. In light of the above, Taylor has failed to demonstrate that the Chamber erred in its reliance on TF1-371's testimony in finding that Taylor instructed that the Freetown invasion be achieved "by all means" and that this in part evidenced the requisite mens rea for planning.

(iii) No error in the Chamber's overall approach

269. Taylor mischaracterises the Chamber's conclusions by artificially separating its findings about his instructions to make the Freetown invasion fearful and to use all means to achieve it. These two instructions are consistent, as both instructed the RUF to utilise its well-known terror tactics. As argued above, by finding that Taylor instructed Freetown be invaded "by all means", the Chamber reasonably found that Taylor intended or had an awareness of the substantial likelihood that the Indictment crimes would be committed in the implementation of the plan. Similarly, as stated above at paragraphs 251-252, the Judgement is replete with the testimony of credible Prosecution witnesses and a Defence witness that by making an operation "fearful", it was known that crimes against civilians were to be carried out.

270. Clearly, therefore, both instructions entailed the commission of Indictment crimes and consequently corroborate each other to demonstrate that Taylor possessed the intent for planning the fearful invasion of Freetown. These instructions and the other evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber[758] establish the requisite mens rea for planning.

(iv) Conclusion

271. Taylor has failed to show that the Trial Chamber's approach was incorrect or that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion that Taylor possessed the mens rea for planning the invasion of Freetown. Consequently this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

PART III: NO ERRORS TO INVALIDATE THE AIDING AND ABETTING CONVICTIONS

272. The Trial Chamber correctly convicted Taylor of aiding and abetting the crimes charged in Counts 1 to 11 of the Indictment as a result of the proper application of the law to its reasonable factual findings. Taylor's challenges to his aiding and abetting conviction focus on the Trial Chamber's alleged application of an erroneous mens rea standard and the Chamber's alleged failure to properly assess Taylor's mens rea in relation to individual acts of assistance and resulting crimes. Taylor also seeks to challenge the Trial Chamber's findings on the actus reus of aiding and abetting by alleging errors in the Chamber's application of the elements of the actus reus to the facts before it. In the process, Taylor frequently conflates the requirements of the actus reus with those of the mens rea.

273. In his submissions, Taylor takes an unsupported fragmentary approach to the Trial Chamber's findings, attempting to isolate and assess whether each particular act of assistance, support and encouragement could give rise to aiding and abetting liability. Taylor's arguments ignore the Chamber's holistic approach based on the totality of the evidence in reaching its findings. There is nothing in the elements of aiding and abetting nor the associated jurisprudence which requires a Chamber to analyze each individual act of assistance in relation to the required actus reus and mens rea.[759]

274. The Trial Chamber properly assessed Taylor's conduct in light of all the evidence on the trial record, including his awareness of crimes by the RUF, AFRC/RUF forces[760] and his persistent and cumulatively critical contributions to the military operations and very existence of an organisation engaged in a relentless campaign of violence and exploitation against the civilian population of Sierra Leone.[761] Based on the totality of the evidence, the Trial Chamber properly concluded that the totality of Taylor's assistance was "critical"[762] and at times "indispensable"[763] to the RUF and AFRC, and substantially contributed to the crimes for which he was convicted.[764]

[759] See, e.g., Perišić, TJ, para. 1624: "The element of substantial assistance for aiding and abetting does not require that an accused provided the specific weapon used by the perpetrator, as the element may be established by the numerous other forms of practical assistance described above, which substantially facilitated the perpetrators' crimes" (emphasis added). See also Perišić, TJ, para. 1625: "The Majority is satisfied that the overwhelming majority of Perišić's actions in support of the VRS facilitated the commission of future crimes" (emphasis added).

GROUND 16: The Trial Chamber correctly defined the mens rea for aiding and abetting

(i) Overview

275. None of the alleged errors relied on by Taylor under this Ground establish that the Trial Chamber relied on an incorrect standard for mens rea. Taylor's assertions that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to apply the 'purpose requirement' of facilitating the principal crimes, misapplied the standard of knowledge for the mens rea, and failed to define the mens rea in relation to the actus reus, are incorrect in law. Taylor's submissions fail to demonstrate any error by the Trial Chamber which would serve to invalidate the decision and warrant appellate intervention.

276. The Trial Chamber correctly applied the elements of the mode of liability of aiding and abetting developed in the jurisprudence of this Appeals Chamber. This standard is consistent with customary international law and the fundamental principles of criminal law. Taylor fails to demonstrate any reason to alter these elements as he proposes or to adopt his position that providing assistance to an insurgency with knowledge that the group utilises an operational strategy of terror against civilians is the "prerogative of states."

(ii) The Trial Chamber properly defined the mens rea for aiding and abetting

277. The Trial Chamber properly set out the mens rea for aiding and abetting as:

> i. The Accused performed an act with the knowledge that it would assist the commission of a crime or underlying offence or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of [sic] underlying offence; and
> ii. The Accused is aware of the essential elements of the crime committed by the principal offender, including the state of mind of the principal offender.[765]

278. The Trial Chamber added that while the conduct of the accused that amounts to the assistance must itself be intentional, it is not required that the accused intend the crime or underlying offence. Rather, it is only required that the accused had knowledge that his acts assist the commission of the crime or the underlying offence.[766]

[765] Judgement, para. 486 (footnotes omitted).
[766] Judgement, para. 487.

279. The Trial Chamber applied the correct elements of the mens rea for aiding and abetting. The jurisprudence of this Appeals Chamber as well as of the ad hoc tribunals establishes that the mens rea for aiding and abetting does not require that the accused's assistance be provided for the "purpose" of facilitating the principal's crimes. Rather, the act must be done with knowledge or awareness of the substantial likelihood that it will facilitate the underlying offence.[767]

(iii) The Trial Chamber's standard comports with SCSL jurisprudence

280. In the Brima et al. (AFRC) Appeal, Kamara challenged the Trial Chamber standard for the mens rea for aiding and abetting. This Appeals Chamber found that the Trial Chamber was correct in applying the following definition, which was subsequently applied in the Appeal Judgments in RUF and CDF:

> The mens rea required for aiding and abetting is that the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator.[768]

(iv) Customary international law is consistent with the knowledge standard

281. Taylor attacks the settled law of this Court and that of the ad hoc tribunals by asserting that under customary international law, knowledge is insufficient to establish the mens rea for aiding and abetting. Rather, Taylor argues that it must be shown that the actus reus was performed with "purpose",[769] which he equates with conduct "specifically directed" or "specifically aimed" to assist, encourage or lend moral support to a particular crime.[770] Taylor's claim that the entire corpus of jurisprudence of the ICTR, ICTY and SCSL is flawed because customary international law never accepted the knowledge standard is without merit.

282. The United Nations and its Member States have recognised that post-Second World War cases are evidence of state practice at the time.[771] These cases repeatedly applied the knowledge standard as the required mens rea for aiding and abetting. In the Zyklon B case, a [771] The United Nations General Assembly unanimously affirmed the principles of international law recognised by the Nuremberg tribunals. See Affirmation of the Principles of International Law Recognized by the Charter of the Nürnberg Tribunal. Also, the United Nations War Crimes Commission ("UNWCC") said that cases before British military courts are declaratory of the state of the law and illustrative of actual state practice. See UNWCC Report I, p. 110. The UNWCC reported on at least 89 cases, e.g. UNWCC Report XV, p. xvi. The UNWCC's reports also support a knowledge standard, see UNWCC Report VII, p. 71 ("This condition is fulfilled if circumstance constituting complicity are present e.g. the [Accused] knew that his action would lead to the commission of a war crime and either intended this consequence or was recklessly indifferent with regard to it").

British military court sentenced two industrialists who supplied poison gas to the Nazis to death because they "knew that the gas was to be used for the purpose of killing human beings."[772]

283. The Nuremberg Military Tribunal ("NMT") in the United States occupied zone applied a knowledge standard in the twelve subsequent Nuremberg trials held pursuant to Control Council Law No. 10. In United States v. Flick, the Tribunal convicted two defendants for knowingly assisting Nazi crimes. Flick was convicted because he knew of the widespread crimes of the SS and nevertheless contributed money critical to its operations. The Tribunal found that "[o]ne who knowingly by his influence and money contributes to the support [of war crimes and crimes against humanity] must, under settled legal principles, be deemed to be, if not a principal, certainly an accessory to such crimes".[773]

284. The French Appellate Tribunal confirmed the conviction of Hermann Roechling, an industrialist, for the inhumane use of forced labour in his factories noting that the mens rea for war crimes under the jurisprudence developed by the NMT allowed convictions solely on the basis of knowledge of the criminal activity.[774] The Appellate Tribunal noted that Roechling "knew in what way such foreign workers were supplied."[775] The Appellate Tribunal also found the president of the Board of Directors of the Roechling company, von Gemmingen-Hornberg, guilty of war crimes as he knew of the inhumane treatment of workers in the plant and had authority to change it but failed to act.[776]

285. In The Einsatzgruppen Case, Klingelhoefer was convicted for forwarding lists of Communist party functionaries "aware [they] would be executed",[777] and Fendler was convicted because he failed to stop summary executions although he knew of them.[778] In Schonfeld, a British military court acquitted defendants Karl Brendle and Eugen Rafflenbeul, as despite having made a physical contribution to the commission of the offence, they had no knowledge that they were doing so.[779]

286. The ICTY was mandated to apply rules of international humanitarian law "which are beyond any doubt part of customary law".[780] The Trial Chamber in Furundžija correctly determined after an analysis of these cases that under customary international law, knowledge is sufficient to establish the mens rea.[781] Taylor wrongly asserts that the analysis in Furundžija was incomplete.[782] "The Ministries Case" cited by Taylor actually confirms the knowledge standard.[783] In seeking only to rely on Rasche, Taylor disregards the fact that the court based Rasche's acquittal not on the lack of proof of his mens rea, but on the finding that no actus reus was shown, as the court held that the provision of a loan for the purposes of an unlawful enterprise was not a violation of international law.[784] For other accused, the NMT in the Ministries Case confirmed the knowledge standard. In Puhl's conviction, the NMT acknowledged that selling valuables of Holocaust victims "was probably repugnant to [Puhl]",[785] but convicted him because he knew that the property was stolen.[786] Likewise, while the NMT accepted that Von Weizsaecker and Woermann might not have approved of the deportation of Jews, the proper question was "whether they knew of the program".[787]

287. The 1996 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind adopted by the International Law Commission ("ILC Draft Code") provides further evidence that customary international law at the time of the Indictment period provided for aiding and abetting liability based on the knowledge standard. As noted by the Furundžija Trial Chamber, the Draft Code was the work of a body of outstanding experts in international law, including governmental legal advisers, elected by the United Nations General Assembly.[788] Article 2(3)(d) of the Draft Code imposes criminal responsibility upon an individual who "knowingly aids, abets or otherwise assists, directly and substantially, in the commission of such a crime, including providing the means for its commission" (emphasis added).

288. Taylor's analysis of the jurisprudence overlooks that the Tadić Trial Chamber at the ICTY also concluded, on the basis of its review of post-World War II cases, that an individual who "knowingly participated in the commission of an offence that violates international humanitarian law and his participation directly and substantially affected the commission of that offence" will be found criminally culpable.[789]

289. Further, Ambassador Scheffer, who was relied on in Taylor's submissions, opined that post-World War II jurisprudence from both national military courts and the Nuremberg Military Tribunals consistently applied a knowledge standard of mens rea for aiders and abettors, concluding that "[c]ustomary international law applies the knowledge standard for aiding and abetting as a mode of participation."[790]

290. Taylor attacks the jurisprudence of the Special Court and the ad hoc tribunals, arguing that customary international law requires that in order to attach liability for aiding and abetting, at a minimum it must be shown that the actus reus was performed with "purpose,"[791] which he also equates with the conduct being "specifically directed" or "specifically aimed" to assist, encourage or lend moral support to a particular crime.[792] Taylor's arguments conflate jurisprudence that uses the terms "specifically directed" or "specifically aimed" in discussing the requirement for the actus reus. A large body of jurisprudence from the Special Court, the ad hoc tribunals, and the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia ("ECCC") and the Special Tribunal for Lebanon ("STL") holds that the knowledge of the accused that his conduct will assist a crime, and awareness of the essential elements of the crime, are sufficient to establish the mental elements of aiding and abetting.[793]

(v) The mens rea standard does not require that assistance be "specifically directed" or "specifically aimed" to the commission of crimes

291. The actus reus of aiding and abetting is satisfied when it is proven that the accused provided practical assistance, encouragement or moral support that has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[794] Some of the jurisprudence from the ad hoc tribunals defined the elements of aiding and abetting as requiring proof that the accused's conduct was "specifically directed" or "specifically aimed" at assisting, encouraging or morally supporting the perpetration of a crime, but this was always in reference to the actus reus, not the mens rea. As illustrated below, the concept was meant to express the requirement that conduct must be sufficiently connected with the crime of the principal to constitute assistance, encouragement or moral support.[795]

292. The House of Lords case of Gillick v. West Norfolk and Wisbech Health Authority ("Gillick") contains an example of an act not sufficiently connected with the crime of the principal to constitute assistance, encouragement or moral support to a crime. According to Taylor's submission, in this case the court "applied a purpose standard to acquit a person where he had a lawful purpose for his action, despite an awareness of a probability that a crime might be therefore be assisted."[796] In fact, no one was acquitted in Gillick, as it was a civil action where a parent sought to prevent a medical clinic from giving advice or treatment for contraception to girls under 16 years of age. The House of Lords held that a doctor who provided advice or treatment for contraception to a girl under 16 was not committing an offence as the doctor was in fact treating girls who were the victims, not the perpetrators, of the crime of unlawful sexual intercourse with a minor.

293. The term "specifically directed" first appeared in the Tadić Appeal Judgement when distinguishing the actus reus of aiding and abetting from joint criminal enterprise.[797] However, in relation to mens rea, the Tadić Appeals Chamber stated that "the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of a specific crime".[798]

294. In Blagojević and Jokić, the Appeals Chamber reviewed the history of the "specifically directed" language and explained its meaning in relation to actus reus, stating that the conduct or omission of the aider and abettor must contribute to the crime charged:

> The Appeals Chamber observes that while the Tadić definition has not been explicitly departed from, specific direction has not always been included as an element of the actus reus of aiding and abetting. This may be explained by the fact that such a finding will often be implicit in the finding that the accused has provided practical assistance to the principal perpetrator which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime.[799]

295. In Mrkšić, the ICTY Appeals Chamber squarely addressed the "specific direction" issue and stated that "the Appeals Chamber has confirmed that 'specific direction' is not an essential ingredient of the actus reus of aiding and abetting".[800] Mrkšić reiterated that the mens rea requirements for aiding and abetting are knowledge that the acts performed assist in the commission of the offence, and awareness of the essential elements of the crime.[801] The Appeals Chamber recalled that it had previously rejected an elevated mens rea standard, "namely, the proposition that the aider and abettor needs to have intended to provide assistance, or as a minimum, accepted that such assistance would be a possible and foreseeable consequence of his conduct".[802]

[795] In the RUF TJ, the actus reus for aiding and abetting was defined as when an accused "perpetrates an act or an omission specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime and that this act or omission of the aider and abettor must have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime" (para. 276). In contrast, the mens rea was defined as "knowledge that the acts performed by the Accused assist the commission of the crime" (para. 280).

296. ICTR jurisprudence is consistent, holding "[t]he requisite mens rea is the fact that the aider and abettor knows that his acts assist in the commission of the specific crime of the principal".[803] While jurisprudence defining the actus reus of the offence often includes language suggesting that the conduct of the accused must be "specifically aimed" at a crime, meaning it must make a substantial contribution to the crime, ICTR cases have consistently held that the mens rea required is simply knowledge that the conduct assists the crime. In Ntawukulilyayo, the ICTR Appeals Chamber held "the actus reus of aiding and abetting is constituted by acts or omissions specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, or lending moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime".[804] A few paragraphs later the Judgement states, "The Appeals Chamber recalls that the mens rea for aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator".[805]

297. In discussing the substantial effect requirement, the Kalimanzira Appeals Chamber held that the aider and abettor must commit acts "specifically aimed" at assisting a crime, but reiterated "[T]he requisite mental element ... is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator".[806] The Rukundo Appeal Judgement defined the actus reus for aiding and abetting identically (acts "specifically aimed at assisting")[807] but reiterated that "the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the perpetrator".[808]

The dissent of Judge Vaz is unequivocal—her disagreement with the majority was on whether it was proven that Sljivančanin possessed the required mens rea for aiding and abetting murder by omission. Judge Vaz stated that the mens rea test would be whether "Šljivančanin knew that (i) killings of the prisoners of war were likely to take place at Ovčara and that (ii) his failure to take action in this regard would assist the commission of the murders." (para. 2 of Dissent of Judge Vaz). Notably, the test as articulated by Judge Vaz does not include specific direction.

298. The ECCC's Trial Chamber has held that "[l]iability for aiding and abetting a crime requires proof that the accused knew that a crime would probably be committed ... and that the accused was aware that his conduct assisted the commission of that crime".[809] The STL's Appeals Chamber affirmed a "knowledge" standard in customary international law and emphasised that "aiding and abetting does not presuppose that the accomplice shares a common plan or purpose with the principal perpetrator or his criminal intent".[810]

299. Therefore, the jurisprudence from all of the international courts is consistent – knowledge or awareness of the substantial likelihood that the accused's conduct will assist the crime is the standard for the mens rea of aiding and abetting, and no further showing of a higher mental state, intent or purpose, is required. This jurisprudence reflects customary international law as it existed prior to the Indictment period in Taylor. The ICTY deals with serious violations of international law in the former Yugoslavia since 1991. The ICTR mandate covers such crimes in Rwanda 1994. The ECCC mandate covers the years 1975-1979. Thus all of these courts deal with crimes committed before the start of the Indictment period in Taylor, 30 November 1996.

(vi) Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute does not codify the elements on aiding and abetting under ICL

300. Taylor wholly relies on the ICC Statute to argue that, with regards to the mens rea for aiding and abetting, customary international law requires a standard higher than mere knowledge of the perpetrator's intended crime and awareness that his assistance facilitates the crimes. His argument that the minimum standard for aiding and abetting under customary international law is reflected in Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute, which makes criminally responsible those who "for the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission",[811] is fundamentally flawed.

301. First, the ICC Statute in general, and the modes of liability scheme in particular, were never meant to codify customary international law.[812] The ICC has itself stated that whether the Statute conforms to customary international law is irrelevant for the purposes of its interpretation. In the Katanga Confirmation Decision, the Pre-Trial Chamber noted that the ICTY Appeals Chamber had expressly found in Stakić that co-perpetratorship is not a mode of liability under international customary law, but:

> since the Rome Statute expressly provides for this specific mode of liability, the question as to whether customary law admits or discards the 'joint commission through another person' is not relevant for this Court.[813]

302. Secondly, no case at the ICC has yet defined the elements of Article 25(3)(c) liability. The confirmation hearing in Mbarishimana, cited by Taylor, merely referred to the article in passing as Mbarishimana was not charged under 25(3)(c).[814] Taylor quotes Ambassador Scheffer stating that the "purpose" language was a compromise reached during negotiations for the Rome Statute between those favouring wording with "knowledge" and those favouring "intention."[815] But Scheffer himself makes the point that "the Statute never defines 'purpose' and the legislative history provides no guidance."[816]

303. Third, Taylor's attempt to depict Article 25(3)(c) of the ICC Statute as identical to aiding and abetting in Article 6(1) of the SCSL Statute is misguided. The ICC has its own unique scheme of individual criminal responsibility and is still in the early stages of developing these modes in its jurisprudence. "Planning", for example, is not mentioned in the ICC Statute although it is a recognised mode of liability under international criminal law. Under the ICC scheme, acts that assist or encourage a crime are not limited to paragraph (c) of Article 25(3) but would also be covered by paragraph (d) of the same provision.[817]

304. While Article 25(3)(d) uses the term "common purpose", it is very different from joint criminal enterprise liability as the accused need not be part of the criminal plan nor intend any crime.[818] Because ICC jurisdiction is "limited to the most serious crimes of concern to the international community",[819] it is highly probable that every case at the ICC will concern crimes committed by a group of persons acting with a common purpose as such crimes could not be committed by individuals acting alone. Article 25(3)(d) makes an individual responsible for providing any assistance to a crime within the ICC's jurisdiction when the contribution is "made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime." Thus, exactly contrary to Taylor's submission,[820] the ICC Statute does indeed hold responsible those who contribute to a crime with mere knowledge of the intention of the perpetrators to commit the offence. Taylor's argument that state practice is reflected in the ICC Statute and rejects criminal responsibility for contributing to a crime with mere knowledge, is untenable in light of Article 25(3)(d), which holds persons criminally responsible who are not themselves part of a common plan, but who contribute with knowledge of the intention of the group to commit crimes.

[817] Article 25(3)(d) provides that a person is criminally responsible for crimes under the Rome Statute if he "[i]n any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either: (i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal aim or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the court; or (ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime." (Emphasis added.)

305. What is clear is that the scheme of modes of liability in the ICC Statute is distinct from that of the SCSL and the ad hoc tribunals and does not, and never was intended to, reflect customary international law. Therefore, the ICC Statute is not helpful in understanding Article 6(1) of the SCSL Statute and provides no reason to reverse the jurisprudence of this Court in defining the elements of aiding and abetting liability.

(vii) Awareness of a "substantial likelihood" satisfies the knowledge test

306. The Trial Chamber correctly stated that the aider and abettor must possess the knowledge or be "aware of the substantial likelihood" that his acts would assist the commission of the underlying offence.[821] This Appeals Chamber has endorsed the "substantial likelihood" standard in AFRC,[822] CDF,[823] and RUF.[824] Appeals Chambers are bound to follow their previous decision absent cogent reasons that mandate a different holding in the interest of justice.[825] Taylor has failed to demonstrate the existence of any such reason to alter the jurisprudence of the Special Court, which is consistent with that of the Appeals

Instances of situations where cogent reasons in the interests of justice requires a departure from a previous decision include cases where the previous decision has been decided on the basis of a wrong legal principle or where a previous decision has been given per incuriam, that is the judicial decision that has been wrongly decided, usually because the judges were ill-informed about the applicable law.

Chambers of the ad hoc tribunals by which it "shall be guided".[826] The standard articulated by this Appeals Chamber for the mens rea for aiding and abetting is proper, represents the standard test under customary international law, is consistent with the jurisprudence of other international tribunals and should not be disturbed.

307. The STL Appeals Chamber cited the AFRC definition of mens rea which included the "substantial likelihood" language, with approval, stating:

> This accords with fundamental principles of criminal law: if someone provides a gun to a well-known thug with the knowledge that it will be used (or is reasonably likely to be used) to commit a crime, he is liable for aiding and abetting whatever that crime is, regardless of whether he was fully aware of the specific crime the thug intended to perpetrate.[827]

308. The findings in the Taylor case, and Taylor's own testimony, show that the RUF was worse than a "well known thug." It was an organisation with a notorious operational strategy of terrorising innocent civilians, of which Taylor himself was well aware when he gave the group guns and ammunition that fueled its terror campaign. The STL Appeals Chamber noted the Van Anraat case before the Hague Court of Appeal relevant to the same principle of awareness of a probability of the commission of a crime:

> The accused had provided to Iraq, between 1980 and 1988, the chemical raw material TDG ... necessary for the manufacture of the mustard gas that the Iraqi Government had then used against the Kurds in 1987-88. The Court applied Dutch law ... [t]he Court first found that the accused knew that the quantity of TDG he provided could only be used to produce mustard gas and then found that the accused was aware of the high risk of the mustard gas in war, particularly given the 'unscrupulous character of the then Iraqi regime.'[828]

309. Taylor incorrectly submits that the ICTY never accepted that knowledge can include "awareness of a probability."[829] The Blaškić Appeals Chamber endorsed the statement made by the Blaškić and Furundžija Trial Chambers to the effect that:

> it is not necessary that the aider and abettor ... know the precise crime that was intended and which in the event was committed. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor.[830]

310. Taylor's submission misreads paragraph 49 of Blaškić, which did not overturn the probability standard.[831] Rather, the Blaškić Appeals Chamber fully endorsed the principle that the knowledge test is satisfied when it is shown that the aider and abettor was "aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed."[832] This probability standard has been consistently applied at the ICTY.[833]

311. Taylor's submission incorrectly asserts that the Haradinaj and Blagojević Appeal Judgements rejected the "awareness of a probability" standard.[834] In both Haradinaj and Blagojević, the Appeals Chamber found that the respective Trial Chambers did not impose a standard of 'certainty' but, rather, acquitted on the basis that the evidence did not show "to any standard" that the accused were aware their acts would assist the commission of a crime.[835]

312. ICTR jurisprudence also supports the principle that the knowledge element of mens rea is satisfied by evidence that the accused is aware a crime will probably be committed.[836] In Karera, the ICTR Appeals Chamber found that "[i]f an accused is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime."[837]

(viii) Taylor fails to show that the mens rea standard is "actual knowledge"

313. Taylor is mistaken in law in asserting that unless the assister can be said to have "actual knowledge" of the criminal intention of the principal, then the assistance is too remote.[838] No jurisprudence using the term "actual knowledge" is cited, nor does Taylor offer a definition of the term. If the term is meant to distinguish constructive knowledge, i.e., a "should have known" standard, there is no relevance to this appeal as the Trial Chamber did not utilise a "should have known" standard.[839] In the event that Taylor suggests that by "actual knowledge" the aider or abettor must know for a "certainty" that the crimes will be committed, this is an incorrect statement of the law. When dealing with future events, no one can have absolute certainty. Regardless of how much information one possesses about past behaviour and declarations of intent, it is always possible that an individual or group will act to the contrary. Moreover, it would make no sense to impose a certainty standard for aiding and abetting when the test for instigating, ordering and planning is awareness of a substantial likelihood.[840] The correct mens rea standard is that which was articulated by this Appeals Chamber in three prior judgments and applied by the Trial Chamber in this case: the accused must know or be aware of the substantial likelihood that his conduct would assist the commission of the underlying offence.

(ix) There is no right of heads of states to aid and abet atrocities

314. Taylor's argument that the Trial Chamber's mens rea standard risks interfering with well-established prerogatives of states conflates state responsibility with international criminal responsibility.[841] Taylor in effect argues that Heads of State should be immune from criminal charges for aiding and abetting atrocity crimes because states have a right to provide assistance to insurgencies even with the knowledge that there is a substantial likelihood such acts will facilitate the commission of atrocities. No such principle exits in international law.

315. States have no right to assist crimes against humanity or war crimes. The International Court of Justice has held that Article 16 of the International Law Commission's Articles on State Responsibility reflects customary international law.[842] The Article provides:

> A State which aids or assists another State in the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter is internationally responsible for doing so if:
> (a) That State does so with knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act; and > (b) The act would be internationally wrongful if committed by that State.

316. Taylor's reliance on the International Court of Justice decision in the Nicaragua case as establishing a right of States to support insurgencies in other countries is misplaced.[843] The holding in Nicaragua provides no support for Taylor's argument that he had a right to support the RUF as part of his foreign policy, as the Decision found no such right under international law, deciding:

> that the United States by training, arming, equipping, financing and supplying the contra forces or otherwise encouraging, supporting and aiding military and paramilitary activities in and against Nicaragua, has acted, against the Republic of Nicaragua, in breach of its obligation under customary international law not to intervene in the affairs of another State.[844]

317. Taylor argues that the effect of the precedent in the Taylor case would be to criminalise assistance to any foreign group because there are reports that some of their forces have committed crimes. This argument ignores the fundamental findings of the Trial Chamber in this case about the notorious reputation of the RUF which distinguishes this case from any of the scenarios in Taylor's submission. There are over 500 pages in the Trial Judgement containing findings about the crimes committed by the RUF and its allies.[845] The Chamber found that "[t]hese crimes were inextricably linked to the strategy and objectives of the military operations themselves"[846] and that "[t]hroughout the Indictment period, the operational strategy of the RUF and AFRC was characterised by a campaign of crimes against the Sierra Leonean civilian population, including murders, rapes, sexual slavery, looting, abductions, forced labour, conscription of child soldiers, amputations and other forms of physical violence and acts of terror."[847] Taylor "knew of the atrocities being committed against civilians in Sierra Leone by the RUF and RUF/AFRC forces and of their propensity to commit crimes"[848] and "knew that his support to the RUF/AFRC would provide practical assistance, encouragement or moral support to them in the commission of crimes".[849]

318. Heads of State should not and do not enjoy immunity for acts that constitute crimes under international law.[850] This Appeals Chamber has already denied Taylor's claim to such immunity.[851] Under Taylor's argument, providing explosives to Al Qaeda knowing of their attacks targeting civilians, or providing guns to the Lord's Resistance Army, knowing of their well-documented practice of abducting children during military operations to serve in their forces, would be legal if the individuals providing this assistance were acting on behalf of a State. Fortunately, this is not the law. There is no principle in international law that grants officials of States the right to provide support to foreign groups that substantially assist crimes, aware of the substantial likelihood that the assistance will facilitate atrocity crimes. No principle of "state prerogative" grants immunity to Charles Taylor, who knew his assistance would lead to more enslavement, more amputations, rapes and the murders of thousands of innocent civilians in Sierra Leone.

(x) The mens rea need not be defined "in relation" to the actus reus

319. Taylor argues that the mens rea for aiding and abetting should be that the accused not only was aware he was contributing to the crime but was aware that his actions constituted a substantial contribution.[852] This contradicts all of the jurisprudence cited above from this

Appeals Chamber, the ICTR, ICTY, ECCC and STL defining the mens rea for aiding and abetting. Taylor bases his argument on the premise that mens rea "always requires as a minimum that the accused know the character of the actus reus,"[853] but cites no authority for this assertion. There is no rule in international criminal law or state practice that an accused must always know before taking an action that all the elements of the actus reus will result. To take an example from common law, the actus reus for murder is the killing of a person but the mens rea is malice aforethought which is satisfied when it is shown the accused possessed the intent to kill or to cause grievous bodily harm.

320. Taylor argues that Article 30 of the ICC Statute articulates this principle,[854] but Article 30 merely provides that a person may be held criminally responsible "only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge." The Trial Chamber applied this standard, holding that "the lending of practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support must itself be intentional"[855] and that it must be shown that the accused performed the act with awareness of the substantial likelihood that the act would assist the commission of the underlying offence.[856]

(xi) Conclusion

321. The elements of mens rea for aiding and abetting are established by the jurisprudence of this Appeals Chamber and were correctly applied by the Trial Chamber in this case. There is no support in international criminal law jurisprudence for the elements proposed by Taylor – that the accused must act with something more than knowledge and must be certain of the future actions of the perpetrator. The standard proposed by Taylor would grant heads of states the prerogative to provide military assistance with the awareness of the substantial likelihood it will facilitate atrocity crimes against neighbours. Such a principle would be a very regrettable step backward in efforts to protect victims of atrocity crimes under international criminal law.

322. Contrary to Taylor's assertions, the Trial Chamber applied the correct standard of mens rea for aiding and abetting. Taylor's appeal under this Ground should be dismissed as it fails to demonstrate any error that would serve to invalidate the Judgement.

GROUND 17: No legal or factual error in finding that throughout the Indictment period the RUF/AFRC had an operational strategy to commit crimes and that Taylor possessed the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting

(i) Overview

323. The Trial Chamber reasonably and correctly found that the RUF and AFRC had an operational strategy throughout the Indictment period which the Chamber properly considered in determining Taylor's mental state for aiding and abetting. Taylor fails to establish any error of law or fact that invalidates the decision or occasions a miscarriage of justice. In the present Ground Taylor cross refers to his Grounds 12,[857] 16,[858] 21[859] and 23.[860] The Prosecution does not repeat its response to those Grounds herein but includes them by reference.

324. Taylor artificially separates the Chamber's findings on operational strategy and his mens rea into three timeframes,[861] and attempts, but fails, to establish that the Chamber committed errors in relation to each. The Prosecution will first address Taylor's erroneous conflation of actus reus with mens rea. Next, the Prosecution will illustrate, by reference to the entire Indictment period and also to the artificial timeframes set out by Taylor, that Taylor fails to establish that the Chamber erred in finding that the RUF/AFRC had a continuous operational strategy. Finally, the Prosecution will demonstrate, again by reference to the entire Indictment period as well as the artificial timeframes, that Taylor fails to establish the Chamber erred in finding he possessed the required mens rea for aiding and abetting.

(ii) Taylor conflates the requirements of actus reus with those of mens rea

325. At the outset, the Prosecution notes that throughout this Ground of Appeal, Taylor erroneously argues that the Chamber was required to find that he knew that his assistance would substantially contribute to the crimes.[862] This conflates the requirements for actus reus with those for mens rea, a conflation for which Taylor fails to provide any support, in the form of either law or jurisprudence. As correctly noted by the Trial Chamber,[863] "substantial contribution" or "substantial effect" is an element of the actus reus, not the mens rea of aiding and abetting. In order to satisfy the mens rea requirements, all that is required is that the Accused know, or is aware of the substantial likelihood, that his acts would assist the commission of a crime or underlying offence.[864] In any case, if there were any requirement that Taylor be aware that his assistance was substantial, the great volume of materiel which Taylor supplied alone, inter alia, would certainly establish this.

[858] Taylor Appeal, paras. 399, 426. With regard to Taylor's argument regarding the requirement of "purpose" for mens rea, the subject of Ground 16, the Prosecution notes that none of the examples he cites to support his view that the Chamber's findings exclude that he provided support "for the purpose" of facilitating crimes (Taylor Appeal, para. 399, fn. 772). The fact that the Chamber found there was a quid pro quo between Taylor and the RUF in no way negates this. Regardless, the Trial Chamber applied the correct standard for mens rea (Judgement, paras. 486-487).

(iii) The RUF/AFRC had a continuous "operational strategy" to commit crimes throughout the Indictment period

326. As mentioned above, Taylor seeks to detract from the Trial Chamber's findings by attacking them based on three artificial timeframes. However, the Trial Chamber properly and reasonably found that the RUF and AFRC had an operational strategy to commit crimes against civilians which lasted throughout the entire Indictment period.[865] Taylor attempts to re-interpret and downplay the Chamber's findings on the consistency of the commission of the crimes[866] yet the Chamber's findings clearly establish that the operational strategy ran throughout the entire Indictment period.

327. Contrary to Taylor's contention,[867] the Chamber properly found that beginning with Operation Stop Election in 1996, and during the remainder of the civil war in Sierra Leone, the RUF and later AFRC/RUF used terror as a primary modus operandi.[868] Taylor fails to support his claim that this finding constituted an "over-generalization", nor can he support this given the Chamber's clear reasoning and findings.[869]

328. Specifically, the Chamber found that the RUF or AFRC/RUF: (i) murdered civilians between May 1997 and January 2000;[870] (ii) carried out widespread acts of cruel treatment and other inhumane acts against civilians between February 1998 and February 1999;[871] (ii)

In relation to Kailahun, the Chamber found that the witnesses who testified on the incidents in this district were credible and that their evidence supported proof of the existence of crimes relating to physical puts forward in relation to the three artificial timeframes.[883] He fails to establish any error warranting appellate intervention in relation to any of the timeframes addressed.

(a) The Junta Period (May 1997 - about 14 February 1998)[884]

331. The RUF's apology cited by Taylor merely acknowledges what everyone knew, i.e. that the RUF had killed and committed acts of sexual violence,[885] and supports, not detracts from, the Chamber's findings on policy and strategy.[886] Indeed, the Chamber's findings on the crimes committed during the Junta period, which included murder, sexual violence, conscription and use of children under the age of 15 into armed groups, and enslavement,[887] dispel Taylor's attempts to downplay what actually transpired during the Junta.[888] Apart from the fact that the Trial Chamber considered all the evidence before it when reaching its findings, the exhibits Taylor refers to do not support his argument.[889]

332. At paragraph 404 of his Appeal, Taylor contends that the Chamber made no finding that he provided any support "during this time period". The time period being referred to is ambiguous. If Taylor is referring to the Junta period (May 1997 - February 1998),[890] the Chamber entered several findings on Taylor's support during this timeframe.[891] If Taylor is referring to Operation Stop Election, which he refers to at the beginning of the paragraph, this falls outside the scope of the Indictment and the Chamber therefore need not have entered findings as to his assistance at the time. Regardless, Taylor ignores the Chamber's findings on his assistance from the very start of the Indictment period.[892]

(b) 15 February 1998 - February 1999[893]

333. Taylor seeks to detract from the totality of the Chamber's findings on his actions between 15 February 1998 and February 1999 by failing to mention several other actions he carried out in this timeframe that also constituted practical assistance.[894] Taylor also fails to mention that the Chamber found that his assistance in this timeframe was used in a number of other attacks[895] in addition to the ones he refers to in paragraph 412 of his Appeal.

1. Operation Fitti-Fatta & Kono & Makeni

334. The lack of success of an operation, alleged or otherwise, has no bearing on Taylor's culpability for aiding and abetting[896] since "[t]he Accused may aid and abet at one or more of the 'planning, preparation or execution' stages of the crime or underlying offence."[897]

335. Therefore, the failure of Operation Fitti-Fatta does not mean the RUF did not have an operational strategy.[898] Indeed, the fact that the Chamber found Operation Fitti-Fatta was attempted[899] is clear evidence of said operational strategy.

336. Given the Chamber's findings that the crimes ensuing from the Bockarie/Taylor plan to capture Freetown were predominantly committed in Freetown, Taylor seeks to reinterpret the Chamber's finding so as to separate Kono and Makeni from Freetown.[900] However, this was a single operation put into effect over a large geographic area, reflecting their plan. The Chamber's findings on the crimes committed,[901] which resulted directly from this plan,[902] provide clear insight into the AFRC/RUF's operational strategy.[903]

2. Disciplining

337. Taylor's argument that the RUF and AFRC leadership tried to impose discipline and punish soldiers who committed crimes,[904] is unsupported.[905] While the Chamber does refer to isolated instances of discipline by the RUF as testified to by Defence witnesses,[906] these were not witnesses on whom the Chamber could rely.[907] The Chamber also refers to Prosecution

[904] Taylor Appeal, paras. 403, 420.
[905] Taylor claims that "substantial evidence from Prosecution witnesses" establishes that the RUF attempted to discipline criminal acts by its soldiers (Taylor Appeal, para. 420). This evidence is anything but substantial. TF1-314, the same witness Taylor cites to in order to establish that Issa Sesay executed soldiers for carrying out rape, also testified nobody was ever punished for raping the witness herself (TF1-314, T. 20 October 2008 p. 18792). TF1-101 did testify about an isolated incident regarding a threat to punish yet he later testified that he was not aware whether this punishment was actually carried out (TF1-101, T. 14 February 2008 pp. 3928-29, T. 15 February 2008 p. 3935). Taylor fails to provide a reference to the transcript of TF1-367 whom he alleges also supports his contention (Taylor Appeal, para. 420).
[906] See Judgement, paras. 943, 1035.
[907] The Chamber found that Sesay's evidence must generally be considered with caution and cannot be relied upon without corroboration (Judgement, para. 372), and on multiple instances rejected DCT-068's testimony as disingenuous and unreliable (Judgement, paras. 944, 1038; see also para. 1653).

witnesses who testified that there was no real attempt to impose discipline,[908] and found these witnesses to be generally credible.[909] Sporadic discipline does not undermine the Chamber's finding on the AFRC/RUF's policy and strategy of committing crimes against the civilian population, especially in view of the magnitude and continuity of the crimes they committed.

3. SAJ Musa

338. Taylor's argument that the Trial Chamber "found that SAJ Musa ordered the main AFRC faction 'to proceed to Freetown without killing, looting or burning, indicating that he did not have a campaign of terror in mind, as Bockarie did'",[910] does not help Taylor. On Musa's death, Gullit took over and executed the Bockarie/Taylor plan.[911] Therefore, Musa was dead during the bloodiest chapter of the operation and the forces he formerly commanded where now operating in cooperation with, and under the instructions of, the commander of combined AFRC and RUF forces and committing Indictment crimes.[912]

339. Further, that Musa seemed disenchanted with the RUF's strategy in November 1998, as set out in an Adjudicated fact,[913] and that, unlike Bockarie, he did not have a campaign of terror in mind,[914] supports, rather than negates, the existence of the strategy.

4. Internal Disputes

340. The instances of infighting in the AFRC/RUF cited to by Taylor[915] do not detract from the reasonableness of the Chamber's finding that the AFRC/RUF had a continuous operational strategy. Taylor simply repeats factual arguments which the Trial Chamber rejected without showing that there was any error of law or fact.[916] Even though there were disputes, contact was still maintained,[917] and, crucially, following Musa's death, Gullit followed and executed the Taylor/Bockarie plan throughout the attack on Freetown.[918] The infighting with Musa was of no consequence to the operational strategy as illustrated by the crimes committed, inter alia, during the Freetown invasion. Taylor overstates the facts[919] and fails to establish any error.[920]

(c) March 1999- 2002[921]

341. The Chamber's findings on the crimes carried out by the RUF or AFRC/RUF[922] clearly illustrate that nothing had changed by early 1999, despite the ceasefire.[923] The crimes committed after the Freetown invasion do not differ from those committed during and before the invasion. The operational strategy persisted.

(d) Conclusion

342. The Trial Chamber's findings clearly establish an operational strategy to commit crimes against civilians which lasted throughout the Indictment. Taylor fails to establish any error warranting appellate intervention.

(iv) Taylor knew, or was aware of the substantial likelihood, that his acts would assist the commission of the Indictment crimes

343. As discussed above, Taylor fails to establish any error in the Chamber's finding that the RUF/AFRC adopted an operational strategy to commit crimes against civilians throughout the Indictment period. Taylor also fails to establish his contention that the Chamber erred in finding he possessed the required mens rea throughout various stages of the Indictment.[924] The Prosecution will first illustrate that the Chamber properly found that Taylor had the required mens rea throughout the entire Indictment period, and then address the arguments Taylor presents based on the artificial timeframes he adopts.

344. Based on the totality of the overwhelming circumstantial and direct evidence before it, the Chamber found that even before Taylor became President, he knew of the crimes committed by the RUF in Sierra Leone,[925] and as early as August 1997, he was aware of past and ongoing[926] crimes committed by the RUF/AFRC forces against civilians.[927] He would also "have been aware of the likelihood that the AFRC/RUF would commit similar crimes in the future."[928] Taylor was also aware of the "essential elements" of the crimes committed by RUF and RUF/AFRC troops, including the state of mind of the perpetrators.[929]

[919] At para. 422 of his Appeal, Taylor cites to para. 6755 of the Judgement in support of the claim that "At least three and possibly four factions emerged within what had been the 'RUF/AFRC' alliance in the course of 1998 alone." This paragraph offers no support to that statement.

345. The fact that Taylor testified that by April 1998 if "someone was providing support to the AFRC/RUF [...] they would be supporting a group engaged in a campaign of atrocities against the civilian population of Sierra Leone",[930] and that there were news reports in May 1998 which made him aware that the RUF was engaged in a "horrific campaign [...] against the civilian population in Sierra Leone"[931] also support the Chamber's conclusion. Further support is given by the fact that in a statement dated July 1998, Taylor himself "strongly condemned the continuing rebel activities in Sierra Leone, as well as the horrendous atrocities that had been committed there."[932]

346. Taylor instructed JPK and Bockarie to capture, maintain, and re-capture Kono,[933] and jointly designed a plan to attack Freetown with Bockarie and told him to use "all means" to do so and to make the operation "fearful".[934] Having issued these instructions and received updates thereon,[935] Taylor was certainly aware that the AFRC/RUF were executing their operational strategy. His instruction to make the area "fearful" reflects the use of this same instruction by RUF/AFRC commanders during previous operations which also resulted in the commission of heinous crimes.[936] The fact Taylor used an instruction which was commonly used by the RUF/AFRC in their previous attacks illustrates that he knew of their operational strategy. The fact that his instruction was later repeated by Bockarie during the course of the Freetown invasion,[937] indicates that Taylor also contributed to the continuation of that strategy.

347. Further, the Chamber found that: (i) Taylor received daily briefings from his national security advisor when he became President; (ii) Taylor was privy to numerous reports as a member of ECOWAS which described the "massive looting of property, murder and rapes" that were being committed on the territory of Sierra Leone;[938] (iii) the situation in Sierra

Leone had a direct impact on the Liberian situation; (iv) embargos on arms and military equipment to Sierra Leone were in force at the time;[939] and (v) media coverage and reports by various organisations on the AFRC/RUF's crimes and terror campaign against the Sierra Leonean civilian population after 1997 meant that it was public knowledge that AFRC/RUF forces committed the crimes of unlawful killings, sexual violence, physical violence, conscription and use of child soldiers, abduction and forced labour, looting, and terrorism.[940]

348. Therefore, the totality of all the above findings led the Trial Chamber to reasonably conclude that Taylor knew that his support to the RUF/AFRC would provide practical assistance, encouragement or moral support to the commission of crimes during the course of their military operations in Sierra Leone and that "[n]evertheless, he provided these groups with practical assistance, encouragement and moral support."[941]

(a) Taylor misrepresents the Chamber's findings

349. Taylor misrepresents the Trial Chamber's findings concerning his knowledge.[942] First, his contention that there was an evolution in his knowledge[943] ignores the Trial Chamber's finding that he possessed the required mens rea even before his election as President of Liberia.[944]

350. As to his knowledge when he assumed the Presidency in Liberia, in the last paragraph of the "Deliberations" section on the "Knowledge of the Accused",[945] the Chamber stated that "[i]n light of the foregoing, the Trial Chamber is convinced that the Accused knew of the AFRC/RUF's operational strategy and intent to commit crimes from the clear and consistent information he received after his election."[946] Taylor became President in August 1997. In the paragraph immediately thereafter, in its "Findings" section, the Chamber stated "the Accused was aware of the crimes committed by the RUF/AFRC forces against civilians, including murder, abduction of civilians including children, rape, amputation and looting, as early as August 1997 when he became President of Liberia."[947]

[943] Taylor Appeal, paras. 401-02.
[944] Judgement, para. 6878. Therefore, the Chamber found he possessed the required mens rea from the beginning of the Indictment period, and not April 1998 as Taylor states (Taylor Appeal, paras. 401-402). The only reference the Chamber makes to April 1998 is based on Taylor's own admission that by that month and year, if someone was providing support to the AFRC/RUF, he "would be supporting a group engaged in a campaign of atrocities against the civilian population of Sierra Leone" (Judgement, para. 6884).
[945] A section spanning from paras. 6887 to 6885 of the Judgement.
[947] Judgement, para. 6886.

351. Therefore, the Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor knew about the RUF/AFRC's operational strategy throughout the Indictment period. Below, the Prosecution addresses Taylor's assertions that he was not aware of this strategy in three distinct timeframes.[948] Taylor fails to establish any error.

(b) The Junta Period (May 1997 - about 14 February 1998)[949]

352. As Taylor notes,[950] the Chamber found he knew of the AFRC/RUF's propensity to commit crimes.[951]However, the Chamber also found, based, inter alia, on the reports, media coverage, the embargo, and the impact on Liberia,[952] that he knew of the atrocities being committed during the Junta period[953] and "would...have been aware of the likelihood that the AFRC/RUF would commit similar crimes in the future."[954] Taylor fails to establish, or even to support his argument, that the Chamber committed any error in so determining.

353. Taylor erroneously challenges the use of the word "could" in the Chamber's statement that "military support could facilitate the commission of crimes",[955] stating the use of this word rather than "would" means "the Chamber could only infer Taylor's knowledge of a possibility that assistance might be used in possible crimes."[956] However, the finding Taylor refers to does not speak specifically of Taylor's knowledge, but that of the international community in general.[957] Indeed, in the following paragraphs, the Chamber fully discusses the sources of information that led it to conclude that Taylor "would therefore have been aware of the likelihood that the AFRC/RUF would commit similar crimes in the future."[958] The Chamber therefore speaks of, at a minimum, the awareness of a substantial likelihood his acts would assist the commission of crimes, which, as established in the response to Ground 16, satisfies the requisite mens rea for a conviction for aiding and abetting.[959]

354. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[960] the Chamber did not only rely on the official reports listed in footnotes 15475-15482 of the Judgement. These constitute only part of the evidence the Chamber relied on in determining his mens rea. The fact the reports would not have been available until late-March 1998[961] is of no consequence since, in reaching its finding on Taylor's knowledge, apart from a plethora of other forms of reports listed in those same footnotes which were available before this time, the Chamber also considered (i) his daily briefings; (ii) other reports he was privy to as a member of ECOWAS;[962] (iii) the fact that the situation in Sierra Leone had a direct impact on the Liberian situation; and (iv) that embargos on arms and military equipment to Sierra Leone were in force at the time.[963]

355. Taylor fails to establish that the Chamber committed any error. Consequently, none of the findings challenged by Taylor[964] merit reversal.

(c) 15 February 1998 - February 1999[965]

1. Taylor's Acknowledgement

356. As illustrated above,[966] and contrary to Taylor's contention,[967] Taylor's acknowledgement that in April 1998 he was aware that serious crimes were being committed in Sierra Leone is but one of the factors the Trial Chamber took into consideration in establishing his mens rea.

357. Taylor's argument as to what his acknowledgement did or did not amount to is irrelevant.[968] Taylor misrepresents his own testimony when he asserts that he testified that serious crimes had been committed "by elements of the AFRC and RUF" or by "some members of these forces".[969] Rather, Taylor's actual testimony was that at the time there was "a group engaged in a campaign of atrocities against the civilian population of Sierra Leone", that group being the RUF/AFRC.[970] Taylor's statement[971] clearly acknowledges there was a campaign of atrocities going on. It is irrelevant that he did not explicitly state this constituted a modus operandi. That was for the Trial Chamber to determine.

358. Taylor impermissibly seeks to relitigate his position at trial by merely reproducing selected portions of his own testimony regarding his knowledge, which the Trial Chamber correctly rejected, without indicating any error in the Chamber's treatment thereof.[972] The Chamber's findings reflect Taylor's knowledge at more than one stage of the conflict.[973] Further, and contrary to Taylor's assertion,[974] the Chamber's findings recognise that the RUF's military strategy evolved over time into to a strategy of guerrilla tactics based on a campaign of terror against the civilian population.[975] The Chamber correctly and reasonably found that Operation Stop Elections marked a change in tactics and thereafter the evolution to the campaign of terror was complete.[976]

2. Names of Operations

359. The Chamber did not find that the names given to operations were in any way illegitimate or unlawful.[977] Given the instructions to make the area "fearful" which were often given to the commanders,[978] and the commission of atrocities that followed these instructions,[979] the Trial Chamber committed no error in noting this factor as but one of the factors it considered in establishing Taylor's intent.[980] Further, the Chamber's findings establish that Taylor was by no means "any outside observer".[981]

3. UN reports

360. The fact that a number of exhibits referred to by Taylor[982] do not explicitly refer to a modus operandi as such is irrelevant. It is the Chamber's job to piece together the evidence before it, and based on that evidence, the Chamber properly concluded that there was such a modus operandi. What is certainly not "entitled to credence" is Taylor's testimony as to what he did and did not read or have knowledge of,[983] the Chamber rejecting his testimony on numerous occasions as "not credible" and "incredible".[984] Further, the fact that, as Taylor notes, Amnesty International stated that the RUF adopted such tactics as an organisational policy, supports the Chamber's conclusion on operational strategy, regardless of whether Taylor did or did not read Amnesty International's report.

4. Taylor's hypothesis

361. The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Taylor possessed the required mens rea for aiding and abetting. The alternative theories put forward by Taylor,[985] which he did not present at trial, constitute a re-litigation of issues the Trial Chamber decided adversely to him. Taylor provides no basis for overturning the Chamber's finding.

362. The Chamber's findings on knowledge clearly establish Taylor possessed the required mens rea. These findings are complemented by other factors which would have led Taylor to know that his assistance would have an impact on future crimes.[986] Not only did the Chamber find that Taylor had knowledge of what was going on in Sierra Leone, but it also found that during this timeframe, inter alia, Taylor instructed JPK and Bockarie to capture, maintain control, and re-capture Kono,[987] and that he formulated the plan to use all means to attack Freetown and make that operation fearful[988] and was in contact with Bockarie as the plan was implemented.[989] That Taylor issued such instructions while simultaneously providing assistance leads one to reasonably conclude that he knew that this assistance would be used in the commission of crimes.

363. That Taylor issued these instructions, in light of the ongoing campaign of atrocities being committed by the AFRC/RUF, also excludes any possibility that he did not know that it was the AFRC/RUF policy to commit despicable crimes,[990] and the possibility that he was merely seeking to assist the RUF to hold its positions.[991] Formulating a plan to invade Freetown and encouraging the taking of diamondiferous areas are diametrically opposed to such hypothesis.

364. Taylor's contention that, from April 1998 onwards,[992] "[t]he most severe crimes, according to the reports, were apparently retaliation in defeat against civilians for perceived collaboration" is unsupported by his citation to the Judgement and, in any event, would only confirm that the RUF were strategically targeting civilians.[993] The Chamber's findings about the exchange of diamonds for arms and ammunition between Taylor and the RUF,[994] the duplicitous role played by Taylor,[995] and about his abovementioned instructions to the AFRC/RUF to take Kono and capture Freetown, dispel Taylor's theory that he was only seeking to avoid a repetition of any crimes[996] or that he favoured the return of peace in Sierra Leone.[997] Neither do these findings negate the findings as to Taylor's knowledge that crimes would be facilitated by his assistance.[998]

5. The Freetown invasion

365. Taylor mischaracterises the Chamber's findings about the events during the Freetown invasion.[999] The Chamber found that Gullit resumed communications with Bockarie on the death of SAJ Musa,[1000] that Bockarie and Gullit co-coordinated their efforts to capture Freetown, and that from that point on, Musa's original plan to attack Freetown was abandoned, and Gullit's movements were incorporated into the Bockarie/Taylor plan.[1001] The Chamber found that throughout the Freetown operation, Bockarie issued a number of instructions, "including an order to use terror tactics against the civilian population on the retreat from Freetown, which were implemented by Gullit and the fighters in Freetown."[1002]

366. Further, Taylor "gave advice to Bockarie and received updates in relation to the operations in Kono and Freetown in the implementation of their plan."[1003] The Chamber found that Bockarie was in daily contact with Taylor in December 1998 and January 1999.[1004] Taylor was certainly aware of what was going on, having directed Bockarie to send prisoners released from Pademba Road Prison to RUF controlled areas.[1005]

367. Taylor's contention that he did not know what was going on at the time also runs counter to his own testimony that he was the "point President" who "led the whole Sierra Leonean situation"[1006] and to his acknowledgements and statements discussed above.[1007]

(d) 15 March 1999 - 2002[1008]

368. Taylor contends that his state of knowledge would not have substantially changed following the crimes committed in Freetown and during the retreat following the ECOMOG counter-offensive.[1009] Indeed, Taylor remained President of Liberia[1010] and therefore continued to receive information and briefings about the conflict in Sierra Leone,[1011] he was still a member of the ECOWAS Committee of Five[1012] and was therefore still privy to their reports,[1013] and the situation in Sierra Leone still had a direct impact on the Liberian situation.[1014] Just like Taylor's knowledge, as argued above, the AFRC/RUF's operational strategy did not change.[1015] Taylor certainly knew the operational strategy went on during this timeframe- the numerous findings on, inter alia, the materiel he provided at the time[1016] together with the Chamber's findings on his knowledge mean the Chamber committed no error in reaching this conclusion.

(v) Conclusion

369. Taylor merely seeks to relitigate issues decided against him and to substitute his characterisation of the facts for that of the Trial Chamber. He fails to establish any error warranting Appellate intervention. The Appeals Chamber should therefore dismiss this Ground of Appeal.

GROUND 18: Mens rea for aiding and abetting

370. Taylor notes in a footnote that "[n]o separate arguments are presented in respect of Ground of Appeal 18, as those arguments are sufficiently expressed in the other grounds concerning mens rea" but that "[t]he ground of appeal is nevertheless maintained on the basis of those arguments."[1017] Despite having stated in the footnote that he is maintaining this Ground of Appeal, Taylor does not even set out the caption of the Ground, nor is it listed in his Table of Contents. The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground[1018] since it fails to comply with paragraphs 6(d), 6(e) and 9 of the Practice Direction. Should the Appeals Chamber elect to consider Taylor's Ground 18, the Prosecution's responses to Grounds 16, 17, 19, and 20 should be considered in response to this Ground.

GROUND 19: The Trial Chamber correctly found that Taylor had the requisite knowledge in assisting the commission of crimes

(i) Overview

371. The Trial Chamber was not required to make a particularised finding concerning Taylor's mens rea with respect to specific acts of assistance. Contrary to Taylor's claim, it is not an error of law for a Trial Chamber to adopt a general approach respecting the assessment of mens rea.[1019] How a Trial Chamber assesses the knowledge of an accused falls squarely within its discretion and the Appeals Chamber will only disturb a discretionary finding where it is so unreasonable as to compel the conclusion that the Trial Chamber failed to use its discretion "judiciously."[1020]

(ii) Taylor fails to establish any error of law in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the knowledge requirement for aiding and abetting

372. Taylor's submission that the Trial Chamber seriously abused its discretion in assessing his knowledge by failing to make a particularised finding concerning his knowledge in respect of specific acts of alleged assistance is unfounded. The Trial Chamber applied the correct standard in finding that Taylor had the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting all of the crimes in the Indictment – he knew or was aware at the time he made his contributions of the substantial likelihood that his acts would facilitate the crimes. The Trial Chamber made detailed findings[1021] establishing Taylor's knowledge of the continuing crimes being committed by the RUF and AFRC/RUF and found that Taylor provided assistance to a military force he knew used terror against civilians and whose crimes were inextricably linked to the manner in which it conducted the war.[1022]

373. The Judgement provides a sufficient basis for the Trial Chamber's conclusions. The findings regarding the mental elements of aiding and abetting[1023] must be read together with the underlying factual findings which show how the Chamber reasonably concluded that Taylor knew that his conduct would assist the crimes committed by the AFRC/RUF. The Trial Chamber found that:

[1019] Taylor Appeal, para. 436. Taylor Notice, para. 53; Taylor contends that the Trial Chamber erred in law and fact by adopting a general approach to the knowledge of the accused over a period of six years without seeking to ascertain his alleged contemporaneous intention in respect of specific allegations of assistance.

[1023] Judgement, paras. 6947-52.

- Taylor was aware that crimes were being committed by the RUF/AFRC as early as August 1997;[1024]
- throughout the Indictment period the operational strategy of the RUF and AFRC was characterised by a campaign of crimes against the Sierra Leonean civilian population, including murders, rapes, sexual slavery, looting, abductions, forced labour, conscription of child soldiers, amputations and other forms of physical violence and acts of terror;
- these crimes were inextricably linked to the strategy and objectives of the military operations themselves. The RUF/AFRC pursued a policy and strategy of committing crimes against the civilian population in order to achieve military gains, and by attracting the attention of the international community, heighten their negotiating stance with the Sierra Leonean Government. The nature of this terror strategy was explicitly demonstrated by the names chosen for their military campaigns, such as "Operation Pay Yourself", "Operation No Living Thing" and "Operation Spare No Soul;"[1025]
- based on the notoriety of the RUF and AFRC and the information received daily as President of Liberia, Taylor was cognisant of the RUF/AFRC's war strategy;[1026]
- Taylor acknowledged that any assistance to the RUF/AFRC would constitute assistance to a campaign of atrocities against the civilian population of Sierra Leone.[1027]

374. The Trial Chamber understood that Taylor was not present at any of the crime scenes but rather was fuelling the conflict and facilitating the crimes while safe in his Liberian Presidential mansion. It is well established that "the location at which the actus reus takes place may be removed from the location of the principal crime."[1028] Establishing the mens rea of an accused is a factual finding dependant on the evidence in each case. The distance of the accused from the crime may or may not have any effect. Given the findings in this case, the mere fact that Taylor was physically distant created no reasonable doubt regarding his awareness that his acts would facilitate the crimes. The circumstances and evidence left no doubt that Taylor had the necessary mens rea when he provided his assistance to the crimes.

[1028] Mrkšić AJ, para. 81. See also Blaškić AJ, para. 48.

375. The aider or abetter need not be aware of the specific crimes that will be committed but must at least have had awareness that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, and one of those crimes must then in fact be committed.[1029] The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Taylor knew that the RUF was notorious for its campaign of violence and terror and that crimes would probably be committed.[1030]

376. Furthermore, Taylor's reliance on the ICTY judgement in Limaj[1031] to support his argument on the mens rea for aiding and abetting is misplaced. The Appeal Judgement in Limaj simply confirmed that the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in making factual determinations for each crime as to whether or not the Accused, Bala, had provided "substantial assistance" to the crime with the requisite knowledge.[1032] The Trial Judgement in Limaj, in fact, defeats Taylor's submissions on aiding and abetting. Limaj confirms that the test for mens rea is mere knowledge and not "purpose", holding "[t]he mens rea required is knowledge that, by his or her conduct, the aider and abettor is assisting or facilitating the commission of the offence."[1033]

377. Applying this standard, the Limaj Trial Chamber convicted Bala for aiding and abetting torture because he had brought the victim to a barn and stood by during the beating, finding that "[i]n the circumstances, Haradin Bala must have become aware ... that the assailants were committing a crime and their state of mind."[1034] The same Accused was acquitted of the murder of three prisoners whose bodies he helped to bury as "it could also be reasonably inferred form the evidence that Haradin Bala learned about the killings afterwards".[1035] Thus, in Limaj, the Trial Chamber reaffirmed the fact-based inquiry approach taken by the Taylor Trial Chamber by exercising its discretion to assess whether, in the particular context of the case, the conduct constituted a substantial contribution.[1036]

378. The Trial Chamber reasonably concluded, considering the entirety of the evidence, that Taylor assisted the RUF and AFRC knowing that his support would assist them in the commission of crimes.[1037]

(iii) Taylor fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber was required to make a distinct finding that Taylor knew his acts would amount to a substantial contribution

379. Taylor's repetitious erroneous assertions that the requisite mens rea is "purpose" and that the actus reus must be performed with "knowledge" that it would contribute "substantially" to the commission of crimes have been answered in Ground 16 of this Response. Taylor's submission in this Ground repeats the erroneous premise[1038] that the mens rea for aiding and abetting requires not just that the accused was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of the underlying offence,[1039] but must also be aware that his acts would amount to a substantial contribution. Again, as in his arguments under Ground 16, he cites to no jurisprudence that supports his position.

380. Taylor conjectures that he may have armed and supplied the RUF in order to prevent their defeat and that the defeat of the RUF "could have unleashed more bloodshed, crimes and instability than just holding their positions."[1040] The evidence and findings disprove this assertion. The Trial Chamber found that Taylor did not just seek to prevent the defeat of the RUF. He planned their largest offensive and provided them the weapons they needed to defeat large ECOMOG forces in Kono and Makeni and move on to Freetown. The Trial Chamber found that the RUF was a force with an operational strategy of terror. The findings on crimes show that they enslaved the civilian population in areas they controlled, forcibly conscripted boys and girls into their forces, and forced women and girls into sexual slavery. Even if Taylor's intent was simply to prevent the defeat of the RUF and ensure they held their positions, Taylor admitted[1041] such assistance was contributing to the crimes inflicted upon all of the men, women, boys and girls caught behind the RUF lines he was protecting. Taking into account the context in which this assistance was given, the Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that, in facilitating and providing arms and ammunitions to the RUF/AFRC, Taylor knew or was aware of the substantial likelihood that his support would provide assistance in the commission of the crimes perpetrated by the armed groups.[1042]

(iv) Conclusion

381. Taylor's arguments in Ground 19 largely repeat arguments made in Ground 16 and elsewhere in his Appeal Submissions and lack any support in jurisprudence. The Trial Chamber properly considered the evidence of Taylor's knowledge that his acts would assist the commission of the crimes, and did not err in law or fact in its findings. This Ground of Appeal should, therefore, be dismissed.

GROUND 20: No error of fact in finding Taylor knew about the delivery of supplies

(i) Overview

382. The complete extent of Taylor's submission for Ground 20, in which caption he alleges an error of fact, is that "[f]or the reasons expressed under Ground 23 showing that the Chamber made no, or no sufficient findings, to show that Taylor knew about, or that he facilitated, the delivery of supplies to Liberia, it follows that he could not have possessed the mens rea for aiding and abetting those acts."[1043] Other than this cursory referral to a distinct Ground of Appeal which spans some 46 pages,[1044] Taylor points to no specific findings, facts, or law, to support Ground 20. Neither does he provide any additional argument.

383. The Appeals Chamber should summarily dismiss[1045] this Ground since it fails to comply with the Practice Direction.[1046] Specifically, the submissions fail to identify the challenged factual finding/s[1047] and the prejudice caused.[1048] Should the Appeals Chamber elect to consider this Ground, the Chamber should dismiss it since Taylor fails to establish any error/s of fact.[1049]

384. The Trial Chamber correctly found that Taylor was aware of the trans-shipment of arms and ammunition through Liberia to Sierra Leone and of other assistance from or via Liberia, including the three main shipments of arms and ammunition identified by the Trial Chamber. To find otherwise would be to give credence to the impossible notion that, for example, a plane with large amounts of materiel could land at Roberts International Airport, the materiel be temporarily stored at White Flower and then trucked across Liberia into Sierra Leone, all without the President of Liberia's knowledge.[1050]

385. Taylor's single-sentence statement in support of this Ground confounds the mens rea requirements for aiding and abetting. The Trial Chamber was under an obligation to, and did, establish that Taylor possessed the mens rea for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes, not the mens rea for aiding and abetting the delivery of supplies to Liberia, i.e. the acts which constitute practical assistance, as Taylor states.[1051]

(iii) The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor possessed the required mens rea for aiding and abetting the Indictment crimes

386. The Trial Chamber committed no error in reaching any of the findings challenged in Ground 23 of Taylor's appeal to which Taylor here cross-refers.[1052] As discussed below, Taylor has also failed to show that the Chamber incorrectly assessed his mens rea for aiding and abetting the Indictment crimes through the impugned acts of assistance. Rather the Chamber correctly found that Taylor possessed the required mens rea for aiding and abetting the Indictment crimes. The Prosecution notes that Taylor does not challenge the Trial Chamber's correct definition of mens rea[1053] in this Ground.

(a) The Trial Chamber properly concluded that Taylor knew about the delivery of supplies to Liberia and that he facilitated them

387. The totality of the Trial Chamber's findings concerning Taylor's provision of materiel throughout the Indictment period[1054] establish that Taylor knew about the delivery of supplies

[1051] "For the reasons expressed under Ground 23 showing that the Chamber made no, or no sufficient findings, to show that Taylor knew about, or that he facilitated, the delivery of supplies to Liberia, it follows that he could not have possessed the mens rea for aiding and abetting those acts." [1054] Including that: (i) during the Junta period the Accused sent ammunition to Bockarie in Sierra Leone via Daniel Tamba (a.k.a. Jungle) (Judgement, para. 4845); (ii) supplies of arms and ammunition were sent to the RUF/AFRC in Buedu between February 1998 and December 1999 by the Accused, through, inter alia, Daniel Tamba, Sampson Weah and Joseph (a.k.a. Zigzag) Marzah (para. 4965); (iii) Bockarie made trips to Liberia in 1998 during which he obtained materiel from the Accused (para. 5030); (iv) the RUF/AFRC received sizeable amounts of materiel from the Accused in 1998 (para. 5031); (v) Bockarie made a trip to Liberia at an undefined time after the Freetown invasion during which he obtained arms and ammunitions supplied by the Accused (para. 5043); (vi) on Bockarie's trip to Monrovia around March 1999, he brought back a large shipment of materiel supplied by the Accused (para. 5096); (vii) Bockarie made a trip to Monrovia as part of the Lomé delegation and returned to Sierra Leone in or around late September to October 1999 with a helicopter of materiel supplied by the Accused (para. 5110); (viii) during the Freetown invasion in January 1999, Dauda Aruna Fornie and others transported materiel provided by the Accused from Liberia to Sierra Leone (para. 5130); (ix) Issa Sesay made a trip to Liberia in May 2000 in which he obtained arms and ammunitions from the Accused (para. 5195); (x) during Issa Sesay's reign as Interim Leader of the RUF, TF1-567 was involved in the transportation of materiel frequently over the course of one year and that materiel was provided by the Accused from Liberia to the RUF in Sierra Leone (para. 5250); (xi) in 2000, Albert Saidu brought back two vehicles of ammunition and medicine from Yeaten, Taylor's subordinate, in response to a request from Issa Sesay (paras. 5251, 5126); (xii) the Accused sent Varmuyan Sherif to open a corridor to facilitate the existing trade of the purchase and sale of arms and ammunition between the RUF and ULIMO between Lofa County and RUF-held-to Liberia and knowingly facilitated them. These findings are based on direct testimony and/or are corroborated by numerous witnesses and documentary evidence.[1055]

388. The Trial Chamber's findings on diamonds also establish that Taylor knew he was providing assistance. The Chamber found there was a quid pro quo- Taylor provided the RUF with materiel in exchange for diamonds.[1056] Taylor was certainly aware of these continuous transactions,[1057] as also established by the fact he instructed JPK and Bockarie to capture, maintain, and re-capture Kono for the purpose of maintaining the trade of diamonds for arms and ammunition,[1058] and facilitated a relationship between the RUF and a diamond dealer for the purpose of diamond transactions.[1059] Indeed, the Chamber noted that "[t]wenty Prosecution witnesses testified to supplies of materiel being brought by intermediaries and their accounts are complementary in most respects."[1060]

389. The Chamber's findings on provision of materiel and facilitation thereof often refer to the fact that this materiel came from White Flower and/or went through Roberts International Airport.[1061] Taylor himself admitted that he permitted Musa Cissé, his protocol officer who he also stated was one of those responsible for arranging bribes to be able to transport arms through a country to Liberia,[1062] to travel with Bockarie on his trip to Burkina Faso, and that territories after 14 February 1998, that Sherif fulfilled his assignment, as result of which members of ULIMO who were supposed to disarm and surrender their arms to the UN, instead sold or bartered them to the RUF (para. 5329; see also para. 5318); (xiii) the Accused provided financial support to the RUF/AFRC in order to facilitate their purchases of arms and ammunition from ex-ULIMO combatants (para. 5330); (xiv) the Accused sent Ibrahim Bah on his behalf to Freetown to meet with Sam Bockarie and JPK to make arrangements for the procurement of arms and ammunition. Bah was given 90 carats of diamonds and $90,000 US to pay for the shipment which was delivered by plane to Magburaka (paras. 5406, 5408, 5394, 5388-89, 5559); (xv) around November/December 1998, the Accused was instrumental in procuring a large quantity of arms and ammunition for the RUF from Burkina Faso. These arms and ammunitions were distributed to RUF and AFRC commanders in Buedu (para. 5527).

[1055] For example, the Chamber reached its finding that Taylor sent supplies of arms and ammunition to the RUF/AFRC in Buedu between February 1998 and December 1999 through his intermediaries, after considering, inter alia: (i) that the account of TF1-579 and Marzah on the matter was corroborated by thirteen other witnesses, some of whom also testified that Taylor himself had given them instructions, and seven of whom testified they were explicitly told the materiel was supplied from the Accused; (ii) credible contemporary documentary evidence; (iii) that Defence evidence contradicting this finding was belied by "overwhelming evidence" by Prosecution witnesses and even by evidence from other Defence witnesses; (iv) that Defence witnesses testified that removal of materiel from Taylor's warehouse required Taylor's approval; and (v) Bobson Sesay's corroborating testimony that Taylor confirmed at a meeting with RUF leaders in August 1999 that he had supplied food, arms and ammunitions to the Sierra Leonean rebel troops, Judgement, paras. 4944, 4946-49, 4953, 4955, 4957, 4965; see also the response to Grounds 1, 3 and 23.

Cissé briefed him after the mission.[1063] However, the Chamber did not find credible Taylor's testimony that Cissé went with Bockarie in the role of translator,[1064] or that Taylor was not aware of what transpired between Bockarie and Compaoré during Bockarie's trip.[1065]

390. Further, TF1-338 testified that Benjamin Yeaten told Sesay that Taylor said that the arms he (Taylor) had supplied to the rebels and that were not used should not be surrendered as part of the disarmament but returned to Benjamin Yeaten since they belonged to Taylor.[1066] TF1-338 also detailed how Sesay's men then moved arms from Sierra Leone to Liberia to comply with this instruction.[1067]

391. Specifically in relation to Taylor's knowledge about the provision of materiel, the Chamber found that "the Accused had knowledge of and sanctioned the delivery to Bockarie of materiel to take back to Sierra Leone from Liberia" based on the consistent evidence that Tamba, Taylor's subordinate, was involved in these trips.[1068] The Chamber also found Taylor's assertion that he did not know about Bockarie's trips and his denial of involvement in the supply of materiel to Bockarie not credible in light of, inter alia, Taylor's own testimony Bockarie could not travel to Monrovia without him being aware of it and evidence that Bockarie crossed the border without exemptions from the travel ban.[1069]

392. Similarly, the Chamber rejected Taylor's claim he did not have a camouflage helicopter in September/October 1999 as not credible in light of his own conflicting testimony, documentary evidence, and multiple witnesses testifying to the contrary.[1070] The Chamber also took note of the "evidence indicating that the Accused's support often satisfied a need or request for materiel at a particular time"[1071] and evidence that Bockarie was communicating with Taylor in relation to arms and ammunitions requests during this period.[1072]

393. By no stretch of the imagination can these shipments, taken together, and often even if take alone, be described as isolated or discrete incidents. None of these instances could have occurred without Taylor's knowledge.

(b) Taylor knew, or was aware of the substantial likelihood, that his actions would assist the commission of the Indictment crimes

394. When one considers the above findings together with the Trial Chamber's other findings on Taylor's knowledge and intent,[1073] including that as early as August 1997 the Accused knew of the atrocities being committed against civilians in Sierra Leone by the RUF and RUF/AFRC forces and of their propensity to commit crimes,[1074] the only reasonable conclusion is that Taylor was certainly aware of to whom and for what purpose he was sending this materiel. Contrary to Taylor's contention,[1075] the totality of evidence establishes beyond reasonable doubt that Taylor knew, or was aware of the substantial likelihood, that his acts would assist the crimes committed by the RUF during the Indictment period.

(c) Taylor was aware of the essential elements of the crimes committed by the principal offender

395. The Trial Chamber's findings also satisfy the second prong of the mens rea requirement, i.e., Taylor was aware of the essential elements of the crimes committed by the principal offender.[1076]

(iv) Conclusion

396. Taylor has shown no error in the Trial Chamber's findings, based on all the evidence before it, that he was aware of the trans-shipment of arms and ammunition through Liberia to Sierra Leone and of other assistance from or via Liberia, including the three main shipments of arms and ammunition identified by the Trial Chamber. The Chamber correctly concluded that Taylor possessed the required mens rea for aiding and abetting the Indictment crimes. The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground of Appeal since Taylor has failed to prove any error/s of fact warranting appellate intervention.

GROUND 21: The Trial Chamber properly held that Taylor's military assistance to the RUF, RUF/AFRC constituted assistance to crimes

(i) Overview

397. Contrary to Taylor's claims, the Trial Chamber applied the correct legal standard of aiding and abetting. Based on the totality of the evidence before it, the Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor's actions fulfilled the elements of aiding and abetting by providing materiel to the RUF, RUF/AFRC in the knowledge or awareness that such actions would assist the commission of crimes and because such actions substantially contributed to the commission of crimes. A Trial Chamber is tasked only with applying the law. The hypothetical implications which Taylor seeks to raise are irrelevant and misplaced. None of the arguments advanced by Taylor under this Ground serve to invalidate the judgement or demonstrate there was a miscarriage of justice.

(ii) The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor's military assistance fulfilled the actus reus and mens rea requirements of aiding and abetting 398. Contrary to Taylor's contention, the Trial Chamber did not "adopt"[1077] or "interpret" a standard of aiding and abetting,[1078] rather it applied the standard which has been consistently used by this Court[1079] and by the ad hoc tribunals when assessing criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting.[1080] Its utilisation thus far in international criminal law has not had any of the detrimental effects to international relations which Taylor ascribes to it,[1081] as Taylor's submissions exaggerate the potential precedential effect of the Trial Judgement. The effect of the Trial Judgement is that those who provide assistance which substantially contributes to the commission of crimes, aware of the essential elements of the crime and state of mind of the perpetrator, will be held criminally responsible for the assistance provided.

399. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly assessed his mens rea for aiding and abetting.[1082] Taylor incorrectly contends that the Trial Chamber sought to infer his knowledge of crimes in Sierra Leone merely from Amnesty International reports, and that such reports put him on notice of the commission of crimes.[1083] Instead, the Trial Chamber noted that in 1997 numerous reports were prepared by ECOWAS and various UN agencies establishing that, as early as May 1997, the crimes committed by the Junta were "significantly reported".[1084] The Trial Chamber referred to a total arms and ammunition embargo to Sierra Leone put into effect by ECOWAS in August 1997, and a similar embargo placed in effect by the UN in October 1997 as recognition by the international community that "any military support could facilitate the commission of crimes".[1085] Further, the Trial Chamber referred to a very extensive list of documents emanating from various UN bodies, NGOs, and news outlets to unequivocally state that reports from 1997 onwards demonstrate the "public knowledge that RUF/AFRC forces committed the crimes of unlawful killings, sexual violence, physical violence, conscription and use of child soldiers, abduction and forced labour, looting and terrorism."[1086] The Trial Chamber also noted the manifold reports by international organisations, NGOs and newspapers which described the atrocities committed by the RUF/AFRC troops after the ECOMOG Intervention.[1087] Moreover, Taylor himself said that there was "no one on this planet that would not have heard through international broadcasts or [...] discussions about what was going on in Sierra Leone",[1088] and that by April 1998 if someone was providing support to the RUF/AFRC they "would be supporting a group engaged in a campaign of atrocities against the civilian population of Sierra Leone."[1089] Taylor also admitted to being briefed on international reports of atrocities being committed in Sierra Leone.[1090] These facts fundamentally distinguish the actions of Taylor in Sierra Leone from the examples of State-to-State assistance which he seeks to advance as similar to his own.[1091]

400. Contrary to Taylor's contention, the conviction entered against him does not amount to the criminalisation of conduct not previously criminalised.[1092] In the sphere of international relations, it is not widespread State practice to provide "critical" and "indispensable"[1093] support to rebel groups seeking to destabilise the elected government of a neighbour, who are notorious for committing terrorist attacks against civilians in the guise of military operations.[1094] If it is such practice by State leaders, they are rightly subject to accountability.

401. Taylor incorrectly asserts that there is a requirement under the mode of liability aiding and abetting that assistance be given "to the crime, as such".[1095] Examples advanced by Taylor of a mother providing sustenance to her child who is a criminal, or the manufacturer of weapons that are used in murders or robberies are entirely irrelevant.[1096] Such examples would not, of course, be considered as assistance substantially contributing to the commission of a crime unless the evidence established the actus reus and mens rea.

402. Taylor does not cite any authority for the proposition that assistance must be "to the crime, as such".[1097] The assertion that an aider and abettor's assistance must have a causal impact on the commission of crimes has been previously rejected by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Blaškić, which confirmed what is required is that assistance "has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime."[1098] In Blagojević and Jokić, the ICTY Appeals Chamber stated that "proof of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime, or proof that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime, is not required",[1099] reiterating the requirement that the support "have a substantial effect" upon the commission of crime.[1100] In Furundžija, an ICTY Trial Chamber, upon an analysis of customary international law, rejected a qualification of proximity between the assistance and the principal act, as this implied that assistance needs to be "tangible" or "have a causal effect" (in the sense of a conditio sine qua non) on the crime.[1101]

403. As acknowledged by Taylor himself, the terms "specifically aimed" and "specifically directed" sometimes used in the jurisprudence in defining aiding and abetting relate to the "substantial contribution" which the assistance provides to the commission of crimes.[1102] However, these terms do not serve to show that assistance must be to the criminal conduct itself as Taylor asserts.[1103] Taylor's arguments fail to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's application of the standard of aiding and abetting which would serve to invalidate the decision.

404. Taylor's assertion that his conviction was based on collective responsibility rather than individual criminal responsibility is incorrect.[1104] Contrary to Taylor's claim, jurisprudence about organisations not being deemed criminal organisations despite being engaged in criminal acts is irrelevant to this case.[1105] The Trial Chamber did not convict Taylor on the basis of his "membership" in the RUF; he was convicted based on the substantial assistance he provided to this notorious organisation aware that it would facilitate their horrendous criminal activity. The Trial Chamber expressly noted that while war is not per se a crime under the Court's Statute, before the start of the Indictment period, the war strategy of the RUF had evolved "to a strategy of guerrilla tactics based on a campaign of terror against the civilian population" of Sierra Leone.[1106] Based on its assessment of the totality of the evidence, the Trial Chamber reasonably found that the waging of a campaign of terror crimes against the civilian population of Sierra Leone was "inextricably linked to the strategy and objectives of military operations themselves" and that "any assistance towards these military operations of the RUF and RUF/AFRC constitutes direct assistance to the commission of crimes by these groups."[1107] Indeed, the rebels' war strategy was so widespread and notorious that Taylor himself admitted that no one on the planet was unaware of it.[1108]

405. Contrary to Taylor's contention that the finding on the operational strategy of the RUF was based "on a six paragraph analysis" of alleged crimes,[1109] the Trial Chamber devoted hundreds of pages to the crimes committed by the RUF/AFRC as a basis for its findings regarding the modus operandi of the RUF/AFRC.[1110] Further, Taylor incredibly claims that his assistance was "neutral in its nature relative to the crimes",[1111] despite the Trial Chamber properly finding that the nature of the military operations of the RUF/AFRC, which were conducted using the materiel that Taylor supplied, encompassed the commission of a terror campaign against civilians. Even Taylor himself notes that the RUF/AFRC's military operations were not conducted using solely machetes.[1112]

406. Taylor incorrectly conflates jus ad bellum and jus in bello in relation to the RUF's military operations in Sierra Leone.[1113] Regardless of the right of the RUF to fight,[1114] there has never been a right to wage a campaign of terror against a civilian population, to carry out a campaign of crimes against the civilian population, crimes inextricably linked to the strategy and objectives of the military operations themselves.[1115] Further, as held by the ICTY Appeals Chamber, even where an operation is considered to be of a legitimate character, this does not exclude an accused's criminal responsibility for crimes committed during the operations.[1116] Moreover, Taylor has consistently denied that he provided any assistance to the RUF, RUF/AFRC during the Indictment period.[1117] Taylor's suggestion at this stage of proceedings that any assistance he was providing was to legitimate war aims[1118] is purely hypothetical and should be dismissed.

407. Taylor's claim that the horrific crimes committed against innocent civilians over the course of more than five years were "a by-product of bad practices, excesses, [and] poor command and control"[1119] does a great disservice to the innumerable victims of crimes and to Sierra Leone itself for all of the devastation wrought. This contention clearly demonstrates that regardless of the extent of witness testimony about the horrors visited upon the civilian population of Sierra Leone as a consequence of the military tactics of the RUF/AFRC, Taylor continues to deny the clear finding regarding how the RUF, RUF/AFRC utilised a terror campaign to achieve its goals.[1120]

408. Further, Taylor's outlandish assertion that findings regarding the RUF's modus operandi were used by the Trial Chamber merely as a way to ascribe criminal responsibility to him is without merit and should be dismissed.[1121] Taylor's contention that punishing intentional individual actions which substantially assisted the murder, rape, and enslavement of Sierra Leoneans, as well as the burning of their property and pillage of their homes and conscription of their children, all as part of a campaign of terror, "risks casting an inappropriately wide net of liability over State practice that only serves to undermine the legitimacy of international criminal law"[1122] is an argument for impunity. Where, as here, Taylor's many actions of assistance are proven beyond reasonable doubt to constitute aiding and abetting, such may not go unpunished. Finally, Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber's imposition of an accepted standard of criminal liability serves to undermine the legitimacy of international criminal law is wholly without merit and deserving of no attention.[1123]

(iii) Conclusion

409. Taylor's submissions under this Ground fail to demonstrate any error in the Trial Judgement which would require appellate intervention and should be dismissed.

GROUND 22: The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor's supplying materiel which was used to secure further arms and ammunition utilised in the commission of crimes, amounted to practical assistance to the commission of those crimes

(i) Overview

410. The Trial Chamber properly found that attacks in which crimes were committed by RUF/AFRC on the outskirts of Freetown in January 1999 were perpetrated using materiel drawn from arms and ammunition directly supplied by Taylor and materiel captured using materiel supplied by Taylor.[1124] Based on the totality of the evidence before it, the Trial Chamber properly found that the materiel supplied by Taylor substantially contributed to the commission of crimes.

411. Taylor's arguments are based on two incorrect assertions. First, Taylor inaccurately claims that the Trial Chamber's analysis and conclusion regarding the materiel used in crimes committed in Freetown and Western Area differed from the approach employed in relation to other operations in which crimes were committed. Second, Taylor incorrectly suggests that materiel captured by the rebels in December 1998 by means of the supplies Taylor provided in November 1998 and then used to commit crimes in January 1999, could not be attributed to him for the purposes of aiding and abetting liability. For the reasons outlined below, Taylor's arguments lack merit. The Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence was consistent, and its findings based on that assessment were reflective of the evidence before it. Further, Taylor supplied materiel that was used to capture enemy materiel, which in turn was used to commit crimes. However, no issue of remoteness arose from this fact. There was a sufficient connection in these circumstances between Taylor's supply of materiel and the commission of Indictment crimes.

412. The Trial Chamber properly concluded that the Burkina Faso shipment Taylor facilitated was brought from Liberia to Sierra Leone in late November 1998 by Taylor's subordinates[1125] along with a plan that Bockarie and Taylor had jointly designed for a two-pronged attack on Kono and Kenema which would culminate in the invasion of Freetown.[1126] This plan of attack was implemented consistent with Taylor telling Bockarie that the operation be "fearful" and that the RUF should use "all means" to get to Freetown.[1127]

[1124] Contra Taylor Appeal, paras. 460-61. See Judgement, para. 5721.

413. The Trial Chamber also properly found that materiel from the Burkina Faso shipment was used to capture large quantities of materiel during the attack on Kono in December 1998.[1128] As Defence witness Issa Sesay testified, had it not been for the arms that came from Liberia, the attack on Kono in which materiel was captured would never have taken place.[1129] The Trial Chamber found that, on the basis of the evidence, materiel drawn either from the Burkina Faso shipment directly or from materiel captured through the use of the shipment materiel arrived in Freetown some time before the third week of January 1999 and was used in the commission of crimes.[1130]

(ii) The Trial Chamber assessed military operations and resulting crimes consistently

414. Taylor suggests that the use of captured materiel in the commission of crimes, notably during the retreat from Freetown and Western Area, should have been considered by the Trial Chamber to place him beyond the scope of accessorial liability.[1131] However, the Trial Chamber found that the materiel captured in Kono in December 1998 was taken through the use of materiel supplied by Taylor in the Burkina Faso shipment in the previous month, and this captured materiel was used in implementing the Bockarie/Taylor plan in Freetown, along with materiel directly supplied by Taylor.

415. Contrary to Taylor's assertions, the approach of the Trial Chamber in its analysis of the Freetown crimes is not inconsistent with its analysis of crimes committed in 1997 and 1998.[1132] Rather, each analysis was consistently applied to the facts before the Chamber; for this reason, comparisons with operations conducted at other times are inapposite.[1133] For example, it was the factual circumstances of the 1999 Freetown crimes which were fundamentally different, not the analysis applied. The Trial Chamber properly analysed whether materiel used by breakaway AFRC groups in operations in the North in late 1998 was linked to Taylor's supplies in order to establish his responsibility for such crimes.[1134] Taylor's contention that no findings were entered regarding crimes committed by breakaway AFRC troops in the capture of Rosos because of the possibility that materiel used for the operation was captured from ECOMOG arises from a flawed reading of the Trial Judgement. As Taylor himself acknowledges, the Prosecution did not advance any evidence in this respect, nor did the witness whom the Trial Chamber relied on regarding military operations at this time testify about the capture of Rosos.[1135] The Chamber made no finding because there was no evidence or argument on this point, not because of some now alleged "potential" that captured materiel rather than materiel provided by Taylor was used in the commission of crimes.[1136] Regarding the Fitti-Fatta operation, in light of evidence that materiel from other sources was used in the attack, the Trial Chamber properly analysed and concluded that materiel supplied by Taylor was also used in the operation.[1137]

416. Further, Taylor's assertion that the Trial Chamber's assessment of crimes committed in Kono in 1998 differed compared to crimes committed in Freetown in 1999 is inapposite.[1138] As noted above, the Chamber assessed the evidence before it relevant to crimes committed in each area. It was the factual circumstances which differed, not the assessment. The Trial Chamber properly assessed whether the many operations of the RUF, RUF/AFRC in 1997 and 1998 in which crimes were committed were conducted using materiel supplied or facilitated by Taylor. As regards the attacks conducted by rebel forces in the retreat from Freetown and in Western Area in early 1999, the Trial Chamber properly found that there were three sources of materiel used in the commission of crimes, all of which were directly attributable to Taylor. Taylor fails to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's approach which would require appellate intervention.

(iii) The Trial Chamber properly applied the actus reus standard in assessing operations committed by the rebel forces in the retreat from Freetown and in the Western Area

417. Contrary to Taylor's contention, the Trial Chamber properly concluded that criminal responsibility could be imposed based on finding that the crimes committed in Freetown were perpetrated using materiel deriving directly or indirectly from Taylor's acts of assistance.[1139]

418. The Trial Chamber properly identified three categories of materiel that were used to reinforce the rebels in Freetown and commit crimes on the outskirts of the city: supplies brought by Rambo Red Goat, materiel brought by Issa Sesay, and that brought by Dauda Aruna Fornie.[1140] The Chamber properly found that materiel brought by Rambo Red Goat came from the Burkina Faso shipment, the procurement of which was facilitated by Taylor and the transport of which to Sierra Leone was provided by him.[1141] Supplies brought by Issa Sesay came either from the Burkino Faso shipment or were captured during the Kono operation in December 1998 using materiel from the Burkina Faso shipment.[1142] The materiel brought by Fornie was that which he had brought from Taylor in Liberia.[1143]

419. As proven by the Defence's own evidence,[1144] the materiel supplied by Taylor was "causally critical" to the capture of materiel during the Kono operation, which added to the resources used in the commission of crimes in the retreat from the capital.[1145] Therefore, the materiel used in the commission of crimes in Freetown and its outskirts emanated directly from Taylor or was causally dependent on supplies directly coming from Taylor.

420. The actus reus of aiding and abetting requires assistance which has a substantial contribution to the commission of crimes.[1146] Taylor fails to cite any authority to support his contention that providing arms and ammunition which are used to capture additional materiel that is used in the commission of crimes does not amount to a substantial contribution.[1147] Nor is this contention supported by Taylor's reiteration of his incorrect interpretation of ICTR jurisprudence that acts must be "specifically aimed" at assisting the commission of a specific crime.[1148] As addressed earlier,[1149] the use of the term "specifically aimed" relates solely to the requirement that assistance amount to a "substantial contribution" to the crimes.[1150]

421. Taylor's contention that "substantial contribution" has been interpreted by the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in Blagojević and Jokić to require that an aider and abettor's "ability to affect the commission of the crime was substantial" is misplaced.[1151] Rather, in using this language, the ICTY Appeals Chamber was distinguishing the role of Blagojević from other members of his military brigade. It found that Blagojević's position "went beyond that of merely relaying orders up and down the chain of command", in that "he assisted in carrying out the orders of the Brigade Commander which were based on his advice and proposals."[1152]

422. Taylor incorrectly contends that his supply of materiel was too remote to the commission of crimes,[1153] referencing a number of variables which he contends affected whether the RUF captured the materiel in Kono.[1154] Taylor erroneously suggests that the capture of the materiel was contingent on, inter alia, the autonomous decision of the RUF to attack Kono, the tactics which were adopted, and the decision to continue to Freetown.[1155] Taylor disregards that the plan he was found to have made with Bockarie and the instructions he gave as to how the operation was to be conducted encompassed the decision to attack Kono, the tactics to be employed in the attack, and the advance to the capital.[1156] Moreover, such variables do not serve to undermine the fact that, as acknowledged in Defence evidence, the capture of the materiel would not have taken place had it not been for Taylor's supplies,[1157] and do not raise any reasonable doubt. The RUF did not use harsh words to capture the Kono materiel. They took it by force, using the materiel, the acquisition of which was assured by Taylor.[1158] Further, Taylor's provision of practical assistance which substantially contributed to the commission of crimes cannot be considered as being too remote in the face of a period of mere weeks between the Burkina Faso shipment and the capture of the materiel in Kono, which was subsequently used to commit crimes pursuant to a plan devised by Taylor and Bockarie.[1159]

423. The ICTR jurisprudence cited by Taylor as examples of "where similar steps intervened between alleged support and crime" is irrelevant. The Kalimanzira Appeals Chamber overturned the aiding and abetting conviction because it found that testimony of the two witnesses upon whom the Trial Chamber had relied was "vague and devoid of detail",[1160] and that there was "no evidence about even a single incident" of killing relating to the accused.[1161] In Nahimana, Ngeze had been convicted of instigating rather than aiding and abetting,[1162] and moreover, no evidence was adduced of any impact of Ngeze's alleged encouragement to commit genocide during a period within the temporal jurisdiction of the ICTR.[1163] The third example adduced by Taylor is equally misplaced.[1164] In Ndindabahizi, the Appeals Chamber overturned the aiding and abetting conviction because it found that the alleged date of the criminal conduct was unclear,[1165] and that it was unclear whether those alleged to have been assisted by the accused were the perpetrators of the crime.[1166] None of the arguments raised by Taylor establish that the Trial Chamber committed an error which invalidates the decision.

(iv) The actus reus of aiding and abetting was fulfilled for crimes in Freetown and Western Area

424. Taylor's assertion that, had the Trial Chamber not attributed captured materiel to him, crimes committed in Freetown could not have been held to have been committed with materiel he supplied is incorrect.[1167] Even if the Trial Chamber had not considered the captured materiel as attributable to Taylor, materiel which was supplied by Taylor still formed "an amalgamate of fungible resources" used in the commission of crimes.[1168] As found by the Trial Chamber, the other two categories of materiel used in the retreat from Freetown were the Burkina Faso shipment facilitated by Taylor and the materiel brought by Fornie provided by Taylor.[1169] Contrary to Taylor's assertion, such a finding would be consistent with the Trial Chamber's assessment of materiel used in the commission of crimes in 1997 and 1998.[1170] For instance, the Trial Chamber found that supplies provided by Taylor were one of the sources of materiel used in Operation Fitti-Fatta in mid-1998, holding that evidence of materiel coming from other sources did not preclude some of the materiel being sourced from Taylor.[1171]

425. Contrary to Taylor's contention, his conviction for aiding and abetting crimes by facilitating the Burkina Faso shipment was not based only on assisting crimes committed in Freetown and the Western Area.[1172] The Trial Chamber entered findings regarding the commission of crimes in Kono in the aftermath of the Burkina Faso shipment.[1173] Yengema training base was established at the end of 1998 and recruits were "trained with live ammunition" and "were also assigned to commanders as bodyguards."[1174] The recruits included conscripted children under the age of 15,[1175] and civilians captured from the area and from the front lines around Koidu Town,[1176] with those who attempted to escape being killed.[1177] Based on these facts, the Trial Chamber properly found that from December 1998 onwards, children were forcibly recruited for the purpose of directly participating in hostilities,[1178] and civilians were enslaved at Yengema by members of the RUF/AFRC.[1179] In light of the need which the RUF/AFRC had for materiel support prior to the Burkina Faso shipment,[1180] it is readily apparent that materiel from the Burkina Faso shipment was used in Yengema for the purposes of operating this training base.[1181]

426. Further, Taylor's contention that there was no connection between the materiel he supplied and the commission of crimes in Freetown and the Western Area ignores the evidence on record.[1182] The Chamber found that, with the initial invaders of the capital requiring reinforcement,[1183] the materiel used in the commission of crimes during the retreat from Freetown and in the Western Area came from three sources, two of which came directly

There is also credible evidence in the trial record that numerous other crimes were committed in Kono and Makeni after the arrival of the Burkina Faso shipment. For example: the corpses of civilians were seen in Koidu Town following the attack by RUF/AFRC fighters in late 1998; women were raped by RUF/AFRC fighters following the capture of Koidu Town during the late 1998 offensive (TF1-567, T. 2 July 2008 p. 12913. TF1-567 was found "generally credible" at Judgement, para. 317); forced mining was taking place in Kono in late 1998 (Judgement, para. 1720). Note that fn. 3938 of the TJ lists Kokuima as one of the mining sites, which is located in Koidu Town. Civilians were also forced to carry arms and ammunition from Buedu to Superman Ground in Kono in readiness for the attack on Kono as part of the late 1998 offensive (TF1-567, T. 2 July 2008 p. 12913). Mining equipment was looted following the recapture of Koidu Town at the end of 1998 (TF1-367, T. 21 August 2008 p. 14270. TF1-367 was found "generally credible" at Judgement, para. 2446).

from Taylor and the other causally dependent on Taylor's supplies.[1184] The Trial Chamber properly concluded that Taylor's assistance was used in operations in which crimes were committed,[1185] including killings, abductions, burnings, physical violence, and sexual crimes.[1186] The materiel which Taylor supplied or facilitated and that which was causally linked to the capture of further supplies was properly considered by the Trial Chamber to have been "critical" in enabling the RUF and RUF/AFRC to conduct its military operations throughout the indictment period.[1187] Taylor's contentions fail to establish any error of law or fact which would serve to invalidate the judgement or occasion a miscarriage of justice.

(v) Conclusion

427. Taylor has failed to demonstrate the existence of an error in the findings of the Trial Chamber that would necessitate appellate intervention in the findings of the Trial Chamber, and consequently, this Ground should be dismissed.

GROUND 23: The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor facilitated the transportation of arms and ammunition to the RUF, RUF/AFRC that played a vital role in their military operations

(i) Overview

428. The Trial Chamber properly found that the shipments of materiel provided by Taylor to the RUF, RUF/AFRC throughout the Indictment period substantially contributed to the commission of crimes by those rebel forces. Taylor incorrectly contends that the shipments could not be attributed to him, and that the materiel provided was used in the commission of crimes. Taylor's arguments lack merit given the Trial Chamber's numerous findings regarding the reliance of the RUF, RUF/AFRC on the shipments that he provided, the lack of alternative sources of materiel available to the rebel forces, and the crimes that were committed in Sierra Leone throughout the Indictment period. None of the alleged errors relied on by Taylor under this Ground establish that the Trial Chamber committed any legal or factual error warranting the intervention of the Appeals Chamber. This Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

(ii) The Trial Chamber properly found that the materiel provided or facilitated by Taylor substantially contributed to crimes during and immediately after the Junta period

(a) Overview

429. The Trial Chamber properly found that materiel which Taylor provided and facilitated throughout the course of the Indictment period was "indispensable for the RUF/AFRC military offensives" and had a "substantial effect on the commission of crimes".[1188] The findings which Taylor seeks to isolate regarding individual shipments and their substantial contribution to the commission of crimes must therefore be viewed in the context of the totality of the Trial Chamber's findings.

430. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly assessed the evidence which tied Taylor to the supply of the Magburaka shipment.[1189] Taylor's suggestion that the Chamber's finding of his involvement in this shipment was solely based on the testimony of TF1-371 that Ibrahim Bah had told him as much,[1190] is incorrect. The Trial Chamber relied on the evidence of a number of witnesses, including a Defence witness, in finding that Ibrahim Bah "was the key person who facilitated the purchase and transportation" of the Magburaka shipment,[1191] while "[a] number of Prosecution witnesses implicated [Taylor] in the supply of the Magburaka arms shipment".[1192] The Trial Chamber relied on a totality of the evidence connecting Taylor to the shipment. For instance, Isaac Mongor testified to the presence of Ibrahim Bah at two meetings with senior RUF officials during which Bah spoke of Taylor's urging for the RUF and AFRC to work together and during which it was clear that military assistance would be provided by Bah, whom the Trial Chamber found was a "trusted emissary" who represented Taylor.[1193] Further, Samuel Kargbo testified to being present at a meeting of the Supreme Council in which JPK said he would send a delegation which included Ibrahim Bah to purchase arms and ammunition.[1194]

(b) The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor knowingly participated in the Magburaka shipment

1. The testimonies of TF1-371, Isaac Mongor and Samuel Kargbo are corroborative

431. Taylor incorrectly claims that the testimony of Isaac Mongor and Samuel Kargbo do not provide corroboration of TF1-371's evidence, because their testimonies conflict in all significant details.[1195] As the Chamber found, the evidence of Kargbo and Mongor both make reference to Taylor's role in the facilitation of the shipment through Bah.[1196] These testimonies do not have to be identical in their account of the sequence of connected facts as witnesses experience the same events from differing view points; they corroborate one another if they support each other in relation to the same fact or a sequence of linked facts.[1197]

432. As noted by the Trial Chamber, Mongor testified to Bah's presence at a meeting at which Bah stated that Taylor wanted the AFRC and RUF to work together.[1198] Mongor was also told by JPK that Taylor was going to "send something" for the Junta government.[1199] Similarly, Kargbo testified to hearing JPK tell Taylor of a delegation including Ibrahim Bah that JPK was sending to Taylor in order to procure arms and ammunition.[1200]

2. The Trial Chamber properly assessed the evidence of TF1-371

433. [See this paragraph in full in Confidential Annex A]

3. The Trial Chamber properly assessed the source of the hearsay evidence

434. Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber failed to properly assess the evidence of Ibrahim Bah given the potential that he was likely to boost his own credibility is misplaced.[1201] As previously discussed, the Trial Chamber was only required to assess circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness in relation to issues, such as motive, affecting the source of the hearsay, and the Chamber implicitly took this approach in this case.[1202] Moreover, already noted above, Taylor's assertion that TF1-371 was the sole source of evidence that Ibrahim Bah was acting on behalf of Taylor is inaccurate. Within the context of the totality of the evidence, the presence of circumstantial guarantees supports the conclusions drawn by the Trial Chamber. For example, Taylor's relationship with the RUF/AFRC was not based solely on isolated instances of cooperation conducted through Bah, rather the relationship was one of long-standing collaboration involving numerous acts over a span of many years.[1203]

435. Moreover, the right to cross examination applies to the witness testifying before a Trial Chamber and not to the initial declarant whose statement has been transmitted by the witness.[1204] Instead, the absence of cross-examination of the declarant can be used to challenge the weight to be given to the hearsay testimony and identify issues which might assist the Trial Chamber to evaluate the evidence.[1205] Taylor did not seek to challenge the potential motive of the source of the hearsay while any of the relevant witnesses were giving their evidence.

436. Based on a thorough assessment of the witnesses' testimony in question, the Chamber decided upon the weight to give to the evidence. Taylor has not demonstrated any error in that assessment of the evidence which would occasion a miscarriage of justice and therefore his submissions in this regard should be dismissed.

4. The Trial Chamber properly assessed the hearsay evidence

437. Taylor's claim that Ibrahim Bah could have brokered the Magburaka delivery without his knowledge is inaccurate.[1206] The Trial Chamber held that the evidence relating to Ibrahim Bah showed an individual who was "a trusted emissary who represented the RUF at times and [Taylor] at times, and served as a liaison between them at times."[1207] In this role, Bah "helped arrange arms and diamonds transactions".[1208] The reasonableness of the Trial Chamber's conclusion can be shown by its careful assessment of the consistent evidence which linked Bah to Taylor and demonstrated Taylor's role in the facilitation of the acquisition of arms and ammunition.[1209]

438. Moreover, the Trial Chamber was conscious that some of the witnesses' evidence was hearsay.[1210] Taylor fails to establish that the Trial Chamber accorded undue weight to the probative value of the hearsay evidence, nor does he demonstrate that such hearsay evidence was unreliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents.[1211] Taylor fails to establish any error in the Trial Chamber's finding that Taylor facilitated the Magburaka shipment that would occasion a miscarriage of justice.

(c) The Trial Chamber properly found that materiel from the Magburaka shipment was used to commit crimes

1. The Trial Chamber properly assessed the size of the Magburaka shipment

439. Contrary to Taylor's assertion, the Trial Chamber did not make inconsistent findings on the size of the Magburaka shipment.[1212] The Trial Chamber relied on the totality of the evidence for its finding on the size of the shipment. TF1-371 testified that the shipment was "huge".[1213] Kargbo testified that the shipment comprised of a "large quantity" of materiel,[1214] while Issa Sesay spoke of "two truckloads" of materiel in testimony which the Trial Chamber considered was downplaying the quantity of the shipment.[1215] Further, Mongor gave evidence that the shipment included "two anti-aircraft guns" and GMG rounds.[1216] The Chamber also referred to evidence regarding the large group of fighters and large number of vehicles that were present to take delivery of the shipment.[1217] The Trial Chamber accepted that a variation between witnesses in the description of the quantity and context of the shipment was inevitable given that it was delivered "during the night with little lighting and hurriedly loaded on to trucks" and that each faction was focused on receiving their share of the materiel.[1218] The thread running through the evidence heard by the Trial Chamber regarding the quantity of the materiel shows that, overall, though the exact details of what the shipment contained may have varied, the evidence in relation to the size of the shipment was consistent. Taylor fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed any error in its assessment of witness evidence which would invalidate the decision or that the finding regarding the size of the Magburaka shipment was one which no reasonable trier of fact could have arrived at.[1219]

440. Taylor's claim that only TF1-371 testified to the inclusion of AK-47 ammunition in the shipment is mistaken.[1220] Evidence that the shipment contained such AK-47 supplies was also testified to by Kargbo,[1221] who was deemed a generally credible eyewitness,[1222] and was further corroborated by the evidence of Alimamy Bobson Sesay,[1223] and Witness TF1-338.[1224] Taylor's assertion that it was an error to prefer the evidence of TF1-371 regarding the presence of AK-47 ammunition, which was corroborated by three other witnesses, instead of Mongor's evidence to the contrary,[1225] which was corroborated only by Issa Sesay whose evidence was to be treated with caution,[1226] is without merit. The Trial Chamber properly assessed the hearsay evidence and used its discretion as to the weight to attach to it.[1227] Taylor fails to demonstrate any error in the manner in which the Trial Chamber dealt with evidence which would serve to invalidate the findings. He also fails to prove that the Trial Chamber erred in its finding regarding the size of the Magburaka shipment or in its finding that the shipment contained AK-47 ammunition. Consequently, the assertion regarding this finding should also be dismissed.[1228]

2. The Trial Chamber properly held that children under the age of 15 were used to participate directly in hostilities at Tongo Fields using materiel provided by Taylor

441. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly found that the use of children under the age of 15 to guard mining sites constituted a violation of international law.[1229] The jurisprudence of this Court is clear: 'using' children to participate actively in hostilities encompasses putting their lives directly at risk in combat, which includes participation in activities linked to combat.[1230] It is also clear from the evidence that Tongo Fields was a military target,[1231] control of which changed hands between opposing sides following armed attacks.[1232] There is nothing in the customary international law definition of participating in hostilities that would exclude the guarding of a military target.[1233]

3. The Trial Chamber properly held that crimes committed during and after the Intervention, including in Freetown, in 'Operation Pay Yourself' and Kono were committed with materiel from the Magburaka shipment

442. Contrary to Taylor's contention, the Trial Chamber properly found that materiel from the Magburaka shipment facilitated by Taylor were used in the commission of crimes in operations in early 1998.[1234] Taylor incorrectly asserts that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof and based its finding on a 'likelihood' that the rebels had access to the Magburaka shipment.[1235] Taylor takes this finding from the Trial Judgement out of context,[1236] as the Trial Chamber made a series of findings which provide the basis which led to the holding that the Magburaka shipment was used in the commission of crimes. The Trial Chamber properly found that at the time of the Magburaka shipment the Junta "had depleted its existing sources of supply";[1237] the shipment itself was "very large";[1238] the rebel forces retreated from Freetown after the Intervention with materiel from the shipment;[1239] that the RUF did not capture much arms and ammunition during this period;[1240] that the rebel forces were involved in offensives in Kono and conducted 'Operation Pay Yourself' after the Intervention;[1241] and, that the rebel forces were almost entirely out of materiel again in June 1998 and requesting more assistance from Taylor.[1242]

443. Further, Taylor's contention that the Trial Chamber reversed the burden of proof by circumstantial evidence is incorrect.[1243] There was no shift in the burden of proof,[1244] as the evidence that materiel from the Magburaka shipment was used in crimes is not "purely circumstantial" as Taylor suggests.[1245] The Defence itself accepted "that the Magburaka shipment was used in fighting in Freetown during the ECOMOG Intervention."[1246]

444. Taylor also previously relied on Exhibit P-066 indicating that at the time of the writing of that letter, dated 24 June 1998, from Sam Bockarie to Taylor, that the materiel from the Magburaka shipment had been exhausted.[1247] This exhibit is important for two reasons. First, it is clear from the letter that the rebel forces still possessed ammunition, albeit a small amount, in June 1998. Second, the letter states "[The rebel forces] appreciate the assistance we have been receiving and we want you to believe that we have no where else to cry for help besides [Taylor]."[1248] It is clear, therefore, that the rebel forces had maintained supplies of materiel from the Magburaka shipment for the time period encapsulating 'Operation Pay

Yourself' and the offensives in Kono District in February/March 1998.[1249] Further, the rebel forces by their own admission did not have an alternative source of armaments other than Taylor, thereby contradicting Taylor's argument that the Trial Chamber's finding that the Magburaka shipment was used in the commission of crimes was based solely on the absence of evidence to the contrary.[1250]

445. In light of the totality of the evidence, Taylor fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's finding that the Magburaka shipment was used in 'Operation Pay Yourself' and in crimes during offensives in Kono in early 1998 was one that no Trial Chamber acting reasonably would have come to.[1251]

446. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber did not shift the burden onto the Defence to prove the relative significance of other sources of materiel available to the rebels.[1252] Taylor's references to existing supplies of the Kabbah Government, captured supplies from ECOMOG and UN peacekeepers, and supplies from trade with ULIMO, AFL and ECOMOG commanders are inapposite.[1253] The Trial Chamber made extensive findings relating to these reputed sources of supplies to the rebels, meaning that no prejudice was caused to Taylor.[1254] In relation to existing military stores in Freetown, the Junta had depleted this source in or around August 1997, more than 6 months before the crimes at issue.[1255] Materiel purchased or traded from ULIMO and Guinea was "small in quantity and insufficient to sustain the operations of the rebel groups".[1256] Defence witness Issa Sesay testified that "trade with AFL commanders resulted only in small amounts of ammunition."[1257] Further, "there is little evidence that the RUF were able to capture much by the way of arms and ammunition [after the Intervention through 1998]".[1258] These findings clearly give the lie to Taylor's assertion that the Trial Chamber made no findings showing that these sources were insubstantial and that the Trial Chamber "impermissibly resolved ambiguity and doubt in favour of the Prosecution."[1259] Taylor fails to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's finding that crimes were committed using materiel from the Magburaka shipment, which would serve to occasion a miscarriage or invalidate the decision.

(d) The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor provided supplies brought by Tamba in 1997

447. Contrary to Taylor's claim regarding the reliability and credibility of four witnesses relied upon in the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber properly assessed and relied on the evidence of these witnesses who corroborate his involvement in the provision of supplies brought by Tamba in 1997.[1260]

448. Witness TF1-375 testified that the truck in which Tamba carried the materiel broke down and that the witness himself was in the convoy that collected and brought the supplies with Tamba to Kenema.[1261] Witness TF1-375 also testified that he later got to know Tamba well and that Tamba had told him of his work as a liaison between Bockarie and Taylor, bringing ammunition to Sierra Leone in return for diamonds.[1262] The Trial Chamber found that Witness TF1-375's evidence required corroboration,[1263] and from the generally credible Jabaty Jaward testifying to "the unique detail" that Tamba and the supplies had gotten stuck, reasonably inferred that the evidence of both witnesses evidence related to the same event.[1264] The Trial Chamber also referred to the evidence of Jabaty Jaward,[1265] Isaac Mongor,[1266] TF1-371,[1267] Karmoh Kanneh,[1268] Albert Saidu,[1269] Augustine Mallah,[1270] and Mustapha M. Mansaray[1271] variously testifying to Tamba's delivery of supplies on behalf of Taylor.

449. The Trial Chamber referred to documentary evidence and the "overwhelming" witness evidence showing that Tamba "worked for the SSS and was a subordinate of [Taylor]",[1272] and that he worked "as a courier of arms, diamonds and messages back and forth between [Taylor] and the RUF/AFRC throughout the Indictment period."[1273] In light of these findings and witness testimony such as that of Karmoh Kanneh who said that Tamba was "[Taylor's] eye in the movement",[1274] Taylor fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he supplied the materiel to the rebel forces which Tamba brought in 1997.[1275]

(e) The Trial Chamber properly found that the supplies brought by Tamba were used in the commission of crimes

450. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[1276] the Trial Chamber properly found that the materiel brought by Tamba in 1997 was used in the commission of crimes in Kenema. Taylor incorrectly contends that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof,[1277] suggesting that the Chamber inferred that the materiel was used by the rebels in military operations in the absence of any direct evidence.[1278] The trial record shows that the supplies brought by Tamba included ammunition for AK-47s, GMGs and RPGs,[1279] and that the materiel supplied was brought to Kenema.[1280] In light of the findings that the Junta had "depleted its existing stores of supplies in late 1997",[1281] and that other supplies at this time were small in quantity and insufficient to sustain operations,[1282] Taylor failed to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's finding.[1283]

(iii) The Trial Chamber properly found that the materiel provided or facilitated by Taylor substantially contributed to the crimes committed in 1998 and early 1999

(a) Kono

1. The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor facilitated the supply of materiel for the Kono operation by supplying Bockarie or by facilitating intermediaries

451. Taylor incorrectly asserts that "almost all of the evidence" regarding his involvement with Bockarie obtaining supplies in Liberia is based on the hearsay source of Bockarie himself.[1284] It requires noting, however, that there is no error of law in relying decisively on hearsay evidence.[1285] In relying on uncorroborated hearsay evidence, a Trial Chamber must take into consideration the indicia which it set out at paragraphs 166, and 168 to 169 of its Judgement. Having considered all of these factors, the Chamber found this evidence reliable. In this respect, the Prosecution recalls that a trier of fact does not have to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes. Nor, does it have to set out in detail why it accepted a particular testimony.[1286]

452. Taylor incorrectly considers as "the danger of hearsay testimony" the Trial Chamber noting that a witness was "simply reporting what he was told by Bockarie" regarding an implausibility in his testimony of a particular meeting with Taylor.[1287] The Trial Chamber recognised that a witness was not required to explain in precise detail what had transpired in a meeting involving Bockarie and Taylor, and failure to do so did not undermine the general credibility of his testimony that Bockarie had travelled to Monrovia and had had returned with a supply of materiel.[1288]

453. Contrary to Taylor's claim, there is no foundation to support that Bockarie was lying and exaggerating Taylor's support of him in order to enhance his own image and bolster his position within the RUF. If embellishing his own role and authority was Bockarie's goal, then sharing credit with Taylor for planning the biggest military operation of the civil war would be unlikely, and there is no evidence that Bockarie would have considered the potential for criminal prosecution and was therefore trying to shift blame for the commission of crimes to Taylor. Bockarie was known as a ruthless commander, feared by his subordinates and known to take measures against those perceived to be disloyal.[1289] The authority wielded by Bockarie over the RUF/AFRC forces is clear, with even the AFRC group which has previously broken away from the rebel alliance in mid-1998 accepting and following his command for the Freetown operation.[1290] Further, the weight of the findings regarding the relationship between Taylor and Bockarie; coupled with the findings regarding Bockarie's direct and indirect provision of what was the RUF's biggest resource, diamonds, to Taylor in 1998 and 1999,[1291]

[1291] For instance, Taylor's own admission regarding meeting Bockarie in Liberia, as well as his declared affinity for Bockarie which could not be explained were the relationship one that Bockarie had lied about. See Judgement, para. 5514, referring to Taylor, T. 17 September 2009 pp. 29250, 29261; T. 26 October 2009 p. 30221 "look, I loved that boy and I am saying – you didn't ask me this question; I volunteered, I would never serve to give the lie to Taylor's assertion.[1292] Moreover, Taylor's contention regarding Bockarie's propensity to embellish their relationship is fatally undermined by the Trial Chamber's finding that following his arrest, Foday Sankoh "instructed Bockarie to take orders from (Taylor)".[1293] This, in effect, represented the continuation of the link between Taylor and the RUF,[1294] with the relationship even closer under Bockarie's reign as rebel leader. The trial record is replete with circumstantial guarantees provided by the long-standing collaboration between Taylor and the RUF, from its very inception,[1295] through the leadership of Sankoh,[1296] Bockarie[1297] and Sesay.[1298]

454. Moreover, the Trial Chamber had witness evidence before it which did not constitute hearsay sourced from Bockarie, and properly referred to this evidence.[1299] Taylor's cherry-picking of the witnesses' testimony is misleading.[1300]

455. For instance, Dauda Aruna Fornie testified that he himself accompanied Bockarie on a number of trips to Monrovia in which arms and ammunition were collected with the assistance of Tamba and Yeaten, and brought back to Sierra Leone.[1301] Karmoh Kanneh testified to being present at Foya when a helicopter of materiel arrived from Monrovia with Yeaten on board.[1302] Samuel Kargbo testified to twice being part of a group that either accompanied or unloaded a convoy of arms and ammunition brought by Bockarie and Tamba to Buedu.[1303] Varmuyan Sherif testified to being instructed by Taylor to collect Bockarie from Sierra Leone and to Taylor providing Bockarie with a satellite phone.[1304] Yanks Smythe testified that arms and ammunition were kept in a warehouse next to White Flower, from which it was not possible to take any significant amount without Taylor's approval.[1305] A number of witnesses testified that the arms and ammunition delivered to Buedu came from that same warehouse at White Flower.[1306] TF1-539 testified that he accompanied Bockarie and Musa Cissé on the trip to Burkina Faso in which arms and ammunition were obtained.[1307] TF1-367 also testified to accompanying Bockarie to Monrovia and bringing back arms and ammunition to Buedu.[1308] There was a wealth of evidence probative of Taylor's involvement in supplying Bockarie,[1309] and consequently no question of Taylor's conviction being based solely on an uncross-examined statement.[1310]

456. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the evidence regarding his use of intermediaries to supply materiel to the rebels was not based solely on oral and documentary hearsay, and did not require corroboration by direct evidence.[1311] As Taylor himself points out, the Trial Chamber acknowledged the hearsay element of the evidence linking him to the provision of supplies.[1312] However, there is no requirement that hearsay evidence be corroborated by direct evidence.[1313] The Trial Chamber properly assessed the relevance, reliability and probative value of each witness's testimony and each piece of documentary evidence.[1314]

457. Moreover, the Trial Chamber referred to evidence which was not based on hearsay, such as Abu Keita, who testified that Marzah and Jungle were sent to Sierra Leone by Yeaten,[1315] whom the Trial Chamber found to be a representative of Taylor.[1316] TF1-579 testified to personally taking materiel to Bockarie in Buedu accompanied by Jungle and Sampson Weah, with Yeaten providing the ammunition from a warehouse beside Taylor's house on one occasion.[1317] Defence witness Yanks Smythe testified that in order to get arms and ammunition from this warehouse, a request would have to be made to Taylor.[1318] Contrary to Taylor's claim,[1319] the Trial Chamber was entitled to give particular weight to the evidence of TF1-516 for the reasons stated.[1320] Taylor fails to demonstrate that there was an error in the Trial Chamber's approach to the evidence which invalidated the decision.[1321]

2. The Trial Chamber properly held that materiel supplied by Taylor substantially contributed to the commission of crimes in Kono in 1998

458. Taylor incorrectly contends that the Trial Chamber relied on two erroneous findings to conclude that Taylor contributed substantially to the crimes committed in Kono in 1998.[1322] First, Taylor confuses the findings of the Trial Chamber as regards the size of the supplies brought by Bockarie and those brought by intermediaries to Sierra Leone.[1323] The Trial Chamber acknowledged that the evidence was insufficient to establish that the materiel provided by Taylor in 1998 through intermediaries was large.[1324] As regards the materiel provided by Taylor which was brought to Sierra Leone through trips Bockarie made to Liberia in 1998, the Trial Chamber found that this was "sizeable".[1325] Given the findings that the rebel forces were often short of supplies,[1326] precipitating frequent requests to Taylor,[1327] it is clear from the context that the supplies which he provided through intermediaries and through Bockarie did amount to a substantial contribution to the commission of crimes.[1328] In fact, the Trial Chamber held that the provision and facilitation of materiel by Taylor was "critical in enabling the RUF and the AFRC to carry out offensives and maintain territories".[1329]

459. Second, Taylor's suggestion that the evidence that materiel he supplied was used in military operations depends on Alimamy Bobson Sesay's uncorroborated hearsay evidence is inaccurate.[1330] As already noted, in light of the evidence that the rebel forces were continuously seeking additional materiel; that sources of supplies other than those emanating from Taylor were limited; and that crimes were being committed in Kono at this time, the Trial Chamber properly entered findings regarding Taylor's participation and its effect on the commission of crimes on the ground.[1331] The trial record shows that in 1998, weapons emanating from Taylor were used in fighting in Freetown,[1332] in "Operation Pay Yourself", in offensives in Kono, as well as in the commission of crimes during those operations.[1333] Taylor fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that the materiel he supplied substantially contributed to the commission of crimes in Kono in 1998.

(b) Fitti-Fatta

1. The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor supplied materiel used in 'Operation Fitti-Fatta'

460. The Trial Chamber did not make any findings as regards the commission of crimes committed during the Fitti-Fatta operation.[1334] As a result, the Trial Chamber did not seek to hold that Taylor had aided and abetted the commission of crimes and there is consequently no conclusion to challenge.[1335] Contrary to Taylor's claim, in the event that the Trial Chamber did enter such a finding, then same would be a reasonable finding on the basis of the evidence before the Trial Chamber.[1336]

461. TF1-375 testified to himself being involved in the transportation of arms and ammunition from Taylor's farm in Gbarnga which were used in the operation. Having noted that this witness's evidence was to be treated with caution, the Trial Chamber found that TF1-375's evidence of Taylor being the source of the supplies was corroborated by Mongor, Pyne and Kamara, all found to be generally credible witnesses.[1337] Given the findings regarding the shortage of supplies of the rebel forces already noted, the Trial Chamber's finding that there were a number sources of supplies for 'Operation Fitti-Fatta' is not dispositive of the fact that Taylor's contribution was substantial.

(c) Operations in the North

1. The Trial Chamber properly found that materiel supplied by Taylor substantially contributed to the commission of crimes by the AFRC in the North

462. The Trial Chamber properly found that materiel supplied by Taylor was used in the commission of crimes by Brima's group during their military activities from mid-1998 to October 1998. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly found that ammunition delivered in mid-1998[1338] would have lasted until October 1998.[1339] Taylor incorrectly asserts that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof,[1340] taking out of context the Chamber's finding that it was not "implausible",[1341] and that it could "reasonably infer" that materiel lasted this time.[1342] Instead, the Trial Chamber looked at the entirety of the evidence, for instance, that many of the operations conducted were against primarily undefended civilian targets,[1343] and that the rebels "never had any other supply" of materiel.[1344]

463. Contrary to Taylor's claim,[1345] the witness Bobson Sesay was in a position to know of the sources of the ammunition obtained and used by Brima's group in the commission of crimes in the North,[1346] with the Trial Chamber noting the witness's consistent and credible account of his participation in operations conducted by Brima's group from mid-1998 to October 1998.[1347] Further, the Trial Chamber referred to the evidence of witnesses who had been captured by Brima's group and held that it closely corroborated Bobson Sesay's account of the operations of Brima's troops throughout this period.[1348] Taylor does not cite any of the apparent "abundant contextual evidence (and findings by the Chamber)" as to the existence of sources of materiel alternative to Taylor's supplies.[1349] Taylor's assertions fail to demonstrate any error on the part of the Trial Chamber occasioning a miscarriage of justice.

464. Contrary to Taylor's assertion, the Trial Chamber properly found that materiel he supplied was used by Denis Mingo and SAJ Musa in attacks on Mongor Bendugu and Kabala, and that the materiel amounted to a substantial contribution to the crimes committed.[1350] The Trial Chamber accepted the evidence of TF1-375, who testified to transporting the ammunition from Taylor's farm in Gbarnga to Bockarie, and to subsequently transporting part of the materiel to Mingo on Bockarie's instruction.[1351] The Trial Chamber properly assessed the credibility concerns regarding the evidence of TF1-375, and found that his account was supported by the evidence of Perry Kamara and Alice Pyne.[1352] Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly accepted that TF1-375 could identify the difference between ammunition used in Liberia and Sierra Leone, in light of the length of time that the witness spent in Liberia.[1353] Further, the Trial Chamber noted that the witness was not challenged on this fact during his testimony,[1354] despite Taylor's assertion that this was "such obvious nonsense".[1355]

465. TF1-375's evidence was corroborated by Perry Kamara,[1356] who testified to Mingo getting the ammunition from Bockarie in Buedu.[1357] Contrary to Taylor's assertion, the finding that materiel he supplied was used by Denis Mingo and SAJ Musa in attacks on Mongor Bendugu and Kabala does not therefore rely solely on TF1-375's evidence, and the Trial Chamber properly analysed the evidence to conclude that the materiel he provided amounted to a substantial contribution to the crimes committed.[1358] Taylor fails to establish any error in the Trial Chamber's finding that materiel he supplied substantially contributed to the commission of crimes in the North which would invalidate the decision or serve to occasion a miscarriage of justice.

(d) Freetown

1. The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor facilitated the supply of materiel to the December 1998-January 1999 offensive by facilitating the Burkina Faso Shipment and ammunition transported by Fornie

466. Taylor's contention that the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber to find that he facilitated the Burkina Faso shipment was based on a single hearsay source and that the Chamber's treatment of hearsay was inadequate is incorrect.[1359] Contrary to Taylor's approach, merely referring to the paragraphs of the Trial Judgement in which the Trial Chamber discussed the evidence of certain witnesses does not serve to prove that the Trial Chamber "relied heavily" on these witnesses.[1360]

467. Taylor fails to acknowledge that the Trial Chamber noted that some witness testimony contained hearsay evidence, which it "fully considered when assessing the weight of their evidence."[1361] The Trial Chamber then went on to hold that these witnesses' testimonies

"effectively complement each critical element of the allegation" and that the witnesses' evidence was in turn partly corroborated by documentary evidence.[1362]

468. Taylor incorrectly asserts that the evidence of eight witnesses regarding his involvement in the Burkina Faso shipment was based solely on one hearsay source, Sam Bockarie.[1363] Taylor neglects to acknowledge: that Isaac Mongor testified to a meeting of commanders at Waterworks prior to the shipment at which a letter was drafted to Taylor requesting ammunition and that Jungle brought the letter to Taylor;[1364] that TF1-567 was told by Issa Sesay that Bockarie had brought back a lot of arms and ammunition from Liberia and that Taylor had said that there would be no more supplies unless the RUF/AFRC recaptured mining areas;[1365] that Karmoh Kanneh testified that Tamba had spoken at a meeting convened after the shipment and told the meeting about the materiel that Bockarie had brought back;[1366] and that Dauda Aruna Fornie testified to accompanying Bockarie to Liberia, to remaining at Base 1 for a week while Bockarie and the rest of the group travelled to Burkina Faso, and to witnessing the two trucks of ammunition travelling from Monrovia accompanied by Marzah and Tamba.[1367] Taylor's assertion that the Trial Chamber's treatment of hearsay was "manifestly inadequate" is therefore a baseless argument.[1368] Further, the Trial Chamber was not required to assess the credibility of Sam Bockarie,[1369] as Bockarie was demonstrably not the single source of information for witnesses' testimony.[1370] Taylor's contention regarding Bockarie also disregards the reality that Bockarie's words regarding his relationship with Taylor are corroborated by the entirety of the evidence before the Trial Chamber.

469. Taylor's own testimony provided further corroboration. He admitted to meeting with Sam Bockarie before the trip and to sending Musa Cissé,[1371] who arranged Taylor's own arms deals,[1372] on the trip with Bockarie to Burkina Faso. Further, it would be utterly unreasonable to believe that a large arms shipment could land at Roberts International Airport and be trucked across Liberia and through the border without the knowledge of the President of Liberia.

470. Taylor's assertion that Marzah's evidence could not have been accepted as reliable by a reasonable trier of fact is incorrect in law and in fact.[1373] First, the law is clear that a Trial Chamber can find a witness credible in certain aspects of their testimony and not in others,[1374] and can accept part of a witness's testimony without accepting all of it.[1375] Second, the Trial Chamber found that Marzah's testimony corroborated the testimony of other witnesses in relation to central aspects of the shipment.[1376]

471. Likewise, Taylor's suggestion that the evidence of Varmuyan Sherif was "not probative" of Taylor's role ignores the facts.[1377] Sherif testified that in his then position of Assistant Director for Operations of the Special Security Services (SSS) at the Executive Mansion in Monrovia, he was instructed by Taylor to go to Roberts International Airport to receive an expected shipment of arms and ammunition.[1378] Sherif encountered Bockarie and Musa Cissé at the airport discussing the shipment and the witness himself escorted the cargo to White Flower, where Taylor was in charge of an arms and ammunition warehouse.[1379] To suggest that Taylor may have believed that the Burkina Faso shipment was for the exclusive use of Liberian forces is a completely incongruous suggestion in light of the facts.[1380] Moreover, in seven months of testimony, Taylor never made such a suggestion.

472. Contemporary documentation also serves to give the lie to Taylor's suggestion that there was no documentary evidence of his involvement.[1381] Exhibit P-067,[1382] which the Trial Chamber found to be "a faithful reproduction of what it purports to be",[1383] states that "[f]rom [the Intervention], [Taylor] gave huge quantity of logistics (ammunition) to the High Command".[1384] The document also refers to bringing parcels of diamonds to Taylor.[1385]

473. The evidence on record clearly shows that Taylor was instrumental in procuring the shipment.[1386] Taylor acknowledged that he met with Bockarie in Liberia.[1387] Taylor also admitted that he sent his Chief of Protocol Musa Cissé to accompany the delegation to Burkina Faso, with the Trial Chamber rejecting his explanation that this was done solely to provide an interpreter to the delegation.[1388] The shipment was brought to Roberts International Airport in Liberia.[1389] The shipment was subsequently brought to White Flower,[1390] and then materiel was transported to Buedu.[1391] Taylor subsequently received diamonds in exchange for his assistance in obtaining the shipment.[1392] Witness TF1-367 testified that at the time of the Burkina Faso shipment the rebels "did not have anywhere else to get ammunition from except Liberia from Charles Taylor."[1393] Taylor fails to establish that a miscarriage of justice was occasioned as a result of the Trial Chamber's findings, and his submissions in this regard should consequently be dismissed. Taylor fails to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's finding that he facilitated the Burkina Faso shipment which would require appellate intervention.

2. The Trial Chamber properly held that Taylor facilitated the supply of ammunition transported by Fornie

474. Contrary to Taylor's contention, the Trial Chamber properly found that he supplied a delivery of arms through Dauda Aruna Fornie during the Freetown invasion in January 1999.[1394] Taylor's claim that Benjamin Yeaten could have been acting independently in arranging the shipment was properly dismissed by the Trial Chamber at trial, and should be similarly dismissed by the Appeals Chamber.[1395] The Trial Chamber's findings in relation to Yeaten are unequivocal. The Trial Chamber noted that both Prosecution and Defence witnesses testified that Yeaten was "extremely powerful but still subject to [Taylor's] authority."[1396] Only a single witness testified that Yeaten was acting independently of Taylor when arms trading, a witness that conceded that he had changed his testimony,[1397] whose evidence was "wholly inconsistent" with other Defence and Prosecution witnesses regarding Yeaten's acting independently,[1398] and "contradictory and implausible" at other times,[1399] who had an "evasive" approach to testifying,[1400] and whose evidence required treating with caution.[1401] Even Taylor's testimony did not corroborate DCT-008.[1402] The Trial Chamber referred to "substantial evidence that Yeaten was representing, and was perceived to be representing, [Taylor]."[1403]

475. In his own evidence Taylor testified that if in a position to do so he would appoint Yeaten again today, a sentiment "inconsistent with a belief that Yeaten was trading arms and ammunition without his knowledge."[1404] Varmuyan Sherif also testified that Taylor was himself in charge of the arms and ammunition warehouse at White Flower and strictly controlled access to the materiel contained therein, as well as the quantities.[1405] The Trial Chamber further noted that evidence relied on by the Defence about an environment of informal trading did not rebut "the direct evidence that Yeaten was acting with [Taylor's] knowledge and direction."[1406]

476. The Trial Chamber properly held that the Defence theory that Yeaten was acting independently of Taylor was difficult to accept in light of Taylor's own evidence concerning Yeaten's inability to obtain supplies without Taylor's knowledge.[1407] The Chamber referred to the testimony of Taylor himself that formal requests had to be made for arms and ammunition and strict records were kept.[1408] The Chamber further found that Taylor's denial that he had access to the arms and ammunition warehouse at White Flower "lacks credibility" given his evidence that it was located next door to his own residence and that the arms and ammunition were there for his own security.[1409] The evidence on record serves to clearly demonstrate that Yeaten was not acting independently of Taylor in the provision of materiel to Fornie in January 1999, and Taylor's fails to demonstrate that there was any other reasonable inference available on the facts.[1410]

477. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber entered findings on the commission of crimes in Kono in December 1998.[1411] The Trial Judgement clearly shows that an unknown number of children under the age of 15 were conscripted into the RUF/AFRC, and that civilians were enslaved by members of the RUF/AFRC in Yengema from approximately December 1998.[1412] The Trial Chamber was therefore correct in convicting Taylor of aiding and abetting crimes which it found to have been committed.[1413]

2. Crimes committed in Freetown and the Western Area using materiel brought by Issa Sesay

478. Contrary to Taylor's suggestion that the Trial Chamber was "merely inferring" the likelihood that Issay Sesay brought materiel to Gullit's forces in Freetown which was used to commit crimes,[1414] the Trial Chamber properly held that in light of "the consistent evidence of Prosecution witnesses that there was" cooperation between AFRC forces in Freetown and RUF reinforcements of which Sesay was part,[1415] it accepted Alimamy Bobson Sesay's evidence that Issa Sesay coordinated with retreating troops and brought supplies of ammunition for the purposes of coordination.[1416]

479. The Trial Chamber properly found that the rebel forces used materiel that they acquired from or through Taylor to commit crimes on the outskirts of Freetown and the Western Area, and so properly found that Taylor substantially contributed to the commission of those crimes.[1417]

3. Crimes committed in Freetown and the Western Area using materiel brought by Idrissa Kamara (a.k.a. Rambo Red Goat)

[1412] Judgement, paras. 1424, 1596 (v), 1694. See also Judgement, paras. 1537-39, 1541. There is also credible evidence in the trial record that numerous other crimes were committed in Kono and Makeni after the arrival of the Burkina Faso shipment. For example: the corpses of civilians were seen in Koidu Town following the attack by RUF/AFRC fighters in late 1998; women were raped by RUF/AFRC fighters following the capture of Koidu Town during the late 1998 offensive (TF1-567, T. 2 July 2008 p. 12913. TF1-567 was found "generally credible" at Judgement, para. 317); forced mining was taking place in Kono in late 1998 (Judgement, para. 1720). Note that fn. 3938 of the TJ lists Kokuima as one of the mining sites, which is located in Koidu Town. Civilians were also forced to carry arms and ammunition from Buedu to Superman Ground in Kono in readiness for the attack on Kono as part of the late 1998 offensive (TF1-567, T. 2 July 2008 p. 12913). Mining equipment was looted following the recapture of Koidu Town at the end of 1998 (TF1-367, T. 21 August 2008 p. 14270. TF1-367 was found "generally credible" at Judgement, para. 2446).

[1416] Judgement, para. 5711.

[1417] Judgement, para. 5715. The three sources being the Burkina Faso shipment, the materiel brought by Dauda Aruna Fornie, and the materiel captured in Kono.

480. Contrary to Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber relied solely on the evidence of Bobson Sesay that Idrissa Kamara entered Freetown with materiel from the Burkina Faso shipment,[1418] the Trial Chamber properly referred to the evidence of a number of witnesses who testified that Kamara had arrived in Freetown some time before the third week of January 1999,[1419] with some of those witnesses testifying that the reinforcements led by Kamara had weapons[1420] and were well armed.[1421] In light of the findings that Bockarie distributed the Burkina Faso materiel to commanders in Buedu,[1422] and that prior to the arrival of that shipment the RUF and AFRC did not receive any other supplies,[1423] the Trial Chamber properly concluded that the materiel which Idrissa Kamara brought with reinforcements to Freetown was drawn from the Burkina Faso shipment.[1424]

481. Moreover, Taylor incorrectly claims that the Trial Chamber did not find that Idrissa Kamara's group committed any crimes.[1425] Having found that Kamara had brought reinforcing materiel, had successfully joined Gullit's troops in Freetown after Gullit's forces had captured the State House,[1426] and that a litany of grievous crimes were committed during the Freetown attack and retreat by "rebels comprising members of the AFRC, RUF, STF and other Liberian fighters",[1427] the Trial Chamber was not required to make specific findings as to which particular soldiers had committed the crimes in question.[1428] Further, contrary to Taylor's suggestion, the Trial Chamber did make findings that crimes were committed by Idrissa Kamara's group.[1429] The Trial Judgement clearly shows that findings were made regarding the commission of crimes, including rape and sexual slavery by Idrissa Kamara's forces that entered Freetown.[1430] The Trial Chamber also heard evidence that upon Gullit's departure from Freetown, he passed the instruction to make the attack "fearful" to Kamara and left Kamara in charge of the operation and that crimes were committed thereafter.[1431] Consequently, Taylor has failed to demonstrate any basis for appellate interference with these findings.

(iv) The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor substantially contributed to the crimes committed in 1999, 2000 and 2001

(a) The Trial Chamber properly held that Taylor participated in the March 1999 shipment

482. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly relied on the evidence of TF1-371, TF1-567, TF1-585 and Karmoh Kanneh[1432] all of whom the Trial Chamber considered to be generally credible,[1433] to find that Taylor supplied a large shipment of materiel to Bockarie.[1434] Contrary to Taylor's claim,[1435] the Chamber properly found that the evidence of these witnesses corroborated each other as to the salient details of the shipment and Taylor's involvement therein.[1436]

483. As regards TF1-371, the Trial Chamber noted that the witness was in a position to know of the arrival of arms and ammunition.[1437] TF1-371 testified that between February and March 1999, before the Lomé negotiations began, Bockarie received a "major" shipment of weapons from Monrovia, which came directly from White Flower.[1438] Having accepted that the witness had omitted to mention the shipment in a previous interview,[1439] the Trial Chamber gave full consideration to the entirety of the evidence of this incident and reasonably relied on the testimony of TF1-371, a witness for whom the Trial Chamber held no general reservations and that was considered to be in a position to know about the incident in question.[1440] The Trial Chamber's approach to the evidence of the witness is one that any reasonable trier of fact was entitled to adopt.

484. Though Karmoh Kanneh described the shipment of the arms and ammunition as occurring at a later time, the Trial Chamber considered that the context of the witness's description of the incident in question, including that it arrived after LURD forces invaded

Lofa which occurred in the first half of 1999; that the first shipment that Kanneh witnessed occurred in early 1998; and that the materiel was transported by air to Foya, all served to support that the witness was testifying to the same incident as TF1-371.[1441] The Trial Chamber found that while TF1-567's testimony did not cite a specific shipment, that the witness's testimony supported the conclusion that arms and ammunition arrived at the time in question.[1442] The Trial Chamber properly and reasonably assessed the evidence of these witnesses, noting that while their accounts of the timing differed, the identification of known events at the time in question and the lapse of time in the interim did not serve to undermine the general credibility of their accounts.[1443] It has been recognised that Appeals Chambers will defer to a Trial Chamber's judgement regarding the resolution of disparities between witnesses' accounts.[1444]

485. Further, the Trial Chamber properly found that the shipment originated with Taylor. TF1-567 and Karmoh Kanneh testified that Taylor sent the shipment, while TF1-371 testified that Taylor was paid for the shipment by several consignments of diamonds from Bockarie, and TF1-585 stated that Bockarie had gone to Monrovia for ammunition at Taylor's invitation.[1445]

486. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly found that this shipment of materiel in March 1999 was large.[1446] In contrast to Taylor's contention,[1447] the Trial Chamber was entitled to rely on the evidence of one witness over another in relation to this point. A Trial Chamber is not required to set down in detail why it chose to accept or reject a particular testimony.[1448] Having found that TF1-371 was generally credible and was in a position to know about the shipment,[1449] the Trial Chamber's reliance on the testimony of this witness was proper and reasonable. The law of this Court is clear that "[w]hen faced with competing versions of events, it is the prerogative of the Trial Chamber to determine which one is more credible."[1450] The Trial Chamber was therefore not required to provide any detailed reasons for its reliance of the testimony of a particular witness.[1451] Taylor fails to establish any error in the Trial Chamber's finding that he facilitated the March 1999 shipment which would occasion a miscarriage of justice.

(b) The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor provided Bockarie with a helicopter of materiel between August and October 1999

487. Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber's finding regarding his provision of materiel to Bockarie in late 1999 was based on uncorroborated hearsay evidence is inaccurate.[1452] TF1-567 testified to accompanying Bockarie to Monrovia during the Lomé peace talks and to boarding a helicopter with Bockarie and Yeaten which contained materiel on the return journey to Sierra Leone.[1453] TF1-567 gave evidence that Yeaten had stated that the materiel came from Taylor, and that the helicopter which was painted in camouflage colour belonged to Taylor.[1454]

488. Further, the Trial Chamber properly looked at the totality of the trial record in which circumstantial guarantees were to be found, such as the evidence that Bockarie made trips to Monrovia during 1999 from which he returned with ammunition as support of TF1-567's account.[1455] Moreover, the Trial Chamber referred to the evidence of other witnesses. Karmoh Kanneh also testified that material was supplied from Liberia to Sierra Leone in 1999 in camouflage coloured helicopters,[1456] which corroborates the evidence of TF1-567 and contradicts the testimony of Taylor that the government of Liberia did not own a camouflage helicopter in October 1999.[1457] TF1-516 also testified that Taylor was using helicopters for transport in 1999,[1458] further contradicting Taylor's claims. Contrary to Taylor's assertions, the evidence before the Trial Chamber corroborated the salient details of the testimony of TF1-567 and the finding that Bockarie returned from a trip to Monrovia in or around late September to October 1999 with a helicopter full of materiel supplied by Taylor.[1459]

489. Taylor's contention in relation to the credibility of Benjamin Yeaten as a source of hearsay evidence, as well as the potential that Yeaten was acting independently of Taylor is a reiteration of arguments made and addressed above.[1460] Taylor has not shown previously, or here, that the Trial Chamber committed an error in its assessment of hearsay evidence which would invalidate the decision.

(c) The Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor participated in providing the RUF materiel while Issa Sesay was leader in 2000, 2001

1. Taylor supplied the RUF through Tamba, Marzah and Weah

490. Contrary to Taylor's claim, the Trial Chamber properly found that he participated in the shipment of materiel brought by Tamba, Marzah and Weah to the RUF in 2000 and 2001.[1461] TF1-516 testified that the practice of requesting materiel from Yeaten via radio was the same when Issa Sesay took over command of the RUF.[1462] This clearly shows the continuity of supply that existed between Taylor and the RUF regardless of the leader in charge of the RUF at the time.[1463] Similarly, TF1-516 testified that the individuals involved in the transport of such materiel did not change from Bockarie's leadership to Sesay's either, with Zigzag, Jungle, Sampson Weah, and Dopoe Menkarzon continuing their roles in the transport of supplies, as well as the addition of Roland Duoh and Liberian Mosquito.[1464] Further, TF1-516 testified to his own participation in the transportation of ammunition, having been assigned to do so by Yeaten.[1465]

491. Taylor incorrectly contends that evidence of Sesay requesting materiel from Yeaten relies on TF1-516's uncorroborated hearsay,[1466] ignoring the evidence of Marzah that he himself was involved in the provision of materiel to Issa Sesay.[1467] The Trial Chamber noted that Marzah's testimony was to be treated with caution and properly and reasonably held that the evidence regarding his continuing to supply materiel to the RUF during this time was corroborated by that of TF1-516.[1468] Even the Defence witness DCT-008 testified that Marzah was involved in the transportation of arms and ammunition from Liberia to the RUF.[1469] Corroboration was also provided by contemporary documentary evidence in the form of Exhibit P-099A, which the Trial Chamber found to be reliable and to be "particularly valuable corroboration of the oral evidence".[1470] The exhibit documents a message from Yeaten to Sesay stating that the former had dispatched ammunition via Sesay's men.[1471]

492. Varmuyan Sherif and TF1-567 also testified specifically to the role played by another of Taylor's intermediaries, Roland Duoh, in transporting ammunition to Sierra Leone during this time.[1472] Taylor's arguments fail to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact would have found that materiel from Taylor through intermediaries continued whilst Issa Sesay was leader of the RUF.

2. Taylor supplied materiel to the RUF through Issa Sesay in May 2000

493. Contrary to Taylor's claim,[1473] the Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor supplied Issa Sesay with materiel in May 2000. Taylor incorrectly contends that the testimonies of TF1-567, Keita and Kamara,[1474] all of whom were found to be generally credible witnesses,[1475] do not corroborate each other regarding the details of this shipment.[1476]

494. As is clear from Taylor's own suggestion that the witnesses' evidence should be viewed in chronological order,[1477] all of the witnesses identified, as well as Taylor and Issa Sesay, testified to a meeting between Sesay and Taylor in May 2000.[1478] TF1-338, TF1-567 and Kamara all testified that Taylor supplied Sesay with a helicopter loaded with materiel in the aftermath of the meeting,[1479] while Keita also testified to the supply and did not give evidence as to the means of delivery.[1480]

495. The Trial Chamber properly relied on the evidence of TF1-338 who testified with direct knowledge and in significant detail about the shipment.[1481] Further, the Trial Chamber properly assessed the evidence and addressed Taylor's concerns about differences in the prior statements of TF1-338 in the Trial Judgement, holding that the account of events was credible and consistent.[1482] As the testimonies of TF1-567, Keita and Kamara were "on the whole consistent" amongst themselves and with the testimony of TF1-338,[1483] the Trial Chamber properly and reasonably found that TF1-338's evidence was corroborated by the evidence of these witnesses.[1484] In view of the whole of the evidence, Taylor fails to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's finding that he supplied materiel to Sesay in 2000 that would require appellate intervention.

3. The materiel supplied by Taylor provided substantial and practical assistance to the commission of crimes

496. Contrary to Taylor's claims, the Trial Chamber properly found that the assistance he provided through intermediaries amounted to a substantial contribution to the commission of crimes.[1485] The comparatively smaller size of the shipments Taylor provided in 2000 and 2001 in relation to much larger provisions supplied in 1998 is inapposite in determining the substantial nature of his assistance.[1486] While fewer crimes were committed during this period,[1487] crimes including the killing of civilians, the conscription and use of child soldiers actively in hostilities, sexual slavery, outrages upon personal dignity and enslavement continued to be perpetrated.[1488] Further, it is clear in light of the paucity of other sources of materiel,[1489] and the often depleted state of the rebel's supplies,[1490] that the materiel provided by Taylor continued to play a central role in the operations conducted by the rebel forces.[1491] This was expressly confirmed in the Trial Judgement when the Trial Chamber found that:

> although there were instances in which the materiel that [Taylor] gave to the RUF/AFRC was more limited in quantity, on a number of occasions the arms and ammunitions which he supplied or facilitated were in fact indispensable for the RUF/AFRC military offensives. The materiel provided or facilitated by [Taylor] was critical in enabling the operational strategy of the RUF and the AFRC during the Indictment period.[1492]

497. That same operational strategy of the RUF/AFRC was "characterized by a campaign of crimes against the Sierra Leonean civilian population" and the rebels "deliberately use(d) terror against the Sierra Leonean population as a primary modus operandi of their political and military strategy."[1493]

[1493] Judgement, paras. 6790, 6905.

498. Further, Taylor's focus on the size of such deliveries fails to acknowledge the frequency with which Taylor made such provisions available to the rebel forces.[1494] For instance, the Trial Chamber found that during Issa Sesay's time as leader of the RUF: TF1-567 was "frequently" involved in the transportation of materiel from Taylor between 2000 and 2001;[1495] TF1-375 was involved in the transportation of such materiel on four occasions;[1496] in addition, in 2000 and 2001, Marzah, Tamba, Sampson Weah, Dopoe Menkarzon, Roland Duoh, Christopher Varmoh and others transported materiel from Taylor.[1497] While the Trial Chamber noted that TF1-516 did not give any evidence that ammunition supplied by intermediaries of Taylor between 2000 and 2001 was used in Sierra Leone,[1498] the Trial Chamber found that "at least part of that materiel was used in Sierra Leone".[1499] Moreover, the Trial Chamber held that "the arms and ammunition sent by [Taylor] to the RUF during 2000 and 2001 were part of an overall supply of materiel used by the RUF in its activities, including the commission of crimes".[1500] Taylor fails to demonstrate that no reasonable Trial Chamber could have concluded that the shipments in question constituted substantial assistance to the commission of crimes.[1501]

(d) The Trial Chamber properly found that the materiel supplied by Taylor in 1999-2001 was used in the commission of crimes

time of disarmament.[1504] The Trial Chamber properly looked to the nature of the crimes committed; noting that the crimes by their nature were such that necessarily involved the use of arms and ammunition.[1505] Though there were sources of alternative material available to the rebel forces, such alternative sources of materiel "were of minor importance in comparison to that supplied or facilitated by [Taylor]."[1506] Moreover, Taylor's supplies were found to have been "critical in enabling the RUF and the AFRC to carry out offensives and maintain territories until the end of the Indictment period."[1507]

500. Taylor incorrectly suggests that isolated findings regarding the non-use of some supplies provided by him meant that shipments he provided could not be considered as amounting to a substantial contribution to crimes.[1508] Taylor's reference to a single instance of witness evidence that 50 rifles that were brought from Liberia were not used in fighting,[1509] does not serve to undermine the findings made by the Trial Chamber as regards the "critical" nature of the materiel supplied by Taylor to military operations of the rebels.[1510] Assistance to the commission of crimes may take many forms and that a fraction of materiel is not found to have been used does not negate the effect that the whole of the assistance has had. Further, Taylor refers to witness evidence of the RUF using materiel for operations in Buedu to regain control of Foya, which does not as he suggests support the contention that supplies were never used or could not be considered to have substantially contributed to crimes.[1511] Taylor has failed to show that the Trial Chamber acted unreasonably in finding that the materiel he supplied in 1999-2001 was used in the commission of crimes and, therefore, has failed to demonstrate any error that would require appellate intervention.

(v) Conclusion

501. Based on all the evidence before it, which the Chamber rigorously and reasonably evaluated, the Trial Chamber properly found that Taylor's provision and facilitation of arms and ammunition to the RUF/AFRC was critical in enabling the operational strategy of the RUF and AFRC during the Indictment period and had a substantial effect on the commission of Indictment crimes. Taylor has failed to demonstrate the existence of an error in the findings of the Trial Chamber that would serve to invalidate the judgement or occasion a miscarriage of justice. This Ground should be dismissed.

GROUND 24: The Trial Chamber committed no error in finding Taylor provided persons who had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes by the RUF and RUF/AFRC

(i) Overview:

502. The Trial Chamber predicated its finding that Taylor sent Senegalese and 20 former NPFL fighters to Bockarie on more than Alice Pyne's sole testimony, since it carefully examined the evidence of many witnesses who testified about a complex sequence of events relating to Taylor's sending of the Liberian fighters who joined the RUF/AFRC forces in Sierra Leone.[1512] Moreover, it did not matter that Taylor had no effective control over these soldiers for his sending them to constitute assistance to the commission of crimes. Taylor fails to demonstrate any error of law or that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached this conclusion, and so Ground 24 should be dismissed.

(ii) (a) The Chamber properly relied on the totality of the evidence including that of Alice Pyne

503. Contrary to Taylor's assertion that the Chamber relied solely on Pyne's evidence in arriving at its conclusion,[1513] Pyne's testimony was corroborated in material respects. The Chamber closely examined the entire body of evidence before it, and properly applied the beyond reasonable doubt standard after its careful and holistic evaluation of the evidence.[1514]

504. Pyne testified that following the Fitti-Fatta attack in June 1998, she met Senegalese in Yomandu. He told her he had come from Liberia and was sent by Taylor with "others" to Bockarie. [1515] With regard to Senegalese, all witnesses identified him as Liberian, and some testified that he worked for Charles Taylor's Special Forces.[1516]

505. Pyne's evidence was supported by TF1-375 and Bobson Sesay who gave corroborating accounts that Senegalese and these 20 fighters came from Liberia following the Fitti-Fatta attack in June 1998. TF1-375 testified to meeting 30 Liberian fighters with Senegalese in Koinadugu in August 1998. The fighters told him they were former NPFL fighters. TF1-375 clearly distinguished these Liberian fighters from Superman's existing

Liberian bodyguards.[1517] Bobson Sesay confirmed 20 Liberian men he met in Colonel Eddie Town in September 1998 came from Liberia in order to reinforce the troops in Koinadugu, that Superman went to Kailahun to get reinforcements, and that Bockarie provided him with these Liberian men, who were former NPFL fighters from the AFL.[1518]

506. Based on the overall evidence before it and the totality of the circumstantial guarantees, the Chamber reasonably concluded that the Prosecution had established beyond reasonable doubt that Taylor sent 20 former NPFL fighters from the AFL where they joined the RUF/AFRC forces.[1519] There is no basis to reverse this finding.

(ii) (b) Senegalese and 20 fighters were Liberian fighters not STF fighters

507. In regard to the inconsistency between Pyne's previous statement (that Senegalese and the fighters were STF) and her oral testimony (they were "Charles Taylor's forces"),[1520] it was within the discretion of the Chamber to give probative value to her trial testimony, especially given that the said testimony was given before the Chamber subject to cross examination, as opposed to the prior statement.

508. During direct and cross-examination on this issue,[1521] Pyne repeatedly explained that the STF members she knew, having long been in Sierra Leone, knew the names of towns and villages and spoke Krio fluently, unlike Senegalese who spoke Liberian English only and the Liberian fighters accompanying him who spoke Kpelle.[1522] TF1-585 corroborated the testimony, stating that Senegalese and his men spoke Liberian English.[1523] Bobson Sesay also clearly distinguished the STF fighters in the Red Lion Battalion from the 20 former NPFL fighters who were from the AFL, alongside whom he fought.[1524]

509. Having regard to the consistency with which Pyne responded to the questions on this issue, and the corroborative accounts given by other witnesses, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to be satisfied that Senegalese and the fighters were not STF. There is no basis for reversing this finding.

(iii) No requirement of effective control for aiding and abetting

510. The issue of whether Taylor had "effective control" – the ability to punish or prevent crimes – over Senegalese and the 20 men after he sent them to Sierra Leone[1525] has no relevance to the issue of whether his act of sending these fighters to bolster the RUF/AFRC forces assisted the commission of crimes. Effective control is part of the test for 6(3) liability but is not an element of aiding and abetting.

511. Further, Taylor's claim that these fighters were free agents acting of their volition ignores the Trial Chamber's finding that he sent Senegalese and these AFL fighters to Bockarie after the Fitta-Fatta attack,[1526] and is merely an unsubstantiated attempt to relitigate an issue decided against him. Taylor has not shown why a reasonable trier of fact could not have reached the Chamber's finding.

512. Moreover, Taylor's assertion is wrong in law and fact that the eventual deployment of Senegalese and the 20 AFL fighters was not evident when they were sent and so there is no basis to find that they were sent to facilitate the commission of crimes.[1527] Taylor was aware of the operational strategy of the RUF which entailed the commission of crimes against the civilian population of Sierra Leone throughout the indictment period.[1528] These 20 AFL fighters formed part of the Red Lion Battalion that attacked and committed crimes in Karina and Kamalo in Bombali District,[1529] and were part of a larger group that attacked and committed crimes in Freetown and the Western Area.[1530] Therefore, "any assistance towards these military operations of the RUF and RUF/AFRC constitute[d] direct assistance to the commission of crimes by these groups".[1531] Taylor does not deny the obvious fact that these fighters enhanced the ability of the RUF/AFRC to conduct military operations in the course of which crimes were committed.

(iv) No error in finding these fighters assisted RUF/AFRC crimes

513. Whether or not an accused's assistance has a substantial effect on the commission of the crimes requires a fact-based inquiry.[1532] The Trial Chamber found that "taken cumulatively … the military personnel provided by the Accused constituted practical assistance which had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes by the RUF and RUF/AFRC."[1533]

514. In addition, the military personnel Taylor also sent included Sierra Leonean refugees to fight,[1534] Abu Keita and 150 men – the "Scorpion Unit",[1535] and former SLA soldiers that were reorganised, armed and sent to Sierra Leone to fight in the Kono and Freetown operations.[1536] Further, the Chamber found that the 20 AFL fighters who fought in the Red Lion Battalion boosted the morale of other RUF fighters during the Freetown Invasion, in the course of which crimes were committed.[1537]

515. Finally, contrary to Taylor's assertion, the Trial Chamber did not find that his contribution of military personnel constituted substantial assistance only when taken together with his arms shipments.[1538] Although there would be no error had the Chamber considered their cumulative effect, the Trial Chamber in fact found that his provision of military personnel constituted substantial assistance "in addition" to his substantial assistance to the crimes through his provision of arms and ammunition.[1539]

(v) Conclusion

516. Taylor has not demonstrated any error on the part of the Trial Chamber that either invalidated its decision or occasioned a miscarriage of justice. There is no basis for reversing his convictions on Counts 1 to 11 for aiding and abetting crimes committed in Bombali District and in Waterloo, Fisher Lane, Hastings and Freetown and the Western Area in December 1998/January 1999.

[1539] Contrary to Taylor's assertion at para. 609, the Trial Chamber found Rambo Red Goat entered Freetown with weapons from the Burkina Faso shipment distributed by Bockarie to commanders in Buedu (Judgement, para. 5708). He joined Gullit's troops in Freetown after Gullit's forces had captured the State House, following which crimes were committed by "rebels comprising members of the AFRC, RUF, STF and other Liberian fighters" – see Judgement, paras. 3435, 5706, 5708, and 788, 807, 983, 989, 1191, 1205, 1309, 1575, 1876, 1930, 2068, 2132, 2151, 2162, 2185, 2192.

517. Taylor's challenge to the Trial Chamber's findings that he sent former SLA soldiers and deserters back to the RUF/AFRC and provided safe haven to RUF combatants and thus aided and abetted crimes is without merit. Such military personnel and operational support Taylor provided to the RUF/AFRC, considered within the entirety of the other forms of practical assistance he provided, assisted the RUF/AFRC forces to undertake military operations characterised by a campaign of terror against civilians.

518. The Chamber properly applied the correct law to the factual findings. Taylor fails to demonstrate any error of law or that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the contested factual findings. Ground 25 should be dismissed.

(i) No error in finding that Taylor returned former SLA soldiers and this action assisted RUF/AFRC crimes in Kono in December 1998

519. The Trial Chamber reasonably concluded on the totality of the evidence that Taylor reorganised, armed and sent a group of at least four former SLA soldiers who had fled to Liberia back to the RUF/AFRC in Sierra Leone to support the attack on Freetown.[1540] This group of men had fled to Liberia after the ECOMOG Intervention, and Taylor had called, organised, armed and sent them to Bockarie to reinforce the advance toward Freetown.[1541] The Chamber found this group of SLA soldiers sent by Taylor arrived in Kailahun in or around late November 1998.[1542]

520. Some of the SLA soldiers were then deployed in Kono where at least four participated in the attacks in December 1998 during which crimes listed in the Indictment were committed.[1543] The Chamber committed no error when it considered sending former SLA soldiers to fight in Sierra Leone as part of the cumulative calculus of assistance to RUF/AFRC crimes.[1544] Taylor has shown no legal or factual error that justifies reversing this finding.

(ii) No error in finding that Taylor provided safe-haven and returned deserters and that these actions assisted RUF/AFRC crimes

521. First, the Chamber reasonably concluded on the totality of the evidence that safe haven in Liberia was provided in the Indictment Period for RUF fighters during their retreat from Zogoda.[1545] Several witnesses presented consistent evidence that when Zogoda came under attack, Sankoh was in Abidjan attending peace talks,[1546] having been instructed by Taylor to do so in order to get arms and ammunition.[1547] The evidence also established that, because there was nowhere for the RUF to base, Sankoh said, "My brother [Taylor] has allowed you to go to Liberia".[1548] Considering the overall evidence on the retreat of the RUF combatants, and that those who retreated into Liberia returned to resume membership in the RUF/AFRC,[1549] the Chamber reasonably concluded that the Prosecution had established beyond reasonable doubt that safe haven was provided in the Indictment period.[1550] Taylor has not shown why a reasonable trier of fact could not have reached this conclusion. There is no basis to reverse this finding.

522. To the contrary,[1551] there is no requirement to prove that Taylor intended that those to whom he provided safe haven or those RUF fighters whom he returned to the RUF (Fonti Kanu and Dauda Aruna Fornie) commit crimes, so long as he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his conduct would facilitate the commission of the crimes at issue.[1552] The Chamber properly found that Taylor was aware of the campaign of atrocities being committed by the RUF/AFRC and that he would "have been aware of the likelihood that the RUF/AFRC would commit similar crimes in the future."[1553] It further found that, even before Taylor became President, he knew of the crimes committed by the RUF in Sierra Leone,[1554] and as early as August 1997, he was aware of past and ongoing[1555] crimes committed by the RUF/AFRC forces against civilians.[1556] Taylor himself testified that by April 1998 if "someone was providing support to the AFRC/RUF [...] they would be supporting a group engaged in a campaign of atrocities against the civilian population of Sierra Leone".[1557]

523. Taylor's conduct in respect of "safe haven" and "deserters" supported, sustained and enhanced the functioning of the RUF and its capacity to undertake military operations in the course of which crimes were committed,[1558] bearing in mind that the RUF/AFRC military campaign was inextricably linked to the commission of crimes throughout the Indictment period.[1559] Therefore, the Chamber reasonably concluded that the military support Taylor provided, the "safe haven" he gave, the return of "deserters", and other forms of operational support all assisted the well-functioning and "existence" of the RUF/AFRC[1560] and had a substantial effect on the commission of the Indictment crimes.[1561]

524. Third, Taylor's claim that Fonti Kanu of the AFRC and Dauda Aruna Fornie of the RUF were expelled because they were illegal aliens in Liberia[1562] ignores the fact that they were not simply taken to the border or turned over to the Sierra Leone government authorities, but rather handed to RUF personnel in late 1998 and late 1999.[1563] These acts must be evaluated in the context of the Chamber's finding that Taylor's forces cooperated with the RUF on the return of deserters[1564] and arrested, detained and forced Sierra Leonean refugees residing in Liberia to return to Sierra Leone to fight.[1565] Taylor himself supports the Chamber's findings in his testimony that Liberia "was set up as a place of asylum"[1566] and used that to characterise his actions in not only giving asylum but citizenship by Presidential Executive Order to Sam Bockarie and hundreds of RUF fighters whom he did not expel as illegal aliens but rather integrated into his own forces.[1567]

525. Taylor does not demonstrate any legal or factual error that either invalidated the Trial Chamber's decision or occasioned a miscarriage of justice. There is no basis for reversing his conviction for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes by sending former SLA soldiers and deserters back to the RUF/AFRC and providing safe haven to RUF combatants as part of his overall practical assistance. Ground 25 should be dismissed.

Mohamed Kabbah testified that had he deserted to Liberia, the NPFL commanders in Foya would have arrested and surrendered him on Bockarie's instruction. GROUND 26: The Trial Chamber did not err in finding Taylor gave military or operational advice to the RUF and AFRC and that such advice constituted assistance to crimes[1568]

(i) Overview

526. The Trial Chamber reasonably found that Taylor gave military or operational advice to the RUF/AFRC, and that such advice constituted assistance to crimes. It is for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible and to decide which witness's testimony to prefer.[1569] Taylor has thus demonstrated no error in the Chamber's determinations warranting appellate intervention.

(ii) No error in the Chamber's determination that Taylor gave military and operational advice to the RUF and AFRC

(a) Taylor's 'advice' to capture Kono

1. Taylor's 'advice' to JPK to capture Kono

527. Taylor erroneously claims that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that he advised JPK to capture Kono.[1570] While the Trial Chamber's finding that Taylor 'told' or 'instructed'[1571] JPK to capture Kono is based upon the testimony of a single witness, Samuel Kargbo,[1572] it is permissible as a matter of law for a Trial Chamber to convict an accused on the basis of a single witness, provided the evidence is assessed with the appropriate caution.[1573]

528. Kargbo testified that prior to the first attack on Kono, Taylor was in contact with JPK by satellite phone, making arrangements to get to Liberia, and that Taylor twice instructed JPK to capture Kono.[1574] JPK first spoke to Taylor from his village in Magbonkineh after the retreat from Freetown in mid-February 1998.[1575] Bobson Sesay and Issa Sesay corroborate Kargbo's testimony that he (Kargbo) drove JPK to Magbonkineh, where the first call to Taylor was made.[1576] Kargbo testified that prior to JPK's first call with Taylor, he made a call to the BBC saying that he was "up the hills" in Freetown and would soon return to the city.[1577] Issa Sesay[1578] and Exhibit P-132[1579] corroborate Kargbo's testimony about this broadcast, describing the content almost identically.[1580]

[1568] The Trial Chamber found the advice and direction Taylor gave on matters concerning or directly relating to their military strategy encouraged and morally supported the commission of Indictment crimes (Judgement, para. 6944), and that, taken cumulatively and considering the other forms of practical assistance Taylor provided, Taylor contributed substantially to the commission of Indictment crimes by rendering encouragement and moral support to the RUF and RUF/AFRC (Judgement, para. 6946).

529. Kargbo's testimony that JPK passed on the order to attack Kono soon after these calls with Taylor was corroborated by Issa Sesay, Isaac Mongor and Foday Lansana.[1581] The Chamber found broad correlation among the accounts.[1582]

530. The Trial Chamber was aware that part of Kargbo's evidence was hearsay, and after weighing the probative value concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents, being voluntary, truthful and trustworthy.[1583]

531. It is clear from the detailed analysis in the Judgement dealing with the instruction to attack Kono[1584] that the Trial Chamber applied the methodology set out in paragraphs 166, 168 and 169 of the Judgement, in reaching its finding that Taylor 'instructed' or 'told' JPK to attack Kono. After approaching Kargbo's testimony with appropriate caution and carefully assessing all the evidence,[1585] the Chamber concluded that Kargbo's evidence was "substantially corroborated in various aspects" and that, although there were inconsistencies in relation to "some details", those inconsistencies did "not challenge his credibility".[1586] There was nothing improper about the Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence pertaining to this matter and Taylor's argument should be dismissed.

2. Taylor's 'advice' to Bockarie to maintain control of Kono

532. The Trial Chamber properly found on the evidence that Taylor advised Bockarie to maintain control of Kono.[1587] Taylor fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached this conclusion.

However, as the evidence of the phone calls with the Accused relies entirely on the testimony of Kargbo, the Trial Chamber has carefully reviewed the extent to which his account of these particular events is corroborated in other respects by witnesses who testified with regard to the attack on and recapture of Kono".
[1587] Taylor Appeal, paras. 627-28.

533. The Trial Chamber's finding is based upon the evidence of Perry Kamara and TF1-371, both of whom it found to be 'generally credible'.[1588] The Chamber accepted Kamara's evidence that he had taken down a radio message from Bockarie to Sesay and Superman. The message indicated that Taylor had told Bockarie not to lose Kono. Bockarie repeated this message frequently.[1589] The Chamber also found that Kamara's testimony was corroborated by Isaac Mongor.[1590] The Trial Chamber also accepted TF1-371's evidence that Bockarie told him of Taylor's instruction to "maintain Kono".[1591]

534. As the primary trier of fact, the Trial Chamber was entitled to find Kamara and TF1-371 credible and to rely upon their evidence to find that Taylor told Bockarie to be sure to maintain Kono.[1592] While Taylor complains that their testimony concerned different times,[1593] he ignores the fact that this was specifically addressed by the Trial Chamber, which concluded that most likely the trip TF1-371 referred to occurred later in time.[1594] The Trial Chamber also took into account that TF1-371's evidence was consistent with Kamara's testimony and that Kamara had testified that Bockarie had repeated Taylor's instruction frequently.[1595]

535. The Trial Chamber was clearly conscious that Kamara and TF1-371's evidence was hearsay. The Chamber's methodology in assessing all hearsay evidence it heard was clearly set out in the Judgement.[1596] Contrary to Taylor's assertion, there is no prohibition upon using the hearsay evidence of one witness to corroborate the hearsay evidence of another witness.[1597]

536. Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to assess the veracity of the hearsay source, Bockarie,[1598] is also erroneous. A party can test the probative value of a hearsay statement and the motive of its source by cross-examining the person before the court.[1599] Here, as the Trial Chamber expressly said in paragraphs 168 and 169 of the Judgement, in assessing hearsay evidence, it considered, among other factors, circumstantial guarantees of reliability, and this latter criterion must pertain to the trustworthiness of the source. Kamara was cross-examined concerning radio messages from Bockarie about mining diamonds in order to secure supplies from Taylor.[1600] Taylor has failed to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion, on the basis of all of the evidence, that Taylor instructed Bockarie to maintain control of Kono, and his argument should thus be dismissed.

3. Taylor's 'advice' to Bockarie to attack Kono that resulted in the Fitti-Fatta attack in mid-June 1998

537. Taylor erroneously claims that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that he advised Bockarie to attack Kono in the Fitta-Fatta offensive[1601] and fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached this conclusion.

538. The Trial Chamber analysed in detail the totality and context of the evidence relating to the Fitti-Fatta offensive.[1602] It found proved beyond reasonable doubt that Taylor advised Bockarie to recapture Kono so that diamonds there would be used to purchase arms and ammunition;[1603] that Taylor discussed the offensive with Bockarie and gave him advice, and sent both ammunition and herbalists for the Fitti-Fatta attack.[1604] In particular, the Trial Chamber accepted evidence from three witnesses: Karmoh Kanneh, Albert Saidu and Mohamed Kabbah, all found to be generally credible,[1605] about the forum at which Bockarie, Daniel Tamba and Ibrahim Bah conveyed Taylor's advice that they should try to get hold of Kono so as to get resources to fund the purchase of materiel.[1606] Bockarie explained that he met Taylor in Monrovia who told him they should "clear" or "try to get" Kono.[1607] The Trial Chamber also relied upon other evidence to the effect that Bockarie had visited Monrovia prior to the meeting.[1608] The Chamber stated that "although Kanneh's evidence includes some aspects which appear displaced in time, this does not detract from the evidence provided regarding the planning of Fitti-Fatta which is largely corroborated by Saidu and Kabbah".[1609] The Trial Chamber carefully contemplated the prior inconsistent statements of Saidu about the meeting, but preferred Saidu's testimony that he was at the meeting, "noting that he described it with detail and that the detail described was substantially consistent with the evidence of the other witnesses who attended the meeting".[1610]

539. The Trial Chamber was entitled to find the evidence of Kanneh, Kabbah, and Saidu credible[1611] and to rely upon their evidence to find that Taylor advised Bockarie to attack Kono.[1612] Taylor's argument[1613] concerning Saidu's prior inconsistent statements ignores the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Saidu's evidence about the meeting was detailed and corroborated by other witnesses who attended the meeting.[1614]

540. Further, Taylor's claim[1615] that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to assess the veracity of the sources of the hearsay is misguided.[1616] Taylor chose not to cross-examine either Saidu or Kanneh about what Bockarie and/or Daniel Tamba had said at the meeting, and put the issue to one side during the cross-examination of Kabbah.[1617] Having considered all relevant factors, the Chamber found their evidence reliable.[1618] Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error.

(b) Taylor's 'advice' to Bockarie regarding the December 1998 offensive

541. Taylor erroneously claims that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that he gave advice to Bockarie in relation to the December 1998 - January 1999 offensive.[1619] The Trial Chamber found that Taylor gave advice to Bockarie and received updates on progress of the operations in Kono and Freetown.[1620] Taylor's complaint that no reasonable chamber could have found that he directed Bockarie to send prisoners released from Pademba Road Prison to Buedu[1621] is without merit.

542. The Trial Chamber relied upon the evidence of two witnesses in reaching its finding on this issue, Dauda Aruna Fornie and TF1-516. Fornie testified that Bockarie called Benjamin Yeaten on the satellite phone, and that Yeaten told Bockarie that Taylor wanted him to ensure that the prisoners released were transferred to Buedu.[1622] The Trial Chamber also relied upon TF1-516's testimony that an instruction to send the released prisoners to Buedu came after a conversation with Yeaten's radio base.[1623] The Trial Chamber found both Fornie and TF1-516 to be generally credible witnesses, noted that "their accounts differ slightly" but found any discrepancies to be "inconsequential".[1624] Taylor complains that Fornie testified that he heard Bockarie tell Mohamed Kabbah that Taylor had instructed him, through Yeaten, to release the prisoners but that when Kabbah testified, he did not mention Taylor's instruction.[1625] Taylor ignores the fact that the Trial Chamber directly addressed this issue in its Judgement:

> The Trial Chamber considered that having testified prior to Fornie, Kabbah was not questioned further on his testimony concerning the release of the Pademba Road prisoners. The Trial Chamber considers that the failure to mention such an instruction is explicable by the passage of time and does not undermine Fornie's evidence.[1626]

543. As the primary trier of fact, the Trial Chamber was entitled to find the evidence of Fornie and TF1-516 credible and to rely upon their evidence in finding that the Prosecution had proved beyond reasonable doubt that Taylor advised Bockarie, through Yeaten, to transfer the released prisoners to Buedu.[1627] The Trial Chamber considered the issues raised by Taylor but reached a conclusion with which Taylor disagrees.[1628] This does not render the Trial Chamber's conclusion unreasonable and does not justify appellate intervention.

544. The Trial Chamber was clearly conscious that Fornie and TF1-516's evidence was hearsay, but weighed the probative value of portions of that evidence and concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents.[1629] Taylor has failed to demonstrate that no reasonable Trial Chamber could have reached the finding or that the finding represents a miscarriage of justice.

(c) Taylor's 'advice' to Bockarie to open a training camp in Bunumbu

545. The Trial Chamber reasonably found on the evidence that Taylor advised Bockarie to open a training camp in Bunumbu.[1630] Taylor fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached this conclusion.

546. The Trial Chamber explicitly recognised that the evidence of TF1-362, the sole witness who testified regarding Taylor's involvement in the creation of the Bunumbu training camp in 1998, was hearsay.[1631] Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber weighed the probative value of portions of that evidence and concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents, being voluntary, truthful and trustworthy.[1632]

547. The Trial Chamber found TF1-362 to be a generally credible witness.[1633] Although the Trial Chamber recognised that TF1-362 was the only witness to give evidence that Taylor gave the instruction to Bockarie to open the training base, the Trial Chamber went on to find that TF1-362's evidence was corroborated by TF1-516's testimony of Yeaten's command.[1634] The Trial Chamber specifically noted Taylor's argument that the evidence of TF1-516 directly contradicts the evidence of TF1-362,[1635] but rejected his argument.[1636] The Trial Chamber relied upon evidence in the case that "Yeaten was Director of the SSS, working for the Accused, transmitting and carrying out orders on his behalf" to conclude that the evidence of TF1-516, that Yeaten commanded Bockarie to open a training base, was consistent with the evidence of TF1-362, that the training camp was opened on the 'order' of the Accused.[1637] Taylor criticises the Trial Chamber for providing no justification about why it believed TF1-516 "erroneously places the event in 1999".[1638] However, the justification is axiomatic: it was "undisputed that in 1998 an RUF training base called "Camp Lion" was set up in Bunumbu.[1639] The Trial Chamber's conclusion on this point is one that a reasonable trier of fact could have reached.

(d) Taylor's 'advice' to Bockarie to construct an airfield in Buedu

548. Taylor erroneously claims that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that he advised Bockarie to construct an airfield in Buedu.[1640] The Trial Chamber relied upon the evidence of three witnesses: Perry Kamara, Albert Saidu and TF1-585 in finding that Taylor 'told'[1641] Bockarie to construct an airfield, finding all three witnesses to be generally credible.[1642] The Trial Chamber relied upon evidence from Kamara that he had transmitted a message from Bockarie in which Taylor told Bockarie that they should try to re-organize and re-prepare the airfield at Buedu.[1643] The Trial Chamber relied upon evidence from Saidu about the meeting at which Daniel Tamba, a.k.a. Jungle, spoke on Taylor's behalf and said that the AFRC/RUF should try to construct the airstrip at Buedu.[1644] The Trial Chamber also found that TF1-585's evidence, that Bockarie's wife told her that Bockarie was at Taylor's farm to discuss construction of an airfield, supported its conclusion.[1645]

549. The Trial Chamber was conscious that Kamara, Saidu, and TF1-585's evidence was hearsay,[1646] but concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents.[1647] As regards Kamara's testimony, Taylor argues that having found one part of Bockarie's message unreliable, the rest of the message could not be relied upon.[1648] Taylor ignores the detailed justification articulated by the Trial Chamber.[1649] The Trial Chamber provided a cogent basis for finding proved beyond reasonable doubt that Taylor 'told' Bockarie to construct the airfield, whilst declining to find that Taylor instructed that civilian labour should be used.

550. Likewise, Taylor raises the same objection on appeal as he raised before the Trial Chamber that the evidence of Mohamed Kabbah discredits the evidence of the other prosecution witnesses.[1650] The Trial Chamber rejected Taylor's contention that Kabbah's testimony to the effect that Bockarie spoke of the need to construct an airfield so that the RUF/AFRC could receive arms and ammunition from Libya, rather than Liberia, discredited the evidence of the prosecution witnesses.[1651] Rather, the Trial Chamber concluded that "an anticipated use of the airfield to receive arms and ammunition from Libya is not inconsistent with a need perceived by the Accused for an airfield to receive arms and ammunition from Liberia."[1652]

551. The testimony of TF1-585[1653] supports Kamara and Saidu's evidence because it supports the conclusion that Taylor discussed the airfield with Bockarie. Saidu's testimony can reasonably be relied upon to prove that Taylor's advice was to construct the airfield at Buedu. The Trial Chamber accept that Daniel Tamba was Taylor's subordinate,[1654] that he spoke at the meeting on behalf of Taylor when he stated that they should construct an airfield at Buedu. The fact that other witnesses who were present at the meeting did not mention this in their evidence does not make it unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on Saidu's testimony. This is particularly so when the witnesses referred to were not cross-examined on the issue.[1655]

(iii) No error in the Chamber's determination that the military and operational advice given by Taylor to the RUF and AFRC constituted assistance to crimes

552. Taylor's assertion that no reasonable Trial Chamber could have concluded that his advice substantially contributed to the alleged crimes is without merit.[1656] Contrary to Taylor's contention that there was no evidence that the AFRC/RUF would use forced labour for the construction of an airfield, the Trial Chamber found that the evidence on record "unequivocally demonstrates that after 1997" it was "public knowledge" that AFRC/RUF forces committed the crime of forced labour.[1657] Consequently, irrespective of whether the airfield was ever used,[1658] Taylor telling the AFRC/RUF to open the airfield substantially contributed to the imposition of forced labour upon at least 200 civilians.[1659]

553. Taylor's assertion that all other advice he gave did not alter the behaviour of Bockarie or JPK or had any impact on the commission of crimes is not borne out by the evidence.[1660] The Trial Chamber found that Taylor "held a position of authority as an elder statesman and as President of Liberia. As such, he was accorded deference by the RUF and RUF/AFRC and, as demonstrated by the evidence, his advice was generally heeded by them".[1661]

554. The RUF, RUF/AFRC's dependence on Taylor for critical ongoing provision of support,[1662] gave further weight to his words and the RUF and AFRC leaders consistently heeded his directions as to the timing and targets of their military operations. Among the advice or instructions Taylor gave to the RUF and AFRC leaders were: (i) Taylor's instruction to JPK to "capture Kono", (ii) Taylor's instruction to Bockarie to "maintain control of Kono", (iii) Taylor's instruction to open a training base in Bunumbu, and (iv)

Taylor's instruction to construct an airfield in Buedu. Each instruction was heeded and within the context of all of the circumstances, the Trial Chamber reasonably found that Taylor's advice substantially contributed to the commission of crimes.[1663]

(iv) Conclusion: No error in the Trial Chamber's determination that Taylor was aware of the substantial likelihood that crimes would be committed as a result of his 'advice'

555. Notably, Taylor raises the issue of mens rea only in the 'conclusion' to his submissions on this issue,[1664] and the mens rea was not part of the Notice of Appeal for this Ground.[1665] Taylor raises the issue of the mens rea for aiding and abetting under Ground 16 of his Appeal to which the Prosecution has responded fully.

556. Taylor does not show that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gave military or operational advice to the RUF or AFRC. Nor did the Trial Chamber err in law or in fact in finding that the advice constituted assistance to the crimes charged in the Indictment. It is unnecessary for the Appeals Chamber to quash any of the relevant factual findings or set aside any legal conclusion. This Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

GROUND 27: The Trial Chamber correctly found that Taylor's provision of communication devices, radio training and "warning messages" amounted to practical assistance which as part of the overall operational support he provided substantially contributed to the commission of crimes

(i) Overview

557. Taylor's arguments regarding alleged errors of law and fact fail to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred under either standard of review. The Trial Chamber reached a reasonable conclusion when it found that Taylor's provision of communication devices, radio training and "warning messages" to the RUF, AFRC/RUF constituted practical assistance to the commission of crimes.[1666] The Trial Chamber considered the totality of the evidence before concluding that "taken cumulatively", Taylor's numerous acts of support had a substantial effect on the crimes committed.[1667] In adopting this holistic approach, the Chamber focused on the contribution of each form of assistance in the context of all of the evidence in deciding whether the actus reus for aiding and abetting was satisfied. Taylor's piecemeal approach in relation to these Grounds fails to reveal any error in the Trial Chamber's reasoning.

(ii) The provision of satellite phones by Taylor

558. As noted by the Trial Chamber, Taylor does not dispute that he gave Bockarie a satellite phone in October 1998,[1668] with the Trial Chamber noting that Bockarie had at least one other such phone.[1669] Contrary to Taylor's assertion that the Trial Chamber was unable to determine whether Bockarie used either of the two satellite phones in relation to military activities,[1670] the Trial Judgement expressly states that there was "overwhelming evidence that Bockarie used satellite phone communications to speak with [Taylor] and others in furtherance of RUF/AFRC military activities."[1671]

559. The Trial Chamber also found that after the meeting at Waterworks at which Bockarie told commanders of the AFRC/RUF about the plan drawn up with Taylor to attack Kono-Makeni-Freetown, Bockarie contacted Taylor by satellite phone and Taylor told Bockarie to use "all means" to get to Freetown.[1672] The Trial Chamber, therefore, clearly found a link between the use of a satellite phone by Bockarie and the commission of crimes.[1673]

560. Taylor's submissions regarding the contribution to Bockarie's communications infrastructure also fail to take account of the Trial Chamber's critical finding that as well as providing a satellite phone, the calls were paid for through "top-up cards" sent through Benjamin Yeaten,[1674] indicating ongoing support for satellite phone communications. The Trial Chamber's inability to ascertain whether calls made by Bockarie to Taylor and others in relation to the RUF/AFRC activities were made on the satellite phone that Taylor provided to Bockarie,[1675] did not preclude its finding that Bockarie's use of both satellite phones, one of which was provided by Taylor, as well as the use of top up cards provided by Yeaten, enhanced Bockarie's communication infrastructure which he used in furtherance of RUF, RUF/AFRC military activities.[1676]

561. The Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in not accepting Taylor's assertions that he used a satellite phone in order to facilitate peace negotiations.[1677] No basis has been established to overturn that credibility assessment.

562. Taylor asserts without justification that the Trial Chamber made errors of law and fact in its findings connecting the use of satellite phone communications during the invasion of Freetown to crimes committed, suggesting that the calls never occurred, or if they did, the contents are unknown.[1678] Taylor does not identify the error of law or fact which he posits, relying instead on the general assertion that such errors occurred.[1679] The claim that the only thing the Trial Chamber was able to find from these communications was that he received updates is manifestly incorrect.[1680] The findings make clear that during such communications Bockarie consulted with Yeaten on operational and military decisions,[1681] and that Taylor gave advice to Bockarie during such communications.[1682]

563. In relation to Issa Sesay's use of a satellite phone, Taylor misstates the record in suggesting that though the Trial Chamber was unable to determine whether Sesay used a satellite phone provided by Taylor, it resorted to making a finding that the phone provided by Taylor contributed to Sesay's "communication capability".[1683] First, the finding specifically relates to the Trial Chamber's determination of whether the satellite phone provided by Taylor was used during a particular call referred to in the testimony of Perry Kamara, and not as to Sesay's use of a satellite phone generally.[1684]

564. Taylor fails to establish any error on the part of the Trial Chamber in finding that the provision of the satellite phone to Issa Sesay was used in furtherance of the rebel's military activities.[1685] Perry Kamara testified that Sesay would send messages to all RUF commanders regarding his satellite phone conversations,[1686] while Dennis Koker testified that he witnessed Sesay discussing the takeover and control of Kono on a satellite phone.[1687] While it is correct that Issa Sesay testified he had another satellite phone beside the one provided by Taylor,[1688]

Taylor omits Sesay's testimony that he was unable to use the other satellite phone in his possession as it had no phone credits.[1689]

(iii) The use of Liberian Communication equipment by the AFRC/RUF

565. Taylor's contention that the Trial Chamber "only accepted one instance of Sankoh using the NPFL communication network" is incorrect.[1690] The Trial Chamber found that Sankoh used the NPFL communications network "to communicate to the RUF, and sent messages to Bockarie via (Taylor)".[1691] These communications included Sankoh promoting Bockarie and instructing Bockarie to take instruction from Taylor. Foday Lansana,[1692] TF1-338,[1693] and Augustine Mallah,[1694] all of whom were found to be generally credible by the Trial Chamber,[1695] testified to these communications. Taylor's submission that because the Trial Chamber did not find him liable for ordering, Sankoh's communication that Bockarie should take orders from Taylor could not have constituted practical assistance to the commission of crimes is without merit, as what is at issue here is the assistance occasioned by the operational support provided by Taylor.[1696]

566. Taylor's contention regarding communications between Memunatu Deen and Bockarie in 1997 fundamentally misinterprets the basis of the Trial Chamber's finding.[1697] The Trial Chamber did not find the Prosecution had proven that the shipment of ammunition brought by Memunatu Deen and Fonti Kanu to Sierra Leone in 1997 was sent by Taylor.[1698] But the Chamber did find that the Prosecution had proved beyond reasonable doubt that communication took place between Bockarie's operator Dauda Aruna Fornie (DAF) and Memunatu Deen, an RUF operator based in Liberia, regarding a shipment of ammunition to be sent by Taylor to Bockarie. The Trial Chamber found that this communication using Liberian radio equipment was part of the operational support provided by Taylor which amounted to practical assistance to military operations of the rebel forces during which crimes were committed.[1699]

567. Similarly, Taylor's contention regarding communications to Eddie Kanneh in Liberia in 1998 is equally misguided.[1700] First, Taylor erroneously implies that these concerned a single instance of Eddie Kanneh moving between Liberia and Sierra Leone, while in fact, the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber shows that these trips took place regularly over a period of three years.[1701] Moreover, the communications did not pertain only to Kanneh's movements, but also involved conversations regarding diamond mining.[1702] Taylor's contentions disregard the importance of diamond mining and diamond transactions in the course of the conflict, as well as the key role that diamonds played in the facilitation of arms and ammunition which fuelled the war.[1703]

568. In relation to communications between Dauda Aruna Fornie and Sam Bockarie in 1998, Fornie testified that he provided Bockarie with updates on the front lines in Sierra Leone.[1704] Taylor fails to establish any error on the part of the Trial Chamber in finding that the giving of military updates to a military commander away from the scene of the battle, when such reports form part of an ongoing provision of operational support, could constitute practical assistance,[1705] more so in light of findings that the RUF/AFRC operational strategy was characterised by a campaign of crimes against the Sierra Leonean civilian population.[1706]

569. In relation to the sending of a radio operator by the RUF to Liberia during the Mosquito Spray incident, Taylor's assertion that this could not be considered practical assistance is based on a misreading of the Judgement.[1707] The Trial Chamber considered this episode significant because it occurred "in order to coordinate communications between Yeaten and the RUF."[1708] The Defence fails to demonstrate any error on the part of the Trial Chamber in considering the heightened cooperation between the RUF and Taylor's subordinates in the context of the overall evidence relevant to Taylor's practical assistance to the RUF/AFRC.[1709]

570. The practical assistance inherent in warning a rebel force of impending attacks which might otherwise serve to diminish their capacity to continue to conduct an operation encompassing acts of terror is obvious.[1710] Taylor's contentions to the contrary appear to suggest that in order to be convicted for aiding and abetting, an individual must provide practical assistance to the commission of a specific crime.[1711] Such a contention is incorrect in law. An accused is not required to know the exact crime to which his assistance is contributing.[1712]

571. Contrary to Taylor's contention that there was a lack of clarity as to whether "448 messages" emanated from Liberia or from Sierra Leone,[1713] Mohammed Kabbah,[1714] TF1-585,[1715] Abu Keita,[1716] Isaac Mongor,[1717] and Alimamy Bobson Sesay[1718] all testified that radio operators in Liberia were transmitting "448 messages", and all of the witnesses testified that the messages were transmitted during 1998 or January 1999. Consequently, Taylor's contentions that there was an absence of time-frame regarding when "448 messages" were sent from Liberia, or that they emanated from Liberia at all, are without merit.[1719]

(v) Conclusion

572. Taylor fails to demonstrate any legal or factual errors in the findings entered by the Trial Chamber regarding his provision of operational support to the rebel forces which would require appellate intervention.

GROUND 28: The Trial Chamber correctly found that the provision of a guesthouse for the RUF in Monrovia constituted practical assistance that taken cumulatively with the other operational support Taylor provided had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes

(i) Overview

573. Taylor fails to demonstrate any error of law or fact in the Trial Chamber's finding that his provision of a Guesthouse to the RUF in Monrovia amounted to practical assistance for the commission of crimes.[1720] As Taylor correctly points out, the Trial Chamber found that the Guesthouse was used in part for matters related to the peace process.[1721] However, the Trial Chamber made clear that in the time it was used by the RUF, "the message from [Taylor] to the RUF was not in support of the peace process".[1722] Instead, the provision of the Guesthouse by Taylor provided "sustained and significant support" to the RUF and was "vital" to their military operations in which crimes were committed.[1723] The Guesthouse provided a base for the RUF in Monrovia through which the relaying of arms and ammunition in exchange for diamonds took place,[1724] the critical elements that perpetuated the conflict.

(ii) The Guesthouse was a hub for transactions involving arms, money and diamonds in which Taylor was "directly involved"

574. Taylor fails to provide any support for his contention that no reasonable trier of fact could have found that he knew or was involved in the transactions that occurred through the Guesthouse.[1725] This assertion fails to take account of the Trial Chamber's finding that "most of the evidence relating to the transfer of arms and ammunition, the provision of funds, and the delivery of diamonds directly involved [Taylor]". Moreover, the Trial Chamber found that "RUF members who stayed at the Guesthouse went to deliver diamonds directly to Taylor".[1726]

575. As has been addressed elsewhere,[1727] the fact that every delivery of diamonds to Taylor was not found to have corresponded to a delivery of materiel, does not in any measure negate the fact that Taylor received diamonds in payment for the provision of such materiel.[1728] As held by the Trial Chamber, the evidence "clearly indicates that diamonds were given to [Taylor] in order to get arms and ammunition from him."[1729] Taylor's contention is submitted without any suggestion as to why the AFRC/RUF was crossing an international boundary in order to give him their most valued resource.[1730] To view the findings regarding diamonds in isolation from the extensive findings regarding the continued provision of war supplies by Taylor to rebel forces who were operating under an international arms embargo, and for whom arms and ammunition were often scarce, is manifestly illogical.[1731]

576. Contrary to Taylor's claim there was no evidence that provision of the Guesthouse provided any practical assistance on the commission of crimes,[1732] the Trial Chamber expressly found that the transactions of arms and ammunition for diamonds between Taylor and the RUF which were conducted through the Guesthouse "played a vital role in the military operations of the RUF in which crimes were committed."[1733] As noted by the Trial Chamber, the actus reus of aiding and abetting does not require proof of a direct causal link between every individual act of assistance and the resulting crime,[1734] as Taylor appears to be arguing.[1735] Further, Taylor's assertion that the Trial Chamber was required to pinpoint a specific crime to which the assistance was made is a reiteration of an argument incorrect in law.[1736] The law is clear that it need not be proven that assistance was made to a specific identifiable crime.[1737] Instead, the Trial Chamber correctly referred to assistance to the "military operations" of the RUF,[1738] which operations were properly found to inherently involve the commission of crimes, given the avowed modus operandi adopted by the rebel forces.[1739]

577. Following Taylor's reasoning would lead to the untenable position where, regardless of the number of different types of isolated yet related acts of support an Accused provides which would together serve to assist a group to commit crimes, such an Accused could not be found liable for aiding and abetting the crimes.[1740] This contention is clearly not supported by the law. The actus reus of aiding and abetting involves the provision of "practical assistance" that has a "substantial effect" on the commission of a crime.[1741] There is nothing in the definition which precludes a Trial Chamber from viewing acts of assistance cumulatively.[1742]

578. Taylor's assertion that the use of the Guesthouse for the transfer of funds between Taylor and the RUF was given particular importance by the Trial Chamber is not borne out by a reading of the Trial Judgement.[1743] The Trial Chamber did not seek to assign particular significance to the transfer of funds via the Guesthouse, rather, it was noted alongside the facilitation of the transfer of arms, ammunition and diamonds.[1744] Moreover, the Trial Chamber went on to conclude that the importance of the Guesthouse lay in the fact that it "provided a base for the RUF in Monrovia, which facilitated the regular transfers of arms and ammunition from [Taylor] to the RUF, as well as diamonds from the RUF to [Taylor]". It was these "transactions which played a vital role in the military operations of the RUF/AFRC in Sierra Leone in which crimes were committed."[1745] The Trial Chamber did not, therefore, proceed to "rely on 'financial support' to sustain the conclusion of assistance by virtue of the Guesthouse."[1746]

579. Further, the Trial Chamber did not rely upon witness testimony regarding the unproven allegation that Taylor kept $150,000 from Issa Sesay for safekeeping, as contended by Taylor.[1747] As noted by the Trial Chamber in a separate part of the Trial Judgement, TF1-338 was the only witness to testify to this incident.[1748] In its findings regarding the Guesthouse, however, the Trial Chamber only referred to the testimony of TF1-338 in relation to different evidence which involved Issa Sesay delivering diamonds to Taylor.[1749] Consequently, Taylor's contention that these amounted to "inconsistent findings" in which "irreconcilable and illogical weight (was) attached to the same evidence" is entirely unfounded.

(iii) Conclusion

580. Taylor fails to demonstrate how any of the findings challenged under this Ground served to either invalidate the decision or occasion a miscarriage of justice.[1750] As a consequence, the arguments in this section should be dismissed.

GROUND 29: The Chamber committed no error in finding that Taylor assisted crimes by providing herbalists in conjunction with all other forms of operational support he provided

581. Taylor's challenge to the Trial Chamber's approach to the evaluation of hearsay evidence lacks merit. His argument that the Trial Chamber predicated its findings solely on hearsay evidence to conclude that he sent herbalists to Bockarie to mark Fitti-Fatta fighters, misconstrues the Chamber's findings. Also without foundation is his challenge to the Chamber's findings that he assisted crimes by providing these herbalists, along with other forms of operational support, to the RUF/AFRC. None of these challenges demonstrate an error of law or fact by the Trial Chamber that warrants intervention by the Appeals Chamber. This Ground should be dismissed.

582. As discussed below, the Chamber did not err in law and fact when it relied on Alice Pyne and Perry Kamara's evidence and the totality of corroborated evidence before it which demonstrate a nexus between Taylor and crimes.

(ii) The Chamber properly relied on the totality of the evidence including that of Pyne and Kamara

583. Contrary to Taylor's suggestion that the Chamber relied on Pyne and Kamara's evidence alone in arriving at its conclusion respecting herbalists,[1751] the Chamber did not approach the evidence as if it existed in a vacuum.[1752] Instead, it provided a reasoned opinion based on the entire body of evidence and applied the "beyond reasonable doubt" standard in a holistic approach.[1753]

584. The Chamber's factual findings[1754] reveal that Taylor sent herbalists to Bockarie to mark Fitti-Fatta fighters to "protect" them against bullets and bolster their confidence.[1755] This finding was based on a careful detailed analysis of the evidence, with the Chamber placing "weight" on the fact that Pyne and Kamara were each told of Taylor's involvement from different sources.[1756] Moreover, merely alleging that the identity of the "elderly Gbandi woman" is in doubt[1757] does not suffice to establish that the Chamber erred in its assessment of Pyne's evidence. That Pyne spoke Gbandi and spent three days with this woman in the zoebush during the marking ceremonies[1758] strengthens her evidence on this issue, which the Chamber reasonably found to be credible.[1759]

585. The Chamber also noted that various aspects of both witnesses' testimony were corroborated in material respects by Issa Sesay (herbalists came from Liberia to mark the Fitta-Fatta fighters),[1760] TF1-375 (two Liberian medicine men, one an SSS subordinate of Yeaten who worked for Taylor marked fighters before retaking Kono),[1761] and Kargbo (marked by an herbalist that Bockarie brought from Liberia).[1762]

586. The Chamber, in short, engaged in a careful evaluation of the entirety of the evidence, including any discrepancies or contradictions in the testimony of both Prosecution and Defence witnesses. That, based on its full review of the record, the Chamber declined to credit Taylor's witnesses' testimony, does not demonstrate bias.[1763] The Chamber acted within its discretion in rejecting the uncorroborated testimony of Issa Sesay and Vincent's evidence that Taylor relied on to rebut Prosecution evidence, as both required caution. The Chamber also acted within its discretion to accord no weight to it.[1764]

587. Although, as observed by the Trial Chamber, there was a lack of direct evidence,[1765] this did not preclude it from determining that Taylor sent herbalists to mark Fitti-Fatta fighters. The Chamber reasoned that "while not confirming or denying any association of the Accused with the herbalists," the testimonies of both TF1-375 and Samuel Kargbo corroborated those of Pyne and Kamara in many respects, including time, place, and procedures adopted by the herbalists.[1766] This provided a sufficiently credible basis for the Chamber to rely on Pyne and Kamara's testimonies. Thus, having considered all of the evidence, it was reasonable for the Chamber to be satisfied that Taylor sent herbalists to Bockarie to mark Fitti-Fatta fighters. To the extent this evidence can be considered purely circumstantial, the Trial Chamber reached the only reasonable conclusion available to it based on the totality of the evidence.

588. The Trial Chamber was conscious that the testimonies before it were based on hearsay. Nevertheless, the Trial Chamber weighed the evidence and found it credible. The Trial Chamber considered that it was given under solemn declaration and took into account the circumstantial guarantees of its trustworthiness and the totality of the circumstances under which it was given, and concluded that it was reliable for the purpose of proving the truth of its contents, in the sense of being voluntary, truthful and trustworthy. The Chamber's methodology in assessing all hearsay evidence it heard was clearly set out at paragraphs 168 to 169 of its Judgement. It is evident from these paragraphs that the Trial Chamber exercised the appropriate caution when relying on this hearsay evidence, as set out in the response to Ground 1.[1767]

(iii) The provision of herbalists by Taylor in conjunction with the other forms of operational support assisted the commission of crimes

589. The Trial Chamber never found that this form of assistance alone, and viewed in isolation, would constitute "practical assistance" for the commission of crimes charged in the Indictment.[1768]

590. Rather, the Trial Chamber found that the provision of herbalists, along with other forms of assistance by Taylor, "supported the well functioning and continued existence" of the RUF/AFRC.[1769] These were groups[1770] whose military campaign was inextricably linked to commission of Indictment crimes, whose operational strategy throughout the Indictment period was characterised by a campaign of crimes against the Sierra Leonean civilian population, which crimes were inextricably linked to the strategy and objectives of the military operations themselves, and were the result of a policy and strategy that entailed a campaign of terror against the civilian population.[1771] Additionally, the Chamber found that these forms of operational support constituted "practical assistance" for the commission of crimes in Counts 1-11 of the Indictment[1772] and that "taken cumulatively" with the military support Taylor was also providing, they had a "substantial effect" on the commission of crimes charged in the Indictment.[1773]

591. There is no requirement that, in providing this assistance, Taylor intended that crimes be committed, so long as he knew or was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would facilitate the commission of crimes.[1774] The Chamber properly concluded that Taylor knew or had such awareness.[1775]

592. Finally, contrary to Taylor's assertions,[1776] his provision of herbalists should not just be viewed as a one-off effort to build confidence for the Fitti-Fatta Operation, but long-term confidence that would benefit the RUF/AFRC fighters over an extended stretch in their campaign, a campaign characterised by crimes against the civilian population of Sierra Leone. According to Pyne, the herbalists had been sent to Bockarie by Taylor to help protect the RUF fighters, "particularly those who would go to recapture Koidu Town from ECOMOG."[1777] As for Kamara, "it was this herbalist that was going to inspire us so that we will have no fear of attacking Kono, and the various areas I have named," which included, Makeni, Magburaka, Matotoka, Masiaka and Waterloo.[1778]

593. Taylor has failed to show any error on the part of the Trial Chamber that either invalidated its decision or occasioned a miscarriage of justice in connection with its determination that he assisted crimes by the cumulative operational support he provided including sending herbalists to mark Fitti-Fatta fighters. Accordingly, Ground 29 should be dismissed.

GROUND 30: The Trial Chamber committed no error in finding that Taylor assisted crimes by providing medical support to RUF/AFRC members

(i) Overview

594. Taylor's challenge to the Trial Chamber's finding that his provision of medical support to RUF/AFRC members as part of the overall operational support he provided aided and abetted crimes is without merit. The medical support Taylor provided to the RUF/AFRC members, considered within the entirety of the operational support he provided, assisted the RUF/AFRC forces to undertake military operations characterised by a campaign of terror against civilians.

595. The Chamber properly applied the correct law to the factual findings. Taylor fails to demonstrate any error of law or that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the contested factual findings. Ground 30 should be dismissed.

(ii) No error in finding that Taylor provided medical support and that this support was not on humanitarian grounds

596. Taylor seeks to relitigate an issue decided against him that providing medical assistance to the RUF/AFRC members in Liberia was for criminal rather than humanitarian reasons.[1779] Taylor's claim that he provided medical assistance for humanitarian reasons related only to the period during which he admitted to providing such support, i.e., the period of mediating the Lomé Accord in February/March 1999.[1780] However, the Chamber reasonably concluded from the totality of the evidence that he provided such support throughout the Indictment period.[1781] The evidence established that the transport of RUF/AFRC members to Liberian hospitals for medical care took place both before and after the Lomé Accord.[1782]

[1777] Taylor Judgement, para. 4072.

597. Moreover, Taylor's assertion that any such support was justified in law as prescribed by international humanitarian law is misplaced.[1783] Taylor has not admitted the Government of Liberia was officially engaged as a party to the conflict in Sierra Leone. Contrary to his assertion,[1784] there was no obligation under international law and/or Common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions I-IV for Liberia to treat wounded fighters from Sierra Leone. Common Article 3 does not impose any obligation on neighbouring countries which were not belligerents in a conflict to receive wounded fighters from a neighbouring country. In addition, there was no evidence adduced at trial that forces or groups opposing the RUF/AFRC were given medical treatment by Taylor.

598. In a similar vein, the doctrine of necessity[1785] to care for the sick or wounded relates to humane treatment of the enemy in times of armed conflict. As stated above, Taylor never admitted that the Government of Liberia was a party to that conflict, throughout the Indictment period. He is unable now to rely on this assertion to argue that his medical support for the RUF/AFRC was only for humanitarian reasons.[1786]

599. Article 11 of the Fifth Hague Convention of 1907 provides that a neutral Power which receives on its territory troops belonging to the belligerent armies shall "intern them, as far as possible, at a distance from the theatre of war".[1787] Article 14 provides that wounded brought into neutral territory "must be guarded by the neutral Power so as to ensure their not taking part again in the military operations."[1788] The evidence in this case does not show that these measures were taken by Taylor. To the contrary, the evidence shows that, following medical treatment in Liberia, wounded RUF/ARC members returned to Sierra Leone where they undertook military operations. RUF commander Superman was one such fighter, among others.[1789]

600. Moreover, under the 1986 Mano River Non-Aggression and Security Cooperation Treaty, Liberia was under an obligation to arrest RUF/AFRC forces found on its territory.[1790] The evidence, including Taylor's own testimony, shows there was no attempt to arrest RUF/AFRC members receiving medical treatment,[1791] and Taylor's own appeal submission makes no such claim. Rather, Taylor's provision of medical care to RUF/AFRC members, who were allowed to return to the RUF/AFRC fighting ranks, supported, sustained and enhanced the functioning of the RUF and its capacity to undertake military operations in the course of which crimes were committed,[1792] bearing in mind that the RUF and RUF/AFRC military campaign was inextricably linked to the commission of the Indictment crimes throughout the Indictment period.[1793] The Chamber reasonably concluded that, having regard to the military support Taylor provided, this medical support along with the other forms of operational support he provided that supported the well-functioning and "continued existence" of the RUF/AFRC[1794] had a substantial effect on the commission of the Indictment crimes.[1795]

601. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[1796] the totality of the evidence led the Chamber to find that allowing such medical treatment to the RUF/AFRC members in February/March 1999 could not be for humanitarian assistance. Taylor ignores the Chamber's findings that as early as August 1997, he knew of the atrocities being committed against civilians in Sierra Leone by the RUF and RUF/AFRC forces and of their propensity to commit crimes.[1797] The Chamber was properly convinced that Taylor knew of the RUF/AFRC's operational strategy and intent to commit crimes from the clear and consistent information he received after his election;[1798] that he knew his support would provide practical assistance to them in the commission of crimes during their military operations,[1799] operations inextricably linked to the commission of crimes.[1800] The only reasonable conclusion is that Taylor knew that acts of medical assistance to the RUF/AFRC (as part of the overall operational support he provided to these groups) would provide practical assistance during the course of their military operations in Sierra Leone. Further, the CDF case that Taylor cites[1801] in support of his claim that medical assistance does not constitute aiding and abetting is misplaced. Unlike Kondewa,[1802] the Trial Chamber determined that Taylor was aware of the RUF/AFRC's intention to commit criminal acts.[1803]

(iii) The Chamber properly evaluated corroborating evidence

602. Contrary to Taylor's assertion,[1804] Kamara and TF1-406 (Sherif) testimony on this issue are corroborative. Kamara recalled that wounded RUF were taken to Monrovia for medical care "any time".[1805] Sherif corroborated Kamara's testimony in relation to similar acts of medical treatment for RUF fighters when the RUF was engaged in combat in Lofa County in 1999[1806] against Mosquito Spray and the LURD forces.[1807] It is also noteworthy that the medical support given to the RUF allowed its members to return to the RUF/AFRC in Sierra Leone where they undertook military operations after fighting for Taylor in Liberia.[1808] The RUF/AFRC at the time remained active in Sierra Leone and continued to commit crimes.[1809] Taylor's medical support ensured the well-functioning and continued existence of the RUF/AFRC,[1810] a group whose military and operational strategy were explicitly based on a widespread or systematic campaign of crimes against civilians[1811] and thereby assisted crimes.

(iv) Conclusion

603. Taylor does not demonstrate any legal or factual error that either invalidated the Trial Chamber's decision or occasioned a miscarriage of justice. There is no basis for reversing his conviction for aiding and abetting the commission of crimes by providing medical care to RUF/AFRC members as part of his overall operational support. Ground 30 should be dismissed.

GROUND 31: No error of law or fact in finding Taylor assisted the commission of crimes by providing sums of money

(i) Overview

604. The Trial Chamber reasonably and correctly found the financial support Taylor provided, together with all the other forms of support he provided, constituted practical assistance to, and had a substantial effect on, the commission of the Indictment crimes. The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground of Appeal since Taylor fails to establish any error of law[1812] or fact[1813] warranting appellate intervention.

605. To the extent Taylor includes his arguments in Grounds 16, 21, 32 and 33 to which he cross-refers in Ground 31,[1814] the Prosecution incorporates its responses thereto by reference.

(ii) Taylor's financial support, together with all the other forms of operational support he provided, constituted practical assistance

606. Taylor erroneously alleges that the Chamber erred in finding his financial support constituted practical assistance.[1815] He approaches the Chamber's findings on operational support in a fragmented manner, treating them as unrelated.[1816] However, the Chamber applied the correct actus reus[1817] and properly assessed all of the forms of operational support,[1818] finding that, taken together, these constituted practical assistance.[1819] The Chamber's reasoning is neither "legally incoherent" nor "irreconcilable",[1820] and Taylor provides no argument to establish the Chamber's conclusion was unreasonable.

607. Contrary to Taylor's suggestion,[1821] financial support formed only part of the operational support that he provided, which also included communications support,[1822] the provision of a guesthouse,[1823] facilitation of road and air transportation of materiel,[1824] and other forms of assistance including the provision of safe haven, medical support, the provision of goods, herbalists and the assistance of Liberian forces.[1825]

608. In its "Conclusion" on "Financial Support" within the "Operational Support" section of the Judgement, the Chamber recalled its findings on financial support and noted that except for the provision of funds he provided to Bockarie in order to buy arms and ammunition from ULIMO, the other funds he provided were for unspecified or personal use.[1826] In this light, the Chamber was unable to find that the financial support he provided "in itself, had a direct impact on the operations of the AFRC/RUF."[1827] In its "Conclusion" to the "Operational Support" section, the Chamber noted that among all the forms of operational support Taylor provided, communications and logistical support in particular was sustained and significant.[1828] This indicates that the Chamber did not consider Taylor's financial support to be among the most significant forms of operational support.

609. Subsequently, in its section on "Operational Support" within its "Legal Findings on Responsibility", the Chamber recalled its earlier finding that Taylor "provided financial support to the RUF/AFRC"[1829] and once again noted that "[i]n most instances, these funds were given to individual RUF members for unspecified or personal use" and that after February 1998, Taylor gave funds to Bockarie "$10,000 to $20,000 at a time, on multiple occasions for the purchase of arms from ULIMO".[1830] The Chamber concluded this paragraph by noting that Taylor "also kept diamonds and money in 'safekeeping' for the RUF/AFRC".[1831]

610. Contrary to Taylor's contention,[1832] the funds he gave Bockarie for the purchase of arms and ammunition from ULIMO constituted practical assistance. Taylor presents no argument to establish otherwise. Further, Taylor's contention that the Chamber found that the money he provided the RUF/AFRC enhanced,[1833] or pertained to,[1834] the organisation's capacity but did not have a direct impact on,[1835] or pertain to,[1836] its operations, has no basis in law and constitutes an artificial distinction. First, the Chamber found that the operational assistance supported, sustained and enhanced the functioning of the RUF as well as its capacity to undertake military operations in the course of which crimes were committed, and constituted practical assistance in the commission of crimes.[1837] In any event, "[t]he Accused may aid and abet at one or more of the 'planning, preparation or execution' stages of the crime or underlying offence."[1838] Therefore, assistance to organisational 'capacity', especially where such organisation carries out an ongoing campaign inextricably linked to the commission of crimes,[1839] may constitute aiding and abetting.[1840]

611. The Chamber's findings clearly establish that Taylor did not provide assistance to an organisation whose members committed crimes "from time to time"[1841] but assisted an organisation who committed crimes throughout the entire Indictment period,[1842] implementing its operational strategy to commit crimes against civilians.[1843]

(iii) Taylor's financial support, together with all of the other forms of operational support he provided, had a substantial effect on the commission of the Indictment crimes

612. Taylor fails to establish that the Trial Chamber erred in finding, after very careful and detailed analysis, that his financial support, when taken together with all the other forms of operational support he provided, had a substantial effect on the commission of the Indictment crimes.[1844] Whether a particular contribution qualifies as "substantial" is a "fact-based inquiry".[1845] Further, the Prosecution need not prove that the crimes would not have been perpetrated but for the Accused's contribution.[1846]

613. After having determined that all the various forms of operational support constituted practical assistance,[1847] the Trial Chamber found that "[t]aken cumulatively, and having regard to the military support provided by the Accused to the AFRC/RUF", Taylor's operational support had a substantial effect on the commission of the Indictment crimes.[1848]

614. Therefore, contrary to Taylor's contention,[1849] the Chamber did not find that his financial assistance, i.e. the $10,000 to $20,000[1850] at a time which Taylor gave to Bockarie after February 1998 on multiple occasions for the purchase of arms from ULIMO, alone had a substantial effect on the Indictment crimes. The Chamber found that all the various forms of operational support, of which this formed part, taken cumulatively had such effect. The Chamber did not mischaracterise any of Taylor's actions.[1851]

615. The fact the Chamber stated Taylor was one of several sources for the money used to make purchases from ULIMO[1852] is irrelevant for the purposes of establishing substantial contribution since "the applicable law for aiding and abetting does not require that the Accused be the only source of assistance in order for his contribution to be substantial."[1853]

616. The Chamber did establish the purpose for which this money was provided—"to buy arms and ammunition from ULIMO".[1854] This finding together with the Chamber's other findings on, inter alia, the AFRC/RUF's operational strategy,[1855] render Taylor's other arguments in this regard moot.[1856] Taylor provides no support, by way of argument, reference to the Judgement or jurisprudence, for his allegation that the Chamber's finding was based on the "continued existence" of the RUF/AFRC.[1857] Indeed, Taylor cannot support this allegation [1856] Taylor Appeal, paras. 693-694. The Prosecution addresses the argument on "specific direction" in its response to Ground 16. The Chamber correctly stated that "[t]he actus reus of aiding and abetting does not require 'specific direction'" (Judgement, para. 484 citing Perišić TJ, para. 126).

since the Chamber based its findings on, inter alia, the numerous forms of operational support provided and the fact he also provided military support.[1858] Taylor fails to establish any error warranting appellate intervention.

(iv) The Trial Chamber correctly evaluated Taylor's testimony

617. Taylor erroneously alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in evaluating his testimony on local customary practices and obligations with regards to the giving of gifts.[1859] Given that the Chamber found that most of the funding Taylor provided was for unspecified or personal use,[1860] Taylor's accusation of cultural insensitivity on the part of the Chamber is devoid of merit, and he fails to establish any error of law or fact or any prejudice.[1861] Further, the Chamber did consider the traditions that allegedly dictated Taylor's actions.[1862]

618. For example, the Chamber accepted Taylor's testimony, corroborated by that of other witnesses, that he gave $5,000-10,000 US to JPK for clothing and personal items.[1863] The fact the Chamber did not specifically mention in its finding that the giving of money for the purchase of clothing and personal items was part of Taylor's tradition is irrelevant and in no way prejudicial to Taylor's rights or in violation of customary international law.[1864] The fact that the Chamber did not consider this transaction as part of the financial assistance Taylor provided the RUF means that the finding could not be prejudicial to Taylor.[1865]

(v) Conclusion

619. In view of the above, the Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground of Appeal since Taylor fails to establish any error of law or fact warranting appellate intervention.

The Chamber also considered evidence of gifts by other African leaders to the RUF and held that there was no evidence that these payments were in any way linked or relevant to Taylor's payments (Judgement, para. 4025).
[1864] Contra Taylor Appeal, para. 697.
[1865] Similarly, the Chamber also found that Taylor sent Sankoh $20,000 US in Lomé before the negotiations began yet held there was no conclusive evidence of the intended use for these funds (Judgement, paras. 3963-64). In reaching this finding, the Chamber considered Taylor's testimony about the fact this money would have been "an innocent gesture along the lines of funds provided by other African Heads of State" (Judgement, para. 3959; see also paras. 3956, 3962). The fact this transaction did not form part of the financial assistance Taylor provided the RUF again means that the finding could not be prejudicial to Taylor.

GROUNDS 32 & 33:[1866] No error of law or fact in the Trial Chamber's findings on diamonds

(i) Overview

620. The Appeals Chamber should summarily dismiss[1867] Taylor's Ground 33 since it adds nothing to Ground 32.[1868] This violates paragraph 9 of the Practice Direction. The consolidated submissions on Grounds 32 and 33 should also be summarily dismissed since, even taken together, they fail to comply with paragraphs 6(d), 6(e) and 9 of the Practice Direction. Specifically, the submissions contain irrelevant comments and self-serving mischaracterisations of the Chamber's findings,[1869] attempt to relitigate facts,[1870] fail to identify the challenged factual finding/s and the prejudice caused,[1871] and disproportionately repeat other Defence submissions.[1872] This has made it difficult for the Prosecution to respond.

621. Should the Chamber opt not to summarily dismiss these Grounds, they should still be dismissed after consideration since Taylor fails to establish any error of law[1873] or fact.[1874]

[1866] See Taylor Appeal, para. 699.

[1867] Para. 29 of the Practice Direction empowers the Appeals Chamber to dismiss submissions where a party fails to comply with the requirements set out in the Practice Direction; see also RUF AJ, paras. 36-46; Gatete AJ, para. 11; Boškoski & Tarčulovski AJ, paras. 17-18; Renzaho AJ, paras. 11-12; Muvunyi II AJ, paras. 11-12.

[1868] Ground 32 alleges that "The Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that Charles Taylor facilitated the sale, transfer or production of Sierra Leonean diamonds, and erred in fact and in law in finding that any such alleged facilitation aided and abetted the crimes." Ground 33 merely repeats a portion of the title to Ground 32 regarding facilitating the sale of diamonds.

[1869] RUF AJ, para. 43. Taylor's commentary regarding the Chamber's finding that he was not guilty through JCE, and that this finding "dealt a final blow to the heart of the Prosecution's case theory" (Taylor Appeal, para. 700) is not only irrelevant but, in relation to the heart of the Prosecution case, it also ignores the Prosecution opening statement which made clear the evidence on the aiding and abetting aspect of the case was "absolutely overwhelming" (Prosecution Opening Statement, T. 4 June 2007 p. 314). Taylor Appeal, paras. 702-705 merely refer to the Chamber's findings and make no argument thereon. Particularly, Taylor's "notes" in para. 705 are irrelevant, contain incorrect citations (e.g. Taylor Appeal, fn. 1375 referring to Judgement, para. 5507), lack any argument, and do not allege any error by the Trial Chamber.

[1870] Taylor's assertion that he did not send arms and ammunitions and did not receive 90 carats of diamonds or $90,000 US from Ibrahim Bah (Taylor Appeal, para. 705) should be disregarded as an attempt to relitigate the issue as the Trial Chamber specifically found that "the Accused sent Ibrahim Bah on his behalf to Freetown to meet with Sam Bockarie and Johnny Paul Koroma to make arrangements for the procurement of arms and ammunition. Bah was given 90 carats of diamonds and $90,000 US to pay for the shipment." (see Judgement, paras. 5394, 5406, 5388-89, 5408, 5559). Taylor consistently and inappropriately uses the word "alleged" in relation to issues on which the Trial Chamber entered clear findings, thereby rendering the issue a judicial finding, not a mere allegation (Taylor Appeal, paras. 702-03).

[1871] See RUF AJ, paras. 38, 41; see also Gatete AJ, para. 12. Taylor Appeal, para. 700 merely states the significance of diamonds to the allegations against Taylor was "varied and confused" without elaboration. Taylor Appeal, para. 709 does not refer to any particular finding he seeks the reversal of.

[1872] In Grounds 32 and 33, Taylor cross-refers to his Grounds 20, 23 and 26-31 (Taylor Appeal, paras. 702-705, fn. 1383). The fact Taylor "consolidates" his submissions on Grounds 32 and 33 (Taylor Appeal, para. 699) also means that he is repeating, in a disproportionate manner, the same arguments in numerous grounds of appeal, falling foul of para. 9 of the Practice Direction.

[1873] RUF AJ, para. 31. See also Munyakazi AJ, para. 6.

[1874] RUF AJ, para. 32; CDF AJ, para. 33. See also Kupreškić AJ, para. 29.

622. The Prosecution notes the obvious disconnect between the titles of these Grounds of Appeal and the underlying submissions. The titles allege errors relating to the facilitation of the sale, transfer or production of Sierra Leonean diamonds.[1875] However, the underlying substantive submissions do not address these issues,[1876] or merely cross-refer to other Grounds of Appeal which potentially do.[1877] Taylor instead focuses solely on the issue of "safekeeping" of diamonds.[1878] The Prosecution will respond comprehensively only to the brief substantive argument actually made.

623. The Prosecution also incorporates its response to Grounds 20, 23 and 26-31 of Taylor's Appeal, to which Taylor cross-refers in Grounds 32 and 33 without presenting any arguments thereon,[1879] in its response to these Grounds.

(ii) The Chamber committed no error of law or fact in its clear and relevant findings on diamonds

624. Taylor mischaracterises the Trial Chamber's findings in the "Diamonds" section.[1880] The Chamber's findings in this section must be evaluated bearing in mind the Chamber's duty to consider the evidence presented in relation to all crimes and forms of liability before it. Contrary to Taylor's submissions, the Chamber's findings were not "at best...a general contextual understanding of the Sierra Leonean conflict".[1881] Rather, the Chamber made findings establishing, inter alia, that there was a continuous supply by the AFRC/RUF of diamonds mined from areas in Sierra Leone to the Accused, often in exchange for arms and ammunition.[1882]

625. In the context of these findings on the exchange of diamonds for arms and ammunition, the Chamber's findings that (i) Taylor provided fuel and mining equipment to the RUF on at least one occasion between 1998 and 2002,[1883] (ii) two men were sent by the Accused to visit and assess the mining site in Kono;[1884] and (iii) Taylor facilitated a relationship between Issa Sesay/the RUF and a diamond dealer known as Alpha Bravo in

The fact that not every delivery of diamonds to the Accused was matched by a delivery of arms and/or of ammunition for the RUF (Judgement, para. 5936) does not mean that Taylor's assistance was not substantial. See Judgement, paras. 5936, 5946-48, 5934.
[1883] Judgement, paras. 6136, 6139(viii).
[1884] Judgement, paras. 6137, 6139(ix). At Judgement, para. 6135, the Chamber notes the men did this "with the intention of making a report to the Accused on improving efficiency".

2001 for the purpose of diamond transactions,[1885] are relevant to both the actus reus and mens rea of aiding and abetting. They establish that Taylor provided practical assistance and supported the RUF/AFRC's mining operations, which the Chamber found involved and led to the commission of a number of crimes, including murder and unlawful killings, the conscription and use of child soldiers, and enslavement.[1886] The Chamber also found that the materiel Taylor provided in return for diamonds was used in the commission of a number of Indictment crimes.[1887]

626. Taylor's submission regarding the Trial Chamber's section on the "Legal Findings on Responsibility"[1888] is also misleading. The findings to which he refers are not "indirect findings on aiding and abetting and diamonds"[1889] and must be read in connection with the Chamber's earlier findings regarding the exchange of diamonds for arms and ammunition. In the section on "Legal Findings on Responsibility", the Chamber noted that operational support was related to diamond transactions[1890] and that several of Taylor's instructions related to the need to maintain the trade of diamonds for arms and ammunition.[1891] Further, the findings on the provision of arms and ammunition are based on the Chamber's earlier findings that diamonds were often used to finance these purchases.[1892]

627. Taylor's submissions deny that his role with diamonds could contribute to the crimes.[1893] However, the fact Taylor was well aware of how his dealing in diamonds implicated him in the Indictment crimes is evident from his desperate but unsuccessful attempts at trial to disassociate himself from diamonds.[1894] Taylor even denied knowing that Kono was a diamondiferous area, a statement the Trial Chamber rejected as not credible.[1895]

628. Taylor has failed to establish any error of law or fact warranting appellate intervention.

(iii) The Chamber did not convict Taylor based on "safekeeping" diamonds

[1894] For example, Taylor's denial about carrying rough diamonds on a trip to South Africa, Burkina Faso and Libya, was rejected by the Trial Chamber given direct evidence he in fact made a gift of rough diamonds on that trip (Judgement, para. 5407).
[1895] Judgement, para. 3111.

629. Taylor misrepresents the Chamber's findings on "safekeeping" and takes them out of context.[1896] The Trial Chamber did not find that the safekeeping of diamonds was a basis for his guilt through aiding and abetting.

630. In paragraph 6932, contained within the sub-section dealing with "Operational Support" in which the Chamber dealt with the forms[1897] of support provided by Taylor, the Chamber stated that it found that he "provided financial support to the RUF/AFRC." It then noted that in most instances, these funds were given "to individual RUF members for unspecified or personal use" and that after February 1998, Taylor gave funds to Bockarie "$10,000 to $20,000 at a time, on multiple occasions for the purchase of arms from ULIMO". The Chamber concluded this paragraph by noting that Taylor "also kept diamonds and money in 'safekeeping' for the RUF/AFRC".

631. This paragraph therefore dealt with just one of the ways Taylor provided operational support, i.e. through the provision of financial support. The Chamber did not find that Taylor's "safekeeping" was even part of this financial support. It noted this aspect for completeness.

632. Taylor also ignores the Chamber's other findings- financial support formed only part of the operational support Taylor provided, which also included communications support,[1898] the provision of a guesthouse,[1899] facilitation of road and air transportation of materiel,[1900] and other forms of assistance including the provision of safe haven, medical support, the provision of goods, herbalists and the assistance of Liberian forces.[1901]

633. The Chamber noted that a common feature of all these forms of assistance is that they supported, sustained and enhanced the functioning of the RUF and its capacity to undertake military operations in the course of which crimes were committed.[1902] Recalling its finding that the RUF and RUF/AFRC military campaign was inextricably linked to the commission of the crimes charged in the Indictment, the Chamber found that "these forms of operational support, including communications, logistics, and the RUF Guesthouse...constitute practical [1901] Judgement, para. 6935. The Chamber also stated that of these various modes of operational support, in particular, the support provided by the Accused to the RUF in the context of communications and logistics was sustained and significant. Judgement, para. 4262.

assistance".[1903] Therefore, "[t]aken cumulatively, and having regard to the military support provided by the Accused to the AFRC/RUF" the operational support provided by the Accused to the AFRC/RUF had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes charged in Count 1 to 11 of the Indictment.[1904]

634. The Chamber also based Taylor's aiding and abetting conviction on his encouragement and moral support, i.e. his giving of advice and direction to the RUF and RUF/AFRC.[1905]

635. Despite the reality that the Trial Chamber did not use "safekeeping" as a basis for Taylor's conviction through aiding and abetting, "safekeeping", which implies that the diamonds were kept for use when necessary, could in itself constitute practical assistance. A reasonable trier of fact could correctly conclude that Taylor's promise to safely keep the fruits of the RUF's crimes in Sierra Leone[1906] constitutes practical assistance since it encouraged the RUF to continue committing their crimes by providing a safe place to store the illegal proceeds thereof and provided a means to finance and perpetuate the RUF's criminal campaign.[1907] It would therefore have been within the discretion of a reasonable trier of fact to hold that such assistance, in addition to all the other forms of assistance found by the Trial Chamber, did have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crimes.[1908]

636. Further, the testimony Taylor cites in support of his claim that neither Sankoh nor any other RUF member received the diamonds Taylor was given for "safekeeping" makes it more plausible that, in reality, Taylor did not consider those diamonds were being deposited with

[1906] The diamonds Taylor held on to were the result of the RUF's mining which the Chamber found involved and led to the commission of a number of crimes, including murder and unlawful killings, child soldiers, and enslavement, see Judgement, paras. 551, 557, 635-36, 640-41, 674-75, 1467-68, 1495, 1650-57, 1735-38, 1744-47, 1752.
[1907] Indeed, this Appeals Chamber has stated that "encouragement" and "moral support" may constitute the actus reus and that acts of aiding and abetting can be made at a time and place removed from the actual crime (CDF AJ, para. 72; see also Judgement, para. 484). The Prosecution need not prove that the crime or underlying offence would not have been perpetrated but for the Accused's contribution (Judgement, para. 485; Blagojević & Jokić TJ, para. 726; CDF AJ, para. 72).
[1908] In this regard it should be noted that "[a]iding and abetting, which may appear to be synonymous, are indeed different. Aiding means giving assistance to someone. Abetting, on the other hand, would involve facilitating the commission of an act by being sympathetic thereto…The Chamber is of the opinion that either aiding or abetting alone is sufficient to render the perpetrator criminally liable." (original emphasis) Akayesu TJ, para. 484; Judgement, fn. 1136.

him, but rather considered them payment for his provision of materiel and other forms of assistance.[1909]

637. Taylor has failed to establish any error of law or fact warranting appellate intervention.

(iv) Conclusion

638. In view of the above, the Appeals Chamber should dismiss Taylor's consolidated Grounds 32 and 33 as he fails to point to and prove any error of law or to establish any error of fact.

GROUND 34: Actus reus for aiding and abetting

639. Taylor claims in paragraph 318 of his brief that "Grounds 21 through 34 identify the Chamber's errors in relation to the assistance allegedly provided by Mr. Taylor." In addition, in a footnote, Taylor states that "[n]o separate arguments are presented in respect of Ground 34, as those arguments are sufficiently expressed in the other Grounds concerning actus rea." However, Taylor notes that "[t]he ground of appeal is nevertheless maintained on the basis of those arguments."[1910] Yet he does not set out this supposed Ground of Appeal in his Table of Contents or in his submissions, nor does he make any arguments to support it. Neither the Prosecution nor the Appeals Chamber are under any obligation to resort to the Notice of Appeal in order to determine what Taylor is alleging in this ground, yet this is effectively what is required if any consideration is to be given to it. The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground as it fails to comply with the Practice Direction.[1911] Further, consistent with the holding of the Appeals Chamber at the ICTY, this Ground should be considered abandoned as it was not elaborated on in Taylor's brief.[1912] If the Appeals Chamber is minded to consider [1909] TF1-338 testified that in 2002 Issa Sesay told him that he (Issa) told "the man who was appointed to be the presidential candidate of the RUF" that that he had up to 5,000 carats of diamonds and $150,000 that he had given to Charles Taylor for safekeeping and that "Charles Taylor had said any time elections would be coming close he would assist the RUF and that was why he was keeping the diamonds." The witness stated neither Sankoh nor Sesay or anyone in the RUF ever received the diamonds given to Taylor by Sesay and Bockarie for safekeeping. [1911] Para. 6 requires that the Appellant's Submission include (d) "the arguments in support of each ground of appeal containing the contentions of the Appellant on the issues presented and the reasons therefore; with precise references to the authorities relied upon;" and (e) "the conclusion and relief sought". Neither of these provisions are complied with in relation to Ground 34. Moreover, para. 9 states "[t]he Appellant shall not repeat in a disproportionate manner, the same arguments in numerous grounds of appeal." Para. 29 empowers the Appeals Chamber to dismiss submissions where a party fails to comply with these requirements.

GROUND 35: This Ground has been withdrawn by the Appellant.[1914]

PART IV: ISSUES RELATING TO ALLEGED IRREGULARITIES IN THE JUDICIAL PROCESS

GROUND 36: Taylor fails to show that the Trial Chamber did not deliberate in this case[1915]

(i) Overview

640. Taylor's suggestion that the Trial Chamber did not deliberate is without merit and should be dismissed. It is for him to establish not only that there was an error of law or procedure, but also to demonstrate how such alleged error has invalidated the verdict or occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[1916] Taylor has failed to discharge his burden. Instead, he has misconstrued the personal Statement of the Alternate Judge, and has failed to show that the deliberative process was compromised in any way.[1917]

641. The Judgement itself attests to the care with which the Trial Chamber considered this case and is in line with the presumption that judges act in accordance with their solemn declarations. Nothing in the Statement of the Alternate Judge undermines this presumption.[1918]

(ii) Arguments

642. The insufficiency of Taylor's submissions under this Ground is clear from the outset. First, Taylor never even attempts to address the glaring question as to how the Judgement of such size and detail was finalised without deliberations. The stark facts are that the Judgement:

[1914] See Taylor Appeal, fn. 642.
[1915] At paras. 711 and 712 of the Taylor Appeal, Taylor alleges "two significant errors" identified in the Statement of the Alternate Judge, Judge El-Hadji Malick Sow, made on 26 April 2012 following the official adjournment of the hearing at which the oral summary of the Judgement was delivered (Statement), but indicates he will deal with the alleged failure to deliberate under Ground 36 and with the second alleged error in Ground 37. Therefore, the Prosecution response to Taylor's Ground 36 deals only with the alleged failure to deliberate.
[1916] Taylor submits that the error identified in Ground 36 "should lead to a reversal of all adverse findings in the Judgement, the quashing of all convictions, and vacatur of the Judgement and Sentencing Judgement" (see Taylor Appeal, para. 711). As argued in para. 6 above, such broad submissions can lead to summary dismissal.
[1917] Taylor Appeal, paras. 711, 717.
[1918] See Taylor Appeal, para. 710, for a full text of the "Statement". See also Taylor Appeal, Public Annex C, for a copy of the Statement.

- is over 2,500 pages long,
- took over 13 months to issue,
- contains detailed analyses of the law, evidence and the considerable number of factual and legal issues raised during the course of the lengthy trial, and,
- while convicting Taylor of the 11 counts on the Indictment on the basis of two modes of individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute, rejects three modes of liability as not proven beyond reasonable doubt.

643. There is a strong presumption that a judge acts in accordance with his or her solemn declaration. Before taking up duties, every Judge of the Special Court solemnly declares that he or she will perform his or her duties and exercise his or her powers honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously.[1919] As ICTY Appeals Chamber held in Krajišnik, a party must adduce sufficient evidence to rebut the strong presumption that judges act in accordance with their oath.[1920] This, Taylor has failed to do.

644. Nor is Taylor's reliance on the brief and ambiguous oral Statement of the Alternate Judge sufficient to rebut the presumption. Furthermore, any motion filed by Taylor under Rule 115 seeking to present additional evidence before the Appeals Chamber cannot remedy this deficiency in his argument.[1921] An appeal brief must provide the proper foundation to support a motion for the admission of additional evidence under Rule 115.[1922] Taylor's submissions do not provide such a foundation.

645. At no point in his appeal brief does Taylor identify which of the many findings and conclusions in the Judgement were reached by persons other than the three Judges of Trial Chamber II,[1923] or provide any explanation as to how the Judgement was written in the alleged absence of proper deliberations. General reliance on the Alternate Judge's Statement is not sufficient to fill these evidential gaps. As argued below, the Statement does not establish that no deliberations occurred.[1924] In Krajišnik, after a lengthy trial, the Judgement

[1919] SCSL Rule 14(A).
[1920] Krajišnik AJ, para. 133. Note ICTY Rule 14 is in similar terms to that of SCSL Rule 14.
[1921] Taylor's statement of intention in this regard is made at Taylor Appeal, para. 730.
[1922] RUF AJ, para. 43 ("the Appeals Chamber will, as a general rule, summarily dismiss undeveloped arguments and alleged errors, as well as submissions where the appellant fails to articulate the precise error committed by the Trial Chamber.")
[1923] The jurisprudence requires such substantiation. See Krajišnik AJ, para. 134 ("Amicus Curiae claims it was impossible to deliberate properly on such a complex case in only 18 working days, but he brings no evidence to substantiate his claim. In particular, he fails to show that conclusions were reached by other persons than the Judges or that preparatory work overreached into the area of deliberation.") was issued only 18 working days after the close of final arguments. The Appeals Chamber rejected a challenge based on alleged lack of deliberations, holding that "general comments on the length of the deliberations are insufficient to show improprieties in the deliberative process."[1925] Here, as in Krajišnik, there is an "absence of direct evidence of a failure to deliberate" or any clear basis on which to "infer that the deliberation process was corrupted".[1926]

646. Contrary to Taylor's assertions, the Statement does not have "substantial probative value" nor is it "compelling".[1927] The part of the Statement relied upon by Taylor to support his position that the Trial Chamber failed to deliberate states: "The only moment where a Judge can express his opinion is during deliberations or in the courtroom and pursuant to the Rules, when there is no ^ deliberations, the only place left for me in (sic) the courtroom".[1928]

647. Crucially, the quoted text shows that there is a missing word between 'no' and 'deliberations' which, by its placement, is evidently meant to qualify or describe the nature of the deliberations held, apparently based on the Alternate Judge's personal assessment. It is misleading, therefore, for Taylor to conclude that "the Trial Chamber failed to deliberate pursuant to the Rules",[1929] completely disregarding the elision in the sentence.

648. Further, Taylor's submissions at paragraph 715 of his brief ignore that Rule 87 mandates neither the manner nor means of deliberation following closing arguments. Rather, the Rule simply states that the Trial Chamber shall deliberate. Taylor's argument as to the alleged requirement that the judges "attend all deliberations together" and the required "presence" of the judges of the Trial Chamber[1930] must be viewed in this light. Given that physical presence is not specifically mandated by the Rule, arguably deliberations can occur in the modern world via teleconference [or email discussion], provided deliberations otherwise conform with the requirements of Rule 87, i.e. are private, include all judges and allow each judge to vote. In any event, the absence of an alternate judge from some or all of the deliberations would be, at most, a technical violation of Rule 16*bis*, with no prejudicial effect unless the Alternate Judge was required to replace one of the three voting judges, a situation which did not arise in this case.

649. The submissions at paragraph 717 of the Taylor Appeal as to what is "suggested" by the Statement are equally without merit as they are based on pure speculation. Considering the Statement as a whole, an alternate, contrary, logical and reasonable interpretation is that it "suggests" that the Alternate Judge was noting his concern that the deliberations did not afford him an opportunity to express – or adequately express - his differing opinion. So, he was availing himself of the opportunity to express his opinion in court. In this regard, it is important to bear in mind that Rule 16*bis* requires an alternate judge to be present for deliberations but, by its plain language, does not afford him leave to participate in those deliberations, nor to voice his opinions in court.

650. Taylor's submissions are also contradictory. Taylor argues that no proper deliberations occurred, meaning, if true, that all findings and conclusions in the Judgement should be without effect. However, he requests that only those findings adverse to him be reversed.[1931] Therefore, according to Taylor's logic, it is only in regard to findings adverse to him that there were no proper deliberations, but, in regard to favourable findings, there were proper deliberations. Such self-serving and contradictory arguments further demonstrate the lack of merit of this Ground of Appeal.

651. The remainder of Taylor's submissions under this Ground concerning two situations when limited details of the deliberative process were revealed is irrelevant to the merit of the alleged error.[1932]

(iii) Conclusion

652. Taylor's extensive submissions under this Ground are marked by a failure to properly substantiate the allegation that the three Judges of Trial Chamber II did not act in accordance with their solemn judicial oath and thus failed to deliberate properly. The Statement at the core of this Ground does not establish the claimed failure to deliberate. Further, despite alleging that no proper deliberations occurred, Taylor fails to explain how the Judgement, one of the lengthiest in the history of international criminal law, was produced and specifically who, other than the Judges of Trial Chamber II, made the findings, conclusions and dispositions contained within it. Finally, Taylor's submissions are vague and fail to identify the challenged findings or conclusions. While Taylor has intimated that he intends to file a Rule 115 motion in connection with this Ground, such a motion is the means by which a party seeks to present additional evidence, not to correct defective appeal submissions.

653. Taylor's arguments under this Ground are without merit and should be dismissed.

GROUND 37: The Trial Chamber ensured that Taylor's trial was conducted in full accord with Rule 26*bis* and fundamental guarantees of due process

(i) Overview

654. Ground 37 is without merit and should be dismissed. None of the alleged irregularities, even if correctly characterised, resulted in a denial of a fair trial. Rather, his trial was conducted in full accordance with "international standards of justice, fairness, and due process of law".[1933] The situations highlighted in the Taylor Appeal do not, individually or cumulatively, amount to procedural irregularities which would invalidate the Judgement or occasion a miscarriage of justice. Concretely, the absence of a voting member of Trial Chamber II for a session relating to a tangential matter resulted in no prejudice to Taylor, but rather in lead trial Defence counsel avoiding any negative consequence for his inappropriate conduct, the official transcript for 26 April 2012 is reflective of the proper adjournment of a session by the Presiding Judge; the name of the Alternate Judge, who had no vote, was properly omitted from the Trial Chamber's orders and cover pages of the Judgement as a consequence of the direction issued by the Plenary of Judges that he "refrain from further sitting in the proceedings pending a decision by the appointing authority";[1934] and there is no showing that the content of the Alternate Judge's Statement invalidated the Judgement or occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

(ii) There was no irregularity which prejudiced Taylor's right to a fair and public trial, invalidated the Judgement or occasioned a miscarriage of justice in relation to the conduct of the Judges on 25 February 2011

655. Taylor's remarkable claim that events at the hearing of 25 February 2011 breached his right to a fair and public trial is clearly without merit.[1935] Justice Sebutinde's absence resulted in no prejudice to Taylor.

656. First, the subject of the hearing on 25 February 2011 was on a matter tangential to the substantive proceedings in relation to Taylor and had no direct bearing on the guilt or innocence of Taylor. The hearing was scheduled to address the withdrawal of lead trial Defence counsel, Mr. Courtenay Griffiths, from the courtroom on 8 February 2011 despite the Presiding Judge's direction that he remain seated and in contravention of an express warning of the Presiding Judge. Nonetheless, after the Presiding Judge's direction and warning, lead trial Defence counsel left the courtroom, absented himself from proceedings for the remainder of the day and did not appear for Defence closing arguments on 9 February 2011.[1936] The 25 February session was convened to address this misconduct. On 25 February 2011, Justice Sebutinde absented herself from the hearing. As a consequence of her absence, the two remaining voting judges determined the bench was not properly constituted and the hearing was adjourned early with no substantive decision being rendered.[1937] While it might have been more appropriate for Justice Sebutinde to have attended the scheduled session, her absence merely resulted in lead trial Defence counsel avoiding any potential consequences for his earlier conduct. Set in its proper factual and legal context, it is clear that there is no link between this hearing and the Judgement.

657. Secondly, in the absence of Justice Sebutinde, it was within the Presiding Judge's discretion[1938] to find that the situation was not one to which Rule 16 applied, that the Trial Chamber was not properly constituted, and to adjourn the hearing.[1939] Rule 16(A) allows the remaining judges to continue the proceedings if a judge is unable to sit for a period of not more than five working days. This Rule does not deal with the situation where a judge refuses to sit.[1940]

658. Taylor leaps to the convenient but erroneous conclusion that the requirements of Article 12(4) and Rule 16(B) had been fulfilled and, thus, that there was a failure to consider Justice Sow as a replacement for Justice Sebutinde.[1941] These references are, however, of no assistance to Taylor. Rule 16(B) makes clear that only if a prolonged absence is likely will an alternate judge replace the absent judge. In this case, the situation before the two remaining

On 11 February 2011 the matter was delayed until 25 February 2011 – see T. 11 February 2011, pp. 49304-05.

[1938] The discretionary nature of the decision is clear from the wording of Rule 16(A) which provides that proceedings may continue in the absence of a judge for not more than five working days where it is considered it is in the interests of justice to do so. Accordingly, it was within the discretion of the remaining judges to conclude that proceedings could not continue on that day in the absence of Justice Sebutinde.

(A) If a Judge is unable to continue sitting in a proceeding, trial or appeal which has partly been heard for a short duration and the remaining Judges are satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to do so, those remaining Judges may order that the proceeding, trial or appeal continue in the absence of that Judge for a period of not more than five working days.

(B) If a Judge is, for any reason, unable to continue sitting in a proceeding, trial or appeal which has partly been heard for a period which is or is likely to be longer than five days, the President may designate an alternate Judge as provided in Article 12(4) of the Statute. (Emphasis added.)

voting judges was not an absence likely to be for a period longer than five days, so Rule 16(B) did not apply. Taylor's selective reading of the Rules also ignores Rule 16*bis*(D), which gives the Presiding Judge, not the Alternate Judge, the authority to assign other functions to the Alternate Judge as the Presiding Judge, in consultation with the other judges of the Chamber, may deem necessary.

659. Assuming, arguendo, Justice Sebutinde's absence on 25 February 2011 could be considered an irregularity, such irregularity occurred during what was effectively a disciplinary hearing at which no substantive decision was taken on any matter prejudicial to Taylor.

660. In light of the above, no procedural irregularity occurred on 25 February 2011 which in any way invalidated the unanimous Judgement of the Trial Chamber or occasioned a miscarriage of justice. Taylor's lack of submissions addressing these consequences makes it clear he is unable to make this crucial link.

(iii) There was no irregularity invalidating the Judgement or occasioning a miscarriage of justice by ending the official Court session when the Presiding Judge adjourned the Court, or by the alleged "removal" of the Alternate Judge's: (i) Statement from the 26 April 2012 transcript; and (ii) name from Court documents from 26 April 2012 onwards

661. The allegation concerning the switching off of the Alternate Judge's microphone[1942] plus the second[1943] and third[1944] alleged procedural irregularities relied on by Taylor are all inextricably linked, as all arise from the judicial response to the Alternate Judge's conduct. Accordingly, the response to these submissions will be dealt with together.

(a) The Presiding Judge properly adjourned the 26 April 2012 proceedings and the Alternate Judge's personal comments are properly not part of the official record

662. The Presiding Judge acted in accordance with his authority in orally delivering the unanimous judgement of the three voting judges of the Trial Chamber and, thereafter, adjourning the official proceedings on that date. The Alternate Judge had no authority to make any statement during the proceedings on 26 April 2012, thus it was proper for the microphones to be turned off after the proceedings were officially adjourned.[1945] Certainly, doing so did not violate any right afforded Taylor.

[1944] Taylor Appeal, paras. 753-56.
[1945] Decision on Disqualification, para. 33.

663. Additionally, confining the Alternate Judge to his proper role which is to be present at proceedings and deliberations in case he or she must assume duties upon the prolonged absence of a member of the Trial Chamber violates no right Taylor can legitimately claim.[1946] During the trial, deliberations and delivery of the judgement, the key aspect of the alternate judge's role is presence, not participation. For example, the alternate judge does not have a vote on the merits or on sentencing, or an articulated right to participate in deliberations.[1947] An alternate judge does not even have the right to ask questions directly unless allowed to do so by the Presiding Judge. Rather, Rule 16*bis*(B) permits an alternate judge to pose questions through the Presiding Judge and, even then, only where the questions are necessary for the alternate judge's understanding of the proceedings.

(b) The absence of the Alternate Judge's name from official Court documents issued after 26 April 2012 is reflective of a proper exercise of authority by a plenary meeting of the Judges of the Special Court, the judges of Trial Chamber II abstaining and does not violate any right of Taylor

664. Taylor's arguments on the above alleged irregularity are unfounded. His assertion that the absence of the Alternate Judge's name from official Court documents after 26 April 2012 is unexplained is mistaken,[1948] because it ignores the detailed explanation provided by the Presiding Judge in court on 16 May 2012. That explanation sets out the conclusions of a plenary of the Judges of the Special Court, the judges of Trial Chamber II abstaining, including a finding that the Alternate Judge's behavior on 26 April amounted to misconduct rendering him unfit to sit as an Alternate Judge of the Special Court, and directing him to refrain from further sitting in the proceedings pending a decision from the appointing authority.[1949] The Presiding Judge's clear and detailed explanation establishes a proper basis for the absence of the Alternate Judge's name on official Court documents after 26 April.

665. Indeed, the overarching fatal deficiency of Taylor's submissions on these three alleged errors concerning the actions taken to deal with the Alternate Judge's conduct is that their tenor is akin to appealing the disciplinary action taken by the plenary of judges in relation to the conduct of the Alternate Judge, rather than appeal submissions against Taylor's conviction and sentence.[1950] As with the other alleged procedural irregularities discussed above, at no point does Taylor link these alleged errors to any identifiable prejudice which he suffered, save broadly in respect of an apparent supposed breach of his fair trial rights.[1951] Such broad, unfocussed submissions are clearly insufficient for appeal purposes, particularly when the impugned actions have no bearing on the findings in the Judgement or the determination of Taylor's guilt or innocence and sentence.

666. Taylor's submissions under this Ground are further weakened by the Appeals Chamber determination that "sanctioning judicial misconduct in a trial does not constitute nor give rise to the appearance of pre-judgement of the guilt or innocence of the respective accused" and that "[t]he parties' rights would be severely violated were the Plenary to allow judicial misconduct only because sanctioning it could be falsely imagined as benefiting or harming a particular party."[1952] The Appeals Chamber has also ruled that "the Defence's submissions with respect to the trial record are ill-founded", and that "[t]here is no basis to suggest that the official transcript is anything but accurate and transparent."[1953] Therefore, it is clear that the Appeals Chamber has ruled that the steps taken to sanction the Alternate Judge, including the direction by the Plenary that the Alternate Judge "refrain from further sitting in the proceedings",[1954] were proper and cannot be "falsely imagined as ... harming a particular party."

667. Taylor acknowledges that he is asking for reconsideration of the ruling but then fails to identify and satisfy the test.[1955] This Appeals Chamber has endorsed the approach taken in Ntagerura, where the ICTR Appeals Chamber held that a previous decision can be reconsidered if a clear error of reasoning has been demonstrated or if it is necessary to prevent an injustice.[1956] No clear error of reasoning is identified by Taylor, nor has he demonstrated that there is an injustice. On this latter point, as the Appeals Chamber noted, "[t]he Defence is fully aware of the content of Justice Sow's statement".[1957] Thus, it is available to the Defence for the purposes of appeal.[1958] Further, no injustice has arisen as a result of the omission of the Alternate Judge's name from Court documents since 26 April 2012.

668. Accordingly, no procedural irregularity is established by Taylor in relation to any of the actions taken to deal with the Alternate Judge's misconduct to which he refers under this Ground.

(iv) There was no irregularity evidenced in Alternate Judge's Statement of 26 April 2012 which would invalidate the Judgement or occasion a miscarriage of justice

669. Taylor's submission that the Alternate Judge's Statement establishes the existence of procedural errors which "should lead to the reversal of all adverse findings ... in the Judgement, the quashing of all convictions, and vacatur of the Judgement and Sentencing Judgement" should be dismissed for reasons of vagueness and lack of particularity.[1959]

670. In short, Taylor fails to state why the "system" is not consistent with the values of international criminal justice, why the "whole system" is under grave danger of losing all credibility, and why this "whole thing" is headed for failure.[1960] Further, as argued above in relation to Ground 36, the purpose of a Rule 115 motion is not to remedy such deficiencies in an appellant's appeal brief. The result is that Taylor fails to establish any procedural irregularity.

671. Taylor also fails to include the sentence immediately before the quoted sentence, the language of which gives an entirely different import to the following quoted sentence. The relevant omitted language of the preceding sentence is italicised: "I won't get – because I think we have been sitting too long but for me I have my dissenting opinion and I disagree with the findings and conclusions of the other Judges, because for me under any mode of liability, under any accepted standard of proof the guilt of the accused from the evidence provided in this trial is not proved beyond reasonable doubt by the Prosecution." Taking this language into consideration, the sentence which followed can be said to logically relate to the Alternate Judge's strong disagreement with the unanimous findings and disposition of the Trial Chamber, not to any impropriety on the part of the Trial Chamber.

(v) Conclusion

672. Taylor fails to establish the occurrence of any procedural irregularity, individually or cumulatively, breaching his right to a fair and public trial and occasioning a miscarriage of justice or invalidating the Judgement. His appeal submissions under this Ground should, therefore, be dismissed.

GROUND 38: Taylor has failed to show that Trial Chamber II was irregularly constituted after Justice Sebutinde was elected a Judge of the International Court of Justice

(i) Overview

673. Taylor's argument is without merit and should be dismissed. Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error of law and/or procedure that would render the Trial Chamber irregularly constituted from the time of Justice Sebutinde's appointment as a judge of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) and thus invalidate the Judgement or occasion a miscarriage of justice. Taylor has made no showing to overcome the strong presumption that Justice Sebutinde acted in accord with the sworn declaration she took as a judge of the Special Court to carry out her duties honestly, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously. The single fact of her appointment as a judge of the ICJ does not rebut that presumption. Taylor has failed to establish that her appointment resulted in Justice Sebutinde acting contrary to "the demands of a full-time office,"[1961] the "efficient and timely functioning"[1962] of Trial Chamber II, her commitment "to the work of the [Special Court] and the complete and honourable discharge of [her] obligations,"[1963] her availability to "deal attentively within a reasonable period with the matters put before [...] her" and to consider the case submitted to her with due care and within a reasonable time,[1964] or that the appointment delayed the delivery of judgement in this case.[1965]

(ii) Taylor has made no showing that Justice Sebutinde failed to act honestly, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously

674. Taylor fails to rebut the strong presumption that Justice Sebutinde acted in accordance with the solemn declaration she made to perform her duties as a Special Court judge honestly, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously.[1966] Taylor has made no showing that her appointment in any way prevented her from discharging her duties in his case in accordance with that declaration.

675. As Justice Robertson noted in his Separate Opinion in Norman, independence means putting judges in a position to act according to their conscience and the justice of the case, free from pressure.[1967] There has been no showing that Justice Sebutinde's appointment as an ICJ judge prevented her from acting independently. Unlike the situation in Čelebići,[1968] Justice Sebutinde's appointment is not political or administrative in nature, but judicial. In addition, no decision, order, or judgement of Trial Chamber II or the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court will be the subject of litigation before the ICJ, nor would any judicial action of the ICJ ever be brought before the Special Court for review. Thus, there is no conflict of interest.[1969]

676. Taylor's reliance on ICTY Statute Article 13*bis*(3)[1970] is misplaced.[1971] The SCSL Statute has no similar provision, nor do the SCSL Rules. Taylor's reliance on Article 16 of the ICJ Statute is similarly misplaced. As noted above, absent a conflict of interest that rendered Justice Sebutinde unable to act in accord with her solemn declaration as a judge of the SCSL, whether her dual role violated the Article is a matter for the ICJ and has no bearing on her performance of duties at this Court. However, Article 16, properly understood, does not prohibit Justice Sebutinde's continued participation as a judge of Trial Chamber II. In its Annual Report to the General Assembly for the period 1 August 1995 to 31 July 1996, the ICJ responded to questions that had been raised about the Court's practice of permitting its members to engage in occasional activities outside of the Court for remuneration. The Court noted that repeated endorsement by the international organs concerned showed an awareness of the contribution that the members of the Court could "make to the development of international law, and of the benefits deriving therefrom for all institutions concerned." Perhaps even more importantly, the Court said, "The practice, which involves a very limited number of judges for very limited periods, has no adverse effect on the pace of the work of the Court or the total precedence given to that work by its members."[1972] Indeed, the Statute of the ICJ does not place an absolute prohibition on outside judicial activities.[1973]

It can only be settled by the relevant bodies of the Tribunal.* If these bodies are satisfied that the judge does not fulfill one of the requisite conditions, for instance because he has engaged in political or administrative functions incompatible with the judicial function, the judge is duty bound to either abandon those incompatible functions or to resign from the position of judge" (emphasis added).

677. In short, membership as a judge of the ICJ is not incompatible with membership as a judge of an international tribunal as long as a case before that tribunal is not subject to being submitted to the ICJ, and as long as the judge can still give "the fullest precedence to [her] supervening duties" as a member of the ICJ.[1974] Further, as the ICJ is "the principal judicial organ of the United Nations and, as such, an important part of the peacekeeping machinery established by the Charter, [...] there is nothing unusual in the Court contributing, by various means [...] to the achievement of this vital goal of the United Nations," provided that, in so doing, it does not overstep the bounds of the Statute.[1975] Given that the SCSL was established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for serious crimes against civilians, including leaders who threatened the establishment and implementation of the peace process in Sierra Leone,[1976] it would be compatible for the ICJ to endorse the continued participation of Justice Sebutinde as a Judge of the Special Court.[1977]

678. As discussed above, the Statute of the ICJ does not place an absolute prohibition on outside judicial activities.[1978] Indeed, none of the authorities cited by Taylor indicates any differently.[1979] Article 40 of the ICC Statute, for instance, does not prohibit all occupations of all professional nature. Rather, the provision means that the judges who have been required to serve on a full-time basis remain free to continue to exercise other professional occupations unless the occupation, of itself, would interfere with their judicial functions.[1980]

679. It is clear there was no legal prohibition to Justice Sebutinde serving simultaneously as a judge of the ICJ and the SCSL.[1981] Most importantly, Taylor makes no showing that holding both offices resulted in a failure by her to act conscientiously in this case. Contrary to Taylor's arguments, Justice Sebutinde was not a judge of both the Special Court and the ICJ "for a significant period"[1982] or for a period which "encompassed the time period between the end of trial hearings and the delivery of Judgment."[1983] Rather, she was a judge of both courts for a relatively short period of time, toward the end of the some 13 months of deliberations on Taylor's guilt or innocence.

680. The hearing in this case was closed for deliberation on 11 March 2011.[1984] Justice Sebutinde's term as a judge of the ICJ began as of 6 February 2012,[1985] almost 11 months after the hearing had closed, but she did not make her sworn declaration until 12 March 2012,[1986] one year after the hearing was closed. On 1 March 2012, 11 days before making the solemn declaration, Trial Chamber II, Justice Sebutinde included, issued a scheduling order setting 26 April 2012 as the date on which the Judgement would be delivered.[1987] The Judgement was delivered as scheduled on 26 April 2012, Justice Sebutinde attending, less than two months after her term as an ICJ judge began. Some three weeks later, on 18 May 2012, the written judgement of some 2,500 pages was issued, with Justice Sebutinde's signature.

681. Given this history, it cannot be argued that Justice Sebutinde's continued participation in the trial process during the short period when, arguably, most of the deliberations on [1981] Judge Sebutinde holding both offices for a relatively short period of time is no more inappropriate than Alternate Judge Sow's membership on the Working Group on Arbitrary Detention (OHCHR), throughout the duration of his position as Alternate Judge on this case. Judge Sow was appointed to this body on 1 May 2008, while already a serving Judge of the SCSL, and, not only did he hold a position that required more or less, full time responsibilities (Vice-Chair), he regularly traveled on that office's official business, from records, at least four times during the currency of the Taylor Trial (Ukraine, 22 October – 5 November 2008; Malta, 19-23 January 2009; Armenia, 6-15 September 2010; Malaysia, 7-17 June 2010). [1987] Scheduling Order for Delivery of Judgement, 1 March 2012.

Taylor's guilt or innocence would have been completed, had the effect of invalidating the Judgement or occasioning a miscarriage of justice.

682. Nor has Taylor shown that Justice Sebutinde's appointment prevented her from acting conscientiously in the conduct of the proceedings relating to sentence. The schedule for submissions and delivery of sentencing judgement was set on 26 April 2012,[1988] and there was no deviation from that schedule. Sentencing proceedings moved apace with the requirements of Rule 100, and oral submissions followed on 16 May 2012, six days after final written submissions were filed by the Defence on 10 May 2012. Justice Sebutinde was present to hear those submissions, and asked questions during oral argument.[1989] Some two weeks after oral submissions, on 30 May 2012, the Trial Chamber delivered its sentencing judgement, which Justice Sebutinde signed.

(iii) Taylor has made no showing that appropriate undertakings and decision making did not occur consequent to Judge Sebutinde's appointment as a judge of the ICJ

683. Taylor appears to put misplaced reliance on a lack of notice to the parties to support his assertions that no appropriate undertakings were given or a decision taken in regard to Judge Sebutinde holding positions as a judge in both the Special Court and the ICJ.[1990] There is no requirement for such notice in the Statute or Rules of the Special Court, nor in the Special Court Agreement. Whether or not a judge meets all the requirements for service as a Judge of the Special Court is a matter for the President and/or Council or Plenary of Judges to decide and does not require party involvement, notification or consent.[1991] Indeed, it flows from the power of assignment given to the Presidency by Article 19 of the SCSL Agreement.[1992]

684. Nor do the ICTY and ICTR cases cited by Taylor impose any such notice requirement.[1993] Of the many sources cited by Taylor, only two refer to a requirement of some

This provision can be compared to the article of the 35(3) of the ICC that gives the Presidency the discretion to decide, in the light of the need and workload of the Court, to what extent the judges shall be full-time. Rome Statute, Art. 35(3): Service of judges: The Presidency may on the basis of the workload of the Court and in consultation with its members, decide from time to time to what extents the remaining judges shall be required to serve on a full-time basis. Any such arrangement shall be without prejudice to the provisions of article 40.

notification to the parties, neither of which is binding on the Special Court nor absolute.[1994] Absence of notice does not establish a failure to give appropriate undertakings or to engage in appropriate decision making.

685. Taylor's complaint that Justice Sebutinde failed to obtain any required authorisation to hold both judgeships simultaneously is without merit. Since these proceedings did not take place at the ICJ, it is irrelevant whether Justice Sebutinde obtained permission from that Court to complete the Taylor trial.[1995] Had she not had permission from the appropriate Special Court authority,[1996] she would simply have been refused admission to the Court premises and to Special Court materials. Clearly this did not happen.

(iv) Taylor's failure to make timely objection and his contradictory request for relief also underscore the lack of merit of this Ground of Appeal

686. In assessing the merit of this Ground of Appeal, regard must be had to Taylor's failure to timely raise the issue before the conclusion of the trial proceedings.[1997] If he had considered the issue to be prejudicial, he could have raised the matter while the Trial Chamber was fully constituted, in particular considering that lead appeal Defence counsel was trial Defence co-counsel from about August 2007 throughout the remainder of the trial proceedings.

687. Further, Taylor's requests for relief undermine his arguments. Taylor's request that only those findings adverse to him should be reversed[1998] suggests that the Chamber was regularly constituted in regard to findings favourable to him, but irregularly constituted in regard to adverse findings. Such self-serving and contradictory arguments underscore the lack of merit of this Ground of Appeal.

(v) Conclusion

688. Taylor has failed to establish that Justice Sebutinde's appointment as a judge of the ICJ constituted any error of law/and or procedure which rendered the constitution of Trial Chamber II irregular. He has failed to show that her duties as a judge of the ICJ were incompatible with her duties as a judge of the Special Court, or that the appointment prevented her from acting impartially, independently, conscientiously and with judicial integrity. This Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

[1995] However, as lead appeal Defence counsel will recall, at a reception for the Judges of Trial Chamber II on 31 May 2012 hosted by the President of the Special Court and attended by lead appeal Defence counsel, Justice Sebutinde thanked the President of the ICJ for allowing her to continue her work as a judge of Trial Chamber II. See also ICJ Statute Commentary, p. 335, para. 33: As evidenced by the practice of the ICJ, it is usually the judge in question who initially expresses any doubts he may have to the President. The president generally informs the Court of any question of incompatibility raised by the judge; the President consults the Court whenever he or she deems necessary; where the President and the judge disagree, the question is submitted to the Court for decision.

GROUND 39: Taylor fails to establish any error of law, procedure or fact in the Chamber's dismissal of his request for disclosure and/or an investigation pursuant to Rule 54 (Wikileaks Motion)

(i) Overview

689. Pursuant to Rule 92*bis*, Taylor sought to reopen his case to admit two leaked United States Government ("USG") cables,[1999] and, pursuant to Rule 54, sought, based on those cables, to obtain an order for disclosure and/or an investigation of information allegedly obtained in breach of the independence and impartiality of all organs of the Court.[2000] The Trial Chamber granted the motion to reopen and admitted the documents in question,[2001] but in its "Wikileaks Decision" dismissed Taylor's request for disclosure or an investigation, holding that he had not shown any prima facie evidence that there had been interference with the independence and impartiality of the Court.[2002] Having reasonably assessed the information before it, the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in applying the correct legal standard to the issue before it and in its dismissal of the motion for disclosure/investigation. Taylor has made no showing of any error of law, procedure or fact that would invalidate the Judgement or occasion a miscarriage of justice.[2003]

(ii) The Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in denying Taylor's request pursuant to Rule 54

690. A Trial Chamber has wide discretion to determine when to exercise its authority under Rule 54.[2004] As correctly recalled in the Wikileaks Decision, the test for whether the Trial Chamber should issue an order under Rule 54 is whether to do so is necessary (not simply useful or convenient) for the purpose of an investigation or the preparation or conduct of the trial.[2005] For the reasons discussed below, the Chamber applied the correct law and reached reasonable conclusions in determining that this test was not met.

[2003] In this regard it is important to note that the Chamber had the two Cables before it in resolving the issues in the case.

691. As Taylor has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion by refraining to issue an order for the requested disclosure or/and investigation,[2006] no appellate intervention is warranted.

(iii) The Chamber applied the correct legal standard with regard to Taylor's request for disclosure and/or an investigation

692. The Trial Chamber correctly stated the law with regard to a motion for relief based on an alleged breach of independence and/or impartiality of the Court. The Trial Chamber properly considered Articles 13(1) and 15(1) of the SCSL Statute.[2007] There is a high presumption of independence and impartiality of the organs of the Court that cannot be easily rebutted.[2008] With regard to the alleged breach of independence of the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber correctly relied on the Sesay decision in stating that in order to grant disclosure, "a party must establish a prima facie case that there has been such a breach, and in so +doing must determine, whether there is, at this point in time, any evidentiary basis or factual foundation to warrant a finding of fact that there has been in law such a breach".[2009] The Chamber also correctly recalled the Sesay holding that "mere cooperation between the Prosecution and ... the US Government", without proof that the Prosecution received instructions from that government, "including the nature and contents of such instructions, does not, per se, fulfill the test to establish a violation of Article 15(1)".[2010] Contrary to Taylor's assertions,[2011] the proper analysis is not whether there were communications—and certainly not whether there were one-way communications, but whether instructions have been sought or given.[2012] With respect to the alleged breach of independence and impartiality of the judges, the Trial Chamber correctly stated that a requesting party must make a prima facie showing that such information would demonstrate bias or the appearance of bias.[2013]

693. The Trial Chamber then correctly applied the legal standards in deciding the request for disclosure or investigation. The Chamber considered the information in the two documents on which Taylor relied. The Chamber, which is best placed to assess evidence presented at the trial,[2014] reasonably concluded that none of the information in these documents established the requisite prima facie showing that there had been interference with the independence and impartiality of the Court and appropriately dismissed the motion.[2015]

694. The Chamber correctly concluded that the first cable did not indicate any influence over any organs of the Court or over the outcome of the trial.[2016] Indeed, the contents of the Cable refute rather than support Taylor's argument. The fact that the author of the Cable expresses concern that Charles Taylor at liberty would be a threat to stability in Liberia and urges the USG to consider possible prosecution for violation of U.S. law demonstrates this lack of influence.[2017]

695. The Chamber also properly concluded that the second cable did not establish the requisite prima facie showing.[2018] This Cable clearly relates to a one way flow of information regarding the status of proceedings in a case before the Court, a matter within the purview of the Management Committee, given to a State member of that Committee.[2019] As the Chamber properly considered, as part of their official functions, the Registry and the Prosecution interact on a regular basis with States of the Management Committee, including the United States, about the progress of the trial including "questions of efficiency".[2020] Thus, communications themselves were not indicative of a breach of independence. The Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that statements attributed to the sources within the Court did not demonstrate that such sources were receiving instructions from the USG.[2021]

[2018] Taylor's assertion that the contents of the second cable were serious enough to impel Justice Sebutinde to voluntarily withdraw from resolution of this issue is unfounded. As she stated in her declaration appended to the Wikileaks Decision, Justice Sebutinde merely considered "that in order for justice to be seen done, [she] should not participate in the deliberation or decision relating to this Motion. (iv) No error in the Trial Chamber's Decision even applying the standard that there "may have been interference" with the independence and impartiality of the Court

696. Notwithstanding the Chamber's use of the phrase "may have been interference"[2022] in one instance, this one phrase, when placed in the context of the whole Decision, does not imply that the Chamber used an incorrect standard in deciding the issue. The impugned must be put or read in its proper context.[2023] A reading of the whole Decision makes clear the Trial Chamber applied the correct standard of proof in its reasoning.

697. In any event, as discussed in paragraphs 694 and 695 above, the two Cables do not establish even that there "may have been" interference with the independence and impartiality of the Court.[2024] Nothing in the Cables provides a reasonable basis to conclude that instructions were being sought or received, or that the independence of the Court may have been breached in any way. For example, as the Chamber concluded in relation to the second Cable, nothing therein demonstrates whether the "contacts" had any relationship with the USG capable of interfering with the independence of the Court. Taylor's argument now, as at in the motion, relies on pure conjecture and speculation, and makes no showing that would have necessitated an order for disclosure/investigation.

(iv) Conclusion

698. As Taylor has failed to demonstrate any error of law, fact or procedure to warrant Appellate intervention, this Ground should be dismissed.

PART V: NO ERRORS UNDERMINING THE FAIRNESS OF THE PROCEEDINGS

Ground 40: The Trial Chamber committed no error in its treatment of payments and incentives received by Prosecution witnesses

(i) Overview

699. Taylor argues without merit that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in failing to find that payments and incentives received by Prosecution witnesses TF1-276, TF1-334, TF1-532, TF1-548 and TF1-274 went beyond that which is reasonably required for the management of a witness, were objectively unreasonable or excessive, and/or amounted to an Wikileaks Motion is unfounded. Judge Sebutinde considered that in order for justice to be seen done, she should not participate in the deliberation or decision relating to this Motion.

[2022] Wikileaks Decision, p. 6.

[2023] See, e.g., Rutaganda AJ, paras. 173-84, holding that in determining whether or not a Trial Chamber reversed the burden of proof, the impugned language must be put or read in its proper context.

abuse of the Prosecution's discretion pursuant to Rule 39(ii) and thereby necessitated that their respective testimony be treated with caution.[2025] This Ground should be dismissed.

700. Taylor fails to demonstrate any error warranting appellate intervention. At paragraphs 194-195 of the Judgement, the Trial Chamber clearly sets out its approach to assessing whether payments made to witnesses by the Prosecution's Witness Management Unit (WMU) were reasonable and compliant with Rule 39(ii). The Trial Chamber made various specific findings about the reasonableness of payments made to Prosecution witnesses. Where specific findings were not made, the Trial Chamber nevertheless properly assessed the issue in accordance with the approach it set out in paragraphs 194-195 of the Judgement. It has not been demonstrated that no reasonable trier of fact could have found the payments in question compliant with Rule 39(ii).

701. Taylor's pleading is replete with mischaracterisations. For example, he refers to an earlier Trial Chamber ruling that payments to DCT-097 (a potential witness never called) appeared to be beyond that which was reasonably required for the management of the witness.[2026] Putting aside the lack of prejudice regarding payments made to someone who did not testify, Taylor critically omits reference to the Trial Chamber's ultimate conclusion that the payments fell within the Prosecution's discretion pursuant to Rule 39(ii).[2027]

(ii) No error in the Chamber's determination concerning payments and incentives received by certain Prosecution witnesses

702. The issue of "Alleged 'Incentives' for Witnesses" is addressed in the "Evaluation of Evidence" section at the beginning of the Judgement.[2028] The Trial Chamber acknowledged the arguments made by Taylor concerning witness payments, which he now repeats and seeks to relitigate on appeal.[2029]

703. At paragraphs 194-195 of its Judgement, the Trial Chamber explicitly set out the approach that it took in evaluating whether payments made to witnesses called by the

[2025] In Taylor Appeal, paras. 816-17, Taylor repeats arguments advanced in Ground 5 that payments to witnesses automatically necessitate that their evidence be treated with caution. The Prosecution has responded to these arguments in the response to Ground 5.

[2029] Taylor Appeal, Grounds 5 and 40. Taylor's allegations that the payments were an abuse of discretion pursuant to Rule 39(ii), and/or exorbitant, and/or objectively unreasonable and/or excessive were raised throughout the course of this trial, including in the Contempt Motion, the Confidential Defence Final Brief (paras. 23-26, 1396-98, 1405-09, 1472-74, 1476-78, 1491), as well as in his closing arguments (T. 9 March 2011 p. 49397; T. 10 March 2011 pp. 49473-93; T. 11 March 2011 p. 49620), and were all considered by the Trial Chamber as reflected in Judgement, paras. 185-188.

Prosecution were in breach of Rule 39(ii), and/ or exorbitant, and/or objectively unreasonable and/or excessive. There is nothing erroneous in this approach. Taylor erroneously avers that the Trial Chamber failed to "draw any conclusions as to whether payments constituted an abuse of the Prosecution's discretion under Rule 39(ii)".[2030] Reading paragraphs 194 and 195 together (rather than in isolation),[2031] it is clear that by asking itself whether payments made were "reasonably required for the management of a witness", the Trial Chamber addressed Taylor's concerns.

704. Taylor's apparent suggestion that each time it discussed the issue of payments, the Trial Chamber ought to have specifically set out whether the payments were an abuse of the Prosecutor's Rule 39(ii) discretion, is without merit.[2032] In light of the methodology articulated in paragraph 195 setting out the Chamber's approach, it was unnecessary for the Trial Chamber to expressly refer to the Rule on each occasion that it assessed the issue. Although the Chamber did not articulate specific findings about whether payments were in breach of Rule 39(ii) for witnesses Abu Keita, Isaac Mongor or Suwandi Camara, the methodology set out in paragraph 195 should be understood to have been applied on a case-by-case basis in assessing the legitimacy of payments and concluding that such payments did not undermine the witnesses' credibility. It was unnecessary for the Trial Chamber to repeat that it had taken this approach when assessing and relying upon their evidence, as a Trial Chamber is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning in assessing and weighing the evidence at trial.[2033] As discussed below, the Chamber did make specific rulings in relation to Rule 39(ii) for witnesses Alimamy Bobson Sesay and Dauda Aruna Fornie. For these reasons, Taylor's claim that the Trial Chamber's credibility assessments "simply noted when payments had been made and then, without exception, concluded that these payments had no impact on credibility, without performing any substantive analysis of the appropriateness of the payments" is simply incorrect.[2034]

705. Taylor's complaints in regard to each witness are considered below.

(a) TF1-334, Alimamy Bobson Sesay

706. In its general credibility assessment of Alimamy Bobson Sesay,[2035] the Trial Chamber expressly and carefully considered the payments he received, including the resurrected allegation that payments were made when no interviews were conducted with the witness. Having considered the arguments as well as cross-examination of the witness on the matter,[2036] the Trial Chamber, contrary to Taylor's argument,[2037] made an explicit finding that the payments made to Bobson Sesay were not unreasonable.[2038] Given this finding, the Trial Chamber did not need to additionally articulate that the payments were not "objectively excessive" or "did not constitute an abuse of the Prosecution's discretion pursuant to Rule 39(ii)". It is axiomatic from the finding that the payments were not unreasonable that the payments were neither "objectively excessive" nor "an abuse of the Prosecution's discretion".[2039]

707. It is clear Taylor is simply seeking to relitigate this issue on appeal. The Trial Chamber specifically addressed his arguments in its Judgement. Taylor poses the questions "why" and "how" "was [it] necessary" that the payments in question were made to Bobson Sesay,[2040] questions addressed by the Trial Chamber in Judgement paragraph 287. The Trial Chamber noted that payments were made to the witness on occasions where there was no record of an interview conducted because he was assisting the Prosecution to obtain information and locate people. According to the witness's testimony, this often involved traveling to various locations, with or without investigators, to locate such persons or information.[2041] This is consistent with the remit of Rule 39(ii) which permits the Prosecution to "take all measures necessary for the purpose of the investigation". Also of note is that in July 2006, Bobson Sesay testified in the RUF trial and was compensated for expenditures incurred as a consequence of meeting with the Prosecution in advance of his testimony in that case.[2042] The Trial Chamber properly approached the issue of payments made to this witness and the conclusion that the payments were not unreasonable was reasonably available to it.

(b) TF1-276, Abu Keita

708. In its general credibility assessment of Abu Keita,[2043] the Trial Chamber expressly and carefully considered the payments Keita received. This included Taylor's argument that Keita "received payments in excess of what was necessary to cover his expenses, and that his testimony was influenced by the indebtedness he felt to the prosecution".[2044] The Trial Chamber explicitly found that most of the $2,502 U.S. and 6,000 Leones (approximately $2 U.S.) received by Keita could be accounted for as reimbursement for plane tickets, hotel expenses, meals and other transport-related expenses.[2045] It then stated, "The Trial Chamber does not find that these payments undermine the witness's credibility".[2046]

709. Taylor's argument that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that payments made to Keita were permissible under Rule 39(ii) lacks merit. As set out by the Trial Chamber in its assessment of the issue, most of the $2,502 U.S. and 6,000 Leones (approximately $2 U.S.) received by Keita were reimbursements for plane tickets, hotel expenses, meals and other transport-related expenses.[2047] The payments at issue totaling $2,502 U.S. were made in June 2003 when Taylor was still President of Liberia.[2048] Keita was an insider in Liberia who was willing to meet with the Prosecution to discuss Taylor's relationship with the RUF, necessitating transport outside of Liberia so that his security would not be compromised and he could be interviewed at a safe location.[2049] Understood in this context, the payments were necessary, reasonable, and within the ambit of Rule 39(ii) which permits the OTP to take necessary measures to provide for the safety of potential witnesses. Moreover, during cross-examination, Defence counsel merely asked the witness to confirm that these payments had been made in respect of his expenses but, significantly, did not challenge the reasonableness of any of these payments.[2050] Further, Defence counsel objected to the use of an unredacted version of the witness disbursement form when it was offered by the Prosecution[2051] yet now puts those payments at issue. Taylor fails to establish any impropriety in relation to payments made by the Prosecution in respect of Keita and his argument should be dismissed.

immunity he had received from the Prosecution,[2053] previous inconsistent statements,[2054] his demeanour while testifying,[2055] and payments received from the Prosecution.[2056] The Trial Chamber give clear consideration to the points put in cross-examination of the witness in relation to payments he received. In particular, the Trial Chamber acknowledged that some headway was made in cross-examination, in as far as the witness was "unable to explain the exact amounts he was given for transportation, food and lost wages".[2057] The clear consideration of the points raised during cross-examination makes it plain that the Trial Chamber was alive to the issue of reasonableness of witness payments, and the risk that this could potentially have on Mongor's credibility.

711. Taylor's argument that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that the payments made to Mongor were permissible under Rule 39(ii) lacks merit. Paragraph 809 of Taylor's Appeal exclusively concerns payments made not by the WMU, but by WVS, payments which the Defence has previously stated it did not contest.[2058] Payments made by WVS are, of course, separate and distinct from payments made by the WMU pursuant to Rule 39(ii). Paragraph 808 addresses payments made by the WMU during a period of a year and a half, between mid-2006 and the end of 2007. During this time, as acknowledged by Taylor, the witness was interviewed on numerous occasions.[2059] The vast majority of those interviews were conducted prior to March 2007 when Mongor received no reimbursements from the WVS.[2060] After March 2007, WMU disbursements to Mongor mostly reimbursed him for pre-paid top up cards for the mobile telephone he used to keep in contact with court staff.[2061] These payments, ranging from 15,000 to 120,000 Leones, equating to approximately $5-$40 U.S., were neither extortionate nor unreasonable. As Mongor testified on cross-examination, the disbursements were for transportation, meals, lost wages, and top-up cards for his mobile telephone.[2062] Taylor has not shown that no reasonable fact finder could have concluded that the payments made were for necessary expenses and were permissible under Rule 39(ii). Taylor's argument should be dismissed.

(d) TF1-548, Suwandi Camara

712. In reaching its conclusion that Suwandi Camara was a generally credible witness,[2063] it is evident that the Trial Chamber applied the criteria set out in Judgement paragraph 195 and, contrary to Taylor's submissions, did not ignore the issue of payments.[2064]

713. Taylor's argument that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that the payments made to Camara were permissible under Rule 39(ii) is without merit. Between 7 October 2006 and 7 January 2008, payments were made to Camara on 26 occasions, totaling $1,984.79. The witness was cross-examined at length about these payments, and reference was made to Prosecution disbursement records.[2065] Taylor characterises payments of $100 USD made to the witness as "discrete and unexplained".[2066] This is untrue. The reasons for these payments were disclosed in the disbursements records, and the witness was cross-examined about the same. Payments were made for compensation for travel (the witness had to travel to a different town to meet with investigators),[2067] meals, for top-up cards (used by the witness to keep in contact with OTP investigators),[2068] for 'family assistance' (for the education of his children),[2069] and for security reasons.[2070] The payments were reimbursements in respect of: (i) those occasions when he was interviewed by investigators, as well as (ii) other occasions when he acted as a 'source' assisting investigators, for example, by locating persons and providing information.[2071] Such payments are consistent with the remit of Rule 39(ii), which permits the Prosecution to take all necessary measures for the assistance and support of potential witnesses and sources.

(e) TF1-274, Dauda Aruna Fornie

714. In its general credibility assessment of Dauda Aruna Fornie,[2072] the Trial Chamber expressly and carefully considered the payments received by the witness.[2073] Contrary to Taylor's allegation, the Trial Chamber made a specific finding on the reasonableness of payments made to the witness. The Trial Chamber noted that Fornie received in total 3.9 million Leones (approximately $1,300 U.S.) from the Prosecution, and that these payments included transportation, medical expenses, rent payments and witness attendance allowances. The Trial Chamber specifically concluded that "these payments do not appear to be unreasonable". The Trial Chamber further concluded that any payments received by the witness did not appear to have influenced his testimony.[2074] Having made this finding, for the reasons already outlined above, it was unnecessary for the Trial Chamber to make a specific reference to Rule 39(ii).

715. Taylor's assertion that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that payments made to Fornie were reasonable lacks merit. Rule 39(ii) permits payments to be made by the WMU to potential witnesses or sources for the purpose of investigations, including the taking of any special measures to provide for their safety, support and assistance. Fornie was a witness for the Prosecution who also acted as a "source" by assisting the Prosecution to obtain information, which assisted with the case's investigations.[2075] Payments to compensate for lost wages, food and transportation were permissible in order to support and assist Fornie in these circumstances,[2076] as were payments made to the witness for "communications", namely, top-up cards for his mobile phone, to ensure that the Prosecution could keep in contact with him. The payment of 480,000 Leones made in respect of rent, and the assistance given to the witness for medical expenses are likewise consistent with the terms of the Rule.

(iii) The Trial Chamber's factual findings should not be overturned

716. In paragraph 818 of his Appeal, Taylor seeks the same relief he requested under Ground 5 for Bobson Sesay, Mongor and Fornie. The Prosecution has responded to those arguments in Response Ground 5. In relation to Keita, those findings mentioned in footnote 1578 are corroborated by other evidence in the case.[2077] For Camara, Taylor does not cite any instances in which the Trial Chamber has relied upon the evidence of this witness without corroboration.[2078] As such, there is no basis for the Appeals Chamber to overturn any findings made in reliance upon any of the witnesses' evidence.

(iv) Conclusion

717. Taylor fails to show that the Trial Chamber committed any error of law or fact. This Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.

GROUND 41: The Trial Chamber properly entered cumulative convictions for rape and sexual slavery

(i) Overview

718. Taylor's arguments regarding impermissible cumulative convictions are without merit. The alleged error of law is unfounded. The Trial Chamber's convictions are in accord with settled Appeals Chamber jurisprudence. There is no bar to entering cumulative convictions for rape vis-à-vis sexual slavery, because each of the offences contains a materially distinct element not present in the other.

719. Taylor alleges error of fact which his submissions do not address.[2079] As the Appeals Chamber noted, "[a]n appellant is expected to identify the challenged factual finding and put forward its factual arguments with specificity", otherwise that alleged error of argument will be summarily dismissed.[2080] In any event, as the Appeals Chamber stated, issues of cumulative convictions are errors of law.[2081]

(ii) The Trial Chamber made no error of law

720. It is well established that multiple convictions under different statutory provisions for the same conduct are permissible if each statutory provision has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. This test was laid down by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Čelebići.[2082] Consistent with the provisions of Article 20(3) of the Statute of the SCSL, the Appeals Chamber of this court has endorsed the test as set forth in Čelebići.[2083]

[2081] RUF AJ, para. 1191.

[2082] Čelebići AJ, paras. 412-13. Multiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.

[2083] RUF AJ, para. 1190; CDF AJ, para. 220.

721. The determination of whether the same conduct can lead to a conviction under two distinct statutory provisions lies at the heart of the Čelebići test and is a question of law.[2084] In other words, the Čelebići test focuses on the legal elements of each crime that may be the subject of a cumulative conviction rather than on the underlying conduct of the accused. The fact that the same conduct supports a finding of two crimes does not make the legal elements identical as a matter of law.[2085] What matters for the purpose of cumulative convictions test are the legal elements of each crime that may be the subject of cumulative convictions, not the underlying conduct of the accused.[2086]

722. Furthermore, the Čelebići test serves twin aims: ensuring that the accused is convicted only for distinct offences, and at the same time, ensuring that the convictions entered fully reflect his criminality.[2087] Strict application of the test is necessary to maintain this balance.[2088]

723. Contrary to Taylor's argument,[2089] the offence of rape is "materially distinct" from the offence of sexual slavery as the Trial Chamber correctly stated – that is each offence has an element that requires proof of a fact not required by the other offence.[2090] The actus reus of rape is characterised by "the non-consensual sexual penetration".[2091] The actus reus of sexual slavery is characterised by "the exercise of any or all of the powers attaching to the right of ownership over a person, and involve sexual acts" (not limited to rape).[2092] The mens rea of rape is the intentional effect of non-consensual sexual penetration.[2093] The mens rea of sexual slavery is the intentional exercise of such powers of ownership over a person.[2094]

724. Thus, while sexual slavery contains an ongoing control or ownership requirement, rape does not. Instead rape requires sexual penetration, which sexual slavery does not. Therefore, each of the offences is materially distinct, and the offence of rape is not "entirely" subsumed by the offence of sexual slavery.[2095]

725. In Kunarac, women and girls had been held enslaved for extended periods in Foca in 1992. They were repeatedly raped during their captivity and forced to perform sexual and domestic services by Kunarac and Kovač.[2096] This essentially amounted to sexual slavery according to the Appeals Chamber, which concluded enslavement based on sexual exploitation is a distinct offence from that of rape. That forcing the women and girls to endure rape as an especially odious form of their domestic servitude did not merge the two convictions.[2097] In the case at hand, the women and girls enslaved by the RUF/AFRC suffered similar fate as those in Foca 1992. In keeping with appellate jurisprudence, the Trial Chamber correctly entered cumulative convictions for rape vis-à-vis sexual slavery.

(iii) The Trial Chamber committed no error in following settled appellate jurisprudence

726. Contrary to Taylor's claim that the precedent set by the RUF Trial Chamber was binding on the Taylor Chamber,[2098] the decision of one Trial Chamber is not "binding" on another.[2099] Rather, the Trial Chamber was bound by the ratio decidendi of decisions of the Appeals Chamber.[2100] Therefore the Taylor Chamber properly relied on appellate jurisprudence. The RUF Trial Judgement departs from settled appeals jurisprudence which this Appeals Chamber has endorsed,[2101] and does not directly refer to any authority.[2102] Taylor has not presented any cogent reasons warranting such a departure.[2103]

727. Taylor misreads paragraph 719 of the AFRC Trial Judgement.[2104] First, that Trial Chamber did not construe sexual slavery as rape. It only said that sexual slavery may include rape. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber was addressing the elements of sexual slavery as constituting "an outrage upon personal dignity". In any case, a trial chamber can depart from its own position and adopt the correct appeals chamber position.[2105]

[2099] The Appeals Chamber stated that while an SCSL Trial Chamber "does not commit an error of law when it opts to follow one line of persuasive line of jurisprudence rather than another or rather than breaking new ground", "it is nevertheless prudent for the Trial Chamber to carefully consider relevant comparative jurisprudence' since their decisions maybe reviewed by the SCSL Appeals Chamber 'which is required to consider ICTR and ICTY "guidance"', see Norman Subpoena Appeal Decision, paras. 12, 14. PART VII: ALLEGED SENTENCING ERRORS

729. A Trial Chamber has a wide discretion in sentencing matters, and the Appeals Chamber will not overturn its decisions unless it committed a discernible error in exercising its discretion or failed to follow the applicable law.[2106] Grounds 42 to 45 should be dismissed[2107] as Taylor fails to show that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion leading to the imposition of a manifestly unreasonable sentence. To the contrary, as argued in the Prosecution's Appeal Submissions, Taylor's sentence should be revised upwards to eighty (80) years in order to properly and accurately reflect the totality of his criminal conduct. Further, Taylor does not establish that the Trial Chamber failed to follow the applicable law.

GROUND 42: Taylor fails to establish that the 50-year sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber was manifestly unreasonable in all the circumstances

(i) Overview

730. None of the alleged errors relied on by Taylor under this Ground establish that the Trial Chamber committed any error warranting appellate review nor that it "transgressed the applicable principles of sentencing" resulting in "a manifestly excessive sentence".[2108] Further, Taylor's Notice of Appeal failed to set out the contents of this Ground,[2109] choosing only to elucidate his arguments in his Appeal Brief.[2110] For these reasons, this Ground of Appeal should be dismissed.[2111]

(a) The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion by finding that serving a sentence abroad is not a factor to be taken into account in determining a sentence of imprisonment

[2111] Taylor Appeal, para. 826. The arguments contained herein are without prejudice to the Prosecution's appeal that the Trial Chamber would have imposed a sentence higher than fifty (50) years had it properly assessed the gravity of Taylor's conduct. See Prosecution Appeal Brief, paras. 224-34.

731. The Trial Chamber properly found that serving a sentence abroad is not a factor to be taken into account in sentencing.[2112] There is no international authority which supports the contention that serving a sentence abroad is a mitigating factor or a factor which should be taken into account as part of sentencing.

732. Trial Chamber I's statement in RUF that "sentences served abroad [...] would normally amount to a factor in mitigation"[2113] which is relied upon by Taylor is obiter dictum since the Trial Chamber did not authoritatively rule on this issue.[2114] Further, the binding authority at this Court on this point is this Chamber's determination in RUF that there was "no error in the Trial Chamber's decision not to mitigate sentence" because it would be served abroad.[2115] This Chamber also noted that Sesay had not referred to any jurisprudence where serving a sentence abroad had been considered as mitigating.[2116]

733. The ICTY authority cited by Taylor is equally inapposite.[2117] The Trial Chamber in Mrđa expressly held that serving a sentence abroad is not a mitigating factor.[2118] Instead, it determined that it was simply a factor it would take "into account [...] in determining the length of imprisonment".[2119] While Taylor argues that this factor should be "taken into account" in mitigation[2120] apparently on a basis similar to Mrđa, he fails to identify the legal basis that would require the Trial Chamber to take it into account.[2121] Given that it was expressly found not to be a mitigating factor in Mrđa, it would appears that the ICTY Trial Chamber in that case was merely considering it as one of a number of factors relevant to sentencing.

734. The correctness of the Trial Chamber's decision in this case is further underlined by the ICTY Appeals Chamber's approach in Tadić. In Tadić, the Appeals Chamber found there to be no error in the Trial Chamber's dismissal of the personal circumstances raised by Tadić in mitigation, including the fact that he would serve his sentence in a foreign country.[2122]

[2113] RUF Sentencing Judgement (SJ), para. 206.
[2114] Ultimately, Trial Chamber I was not required to make any determination on this matter because there was no conclusive information before the Court as to where sentence was to be served. Trial Chamber I also noted it was a discretionary decision to be made by the President of the Court (see RUF SJ, paras. 205-06).

[2122] Tadić Sentencing AJ, paras. 18, 22.

Taylor, therefore, fails to cite a single decision which would amount to authority for his contention that serving a sentence abroad should have been considered in mitigation by the Trial Chamber or that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in the exercise of its sentencing discretion by failing to take account of this factor.

735. Equally, Taylor's assertion that the Trial Chamber "failed to consider the substantive factual submissions of the Defence on this issue"[2123] is baseless. The Sentencing Judgement effectively addresses and considers all of the substantive points raised by Taylor in relation to his concerns about potentially serving his sentence in the United Kingdom.[2124]

(b) The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion by taking into account the extraterritorial nature of Taylor's conduct as an aggravating factor

736. Taylor's references to the application of principles of customary international law and nullum crimen sine lege under this argument misconstrue the approach actually taken by the Trial Chamber.[2125] The Trial Chamber did not, nor did it purport to, apply any extraneous "principle" of law in sentencing Taylor. Rather, the Trial Chamber found the extraterritorial aspect of Taylor's conduct to be an aggravating factor. There is no comprehensive or exhaustive list of the aggravating factors of crimes in the Statute, the Rules or the jurisprudence.[2126] The relevant factors to be taken into consideration depend on the facts of the case. Ultimately, a Trial Chamber has considerable discretion in deciding these factors and the weight to attach to them.[2127] Aggravating factors are effectively those circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence,[2128] beyond the elements of the crime, which increase the culpability of the crime. The extraterritorial nature of Taylor's actions unquestionably heightened the responsibility which rests upon Taylor by virtue of his criminal conduct.

737. The principle of territorial integrity provides a wall of protection in international law for a state's boundaries and for the civilians who reside within those boundaries. The people of Sierra Leone were entitled to and expected to benefit from the protection which the national boundaries of Sierra Leone are intended to provide under international law. Taylor's actions shattered that protection. Further, the principle of non-intervention in the domestic affairs of a sovereign state is "of the greatest importance for the maintenance of international peace and security",[2129] and the prohibition on the use of force is both a treaty obligation[2130] and an obligation of customary international law[2131] which state officials must abide by in the conduct of their inter-state relations.[2132] Taylor, as an educated statesman, was unquestionably aware of these core tenets of international law by which he, as Head of State, was bound, yet his actions perpetuated a conflict in a country not his own and with which Liberia was not at war.

738. International law must prohibit and deter external intervention in sovereign states which brings exploitation and suffering to millions of people's lives by virtue of the actions of those at a safe distance profiting from cross-border conflict. As the Trial Chamber found, Taylor did not set foot in Sierra Leone,[2133] yet his conduct amounted to an outside intrusion into Sierra Leone of incomparable consequence, facilitating the temporary overthrow of a democratically elected government, the destabilising of a sovereign nation, and the wreaking of destruction on the very fabric of Sierra Leonean society, all with the motive of exploiting its natural resources. Consequently, the extraterritorial nature of Taylor's actions was properly and correctly considered by the Trial Chamber to aggravate his criminal conduct.[2134]

739. Given the discretionary nature of what constitutes an aggravating factor based on the facts of a particular case,[2135] the evocation of case law in which such a factor was not taken into account is irrelevant.[2136] Taylor, therefore, fails to establish any alleged error that would require the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.

(c) The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion by giving weight to Taylor's breach of trust as an aggravating factor

740. Taylor asserts that, despite his position as an international actor and Statesman, he did not owe a duty to the people of Sierra Leone.[2137] Contrary to his contention, Taylor was under a duty to the civilians of Sierra Leone not to fuel the conflict which was resulting in the commission of horrific crimes against them. Through seven months of testimony, Taylor stressed that he occupied a position of authority and trust at the international level as a result of the positions he held as a Head of State, and a member of the ECOMOG Committee of Five and the Committee of Six.[2138] Taylor himself claimed to be the one responsible for contacting and negotiating with rebel leaders to advance the peace process and that ECOMOG had made him the "point president" in the region's efforts to end the Sierra Leone conflict, meaning that he was "the lead person in the crisis".[2139] In these positions, Taylor was tasked with negotiating a peace for what was publicly known to be an abhorrent conflict in a neighbouring country. The facts show, however, that the leading part played by Taylor in the crisis was very different to that which Sierra Leone, regional powers and the international community had hoped and needed. As noted by the Trial Chamber, Taylor's ostensible role in facilitating peace was undermined by the reality that "the message from [Taylor] to the RUF was not in support of the peace process".[2140] By continuing to privately facilitate the commission of a raft of horrific crimes while publicly proclaiming a role in negotiating a peace, Taylor breached the trust that was placed in him to act on behalf of the ECOWAS and the international community to bring the violence to an end.[2141] Further, Taylor fundamentally abused his position as a Head of State to turn the resources of Liberia against the civilian population of Sierra Leone.[2142] The possibility to do so arose as a result of the authority inherent in Taylor's position as Head of State of Liberia. His decision to act to the detriment of the civilian population of Sierra Leone was correctly held by the Trial Chamber to amount to an aggravating factor.[2143]

(d) The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion in the assessment and applicability of the sentencing practice of the ad hoc tribunals for aiding and abetting

741. As Taylor rightly points out, the Trial Chamber noted the sentencing practice of this Court, as well as that of the ICTY and ICTR in determining his sentence.[2144] The Trial Chamber correctly noted that the ad hoc tribunals generally impose a lower sentence for those convicted of aiding and abetting crimes.[2145] This practice does not, however, amount to a "principle" that all those convicted of aiding and abetting deserve a lesser sentence in all cases.[2146] Rather, it is based on the fact that those convicted of aiding and abetting before the ad hoc tribunals have been found guilty of relatively less serious and less far-reaching conduct in the context of the conflicts in which they occurred.[2147] Each case should be considered on its own facts and other aiding and abetting cases should not be considered as providing "a legally binding tariff of sentences".[2148] Moreover, "different mitigating and aggravating circumstances might dictate different results".[2149] The law is clear, therefore, that factors such as having reference to the sentencing practices of other courts "do not constitute binding limitations on a Trial Chamber's discretion to impose a sentence", and such discretion is ultimately guided by "the facts of each particular case".[2150]

[2143] Contra Taylor Appeal, para. 838. The ICTR has also found the abuse of the authority and duty to protect civilian populations entrusted in a position of high office to be aggravating. See Kambanda TJ, para. 61. At the appellate phase, Kambanda did not appeal the Trial Chamber's taking into consideration his abuse of authority. The Appeals Chamber noted the aggravating and mitigating factors assessed by the Trial Chamber and found that the sentence fell within the discretionary framework allowed to the Trial Chamber. See Kambanda AJ, paras. 114-126. The ICTY has also stated that "the consequences are necessarily more serious if individuals who occupy top [...] political positions use those positions to commit crimes." See Plavšić SJ, para. 54. See also Krstić TJ, paras. 708-709.

742. In this case, the Trial Chamber correctly held Taylor to be "in a class of his own"[2151] in terms of those bearing criminal responsibility for events in Sierra Leone.[2152] Taylor's conviction for aiding and abetting spans five years, from the start of the Special Court's jurisdiction to the end of the conflict, and encompasses "some of the most heinous and brutal crimes recorded in human history".[2153] The Trial Chamber was correct to find that Taylor's conviction for aiding and abetting was outside the realm of any situation previously adjudicated upon by the ad hoc tribunals that might have served as a comparator for sentence.[2154] The findings throw into stark relief Taylor's "critical"[2155] and "indispensable"[2156] role in a conflict, the duration of which was prolonged by his very actions.[2157] Taylor fails to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed any error in law or discernible error in the exercise of its discretion that would invalidate the decision.

(e) The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion in its assessment of the sentencing practice of the Special Court for aiding and abetting

743. The Sentencing Judgement clearly shows that the Trial Chamber took into consideration the sentences imposed on those previously convicted by the Court but found, based on its assessment of the evidence, that the nature of Taylor's actions set him apart for the purposes of sentencing "compared to the principal perpetrators who have been convicted by this Court".[2158] Any attempt at comparing the roles of principal perpetrators whose conduct was either temporally, criminally or geographically limited by comparison to Taylor, who was convicted of crimes committed throughout Sierra Leone throughout the Indictment period, is an exercise in futility. If anything, such a comparison in this case would have substantiated a term of imprisonment significantly higher than 50 years, as Taylor's role was more pervasive and central to the commission of the crimes across time and territory than that of any other accused convicted in this Court. Moreover, as correctly noted by the Trial Chamber, a sentence should always be "individualised" to reflect the inherent gravity of the totality of a convicted person's criminal conduct.[2159]

744. The Trial Chamber was bound by Article 19 of the Statute and SCSL Rule 101 only to take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the accused. Other factors such as the general sentencing practice of the ICTR and the national courts of Sierra Leone are to be taken into account where appropriate.[2160] While neither the Statute nor the Rules specifically mention the sentencing practice of this Court, the jurisprudence acknowledges that this can be taken into account.[2161]

745. Taylor's extensive comparison between the sentences previously imposed at the Special Court on those convicted of aiding and abetting is an elaborate exercise which entirely fails to establish any error in the discretion exercised by the Trial Chamber.[2162] The single instance that can be isolated for the purposes of comparison is the aiding and abetting conviction of Gbao for attacks on peacekeepers.[2163] The attacks in question occurred over a period of nine days and amounted to the abduction of a number of peacekeepers, the killing of four, and the assault of another.[2164] Gbao was sentenced to 25 years for his aiding and abetting of these attacks.[2165] By comparison, Taylor was found to have aided and abetted the commission of all the Indictment crimes throughout the entire Indictment period.[2166] Given this comparison, the gravity of Taylor's crimes is much more than double that of Gbao's and the sentence should reflect that difference.

746. As is the case at the ad hoc tribunals, aiding and abetting should not be automatically considered a lesser mode of liability for the purposes of sentencing at this Court.[2167] The most important factor is the gravity of the crimes, including the accused's conduct. Further, the comparison of Taylor and Gbao supports rather than undermines the Trial Chamber's reasoning and shows that the sentence imposed on Taylor for aiding and abetting cannot be considered excessive.[2168] Instead, the Prosecution argues that, in fact, the gravity of Taylor's actions required the imposition of a higher sentence.

747. Taylor's reference to modes of liability for which he was not convicted is misplaced.[2169] The Trial Chamber correctly stated that a sentence must reflect the totality of the accused's criminal conduct,[2170] and, therefore, ulterior considerations such as convictions that were not entered should not be borne in mind for the purposes of sentencing.[2171] Taylor's assertion that the sentence imposed amounts to a life sentence was an issue the Defence brought before the Trial Chamber in determining his sentence and, therefore, amounts to rehashing a previously decided issue without any attempt to demonstrate an error warranting appellate review.[2172]

(f) The Trial Chamber correctly exercised its discretion and made no error of law when considering and assessing Taylor's position as Head of State

748. Taylor's assertion that his position as Head of State of Liberia was 'double-counted', or in fact, counted five times, misreads the Sentencing Judgement.[2173] First, it is patently clear certain crimes, they were also convicted under superior responsibility for the same crimes. Therefore, again, it is unclear what sentence was imposed for their aiding and abetting convictions alone.

from the findings that Taylor's position as President of Liberia, and member of the ECOWAS Committee of Five (later the Committee of Six) was considered by the Trial Chamber once as regards the position of leadership itself.[2174] Second, the Trial Chamber then properly considered Taylor's position separately in relation to his breach of trust.[2175] This approach reflects the jurisprudence of this Court where these factors have been considered separately for the purposes of sentencing.[2176] Third, the extraterritorial nature of Taylor's actions and the effects that were felt across an international boundary was properly considered by the Trial Chamber as a separate and distinct aggravating factor from his position as Head of State.[2177] Fourth, contrary to Taylor's contention, the Trial Chamber merely noted that the context of the aiding and abetting convictions of the principal perpetrators convicted before the Special Court and Taylor's could not rightly be compared.[2178] Fifth, the final example referred to by Taylor is taken from the Trial Chamber's conclusion that all of the factors which had been noted should be reflected in the sentence imposed, and does not represent a separate reference to Taylor's position as Head of State in aggravation. It is clear, therefore, that the Trial Chamber properly considered the factors which were to be considered as aggravating in the imposition of Taylor's sentence, and that no double-counting occurred.

(ii) Conclusion

749. All of the situations highlighted by Taylor under this Ground fail to demonstrate any "discernible error" in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion or that the Chamber failed to follow the applicable law. The sentence was not manifestly unreasonable in the circumstances of the case, and the aggravating factors considered by the Trial Chamber fell within the discretion provided to it by the Statute, the Rules and jurisprudence.[2179] Consequently, Taylor's submissions should be dismissed.

GROUND 43: The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error by noting Sierra Leonean law on sentencing practice

(i) Overview

750. Contrary to Taylor's contention,[2180] the Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error by noting Sierra Leonean law in relation to its consideration of the appropriate relative penalties for accessory modes of liability.[2181] Although the Chamber noted in its "Applicable Law" section that Sierra Leonean law allows an accessory to be sentenced as a principal,[2182] it also noted that at the ICTY and ICTR, aiding and abetting generally attracts a lower sentence.[2183] The Chamber did not apply the Sierra Leone approach, but did factor in Taylor's special status.[2184] The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this ground because Taylor fails to establish that the Trial Chamber's mere noting of this factor, which differs from the application thereof, caused him any prejudice which would invalidate the decision, or that the Chamber either committed an error of law or misdirected itself.[2185]

(ii) It was within the Trial Chamber's discretion to "note" Sierra Leonean law

751. This Appeals Chamber has held that the phrase "as appropriate" in Article 19(1) of the Statute shows that the Trial Chamber has discretion in determining when to have recourse to sentencing practices of the national courts in Sierra Leone.[2186] Taylor overstates the Appeals Chamber's guidance on this issue.[2187]

752. In CDF, this Chamber held that "the best interpretation of the word 'appropriate' is that a Trial Chamber ... is to have recourse to the national courts in Sierra Leone for convictions under Sierra Leonean law contained in Article 5 of the Statute".[2188] The fact the Chamber considered this the "best" interpretation implies there may be others which would not constitute an error. This Chamber did not state that it would be inappropriate for a Trial Chamber to take account of such practices in any other circumstances. In addition, the approach of Trial Chambers to date has been to decide, in the exercise of their discretion, that it is unnecessary to consider the practice of the Sierra Leonean domestic courts where the accused were neither indicted for nor convicted of offences under Article 5 of the Statute.[2189] However, this approach has only been adopted in relation to domestic sentencing practices concerning offences[2190] and not in relation to modes of liability. The Chamber here noted Sierra Leonean law on a mode of liability which is a separate and distinct issue to offences.

753. Taylor contends that the law and practice of Sierra Leone cannot be considered because he was neither indicted for nor convicted of crimes under Article 5 of the Statute.[2191] However, this overly strict interpretation counters the established practice at the ICTY[2192] and ICTR,[2193] where the sentencing law and practices in the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda are respectively taken into account despite the fact that neither tribunal has any jurisdiction over any violations of domestic law. The Tribunals' respective Statutes would similarly also be in error.[2194] The correct approach, as established in this jurisprudence, is that the sentencing practice in the relative jurisdictions can be considered regardless of whether an Accused is charged with offences under domestic law. However, the Judges are not bound to apply that sentencing practice.

(iii) The Trial Chamber correctly exercised its discretion to note Sierra Leonean sentencing law

754. Given that, as argued above, it was within the Trial Chamber's discretion to "note" Sierra Leonean sentencing practice but that it did not proceed to apply it, Taylor's appeal under this Ground should be dismissed as crucially, for the purposes of appeal, Taylor does not establish any prejudice. A brief analysis of two paragraphs of the Sentencing Judgement confirms that the Chamber did not apply Sierra Leonean sentencing practice in this case.

755. First, the express wording of paragraph 37 in the "Applicable Law" section of the Sentencing Judgement makes it amply clear that the Trial Chamber was aware that it should have recourse to the sentencing practices of the Sierra Leonean national courts "when appropriate". It is also clear from this paragraph that the Trial Chamber was fully aware that Taylor was neither indicted for nor convicted of Article 5 offences. However, the Chamber "[n]evertheless" felt that, in this case, it was appropriate to "note" the manner in which an [2190] Indeed, in the CDF case, the issue was that "Sierra Leone has not criminalized war crimes and crimes against humanity as such, and consequently there is no specifically relevant sentencing practice for a Trial Chamber to refer to", see CDF AJ, para. 475. accessory may be punished in Sierra Leone. This consideration rested entirely within the Trial Chamber's discretion.

756. Secondly, the Chamber's statement that "although the law of Sierra Leone provides for the sentencing of an accessory to a crime on the same basis as a principal" [2195] clearly shows that the Trial Chamber ultimately decided not to follow Sierra Leonean law. Therefore, even if, arguendo, the Trial Chamber had committed a discernible error in noting Sierra Leonean law, that noting clearly had no effect on the sentence which ultimately was imposed.[2196]

757. The Prosecution reiterates its position that the Chamber should not only have noted Sierra Leonean practice on the issue, but applied it, as it is the most reasonable approach to sentencing.[2197] This would also have been within the Chamber's discretion.

(iv) Conclusion

758. Nothing in the Statute, Rules or jurisprudence of this Court precludes a Trial Chamber from taking note of the sentencing practice in Sierra Leone, especially in relation to modes of liability. Indeed, the Statute explicitly states that in determining the term of imprisonment, "the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the ... national courts of Sierra Leone". This consideration, therefore, fell squarely within the Chamber's discretion and does not constitute a discernible error warranting appellate intervention.

759. The Trial Chamber merely noted this factor and, ultimately, decided not to adopt the approach of the Sierra Leonean courts when imposing sentence. The Appeals Chamber should dismiss this Ground because Taylor fails to establish any error or identify any prejudice.

GROUND 44: The Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion in deciding the factors to be taken into account in aggravation

(i) Overview

760. Taylor suggests in this Ground that the Trial Chamber erred in law and fact by considering three factors, namely, extraterritoriality, his special status, and exploitation of the conflict for financial gain, as aggravating factors and without according the Defence the right to make submissions on each of them.[2198] However, this argument should be rejected since it is built on a combination of two errors. First, Taylor was provided with broad notice of all of the issues which the Chamber treated as aggravating factors and, thus, he had the opportunity to address them. Second, a Trial Chamber has broad discretionary powers to identify aggravating factors based on the totality of the evidentiary record, the only limit on this discretion being that such factors must not be counted twice and must be proven beyond reasonable doubt.

(ii) The Trial Chamber properly exercised its discretion in deciding on the factors to be taken into account in aggravation

761. Taylor's submissions under this Ground[2199] fail to acknowledge that the Prosecution did advance arguments in the Prosecution Sentencing Brief, albeit not as separate aggravating factors, regarding: (i) extraterritoriality;[2200] (ii) Taylor's special status, and his responsibility at the highest level;[2201] and (iii) his exploitation of the conflict for financial gain.[2202] Taylor, therefore, did have an opportunity to address these issues and, thus, suffered no prejudice warranting appellate intervention.

762. Taylor's argument under this Ground of Appeal is also fatally flawed because it is based on an overly narrow interpretation of the Trial Chamber's powers.[2203] As discussed in the response to Ground 42 above, the breadth of a Trial Chamber's discretion in determining the individual circumstances it will consider in aggravation is "considerable".[2204] This is not to say that the Trial Chamber's discretionary power "to identify the relevant factors"[2205] is unchecked. For example, aggravating factors must be proven beyond reasonable doubt[2206] and must not overlap with those used to assess gravity.[2207] However, contrary to Taylor's submissions, a Trial Chamber may itself identify aggravating factors as a legitimate exercise of a Chamber's discretion.[2208]

(iii) Taylor was afforded sufficient opportunity to be heard on sentencing

763. In making the erroneous argument that a Trial Chamber does not have a broad discretion to identify aggravating factors, Taylor wrongly conflates his argument with the right to be heard.[2209] As outlined below, Taylor was afforded and exercised the considerable opportunities extended to him to be heard on the matter of sentencing. Further, for sound pragmatic reasons, the right to be heard is not as extensive as Taylor argues.

764. Taylor's erroneous conflation is apparent from his reliance on the ICTY case of Jelisić.[2210] In that case, the ICTY Appeals Chamber was faced with a situation where the Trial Chamber had "decided against the right of the prosecution to be heard on the substantive question of whether its evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction".[2211] In contrast to Taylor's situation during the sentencing phase of proceedings when he submitted written and oral arguments, it is clear that the Prosecution in Jelisić was not given any opportunity "at all" to address the Court on whether its evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction.[2212] The Jelisić situation is, therefore, not comparable.

765. Taylor's reliance on Lubanga is equally misplaced.[2213] Much of the procedure followed in Lubanga was necessitated because Mr. Lubanga was the first convicted person to be sentenced by the ICC. There were no binding precedents[2214] and the procedure was untested. Even the standard of proof for aggravating factors at the ICC was considered an issue to be determined for the first time.[2215] Therefore, the process in Lubanga can be distinguished as it must be viewed as a case which was setting the basic foundations for future ICC sentencing cases. This is to be contrasted with the present case which is the last to be tried by this Court and benefits from being able to draw upon an established body of sentencing jurisprudence. In addition and as Taylor correctly points out, ICC Trial Chambers can take into account for the purposes of sentencing any evidence admitted during the special sentencing hearing and, thus subsequent to conviction.[2216] Obviously, the Defence will require notice of such additional evidence in such instances and must be given the opportunity to address it.

766. Finally, the case of Kvočka, referred to in paragraph 868 of Taylor's brief, does not support his argument. In that case, the Trial Chamber did not find it was precluded from considering an aggravating factor not raised by the Prosecution, it simply declined to do so.[2217] Further, any doubt about the competency of a Trial Chamber relying on an aggravating factor not raised by a party has been removed by the recent ICTY Appeals Chamber decision in Rašić.[2218] In any event, and as argued above, the Prosecution did make submissions on the three factors contested by Taylor. Trial Chamber II, therefore, committed no discernible error nor failed to apply the applicable law.

767. In sum, the Trial Chamber was entitled to identify which factors it would consider in aggravation, subject to the normal restrictions provided in the jurisprudence. Thus, this action did not breach Taylor's right to be heard.

768. In addition to the foregoing, Taylor's approach to the extent of the right to be heard can be criticised for sound pragmatic reasons. Taylor's overly broad approach would imbue the parties with the right to be heard on each and every point considered by a Trial Chamber in reaching a determination. This is obviously incorrect and should be rejected for reasons of judicial economy and efficiency.

769. In any event, the bare fact is that Taylor exercised the considerable opportunities extended to him to address the Court on the issue of sentencing. Taylor submitted an 85-page sentencing brief with 35 annexes attached.[2219] In addition, at the 16 May 2012 sentencing hearing, he made oral submissions via his Defence counsel[2220] before addressing the Court himself for 30 minutes.[2221] Taylor's right to be heard was, therefore, clearly not breached.

(iv) Conclusion

770. Taylor's appeal under this Ground should be dismissed. Contrary to his arguments, the Trial Chamber did not commit a discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion when it identified the factors to be taken into account in aggravation and Taylor was afforded ample opportunity to be heard on sentencing.

GROUND 45: The Trial Chamber properly weighed and rejected the evidence regarding sympathy and compassion as a mitigating factor

(i) Overview

771. As a necessary preliminary, the Prosecution observes the obvious disconnect between the title of this Ground of Appeal and the underlying submissions. The title alleges an error based on the Chamber's failure to consider expressions of sympathy in mitigation,[2222] whereas the underlying substantive submissions focus on the weight allegedly given by the Trial Chamber to the pain and suffering caused to witnesses by having to testify.[2223] The Prosecution will respond only to the brief substantive argument actually made.

772. Contrary to Taylor's contention,[2224] in rejecting remorse as a mitigating factor, the Trial Chamber gave no weight to the fact the Defence required the Prosecution to prove the crime-base. The Chamber made this statement in direct response to false assertions made by the Defence in its sentencing submissions,[2225] and separately considered and rejected Taylor's statement and comments of remorse because they did not constitute "remorse that would merit recognition for sentencing purposes".[2226] This Ground of Appeal should be dismissed since it fails to establish that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error.

(ii) The Trial Chamber commited no discernible error in the exercise of its wide discretion in addressing the Defence's representation of facts

773. Taylor argues that the Trial Chamber gave weight to an impermissible consideration when deliberating the mitigating factors submitted by the Defence.[2227] However, a plain reading of the Sentencing Judgement and the Defence's underlying submissions establish that the impugned statement at paragraph 91 of the Sentencing Judgement simply sought to clarify the record and did not play a role in the Trial Chamber's disposition.[2228] This is evident from the following brief analysis.

774. In the Sentencing Judgement, the Trial Chamber noted[2229] Defence submissions which asserted that the Defence had agreed to the crime-base evidence in this case and that the Prosecution had unnecessarily taken it upon itself to call crime-base witnesses.[2230] The Trial Chamber's statement was clearly meant to counter these assertions. Taylor's rights were in no way infringed.

775. The Prosecution does not contest the fact that the right to cross-examine witnesses is a fundamental one.[2231] The Trial Chamber also respected this right and did not punish Taylor for exercising it. The Chamber's response to the Defence's assertions was separate from its subsequent examination of Taylor's statement and comments which it found did not constitute "remorse that would merit recognition for sentencing purposes".[2232] It was clearly within the Trial Chamber's discretion to reject this Defence argument for mitigation. Taylor's fundamental rights were in no way violated and the Chamber committed no error.

(iii) Conclusion

776. Taylor's submissions under this Ground of Appeal are clearly without merit. The Appeals Chamber should, therefore, dimiss this Ground of Appeal.

[2230] See, e.g., Defence Sentencing Brief, para. 179, where the Defence recalled its opening statement that "...We still cannot therefore understand why more than half of the witnesses called were so-called crime base witnesses to prove a fact not in dispute." The Defence then recalled Defence Counsel's statement to a crime-base witness that "...we can certainly inform you now that it's not because of us that you have been brought here" (see Defence Sentencing Brief, para. 180, fn. 266 citing T. 8 January 2008 p. 742).

[2232] "In his statement to this Court, Mr. Taylor stated that 'Terrible things happened in Sierra Leone and there can be no justification for the terrible crimes.' Mr. Taylor has not accepted responsibility for the crimes of which he stands convicted, and the Trial Chamber does not consider this statement, and the other comments made by Mr. Taylor, to constitute remorse that would merit recognition for sentencing purposes." Sentencing Judgement, para. 91.

III. RELIEF SOUGHT

777. On the basis of the foregoing, Taylor's Grounds of Appeal should be dismissed in heir entirety.

A. Statutory and Regulatory Provisions

AGREEMENT BETWEEN THE UNITED NATIONS AND THE GOVERNMENT OF SIERRA LEONE ON THE ESTABLISHMENT OF A SPECIAL COURT FOR SIERRA LEONE

WHEREAS the Security Council, in its resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, expressed deep concern at the very serious crimes committed within the territory of Sierra Leone against the people of Sierra Leone and United Nations and associated personnel and at the prevailing situation of impunity;

WHEREAS by the said resolution, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes committed under Sierra Leonean law;

WHEREAS the Secretary-General of the United Nations (hereinafter "the Secretary-General") and the Government of Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Government") have held such negotiations for the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Special Court");

NOW THEREFORE the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone have agreed as follows:

Article 1
Establishment of the Special Court

1. There is hereby established a Special Court for Sierra Leone to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996.

2. The Special Court shall function in accordance with the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone. The Statute is annexed to this Agreement and forms an integral part thereof.

Article 2
Composition of the Special Court and appointment of judges

1. The Special Court shall be composed of a Trial Chamber and an Appeals Chamber with a second Trial Chamber to be created if, after the passage of at least six months from the commencement of the functioning of the Special Court, the Secretary-General, or the President of the Special Court so request. Up to two alternate judges shall similarly be appointed after six months if the President of the Special Court so determines.

2. The Chambers shall be composed of no fewer than eight independent judges and no more than eleven such judges who shall serve as follows:

(a) Three judges shall serve in the Trial Chamber where one shall be appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone and two judges appointed by the Secretary-General, upon nominations forwarded by States, and in particular the member States of the Economic Community of West African States and the Commonwealth, at the invitation of the Secretary-General;

(b) In the event of the creation of a second Trial Chamber, that Chamber shall be likewise composed in the manner contained in subparagraph (a) above;

(c) Five judges shall serve in the Appeals Chamber, of whom two shall be appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone and three judges shall be appointed by the Secretary-General upon nominations forwarded by States, and in particular the member States of the Economic Community of West African States and the Commonwealth, at the invitation of the Secretary-General.

3. The Government of Sierra Leone and the Secretary-General shall consult on the appointment of judges.

4. Judges shall be appointed for a three-year term and shall be eligible for re-appointment.

5. If, at the request of the President of the Special Court, an alternate judge or judges have been appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone or the Secretary-General, the presiding judge of a Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber shall designate such an alternate judge to be present at each stage of the trial and to replace a judge if that judge is unable to continue sitting.

Article 3
Appointment of a Prosecutor and a Deputy Prosecutor

1. The Secretary-General, after consultation with the Government of Sierra Leone, shall appoint a Prosecutor for a three-year term. The Prosecutor shall be eligible for reappointment.

2. The Government of Sierra Leone, in consultation with the Secretary-General and the Prosecutor, shall appoint a Sierra Leonean Deputy Prosecutor to assist the Prosecutor in the conduct of the investigations and prosecutions.

3. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutor shall be of high moral character and possess the highest level of professional competence and extensive experience in the conduct of investigations and prosecutions of criminal cases. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutor shall be independent in the performance of their functions and shall not accept or seek instructions from any Government or any other source.

4. The Prosecutor shall be assisted by such Sierra Leonean and international staff as may be required to perform the functions assigned to him or her effectively and efficiently.

Article 4
Appointment of a Registrar

1. The Secretary-General, in consultation with the President of the Special Court, shall appoint a Registrar who shall be responsible for the servicing of the Chambers and the Office of the belonging to or used by it, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall be inviolable.

Article 9
Funds, assets and other property

1. The Special Court, its funds, assets and other property, wherever located and by whomsoever held, shall enjoy immunity from every form of legal process, except insofar as in any particular case the Court has expressly waived its immunity. It is understood, however, that no waiver of immunity shall extend to any measure of execution.

2. Without being restricted by financial controls, regulations or moratoriums of any kind, the Special Court:

(a) May hold and use funds, gold or negotiable instruments of any kind and maintain and operate accounts in any currency and convert any currency held by it into any other currency;

(b) Shall be free to transfer its funds, gold or currency from one country to another, or within Sierra Leone, to the United Nations or any other agency.

Article 10
Seat of the Special Court

The Special Court shall have its seat in Sierra Leone. The Court may meet away from its seat if it considers it necessary for the efficient exercise of its functions, and may be relocated outside Sierra Leone, if circumstances so require, and subject to the conclusion of a Headquarters Agreement between the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone, on the one hand, and the Government of the alternative seat, on the other.

Article 11
Juridical capacity

The Special Court shall possess the juridical capacity necessary to:

(a) Contract;

(b) Acquire and dispose of movable and immovable property;

(c) Institute legal proceedings;

(d) Enter into agreements with States as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and for the operation of the Court.

Article 12
Privileges and immunities of the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar

1. The judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar, together with their families forming part of their household, shall enjoy the privileges and immunities, exemptions and facilities accorded to diplomatic agents in accordance with the 1961 Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations. They shall, in particular, enjoy:

(a) Personal inviolability, including immunity from arrest or detention;

(b) Immunity from criminal, civil and administrative jurisdiction in conformity with the Vienna Convention;

(c) Inviolability for all papers and documents;

(d) Exemption, as appropriate, from immigration restrictions and other alien registrations;

(e) The same immunities and facilities in respect of their personal baggage as are accorded to diplomatic agents by the Vienna Convention;

(f) Exemption from taxation in Sierra Leone on their salaries, emoluments and allowances.

2. Privileges and immunities are accorded to the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar in the interest of the Special Court and not for the personal benefit of the individuals themselves. The right and the duty to waive the immunity, in any case where it can be waived without prejudice to the purpose for which it is accorded, shall lie with the Secretary-General, in consultation with the President.

Article 13
Privileges and immunities of international and Sierra Leonean personnel

1. Sierra Leonean and international personnel of the Special Court shall be accorded:

(a) Immunity from legal process in respect of words spoken or written and all acts performed by them in their official capacity. Such immunity shall continue to be accorded after termination of employment with the Special Court;

(b) Immunity from taxation on salaries, allowances and emoluments paid to them.

2. International personnel shall, in addition thereto, be accorded:

(a) Immunity from immigration restriction;

(b) The right to import free of duties and taxes, except for payment for services, their furniture and effects at the time of first taking up their official duties in Sierra Leone.

3. The privileges and immunities are granted to the officials of the Special Court in the interest of the Court and not for their personal benefit. The right and the duty to waive the immunity in any particular case where it can be waived without prejudice to the purpose for which it is accorded proceedings. It shall, in particular, facilitate access to the Prosecutor to sites, persons and relevant documents required for the investigation.

2. The Government shall comply without undue delay with any request for assistance by the Special Court or an order issued by the Chambers, including, but not limited to:

(a) Identification and location of persons;

(b) Service of documents;

(c) Arrest or detention of persons;

(d) Transfer of an indictee to the Court.

Article 18
Working language

The official working language of the Special Court shall be English.

Article 19
Practical arrangements

1. With a view to achieving efficiency and cost-effectiveness in the operation of the Special Court, a phased-in approach shall be adopted for its establishment in accordance with the chronological order of the legal process.

2. In the first phase of the operation of the Special Court, judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar will be appointed along with investigative and prosecutorial staff. The process of investigations and prosecutions of those already in custody shall be initiated.

3. In the initial phase, judges of the Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber shall be convened on an ad hoc basis for dealing with organizational matters, and serving when required to perform their duties.

4. Judges of the Trial Chamber shall take permanent office shortly before the investigation process has been completed. Judges of the Appeals Chamber shall take permanent office when the first trial process has been completed.

Article 20
Settlement of Disputes

Any dispute between the Parties concerning the interpretation or application of this Agreement shall be settled by negotiation, or by any other mutually agreed-upon mode of settlement.

Article 21
Entry into force

STATUTE OF THE SPECIAL COURT FOR SIERRA LEONE

Having been established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone pursuant to Security Council resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, the Special Court for Sierra Leone (hereinafter "the Special Court") shall function in accordance with the provisions of the present Statute.

Competence of the Special Court

1. The Special Court shall, except as provided in subparagraph (2), have the power to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996, including those leaders who, in committing such crimes, have threatened the establishment of and implementation of the peace process in Sierra Leone.

2. Any transgressions by peacekeepers and related personnel present in Sierra Leone pursuant to the Status of Mission Agreement in force between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone or agreements between Sierra Leone and other Governments or regional organizations, or, in the absence of such agreement, provided that the peacekeeping operations were undertaken with the consent of the Government of Sierra Leone, shall be within the primary jurisdiction of the sending State.

3. In the event the sending State is unwilling or unable genuinely to carry out an investigation or prosecution, the Court may, if authorized by the Security Council on the proposal of any State, exercise jurisdiction over such persons.

Article 2
Crimes against humanity

The Special Court shall have the power to prosecute persons who committed the following crimes as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population:

a. Murder;
b. Extermination;
c. Enslavement;
d. Deportation;
e. Imprisonment;
f. Torture;
g. Rape, sexual slavery, enforced prostitution, forced pregnancy and any other form of sexual violence;
h. Persecution on political, racial, ethnic or religious grounds;
i. Other inhumane acts.

Article 3
Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II

i. Setting fire to dwelling - houses, any person being therein, contrary to section 2;

ii. Setting fire to public buildings, contrary to sections 5 and 6;

iii. Setting fire to other buildings, contrary to section 6.

Article 6
Individual criminal responsibility

1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime.

2. The official position of any accused persons, whether as Head of State or Government or as a responsible government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.

3. The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior had failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

4. The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the Special Court determines that justice so requires.

5. Individual criminal responsibility for the crimes referred to in article 5 shall be determined in accordance with the respective laws of Sierra Leone.

Article 7
Jurisdiction over persons of 15 years of age

1. The Special Court shall have no jurisdiction over any person who was under the age of 15 at the time of the alleged commission of the crime. Should any person who was at the time of the alleged commission of the crime between 15 and 18 years of age come before the Court, he or she shall be treated with dignity and a sense of worth, taking into account his or her young age and the desirability of promoting his or her rehabilitation, reintegration into and assumption of a constructive role in society, and in accordance with international human rights standards, in particular the rights of the child.

2. In the disposition of a case against a juvenile offender, the Special Court shall order any of the following: care guidance and supervision orders, community service orders, counselling, foster care, correctional, educational and vocational training programmes, approved schools and, as appropriate, any programmes of disarmament, demobilization and reintegration or programmes of child protection agencies.

Article 8
Concurrent jurisdiction

Government of Sierra Leone, and three judges appointed by the Secretary-General.

2. Each judge shall serve only in the Chamber to which he or she has been appointed.

3. The judges of the Appeals Chamber and the judges of the Trial Chamber, respectively, shall elect a presiding judge who shall conduct the proceedings in the Chamber to which he or she was elected. The presiding judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be the President of the Special Court.

4. If, at the request of the President of the Special Court, an alternate judge or judges have been appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone or the Secretary-General, the presiding judge of a Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber shall designate such an alternate judge to be present at each stage of the trial and to replace a judge if that judge is unable to continue sitting.

Qualification and appointment of judges

1. The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. They shall be independent in the performance of their functions, and shall not accept or seek instructions from any Government or any other source.

2. In the overall composition of the Chambers, due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law, criminal law and juvenile justice.

3. The judges shall be appointed for a three-year period and shall be eligible for reappointment.

Article 14
Rules of Procedure and Evidence

1. The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda obtaining at the time of the establishment of the Special Court shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to the conduct of the legal proceedings before the Special Court.

2. The judges of the Special Court as a whole may amend the Rules of Procedure and Evidence or adopt additional rules where the applicable Rules do not, or do not adequately, provide for a specific situation. In so doing, they may be guided, as appropriate, by the Criminal Procedure Act, 1965, of Sierra Leone.

The Prosecutor

1. The Prosecutor shall be responsible for the investigation and prosecution of persons who bear the greatest responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes under Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996. The Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Special Court. He or she shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other source.

2. The Office of the Prosecutor shall have the power to question suspects, victims and witnesses, to collect evidence and to conduct on-site investigations. In carrying out these tasks, the Prosecutor shall, as appropriate, be assisted by the Sierra Leonean authorities concerned.

3. The Prosecutor shall be appointed by the Secretary-General for a three-year term and shall be eligible for re-appointment. He or she shall be of high moral character and possess the highest level of professional competence, and have extensive experience in the conduct of investigations and prosecutions of criminal cases.

4. The Prosecutor shall be assisted by a Sierra Leonean Deputy Prosecutor, and by such other Sierra Leonean and international staff as may be required to perform the functions assigned to him or her effectively and efficiently. Given the nature of the crimes committed and the particular sensitivities of girls, young women and children victims of rape, sexual assault, abduction and slavery of all kinds, due consideration should be given in the appointment of staff to the employment of prosecutors and investigators experienced in gender-related crimes and juvenile justice.

5. In the prosecution of juvenile offenders, the Prosecutor shall ensure that the child-rehabilitation programme is not placed at risk and that, where appropriate, resort should be had to alternative truth and reconciliation mechanisms, to the extent of their availability.

Article 16
The Registry

1. The Registry shall be responsible for the administration and servicing of the Special Court.

2. The Registry shall consist of a Registrar and such other staff as may be required.

3. The Registrar shall be appointed by the Secretary-General after consultation with the President of the Special Court and shall be a staff member of the United Nations. He or she shall serve for a three-year term and be eligible for re-appointment.

4. The Registrar shall set up a Victims and Witnesses Unit within the Registry. This Unit shall provide, in consultation with the Office of the Prosecutor, protective measures and security arrangements, counselling and other appropriate assistance for witnesses, victims who appear before the Court and others who are at risk on account of testimony given by such witnesses. The Unit personnel shall include experts in trauma, including trauma related to crimes of sexual violence and violence against children.

Rights of the accused

1. All accused shall be equal before the Special Court.

2. The accused shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing, subject to measures ordered by the Special Court for the protection of victims and witnesses.

3. The accused shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty according to the provisions of the present Statute.

4. In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, he or she shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:

a. To be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he or she understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him or her;
b. To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his or her defence and to communicate with counsel of his or her own choosing;
c. To be tried without undue delay;
d. To be tried in his or her presence, and to defend himself or herself in person or through legal assistance of his or her own choosing; to be informed, if he or she does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interests of justice so require, and without payment by him or her in any such case if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it;
e. To examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him or her and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his or her behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him or her;
f. To have the free assistance of an interpreter if he or she cannot understand or speak the language used in the Special Court;
g. Not to be compelled to testify against himself or herself or to confess guilt.

Article 18
Judgement

The judgement shall be rendered by a majority of the judges of the Trial Chamber or of the Appeals Chamber, and shall be delivered in public. It shall be accompanied by a reasoned opinion in writing, to which separate or dissenting opinions may be appended.

Article 19
Penalties

1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.

2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chamber may order the forfeiture of the property, proceeds and any assets acquired unlawfully or by criminal conduct, and their return to their rightful owner or to the State of Sierra Leone.

Article 20
Appellate proceedings

1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chamber or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:

a. A procedural error;
b. An error on a question of law invalidating the decision;
c. An error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chamber.

3. The judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda. In the interpretation and application of the laws of Sierra Leone, they shall be guided by the decisions of the Supreme Court of Sierra Leone.

Article 21
Review proceedings

1. Where a new fact has been discovered which was not known at the time of the proceedings before the Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber and which could have been a decisive factor in reaching the decision, the convicted person or the Prosecutor may submit an application for review of the judgement.

2. An application for review shall be submitted to the Appeals Chamber. The Appeals Chamber may reject the application if it considers it to be unfounded. If it determines that the application is meritorious, it may, as appropriate:

a. Reconvene the Trial Chamber;
b. Retain jurisdiction over the matter.

Article 22
Enforcement of sentences

1. Imprisonment shall be served in Sierra Leone. If circumstances so require, imprisonment may also be served in any of the States which have concluded with the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda or the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia an agreement for the enforcement of sentences, and which have indicated to the Registrar of the Special Court their willingness to accept convicted persons. The Special Court may conclude similar agreements for the enforcement of sentences with other States.

2. Conditions of imprisonment, whether in Sierra Leone or in a third State, shall be governed by the law of the State of enforcement subject to the supervision of the Special Court. The State of enforcement shall be bound by the duration of the sentence, subject to article 23 of the present Statute.

Pardon or commutation of sentences

If, pursuant to the applicable law of the State in which the convicted person is imprisoned, he or she is eligible for pardon or commutation of sentence, the State concerned shall notify the Special Court accordingly. There shall only be pardon or commutation of sentence if the President of the Special Court, in consultation with the judges, so decides on the basis of the interests of justice and the general principles of law.

Part III - ORGANIZATION OF THE SPECIAL COURT

Section 1: The Judges

Rule 14: Solemn Declaration (amended 14 March 2004)

(A) Before taking up his duties each Judge shall make the following solemn declaration:

> "I solemnly declare that I will without fear or favour, affection or ill-will, serve as a Judge of the Special Court, honestly, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously."

(B) The text of the declaration, signed by the Judge and witnessed by the Secretary-General of the United Nations or his representative, and the President of Sierra Leone or his representative, shall be kept in the records of the Special Court.

Rule 15: Disqualification of Judges (amended 29 May 2004 and 24 November 2006)

(A) A Judge may not sit at a trial or appeal in any case in which his impartiality might reasonably be doubted on any substantial ground.

(B) Any party may apply to the Chamber of which the Judge is a member for the disqualification of the said Judge on the above ground.

C) Where the Judge voluntarily withdraws from the Trial Chamber, the President may assign the alternate judge, in accordance with Article 12(4) of the Statute, or another Trial Chamber Judge to sit in his place. Where a judge voluntarily withdraws from the Appeals Chamber, the Alternate Judge may sit in his place.

(D) The Judge who approves an indictment or who is involved with any pre-trial or interlocutory matter against a suspect or accused, shall not for that reason be disqualified from sitting as a member of a Chamber for the trial or appeal of that accused.

Rule 15 bis: Unfitness to Sit (adopted 24 November 2006)

(A) Where it is alleged that a Judge is not fit to sit as a member of the Special Court, the President may refer the matter to the Council of Judges.

(B) Should the Council of Judges determine that:

(i) the allegation is of a serious nature, and

(ii) there appears to be a substantial basis for such allegation, it shall refer the matter to the Plenary Meeting which will consider it and, if necessary, make a recommendation to the body which appointed the Judge.

(C) At each stage, the challenged Judge shall be entitled to present his comments on the matter.

Rule 16: Absence and Resignation (amended 29 May 2004)

(A) If a Judge is unable to continue sitting in a proceeding, trial or appeal which has partly been heard for a short duration and the remaining Judges are satisfied that it is in the interests of justice to do so, those remaining Judges may order that the proceeding, trial or appeal continue in the absence of that Judge for a period of not more than five working days.

(B) If a Judge is, for any reason, unable to continue sitting in a proceeding, trial or appeal which has partly been heard for a period which is or is likely to be longer than five days, the President may designate an alternate Judge as provided in Article 12(4) of the Statute.

(i) If an alternate Judge is not available as provided in Article 12(4) of the Statute, and the remaining Judges are satisfied that it would not affect the decision either way, the remaining Judges may continue in the absence of that Judge.

(ii) Where a trial or appeal chamber proceeds in the absence of one Judge, in the event that the decision is split evenly a new proceeding, trial or appeal shall be ordered.

(C) If a Judge is, for any reason, unable to sit in a proceeding, trial or appeal which has not yet been heard but has been scheduled, the President may designate an alternate Judge as provided in Article 12 (4) of the Statute.

(D) A Judge who decides to resign shall give notice of his resignation in writing to the President, who shall transmit it to the Secretary-General of the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone.

Rule 16*bis*: Alternate Judges (adopted 14 May 2007)

(A) An alternate Judge designated in accordance with Article 12(4) of the Statute shall be present at each stage of the trial or appeal to which he or she has been designated.

(B) During the proceedings, the alternate Judge may, through the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber or Appeals Chamber, pose questions which are necessary for the alternate Judge's understanding of the trial or appeal proceedings.

(C) An alternate Judge shall be present during the deliberations of the Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber to which he or she has been designated but shall not be entitled to vote thereat.

(D) The alternate Judge may perform such other functions within the Trial Chamber or Appeals Chamber as the Presiding Judge in consultation with the other judges of the Chamber may deem necessary.

Rule 17: Precedence (amended 7 March 2003)

(A) All Judges are equal in the exercise of their judicial functions, regardless of dates of election, appointment, age or period of service.

(B) Judges elected or appointed on different dates shall take precedence according to the dates of their election or appointment; Judges elected or appointed on the same date shall take precedence according to age.

(C) In case of re-election, the total period of service as a Judge of the Special Court shall be taken into account.

Section 2: The Presidency

Rule 18: Election of the President (amended 14 March 2004 and 24 November 2006)

(A) The Presiding Judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be the President of the Special Court.

(B) The Presiding Judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be elected for a term of one year or such shorter term as shall coincide with the duration of his term of office as a Judge. He or she may be re-elected. The President shall reside in Freetown, the seat of the Special Court, and shall work on a full-time basis, and be remunerated accordingly.

(C) If the President ceases to be a member of the Special Court or resigns his office before the expiration of his term, the Judges of the Appeals Chamber shall elect from among their number a successor for the remainder of the term.

(D) The Presiding Judge of the Appeals Chamber shall be elected by a majority of the votes of the Judges appointed to the Appeals Chamber.

Rule 19: Functions of the President (amended 7 March 2003 and 24 November 2006)

(A) The President shall preside at all plenary meetings of the Special Court, co-ordinate the work of the Chambers and supervise the activities of the Registry as well as exercise all the other functions conferred on him by the Agreement, the Statute and the Rules.

(B) The President may after appropriate consultation issue Practice Directions, consistent with the Agreement, the Statute and the Rules, addressing detailed aspects of the conduct of proceedings before the Special Court.

(C) The President shall, in addition to the discharge of his or her judicial functions, be responsible for the proper administration of justice. In particular, in coordination with the Registrar, the Prosecutor, and the Principal Defender, the President shall take all appropriate measures aimed at furthering the conduct of fair, impartial and expeditious trials and appeals.

Rule 20: The Vice-Presidency (amended 7 March 2003 and 24 November 2006)

The Vice-President shall be elected from amongst the Appeals Chamber Judges for a term of one year, or such shorter term as shall coincide with the duration of his term of office as a Judge. The Vice-President may be re-elected.

Rule 21: Functions of the Vice-President (amended 29 May 2004 and 24 November 2006)

The Vice-President shall exercise the functions of the President in case the latter is absent from Sierra Leone or is unable to act.

Rule 22: Replacements (amended 7 March 2003)

If neither the President nor the Vice-President can carry out the functions of the Presidency, this shall be assumed by a senior Judge, determined in accordance with Rule 17.

Section 3: Internal Functioning of the Special Court

Rule 23: The Council of Judges (amended 29 May 2004 and 13 May 2006)

(A) There shall be a Council of Judges which shall be composed of the President and the Presiding Judges of the Trial Chambers.

(B) The President shall consult the Council of Judges on all major questions or matters relating to the functioning of the Special Court.

(C) In order to ensure the coordination of the activities of all organs of the Special Court, the Council of Judges, or its representative, shall meet with the Registrar, the Prosecutor and the Principal Defender, or their representatives.

(D) The President shall consult the Council of Judges with respect to the functions set forth in Rule 19 and 33, and particularly all the Registry activities relating to the administrative support provided to the Chambers.

Rule 24: Plenary Meetings of the Special Court (amended 7 March 2003)

The Judges shall meet in plenary to:

(i) Adopt and amend the Rules;

(ii) Adopt the Annual Report provided for in Article 25 of the Statute;

(iii) Decide upon matters relating to the internal functioning of the Chambers and the Special Court;

(iv) Exercise any other functions provided for in the Agreement, the Statute or in the Rules.

Rule 25: Dates of Plenary Meetings (amended 7 March 2003)

Plenary Meetings shall be convened by the President if so requested by at least five Judges, and may be convened whenever the exercise of his functions under the Agreement, the Statute or the Rules so requires.

Rule 26: Quorum and Vote (amended 16 November 2011)

(A) The quorum for each Plenary Meeting of the Special Court shall be seven Judges, including at least one judge from each Trial Chamber. On expiration of the terms of both Trial Chambers, the quorum shall be four judges.

(B) Subject to Rule 6(A) and (B) and Rule 18(C), the decisions of the Plenary Meeting of the Special Court shall be taken by the majority of the Judges present. In the event of an equality of votes, the President or the Judge who acts in his place shall have a casting vote.

Section 4: The Chambers

Rule 26*bis*: The Chambers (adopted 29 May 2004)

The Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious and that proceedings before the Special Court are conducted in accordance with the Agreement, the Statute and the Rules, with full respect for the rights of the accused and due regard for the protection of victims and witnesses.

Rule 27: The Trial Chambers (amended 14 May 2005)

(A) The Presiding Judge of each Trial Chamber shall be elected for a renewable term of one year.

(B) The Presiding Judge shall coordinate the work of the Chamber and liaise with the Registrar on matters affecting the Trial Chamber and will exercise such other functions as may be conferred on him by the Agreement, the Statute, and the Rules.

(C) The Presiding Judge may issue, after appropriate consultations, Practice Directions in relation to the Trial Chamber.

(D) The provisions of Rule 17 will apply in the event of the Presiding Judge being unable to carry out his functions.

Rule 27*bis*: The Appeals Chamber (amended 29 May 2004)

(A) The Presiding Judge of the Appeals Chamber shall coordinate the work of the Chamber and liaise with the Registrar on matters affecting the Appeals Chamber and will exercise such other functions as may be conferred on him by the Agreement, the Statute, and the Rules.

(B) The Presiding Judge may issue, after appropriate consultations, Practice Directions in relation to the Appeals Chamber.

(C) The provisions of Rule 17 will apply in the event of the Presiding Judge being unable to carry out his functions.

(D) Unless otherwise provided in these Rules, the Appeals Chamber shall, for each appeal, be composed of all its five members.

Rule 28: Designated Judges (amended 1 August 2003 and 13 May 2006)

After consultation with the Judges concerned, the President shall designate for a given period such Judges as necessary to whom indictments, warrants, and all other pre-trial matters not pertaining to a case already assigned to a Chamber, shall be transmitted for review. The Registrar shall publish the information by appropriate means and as soon as possible.

Rule 29: Deliberations

(C) Once the trial of an accused has commenced, the Prosecutor may withdraw an indictment only by leave granted by the Trial Chamber.

(D) The withdrawal of the indictment shall be promptly notified to the accused and to counsel for the accused.

Rule 52: Service of Indictment (amended 29 May 2004)

(A) Service of the indictment shall be effected personally on the accused at the time the accused is taken into the custody of the Special Court or as soon as possible thereafter.

(B) Personal service of an indictment on the accused is effected by giving the accused a copy of the indictment approved in accordance with Rule 47.

(C) An indictment that has been permitted to proceed by the Designated Judge shall be retained by the Registrar, who shall prepare certified copies bearing the seal of the Special Court. If the accused does not understand English and if the language understood is a written language known to the Registrar, a translation of the indictment in that language shall also be prepared. In the case that the accused is illiterate or his language is an oral language, the Registrar will ensure that the indictment is read to the accused by an interpreter, and that he is served with a recording of the interpretation.

(D) Subject to Rule 53, upon approval by the Designated Judge the indictment shall be made public.

Rule 53: Non-disclosure (amended 1 August 2003)

(A) In exceptional circumstances, the Designated Judge may, in the interests of justice, order the non-disclosure to the public of any documents or information until further order.

(B) When approving an indictment the Designated Judge may, on the application of the Prosecutor, order that there be no public disclosure of the indictment until it is served on the accused, or, in the case of joint accused, on all the accused.

(C) The Designated Judge or the Trial Chamber may, on the application of the Prosecutor, also order that there be no disclosure of an indictment, or part thereof, or of all or any part of any particular document or information, if satisfied that the making of such an order is required to give effect to a provision of the Rules, to protect confidential information obtained by the Prosecutor, or is otherwise in the interests of justice.

Section 2: Orders and Warrants

Rule 54: General Provision

At the request of either party or of its own motion, a Judge or a Trial Chamber may issue such orders, summonses, subpoenas, warrants and transfer orders as may be necessary for the purposes of an investigation or for the preparation or conduct of the trial.

plea. The defendant shall thereafter, but no more that 7 days after the Prosecutor's filing submit any relevant information that may assist the Trial Chamber in determining an appropriate sentence.

(B) Where the accused has entered a guilty plea, the Trial Chamber shall hear submissions of the parties at a sentencing hearing. Where the accused has been convicted by a Trial Chamber, the Trial Chamber may hear submissions of the parties at a sentencing hearing.

(C) The sentence shall be pronounced in a judgement in public and in the presence of the convicted person, subject to Rule 102(B).

Rule 101: Penalties (amended 29 May 2004)

(A) A person convicted by the Special Court, other than a juvenile offender, may be sentenced to imprisonment for a specific number of years.

(B) In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19 (2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as:

(i) Any aggravating circumstances;

(ii) Any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction;

(iii) The extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9 (3) of the Statute.

(C) The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

(D) Any period during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Special Court or pending trial or appeal, shall be taken into consideration on sentencing.

Rule 102: Status of the Convicted Person (amended 29 May 2004 and 24 November 2006)

(A) Subject to the Trial Chamber's directions in terms of Rule 101, the sentence shall begin to run from the day it is pronounced. However, as soon as notice of appeal is given, the enforcement of the judgement shall thereupon be stayed until the decision on the appeal has been delivered, the convicted person meanwhile remaining in detention, as provided in Rule 64.

(B) If, by a previous decision of the Trial Chamber, the convicted person has been provisionally released, or is for any other reason at liberty, and he is not present when the judgement is pronounced, the Trial Chamber shall issue a warrant for his arrest. On arrest, he shall be notified of the conviction and sentence, and the procedure provided in Rule 103 shall be followed.

PRACTICE DIRECTION ON THE STRUCTURE OF GROUNDS OF APPEAL BEFORE THE SPECIAL COURT

PREAMBLE

The President of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("Special Court");

CONSIDERING the Statute of the Special Court ("Statute") as annexed to the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, signed on 16 January 2002; and in particular Article 20 of the Statute which provides that the Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chamber or from the Prosecutor on a procedural error, an error on a question of law invalidating the decision, or an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice;

CONSIDERING the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Special Court ("Rules"); in particular Rules 111, 112 and 113 which deal with the procedure for filing of written submissions by the Parties in appeals from final judgement;

PURSUANT to Rule 107 of the Rules and after consultation with the Vice-President;

HEREBY issues this Practice Direction in order to establish a procedure for the structuring of grounds of appeal and written submissions in appellate proceedings before the Special Court, and

STATES that this Practice Direction shall apply exclusively to appeals from final judgments of a Trial Chamber

I. FORMAL REQUIREMENTS

The Appellant's Notice of Appeal

1. A party seeking to appeal from a judgement or sentence of a Trial Chamber ("Appellant") shall file and serve upon the other parties, in accordance with the Statute and the Rules, a written Notice of Appeal containing in the following order:
(a) the date of the final judgment or sentencing judgment as well as the case number
(b) the specific provision of the Rules pursuant to which the Notice of Appeal is filed;
(c) the grounds of appeal, stating clearly in respect of each ground of appeal the substance of the alleged error;
(d) an identification of the finding, decision or ruling challenged in the judgment with specific reference to the page and paragraph numbers;
(e) an identification of any other order, decision or ruling challenged with specific reference to the date of its filing, and/or transcript page;
(f) the precise relief sought

2 Where a procedural error is alleged, such as would affect the fairness of the trial, the Appellant shall state in what manner the error has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

3 Where an error of law is alleged in a ground of appeal, the Appellant shall state what error has been made in point of law and in what manner the error invalidates the decision.

4 Where an error of fact is alleged, the Appellant shall state in what manner the error of fact has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

5 Where a misdirection either of law or of fact or of mixed law and fact is alleged in a ground of appeal, the Appellant shall state in what manner the Trial Chamber misdirected itself and where the misdirection occurred in the judgment;

The Appellant's Submissions

6. After having filed a Notice of Appeal, the Appellant shall file, in accordance with the Statute and the Rules, an Appellant's Submission, containing the following, with the appropriate titles and in the order herein indicated:
(a) a table of contents with page references;
(b) an introduction containing a statement of the subject matter, the specific provision of the Rules pursuant to which the Appellant Submissions is filed, the date of the impugned Judgment as well as the case number; and the date of any interlocutory filing or decision relevant to the appeal;
(c) a statement of the issues presented;
(d) the arguments in support of each ground of appeal containing the contentions of the Appellant on the issues presented and the reasons therefore; with precise references to the authorities relied upon;
(e) the conclusion and relief sought.

7. The Appellant shall not group disparate arguments, each pertaining to a substantial issue under a single ground of appeal

8. The Appellant shall not group allegations of error or misdirection relating to disparate issues under a single ground of appeal.

9. The Appellant shall not repeat in a disproportionate manner, the same arguments in numerous grounds of appeal.

10. The Appellant shall present a holistic and comprehensive ground of appeal. Division of a ground of appeal into "subs-grounds" is impermissible.

11. The Appellant shall maintain a respectful and decorous tone in his/her submissions

The Respondent's Submissions

12. The opposite party ("Respondent") shall file in accordance with the Statute and the Rules a Respondent's Submission, containing the following, with the appropriate titles and in the order herein indicated:
(a) a table of contents with page references;
(b) an introduction containing a statement of the subject matter, the specific provision of the Rules pursuant to which the Respondent's Submissions is filed and the date of any interlocutory filing or decision relevant to the appeal;
(c) a statement on whether or not the ground of appeal is opposed and arguments in support thereof;

13. The statements and arguments must be set out and numbered in the same order as in the Appellant's Submissions and shall be limited to arguments made in response thereto.

The Respondent shall maintain a respectful and decorous tone in his/her submissions

Submissions in Reply

14. An Appellant may file, in accordance with the Statute and the Rules, Submissions in Reply, limited to arguments in reply to the Respondent's Submissions, set out and numbered in the same order as in previous Submissions.

The Book of Authorities

15. The parties' Submissions shall be accompanied by a "Book of Authorities" setting out clearly all authorities relied upon.

16. The Book of Authorities shall be numbered consecutively and shall include a table of content describing each document, including the date and reference.

17. The Book of Authorities shall include a legible copy of the pages of or excerpts from every referenced material including case law, statutory and regulatory provisions from the Special Court, international tribunals and national sources to which the parties actually refer in the parties' submissions or intends to refer in the parties' oral arguments.

18. Authorities not in the official language of the Special Court shall be translated accordingly.

19. A party may object to a translation by filing no later than XXX days from the filing of the Book of Authorities the translation which he/she contends is the correct translation instead of the translation challenged.

20. In the filing of the Book of Authorities, the parties shall be guided by Article 7 of the Practice Direction on Filing Documents before the Special Court, adopted on 27 February 2003, as amended on 16 January 2008.

21. Failure to file the Book of Authorities prescribed above shall not bar the Appeals Chamber from rendering a judgment, a decision or an order as it sees fit in the appeal.

Additional Evidence

22. A party applying to present additional evidence must do so by way of motion, in accordance with the Rules, stating:

(a) the specific Rule by which the application is made;
(b)a precise list of the evidence sought to be presented;
(c) an indication of the specific finding of fact made by the Trial Chamber to which the additional evidence is directed;
(d) the reasons and supporting evidence relied on to establish that the proposed additional evidence was not available at trial as required by that Rule
(e) the arguments in support of the requirement that the admission of the requested additional evidence should be in the interest of justice

23. The relevant documents and exhibits, where applicable, shall be translated into the working language of the Special Court.

24. Where a party is authorised by the Appeals Chamber to present additional evidence, then the requirements of this Practice Direction apply mutatis mutandis.

II. GENERAL REQUIREMENTS

25. The parties shall refer to and comply with the Practice Direction on Filing Documents before the Special Court for Sierra Leone, adopted on 27 February 2003, as amended on 16 January 2008, for the general requirements for filing of written submissions, including the filing of authorities.

26. In accordance with the Rules, the time limits prescribed under this Practice Direction shall run from but shall not include, the day upon which the relevant document is filed. Should the last day of a time prescribed fall upon a non-working day of the Special Court it shall be considered as falling on the first working day thereafter.

27. The provisions of this Practice Direction are without prejudice to any orders or decisions that may be made by a designated Pre-Hearing Judge or the Appeals Chamber in particular with regard to the variation of time limits.

III NON-COMPLIANCE WITH THE REQUIREMENTS

28. Where a party fails to comply with the requirements laid down in this Practice Direction, or where the wording of a filing is unclear or ambiguous, a designated Pre-Hearing Judge or the Appeals Chamber may in its discretion decide upon an appropriate sanction, which can include an order for clarification or re-filing. The Appeals Chamber may also reject a filing or dismiss submissions therein.

This Practice Direction shall enter into force on 1 July 2011.

Office of the Principal Defender:	Ms Claire Carlton-Hanciles

first matter is the delivery of the full judgement, which is a huge judgement. The Trial Chamber had aimed at having it published last Monday. However, the technicians who were formatting the judgement for publication have had challenges due 09:34:31 to the voluminous size of the judgement, and they was not able to meet the Monday dead-line.

However, they have guaranteed that the judgement will be ready for publication before close of business this Friday.

Now, the second matter is as follows: Before proceeding
09:34:58 today, it gives us no pleasure to have to place on record some explanation for the extraordinary situation which occurred at the end of the previous sitting of the Trial Chamber on 26th of April, 2012, on which date the Trial Chamber delivered its summary judgement.

09:35:25 On that date, at the conclusion of the proceedings, the Alternate Judge, without any notice to the Trial Chamber, proceeded to deliver his own opinions from the bench on the judgement that had just been delivered on these proceedings and on the Special Court itself. What the Alternate Judge did was in 09:35:56 contravention of the agreement, the Statute, and the Rules which govern this Court and amounted to misconduct.

The purpose of attaching an Alternate Judge to a Trial Chamber is that he can be designated to replace a sitting Judge if that Judge is unable to continue sitting. See Article 12 of 09:36:23 the Statute. No such designation has been made in the present case. Further, during the proceedings, the Alternate Judge may pose questions through the Presiding Judge, but there is no other entitlement for an Alternate Judge to speak during court proceedings. See Rule 16 bis (B). Moreover, an Alternate Judge does not have any say in decisions of the Trial Chamber. He is obliged to be present during deliberations off the Trial Chamber, but he is not entitled a vote thereat. See Rule 16 bis (C). It follows that it was wrong for the Alternate Judge, who has not been designated to replace a sitting Judge, to offer an opinion, whether dissenting or concurring, on a judgement of Trial Chamber.

The behaviour of Judge Sow was referred by the Council of Judges to a plenary meeting of the Judges of the Special Court. We three Trial Chamber Judges abstained from voting at that plenary.

I will now read onto the record the resolution of the plenary.

Resolution on complaint by Trial Chamber II against Justice Malick Sow. The Judges of the Special Court for Sierra Leone sitting on the 7th and 10th of May, 2012, in the 17th plenary of Judges, pursuant to Rule 15 bis (B) of the Rules of Procedure of Evidence of the Special Court which mandates the Council of Judges who refer an allegation of unfitness of a Judge to sit to the plenary if it determines that, one, the allegation is of a serious nature, and two, that there appears to be a substantial basis for same.

Pursuant also to Rule 24(iii) of the Rules, which provides that the Judges shall meet in plenary to decide upon matters relating to the internal functioning of the Chambers and the Special Court, seized of the complaint by the Judges of Trial Chamber II, dated 26th of April, 2012, against Justice Malick Sow, Alternate Judge, considering the response of Justice Malick Sow, dated the 1st of May, 2012, to the complaint, having also considered the views and recommendations of the Judges on the matter and the response of Justice Malick Sow to those views pursuant to Rule 15 bis (C) have reached the following conclusions:

09:39:39 1. The plenary declares that Justice Malick Sow's behaviour in court on the 26th of April, 2012, amounts to misconduct rendering him unfit to sit as an Alternate Judge of the Special Court.

2. The plenary recommends to the appointing authority 09:40:03 pursuant to Rule 15 bis (B) to decide upon the further status of Justice Malick Sow.

3. Pursuant to Rule 24(iii), the plenary directs Justice Malick Sow to refrain from further sitting in the proceedings pending a decision from the appointing authority.

09:40:28 Done in Freetown, Sierra Leone, this 10th day of May, 2012, for and on behalf of the plenary, signed by the President Justice Jon Kamanda.

Now, Ms Hollis, you have one hour to address the Court and that will start from now which will bring you up to 20 to 11.00 09:41:05 you must complete your address.

MS HOLLIS: Thank you, Mr President. May it please the Court. In arriving at a sentence --

PRESIDING JUDGE: I'm sorry. I didn't see you standing there.

09:41:13 MR GRIFFITHS: I apologise to my learned friend. Your Honour, can I ask -- raise two matters, preliminary matters, regarding the timing of the proceedings today. I don't know whether Your Honours were considering have a mid-morning break at some stage, but it would perhaps assist us if that were to be please accept my congratulations in advance.

Thank you.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Thank you, Mr Taylor.

THE ACCUSED: May I leave now?

12:00:52 PRESIDING JUDGE: Before we adjourn, we would like to thank both the Prosecution and the Defence for their very comprehensive written briefs and also for the additional oral arguments presented today. We have much to consider.

The delivery of judgement -- a Sentencing judgement date

12:01:22 has already been fixed for the 30th of May, Wednesday, the 30th of May, at 11.00 a.m. So Mr Taylor is remanded until that date for a sentence, and I will now adjourn the court.

Statute Statut

International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR)
Tribunal pénal international pour le Rwanda (TPIR)
31 January 2010 – 31 janvier 2010

Article 5: Personal Jurisdiction

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to the provisions of the present Statute.

Article 6: Individual Criminal Responsibility

1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

2. The official position of any accused person, whether as Head of state or government or as a responsible government official, shall not relieve such person of criminal responsibility nor mitigate punishment.

3. The fact that any of the acts referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

4. The fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the International Tribunal for Rwanda determines that justice so requires.

Article 7: Territorial and Temporal Jurisdiction

The territorial jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall extend to the territory of Rwanda including its land surface and airspace as well as to the territory of neighbouring States in respect of serious violations of international humanitarian law committed by Rwandan citizens. The temporal jurisdiction of the International Tribunal for Rwanda shall extend to a period beginning on 1 January 1994 and ending on 31 December 1994.

Article 8: Concurrent Jurisdiction

1. The International Tribunal for Rwanda and national courts shall have concurrent jurisdiction to prosecute persons for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of Rwanda and Rwandan citizens for such violations committed in the territory of the neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994.

2. The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall have the primacy over the national courts of all States. At any stage of the procedure, the International Tribunal for Rwanda may formally request national courts to defer to its competence in accordance with the present Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Tribunal for Rwanda.

4. In the determination of any charge against the accused pursuant to the present Statute, the accused shall be entitled to the following minimum guarantees, in full equality:

(a) To be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he or she understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him or her;

(b) To have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his or her defence and to communicate with counsel of his or her own choosing;

(c) To be tried without undue delay;

(d) To be tried in his or her presence, and to defend himself or herself in person or through legal assistance of his or her own choosing; to be informed, if he or she does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him or her, in any case where the interest of justice so require, and without payment by him or her in any such case if he or she does not have sufficient means to pay for it;

(e) To examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him or her and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his or her behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him or her;

(f) To have the free assistance of an interpreter if he or she cannot understand or speak the language used in the International Tribunal for Rwanda;

(g) Not to be compelled to testify against himself or herself or to confess guilt.

Article 21: Protection of Victims and Witnesses

The International Tribunal for Rwanda shall provide in its Rules of Procedure and Evidence for the protection of victims and witnesses. Such protection measures shall include, but shall not be limited to, the conduct of in camera proceedings and the protection of the victim's identity.

Article 22: Judgement

1. The Trial Chambers shall pronounce judgements and impose sentences and penalties on persons convicted of serious violations of international humanitarian law.

2. The judgement shall be rendered by a majority of the judges of the Trial Chamber, and shall be delivered by the Trial Chamber in public. It shall be accompanied by a reasoned opinion in writing, to which separate or dissenting opinions may be appended.

Article 23: Penalties

1. The penalty imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be limited to imprisonment. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda.

2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chambers may order the return of any property and proceeds acquired by criminal conduct, including by means of duress, to their rightful owners.

permanent judge in a section of a Trial Chamber to be replaced resulting in a section solely comprised of ad litem judges, that section may continue to hear the case, notwithstanding that its composition no longer includes a permanent judge.

Article 13
Qualifications of judges

The permanent and ad litem judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. In the overall composition of the Chambers and sections of the Trial Chambers, due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law.

Article 13 bis
Election of permanent judges

1. Fourteen of the permanent judges of the International Tribunal shall be elected by the General Assembly from a list submitted by the Security Council, in the following manner:

(a) The Secretary-General shall invite nominations for judges of the International Tribunal from States Members of the United Nations and non-member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters;

(b) Within sixty days of the date of the invitation of the Secretary-General, each State may nominate up to two candidates meeting the qualifications set out in article 13 of the Statute, no two of whom shall be of the same nationality and neither of whom shall be of the same nationality as any judge who is a member of the Appeals Chamber and who was elected or appointed a permanent judge of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Territory of Neighbouring States, between 1 January 1994 and 31 December 1994 (hereinafter referred to as "The International Tribunal for Rwanda") in accordance with article 12 bis of the Statute of that Tribunal;

(c) The Secretary-General shall forward the nominations received to the Security Council. From the nominations received the Security Council shall establish a list of not less than twenty-eight and not more than forty-two candidates, taking due account of the adequate representation of the principal legal systems of the world;

(d) The President of the Security Council shall transmit the list of candidates to the President of the General Assembly. From that list the General Assembly shall elect fourteen permanent judges of the International Tribunal. The candidates who receive an absolute majority of the votes of the States Members of the United Nations and of the non-member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters, shall be declared elected. Should two candidates of the same nationality obtain the required majority vote, the one who received the higher number of votes shall be considered elected.

2. In the event of a vacancy in the Chambers amongst the permanent judges elected or appointed in accordance with this article, after consultation with the Presidents of the Security Council and of the General Assembly, the Secretary-General shall appoint a person meeting the qualifications of article 13 of the Statute, for the remainder of the term of office concerned.

3. The permanent judges elected in accordance with this article shall be elected for a term of four years. The terms and conditions of service shall be those of the judges of the International Court of Justice. They shall be eligible for re-election.

Article 13 ter
Election and appointment of ad litem judges

1. The ad litem judges of the International Tribunal shall be elected by the General Assembly from a list submitted by the Security Council, in the following manner:

(a) The Secretary-General shall invite nominations for ad litem judges of the International Tribunal from States Members of the United Nations and non-member States maintaining permanent observer missions at United Nations Headquarters.

1. The penalty imposed by the Trial Chamber shall be limited to imprisonment. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia.

2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chambers may order the return of any property and proceeds acquired by criminal conduct, including by means of duress, to their rightful owners.

Article 25
Appellate proceedings

1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chambers or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:

(a) an error on a question of law invalidating the decision; or
(b) an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chambers.

RULES OF PROCEDURE AND EVIDENCE

PART THREE ORGANIZATION OF THE TRIBUNAL

Section 1: The Judges

Rule 14
Solemn Declaration
(Adopted 11 Feb 1994)

(A) Before taking up duties each Judge shall make the following solemn declaration:

"I solemnly declare that I will perform my duties and exercise my powers as a Judge of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously". (Amended 12 Nov 1997)

(B) The declaration shall be signed by the Judge and witnessed by, or by a representative of, the Secretary-General of the United Nations. The declaration shall be kept in the records of the Tribunal. (Amended 12 Nov 1997)

(C) A Judge whose service continues without interruption after expiry of a previous period of service shall not make a new declaration. (Amended 12 Nov 1997)

Rule 15
Disqualification of Judges
(Adopted 11 Feb 1994, amended 15 June 1995, amended 25 June 1996, amended 5 July 1996, amended 25 July 1997, amended 17 Nov 1999)

(A) A Judge may not sit on a trial or appeal in any case in which the Judge has a personal interest or concerning which the Judge has or has had any association which might affect his or her impartiality. The Judge shall in any such circumstance withdraw, and the President shall assign another Judge to the case.

(B) (i) Any party may apply to the Presiding Judge of a Chamber for the disqualification and withdrawal of a Judge of that Chamber from a trial or appeal upon the above grounds. The Presiding Judge shall confer with the Judge in question and report to the President. (Amended 30 Jan 1995)

PURPOSES AND PRINCIPLES

Article 1

The Purposes of the United Nations are:

1. To maintain international peace and security, and to that end: to take effective collective measures for the prevention and removal of threats to the peace, and for the suppression of acts of aggression or other breaches of the peace, and to bring about by peaceful means, and in conformity with the principles of justice and international law, adjustment or settlement of international disputes or situations which might lead to a breach of the peace;

2. To develop friendly relations among nations based on respect for the principle of equal rights and self-determination of peoples, and to take other appropriate measures to strengthen universal peace;

3. To achieve international cooperation in solving international problems of an economic, social, cultural, or humanitarian character, and in promoting and encouraging respect for human rights and for fundamental freedoms for all without distinction as to race, sex, language, or religion; and

4. To be a center for harmonizing the actions of nations in the attainment of these common ends.

Article 2

The Organization and its Members, in pursuit of the Purposes stated in Article 1, shall act in accordance with the following Principles.

1. The Organization is based on the principle of the sovereign equality of all its Members.

2. All Members, in order to ensure to all of them the rights and benefits resulting from membership, shall fulfil in good faith the obligations assumed by them in accordance with the present Charter.

3. All Members shall settle their international disputes by peaceful means in such a manner that international peace and security, and justice, are not endangered.

4. All Members shall refrain in their international relations from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or political independence of any state, or in any other manner inconsistent with the Purposes of the United Nations.

5. All Members shall give the United Nations every assistance in any action it takes in accordance with the present Charter, and shall refrain from giving assistance to any state against which the United Nations is taking preventive or enforcement action.

6. The Organization shall ensure that states which are not Members of the United Nations act in accordance with these Principles so far as may be necessary for the maintenance of international peace and security.

7. Nothing contained in the present Charter shall authorize the United Nations to intervene in matters which are essentially within the domestic jurisdiction of any state or shall require the Members to submit such matters to settlement under the present Charter; but this principle shall not prejudice the application of enforcement measures under Chapter VII.

CHAPTER II

MEMBERSHIP

Article 3

The original Members of the United Nations shall be the states which, having participated in the United Nations Conference on International Organization at San Francisco, or having previously signed the Declaration by United Nations of January 1, 1942, sign the present Charter and ratify it in accordance with Article 110.

ECONOMIC COMMUNITY OF WEST AFRICAN STATES

PROTOCOL ON NON-AGGRESSION

THE HIGH CONTRACTING PARTIES

CONSIDERING that the Economic Community of West African States, (hereinafter referred to as the "Community"), set up by virtue of the Treaty of May 28, 1975, cannot attain its objectives save in an atmosphere of peace and harmonious understanding among the Member States of the Community;

RECALLING Article 2(4) of the United Nations Charter which provides that all Member States shall refrain, in their international relations, from the threat or use of force against the territorial integrity or independence of any State, or any other manner inconsistent with the purposes of the United Nations;

RECALLING Article 3(3) of the Charter of the Organization of African Unity which provides for the respect of the sovereignty and territorial integrity of each State and its inalienable right to independent existence;

RECALLING the Resolution of the Summit Meeting of Heads of State and Government of the Community held in Lome on 5 November 1976 regarding the signing of an Annexed Protocol on non-recourse to force by Member States of the Community;

AGREE AS FOLLOWS:

ARTICLE 1

Member States shall, in their relations with one another, refrain from the threat or use of force or aggression or from employing any other means inconsistent with the Charters of the United Nations and the Organization of African Unity against the territorial integrity of political independence of other Member States.

ARTICLE 2

Each Member State shall refrain, from committing, encouraging or condoning acts of subversion, hostility or aggression against the territorial integrity or political independence of the other Member States.

ARTICLE 3

Each Member State shall undertake to prevent Foreigners resident on its territory from committing the acts referred to in Article 2 above against the sovereignty and territorial integrity of other Member States.

4. In the case of the resignation of a member of the Court, the resignation shall be addressed to the President of the Court for transmission to the Secretary-General. This last notification makes the place vacant.

Article 14

Vacancies shall be filled by the same method as that laid down for the first election, subject to the following provision: the Secretary-General shall, within one month of the occurrence of the vacancy, proceed to issue the invitations provided for in Article 5, and the date of the election shall be fixed by the Security Council.

Article 15

A member of the Court elected to replace a member whose term of office has not expired shall hold office for the remainder of his predecessor's term.

Article 16

1. No member of the Court may exercise any political or administrative function, or engage in any other occupation of a professional nature.

2. Any doubt on this point shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

Article 17

1. No member of the Court may act as agent, counsel, or advocate in any case.

2. No member may participate in the decision of any case in which he has previously taken part as agent, counsel, or advocate for one of the parties, or as a member of a national or international court, or of a commission of enquiry, or in any other capacity.

3. Any doubt on this point shall be settled by the decision of the Court.

Article 18

1. No member of the Court can be dismissed unless, in the unanimous opinion of the other members, he has ceased to fulfill the required conditions.

2. Formal notification thereof shall be made to the Secretary-General by the Registrar.

3. This notification makes the place vacant.

Article 19

The members of the Court, when engaged on the business of the Court, shall enjoy diplomatic privileges and immunities.

Article 20

Every member of the Court shall, before taking up his duties, make a solemn declaration in open court that he will exercise his powers impartially and conscientiously.

Article 21

1. The Court shall elect its President and Vice-President for three years; they may be re-elected.

2. The Court shall appoint its Registrar and may provide for the appointment of such other officers as may be necessary.

Article 22

1. The seat of the Court shall be established at The Hague. This, however, shall not prevent the Court from sitting and exercising its functions elsewhere whenever the Court considers it desirable.

2. The President and the Registrar shall reside at the seat of the Court.

Article 23

1. The Court shall remain permanently in session, except during the judicial vacations, the dates and duration of which shall be fixed by the Court.

2. Members of the Court are entitled to periodic leave, the dates and duration of which shall be fixed by the Court, having in mind the distance between The Hague and the home of each judge.

Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court

PART 2. JURISDICTION, ADMISSIBILITY AND APPLICABLE LAW

Article 5[1]
Crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court

The jurisdiction of the Court shall be limited to the most serious crimes of concern to the international community as a whole. The Court has jurisdiction in accordance with this Statute with respect to the following crimes:

(a) The crime of genocide;

(b) Crimes against humanity;

(c) War crimes;

(d) The crime of aggression.

Genocide

For the purpose of this Statute, "genocide" means any of the following acts committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such:

(a) Killing members of the group;

(b) Causing serious bodily or mental harm to members of the group;

(c) Deliberately inflicting on the group conditions of life calculated to bring about its physical destruction in whole or in part;

(d) Imposing measures intended to prevent births within the group;

(e) Forcibly transferring children of the group to another group.

Article 7
Crimes against humanity

1. For the purpose of this Statute, "crime against humanity" means any of the following acts when committed as part of a widespread or systematic attack directed against any civilian population, with knowledge of the attack:

(a) Murder;

(b) Extermination;

(c) Enslavement;

(d) Deportation or forcible transfer of population;

(e) Imprisonment or other severe deprivation of physical liberty in violation of fundamental rules of international law;

1 Paragraph 2 of article 5 ("The Court shall exercise jurisdiction over the crime of aggression once a provision is adopted in accordance with articles 121 and 123 defining the crime and setting out the conditions under which the Court shall exercise jurisdiction with respect to this crime. Such a provision shall be consistent with the relevant provisions of the Charter of the United Nations.") was deleted in accordance with RC/Res.6, annex I, of 11 June 2010.

PART 3. GENERAL PRINCIPLES OF CRIMINAL LAW

Article 22
Nullum crimen sine lege

1. A person shall not be criminally responsible under this Statute unless the conduct in question constitutes, at the time it takes place, a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court.

2. The definition of a crime shall be strictly construed and shall not be extended by analogy. In case of ambiguity, the definition shall be interpreted in favour of the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted.

3. This article shall not affect the characterization of any conduct as criminal under international law independently of this Statute.

Article 23
Nulla poena sine lege

A person convicted by the Court may be punished only in accordance with this Statute.

Article 24
Non-retroactivity ratione personae

1. No person shall be criminally responsible under this Statute for conduct prior to the entry into force of the Statute.

2. In the event of a change in the law applicable to a given case prior to a final judgement, the law more favourable to the person being investigated, prosecuted or convicted shall apply.

Article 25[8]
Individual criminal responsibility

1. The Court shall have jurisdiction over natural persons pursuant to this Statute.

2. A person who commits a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court shall be individually responsible and liable for punishment in accordance with this Statute.

3. In accordance with this Statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:

   (a) Commits such a crime, whether as an individual, jointly with another or through another person, regardless of whether that other person is criminally responsible;

   (b) Orders, solicits or induces the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

   (c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission;

   (d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:

8 As amended by resolution RC/Res.6 of 11 June 2010 (adding paragraph 3 bis).

(i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or

(ii) Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime;

(e) In respect of the crime of genocide, directly and publicly incites others to commit genocide;

(f) Attempts to commit such a crime by taking action that commences its execution by means of a substantial step, but the crime does not occur because of circumstances independent of the person's intentions. However, a person who abandons the effort to commit the crime or otherwise prevents the completion of the crime shall not be liable for punishment under this Statute for the attempt to commit that crime if that person completely and voluntarily gave up the criminal purpose.

3 bis. In respect of the crime of aggression, the provisions of this article shall apply only to persons in a position effectively to exercise control over or to direct the political or military action of a State.

4. No provision in this Statute relating to individual criminal responsibility shall affect the responsibility of States under international law.

Article 26
Exclusion of jurisdiction over persons under eighteen

The Court shall have no jurisdiction over any person who was under the age of 18 at the time of the alleged commission of a crime.

Article 27
Irrelevance of official capacity

1. This Statute shall apply equally to all persons without any distinction based on official capacity. In particular, official capacity as a Head of State or Government, a member of a Government or parliament, an elected representative or a government official shall in no case exempt a person from criminal responsibility under this Statute, nor shall it, in and of itself, constitute a ground for reduction of sentence.

2. Immunities or special procedural rules which may attach to the official capacity of a person, whether under national or international law, shall not bar the Court from exercising its jurisdiction over such a person.

Article 28
Responsibility of commanders and other superiors

In addition to other grounds of criminal responsibility under this Statute for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court:

(a) A military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by forces under his or her effective command and control, or effective authority and control as the case may be, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such forces, where:

(i) That military commander or person either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes; and

(ii) That military commander or person failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.

(b) With respect to superior and subordinate relationships not described in paragraph (a), a superior shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such subordinates, where:

(i) The superior either knew, or consciously disregarded information which clearly indicated, that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes;

(ii) The crimes concerned activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior; and

(iii) The superior failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.

Article 29
Non-applicability of statute of limitations

The crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court shall not be subject to any statute of limitations.

Article 30
Mental element

1. Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge.

2. For the purposes of this article, a person has intent where:

(a) In relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the conduct;

(b) In relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

3. For the purposes of this article, "knowledge" means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. "Know" and "knowingly" shall be construed accordingly.

Article 31
Grounds for excluding criminal responsibility

1. In addition to other grounds for excluding criminal responsibility provided for in this Statute, a person shall not be criminally responsible if, at the time of that person's conduct:

Article 33

Superior orders and prescription of law

1. The fact that a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court has been committed by a person pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior, whether military or civilian, shall not relieve that person of criminal responsibility unless:

(a) The person was under a legal obligation to obey orders of the Government or the superior in question;

(b) The person did not know that the order was unlawful; and

(c) The order was not manifestly unlawful.

2. For the purposes of this article, orders to commit genocide or crimes against humanity are manifestly unlawful.

PART 4. COMPOSITION AND ADMINISTRATION OF THE COURT

Article 34

Organs of the Court

The Court shall be composed of the following organs:

(a) The Presidency;

(b) An Appeals Division, a Trial Division and a Pre-Trial Division;

(c) The Office of the Prosecutor;

(d) The Registry.

Article 35

Service of judges

1. All judges shall be elected as full-time members of the Court and shall be available to serve on that basis from the commencement of their terms of office.

2. The judges composing the Presidency shall serve on a full-time basis as soon as they are elected.

3. The Presidency may, on the basis of the workload of the Court and in consultation with its members, decide from time to time to what extent the remaining judges shall be required to serve on a full-time basis. Any such arrangement shall be without prejudice to the provisions of article 40.

4. The financial arrangements for judges not required to serve on a full-time basis shall be made in accordance with article 49.

Article 36

Qualifications, nomination and election of judges

1. Subject to the provisions of paragraph 2, there shall be 18 judges of the Court.

2. (a) The Presidency, acting on behalf of the Court, may propose an increase in the number of judges specified in paragraph 1, indicating the reasons why this is considered necessary and appropriate. The Registrar shall promptly circulate any such proposal to all States Parties.

(b) Any such proposal shall then be considered at a meeting of the Assembly of States Parties to be convened in accordance with article 112. The proposal shall be considered adopted if

2. The First Vice-President shall act in place of the President in the event that the President is unavailable or disqualified. The Second Vice-President shall act in place of the President in the event that both the President and the First Vice-President are unavailable or disqualified.

3. The President, together with the First and Second Vice-Presidents, shall constitute the Presidency, which shall be responsible for:

(a) The proper administration of the Court, with the exception of the Office of the Prosecutor; and

(b) The other functions conferred upon it in accordance with this Statute.

4. In discharging its responsibility under paragraph 3 (a), the Presidency shall coordinate with and seek the concurrence of the Prosecutor on all matters of mutual concern.

Chambers

1. As soon as possible after the election of the judges, the Court shall organize itself into the divisions specified in article 34, paragraph (b). The Appeals Division shall be composed of the President and four other judges, the Trial Division of not less than six judges and the Pre-Trial Division of not less than six judges. The assignment of judges to divisions shall be based on the nature of the functions to be performed by each division and the qualifications and experience of the judges elected to the Court, in such a way that each division shall contain an appropriate combination of expertise in criminal law and procedure and in international law. The Trial and Pre-Trial Divisions shall be composed predominantly of judges with criminal trial experience.

2. (a) The judicial functions of the Court shall be carried out in each division by Chambers.

(b) (i) The Appeals Chamber shall be composed of all the judges of the Appeals Division;

(ii) The functions of the Trial Chamber shall be carried out by three judges of the Trial Division;

(iii) The functions of the Pre-Trial Chamber shall be carried out either by three judges of the Pre-Trial Division or by a single judge of that division in accordance with this Statute and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence;

(c) Nothing in this paragraph shall preclude the simultaneous constitution of more than one Trial Chamber or Pre-Trial Chamber when the efficient management of the Court's workload so requires.

3. (a) Judges assigned to the Trial and Pre-Trial Divisions shall serve in those divisions for a period of three years, and thereafter until the completion of any case the hearing of which has already commenced in the division concerned.

(b) Judges assigned to the Appeals Division shall serve in that division for their entire term of office.

4. Judges assigned to the Appeals Division shall serve only in that division. Nothing in this article shall, however, preclude the temporary attachment of judges from the Trial Division to the Pre-Trial Division or vice versa, if the Presidency considers that the efficient management of the Court's workload so requires, provided that under no circumstances shall a judge who has participated in the pre-trial phase of a case be eligible to sit on the Trial Chamber hearing that case.

Article 40

Independence of the judges

1. The judges shall be independent in the performance of their functions.

2. Judges shall not engage in any activity which is likely to interfere with their judicial functions or to affect confidence in their independence.

3. Judges required to serve on a full-time basis at the seat of the Court shall not engage in any other occupation of a professional nature.

4. Any question regarding the application of paragraphs 2 and 3 shall be decided by an absolute majority of the judges. Where any such question concerns an individual judge, that judge shall not take part in the decision.

Article 41

Excusing and disqualification of judges

1. The Presidency may, at the request of a judge, excuse that judge from the exercise of a function under this Statute, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

2. (a) A judge shall not participate in any case in which his or her impartiality might reasonably be doubted on any ground. A judge shall be disqualified from a case in accordance with this paragraph if, inter alia, that judge has previously been involved in any capacity in that case before the Court or in a related criminal case at the national level involving the person being investigated or prosecuted. A judge shall also be disqualified on such other grounds as may be provided for in the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

(b) The Prosecutor or the person being investigated or prosecuted may request the disqualification of a judge under this paragraph.

(c) Any question as to the disqualification of a judge shall be decided by an absolute majority of the judges. The challenged judge shall be entitled to present his or her comments on the matter, but shall not take part in the decision.

Article 42

The Office of the Prosecutor

1. The Office of the Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Court. It shall be responsible for receiving referrals and any substantiated information on crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court, for examining them and for conducting investigations and prosecutions before the Court. A member of the Office shall not seek or act on instructions from any external source.

2. The Office shall be headed by the Prosecutor. The Prosecutor shall have full authority over the management and administration of the Office, including the staff, facilities and other resources thereof. The Prosecutor shall be assisted by one or more Deputy Prosecutors, who shall be entitled to carry out any of the acts required of the Prosecutor under this Statute. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutors shall be of different nationalities. They shall serve on a full-time basis.

3. The Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutors shall be persons of high moral character, be highly competent in and have extensive practical experience in the prosecution or trial of criminal cases. They shall have an excellent knowledge of and be fluent in at least one of the working languages of the Court.

4. The Prosecutor shall be elected by secret ballot by an absolute majority of the members of the Assembly of States Parties. The Deputy Prosecutors shall be elected in the same way from a list of candidates provided by the Prosecutor. The Prosecutor shall nominate three candidates for each position of Deputy Prosecutor to be filled. Unless a shorter term is decided upon at the time of their election, the Prosecutor and the Deputy Prosecutors shall hold office for a term of nine years and shall not be eligible for re-election.

4. The deliberations of the Trial Chamber shall remain secret.

5. The decision shall be in writing and shall contain a full and reasoned statement of the Trial Chamber's findings on the evidence and conclusions. The Trial Chamber shall issue one decision. When there is no unanimity, the Trial Chamber's decision shall contain the views of the majority and the minority. The decision or a summary thereof shall be delivered in open court.

Article 75

Reparations to victims

1. The Court shall establish principles relating to reparations to, or in respect of, victims, including restitution, compensation and rehabilitation. On this basis, in its decision the Court may, either upon request or on its own motion in exceptional circumstances, determine the scope and extent of any damage, loss and injury to, or in respect of, victims and will state the principles on which it is acting.

2. The Court may make an order directly against a convicted person specifying appropriate reparations to, or in respect of, victims, including restitution, compensation and rehabilitation.

Where appropriate, the Court may order that the award for reparations be made through the Trust Fund provided for in article 79.

3. Before making an order under this article, the Court may invite and shall take account of representations from or on behalf of the convicted person, victims, other interested persons or interested States.

4. In exercising its power under this article, the Court may, after a person is convicted of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court, determine whether, in order to give effect to an order which it may make under this article, it is necessary to seek measures under article 93, paragraph 1.

5. A State Party shall give effect to a decision under this article as if the provisions of article 109 were applicable to this article.

6. Nothing in this article shall be interpreted as prejudicing the rights of victims under national or international law.

Article 76

Sentencing

1. In the event of a conviction, the Trial Chamber shall consider the appropriate sentence to be imposed and shall take into account the evidence presented and submissions made during the trial that are relevant to the sentence.

2. Except where article 65 applies and before the completion of the trial, the Trial Chamber may on its own motion and shall, at the request of the Prosecutor or the accused, hold a further hearing to hear any additional evidence or submissions relevant to the sentence, in accordance with the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

3. Where paragraph 2 applies, any representations under article 75 shall be heard during the further hearing referred to in paragraph 2 and, if necessary, during any additional hearing.

4. The sentence shall be pronounced in public and, wherever possible, in the presence of the accused.

United Nations S/RES/1315 (2000)

Security Council

Distr.: General
14 August 2000

Resolution 1315 (2000)

Adopted by the Security Council at its 4186th meeting, on 14 August 2000

The Security Council:

Deeply concerned at the very serious crimes committed within the territory of Sierra Leone against the people of Sierra Leone and United Nations and associated personnel and at the prevailing situation of impunity,

Commending the efforts of the Government of Sierra Leone and the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) to bring lasting peace to Sierra Leone, Noting that the Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS agreed at the 23rd Summit of the Organization in Abuja on 28 and 29 May 2000 to dispatch a regional investigation of the resumption of hostilities,

Noting also the steps taken by the Government of Sierra Leone in creating a national truth and reconciliation process, as required by Article XXVI of the Lomé Peace Agreement (S/1999/777) to contribute to the promotion of the rule of law,

Recalling that the Special Representative of the Secretary-General appended to his signature of the Lomé Agreement a statement that the United Nations holds the understanding that the amnesty provisions of the Agreement shall not apply to international crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law,

Reaffirming the importance of compliance with international humanitarian law, and reaffirming further that persons who commit or authorize serious violations of international humanitarian law are individually responsible and accountable for those violations and that the international community will exert every effort to bring those responsible to justice in accordance with international standards of justice, fairness and due process of law,

Recognizing that, in the particular circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace,

00-60532 (E)

Taking note in this regard of the letter dated 12 June 2000 from the President of Sierra Leone to the Secretary-General and the Suggested Framework attached to it (S/2000/786, annex),

Recognizing further the desire of the Government of Sierra Leone for assistance from the United Nations in establishing a strong and credible court that will meet the objectives of bringing justice and ensuring lasting peace,

Noting the report of the Secretary-General of 31 July 2000 (S/2000/751) and, in particular, taking note with appreciation of the steps already taken by the Secretary-General in response to the request of the Government of Sierra Leone to assist it in establishing a special court,

Noting further the negative impact of the security situation on the administration of justice in Sierra Leone and the pressing need for international cooperation to assist in strengthening the judicial system of Sierra Leone,

Acknowledging the important contribution that can be made to this effort by qualified persons from West African States, the Commonwealth, other Member States of the United Nations and international organizations, to expedite the process of bringing justice and reconciliation to Sierra Leone and the region,

Reiterating that the situation in Sierra Leone continues to constitute a threat to international peace and security in the region,

1. Requests the Secretary-General to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court consistent with this resolution, and expresses its readiness to take further steps expeditiously upon receiving and reviewing the report of the Secretary-General referred to in paragraph 6 below;

2. Recommends that the subject matter jurisdiction of the special court should include notably crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, as well as crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone;

3. Recommends further that the special court should have personal jurisdiction over persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of the crimes referred to in paragraph 2, including those leaders who, in committing such crimes, have threatened the establishment of and implementation of the peace process in Sierra Leone;

4. Emphasizes the importance of ensuring the impartiality, independence and credibility of the process, in particular with regard to the status of the judges and the prosecutors;

5. Requests, in this connection, that the Secretary-General, if necessary, send a team of experts to Sierra Leone as may be required to prepare the report referred to in paragraph 6 below;

6. Requests the Secretary-General to submit a report to the Security Council on the implementation of this resolution, in particular on his consultations and negotiations with the Government of Sierra Leone concerning the establishment of the special court, including recommendations, no later than 30 days from the date of this resolution;

7. Requests the Secretary-General to address in his report the questions of the temporal jurisdiction of the special court, an appeals process including the advisability, feasibility, and appropriateness of an appeals chamber in the special court or of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda or other effective options, and a possible alternative host State, should it be necessary to convene the special court outside the seat of the court in Sierra Leone, if circumstances so require;

8. Requests the Secretary-General to include recommendations on the following:

(a) any additional agreements that may be required for the provision of the international assistance which will be necessary for the establishment and functioning of the special court;

(b) the level of participation, support and technical assistance of qualified persons from Member States of the United Nations, including in particular, member States of ECOWAS and the Commonwealth, and from the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone that will be necessary for the efficient, independent and impartial functioning of the special court;

(c) the amount of voluntary contributions, as appropriate, of funds, equipment and services to the special court, including through the offer of expert personnel that may be needed from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations;

(d) whether the special court could receive, as necessary and feasible, expertise and advice from the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda;

the Trial Chamber's "Decision on Defence Motions for Judgement of Acquittal Pursuant to Rule 98" was unambiguous in its meaning and effect.[109]

59. The Appellant Kanu submits that the Indictment failed to specify adequately locations in which certain crimes were committed and was therefore defective.[110] According to Kanu, where an Indictment is found to be defective, consideration must also be given to whether the Appellant was accorded a fair trial. In this instance, Kanu insists that he was entitled to assume that the list of alleged locations in the Indictment was exhaustive. He contends that "the word 'including' in the Indictment, in so far as it left the list of places open, did not make it clear that the crimes in question were also committed in locations . . . other than those expressly mentioned."[111] According to Kanu, this defect materially affected his ability to prepare his defence and is contrary to the general principle of law requiring that "the location of crimes alleged to have been committed be specified in the Indictment with as much clarity as possible so that the Accused is not materially prejudiced in the preparation of his defence."[112]

60. All the Appellants therefore submit that the Trial Chamber correctly arrived at its conclusion and in so doing protected the fair trial rights of the Appellant.

3. Discussion: Reversal of a Previous Interlocutory Decision

61. We find that Trial Chamber II reconsidered the decision reached by Trial Chamber I and came to a different conclusion with respect to the pleading of locations in the Indictment.

62. It seems to us that the following questions arise for determination:

(i) Whether Trial Chamber II properly reconsidered issues relating to the alleged defects in the Indictment;

(ii) If Trial Chamber II had such power, whether it ought not to have given the parties an opportunity to be heard on the matter.

63. In the Ntagerura et al. case, the ICTR Appeals Chamber held that it falls within the discretion of a Trial Chamber to reconsider a previous decision if a clear error of reasoning has been demonstrated or if it is necessary to prevent an injustice.[113] We endorse that opinion. Consequently, whether or not an issue relating to the form of an indictment should be reconsidered should be determined on a case-by-case basis having regard to the stage of proceedings, the issues raised by the earlier decision and the effect of reconsideration or reversal on the rights of the Parties.

64. With regard to question (ii) the Parties ought to have been given an opportunity to be heard on the matter as natural justice demands. However, even if they failed to accord the Parties that opportunity, this Chamber has the power to review the situation and come to its own conclusion in the interest of justice. In all the circumstances of the case, we opine that the Trial Chamber's error in not expressly giving notice to the Parties of its intention to reconsider the pre-trial decision, and its failure to re-open the hearings did not invalidate the decision. The Trial Chamber's limited treatment of the evidence of crimes committed in such locations was a proper exercise of its discretion in the interest of justice, taking into account that it is the Prosecution's obligation to plead clearly material facts it intends to prove, so as to afford the Appellants a fair trial.

65. The Prosecution's Second Ground of Appeal therefore fails.

C. Prosecution's Fourth Ground of Appeal and Kanu's Tenth Ground of Appeal: Joint Criminal Enterprise

1. Trial Chamber's Findings

66. Prior to the establishment of Trial Chamber II, Trial Chamber I, ruling on a preliminary motion brought by the Appellant, dealt with several pre-trial issues in this case, including the form of the Indictment and the pleading of joint criminal enterprise ("JCE") as a form of liability. In this regard the Trial Chamber held that:

> "the Indictment in its entirety, is predicated upon the notion of joint criminal enterprise . . [and that] the nature of the alleged joint criminal enterprise, the nature of the Accused's participation in it, the identity of those involved in the same, and the time frame of the alleged joint criminal enterprise are all pleaded with the degree of particularity as the factual parameters of the case admits."[114]

67. On 17 January 2005, the case was transferred to Trial Chamber II. In the AFRC Trial Judgment, Trial Chamber II revisited the question whether joint criminal enterprise was properly [114] Kamara Form of the Indictment Decision, para. 52.

(b) Discussion

119. The thrust of this Ground of Appeal is that it challenges the Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence and its findings of fact. Brima has not advanced any arguments in support of his contention that the Trial Chamber erred in law and fact by resolving any reasonable doubt in favour of the Prosecution. His general allegation that witnesses had a motive to lie and that their evidence was inconsistent or contradictory, does not refer to any particular instance of error in the Trial Chamber's analysis of the evidence. On the contrary, the judgment shows that the Trial Chamber carefully considered all the evidence before it, assessed the credibility of the prosecution witnesses including the fact that their evidence was not discredited during cross-examination, and concluded that the witnesses were credible and their evidence reliable.[205] Brima has not demonstrated any error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence of these witnesses.

120. With respect to the alleged inconsistency between the prior statement and trial testimony of witness TF1-184, the Appeals Chamber reiterates that this is clearly a matter for the Trial Chamber's evaluation. The mere existence of inconsistencies in the testimony of a witness does not undermine the witness's credibility. The Trial Chamber has broad discretion to determine the weight to be given to discrepancies between a witness's testimony and his prior statements. The Appeals Chamber will normally uphold a Trial Chamber's findings on issues of credibility, including its resolution of inconsistent evidence and will only find that an error of fact occurred when it determines that no reasonable tribunal could have made the impugned finding.

121. The same reasoning applies to Brima's submission that there were discrepancies between the testimonies of witnesses TF1-334 and TF1-167 relating to events in Karina.[206] The Appeals Chamber reiterates that it is for the Trial Chamber to determine whether discrepancies discredit a witness's testimony. When faced with competing versions of events, it is the prerogative of the Trial Chamber to determine which one is more credible.[207] In its consideration of witness TF1-184's evidence the Trial Chamber stated that:

> "although the evidence of the witness was unclear at times, in its cross-examination of the witness the Defence raised no significant inconsistencies between his evidence in chief and his prior statement to the Prosecution. In addition, the Trial Chamber finds that the witness was not shaken on cross-examination and was generally corroborated by other witnesses."[208]

[206] Brima Appeal Brief, para. 177.
[207] Rutaganda Appeal Judgment, para. 29.

Brima has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber either committed an error or acted unreasonably in making the above finding.

122. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Brima's Ninth Ground of Appeal.

2. Brima's Tenth and Eleventh Grounds of Appeal: Failure to Consider the Rivalry Between Brima and Witness TF1-334

123. Under his tenth and eleventh Grounds of Appeal, Brima alleges that the Trial Chamber failed to consider his testimony of the rivalry that existed between himself and Prosecution witness TF1-334 and that this occasioned a miscarriage of justice. Similarly, he submits that out of a total of 146 prosecution and defence witnesses called to testify at the trial, the Trial Chamber disproportionately relied on the evidence of two witnesses namely TF1-334 and TF1-167, and that this occasioned a further miscarriage of justice.

124. In his Appeal Brief filed on 13 September 2007, Brima did not proffer any arguments in support of the above Grounds of Appeal, but opted to associate himself with Kamara's submissions in support of Ground Eight of the latter's Appeal. The Appeals Chamber will therefore consider Grounds Ten and Eleven of Brima's Appeal when it deals with Ground Eight of Kamara's Appeal.

B. Kamara's Eighth Ground of Appeal: Credibility of Prosecution Witnesses

1. Submissions of the Parties

125. Kamara challenges the credibility of Prosecution witnesses TF1-334, TF1-167, TF1-184 and TF1-153 and submits that these witnesses were co-perpetrators of the crimes for which the Appellants were convicted, and therefore the Trial Chamber ought to have approached their evidence with particular caution. In addition, he submits that in return for their testimony before the Trial Chamber, witnesses TF1-334, TF1-167 and TF1-184 received preferential treatment while in detention at Pademba Road prison. Furthermore, according to Kamara, there were unresolved discrepancies in the evidence of the Prosecution witnesses and the Trial Chamber failed to provide a reasonable explanation why it chose to rely on the evidence of one witness and not the other. He adds that the Trial Chamber should have evaluated the credibility of the Prosecution witnesses in light of the evidence as a whole, and requests the Appeals Chamber to "review the evidence given by witnesses TF1-153, TF1-334, TF1-184 and TF1-167 especially with regard to issues on which the Trial Chamber relied in order to enter a guilty verdict."[209]

126. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber correctly instructed itself on the appropriate legal standards applicable to accomplice evidence.[210] In response to the submission that the Trial Chamber had relied exclusively on certain witnesses, the Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber had not violated the principle enunciated by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Kupreškić et al. that it must convict in light of the whole trial record.[211] It submits further that the Trial Chamber did address the alleged discrepancies in the testimonies of TF1-334 and TF1-167, and found some to be significant and others not to be so. In its view, Kamara had not established any error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the credibility of the witnesses in question.[212]

2. Discussion

(a) The Trial Chamber's Approach to Accomplice Evidence

127. The Trial Chamber in paragraph 125 of its Judgment states that "none of these Prosecution witnesses has been charged with any crimes and their evidence cannot, therefore, be described as 'accomplice evidence'."[213] The jurisprudence of the international criminal tribunals demonstrates that a witness facing criminal charges based on the same allegations as the accused may be considered an accomplice under the law. However, there is no requirement that in order to qualify as an accomplice, a witness must have been charged with a specific offence. The Trial Chamber, therefore, erred in finding that the witnesses of the Prosecution were not accomplices simply because they were not charged with any criminal offence.

128. The next issue for the Appeals Chamber's determination is whether the Trial Chamber's error invalidated its decision. If after evaluation of evidence of an accomplice the Trial Chamber comes to the conclusion that the witness is nonetheless credible and his evidence reliable, the Trial Chamber can rely on it to enter a conviction. The Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that in

[211] Ibid at para. 4.57.
[212] Prosecution Response Brief, para. 4.65.
[213] AFRC Trial Judgment, para. 125.

assessing the reliability of accomplice evidence, the main consideration for the Trial Chamber should be whether or not the accomplice has an ulterior motive to testify as he did.

129. Whilst it is safe for a Trial Chamber to look for corroboration in such circumstances, it may convict on the basis of the evidence of a single witness, even an accomplice, provided such evidence is viewed with caution. In considering the credibility of certain Prosecution witnesses, the Trial Chamber noted that:

> "The Defence calls into issue the credibility of certain Prosecution witnesses because these individuals have allegedly been implicated in crimes under the jurisdiction of the court, or in domestic crimes, or that they were informants to the police, or admitted taking drugs. The Brima Defence specifically alleges that Witness George Johnson killed Brima's brother and that this was reason enough for the witness to "attempt to fabricate" evidence against the accused. A witness with a self-interest to serve may seek to inculpate others and exculpate himself, but it does not follow that such a witness is incapable of telling the truth. Hence, the mere suggestion that a witness might be implicated in the commission of crimes is insufficient for the Trial Chamber to discard that witness's testimony." [214]

130. With respect to the specific allegation that certain witnesses might have been induced to testify against the Appellant, the Trial Chamber held that:

> "The Trial Chamber is satisfied that these payments have been made in a transparent way and in accordance with the applicable Practice Direction. Allegations to the contrary are therefore without merit... Accordingly, the Trial Chamber has not given undue weight to these alleged 'incentives' when assessing the credibility of the witnesses in question."[215]

131. The Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that even though the Trial Chamber did not say that prosecution witnesses TF1-334, TF1-184 and TF1-167 (George Johnson) were accomplices, the Trial Chamber was mindful of Kamara's allegations that these witnesses may have been involved in criminal conduct or otherwise have reason to give false testimony.

132. For example, in addressing the issue of the credibility of witness TF1-334, the Trial Chamber noted that "[t]he witness revealed that he had sought and received an assurance from the Office of the Prosecutor that he would not be prosecuted for any crimes he had committed."[216] The Trial Chamber concluded, however, that he was a credible and reliable witness, that his evidence

152. Kanu has not established that the Trial Chamber erred in its evaluation of the evidence of the witnesses or that its evaluation was unreasonable. His submission that the Trial Chamber tended to prefer the evidence of Prosecution witnesses, therefore, lacks merit.

153. With respect to Kanu's submission that the Trial Chamber attached less weight to the evidence of Defence witnesses because that evidence had not been put to the Prosecution witnesses in cross-examination, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did take into consideration the fact that the Rules of the Special Court do not oblige a party to put its case to a witness.[242] The Trial Chamber considered that it would not be in the interests of justice to set aside the relevant Defence testimony, but rather proceeded to take this factor into account in assessing the weight to be attached to such evidence. The Appeals Chamber opines that the Trial Chamber's approach was in conformity with the Rules, which give it a discretion to apply the rules of evidence which best favour a fair determination of the matter before it.[243]

154. Kanu submits that the Trial Chamber failed to examine thoroughly the evidence of Prosecution witnesses TF1-033, TF1-334 and George Johnson, and to give sufficient reasons why it proceeded to accept their evidence in spite of material omissions and inconsistencies in their separate accounts. The Appeals Chamber reiterates that the Trial Chamber has a discretion to determine the weight to be given to discrepancies between a witness' testimony and his prior statements. It is for the Trial Chamber to determine whether discrepancies discredit a witness' testimony and, when faced with competing versions of events, to determine which one is more credible.

155. With respect to Kanu's submissions regarding Prosecution witness George Johnson, the mere fact that the Trial Chamber found his evidence relating to certain events to be unreliable does not warrant dismissal of his entire testimony. The same reasoning applies to the Appellant's

[242] Ibid at paras 132-133. The Trial Chamber found that "[i]n contrast to its ICTY and ICTY counterparts, the Rules of the Special Court do not oblige a Party to put its case to a witness. As claimed by the Prosecution, the Defence did lead evidence in the Defence case which was not put to Prosecution witnesses in cross-examination.... In the circumstances the Trial Chamber considers that it would not be in the interests of justice to set aside the testimony of the relevant Defence witnesses. However, in assessing the weight to be given to such evidence, the Trial Chamber will take into account that the evidence was not put to the Prosecution witnesses, with the result that the Trial Chamber did not have the benefit of observing their reactions." ICTY Rule 90(H)(ii) and ICTR Rule 90(G)(ii) provide that "[i]n the cross-examination of a witness who is able to give evidence relevant to the case for the cross-examining party, counsel shall put to that witness the nature of the case of the party for whom that counsel appears which is in contradiction to the evidence given by the witness."

submission regarding Prosecution witness TF1-033. The Trial Chamber after evaluating that witness' evidence had concluded that:

> "While the witness appears on occasion to have exaggerated figures and was unclear on dates, he did not fabricate events. The Trial Chamber further found the witness truthful at trial, and is unwilling to conclude that his evidence overall is not credible or reliable."[244]

156. Kanu also submits that Prosecution witness TF1-033 did not mention the stay of the AFRC troops in Mansofinia, and that this was a significant omission on the part of the witness given that Mansofinia was the location where the AFRC troops restructured and reorganised for the advance to Freetown. The Trial Chamber noted that witness TF1-033 testified that AFRC troops were restructured at Yaya instead of at Mansofinia, and that the first stop of the troops after Yaya was Yiffin.[245] The Trial Chamber also observed that witness TF1-334 testified that the first stop of the troops after Mansofinia was at a village called "Yayah" and that witness George Johnson testified that "Yarya" was one of the villages the troops passed through on their way to Mansofinia.[246]

157. The Trial Chamber concluded that the reason for this inconsistency was that witness TF1-033's recollection of the location was mistaken, but that nonetheless his evidence generally corroborated that of witnesses TF1-334 and George Johnson. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber reasoned that its conclusion was supported by the fact that witness TF1-033 had also been confused in relation to the hometown of the Appellant Brima. The Appeals Chamber considers that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to arrive at this conclusion. The evidence of the three Prosecution witnesses in question i.e. TF1-033, TF1-334 and George Johnson on the troop restructure generally corroborated each other, and all of them mentioned a village called "Yarya" as the place at which the AFRC stopped either on the journey to Mansofinia, or during the advance to Freetown.[247] The alleged inconsistencies in the witnesses' accounts were therefore not so significant as to warrant a different factual finding by the Trial Chamber.

158. With respect to the evidence of Prosecution witness Gibril Massaquoi, the Trial Chamber observed that there were internal discrepancies in his evidence, as well as discrepancies between his

C. Kamara's Fifth and Sixth Grounds of Appeal: Aiding and Abetting Crimes in Freetown and the Western Area

241. Kamara contends that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact by finding him guilty under Article 6(1) for aiding and abetting the mutilation of civilians in Freetown and other parts of the Western Area as well as the killing of civilians at Fourah Bay.[353] In particular, he argues that the Trial Chamber erroneously "applied a wider standard of liability instead of the stricter standard to find the Appellant guilty as an aider and abettor based on its analysis of the mens rea of aiding and abetting."[354] He submits that the Trial Chamber was required to find that he was aware that his acts assisted the specific crime committed by the principal perpetrator and that he was aware of the essential elements of that crime.[355]

1. Errors of Law

242. In discussing the mens rea for aiding and abetting, the Trial Chamber stated:

> "The mens rea required for aiding and abetting is that the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator. However, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor had knowledge of the precise crime that was intended and which was actually committed, as long as he was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, including the one actually committed."[356]

243. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber was correct in its analysis. The Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in both Blaškić and Simić found that it was not necessary to prove that the aider and abettor knew the precise crime that was intended or actually committed by the principal perpetrator.[357] In both cases the ICTY Appeals Chamber held further that liability for aiding and abetting requires proof that the accused knew that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, that one of those crimes was in fact committed, and that the accused was aware that his conduct assisted the commission of that crime.[358] The Appeals Chamber endorses this principle.

(d) Conflicting Testimony of Witness TF1-334 and Witness TF1-167

267. Kamara submits that the Trial Chamber failed to reconcile the conflicting testimony of witness TF1-334 and witness TF1-167 concerning the burning of five young girls inside a house in Karina in Bombali District.[415] He argues that in failing to provide a reasoned opinion explaining its evaluation of the conflicting evidence, the Trial Chamber failed to establish that it was proved beyond reasonable doubt that he is liable as a superior under Article 6(3) of the Statute.[416] Kamara had advanced similar arguments in respect of the testimony of witnesses TF1-167 and TF1-334 concerning an order that prisoners released from Pademba Road Prison should move to State House and that AFRC troops should burn houses and parastatals in Freetown.[417]

268. While it is preferable for the Trial Chamber to state its reasons for accepting the evidence of one witness over that of another when they are contradictory, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record.[418] Rather it may only make findings of material facts that are essential to the determination of guilt in relation to a particular Count. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber has set out in its Judgment the standard of review for the evaluation of witness testimony.[419]

(e) Kamara's Responsibility as a Superior for Crimes in Freetown

269. The Appeals Chamber now turns to Kamara's final contention that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him responsible as a superior for crimes committed by AFRC troops in Freetown on the basis of evidence indicating that he was present at meetings and at headquarters at State House immediately following its capture on 6 January 1999.[420] Kamara asserts that such evidence does not form the basis upon which his liability as a superior could be assessed. The Appeals Chamber considers that Kamara misconstrues the Trial Chamber's findings. The Trial Chamber noted evidence that Kamara was present at meetings, but drew no inferences or conclusions from the evidence as the Prosecution did not lead evidence about Kamara's contributions at those meetings.[421] The Appeals Chamber finds this conclusion to be reasonable.

[421] AFRC Trial Judgment, para. 1945.

The Trial Chamber held that Kanu "planned, organised and implemented the system to abduct and enslave civilians which was committed by AFRC troops in Bombali and Western Area." It further held that Kanu "had the direct intent to establish and implement the system of exploitation involving the three enslavement crimes, namely, sexual slavery, conscription and use of children under the age of 15 for military purposes, and abductions and forced labour."[453] The Trial Chamber was, therefore, satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Kanu bore individual criminal responsibility under Article 6(1) for planning the commission of the above crimes in the Bombali District and the Western Area.[454]

299. Kanu argues that while the evidence shows that it fell upon him, as Chief of Staff, to manage the system of slavery within the AFRC faction, he could not be convicted on that basis for planning the crimes of sexual slavery, conscription and use of children for military purposes, and abductions and forced labour.[455] He further argues that at best, the evidence implicates him at the execution stage in the military training of children and the exploitation of women for sexual purposes.[456]

300. The Prosecution responds that Kanu's position of influence in the AFRC and his admission that he managed this system of slavery amply justify a reasonable inference that he was involved in planning the above crimes.[457]

2. Discussion

301. The Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber's definition of planning under Article 6(1). The Trial Chamber stated that " 'planning' implies that one or several persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases."[458] Circumstantial evidence may provide proof of the existence of a plan, and an individual may incur responsibility for planning when his level of participation is substantial even though the crime may have actually been committed by another person.[459] According to the Trial Chamber, the actus reus for planning requires that "the accused, alone or together with others, designated [sic] the criminal conduct constituting the crimes charged."[460] While "there must be a sufficient link between the planning of a crime both at the preparatory and the execution phases," it is "sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct."[461] The Trial Chamber further stated that the mens rea "requires that the accused acted with direct intent in relation to his or her own planning or with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed ... in the execution of that plan."[462]

302. With regard to sexual slavery, the Trial Chamber found that:

> "In Bombali District the Accused Kanu designed and implemented a system to control abducted girls and women. All abducted women and girls were placed in the custody of the Accused. Any soldier who wanted an abducted girl or woman to be his "wife" had to 'sign for her'. The Accused informed his fighters that any problems with the women were to be immediately reported back to him, and that he would then monitor the situation. The Accused issued a disciplinary instruction ordering that any woman caught with another woman's husband should be beaten and locked in a box."[463]

On the basis of this evidence, the Trial Chamber was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Kanu was responsible for planning the commission of the crime of sexual slavery in the Bombali District and the Western Area. The Appeals Chamber agrees.

303. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the conscription and use of children for military purposes, as well as abductions and forced labour in the Bombali District and the Western Area. In the case of Bombali District, the Trial Chamber found that Kanu was in charge of forced military training of civilians at Camp Rosos and that children below the age of 15 years were among those forced to undergo training.[464] On the basis of this evidence, the Trial Chamber was satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that in the Bombali District Kanu was not only responsible for planning the conscription of children under the age of 15 into an armed group, but also for using such children to participate actively in hostilities, as well as for the crime of enslavement.

304. Regarding the Western Area, the Trial Chamber also found that Kanu "continued in his positions as Chief of Staff and commander in charge of civilians in Freetown and the Western Area" and that he had "approximately ten child combatants in his charge in Benguema following Chamber is able to infer that the Trial Chamber must have failed to exercise its discretion properly."[471]

C. Excessive Sentences: Ground Twelve of Brima's Appeal and Ground Ten of Kamara's Appeal

310. Brima alleges that the Trial Chamber erred by imposing a global sentence of fifty years, that it is "excessively harsh and disproportionate," and that it is inconsistent with the sentencing guidelines of the ICTY and the ICTR.[472] Kamara's Tenth Ground of Appeal argues that the Trial Chamber was required by Article 19(1) of the Statute to consider the sentencing practices in the ICTR and the national courts of Sierra Leone.[473] Kamara further argues that a sentence of 45 years is inconsistent with the penalties that have been imposed by the ICTR.[474]

311. Article 19(1) of the Statute provides that the "Trial Chamber, as appropriate, shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone." The phrase "where appropriate" shows that the Trial Chamber has a discretion in determining when to have recourse to sentencing practices in the two courts.

D. Mitigating Factors: Ground Nine of Kamara's Appeal and Grounds Eleven, Fifteen, Sixteen, Seventeen and Eighteen of Kanu's Appeal

312. The Appellants make two distinct submissions with regard to mitigating factors. First, that the Trial Chamber did not consider mitigating factors and second, that particular mitigating factors were not given adequate weight.[475]

313. Rule 101(B) of the Rules provides that the "Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19(2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as: ...any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person

II. PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS

6. The Kanu Defence objected to the documents annexed to the Prosecution Sentencing Brief on the grounds that (1) the Prosecution purported to introduce new evidence through these documents;[11] (2) the Prosecution did not comply with its disclosure obligations under the rules in relation to (Annex G); the expert report was not objective and the Defence was not in a position to call their own expert in rebuttal on such short notice;[12] (3) the introduction of new Prosecution evidence would amount to an abuse of process;[13] (4) the witness statements provided by the Prosecution are inadmissible, or alternatively, the Defence should have had an opportunity to cross-examine the proposed witnesses;[14] and (5) other material submitted by the Prosecution is irrelevant.[15]

7. In its oral arguments, the Prosecution submitted that it is allowed to introduce additional evidence at the sentencing stage. The Prosecution argued that since the Special Court has two distinct procedures it was not necessary for it to adduce such evidence at the trial stage.[16]

8. The Trial Chamber upholds the Defence objections and has not taken into consideration the documents annexed to the Prosecution Sentencing Brief.

9. The Trial Chamber recalls the general principle that only matters proved beyond reasonable doubt against the Accused are to be considered against him at the sentencing stage.[17] Aggravating circumstances must be proved beyond reasonable doubt[18], whilst mitigating circumstances need only be proved on a balance of probability.[19]

III. APPLICABLE LAW

A. Applicable Provisions

10. Sentencing in the Special Court is regulated by the provisions of Article 19 of the Statute of the Special Court ("Statute") and Rule 101 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules"). Article 19 of the Statute provides:

> 1. The Trial Chamber shall impose upon a convicted person, other than a juvenile offender, imprisonment for a specified number of years. In determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone.
> 2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.
> 3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chamber may order the forfeiture of the property, proceeds and any assets acquired unlawfully or by criminal conduct, and their return to their rightful owner or to the State of Sierra Leone.

Rule 101 of the Rules provides:

>
> (B) In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 19 (2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as:
>
> (i) Any aggravating circumstances;
>
> (ii) Any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction;
>
> (iii) The extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9(3) of the Statute.
>
> (C) The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.
> (D) Any period during which the convicted person was detained in custody pending his transfer to the Special Court or pending trial or appeal, shall be taken into consideration on sentencing.

11. According to the above provisions the Trial Chamber is obliged to take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person. Aggravating and mitigating circumstances and the general practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (ICTR) and the domestic courts of Sierra Leone shall, where appropriate, be taken into account. These requirements are not exhaustive and the Trial

Chamber has the discretion to determine an appropriate sentence depending on the individual circumstances of the case.[20]

12. The Trial Chamber agrees with the holding of the ICTR Appeals Chamber in Prosecutor v. Kambanda, that "[...] the Statute is sufficiently liberally worded to allow for a single sentence to be imposed. Whether or not this practice is adopted is within the discretion of the Chamber".[21] The governing criteria is that the final or aggregate sentence should reflect the totality of the culpable conduct, or generally, that it should reflect the gravity of the offences and the overall culpability of the offender, so that it is both just and appropriate.[22] In the present case the Trial Chamber finds it is appropriate to impose a global sentence for the multiple convictions in respect of Brima, Kamara and Kanu.

B. Sentencing Objectives

13. The preamble of the United Nations Security Council Resolution 1315 (2000)[23] recognises that

> [...]in the particular circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace.[24]

14. Retribution, deterrence and rehabilitation have been considered as the main sentencing purposes in international criminal justice.[25]

15. Furthermore, international criminal tribunals have held that retribution is not to be understood as fulfilling a desire for revenge but rather as duly expressing the outrage of the national and international community at these crimes,[26] and that is meant to reflect a fair and balanced

Furthermore, unlike vengeance, retribution incorporates a principle of restraint; retribution requires the imposition of a just and appropriate punishment, and nothing more", *R. v. M. underlying criminal conduct;[34] the form and degree of participation of the Accused[35] or the specific role played by the Accused in the commission of the crime;[36] the degree of suffering, impact or consequences of the crime for the immediate victim in terms of physical, emotional and psychological effects;[37] the effects of the crime on relatives of the immediate victims and/or the broader targeted group;[38] the vulnerability of the victims;[39] and the number of victims.[40]

20. Where an Accused has been found liable as a commander pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute, two levels of consideration are necessary in determining the gravity of the offence: (1) the gravity of the underlying crime committed by a subordinate under the effective control of the Accused, and (2) the gravity of the Accused's own conduct in failing to prevent or punish the crimes committed by that subordinate.[41]

2. Aggravating Circumstances

21. The aggravating and mitigating circumstances to be taken into account by the Trial Chamber are not exhaustively set out in the Rules.[42] Thus, the Trial Chamber is tasked with the charge of weighing the individual circumstances of each case and has discretion to identify the relevant factors. The Trial Chamber may consider, for example,

> (i) the position of the accused, that is, his position of leadership, his level in the command structure, or his role in the broader context of the conflict [...]; (ii) the discriminatory intent or the discriminatory state of mind for crimes for which such a state of mind is not an element or ingredient of the crime; (iii) the length of time during which the crime continued; (iv) active and direct criminal participation, if linked to a high-rank position of command, the accused's role as fellow perpetrator, and the active participation of a superior in the criminal acts of subordinates; (v) the informed, willing or enthusiastic participation in crime; (vi) premeditation and motive; (vii) the sexual, violent, and humiliating nature of the acts and the vulnerability of the victims; (viii) the status of the victims, their youthful age and number, and the effect of the crimes on them; (ix) the character of the accused; and (x) the circumstances of the offences generally.[43]

22. The Trial Chamber may also consider the fact that attacks directed against protected persons were carried out in places of religious worship or sanctuary, to be an aggravating factor in sentencing.

23. Facts which go to proof of the gravity of the offence and facts which constitute aggravating factors may overlap.[44] The practice of some Trial Chambers has been to consider the gravity of the offence together with aggravating circumstances.[45] The Trial Chamber considers that, regardless of the approach, where a factor has already been taken into account in determining the gravity of the offence, it cannot be considered additionally as an aggravating factor and vice versa.[46] Similarly, if a factor is an element of the underlying offence, then it cannot be considered as an aggravating factor.[47]

24. The Trial Chamber may consider the abuse of a position of power by an accused held criminally responsible for a crime under Article 6(1) of the Statute to be an aggravating factor.[48] Where an accused has been found liable for the crimes of a subordinate under Article 6(3) of the Statute his/her mere position of command will not be considered by the Trial Chamber as an aggravating factor as it is an element of liability.[49] However, where it has been proved that an accused actively abused his/her command position or otherwise promoted, encouraged or participated in the crimes of his/her subordinates, such conduct may amount to an aggravating circumstance.[50]

3. Mitigating Circumstances

25. Under Rule 101(B) any substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction must be considered as a mitigating circumstance.[51] In addition, the Trial Chamber has the discretion to identify and weigh other mitigating factors according to the

Leonean practice can only be considered as a guide but is not binding on the Trial Chamber.[57] It further refers to the Serushago Trial Chamber's assessment of mitigating circumstances in that case,[58] and cites a number of cases before the ICTY and ICTR in which high ranking officials convicted on numerous counts were given lighter sentences than those proposed by the Prosecutor in the instant case.[59]

30. The Kamara Defence notes that the Kamara was convicted of having ordered the killing of five girls in Karina, Bombali District, and submits that the average sentencing period at the ICTR for the offences of murder and extermination has been between ten and fifteen years.[60] It further argues that Sierra Leonean practice on sentencing for murder is not binding on the Trial Chamber.[61]

31. The Kanu Defence proposes that the Trial Chamber should take into consideration the sentencing practice of the ICTY, as it is a basis for ICTR practice, and may provide the Trial Chamber with additional guidance.[62] The Prosecution would appear to agree as it provided a chart on ICTY sentencing practice in Annex B of its Sentencing Brief. The Kanu Defence contends that in Sierra Leone, a sentence of life imprisonment can be imposed for a range of crimes including "rape, burglary and gilding coinage"[63] while the ICTR has only imposed life sentences on individuals convicted of the crime of genocide.[64] In oral arguments, the Kanu Defence further submitted that Sierra Leonean sentencing practice is only relevant for convictions under Article 5 of the Statute which deals with crimes under Sierra Leonean law, which crimes were not charged in the indictment.[65]

B. Deliberations

(a) Sentencing Practice in Sierra Leone

32. Article 19(1) states that as appropriate, the Trial Chamber shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the national courts of Sierra Leone as and when appropriate. This does not oblige the Trial Chamber to conform to that practice, but rather to take into account that practice as and when appropriate.[66] The Trial Chamber finds that it is not appropriate to adopt the practice in the present case since none of the Accused was indicted for, nor convicted of, offences under Article 5 of the Statute.

(b) Sentencing Practice at other International Tribunals

33. Article 19(1) of the Statute provides that the Trial Chamber shall, where appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the ICTR in determining the terms of imprisonment. The Trial Chamber will also consider the sentencing practice of the ICTY as its statutory provisions are analogous to those of the Special Court and the ICTR. The Trial Chamber is therefore guided by the sentencing practices at both the ICTR and the ICTY. The Chamber further notes that the pronouncement of global sentences is a well established practice at those tribunals.[67] The mitigating and aggravating factors that the Trial Chamber has considered in the instant case have also been widely considered by the ICTR and ICTY.[68]

V. DETERMINATION OF SENTENCES

34. Brima, Kamara and Kanu have been found responsible for some of the most heinous, brutal and atrocious crimes ever recorded in human history. Innocent civilians – babies, children, men and women of all ages – were murdered by being shot, hacked to death, burned alive, beaten to death. Women and young girls were gang raped to death. Some had their genitals mutilated by the insertion of foreign objects. Sons were forced to rape mothers, brothers were forced to rape sisters. Pregnant women were killed by having their stomachs slit open and the foetus removed merely to settle a bet amongst the troops as to the gender of the foetus. Men were disembowelled and their intestines stretched across a road to form a barrier. Human heads were placed on sticks on either side of the road to mark such barriers. Hacking off the limbs of innocent civilians was commonplace. The victims were babies, young children and men and women of all ages. Some had Revised pursuant to Corrigendum issued by the Trial Chamber on 19 July 2007.

(a) Discrepancies Between the Evidence of Various Witnesses, or Between the Evidence of a Particular Witness and a Previous Statement

110. It is the responsibility of the Trial Chamber to resolve any inconsistencies that may arise within and/or amongst witnesses' testimonies. In doing so, the Trial Chamber has discretion to evaluate any inconsistencies, to consider whether the evidence taken as a whole is reliable and credible and to accept or reject the 'fundamental features' of the evidence.[168] In this context, the Trial Chamber endorses the statement of the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Kupreškić that

> [t]he presence of inconsistencies in the evidence does not, per se, require a reasonable Trial Chamber to reject it as being unreliable. Similarly, factors such as the passage of time between the events and the testimony of the witness, the possible influence of third persons, discrepancies, or the existence of stressful conditions at the time the events took place do not automatically exclude the Trial Chamber from relying on the evidence.[169]

111. A number of witnesses gave evidence of horrific events in which they personally suffered the amputation of one or both arms, or were raped, or saw such atrocities inflicted on members of their families, or who witnessed family members being tortured and killed. Recounting this evidence in court evoked strong emotional reactions in all of these witnesses, many of whom broke down in tears. As a result, the Trial Chamber took the view that there may have been memories which prevented the witnesses from giving a full account of their experiences to the Court, or which prevented them from articulating in detail what they had endured.[170] The Trial Chamber also took into consideration the possibility that any observations made by the witnesses at the relevant time may have been affected by terror or stress[171]. While these circumstances do not necessarily mean that such evidence is not reliable, the Trial Chamber has weighed it with particular scrutiny.

112. During the trial, both the Prosecution and the Defence made use of pre-trial statements from witnesses – and sometimes of interview notes – for the purpose of cross-examination. In many instances both parties alleged inconsistencies and contradictions between the pre-trial statements of witnesses and their evidence at trial. The Trial Chamber accepts that the information given in such a statement will not always be identical to the witness's oral evidence. This may be because the witness was asked questions at trial not previously asked, or may in his or her testimony remember details previously forgotten[172]. The Trial Chamber has also taken into account that the six to eight years that have passed since the events in the Indictment have, in all likelihood, affected the altered his findings. For instance, he was reluctant to accept the new evidence of witness TRC-01 and other Defence witnesses which contradicted his own position.[1083]

551. Ultimately, however, the Trial Chamber considers both military expert reports to be of limited use in examining the organisational structure of the AFRC faction. This is firstly because their reports are primarily relevant for only a short temporal and geographic period in the Indictment, as both experts focused on the organisation of the AFRC troops from Colonel Eddie Town to Freetown (November 1998 through January 1999). However, throughout the Indictment period (May 1997 through January 2000), the AFRC underwent significant organisational changes at certain key points and it is therefore erroneous to assume that the structure at one point in time is reflective of the structure throughout the entire period.

552. In addition, the Trial Chamber found the methodology used by the experts of little assistance. Both experts examined the AFRC with a view to determining whether it was a traditional military organisation, using a four pronged test devised by Colonel Iron.[1084]

553. The experts defined a number of structural features of traditional military organisations which, in the Trial Chamber's view, were present in the AFRC in only a rudimentary form. For example, the experts discussed the importance of the span of command, which refers to the number of units or sub-units at any one level that one person might command.[1085] Colonel Iron explained that the establishment of sub-units at each hierarchical level of command increases the control that each individual commander possesses.[1086] The evidence indicates that AFRC troops were divided into battalions, but the number of battalions varied at different times and the number of men in each battalion appears to have fluctuated.[1087] In a regular army, a "staff" is appointed to assist the commander.[1088] While SAJ Musa established some kind of staff structure at Colonel Eddie Town,[1089] the evidence establishes that the AFRC officers lacked sufficient military training to properly fulfil staff functions.[1090]

[1084] Major-General Prins adopted Colonel Iron's methodology: Exhibit D-36, Prins Report para. 10. The four elements of the test were whether the AFRC had a recognisable military hierarchy and structure; whether it exhibited the characteristics of a traditional military organisation; whether there was coherent linkage between strategic, operational and tactical levels; and whether command was effective.

not be associated with, or acting on behalf, a State. To give the protection against crimes relating to child soldiers its intended effect, it is justified not to restrict 'conscription' to the prerogative of States and their legitimate Governments, as international humanitarian law is not grounded on formalistic postulations.[1427] Rather, the Trial Chamber adopts an interpretation of 'conscription' which encompasses acts of coercion, such as abductions[1428] and forced recruitment[1429], by an armed group against children, committed for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities.

735. 'Enlistment' entails accepting and enrolling individuals when they volunteer to join an armed force or group.[1430] Enlistment is a voluntary act, and the child's consent is therefore not a valid defence.[1431]

736. 'Using' children to "participate actively in the hostilities" encompasses putting their lives directly at risk in combat.[1432] As a footnote attached to the Preparatory Conference on the establishment of the International Criminal Court states

> The words "using" and "participate" have been adopted in order to cover both participation in combat and also active participation in military activities linked to combat such as scouting, spying, sabotage and use of children as decoys, couriers or at military checkpoints."[1433]

737. It is the Trial Chamber's view that the use of children to participate actively in hostilities is not limited to participation in combat. An armed force requires logistical support to maintain its operations. Any labour or support that gives effect to, or helps maintain, operations in a conflict constitutes active participation. Hence carrying loads for the fighting faction, finding and/or acquiring food, ammunition or equipment, acting as decoys, carrying messages, making trails or finding routes, manning checkpoints or acting as human shields are some examples of active participation as much as actual fighting and combat.

738. The elements of 'armed forces or groups' entail that the armed forces or groups must be under responsible command, which entails a degree of organization which should be such as to

774. The Trial Chamber agrees with the Prosecution that an accused may be responsible for "reissuing illegal orders", i.e., for receiving a criminal order from a superior and, in turn, instructing subordinates to act upon it.[1497]

(e) Aiding and abetting

775. The actus reus of 'aiding and abetting' requires that the accused gave practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of a crime.[1498] "Aiding and abetting" may be constituted by contribution to the planning, preparation or execution of a finally completed crime.[1499] Such contribution may be provided directly or through an intermediary[1500] and irrespective of whether the participant was present or removed both in time and place from the actual commission of the crime.[1501] Mere presence at the scene of crime without preventing its occurrence does not per se constitute aiding and abetting.[1502]. However, the presence at a crime scene of a person who is in a position of authority may be regarded as an important indication for encouragement or support.[1503]

776. The mens rea required for aiding and abetting is that the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator. However, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor had knowledge of the precise crime that was intended and which was actually committed, as long as he was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, including the one actually committed.[1504]

777. The Prosecution contends that a "persistent failure to prevent or punish crimes by subordinates over time may also constitute aiding or abetting."[1505] The Trial Chamber agrees that, while such failure entails a superior's responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute, it may also be a basis for his liability for aiding and abetting, subject to the mens rea and actus reus requirements being fulfilled.[1506]

III. DELIBERATIONS

19. Rule 54 states:

> "At the request of either party or of its own motion, a Judge or a Trial Chamber may issue such orders, summonses, subpoenas, warrants and transfer orders as may be necessary for the purposes of an investigation or for the preparation or conduct of the trial".

20. The Rule is a general rule in unambiguous language. Clearly, the test for whether the Trial Chamber ought to issue the orders sought by the Defence, is whether to do so is necessary (not simply useful or helpful) for the purposes of an investigation or for the preparation or conduct of the trial.[4]

21. The relief sought by the Motion is based on events alleged to have occurred on two dates, 6 April, 2005, when a group of 5 soldiers and ex-soldiers visited the Special Court, and 23 April 2005, when Military Police searched the houses of a potential witness and a clerk to one of the Defence Counsel. From what Defence Counsel told the Court on 26 April 2005, it is probable that the potential witness involved in the latter incident was one of the group of 5 involved in the earlier incident.[5]

Incident on 6 April, 2005.

22. According to the Defence, the group of 5 soldiers and ex-soldiers were denied access to the detainees and have since refused to visit again because of the way they were treated by Special Court security.

23. Considering all the facts available, we were unable to find anything to justify the claim that they were refused access to the detainees. In fact, they were permitted to visit the Special Court[6], but when they asked to see the detainees they were asked to fill out an application and wait for approval[7]. That requirement is not unreasonable and is well within the powers of the Chief of Detention. In fact, it would be unreasonable for any visitor to expect to be shown a red carpet straight through to the Detention Facility without having to undergo any formalities.

24. Under Rule 41 of the Rules of Detention, the Chief of Detention, in consultation with the Registrar, has the power to impose such restrictions and supervision on visits to detainees as he may deem necessary in the interests of the administration of justice or the security and good order of the Detention Facility. All visitors are obliged to comply with the separate requirements of the visiting regime of the Detention Facility, which may include personal searches, and any person who refuses to comply with such requirements shall be refused access.

light of the several challenges to the indictment raised by the Defence, this Trial Chamber deems it necessary to recall, with emphasis, its major judicial focus as regards defects in the form of indictments in the context of international criminality. The Trial Chamber's focus is that:

> where the allegations relate to ordinary or conventional crimes within the setting of domestic or national criminality, the degree of specificity required for pleading the indictment may be much greater than it would be where the allegations relate to unconventional or extraordinary crimes for example, mass killings, mass rapes and wanton and widespread destruction of property (in the context of crimes against humanity and grave violations of international humanitarian law) within the setting of international criminality.[19]

20. The Trial Chamber wishes to observe that the same general judicial focus is shared by our sister tribunals ICTY and ICTR. Admittedly, how each tribunal applies this judicial approach to individual cases of alleged defects in the form of the indictment must, and will, necessarily vary with the particular context, specific parameters of the criminal activities forming the substrata of the allegations charged in the indictment, and the totality of the circumstances as alleged.

21. Given the frequent citation before the Trial Chamber of ICTY and ICTR case-law authorities for the Chamber's guidance as the interpretation of general principles of law in the context of international criminal adjudication, largely due to the nascent character of the Special Court's evolving jurisprudence, this Trial Chamber deems it necessary to comment on this forensic trend.

22. In this connection, the Trial Chamber emphasises that its application of the ICTY and ICTR jurisprudence is not due to a statutory imperative predicated upon a binding relationship of these UN Security Council-established International Criminal Tribunals on the Special Court; indeed, the Statute of the Special Court specifies that the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be "guided" by, and not bound by, decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the two International Tribunals.[20] There is, however, a special relationship envisioned between the Special Court and the magnitude on which the acts or events allegedly took place, (iv) the circumstances under which the crimes were allegedly committed, (v) the duration of time over which the said acts or events constituting the crimes occurred, (vi) the time span between the occurrence of the events and the filing of the indictment, (vii) the totality of the circumstances surrounding the commission of the alleged crimes."

See also, Report of the Secretary-general on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone, S/2000/915, 4 October 2000 ("Report of the Secretary-General on Special Court"), paras 40-46 (on the proposal of sharing one Appeals Chamber between the International Tribunals and the Special Court). Paragraph 41 is particularly instructive: "While in theory the establishment of an overarching Appeals Chamber as the ultimate judicial authority in matters of interpretation and application of international humanitarian law offers a guarantee of developing a coherent body of law, in practice, the same result may be achieved by linking the jurisprudence of the Special Court to that of the International Tribunals, without imposing on the shared Appeals Chamber the financial and administrative constraints of formal institutional link."

33. In regard to errors of fact: On appeal where errors of fact are alleged also pursuant to Article 20 of the Statute and Rule 106 of the Rules, the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact reached by a Trial Chamber. Where it is alleged that the Trial Chamber committed an error of fact, the Appeals Chamber will give a margin of deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial. This is because it is the Trial Chamber that is best placed to assess the evidence, including the demeanour of witnesses. The Appeals Chamber will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous.[62] The Appeals Chamber applies the same reasonableness standard to alleged errors of fact regardless of whether the finding of fact was based on direct or circumstantial evidence.[63]

34. The Appeals Chamber adopts the statement of general principle contained in the ICTY Appeals Chamber decision in Kupreškić, as follows:

> ". . . the task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial is left primarily to the Trial Chamber. Thus, the Appeals Chamber must give a margin of deference to a finding of fact reached by a Trial Chamber. Only where the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber could not have been accepted by any reasonable tribunal of fact or where the evaluation of the evidence is wholly erroneous may the Appeals Chamber substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber."[64]

35. In regard to procedural errors: Although not expressly so stated in Article 20 of the Statute, not all procedural errors vitiate the proceedings. Only errors that occasion a miscarriage of justice would vitiate the proceedings. Such are procedural errors that would affect the fairness of the trial. By the same token, procedural errors that could be corrected or waived or ignored (as immaterial or inconsequential) without injustice to the parties would not be regarded as procedural errors occasioning a miscarriage of justice.

"encouragement" and "moral support" are two forms of conduct which may lead to criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting a crime.[156]

72. The Appeals Chamber agrees that "encouragement" and "moral support" may constitute the actus reus and that acts of aiding and abetting can be made at a time and place removed from the actual crime.

73. In regard to the actus reus for aiding and abetting, the Trial Chamber found that Kondewa's speech at the First Passing Out Parade had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crimes in Tongo.[157] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber found that at the First Passing Out Parade Norman instructed the Kamajors "to kill captured enemy combatants and 'collaborators' to inflict physical suffering or injury upon them and to destroy their houses."[158] After Norman and Fofana spoke "all the fighters looked at Kondewa, admiring him as a man with mystic powers, and he made the last comment saying that the time for surrender of the rebels had long been exhausted and that they did not need any surrendered rebels."[159] The Trial Chamber then found that in uttering these words Kondewa effectively supported Norman's instructions and encouraged the Kamajors to execute Norman's unlawful orders.[160] The Trial Chamber also noted that no fighter would go to war without Kondewa's blessing because they believed that Kondewa transferred his mystical powers to commit such acts.[161]

74. In addition to his spiritual responsibilities, Kondewa was, together with Norman and Fofana, the three people regarded as what was referred to as the "Holy Trinity" at Base Zero; the three of them were the key and essential components of the leadership structure[162] and were the three people who according to the Trial Chamber actually made the decisions and nobody could make a decision in their absence.[163]

75. Even though the First Passing Out Parade in December 1997 was temporally and geographically removed from the second and third attacks on Tongo Town, the Appeals Chamber observes that one of the purposes of the Passing Out Parade was for Norman to give instructions to the Kamajors for the second and third attacks on Tongo Town,[164] not just instructions concerning unlawful acts. For this reason temporal and geographic remoteness is not of significance to the question of whether Kondewa's speech substantially contributed to the perpetration of the crimes. Thus, in the light of all the circumstances of this case, a reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that the only inference available on the evidence was that through his blessings and speech at the First Passing Out Parade Kondewa substantially contributed to the perpetration of the crimes in Tongo Town.

76. Regarding the requisite mens rea, the Appeals Chamber agrees with Kondewa that the Trial Chamber erroneously relied on the fact that he had received the report to Base Zero of the Kamajors' previous crimes in Tongo. On the contrary, the Trial Chamber found that Norman and Fofana received this report, not Kondewa.[165] Thus, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in relying on this report.[166]

77. It is the unchallenged finding of the Trial Chamber, that Norman at the Passing Out Parade ordered the Kamajors to commit criminal acts in Tongo, and that Kondewa who spoke after Norman, knew of the orders of Norman when he said: "a rebel is a rebel; surrendered, not surrendered, they're all rebels . . . [t]he time for their surrender had long since been exhausted, so we don't need any surrendered rebel ... I give you my blessings; go my boys, go."[167] The Trial Chamber further found that "no fighter would go to war without Kondewa's blessings because they appropriate caution in reviewing the hearsay evidence.[385] Third, Kondewa submits that the Trial Chamber erred in its reliance on circumstantial evidence to convict him of murder because "inferences reasonably to be drawn from the evidence must not only be consistent with Kondewa's guilt but inconsistent with every reasonable hypothesis of Kondewa's innocence."[386] He asserts that a number of alternative explanations exist, such as that the Town Commander could have been murdered by someone else.[387]

197. In response, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber took into account the hearsay evidence only as corroborating the eyewitness testimony of Witness TF2-096.[388] Therefore, the Prosecution submits that this evidence and the inferences to be drawn from all of the relevant evidence in the case as a whole were not only consistent with Kondewa's individual responsibility for shooting and killing one of the town commanders, but were inconsistent with any reasonable hypothesis of Kondewa's innocence.[389] The Prosecution argues that Witness TF2-096's testimony that the Town Commander "fell" should naturally be understood as a statement that the victim was shot dead.[390] The Prosecution argues that this was the understanding of everyone in the courtroom including the Defence Counsel, as there was no objection to the Prosecution's subsequent question about how the witness knew the person who killed the town commander.[391]

198. Before assessing whether the Trial Chamber erred in its application of the law to the facts, the Appeals Chamber considers it necessary to set out the applicable law. The Appeals Chamber considers that as a matter of law it is permissible to base a conviction on circumstantial evidence and/or hearsay evidence.[392] Because hearsay evidence is admissible as substantive evidence in order to prove the truth of its contents, the Appeals Chamber considers that establishing the reliability of hearsay evidence is of paramount importance.[393] collective punishments in Count 7 and the crimes in Counts 2, 4 and 5, the Trial Chamber impermissibly widened the interpretation of punishment for the purposes of collective punishments beyond the conduct charged in Counts 2, 4 and 5.[419] In particular, the Trial Chamber found that "the term punishment in the first element [of collective punishments] is meant to be understood in its broadest sense and refers to all types of punishments."[420] Kondewa submits that the Trial Chamber therefore erred in finding that "because the actus reus and the mens rea of collective punishments can be broader than the 'punishments' of Count [sic] 1-5, it is permissible to enter convictions under Count 7 as well as Counts 2-5."[421]

219. The Prosecution argues that when an accused has been charged with two crimes in relation to the same conduct, the relevant question is whether the two statutory provisions, as a matter of law, both contain a materially distinct element not contained in the other.[422] The question is not whether the two statutory provisions, as a matter of fact, are each based on a material fact on which the other is not based.[423] The Prosecution argues that the relevant crimes, as a matter of law, contain materially distinct elements and that cumulative convictions are therefore permissible.[424]

2. Discussion

220. The Trial Chamber held that the "issue of cumulative convictions arises when more than one conviction is imposed for the same criminal conduct" and that multiple convictions for the same conduct are permissible if each statutory provision has a materially distinct element not contained in the other.[425] Elements are materially distinct from one another if each requires proof of a fact not required by the other.[426] The Trial Chamber stated that "multiple convictions may only be upheld if circumstances be cured by timely, clear and consistent information detailing the factual basis underpinning the charges against him or her.[723]

364. The Appeals Chamber finds that paragraph 28 of the Indictment is clear in establishing that the material facts supporting criminal responsibility under Count 6 are the material facts pleaded in relation to Counts 1 to 5 of the Indictment. These include "threats to kill, destroy and loot." The Trial Chamber, therefore, erred in stating it would only consider crimes "charged and found to have been committed under Counts 1-5 in the Indictment."[724] The Trial Chamber should have considered all conduct that was adequately pleaded in the Indictment irrespective of whether such conduct satisfied the elements of any other crimes under Counts 1-5.

365. Whether the Trial Chamber's error invalidates the decision is discussed below as it is dependent on whether the Trial Chamber erred in its determination of the mens rea requirement for acts of terrorism. In particular, Fofana's and Kondewa's liability for acts of terrorism under Article 6(1) and Article 6(3) of the Statute depends on whether they had the requisite mens rea for liability as aiders and abetters or superiors. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber will examine whether a reasonable tribunal of fact could have found, as the Trial Chamber did, that neither Fofana nor Kondewa had the requisite mens rea.

(b) Fofana's and Kondewa's Responsibility for Aiding and Abetting Acts of Terrorism in Tongo

366. The Appeals Chamber has previously endorsed the following statement of the mens rea for aiding and abetting:

> "The mens rea required for aiding and abetting is that the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator. However, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor had knowledge of the precise crime that was intended and which was actually committed, as long as he was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, including the one actually committed."[725]

of Fofana's and Kondewa's sentences. The Submissions of the Parties are discussed below in relation to each alleged error.

2. Standard of Review

465. The relevant provisions on sentencing are Article 19 of the Statute and Rules 99 to 105 of the Rules. Both Article 19 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules contain provisions for sentencing. According to the provision of Article 19, a Trial Chamber must take into account the gravity of the offence[897] and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.[898] The Statute also provides that in determining the term of imprisonment the Trial Chamber shall have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the ICTR and the national courts of Sierra Leone, as appropriate. According to Rule 101 of the Rules, aggravating and mitigating circumstances shall, inter alia, be taken into account.[899] Rule 101(c) of the Rules provides that the Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently.

466. Appeals against sentence, as appeals from a judgement of a Trial Chamber, are appeals stricto sensu. They are not trials de novo.[900] Trial Chambers are vested with broad discretion in [897] The ICTY Appeals Chamber has held that the determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime. Prosecutor v. Kupreškić et al., IT-95-16-T, International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Trial Chamber, Judgement, 14 January 2000, para. 852, endorsed in Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para. 182. See also Blaškić Appeal Judgement, para. 683.

[898] The ICTY Appeals Chamber has held that the individual circumstances of the convicted person consist of a non-exhaustive list of mitigating and aggravating circumstances. Mitigating circumstances previously recognized by the ICTY include: (1) co-operation with the Prosecution; (2) the admission of guilt or a guilty plea; (3) the expression of remorse; (4) voluntary surrender; (5) good character with no prior criminal convictions; (6) comportment in detention; (7) personal and family circumstances; (8) the character of the accused subsequent to the conflict; (9) duress and indirect participation; (10) diminished mental responsibility; (11) age; and (12) assistance to detainees or victims. Aggravating circumstances previously recognized by the ICTY include: (i) the position of the accused, that is, his position of leadership, his level in the command structure, or his role in the broader context of the conflict of the former Yugoslavia; (ii) the discriminatory intent or the discriminatory state of mind for crimes for which such a state of mind is not an element or ingredient of the crime; (iii) the length of time during which the crime continued; (iv) active and direct criminal participation, if linked to a high-rank position of command, the accused's role as fellow perpetrator, and the active participation of a superior in the criminal acts of subordinates; (v) the informed, willing or enthusiastic participation in crime; (vi) premeditation and motive; (vii) the sexual, violent, and humiliating nature of the acts and the vulnerability of the victims; (viii) the status of the victims, their youthful age and number, and the effect of the crimes on them; (ix) civilian detainees; (x) the character of the accused; and (xi) the circumstances of the offences generally. See Blaškić Appeal Judgement, paras 685-686, 696

[899] In addition, Trial Chambers are obliged to take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9(3) of the Statute and in Rule 101(B)(iii).

[900] Kupreškić Appeal Judgement, para. 408; Prosecutor v. Mucić et al., IT-96-21-A*bis*, International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia, Appeals Chamber, Judgement on Sentence Appeal, 8 April 2003, para. 11; Čelebići Appeal Judgement, para. 203.

determining an appropriate sentence due to their obligation to individualise the penalties to fit the circumstances of the accused and the gravity of the crime.[901] The Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings relevant to sentencing by the Trial Chamber.[902] As a general rule, the Appeals Chamber will not revise a sentence unless the Appellant demonstrates that the Trial Chamber has committed a "discernible error" in exercising its discretion or has failed to follow the applicable law.[903]

467. In the AFRC Appeal Judgment, the Appeals Chamber explained that to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in exercising its discretion:

> "the Appellant has to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber gave weight to extraneous or irrelevant considerations, failed to give weight or sufficient weight to relevant considerations, made a clear error as to the facts upon which it exercised its discretion, or that the Trial Chamber's decision was so unreasonable or plainly unjust that the Appeals Chamber is able to infer that the Trial Chamber must have failed to exercise its discretion properly."[904]

3. Alleged Refusal to Consider Sentencing Practices of the National Courts of Sierra Leone

(a) Trial Chamber Findings

468. Article 19(1) of the Statute states: "the Trial Chamber shall, as appropriate, have recourse to the practice regarding prison sentences in the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda and the national courts of Sierra Leone."[905]

469. The Trial Chamber held that it would not give consideration to the sentencing practice in Sierra Leone because Fofana and Kondewa had not been convicted of any crime under Sierra Leone

(c) Discussion

475. The Appeals Chamber notes that at the time the ICTY Statute took effect, the former Yugoslavia had domestic legislation criminalizing "acts against humanity and international law."[919] Similarly, at the time the ICTR Statute took effect, Rwanda had domestic legislation criminalizing war crimes, crimes against humanity and genocide.[920] In contrast, Sierra Leone has not criminalized war crimes and crimes against humanity as such, and consequently there is no specifically relevant sentencing practice for a Trial Chamber to refer to.

476. The Special Court has jurisdiction over crimes defined in Sierra Leone law in addition to certain international crimes. Bearing this in mind, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that the best interpretation of the word "appropriate" is that a Trial Chamber is to have recourse to the practice of the ICTR for convictions for war crimes and crimes against humanity and is to have recourse to the national courts in Sierra Leone for convictions under Sierra Leone law contained in Article 5 of the Statute.

477. In the result, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber did not err in holding that it will not consider the sentencing practice of Sierra Leone.

> Additionally, the process of sentencing is intended to convey the message that globally accepted laws and rules have to be accepted by everyone.[44]

31. In fact, the sentence imposed must be individualized and proportionate to the conduct of the Accused.[45]

3. Sentencing Factors

32. The Chamber notes that Article 19 and Rule 101(B) stipulate that certain factors have to be considered in determining an appropriate sentence. These include the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the Accused, any aggravating and mitigating factors, and where appropriate, the general sentencing practices of the ICTR and of the national courts of Sierra Leone.

3.1. Gravity of the Offence

33. The Chamber is of the view that the "gravity of the offence" is an important principle in determining the sentence to be imposed by the Court. The determination of the gravity of the offence, which has been regarded as the "litmus test for the appropriate sentence",[46] requires a "consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of participation of the Accused in the crime".[47] In considering the gravity of the offence, the Chamber has taken into account such factors as the scale and brutality of the offences committed,[48] the role played by the Accused in their commission,[49] the degree of suffering or impact of the crime on the immediate victim, as well as its effect on relatives of the victim,[50] and the vulnerability and number of victims.[51]

34. In assessing the role of the Accused in the crime, the Chamber has taken into account the mode of liability under which the Accused was convicted, as well the nature and degree of his participation in the offence. In particular, the Chamber has considered whether the Accused was held liable as an indirect or a secondary perpetrator.[52] In assessing the gravity of offences for which the Accused was convicted as a superior, the Chamber has considered the gravity of the underlying offence and the gravity of the conduct of the Accused in failing to prevent or punish the crimes committed by the subordinate.[53]

35. The Chamber is of the opinion however, that the factors it has taken into account in assessing the gravity of the offence, cannot, in addition, be taken into account as aggravating circumstances.[54] Similarly, the Chamber takes the view that factors which it considers and accepts to lessen the gravity of the offence, cannot be taken into account as mitigating circumstances.

3.2. Aggravating Factors

36. Aggravating factors must be shown to have been established by the Prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt.[55] Only circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence charged, and for which the Accused has been convicted, can be considered to be aggravating.[56] If a particular circumstance is an element of the underlying offence, it cannot be taken into account as an aggravating factor.[57]

The Chamber notes that the Prosecution has discussed some of these factors, including the vulnerability and age of victims and the humiliating and degrading nature of the acts, as aggravating factors (Prosecution Sentencing Brief, para 56). The Chamber is of the view that these are more appropriately considered in relation to its determination of the gravity of the offence.

37. We observe that since the Statute and the Rules do not exhaustively list the circumstances that the Chamber may consider to be aggravating, the courts have, through their Decisions and Judgements, developed jurisprudence on the factors that may be considered as aggravating. These include the leadership role of the Accused,[58] premeditation and motive,[59] a willing and enthusiastic participation in the crime,[60] and the length of time during which the crime was committed.[61]

38. The Chamber is of the view that the position of leadership of an Accused held criminally responsible for a crime under Article 6(1) of the Statute, can be considered to be an aggravating circumstance.[62] However, if an Accused has been found liable under Article 6(3), his leadership position cannot be considered by the Chamber as an aggravating factor as it is in itself a constitutive element of the offence.[63] Where the Accused has actively abused his position of command or participated in the crimes of his subordinates however, such conduct can be considered to be aggravating.[64]

39. Breach of trust or authority, where the Accused was in a position that carries with it a duty to protect or defend the victims, such as in the case of a government official, police chief or commander, can be an aggravating factor, and even where the Accused held no official position of authority, it is an aggravating factor, if he held a position of prominence or trust in the community.[65]

3.3. Mitigating Factors

40. Mitigating factors must be established by the Defence on a balance of probabilities.[66] Under Rule 101(B), the only mitigating circumstance that the Chamber is required to consider is the substantial cooperation of the Accused with the Prosecutor. The Chamber, however, has the discretion to consider other factors or circumstances in mitigation, such as the expression of remorse,[67] good character with no prior convictions,[68] personal and family circumstances,[69] behaviour and conduct subsequent to the conflict, particularly with respect to promoting peace and reconciliation,[70] good behaviour in detention,[71] and assistance to detainees or victims.[72] The Chamber has also considered the prevailing circumstances operating at the time of the commission of the crimes, and the motive of the Accused in determining whether there should be a mitigation of the sentence.

4. Sentencing Practice of Other International Tribunals

41. Article 19(1) directs the Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices adopted at the ICTR. In their written and oral submissions, the Parties also drew the Chamber's attention to jurisprudence from the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ("ICTY").[73] The Chamber is of the view that the sentencing practice of both international tribunals is instructive, and has considered these practices where appropriate. However, it is also aware of the limitations of the use that can be made of the sentencing practices of these tribunals. In particular, it notes that the practice of imposing global sentences at both tribunals makes it difficult to ascertain the sentence imposed for each individual crime. Moreover, the Chamber notes that many of the sentences at the ICTR were imposed in relation to the crime of genocide, which is not an offence within the jurisdiction of the Special Court.

5. Sentencing Practice of Sierra Leonean Courts

42. Article 19(1) authorizes the Trial Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices of Sierra Leonean domestic courts. The Prosecution contends that in determining the gravity of the offence, the Chamber should consider that the offences for which the Accused have been found guilty, would attract the death penalty or life imprisonment under Sierra Leonean law.[74] Both Fofana and Kondewa submit that given that the Accused were not convicted of any offences under Article 5 of the Statute which incorporates offences under Sierra Leonean legislation, the court should not consider Sierra Leonean sentencing practice.[75]

43. In this regard, the Chamber notes that the Accused were neither indicted nor convicted for any of the offences enumerated under Article 5 of the Statute. Furthermore, the Statute of the Special Court does not provide for either capital punishment or imposition of a "life sentence", which are the punishments that the most serious crimes under Sierra Leonean law attract. For these reasons, the Chamber finds that it would be inappropriate to rely on the sentencing practices of Sierra Leonean Courts in determining the punishment to be imposed on either Fofana or on Kondewa.

V. DELIBERATIONS

44. The Chamber has considered both the Parties' written briefs and their oral submissions, made in court during the Sentencing Hearing, as they relate to the gravity of the offence, as well as subordinate is required. It is sufficient that there is proof of some position of authority on the part of the Accused that would compel another to commit a crime in compliance with the Accused's order.[286] Such authority can be de jure or de facto and can be reasonably implied.[287] The Chamber is of the view that a "causal link between the act of ordering and the physical perpetration of a crime [...] also needs to be demonstrated as part of the actus reus of ordering" but that this "link need not be such as to show that the offence would not have been perpetrated in the absence of the order."[288]

226. The Chamber finds that to establish the mens rea requirement for "ordering" a crime, the Prosecution must prove that the Accused either intended to bring about the commission of the crime or that the Accused had reasonable knowledge that the crime would likely be committed as a consequence of the execution or implementation of that order.

4.1.6. Aiding and Abetting

227. The Chamber notes that the Prosecution charges the Accused pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute with aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of the crimes referred to in the Indictment.[289]

228. It is the view of the Chamber that "aiding and abetting" consists of the act of rendering practical assistance, encouragement or moral support, which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of a certain crime.[290] "Aiding and abetting" can include providing assistance, helping, encouraging, advising, or being sympathetic to the commission of a particular act by the principal offender.[291]

229. The Chamber is of the opinion that the actus reus of aiding and abetting requires that the Accused carries out an act specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime and that this act of the aider and abettor must have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[292] "Proof of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider or abettor and the commission of the crime, or proof that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime, is not required."[293] Further, taking into account the specific wording of Article 6(1) of the Statute that "[a] person who [...] aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime", this Chamber is of the opinion that the actus reus of aiding and abetting a crime may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated and at a location geographically removed from the location of the principal crime.[294] The Chamber reiterates, however, that the act of the aider and abettor must have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.

230. Mere presence at the scene of a crime will not usually constitute aiding and abetting. Where, however, such presence provides encouragement or support to the principal offender, that may be sufficient. For example, the presence of a person with superior authority at the scene of a principal crime may be probative to determining whether such person encouraged or supported the principal perpetrator.[295] The Chamber also notes that a superior's failure to punish for past crimes might result in acts that would constitute instigation or aiding and abetting for further crimes.[296]

231. The Chamber recognises that the mens rea of aiding and abetting is the knowledge that the acts performed by the Accused assist the commission of the crime by the principal offender.[297]

796. The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced proves beyond reasonable doubt that the acts described in paragraph 786 [Count 2] and in paragraph 791 [Count 4] were perpetrated with the specific intent to punish the civilian population in Koribondo and the surrounding areas.

797. The Chamber is therefore satisfied, in relation to those acts described in paragraph 786 [Count 2] and in paragraph 791 [Count 4], that both the general requirements of war crimes and the specific elements of collective punishments have been proved beyond reasonable doubt with respect to each incident.

3.5.1.4. Conclusion

798. On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds that it has been proved beyond reasonable doubt that Fofana is individually criminally responsible as a superior, pursuant to Article 6(3), for the crimes committed in Koribondo as found under Counts 2, 4 and 7 above.

3.5.2. Responsibility of Kondewa

3.5.2.1. Responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1)

799. The Chamber takes the view that Kondewa's speech at the passing out parade in early January 1998 was words of moral support and encouragement to the Kamajor fighters who were about to conduct military operations on the junta-held territories. The Chamber finds, however, that this speech does not amount to urging, encouraging or prompting the Kamajors to commit criminal acts. This evidence does not demonstrate beyond reasonable doubt that Kondewa intended to provoke or induce the commission of the criminal acts which the Chamber found were committed by Kamajors subsequently during the attack on Koribondo or that Kondewa had reasonable knowledge that criminal acts would likely be committed as a result of his speech.

800. Furthermore, the Chamber finds that giving moral support or blessing as well as providing medicine which the Kamajors believed would protect them against the bullets does not constitute aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation of execution of the criminal acts. We find that there is no evidence to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that at the time of giving his speech and providing his medicine Kondewa was aware of the Kamajors' intention to commit any criminal acts, which the Chamber found were committed by the Kamajors in Koribondo during the attack.

Chamber, in applying Rule 54 of the Rules, chose an unduly restrictive standard for the issuance of a subpoena. According to the Appellant, this standard, which was erroneously drawn from the jurisprudence of the ICTY, resulted in an infringement of his fundamental rights under Article 17(4)(c) of the Statute.[16] Appellant Norman makes a similar submission in his third ground of appeal, arguing that the threshold for issuing a subpoena was set too high, "trivialising" the rights of the accused.[17] The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber applied the correct test and that it was appropriate for the Trial Chamber to be guided by the jurisprudence of the ICTY Appeals Chamber.[18]

12. Both Appellants argue that it was inappropriate for the Trial Chamber to adopt the test articulated in the ICTY Appeals Chamber jurisprudence.[19] We disagree. In accordance with Article 20 of the Statute – which provides that the Appeals Chamber "shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the international tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda" – the Trial Chamber was right in choosing to be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chambers of these tribunals. While the Trial Chambers are not technically required by Article 20 to refer to the jurisprudence of the international tribunals, it is nevertheless prudent for the Trial Chamber to carefully consider relevant comparative jurisprudence. This is logical since Trial Chamber decisions may be reviewed by the Appeals Chamber, which is statutorily required to consider ICTR and ICTY "guidance".[20]

13. Article 20 of the Statute does not say that decisions of the ICTR and ICTY are binding on the Trial or Appeals Chambers of the Special Court for Sierra Leone – this Chamber is only required to refer to them as a guide. We, therefore, do not accept the Prosecutor's submission that the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court may not depart from the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR Appeals Chambers unless there are "cogent reasons in the interests of justice for so doing, and only after the most careful consideration . . . ."[21] The Statute requires the Appeals Chamber to look to the jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR Appeals Chambers for guidance, but does not require the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court to follow this jurisprudence. This body of case law is persuasive, but it is not directly applicable or binding. While there is value in developing a coherent approach across international criminal tribunals on both substantive and procedural questions, it must be emphasised that the Special Court is a hybrid court. Useful guidance may be gleaned from the experience of the other international criminal tribunals, but this Special Court is not bound by their decisions. This Appeals Chamber will, however, follow relevant jurisprudence where it is appropriate to do so.

14. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber does not accept the Appellants' arguments that the Trial Chamber should have preferred the ICTR approach to issuing a subpoena over that of the ICTY.[22] A Trial Chamber does not commit an error of law when it opts to follow one line of persuasive jurisprudence rather than another or rather than breaking new ground.

15. As correctly determined by the Trial Chamber, appropriate guiding authority is found in the ICTY Appeals Chamber interlocutory appeals decisions in the Halilović[23] and Krstić cases.[24] Neither Appellant has satisfied the Appeals Chamber that the ICTR has taken a different approach or that the alleged ICTR approach should have been adopted. The Appellants rely on two ICTR Trial Chamber decisions to support their argument. Rather than showing a difference in approach, these two decisions tend to demonstrate that the ICTR Trial Chambers applied the same test as that of the ICTY Appeals Chamber.

16. In order to demonstrate the ICTR's divergent approach to the subpoena question, the Appellants first cite a decision of a single judge of ICTR Trial Chamber I in the Bagosora et al. case.[25] Although this decision does not directly refer to any authority, it nevertheless

THE APPEALS CHAMBER of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("the Special Court");

SEIZED of a Preliminary Motion Based on Lack of Jurisdiction: Judicial Independence, filed on 26 June 2003 on behalf of Sam Hinga Norman ("the Preliminary Motion");

NOTING the Prosecution Response filed on 7 July 2003[1]; the Applicant's Reply filed on 14 July 2003[2]; and the referral of the Motion to the Appeals Chamber under Rule 72(E) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Special Court ("the Rules") on 17 September 2003[3];

NOTING the intervention by Moinina Fofana for which substantive submissions were filed on 31 October 2003[4];

NOTING that an oral hearing was held on 5 November 2003;

HAVING CONSIDERED THE ORAL AND WRITTEN SUBMISSIONS OF THE PARTIES;

HEREBY DECIDES AS FOLLOWS:

I. INTRODUCTION

1. This ruling concerns a Preliminary Motion filed on 26 June 2003 on behalf of Sam Hinga Norman ("the Applicant"), one of the persons standing trial before the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("the Court") in Case No. SCSL-2004-14[5]. The Preliminary Motion was referred to the Appeals Chamber of the Court pursuant to Rule 72(E) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Special Court ("the Rules").

2. By the Preliminary Motion the applicant challenges the jurisdiction of the Court to try him.

[5] The Preliminary Motion was filed under Case No.SCSL-2003-08. Following the Decision and Order on Prosecution Motions for Joinder of 27 January 2004, and the subsequent Registry Decision for the Assignment of a new Case Number of 3 February 2004, this new case number has been assigned.

3. By virtue of Rule 72(B) of the Rules, preliminary motions by an accused are objections based on lack of jurisdiction; defects in the form of indictment; the denial of request for assignment of counsel; and abuse of process or applications for severance of crimes joined in one indictment under Rule 49, or for separate trials under Rule 82(B).

4. Rule 72(B) does not expressly describe a motion based on the fairness of a trial or alleging an infringement of the right of an accused to a fair hearing or, in effect, seeking a reclusion of the judges as a preliminary motion. An objection that the Court lacks judicial independence is basically, and in substance, an objection to the fairness of the trial and an allegation that the right of the accused to a fair hearing is likely to be infringed by the trial. Evidently, it is to enable the applicant to find a platform within Rule 72 from which to raise these issues as a threshold issue that the objection has been described as a jurisdictional objection.

5. Notwithstanding that doubt may legitimately be entertained whether an allegation of real likelihood of bias is a challenge to the jurisdiction of the Court, the ground of the objection raised by the applicant's motion that the Court lacks judicial independence is sufficiently fundamental to make it imprudent to deny a hearing of the Preliminary Motion on the merits and not to determine the issues raised by the Preliminary Motion.

II. THE SPECIAL COURT FOR SIERRA LEONE

6. The Court is established by an agreement made on 16 June 2002 between the United Nations ("UN") and the Government of Sierra Leone to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996[6].

7. The basic documents of the Court are:
   (a) The Agreement between the UN and the Government of Sierra Leone ("the Agreement");
   (b) The Statute of the Court which is annexed to the Agreement and forms an integral part thereof ("the Statute")[7]; and
   (c) The Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Special Court.

SEPARATE OPINION OF JUSTICE GEOFFREY ROBERTSON:

1. This is a challenge to the jurisdiction of the Special Court by Sam Hinga Norman in Case No. SCSL-2004-14[1] on the grounds that the arrangements for funding its operations and the structure of its Management Committee deprive the Court of those guarantees of independence and impartiality which are essential prerequisites for its exercise of judicial power over the Applicant, or indeed over anyone else. Although, as an intervener points out,[2] domestic laws differ about whether this challenge goes strictly to jurisdiction (the exercise of judicial power), as distinct from legality (the right to exercise that power), the distinction is beside any practical point. If the structure of any body purporting to exercise judicial power is so fundamentally flawed that its judges may realistically be perceived as puppets moved by the purse strings or the politics of their progenitors or paymasters, then it cannot be acknowledged as a "court" at all. It will be an emanation of power, of the state or some conglomeration of states, but it will lack the defining quality of legality, namely independence from the state. In international criminal law, there can be no such creature as a 'kangaroo court': entities which lack independence and impartiality are not courts at all and their decisions, however portentous, do not have the quality of legality.

2. "Independence and impartiality" is an alliterative conjunction found in most human rights treaties, although the two concepts are in fact disparate and have different legal histories. "Independence" means putting judges in a position to act according to their conscience and the justice of the case, free from pressures from governments, funding bodies, armies, churches, newspapers or any other source of power and influence that may otherwise bear upon them. It was established in the common law by an enactment of the long parliament in 1641, as an early victory (to be defended subsequently by arms) in the struggle against Stuart absolutism. "Impartiality", on the other hand, is generally regarded as the judicial characteristic of disinterest towards parties and their causes. The common law began to develop concrete rules against bias in the nineteenth century, beginning with the disqualification of judges who held stock in companies which were parties in their court. There is, of course, an overlap: judges who are not independent of the state will be perceived

(and may actually become) partial to the state when it is a party to litigation. But for present purposes any such overlap, real or perceptual, is not alleged: the Applicant's challenge is to the perception created by the fact that certain states contribute the lion's share of funds and nominate representatives to the Management Committee.

3. The Applicant eschews any suggestion that the Special Court lacks the quality of independence through any constitutive arrangement other than funding, in particular the funding of judicial salaries.[3] These arrangements for what has been termed a "voluntary contribution" are certainly novel, and some apprehension about them was expressed, prior to their implementation by the Security Council and the Sierra Leone government, by the UN's own Secretary General,[4] although these concerns related to whether the funding would be sufficient and not to independence. In order to establish that novel arrangements affect judicial independence, there must be a realistic danger that they are or will be productive of pressure on the judges of the Court to decide cases in a particular way - in respect of this Applicant, to convict him. The Applicant argues that the funding arrangements "create a legitimate fear of political interference by economic manipulation".[5] When pressed in oral argument, his counsel conceded that this must translate into a fear that major donors would withhold funding unless the Court convicted all or most of its indictees and that such fear would so play on the minds of the judges that they would strive (not withstanding the burden of proof or the state of the evidence) to convict the Applicant. This is a far-fetched and difficult proposition.[6] Nonetheless, courts which claim true independence should be ready to examine any respect in which learned counsel allege that this fundamentally important quality may be imperiled. Courts which are so starved of funds that they cannot do justice should close themselves down rather than continue under the expectation that sufficient funding will be forthcoming only if they render verdicts acceptable to the funding body.

II. APPELLATE REVIEW

A. Standard of Review on Appeal

30. Before the Appeals Chamber embarks on a detailed consideration of the Parties' Grounds of Appeal, it is expedient to recall at the threshold, albeit in general terms, some of the principles of appellate review that will guide it.[58]

31. In regard to errors of law: Where the appellant alleges an error of law pursuant to Article 20 of the Statute and Rule 106 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules"), only arguments relating to errors in law that invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber would merit consideration. The appellant must provide details of the alleged error and state with precision how the legal error invalidates the decision.[59] In exceptional circumstances, the Appeals Chamber may consider legal issues raised by a party or proprio motu although they may not lead to the invalidation of the judgment, if they are nevertheless of general significance to the Special Court's jurisprudence.[60]

32. In regard to errors of fact: On appeal where errors of fact are alleged also pursuant to Article 20 of the Statute and Rule 106 of the Rules, the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact reached by a Trial Chamber; the error of fact must have resulted in a miscarriage of justice.[61] The appellant must provide details of the alleged error and state with precision how the error of fact occasioned a miscarriage of justice. A miscarriage of justice is defined as "[a] grossly unfair outcome in judicial proceedings, as when a defendant is convicted despite a lack of evidence on an essential element of the crime."[62] For an error to be one that occasioned a miscarriage of justice it must have been "critical to the verdict reached."[63] Where it is alleged that the Trial Chamber committed an error of fact, the Appeals Chamber will give a margin of deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial.[64] This is because it is the Trial Chamber that is best placed to assess the evidence, including the demeanour of witnesses.[65] The Appeals Chamber will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous.[66] The Appeals Chamber has adopted the statement of general principle contained in the ICTY Appeals Chamber decision in Kupreškić et al., as follows:

The Appeals Chamber applies the same reasonableness standard to alleged errors of fact regardless of whether the finding of fact was based on direct or circumstantial evidence.[68]

33. The same standard of reasonableness and deference to factual findings applies when the Prosecution appeals against an acquittal,[69] however, the Appeals Chamber endorses the view that:

> Considering that it is the Prosecution that bears the burden at trial of proving the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt, the significance of an error of fact occasioning a miscarriage of justice is somewhat different for a Prosecution appeal against acquittal than for a defence appeal against conviction. A convicted person must show that the Trial Chamber's factual errors create a reasonable doubt as to his guilt. The Prosecution must show that, when account is taken of the errors of fact committed by the Trial Chamber, all reasonable doubt of the convicted person's guilt has been eliminated.[70]

34. In regard to procedural errors: Although not expressly so stated in Article 20 of the Statute, not all procedural errors vitiate the proceedings. Only errors that occasion a miscarriage of justice would vitiate the proceedings. Such are procedural errors that would affect the fairness of the trial. By the same token, procedural errors that could be waived or ignored (as immaterial or inconsequential) without injustice or prejudice to the parties would not be regarded as procedural errors occasioning a miscarriage of justice.

35. In regard to appellate review of the exercise of discretionary powers by the Trial Chamber: The guiding principles can be stated succinctly. The Trial Chamber's exercise of discretion will be overturned if the challenged decision was based: (i) on an error of law; or (ii) on a patently incorrect conclusion of fact; or (iii) if the exercise of discretion was so unfair or unreasonable as to constitute an abuse of the Trial Chamber's discretion. The scope of appellate review of discretion is, thus, very limited: even if the Appeals Chamber does not agree with the impugned decision, it will stand unless it was so unreasonable as to force the conclusion that the Trial Chamber failed to exercise its discretion judiciously.[71] Where the issue on appeal is whether the Trial Chamber correctly exercised its discretion in reaching its decision the Appeals Chamber will only disturb the decision if an appellant has demonstrated that the Trial Chamber made a discernible error in the exercise of discretion.[72] A Trial Chamber would have made a discernible error if it misdirected itself as to the legal principle or law to be applied, took irrelevant factors into consideration, failed to consider relevant factors or failed to give them sufficient weight, or made an error as to the facts upon which it has exercised its discretion.[73] Provided therefore that the Trial Chamber has properly exercised its discretion, its decision will not be disturbed on appeal even though the Appeals Chamber itself may have exercised the discretion differently.

B. Defective submissions

36. The Appeals Chamber has the inherent discretion to find that any of the Parties' submissions do not merit a reasoned opinion in writing and summarily dismiss arguments that are evidently unfounded. In particular, the Appeals Chamber cannot effectively and efficiently carry out its mandate without focused submissions by the Parties. In order for the Appeals Chamber to assess a Party's arguments, the Party is expected to set out its Grounds of Appeal clearly, logically and exhaustively.[74] Accordingly, submissions that are obscure, contradictory, vague or suffer from other formal and obvious insufficiencies may be, on that basis, summarily dismissed without detailed reasoning.[75]

37. In the instant proceeding, the Appeals Chamber has identified the following seven types of deficiencies in the Parties' submissions.

[75] See Krajišnik Appeal Judgment, para. 16; Martić Appeal Judgment, para. 14; Strugar Appeal Judgment, para. 16; Orić Appeal Judgment, para. 14.

38. First, some submissions are vague. An appellant is expected to identify the challenged factual finding and put forward its factual arguments with specificity.[76] As a general rule, where an appellant's references to the Trial Judgment or the evidence are missing, vague or incorrect, the Appeals Chamber will summarily dismiss that alleged error or argument.[77] The Appeals Chamber has summarily dismissed a number of the Parties' argument on this basis.[78]

39. Second, some submissions merely claim a failure to consider evidence. A Trial Chamber is not required to refer to the testimony of every witness and to every piece of evidence on the record, and failure to do so does not necessarily indicate lack of consideration.[79] This holds true as long as there is no indication that the Trial Chamber completely disregarded any particular piece of evidence. Such disregard is shown "when evidence which is clearly relevant to the findings is not addressed by the Trial Chamber's reasoning."[80] Where the Appeals Chamber finds that an appellant merely asserts that the Trial Chamber failed to consider relevant evidence, without showing that no reasonable trier of fact, based on the totality of the evidence, could have reached the same conclusion as the Trial Chamber did, or without showing that the Trial Chamber completely disregarded the evidence, it will, as a general rule, summarily dismiss that alleged error or argument.[81] The Appeals Chamber has summarily dismissed the arguments suffering from this type of deficiency.[82]

40. Third, some submissions merely seek to substitute alternative interpretations of the evidence. As a general rule, mere assertions that the Trial Chamber erred in its evaluation of the evidence, such as claims that the Trial Chamber failed to give sufficient weight to certain evidence, or should have interpreted evidence in a particular manner, are liable to be summarily dismissed.[83] Similarly, where an appellant merely seeks to substitute its own evaluation of the evidence for that of the Trial Chamber, such submissions may be dismissed without detailed reasoning. The same applies to claims that the Trial Chamber could not have inferred a certain conclusion from circumstantial evidence, without further explanation.[84] An appellant must address the evidence the Trial Chamber relied on and explain why no reasonable trier of fact, based on the evidence, could have evaluated the evidence as the Trial Chamber did, and the Appeals Chamber may summarily dismiss arguments that fail to make such a minimum pleading on appeal. The Appeals Chamber has summarily dismissed the arguments that fail to comply with this rule.[85]

41. Fourth, some submissions fail to identify the prejudice. Where the Appeals Chamber considers that an appellant fails to explain how the alleged factual error had an effect on the conclusions in the Trial Judgment, it will summarily dismiss that alleged error or argument. The arguments of the Parties suffering from this deficiency have been summarily dismissed.[86]

42. Fifth, some submissions are mere repetitions of arguments at trial. The Appeals Chamber will, as a general rule, summarily dismiss submissions that merely repeat arguments that did not succeed at trial unless it is shown that their rejection by the Trial Chamber constituted an error warranting the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[87] The Appeals Chamber emphasizes that an appellant must contest the Trial Chamber's findings and conclusions, and should not simply invite the Appeals Chamber to reconsider issues de novo. Submissions that merely put forward an appellant's position without addressing the Trial Chamber's allegedly erroneous finding or conclusion therefore fail to properly develop an issue for appeal. Some of the Parties' arguments have been summarily dismissed on this basis.[88]

43. Sixth, many submissions are otherwise incomplete. Submissions may be dismissed without detailed reasoning where an appellant makes factual claims or presents arguments that the Trial

Chamber should have reached a particular conclusion without advancing any evidence in support. Indeed, an appellant is expected to provide the Appeals Chamber with an exact reference to the parts of the trial record invoked in support of its arguments.[89] As a general rule, in instances where this is not done, the Appeals Chamber will summarily dismiss the alleged error or argument.[90] Similarly, the Appeals Chamber will, as a general rule, summarily dismiss undeveloped arguments and alleged errors, as well as submissions where the appellant fails to articulate the precise error committed by the Trial Chamber.[91] The Appeals Chamber has, therefore, summarily dismissed numerous arguments because they are unsupported,[92] undeveloped,[93] or fail to articulate the precise error alleged.[94]

44. Lastly, some submissions exceed the applicable page limit. The Parties are obliged to comply with the page limits for their appeal briefs set out in Article 6(E) of the Practice Direction on Filing Documents before the Special Court for Sierra Leone, as amended, and to seek authorisation pursuant to Article 6(G) of the said Practice Direction before filing appeal briefs which exceed that page limit. In the present case, the Parties were granted extensions of pages for their appeal and response briefs.[95] Additional arguments of the Parties presented in annexes to their Appeals in violation of the page limit thus imposed have been summarily dismissed.[96]

45. In addition to the abovementioned formal deficiencies in the pleadings, the Appeals Chamber observes that large parts of the Parties' Grounds of Appeal are, in general, poorly structured and organised. For instance, rather than making distinct challenges under separate grounds of appeal, the Parties arrange different parts of different grounds to support a variety of arguments without indicating which portion of each argument develops which ground of appeal. Similarly, in other instances the Parties group a range of disparate arguments, each concerning a substantial issue, under a single ground of appeal. The Parties also frequently raise the same argument in numerous grounds of appeal. Finally, the Parties have often used "sub-grounds" of appeal to designate apparently new grounds of appeal, rendering meaningless the practice of pleading distinct errors as distinct grounds of appeal. In the interests of justice, the Appeals Chamber has endeavoured to fully consider these problematic submissions, subject to the summary dismissals outlined above. We note, however, that the poorly structured and disorganized grounds of appeal failed to assist the Appeals Chamber in its consideration of the issues and arguments.

46. Finally, the Appeals Chamber observes that the tone and language of some submissions do not meet the standard expected of those appearing before the Special Court. Although zealous advocacy is encouraged, Counsel should nevertheless maintain a respectful and decorous tone in their submissions.

[96] This ruling applies to the arguments made in Annexes A, B, C1-C9, E, G, H, I, J to the Sesay Appeal, and Annexes III and V to the Gbao Appeal. The Appeals Chamber notes that Sesay refers to "Annex D" to his Appeal (see e.g. Sesay Appeal, paras 31, 48), but that no "Annex D" to his appeal was filed.

Prosecution.[401] He argues specifically that the Trial Chamber did not properly consider payments made to TF1-035, TF1-360, TF1-366, TF1-334, TF1-015, and TF1-362.[402] The Prosecution responds that Sesay's submission is unsubstantiated.[403]

(b) Discussion

197. In its Decision on Sesay Motion on Payment to Witnesses, the Trial Chamber dismissed Sesay's Motion to Hear Evidence Concerning the Prosecution's Witness Management Unit and its Payments to Witnesses.[404] This motion was made on 30 May 2008 after the conclusion of the Prosecution and Defence cases in chief. The motion alleged that Prosecution witnesses who had appeared at the RUF trial were given material assistance by the Office of the Prosecutor and that this came to light when the same witnesses testified in the Taylor trial.[405] In denying the motion, the Trial Chamber considered that Sesay: had the opportunity, in the course of cross-examination of witnesses called by the Prosecution, to put these questions to the witnesses, and exercised that right in respect to some of them; did not pursue this line of cross-examination with other witnesses called by the Prosecution; and did not attempt to introduce additional evidence of payments during the Prosecution case or his own case.[406] As Sesay neither contests this nor indicates what error of "law, fact and/or procedure" the Trial Chamber made in dismissing the motion, his submission is dismissed.[407]

198. Sesay's second assertion is equally unavailing. Sesay contends that the Trial Chamber failed to take into consideration payments by the Prosecution to witnesses.[408] However, in the Trial Judgment at paragraph 523, directly under the heading "Witness Incentives," the Trial Chamber considered the Defence allegations of improper inducement for witness testimony by the Prosecution and expressly recognised that "[t]his issue was raised in motions filed by the Defence, during the cross examination of several witnesses and in their Final Trial Briefs."[409] The "issue" to 200. Finally, as to Sesay's contention that the Trial Chamber neglected to properly consider and reason the credibility of witnesses because of its alleged failure to take into account evidence of Prosecution payments to witnesses specifically in connection with their credibility is misplaced.[418] The Trial Chamber thoroughly explained its analysis of the credibility of the witnesses. It expressly considered the evidence of Prosecution payments to witnesses.[419] It stated in particular that it had considered factors such "as any personal interest witnesses may have that may influence their motivation to tell the truth; and observational criteria such as the witnesses' demeanour, conduct and character."[420] In addition, the Trial Chamber provided individual assessment of the credibility of a number of Prosecution witnesses, including three of the six witnesses cited in this ground.[421] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the credibility of witnesses and the weight to be given the evidence is within the Trial Chamber's discretion.[422] In that regard, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber adequately reasoned its use of discretion and that this discretion has been properly exercised.

(c) Conclusion

201. For the foregoing reasons, Sesay's Ground 16 is dismissed in its entirety.

3. Alleged False Testimony of Prosecution Witness TF1-366 (Sesay Ground 17)

(a) Trial Chamber's findings

202. In a Decision of 25 July 2006, the Trial Chamber dismissed Sesay's Motion concerning the False Testimony of TF1-366.[423] In respect of each portion of TF1-366's evidence that Sesay alleged amounted to false testimony, the Trial Chamber considered that the inconsistency and contradiction in the witness's testimony did not amount to knowingly giving false testimony, and stated that the determination of the credibility, reliability and probative value of the witness's s evidence would be considered at the appropriate time.[424] In assessing the credibility of TF1-366 in the Trial Judgment, the Trial Chamber stated that it had "share[d] the concerns of Defence Counsel for the Accused that

TF1-108's testimony was the sole basis for the finding of two RUF farms in Giema in 1996 and 1998 where about 300 civilians were forced to work.[456]

(c) Discussion

217. Although Sesay alleges errors in the Decision on his Motion for Various Relief and in the Trial Judgment as regards the assessment of TF1-108's credibility and the reliance on TF1-108's evidence, the Appeal Chamber only addresses the latter because Sesay has not shown any prejudice from the alleged errors in the Trial Chamber's Decision on Sesay Motion for Various Relief.

218. Sesay's challenges the Trial Chamber's assessment of TF1-108's credibility and the use of the witness's evidence for its findings. Assessing the credibility and reliability of TF1-108's evidence, the Trial Chamber stated:

> In assessing the veracity of TF1-108's testimony, the Chamber shares the concerns of the Defence, and doubts the credibility of this witness, particularly in light of his misleading evidence concerning the death of his wife. The Chamber, while exercising caution with regard to the evidence given by TF1-108, has accepted portions of his testimony that are corroborated by a reliable source when such evidence dealt with the acts and conduct of the Accused, as well as his general descriptions of events. The Chamber has accordingly rejected his testimony on the raping to death of his wife as fallacious. We however, have found and accepted his testimony on matters within his personal knowledge and touching on his activities and involvement in the conflict within his locality as credible where corroborated by other credible and reliable evidence particularly on issues of forced labour, 'forced marriages' and inhumane treatment of civilians.[457]

Sesay contends that "it was not within the reasonable exercise of discretion to assess TF1-108's credibility as requiring corroboration only."[458]

219. The Appeals Chamber notes that neither the Rules nor the relevant international jurisprudence require a Chamber to exclude in its entirety a witness's evidence because the witness is found to have lied when giving testimony. While some Trial Chambers have found evidence of witnesses who have lied not to be credible and rejected it in whole,[459] others have elected to accept portions of the witness's testimony, approaching it with caution and/or requiring corroboration.[460]

The effect given to a witness's false testimony upon his overall credibility is thus to be assessed on a case-by-case basis. As a matter of law, the Trial Chamber was not required to reject TF1-108's evidence in its entirety on the basis that he provided fallacious evidence in relation to his wife. Rather, the credibility and reliability of this evidence, as any other permissible evidence, was a matter for the Trial Chamber to assess in view of the circumstances of the case. The Trial Chamber duly took into consideration the fact that TF1-108 made fallacious allegations and as a result required corroboration of the entirety of his evidence. In view of the caution displayed by the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber considers that Sesay fails to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have assessed TF1-108's credibility as the Trial Chamber did. This prong of Sesay's present appeal is therefore dismissed.

220. The Appeals Chamber now turns to Sesay's claim that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in relying on TF1-108's testimony as the only support for various allegations which resulted in convictions for the crimes charged in Counts 12 and 13 of the Indictment.

221. As a preliminary matter, the Appeals Chamber holds that a Trial Chamber enjoys discretion to use uncorroborated evidence, to decide whether corroboration is necessary in the circumstances,[461] and to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, witness testimony.[462] Any appeal based on the absence of corroboration must therefore necessarily be against the weight attached by the Trial Chamber to the evidence in question.[463] Nonetheless, should a Chamber consider that a witness's evidence is to be approached with caution and/or require corroboration by other reliable evidence, it is bound to abide itself by the required caution or corroboration.[464]

It found that that no reasonable trier of fact could have accepted this witness's uncorroborated hearsay testimony about one alleged event.)

222. Turning to the instant case, in relation to Count 12 of the Indictment, Sesay refers to the Trial Chamber's finding that "girls as young as 6 years old were trained to fight at Bunumbu" Training base,[465] in support of which the Trial Chamber only referred to the testimony of TF1-108.[466] However, the factual and legal findings of the Trial Chamber that children, including girls,[467] under the age of fifteen were trained at Bunumbu Training Base (Camp Lion) were based on the testimony of numerous witnesses,[468] and an exhibit.[469] Sesay therefore fails to demonstrate any error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence.

223. In relation to Count 13 of the Indictment, Sesay refers to the Trial Chamber's findings of two "government" farms in Giema which were organised and managed by the RUF with approximately 300 civilians working on these farms,[470] that civilians working on these farms could not refuse to farm because armed men were observing and supervising them while they were working,[471] and that civilians working on Gbao's farm in Giema were guarded by Gbao's bodyguard, Korpomeh.[472] The Appeals Chamber notes that in relation to parts of its findings on the existence in 1996 and 1998 of two big "government" farms in Giema, which were organised and managed by the RUF and where approximately 300 civilians were forced to work, the Trial Chamber only cited the evidence of TF1-108.[473] However, the Trial Chamber also relied on the testimony of TF1-330 for its finding that "[f]rom 1996 to 2001, farming occurred at RUF farms located in Giema, Talia, Sembehun, Bandajuma and Sandialu."[474] Sesay does not make any submissions as to how the testimony of TF1-330 fails to corroborate TF1-108's evidence. Sesay's only submissions concerning TF1-330 in this ground of appeal pertain to his allegation that TF1-

108 tried to influence him in respect of the evidence related to the alleged death of his wife.[475] Sesay does not argue that the evidence of TF1-330 concerning the RUF farms in Giema was tainted by his contact with TF1-108. The Appeals Chamber further recalls it has dismissed the related challenges to TF1-108's allegedly uncorroborated testimony in Gbao's Ground 11.[476]

(d) Conclusion

224. In view of the above, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Sesay's Ground 18 in its entirety.

5. Alleged error relating to admission of evidence under Rule 92*bis* (Sesay Ground 20)

(a) Trial Chamber's findings

225. At trial, Sesay filed four motions[477] requesting the admission of a total of 23 witness statements under Rule 92*bis* in lieu of their examination-in-chief and without cross examination.[478] The Trial Chamber decided the motions in a single decision on 15 May 2008.[479] The Trial Chamber found that the statements of 17 witnesses were repetitive of other witness statements and of the viva voce testimony already heard by the Trial Chamber,[480] and that admission of these witness statements would result in duplicating evidence and would cause unnecessary delay in the proceedings.[481] It therefore dismissed the request to admit these 17 witness statements under Rule 92*bis*.[482] The Trial Chamber considered that six of the 23 witness statements contained admissible evidence under Rule 92*bis* and were non-repetitive.[483] It therefore admitted those six statements.[484]

(b) Submissions of the Parties

226. In Ground 20, Sesay submits that the Trial Chamber erred in dismissing 18 Rule 92*bis* and Rule 92*ter* witness statements.[485] He contends that the "the reasons proffered for rejecting the statements were demonstrably flawed," that the "evidence would not have been repetitive" and category" of witnesses. The Appeals Chamber however finds that Sesay misrepresents the Trial Chamber's findings. The Trial Chamber considered that witnesses who had been themselves the victims of brutal crimes or were eye-witnesses to the commission of such crimes against relatives and friends were emotional when testifying and were sometimes unable to provide every detail of their experience. As a result, minor inconsistencies in their testimony are to be expected.[517] The Trial Chamber did not treat those witnesses as an "inviolable category." It considered instead that minor inconsistencies in their testimony may be attributed to their traumatic experience, thereby taking due account of the impact of trauma of the victim witnesses upon their testimony, for the purpose of evaluating their credibility.

238. The Appeals Chamber sees no error in the Trial Chamber's reasoning, and considers it a sound practice to bear in mind the likely distorting effect of trauma upon a witness's testimony and to accordingly consider the suffering he or she has experienced when evaluating his/her overall credibility.[518] The Appeals Chamber agrees with the observation of the ICTY Appeals Chamber that traumatic experiences often generate minor inconsistencies in a witness's testimony, but this fact should not impugn the witness's credibility.[519] On the other hand, the evident trauma suffered by a witness does not provide a guarantee that their testimony is reliable.[520]

239. Sesay complains that the Trial Chamber found the evidence of "victim witnesses" and "former child soldiers" reliable merely because it related to their own experience. In fact, the Trial Chamber found those witnesses credible "especially as [their] testimony relates to personal accounts of witnesses experiencing the crimes charged"[521] and "especially as it relates to their own experiences," respectively.[522] Sesay fails to show how it was an abuse of the Trial Chamber's discretion to consider that the witnesses testified credibly about their personal experiences.

240. Sesay provides scant support for his assertion that the Trial Chamber did not assess the credibility of witnesses individually. It is true that the Trial Chamber made general observations on the overall reliability of evidence of "victim witnesses" and "former child soldiers;" however, Sesay fails to argue why their partly similar circumstances did not warrant partly similar consideration by the Trial Chamber. It is also clear that the Trial Chamber considered the credibility of witnesses within the categories on an individual basis. For example, in relation to TF1-141,[523] TF1-263,[524] TF1-117,[525] and TF1-314,[526] all of whom were former child soldiers, the Trial Chamber reasoned differently regarding the credibility of their evidence, taking into account factors such as the demeanour of the witness,[527] inconsistencies in their statements,[528] or whether the evidence of the witness was useful and compelling.[529]

241. Sesay further submits that the Trial Chamber distinguished between evidence related to the witnesses' own experience, which it found generally reliable, and evidence that goes to the "acts and conduct of the accused," which it found to require corroboration. The distinction, Sesay contends, was unsustainable given that the use of the evidence of the concerned witnesses in relation to their own experience was "critical to proof of essential elements of crime and proof of responsibility."[530] Sesay, however, does not substantiate this argument at all in this ground. Instead he directs the Appeals Chamber to "[s]ee Grounds 25, 32, 36, 37, 39, 40, 42 and 43,"[531] and cites without explanation or argument decisions under Rule 92*bis* from this Court and the other international tribunals.[532]

242. His reference in this relation to case law that applies the term of art "acts and conduct" of the accused in the context of Rule 92*bis* is misguided. There is no suggestion in the Trial Judgment that the Trial Chamber applied the term "acts and conduct of the accused" in the context of Rule 92*bis* when discussing the credibility of the witnesses.

(c) Conclusion

243. In view of the above, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Sesay's Grounds 21 and 22 in their entirety.

258. The Prosecution responds that the testimony of a witness who lies need not necessarily be discarded in its entirety and that the Trial Chamber has discretion to accept parts of a witness's evidence even when knowing that other part of the evidence has been dishonest.[555]

(b) Discussion

259. In relation to Gbao's submission that evidence of a witness who admits to lying under oath should be disregarded in its entirety, the Appeals Chamber recalls its previous holding that, as a matter of law, a Trial Chamber is not required to reject the entirety of the evidence of witness should it be apparent that the witness lied while testifying under solemn declaration.[556] While a Trial Chamber may decide, in its exercise of discretion, to entirely disregard the evidence of a witness deemed unworthy of belief,[557] it may also find portions of the testimony believable and decide to rely on the evidence it determines to be credible, using necessary caution.[558] The effect of untruthful testimony on the evaluation of a witness's overall credibility, and the reliability of all of other evidence adduced from that witness must be assessed on a witness by witness basis by the trier of fact.

260. In relation to Prosecution Witness TF1-108, the Appeals Chamber has previously determined that the Trial Chamber did not abuse its discretion in accepting portions of the witness's evidence that are corroborated by other reliable evidence.[559]

261. In relation to Prosecution Witness TF1-366, the Appeals Chamber already stated that it saw no abuse of discretion in the Trial Chamber's Decision on Sesay Motion concerning the False Testimony of TF1-366.[560] In this Decision, the Trial Chamber stated that the inconsistencies and contradictions in the witness's testimony would be addressed at its final determination of the credibility, reliability and probative value of TF1-366 in light of all the evidence adduced by the Prosecution and the Defence.[561] In the Trial Judgment, the Trial Chamber stated that it was required

342. The Prosecution responds that there is little to distinguish the Trial Chamber's overall approach from that taken in Martić.[797] Gbao makes no additional submissions in reply.

(c) Discussion

(i) Did the Trial Chamber fail to explain how the Common Criminal Purpose involved crimes?

343. Gbao's key argument—under both Ground 8(e) and consolidated Grounds 8(g)/(h)—is that the Trial Chamber failed to provide a sufficiently reasoned opinion for its conclusion that the Common Criminal Purpose involved the commission of the crimes charged. Sesay's submission under his Ground 24 that certain crimes could not form part of the Common Criminal Purpose because the Trial Chamber found that they were not committed with the intent to take control of Sierra Leone or to terrorise and collectively punish civilians similarly turns on the Trial Chamber's own reasoning.

344. The fair trial requirements of the Statute include the right of the accused to a reasoned opinion by the Trial Chamber under Article 18 of the Statute and Rule 88(C) of the Rules. The Appeals Chamber finds the well-established jurisprudence of the ICTY and ICTR which interpret their identical provisions[798] persuasive as to the law in this regard.[799] As recently held by the ICTY Appeals Chamber:

> A reasoned opinion ensures that the accused can exercise his or her right of appeal and that the Appeals Chamber can carry out its statutory duty under Article 25 to review these appeals. The reasoned opinion requirement, however, relates to a Trial Chamber's Judgment rather than to each and every submission made at trial.[800]

345. As a general rule, a Trial Chamber is required only to make findings on those facts which are "essential to the determination of guilt in relation to a particular Count";[801] it "is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes"[802] nor is it "required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony."[803] However, the requirements to be met by the Trial Chamber may be higher in certain cases.[804] It is "necessary for any appellant claiming an error of law because of the lack of a reasoned opinion to identify the specific issues, factual findings or arguments, which he submits the Trial Chamber omitted to address and to explain why this omission invalidated the decision."[805]

346. Turning to the present case, the Appeals Chamber considers at the outset that Gbao's comparison between the length of parts of the Trial Judgment and the corresponding parts of other trial judgments in different cases is unhelpful,[806] as "general observations on the length of the Trial Judgment, or of particular parts of the Trial Judgment, usually do not suffice to show an error of law because of a lack of reasoned opinion."[807]

347. The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded that the findings now at issue fall short of this threshold. Contrary to Gbao's claim, the Trial Chamber did not "merely state" that the Junta intended crimes to reach its objective without reference to any "explicit or implicit agreement" nor did it fail to consider whether the crimes were simply "committed in the midst of the conflict."[808] In particular, the Trial Chamber specified what the criminal means of the JCE were, and how they actually furthered the AFRC/RUF's objective of controlling the territory of Sierra Leone. The "spread of extreme fear"—that is, acts of terrorism—was intended to "subdue the civilian population in order to exercise power and control over captured territory."[809] These acts included unlawful killings, sexual violence and physical violence.[810] Collective punishments were employed to subdue the civilian population to the same end.[811] Recruitment of child soldiers served to re-enforce the AFRC/RUF military forces in order to assist in specific military operations.[812] Enslavement of civilians was perpetrated to perform farming, logistical chores or diamond

Annex F to his Appeal, selected parts of TF1-334's testimony, and a list of testimonies allegedly supporting that the crimes in RUF camps fell outside the JCE.[1196] He makes no mention in his Appeal of why or how no reasonable trier of fact could have relied on the evidence the Trial Chamber referenced for its findings regarding the AFRC/RUF split, let alone how any such error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[1197] The Appeals Chamber recalls that it is for an appellant, not the Appeals Chamber, to clearly articulate the errors alleged to have been committed by the Trial Chamber. Undeveloped assertions such the one now at issue, which merely requests the Appeals Chamber to assess selected parts of the evidence de novo, will be summarily dismissed by the Appeals Chamber.

465. This part of Sesay's Ground 33 is rejected.

4. Conclusion

466. For the foregoing reasons, and recalling its prior conclusions with respect to other arguments raised in Sesay's Ground 33,[1198] the Appeals Chamber dismisses Sesay's Ground 33 in its entirety. The Appeals Chamber dismisses Kallon's Ground 11 in part.

E. Alleged errors regarding the category of the JCE (Kallon Ground 2 (in part) and Gbao Grounds 8(j), (k))

1. Trial Chamber's findings

467. The Trial Chamber found that "the crimes charged under Counts 1 to 14 were within the [JCE] and intended by the participants to further the common purpose."[1199] As previously noted, the Common Criminal Purpose found by the Trial Chamber consisted of the non-criminal objective to gain and exercise political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone, in particular the diamond mining areas, and the crimes as charged under Counts 1 to 14 as means of achieving that objective.[1200] It further held that mid- and low-level RUF and AFRC Commanders and rank-and-file fighters were used by JCE members to commit crimes that "were either intended by the person who attacked Salahuedin and abducted Jaganathan."[1323] Second, Kallon contests his identification in the abduction of Mendy and Gjellesdad.[1324] Third, Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him involved in the abduction of Kasoma and 10 ZAMBATT peacekeepers at Moria.[1325] Kallon argues that a reasonable trier of fact would have concluded that the RUF commander in question was someone other than Kallon.[1326] Fourth, Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber erred in "failing to exercise caution in the assessment of the uncorroborated identification of the Appellant under uncertain and difficult circumstances provided by a lone witness."[1327] Kallon submits that the Trial Chamber failed to apply the relevant standards on identification evidence.[1328]

517. In response, the Prosecution points to the Trial Chamber's discussion on "Identification Evidence", and submits that Kallon fails to show an error in the Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence.[1329] It also contends that Kallon's submission on hearsay is unsubstantiated and that any difficulties Jaganathan had with his recollections on other matters were immaterial to the issue at hand.[1330]

3. Discussion

518. The Appeals Chamber will consider each of the purported errors in turn. First, regarding the identification of Kallon as being involved in the attacks on Salahuedin and Jaganathan, the Trial Chamber found that Jaganathan identified Kallon as being involved in the attack upon him. Jaganathan indicated in his testimony that, prior to the attack, he had not seen Kallon but that Major Maroa of the Kenyan Battalion informed him that it was he.[1331] The Appeals Chamber sees no error in this finding. It is well accepted that hearsay evidence may be admitted.[1332] Care needs to be taken when relying upon such evidence; however, the Trial Chamber was well aware of this.[1333] The Appeals Chamber also finds Kallon's argument misplaced. The testimony of Ngondi indicates that Maroa told him that Kallon assaulted Jaganathan; the testimony of Jaganathan indicates that both he and Salahuedin were assaulted by Kallon.[1334] Accordingly, no material inconsistency arises.

519. Turning to the second alleged error, Kallon seeks to impugn Mendy's testimony as to the identification of Kallon by noting his failure to recall other events in the same period.[1335] This line of reasoning is unconvincing since a witness may well recollect certain events while not recalling others; such inability to recall does not make those recollections inherently unreliable.[1336] Moreover, Kallon does not seek to challenge other evidence – including documentary evidence – that puts him at the scene.[1337] Instead, he simply asserts that the Trial Chamber failed to consider the testimony of other witnesses without explaining why their testimony is to be preferred over that which was cited by the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber will normally uphold a Trial Chamber's findings on issues of credibility, including its resolution of inconsistent evidence and will only find that an error of fact occurred when it determines that no reasonable tribunal could have made the impugned finding.[1338]

520. As to Kallon's third alleged error, he fails to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion of the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber notes that Kallon's argument rests on two bases. First, he argues that the finding of the Trial Chamber that "[t]he RUF Commander took Kasoma and the ZAMBATT soldiers to the MP Office in Makeni, where he introduced Kasoma as the Commander of ZAMBATT to Sesay. Kallon was present at this time" reveals that Kallon was not the RUF Commander.[1339] Second, he submits that this is supported by the testimony of Sesay, DMK-161 and DMK-087.[1340]

521. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the relevant part of the Trial Judgment reveals no error. The phrase "RUF Commander" is used in different places, by different witnesses, to refer to different individuals. For example, paragraph 1835 of the Trial Judgment, referring to the testimony of Edwin Kasoma, notes that "Kasoma was taken by several officers, including one man with a limp, to a small shelter to meet the RUF Commander." Paragraph 1838 of the Trial Judgment, referring to the testimony of DIS-310, reads "[t]he RUF Commander giving orders at the scene was a short person with a limp." That different witnesses refer to different individuals as the "RUF Commander" explains why the Trial Chamber sometimes refers to the RUF Commander and sometimes Kallon. It does not follow that because Kallon was not the individual described as the "RUF Commander" at one point in time, he was not the individual described as the "RUF Commander" at another point in time. Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber notes that the testimony of Kasoma was relied upon extensively by the Trial Chamber and it is unambiguous on point.[1341] The Appeals Chamber further notes that Kallon proffers no real reasons for why the evidence of the witnesses he cites is to be preferred over that used by the Trial Chamber, including that of Kasoma.

522. The Appeals Chamber finds that the arguments related to the fourth alleged error remain at the level of mere assertion. That the Trial Chamber exercised caution in relying on identification evidence of a lone witness is abundantly clear from the Trial Judgment, which notes the practice of the Trial Chamber "to examine evidence from a lone witness very carefully, in light of the overall evidence adduced, and to guard against the exercise of an underlying motive on the part of the witness, before placing any reliance on it."[1342] Kallon's argument that the Trial Chamber failed to apply the requisite standards on identification evidence is not backed by any reasoning and is unsupported on the facts. In any event, the Appeals Chamber has itself held that "there is no bar to the Trial Chamber relying on a limited number of witnesses or even a single witness, provided it took into consideration all the evidence on the record."[1343] Accordingly, Kallon has not demonstrated any error on the part of the Trial Chamber.

4. Conclusion

523. For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Kallon's Ground 26 in its entirety.

544. The Appeals Chamber notes that all that remains is Gbao's argument that the actions on which the Trial Chamber based its findings as to his actus reus and mens rea took place after the crimes were committed. It is helpful to reproduce, at the outset, the key findings of the Trial Chamber:

> 2263. ... the Chamber finds that Gbao deliberately fomented an atmosphere of hostility and orchestrated an armed confrontation at the Makump DDR camp and that Gbao's actions in arming himself with an AK-47 amounted to tacit approval of Kallon's conduct. We therefore find that Gbao's conduct before and during the attacks on Salahuedin and Jaganathan had a substantial effect on their perpetration.

545. In relation to both the actus reus and the mens rea, the actions of Gbao considered crucial by the Trial Chamber are his taking up of arms and his standing passively by. The taking up of arms took place at some point during the period in which Kallon was inside the camp, as did the start of Gbao's passive behaviour; the exact moment has not been determined. Given that Kallon proceeded to enter the camp after an exchange with Gbao, Kallon would have been aware of Gbao's presence outside the camp. However, there is no indication that Kallon was aware of Gbao having taken up arms until after he left the camp. The question is, then, whether Gbao's presence outside the camp can be said to have had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. The Appeals Chamber takes the view that it is within the discretion of a reasonable trier of fact to hold that such presence did have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the offence.

546. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the mens rea for aiding and abetting is that:

> the accused knew that his acts would assist the commission of the crime by the perpetrator or that he was aware of the substantial likelihood that his acts would assist the commission of a crime by the perpetrator. However, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor had knowledge of the precise crime that was intended and which was actually committed, as long as he was aware that one of a number of crimes would probably be committed, including the one actually committed.[1393]

547. The Appeals Chamber notes that there is no indication in the Trial Judgment that, prior to Kallon's entry into the camp, Gbao knew that any attacks might take place or any crimes might be committed by Kallon or Kallon's forces. It does not follow from Gbao's knowledge of Kallon's [1392] Trial Judgment, paras 2263, 2264.

629. Sesay further argues that the Trial Chamber failed to explain why it accepted TF1-334's testimony in spite of the fact that the witness was an accomplice, was released from prison during his involvement with the Prosecution, sought relocation, obtained unexplained payments from the Prosecution, and gave evidence in court which differed from a previous interview.[1569] This is not true. The Trial Chamber noted TF1-334 among the "insider" witnesses who may be considered accomplices, and "cautioned itself on the risk and danger of accepting uncorroborated evidence from an insider witness as credible."[1570] The Trial Chamber also considered that "[t]he Defence has alleged that some of the Prosecution evidence is unreliable because the witnesses were provided with financial incentives to testify, or were aided in some other way such as their relocation to another country."[1571] It noted the forms of remuneration to which individuals testifying before the Special Court may be entitled, and that the payments received by certain witnesses were disclosed and admitted as evidence.[1572] Further, Sesay neither provides any reference to the alleged earlier interview of TF1-334, nor does he explain why it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to prefer the witness's viva voce evidence instead of the interview.[1573] Sesay's challenges to the quality of TF1-334's testimony are accordingly dismissed.

630. Third, Sesay disputes that he was involved in the forced mining in Kono before December 1998, and argues that his involvement with the Yengema training base could not constitute participation in the JCE because the base did not start operating until late 1998 or early 1999.[1574] Both arguments are based on the Trial Chamber's findings. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that Sesay participated in the forced labour in diamond mines in Kono "between 14 February and May 1998" in order to further the Common Criminal Purpose.[1575] While the Trial Chamber provided more detailed findings on Sesay's involvement in the mining in Kono after December 1998[1576]—and appears to have erroneously relied on some of this later involvement for its finding on Sesay's participation in the JCE[1577]—the Appeals Chamber is satisfied it was

In this regard, Sesay alleges an error of fact, arguing that TF1-367 testified that some of the 200 to 300 civilians captured and forced to work at Kaisambo volunteered and that the civilians were not forced to return, but fails to avert to the evidence supporting the finding that civilians who refused to mine were beaten.[1800] Further relevant indicia of enslavement is found in the holdings that the "conditions for the hundreds of civilians forced to mine were poor; they were neither paid nor given adequate housing, food or medical treatment" and "they were constantly supervised by armed men."[1801]

697. Except for the error of law found above, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not fail to provide a reasoned opinion.

(d) Did the Trial Chamber err in relying on Witness TF1-367?

698. The Appeals Chamber notes that Sesay's claims regarding TF1-367's "lies" are in effect submissions that TF1-367's testimony contradicts other evidence.[1802] Sesay does not explain how, or in what respects, these contradictions caused the Trial Chamber to err. As to TF1-367's alleged motives to implicate Sesay, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the evidence Sesay invokes[1803] precluded a reasonable trier of fact from finding, as the Trial Chamber did, that the witness was "generally credible."[1804] Sesay's submission is dismissed.

(e) Did the Trial Chamber err in finding that Sesay was involved in the design and execution phases of the enslavement?

699. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "[w]hile there must be a sufficient link between the planning of a crime both at the preparatory and the execution phases, it is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct."[1805] The Appeals Chamber considers that Sesay's actions both before and after December 1998 are relevant in this regard. In particular, contrary to the Prosecution's argument,[1806] Sesay's conduct pre-December 1998 is relevant to whether a reasonable trier of fact could have found that he planned the enslavement which ensued thereafter.

[1804] Trial Judgment, para. 552.

700. As to his conduct before December 1998, Sesay essentially relies on the findings underlying the conclusion that he was not in a superior-subordinate relationship with RUF fighters in Kono from May to the end of November 1998.[1807] The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that these findings alone show that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to find that he planned the enslavement from December 1998 onward. The following findings provided a basis for a reasonable trier of fact to find that Sesay was involved in the preparatory phase of planning the enslavement: (i) the RUF continued conducting mining operations in parts of Kono District after having been forced to retreat from Koidu Town in early April 1998;[1808] (ii) he led and commanded the RUF troops who re-captured Koidu Town on 16 December 1998, although the Trial Chamber could not specifically determine Sesay's involvement in Kono District between August and November 1998;[1809] and (iii) after Koidu Town was retaken, RUF mining in Kono District "intensified significantly,"[1810] and "mining operations expanded" to different areas in Kono District, in particular Tombodu.[1811] These findings must be read together with those on Sesay's involvement in mining in Kono after December 1998. In particular, the Trial Chamber found that the Mining Commander reported to Sesay,[1812] that Sesay visited the mining site at Tombodu and collected diamonds (for which purpose he maintained a house in Koidu),[1813] and that he ordered that civilians be captured from other Districts and arranged for transportation of the captured civilians to the mines in Kono.[1814]

701. Sesay's reference to evidence that Bockarie was in control of the mining,[1815] or other evidence allegedly showing that Sesay "had nothing to do with the mining,"[1816] fails to address the evidence on which the Trial Chamber based its findings. Moreover, the Trial Chamber recognised that Sesay was "subordinate to Bockarie at the time," but that since the illicit sale of diamonds was the RUF's primary means of financing its operations, "the mining system in Kono District was designed and supervised at the highest levels" and "Sesay, as the BFC ... was actively and

Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion to assess the witness's credibility or determine the weight it attached to his testimony, this part of Sesay's argument fails.

761. Sesay further submits that the Trial Chamber unreasonably relied upon Witnesses TF1-114 and TF1-108[1984] to support its finding that children were forcibly trained,[1985] but disregarded their testimony that, Sesay contends, "contradicted TF1-362's account of Sesay's involvement in the training base." However, Sesay fails to demonstrate how the testimony of TF1-114 and TF1-108 contradicts the testimony relied upon by the Trial Chamber, and the Appeals Chamber is unable to infer his argument. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "[w]hile it is preferable for the Trial Chamber to state its reasons for accepting the evidence of one witness over that of another when they are contradictory, the Trial Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record."[1986] Sesay fails to show error in the Trial Chamber's finding.

(c) Whether receipt of reports substantially contributed to crimes

762. The Trial Chamber found that Sesay, as one of the most senior RUF commanders, made a substantial contribution to the planning of the RUF system of child use by, inter alia, receiving reports on training at Bunumbu and subsequently at Yengema.[1987] Specifically, the Trial Chamber found that the adjutant at the base drew up a list of recruits including their names, ages and other personal data.[1988] Sesay submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that receipt of reports substantially contributed to the crime of child conscription or use.[1989] He posits that the alleged planning must be found to have actually led to the commission of specific crimes.[1990]

763. Reports on the trainees were compiled by the adjutant and sent to the deputy at the training base and then to the training commandant who would forward the reports to an advisor.[1991] Next, the reports were either delivered by hand or communicated via radio to Sesay and finally to Bockarie;[1992] and Sesay would confirm delivery of the report back to the base.[1993] The Trial Chamber found that "[e]very such report was either hand-delivered or communicated via radio to the Joint Security Board of Investigations.[2907] More importantly, Gbao does not challenge the Trial Chamber's finding that "in RUF controlled territory, the OSC was responsible for the enforcement of discipline and law and order."[2908] Similarly, Gbao neither challenges the Trial Chamber's finding that he was a Vanguard,[2909] nor the findings regarding the status and authority Vanguards held.[2910] In particular, he does not challenge the Trial Chamber's finding that assignment and status could be more important in terms of authority and influence than rank in the RUF.[2911] Accordingly, Gbao's citation to testimonial evidence of his rank by Witness DAG-048 and the testimony of Witness TF1-371 does not establish that the Trial Chamber unreasonably found that he had considerable prestige and power in Kailahun District.

1057. Gbao further claims that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he gained additional prestige and power within the RUF as a result of a personal connection with Foday Sankoh.[2912] However, Gbao fails to articulate how this error rendered unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that "Gbao had considerable prestige and power within the RUF in Kailahun District,"[2913] particularly as he does not contest his assignment as OSC and Overall IDU Commander and his status as a Vanguard, as noted above.

(v) Beating of TF1-113

1058. Gbao misrepresents the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the general credibility of TF1-113. Contrary to his assertion, the Trial Chamber did not consider that this witness required corroboration when testifying about Gbao's acts and conduct.[2914] Rather, the Trial Chamber was not convinced that the whole of the witness's testimony was not credible, and found that it was only necessary to exercise extreme caution and often seek corroborative evidence.[2915] Furthermore, Gbao fails to support his assertion that the testimonies of witnesses who lie under oath should, as a rule, be disregarded,[2916] as none of the authorities he cites supports such a proposition.[2917] In that regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that Rules 77 and 91 of the Rules allow a Chamber to hold in contempt a witness who wilfully gives false testimony under oath, but nothing in the Rules obligates a Chamber to discard the testimony of such witnesses for that reason alone. Rather, Rule 89 permits a Chamber to admit any evidence it deems relevant. The Appeals Chamber will not lightly disturb the Trial Chamber's exercise of its discretion in this respect. Indeed, "it is primarily for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible and to decide which witness' testimony to prefer, without necessarily articulating every step of the reasoning in reaching a decision on these points."[2918] Accordingly, Gbao's claim that the Trial Chamber erred in finding TF1-113's testimony credible on this issue is rejected.[2919]

(vi) The Trial Chamber's finding that Gbao significantly contributed to the JCE

1059. In addition to the claims previously addressed, Gbao submits four grounds in support of his argument that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he significantly contributed to the JCE.

1060. Gbao first argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he significantly contributed as the OSC, submitting that the RUF security apparatus had a nominal role during the Junta period,[2920] and that he had limited authority over the RUF security units.[2921] Gbao further submits that the security apparatus did not deal with most disciplinary issues in fact, which "were instead handled by the local Area Commander where the crime was alleged to have taken place."[2922] The Appeals Chamber has previously dismissed Gbao's first submission,[2923] and has noted that the Trial Chamber found that Gbao, whatever his de jure authority, exercised "considerable influence" and "practical authority" over the RUF security apparatus.[2924] The Appeals Chamber further notes with respect to the last submission that the Trial Chamber specifically distinguished between discipline in combat areas and RUF-controlled territory, finding that although "Gbao may have possessed only limited authority in respect to combat operations," "the OSC was responsible for the enforcement of discipline and law and order" in RUF-controlled territory.[2925] In this regard, the Appeals Chamber recalls the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the role of the RUF security to Kailahun was Gbao.[3264] This evidence is insufficient to eliminate all doubt as to whether Gbao "participated in the execution, administration and running of a plan" encompassing child conscription, as argued by the Prosecution.[3265]

1173. The Trial Chamber's scant findings on Gbao's involvement in the child conscription stand in stark contrast to its detailed findings on his involvement in the other types of forced labour in Kailahun District administered by the G5, in particular forced farming,[3266] and also on his co-accused's substantial contribution to the crimes under Count 12.[3267] This disparity in findings reflects a corresponding difference in the amount of reliable evidence. The Prosecution argues no error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the available evidence.

1174. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by the Prosecution's attempt to link child conscription and use with the enslavement in Kailahun District. While both were within the JCE, it does not follow that Gbao, simply by contributing to the latter crime also significantly contributed to the former, as the two crimes are distinct both in law and in fact. The Trial Chamber found no evidence that Gbao's participation in the JCE was such that it contributed to both.[3268] By merely reiterating the Trial Chamber's findings, without proffering any evidence that might have been disregarded by the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution's submission is but a bare request that the Appeals Chamber substitute its own conclusion for that of the Trial Chamber. Such a submission fails to meet the Prosecution's burden to eliminate all reasonable doubt as to Gbao's guilt.

1175. The Prosecution makes two additional submissions as to Gbao's alleged responsibility for aiding and abetting child conscription and use outside Kailahun District. The first is that his alleged contribution to planning the execution of the crime in Kailahun District, coupled with his purported failure to interfere in the recruitment of civilians including persons under the age of 15 being sent to training and then used for military purposes, amounted to tacit approval and encouragement of the crime.[3269] The Appeals Chamber recalls that it has rejected the Prosecution's contention that Gbao significantly or substantially contributed to the child conscription and use in Kailahun District. Moreover, assuming arguendo that Gbao did so contribute, the Prosecution fails to point to findings or evidence establishing Gbao's alleged failure to interfere beyond Kailahun, or suggest what measures he could have taken in that respect and what effect his failure to do so would have had on the perpetrators. To the contrary, the Prosecution itself refers to evidence that Gbao granted permission for the re-opening of the Interim Care Centre in Makeni in February 2000.[3270]

1176. The Prosecution's second submission is that Gbao aided and abetted "re-recruitment" and use of the children he removed from the Interim Care Centre in May 2000.[3271] The Trial Chamber found that the fact that Gbao loaded former child fighters onto a truck and removed them from the Interim Care Centre in May 2000 was "insufficient to constitute a substantial contribution to the widespread system of child conscription or the consistent pattern of using children to participate actively in hostilities."[3272] The Prosecution challenges this finding,[3273] essentially arguing that some of the removed children were used in combat in the Lunsar area during the RUF attack on the ZAMBATT peacekeepers.[3274]

1177. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the Prosecution succeeds in eliminating all reasonable doubt as to Gbao's guilt in this regard. First, it remains unclear if the persons Gbao removed were under the age of 15 years. The Prosecution seeks to infer from the finding that between 1998 and 2002 "the mean average" of children "in most Centres" was 14 years[3275] that "some of" the children removed by Gbao were under the age of 15.[3276] This submission does not eliminate all reasonable doubt as to the children's age.

1178. Second, the Prosecution also fails to eliminate all reasonable doubt as to whether they were used to participate actively in hostilities. Here, the Prosecution relies on the testimony of TF1-174.[3277] It says the witness testified that he left Makeni on 6 May 2000 and that when he returned to the Interim Care Centre at Makeni the number of children there had decreased drastically.[3278] A day after Gbao removed the children from the Interim Care Centre, "one of the boys" returned to the Interim Care Centre crying and saying that "a good number of his companions were killed in the attack at Lunsar."[3279] The Prosecution posits that this leads to the only reasonable inference that the

3. Discussion

(a) Applicable law

1190. The jurisprudence on cumulative convictions has been thoroughly addressed at the international tribunals. The test to determine the permissibility of cumulative convictions was set out in the Čelebići Appeal Judgment, which stated:

> Having considered the different approaches expressed on this issue both within this Tribunal and other jurisdictions, this Appeals Chamber holds that reasons of fairness to the accused and the consideration that only distinct crimes may justify multiple convictions, lead to the conclusion that multiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.
> Where this test is not met, the Chamber must decide in relation to which offence it will enter a conviction. This should be done on the basis of the principle that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld. Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional materially distinct element, then a conviction should be entered only under that provision.[3300]

1191. The test applied is therefore two-part: first, it is permissible to enter cumulative convictions under different statutory provisions for the same criminal act if each statutory provision has a "materially distinct element" that is not contained in the other statutory provision.[3301] Second, if this is not the case then the conviction for the criminal act should be upheld under the "more specific provision."[3302] It is the legal elements of each statutory provision, and not the acts themselves that must be considered when applying this test.[3303] The issue of whether the same act can lead to a conviction under multiple statutory provisions is a question of law.[3304]

(b) Cumulative convictions for extermination as a crime against humanity (Count 3) and murder as a crime against humanity (Count 4)

1192. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber correctly stated the law on cumulative convictions with respect to Counts 3 and 4 when it held that "[it] is impermissible to convict for both murder [as a crime against humanity] and extermination [as a crime against humanity] under Count 4 and Count 3 based on the same conduct. What makes a statutory provision materially distinct is whether "it requires proof of a fact not required by the other."[3305] Murder as a crime against humanity does not contain a materially distinct element from extermination as a crime against humanity; they are only distinguished by the fact that extermination requires killings "on a massive scale."[3306] The crime of murder is therefore subsumed in the crime of extermination and consequently convictions under Counts 3 and 4 for the same underlying acts are impermissibly cumulative.

1193. Turning to the second prong of the test, since the first part of the Čelebići test was not met, we now turn to the issue under which count the convictions should be upheld. Following the principle in Čelebići the statutory provision that is more specific, that is, "contains an additional materially distinct element" should stand.[3307] Extermination as a crime against humanity contains the additional element that the crime must be committed on a massive scale, which murder as a crime against humanity does not contain. Therefore, extermination as a crime against humanity is the more specific statutory provision and convictions for the above noted criminal conduct[3308] should stand under Count 3, but not under Count 4.

circumstances found to exist then, [and therefore] it should not be given undue weight in mitigation."[3443] Sesay fails to show error in this regard.

(e) Alleged coercive treatment by the Prosecution

1244. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that, contrary to Sesay's argument, the Trial Chamber took into account Sesay's argument that the Prosecution's "coercive conduct" during his arrest and "interview process" denied him of the real possibility of cooperation with the Prosecution. These circumstances were the subject of the "lengthy voir dire process," and Sesay's submissions were noted in paragraph 72 of the Sentencing Judgment.[3444] In the context of considering "Substantial cooperation" with the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber found that Sesay's treatment by the Prosecution during the six day period after his arrest did not preclude him from cooperating with the Prosecution at any point since that episode, and thus it did not warrant additional relief beyond that already afforded to Sesay, namely, that the Trial Chamber expunged from the record the statements obtained by the Prosecution during this six day period.[3445] On appeal, Sesay has not shown any error and, therefore, his submission is untenable.

(f) Likelihood of serving sentence abroad

1245. The Trial Chamber found that:

> [W]hilst it seems more likely than not at this stage that the convicted persons in this trial will serve sentences outside Sierra Leone, this is a decision that ultimately lies within the discretion of the President of the Court, based upon agreements concluded by the Registrar. The Chamber is unable to speculate on the result of these negotiations and decision-making processes, upon which it has no conclusive information, which lie outside of its control. It therefore notes for purposes of record that it has not given any weight to this factor in the consideration of the sentences of any of the convicted persons in this case.
> The Chamber, however, wishes to recognize that, in general terms, sentences served abroad, where family visits are likely to be few, may be harder to bear. Such circumstances would normally amount to a factor in mitigation.[3446]

1246. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's decision not to mitigate the Appellants sentences as a consequence of the fact that they will likely be served outside of Sierra Leone. As discussed in the Mrđa case, which is relied upon by Sesay, it is common practice that convicted persons from international criminal tribunals serve their sentences in foreign countries.[3447] Sesay does not refer to any case in which serving the sentence in a foreign country has been considered as a mitigating factor for sentencing purposes.[3448]

(g) Statement of remorse

1247. Although the Trial Chamber found Sesay's statements of remorse were generally "not sincere," it accepted that his expression of empathy toward the victims of the conflict were in fact sincere.[3449]

1248. With regard to any further mitigating weight, Trial Chamber exercised its discretion to find that Sesay's statements, apart from his empathy toward victims of the conflict, did not show any real remorse.[3450] Sesay, however, relies on the ICTY Trial Chamber case of Brđanin to assert that in order to constitute a mitigating circumstance "it is sufficient for the accused to extend his sympathy for victims of the conflict."[3451] The Appeals Chamber finds that this is a mischaracterisation of the law. In Fofana and Kondewa, the Appeals Chamber observed that only in a minority of cases have Trial Chambers found that an accused's expressions of regret or empathy for victims, without acknowledgement of responsibility for the crimes, constituted a mitigating factor. The Appeals Chamber acknowledged that it is:

> aware of only two cases at the ad hoc Tribunals in which the Chamber considered whether an accused's expressions of regret or empathy for victims without acknowledgement of responsibility for the crimes could constitute a mitigating factor. In Vasiljević, the ICTY Appeals Chamber opined that an accused can express sincere regrets without admitting his participation in a crime, and that this could be a factor taken into account by the Trial Chamber.[3452] However, in Vasiljević, the Appeals Chamber declined to consider Vasiljević's expressions of regret to be a mitigating circumstance.[3453]
> The ICTY Trial Judgment in Orić is the only case in which a convicted person received credit for expressions of empathy for the victims without acknowledging responsibility.[3454] In Blaškić, the accused attempted to express remorse while denying cannot be held responsible for an act unless something he himself has done or failed to do justifies holding him responsible."[3521]

1278. Although we find error in the holding that Rocky's conduct at the Sunna Mosque constituted an aggravating factor for Kallon, the Appeals Chamber finds no reason to interfere in the sentence. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the weight to be attached to an aggravating circumstance is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber,[3523] and an Appellant bears "the burden of demonstrating that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion" in the weight it attached.[3524] In view of the Trial Chamber's proper consideration of Kallon's use of the Sunna Mosque as an aggravating circumstance, the Appeals Chamber considers that Kallon has not shown that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in determining the weight to be given to this aggravating circumstance. Kallon's submission is therefore rejected.

(d) Duress and superior orders

1279. In regard to factors of duress and acting under superior orders, Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in considering these two separate arguments as one mitigating factor.[3525] The Appeals Chamber notes, however, that the Trial Chamber acknowledged that Kallon submitted at trial that these factors were separate mitigating factors and it explained that even though it was considering these factors under the heading "Executing Orders" it did not imply that these factors are the same.[3526] The Trial Chamber committed no error in this regard.

1280. Kallon argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he had failed to establish that with respect to the UNAMSIL events his life was under threat if he failed to obey Sankoh's orders.

23. The Chamber is cognisant of the impermissibility of "double-counting", meaning that the factors considered in assessing the gravity of the offence, cannot be used or considered as aggravating circumstances.[27] The Appeals Chamber has however endorsed the view that there is no double-counting merely because a Trial Chamber considers the impact of the crimes on the victim in one section and the vulnerability of the victims in the other section.[28] In this regard, this Chamber takes the view that factors which it considers and accepts as lessening the gravity of the offence, cannot be taken into account as mitigating circumstances.

3.2. Aggravating Factors

24. The Chamber opines that it is an accepted practice that aggravating factors should be established by the Prosecution beyond a reasonable doubt[29] and that only circumstances directly related to the commission of the offence charged, and for which the Accused has been convicted, can be considered to be aggravating.[30] Hence, when a particular circumstance is an element of the underlying offence, it cannot be taken into account as an aggravating factor.[31]

25. The Chamber acknowledges that the Statute and the Rules do not provide an exhaustive enumeration of the circumstances that the Trial Chamber may consider to be aggravating. Based on the established jurisprudence, factors considered as aggravating in other international criminal jurisdictions, however, include the leadership role of the Accused,[32] premeditation and motive,[33] a willing and enthusiastic participation in the crime,[34] the length of time during which the crime was committed,[35] the location of the attacks – attacks committed in traditional places of civilian sanctuary such as churches, mosques, schools and hospitals being generally considered as more serious,[36] sadism and a desire for revenge,[37] abuse of trust or official capacity,[38] "total disregard for the sanctity of human life and dignity." The Chamber takes the view that deceptive behaviour such as luring others into a false sense of security through fraudulent offers to discuss or negotiate and subsequently taking advantage of the others revealed weakness may also amount to aggravating circumstances. The Prosecution submitted that bad behaviour of an accused during trial might constitute and aggravating factor, however the Chamber does not accept that argument.

[35] Blaskic Appeal Judgement, para. 686. As noted, the Chamber has considered certain factors, such as the vulnerability and age of victims, and the humiliating or degrading nature of the acts, that are sometimes considered as aggravating factors, as part of the gravity of the offence (see n. 51).

26. Furthermore, the Chamber opines that the position of leadership of an Accused held criminally responsible for a crime under Article 6(1) of the Statute, may constitute an aggravating circumstance.[39] However, it has been held that if an Accused has been found liable under Article 6(3), his leadership position cannot be considered by the Chamber as an aggravating factor as it is in itself a constitutive element of the offence.[40] It has also been held that where the Accused has actively abused his position of command or participated in the crimes of his subordinates, however, such conduct can be considered to be aggravating.[41]

3.3. Mitigating Factors

27. The Chamber recalls that neither the Statute nor the Rules exhaustively define the factors that may be considered to be mitigating. As a consequence, we opine that the category of mitigating circumstances is not closed. Accordingly, "what constitutes a mitigating factor is a matter for the Trial Chamber to determine in the exercise of its discretion."[42]

28. It has been held that the burden of proof on the Accused with regard to mitigating circumstances is that of a balance of probabilities, meaning that it is more probable than not that the circumstances in question did exist. Therefore, it is a much lower burden of proof

Chamber to be meritorious, undermines the purposes of sentencing rather than promotes them".[53]

4. Sentencing Practice of Other Tribunals and Courts

31. Article 19(1) empowers the Chamber to consider as appropriate the practice regarding sentencing at the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ("ICTR"). The Chamber also considers as appropriate the jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ("ICTY"), which shares a common Appeals Chamber with the ICTR, to be instructive, and has also considered this as appropriate. The Chamber has also considered the sentencing practice of this court, to the limited extent possible.

32. Article 19(1) authorises the Chamber to consider, where appropriate, the sentencing practices of Sierra Leonean domestic courts. However, as none of the Accused was charged for offences under Sierra Leonean law, the Chamber deems it unnecessary to make this enquiry.[54]

IV. SUBMISSION OF THE PARTIES

33. In issuing this Judgement, the Chamber has taken into consideration both the written and oral submissions of the Parties.[55]

1. Prosecution

1.1. Sentencing Principles

34. The Prosecution submits that in determining the appropriate sentences the Chamber must consider certain fundamental sentencing principles, the objectives and purposes of sentencing and the factors specified in Articles 19 of the Statute and Rule 100(B).

facilitate disarmament and rehabilitation of former child soldiers."[180] Similarly, the Gbao Defence highlights Gbao's role in relation to the release of 45 suspected Kamajors in Kailahun, before the second group of 64 was killed, and requests that this be considered as a mitigating factor.[181]

96. Other mitigating factors adduced by the Gbao Defence include Gbao's personal and family circumstances, his advanced age, his health condition, good character and lack of prior convictions.[182] In particular, the Gbao Defence would like the Chamber to refrain from imposing a long sentence on Gbao because, given his age, this would functionally amount to a life sentence. Additionally, it was submitted that serving his sentence in a foreign country would result in undue hardship on Gbao and on his family and should, consequently, be taken into account when determining the length of Gbao's imprisonment.[183]

97. The Chamber recalls that during oral submissions, Counsel for Gbao stated that:

> Mr. Gbao does not wish to address the Chamber. This is not because he is feeling any form of disrespect towards this Chamber. It is not because he is feeling surly. It is because he prefers not to. He prefers to speak through me.[184]

98. Counsel for Gbao made further submissions to the effect that: (i) Mr. Gbao does not hold a grudge against his former opponents, indeed he made his peace with the CDF and others a while ago, and even became close with the late Chief Hinga Norman whilst in detention;[185] (ii) he has genuinely forgiven his former enemies, even those who testified against him;[186] and, (iii) "Although [Gbao] accepts that certain members of the RUF committed crimes during the war, Mr. Gbao's conscience forbids him to apologise for those events of which he had no knowledge, let alone control, but one must not assume from that that he doesn't feel deep profound and lasting regret at what happened in this country during the war".[187] representatives from Ghana, Guinea, Libya, Sierra Leone, Canada, UK, USA, the then Organisation of African Unity (now African Union) and UNAMSIL.[305]

202. It was of utmost international interest that all the UNAMSIL peacekeepers were safely returned, those detained, wounded or injured, death or alive and all the missing peacekeepers.[306] The political effort to assist the Sierra Leonean people should be supplemented by a credible military force. The UK decided to deploy their spearhead battalion to restore relative calm in Freetown, Lungi and the Peninsula areas.

203. The objective of the international community was to assist in creating conditions for the establishment of lasting peace. At the 4139th meeting of the Security Council on 11 May 2000, many member states advocated that UNAMSIL should be given a strong peace enforcement mandate under Chapter VII of the Charter.[307] The Under-Secretary-General deemed it essential for the international community to show the necessary will and resolve to sustain such a commitment to impose peace in Sierra Leone and called on member states with ready capacity and necessary resources to assist.

1.8.6. Conclusion

204. Having carefully considered the instances of crimes against UNAMSIL personnel as we have found in the Judgement (Counts 15 and 17 of the Indictment) the Chamber concludes that the inherent gravity of the criminal acts in question is exceptionally high.

2. Individual Circumstances of the Accused

2.1. Applicable to all accused

2.1.1. Sentence possibly to be served outside of Sierra Leone

205. Having considered the submissions of the Parties in relation to serving a sentence in a foreign country,[308] as well as the submissions of the Registrar in this regard,[309] the Chamber notes that whilst it seems more likely than not at this stage that the convicted persons in this trial will serve sentences outside of Sierra Leone,[310] this is a decision that ultimately lies within the discretion of the President of the Court, based upon agreements concluded by the Registrar.[311] The Chamber is unable to speculate on the result of these negotiations and decision making processes, upon which it has no conclusive information, and which lie outside of its control. It therefore notes for purposes of record that it has not given any weight to this factor in the consideration of the sentences of any of the convicted persons in this case.

[309] SCSL-04-15-T-1248, Submission of the Registrar Pursuant to Rule 33(B) Regarding the Conclusion of Agreements for the Enforcement of Sentences, 25 March 2009 ("Registrar's Submission")

206. The Chamber however wishes to recognise that, in general terms, sentences served abroad, where family visits are likely to be few, may be harder to bear. Such circumstances would normally amount to a factor in mitigation of sentence.

2.1.2. References in submissions to evidence adduced during trial

207. Although both the Prosecution and the Defence teams referred to evidence adduced at trial in support of their arguments on sentencing, the Chamber has not given this evidence substantial consideration unless such evidence resulted in a finding of fact in the Judgement. The Chamber had determined that some of the evidence adduced at trial was found to be not credible and therefore attached no probative value to it. In making its findings on the individual circumstances of the Accused for the purposes of sentencing, the Chamber has relied upon the findings in the Judgement, the arguments of the parties including any information adduced specifically in support thereof and the procedural history of the case.

2.2. Sesay

2.2.1. Convictions and form of liability

208. The Chamber recalls the crimes for which Sesay has been convicted, and the form of liability for each crime, as set out above in Section II of this Sentencing Judgement.

Court Appointed Counsel for Augustine Gbao:

certain key information allegedly arising out of the relationship between General Tarnue, Dr. White and the United States Government as set out in paragraph 6 herein.

(A) Alleged Breach of Article 15(1)

40. The Chamber notes that both the Defence and the Prosecution agree that within the proper context and interpretation of the Statute and the Rules, Article 15(1) does vest on the Prosecution, the autonomy and independence in the discharge of its functions, and that the Office of the Prosecutor must act as an independent body that does not take instructions from any other entity.

41. It seems clear to the Chamber that the arguments and submissions of the Defence as regards the alleged breach of Article 15(1) are predicated upon the assumption that the Office of the Prosecutor has taken instructions from another entity. The Prosecution submits that it has not. The crux of the matter, from the Chamber's perspective, is whether there is, at this point in time, any evidentiary basis or factual foundation for the allegation put forward by the Defence, to warrant a conclusive finding of fact that there has in law been a breach of Article 15(1). The Defence assert that the evidence from which such inference should be drawn is that of General Tarnue that Dr. White's actions were, according to Dr. White, to be based upon a decision of the State Department of the Government of the United States.

42. Does this piece of evidence irresistibly sustain the Defence contentions, even if given a liberal evaluation? In other words, does it necessarily follow that because General Tarnue stated that Dr. White told him that the latter's actions were to be based on a decision of the State Department of the U.S. Government, the Office of the Prosecutor was acting on the instructions 'received' from the U.S. Government? In the Chamber's opinion, an inference of this nature cannot lightly be drawn from such evidence, given its grave implications for the justice process.

43. The Chamber, likewise, emphasises that the suggestion of the Defence that General Tarnue's testimony revealed a relationship between the Office of the Prosecutor and the United States of America, even if it were true, could not in law justify, without more, the inference that the Prosecution was receiving instructions from the U.S Government in breach of Article 15(1). This is so even if the Office of the Prosecutor sought assistance from the U.S. Government as envisaged by Rule 8(C) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Certainly, in the Chamber's view, it would do violence to the plain meaning and context of the Statute and the Rules if conceptually the words "instructions" and "assistance" were construed as being synonymous and interchangeable. The contentions of the Defence on this issue, therefore, are legally unsustainable in that, on the whole, the Defence has failed to substantiate, by prima facie proof, the allegation of breach of Article 15(1), on the part of the Office of the Prosecutor. This Chamber does not find any, as the Defence contends, "master-servant" relationship between Dr. White, as FBI agent and the Prosecution which would occasion a breach of Article 15(1).

(B) Discretion to Seek Assistance

44. The Chamber recalls that both the Defence and Prosecution agree that within the framework of the Court's Statute and Rules, the Office of the Prosecutor is vested with some measure of discretionary latitude in seeking assistance from internal and external agencies for the purpose of the conduct of its investigations. We observe that, unlike Article 15(1) of the Statute which is an exclusionary clause designed to protect and preserve prosecutorial independence, there is no similar statutory prohibition for the Prosecution, in the exercise of its prosecutorial discretion, to seek, within the confines of the law, any assistance from other bodies and Institutions in fulfilling the duties conferred on it by the Statute. Clearly, Article 15(2) of the Statute is explicit in its purport and intendment that:

> "The Office of the Prosecutor shall have power to question suspects, victims, and witnesses, to collect evidence and evident on - site investigations. In carrying out these tasks, the Prosecutor shall, as appropriate, be assisted by the Sierra Leone authorities concerned."

45. By parity of reasoning, Rules 8(C), (D) and (E), 39, and 40 of the Court's Rules of Procedure and Evidence cumulatively establish a machinery for co-operation between the Office of the Prosecutor and external agencies or entities, be they States, Governments, Organisations, Bureaus, or related bodies.

46. In this regard, the Defence submissions do not really challenge the authority of the Office of the Prosecutor to seek assistance in the conduct of its investigations. Accordingly, the Chamber concludes that there is clear statutory authority for the Prosecution to seek assistance from both internal and external sources for the purposes of the conduct of its investigations in the course of fulfilling its mandate to bring to justice those who bear the greatest responsibility for crimes against humanity, war crimes and related offences during the hostilities that took place in Sierra Leone at the material times.

position to commit an offence.[485] It is the Chamber's opinion that no formal superior-subordinate relationship between the superior and the subordinate is required. It is sufficient that there is proof of some position of authority on the part of the Accused that would compel another to commit a crime in compliance with the Accused's order, command or direction.[486] Such authority can be de jure or de facto and can be reasonably implied.[487] The Chamber is of the view that a "causal link between the act of ordering and the physical perpetration of a crime [...] also needs to be demonstrated as part of the actus reus of ordering" but that this "link need not be such as to show that the offence would not have been perpetrated in the absence of the order."[488]

274. The Chamber finds that to establish the mens rea requirement for ordering a crime, the Prosecution must prove that the Accused either intended to bring about the commission of the crime or that the Accused gave an order with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime would likely be committed as a consequence of the execution or implementation of that order, command or direction.[489]

4.1.6. Aiding and Abetting

275. The Chamber notes that the Prosecution charges the Accused pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute with aiding and abetting in the planning, preparation or execution of the crimes referred to in the Indictment.[490]

276. The Chamber considers that "aiding and abetting" consists of the act of rendering practical or material assistance, encouragement or moral support, which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of a certain crime.[491] Aiding and abetting may also consist of an omission, providing that the basic elements of aiding and abetting as set out below are satisfied.[492]

277. The actus reus of aiding and abetting requires that the Accused perpetrates an act or an omission specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime and that this act or omission of the aider and abettor must have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[493] The provision of material or physical assistance can also constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting. "[P]roof of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider or abettor and the commission of the crime, or proof that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime, is not required."[494]

278. Further, taking into account the specific wording of Article 6(1) of the Statute that "[a] person who [...] aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall be individually responsible for the crime", this Chamber is of the opinion that the actus reus of aiding and abetting a crime may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated and at a location geographically removed from the location of the principal crime.[495] If the aiding and abetting occurs after the crime, it must be established that a prior agreement existed between the principal and the person who subsequently aided and abetted in the commission of the crime.[496] The Appeals Chamber has confirmed that acts of aiding and abetting "can be made at a time and place removed from the actual crime."[497] The Chamber reiterates, however, that the act of the aider and abettor must have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.

279. Mere presence at the scene of a crime, without more, will not usually constitute aiding and abetting. There may be situations, however, in which the physical presence at the crime scene of the Accused, combined with his or her position of authority, "allowed the inference that non-interference by the accused actually amounted to tacit approval and encouragement" that could amount to aiding and abetting.[498] The Chamber also notes that, in some circumstances, a superior's failure to punish for past crimes might constitute instigation or aiding and abetting for further crimes.[499]

280. The Chamber recognises that the mens rea of aiding and abetting is the knowledge that the acts performed by the Accused assist the commission of the crime by the principal offender.[500] "Such knowledge may be inferred from all relevant circumstances."[501] The Accused need not share the mens rea of the principal offender, but he must be aware of the principal offender's intention.[502] In the case of specific intent offences, the aider and abettor need not possess the principal offender's intent, but must have knowledge that the principal offender possessed the specific intent required.[503] In other words, "it must be shown that the aider and abettor was aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal."[504] The aider and abettor, however, need not know the precise crime that is intended by the principal offender. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed by the principal offender, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, then he has intended to assist or facilitate the commission of that crime, and may be guilty of aiding and abetting.[505]

4.2. Responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute

281. In addition or in the alternative, the Prosecution alleges that the Accused are responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute for the crimes alleged in Counts 1 through 18 of the Indictment as these crimes were allegedly committed while the Accused were holding

493. During the course of the trial, some witnesses have been asked to identify one or more of the Accused in the courtroom. The Chamber is aware that it may be possible for a witness to point out an Accused person due to their physical placement in the courtroom and, in a multi-Accused trial, to pick out the Accused person who most closely resembles an individual they previously saw.[931]

494. The Chamber considers identification by a witness of someone previously known to be more reliable than identification of someone previously unknown.[932]

2.4. Hearsay Evidence

495. The Chamber followed the operative principle in the sphere of international criminal adjudication that hearsay evidence is admissible.[933] The Chamber is aware that hearsay evidence has inherent deficiencies. It cannot be tested by cross-examination, its reliability may be affected by compounded errors of perception and memory, its source and content can neither be confirmed nor is it subject to solemn declaration.[934] We are conscious of the fact that where such evidence is admitted to prove the truth of its contents, a tribunal ought to be satisfied that it is reliable for that purpose, in the sense of its being voluntary, truthful, and trustworthy, and that both its context and the circumstances under which it arose should be considered.[935]

496. Consistent with the Statute, the Rules of Procedure and Evidence and established international criminal jurisprudence, we acknowledge the fact that evidence which is hearsay in character does not necessarily deprive it of its probative value. In general, however, the weight or the probative value to be attached to such evidence will usually be less than that attributed to the testimony under oath of a witness who has been subjected to cross-examination.[936] Factors that influence the probative value of hearsay evidence include whether the evidence given was first-hand or further removed, the opportunity to cross-examine the person who made the statement, the potential for errors of perception and memory and the circumstantial guarantees of trustworthiness surrounding the statements.[937]

2.5. Accomplice Evidence

497. The Chamber has heard considerable evidence from "insider witnesses" - that is, persons who were former members of the RUF or the AFRC and who, even though they were not, could also have been indicted for these same offences whose commission they themselves openly and voluntarily admitted in the course of their testimony. These witnesses, as the Appeals Chamber has also observed, are, in law, considered as accomplices.[938]

498. The Chamber has approached the assessment of the reliability of the evidence of accomplice witnesses with caution and has always considered whether or not an accomplice has an ulterior motive to testify such as assurances of a quid pro quo from the Prosecution that they will not be prosecuted. Where possible, the Chamber has looked for corroboration of the evidence of accomplice witnesses.[939]

2.6. Circumstantial Evidence

499. Circumstantial evidence is evidence of circumstances surrounding an event or incident from which a fact at issue may be reasonably inferred.[940] Although the individual ingredients of circumstantial evidence may be insufficient to establish a fact, taken conjunctively and cumulatively their effect may be revealing and sometimes decisive.[941] As a matter of law, where the Prosecution's case is substantially based on circumstantial evidence, it must be such as to satisfy the Chamber that it is consistent only with the guilt of the Accused and that there is no reasonable innocent explanation.[942] Where it has been necessary for the Chamber to resort to circumstantial evidence in proof of a fact in issue, the Chamber has been careful to consider whether any conclusion other than the guilt of the Accused can reasonably be reached. If such a conclusion is possible, the Chamber has not relied on the evidence for the purpose of convicting the Accused.[943]

2.7. Corroboration

500. In some instances, only one witness has given evidence on a material fact. While the testimony of a single witness on a material fact does not, as a matter of law, require corroboration,[944] it has been the practice of the Chamber to examine evidence from a lone witness very carefully, in light of the overall evidence adduced, and to guard against the exercise of an underlying motive on the part of the witness, before placing any reliance upon it.[945]

501. The Chamber is mindful of the Appeals Chamber's opinion that the Trial Chamber may rely on "a limited number of witnesses or even a single witness provided that it took into consideration all the evidence on the record."[946]

2.8. Alibi

502. In the course of these proceedings, the Second Accused, Kallon, raised alibis and adduced evidence to support his claims in relation to certain events and allegations set out in the Indictment. In raising the special defence of alibi, an Accused not only denies that he committed the crimes charged, but also asserts that he was present in a different location than

It is not sufficient that it is a reasonable conclusion available from that evidence. It must be the only reasonable conclusion available. If there is another conclusion which is also reasonably open from that evidence, and which is consistent with the innocence of the accused, he must be acquitted." [emphasis in original].

The Chamber also accepted Johan Hederstadt as a prima facie expert on guerrilla warfare, and allowed his testimony within his specialization.[994] However, the Chamber only accepted the report to the extent that it fell within his knowledge as an expert, and excluded evidence from it with regard to many of his conclusions.[995] Generally speaking however, the Chamber views the evidence of these and other expert witnesses as credible and has accepted the evidence of such experts insofar as it relates to their areas of expertise, and does not make conclusions on the acts and conduct of the Accused Persons.

5.5. Insider Witnesses

539. Numerous "insider witnesses" were called by both the Prosecution and the Defence. The Chamber specifically recalls the testimony of TF1-371, TF1-366, TF1-361, TF1-367, TF1-362, TF1-360, TF1-071, George Johnson, TF1-334, TF1-036, TF1-045, DIS-069, DIS-188, DIS-157 and others. These insider witnesses were themselves high-ranking officers in the RUF or AFRC. Many of these witnesses were key participants in the crimes alleged in the Indictment, and may be considered to be co-perpetrators or accomplices. The Chamber reiterates that the Appeals Chamber has clarified that such persons may be considered accomplices even if they have not been charged with any criminal offence.[996]

540. The Chamber recalls its previous discussion about insider witnesses and the nature of their evidence, and emphasises that the trier of fact must exhibit extreme caution when examining the credibility of accomplice evidence. When possible, the Chamber has sought corroboration of the evidence of insider witnesses, and in particular, when this evidence related to a material issue. Being so aware, the Chamber has cautioned itself on the risk and danger of accepting uncorroborated evidence from an insider witness as credible, but at the same time, acknowledges its authority to accept such evidence. Without seeking to examine all of them, the following paragraphs provide a brief discussion on the credibility of a few of the insider witnesses for both the Prosecution and the Defence.

5.5.1. Prosecution Witnesses

541. TF1-371 was a high-ranking member of the RUF.[997] This witness testified extensively on training, the inner workings of the Junta Government, forced labour and serious crimes.

542. All three Defence Counsel have raised credibility concerns with respect to this witness. The Sesay Defence claimed TF1-371 changed his story several times, contradicted himself with respect to the diamond mining programme of the RUF and AFRC, and inaccurately implicated Sesay.[998] The Kallon Defence asserted that TF1-371 was a very high-ranking RUF officer by 1996 who has repeatedly minimized his own role and exaggerated that of the Accused. The Kallon Defence submitted that this witness was unreliable.[999] The Gbao Defence argued the testimony of TF1-371 had been significantly undermined due to the Prosecution's promise of immunity in exchange for testimony.[1000]

543. The Chamber has duly noted the credibility concerns surrounding the testimony of TF1-371 raised by all three Defence Counsel, and has approached the testimony of TF1-371 with utmost caution. The Chamber has observed that TF1-371 at times has a tendency to implicate the Accused in a way that does not accord with the rest of the evidence. For instance, the Chamber has serious concerns about the veracity of TF1-371's testimony as it relates to the command structure of the RUF and the AFRC, the role of the Accused within the RUF movement as well as evidence which relates to the acts and conduct of the Accused. The Chamber has required corroboration before accepting his evidence relating to these issues. However, where the evidence of TF1-371 was more general in nature, the Chamber has accepted his evidence without corroboration, as it has found it to be consistent with the overall evidence and reliable. We found this witness to be very articulate, and able to give his testimony in a clear-headed and coherent way.

5.5.1.2. TF1-366

544. TF1-366 testified that he was captured as a child by the RUF in Kailahun District in 1991 and taken to Baiwala base camp to be trained.[1001] This witness remained in the RUF for the duration of the war, eventually reaching the rank of Colonel. TF1-366 fought for the RUF and personally participated in many attacks and missions.[1002]

545. The Sesay Defence objected to the testimony of TF1-366 in part, because it claimed the witness attempted to implicate Sesay at every opportunity, and was generally an unreliable witness.[1003] The Chamber notes that the Sesay Defence also filed a Motion to Direct the Prosecutor to Investigate the Matter of False Testimony of TF1-366.[1004] The Kallon Defence asserted that TF1-366 was unreliable, contradicted himself and exhibited a "solemn" disregard for the truth.[1005] The Gbao Defence had similar concerns, stating that much of the evidence of TF1-366 was "so utterly inconsistent it caused one to wonder whether he was making it up as he went along."[1006]

546. The Chamber shares the concerns of Defence Counsel for the Accused that the testimony of TF1-366 was often problematic. The testimony of this witness tended to over-implicate the Accused, particularly Sesay and Kallon, in a way that went beyond the general story as related by other witnesses. The Chamber has therefore been cautious, and has not accepted the testimony of TF1-366 as it relates to the acts and conduct of the Accused unless it was corroborated in some material aspect by a reliable witness. However, where TF1-366 has given more general evidence, or has testified about his own experiences, the Chamber has accepted his evidence without corroboration.

547. TF1-361 testified that he was captured by the RUF in 1991.[1007] TF1-361 was trained at Camp Zogoda.[1008] The witness testified comprehensively with regard to the RUF, including his functions in the RUF, its command structure and on specific crimes.

548. The Sesay Defence objected to the testimony of TF1-361 on the grounds of his "verbal contortions".[1009] The Sesay Defence also raised concerns about TF1-361's loyalties, claiming his fierce loyalty to Superman, and the in-fighting that took place between Superman and Sesay, made it impossible for this witness to provide an unbiased account.[1010] The Kallon Defence found TF1-361's testimony unreliable because the witness attempted to over-implicate the Accused, as well as contradict himself regarding material events.[1011]

549. The Chamber has considered the concerns of the Defence Counsel, but concludes that, on the whole, TF1-361 was a reliable witness and has generally believed his evidence. The witness' testimony was internally consistent as well as consistent with the evidence of other credible witnesses. Although TF1-361 was an insider witness, he testified in a forthright and compelling manner and as one who was genuinely committed to assisting the Chamber. Accordingly, the Chamber has largely accepted his evidence. Exceptionally, where there could have been doubts as to his testimony given his status as an insider witness, the Chamber admonished itself accordingly.

5.5.1.4. TF1-367

550. TF1-367 joined the RUF voluntarily in 1990 and trained at Camp Naama.[1012] He remained with the RUF for the duration of the war. TF1-367 testified about diamond mining at Tongo Field, forced labour and logistics during the Junta.[1013]

551. The Sesay Defence raised concerns about TF1-367's testimony on the basis that the witness had occasionally lied and was generally unreliable.[1014] The Kallon Defence submitted that TF1-367's rampant dishonesty undermined his testimony.[1015]

552. The Chamber is of the view that the testimony of TF1-367 was generally credible. The witness recounted events confidently and showed a genuine interest in assisting the Chamber. The Chamber is of the view that any inconsistencies in his testimony were minor, and has largely accepted his evidence as being trustworthy.

5.5.1.5. TF1-362

553. TF1-362 voluntarily joined the RUF in Liberia in 1990.[1016] TF1-362 remained with the RUF throughout the war up until disarmament.[1017] Most of this witness' testimony centred on RUF training and recruiting.

554. The Sesay Defence expressed concerns about the testimony of TF1-362 because of the hostility harboured by the witness towards Sesay, and that the testimony was patterned to implicate him.[1018]

555. The Chamber considers that even if these allegations were well-founded, we have approached the testimony of TF1-362 concerning Sesay with caution. Generally, however, the Chamber has found the testimony of TF1-362 to be credible and has largely accepted this witness' evidence.

5.5.1.6. George "Junior Lion" Johnson

556. George Johnson joined the Sierra Leone military in 1993 in Kenema, and fought against the RUF.[1019] Following the coup, the witness was released from Pademba Road Prison in Freetown and joined the AFRC Junta.[1020] Eventually, Johnson separated from the main AFRC faction and became an Operation Commander with the West Side Boys.[1021] He testified extensively about the operations of the West Side Boys until the Lomé Peace Accord, as well as the 6 January 1999 invasion and events during the Junta.

557. The Kallon Defence submits that George Johnson is not a credible witness because he over-implicated Kallon, and testified that Kallon had a higher rank than he actually held.[1022] The Kallon Defence also argued that Johnson's testimony was unreliable because it was inconsistent with his previous statements, and because he minimized his own role in the conflict.[1023]

558. The Chamber finds that George Johnson is a credible witness whose testimony was forthright and compelling in that he exhibited a convincing grasp of the events and did not testify about events beyond his knowledge. In the Chamber's considered view, his demeanour in Court also indicated that he was genuinely assisting the Court to arrive at the truth. Moreover, none of the substantive aspects of Johnson's testimony were impeached in cross-examination. As such, his testimony is generally accepted as reliable and trustworthy.

5.5.1.7. TF1-045

559. TF1-045 testified that he and his family were captured by the RUF in Pujehun District in 1991.[1024] In 1996 Sankoh assigned the witness to work as a bodyguard in the RUF.[1025] Eventually, the witness rose to a high rank within the RUF.[1026] TF1-045 testified about diamond mining at Tongo Field, as well as about rape and looting and the command structure during the AFRC/RUF Junta.

560. The Sesay Defence raised concerns about the testimony of TF1-045 because it asserted that he harboured hostility toward Sesay, was unreliable with respect to his evidence about civilian diamond mining, and attempted to over-implicate the Accused.[1027] The Kallon Defence stated that TF1-045 was entirely unreliable and untruthful as he had attempted to implicate Kallon and to unnecessarily shift blame for the war to Kallon.[1028] The Kallon Defence argued that the whole of TF1-045's testimony should be disregarded.[1029] The Gbao Defence asserted that the Chamber should approach TF1-045's testimony with caution, especially as it related to the Kamajor killings in Kailahun because the witness' testimony that he was there was unrealistic and unreliable.[1030] The Gbao Defence asserted TF1-045's testimony contained "inconsistencies, exaggerations and omissions of material facts" and that every detail of his testimony should be disregarded.[1031]

561. The Chamber has duly considered the concerns of all three Defence teams and is of the view that TF1-045 provided helpful evidence, including useful information regarding the command structure and the functioning of the RUF as a movement. The Chamber opines that TF1-045 appeared confident and truthful while testifying, and that the overall purpose of his appearance in Court was to assist the Chamber in its search for the truth. Due to the fact that TF1-045 is a protected witness, the Chamber has, however, exercised caution when using his evidence. When the witness gave testimony that related directly to the acts and conduct of the Accused, the Chamber has required corroboration of that evidence. Generally speaking, however, the Chamber is of the considered view that TF1-045's testimony is credible.

5.5.1.8. TF1-360

562. TF1-360 testified that he was captured by the RUF in Pujehun District in April 1991.[1032] He was trained in the RUF, and remained in the movement, performing a specific role, until the end of the war.[1033]

563. While the Sesay Defence often accepted TF1-360's testimony, it raised concerns about internal contradictions in this witness' testimony.[1034] The Kallon Defence voiced stronger problems with the credibility of this witness, noting that he had a tendency to exaggerate the role of Kallon and gave materially inconsistent statements.[1035] The Kallon Defence argued that all of TF1-360's testimony should be ignored.[1036]

564. The Chamber notes that the testimony of TF1-360 was not always clear. While there were some discrepancies in this witness' testimony about dates, times and locations, the Chamber does not consider these to be material. The witness impressed the Chamber as a substantively truthful and forthright witness. In fact, the core of his testimony was consistent with the overall evidence adduced and accepted. On the whole, the Chamber is of the considered view that the evidence of TF1-360 is to be generally accepted as being credible.

5.5.2. Defence Witnesses

5.5.2.1. DIS-069

565. DIS-069 testified that in 1991 he voluntarily joined the RUF and trained at Pendembu.[1037] DIS-069 stayed with the RUF until disarmament, when he joined the ceasefire monitoring committee in Kenema.[1038]

566. The Chamber has evaluated the evidence given by DIS-069 and finds that it is generally implausible and unreliable. The Chamber considers that this witness did not testify in order to assist the Chamber in its search for the truth, but to assist the Accused. This witness' evidence runs counter to the entirety of evidence adduced by witnesses which this Chamber has found to be more reliable. In particular, where TF1-362 and DIS-069 have testified about the same events, the Chamber has found the testimony of TF1-362 to be more coherent, consistent and reliable. As such, the Chamber has generally rejected DIS-069's version of events unless corroborated by other credible evidence.

5.5.2.2. DIS-188

567. DIS-188 joined the RUF in Kangama in 1991, working as a mediator between the fighters and the civilian population.[1039] He has testified that he was an adherent of the RUF ideology.[1040] The witness was a member of the RUF for the entirety of the war, and his testimony covered everything from command structure, to RUF farming, to the alleged use of child soldiers.

568. The Chamber has serious concerns about the veracity of this witness' testimony. Much of DIS-188's evidence was inconsistent, and the Chamber is reluctant to accept it. On the whole, the Chamber opines that DIS-188's testimony was influenced in part by his support for the RUF movement and its ideology, and that he was not genuinely assisting the Court to arrive at the truth. However, where DIS-188's testimony has been corroborated and confirmed by the evidence of reliable witnesses, the Chamber has relied upon his evidence for that limited purpose.

569. DIS-157 voluntarily joined the RUF prior to the invasion on Sierra Leone in 1991.[1041] He testified about military operations of the RUF, how the RUF was supposed to treat civilians, as well as the relationship between the RUF and the AFRC.

570. After an analysis of the evidence of DIS-157, the Chamber finds that he is generally an unreliable witness. His testimony was inconsistent with that of other witnesses that the Chamber found to be credible, and some versions of the events given by this witness are completely implausible. For instance, DIS-157 testified that there was no forced farming in Kailahun between 1997 and 2000. The Chamber is unwilling to accept a claim that is so heavily refuted and contradicted by the overwhelming weight of reliable testimony. However, the Chamber found that some aspects of DIS-157's testimony could be accepted as credible where that testimony is supported by the general evidence or is corroborated by some other reliable evidence.

5.5.2.4. DAG-048

571. DAG-048 testified that he was approached by the RUF in Pendembu in 1991, and was forced to join the RUF in 1992.[1042] Although the witness was compelled to join the RUF, he grew to embrace and to adopt the RUF ideology and served in the RUF until the end of the war.[1043]

572. The Chamber has examined DAG-048's testimony and has found that it is generally unreliable. This witness' version of events was inconsistent with the version told by many other witnesses that the Chamber has accepted as being trustworthy. When compared with the general thrust of the evidence adduced at trial, DAG-048's account differs to the extent that the Chamber regards the essence of his testimony as inconsistent, unreliable and untrustworthy and unacceptable. However, where this witness's evidence is corroborated by accepted, reliable witnesses, the Chamber will accept his testimony for that limited purpose.

573. DAG-111 was employed by Gbao as his driver and mechanic for a year and a half, first in Kailahun Town and then in Makeni.[1044] DAG-111 gave detailed testimony in relation to the attacks on UNAMSIL peacekeepers in May 2000 and the movements and conduct of Gbao at this time.

574. In particular, DAG-111 testified that he accompanied Gbao to Makump DDR camp on 1 May 2000 with two other RUF members in order to investigate reports that RUF fighters had been forcibly disarmed. Upon arrival, Gbao was vexed and angry.[1045] However, Gbao spoke to several peacekeepers outside the camp and calmed down when he was informed that the MILOBs had effected disarmament. Gbao remained at the camp while DAG-111 returned to Makeni at Gbao's request and informed Kailondo that the situation was under control.[1046]

575. When DAG-111 returned to the camp, Gbao was calmly talking to the peacekeepers outside. However, shortly thereafter Kailondo arrived in a vehicle with ten men. Kailondo was angry and fired his AK-47 in the air. Gbao attempted to pacify him but to no avail.[1047] A second car then arrived from Makeni and Kallon descended with seven men. Kallon was armed and joined Kailondo.[1048] Gbao spoke to them both, attempting to calm them, as more armed men arrived, bringing the number of those present to around 50 fighters.[1049] According to DAG-111, at this point Gbao became afraid and departed the camp.[1050]

576. The Chamber notes that former UNAMSIL peacekeepers Major Ganase Jaganathan and Brigadier Leonard Ngondi also testified in relation to these events.[1051] Jaganathan, who had met Gbao on approximately three previous occasions, attended Makump DDR Camp to speak to Gbao and Ngondi was in radio communication with one of his subordinates, Major Maroa, who was also at the scene. The Chamber is satisfied that these witnesses were genuinely attempting to assist the Court and their testimony in relation to the events of 1 May 2000 at Makump DDR camp was detailed and consistent.

577. Jaganathan and Ngondi testified that Gbao was present at the Makump DDR camp with around 30 to 40 armed fighters. Gbao appeared drunk and angry and was threatening that he would not leave the camp unless his disarmed fighters were returned to him.[1052] Kallon subsequently arrived and abducted Jaganathan. No other Commander arrived at the scene, and Gbao stood at Kallon's vehicle armed with an AK-47 while Jaganathan was forced inside and driven away.[1053]

578. Having carefully examined the entirety of the evidence pertaining to Gbao's conduct at Makump DDR camp, the Chamber finds the discrepancies between the testimony of DAG-111 and the evidence of Jaganathan and Ngondi to be so significant as to render the testimony of DAG-111 in relation to the events of 1 May 2000 unreliable. The Chamber is unwilling to accept evidence that is contradicted by the corroborated testimony of two reliable witnesses. The Chamber has therefore not relied on the testimony of DAG-111 in its findings on this incident.

5.6. Former Child Soldiers

579. Several of the witnesses who testified were former child combatants who had been captured by the RUF at ages as young as ten. Many of these child witnesses experienced serious physical and mental trauma both during and after the war. Many were forced to consume or use drugs throughout their time in the RUF. Due to the fact that the events they attempt to recount took place largely during their childhood, their ability to recall such events is compounded by the passage of time. This means that such witnesses generally experienced difficulty in remembering specific details about such events, and various minor discrepancies are identifiable in their evidence. However, the Chamber has generally accepted the evidence of former child soldiers, especially as it relates to their own experiences. The following is a credibility evaluation of some of the key former child soldier witnesses.

5.6.1. TF1-141

580. The RUF captured TF1-141 in Koidu Town in 1998 during the Junta period.[1054] TF1-141 testified that he was taken to the Guinea Highway by the RUF, where he went on food-finding missions with other small boy units (SBUs), and that he also worked as a bodyguard.[1055] The witness remained with the RUF until 2000, when he was disarmed at a demobilisation, disarmament and reintegration ("DDR") camp.[1056]

581. The Sesay Defence asserted that TF1-141 was unreliable because he contradicted himself on several issues and attempted to over-implicate Sesay.[1057] The Kallon Defence stated that TF1-141's testimony contained many internal inconsistencies and contradictions, and was too rehearsed to be believed.[1058] The Gbao Defence expressed concern with the numerous contradictions throughout this witness' testimony.[1059]

582. The Chamber has evaluated TF1-141's credibility and shares some of the concerns raised by the Defence. In particular, the Chamber is uneasy with portions of TF1-141's testimony that appear to be fanciful and thus implausible.

583. The Chamber notes, however, that although the witness was diagnosed with Post-Traumatic Stress Disorder ("PTSD") originating from his experiences as a child soldier with the RUF,[1060] a psychologist's report submitted prior to his testimony indicated that he was able to testify in court proceedings.[1061] The Chamber is thus reassured that the witness was able to give truthful testimony. In addition, TF1-141 came across as a candid witness and the Chamber has generally accepted his testimony, especially as it relates to his own experiences as a child combatant. However, where the witness has testified about the acts and conduct of the Accused, the Chamber has required corroboration of his testimony.

584. TF1-263 testified that he was living in Koidu Town in 1998 when the rebels attacked his village.[1062] The witness was eventually captured by the RUF and forced to train and fight with other civilians of both his age and older.[1063] The witness testified extensively, and provided direct evidence regarding abductions, looting, murder by Sesay, mistreatment of civilians, the command structure of the RUF, widespread and mass killings, kidnapping of UNAMSIL personnel, and the direct orders of Sesay and Kallon on missions.

585. The Sesay Defence claims the testimony of TF1-263 is "inherently unreliable", in part due to inconsistencies between his testimony and his prior statements to the Prosecution.[1064]

586. The Chamber recognizes that TF1-263's testimony was problematic in some respects, as there were occasions where the witness implicated one of the Accused in a way that the evidence does not support. As a result of these concerns, the Chamber has required corroboration of any evidence of this witness that relates to the acts and conduct of any of the three Accused.

587. While the Chamber observes that there were minor inconsistencies in his testimony, it notes that the witness was very young at the time the offences were committed, which may explain the slight discrepancies in his evidence. On the whole, the Chamber finds the witness generally credible, as the alleged inconsistencies are mostly minor. As such, the Chamber largely accepts this witness' testimony, particularly as it relates to his own experiences.

588. TF1-117 testified that he was living in Gboajibu village in 1992 when the RUF, led by Gbao, attacked his village.[1065] TF1-117 stated that he was taken to Kono where he was given drugs and where the RUF trained him in combat.[1066] The witness testified extensively regarding amputations, the command structure of the RUF, attacks on civilians and peacekeepers, as well as his general movements across Sierra Leone during the time he spent with the RUF.

[1066] Transcript of 29 June 2006, TF1-117, p. 91.

589. The Sesay Defence states that TF1-117 is highly unreliable and in the Chamber's view, his evidence alone is not sufficient to sustain a conviction on any count.[1067] Specifically, the Sesay Defence claims that the witness describes events that no other witnesses recount, and tended to over-implicate Sesay.[1068] The Gbao Defence considered the witness TF1-117 to be one of the five most problematic and unreliable witnesses in the RUF trial.[1069] The Gbao Defence took issue with this witness' testimony because he implicates Gbao in the use of child soldiers; states that Gbao participated in RUF attacks; and generally provided exaggerated, contradictory and unrealistic accounts of events.[1070]

590. The Chamber has evaluated the arguments of Defence Counsel for Sesay and Gbao, and shares their concerns in some respects. The Chamber finds that portions of TF1-117's testimony are inconsistent. Specifically, TF1-117's testimony regarding the command structure of the RUF was often vague and contradictory, which made it difficult to assess or accept. Insofar as his evidence relates to the RUF command structure or relates directly to the acts and conduct of the Accused, the Chamber has required corroboration of this witness' testimony. There were, however, some instances when this witness provided useful and compelling evidence to the Court. In these instances, and when the evidence directly reflected TF1-117's personal experiences, the Chamber has accepted his evidence.

591. TF1-314 testified that in 1994 at the age of 10, she was captured and raped by the RUF in Masingbi, Tonkolili District.[1071] Following this violation, she was given the choice by an RUF fighter of being killed or accompanying the RUF. She chose to follow the RUF.[1072] She testified that she was eventually trained as part of a small girls unit ("SGU"); went on food-finding missions for the RUF; and married a rebel named Scorpion.[1073]

592. The Sesay Defence claims the testimony of TF1-314 lacks credibility, specifically with regard to her alleged military training. The Sesay Defence states that her inability to recall how to dismantle a gun or participate in an ambush shows that she is unreliable and that doubts can be cast on whether she was actually given military training by the RUF.[1074] The Gbao Defence asserts that this witness is not credible because there are significant inconsistencies in her evidence, as well as retractions of material aspects of her testimony.[1075]

593. The Chamber has evaluated the concerns of the Defence and has decided that most of TF1-314's testimony is credible and will be accepted. The Chamber notes that the witness may have been confused at times regarding times, locations and troop movement. The witness provided unsubstantiated evidence concerning certain events which will not be accepted by the Chamber.[1076]

594. Overall, the Chamber opines that the evidence of TF1-314 is largely credible. The Chamber is of the considered view that slight variations between TF1-314's prior statements and those made at trial are immaterial to a credibility determination of this witness' overall evidence. However, the Chamber will require corroboration of any evidence which relates to the acts and conduct of any of the three Accused.

5.7. Other witnesses

595. TF1-108 held a position of authority within the RUF.[1077] TF1-108 stated that the RUF entered his village in 1991 and appointed him[1078] to be in charge of organising and coordinating food shipments to the RUF fighters from the civilian population.[1079] TF1-108 held this position for the duration of the war.[1080]

596. The Sesay Defence argued that the testimony of TF1-108 is patently unreliable due in part to the fact that the witness' account of his wife's gruesome rape and death was a fabrication exposed when the Sesay Defence called his wife as a witness.[1081] The Gbao Defence states that this witness is unreliable and that the credibility of important aspects of his testimony had been exposed as incorrect by the Defence.[1082] The Gbao Defence specifically took issue with TF1-108's testimony concerning forced labour, stating that he was the "first significant witness against Gbao" after nearly two years of trial proceedings who directly implicated Gbao in allegations of forced labour.[1083]

597. In assessing the veracity of TF1-108's testimony, the Chamber shares the concerns of the Defence, and doubts the credibility of this witness, particularly in light of his misleading evidence concerning the death of his wife. The Chamber, while exercising caution with regard to the evidence given by TF1-108, has accepted portions of his testimony that are corroborated by a reliable source when such evidence dealt with the acts and conduct of the Accused, as well as his general descriptions of events. The Chamber has accordingly rejected his testimony on the raping to death of his wife as fallacious. We however, have found and accepted his testimony on matters within his personal knowledge and touching on his activities and involvement in the conflict within his locality as credible where corroborated by other credible and reliable evidence particularly on issues of forced labour, 'forced marriages' and inhumane treatement of civilians.

598. TF1-113 testified that she was captured by the RUF in Pendembu in 1991,[1084] and provided information on abductions; forced labour; the murders of suspected Kamajors; and "government" farming.

599. The Sesay Defence raised credibility concerns with regard to this witness due to significant inconsistencies in her testimony.[1085] The Gbao Defence submitted that as the witness had avoided answering certain questions and had provided contradictory answers to questions concerning material events, her testimony with regard to the killings of suspected

Kamajors in Kailahun was not truthful.[1086]

600. The Chamber has examined the concerns raised by the Sesay and Gbao Defence. The Chamber notes that while TF1-113 tended to misstate the facts during certain portions of her testimony, it remains unconvinced that this is sufficient reason to consider the whole of her evidence unreliable. The Chamber has, however, before considering the use of TF1-113's evidence, exercised extreme caution and often found it necessary to seek other corroborative evidence.

601. TF1-093 testified that she was captured by the RUF in Njala, Moyamba District, in 1996.[1087] She stated that, on the day of her captured she was raped, stabbed and forced into marriage with an RUF Commander.[1088] TF1-093 said that she was also trained in the use of firearms and RPG, and in guerrilla warfare.[1089] The witness provided direct evidence on amputations, forced labour, child soldiers, lootings, burnings, unlawful killings and rapes.

602. The Sesay Defence found TF1-093's testimony problematic because her testimony was replete with "contradiction, confusion and inconsistencies" and was fundamentally unreliable.[1090]

603. The Chamber shares the concerns of the Sesay Defence, and finds the testimony of TF1-093 generally unreliable. The Chamber is of the considered view that this witness is often inconsistent and prone to exaggeration. Although much of her testimony has been rejected, the Chamber accepts the core of her testimony, particularly as it relates to her own experiences, such as the time she spent as a "bush" wife. The Chamber has otherwise relied upon her evidence to the extent that it was corroborated by reliable witnesses and is consistent with the general story adduced by other evidence.

5.8. Testimony of the Accused

604. The Chamber refers to its previous discussion regarding the right of the accused persons to testify in their own defence,[1091] and recalls that no adverse inferences were drawn from Gbao's decision not to testify. It has made the following credibility findings about Sesay and Kallon.

5.8.1. Issa Sesay

605. The Chamber has concerns regarding both the veracity and accuracy of Sesay's testimony. Portions of Sesay's recounting of events are simply implausible, and do not correspond with the rest of the evidence as a whole. For instance, Sesay testified that he was scared to punish Komba Gbundema, who was acting on Sankoh's orders, as he was afraid of Sankoh's reaction. This would seem unlikely when compared to the overwhelming weight of evidence to the contrary,[1092] and is especially problematic given that Sesay was the interim leader of the RUF at the time.[1093] In addition, Sesay's testimony that children were only trained for defensive purposes and that there were no child combatants in Kono[1094] is entirely unrealistic, and in any event immaterial to the elements of the crime. Ngondi testified that at a meeting to discuss how the RUF had impeded the operation of Caritas, which was identifying child combatants abducted by the RUF in an effort to reunite them with their families, Sesay was concerned that Caritas was removing "their" combatants from the territory.[1095] Moreover, the Chamber does not accept Sesay's ex post facto rationalisations for why he acted in certain ways.

606. The Chamber has accepted Sesay's testimony on matters relating to some aspects of the nature and scope of the command structure of the RUF, given his position in the hierarchy of the RUF High Command.

607. The Chamber, acknowledges that Sesay's knowledge of the RUF command structure was irregular with regard to certain organisational and operational matters, including the diverse activities created by the war situation, and accepted such testimony as credible. For instance, Sesay testified that soon after the AFRC seized power, Johnny Paul Koroma invited the RUF to form an alliance with the AFRC. Sankoh accepted the invitation and ordered the RUF to join the AFRC. We also accepted other parts of Sesay's evidence when we deemed it to be relevant and credible and where the Chamber was certain that such evidence was not a deliberate manipulation by Sesay to distort the truth or mislead the Chamber with regard to the issue of his liability or that of Kallon and Gbao.

608. It is the considered view of the Chamber that Sesay's credibility is at issue and his version of events has not generally been accepted, particularly the evidence which deals with his conduct or the conduct of his co-Accused. Given the rank he held in the RUF from its inception until disarmament, at which time he was the acting leader of an insurgent movement in which there was continuous infighting, suspicion, mistrust and rivalry, it is simply unacceptable to believe that the Accused played the meaningless and at times peaceful role he attempts to portray. It is highly improbable, given the totality of the evidence, that a high-ranking officer of the RUF hierarchy would adopt the role of a pacifist essentially concerned with the well-being of the civilian population throughout the entire conflict, which is the position Sesay would have the Chamber believe. We disbelieve him in this posturing.

5.8.2. Morris Kallon

609. Kallon failed to impress the Chamber as a truthful witness and the Chamber repudiates his testimony. We are of the opinion that most of the responses and explanations given by Kallon throughout the trial proceedings, particularly those concerned with his alibi were implausible afterthoughts and to an extent, recent fabrications. As an example, TF1-122 testified during the Prosecution case that he had intervened to prevent soldiers taking the property of a woman who had failed to stand still during a flag raising ceremony held in Kenema.[1096] Kallon testified to an almost identical incident, but does not mention TF1-122, stating rather that he had thwarted the attempt of the soldiers to steal the woman's property.[1097] In the Chamber's view, this suggests a conscious attempt by Kallon to allign his testimony to the evidence presented during the Prosecution case, including attempting to put himself in a favourable light by downplaying or accentuating his role in incidents described by Prosecution witnesses. In many instances, the evidence that Kallon gives contradicts the weight of credible evidence presented by other reliable witnesses. In some instances, when compared with evidence accepted by the Chamber as credible, Kallon's dubious recounting of events is made implausible. For instance, Kallon testified that in May 2000, he was afraid to arrest Kailondo who was acting on Sankoh's orders. This is highly unlikely as Kallon was Battle Ground Commander at the time.[1098] As such, the Chamber rejects most of Kallon's testimony, except in instances where that testimony is corroborated by reliable witnesses. We believe the evidence of DAG-111 that he was there and that he perpetrated the acts alleged against him in the Indictment in Count 15 and that he was not present at the Makump Camp on 1 May 2000 when UNAMSIL personnel were besieged and being mistreated.

610. In the Chamber's opinion Kallon patterned his testimony to suit his defence of alibi. His alibi is in the Chamber's view fabricated, unreliable and implausible.

5.9. Kallon's Alibi

5.9.1. Procedural History

611. In its Pre-Trial Brief, the Kallon Defence did not raise any alibi claims, although it did explicitly reserve "the right to enter a Special Defence on behalf of Morris Kallon".[1099] On 27 October 2006, at the Defence Status Conference, the Kallon Defence repeated its pre-trial position regarding the use of a special defence.[1100] The Kallon Defence stated that it was reserving its right to use a Special Defence under Rule 67, and undertook to inform the Chamber when a decision was made on the issue.[1101] At the Pre-Defence conference of 20 March 2007, the Kallon Defence "authoritatively" stated that it would not rely upon an alibi or any other special defence.[1102]

612. On 28 March 2007, however, the Kallon Defence retracted its prior undertaking and 2234. On the basis of the foregoing, the Chamber finds Kallon liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for planning the use of children under the age of 15 by the RUF to actively participate in hostilities in Kailahun, Kono and Bombali Districts between 1997 and September 2000.

10.2.2.3. Gbao

2235. The Chamber has found that Gbao loaded former child fighters onto a truck and removed them from the Interim Care Centre in Makeni in May 2000.[3906] We find this insufficient to constitute a substantial contribution to the widespread system of child conscription or the consistent pattern of using children to actively participate in hostilities. We further find that there is no other evidence that Gbao participated in the design of these crimes.

2237. The Chamber further concludes that the Prosecution has failed to establish that Gbao was in a superior-subordinate relationship with the perpetrators of these crimes. We accordingly find that Gbao is not liable under Article 6(3) of the Statute for the conscription of persons under the age of 15 into the RUF or the use of children under the age of 15 by the RUF to actively participate in hostilities.

11. Attacks on UNAMSIL personnel (Counts 15 to 18)

11.1. Crimes Committed under Counts 15 to 18

(i) One UNAMSIL peacekeeper was assaulted and one UNAMSIL peacekeeper was abducted at Makump DDR camp on 1 May 2000 (Count 15);

[3906] Supra para. 1690.

[3907] We recall that the attacks on those peacekeepers abducted by RUF fighters continued in Kono District until their release.

(ii) Three groups of UNAMSIL peacekeepers were abducted in Makeni and one group of UNAMSIL peacekeepers was abducted in Magburaka on 1 May 2000 (Count 15);

(iii) Three UNAMSIL camps in Makump and Magburaka were attacked on 2 May 2000, resulting in the death of four peacekeepers (Counts 15 and 17);

(iv) Two groups of UNAMSIL peacekeepers were abducted near Moria village on 3 May 2000 (Count 15);

(v) UNAMSIL peacekeepers in Lunsar were attacked on 4 May 2000 (Count 15);

(vi) UNAMSIL personnel in Makeni were attacked on 7 May 2000 (Count 15); and

(vii) UNAMSIL personnel were attacked between Mile 91 and Magburaka on 9 May 2000 (Count 15).

11.2. Responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute

11.2.1. Sesay

2239. We recall that Rono and three other UNAMSIL peacekeepers were abducted by RUF fighters on 2 May 2000. This abduction was precipitated by a note to Rono purportedly from Sesay and Rono observed Sesay's car, which he recognised, outside his camp.[3908] We further recall that Rono and eight other detained peacekeepers were in the custody of RUF fighters at Matotoka, which is located between Makeni and Kono, with Sesay in the early hours of 3 May 2000.[3909]

2240. We have found that on 1 May 2000, Sesay was in Kono District and we have found that the Prosecution has not established that Sesay arrived in Makeni from Kono on 2 May 2000.[3910] Notwithstanding Sesay's subsequent involvement in the attack on Rono and three other peacekeepers, the Chamber finds the evidence insufficient to prove that Sesay was present at Rono's abduction or that he was aware of this crime prior to its occurrence.

2241. We therefore find that the Prosecution has not established beyond reasonable doubt that Sesay ordered, planned, instigated or otherwise aided and abetted the attack directed humanity and war crimes as set out in the Applicable Law section above clearly each contain a materially distinct element that does not exist in the other. As a result, the Chamber is satisfied that it is permissible to enter convictions for the same conduct under Article 2 (Crimes against humanity) and Article 3 (Violations of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II).[3986]

2303. Therefore, it is permissible to enter convictions in relation to the same conduct as found under Counts 6, 7 and 8. Similarly, it is permissible to enter convictions in relation to the same conduct under Count 5, 10, 15 and under Counts 4, 11, 16 respectively.

2.2. Cumulative Convictions on separate Crimes Against Humanity

2.2.1. Murder and Extermination

2304. The Chamber considers that is impermissible to convict for both murder and extermination under Count 4 and 3 based on the same conduct.[3987] However, the Chamber finds that it is permissible to convict on both counts if each count is based on distinct conduct.[3988]

2.2.2. Rape and Sexual Slavery

2305. The Chamber considers that the crime charged under Count 7 (sexual slavery) requires a distinct element from the crime of rape (Count 6). The offence of rape requires sexual penetration, whereas sexual slavery requires the exercise of powers attaching to the right of ownership and acts of sexual nature. As the acts of a sexual nature do not necessarily require sexual penetration, and rape does not require that the right to ownership is exercised, the Chamber finds that sexual slavery is distinct from rape. Where the commission of sexual slavery, however, entails acts of rape, the Chamber finds that the act of rape is subsumed by the act of sexual slavery. In such a case, a conviction on the same conduct is not permissible for rape and sexual slavery.

TRIAL CHAMBER I ("The Chamber") of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("The Court") composed of Hon. Justice Benjamin Mutanga Itoe, Presiding Judge, Hon. Justice Bankole Thompson, and Hon. Justice Pierre Boutet;

SEIZED of the Motion Seeking Disclosure of the Relationship Between the United States of America's Government and/or Administration and/or Intelligence and/or Security Services and the Investigation Department of the Office of the Prosecutor, filed on the 1st of November, 2004 ("Motion") on behalf of Issa Hassan Sesay ("Accused");

MINDFUL of the Prosecution Response to this Motion filed on the 16th of November 2004 ("Response") by the Office of the Prosecutor ("Prosecution" or "OTP");

NOTING the Defence Reply thereto, filed on the 19th of November 2004 ("Reply");

MINDFUL of the provisions of Article 15 of the Statute of the Court;

MINDFUL of the provisions of Rule 68 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Court;

NOW CONSIDERS the matter on the basis of the written submissions of the Parties pursuant to Rule 73(A) of the Rules;

I. SUBMISSIONS OF THE PARTIES

A) The Defence Motion

1. The Defence submits that during his testimony from the 4th to 11th of October 2004, Prosecution witness, General Tarnue, made assertions which revealed a relationship between the Office of the Prosecution and the United States Government[1] through the Agency of the FBI. The Defence avers that the evidence given by General Tarnue raises a "prima facie case that the Prosecutor, through the intermediary of Dr. White, [Chief of Investigations][2], has acted in breach of Article 15 insofar as he worked with and/or at the behest of and/or in conjunction with the FBI".

[1] Motion, para. 1.

[2] The Defence concerns are limited to the conduct of the specific investigator and any other aspect of the investigation that is tainted by him and do not concern the Prosecution generally.

2. The Defence submits that the evidence that Dr. White used Prosecution funds during "FBI vetting" discloses a symbiotic relationship between the OTP and the FBI which would be inconsistent with the Prosecution's obligation pursuant to Article 15 to maintain its independence.[3] The Defence also states that the evidence of General Tarnue suggests that Dr. White played an integral role in the relocation and in the granting of asylum to General Tarnue.[4] The Defence submits that the above evidence raises serious questions about the integrity of the investigations[5] in this matter in that the Prosecution has violated Article 15 of the Statute of the Court in that it has not acted independently.

3. The Defence further avers that a prima facie breach of Article 15 raises issues which relate to an evaluation of the evidence and to an assessment of whether the Prosecution has complied with its disclosure obligations pursuant to Rule 68 of the Rules.[6]

4. The Defence submits that the Chamber will not be able to properly evaluate the veracity and reliability of the evidence of General Tarnue and other witnesses without a clear indication from the Prosecution as to the extent of the relationship between Dr. White acting for the OTP on the one hand, and the American Government and the FBI on the other since the involvement of the latter may have affected the evidence obtained.[7] The Defence further asserts that Dr. White's involvement with the outside agencies in assisting in the relocation of General Tarnue and his family must be disclosed since this assistance is capable of being an inducement and might have influenced General Tarnue's willingness to implicate the Accused.[8]

5. The Defence submits that the Prosecution must disclose anything that reveals the untruthfulness of General Tarnue's evidence pursuant to its obligation to disclose exculpatory evidence under Rule 68.[9] The Defence also asserts that General Tarnue's evidence, and in particular a statement made during his interview with Dr. White in April 2003, suggest that there were previous interviews with Dr. White and the FBI that have not been disclosed.[10]

6. In conclusion, the Defence requests that the Prosecution be required to disclose:

(i) The relationship between Dr. White and/or the investigation team and the United States government, administration, security services and/or FBI;

(ii) The extent to which General Tarnue's evidence in this regard is untrue or unreliable;

(iii) Whether any other investigatory work has been conducted with OTP investigators working alongside any outside agency;

(iv) Whether any fruits of joint investigation have been shared with any outside agency;

(v) What assistance was offered and given to General Tarnue by Dr White and/or any other investigator;

(vi) Any information in the possession of, or known to the OTP which discloses any activity which is prima facie either illegal or in breach of the Statute or Rules of the Special Court by any investigator working for the OTP including but not limited to Dr White and including but not limited to any involvement in an alleged attempt to arrest Benjamin Yeaten in Togo between 2000-2004.[11]

B) The Prosecution Response

7. The Prosecution submits that the Defence Motion should be dismissed in its entirety. It rejects the Defence's assertion that it is not acting independently and has taken instructions from another entity. The Prosecution argues that while it has, as permitted by the Statute and Rules, sought information and assistance from other entities in conducting its investigations, it has in no way acted improperly.[12]

8. The Prosecution submits that the Statute makes it clear in the wording of Article 15 that the Office of the Prosecutor is responsible for both investigating and prosecuting alleged crimes that fall within the jurisdiction of the Court, to be independent of other organs of the Special Court, and in so acting, not to take instructions from any entity. The Prosecution emphasizes, however, that the

[12] Response, paras. 7-8.

Statute, while prohibiting the Prosecution from taking instructions from any entity, does not prohibit it from seeking assistance or information from any other source.[13]

9. Indeed, Article 15(2) of the Statute specifically provides that the "Prosecutor shall, as appropriate, be assisted by the Sierra Leonean authorities concerned". However, the Prosecution submits that it should be implied that its ability to seek assistance and information from other entities extends to those entities outside of Sierra Leone. It submits further, that it must seek assistance from other entities in order to pursue thorough investigations in accordance with its mandate since accused persons, witnesses and physical evidence may be located in other countries and jurisdictions that are not within the authority and limited territorial jurisdiction of the Court.[14]

10. In support of its position, the Prosecution relies on Rules 8 (C) (D) and (E), 39 and 40 of the Rules which make reference to assistance from other States. The Prosecution also relies to the Blaskic decision of the Appeals Chamber of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia ("ICTY") which noted that international tribunals "must rely on the cooperation of States".[15]

11. With regard to the Defence allegation that there is prima facie evidence that the Prosecution has breached Article 15 insofar as Dr. White "has worked with and/or at the behest of and/or in conjunction with the FBI", the Prosecution states that it has not engaged in any wrong doing and that the action complained of is permitted by the governing legislation. Submitting that Article 15(1) of the Statute prohibits "seeking or receiving instructions" and not "seeking assistance", the Prosecution contends that the Accused does not allege that the Prosecution sought or received instructions from another entity.[16]

12. The Prosecution further submits that cooperation between the Prosecution and foreign security agencies is necessary for the relocation of witnesses in order to ensure protective measures in the country of relocation.[17]

13. It asserts that the Motion shows no evidence whatsoever that the Prosecution has failed to comply with its disclosure obligations pursuant to Rule 68 and states that it has disclosed the evidence in its possession, while remarking that it cannot disclose evidence that is not in the possession of the Office of the Prosecutor because the Prosecution cannot compel other independent entities or Agencies to produce documents or evidence.[18]

14. In response to the specific requests for disclosure contained in the Motion, the Prosecution submits that:

(i) The word "relationship" is vague. There are no grounds to disclose calls and meetings and if something else is sought, it must be specified in a motion.[19]

(ii) The Prosecution has already disclosed the evidence in its possession relating to the untruthfulness or unreliability of General Tarnue's evidence. Defence may seek to compel evidence from other sources by means of court order.[20]

(iii) Disclosure of other investigations in which investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor are working alongside any outside agency is outside the scope of the conduct complained of without evidentiary basis and would compromise ongoing investigations.[21]

(iv) As above in (iii).[22]

(v) General Tarnue was examined on the issue of the assistance given to him by the Chief of Investigation and other investigators and this is sworn evidence. Defence could compel others to testify on this and related topics.[23]

(vi) The request for disclosure of any activity that is illegal or in breach of the Statute or Rules, including an alleged attempt to arrest Benjamin Yeaten in Togo between 2000 and 2004 is a "fishing expedition". An alleged arrest of Mr. Yeaten is irrelevant to the matters at hand.[24]

C) The Defence Reply

15. The Defence agrees that the Statute and the Rules permit the Prosecution to seek information and assistance from other entities while carrying out its mandate and that this may be necessary in order to provide protective measures to relocated witnesses.[25]

16. It asserts, however, that the evidence of General Tarnue that Dr. White's actions were based upon a decision of the U.S. State Department suggests that the Prosecution's actions were based upon instructions received from the State Department. The Defence argues that if the Prosecution was not taking instructions from the FBI but merely seeking information and assistance as they affirm, they ought therefore to disclose that assistance pursuant to Rule 68 since this may impact on the motivation and credibility of General Tarnue.[26]

17. The Defence clarifies that they are only seeking information regarding the relationship or ongoing investigations between the Prosecution and the U.S. administration in those cases where it breaches the Rules or results in assistance provided to General Tarnue or any other witness. The Defence reiterates that the evidence given by General Tarnue prima facie discloses a breach of Article 15 and/or assistance offered to him by the Prosecution.[27]

18. The Defence submits that it is General Tarnue's evidence that Dr. White assisted him in his attempt to obtain asylum and to escape to Ghana and that this assistance "may affect the credibility of prosecution evidence".[28] The Defence highlights that the Prosecution has suggested that the Defence can obtain further details of assistance by compelling others to testify. The Defence submits that this is an admission that further information exists and that the Prosecution has not fulfilled its duty to disclose that evidence pursuant to Rule 68. The Defence suggests that the information is within the custody, control and possession of the Prosecution.[29]

19. The Defence maintains that it is not on a "fishing expedition". It asserts that it simply seeks that the Prosecution put before the Chamber, all the evidence which might affect the motivation and the credibility of the evidence it relies upon.[30]

II. APPLICABLE LAW

(A) Authority, Autonomy and Independence of the Office of the Prosecutor

20. The law applicable to the subject-matter of the instant Motion is embodied in five key statutory provisions of the Court, to wit, Article 15(1) of the Statute, Section 15 of the Special Court Agreement, 2002 Ratification Act, 2002 ("Special Court Agreement") and Rules 8, 39, and 68 of the Rules.

21. Underscoring the centrality of the prosecutorial role within the Special Court's adversarial system for the adjudication of criminal cases, Article 15(1) of the Statute of the Court sets up an autonomous and independent machinery for the prosecution of crimes against humanity and war crimes in these terms:

> The Prosecutor shall be responsible for the investigation and prosecution of persons who bear the greatest responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law and crimes under Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996. The Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Special Court. He or she shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or from any other source. (emphasis added)

22. In the Chamber's opinion, it is absolutely clear that Article 15(1) reinforces, in unambiguous terms, an internationally accepted norm governing the exercise of prosecutorial authority, in International Criminal Tribunals namely, autonomy and independence. To this end, the Chamber acknowledges that it is imperative not only in preserving the integrity of the administration of criminal justice in international law but also to ensure the confidence of the international community in mechanisms set up to ensure accountability for war crimes against humanity, that the Office of the Prosecutor enjoys an unfettered functional and investigative discretion, subject only to recognised and accepted judicial controls in respect of the functions conferred on it by the Statute of the Special Court.

(B) Statutory Obligation on Sierra Leone to Provide Assistance to the Court.

23. The Chamber acknowledges that it was in recognition of the need for co-operation between the Court, the relevant Sierra Leone authorities and other states to fulfil the Court's mandate that Article 15(1) of the Statute, Section 15 of the Special Court Agreement and Rule 39 of the Court's

200

Rules, were enacted. The provisions of Article 15(1) of the Statute are already set out in paragraph 21 above. Section 15(1) of the Act enables the Court to request assistance from the State of Sierra Leone through the office of the Attorney-General. Rule 39 expressly vests the Prosecutor with certain clearly – defined powers, for the purpose of conducting an investigation, in these terms:

> In the conduct of an investigation, the Prosecutor may:
> i. Summon and question suspects, interview victims and witnesses and record their statements, collect evidence and conduct on-site investigations;
> ii. Take all measures deemed necessary for the purpose of the investigation, including the taking of any special measures to provide for the safety, the support and the assistance of potential witnesses and sources;
> iii. Seek, to that end, the assistance of any State authority concerned, as well as of any relevant international body including the International Criminal Police Organization (INTERPOL); and > iv. Request such orders as may be necessary from a Trial Chamber or a Judge. (emphasis added)

24. Rule 8(C) is to this effect:

> The Special Court may invite third States not party to the Agreement to provide assistance on the basis of an ad hoc arrangement, an agreement with such State or any other appropriate basis.

25. The Chamber opines that the foregoing statutory provisions are quite explicit in their intent to ensure that the prosecuting arm of the Court is guaranteed the necessary investigative and prosecutorial logistics and support to enable the Court to function effectively and efficiently in the discharge of its duties within the mandate that has been conferred on it.

26. In addition to these provisions, this is clearly a case that comprises crimes with international components and connections in foreign countries like Liberia, where Prosecution Witness General Tarnue, who has already testified, hails from.

27. This being the case, it is within the discretion of the Prosecution, in the conduct of its investigations, to transcend, should this become necessary, the national frontiers of Sierra Leone with a view to co-operating and working with and alongside willing foreign bodies or agencies.

28. In this context, it is, in our view, legitimate for the Prosecution to seek the assistance of any State, Authority, or any relevant international body as stipulated in Rule 39 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Court, in order not only to properly fulfill the mandate conferred on it by Statute but also to discharge the heavy burden of proof it bears to establish the guilt of the accused beyond reasonable doubt.

29. Indeed and as was pertinently pointed out by the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY in the Blaskic case:

> "... It is self evident that the International Tribunal, in order to bring to trial persons living under the jurisdiction of Sovereign States not being endowed with enforcement agents of its own, must rely upon the cooperation of the States. The International Tribunal must turn to States if it is effectively to investigate crimes, collect evidence, summon witnesses and have indictees arrested and surrendered to the International Tribunal." [31]

(C) Disclosure Obligation of Prosecutor under Rule 68

30. Rule 68 provides that:

> (A) The Prosecutor shall, within 14 days of receipt of the Defence Case Statement, make a statement under this Rule disclosing to the defence the existence of evidence known to the Prosecutor which may be relevant to issues raised in the Defence Case Statement.
> (B) The Prosecutor shall, within 30 days of the initial appearance of the accused, make a statement under this Rule disclosing to the defence the existence of evidence known to the Prosecutor which in any way tends to suggest the innocence or mitigate the guilt of the accused or may affect the credibility of prosecution evidence. The Prosecutor shall be under a continuing obligation to disclose any such exculpatory material.

31. The provisions of Rule 68, as has been the case in the ICTY and the ICTR, have also come under scrutiny in Trial Chamber I of the Special Court for Sierra Leone.

32. On this issue and in the case of Prosecutor v. Delalic, the Trial Chamber of the ICTY had this to say:

[31] Prosecutor v. Blaskic, supra note 15.

> "... The rationale is that the law maker should be taken to mean what is plainly expressed. The underlying principle which is also consistent with common sense is that the meaning and intention of a statutory provision shall be discerned from the plain and unambiguous expression used therein rather than from any notions which may be entertained as just and expedient..."[32]

33. In the Brima decision relating to the Principal Defender of the 6th of May 2004, this Chamber had this to say:

> "In this regard, we would like to recall in order to emphasize, that in interpreting statutory or regulatory instruments, due regard should primarily be paid to their ordinary and natural meaning so as to avoid... importing extraneous interpretations to statutory provisions or regulations which are as clear as those we have just reproduced for purposes of scrutinous examination."[33]

34. In two of its recent Decisions, namely, Prosecutor v. Issa Hassan Sesay et al.,[34] where we cited this passage contained in the Brima decision, and Prosecutor v. Allieu Kondewa[35], the Chamber expounded on what we considered to be the true and proper meaning of Rule 68 in the light of its legislative intent and consistent with the basic canons of statutory interpretation, especially and in particular, the golden rule. In this regard, this Chamber in the Kondewa decision which was delivered soon after the Chamber's landmark Brima decision relating to the Principal Defender, had this to say:

> "In addressing this aspect, the Chamber wishes to observe, by way of first principles, that no rule, however formulated, should be applied in a way that contradicts its purpose. A kindred notion here is that a statute or rule must not be interpreted so as to produce an absurdity. In effect, it is rudimentary law that a statute or rule must be interpreted in the light of its purpose."[36]

35. For the purposes of the instant Motion and guided by the foregoing principles, we again, on this issue reiterate our stand that Rule 68 imposes on the Prosecution, a legal obligation to disclose "within 30 days of the initial appearance of the accused," and continuously thereafter, exculpatory evidence, meaning evidence that in anyway leads to suggest the innocence of the accused, or evidence that in anyway tends to mitigate the guilt of accused or evidence favourable to the accused that may affect the credibility of the prosecution evidence.

36. Having examined the legal nature and scope of the Prosecution's obligation under Rule 68 to disclose exculpatory evidence, we would like to restate here that in order to sustain an allegation by the Defence of a breach by the Prosecution of its disclosure obligations under Rule 68, the Defence must demonstrate, by prima facie proof: (1) that the targeted evidentiary material is exculpatory in nature, (2) the materiality of the said evidence, (3) that the Prosecution has, in its possession, custody, or control, the targeted exculpatory evidentiary material, and (4) that the Prosecution has, in fact, failed to disclose the targeted exculpatory evidentiary material.

III. EVALUATION OF MERITS OF APPLICATION

37. On the merits of this application, we observe that the Motion raises three key issues for our determination. The first is whether, as alleged by the Defence, there has been a breach on the part of the Prosecution of Article 15(1) of the Statute of the Court on the grounds, as alleged by the Defence, that General Tarnue's testimony revealed a relationship between the Office of the Prosecutor and the Government of the United States of America or the FBI. As already noted, Article 15(1) guarantees that Office prosecutorial autonomy and independence. Put slightly differently, the issue is whether the Office of the Prosecutor has, on that score, compromised its autonomy and independence by, as alleged, taking instructions from the United States Government, notably from the State Department or from its Agency, the FBI.

38. The second issue is whether, under the statutory framework of the Court which creates the Office of the Prosecutor, there is any provision precluding that Office from seeking assistance, as distinct from receiving instructions which is what is prohibited by Article 15(1) of the Statute, from any entity or source in the discharge of both its investigatory and prosecutorial functions. In effect, does the Statute foreclose the benefit of assistance from any source whatever to the Office of the Prosecutor in the execution of its mandate?

39. The third key issue is whether, in the light of contentions by the Defence in respect of General Tarnue's testimony as to his dealings with Dr. White and the U.S. Government, Rule 68 is, in fact and in law, implicated here making it obligatory on the part of the Prosecution to disclose certain key information allegedly arising out of the relationship between General Tarnue, Dr. White and the United States Government as set out in paragraph 6 herein.

(A) Alleged Breach of Article 15(1)

40. The Chamber notes that both the Defence and the Prosecution agree that within the proper context and interpretation of the Statute and the Rules, Article 15(1) does vest on the Prosecution, the autonomy and independence in the discharge of its functions, and that the Office of the Prosecutor must act as an independent body that does not take instructions from any other entity.

41. It seems clear to the Chamber that the arguments and submissions of the Defence as regards the alleged breach of Article 15(1) are predicated upon the assumption that the Office of the Prosecutor has taken instructions from another entity. The Prosecution submits that it has not. The crux of the matter, from the Chamber's perspective, is whether there is, at this point in time, any evidentiary basis or factual foundation for the allegation put forward by the Defence, to warrant a conclusive finding of fact that there has in law been a breach of Article 15(1). The Defence assert that the evidence from which such inference should be drawn is that of General Tarnue that Dr. White's actions were, according to Dr. White, to be based upon a decision of the State Department of the Government of the United States.

42. Does this piece of evidence irresistibly sustain the Defence contentions, even if given a liberal evaluation? In other words, does it necessarily follow that because General Tarnue stated that Dr. White told him that the latter's actions were to be based on a decision of the State Department of the U.S. Government, the Office of the Prosecutor was acting on the instructions 'received' from the U.S. Government? In the Chamber's opinion, an inference of this nature cannot lightly be drawn from such evidence, given its grave implications for the justice process.

43. The Chamber, likewise, emphasises that the suggestion of the Defence that General Tarnue's testimony revealed a relationship between the Office of the Prosecutor and the United States of America, even if it were true, could not in law justify, without more, the inference that the Prosecution was receiving instructions from the U.S Government in breach of Article 15(1). This is so even if the Office of the Prosecutor sought assistance from the U.S. Government as envisaged by Rule 8(C) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence. Certainly, in the Chamber's view, it would do violence to the plain meaning and context of the Statute and the Rules if conceptually the words "instructions" and "assistance" were construed as being synonymous and interchangeable. The contentions of the Defence on this issue, therefore, are legally unsustainable in that, on the whole, the Defence has failed to substantiate, by prima facie proof, the allegation of breach of Article 15(1), on the part of the Office of the Prosecutor. This Chamber does not find any, as the Defence contends, "master-servant" relationship between Dr. White, as FBI agent and the Prosecution which would occasion a breach of Article 15(1).

*(B) Discretion to Seek Assistance

44. The Chamber recalls that both the Defence and Prosecution agree that within the framework of the Court's Statute and Rules, the Office of the Prosecutor is vested with some measure of discretionary latitude in seeking assistance from internal and external agencies for the purpose of the conduct of its investigations. We observe that, unlike Article 15(1) of the Statute which is an exclusionary clause designed to protect and preserve prosecutorial independence, there is no similar statutory prohibition for the Prosecution, in the exercise of its prosecutorial discretion, to seek, within the confines of the law, any assistance from other bodies and Institutions in fulfilling the duties conferred on it by the Statute. Clearly, Article 15(2) of the Statute is explicit in its purport and intendment that:

> "The Office of the Prosecutor shall have power to question suspects, victims, and witnesses, to collect evidence and evident on - site investigations. In carrying out these tasks, the Prosecutor shall, as appropriate, be assisted by the Sierra Leone authorities concerned."

45. By parity of reasoning, Rules 8(C), (D) and (E), 39, and 40 of the Court's Rules of Procedure and Evidence cumulatively establish a machinery for co-operation between the Office of the Prosecutor and external agencies or entities, be they States, Governments, Organisations, Bureaus, or related bodies.

46. In this regard, the Defence submissions do not really challenge the authority of the Office of the Prosecutor to seek assistance in the conduct of its investigations. Accordingly, the Chamber concludes that there is clear statutory authority for the Prosecution to seek assistance from both internal and external sources for the purposes of the conduct of its investigations in the course of fulfilling its mandate to bring to justice those who bear the greatest responsibility for crimes against humanity, war crimes and related offences during the hostilities that took place in Sierra Leone at the material times.

47. The complexity, roles, and functions of any such agencies or bodies cannot legally operate as limiting or restricting such authority in the absence of any express statutory provision to that effect.

(C) Disclosure under Rule 68

48. The third key issue relates to whether in the light of the contentions by the Defence about General Tarnue's testimony as to his dealings with Dr. White and the United States Government, Rule 68 is thereby implicated in fact and in law, requiring the Prosecution therefore to disclose certain key information as set out in the Defence Request (reproduced at paragraph 6 herein), the Chamber's findings are set out below in sub-paragraphs (iv) - (ix) of paragraph 64 herein.

49. In arriving at these conclusions, the Chamber notes that the requests made by the Defence in this application are either too broad, too vague, or indeed unspecific.

50. In seeking to establish a breach of Article 15(1) of the Statute, there has been a total lack of specificity on instructions received which the Defence alleges amounts to a breach by the Prosecution of its statutory obligations under Article 15(1). These same comments apply to the application where the Defence seeks to compel the Prosecution to disclose exculpatory evidence under Rule 68 as to the assistance offered by Dr. White to General Tarnue to obtain asylum and a relocation of himself and his family in the U.S.A.

51. In this regard, the Chamber would like to state here that for the Defence to succeed in this Motion, it is not enough to premise its application either on presumptions, on speculations, or on probabilities. If it does, as it seems, seek to establish the subservience of the Prosecutor to a foreign Government or Agency, it must provide concrete proof of those instructions and their contents and not just invite this Chamber, merely on the basis of speculation and without any legal or factual proof, to draw such a conclusion or even such an inference.

52. We are strongly of the opinion that mere evidence of the cooperation between the Prosecution and the FBI or the US Government, without proof that the former received instructions from the latter, including the nature and contents of such instructions, does not, per se, fulfill the test to establish a violation of Article 15(1) of the Statute.

(D) Exculpatory Evidence Under Rule 68

53. In the same vein, a mere speculative assertion without specifying or advancing concrete proof of the nature and content of the exculpatory evidence which the Defence is alleging to be in the possession of the Prosecution of General Tarnue and his family's relocation, to our mind, fails to meet the test required to warrant an Order by the Chamber for the Prosecution to disclose under Rule 68 of the Rules.

54. The Chamber recognizes that disclosure procedures are not only intended to ensure and protect the rights of the accused to a fair trial, but also and more importantly, for him to be informed of the nature and cause of the charge against him, and further, to enable him to have adequate time and facilities for the conduct of his or her defence.

55. We observe however, that where the request to disclose lacks specificity as to the details of facts sought to be disclosed, and proof that those facts are indeed in the possession of the Prosecution, the Chamber cannot, and should not be called upon to grant, a vaguely formulated request particularly so because even if it were conceded that such facts, unknown to the Prosecution, exist with the F.B.I. or the US Government, the Prosecution cannot be compelled to produce information that is in possession of a foreign Independent Agency or in that of the US Government represented by the Department of State.

56. In circumstances such as these where the Prosecution has declared that it has disclosed everything and that it has nothing more to disclose to the Defence under Rule 68, the Defence, in the absence of concrete elements to substantiate its claims, we contend, has the alternative weapon of cross-examination to establish such facts in evidence and thereafter, to base an application of this nature on the facts so established.

57. In this regard we observe that General Tarnue was in the witness box for slightly over 8 days, when these and other issues arose and were extensively highlighted, not only during examination- in-chief which lasted 7 hours 12 minutes but also, and even more fully highlighted and explored in the course of the extensive, lengthy, exhaustive cross examination of this witness by Learned Counsel for the 1st Accused, the Applicant in this Motion, Mr. Jordash, which lasted 15 hours 38 minutes, by counsel for 2nd Accused which lasted 4 hours 38 minutes, and by counsel for 3rd Accused which lasted 5 hours 27 minutes.

58. It would, in our opinion, be unfair, after such a lengthy, protracted, and extensive cross-examination, to compel a disclosure of evidence under Rule 68 when the Prosecution avers, and without any concrete evidence proffered by the Defence to contradict this assertion, that it has disclosed all it had to disclose and that it has nothing more to disclose following the vague and speculative application of the Defence for it to fulfill this obligation under Rule 68 of the Rules.

59. We consider it pertinent in this regard to refer to our decision in the case of the Prosecutor v. Allieu Kondewa of the 8th of July 2004[37] where the Defence, under Rule 68 of the Rules, sought an Order to compel the Prosecutor to disclose whether it has such exculpatory mitigating material in its possession and to disclose same to the Defence. The Prosecution argued that the Defence failed to present a prima facie case of the existence of such evidence and of the fact that it is in the custody of the Prosecution.

60. We had this to say in our Decision in this case:

> "This Chamber adopts this reasoning and takes the view that any request by the Defence for exculpatory material alleged to be in the Prosecutor's possession, custody or control must be specific as to such material....
>
> [T]he Chamber must be satisfied that the request by the Defence has been specific as to the targeted material alleged to be in the Prosecutor's possession, control or custody....
> The Chamber finds that nowhere in the said Motion does the request for the disclosure of the targeted exculpatory evidence or material clearly specify the material so desired.... In such matters, it is not sufficient merely to allege non-compliance, on the part of the Prosecution, with its disclosure obligation or merely to restate the law on the subject in the form of submissions. It is essential to set out with much particularity what the information is all about or what precisely it is, and the extent to which it is exculpatory..."[38]

61. We accordingly, took the view and ruled that "in the absence of specific identification of the material evidence that the Defence alleges the Prosecution has withheld, it is inappropriate for the Trial Chamber to intervene at this time."[39]

62. In yet another Chamber's Decision of the Prosecutor v Issa Hassan Sesay et al. dated the 9th of July 2004[40], the Defence sought disclosure under Rule 68. It averred that it had ascertained through its own investigations, that there were several Prosecution Witnesses whose evidence is wholly exculpatory of the Accused. It sought disclosure as to the evidence relating to inducements made to the witnesses to facilitate their cooperation in giving evidence. Furthermore and as regards the interviews of so called "insiders", those conducting the interviews are alleged to have offered rewards

[37] Prosecutor v. Kondewa, supra note 35.
[38] Id., paras 24-26.
[39] Id., para. 26.
[40] Prosecutor v. Sesay et al., supra note 34.

to them for continued cooperation. The Defence therefore sought all details of offers made and rewards, including relocation packages, amenities, and monies given or due.

63. The Prosecution argued that for the Defence to succeed in its application, the request must be for a specific material or materials. The Prosecution further asserts that the Defence did not request any specific material but made generic requests which the Prosecution considers as tantamount to a "fishing expedition" into the Prosecution's records.

64. In this case and as we had similarly held in the Kondewa case,[41] we had this to say:

> "...The Trial Chamber considers that the key question to be answered here is whether the Defence has made a prima facie showing of exculpatory material sought from the Prosecution. Furthermore in resolving this important question, the Chamber must be satisfied that the request by the Defence has been specific as to the targeted material alleged to be in the Prosecutor's possession, control or custody."[42]

65. The Chamber accordingly dismissed the application for a want of legal sustainability given the lack of specific identification of material evidence which the Defence alleges the Prosecution has withheld, and for which disclosure is sought.

66. Applying the aforementioned principles, the Chamber has reviewed the contentions of the Defence in respect of the alleged non-disclosure of the alleged specific information arising from General Tarnue's contact with Dr. White and the U.S. Government and finds specifically as follows:

i. that the Prosecution through Dr. Alan White, did seek and obtain assistance from the U.S. Government or the FBI;

ii. that the finding in (i) above does not imply that Dr. Alan White or other investigators of the Office of the Prosecutor received instructions from those outside agencies;

iii. that there is, by reason of our findings in (i) and (ii), no legal basis for issuing a disclosure order against the Prosecution in respect thereof;

iv. that the evidence of the relationship between Dr. Alan White or other investigators and the U.S. Government or its agencies cannot, without more, be regarded as [41] Prosecutor v. Kondewa, supra note 35.

[42] Prosecutor v. Sesay et al., supra note 34, para. 43.

exculpatory merely by reason of the fact that it may have resulted in assisting in the relocation of General Tarnue and his family;

v. that it is premature, at this stage and without more, to reach any conclusive finding as to the alleged untruthfulness or unreliability of General Tarnue's evidence;

vi. that upon a full consideration of the evidence before it, the Chamber finds that the Defence has not established on a prima facie basis that there was an earlier interview between Dr. White and General Tarnue that has not been disclosed;

vii. that there is both in fact and in law no basis for a disclosure order in respect of other investigating work allegedly conducted jointly with Prosecution investigators and any outside agency because the Defence has not identified with certainty and precision, the fact or areas which would justify our issuing such an Order;

viii. that there is also no basis in fact and in law for a disclosure order in respect of any allegedly prima facie authority or violation of the Statute or the Rules of the Court by Dr. White or any other investigator including but not limited to any involvement in the alleged attempt to arrest Benjamin Yeaten in Togo during 2000-2004.

ix. that there is no legal basis for a disclosure order to be directed to the Prosecution to disclose any information relating to assistance given by the Prosecution or its agents to General Tarnue in respect of his asylum claim or relocation.

DISPOSITION

FOR ALL THE ABOVE REASONS,

67. The Trial Chamber finds no factual or legal merits or sufficient grounds to warrant the granting of this Defence Motion.

ACCORDINGLY IT IS DENIED AND DISMISSED.

Hon. Justice Pierre Boutet appends a Partially Dissenting Opinion to this Decision with reference to the findings "that there is no legal basis for a disclosure order to be directed to the Prosecution to disclose any information relating to assistance given by the Prosecution or its agents to General Tarnue in respect of his asylum claim or relocation."

involving Charles Taylor's guilt or innocence. The Plenary was not seized of, did not pronounce on nor express any views concerning the guilt or innocence of Mr. Taylor. In the language of the Motion, the Plenary was not seized of, did not pronounce on nor express any views concerning the content of Justice Sow's statement. The Plenary Resolution concerned only "Justice Malick Sow's behaviour in court on the 26th of April 2012".[70] A reasonable observer would not consider these distinctions "artificial"[71] but intrinsically judicial, reflecting the professional skills and responsibilities of Judges.[72]

30. The Appeals Chamber further holds that sanctioning judicial misconduct in a trial does not constitute nor give rise to the appearance of prejudgment of the guilt or innocence of the respective accused. In accordance with Article 17 of the Statute, the Plenary protects the fair trial rights of both parties and the integrity of the proceedings by considering serious allegations of judicial misconduct and taking appropriate action where misconduct is established.[73] The parties' rights would be severely violated were the Plenary to allow judicial misconduct only because sanctioning it could be falsely imagined as benefiting or harming a particular party. In deciding on allegations of judicial misconduct, the Plenary considers only whether such misconduct is established.[74] This Appeals Chamber firmly rejects any suggestion that the Plenary may or should do otherwise.

31. Many of the Defence's submissions do not address the impartiality of the Appeals Chamber, but the consequences of the Plenary Resolution. The Defence suggests that the Plenary Resolution "constitutes an adverse finding on the professional credibility of Justice Sow"[75] and that "the declaratory effect of the [decision] constitutes a particularly severe sanction because it seriously and publicly damages Justice Sow's professional reputation and standing."[76] The Defence proposes that "[i]t is no answer to assert that these findings were objectively correct because such an assertion reflects precisely the perception of pre-judgment claimed by the Defence."[77]

32. This is not pre-judgment nor the appearance of pre-judgment – the independence of judges would be fatally undermined if observers' perceptions of the consequences of judicial acts were considered indicia of bias.[78] Once seized of a complaint of misconduct, the Plenary considered it on its merits alone, without regard to extraneous considerations. Justice Sow's credibility, including as it may bear on any matters involving the guilt or innocence of Mr. Taylor, has not been judged by the Appeals Chamber. In any event, the Defence's characterizations of Justice Sow's credibility, professional reputation and standing are unwarranted and bordering on defamatory.

33. Likewise, the Defence's submissions with respect to the trial record are ill-founded.[79] The hearing of 26 April 2012 officially concluded when it was adjourned by the Presiding Judge of Trial Chamber II.[80] The official transcript accordingly ends with that adjournment, and could not have included further statements made after the hearing was officially closed.[81] On 16 May 2012, the Presiding Judge described for the record Justice Sow's behaviour following the adjournment.[82] The Plenary Resolution regarding Justice Sow's behaviour was further entered into the official record.[83] The Defence is fully aware of the content of Justice Sow's statement.[84] There is no basis to suggest that the official transcript is anything but accurate and transparent.

34. The Plenary did not consider any matters related to Charles Taylor's guilt or innocence nor the content of Justice Sow's statement. A reasonable observer would properly appreciate this fact, as both Parties do. The Appeals Chamber concludes that no reasonable observer, properly informed, would reasonably apprehend bias with respect to the Appeals Chamber's consideration of Defence Grounds 36 and 37. The Motion must therefore be dismissed.

35. In closing, the Appeals Chamber endorses the words of Judge Antonio Cassese, former President of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon, and draws the attention of the Parties and the public to them:

> I firmly believe that, while Judges must be absolutely free and appear to be free from any preconceived beliefs, it is also necessary for them to be sheltered from mere innuendoes as to their professional past or their current attitude. If they were not so safeguarded, they would be unable to discharge their difficult mission with equanimity. Charges of bias unsupported by compelling evidence can only sow confusion and uncertainty in the mind of all those who watch the unfolding of international justice, as well as trouble the conscience of Judges, thereby affecting their serenity. The Tribunal will firmly reject any attempt at guesswork or speculation intended to project onto the Tribunal political motivations that instead are, and shall always remain, extraneous to it, as is fitting and appropriate for any court of law.[85]

TRIAL CHAMBER II ("Trial Chamber") of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("Special Court");[1]

SEISED of the "Urgent and Public with Annexes A-N Defence Motion for Disclosure and/or Investigation of United States Government Sources Within the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution and the Registry Based on Leaked USG Cables", filed on 10 January 2011 ("Motion"),[2] wherein, in light of the publication of two leaked United States Government ("USG") cables and an article in the New Democrat, a Liberian Newspaper ("Newspaper Article"), the Defence seeks, pursuant to Rule 54 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules") immediate disclosure and/or an investigation into:

(i) the identity of the source(s) within the Trial Chamber, Prosecution and Registry who provided the USG with the information in the Cables;[3]

(ii) the full nature of the respective sources' relationship with the USG, specifically including an explanation of the context and circumstances in which each of the comments recorded in the Cables were made to representatives of the USG;[4]

(iii) information tending to suggest that the Prosecution has sought or received instructions from the USG regarding any aspect of the Taylor trial;[5] and

(iv) a full explanation of the money provided by the USG to the Prosecution, including the amounts of money given and when; the purpose of the funds; how the funds were used; and who the OTP was accountable to in the distribution and use of the funds;[6] on the basis that the USG Cables and Newspaper Article clearly indicate 1) the USG's desire to ensure that Mr. Taylor does not return to Liberia; and 2) proof that there is and have been contacts between the Trial Chamber, the Office of the Prosecutor and the Registry, and agents of the USG outside the official lines of communication;[7] 3) the only way to remove any doubt about the independence and impartiality of the tribunal is to order the disclosure and/or the investigation into the identity of the sources within the Trial Chamber, Prosecution and Registry and the full nature of their relationship with the USG;[8]

NOTING the "Prosecution Response to Defence Motion for Disclosure and/or Investigation of United States Government Sources Within the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution and the Registry Based on Leaked USG Cables", filed on 20 January 2011 ("Response"),[9] wherein the Prosecution opposes the Motion and submits that it should be dismissed on the basis that;

(i) it is untimely and frivolous, appears to be a deliberate attempt to delay the proceedings, and rehearses the unfounded allegations made in the Sesay et al. case in relation to the Prosecution's link to the USG;[10]

(ii) the Cables do not provide any evidentiary basis or factual foundation for the allegations put forward by the Defence concerning any organ of the Court, and in fact clearly evidence the Court's impartiality and independence;[11]

COGNISANT of the provisions of Articles 13(1), 15(1) and 17 of the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("Statute") and Rule 54 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules");

NOTING that two United States Government cables, one dated 10 March 2009 ("First USG Cable"),[13] and the other dated 15 April 2009 ("Second USG Cable"), were leaked through Wikileaks, an internet platform which allows anonymous disclosure of leaked information,[14] and published by the Guardian newspaper on 17 December 2010;[15]

NOTING that on 23 December 2010, an article was published in the New Democrat entitled "Sorry for the Leaks; Pres. Sirleaf Acknowledges US Ambassador's Apology";[16]

RECALLING that on 13 September 2010, the Trial Chamber ordered the Defence to file all remaining motions by 24 September 2010;[17]

CONSIDERING that, with respect to the Defence request for a full explanation of the funds provided by the USG to the Prosecution, the Defence relies on statements made by former Prosecutor David Crane in 2006 to the Subcommittee on Africa, Global Human Rights and International Operations of the United States House of Representatives' Committee on International Relations, a statement which is already in evidence in this case,[18] and which has already been used by the Defence in its opening statement and examination-in-chief of the Accused;[19]

HOLDING, therefore, that as the Defence has already had an opportunity to raise this issue prior to the deadline of 24 September 2010, and as this issue is unrelated to the recently leaked USG Cables, this aspect of the Motion is untimely, but that it is in the interests of justice to consider the remainder of the Motion at this time;

NOTING that Article 13(1) of the Statute provides that:

> The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity [. . .] They shall be independent in the performance of their functions, and shall not accept or seek instructions from any Government or other source;

NOTING that Article 15(1) of the Statute provides inter alia that:

> The Prosecutor shall act independently as a separate organ of the Special Court. He or she shall not seek or receive instructions from any Government or any other source;

NOTING that Rule 54 of the Rules provides that:

> At the request of either party or of its own motion, a Judge or a Trial Chamber may issue such orders, summonses, subpoenas, warrants and transfer orders as may be necessary for the purposes of an investigation or for the preparation or conduct of the trial;

RECALLING that this Trial Chamber has previously held, in relation to Rule 54, that the "test for whether the Trial Chamber should issue an order under the Rule is whether to do so is necessary (not simply useful or convenient) for the purposes of an investigation or for the preparation or conduct of the trial";[20]

RECALLING that Trial Chamber I has held that, in order for a disclosure order to be granted in relation to a breach of Article 15(1), a party must establish a prima facie case that there has been such a breach,[21] and in so doing must determine, whether there is, at this point in time, any evidentiary basis or factual foundation to warrant a conclusive finding of fact that there has in law been such a breach;[22]

CONSIDERING that with respect to a request for disclosure or an investigation in relation to a Judge or a member of the Trial Chamber, a party must specifically identify the information it seeks to have disclosed, and must make a prima facie showing that such information would demonstrate actual bias or the appearance of bias;[23]

CONSIDERING therefore that, in determining whether an order for disclosure and/or an investigation pursuant to Rule 54 is necessary, the Trial Chamber must determine whether a prima facie case has been established that there may have been interference with the independence and impartiality of the Court;

CONSIDERING that the First USG Cable does not indicate that the USG has any influence over any organs of the Court;

CONSIDERING moreover, that as the United States government raises concerns in this cable about the effect on the fragile peace in Liberia should Taylor be acquitted in The Hague or given a light sentence, it is clear that it does not have any influence over the final outcome of the trial;

CONSIDERING that while it is of concern to the Trial Chamber that the United States government may have received information from "contacts" in Chambers,[24] the Registry and the Prosecution, the Second USG Cable does not demonstrate whether these "contacts" have any relationship with the USG capable of interfering with the independence or impartiality of the Court or any organ of the Court;

CONSIDERING FURTHER that, as part of their official functions, the Registry and the Prosecution interact on a regular basis with government officials from a number of countries, and in particular, with member states of the management committee, including the United States of America, about the progress of the trial, including "questions of efficiency" as provided for by Article 7 of the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone on the Establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone,[25] which states that:

> It is the understanding of the Parties that interested States will establish a management committee to assist the Secretary-General in obtaining adequate funding, and provide advice and policy direction on all non-judicial aspects of the operation of the Court, including questions of efficiency, and to perform other functions as agreed by interested States. The management committee shall consist of important contributors to the Special Court. The Government of Sierra Leone and the Secretary-General will also participate in the management committee.

RECALLING that Trial Chamber I has held that that "mere evidence of the cooperation between the Prosecution and the FBI or the US Government, without proof that the former received instructions from the latter, including the nature and contents of such instructions, does not, per se, fulfill the test to establish a violation of Article 15(1) of the Statute";[26]

SATISFIED that, while the statements attributed to the sources within the Prosecution Registry, and Chambers in the Second USG Cable indicate that information may have been provided to the USG government by employees within the Court, the statements do not demonstrate that such sources were receiving instructions from the USG;

FINDING therefore that the Defence it has not shown any prima facie evidence that there has been interference with the independence and impartiality of the Court, and therefore has shown no evidentiary basis for either disclosure by, or an investigation of, any organ of the Court;

HEREBY DISMISSES THE MOTION.

DECLARATION OF JUSTICE JULIA SEBUTINDE

1. For the reasons set out below, it is my considered opinion that it would be in the interests of justice for me to voluntarily withdraw myself from a decision on this Motion. The USG Code Cable contained in Annex B of the Motion involves a statement that un-named "sources in the Prosecution, Chambers and the Registry" of the Special Court allegedly made certain specific allegations against me.

2. In the Motion, the Defence requests an investigation into the contacts or sources in the Court who made these allegations. Indeed, the Defence has observed that "[t]he only sign of how seriously some members of this Court have taken the matter is through the personal response of Justice Julia Sebutinde to the allegations in one of the cables which impinge on her integrity, as reported in the media".[1]

3. I declare that while I am completely innocent of the allegations contained in the USG Code Cable and consider myself to be impartial and free of bias in relation to the issues at stake in this Motion, it is my considered view that in order for justice to be seen to be done, I should not participate in the deliberations or decision relating to this Motion.

4. Accordingly, I voluntarily withdraw from participating in the deliberations and the Decision on this Motion.

Done at The Hague, The Netherlands, this 26th day of January 2011.

TRIAL CHAMBER II ("Trial Chamber") of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("Special Court");[1]

SEISED of the "Urgent and Public with Annexes A-C Defence Motion to Re-Open its Case in Order to Seek Admission of Documents Relating to the Relationship Between the United States Government and the Prosecution of Charles Taylor", filed on 10 January 2011 ("Motion"),[2] wherein the Defence seeks permission to re-open its case for the limited purpose of seeking admission of the following documents ("Defence Documents") into evidence pursuant to Rule 92*bis*:[3]

(a) marked portions of a United States Government ("USG") cable, dated 10 March 2009, which was leaked through Wikileaks and published by the Guardian newspaper ("Guardian") on 17 December 2010 ("First USG Cable");[4]

(b) the entirety of a USG cable, dated 15 April 2009, which was leaked through Wikileaks and published by the Guardian on 17 December 2010 ("Second USG Cable");[5]

(c) the first paragraph of an article from the New Democrat, a Liberian newspaper, entitled "Sorry for the Leaks; Pres. Sirleaf Acknowledges US Ambassador's Apology", dated 23 December 2010 ("Newspaper Article");[6] on the basis that the Defence should be entitled to re-open its case for this limited purpose as:

(i) the evidence could not, with reasonable diligence, have been obtained and presented during its case in chief, as the cables are confidential and classified documents which were obtained by Wikileaks and published in the Guardian on 17 December 2010, five weeks after it had closed its case, and the publication of the Newspaper Article was in consequence of the leak and publication of the cables;[7]

(ii) the probative value of the cables is significant as the cables raise grave doubts about the independence and impartiality of the Special Court's prosecution of Charles Taylor;[8]

(iii) there would be limited delays to the trial proceedings if these documents are admitted;[9] and submits that the documents are admissible pursuant to Rule 92*bis* on the basis that:

(i) the documents are relevant as they support the Defence position that the prosecution of Mr. Taylor is political and his indictment was deliberately selective;[10]

(ii) the documents are susceptible of corroboration in due course, in regard to each other, and the evidence on record;[11]

(iii) the portions of the USG Cables and Newspaper Article sought to be admitted do not go to the acts and conduct of the Accused and;[12]

(iv) the information contained in the USG Cables are facts as reported by United States diplomatic personnel, as is the apology from the U.S. Ambassador to the Liberian President contained in the newspaper article, and they therefore do not constitute opinion evidence;[13]

NOTING the "Prosecution Response to Defence Motion to Re-Open its Case to Seek Admission of Documents Relating to the Relationship between the United States Government and the Prosecution of Charles Taylor", filed on 20 January 2011 ("Response"),[14] wherein the Prosecution opposes the Motion and submits that the Defence has failed to demonstrate the relevance of the Defence Documents,[15] on the basis that:

(i) the USG Cables refute, rather than support, the Defence allegations that the independence and impartiality of the Special Court is compromised by the involvement of the United States or any other government;[16]

(ii) the Newspaper Article has no relevance to this trial;[17]

(iii) there is nothing in any of the documents that provides any evidentiary basis for an argument that the Prosecution is in breach of its duty of independence under Article 15(1), or has sought or received instructions from the USG in relation to these proceedings;[18]

[18] Response, paras 9-10.

(iv) the Defence argument that the documents are relevant to the Defence theory of selective prosecution has no merit, as the Prosecution acted squarely within the bounds of its discretion pursuant to Article 1(1) of the Statute in bringing an Indictment against Charles Taylor as one of those who bears the "greatest responsibility";[19]

NOTING that the Prosecution further submits that the documents contain matters of opinion rather than matters of fact, and that they are therefore inadmissible under Rule 92*bis*;[20]

NOTING FURTHER that the Prosecution requests that should the Trial Chamber permit the Defence to re-open its case in order to admit the documents, the entire March 2009 cable should be admitted;[21]

NOTING ALSO the "Defence Reply to Prosecution Response to Defence Motion to Re-Open its Case to Seek Admission of Documents Relating to the Relationship between the United States Government and the Prosecution of Charles Taylor", filed on 25 January 2011 ("Reply");[22]

COGNISANT of the provisions of Article 17 of the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("Statute") and Rules 54, 92*bis* and 73(A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules");

COGNISANT of the provisions of Rule 92*bis* which states:

> Rule 92*bis*: Alternative Proof of Facts
>
> (A) In addition to the provisions of Rule 92*ter*, a Chamber may, in lieu of oral testimony, admit as evidence in whole or in part, information including written statements and transcripts, that do not go to proof of the acts and conduct of the accused.
>
> (B) The information submitted may be received in evidence if, in the view of the Trial Chamber, it is relevant to the purpose for which it is submitted and if its reliability is susceptible of confirmation.
> (C) A party wishing to submit information as evidence shall give 10 days notice to the opposing party. Objections, if any, must be submitted within 5 days.

NOTING that the Appeals Chamber has ruled that the effect of Rule 92*bis* "is to permit the reception of 'information' - assertions of fact (but not opinion) made in documents or electronic communications - if such facts are relevant and their reliability is "susceptible of confirmation." This phraseology was chosen to make clear that proof of reliability is not a condition of admission: all that is required is that the information should be capable of corroboration in due course . It is for the trial chamber to decide whether the information comes in a form, or is of a kind, that is "susceptible of confirmation". It follows, of course, from the fact that its reliability is "susceptible of confirmation", that it is also susceptible of being disproved, or so seriously called into question that the court will place no reliance upon it";[23]

RECALLING that the Trial Chamber has previously held that a party seeking to re-open a case must (i) meet the threshold test of establishing that the evidence could not, with reasonable diligence, have been obtained and presented during its case in chief, and (ii) if the first prong of the test is met, the party must demonstrate that the probative value of the evidence is not substantially outweighed by the need to ensure a fair trial;[24]

FINDING, given that (i) the Defence closed its case on 12 November 2010; (ii) the two USG Cables were published in the Guardian on 17 December 2010, and (iii) the Newspaper Article was published on 23 December 2010, that these documents could not, with reasonable diligence, have been obtained and presented by the Defence during its case-in-chief;

FINDING FURTHER that the admission of these documents will not have any bearing on the fairness of the trial since the Defence does not request the calling of any viva voce evidence and since either party may, if necessary, apply for leave to make supplementary submissions in relation to the documents;

FINDING ALSO, in relation to the admissibility of the documents, that:

(i) the two USG Code Cables can be related to submissions made by Defence Counsel as well as sworn evidence by the Accused and that they therefore meet the requirements of Rule 92*bis*(A) & (B) in that (i) they do not go to proof of the acts and conduct of the Accused, (ii) are relevant to the purpose for which they are submitted, and (iii) their reliability is susceptible of confirmation;

(ii) the First USG Code Cable should be admitted in its entirety in order to fully understand its context;

(iii) the Newspaper Article merely reports an apology by the US Ambassador to President Sirleaf and, as such, is not relevant to the present case and thus fails to satisfy the requirements of Rule 92*bis*;

DECLARATION OF JUSTICE JULIA SEBUTINDE

1. For the reasons set out below, it is my considered opinion that it would be in the interests of justice for me to voluntarily withdraw myself from a decision on this Motion. The USG Code Cable contained in Annex B of the Motion involves a statement that un-named "sources in the Prosecution, Chambers and the Registry" of the Special Court allegedly made certain specific allegations against me.

2. In the Motion, the Defence requests that this document be admitted into evidence pursuant to Rule 92bis of the Rules. Indeed, the Defence has observed that "[t]he only sign of how seriously some members of this Court have taken the matter is through the personal response of Justice Julia Sebutinde to the allegations in one of the cables which impinge on her integrity, as reported in the media".[1]

3. I declare that while I am completely innocent of the allegations contained in the USG Code Cable and consider myself to be impartial and free of bias in relation to the issues at stake in this Motion, it is my considered view that in order for justice to be seen to be done, I should not participate in the deliberations or decision relating to this Motion.

4. Accordingly, I voluntarily withdraw from participating in the deliberations and the Decision on this Motion.

DECISION ON PUBLIC WITH CONFIDENTIAL ANNEXES A-J AND PUBLIC ANNEXES K-O DEFENCE MOTION REQUESTING AN INVESTIGATION INTO CONTEMPT OF COURT BY THE OFFICE OF THE PROSECUTOR AND ITS INVESTIGATORS

evidence against Taylor and that they would grant him protection, including relocation. He stated that he gave the Prosecution information on diamond for arms transactions between Taylor and the RUF as well as the political climate in the region, but that he could not vouch for "its entire accuracy." He also stated that he recommended other persons for the Prosecution to speak to.

110. The Trial Chamber notes that the allegations date back to 2005 and 2006. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that there was undue delay in bringing the allegations to the Trial Chamber's attention. The Trial Chamber has already dismissed the Prosecution's submission that DCT-097 was not one of its witnesses, and found that the "evidence strongly suggests that for all intents and purposes [DCT-097] was a potential Prosecution witness."[164] The Trial Chamber notes that the documentation of payments indicates amounts including $ 4,700 provided to the witness for a reason that was redacted by the Prosecution; $ 6,180 for lodging and expenses for the witness and his family as well as smaller instalment amounts ranging from hundreds to thousands of dollars for communication, transportation, meals, subsistence and expenses relating to a trip to Ghana.[165] The Trial Chamber finds that the Defence has not demonstrated how these allegations relate to charges of contempt. There is no indication that the payments were not necessary; rather, both DCT-097 and the Prosecution have provided legitimate reasons for these payments and the Trial Chamber finds that such payments fall within the discretion of the Prosecution pursuant to Rule 39(ii).

111. Further, the Trial Chamber finds that the evidence presented by the Defence does not suggest that the payments were made in exchange for DCT-097's testimony. Rather, the Trial Chamber finds that DCT-097 was exploiting the Prosecution to the point of giving them false information. Given these facts, the Trial Chamber finds no reason to believe that the Prosecution may have knowingly and wilfully interfered with the administration of justice. The Trial Chamber notes that DCT-097 received a total amount of $ 40,441.37 from the Prosecution.[166] The Prosecution explained that these were discretionary payments pursuant to Rule 39(ii). The Trial Chamber finds that the Defence has not demonstrated how this discretion pursuant to Rule 39(ii) has been abused or in which way the payments can be considered as exorbitant. Further, the Trial Chamber finds that the Defence has not demonstrated how the conduct of the Prosecution prevents the Defence from calling DCT-097. The allegations, in particular his alleged "deals" with the Prosecution on relocation. The Defence cannot therefore claim prejudice in this regard. In any event, the Trial Chamber considers that even if the Prosecution had promised Abu Keita relocation (which the Prosecution denies), the Prosecution has a legitimate interest in securing the safety of its witnesses, and may arrange for any appropriate protective measures for them, including relocation. The Trial Chamber notes that Abu Keita testified openly,[185] an indication that he was in fact, not concerned about his security, an indication consistent with the Prosecution position that it did not promise him relocation. The information provided, even if believed, does not support an allegation of contemptuous conduct on the part of the Prosecution. The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the allegation is not sufficiently credible to provide it with reason to believe that a member of the Prosecution knowingly and wilfully interfered with the administration of justice in the present case.

10) Payment of $10,000 to TF1-362 to testify

128. The Defence alleges that "it is 'common knowledge' amongst RUF ex-combatants that Prosecution witness TF1-362 testified and lied before the Special Court and in exchange made approximately $10,000."[186] It cites in support of this allegation the affidavit of DCT-102, testimony of Charles Taylor, and the testimony of Defence Witness DCT-215. It does not specify when TF1-362 allegedly received this amount of money.

129. The Prosecution submits that common knowledge cannot be relied upon to support an allegation of contempt of court.[187] Furthermore, the Prosecution disclosed all relevant information for TF1-362 prior to the witness' testimony to the Defence.[188]

130. In his affidavit, DCT-102 attests that he met TF1-362, who confirmed testifying in The Hague. He attests that he "heard a rumour" that TF1-362 received 10,000 USD but that he does "not have personal knowledge of that."[189] Witness DCT-215 and the Accused both provided evidence in relation to this alleged incident, but are not able to provide any information as to whether TF1-362 received this money from the Prosecution or the reasons for receiving such funds.

131. Witness DCT-215 testified that he met TF1-362 who told him that "someone" had asked him/her to "go and tell lies" and that he/she was given "a little thing" for this. He said that this was a reference to the Prosecution because TF1-362 explained that he/she was given a new name and money to build a house.[190] He testified that he did not know the exact amount, but that "it is alleged by some people" that TF1-362 was paid up to 10,000 USD.[191]

132. The Accused testified that he heard that TF1-362 boasted of getting a job and 10,000 USD to build a house as a result of testifying before the Special Court.[192]

133. The Trial Chamber also notes that DCT-062 testified that he went together with DCT-102 to visit TF1-362.[193] TF1-362 told them that he/she was going to build a house.[194] However, DCT-062 testified that TF1-362 did not tell them where the money to build the new house would come from.[195]

134. The Trial Chamber notes that the allegations made by DCT-102 are based only on rumour and speculation and that DCT-102 has no personal knowledge of the allegations. The Trial Chamber further notes that even the Accused in his testimony cited rumour and not personal knowledge in relation to this event. It is not explained where the information came from. Moreover, the Trial Chamber notes that although DCT-215 and DCT-062 were present at the same occasion, the account given by each of them is contradictory regarding the statement TFI-362 is alleged to have made in their presence. Further the Trial Chamber notes that DCT-215's testimony and the transcript reference provided by the Defence in support of the allegation does not specifically refer to an amount of 10,000 USD, but only to a "little thing".[196] Furthermore neither of the two individuals state that TFI-362 named the Prosecution as the organ that supplied the $10,000 or "little thing". At best, the Defence allegation seems to be based on mere suspicion. With regard to the testimony of the Accused and Defence Witness DCT-062, the Trial Chamber will consider their evidence when assessing the credibility of Witness TF1-362 in the final judgement. Furthermore, as the Defence was able to cross-examine TF1-362 in relation to this allegation there is no prejudice suffered by the credibility of the Prosecution witnesses and the veracity of their accounts in its deliberations on the judgement.

149. Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds no reason to believe that members of the Prosecution wilfully interfered with the administration of justice or otherwise engaged in contemptuous conduct as identified in Rule 77.

14) Finding on the merits

150. The Trial Chamber is not satisfied that any of the allegations submitted by the Defence provide reason to believe that contempt may have been committed by members of the Prosecution.

FOR ALL THE ABOVE REASONS

THE TRIAL CHAMBER on 22 October 2010 dismissed the Motion in its entirety.

DECISION ON DEFENCE APPLICATION FOR JUDICIAL NOTICE OF ADJUDICATED FACTS FROM THE AFRC TRIAL JUDGEMENT PURSUANT TO RULE 94(B)

26. Whereas Rule 94 does not define what constitutes an "adjudicated fact" this Court has previously held that when deciding whether or not to take judicial notice of a proposed fact as an adjudicated fact, the following criteria must be met:

a. The fact must be distinct, concrete and identifiable;

b. The fact must be relevant and pertinent to an issue in the current case;

c. The fact must not contain legal conclusions, nor may it constitute a legal finding;

d. The fact must not be based on a plea agreement or upon facts admitted voluntarily in an earlier case;

e. The fact clearly must not be subject to pending appeal, connected to a fact subject to pending appeal, or have been settled finally on appeal;

f. The fact must not go to proof of the acts, conduct, or mental state of the accused person;

g. The fact must not be sufficient, in itself, to establish the criminal responsibility of the Accused;

h. The fact must not have been re-formulated by the party making the application in a substantially different or misleading fashion; that is to say, the fact must not differ significantly from the way the fact was expressed when adjudicated in the previous proceedings, it must not have been abstracted from the context of the original judgement in an unclear or misleading manner, and it must not be unclear or misleading in the context in which it is placed in the application.[48]

27. Facts that the Trial Chamber has taken judicial notice of under Rule 94(A) need not be proven again at trial. In contrast, Rule 94(B) creates a

> "well-founded presumption of accuracy of [the proposed fact], which therefore does not have to be proven again at Trial, but which, subject to that presumption, may be challenged at [...] trial."[49]

Like all rebuttable evidence, judicially noticed adjudicated facts remain subject to challenge by the non-moving party during the course of the trial.[50] As a party may challenge, at trial, an

[49] Sesay Decision on Adjudicated Facts, para. 18; see also Prosecutor v. Karemera et al., ICTR-98-AR73(C), Decision on Prosecutor's Interlocutory Appeal of Decision on Judicial Notice (AC), 16 June 2006, para. 42, stating the "facts noticed under Rule 94(B) are merely presumptions that may be rebutted [...] with evidence at trial."

[50] Prosecutor v. Popovic et. al., IT-05-88-T, Decision on Prosecution Motion for Judicial Notice of Adjudicated Facts with Annex, 26 September 2006, para. 21.

adjudicated fact that has been judicially noticed, it follows that the Trial Chamber is not restricted to taking judicial notice of facts that are not subject of dispute between the parties.[51]

28. Pursuant to Rule 94(B), taking judicial notice of adjudicated facts is a matter for the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion. Therefore, even where a proposed adjudicated fact fulfils all of the aforementioned criteria, the Trial Chamber will retain its discretion not to take judicial notice of said fact if doing so will not best serve the interests of justice.[52] Factors to be considered in that regard are the rights of the accused and judicial economy.[53]

29. The Special Court has further established that

> "the overriding consideration is whether taking judicial notice of the said fact will promote judicial economy while ensuring that the trial is fair, public and expeditious. Other relevant factors in such a determination include: the stage of proceedings at the time the Application is brought; the volume of evidence already led by the parties in respect of the proposed adjudicated facts; whether the proposed adjudicated facts go to issues central to the present case; and the nature of the proposed adjudicated facts, including whether they are over-broad, tendentious, conclusory, too detailed, so numerous as to place a disproportionate burden on the opposing party to rebut the facts, or repetitive of evidence already heard in the case."[54]

30. Rule 94(B) has two purposes. The first is to promote judicial economy by dispensing with the need for the parties to lead evidence in order to prove supplementary facts or allegations already proven in past proceedings. The second is to harmonise judgements in relation to certain factual issues that arise in multiple cases before the Special Court.[55]

III. DELIBERATIONS

1. Timing of the Defence Application

31. The Defence filed the Motion after the Prosecution announced that it would be calling its last witness. The Prosecution objects to the timing of the Motion, submitting that it has already closed its case and that trial fairness would require that it be given the opportunity to consider calling "rebuttal" evidence, either before the close of its case, or in a rebuttal case.[56] Therefore the granting of the Motion would be contrary to the interest of justice and would not achieve judicial economy.

32. The Trial Chamber finds that the timing of the Motion is not in itself of sufficient concern to justify dismissal of the Motion in its entirety.[57] The Chamber notes that the Motion was filed before the opening of the Defence case and is intended to streamline the Defence case.[58] Furthermore, the Prosecution submissions, if accepted would lead to an unacceptable limitation of the application of Rule 94(B) to the pre-trial stage or to the Prosecution case. The Trial Chamber notes that Rule 94(B) itself does not contain such a limitation and that in the event that the proposed adjudicated facts are judicially noticed, the Prosecution may have the option to challenge them by cross-examining Defence witnesses or by calling rebuttal evidence. The Trial Chamber accordingly rejects an objection based on this ground alone.

2. The Proposed facts go to issues central to the present case

33. The Prosecution submits that it would be inappropriate to take judicial notice of Facts 1, 2, 3, 5, 7, 8, 9, 12, 13, 14 and 15 as they relate to central issues in this case, specifically the relationship between AFRC and the RUF.[59] In support, the Prosecution refers to a decision in the Popovic case before the ICTY, which states:

> "[...] some of the proposed adjudicated facts go to issues which are at the core of this case. In balancing judicial economy with the Accused's right to a fair and public trial, the Trial Chamber is of the view that a number of these facts should be excluded in the interests of justice".[60]

34. The Prosecution argues that the issues in the AFRC case were different and not central issues in that case, but are central in the present case. Whether a proposed adjudicated fact commanders agreed that the troops who had arrived from Kono District should act as an advance troop which would establish a base in north western area Sierra Leone in preparation for an attack on Freetown. The purpose was to "restore the Sierra Leone Army".

9	193, 384	From Colonel Eddie Town, in or around September 1998, AFRC troops staged a number of attacks on ECOMOG positions to supplement their dwindling stocks of arms and ammunition
10	197	In October 1998, following an armed clash with Dennis Mingo, SAJ Musa left Koinadugu District to join the advance team and prepare for an attack on Freetown. SAJ Musa did not follow the same route taken by the advance teams in his journey to the west
11	198	Upon his arrival in 'Colonel Eddie Town' in November 1998, SAJ Musa assumed command. He emphasised his disenchantment with the RUF and stressed that it was vital that his troops arrive in Freetown before the RUF. SAJ Musa reorganised the troops and began the advance towards Freetown. The troops passed through the villages of Mange, Lunsar, Masiaka and Newton before arriving in Benguema in the Western Area in December 1998. Throughout the advance, the troops withstood frequent attacks by ECOMOG.
12	200	On one occasion during the advance, SAJ Musa and the AFRC troops heard the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) interview Sam Bockarie over the radio. Bockarie revealed the position of the AFRC fighting forces and explained that it was RUF troops who were approaching Freetown. Soon after, ECOMOG bombarded the area. Musa immediately contacted Sam Bockarie, insulted him and told him that he had no right to claim that the troops approaching Freetown were RUF troops
13	201	On 23 December 1998, shortly after the arrival in Benguema, SAJ Musa was killed in an explosion during an attack on an ECOMOG weapons depot
14	202, 398	Following the death of SAJ Musa, the troops reorganised. On 5 January 1999, the Accused Brima gathered the troops in Allen Town and told them the time had come to attack Freetown. On 6 January 1999, they invaded Freetown
15	206	Following heavy assaults from ECOMOG, the troops were forced to retreat from Freetown. This failure marked the end of the AFRC offensive as the troops were running out of ammunition. While the AFRC managed a controlled retreat, engaging ECOMOG and Kamajor troops who were blocking their way, RUF reinforcements arrived in Waterloo. However, the RUF troops were either unwilling or unable to provide the necessary support to the AFRC troops.

DECISION ON EX PARTE AND CONFIDENTIAL PROSECUTION MOTION FOR AN ORDER TO PROVIDE TO THE PROSECUTION NON-PRIVILEGED DOCUMENTS RECENTLY OBTAINED FROM THE ACCUSED'S PERSONAL ARCHIVE

evidence of (a) the existence of a common plan, design or purpose and the nature of the Accused's participation; (b) the Accused's role in the conflict and the widespread or systematic attack against the civilian population of Sierra Leone; (c) the Accused's relationships, interactions and communications with those involved in the actual conduct of the armed conflict, the attack against the civilian population and the crimes charged; and (d) the Accused's intent, knowledge and/or awareness of the crimes with which he is charged.[6]

6. The Prosecution submits that by seeking such an order no lawyer-client privilege would be affected. They argue that from the statements made during the Status Conference a reasonable inference can be made that Documents "were not recently created and certainly [were] not created as work product by the Defence legal team" and that the Documents from the personal archive existed "before" the Accused was detained by the Special Court for Sierra Leone.[7]

7. The Prosecution recognizes that in seeking this remedy a proper balance must be struck between the rights of the Accused and the Prosecution's right to have access to all potentially relevant information. The Prosecution further understands that any order which it seeks must be proportionate.[8]

III. DELIBERATIONS

8. It is not possible for the Trial Chamber to decide from the available information whether or not any of the documents in the archive are privileged. In any event, no general right rests with the Prosecution to have access to all potentially relevant information, nor is there any general disclosure obligation upon the Defence. The disclosure obligations placed on the Defence under the Rules refer to very limited circumstances such as, for example, the Defence obligations in relation to the defence of alibi and any special defence.[9]

9. Rule 54 of the Rules provides:

> "At the request of either party or of its own motion, Judge or a Trial Chamber may issue such orders, summonses, subpoenas, warrants and transfer orders as may be necessary for the purposes of an investigation or for the preparation or conduct of the trial."

10. The Rule is a general rule in unambiguous language. Clearly, the test for whether the Trial Chamber ought to issue an order under the Rule is whether to do so is necessary (not simply useful or convenient) for the purposes of an investigation or for the preparation or conduct of the trial.[10]

[10] See Prosecutor v. Brima, Kamara, Kanu, Case No. SCSL-04-16-T, Decision on Joint Defence Motion for General Orders Pursuant to Rule 54, 28 July 2005, para. 20.

11. In the present case, in order to satisfy the requirements of Rule 54 of the Rules, the Prosecution has to

(i) identify the information sought or to describe it by its general nature; and

(ii) show a legitimate forensic purpose.[11]

12. It is not necessary for a party to identify "exactly what material he seeks".[12] It is sufficient for the party to identify as clearly as possible the documents or the nature of the documents to which he seeks access. However, this does not mean that a party may conduct a "fishing expedition" - that is, seek access to material in order to discover whether there is a case to make.

13. As to the second requirement, that the party must show a legitimate forensic purpose for seeking access, it must show that such access would be likely to assist the case materially, or that there is at least a "good chance" that it will give that assistance.[13]

14. In the instant case the Prosecution has not identified the information sought, nor even described it by its general nature. On the contrary, the Motion has the hallmarks of a fishing expedition. The Prosecution has only broadly stated that it believes that the material and documents in the personal archive generally relate to the issues in the current proceedings, i.e. material concerning the existence of a Joint Criminal Enterprise, the role of the Accused in the conflict, interactions between the Accused and persons involved in the conflict and his knowledge or intent of the crimes charged. The stated issues do not identify or describe any document, but are merely a restatement of the core elements of the charges against the Accused. Moreover, it follows that, in the absence of identification or description of any document, the Prosecution has not shown how the material in the archive would assist its case materially.

15. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that the Prosecution has failed to establish any grounds for the orders sought under Rule 54.

FOR THE ABOVE REASONS, THE TRIAL CHAMBER

DISMISSES the Motion; and

ORDERS that the Motion and this Decision be served on the Defence.

not be in question as it was merely the receiving state. A successful claim of sovereign immunity may lead to a claim by Liberia of a violation of its sovereignty, as the immunity attaches to the state concerned, not to a third state. However, Liberia is not before this court and in any event we have held that this court is an international court rather than the court of another sovereign state.

58. Since the Applicant is the subject of criminal proceedings before this court, processes issued in the course of, or for the purpose of, such proceedings against the Applicant cannot be vitiated by a claim of personal immunity.

59. Before this matter is concluded, it is apt to observe that the Applicant had at the time the Preliminary Motion was heard ceased to be a Head of State. The immunity ratione personae which he claimed had ceased to attach to him. Even if he had succeeded in his application the consequence would have been to compel the Prosecutor to issue a fresh warrant.

VII. DISPOSITION

1. INTRODUCTION
1.1. The International Tribunal

479. Therefore, as can be seen, the forms of participation referred to in Article 6 (1), cannot render their perpetrator criminally liable where he did not act knowingly, and even where he should have had such knowledge. This greatly differs from Article 6 (3) analyzed here below, which does not necessarily require that the superior acted knowingly to render him criminally liable; it suffices that he had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit or had committed a crime and failed to take the necessary or reasonable measures to prevent such acts or punish the perpetrators thereof. In a way, this is liability by omission or abstention.

480. The first form of liability set forth in Article 6 (1) is planning of a crime. Such planning is similar to the notion of complicity in Civil law, or conspiracy under Common law, as stipulated in Article 2 (3) of the Statute. But the difference is that planning, unlike complicity or plotting, can be an act committed by one person. Planning can thus be defined as implying that one or several persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases.

481. The second form of liability is 'incitation' (in the french version of the Statute) to commit a crime, reflected in the English version of Article 6 (1) by the word instigated. In English, it seems the words incitement and instigation are synonymous82. Furthermore, the word "instigated" or "instigation" is used to refer to incitation in several other instruments83. However, in certain legal systems and, under Civil law, in particular, the two concepts are very different84. Furthermore, and even assuming that the two words were synonymous, the question would be to know whether instigation under Article 6 (1) must include the direct and public elements, required for incitement, particularly, incitement to commit genocide (Article 2 (3)(c) of the Statute) which, in this instance, translates incitation into English as "incitement" and no longer "instigation". Some people are of that opinion85. The Chamber also accepts this interpretation 86.

482. That said, the form of participation through instigation stipulated in Article 6 (1) of the Statute, involves prompting another to commit an offence; but this is different from incitement in that it is punishable only where it leads to the actual commission of an offence desired by the instigator87.

483. By ordering the commission of one of the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, a person also incurs individual criminal responsibility. Ordering implies a superior- subordinate relationship between the person giving the order and the one executing it. In other words, the person in a position of authority uses it to convince another to commit an offence. In certain legal systems, including that of Rwanda 88, ordering is a form of complicity through instructions given to the direct perpetrator of an offence. Regarding the position of authority, the Chamber considers that sometimes it can be just a question of fact.

484. Article 6 (1) declares criminally responsible a person who "(...) or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 4 (...)". Aiding and abetting, which may appear to be synonymous, are indeed different. Aiding means giving assistance to someone. Abetting, on the other hand, would involve facilitating the commission of an act by being sympathetic thereto. The issue here is to whether the individual criminal responsibility provided for in Article 6(1) is incurred only where there was aiding and abetting at the same time. The Chamber is of the opinion that either aiding or abetting alone is sufficient to render the perpetrator criminally liable. In both instances, it is not necessary for the person aiding or abetting another to commit the offence to be present during the commission of the crime.

485. The Chamber finds that, in many legal systems, aiding and abetting constitute acts of complicity. However, though akin to the constituent elements of complicity, they themselves constitute one of the crimes referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, particularly, genocide. The Chamber is consequently of the opinion that when dealing with a person Accused of having aided and abetted in the planning, preparation and execution of genocide, it must be proven that such a person did have the specific intent to commit genocide, namely that, he or she acted with the intent to destroy in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such; whereas, as stated supra, the same requirement is not needed for complicity in genocide89.

486. Article 6(3) of the Statute deals with the responsibility of the superior, or command responsibility. This principle, which derives from the principle of individual criminal responsibility as applied in the Nuremberg and Tokyo trials, was subsequently codified in Article 86 of the Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 8 June 1977.

487. Article 6 (3) stipulates that:

"The fact that any of the acts referred to in Articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his or her superior of criminal responsibility if he or she knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof".

488. There are varying views regarding the Mens rea required for command responsibility. According to one view it derives from a legal rule of strict liability, that is, the superior is criminally responsible for acts committed by his subordinate, without it being necessary to prove the criminal intent of the superior. Another view holds that negligence which is so serious as to be tantamount to consent or criminal intent, is a lesser requirement. Thus, the "Commentary on the Additional Protocols of 8 June 1977 to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949" stated, in reference to Article 86 of the Additional Protocol I, and the mens rea requirement for command responsibility that:

"[...] the negligence must be so serious that it is tantamount to malicious intent, apart from any link between the conduct in question and the damage that took place. This element in criminal law is far from being clarified, but it is essential, since it is precisely on the question of intent that the system of penal sanctions in the Conventions is based"90.

489. The Chamber holds that it is necessary to recall that criminal intent is the moral element required for any crime and that, where the objective is to ascertain the individual

8. There is no exhaustive list of such "particular circumstances", but they include "a case in which the decision, though apparently res judicata, is void, and therefore non-existent in law, for the reason that a procedural irregularity has caused a failure of natural justice", or where a party has been subjected to "an unfair procedure".[2] In Mucic et al., the Appeals Chamber, in examining its own powers to reconsider, held as follows:

> The Appeals Chamber has an inherent power to reconsider any decision, including a judgment where it is necessary to do so in order to prevent an injustice. The Appeals Chamber has previously held that a Chamber may reconsider a decision, and not only when there has been a change of circumstances, where the Chamber has been persuaded that its previous decision was erroneous and has caused prejudice. Whether or not a Chamber does reconsider its decision is itself a discretionary decision. Those decisions were concerned only with interlocutory decisions, but the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that it has such a power also in relation to a judgment which it has given – where it is persuaded:
> (a) (i) that a clear error of reasoning in the previous judgment has been demonstrated by, for example, a subsequent decision of the Appeals Chamber itself, the International Court of Justice, the European Court of Human Rights or a senior appellate court within a domestic jurisdiction, or > (ii) that the previous judgment was given per incuriam; and
> (b) that the judgment of the Appeals Chamber sought to be reconsidered has led to an injustice.[3]

9. The Chamber notes that the language utilized by the Appeals Chamber in the above case seems to suggest that the Appeals Judges were primarily concerned with reconsideration at the appellate level. However, the Chamber considers that the holding is equally applicable to reconsideration of Trial Chamber decisions. This Trial Chamber has previously held that reconsideration is permissible where the impugned decision was erroneous in law or an abuse of discretion when decided,[4] or where there have been new circumstances since the filing of the impugned Decision that affect the premise of the impugned Decision.[5] It is noted that the Prosecution is basing its motion solely on the argument that the impugned decision was erroneous and has caused prejudice.

10. Consequently, the Chamber will now examine, in relation to each witness, if there were any errors in the impugned decision or an abuse of discretion, and whether an injustice has been occasioned by the decision.

Witness AMI

11. The Prosecution submits that the Decision erroneously characterized Witness AMI's proposed testimony as "repetitive": His evidence relates to the Accused Kabiligi's involvement

146. In support of his contention, the Appellant refers to a paragraph of the Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgement, which sets out: (1) the distinction between instigation as a mode of responsibility as opposed to direct and public incitement to commit genocide, which is itself a crime under Article 2(3)(c) of the Statute;[367] and (2) the difference between the offences of genocide and direct and public incitement to commit genocide, namely that the crime of direct and public incitement to commit genocide is an inchoate offence, punishable even if no act of genocide has resulted therefrom.[368] Contrary to the Appellant's submission, the analysis in the Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgement in fact supports the proposition that the offence of direct and public incitement to commit genocide is, in and of itself, a serious offence warranting serious punishment, notwithstanding that no physical act of genocide may have been committed. It does not indicate any hierarchy between the two offences. This argument is accordingly dismissed.

147. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber committed a further error by taking into account the possible sentences for the crime of genocide under Rwandan law.[369] He argues that as the offence of direct and public incitement to commit genocide does not exist under Rwandan law, it is impossible to precisely assess how it would be treated.[370] The Appellant refers to two Rwandan cases which, in his view, illustrate that the offence of incitement, which does exist under Rwandan law, is closer to direct and public incitement than to genocide and that it is sometimes treated more leniently.[371]

148. The Appeals Chamber reiterates that whilst a Trial Chamber is obliged to take into account the general sentencing practice in Rwanda, it is not obliged to follow it.[372] The Appeals Chamber notes that although it would appear that Rwandan law does not make direct and public incitement to commit genocide a separate offence, it nevertheless criminalizes genocide[373] and provides that the act of, inter alia, "incitement, by way of speech, image or writing, to commits [sic] such a crime, even where not followed by an execution" shall be punishable by penalties provided for under that law.[374]

149. The Appeals Chamber has considered the two Rwandan judgements proffered by the Appellant[375] and is not persuaded that these cases are sufficient to demonstrate that direct and public incitement to commit genocide is treated more leniently by Rwandan courts. The Appeals Chamber notes that Karamira was ultimately convicted for genocide based on various acts, including the giving of a "Hutu Power" speech to which the Appellant refers, and that he was sentenced to death.[376] With respect to Gataza, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Supreme Court of Rwanda confirmed Gataza's sentence of 30 years of imprisonment for murder, attempted murder and "association de malfaiteurs" pursuant to Article 51 of Rwanda's Organic Law No. 16/2004 of 19 June 2004.[377] The Gataza Judgement is therefore of little assistance in detemining what sentence would apply in Rwanda with respect to the crime for which the Appellant was convicted.

150. The Appellant also submits that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to take into account factors which it ought to have considered for purposes of sentencing, namely, that the Trial Chamber was concerned with an inchoate offence where it had not been demonstrated on the evidence that the commission of this offence resulted in death or physical harm.[378] He submits that this failure is evidenced by the fact that the Trial Chamber recounted the testimony of Witness AKK concerning the deaths of a number of individuals, without recognizing that it was not proven that these deaths resulted from the conduct for which the Appellant was convicted.[379]

151. The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by these submissions. There is no indication in the Trial Chamber's reasoning on sentencing that it took into account the testimony of Witness AKK with respect to deaths which allegedly occurred as a result of the Appellant's conduct. Indeed, the paragraphs of the Trial Judgement cited by the Appellant were contained in the factual findings

[374] See Organic Law No. 33*bis*/2003, Article 17(3). The Appeals Chamber observes that whilst it would have been preferable for the Trial Chamber to also refer to Organic Law No. 33*bis*/2003 in its discussion on the Rwandan law relating to the offence of genocide, its failure to do so does not impact the validity of the Trial Chamber's overall assessment of Rwanda's sentencing practice.

[375] The Appeals Chamber recalls its earlier finding that it would consider the merits of the Appellant's submissions with respect to these judgements when determining the merits of the Appellant's case. See Rule 115 Decision, para. 19.

under Rwandan law.[495] It argues that the crimes for which the Appellant was convicted would have placed him within the first or second category of Rwanda's Organic Law.[496] The Appeals Chamber recalls that in Semanza the Trial Chamber had considered the relevant provisions of Organic Law 08/96 with respect to, inter alia, the offence of genocide and the applicable penalties.[497] Similarly, in the present case, the Trial Chamber made it clear that it "considered that under Rwandan law, genocide carries a possible penalty of life imprisonment, or life imprisonment with special provisions, depending on the nature of the accused's participation."[498] The Appeals Chamber repeats that, as it found in the Semanza case, "all [that] the Tribunal's Statute requires [is] recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda."[499]

198. The Prosecution submits that the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber "does not serve the objective of reconciliation as recognised by the Tribunal"[500] and that this "low sentence of 15 years in this case, which does not give sufficient weight to Rwanda's sentencing practice, sends the wrong message and serves to further aggravate the suffering of victims".[501] The Appeals Chamber considers that these submissions fail to demonstrate that the sentence imposed does not further the two main purposes of sentencing: retribution and deterrence.[502]

199. The Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber took into account the maximum sentence available under Rwandan law in the context of all other relevant factors, general as well as individualized, in determining the appropriate sentence in this case. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds no discernible error in the reasoning of the Trial Chamber on this point.

200. This sub-ground of appeal is dismissed.

4. Alleged Inconsistency of the Sentence with the Tribunal's Sentencing Practice

201. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber erred in relying upon the Kajelijeli and Ruggiu judgements as examples of relevant Tribunal sentencing practice, because they are significantly different from the present case.[503] It submits that the Trial Chamber failed to take into in such a way as would best favour a fair determination of the case in consonance with the spirit of the Statute and the general principles of law.[43]

Burden and Standard of Proof

30. Pursuant to Article 20(3) of the Statute, an accused shall be presumed innocent until proven guilty. This presumption places on the Prosecution the burden of establishing the guilt of the accused, a burden which remains on the Prosecution throughout the entire trial. A finding of guilt may be reached only when a majority of the Trial Chamber is satisfied that guilt has been proven beyond reasonable doubt.[44] Accordingly, the Chamber determined whether it was satisfied that every element of the crime charged and of the mode of liability and any fact indispensable for a conviction were proven beyond reasonable doubt by the Prosecution.[45] In so doing, it has been necessary on certain occasions for the Chamber to draw inferences from circumstantial evidence. In such cases, the Chamber drew the only reasonable conclusion available from the evidence.[46] Where there was another conclusion reasonably open from that evidence inconsistent with the guilt of the Accused, the Chamber did not enter a finding of guilt.

Viva Voce Evidence

31. When evaluating viva voce evidence, the Chamber considered various factors, including the witnesses' demeanour in court, the plausibility and clarity of their testimony, and whether there were contradictions or inconsistencies within their testimony or between their testimony and their prior statements relied upon in court or admitted as exhibits. It also considered the individual circumstances of the witnesses, including their role in the events in question, their relationship with the Accused and whether the witnesses would have an underlying motive to give a certain version of the events.

32. The Chamber recognises that a significant period of time has elapsed between the events alleged in the Indictment and the testimonies given in court. Therefore, lack of precision or minor discrepancies between the evidence of different witnesses, or between the testimony of a particular witness and a prior statement, was not regarded in general as necessarily discrediting their evidence. When deciding not to rely on certain aspects of a witness's testimony, the Chamber nevertheless sometimes relied on other parts of the testimony deemed to be reliable and credible.

33. The Chamber also recalls that the testimony of a single witness on a material fact does not, as a matter of law, require corroboration.[47] However, when only one witness presented evidence on a particular incident, the Chamber examined the evidence with particular care before accepting it as a sufficient basis for finding guilt.

34. Applying these criteria, the Trial Chamber assessed the testimony of Witness BKW, a former motorcycle taxi-driver sentenced to death for his participation in the genocide,[48] with great caution. Not only is the witness an alleged accomplice to Bikindi, but he also admitted lying to a court in Rwanda and hiding the truth from Tribunal investigators.[49] Prosecution and Defence Counsel both pointed out that the witness denied having killed anyone when testifying before the Tribunal in the Nahimana et al. case,[50] although he testified to the contrary in the present case.[51] As set out in following sections, the Trial Chamber found portions of his testimony to be largely unreliable.[52] Consequently, the Chamber relied on Witness BKW's evidence only insofar as it corroborated, or was corroborated by, other reliable and credible evidence and never as the sole basis for a finding of guilt.

35. The Chamber has also considered Witness KRQ's testimony that, while detained in Gisenyi Prison, sometime between 2003 and 2004, he and four co-detainees were taken to the Rwandan public prosecutor's office and asked by an employee of that office to level accusations against Bikindi.[53] However, in the absence of any corroboration of this serious accusation proferred by a witness with a criminal record, the Chamber has accorded no weight to the witness's assertion.

Expert Witnesses

36. When assessing and weighing the evidence of the expert witnesses, the Chamber considered factors such as the professional competence of the expert, the position held by the expert, the scope of his expertise, the methodologies used, the credibility of the findings made in light of these factors and other evidence, and the relevance and reliability of their evidence.

Documentary Evidence

37. Factors such as authenticity and proof of authorship assumed the greatest importance in the Chamber's assessment of the weight to be attached to individual pieces of documentary evidence.

Interpretation and Transcription

38. In a number of instances, the Chamber identified discrepancies between the French and English versions of the transcripts of testimonies given in Kinyarwanda. In those instances, because the testimonies given in Kinyarwanda were first interpreted in French, and then from French to English before being transcribed in English, the Chamber relied on the French version of the transcripts as more accurate. When in doubt, the Chamber resorted to the original testimony in Kinyarwanda with the assistance of the Tribunal's Languages Support Section.

39. The Chamber also took into account that, as a result of translation and transcription, names of individuals or locations given by witnesses which were similar, but not identical, may actually have referred to the same place or person.

to security.[311] Mugiraneza Defence Witness RWQ, an MRND and Interahamwe member who Witness GJQ testified had received grenades, denied ever possessing grenades, other than as part of his duties as a member of the Rwandan military.[312]

202. Prosecution Witness GJQ was the sole witness to accuse Mugiraneza of weapons distribution in 1991. His evidence was hearsay. He only learned of Mugiraneza's alleged role in 1992 when he joined the Interahamwe. Further, he offered no further testimony or details as to when in 1991 the distribution occurred. While Witness GJW corroborated Witness GJQ that Colonel Rwagafilita distributed weapons, Witness GJW did not implicate Mugiraneza in this activity and his evidence was hearsay as well.[313] Last, Witness GJQ's testimony that Interahamwe would walk around public places with grenades[314] was undermined by Prosecution Witness GTF. This witness owned a shop close to the Kibungo roundabout in 1994 and testified he did not see any Interahamwe armed with rifles, grenades or pistols before the President's death in Kibungo.[315]

203. The Chamber considers the Defence evidence denying the allegation is self-serving.[316] However, it is of the view that the uncorroborated hearsay testimony of Witness GJQ, whose evidence implicating the Accused has been treated with caution (see II.6.1), is not an adequate basis upon which to base findings beyond reasonable doubt. As such, the Prosecution has not proven beyond reasonable doubt that Mugiraneza distributed grenades in 1991 that were used in 1994 to kill Tutsis.

2.3 Weapons Distribution at Hôtel Tourisme, Gitarama, 1993

204. The Prosecution led evidence through Witness GHU of an alleged weapons distribution at a joint MRND/MDR-Power meeting in Gitarama at the Hôtel Tourisme between November and December 1993. Nzabonimana introduced Bicamumpaka to the audience of around 500 persons as a prominent MDR member. Nzabonimana told the crowd to know its enemy, "none other than the Inyenzi, and the Inyenzi are the Tutsis". Subsequently, Nzabonimana and Bicamumpaka distributed rifles and grenades to those present, including to several Interahamwe.[317] It was the second time Witness GHU had seen Bicamumpaka.[318]

205. In contrast, Witness VF-1, who Witness GHU testified was present and received weapons, denied ever having possessed weapons or meeting Bicamumpaka or Nzabonimana.[319] Bicamumpaka also denied having ever distributed weapons to Interahamwe him in the evening of 3 April at Murilo's bar in Remera sector. Mugiraneza denied any knowledge of the Kibungo Club or having participated in any meeting on 3 April.

[316] The Chamber considers Mugiraneza's denial to be self-interested. Furthermore, although Witness RWQ expressly contradicted Witness GJQ's evidence, the Chamber is mindful of Witness RWQ's possible interest in distancing himself and the Accused from the alleged distribution of weapons.

491. In assessing the credibility of Witness GJQ, the Chamber recalls that he was incarcerated at the time of his testimony while the appeal of his death sentence for involvement in the killings of Tutsis was pending.[708] He is an admitted accomplice of Prosper Mugiraneza and has blamed Mugiraneza for his actions. Specifically, while the witness confirmed that he pleaded guilty to the crimes he committed, he testified that he did not voluntarily take part in massacres. Consequently, he requested that the Chamber make Mugiraneza assume all of the responsibility for the crimes that Witness GJQ committed.[709]

492. The Chamber is troubled by Witness GJQ's statement, which imputes responsibility for all his crimes to Mugiraneza. The witness's evidence also appears to function as an attempt to minimise his role, or at least his culpability, in the crimes for which he has confessed. Given his pending appeal, the Chamber is reasonably concerned that the witness's testimony may be motivated by a desire to positively influence his proceedings.

493. Furthermore, the Defence challenged Witness GJQ's credibility based on the Judgement of the Kibungo Court of First Instance, which convicted him and sentenced him to death.[710] In its judgement, the Court noted the rejection of Witness GJQ's guilty plea by the Rwandan Office of the Prosecutor.[711] The Court also determined at several points that Witness GJQ lied, denying his responsibility for crimes, as well as falsely accusing his co-accused.[712] The Court did not accept the uncorroborated testimony of Witness GJQ regarding allegations related to the Kibungo Club (also called "Rwatoro Club").[713] This Chamber is not bound by findings of another court adjudicating a separate record, much of which is incomplete in this proceeding. Nonetheless, judicial determination of falsification by a witness raises concerns about his general credibility.[714]

494. Indeed, this Chamber has heard testimony that Witness GJQ threatened to falsely accuse other people and specifically targeted Mugiraneza. Witnesses RWL, RDK, RWB, RDZ and RDF testified that Witness GJQ told them that he would make false accusations against them unless they gave him bribes.[715] Witness RWB also testified that Witness GJQ told him that if they both testified against Mugiraneza, they would receive "compensation".

[715] Several witnesses explained that Witness GJQ asked for "sugar", which meant a bribe.

Similarly, Witness GJQ told Witness RDZ that he should have mentioned Mugiraneza's name during his trial in order to receive a lighter sentence. According to those questioned, these allegations were not reported to the Rwandan authorities because Witness GJQ allegedly had influence with them. In the Chamber's view, the testimonies of the five witnesses, while not conclusive, is further evidence that he may be inclined to ignore his testimonial oath and that his evidence should be viewed with considerable suspicion.[716]

495. Turning to the merits of his evidence, the Chamber observes that Witness GJQ provided statements to Tribunal investigators on 20 October 1999, 20 July 2001, 14 November 2002, 28 May 2003 and 21 July 2003.[717] The Defence confronted the witness with the fact that his prior accounts vary as to when he joined the MRND, ranging from September 1992 to August or September 1993.[718] Witness GJQ explained that it was possible that the person taking notes for his statements was mistaken or that he made a mistake concerning dates.[719] However, the witness maintained that attempts to lure him into the MRND party began in July 1992 when he met with Mugiraneza, Rwagafilita and Kabagema at Rwagasore's place, and continued into August.[720] He then testified that he was recruited into the MRND around September or October 1992.[721] The Chamber considers the explanation reasonable.

496. Turning to the Defence evidence, Witness RRD confirmed the existence of the Kibungo Club, that radio broadcasts were used to announce the general meeting in April 1994, and that Rwatoro and Tahimana (as identified by Witness GJQ) were leaders of the club. Like Witness GJQ, he confirmed that elections were held and that Prosper Mugiraneza was not present.[722]

497. However, Defence witness evidence veers dramatically from Witness GJQ's with respect to the topics of discussion and attendees. While Witness GJQ testified that the war was discussed and one of the speakers encouraged the attendees to kill Tutsis, Witnesses

The Chamber omits citation to Witness RDK's evidence due to witness identification concerns. The Defence also challenges Witness GJQ's credibility submitting that his "pattern of lying is consistent with GJQ's history of putting himself and his interests above all else". As an example, the Defence points to Witness GJQ's motivation for joining the MRND, which the Defence alleges was out of self-interest and the immediate benefit of tires for his lorry (Mugiraneza Closing Brief, para. 123). The Defence cites the evidence of Witnesses RWL and RDZ. Mugenzi Defence Witness Jeannette Uzamukunda

682. Jeannette Uzamukunda, a Tutsi, is Mugenzi's wife and Vestine Ugiranyina's older sister.[1011] Uzamukunda testified that the gendarmes who were assigned to Mugenzi were not under his control and he could not order them to do things. Rather, they were under the control of the gendarmerie.[1012]

Deliberations

683. There is no dispute that Vestine Ugiranyina, along with possibly more than 1,000 other primarily Tutsi refugees took refuge at Rukara Parish around 7 April 1994. During Ugiranyina's stay, attackers, described by Witness LEL as Interahamwe, launched an assault as early as 8 April. According to Ugiranyina, firearms and grenades were employed in the attack. Prosecution Witness LEL and Ugiranyina confirmed that many persons who sought refuge there had been killed.

684. The Mugenzi Defence also agrees that Ugiranyina was rescued from the church at Rukara Parish by gendarmes in Mugenzi's security detail or persons cooperating with them. The Prosecution has presented this event as evidence of Mugenzi's ability to prevent massacres and knowledge that Tutsis were being killed at Rukara Parish. The Mugenzi Defence, however, contends that he was unaware both of the involvement of his security detail in this operation and that killings were occurring at Rukara Parish.[1013]

685. The Prosecution did not lead any direct evidence that Mugenzi knew that the Tutsi refugees in Rukara Parish were going to be massacred. Rather, it invites the Chamber to infer this knowledge based on Witness LEL's evidence that Mugenzi sent "soldiers" to rescue Ugiranyina. Witness LEL was the only witness to testify that Ugiranyina was rescued by soldiers on Mugenzi's orders.[1014]

686. At the outset, the Chamber accepts that Witness LEL sought refuge in the church at Rukara Parish in April 1994. The fundamental features of Witness LEL's evidence about attacks there and the rescue of Ugiranyina are corroborated by Defence evidence. The Chamber has considered that the Defence attempts to undermine her credibility, by pointing out how her testimony has evolved from prior statements to Tribunal investigators or the Prosecution, does little to undermine the central, undisputed aspects of her evidence.[1015]

[1014] The Mugenzi Defence mistakenly notes at para. 1256 of its Closing Brief that Witness LEL did not give any evidence about who had ordered the gendarmes to go to Rukara Parish.

[1015] For example, the Mugenzi Defence noted that in a prior statement to Tribunal investigators in 2001, Witness LEL could not recall the name of who was rescued but identified Ugiranyina by name while testifying. Compare T. 16 February 2004 p. 43 (reading of Witness LEL's prior statement, indicating "I no longer recall her name") and T. 16 February 2004 p. 39 (testifying that once she heard Vestine's name in the church, she remembered it "from that date on"). Witness LEL explained that given the traumatic nature of the events, it was difficult to recall events but that she had known Vestine's name for "quite a while". Witness LEL, T. 16 February 2004 pp. 42-43, 54. Compare T. 16 February 2004 pp. 43-44, 48 (reading of her will-say statement, which states: "[t]his Vestine was the only refugee this witness knew of to have been saved from the Rukara church massacre by the intervention of a person in authority") and T. 16 February 2004 p. 33 (testifying that a second woman was rescued with Vestine). Witness LEL clarified that she had not seen the other woman leave with Vestine but had

687. Nonetheless, Witness LEL's testimony does not implicate Mugenzi in the attack on Rukara Parish. Specifically, she did not describe Mugenzi as being present during the assault, or the attackers, which she referred to as Interahamwe, as following Mugenzi's orders. Likewise, she gave no evidence to suggest that the security personnel who saved Ugiranyina, whom she called soldiers, participated in the attacks at Rukara Parish. Her evidence that Mugenzi had sent these soldiers to save Ugiranyina is second-hand, and thus of limited probative value.[1016]

688. The Prosecution's assertions that Mugenzi must have known and that the gendarmes would not have acted without his approval are not supported by the evidence.[1017] Mugenzi and Defence Witnesses Ugiranyina and Mukagakwavu have testified that although a driver and security personnel that were assigned to protect Mugenzi did extract Ugiranyina and her husband's niece, Claudine, they did so without Mugenzi's knowledge. Their evidence tends to suggest that Mugenzi was likewise unaware of what was occurring at Rukara Parish at that time.[1018] The Defence has also presented evidence that Mugenzi was not in control of the gendarmes assigned to him, but rather they were under the control of the gendarmerie.[1019]

689. The Chamber views the testimony of Mugenzi and the Defence witnesses with suspicion. Mugenzi has an interest in denying his ability to control soldiers and gendarmes, who, in the Indictment, are part of a category of assailants for which the Prosecution seeks to hold him responsible.[1020] Likewise, Defence Witnesses Ugiranyina, Mukagakwavu and Uzamukunda are close personal relations and received protection from him during the events of 1994.[1021]

690. Nevertheless, the Chamber also observes that there is undisputed evidence that on 9 April 1994, the day Ugiranyina and Mukagakwavu testified Ugiranyina's extraction from Rukara Parish occurred, Mugenzi was sworn in as a member of the Interim Government, involved in meetings and conveying instructions to MRND and Interahamwe leaders to stop killings throughout Kigali (II.7.2; II.7.3).

heard about it and that at the time of her interview it was difficult to recall all the details about the event. Witness LEL, T. 16 February 2004 pp. 52-53.

[1016] Witness LEL, T. 16 February 2004 pp. 33 ("They [refugees] only said that it was Mugenzi who had sent these soldiers to come and take that woman."), 52 ("Q: I think you have made it plain in your evidence today that the soldiers did not mention Mugenzi's name; is that right? A: That's correct; he never mentioned his name."), 53 ("The soldiers did not say that [Mugenzi ordered them to get Vestine] while I was – it was in my earshot; it was stated by the refugees who were with me."), 56 ("Q: And he, or they [soldiers], never mentioned the name of Mugenzi, that's clear. A: The name was mentioned by the refugees.").

[1017] Prosecution Closing Brief, para. 413.

[1018] Mugenzi explains that on the day of the rescue he had sent his driver out to get his mother, Edreda Mukagakwavu, to bring her back to his home in Kigali. After the driver left he had no other contact with him, and was thus unaware that the driver agreed with Mukagakwavu to some detours, including picking up Ugiranyina. Mugenzi, T. 9 November 2005 p. 82. Defence Witnesses Vestine Ugiranyina and Edreda Mukagakwavu corroborate his testimony. Mukagakwavu, T. 24 April 2006 p. 9; Ugiranyina, T. 20 April 2006 pp. 7-8, 27-29, 43.

[1020] See Indictment, paras. 5.36-5.37, 6.14, 6.35, 6.37, 6.61, 6.63, 6.65.

[1021] In Gitarama Mugenzi arranged housing for Ugiranyina and her family, and protection by the Gitarama prefect. Mugenzi, T. 9 November 2005 p. 82. On 15 April 1994, Ugiranyina and her family stayed with Mugenzi's friend, Baptista Kamugisha, in Shyogwe, Gitarama. He later arranged for them to move to a house behind Democracy stadium in Gitarama town and for them to receive travel documents from Fidèle Uwizeye, the Gitarama prefect. Ugiranyina, T. 20 April 2006 pp. 13-14, 25-29. Mugenzi sent a driver and a guard to get his mother in Kigali and bring her to him. Mukagakwavu, T. 24 April 2006 pp. 9-10.

691. The Chamber has also considered evidence from Mugenzi, Bizimungu and former Minister André Ntagerura that telephone communication in Kigali had been disrupted.[1022] There is other evidence that travel between the two prefectures was also difficult. Specifically, the driving distance between Kigali and Rukara commune was significant.[1023] Additionally, there is evidence tending to suggest that roadblocks could have impeded travel and that some of the area was under RPF control.[1024] In the Chamber's view, this evidence raises further questions about whether Mugenzi was aware of what was occurring at Rukara Parish when he sent his car and driver to pick up his mother in Kigali on 7 April 1994.

692. It is also reasonable to conclude that, once in the company of Mugenzi's family, Mugenzi's security detail would have acted on their orders alone. Given all of the above, it is not unlikely that Mugenzi lacked knowledge about attacks on Rukara Parish or the details of what his security personnel were doing once having gone to assist his family.

693. Finally, the Chamber does not consider that Witness LEL's uncorroborated hearsay evidence provides a sufficient basis for it to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Mugenzi sent security personnel, whether they be soldiers or gendarmes, to rescue Vestine Ugiranyina and her husband's niece, Claudine, knowing that attacks on Tutsis had occurred or were going to occur at Rukara Parish. Furthermore, the evidence fails to establish that Mugenzi gave orders to any category of assailants participating in the attack, or that any were his subordinates. Based on the foregoing, the Chamber need not address notice challenges.

6.5 Killings at the Saint Joseph Economat, 15 April 1994

Introduction

694. The Indictment alleges that, from 7 April 1994, massacres of the Tutsi population were perpetrated by militiamen, military personnel and gendarmes on the directives or to the knowledge of authorities, including the four Accused. Specifically, the Prosecution alleges that Colonels Rwagafilita and Nkuriyekubona, who were in charge of the massacres in Kibungo, ordered Witness GJQ to kill people who were hiding at the Economat on 15 April. It submits that government officials, including Prosper Mugiraneza, were aware of this [1022] For example, Mugenzi testified that there were no mobile phones in Rwanda in 1994. He also testified that telephones outside Kigali were broken down as the central system of Rwandan telephones had been blown up in the first week of the war and were only restored after the war. Mugenzi, T. 9 November 2005 pp. 53-54. Bizimungu testified that on 8 April 1994 most lines of communication from Kigali were cut and a couple of days later all lines of communication were out because the RPF had bombed telecommunication systems in Kigali. Bizimungu, T. 4 June 2007 pp. 44-45. Former Minister André Ntagerura testified that from 6 to 7 April 1994 the RPF destroyed the central telecommunications system in Kigali, cutting off all communication with other prefectures and the outside world. Ntagerura, T. 19 February 2007 p. 22. But see Makeli, T. 30 October 2007 p. 25 (agreed that by 23 April 1994, phone lines in Kacyiru and Remera were not working but those close to Radio Rwanda in Kigali were).

[1023] Former Minister André Ntagerura testified that, under normal conditions, travel from Kigali to Kigarama would take about 1 hour and 20 minutes. Ntagerura, T. 19 February 2007 p. 20. Paul Mujyambere testified that the drive from Kigarama to Rukara is about 30 kilometres. Mujyambere, T. 6 May 2008 p. 7; see also Exhibit 1D24 (Administrative and Roads Map of Rwanda); Exhibit 1D39(A) (Administrative and Roads Map of Rwanda).

[1024] Defence Witnesses WFQ1 and Antoine Nyetera testified that the Kigali-Kibungo road was impassable because of its location in a zone of combat controlled by the RPF. Witness WFQ1, T. 4 October 2006 pp. 48-49; Nyetera, T. 26 September 2006 p. 13.

testified that the last time he was in Kibungo was 3 April, which is corroborated by Witness GJQ's evidence.[1053]

712. Considering the uncorroborated hearsay evidence provided by Witness GJQ, as well as the Chamber's reservations about the witness generally, there is reasonable doubt that Mugiraneza was in contact with Rwagafilita during the planning and execution of the Economat massacre. Consequently, the Prosecution has failed to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Mugiraneza was involved in, or had knowledge of, the massacres occurring at the Economat in Kibungo on 15 April 1994 or the killing of injured persons on 18 April. In light of this finding, the Chamber need not consider objections related to insufficient notice.[1054]

7. KIGALI PREFECTURE, 6 – 12 APRIL 1994

7.1 Meeting and Distribution of Weapons in Kabuga, 6, 7 and 9 April 1994

Introduction

713. The Indictment alleges that from late 1990 to July 1994, all four Accused conspired amongst themselves and others to exterminate Tutsi civilians and eliminate members of the opposition. A component of this plan included the distribution of weapons to militiamen and certain civilians with the intent to exterminate the Tutsi population and its accomplices. More specifically, the Prosecution alleges that, on 6 April 1994, Bicamumpaka and others met at Joseph Sebisogo's house in Kabuga and Bicamumpaka ordered the Interahamwe to hunt down and kill Tutsis. Bicamumpaka returned to Kabuga on 9 April with weapons, which he gave to Interahamwe leaders to distribute. Following this, the massacres of Tutsis in Kabuga intensified once more. The Prosecution relies on the testimony of Witness GHY. The Prosecution, relying on the testimony of Witness GHT, further alleges that, on 7 April, Bicamumpaka brought weapons to Kabuga, distributed them to the Interahamwe after which massacres of Tutsis in Kabuga intensified.[1055]

714. Bicamumpaka's Defence argues that there was no notice for these allegations. Furthermore, it contends that Witnesses GHY and GHT are unreliable. Bicamumpaka was at home with his family in Kigali on 6 and 7 April 1994 and on 9 April he was present at the swearing-in ceremony of the Interim Government, held meetings with the diplomatic core in Kigali, and attended two cabinet meetings. He denies travelling to Kabuga at any point between 6 and 9 April. Bicamumpaka's Defence relies on the testimonies of Bicamumpaka, Witnesses Abubakar Nduwayezu, Jean Rwagatera, OK-3, TK-1, OG-3, TF-2 and LD-1, and Prosecution Witness DCH.[1056]

[1054] The Chamber recalls that evidence relating to events occurring in Kibungo prefecture was only admitted to be considered against Mugiraneza for the allegations of conspiracy to commit genocide and complicity in genocide. brother and the Tanzanian took Witness GHT away. On the next day, 9 April, Witness LD-1's brother told her that he and the Tanzanian had disguised Witness GHT as a Muslim so that she could pass through a roadblock, and had taken her to the mosque to hide her there. Witness LD-1 testified that Abubakar Nduwayezu was at the mosque between 8 and 12 April but she did not see him there or anywhere else during those dates.[1111]

752. Witness LD-1 did not see or meet Bicamumpaka at any time in March or April 1994. She also stated that she did not know Bicamumpaka during this time. She denied that Witness GHT was introduced to Bicamumpaka at her parents' home at any time in late March or early April as her parents did not know Bicamumpaka. She was sure that Bicamumpaka did not go to her father's home as he was "a drunkard," talkative and would have mentioned it.[1112]

Bicamumpaka Defence Witness OG-3

753. Witness OG-3, a Hutu, took care of Bicamumpaka's children and lived in his home in Kigali in 1994.[1113] On 6 April 1994, Bicamumpaka left the family house during the day, but had returned by the time President Habyarimana's plane was shot down. When he came back home he did not go to his bedroom but watched television in the sitting room as usual. Later that evening, following the news about the President's plane crash, a communiqué was issued over Radio Rwanda telling people to stay at home for their safety. Consequently, she and Bicamumpaka's family, including Bicamumpaka, stayed at home from that moment until around 10.00 p.m. on 8 April when he left with his family, accompanied by soldiers and Donat Murego, to an unknown location.[1114]

Deliberations

754. Relying on Witness GHY, the Prosecution alleges that on 6 April 1994, Bicamumpaka met others at Joseph Sebisogo's house and ordered the Interahamwe to kill Tutsis. Bicamumpaka returned to Kabuga on 9 April to distribute weapons to Interahamwe. Following this distribution, the massacre of Tutsis in Kabuga intensified. Further, relying on Witness GHT, the Prosecution alleges that on 7 April, Bicamumpaka brought weapons to Kabuga to distribute to the Interahamwe and thereafter massacres against Tutsis intensified.

755. Bicamumpaka denied travelling to Kabuga at any point between 6 and 9 April 1994 contending that he was at his home in Kigali with his family on 6, 7 and 8 April, and participating in Interim Government affairs in Kigali on 9 April. The Chamber shall address these allegations in turn.

(i) Meeting at Joseph Sebisogo's House, 6 April 1994

756. Witness GHY is the only Prosecution witness to provide evidence of Bicamumpaka's presence at a meeting in Kabuga on 6 April 1994. Specifically, Witness GHY testified that in the evening of 6 April she saw three men dressed in Interahamwe uniform drive into Kabuga from the direction of Kigali. She was subsequently told by one of her neighbours that Bicamumpaka had been in the vehicle and that he had held a meeting later that evening with Interahamwe and others at Interahamwe treasurer Joseph Sebisogo's house.

757. Before turning to the merits of Witness GHY's testimony, the Chamber will consider her general credibility. Witness GHY testified at trial that she did not know who Bicamumpaka was on 6 April 1994 when she first saw him, but was told of his identity by her neighbour.[1115] However, in a 3 February 2000 statement to Tribunal investigators, Witness GHY contended that on 6 April she already knew Bicamumpaka, as he would often visit trader Sebisogo, who was also her neighbour.[1116] When confronted with this discrepancy at trial, Witness GHY denied that she had ever told the investigators that she had previously known Bicamumpaka and that when her statement had been read back to her in 2000 it did not contain that statement. Moreover, she queried whether the signature on the statement was hers, reiterating that she did not know Bicamumpaka at this time.[1117]

758. The Chamber considers that Witness GHY's insistence that she did not know who Bicamumpaka was in 1994 creates real concerns about her ability to identify him. By her own admission, she did not recognise him in the vehicle that passed her on 6 April as she did not know who he was. Rather, she only saw three unknown individuals wearing the uniform of the Interahamwe in the vehicle. She was subsequently told that Bicamumpaka had been in that vehicle by her neighbour, who had followed the vehicle to Sebisogo's house. The Chamber considers that in the absence of corroboration, Witness GHY's hearsay identification evidence is weak. The Chamber has similar concerns about the witness's ability to identify Bicamumpaka on 9 April (discussed below).

759. In an effort to impeach Witness GHY's testimony, the Bicamumpaka Defence proffered the judgement from a genocide trial of 32 accused before the Kigali Court of First Instance.[1118] As a general matter, the observations of judges reviewing an entirely separate record are of little probative value in this proceeding.[1119] However, judicial findings that a witness lied in a separate proceeding – rather than just general credibility concerns – could be a basis for considering his or her evidence before this Tribunal with caution.[1120] While, contrary to the Bicamumpaka Defence submission, the Kigali Court of First Instance did not find that Witness GHY lied on numerous occasions before it, it did question Witness GHY's sincerity.[1121] This gives the Chamber pause.

[1116] Witness GHY's 7 February 2000 Statement was not admitted into evidence at trial. However, the relevant excerpt was read into the record at T. 29 September 2004 pp. 19-20.

Georges Rutaganda*, Case No. ICTR-96-03-R, Decision on Requests for Reconsideration, Review, Assignment of Counsel, Disclosure, and Clarification (AC), 8 December 2006, paras. 15, 20 (alleged findings in a Rwandan proceeding that Tribunal witnesses generally lacked credibility were insufficient to justify review proceedings).
[1120] Cf. Nchamihigo Appeal Judgement, paras. 68, 77, 83 (overturning factual findings of the Trial Chamber, in part, because it relied on the uncorroborated evidence of a witness convicted for forgery without having exercised appropriate caution), 305, 309, 312-314 (overturning factual findings of the Trial Chamber, in part, because insufficient caution was used when assessing the evidence of an accomplice witness who admitted to misleading judicial officials in his own criminal case).
[1121] Bicamumpaka Closing Brief, paras. 312-313; Exhibit 3D8(F) (Judgement of the Kigali Court of First Instance) p. 37.

760. Turning to the merits of Witness GHY's testimony about this allegation, the Chamber first recalls that in contrast to what the Prosecution alleges, Witness GHY only testified to Bicamumpaka's presence at a meeting attended by Interahamwe. She did not give any evidence that Bicamumpaka ordered Tutsis to be killed at this meeting. Moreover, her testimony that Bicamumpaka was at the meeting is based entirely on her neighbour's out-of-court statements, which are second-hand and thus of limited probative value.

761. Turning to the Defence evidence, Bicamumpaka denied having attended the meeting at Sebisogo's house on 6 April 1994 testifying that he remained at home in Kigali with his family from late afternoon on 6 April to 2.00 a.m. on 9 April. Bicamumpaka's testimony is generally corroborated by Witness OG-3 who was working at his residence. Moreover, Witnesses DCH, TK-1, OK-3 and TF-2, who lived in Kabuga in April 1994, did not see or hear that Bicamumpaka was in Kabuga in April.

762. This evidence is far from dispositive. Bicamumpaka has an interest in denying that he was in Kabuga on 6 April 1994. Likewise, Defence Witness OG-3 was a former employee of the Accused and consequently may have a motive to testify in a manner favourable to him. Witnesses TK-1, TF-2 and OK-3's general evidence that they did not see or alternatively hear that Bicamumpaka was in Kabuga in April is not dispositive. Notably, they also denied knowing him. Moreover, Witness TK-1 is an alleged accomplice of Bicamumpaka and, therefore, has a clear motive to deny Bicamumpaka's presence at Sebisogo's home where he was staying from 6 April for three to four weeks.[1122] Witness DCH's evidence is likewise of limited probative value in light of his testimony that he went home when he heard the shots that brought the President's plane down.[1123]

763. Bicamumpaka also introduced UNAMIR cables, which he claims demonstrate that it was impossible for him to have travelled from Kigali to Kabuga from 6 to 9 April 1994. The UNAMIR communications indicate that the RPF had taken control over some parts of eastern Kigali, the most likely route to Kabuga.[1124] Witness TK-1 testified, however, that several roads besides the paved road between Kigali and Kabuga would allow one to travel between the two locations.

764. Notwithstanding the frailties in the Defence evidence, Witness GHY's uncorroborated hearsay evidence fails to provide a sufficient basis for the Chamber to make findings beyond reasonable doubt. The Prosecution has not proven that Bicamumpaka attended a meeting with Interahamwe at Joseph Sebisogo's house on 6 April 1994 at which he ordered that Tutsis be killed.

(iii) Distribution of Weapons, 7 April 1994

765. Witness GHT is the only Prosecution witness to provide evidence of Bicamumpaka's role in weapons distribution in Kabuga on 7 April 1994. Specifically, Witness GHT testified that around 12.00 p.m., she saw, through the window of her father-in-law's house, a white advising them not to take part in the massacres. Ndindabahizi was not aware of the cessation of killings by the Interahamwe after 9 April.[1213]

Mugenzi Defence Witness Agnès Ntamabyaliro

828. Agnès Ntamabyaliro, a Hutu, was appointed Minister of Trade and Industry in April 1992 and Minister of Justice in July 1993, a post which she retained in the Interim Government.[1214] After the swearing-in ceremony on 9 April 1994, Ntamabyaliro did not recall any other meetings that day. The first cabinet meeting took place on 10 April and she could not recall who was present, including whether Mugenzi attended. The cabinet was informed of the killings in Kigali, but not about other killings in the prefectures. The killings were committed by unruly soldiers and Interahamwe, which were denounced by the Interim Government. At the time, the ethnicity of the victims was unclear as people from all ethnic groups were being killed.[1215]

Deliberations

829. The parties do not dispute that there was a meeting among Mugenzi, Nzirorera, and Interahamwe, including Witness D, at which Witness D and the other Interahamwe were tasked with instructing the killers throughout Kigali to stop killing. Although Witness D places the meeting on 10 April 1994, the Chamber is satisfied that the meeting took place on 9 April, as Mugenzi testified.[1216] Further, the Interim Government, at the 9 April cabinet meeting, was advised that civilians were being killed by the Interahamwe. The only issues before the Chamber are the reasons for the pacification mission and whether Mugenzi expressed satisfaction that many Tutsis had been killed.

830. Witness D was the sole witness to testify for the Prosecution in relation to this event. Before turning to the merits of the Prosecution evidence, the Chamber looks at the general credibility of Witness D. His relationship with the Prosecution is extensive. He has provided information to the Prosecution and evidence on its behalf concerning the events of 1994 and assisted in the location of fugitives.[1217] Furthermore, he has received direct or indirect payments from the Prosecution between 1996 and May 2007 for his assistance and has been placed in a witness protection program. Many payments appear to be reasonable expenditures to cover travel, communication and other hardships related to assisting investigations or testifying before the Tribunal.[1218] Notwithstanding, the payments are significant.[1219]

[1213] Ndindabahizi, T. 2 May 2007 pp. 8-11, 15-16.
[1214] Ntamabyaliro, T. 21 August 2006 pp. 3-7; Exhibit 2D102A (Ntamabyaliro's Personal Information Sheet). At the time of her testimony, Agnès Ntamabyaliro was charged with genocide and a detainee in Kigali prison. Her trial had commenced but was postponed so that she could testify before the Tribunal. [1215] Ntamabyaliro, T. 21 August 2006 pp. 42-44; T. 28 August 2006 pp. 55-56.
[1216] During his testimony, Witness D stated that he believed that the Interim Government had been sworn in on the day of the meeting. The Chamber accepts that the Interim Government was sworn in on 9 April 1994 (II.7.2), and, thus, accepts that the meeting where Witness D and others were instructed to undertake the pacification tour took place on 9 April. The Chamber notes that the Indictment places the meeting on 9 April.
[1217] See Witness D, T. 15 June 2004 pp. 67-68; T. 17 June 2004 pp. 13-14, 67-70.
[1218] See, e.g., Witness D, T. 15 June 2004 pp. 68-69; T. 16 June 2004 pp. 8-9, 71; Exhibit P56 (Statement of Payments to Witness D, 15 February 2002).

831. Furthermore, in February 2002, the Prosecutor issued a statement that the Prosecution had decided not to open an investigation against Witness D given that the "evidence assessed" did not provide sufficient grounds to prosecute him. It further described his willingness to cooperate with the Office of the Prosecutor.[1220] Notably, this agreement was made in order to secure his testimony in the Nahimana et al. trial. While Witness D testified that this was done to allay suspicions about his involvement in the genocide and affirm his general credibility, it can also be seen as a concession made to obtain testimony.[1221] The record does not reflect that the Prosecution has acted improperly or sought to influence Witness D's testimony. Nonetheless, the possibility that Witness D is motivated to provide evidence favourable to the Prosecution in order to ensure continued benefits cannot be ignored.

832. In addition, aspects of Witness D's testimony regarding his position within the Interahamwe raise questions about his credibility. He testified that, by 1992, his position within the Interahamwe was by title only and that he held little influence within the organisation.[1222] However, he was a signatory to a January 1994 letter from the Interahamwe to UNAMIR that complained about the impartiality of its peacekeepers.[1223] After the formation of the Interim Government, Witness D was called upon to pacify Interahamwe killing Tutsis throughout Kigali and, during his tour, was able to move freely throughout Kigali. In the last week of April, he was part of a contingent of Interahamwe officials who met with General Roméo Dallaire to address the fact that Interahamwe were preventing UNAMIR-escorted refugees from the Hôtel des Mille Collines from reaching Kanombe airport.[1224] Finally, while in Butare, he was approached by Colonel Muvunyi to discourage Interahamwe arriving from Kigali to participate in looting.[1225]

833. Given his own admissions that Interahamwe participated in killings in 1994, his attempts to distance himself from the organisation, while understandable, are inconsistent with the contemporaneous recognition of his status by those in power in 1994 and his acts on the organisation's behalf.[1226] Under these circumstances, the Chamber does not consider Witness D to be an accomplice witness. However, the Chamber has some concerns that his evidence might be incomplete, particularly to the extent that it implicates him in criminal

In so finding, the Chamber has considered the Prosecution submissions about the nature of the compensation received by Witness D. See T. 16 June 2004 p. 15. It would be dishonest, in my view, to call this organisation as genocidaire, because as I explained to you, it is not only the Interahamwe who perpetrated the killings in Rwanda.").

conduct. Under these circumstances, his evidence should be assessed on a case-by-case basis and approached with the appropriate caution.[1227]

834. Turning to the question whether the true purpose of the pacification tour was to hide victims' bodies from the international community, the Chamber recalls Witness D's testimony that, at the time of the tour, some members of the expatriate community remained in Kigali, including UNAMIR troops. Indeed, Witness D encountered the Bengali faction of UNAMIR troops during the tour.[1228] Witness D acknowledged that the ICRC was trying to collect bodies around the time of the pacification tour.[1229] In this regard, the Chamber recalls Bizimungu's evidence that on 11 April 1994, Philippe Gaillard, an ICRC representative, told him that it was urgent that bodies in Kigali be collected to avoid an epidemic.[1230] Finally, the Chamber notes that contemporaneous UNAMIR cables and reports show that UNAMIR representatives were aware of killings and reported that they were ongoing in Kigali to their superiors at UN headquarters.[1231]

835. The Chamber considers that the presence of members of the international community, particularly UNAMIR, in Kigali at the time, the ICRC efforts related to the burial of bodies and the UNAMIR reports of mass killings in Kigali prior to the pacification tour raise doubt with respect to the plausibility of Witness D's evidence that the purpose of the pacification tour was to conceal killings from the international community. Moreover, the Chamber observes that while the removal of bodies from the streets of Kigali may have had the effect of improving the international community's impression of the situation, it would also have the effect of alleviating a clear public health risk. Under these circumstances, the Chamber does not accept Witness D's evidence with respect to the purpose of the pacification tour.

836. Nor does the Chamber accept Witness D's evidence that Mugenzi was pleased that many Tutsis had been killed in Kigali. Though he insisted that Mugenzi was pleased at the high number of people killed, his evidence on this point is highly subjective. Notably, Witness D did not claim that Mugenzi made any statement to the effect that he was pleased to hear about the killings.[1232] Rather, Witness D's conclusion with respect to Mugenzi's state of mind is based solely on Mugenzi's physical reaction to the report that the pacification tour had been a success. Under the circumstances, the Chamber considers that it can only accept Witness D's evidence if his were the only reasonable interpretation of Mugenzi's reaction.

[1227] The Chamber has also considered the evidence of Witness ALL-42 regarding Witness D's relationship with the RPF. See Exhibit 4D164 (Bagosora et al. Transcript of 8 November 2006) pp. 33-34. This evidence, which is general, does not raise questions about Witness D's reliability.

following a meeting of Interim Government ministers at his home, which Uwizeye did not attend, Ndindabahizi told Uwizeye that Bizimungu had been given money to buy arms in Kinshasa and South Africa.[1457]

1009. Consequently, Uwizeye's evidence is hearsay and of limited probative value. Furthermore, it is contradicted by its source, Ndindabahizi, who testified that Bizimungu was sent to Zaire to ask Mobutu to facilitate ceasefire negotiations with the RPF. Ndindabahizi further testified that Uwizeye knew that this was the purpose of Bizimungu's mission, as he was present at the meeting at his house when this was decided. Uwizeye denied this, testifying that he had been absent when this was discussed.

1010. Ndindabahizi's evidence about the purpose of Bizimungu's trip is corroborated by Bizimungu, Mugenzi and Witness WAE.[1458] The Chamber considers their evidence with suspicion. Bizimungu has a clear interest in denying that he was sent on a mission to buy arms and Mugenzi, Bicamumpaka, Ndindabahizi and Witness WAE would be considered accomplices of Bizimungu in relation to this event. Furthermore, Bizimungu, Mugenzi and Ndindabahizi, who were central to rebutting Uwizeye's allegation, were detained together in the United Nations Detention Facility and Bizimungu had heard the testimonies of Mugenzi and Ndindabahizi before he testified.[1459] Notwithstanding, their evidence raises doubts about Uwizeye's hearsay testimony that Ndindabahizi had said Bizimungu was being sent to purchase weapons.

1011. The Chamber considers that several other circumstantial factors lend credence to Bizimungu's evidence that his mission was to broker a ceasefire rather than purchase weapons. First, Bizimungu was accompanied by Colonel Ephrem Setako, a legal advisor to the Rwandan army and a member of its neutral military observer group.[1460] Given his position, it is likely that Setako would have been involved as the military's representative in ceasefire negotiations with the RPF. Further, Witness WAE testified that, since Mobutu was a soldier, it was believed that a briefing for Mobutu done by a fellow military officer about the military developments would be "easier to understand".[1461]

1012. Furthermore, the day after Bizimungu's meeting with Mobutu, the latter met with the RPF and, less than a week later, Mobutu met with a second Rwandan government delegation who signed a ceasefire agreement. Bizimungu's testimony about the second delegation is corroborated by some of its members – Ntagerura, Ntamabyaliro and Witness WAE – and [1457] The Chamber observes that there is some disagreement as to whether Mugiraneza was present at the gathering when it was decided that Bizimungu would go to Zaire. Specifically, Mugiraneza and Witness RWV testified that Mugiraneza went straight to the Murambi Centre and did not stop at Fidèle Uwizeye's home once in Gitarama. See Mugiraneza, T. 22 May 2008 pp. 48-50, 52-54; T. 2 June 2008 pp. 58-59; T. 3 June 2008 pp. 55-56; Witness RWV, T. 9 June 2008 pp. 27-28, 30-32, 68. Witness RWW, on the other hand, testified that Mugiraneza joined several other government officials at Uwizeye's home when he arrived in Gitarama. Witness RWW, T. 13 March 2008 pp. 23, 25, 27, 37-38, 46. The Chamber considers it unnecessary to resolve this discrepancy.

[1458] Aside from indicating that Bizimungu was going to see President Sese Seko Mobutu in Zaire, the testimonies of Bicamumpaka as well as Witnesses WAA and WDK shed little light on why Bizimungu went there.

[1459] The fact that Bizimungu testified after other Defence witnesses is relevant when evaluating his evidence. Ntakirutimana Appeal Judgement, paras. 392-393.

documentary evidence.[1462] This evidence reflects that Mobutu was being used generally as a mediator by the Rwandan government to facilitate ceasefire negotiations with the RPF.

1013. The Chamber has also considered the significant sum Bizimungu was allotted for this mission. On its face, the equivalent of $17,500 USD appears to be an excessive amount given the stated purpose of Bizimungu's mission in neighbouring Zaire. Further, Uwizeye testified that all the money in the prefecture's "coffers" or safe was taken.[1463] It is a reasonable possibility that additional funds could have been taken if they had been available in the coffers. Notwithstanding, Bizimungu testified that this money was also used to cover future missions, including his later travel to Switzerland and Tunisia. Bizimungu repeated this in a letter to Jean Kambanda in October 1994, in which he sought to rebut allegations that he had misappropriated funds.[1464] Bizimungu also added that his daily expenses in Zaire were significant, with his room at the InterContinental Hotel costing between $180 to $200 USD per day.[1465] The Chamber also observes that Ndindabahizi suggested that the sizeable amount anticipated the contingency that Bizimungu might have had to charter a plane while in Zaire.

1014. The Chamber considers that the explanations about why Bizimungu received around the equivalent of $17,500 USD and his use of the funds are equivocal.[1466] Although Bizimungu testified that he did not draw against them, his later mission orders allotted additional monies to be allocated to Bizimungu for those missions.[1467]

1015. Notwithstanding, other evidence in the record indicates that monies allocated for weapons purchases were substantially higher than the amount Bizimungu received. For example, Ndindabahizi testified that Colonel Théoneste Bagosora was given $1,000,000 USD to purchase weapons and a contract for the purchase of arms for $1,499,499 USD signed by Colonel Bagosora was entered as an exhibit.[1468] The significant difference between the expenditures made by Bagosora – nearly $1,500,000 USD – and the money given to Bizimungu – the equivalent of $17,500 USD – raises questions about whether the latter amount would have been considered sufficient to cover an arms purchase.[1469]

1016. Finally, in assessing the Prosecution case, the Chamber also considers Witness WAE's evidence that Colonel Théoneste Bagosora signed a contract to purchase weapons in Kinshasa, Zaire on 24 May 1994. In an attempt to circumvent an arms embargo, he disguised the arms purchase as an order for medication intended for the Ministry of Health. This is [1463] Uwizeye, T. 8 April 2005 pp. 8-10. Mugenzi testified that the Gitarama prefecture treasury did not have sufficient funds and he believed that other unidentified sources in the south provided funds as well (Mugenzi, T. 9 November 2005 pp. 55-56). However, no other witness corroborated this testimony.

[1466] Having reviewed, for example, Bizimungu's hotel records in Kinshasa, Zaire, the Chamber is unable to determine the amount he was charged in USD.
[1467] See Exhibit 1D203 (Mission Order, 27 April 1994) and 1D210 (Mission Order, 28 June 1994) (providing daily subsistence allowances of 14,300 Rwandan francs, or approximately $70 USD, per day).
[1468] Exhibit P159 (Contract for the Purchase of Arms Between the Government of Rwanda and the Société Commerciale du Sud, 24 May 1994).
[1469] The Bizimungu Defence cites Expert Witness Helmut Strizek's Report that the omission of Bizimungu's name from the list of weapon buyers provided by André Guichaoua in his report in the Nyiramasuhuko et al. trial proves the falsity of any claim that Bizimungu went to buy weapons. The list was not entered into evidence in this case and the Chamber considers this evidence to have little probative value. See Exhibit 1D143 (Expert Report of Helmut Strizek) p. 40.

supported by documentary evidence.[1470] Notably, Bizimungu has presented evidence that he was in Zaire in the days before and possibly the very day this agreement was signed (II.14.2.2). Thus, evidence that Bagosora was sent to purchase weapons in Zaire and intended to disguise them as medical supplies could be consistent with the proposition that Bizimungu, the Minister of Health, was involved in or complicit in this purchase and possibly earlier ones. Further, Bizimungu was accompanied by a military officer, Setako, who conceivably could have assisted with a weapons purchase and it is a reasonable possibility that the funds given to Bizimungu was an initial payment, either related to Bagosora's purchase or a different weapons shipment.

1017. Notwithstanding, Witness WAE testified that Bizimungu was not present at the Rwandan Embassy when Bagosora signed the contract on 24 May 1994. Indeed, a contemporaneous radio broadcast indicates that Bizimungu was in Rwanda that day (II.14.2.2). Furthermore, Witness WAE did not believe that Bizimungu was aware of Bagosora's decision to disguise the weapons in this manner and Bizimungu testified that he did not learn of this until after his incarceration. The Prosecution did not cite to any direct evidence that Bizimungu would have known about this.[1471]

1018. The Chamber recalls that elsewhere in the Judgement it found that evidence implicating Bizimungu in the receipt and distribution of weapons in Gisenyi was insufficient to support findings beyond reasonable doubt (II.11.3). Under the circumstances, the Chamber is not satisfied that Uwizeye's uncorroborated hearsay evidence, which is contradicted by its source, provides a sufficient basis for it to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Bizimungu was sent to Zaire on 12 April 1994 with $17,500 USD to buy weapons and did purchase them.

8.2 Kamonyi School, After 12 April 1994

Introduction

1019. The Prosecution contends that shortly after the Interim Government moved from Kigali to Gitarama prefecture, Prosper Mugiraneza and other Interim Government ministers, including Callixte Nzabonimana, were at Kamonyi parish school in the midst of an attack by armed Interahamwe. Reference is made to Fidèle Uwizeye.[1472]

1020. The Mugiraneza Defence argues that there was no attack as alleged by Uwizeye. Reference is made to the testimony of Witness RRJ and the Rule 92 bis statements of Witnesses RWY, BGK, BGL and BGD.[1473]

Defence Witness Jean-François Ruppol and Dominique Makeli

1559. Jean-François Ruppol worked in Rwanda from 1991 to 7 April 1994 as the head of a Belgian agency that cooperated with the Rwandan Ministry of Health and Dominique Makeli, a Hutu, was a journalist for Radio Rwanda in 1994.[2215] Ruppol was in Murambi, Gitarama prefecture on 16 and 17 May 1994 on a medical assistance mission, where he met with several Interim Government ministers, including André Rwamakuba. Ruppol asked him where Bizimungu was and was told that he was abroad.[2216]

1560. Makeli heard that the government sent various ministers all over the world to go and explain the "Rwanda issue", and read transcripts from a 19 May 1994 Radio Rwanda broadcast, where Rwamakuba stated that he was following the population's health "when the Minister of Health [was] on a foreign visit". Given Bizimungu's prior experience in the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Makeli considered him to be the "right person to be sent out of the country" to explain what was happening in Rwanda.[2217]

Deliberations

1561. The Prosecution, relying on the testimony of Witness D, argues that Bizimungu met the witness in Kigali in the first half of May 1994 and informed him that the Interim Government had been concerned that killings would not occur in Butare. Consequently, it had decided to send a delegation of Butare natives, like the President and Prime Minister, to incite persons there. Bizimungu also stated that he was proud of what the Interahamwe was doing and that the Interim Government supported them. Bizimungu denies that this occurred, relying particularly on alibi evidence that he was not in Rwanda in the first half of May 1994.

1562. Before turning to the merits of the Prosecution evidence, the Chamber looks at the general credibility of Witness D. His relationship with the Prosecution is extensive. He has provided information to the Prosecution and evidence on its behalf concerning the events of 1994 and assisted in the location of fugitives.[2218] Furthermore, he received direct or indirect payments from the Prosecution between 1996 and May 2007 for his assistance and has been placed in a witness protection program. Many payments appear to be reasonable expenditures to cover travel, communication and other hardships related to assisting investigations or testifying before the Tribunal.[2219] Notwithstanding, the payments are significant.[2220]

1563. Furthermore, in February 2002, the Prosecutor issued a statement that it had decided not to open an investigation against Witness D given that the "evidence assessed" did not provide sufficient grounds to prosecute him. It further described his willingness to cooperate with the Office of the Prosecutor.[2221] Notably, this agreement was made in order to secure his testimony in the Nahimana et al. trial. While Witness D testified that this was done to allay suspicions about his involvement in the genocide and affirm his general credibility, it can also be seen as a concession made to obtain testimony.[2222] The record does not reflect that the Prosecution has acted improperly or sought to influence Witness D's testimony. Nonetheless, the possibility that Witness D is motivated to provide evidence favourable to the Prosecution in order to ensure continued benefits cannot be ignored.

1564. In addition, aspects of Witness D's testimony regarding his position within the Interahamwe raise questions about his credibility. He testified that, by 1992, his position within the Interahamwe was by title only and that he held little influence within the organisation.[2223] However, he was a signatory to a January 1994 letter from the Interahamwe to UNAMIR that complained about the lack of neutrality of its peacekeepers.[2224] After the formation of the Interim Government, Witness D was called upon to pacify Interahamwe killing Tutsis throughout Kigali, and during his tour, was able to move freely throughout Kigali. In the last week of April 1994, he was part of a contingent of Interahamwe officials who met with General Roméo Dallaire to address the fact that Interahamwe were preventing UNAMIR-escorted refugees from the Hôtel des Mille Collines from reaching Kanombe airport.[2225] Finally, while in Butare, he was approached by Colonel Muvunyi to discourage Interahamwe arriving from Kigali from participating in looting.[2226]

1565. Given his own admissions that Interahamwe participated in killings in 1994, his attempts to distance himself from the organisation, while understandable, are inconsistent with the contemporaneous recognition of his status by those in power in 1994 and his acts on the organisation's behalf.[2227] Under these circumstances, the Chamber does not consider Witness D to be an accomplice witness. However, the Chamber has some concerns that his evidence might be incomplete, particularly to the extent that it implicates him in criminal conduct. Under these circumstances, his evidence should be assessed on a case-by-case basis and approached with the appropriate caution.

1566. Turning to the allegation, the Chamber observes that the Defence does not dispute Witness D's ability to identify Bizimungu. Indeed, Bizimungu testified to his knowledge of Interahamwe officials.[2228] Given Witness D's position within the Interahamwe and Bizimungu's in the MRND and their mutual presence in Kigali for overlapping periods, it is not unlikely that the two knew each other.

CHAPTER V: SENTENCING

(i) Introduction

1989. Having found Mugenzi and Mugiraneza guilty of crimes under the jurisdiction of the Tribunal, the Chamber must determine appropriate sentences.

(ii) Law

1990. All crimes under the Tribunal's Statute are serious violations of international humanitarian law.[2749] When determining a sentence, a Trial Chamber has considerable, though not unlimited, discretion on account of its obligation to determine penalties to fit the individual circumstances of an accused and to reflect the gravity of the crimes for which the accused has been convicted.[2750]

1991. The gravity of the offences committed is the deciding factor in the determination of the sentence.[2751] Gravity entails the particular circumstances of the case, the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crimes, and the number of victims.[2752] The consequences of the crime upon any victims who were directly injured are also relevant.[2753]

1992. The Appeals Chamber has stated that "sentences of like individuals in like cases should be comparable".[2754] However, similar cases do not provide a legally binding benchmark for sentences. Although assistance can be drawn from previous decisions, such assistance is often limited, as each case contains a multitude of variables.[2755] In light of this, the Appeals Chamber has recognised that "[d]ifferences between cases are often more significant than similarities and different mitigating and aggravating circumstances might dictate different results".[2756]

1993. Pursuant to Article 23 of the Statute, and Rule 101 (B) of the Rules, the Chamber shall take into account the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda, any aggravating circumstances, any mitigating circumstances, and the extent to which the convicted person has already served any penalty imposed by a court of any State for the same act. These factors are not exhaustive.[2757]

in part, a protected group as such.[100] The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber's inferential approach was consistent with well established legal principles and amply supported by the evidence and factual findings in this case, including those connecting the Appellant to other perpetrators of the genocide.[101]

39. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber correctly recognized that genocide is a crime requiring "specific intent".[102] The Prosecution is required, under Article 2(2) of the Statute, to prove that the accused possessed the specific "intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group, as such".

40. The Tribunal's jurisprudence conclusively establishes that genocidal intent can be proven through inference from the facts and circumstances of a case. By its nature, intent is not usually susceptible to direct proof. Only the accused himself has first-hand knowledge of his own mental state, and he is unlikely to testify to his own genocidal intent. Intent thus must usually be inferred. Here, the Trial Chamber stated:

> It is possible to infer the genocidal intent inherent in a particular act charged from the perpetrator's deeds and utterances considered together, as well as from the general context of the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against that same group, notwithstanding that the said acts were committed by the same offender or by others. Other factors, such as the scale of atrocities committed, their general nature, in a region or a country, or furthermore, the fact of deliberately and systematically targeting victims on account of their membership in a particular group, while excluding members of other groups, can enable the Chamber to infer the genocidal intent of a particular act.[...] Evidence of genocidal intent can be inferred from "the physical targeting of the group or their property; the use of derogatory language toward members of the targeted group; the weapons employed and the extent of bodily injury; the methodical way of planning, the systematic manner of killing."[103]

41. This approach is consistent with the Appeals Chamber's previous holdings. For instance, the Rutaganda Appeal Judgement states:

> The Appeals Chamber concurs with the Appellant that in order to find a person guilty of genocide, it must be established that such a person was personally possessed of the specific intent to commit the crime at the time he did so. Nonetheless, as stated by the Appeals Chamber in Kayishema/Ruzindana, "explicit manifestations of criminal intent are [...] often rare in the context of criminal trials". In the absence of explicit, direct proof, the dolus specialis may therefore be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances. Such an approach prevents perpetrators from escaping convictions simply because such manifestations are absent.[104]

Specifically, relevant facts and circumstances could include "the general context, the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against the same group, the scale of atrocities committed, the systematic targeting of victims on account of their membership of a particular group, or the repetition of destructive and discriminatory acts."[105] The Appeals Chamber emphasizes that the inferential approach does not relieve the Prosecution of its burden to prove each element of its case, including genocidal intent, beyond reasonable doubt. Rather, it is simply a different means of satisfying that burden.

42. In this case, in support of its finding that the Appellant possessed the requisite genocidal intent, the Trial Chamber cited the Appellant's urging of the conseillers de secteur in his commune, at a meeting on 9 April 1994, "to incite the Hutu to kill the Tutsi"; the Appellant's similar statements made directly to the Hutu population on three separate occasions on 13 and 14 April 1994; his instigation of the rape of Tutsi women and girls on 17 April 1994; and his personal killing of a Tutsi named Murefu on 15 April 1994, which signalled "the beginning of the attack at Nyarubuye Parish".[106] The Trial Chamber also referred to its earlier findings of fact. For instance, it found that at the 9 April 1994 meeting, the Appellant instructed the conseillers to return to their secteurs and organize meetings at which they were to instruct the Hutu "to separate themselves from the Tutsi" and then "to kill all the Tutsi, so that the Inkotanyi would no longer have any accomplices."[107] It also found that on 14 April 1994, at Rwanteru commercial centre, the Appellant "addressed about one hundred people and incited them to arm themselves with machetes and to participate in the fight against the enemy, specifying that they had to hunt down all the Tutsi."[108] And it found that later that same day, at Gisenyi trading centre, the Appellant urged about forty people "to kill all the Tutsi and throw their bodies into the River Akagera."[109]

43. The Appellant raises certain challenges to these and other findings, which will be discussed below. But he submits no serious contention that the Trial Chamber's findings of fact, if valid, were nonetheless insufficient as a matter of law to support an inference of genocidal intent. The Appellant offers no reasonable alternative explanation for the above-described actions and utterances. His repeated exhortations to crowds of people that they should kill all the Tutsis, even considered apart from his other actions, leave room for no other reasonable inference.

44. The Appellant further argues that the Trial Chamber improperly relied on the "acts of other perpetrators" to prove the Appellant's genocidal intent without establishing a nexus between those finding.[165] Here, the Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that any inaccuracies in Witness TAW's account resulted from the fact that he was relying on what others had told him and did not fundamentally undermine his credibility. Notably, the witness was forthright in acknowledging the limits of his direct knowledge.[166]

71. The Appellant argues that Witness TAW is biased against the Appellant because he blames the Appellant for the death of his family members and the failure to protect his property.[167] The Trial Chamber declined to find that this allegation of bias affected the witness's credibility, citing his apparently truthful demeanour, and noting that he "refrained from exaggerating his account of events in order to hurt the Accused."[168] The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber's assessment of credibility is reasonable and defers to it. It bears noting that the mere fact that a witness or his family was a victim of an accused does not necessarily imply a bias that discredits that witness's testimony. This Tribunal, like criminal courts everywhere, routinely relies on the testimony of victims of crime, who, one would assume, are as motivated as anyone to see that justice is done with accuracy. It is for the trier of fact to determine whether a particular witness may have an incentive to distort the truth, and here the Appellant has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber's assessment was in error.

72. Finally, the Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber's reliance on Witness TAW in concluding, inter alia, that weapons were distributed was in error because the evidence was uncorroborated and circumstantial.[169] It is well established that a Trial Chamber has the discretion to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, witness testimony.[170] Moreover, it is also permissible to rely on circumstantial evidence to prove material facts.[171] The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence in this regard.

(b) Credibility of Witness TBH

73. In addition to the above-mentioned arguments concerning inconsistencies between the testimonies of Witnesses TAW and TBH, the Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber erred in crediting the testimony of Witness TBH. He maintains that the witness was personally biased because the Appellant had previously removed him from an official position. Furthermore, he evidence was to be assessed.[283] The Prosecution characterizes the alleged error as legal as well as factual, claiming that the Trial Chamber misunderstood the requirements for corroboration.[284]

115. It is well established that, as a matter of law, it is permissible to base a conviction on circumstantial evidence and/or hearsay evidence.[285] The Appeals Chamber recalls that, even if the law does not require evidence to be corroborated, a Trial Chamber, as the trier of fact, can decide that under particular circumstances corroboration is necessary.[286] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber made a factual finding specific to the evidence in this case: "the hearsay evidence of Witness TAS is insufficient, failing corroboration, to establish that the Accused ordered the murder of Marie and Béatrice."[287] Moreover, the Trial Chamber evidently did not ignore the evidence alleged by the Prosecution as corroborative of Witness TAS's hearsay evidence; it relied on this evidence to convict the Appellant of genocide and extermination.[288] Although the Trial Chamber did not specifically discuss this evidence in the context of the murder count, it was not obligated to set forth every step of its reasoning or to cite every piece of evidence that it considered.[289]

116. Moreover, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude -- taking into account the hearsay testimony of Witness TAS as well as the circumstantial evidence -- that it was not established beyond reasonable doubt that the Appellant ordered the murders of Marie and Béatrice. The Appellant's involvement in various aspects of the genocidal campaign might reasonably be taken as support for the credibility of the hearsay testimony that he ordered these particular murders, as might the fact that he expelled Marie and Béatrice with little regard for the obvious danger to their lives. But none of this evidence provides such unambiguous proof that he issued such an order that a reasonable Trial Chamber would have had to convict him on that basis.

117. This sub-ground of appeal is dismissed.

2. Alleged Failure to Consider Other Modes of Liability

118. As an alternative to its ordering theory, the Prosecution argues that the Appellant should have been convicted for aiding and abetting the murders of Marie and Béatrice.[290] It maintains that the Trial Chamber's findings that the Appellant expelled his tenants in full knowledge of the risk

II. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

7. The Appeals Chamber recalls the applicable standards of appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber reviews only errors of law which have the potential to invalidate the decision of the trial chamber and errors of fact which have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[12]

8. Regarding errors of law, the Appeals Chamber has stated:

> Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[13]

9. Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, it will articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the trial chamber accordingly.[14] In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but, when necessary, also applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the appellant before that finding may be confirmed on appeal.[15]

10. Regarding errors of fact, it is well established that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by a trial chamber:

> Where the Defence alleges an erroneous finding of fact, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial, and it will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. Furthermore, the erroneous finding will be revoked or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[16]

11. A party cannot merely repeat on appeal arguments that did not succeed at trial, unless it can demonstrate that the trial chamber's rejection of those arguments constituted an error warranting the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[17] Arguments which do not have the potential to cause the impugned decision to be reversed or revised may be immediately dismissed by the Appeals Chamber and need not be considered on the merits.[18]

12. In order for the Appeals Chamber to assess arguments on appeal, the appealing party must provide precise references to relevant transcript pages or paragraphs in the decision or judgement to which the challenge is made.[19] Moreover, the Appeals Chamber cannot be expected to consider a party's submissions in detail if they are obscure, contradictory, vague, or suffer from other formal and obvious insufficiencies.[20] Finally, the Appeals Chamber has inherent discretion in selecting which submissions merit a detailed reasoned opinion in writing, and it will dismiss arguments which are evidently unfounded without providing detailed reasoning.[21] provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other.[630]

260. The Appeals Chamber recalls that genocide and conspiracy to commit genocide are distinct crimes under Articles 2(3)(a) and 2(3)(b) of the Statute. As the Trial Chamber correctly observed, the crime of genocide has a materially distinct actus reus from the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide and both crimes are based on different underlying conduct.[631] The crime of genocide requires the commission of one of the enumerated acts in Article 2(2) of the Statute,[632] while the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide requires the act of entering into an agreement to commit genocide.[633] The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not err in concluding that the crimes are distinct and that the conduct underlying each crime is not the same.

261. The Appeals Chamber now turns to address the Prosecution's contention that the Trial Chamber erred in exercising its discretion not to enter a conviction for conspiracy to commit genocide.[634] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber considers that a trial chamber is bound to enter convictions for all distinct crimes which have been proven in order to fully reflect the criminality of the convicted person.[635] Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber finds, Judge Agius dissenting, that by convicting Gatete only of genocide while he was also found criminally responsible for conspiracy to commit genocide, the Trial Chamber failed to hold him responsible for the totality of his criminal conduct, which included entering into the unlawful agreement to commit genocide.

262. Turning to Gatete's reliance on the inchoate nature of the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide in support of his contention that the Trial Chamber was correct in following the approach adopted by the Popović et al. and Musema trial chambers,[636] the Appeals Chamber finds, Judge to be the appropriate sentence for the direct participation, except for the rapes of three persons, in genocide, murder and rape as crimes against humanity, and murder and rape as serious violations of Article 3 Common to the Geneva Conventions, at four massacre sites.[1322] Renzaho was the Préfet of Kigali-Ville and a colonel in the Rwandan Army and therefore was clearly an important and influential authority of the Rwandan government.[1323] In Seromba, the Appeals Chamber decided to increase the sentence handed down in the first trial from 15 years to life imprisonment after having granted one count of the Prosecution's appeal regarding the destruction of a church where 1,500 refugees died or were seriously injured. This act was considered in appeal as a crime of genocide and not only as constituting the crime of extermination. He was therefore convicted of both genocide and extermination for his role in the destruction of the church. Given the extraordinary gravity of the crimes, the Appeals Chamber therefore imposed on the Accused a sentence of imprisonment for the remainder of his life.[1324] In Gacumbitsi, the Appeals Chamber also increased the Accused's previous conviction of 30 years to life imprisonment. In reaching its conclusion, the Appeals Chamber noted that Gacumbitsi played a central role in planning, instigating, ordering, committing, and aiding and abetting genocide and extermination in his Commune of Rusumo, where thousands of Tutsis were killed or seriously harmed.[1325]

3.2 Individual, Aggravating and Mitigating Factors

740. The Chamber has wide discretion in determining what constitutes mitigating and aggravating circumstances and the weight to be accorded thereto. Whilst aggravating circumstances need to be proved beyond reasonable doubt, mitigating circumstances need only be established on a balance of probabilities.[1326] Any particular circumstance that is included as an element of the crime for which the Accused is convicted will not also be considered as an aggravating factor.[1327]

741. The Prosecution submits that the aggravating factors against Hategekimana include: his position; his premeditation; his direct participation as a perpetrator; the violent and humiliating nature of his acts and the vulnerability of his victims; and the duration of the offences and suffering of his victims.[1328] The Chamber notes that it is well established in the ICTR and ICTY's jurisprudence that the manner in which the accused exercised his command or the abuse of an accused's personal position in the community may be considered as an aggravating factor.[1329]

742. The Appeals Chamber has held that an accused's abuse of his superior position or influence may be considered as an aggravating factor.[1330] The Chamber notes Hategekimana's position as the de jure and de facto Commander of the Ngoma Camp. The influence he derived from his position and his local status made it likely that others would follow his example, which is an aggravating factor.[1331]

XXIII. SENTENCING

289. The Appeals Chamber recalls that at trial, the Appellant was convicted for genocide (Count 2); direct and public incitement to commit genocide (Count 4); and extermination as a crime against humanity (Count 6).[584] The Trial Chamber sentenced the Appellant to imprisonment for the remainder of his life for Count 2 as well as Count 6, and to imprisonment for fifteen years for his conviction on Count 4, with all three sentences to run concurrently.[585] The Trial Chamber then reduced the Appellant's fifteen-year sentence under Count 4 by five years, five months and twenty-five days as credit for time served pursuant to Rule 101(D) of the Rules.[586]

290. The combined effect of Article 23 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules is inter alia that,[587] in imposing a sentence, the Trial Chamber shall consider the following factors: (i) the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda; (ii) the gravity of the offences or totality of the conduct;[588] (iii) the individual circumstances of the accused, including aggravating and mitigating circumstances; and (iv) the extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served.[589] The Appeals Chamber recalls, however, that the factors to be taken into account by the Trial Chamber at sentencing as listed in these provisions are by no means exhaustive.[590] Finally, it shall credit the accused for any time spent in detention pending transfer to the Tribunal, trial, or appeal.

291. The Appeals Chamber further recalls that under Article 24 of the Statute, its review of the Trial Chamber's determination of a sentence on appeal is of a corrective nature only rather than a de novo sentencing proceeding. The role of the Appeals Chamber is limited to correcting errors of law invalidating a decision and errors of fact that have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[591] When determining a sentence, a Trial Chamber has considerable, though not unlimited, discretion on account of its obligation to individualize penalties to fit the individual circumstances of an accused and to reflect the gravity of the crimes for which the accused has been convicted.[592] Consequently, as a general rule, the Appeals Chamber will not substitute a sentence for that of a Trial Chamber, unless "it believes that the Trial Chamber has committed an error in exercising its discretion, or has failed to follow applicable law."[593] The appellant in principle bears the burden of demonstrating that there has been a discernible error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion by showing that "(a) the Trial Chamber either took into account what it ought not to have, or failed to take into account what it ought to have taken into account in the weighing process involved in the exercise of its discretion; and (b) if it did, that this resulted in a miscarriage of justice."[594] As long as the Trial Chamber has observed the proper limits of the discretionary framework afforded to it at sentencing without committing any discernible errors, the Appeals Chamber will not intervene.[595]

A. Appeal against the Sentence (Ground of Appeal 25)

292. The Appellant argues under Ground of Appeal 25 that the Trial Chamber erred in sentencing him to imprisonment for life because it failed to accept, as a mitigating factor,[596] all of the evidence proffered by the Appellant in support of his contention that he saved the lives of Tutsis.[597] Consequently, the Appellant requests the Appeals Chamber to quash his sentence and to substitute the sentence with a determinate one.[598]

293. Specifically, the Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber erred in making the following findings[599] when considering his alleged mitigating circumstances:

(i) that the allegation that the Appellant saved Tutsis prior to 1 January 1994 may not be considered as a mitigating circumstance;

[596] The Appeals Chamber notes that in his Amended Notice of Appeal, at paras. 139, 140, the Appellant raised two additional sub-grounds of appeal under this ground with respect to alleged errors by the Trial Chamber in giving weight to the following aggravating factors at sentencing: 1) that the Appellant directed and participated in the killings in various locations in Ruhengeri Prefecture; and 2) that the Appellant used his considerable influence to bring people together to commit massacres and acted as a bridge between military and civilian spheres to for the purpose of attacking and massacring Tutsi civilians. However, the Appellant failed to raise these alleged errors again in his Brief, Brief in Reply or at the Appeal Hearing, or to develop any specific arguments or cite to any authorities in support of his contention that the Trial Chamber committed error in this regard. Thus, the Appeals Chamber declines to consider these sub-grounds, finding that the Appellant's right to appeal as to them is waived. See Kayishema and Ruzindana Appeal Judgement, para. 46.

inflammatory speech would have offered tacit approval of its message. The basis of Kalimanzira's conviction, however, rests on the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Kalimanzira's tacit approval not only sanctioned Ndayambaje's message, but in fact substantially contributed to killings which occurred after the ceremony.[203]

76. As the Trial Chamber noted, Witnesses BBB and BCA attest to killings occurring after the meeting.[204] Their accounts regarding these crimes are vague and devoid of any detail. In particular, the extent of Witness BBB's description of the killings is that "after the speech, people went to sweep their houses, that is to say, to kill those persons."[205] Witness BCA's account is similarly brief: "As was noticed later on, it meant that [Tutsis and Hutus who opposed the government] who had been hidden had to be taken out of their hiding so that they should be killed as well."[206]

77. The Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, considers that it is unclear from either account whether the witnesses had first-hand knowledge of the killings or whether their evidence was hearsay. They refer to no particular incident, provide no approximate time-frame for the killings, and do not give any identifying information concerning the assailants or victims. In such circumstances, the Appeals Chamber finds, Judge Pocar dissenting, that it is impossible to determine with any reasonable certainty whether any killings in fact occurred following the meeting and, if so, the degree to which they were related to the ceremony.

78. In the Muvunyi case, the Appeals Chamber reversed a conviction for genocide because the evidence of the killings which underpinned the finding of guilt were based on second- or third-hand testimony that "contain[ed] no detail on any specific incident or the frequency of the attacks."[207] The Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, can identify no material distinction between the quality of the evidence in the Muvunyi case and that provided by Witnesses BBB and BCA here with respect to the occurrence of killings.

79. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, is not persuaded that the Trial Chamber acted reasonably in relying on the evidence of Witnesses BBB and BCA about the subsequent killings. No reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that Tutsis were killed as a result of the ceremony in circumstances where it heard no evidence about even a single incident. Therefore, the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that the evidence showed that Kalimanzira's presence at the inauguration substantially contributed to subsequent acts of genocide. As a result, the Appeals Chamber need not address Kalimanzira's other arguments under this ground of appeal.

80. For the forgoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, grants Kalimanzira's Fifth Ground of Appeal and reverses his conviction for aiding and abetting genocide based on this event.

perpetrators' criminal plan.[227] Kalimanzira also asserts that the Trial Chamber erred in discussing his mens rea for genocide in a separate section of the Trial Judgement applicable to all relevant counts of the Indictment.[228] He asserts that this section improperly analyzes multiple separate incidents and also focuses only on genocidal intent, rather than the specific mens rea required for aiding and abetting.[229]

86. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an "aider and abettor commitFsğ acts specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, or lending moral support for the perpetration of a specific crime, and that this support ha[s] a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[230] Whether a particular contribution qualifies as "substantial" is a "fact-based inquiry"; such assistance need not "serve as condition precedent for the commission of the crime."[231] With regard to the mens rea required for aiding and abetting, the Appeals Chamber has held that "Ftğhe requisite mental element Ғ...ğ is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator."[232] Specific intent crimes such as genocide require that "the aider and abettor must know of the principal perpetrator's specific intent."[233]

87. Kalimanzira's contention that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he made a substantial contribution to the killings at Kabuye hill is not convincing. The Trial Chamber reasonably concluded that he substantially contributed to the massacre by encouraging Tutsis to seek refuge at Kabuye hill and by providing armed reinforcements to those trying to kill the Tutsis there. Kalimanzira's assertion that he did not substantially aid the assault on Kabuye hill rests on his claim that no credible witnesses who were also principal perpetrators placed him there.[234] However, this claim does not take into account the evidence provided by Tutsi survivors of the attacks. It was on the basis of their testimonies that the Trial Chamber placed him at Kabuye hill on 23 April 1994.[235] The Appeals Chamber recalls that it is not necessary for a principal perpetrator to be aware of the aider and abettor's contribution.[236] It further recalls the Trial Chamber's finding that the attacks at Kabuye hill involved a large number of individuals over a broad terrain and long period of time.[237] In this context, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that Kalimanzira provided influenced by the Prosecution's practice of having its witnesses identify him from the witness stand and thus did not discuss identification evidence in the Trial Judgment.[253] Kalimanzira also provides specific analysis of the identification evidence provided by Witnesses BBO, BCF, BDC, BWK, and BWO in their testimony.[254] Kalimanzira focuses especially on Witness BWK, noting that she testified to meeting him only once prior to 23 April 1994, when he was identified by a third party. Kalimanzira also observes that she again required assistance in order to identify him on 23 April 1994.[255]

95. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber gave careful consideration to the testimony of survivor witnesses for both the Prosecution and the Defence. It contends that differences in the Trial Chamber's description of these witnesses did not amount to an error.[256] It also suggests that the Trial Chamber appropriately chose to accept aspects of the Defence witnesses' testimony without finding that it undermined the testimony of Prosecution witnesses.[257] The Prosecution further contends that the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in not specifically discussing the identification evidence of certain witnesses. The Prosecution asserts that there were no difficult circumstances with regard to identification that would require a more rigorously reasoned opinion on this issue.[258] With regard to Witness BWK, it notes that she provided "detailed evidence" regarding her first encounter with Kalimanzira, and notes that her meeting with him on 23 April 1994 "must have been clearly memorable to her."[259]

96. The Appeals Chamber recalls that in assessing witness testimony, "it falls to the Trial Chamber to take the approach it considers most appropriate for the assessment of evidence."[260] A trial chamber "is F...ğ not obliged in its judgement to recount and justify its findings in relation to every submission made at trial."[261] In addition, "neither the Rules nor the jurisprudence of the Tribunal obligeFğ [a] Trial Chamber to require a particular type of identification evidence."[262] However, identifications made in difficult circumstances, such as darkness, obstructed view, or traumatic events,[263] require careful and cautious analysis by a trial chamber.[264] In addition, in-court identification evidence should be assigned "little or no credence" given the signals that can identify an accused aside from prior acquaintance.[265] The Appeals Chamber further recalls that "Fağ Trial Chamber has the discretion to cautiously consider hearsay evidence and has the discretion to rely on it."[266] However, "the weight and probative value to be afforded to that evidence will usually be less than that accorded to the evidence of a witness who has given it under oath and who has been cross-examined."[267]

97. Kalimanzira provides no relevant evidence or analysis to support his contention that the Trial Chamber inappropriately excused weaknesses in Prosecution witnesses' testimony on the basis of their past suffering. The Appeals Chamber also finds that the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in accepting Defence witnesses' testimony regarding events at Gisagara marketplace and Kabuye hill, while also concluding that their failure to see Kalimanzira did not preclude his presence at these locations. Large numbers of individuals were involved in these two events, and the Trial Chamber's conclusions regarding Kabuye hill – that "no witness alone could amply describe everything that transpired or identify everyone who was present" – applies to the events at Gisagara marketplace with equal force.[268]

98. The Appeals Chamber notes that Kalimanzira points to no evidence and provides no analysis in relation to his assertion that identifications occurred under difficult circumstances. Therefore, this contention is summarily dismissed. The Appeals Chamber further notes that Kalimanzira appears to contradict himself by claiming that the in-court identification by Prosecution witnesses led the Trial Chamber to ignore the issue of identification evidence, while at the same time referring to Trial Chamber analysis of such identification evidence relating to Witnesses BBO and BWO.[269] In any event, the evaluation in the Trial Judgement of individual witness testimonies demonstrates that, for the most part, the Trial Chamber reasonably discussed identification evidence when this was relevant to assessing a witness's credibility. Thus, analysis of identification evidence was reasonably used both to explain the Trial Chamber's caution in accepting Witness BBO's evidence, and to help justify the finding that Witness BWO was credible. The absence of any analysis of identification evidence with respect to Witnesses BDC and BCF from the Trial Judgement is also reasonable. Both testified that they had seen Kalimanzira more

A. Procedural Background

109. It is thus apparent that it is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to impose either a single sentence or multiple sentences for convictions on multiple counts. However, the question arises, in what circumstances is it appropriate for a Chamber to exercise its discretion to impose a single sentence.

110. On this point, the Appeals Chamber notes that with respect to the particular circumstances of the Blaškić case, ICTY Trial Chamber I stated that > the crimes ascribed to the accused have been characterised in several distinct ways but form part of a single set of crimes committed in a given geographic region during a relatively extended time-span ... In light of this overall consistency, the Trial Chamber finds that there is reason to impose a single sentence for all the crimes of which the accused has been found guilty.

This followed similar reasoning in the Jelisić case.[125]

111. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the approach adopted in the Blaškić case: where the crimes ascribed to an accused, regardless of their characterisation, form part of a single set of crimes committed in a given geographic region during a specific time period, it is appropriate for a single sentence to be imposed for all convictions, if the Trial Chamber so decides. The issue is whether this case falls within such parameters.

112. The Appellant pleaded guilty to six counts under Article 2 (Genocide) and Article 3 (Crimes against humanity) of the Statute, for which he was subsequently convicted. These acts were carried out in Rwanda during a specific time period (1994) and formed part of a single set of crimes related to the widespread and systematic attack against the Tutsi civilian population of Rwanda, the purpose of which was to kill them. The Appeals Chamber finds that this was therefore a case in which it was appropriate to impose a single sentence for the multiple convictions.

113. Finding no merit in the Appellant's arguments, the Appeals Chamber dismisses this ground of appeal.

C. Fourth, Fifth, Seventh and Eighth Grounds of Appeal

114. The main issue raised by the Appellant in the fourth, fifth, seventh and eighth grounds of appeal is that the Trial Chamber erred in law in failing to properly take certain mitigating circumstances into account. As a result the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber was excessive. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to consider that his plea of guilty as a mitigating factor carries a discount in sentence; failing to take into account both his personal circumstances and his substantial co-operation with the Prosecutor (both in the past and in the future[126]); and failing to take into account the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda in the determination of sentence. In addition, he submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law and on the facts in taking into account the non-explanation of the Appellant when asked if he had anything to say himself in mitigation before sentence.

115. For the Appellant's appeal to succeed on these grounds, he must show that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion, so invalidating the sentence. The sentence must be shown to be outside the discretionary framework provided by the Statute and the Rules.

116. The Appeals Chamber notes that a Trial Chamber is required as a matter of law, under both the Statute and the Rules, to take account of mitigating circumstances and the general practice regarding prison sentences in Rwanda. Therefore if it fails to do so, it commits an error of law. Article 23 provides inter alia, that "[i]n determining the terms of imprisonment, the Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda"[127] and that in imposing sentence it "should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person."[128] Rule 101(B) provides:

> In determining the sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 23(2) of the Statute, as well as such factors as:
> (i) Any aggravating circumstances;
>
> (ii) Any mitigating circumstances including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction;
>
> (iii) The general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda:
> (iv) The extent to which any penalty imposed by a court of any State on the convicted person for the same act has already been served, as referred to in Article 9 (3) of the Statute.

117. Rule 101(B) is expressed in the imperative in that the Trial Chamber "shall take into account" the factors listed and therefore if it does not, it will commit an error of law. Whether or not this would invalidate the decision is of course another question.

118. In the Judgement the Trial Chamber considered both the Appellant's guilty plea on each count on the indictment, together with the Plea Agreement,[129] wherein the Appellant made full admissions of all the relevant facts alleged in the indictment and his involvement as Prime Minister. He "acknowledge[d] that...he as Prime Minister, instigated, aided and abetted the Prefets, Bourgmestres, and members of the population to commit massacres and killings of civilians, in particular Tutsi and moderate Hutu."[130] The Trial Chamber noted the gravity of the crimes in question and found as an aggravating factor the fact that the Appellant abused his position of authority and trust of the civilian population when he, as Prime Minister, was responsible for maintaining peace and security.[131] It considered the factors put forward by the Appellant in mitigation: plea of guilty; remorse, which the Appellant claimed was evident from the act of pleading guilty; and cooperation with the Prosecutor.[132] Nevertheless, it found that the Appellant had "offered no explanation for his voluntary participation in the genocide; nor [had] he expressed contrition, regret or sympathy for the victims in Rwanda, even when given the opportunity to do so by the Chamber, during the [pre-sentencing] hearing of 3 September 1998."[133]

119. Weighing up the submissions of both parties, in particular regarding the Appellant's past and future cooperation with the Prosecutor, the fact that the guilty plea would encourage others to come forward and recognize their responsibilities and that it was in itself a mitigating circumstance, the Trial Chamber nevertheless determined that, in view of the "intrinsic gravity" of the crimes and the Appellant's position of authority,[134] "the aggravating circumstances surrounding the crimes...negate the mitigating circumstances, especially since [the Appellant] occupied a high ministerial post, at the time he committed the said crimes."[135] The Appellant was therefore sentenced "à la peine d'emprisonnement à vie," (translated in the English text, as "life imprisonment").[136]

120. The Judgement illustrates that the Trial Chamber clearly considered the mitigating factors put forward by both the Appellant and the Prosecutor, the principle that a guilty plea as part of this mitigation carries with it a reduction in sentence and the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda. The Trial Chamber acknowledged that the Prosecutor had asked the Trial Chamber "to regard as a significant mitigating factor, not only the substantial co-operation so far extended, but also the future co-operation..." of the Appellant.[137] It noted the early guilty plea of the Appellant and the fact that both the Appellant and the Prosecutor > urged the Chamber to interpret [the Appellant's] guilty pleas as a signal of his remorse, repentance and acceptance of responsibility for his actions. The Chamber is mindful that remorse is not the only reasonable inference that can be drawn from a guilty plea; nevertheless it accepts that most national jurisdictions consider admissions of guilt as matters properly to be considered in mitigation of punishment.[138]

121. In addition, with regard to consideration of the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda, the Trial Chamber analysed this issue at some length in paragraphs 18-25 and having reviewed the scale of sentences applicable in Rwanda, properly concluded that "the reference to this practice can be used for guidance, but is not binding."[139]

122. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the Trial Chamber clearly considered each of the above factors put forward by the Appellant in mitigation in reaching its decision and as required in the Statute and Rules and therefore to this extent did not commit an error of law.

123. However, the second question is whether the Trial Chamber properly took these factors into account. This turns on the question of the weight attached by the Trial Chamber to the mitigating factors. As the Prosecutor submits, "the Appellant's Brief does not appear to argue that the Trial Chamber failed to recognize this as a mitigating circumstance, but rather, that the Trial Chamber failed to give this mitigating circumstance sufficient weight."[140]

124. The weight to be attached to mitigating circumstances is a matter of discretion for the Trial Chamber and unless the Appellant succeeds in showing that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion, resulting in a sentence outside the discretionary framework provided by the Statute and the Rules, these grounds of appeal will fail.

125. The Appeals Chamber notes that the crimes for which the Appellant was convicted were of the most serious nature. A sentence imposed should reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct. The Appeals Chamber of the ICTY has observed that "[c]onsideration of the gravity of the conduct of the accused is normally the starting point for consideration of an appropriate sentence."[141] In sentencing the Appellant, the Trial Chamber found that

(v) the crimes for which Jean Kambanda is responsible carry an intrinsic gravity, and their widespread, atrocious and systematic character is particularly shocking to the human conscience;

(vi) Jean Kambanda committed the crimes knowingly and with premeditation;

(vii) and, moreover, Jean Kambanda, as Prime Minister of Rwanda was entrusted with the duty and authority to protect the population and he abused this trust.[142]

126. In this case, the Trial Chamber balanced the mitigating factors against the aggravating factors and concluded that "the aggravating circumstances surrounding the crimes negate the mitigating circumstances[143][144] The Appeals Chamber considers that this sentence falls within the discretionary framework provided by the Statute and the Rules, and so sees no reason to disturb the decision of the Trial Chamber.

Considering that the exceptional situation facing the country requires the adoption of adequate measures to meet the need of the Rwandan people for justice."

28. That said, it is clear that the penalties imposed on accused persons found guilty by the Tribunal must be directed, on the one hand, at retribution of the said accused, who must see their crimes punished, and over and above that, on other hand, at deterrence, namely dissuading for good those who will attempt in future to perpetrate such atrocities by showing them that the international community was not ready to tolerate the serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights.

29. The Chamber recalls, however, that in the determination of sentences, it is required by Article 23 (2) of the Statute and Rule 101 (B) of the Rules to take into account a number of factors including the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the accused, the existence of any aggravating or mitigating circumstances, including the substantial co-operation by the accused with the Prosecutor before or after his conviction. It is a matter, as it were, of individualising the penalty, for it is true that "among the joint perpetrators of an offence or among the persons guilty of the same type of offence, there is only one common element: the target offence which they committed with its inherent gravity. Apart from this common trait, there are, of necessity, fundamental differences in their respective personalities and responsibilities : their age, their background, their education, their intelligence, their mental structure....It is not true that they are a priori subject to the same intensity of punishment "[unofficial translation] [9]

30. Clearly, however, as far as the individualisation of penalties is concerned, the judges of the Chamber cannot limit themselves to the factors mentioned in the Statute and the Rules. Here again, their unfettered discretion to evaluate the facts and attendant circumstances should enable them to take into account any other factor that they deem pertinent.

31. Similarly, the factors at issue in the Statute and in the Rules cannot be interpreted as having to be mandatorily cumulative in the determination of the sentence.

[9] Merle and Virtu - Trait de Droit Criminal, Editions Culpas, paragraph 66, pages 115 and 116

32. Recalling these factors, the Chamber would like to emphasise three of them, in particular. These are the aggravating circumstances, individual circumstances of Jean Kambanda[10] (Article 23 (2) of the Statute) and the mitigating circumstances.

33. Regarding the aggravating circumstances, it will be noted that the gravity of crimes such as genocide and crimes against humanity which are particularly revolting to the collective conscience alone, is enough to merit lengthy elaboration. The Chamber will, however, come back to it when weighing the aggravating factors against the mitigating factor or factors in favour of the accused for the determination of the sentence.

34. As far as the "individual circumstances of Jean Kambanda" are concerned, the individualisation of the sentence, as the expression itself seems to suggest, is not possible unless facts about his "personality" are known, including his background, his behaviour before, during and after the offence, his motives for the offence and demonstration of remorse thereafter.

35. With regard to the mitigating circumstances, Article 6 (4) of the Statute states that the fact that an accused person acted pursuant to an order of a Government or of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the Tribunal determines that justice so requires. The problem should not arise in the instant case, since the accused was the Prime Minister. For its part, Rule 101 (B) (ii) of the Rules, as mentioned earlier stipulates as mitigating circumstances " the substantial co-operation by the convicted person with Prosecutor before or after the conviction." In this regard, when determining the sentence for Jean Kambanda, the Chamber will have to assess the extent of the co-operation by the accused referred to by the Prosecutor in the documents under seal entitled "Agreement on a guilty plea.", signed by herself, the accused and his counsel.

[10] The term "the accused" should rather be used since you do not pass sentence on a convicted person.

59. The Chamber recalls as aforementioned that the Tribunal was established at the request of the government of Rwanda; and the Tribunal was intended to enforce individual criminal accountability on behalf of the international community, contribute in ensuring the effective redress of violence and the culture of impunity, and foster national reconciliation and peace in Rwanda. (Preamble, Security Council resolution 955(1994)).

60. In her submissions, although the Prosecutor sought a term of life imprisonment for Jean Kambanda, she requested that the Tribunal, in the determination of the sentence, take into consideration the guilty plea and the cooperation of Jean Kambanda with her office. The Defence Counsel in his submissions emphasised that Jean Kambanda was only a puppet controlled by certain military authorities and that his power was consequently limited. He thus submitted that the Tribunal, taking into account the guilty plea, Jean Kambanda's cooperation and willingness to continue cooperating with the Prosecutor, and the role Jean Kambanda could play in the process of national reconciliation in Rwanda, sentence him for a term of imprisonment not exceeding two years.

61. The Chamber has examined all the submissions presented by the Parties pertaining to the determination of sentence, from which it can be inferred:

(A) (i) Jean Kambanda has cooperated and is still willingly cooperating with the Office of the Prosecutor;

(ii) the guilty plea of Jean Kambanda is likely to encourage other individuals to recognize their responsibilities during the tragic events which occurred in Rwanda in 1994;

(iii) a guilty plea is generally considered, in most national jurisdictions, including Rwanda, as a mitigating circumstance;

(B) but that, however:

(v) the crimes for which Jean Kambanda is responsible carry an intrinsic gravity, and their widespread, atrocious and systematic character is particularly shocking to the human conscience;

(vi) Jean Kambanda committed the crimes knowingly and with premeditation;

(vii) and, moreover, Jean Kambanda, as Prime Minister of Rwanda was entrusted with the duty and authority to protect the population and he abused this trust.

62. On the basis of all of the above, the Chamber is of the opinion that the aggravating circumstances surrounding the crimes committed by Jean Kambanda negate the mitigating circumstances, especially since Jean Kambanda occupied a high ministerial post, at the time he committed the said crimes.

A. The Appellant's High Position as an Aggravating Circumstance

346. The Appellant argues that the Trial Chamber failed to provide a reasoned opinion in support of its conclusion that the high position he held as a civil servant was an aggravating circumstance.[761]

347. The Trial Chamber, in the part of the Trial Judgement dealing with the aggravating circumstances, indeed found that the Appellant's "high position [...] as a civil servant can be considered as an aggravating factor".[762] The high position of an accused has previously been considered as an aggravating factor both before the ICTR and the ICTY. In Kambanda, for example, the Appeals Chamber found the fact that "Jean Kambanda, as Prime Minister of Rwanda was entrusted with the duty and authority to protect the population and he abused this trust", to constitute an aggravating circumstance.[763] In Aleksovski, the ICTY Appeals Chamber maintained that the Appellant's "superior responsibility as a warden seriously aggravated the Appellant's offences, [and that] instead of preventing it, he involved himself in violence against those whom he should have been protecting...."[764] The Appeals Chamber in Kayishema and Ruzindana further clarified that a position of authority by itself does not amount to an aggravating factor, but that the "the manner in which an accused exercises his command"[765] can justify a finding of a high position of authority as an aggravating circumstance. More recently, in Ntakirutimana, the Appeals Chamber affirmed the Trial Chamber's holding that the abuse of the Appellant's personal position in the community to commit the crimes was an aggravating circumstance.[766]

348. In light of the above and contrary to the Appellant's submissions, the Appeals Chamber does not find that the finding of the Trial Chamber that his high position is an aggravating circumstance "lacks merit".[767] Further, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that there is anything "disturbing"[768] or otherwise inadequate in the Trial Chamber's reasoning and does not find any element that would indicate that the Appellant was sentenced to life imprisonment solely on the basis of this aggravating factor.[769]

349. For the foregoing reasons, this part of the Appellant's ground of appeal is dismissed.

B. National Reconciliation and Restoration of Peace

350. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber, while it stated that it was "mindful" of the aims of the United Nations Security Council in creating the Tribunal, including national reconciliation and restoration of peace, as expressed in Resolution 955,[770] nevertheless sentenced him to life imprisonment, "notwithstanding the Dissenting Opinion of Judge Maqutu, according to which the Accused should not have been given the heaviest sentence, precisely because the wisdom derived from his severe experience could benefit the aim of national reconciliation".[771] In his view, the Trial Chamber "ostentatiously first outlined the rules it purported to have applied. However, it did not apply those rules."[772] In support of this assertion, the Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber "gave no explanation whatsoever as to what extent [...] the sentence it imposed would help restore peace and national reconciliation".[773] The Prosecution responds that "[i]t is unclear from the Appellant's argument how the Trial Chamber failed to assess this subject properly, or how a reconsideration of it would lead to the sentences being reduced to the level the Appellant now seeks",[774] and therefore argues that this submission must fail.[775]

351. The Appeals Chamber first notes that while national reconciliation and the restoration and maintenance of peace are important goals of sentencing, they are not the only goals. Indeed, the Trial Chamber correctly referred to "deterrence, justice, reconciliation, and the restoration and maintenance of peace" as being among the goals consistent with Security Council Resolution 955 of 8 November 1994[776] which set up the Tribunal.[777] These goals cannot be separated but are intertwined, and, in any case, nothing in Resolution 955 indicates that the Security Council intended that one should prevail over another. The Appellant contends that sentencing him to life imprisonment would deprive "both his fellow Rwandans and their country of what they could learn from him upon his release"[778] and therefore not serve the goal of national reconciliation. The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded by this argument. The Trial Chamber was free to conclude that any advantage in terms of national reconciliation gained by the Appellant's eventual release was either minimal or was outweighed by the harms to both general deterrence and national reconciliation that would be created by a lenient sentence that was not perceived to reflect the gravity of the crimes committed. Moreover, too lenient a sentence might also undermine other fundamental principles of sentencing, in particular proportionality,[779] by giving the impression that the punishment does not reflect the gravity of the crimes committed. In any case, it is not a matter – as the Appellant contends – of "the triumph of the law over the barbarous acts that were committed"[780] or of whether or not "sentencing [him] to life imprisonment [would] contribute, even momentarily, to the restoration of peace or national reconciliation, which is one of the Tribunal's goals".[781] It is settled case law before both the ICTR and the ICTY that the underlying principle is that Trial Chambers must tailor the penalty to fit the individual circumstances of the accused and the gravity of the crime.[782] The Appellant has neither demonstrated that the Trial Chamber committed any error in its assessment of the goals behind the creation of the Tribunal, nor that the Trial Chamber improperly exercised its discretion in determining the appropriate sentence.

352. For the foregoing reasons, this part of the Appellant's fifteenth ground of appeal is dismissed.

C. The Appellant's "Individual Circumstances"

353. The Appellant argues under this part of his ground of appeal that the Trial Chamber failed to fulfil its obligation, pursuant to Article 23(2) of the Statute, to take into account his "individual circumstances".[783] He points out, for example, that he is "relatively young in age" and is "the father of four young children".[784] The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber did consider the Appellant's personal circumstances at paragraphs 756 to 758 of the Trial Judgement and, in

174. The witness[246] testified that at a meeting in January 1992, the Provisional National Committee was introduced to party members and Jean-Pierre Turatsinze. Turatsinze was the Interahamwe coordinator in the sense that he was the liaison between the Interahamwe and the MRND. At a meeting of the Kigali-Ville préfecture committee in the same month, Ngirumpatse told everyone that the Interahamwe were to be set up throughout the country. At a meeting a week or two later, he stated that the Interahamwe had been formed and that leaders had been appointed.[247]

Prosecution Witness G

175. The witness was a high-ranking member of the Interahamwe.[248] He received extensive benefits, financial and otherwise, from the Prosecution in exchange for his testimony.[249]

176. Ngirumpatse played a role in the establishment of the Interahamwe in Kigali-ville and on one occasion even attended a meeting regarding the establishment of the Interahamwe, which he encouraged.[250] At one point, the MRND leadership requested that Interahamwe be recruited from the ranks of the unemployed.[251]

177. The witness agreed with the content of the transcript of Ngirumpatse's speech in Ruhengeri on 15 November 1992, which states that Ngirumpatse referred to the Interahamwe and asked them to recruit sharp members who were committed to the party throughout the country.[252]

Prosecution Witness T

178. The witness was a high-ranking member of the Interahamwe.[253] At the time of his testimony, he had pleaded guilty to genocide charges in Belgium and was cooperating with the Belgian authorities.[254] He received extensive benefits, financial and otherwise, from the Prosecution in exchange for his testimony.[255]

179. In January 1992, Ngirumpatse asked members of the Provisional National Committee of the Interahamwe to reflect on the implementation of the Interahamwe considering the evidence in the context of the other evidence brought in the Karemera et al. case.[32] He argues that depriving an accused of the right to use evidence from the original trial as part of his rebuttal of adjudicated facts undermines the reason that taking judicial notice is permitted in the first place, which is that the accused is free to rebut the adjudicated fact.[33]

D. Discussion

13. The Appeals Chamber recalls that facts judicially noticed pursuant to Rule 94(B) of the Rules are merely presumptions that may be rebutted with evidence at trial.[34] The legal effect of judicially noticing an adjudicated fact is only to relieve the Prosecution of its initial burden to produce evidence on the point; the defence may put the adjudicated fact into question by introducing evidence to the contrary.[35] This Appeal raises the issue of the nature of the evidence that can be introduced in rebuttal in such circumstances.

14. In the Karemera et al. Appeal Decision on Judicial Notice, the Appeals Chamber held that the Defence may rebut the presumption by introducing "reliable and credible" evidence to the contrary.[36] The requirement that the evidence be "reliable and credible" must be understood in its proper context, through the lens of the general standard for admission of evidence at trial set out in Rule 89(C) of the Rules: "[a] Chamber may admit any relevant evidence which it deems to have probative value". Only evidence that is reliable and credible may be considered to have probative value.[37]

Dario Kordi} and Mario ^erkez*, Case No. IT-95-14/2-AR73.5, Decision on

20. Lastly, the Trial Chamber reasoned that "the very purpose of admitting adjudicated facts would be undermined by permitting a party to admit such evidence" because "[j]udicial economy would not be achieved if parties were entitled to challenge adjudicated facts with evidence that has already been rejected in relation to that finding."[48] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber underscores that the principle of judicial economy must yield to the fundamental right of the accused to a fair trial. A Trial Chamber cannot deny the Defence its right to put the adjudicated fact into question by introducing evidence to the contrary simply because it would frustrate judicial economy. Further, the Appeals Chamber emphasizes that Rule 94(B) of the Rules fosters judicial economy by avoiding the need for evidence in chief to be presented in support of a fact already previously adjudicated. Hence, the purpose of judicial economy underlying Rule 94(B) of the Rules is not frustrated by the admission of rebuttal evidence.

21. Similarly, the fact that the judicial notice mechanism was also created to favour consistency and uniformity of the case-law cannot be a matter that weighs against the admissibility of rebuttal evidence. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber stresses that adjudicated facts that are judicially noticed by way of Rule 94(B) of the Rules remain to be assessed by the Trial Chamber to determine what conclusions, if any, can be drawn from them when considered together with all the evidence brought at trial. The Rule 94(B) mechanism does not allow a Chamber to simply defer to the assessment of the evidence by another Chamber on the ground that this mechanism was fashioned to favour consistency and uniformity in the Tribunal's case-law.

22. The Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber incorrectly applied the governing law in finding that "evidence which has already been considered and rejected by another Trial Chamber in making a finding of fact should not be admissible in a later proceeding to rebut that same finding of fact".[49] This approach would have the effect of denying to the opposite party its fundamental right to contest the material admitted by rebutting the presumption created by the admission of the adjudicated fact. In deferring to the assessment of the reliability of Ntakirutimana's testimony by the Ntakirutimana Trial Chamber, the Trial Chamber not only failed to fulfil its obligation to examine whether the evidence may have probative value in the circumstances of the case before it, but also misapplied the standard for admission of evidence which only requires prima facie indicia of reliability and credibility.

allotment of time for the presentation of evidence.[25] He further points to the "fervor with which the Presiding Judge and Trial Chamber denied the motion, labeling it 'vexatious'", which in his view lends credence to the possibility of bias.[26]

6. Finally, Mr. Nzirorera submits that the Trial Chamber erred in denying his counsel fees associated with the motion.[27] He argues that such sanctions must be imposed cautiously.[28] Mr. Nzirorera acknowledges that there is no appeal as of right against a decision denying fees, but notes that the Trial Chamber granted certification of the entire decision, which necessarily includes the denial of fees.[29] In the event that his appeal is successful, he asks that the sanctions be reversed.[30]

7. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber did not abuse its discretion in denying disclosure of the assessment of Mr. Morley.[31] It argues that the Trial Chamber, after describing the purpose of an assessment in connection with an application for Queen's Counsel, correctly determined that the process could not give rise to a claim of bias or an appearance of bias and thus denied the motion.[32] The Prosecution further argues that Rule 68 of the Rules has no applicability as nothing in the assessment would suggest the innocence or mitigate the guilt of the accused or affect the credibility of Prosecution evidence.[33] The Prosecution also contends that a denial of fees is not subject to appeal.[34]

DISCUSSION

8. This appeal raises two principal questions concerning whether the Trial Chamber erred in refusing to disclose the assessment and in denying fees to Mr. Nzirorera's counsel. The Appeals Chamber will only overturn a Trial Chamber's discretionary decision where it is found to be: (i) based on an incorrect interpretation of governing law; (ii) based on a patently incorrect conclusion of fact; or (iii) so unfair or unreasonable as to constitute an abuse of the Trial Chamber's discretion.[35]

A. Alleged Error in Refusing to Disclose the Assessment

9. The Statute and Rules guarantee an accused's right to be tried by impartial Judges.[36] Rule 15(A) of the Rules specifically provides that "[a] Judge may not sit in any case in which he has a personal interest or concerning which he has or has had any association which might affect his impartiality." In particular, a Judge must withdraw from a case if it is shown that actual bias exists or if the circumstances would lead a reasonable observer, properly informed, to reasonably apprehend bias.[37]

10. Rule 15(B) of the Rules prescribes a two-stage process for making a request to disqualify a Judge which consists of (i) an application to the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber seized with the proceedings, and (ii) a de novo determination by the Bureau.[38] The Appeals Chamber's consideration of matters relating to disqualification is limited to an appeal on the merits of the case or, as here, where the issue properly arises in an interlocutory appeal certified by the Trial Chamber.[39]

11. Mr. Nzirorera has not filed a request to disqualify Judge Byron in accordance with Rule 15(B) of the Rules. Rather, he sought disclosure of material directly from the concerned Trial Chamber in order to assess the merits of making such a claim.[40] While the Statute and Rules do not explicitly provide for the disclosure of material from a Judge in connection with a request for disqualification, they also do not prevent a party from requesting disclosure of information in this regard. The Appeals Chamber recalls that a presumption of impartiality, which cannot be easily rebutted, attaches to the Judges of the Tribunal.[41] Bearing this in mind, a request for disclosure must specifically identify the material or information in the possession of the Judge and make a prima facie showing that it would demonstrate actual bias or the appearance of bias.

On this basis, the Appeals Chamber considers that the following principles should direct it in interpreting and applying the impartiality requirement of the Statute: A. A Judge is not impartial if it is shown that actual bias exists. B. There is an unacceptable appearance of bias if: (i) a Judge is a party to the case, or has a financial or proprietary interest in the outcome of a case, or if the Judge's decision will lead to the promotion of a cause in which he or she is involved, together with one of the parties. Under these circumstances, a Judge's disqualification from the case is automatic; or (ii) the circumstances would lead a reasonable observer, properly informed, to reasonably apprehend bias.").

12. There is no dispute that Mr. Nzirorera has sufficiently identified the requested material. The main question therefore is whether he has shown that it is capable of demonstrating bias or the appearance of bias. Mr. Nzirorera claims that the Trial Chamber erred in law in holding that the contents of the assessment could not be disclosed because giving the assessment amounted to a judicial act. As previously noted in this case, the fact that a Judge performs an act in a judicial capacity provides no shield from a claim of bias or appearance of bias.[42] In any event, even though the assessment was presumably based on the Presiding Judge's observations of Mr. Morley's competence in court, the Appeals Chamber is not convinced that it constituted a judicial act of the Tribunal.

13. Nevertheless, the Appeals Chamber does not agree with Mr. Nzirorera that the Trial Chamber denied disclosure only because it considered the assessment to be a judicial act. In refusing to disclose the assessment, the Trial Chamber reviewed the nature and purpose of the exercise and concluded that it did not demonstrate any bias or an appearance of bias.[43] Only then, did the Trial Chamber go on to observe that the assessment was a judicial function. This reference was made to highlight what the Trial Chamber viewed as Mr. Nzirorera's "lack of respect for the Chamber" and does not appear to be the basis of the decision.[44]

14. The Appeals Chamber is also not persuaded that the Trial Chamber failed to properly consider whether the assessment demonstrates bias or an appearance of bias. In this respect, the Trial Chamber referred to the nature of the exercise, which was to provide a confidential assessment available only to the Queen's Counsel nominating committee about the applicant's competencies in cases of substance, complexity, or particular difficulty.[45] The Trial Chamber also considered this exercise against the backdrop of a Judge's duty to remain impartial.[46]

15. The Appeals Chamber agrees that there is nothing per se improper about a Judge providing an assessment of a counsel's professional competence – whether ultimately positive or negative or characterized as a letter of recommendation – in connection with an application for a distinction or rank conferred by a domestic jurisdiction. Consequently, it can identify no error on the part of the Trial Chamber in refusing to disclose the assessment.

16. In support of Mr. Nzirorera's contention that a Judge should not provide a letter of recommendation for a person appearing in a pending case before him or her, he points to a other proceedings of the Tribunal relating to the matter at issue in the current proceedings."

Taking judicial notice of adjudicated facts under Rule 94(B) is a method of achieving judicial economy and harmonizing judgements of the Tribunal while ensuring the right of the Accused to a fair, public and expeditious trial.[69]

40. Although governed by some of the same principles, judicial notice under Rule 94(B) is different in nature from judicial notice under Rule 94(A). Adjudicated facts are different from facts of common knowledge (although there is some overlap in the categories). There is no requirement that adjudicated facts be beyond reasonable dispute. They are facts that have been established in a proceeding between other parties on the basis of the evidence the parties to that proceeding chose to introduce, in the particular context of that proceeding. For this reason, they cannot simply be accepted, by mere virtue of their acceptance in the first proceeding, as conclusive in proceedings involving different parties who have not had the chance to contest them.

41. Thus, there are two crucial differences between the two provisions. One is built into the Rule: whereas judicial notice under Rule 94(A) is mandatory, judicial notice under Rule 94(B) is discretionary, allowing the Trial Chamber to determine which adjudicated facts to recognize on the basis of a careful consideration of the accused's right to a fair and expeditious trial. The principles guiding and limiting the exercise of that discretion have been developed through jurisprudence and are discussed below.

42. The second difference is established by the Tribunal's jurisprudence, and concerns the consequences of judicial notice: whereas facts noticed under Rule 94(A) are established conclusively, those established under Rule 94(B) are merely presumptions that may be rebutted by the defence with evidence at trial.[70] The Appeals Chamber reiterates that judicial notice does not shift the ultimate burden of persuasion, which remains with the Prosecution. In the case of judicial notice under Rule 94(B), the effect is only to relieve the Prosecution of its initial burden to produce evidence on the point; the defence may then put the point into question by introducing reliable and credible evidence to the contrary. This approach is consistent with practice in national jurisdictions: whereas judicial notice of facts of common knowledge may be treated as conclusive,[71] the final adjudication of facts in judicial proceedings is treated as conclusively binding only, at most, on the parties to those proceedings (res judicata).[72]

43. The Prosecution sought judicial notice under Rule 94(B) of 153 adjudicated facts. The Trial Chamber rejected this request in full, and the Prosecution appeals with respect to 147 of the facts. The Prosecution, the Accused, and the Trial Chamber have not proceeded in their analysis one by one through these facts, and the Appeals Chamber will not do so either. It will instead address the two major reasons given by the Trial Chamber for refusing to take judicial notice and consider whether each constitutes a legitimate reason to so refuse under Rule 94(B). In doing so, the Appeals Chamber bears in mind that "a Trial Chamber's exercise of discretion will only be overturned if the challenged decision was (1) based on an incorrect interpretation of governing law; (2)

II. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

7. The Appeals Chamber recalls the applicable standards of appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber reviews only errors of law which invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and errors of fact which have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[13]

8. As regards errors of law, the Appeals Chamber has stated:

> Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[14]

9. Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, the Appeals Chamber will articulate the correct legal interpretation and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly. In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but, when necessary, applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the appellant before that finding may be confirmed on appeal.[15]

10. As regards errors of fact, it is well established that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by a Trial Chamber:

> Where the Defence alleges an erroneous finding of fact, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial, and it will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. Furthermore, the erroneous finding will be revoked or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[16]

11. A party cannot merely repeat on appeal arguments that did not succeed at trial, unless it can demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's rejection of those arguments constituted an error warranting the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[17] Arguments which do not have the potential to cause the corroborated and un-contradicted testimony.[79] He also submits that neither the Trial Chamber nor the Prosecution provided justification for this preference.[80]

39. It is well established that, as a matter of law, it is permissible to base a conviction on hearsay evidence.[81] A Trial Chamber has the discretion to cautiously consider hearsay evidence[82] and has the discretion to rely on it.[83] While the weight and probative value to be afforded to that evidence will usually be less than that accorded to the evidence of a witness who has given it under oath and who has been cross-examined, it will depend upon "the infinitely variable circumstances which surround hearsay evidence".[84] Thus, the fact that the evidence regarding a specific event is hearsay evidence does not in itself suffice to render it not credible or unreliable.[85] The source of information,[86] the precise character of the information,[87] and the fact that other evidence corroborates the hearsay evidence[88] are relevant criteria in assessing the weight or probative value of hearsay evidence. In any event, it is for the appealing party to demonstrate that no reasonable trier of fact could have relied upon hearsay evidence in reaching a specific finding.[89]

40. The Appeals Chamber rejects the unsubstantiated and vague contentions made under this sub-ground of appeal that the Trial Chamber systematically erred in its assessment of hearsay evidence, that it failed to provide a reasoned opinion in relation to its assessment of hearsay evidence, and that it also failed to explain why it relied upon that evidence and disregarded evidence favourable to the Appellant.

41. Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber finds no merit in the Appellant's contention that the Trial Chamber erred in preferring hearsay testimony to the Appellant's uncontradicted testimony. Contrary to the Appellant's assertion,[90] his testimony denying his participation in all of the crimes depending on its assessment, rely on a single witness's testimony for the proof of a material fact.[101] It may thus convict an accused on the basis of evidence from a single witness, although such evidence must be assessed with appropriate caution.[102] Any appeal based on the absence of corroboration must therefore necessarily be against the weight attached by the Trial Chamber to the evidence in question.[103]

46. The Appeals Chamber dismisses the assertions made by the Appellant under this sub-ground of appeal as general and unsubstantiated. The Appellant's submission relating to possible collusion between the four Prosecution witnesses testifying about the events in Ntarama[104] will be addressed below.[105]

47. For the foregoing reasons, this sub-ground of appeal is dismissed.

E. Alleged Errors relating to the Observations Made during the Site Visit

48. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law by failing to provide the factual findings arising from the site visit, thus denying him the opportunity to present a full defence, as well as the right to an intelligible judgement.[106] The Appellant further submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact by making factual findings which are contrary to the observations it made during its site visit in Rwanda from 1 to 3 November 2006.[107] He argues that observations made during the site visit brought to light certain details about the Ntarama area that are not revealed in the Trial Judgement.[108] He argues that, absent a procès-verbal, pictures or admissions, it is now impossible to use the observations made during the site visit to challenge the credibility of unreliable witnesses and to demonstrate the Trial Chamber's errors in this respect.[109] He also

Witness BMG's evidence corroborated that of Witness BMF about sparing the life of a Tutsi man named Callixte Kalisa.[341]

171. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence of these witnesses and its finding that certain houses of Tutsis were spared on the Appellant's orders are erroneous.[342] The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber properly assessed the evidence concerning the order that certain houses of Tutsis be spared.[343]

172. The Appellant first contends that Prosecution Witnesses BMG, BMF, and BMH do not corroborate each other since none of them "gave the same reasons advanced by Fthe Appellantğ or by those persons who were quoting him, as to why the lives and houses of some Tutsi had to be spared."[344]

173. The Appeals Chamber recalls its holding in the Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgement that:

> two testimonies corroborate one another when one prima facie credible testimony is compatible with the other prima facie credible testimony regarding the same fact or a sequence of linked facts. It is not necessary that both testimonies be identical in all aspects or describe the same fact in the same way. Every witness presents what he has seen from his own point of view at the time of the events, or according to how he understood the events recounted by others. It follows that corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony.[345]

174. The Appeals Chamber further recalls that minor inconsistencies commonly occur in witness testimony without rendering it unreliable and that it is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to evaluate such inconsistencies and to consider whether the evidence as a whole is credible, without explaining its decision in every detail.[346]

175. While the Trial Chamber did not explicitly address this matter, the Appeals Chamber finds that the alleged inconsistency is minor and that it is not relevant to the material facts underlying the conviction. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber's failure to address this issue does not render its reliance on the witnesses erroneous.

the accused; it is sufficient to demonstrate that the instigation was a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of another person committing the crime.[727]

318. Contrary to the Appellant's contention, the specific identification of the perpetrators, who were identified in the Trial Judgement as Interahamwe, was not required for a finding that the Appellant instigated the killing of Gakuru. In any event, the Trial Chamber did identify the perpetrators. It is implicit, but certain, in the Trial Judgement that the Trial Chamber found that Gakuru was killed by the Interahamwe who were informed by the Appellant that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi" and who received his order to arrest him. The Trial Chamber found that "[b]y doing so, Karera left him [Gakuru] in the hands of Interahamwe" and that "[u]nder the prevailing circumstances, he must have understood that Gakuru would be killed".[728] That the Trial Chamber made such a finding is implicit in its recollection of the evidence of Witnesses BMO and BMN.[729] While it would have been preferable for the Trial Chamber to explicitly state that it identified the perpetrators of Gakuru's murder as being the Interahamwe to whom the Appellant indicated that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi" and who received the order to arrest him, this omission does not amount to an error.

319. However, based on the Trial Chamber's factual findings, the Trial Chamber could not have reasonably concluded that the Appellant prompted the perpetrators to kill Gakuru. The Trial Chamber made no factual findings supporting such a conclusion. It merely concluded that the Appellant had informed the Interahamwe who later killed Gakuru that he was an "Inyenzi" and ordered them to arrest him. The Trial Chamber should have further explained how, on the basis of these factual findings, it inferred that the Appellant had prompted the Interahamwe to kill Gakuru. In the absence of such an explanation, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting the Appellant for instigating Gakuru's murder.

320. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the Appellant's submission that the Trial Chamber erred in entering a conviction for aiding and abetting murder as a crime against humanity.

321. The actus reus of aiding and abetting is constituted by acts or omissions that assist, further, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which substantially contribute to the perpetration of the crime.[730] The mens rea for aiding and abetting is knowledge that acts performed by the aider and abettor assist in the commission of the crime by the principal.[731] It is well established that it is not necessary for an accused to know the precise crime which was intended and which in the event was committed, but he must be aware of its essential elements.[732] If an accused is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime.[733]

322. The Trial Chamber found that the Appellant told the Interahamwe that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi" and that he ordered his arrest by the Interahamwe, which he must have understood would result in his murder.[734] On the basis of these findings, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that the Appellant aided and abetted the murder of Gakuru.[735] By instructing the Interahamwe to arrest Gakuru and telling them that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi", it was reasonable to conclude that the Appellant substantially contributed to the commission of his murder through specifically assisting and providing moral support to the principal perpetrators. Furthermore, in light of the evidence adduced, the Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's finding that the Appellant had the requisite mens rea.

323. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber grants this sub-ground of appeal in part and reverses the Appellant's conviction for instigating murder as a crime against humanity based on this event. The Appellant's conviction for aiding and abetting murder as a crime against humanity based on the killing of Gakuru is upheld.

F. Conclusion

324. The Appeals Chamber grants the Appellant's First Ground of Appeal and reverses the Appellant's conviction for aiding and abetting genocide and extermination as a crime against humanity, based on the alleged weapons distribution in Rushashi commune.

325. The Appeals Chamber further grants the Seventh Ground of Appeal, in part, and reverses the Appellant's conviction for instigating murder as a crime against humanity based on the killing of Gakuru.

Ngendombi Hill, between 9 and 11 April 1994.[92] In making findings concerning the second attack at Nyarutovu Hill, the Trial Chamber relied solely on the evidence of Witness W.[93] Under this ground of appeal, the Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in its assessment of Witnesses AW and W and in its failure to consider other Defence evidence.[94] The Appeals Chamber has already considered the Appellant's other challenges to the findings related to the two attacks on Nyarutovu Hill under Ground of Appeal 7.

1. Alleged Errors in the Assessment of Witness AW

56. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law and in fact in relying on the testimony of Witness AW in making findings in relation to the attack on Nyarutovu Hill, arguing that his testimony was uncorroborated, inconsistent, and implausible.[95] In this respect, the Appellant raises six principal arguments which are discussed below in turn.

57. The Appellant initially submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in relying on the testimony of Witness AW because he contradicted himself by first stating that the Appellant arrived on 8 April 1994 in the Bisesero area in a red minivan and subsequently noting that he arrived during the attack in a white Toyota.[96] In this regard, the Appellant also submits that it was established by other witnesses that the commune did not have a red-coloured van.[97]

58. A review of the transcripts reveals that Witness AW made reference to a red minivan at the beginning of his testimony[98] and, when specifically questioned by the Prosecution about the vehicle, identified it as a white Toyota.[99] In recounting Witness AW's testimony in the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber referred only to the Appellant arriving in a "red minivan" and did not explicitly address this contradiction.[100] The Appeals Chamber recalls that, while a Trial Chamber is [92] Trial Judgement, paras. 67, 76. The Trial Chamber also found that, on the day of the second attack on Nyarutovu Hill, the Appellant also participated in attacks in neighbouring areas such as Nyarutovu, Kiziba, and Ngendombi. The Trial Chamber discussed in detail only the attacks on Nyarutovu Hill and Ngendombi Hill and its findings on genocide are based only on those two locations. Trial Judgement, paras. 63-79, 513. The parties also do not address these other attacks in detail, and the Appeals Chamber therefore sees no need to address them.

[95] Notice of Appeal, p. 3, paras. 8, 9; pp. 10-11, paras. 15-17, 19; Appellant's Brief, paras. 89-102, 111-114.
[96] Appellant's Brief, paras. 90, 91, 96, 97, 111-114. At paragraph 111 of the Appellant's Brief, the Appellant refers to alleged contradictions between the evidence given by Witness AW and Witness W relating to the "means" the Appellant used to arrive at Nyarutovu Hill. The Appellant however goes on to illustrate this with an alleged internal inconsistency in Witness AW's testimony. Appellant's Brief, paras. 112, 113.
[97] Notice of Appeal, p. 10, para. 16. The Appeals Chamber notes that this argument was not mentioned in the Appellant's Brief and that the Appellant does not provide citation to evidence on the record.

required to consider inconsistencies and any explanations offered in respect of them when weighing the probative value of evidence,[101] it does not need to individually address them in the Trial Judgement.[102] Furthermore, the presence of inconsistencies within or amongst witnesses' testimonies does not per se require a reasonable Trial Chamber to reject the evidence as being unreasonable.[103] The Appeals Chamber notes that Witness AW's testimony was consistent as to the owner and occupants of the vehicle.[104] The Appeals Chamber is therefore not convinced that no reasonable trier of fact could have relied on his testimony, notwithstanding the discrepancy concerning the colour of the vehicle.

59. The Appellant also submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in relying on Witness AW's testimony given his account that from Nyarutovu Hill he could see vehicles parked close to the Appellant's house in Gishyita town.[105] The Appellant submits that this would have been impossible in light of the witness's testimony that it would take approximately thirty minutes to walk from one location to the other, which the Appellant surmised corresponded to a distance of about two-and-a-half kilometres.[106]

60. A review of the relevant transcript shows that the witness found it difficult to estimate the distance between Gishyita town and Nyarutovu Hill, given the "roundabout pathways that lead from one place to the other."[107] Yet, the witness considered that "the distance was not very large" and could be covered in a thirty minute walk.[108] In this context, the witness was also asked to explain the location of a place called Kiziba in relation to Nyarutovu Hill and Gishyita town.[109] The witness stated that Kiziba was located between the two places.[110] He also stated that the distance between Kiziba and Nyarutovu Hill measured between thirty and fifty metres and that, in relation to Nyarutovu Hill, Kiziba was located in the valley below.[111] In challenging Witness AW's testimony on this point, the Appellant advances his own view of the situation based on speculation and selective references to the witness's testimony, which fail to account for the witness's elevated subordinate relationship between him and Mugonero.[430] He submits that the Trial Chamber was required to establish his position of authority in order to show that he used his authority to "persuade or force another person to commit a crime."[431]

189. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and that this support has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[432] The requisite mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[433] For an accused to be convicted of abetting an offence, it is not necessary to prove that he had authority over the principal perpetrator.[434]

190. The Appeals Chamber is not convinced that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting the Appellant for abetting the rape of Witness BG when he gave permission to Mugonero to "take away" Witness BG. The Trial Chamber concluded that the Appellant was a well-known and influential person in his community.[435] The Trial Chamber further found that the Appellant knew that Mugonero wanted to rape the witness.[436] The Appeals Chamber considers that a reasonable trier of fact could find that the Appellant's actions in such circumstances amounted to encouragement which had a substantial affect on Mugonero's subsequent rape of Witness BG. In the Semanza Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber reached a similar conclusion in respect of an "influential" accused who encouraged the rape of Tutsi women by giving "permission" to rape them.[437]

191. Accordingly, this sub-ground of appeal is dismissed.

E. Conclusion

II. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

5. The Appeals Chamber recalls the applicable standards of appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber reviews only errors of law which have the potential to invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and errors of fact which have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[13]

6. Regarding errors of law, the Appeals Chamber has stated:

> Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[14]

7. Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, the Appeals Chamber will articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly.[15] In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but, when necessary, also applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the appellant before that finding may be confirmed on appeal.[16]

8. Regarding errors of fact, it is well established that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by the Trial Chamber:

> Where the Defence alleges an erroneous finding of fact, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial, and it will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. Furthermore, the erroneous finding will be revoked or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[17]

9. A party cannot merely repeat on appeal arguments that did not succeed at trial, unless it can demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's rejection of those arguments constituted an error warranting

the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[18] Arguments which do not have the potential to cause the impugned decision to be reversed or revised may be immediately dismissed by the Appeals Chamber and need not be considered on the merits.[19]

10. In order for the Appeals Chamber to assess arguments on appeal, the appealing party must provide precise references to relevant transcript pages or paragraphs in the decision or judgement to which the challenge is made.[20] Moreover, the Appeals Chamber cannot be expected to consider a party's submissions in detail if they are obscure, contradictory, vague, or suffer from other formal and obvious insufficiencies.[21] Finally, the Appeals Chamber has inherent discretion in selecting which submissions merit a detailed reasoned opinion in writing, and it will dismiss arguments which are evidently unfounded without providing detailed reasoning.[22]

Witness BWQ's evidence, which the Trial Chamber considered credible, that he was familiar with Munyakazi prior to the event.[176] Moreover, the witness personally interacted with Munyakazi after the assailants arrived at the parish,[177] and saw him two more times: once through a ventilation hole as the main door of the church was destroyed; and again as Munyakazi entered the church after the destruction of the door, but before the assailants began throwing grenades at the refugees.[178] Witness BWR also corroborated Witness BWQ's account of Munyakazi's presence at the church door.[179] In this context, Munyakazi has not shown that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to rely on Witness BWQ's eye-witness account of Munyakazi's actions at the church.

71. The Appeals Chamber is also not convinced that Munyakazi has identified any inconsistency between the accounts of Witnesses BWU and BWW that would call into question the Trial Chamber's reliance on their evidence. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber has the main responsibility to resolve any inconsistencies that may arise within or among witnesses' testimonies.[180] It is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to evaluate any such inconsistencies, to consider whether the evidence taken as a whole is reliable and credible, and to accept or reject the fundamental features of the evidence.[181] The Appeals Chamber further recalls that "corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony."[182]

72. The Trial Chamber viewed the evidence of Witnesses BWU and BWW with caution, given their participation in the attack as accomplices of Munyakazi, and therefore accepted it only where corroborated.[183] In this respect, the Trial Chamber considered that the testimonies of Witnesses BWU and BWW were consistent on a number of key details, including the date and timeframe of the attack, the participation of Munyakazi and the Interahamwe, his dress and possession of a weapon, and the general tenor of how the attack unfolded.[184] It also relied on Witness BWU, together with the evidence of Witnesses BWQ and BWR, concerning Munyakazi's role in the

And later on I heard only the noises of the victims, and I knew nothing again of what happened subsequently. Q. You were able to see him after you'd moved to the centre area of the church; is that what you're saying? A. I've explained this already. 75. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber can identify no error in the Trial Chamber's reliance on Witnesses BWU and BWW to establish that Munyakazi led the attack.

76. Turning to the site visit, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber has the primary discretion to decide whether or not a site visit is necessary or relevant in the assessment of evidence.[196] The only credibility issue argued by Munyakazi that reasonably relates to the physical features of the parish is Witnesses BWQ's and BWR's ability to see assailants through the ventilation holes. On this point, the Trial Chamber heard testimony concerning the placement and size of the holes, as well as the ease with which one could see through them.[197] Munyakazi points to no other evidence on the record that would cast doubt on the physical features of the ventilation holes. Moreover, Witnesses BWQ and BWR testified that they saw Munyakazi immediately after the door was destroyed.[198] Furthermore, Witness BWU, who was outside the church, also testified about Munyakazi's presence at the door and the manner of the attack.[199] In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in cancelling the site visit.

77. The Appeals Chamber also can identify no error in the Trial Chamber's reliance on Witnesses MM and MP. The Trial Chamber expressly noted that they "provided only hearsay evidence" which came "from the same source."[200] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber has the discretion to cautiously consider and rely on hearsay evidence.[201] The Appeals Chamber considers that, in making its findings, the Trial Chamber relied principally on the "detailed first-hand evidence" of Witnesses BWQ, BWR, BWU, and BWW.[202]

78. There is no merit in Munyakazi's submission that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on exaggerated evidence. The Trial Chamber was clearly aware of the potential for exaggeration in view of its observation that Witness BWW had "a marked tendency to exaggerate figures".[203] The Trial Chamber, however, relied only on this witness's evidence when corroborated.[204] The Trial Chamber's findings were based principally on four eye-witnesses "from a wide array of particular, he highlights inconsistencies between the accounts of Witnesses MM and MP with respect to the number of gendarmes who addressed the assailants, their ability to see Munyakazi or vehicles within the parish premises, where the refugees were killed, how the attack started, and whether there was a victim selection process.[267] Munyakazi argues that these discrepancies cannot be reasonably explained by the passage of time or confusion given Witnesses MM's and MP's similar vantage points during the attack and their shared role in ensuring the welfare of the refugees.[268] Munyakazi also highlights the discrepancy between Witnesses MM's and MP's contention that the gendarmes tried to prevent the attack and Witness BWW's assertion that the gendarmes welcomed the attackers.[269]

102. Munyakazi argues that the Trial Chamber failed to appreciate the differences in Witnesses MM's, LCQ's, and BWW's respective accounts concerning the location and manner of the killings.[270] Munyakazi further contends that Witnesses MM and LCQ could not corroborate each other given their different vantage points during the attack.[271] Furthermore, Munyakazi submits that the evidence of Witness BWW is exaggerated and lacking in key details.[272] Munyakazi also points to differences among the witnesses' descriptions of the assailants' attire, the gender of the refugees at the parish, and the involvement of certain attackers.[273] Finally, Munyakazi submits that, had the Trial Chamber not cancelled the site visit, it would have determined that the discrepancies between the testimonies of Witnesses MM, MP, LCQ, and BWW were significant.[274]

103. A review of the Trial Judgement and record reflects that there are certain differences between the accounts of the Prosecution witnesses, which are partly reflected in the summary of their evidence in the Trial Judgement. Contrary to Munyakazi's submissions, however, these differences are generally minor and do not call into question the reasonableness of the Trial Chamber's reliance on the accounts of the witnesses. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber has the main responsibility to resolve any inconsistencies that may arise within or among witnesses' testimonies.[275] It is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to evaluate inconsistencies in the evidence, to consider whether the evidence taken as a whole is reliable and credible, and to accept some but reject other parts of a witness's testimony.[276] Furthermore, corroboration does not require witnesses' accounts to be identical in all aspects since "[e]very witness presents what he has seen from his own point of view at the time of the events, or according to how he understood the events recounted by others."[277] Rather, the main question is whether two or more credible accounts are incompatible.[278]

104. Witness MP's account of how the attack unfolded is mostly incompatible with those of Witnesses MM, LCQ, and BWW.[279] Specifically, according to the Trial Judgement, Witness MP described an attack involving killings which occurred in the classrooms on the premises of the parish.[280] In contrast, Witnesses MM, LCQ, and BWW indicated that the victims were first gathered at the parish, removed from its premises, stripped naked, and killed elsewhere.[281] The Trial Chamber considered that this discrepancy could be explained by the passage of time and confusion due to the frequency of attacks on the parish during that period.[282] The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that these circumstances reasonably explain why Witness MP may have been mistaken about some of the specific details of the attack on 30 April 1994. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion in rejecting many of the inconsistent details of the attack given by Witness MP and in preferring the corroborated version of events provided by Witnesses MM, LCQ, and BWW.[283]

105. The other discrepancies between Witnesses MM and MP, which were not expressly addressed in the Trial Judgement, are minor and could also be explained by confusion and the passage of time. It was within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to nonetheless rely on other aspects of Witness MP's evidence on points where his evidence was consistent with that of other witnesses, such as the time and date of the attack, the number of victims, and the leader of the attack.[284] Accordingly, Munyakazi has not demonstrated that the discrepancies between Witness MP's testimony about the attack and the other evidence call into question the reasonableness of the Trial Chamber's findings.

117. The Trial Chamber did not discuss the differences in the evidence of Prosecution Witnesses MM, MP, and LCQ concerning the initial attacks at the parish on 11 or 13 April 1994. Witness MM indicated that the attacks began on 11 April 1994.[319] Witness LCQ believed that the first attack occurred on 13 April 1994.[320] Witness MP acknowledged that there were other attacks, but did not specify any dates and was not questioned about when they occurred.[321] The Appeals Chamber considers that, despite these minor variances in detail, the accounts of these witnesses remain compatible. Notably, Witnesses MM, MP, and LCQ consistently recalled the three most significant attacks at the parish on 18, 20, and 30 April 1994 and mentioned other assaults by local inhabitants.[322]

118. Witness Nahimana's omission of a significant attack at the parish on 20 April 1994, which was confirmed by three eye-witnesses, is more significant than the possible omission by the Prosecution witnesses of earlier, smaller incidents.[323] However, the events at the parish on that date were not necessarily a central feature of his testimony, and neither party questioned him extensively on this issue. Even if it were an error to discount his evidence on this basis, the Appeals Chamber can identify no miscarriage of justice. The fact remains that Witness Nahimana asserted that no attack occurred on 30 April 1994 and that he never heard about one from Witnesses MM and MP or other sources.[324] In contrast, the Trial Chamber heard evidence from four Prosecution witnesses, including Witnesses MM and MP; in the view of the Trial Chamber, this evidence credibly confirmed that Munyakazi participated in an attack at the parish on 30 April 1994.[325] The Appeals Chamber recalls that, when faced with competing versions of events, it is the duty of the Trial Chamber that heard the witnesses to determine which evidence it considers more probative.[326] Based on the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to accept the Prosecution evidence over Witness Nahimana's account.

conducted a site visit, there would have been additional reasons to discount their testimony.[416] Munyakazi also highlights his alibi, which, in his view, was unreasonably discounted and further emphasizes that Witnesses MBRE, YCC, and YCH confirmed that there was no attack at the parish on 16 April 1994.[417] Finally, Munyakazi contends that the Trial Chamber correctly questioned his participation in the massacre at the parish based on the attack at CIMERWA.[418]

152. The Appeals Chamber underscores that Trial Chambers enjoy broad discretion in assessing evidence, to which deference is owed.[419] Although the Trial Chamber found Witnesses LAY and BWP to be "generally credible and reliable",[420] the Prosecution does not fully appreciate that the Trial Chamber heard competing evidence, which was not discounted, from Witnesses MBRE, YCC, and YCH that no attack occurred at the parish on 16 April 1994.[421] Although these Defence witnesses were not at the parish, as the Prosecution notes, the Trial Chamber observed that, based on their respective vantage points in and around Kabeza Centre, from where the entrance of the parish was visible, they were in a position to know whether an attack occurred at the parish on that date.[422] The Prosecution does not dispute this or raise any other challenge to the Trial Chamber's assessment of this Defence evidence. Consequently, the accounts of Witnesses LAY and BWP that Munyakazi participated in an attack at the parish on 16 April 1994 cannot be easily reconciled with Witnesses MBRE's, YCC's, and YCH's testimony.

153. The evidence concerning the involvement of the Bugarama Interahamwe in the attack at CIMERWA on 16 April 1994 may reasonably be described as circumstantial support for the proposition that Munyakazi did not participate in another massacre on that same day at Nyamasheke parish with members of that same group. As the Prosecution observes, there is no indication that Munyakazi participated in the attack at CIMERWA.[423] However, it cannot be said that the involvement of members of the Bugarama Interahamwe in the CIMERWA attack is incapable of raising some concern about evidence that, on the same day, the group was involved in another attack at a distant location.

154. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber has the main responsibility to resolve any inconsistencies that may arise within or among witnesses' testimonies.[424] Although it would have been reasonable for the Trial Chamber to prefer the credible and reliable first-hand evidence of Witnesses LAY and BWP, the Appeals Chamber cannot conclude that no reasonable trier of fact could have reasonable doubt as to Munyakazi's participation in an attack on Nyamasheke parish on 16 April 1994, in light of the competing Defence evidence.

155. Accordingly, the Prosecution has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber's assessment of the totality of the evidence was unreasonable. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the Prosecution's First Ground of Appeal.

18. The Appeals Chamber recalls that in determining whether or not a Trial Chamber's finding was reasonable, it "will not lightly disturb findings of fact by a Trial Chamber."[25] In the first place, the task of weighing and assessing evidence lies with the Trial Chamber. Furthermore, it is for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible or not. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber must give a margin of deference to a finding of fact reached by a Trial Chamber.[26] But the Trial Chamber's discretion in weighing and assessing evidence is always limited by its duty to provide a "reasoned opinion in writing,"[27] although it is not required to articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes.[28] The question arises as to the extent that a Trial Chamber is obliged to set out its reasons for accepting or rejecting a particular testimony.[29] There is no guiding principle on this point and, to a large extent, testimony must be considered on a case by case basis. The Appeals Chamber of ICTY held that:[30]

> [t]he right of an accused under Article 23 of the Statute to a reasoned opinion is an aspect of the fair trial requirement embodied in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute. The case-law that has developed under the European Convention on Human Rights establishes that a reasoned opinion is a component of the fair hearing requirement, but that "the extent to which this duty . . . applies may vary according to the nature of the decision" and "can only be determined in the light of the circumstances of the case."[31] The European Court of Human Rights has held that a "tribunal' is not obliged to give a detailed answer to every argument.[32]

19. In addition, the Appeals Chamber of ICTY has stated that although the evidence produced may not have been referred to by a Trial Chamber, based on the particular circumstances of a given case, it may nevertheless be reasonable to assume that the Trial Chamber had taken it into account.[33]

20. It does not necessarily follow that because a Trial Chamber did not refer to any particular evidence or testimony in its reasoning, it disregarded it. This is particularly so in the evaluation of witness testimony, including inconsistencies and the overall credibility of a witness. A Trial Chamber is not required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony. Thus, in the

Čelebići case, the Appeals Chamber of ICTY found that it is open to the Trial Chamber to accept what it described as the "fundamental features" of testimony.[34] It also stated that:

> [t]he Trial Chamber is not obliged in its Judgement to recount and justify its findings in relation to every submission made during trial. It was within its discretion to evaluate the inconsistencies highlighted and to consider whether the witness, when the testimony is taken as a whole, was reliable and whether the evidence was credible. Small inconsistencies cannot suffice to render the whole testimony unreliable.[35]

21. It is for an appellant to show that the finding made by the Trial Chamber is erroneous and that the Trial Chamber indeed disregarded some item of evidence, as it did not refer to it. In Čelebići, the Appeals Chamber found that the Appellant had "failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred in disregarding the alleged inconsistencies in its overall evaluation of the evidence as being compelling and credible, and in accepting the totality of the evidence as being sufficient to enter a finding of guilt beyond reasonable doubt on these grounds."[36]

B. The Burden and Standard of Proof at Trial: General principles governing assessment of evidence by the Trial Chamber

22. Musema has raised six preliminary points largely based on what he alleges to be errors in the Trial Chamber's observations as to how it intended to or did assess the evidence at trial. He claims that the Trial Chamber consistently committed the said errors in its assessment of the evidence and that the failure of the Trial Chamber to apply the correct burden and standard of proof to the facts before it meant that he was wrongly convicted.[37]

23. Before examining the Trial Chamber's precise factual findings, the Appeals Chamber will first briefly consider these general allegations.

1. Burden and standard of proof

(a) Arguments of the parties

24. Musema alleges that the Trial Chamber "consistently erred in its statements of the law regarding the burden and standard of proof."[38] He maintains that the Trial Chamber failed to apply the correct test in assessing evidence, whereby it is the duty of the Prosecution, save in certain cases, to prove the

It is clear from the above findings of the Trial Chamber, that the alleged inconsistency between Witness R's testimony that he treated his wound with cow butter and his earlier testimony that he treated it with penicillin was satisfactorily explained to the Trial Chamber.[152] There remains the allegation of inconsistency as to whether Witness R had the wound treated in Rwirambo or not. In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, this allegation is not such as would cause a reasonable Trial Chamber to reject Witness R's testimony. Considering Witness R's testimony, when taken as a whole and specifically in relation to Musema's involvement in the attack, the Appeals Chamber holds that the Trial Chamber had the discretion to find the alleged inconsistency inadequate to substantially cast doubt on Witness R's testimony. Thus, although not specifically mentioned in the Trial Judgement, it was not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to find Witness R credible.

90. With regard to Musema's challenge to his identification by Witness R,[153] the Appeals Chamber first recalls that neither the Statute nor the Rules oblige the Trial Chamber to require evidence of any particular kind for purposes of identification. Pursuant to Rule 89 of the Rules, a Chamber "may admit any relevant evidence which it deems to have probative value". The Appeals Chamber has previously acknowledged that a Trial Chamber is best placed to assess the evidence presented at trial; whether it will rely on a single witness testimony as proof of a material fact will depend on various factors that have to be assessed in the circumstances of each case.[154] In the same vein, it is for the Trial Chamber to assess the evidence of identification given by witnesses and to determine whether it is reliable in the light of the circumstances of the case. Unless it is shown that the Trial Chamber's assessment was wholly erroneous, the Appeals Chamber will defer thereto.

91. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that, while stating that he was at a "rather lengthy distance" from Musema, the witness also testified that he had known Musema previously;[155] that testimony about the date of his injury. During the Kayishema and Ruzindana trial, he testified on 13 November 1997, stating that his injury occurred on 29 April. More than a year later, he testified before the Trial Chamber in the instant case on 25 February 1999 and stated the date to be "between the 27th of April and the 3rd or 4th of May". See T, 25 February 1999, p. 104.

[152] The Appeals Chamber observes that during his testimony in the Kayishema and Ruzindana trial, Witness R was examined in relation to events occurring on 13 and 14 May 1994. Witness R explained that he was still suffering from his wound on those dates and added that he was able to purchase penicillin to treat the wound. See The Prosecutor v. Clement Kayishema and Obed Ruzindana, Case No. ICTR-95-1-T, 13 November 1997, pp. 109-110. Accordingly, Witness R's explanation that he was not able to obtain penicillin soon after his injury (i.e between 27 April and 4 May) but much later (i.e 13 and 14 May), is not necessarily inconsistent.

[153] Musema refers to para. 62 of the Defence Closing Argument, filed 28 June 1999, "Therefore, examine carefully the circumstances in which the identification by each eyewitness was made. What was the witness doing at the time? What were the circumstances? Was the situation one in which he was capable of making his own identification, or is the identification based on information from someone else? Could there be grounds for an association with the accused rather than a viewing of the accused himself? How long did the witness have the person he says was the Defendant under observation? At what distance? In what light? Did anything interfere with the observation? Had the witness ever seen the accused before? If so, how often? If only occasionally, had he any special reason for remembering him?". (See Appellant's Brief, para. 144).

[154] Kayishema/Ruzindana Appeal Judgement, para. 187; Akayesu Appeal Judgement, para. 132; Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para. 63; Tadić Appeal Judgement, para. 65; Celebići Appeal Judgement, para. 506.

[155] T, 25 February 1999, p. 70.

Furthermore, upon review of the Trial Judgement on this issue, the Appeals Chamber also notes that most of the matters raised in Musema's arguments concerning the credibility of Witness AC were noted by the Trial Chamber.[241]

134. The Trial Chamber's factual findings[242] based, though not entirely, on Witness AC's testimony reveal that a large-scale attack occurred on 14 May 1994 on Muyira Hill; that AC saw Musema arrive in his red Pajero; that the attack was led by Musema and Ndimbati; that Musema, who was carrying a firearm and a belt of ammunition, fired gunshots, which, according to AC, hit an old man by the name of Ntambiye and another called Iamuremye,[243] that, on being attacked by the assailants led by Musema and Ndimbati, the refugees defended themselves with stones, but that the military fired tear gas at them; and that the attackers left the scene at 18:00hrs. As was observed by the Trial Chamber on two occasions, there was no cross-examination of Witness AC specific to this attack.[244] Various aspects of Witness AC's testimony were also corroborated by the testimony of Witnesses F, T and D in material respects.[245] On the question of corroboration of testimony, the Appeals Chamber recalls its earlier statements with regard to the Trial Chamber's discretion to assess the evidence and testimony before it. Thus, although not bound to do so, a Trial Chamber may require that the testimony of a witness be corroborated. The Appeals Chamber finds that it was within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to accept the evidence of AC to the extent that it was corroborated by other testimony. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber also recalls that "a tribunal of fact must never look at the evidence of each witness, as if it existed in a hermetically sealed compartment; it is the accumulation of all the evidence in the case which must be considered. The evidence of one witness, when considered by itself, may appear to be of poor quality, but it may gain strength from other evidence of the case."[246]

135. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not err in accepting the evidence of Witness AC on condition that it was corroborated by other testimony. Furthermore, Musema's submissions on the alleged unreliable features of Witness AC's testimony do not, in the view of the Appeals Chamber, directly challenge the material aspects of AC's evidence. Thus, notwithstanding Musema's arguments, Witness AC's evidence concerning Musema's participation in the 14 May 1994 attack which is corroborated by the evidence of Witnesses F, T and D, remains credible.

[241] See for example, Trial Judgement, para. 450 (concerning AC not being able to remember the names of his wife and children); paras. 452-453 (concerning the inconsistent account of AC's statement dated 12 June 1996 regarding a meeting in Kibuye and AC's refusal to answer questions relating to an incident concerning the fact that AC did not mention Bagosora) and para. 476 (concerning the fact that Witness AC did not mention Musema in the Kayishema and Ruzindana trial and did not mention having seen Prime Minister Jean Kambanda at Nyakavumu cave).

[242] Trial Judgement, paras 711 to 712.

[243] The Trial Chamber, however, did not find that it was established beyond a reasonable doubt that Musema shot a certain Ntambiye and a certain Iamuremye during the attack. See Trial Judgement, para. 752.

[244] Trial Judgement, para. 448 and para. 713.

[245] Ibid., paras. 714 to 717.

[246] Tadic Judgement (on Allegations of Contempt), para. 92. Also, see generally, Attorney General of Hong Kong v. Wong Muk Ping [1987] 2 All ER 488, PC, where the court found it "dangerous to assess the credibility of the evidence given by any witness in isolation from other evidence in the case which is capable of throwing light on its reliability."

209. In considering the manner in which the Trial Chamber applied the burden and standard of proof, the Appeals Chamber must start off by assuming that the words used in the Trial Judgement accurately describe the approach adopted by the Trial Chamber.

210. It is apparent from the above examples that, prima facie, the Trial Chamber appears to have used, on several occasions, different terms in relation to the question of alibi. The issue is whether, in doing so, the Trial Chamber applied a burden and/or standard of proof that was inconsistent with its own statement of the relevant law. The Appeals Chamber will therefore seek to discover the Trial Chamber's intention when it used such wording.

211. Hence, the Appeals Chamber will carry out below an in-depth analysis of the findings of the Trial Chamber with respect to each location. The consequences of any erroneous application of the law or unreasonable interpretation of a fact must be considered on a case-by-case basis.

(c) Errors in the assessment of the alibi with regard to specific locations

212. Having found that the Trial Chamber did not err in its findings as to the credibility of each of the witnesses on whose testimonies it relied to convict, the Appeals Chamber will now consider whether the Trial Chamber erred in rejecting Musema's alibi and, as a result, failed to acquit him.

213. However, before considering each of the locations in question, the Appeals Chamber notes that although, for reasons stated in the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber rejected the alibi raised by Musema in relation to the sites considered, it has found, in relation to four incidents, that the alibi was such as to cast doubt on the Prosecution's allegations.

214. First, with regard to Karongi Hill (18 April 1994), the Trial Chamber expressed the opinion that, taking into account Musema's alibi (the testimonies of Musema and Claire Kayuku), the documentary evidence (Exhibit D45), and the arguments of the Prosecution on this point, the sole testimony of Witness M was insufficient to prove beyond reasonable doubt that Musema was present at the location.[390] Second, with regard to Biyiniro Hill (31 May 1994), the Trial Chamber found that the alibi (Musema's testimony) and the documents tendered in support thereof (Musema's passport, Exhibit D56, entitled "Autorisation de sortie de fonds" and Exhibit D54, cast doubt on the Prosecution's allegations.[391] Third, with regard to the attack of 5 June 1994, near Muyira Hill, the Trial Chamber found that the alibi (the testimonies of Musema and Claire Kayaku, together with Exhibits D57, 58 and 59) cast a reasonable doubt on the Prosecution's allegations.[392] Lastly, with regard to Nyarutovu cellule (22 June 1994), the Trial Chamber found that the alibi (the testimonies of Musema alibi to escape responsibility, why would he state in the calendar and interviews with the Swiss authorities that he was in Gisovu on those dates. He maintains that the fact that he did so suggests that he did not know the dates in question and that "[t]he logic employed by the Trial Chamber is therefore circular."[526]

315. The Trial Chamber found:

> Musema, throughout his testimony, affirmed that his handwritten calendar and the Swiss statements were inaccurate, and that any errors therein were subsequently corrected as documents were uncovered during investigations from, amongst other places, Gisovu Tea Factory. In some instances, such an explanation is valid. However, as regards the present period, the Chamber cannot accept such an explanation. In the said calendar and the 16 March 1995 Swiss statement, Musema clearly remembers being in Gisovu between 4 and 14 May 1994, and recalls that he was present the day the tea factory started up production. To remember such an occasion and one's presence thereat, is not, in the opinion of the Chamber, something one forgets and recalls only after seeing newly uncovered documents. Rather, it is an event which, as Director of the tea factory, Musema would beyond any doubt not have forgotten.[527]

316. The Appeals Chamber reiterates that, the task of weighing and assessing the evidence lies primarily with the Trial Chamber. Furthermore, it is for the Trial Chamber to determine whether a witness is credible or not. The Appeals Chamber will not lightly disturb findings of fact by a Trial Chamber, but rather will always accord the Trial Chambers a margin of deference with respect to findings of fact.[528] Musema has failed to show that no reasonable tribunal of fact could have reached the conclusion of guilt beyond a reasonable doubt. Hence, Musema has demonstrated neither that an error of fact has been committed nor that if such an error did occur, it occasioned a miscarriage of justice. Therefore, the appeal must fail on this point.

General conclusion

317. Given that the Trial Chamber, in its analysis, referred to the appropriate standard and burden of proof for the evaluation of alibi evidence,[529] and given also that it was careful to summarize Musema's alibi evidence with respect to each crime scene and that a trial judgement must be read holistically rather than as a series of independent watertight compartments, the Appeals Chamber has come to the conclusion that the alibi evidence was insufficient to cast reasonable doubt on the Prosecution case. Consequently, Musema's attempts to establish a defence of alibi failed in the face of the Prosecution case which, prima facie, proved beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused was present at the Muyira Hill and Mumataba Hill crime scenes at all relevant times in mid-May.

318. The Appeals Chamber concludes that Musema has failed to establish that the Trial Chamber

49. The admissibility of such evidence shall, as shall all other evidence, be determined through reference to the criteria of relevance and probative value, under Rule 89(C) of the Rules. Relevance is to be assessed through reference to the nexus between the evidence and the existence and/or commission of the conspiracy. As Judge Pal said in the Tokyo Judgement, speaking only of declarations and not acts:

> "In order to be competent as evidence the declaration must have been made in furtherance of the prosecution of the common object, or must constitute a part of the res gestae of some act done for the accomplishment of the object of the conspirators, otherwise such a statement should not be competent evidence against the others."[23]

50. The extent to which such evidence will prove merely the existence of a conspiracy, rather than the participation of the Accused in that conspiracy, will be a matter of assessment by the Chamber.

Hearsay evidence

51. The Chamber notes that hearsay evidence is not inadmissible per se, even when it cannot be examined at its source or when it is not corroborated by direct evidence. Rather, the Chamber has considered such hearsay evidence, with caution, in accordance with Rule 89. The Chamber further notes that, where it has relied upon such evidence, that evidence has, as with all other evidence, been subject to the tests of relevance, probative value and reliability discussed above.

Evidence not presented

[23] The International Military Tribunal for the Far East (29 April 1946 - 12 November 1948). See Röling, B.V.A and Rüter, C.F. (eds), The Tokyo Judgment, vol. II (Amsterdam, APA-University Press Amsterdam BV, 1977), p. 630.

proper motion form, under Rule 91(B)."[92] He argues that the Defence would be put in "an untenable position" if it had to file a motion in order to seriously allege false testimony.[93] Musema asserts that the Defence is only required to cast reasonable doubt on the Prosecution evidence, and is not required to institute proceedings against one or the other Prosecution witness in order to prove that they are lying.[94] On the contrary, under Rule 91(B), only the Trial Chamber has the power to initiate such proceedings.[95] Musema submits that the Trial Chamber's misapplication of the law placed an extra burden on him and implied that no allegation of false testimony would be considered unless proceedings in respect thereof were instituted under Rule 91.[96]

52. In the Prosecution's opinion, Musema's allegations reveal a misinterpretation both of the Trial Judgement and of Rule 91(B).[97] First, the Prosecution submits that under case-law, an accused may bring an allegation of false testimony before the Chamber,[98] and that once proceedings are instituted under the above-mentioned provision, the onus is on the party raising the allegation to satisfy the Chamber that there are strong grounds for believing that a witness has given false testimony.[99] Secondly, the Prosecution states that Musema fails to distinguish "between testimony that is incredible and testimony that constitutes false testimony."[100] It submits that the Trial Chamber simply meant to state that "challenges that go beyond an attack on credibility and implicate averments that a witness has committed perjury must be initiated and pursued consistently with Rule 91(B).[101] The Prosecution further submits that at no point, did the Trial Chamber impose on the Defence the additional burden alleged.[102]

(b) Discussion

53. Musema has not provided any instances in which he suffered prejudice as a result of the Trial Chamber's alleged error of law. On the contrary, he seems to be making a general allegation concerning his entire case, that "[b]y its misapplication of the law [the Trial Chamber] has misjudged the challenges to evidence made by the Defence."[103]

54. His allegation relates to paragraphs 98 and 99 of the Trial Judgement, where the Trial Chamber stated:

II. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

7. The Appeals Chamber recalls the applicable standards of appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber reviews only errors of law which have the potential to invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and errors of fact which have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[13]

8. Regarding errors of law, the Appeals Chamber has stated:

> Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[14]

9. Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, the Appeals Chamber will articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly.[15] In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but, when necessary, also applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the appellant before that finding may be confirmed on appeal.[16]

10. Regarding errors of fact, it is well established that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by the Trial Chamber:

> Where the Defence alleges an erroneous finding of fact, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial, and it will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. Furthermore, the erroneous finding will be revoked or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[17]

the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[18] Arguments which do not have the potential to cause the impugned decision to be reversed or revised may be immediately dismissed by the Appeals Chamber and need not be considered on the merits.[19]

12. In order for the Appeals Chamber to assess arguments on appeal, the appealing party must provide precise references to relevant transcript pages or paragraphs in the decision or judgement to which the challenge is made.[20] Moreover, the Appeals Chamber cannot be expected to consider a party's submissions in detail if they are obscure, contradictory, vague, or suffer from other formal and obvious insufficiencies.[21] Finally, the Appeals Chamber has inherent discretion in selecting which submissions merit a detailed reasoned opinion in writing, and it will dismiss arguments which are evidently unfounded without providing detailed reasoning.[22]

analysis the evidence of Witness MO38 in favour of Witness TQ who had been accused of genocide.[162]

78. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber correctly inferred that Muvunyi tacitly approved of the participation of ESO Camp soldiers in the attack at the Groupe scolaire from the order given to save the Bicunda family, his attempts to save a child of this family who was mistakenly taken, his refusal to come to the assistance of the other refugees, and his overall conduct in allowing a contingent of armed soldiers to leave the camp to participate in the attack.[163] The Prosecution contends that Muvunyi has not demonstrated that it was unreasonable to rely on the evidence of Witness TQ.[164] The Prosecution also notes that the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Muvunyi knew about the attack is reasonable in light of the proximity of the camp to the Groupe scolaire and the repeated nature of the attacks.[165]

79. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime, which have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[166] The requisite mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[167]

80. An accused may be convicted of aiding and abetting when it is established that his conduct amounted to tacit approval and encouragement of the crime and that such conduct substantially contributed to the crime.[168] In cases where tacit approval or encouragement has been found to be the basis for criminal responsibility, it has been the authority of the accused combined with his presence at or very near the crime scene, especially if considered together with his prior conduct, which allows the conclusion that the accused's conduct amounted to official sanction of the crime and thus substantially contributed to it.[169] The question of whether a given act constitutes substantial assistance to a crime requires a fact-based inquiry.[170]

81. The Trial Chamber refers only to limited circumstantial evidence suggesting that Muvunyi tacitly approved the criminal conduct of the principal perpetrators. It is well established that, as a

even though it did not find credible his evidence that no meeting occurred.[285] The Prosecution highlights that a Trial Chamber has the discretion to accept some parts of a witness's testimony and to reject others.[286]

128. The Appeals Chamber has previously held that reliance upon evidence of accomplice witnesses per se does not constitute a legal error.[287] The Appeals Chamber noted, however, that "considering that accomplice witnesses may have motives or incentives to implicate the accused person before the Tribunal, a Chamber, when weighing the probative value of such evidence, is bound to carefully consider the totality of circumstances in which it was tendered."[288] In addition, the Appeals Chamber recalls that a Trial Chamber has the discretion to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, witness testimony and that it is not unreasonable for a trier of fact to accept some, but reject other parts of a witness's testimony.[289]

129. Nevertheless, the Appeals Chamber is not convinced that a reasonable trier of fact could have accepted Witness YAQ's evidence concerning Muvunyi's speech in Gikonko in May or June 1994, given its rationale for rejecting the witness's evidence in relation to a similar event in Rumba cellule. In assessing Witness YAQ's evidence implicating Muvunyi in inciting genocide at the Rumba cellule roadblock, the Trial Chamber expressly noted that he was an accomplice and that it viewed his evidence with caution.[290] In particular, the Trial Chamber stated that "[Witness] YAQ was an Interahamwe militiaman and had reason to enhance Muvunyi's participation in the genocidal campaign and in that way attempt to diminish his own role therein."[291] The Trial Chamber ultimately rejected his testimony concerning Rumba cellule because "in the circumstances of the present case, the evidence of Witness YAQ is not sufficiently reliable or credible to ground a finding of fact beyond reasonable doubt that a meeting took place at the roadblock in Rumba cellule on 24 April 1994 at which the Accused incited the population to kill Tutsis."[292]

130. While the Prosecution contends that Muvunyi failed to show that Witness YAQ had a reason to lie, such a motive plainly follows from the Trial Chamber's own assessment of the witness's account in other parts of the Trial Judgement. The Trial Chamber's reasons for rejecting came to be addressed.[51] The Government of Rwanda filed its Amicus Curiae Brief on 15 February 2000[52] and the Prosecutor's Request for Review and Reconsideration was heard in Arusha on 22 February 2000.

26. On 31 March 2000 the Appeals Chamber reviewed its Decision of 3 November 1999 in light of the new facts, which diminished the role played by the Prosecution's failings and the extent of the violation of the rights of Appellant Barayagwiza,[53] although such violation was confirmed by the Chamber.[54] It considered that the new facts presented by the Prosecutor could have been decisive in the decision, in particular as regards the remedy which had been ordered.[55] As a consequence, the Appeals Chamber replaced the Disposition in the Decision of 3 November 1999, rejecting the Appellant's application for his release and deciding to modify the remedy ordered by providing either for financial compensation if the Appellant was found not guilty, or for reduction of his sentence if he was convicted.[56]

27. Thereafter, Appellant Barayagwiza filed a motion for review or reconsideration of the Decision of 31 March 2000,[57] and that motion was dismissed on 14 September 2000 without examination of the merits.[58] On 23 June 2006, the Appeals Chamber dismissed a further motion by Appellant Barayagwiza which inter alia requested the reconsideration and annulment of the Decision of 31 March 2000, as well as examination of the abuse of process allegedly committed by the Trial Chamber since the Decision of 3 November 1999; the Chamber held that the proper place for such requests was in an appeal against the Judgement on the merits.[59] The Appeals Chamber will consider below the arguments in this respect developed by the Appellant in his submissions on appeal.[60]

2. Examination of the Appellant's arguments

28. The right of an accused to be tried before an independent tribunal is an integral component of his right to a fair trial as provided in Articles 19 and 20 of the Statute.[61] Article 11(1) of the Statute provides that "[t]he Chambers shall be composed of sixteen permanent independent judges, no two of whom may be nationals of the same State, and a maximum at any one time of nine ad litem independent judges appointed in accordance with article 12 ter, paragraph 2, of the present Statute, no two of whom may be nationals of the same State". The independence of the Judges of the Tribunal is guaranteed by the standards for their selection,[62] the method of their appointment,[63] their conditions of service[64] and the immunity they enjoy.[65] The Appeals Chamber further notes that the independence of the Tribunal as a judicial organ was affirmed by the Secretary-General at the time when the Tribunal was created,[66] and the Chamber reaffirms that this institutional independence means that the Tribunal is entirely independent of the organs of the United Nations[67] and of any State or group of States.[68] Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber considers that there is a strong presumption that the Judges of the Tribunal take their decisions in full independence,[69] and it is for the Appellant to rebut this presumption.

29. The Appeals Chamber observes that the Appellant provides various illustrations of what he terms "pressures", which allegedly prevented the Judges from reaching their decision in full independence; it will set these out, and then consider each of them in turn.

(a) Pressures exerted by the Government of Rwanda

30. The Appellant includes in the pressures allegedly exerted by Rwanda following the Decision of 3 November 1999: the official and public condemnation of this Decision by the Government of Rwanda; the subsequent suspension of its cooperation with the Tribunal;[70] the refusal to allow the Prosecutor to visit her office in Kigali;[71] the refusal to receive her and the

In particular, the Judges of the Tribunal shall be elected by the General Assembly from a list submitted by the Security Council, which prevents abusive or discriminatory nominations and ensures that no State or group of States shall play a dominating role in the nomination of Judges.

[64] The conditions of service and compensation for Judges of the Tribunal are established by the General Assembly (see for example, Questions relating to the programme budget for the biennium 1998–1999, UN Doc. A/RES/53/214, 11 February 1999, section VIII). These ensure that Judges have financial security during and after their mandate.

(1) on the impartial and independent character of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 ("ICTY"), and found that ICTY was "an international court which, in view of the content of its Statute and Rules of Procedure, offers all the necessary guarantees including those of impartiality and independence, in view of the content of its Statute and Rules of Procedure". It should be emphasised that these same guarantees were reproduced in the Statute and Rules of the Tribunal, the Statute of the Tribunal being an adaptation of that of ICTY and the Rules of the Tribunal being based on those of ICTY (see paragraphs 9 and 18 of the UN Secretary-General's Report of 13 February 1995 and Article 14 of the Statute which provides that the Judges would adopt the Rules of Evidence and Procedure of ICTY ("ICTY Rules") with such changes as they deemed necessary).

continued suspension of its cooperation after the filing of the Prosecutor's Request for Review and Reconsideration,[72] and the statements – akin to threats according to the Appellant – made by the Attorney General of Rwanda at the hearing of 22 February 2000.[73]

31. The Appellant submits that the political pressures exerted by the Government of Rwanda resulted in the refusal by the Registrar, in violation of the Decision of 3 November 1999, to release him,[74] and in the subsequent decisions rendered by the Appeals Chamber: (1) the stay of execution of the Decision of 3 November 1999, and the continued detention of the Appellant;[75] (2) the leave to appear as amicus curiae granted to the Government of Rwanda;[76] and (3) the review, on 31 March 2000, of its Decision of 3 November 1999. He further alleges that this review and the prior proceedings violated his right to a fair hearing or amounted to an abuse of process.[77]

32. The Appeals Chamber notes that certain official statements from Rwanda, following the Decision of 3 November 1999, may be regarded as an attempt to exert pressure on the Tribunal in order to prevent the release of the Appellant as ordered by that Decision. The same applies to the suspension of cooperation of Rwanda with the Tribunal. However, the Appeals Chamber considers that the fact that pressures were exerted is not enough to establish that the Judges who ruled in this context on the Prosecutor's Request for Review or Reconsideration were influenced by those pressures.

33. Concerning the release of Appellant Barayagwiza ordered by the Decision of 3 November 1999, the Appeals Chamber observes that such release could only have taken place after the Registrar had taken the necessary measures for delivering him to the Cameroonian authorities.[78] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Appellant produces no evidence capable of convincing the Appeals Chamber that the Registrar violated the terms of the Decision of 3 November 1999.[79]

34. As to the decision to order a stay of execution of the Decision of 3 November 1999, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Appellant merely makes a vague allegation without demonstrating how the Government of Rwanda influenced that order. The Appeals Chamber therefore rejects this contention.

35. Lastly, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the purpose of the request by the Government of the Republic of Rwanda for leave to appear as amicus curiae was to state Rwanda's position as to the choice of location for the release of the Appellant.[80] The Appeals [78] This condition had in fact been expressly reaffirmed in the Order of 25 November 1999.

[79] Moreover, Appellant Barayagwiza can hardly argue that the Registrar violated the Decision of 3 November 1999, since on 5 November 1999 he himself filed a "Notice for Review and Stay of Dispositive Order No. 4 of the Decision of the Appeals Chamber dated 3 November 1999" (Dispositive Order No. 4 instructed the Registrar to take the necessary measures to transfer the Appelant to the Cameroon authorities), and only withdrew this on 18 November 1999.

arrangements for more time with Counsel for one of the other two Accused.[459] Mr. Barletta-Calderera chose to come to an arrangement with a colleague and requested an additional 15 minutes at the beginning of the next hearing,[460] which was granted by the Trial Chamber.[461] The Appeals Chamber accordingly concludes that the Appellant's appeal on this point is totally without merit.

192. For the above reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds that Appellant Barayagwiza has failed to show that the Trial Chamber abused its discretionary power by violating the right of the Appellant to examine Prosecution witnesses. The allegation of bias is also rejected.

B. Appellant Barayagwiza's submissions concerning the Trial Chamber's assessment of evidence

1. Assessment of the credibility of certain Prosecution witnesses

193. In his fortieth ground of appeal, Appellant Barayagwiza contends generally that the Trial Chamber erred in presuming that the Prosecution witnesses were credible unless proven otherwise in cross-examination, thus reversing the burden of proof.[462] He stresses that it is for the Prosecutor to establish that its witnesses are credible, that the accused should always be presumed innocent and that the testimony against him should therefore be "treated critically and sceptically".[463] He further contends that it was particularly dangerous to proceed as the Trial Chamber did in a case where the accused was to be tried in absentia and had given no instructions to Counsel, since the latter were restricted in the material they could deploy in order to challenge the witnesses' evidence.[464] The Appellant argues that this error of law invalidated the Trial Chamber's findings of credibility in the case of several Prosecution witnesses and seeks reversal of the Trial Chamber's findings based on their testimony.[465]

194. The Appeals Chamber recalls that statements made by witnesses in court are presumed to be credible at the time they are made; the fact that the statements are taken under oath and that witnesses can be cross-examined constitute at that stage satisfactory indicia of reliability.[466] However, the Trial Chamber has full discretionary power in assessing the appropriate weight and credibility to be accorded to the testimony of a witness.[467] This assessment is based on a number of factors, including the witness's demeanour in court, his role in the events in question, the plausibility and clarity of his testimony, whether there are contradictions or inconsistencies in his successive statements or between his testimony and other evidence, any prior examples of false testimony, any motivation to lie, and the witness's responses during cross-examination. Appellant Barayagwiza is therefore wrong in [463] Ibid., para. 324.

[464] Ibid., para. 325. See also paras. 74-75 and 91, where the Appellant contends that the Trial Chamber undermined the fairness of trial by finding certain Prosecution witnesses credible simply because their testimonies had not been successfully challenged in cross-examination, whereas several witnesses were not cross-examined because of the incompetence of Counsel or as a result of a decision by the Trial Chamber.

invoking the principle of the presumption of innocence in order to contend that it was for the Prosecutor to establish that its witnesses were credible.[468]

195. Even though, in the sections of the Judgement entitled "Credibility of witnesses", the Trial Chamber inter alia discussed the responses of witnesses during cross-examination, it cannot be inferred that this was the only factor considered by the Trial Chamber in determining whether or not the witnesses were credible. Thus the Trial Chamber undoubtedly assessed the credibility of Prosecution witnesses by observing their demeanour in court and by evaluating their testimonies, even though it does not always mentioned this expressly.[469] Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber notes that, in assessing the credibility of several of the witnesses mentioned by the Appellant, the Trial Chamber did not confine itself to discussing the impact of cross-examination, but also expressly considered other factors relating to their credibility.[470] This ground of appeal therefore cannot succeed.

2. Assessment of expert witness testimonies

196. In his forty-first ground of appeal, Appellant Barayagwiza submits that the Trial Chamber erred in admitting the reports and testimonies of Expert Witnesses Des Forges, Chrétien and Kabanda.[471] Before considering the specific submissions advanced by the Appellant, it is necessary to recall certain principles that are applicable to expert witness testimonies.

197. Rule 94 bis of the Rules lays down specific rules for the disclosure of expert witness reports or statements and for the attendance of experts at hearings. Until its amendment on 27 May 2003, this Rule read as follows:

> (A) Notwithstanding the provisions of Rule 66 (A) (ii), Rule 73 bis (B) (iv) (b) and Rule 73 ter (B) (iii) (b) of the present Rules, the full statement of any expert witness called by a party shall be disclosed to the opposing party as early as possible and shall be filed with the Trial Chamber not less than twenty-one days prior to the date on which the expert is expected to testify.
> (B) Within fourteen days of filing of the statement of the expert witness, the opposing party shall file a notice to the Trial Chamber indicating whether:
>
> (i) It accepts the statement of the expert witness;
> (ii) It wishes to cross-examine the expert witness;

[469] In this regard, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber's duty to provide a reasoned decision does not require that it articulate every step of its reasoning for each particular finding it makes: Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgement, para. 23; Rutaganda Appeal Judgement, footnote 43.

[470] See, for example, Judgement, para. 465 (where the Trial Chamber considered the consistency of Witness BI's previous statements with his testimony and found generally that his testimony was clear and consistent), 547 (where the Trial Chamber, in assessing Witness X's credibility, took into account the fact that he had agreed to testify on condition that he receive immunity from prosecution), 608 (where the Trial Chamber notes that Witness GO's testimony was supported by documentary evidence), 711 (where the Trial Chamber takes into consideration Witness AAM's previous statements), 775 (where the Trial Chamber takes into account that Witness AHI is imprisoned in Gisenyi and that his case is on appeal), 812 (where the Trial Chamber considers certain previous statements by Witness EB and finds that he was clear and consistent in his account of events, that he was careful to distinguish what he saw from what he was reporting), 813 (where the Trial Chamber finds that Witness AGX's testimony was clear and consistent).

> evidence other than hearsay that Ngeze was arrested at all. Their sources of information were vague, with the exception of three witnesses who learned of the arrest from Ngeze himself.

427. The Trial Chamber summarized the Defence witnesses' testimonies in support of the alibi as follows:

> A number of Defence witnesses testified to the date of Ngeze's arrest in April 1994. Witness BAZ2, Witness RM1, Witness RM5, Witness BAZ6, Witness RM19, Witness BAZ9 and Witness BAZ15 testified that Ngeze was arrested on 6 April 1994. Witnesses RM13 and Witness BAZ3 testified that Ngeze was arrested just after Habyarimana's death. Witness RM2 testified that Ngeze was arrested on 6-7 April 1994. Witness BAZ1 testified that Ngeze was arrested the day before 6 April 1994 and was detained for three days. Witness RM117 testified that Ngeze was arrested on 7 April 1994. Witness RM112 testified that he found out on 7 April 1994 that Ngeze had been arrested. As to the date of Ngeze's release from prison, Witness RM5 and Witness RM2 testified that Ngeze was released on 9 April 1994. Witness BAZ2, Witness RM112 and Witness RM1 testified that Ngeze was released on 10 April 1994. Witness BAZ15 testified that Ngeze was released after about six days in custody. Witness BAZ9 testified that she saw Ngeze on 10 April 1994. Witness BAZ31 testified that Ngeze went into hiding from 6 April 1994. All of these witnesses learned of Ngeze's arrest from other people. Witness RM112, Witness RM19 and Witness BAZ15 testified that they heard about the arrest from Ngeze himself. The other witnesses heard about the arrest from people on the street or other Muslims, or knew of it as a matter of common knowledge.[1000]

428. The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber could validly conclude that "none of the Defence witnesses had evidence other than hearsay that Ngeze was arrested at all" and that in most cases their sources of information were vague.[1001] However, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that an analysis of Defence witnesses testimonies relating to the alibi from 6 to 9 April 1994 does not demonstrate that those testimonies are "thoroughly inconsistent" (in the words of the authentic, English, text of the Judgement).[1002] From the outset, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that two testimonies corroborate one another when one prima facie credible testimony is compatible with the other prima facie credible testimony regarding the same fact or a sequence of linked facts. It is not necessary that both testimonies be identical in all aspects or describe the same fact in the same way. Every witness presents what he has seen from his own point of view at the time of the events, or according to how he understood the events recounted by others. It follows that corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony.

429. Here, the testimonies of Witnesses BAZ-2,[1003] RM-1,[1004] RM-5,[1005] BAZ-6,[1006] RM-19[1007] and BAZ-15[1008] are consistent regarding the allegation that the Appelant Ngeze was

478. The Appeals Chamber recalls that commission covers, primarily, the physical perpetration of a crime (with criminal intent) or a culpable omission of an act that is mandated by a rule of criminal law, but also participation in a joint criminal enterprise.[1153] However, it does not appear that the Prosecutor charged the Appellants at trial with responsibility for their participation in a joint criminal enterprise,[1154] and the Appeals Chamber does not deem it appropriate to discuss this mode of participation here.[1155]

479. The actus reus of "planning" requires that one or more persons design the criminal conduct constituting one or more statutory crimes that are later perpetrated.[1156] It is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct.[1157] The mens rea for this mode of responsibility entails the intent to plan the commission of a crime or, at a minimum, the awareness of substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of the acts or omissions planned.[1158]

480. The actus reus of "instigating" implies prompting another person to commit an offence.[1159] It is not necessary to prove that the crime would not have been perpetrated without the involvement of the accused; it is sufficient to demonstrate that the instigation was a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of another person committing the crime.[1160] The mens rea for this mode of responsibility is the intent to instigate another person to commit a crime or at a miminum the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of the act or omission instigated.[1161]

481. With respect to ordering, a person in a position of authority[1162] may incur responsibility for ordering another person to commit an offence,[1163] if the person who received the order actually proceeds to commit the offence subsequently. Responsibility is also incurred when an individual in a position of authority orders an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that order, and if that crime is effectively committed subsequently by the person who received the order.[1164]

482. The actus reus of aiding and abetting[1165] is constituted by acts or omissions[1166] aimed specifically at assisting, furthering or lending moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which substantially contributed to the perpetration of the crime.[1167] Contrary to the three modes of responsibility discussed above (which require that the conduct of the accused precede the perpetration of the crime itself), the actus reus of aiding and abetting may occur before, during or after the principal crime.[1168] The mens rea for aiding and abetting is knowledge that acts performed by the aider and abettor assist in the commission of the crime by the principal.[1169] It is not necessary for the accused to know the precise crime which was intended and which in the event was committed,[1170] but he must be aware of its essential elements.[1171]

483. The Appeals Chamber concludes by recalling that the modes of responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute are not mutually exclusive and that it is possible to charge more than one mode in relation to a crime if this is necessary in order to reflect the totality of the accused's conduct.[1172]

B. Responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute

484. The Appeals Chamber recalls that, for the liability of an accused to be established under Article 6(3) of the Statute, the Prosecutor has to show that: (1) a crime over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction was committed; (2) the accused was a de jure or de facto superior of the perpetrator of the crime and had effective control over this subordinate (i.e., he had the material ability to prevent or punish commission of the crime by his subordinate); (3) the accused knew or had reason to know that the crime was going to be committed or had been [1165] The French version of some Appeal and Trial Judgements of this Tribunal and of the ICTY mention the term "complicité" ("complicity") rather than "aide et encouragement" ("aiding and abetting"). The Appeals Chamber prefers "aide et encouragement" because these terms are the ones used in Article 6(1) of the Statute. Furthermore, the Statute uses the word "complicité" in a very specific context (see Article 2(3)(e) of the Statute); it should thus be reserved for that context.

The Trial Chamber also referred to instances of RTLM broadcasting information designed to facilitate the killing of Tutsi. Thus Charles Kalinjabo was killed at a roadblock after RTLM called on all Tutsi who were not Inkotanyi to join their Hutu comrades at the roadblocks.[1240] The neighbours of Witness FW, including "Rubayiza Abdallar" and "Sultan", were killed on 11 April 1994, when they returned home after an RTLM broadcast aired on the same day telling all the Tutsi who had fled their homes to return because a search for guns was to be conducted and the houses of all those who were not home would be destroyed.[1241] The Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that it has not been demonstrated that it was unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to find that the RTLM broadcasts after 6 April 1994 substantially contributed to the killing of these individuals.[1242]

(ii) Link between articles in Kangura and the commission of acts of genocide

516. Paragraph 950 of the Trial Judgement reads as follows:

> 950. The Chamber found, as set forth in paragraphs 245 and 246, that The Appeal to the Conscience of the Hutu and The Ten Commandments, published in Kangura No. 6 in December 1990, conveyed contempt and hatred for the Tutsi ethnic group, and for Tutsi women in particular as enemy agents, and called on readers to take all necessary measures to stop the enemy, defined to be the Tutsi population. Other editorials and articles published in Kangura echoed the contempt and hatred for Tutsi found in The Ten Commandments and were clearly intended to fan the flames of ethnic hatred, resentment and fear against the Tutsi population and Hutu political opponents who supported the Tutsi ethnic group. The cover of Kangura No. 26 promoted violence by conveying the message that the machete should be used to eliminate the Tutsi, once and for all. This was a call for the destruction of the Tutsi ethnic group as such. Through fear-mongering and hate propaganda, Kangura paved the way for genocide in Rwanda, whipping the Hutu population into a killing frenzy.

The Trial Chamber thus found that Kangura contributed, at least in part, to the killing of Tutsi civilians,[1243] and that Appellant Ngeze must be held responsible on this account.[1244]

517. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that these findings are problematic in several respects. First, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the provisions on the temporal jurisdiction of the Tribunal precluded the Trial Chamber from relying on acts of instigation dating from before 1 January 1994 in convicting Appellant Ngeze.[1245] The Appeals Chamber has also held that the Appellant could not be convicted on the basis of publications of Kangura prior to 1 January 1994, allegedly re-circulated or repeated as a result of the competition organized in 1994.[1246] Thus the question which should have been addressed by the Trial Chamber was whether the Kangura articles published in 1994 (and not all of the articles published in Kangura) did in effect substantially contribute to the commission of acts of genocide in 1994.

[1240] Judgement, para. 482; see also para. 449.
[1241] Ibid., paras. 449 and 482.
[1242] As held above (supra IV. A. 2. (c) (iii)), the testimony of Witness FS has been excluded with respect to Appellant Barayagwiza. The Appeals Chamber is however of the view that the finding that the RTLM broadcasts after 6 April 1994 substantially contributed to the commission of acts of genocide should be upheld on the basis of other evidence mentioned here.

518. Further, the Trial Chamber considered that, even though "the evidence does not establish a specific link between the publication and subsequent events, [...] a link was clearly perceived by many witnesses such as Witness AHI, Witness ABE and Nsanzuwera, suggesting that Kangura greatly contributed to the climate leading to these events, if not causing them directly".[1247] The Trial Chamber then adds that "[a]t times Kangura called explicitly on its readers to take action. More generally, its message of prejudice and fear paved the way for massacres of the Tutsi population".[1248] The Appeals Chamber emphasizes, however, that the specific examples given by Witness Nsanzuwera and Witness ABE of attacks on individuals following the publication of Kangura articles date back to 1990 and 1991 and do not fall within the temporal jurisdiction of the Tribunal. Moreover, none of the testimonies makes explicit reference to the impact of Kangura issues published after 1 January 1994.

519. While there is probably a link between the Appellant's acts, because of his role in Kangura, and the genocide, owing to the climate of violence to which the publication contributed and the incendiary discourse it contained,[1249] the Appeals Chamber considers that there was not enough evidence for a reasonable trier of fact to find beyond reasonable doubt that the Kangura publications in the first months of 1994 susbstantially contributed to the commission of acts of genocide between April and July 1994. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that the Trial Chamber erred in finding Appellant Ngeze guilty of the crime of genocide under Article 6(1) of the Statute for having "instigated" the killing of Tutsi civilians as founder, owner and editor of Kangura.[1250]

(iii) Link between CDR activities and the acts of genocide

520. Appellant Barayagwiza contends that no causal link was established between the activities of the CDR and the acts of genocide.[1251]

521. The Trial Chamber explained in paragraph 951 of the Judgement that:

> [t]he Hutu Power movement, spearheaded by CDR, created a political framework for the killing of Tutsi and Hutu political opponents. The CDR and its youth wing, the Impuzamugambi, convened meetings and demonstrations, established roadblocks, distributed weapons, and systematically organized and carried out the killing of Tutsi civilians. The genocidal cry of "tubatsembatsembe" or "let's exterminate them", referring to the Tutsi population, was chanted consistently at CDR meetings and demonstrations. As well as orchestrating particular acts of killing, the CDR promoted a Hutu mindset in which ethnic hatred was normalized as a political ideology. The division of Hutu and Tutsi entrenched fear and suspicion of the Tutsi and fabricated the perception that the Tutsi population had to be destroyed in order to safeguard the political gains that had been made by the Hutu majority.

exclusively on Expert Witness Des Forges' report and testimony, according to which the French Ambassador Yannick Gérard told the Appellant around the end of June or the beginning of July 1994 that the RTLM broadcasts attacking General Dallaire and UNAMIR must cease, that the Appellant promised to intervene with the RTLM journalists, and that the attacks ceased shortly thereafter.[1904]

830. The Appeals Chamber has already recalled that the role of expert witnesses is to assist the Trial Chamber in assessing the evidence before it and not to testify to facts in dispute as would ordinary witnesses.[1905] However, the Appellant does not appear to have objected at trial to this part of Expert Witness Des Forges' testimony.[1906] The Appeals Chamber recalls that, in principle, a party cannot refrain from raising an objection on an issue that was evident at trial, with a view to raising it on appeal if it has lost the case at first instance.[1907] In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Appellant waived his right to raise an objection to this portion of Expert Witness Des Forges' report and testimony.

831. Turning to the argument that the information received from Expert Witness Des Forges was secondary hearsay collected more than five years after the event, the Appeals Chamber recalls that trial chambers may admit and rely on hearsay testimony if they consider it to have probative value.[1908] In the instant case, the Trial Chamber noted that "Des Forges specifies in detail that her source of information about Nahimana's interaction with the French Government is a diplomat who was himself present in meetings between Nahimana and French Ambassador Yannick Gérard, who had a documentary record of the interaction in the form of a diplomatic telegram", and it considered that this piece of information was reliable.[1909] The Appeals Chamber finds that this conclusion was reasonable.

832. The Appellant further submits that, even if the matters reported by Expert Witness Des Forges were true, they could not constitute evidence that the Appellant effectively intervened with RTLM journalists to halt the attacks on UNAMIR and General Dallaire. The Appeals Chamber notes that, according to Expert Witness Des Forges' report and testimony, the said attacks ceased "immediately"[1910] or within two days[1911] after the Appellant met Ambassador Gérard. In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Trial Chamber could reasonably conclude that it was the Appellant's intervention that put an end to these attacks. The fact that the Appellant and Witness Bemeriki denied that there was However, contrary to what the Chamber appears to be saying in paragraph 543 of the Judgement, Expert Witness Des Forges did not rely solely on her conversation of 28 February 2000 with Jean-Christophe Belliard at the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs; in her report, she also cites a press report by Anne Chaon of 7 July 2002.

[1905] See supra IV. B. 2. (b) and XII. B. 3. (b) (i) a.

[1906] Nahimana Appellant's Brief does not refer to any specific objection raised at trial. The Appeals Chamber notes that Appellant Nahimana submitted a written motion objecting generally to the scope of Witness Des Forges' testimony (see Motion to Restrict the Testimony of Alison Desforges [sic] to Matters Requiring Expert Evidence, 10 May 2002), but this motion did not specifically object to that aspect of Expert Witness Des Forges' report. Moreover the Appellant's motion was submitted prior to Witness Des Forges' testimony on this issue.

details provided in cross-examination undermined the credibility of the witness;[2157] (7) the Trial Chamber wrongly shifted the burden of proof onto the Appellant by asking him to prove the date on which an RTLM antenna was installed;[2158] (8) the fact, according to the witness, that the Appellant allegedly took part in a CDR meeting in 1991 is incorrect, since the CDR was only formed in 1992, and there is no evidence that a preliminary meeting may have taken place in 1991.[2159]

949. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the jurisprudence of the Tribunal does not require the corroboration of the testimony of a sole witness,[2160] and that the trial Judges are in the best position to assess the credibility of a witness and the reliability of the evidence adduced.[2161]

950. The Appeals Chamber considers at the outset that the Appellant's claim that Witness AHB committed many errors in his testimony concerning names of persons and locations and distances between locations[2162] should be dismissed without further consideration, in the complete absence of any details in this regard in the Appellant's Brief. Similarly, the Appeals Chamber will not examine the argument that the many inconsistencies in the witness' testimony should have impelled the Trial Chamber to find that the explanations provided by Witness AHB in cross-examination had the effect of undermining, not strengthening, his credibility,[2163] since this argument is not substantiated. Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber considers that the arguments as to the origin of the weapons distributed by the Appellant[2164] do not demonstrate that Witness AHB's testimony was unreliable, and cannot invalidate the finding of the Trial Chamber. Lastly, the allegation that the Appellant did not own a red vehicle[2165] does not show that Witness AHB's testimony was unreliable. These arguments are therefore summarily dismissed.

951. As to the allegation that Witness AHB gave several different versions of the events, the Appeals Chamber notes that, according to Appellant Barayagwiza, the witness "initially said that the Appellant contributed to the killings which started on 7th April 1994 because the Appellant delivered arms to Gisenyi. The second version of his evidence was that there were arms delivered by the army which were used on 7 April to kill Tutsi. In a third version the witness stated that the arms delivered by the Appellant were used to kill people who were not killed in the first phase."[2166] The Appeals Chamber observes that, contrary to what the Appellant claims, the extracts from Witness AHB's testimony at the hearing show that the witness had always asserted that the arms brought by Appellant Barayagwiza were used to kill Tutsi who were not killed in the attacks which took place on 7 April 1994.[2167]

the accused and the gravity of the crime.[2351] Generally, the Appeals Chamber will not substitute its own sentence for that imposed by the Trial Chamber unless it has been shown that the latter committed a manifest error in exercising its discretion, or failed to follow the applicable law.[2352]

1038. The factors that a Trial Chamber is obliged to take into account in sentencing a defendant are set out in Article 23 of the Statute and in Rule 101 of the Rules. They are:

> (1) the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda. However, Trial Chambers are not obliged to conform to that practice but need only to take account of it;[2353]
>
> (2) the gravity of the offences (i.e. the gravity of the crimes of which the accused has been convicted, and the form or degree of responsibility for these crimes). It is well established that this is the primary consideration in sentencing;[2354]
>
> (3) the individual circumstances of the accused, including aggravating and mitigating circumstances. Aggravating circumstances must be proved by the Prosecutor beyond reasonable doubt;[2355] the accused bears the burden of establishing mitigating factors based on the most probable hypothesis (or according to the term of art used in certain jurisdictions, "on a balance of probabilities").[2356] While the Trial Chamber is legally required to take into account any mitigating circumstances, what constitutes a mitigating circumstance and the weight to be accorded thereto is a matter for the Trial Chamber to determine in the exercise of its discretion.[2357] In particular, the existence of mitigating circumstances does not automatically imply a reduction of sentence or preclude the imposition of a sentence of life imprisonment;[2358]
>
> (4) the extent to which any sentence imposed on the defendant by a court of any State for the same act has already been served.

The Appeals Chamber further recalls that credit shall be given for any period of detention of the defendant prior to final judgement.[2359]

1039. Having found the three Appellants guilty of conspiracy to commit genocide, genocide, direct and public incitement to commit genocide, persecution and extermination as crimes against humanity, the Trial Chamber imposed on each Appellant a single sentence of life imprisonment.[2360] However, the Trial Chamber reduced the sentence of Appellant Barayagwiza to 35 years to take account of the violation of his rights, as instructed by the Appeals Chamber in its Decision of 31 March 2000.[2361] The Appellants raise a number of grounds of appeal against the sentences imposed by the Trial Chamber.[2362]

B. Single sentence

1040. Appellants Nahimana[2363] and Ngeze[2364] argue that the Trial Chamber committed an error of law in failing to impose a separate sentence in respect of each offence, as required under Rule 87(C) of the Rules.

1041. Paragraph 1104 of the Judgement reads as follows:

> The Chamber notes that in the case of an Accused convicted of multiple crimes, as in the present case, the Chamber may, in its discretion, impose a single sentence or one sentence for each of the crimes. The imposition of a single sentence will usually be appropriate in cases in which the offences may be recognized as belonging to a single criminal transaction.[2365]

1042. The Appeals Chamber notes that, under Rule 87(C) of the Rules, "if the Trial Chamber finds the accused guilty on one or more of the counts contained in the indictment, it shall also determine the penalty to be imposed in respect of each of the counts". However, the Appeals Chamber has held that Trial Chambers may impose a single sentence in respect of multiple convictions in the following circumstances:

> Where the crimes ascribed to an accused, regardless of their characterisation, form part of a single set of crimes committed in a given geographic region during a specific time period, it is appropriate for a single sentence to be imposed for all convictions, if the Trial Chamber so decides. [2366]

1043. The Appeals Chamber has further held that, when the acts of the accused are linked to the systematic and widespread attack which occurred in 1994 in Rwanda against the Tutsi, this requirement is fulfilled and a single sentence for multiple convictions can be imposed.[2367] The Appeals Chamber reaffirms the position stated in the Kambanda Appeal Judgement. 1063. The Appeals Chamber recalls that, while the Trial Chamber must take account of the general practice regarding sentences in the Rwandan courts,[2406] it is well established in the jurisprudence that the Trial Chamber is not bound by that practice.[2407] The Trial Chamber is therefore "entitled to impose a greater or lesser sentence than that which would have been imposed by the Rwandan courts".[2408]

1064. The Appeals Chamber notes that, in reaching its decision, the Trial Chamber made it clear that it had had regard to Rwandan law.[2409] The Trial Chamber was not obliged to follow Articles 35 and 83 of the Rwandan Penal Code. In any event, the Appeals Chamber notes that, contrary to what the Appellant alleges, the maximum term of imprisonment in Rwanda is not 20 years but life.[2410] Regarding the Rwandan Organic Law of 30 August 1996, the Appellant has produced no evidence that it was applied by the Trial Chamber. The Appellant's appeal on this point is dismissed.

(ii) Practice of international criminal tribunals

1065. Appellant Barayagwiza argues that the sentence of 35 years imposed at first instance is not in conformity with the jurisprudence of the Tribunal or of the ICTY.[2411] In support of this claim, he cites the prison sentences imposed on Elizaphan and Gérard Ntakirutimana, Obed Ruzindana and Laurent Semanza, and notes that the length of the sentences pronounced by the Tribunal varies between 10 and 25 years.[2412] The Appellant further points out that the accused in the Ruggiu and Serushago cases received sentences of 12 and 15 years respectively, despite the fact that their fundamental rights had not been violated.[2413]

1066. As recalled above, Trial Chambers are under an obligation to tailor penalties to fit the gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the case and of each accused; a comparison of cases is thus often of limited assistance.[2414] In the present case, the Appellant has done nothing to show how his case was so similar to those of Elizaphan and Gérard Ntakirutimana, Obed Ruzindana and Laurent Semanza as to require a similar sentence. As to the Ruggiu and Serushago cases, the Appeals Chamber notes that the sentences imposed in these cases relied on mitigating circumstances capable of justifying a reduction of the sentence, namely: a guilty plea, expressions of remorse and substantial cooperation with the Prosecution,[2415] which is not the case here. The Appeals Chamber dismisses the appeal on this point.

contends that in Muvunyi the Appeals Chamber found it necessary for the Trial Chamber to consider whether the testimony of an accomplice was corroborated.[106]

41. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber did not err. It asserts that a Trial Chamber has the "discretion to rely on uncorroborated accomplice witness testimony, as long as it carefully evaluates the totality of the circumstances in which it is tendered and finds it credible".[107] It asserts, relying on the Krajišnik Appeal Judgement, that the Trial Chamber exercised appropriate caution in assessing accomplice evidence, in compliance with the Appeals Chamber's jurisprudence.[108]

42. The Appeals Chamber has held that nothing in the Statute or the Rules prohibits a Trial Chamber from relying upon the testimony of accomplice witnesses.[109] However, such evidence is to be treated with caution, "the main question being to assess whether the witness concerned might have motives or incentives to implicate the accused".[110] Nevertheless, a Trial Chamber retains discretion to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, witness testimony[111] because it is best placed to evaluate the probative value of evidence.[112] Acceptance of and reliance upon uncorroborated evidence does not in itself constitute an error of law.[113] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court for Sierra Leone has extended this proposition to accomplice witnesses, stating that a Trial Chamber "may convict on the basis of the evidence of a single witness, even an accomplice, provided such evidence is viewed with caution."[114]

43. Similarly, in a number of domestic jurisdictions, judges and jurors can rely on the uncorroborated evidence of an accomplice witness provided they assess such evidence with caution. For example, the Indian judiciary has recognized that corroboration is not lawfully required but that

The Appeals Chamber notes that the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court for Sierra Leone similarly stated in Brima et al. that "in assessing the reliability of an accomplice, the main consideration for the Trial Chamber should be whether or not the accomplice has an ulterior motive to testify as he did." Prosecutor v. Alex Tamba Brima, Brima Bazzy Kamara and Santigie Borbor Kanu, Case SCSL-2004-16-A, Appeal Judgement, 3 March 2008 ("Brima et al. Appeal Judgement"), para. 128. it is wise to assess accomplice evidence with caution.[115] Moreover, corroboration requirements for accomplices have been abolished in Canada,[116] the United Kingdom,[117] and Australia.[118] The Appeals Chamber further recalls the discussion in Tadić of corroboration requirements in civil law countries, which concluded that "there is no ground for concluding that this requirement of corroboration is any part of customary international law and should be required by [the ICTY]."[119]

44. The Nahimana et al. and Muvunyi Appeal Judgements upon which the Appellant relies do not represent a different proposition. When the Appeals Chamber stated in Muvunyi that it was necessary for the Trial Chamber to consider whether the testimony of a particular accomplice witness was corroborated, it did so because the Trial Chamber had already found that the witness had a general motive to enhance Muvunyi's role in the crimes and to diminish his own.[120] Contrary to the Appellant's argument, this does not evidence a categorical rule requiring Trial Chambers to search for corroboration when evaluating the testimony of an accomplice witness. Rather, the Appeals Chamber simply found that corroboration was necessary in those circumstances because the accomplice witness had a motive to enhance the accused's role in the crimes.

45. In the passage from the Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgement upon which the Appellant relies, the Appeals Chamber considered whether the Trial Chamber erred when it relied on the testimony of an accomplice witness only to the extent that it was corroborated.[121] The Nahimana Trial Chamber had concluded that it could only rely on the witness's evidence to the extent that it was corroborated because, in addition to being an accomplice, the witness gave testimony that was confusing and inconsistent.[122] The Nahimana Appeal Judgement found that there was no error in this approach.[123] This reflects the fact that Trial Chambers are endowed with the discretion to require corroboration, but does not mean that corroboration is required when evaluating the testimony of all accomplice witnesses.

46. In support of his proposition, the Appellant also points to a passage from the Krajišnik Appeal Judgement.[124] There, the ICTY Appeals Chamber stated that a Trial Chamber should briefly explain why it accepted the evidence of witnesses who may have had motives or incentives to implicate the accused to show its cautious assessment of such evidence.[125] This passage does not mean that corroboration is required. It simply stresses that Trial Chambers cannot merely state that they exercised caution when assessing the evidence of an accomplice witness, but must establish that they in fact did so.

47. The Appeals Chamber recalls that a Trial Chamber has full discretion to assess the appropriate weight and credibility to be accorded to the testimony of a witness.[126] In so doing, a Trial Chamber has to consider relevant factors on a case-by-case basis, including the witness's demeanour in court; his role in the events in question; the plausibility and clarity of his testimony; whether there are contradictions or inconsistencies in his successive statements or between his testimony and other evidence; any prior examples of false testimony; any motivation to lie; and the witness's responses during cross-examination.[127] Some factors are particularly relevant for the assessment of accomplice witnesses, including: the extent to which discrepancies in the testimony were explained;[128] whether the accomplice witness has made a plea agreement with the Prosecution; whether he has already been tried and, if applicable, sentenced for his own crimes or is still awaiting the completion of his trial;[129] and whether the witness may have any other reason for holding a grudge against the accused.[130] Corroboration is also one of many potential factors relevant to the Trial Chamber's assessment of a witness's credibility.[131] The application of these factors, and the positive or negative impact they may have on the witness's credibility, varies according to the specific circumstances of each case.

48. In light of the above, the Appeals Chamber considers that the proposition that a Trial Chamber retains the discretion to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, witness testimony applies equally to the evidence of accomplice witnesses provided that the trier of fact applies the appropriate caution in assessing such evidence.

49. The Appeals Chamber therefore dismisses the Appellant's contention that the Trial Chamber erred in law in holding that it was not obliged to seek evidence in corroboration of accomplice witness testimony.

recalls that Witness BRJ's evidence was corroborated by that of Witness LDC.[399] The Appeals Chamber therefore dismisses the Appellant's argument.

C. Alleged Failure to Provide a Reasoned Opinion in Relation to Defence Witnesses

163. In discussing the allegations of the Appellant's political connections, the Trial Chamber explicitly noted that several Defence witnesses testified that they never saw the Appellant carry a weapon or wear military attire between 6 April 1994 and 18 July 1994.[400] The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to provide reasons for not accepting their testimony.[401]

164. While the Appellant does not specifically identify the witnesses to whom he is referring, the Appeals Chamber understands that they are Witnesses SBM, ZSA, Colette Uwubuheta, and the Appellant himself, as they are referred to in the relevant section of the Trial Judgement.[402]

165. The Appeals Chamber recalls that a Trial Chamber is required to provide a reasoned opinion under Article 22(2) of the Statute and Rule 88(C) of the Rules.[403] A reasoned opinion ensures that the accused can exercise his right of appeal and that the Appeals Chamber can carry out its statutory duty under Article 24 of the Statute.[404] However, this requirement relates to the Trial Judgment as a whole, not to each submission made at trial.[405] In addition, a Trial Chamber "is not required to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony."[406]

166. Furthermore, although certain evidence may not have been referred to by a Trial Chamber, in the particular circumstances of a given case it may nevertheless be reasonable to assume that the Trial Chamber took it into account.[407] A Trial Chamber need not refer to every witness testimony or every piece of evidence provided there is no indication that the Trial Chamber completely disregarded any particular piece of evidence; such disregard is shown where evidence that is clearly relevant to the findings is not addressed by the Trial Chamber's reasoning.[408] reasonable doubt".[535] He argues that the standard of proof of beyond reasonable doubt should not be applied to the assessment of witness credibility. Rather than employing this standard to review individual pieces of evidence, proof beyond reasonable doubt should be sought only in relation to the ultimate question of guilt.[536]

213. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber correctly stated the applicable burden of proof.[537] However, in its assessment of Witness LAG's testimony it stated that it "believe[d] [Witness] LAG beyond reasonable doubt".[538] The Appeals Chamber recalls that triers of fact should render reasoned opinions on the basis of the entire body of evidence and without applying the "beyond reasonable doubt" standard in a piecemeal approach.[539] However, the Appeals Chamber finds that, when stating that it believed Witness LAG beyond reasonable doubt, the Trial Chamber was simply expressing that, after having considered Witness LAG's evidence and a number of factors relevant to his credibility, including Defence evidence, no reasonable doubt remained as to the Appellant's involvement in encouraging killings on that day, as testified to by Witness LAG. The Trial Chamber's use of this language does not demonstrate any shift of the burden of proof given that it provided a reasoned opinion based on the entire body of evidence. This argument is accordingly dismissed.

(e) Karangwa's Wife

214. The Appellant contends that Witness LAG demonstrated his unreliability as a witness when he stated that Karangwa's wife had been killed, when in fact she was still alive at the time.[540]

215. The Appeals Chamber notes that Karangwa's wife was indeed alive when Witness LAG testified, a fact that the Trial Chamber learned during the course of the proceedings. The Appeals Chamber further notes that Witness LAG did not claim to have witnessed the death of Karangwa's wife but simply stated that he "was not present [...] when Karangwa's wife was killed."[541] He had no opportunity to explain his statement, as he was not confronted with information to the contrary. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Appellant has not demonstrated that the Trial Chamber erred in relying on Witness LAG despite the fact that he erroneously stated that Karangwa's wife was dead.

XXV. PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE POCAR

1. In this Judgement, based on the Trial Chamber's erroneous assessment of Witness BRK's credibility, the Appeals Chamber allows the Appellant's 24th to 26th, 32nd and 33rd grounds of appeal, reversing the Appellant's conviction for: (i) genocide for instigating the killings of several Tutsi refugees at the Gendarmerie of Cyangugu on 16 April 1994;[1] (ii) genocide and extermination as a crime against humanity for instigating the massacres perpetrated against the Tutsi refugees at Mibilizi parish and hospital on 18 April 1994;[2] and (iii) genocide and extermination as a crime against humanity for instigating the massacre of Tutsi refugees at Nyakanyinya school on 12 April 1994.[3] To my regret, for the reasons expressed below, I respectfully disagree with both the reasoning and the conclusions of the Majority of the Appeals Chamber and the consequent reversal of the Appellant's convictions for these events based on the lack of credibility of Witness BRK. Without prejudice to further grounds for dissent, I will confine myself here to one question that appears to me to be of particular significance – the extent to which the Appeals Chamber must give deference to a Trial Chamber's assessment of witnesses' credibility. In the present case, this is a question with regard to which I radically disagree with the Majority's reasoning and, therefore, wish to set out my approach to the matter.

2. I recall that the Trial Chamber has full discretionary power in assessing the appropriate weight and credibility to be accorded to the testimony of a witness.[4] Furthermore, as already stated in this Judgement,[5] a Trial Chamber also has full discretion to rely on uncorroborated, but otherwise credible, accomplice witness testimony, provided it assesses such testimony with caution. In its analysis, under the Appellant's 4th and part of 5th grounds of appeal, the Appeal Chamber correctly states that:

> In so doing, a Trial Chamber has to consider relevant factors on a case-by-case basis, including the witness's demeanour in court; his role in the events in question; the plausibility and clarity of his testimony; whether there are contradictions or inconsistencies in his successive statements or between his testimony and other evidence; any prior examples of false testimony; any motivation to lie; and the witness's responses during cross-examination. Some factors are particularly relevant for the assessment of accomplice witnesses, including: the extent to which discrepancies in the testimony were explained; whether the accomplice witness has made a plea agreement with the Prosecution; whether he has already been tried and, if applicable, sentenced for his own crimes or > is still awaiting the completion of his trial; and whether the witness may have any other reason for holding a grudge against the accused.[6]

It is in light of this standard that the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence has to be considered.

3. In the present case, the Trial Chamber considered with prudence the above-mentioned relevant factors. More specifically, in relying on the evidence of Witness BRK, the Trial Chamber considered Witness's BRK demeanour in court and his responses during cross-examination. The Trial Chamber found that: (i) "[Witness] BRK's testimony was direct and forthright";[7] (ii) he "provided detailed evidence";[8] and (iii) he "responded fully" when asked the relevant questions by the Defence.[9]

4. Similarly, the Trial Chamber further examined Witness BRK's role in the events in question, and whether there were any prior examples of false testimony and any motivation to lie. In particular, the Trial Chamber noted that he was "an accomplice"[10] and "an active participant in the massacre".[11] It further considered in detail that:

> BRK was arrested in 1994 on charges relating to burning houses during the genocide, to which he pleaded guilty in 1999. He received a 9-year prison sentence. Having been released provisionally in 2003 he subsequently pleaded guilty in 2005 before the Gacaca courts to further crimes during attacks in Nyakanyinya, Mibilizi and at Kamarampaka Stadium after being confronted by witnesses who had accused him. He has been charged as a Category I offender and his case is still pending. He is also charged with forgery. He explained that he had initially pleaded guilty to the offences in relation to which he had been charged and did not volunteer confessions for other crimes. When he was confronted with further charges, he decided to tell the truth. It is in relation to the events about which he confessed in 2005 that he testified against Nchamihigo.[12]

Consequently, in accordance with established jurisprudence, the Trial Chamber "cautiously considered the circumstances under which [Witness BRK testified] in this case and his evidence".[13] The Trial Chamber also considered the Appellant's submission that "[Witness] BRK's failure to have confessed fully to his crimes earlier than he did [...] was [...] affecting his credibility",[14] but rejected this argument. In doing so, the Trial Chamber explained that "[a]n initial failure for a witness to incriminate himself is not a reason to disbelieve a subsequent confession".[15] In addition to exercising caution when examining Witness BRK's evidence, the Trial Chamber was "mindful of [Witness] BRK's thought that he could benefit from lenienc[y] if he gives evidence for the Prosecution".[16] While the Trial Chamber conceded that part of Witness BRK testimony "could have been exaggerated or invented to further implicate [the Appellant]"[17], it ultimately concluded that Witness BRK "[did] not have any motive or incentive to falsely incriminate [the Appellant]".[18] In addition, the Trial Chamber found that Witness "BRK did not minimise his own responsibility and openly testified about events for which he will suffer penal consequences".[19] The Trial Chamber concluded that it "believes [Witness] BRK's account of the killings at the Gendarmerie on16 April 1994".[20] Similarly, with regard to the massacres at Mibilizi Parish and Hospital and the attack on Nyakanyinya school, the Trial Chamber explicitly states that it "believes" Witness BRK.[21] Finally, when weighing the probative value of Witness BRK's evidence, the Trial Chamber stressed that it "cautiously evaluated the totality of his evidence and the circumstances in which it was tendered".[22] In sum, the Trial Chamber examined Witness BRK's testimony "with great care"[23] and provided thoughtful reasoning. I find no error in this approach.

5. With similar prudence, the Trial Chamber carefully assessed whether there were any discrepancies with prior statements, especially with regard to the exact dates of the events in question. Despite Witness BRK's uncertainty about dates, the Trial Chamber clearly explained why, in these circumstances, it accepted Witness BRK's testimony.[24] The Trial Chamber concluded that it "[did] not view [Witness] BRK's uncertainty with dates as indicating any lack of credibility or reliability".[25] In my view, it was not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to find Witness BRK's evidence credible notwithstanding his inability to recall dates. More importantly, the Trial Chamber was satisfied from Witness BRK's description of the sequence of events, when viewed in context with other evidence.

6. In addition, with regard to the events at the Gendarmerie of Cyangugu on 16 April 1994, while there were no other witnesses to the actual killings, the Trial Chamber found that Witness "BRK's evidence was supported in several aspects".[26] The Trial Chamber made similar findings with regards to the massacres at Mibilizi parish and hospital.[27]

7. In other words, the Trial Chamber fulfilled its obligations to carefully assess Witness BRK's credibility in light of his status as an accomplice. In these circumstances, deference must be accorded to the Trial Chamber's assessment of Witness BRK's credibility.

8. A Trial Chamber, as the primary trier of fact, is better placed than the Appeals Chamber to evaluate the probative value of witnesses' testimonies. In my view, the Appeals Chamber should not overturn or reassess Trial Chamber's findings regarding witnesses' credibility unless the Trial Chamber did not treat such evidence with caution and/or failed to consider the relevant factors in the case of uncorroborated accomplice witness testimony. In the present case, the Trial Chamber exercised extreme prudence in relying on Witness BRK and, therefore, correctly applied the legal standard. In contrast, the Majority is de novo assessing Witness BRK's credibility without having heard his testimony and partly bases its reasoning on discrepancies in Witness BRK's testimony. I believe this is an incorrect intrusion in the assessment correctly made by the Trial Chamber and is in violation of the applicable standard of review on appeal. According to such standard, deference must be accorded to the Trial Chamber's assessment of witnesses' credibility. While, as a matter of first impression, Witness BRK could reasonably be discredited, I am convinced that, given our deferential standard of review, we cannot conclude that the Trial Chamber acted unreasonably in crediting Witness BRK's testimony. I also find the Majority's reasoning difficult to reconcile with the general conclusions in paragraphs 42 to 48 of this Judgement, which emphasize that the Trial Chamber has discretionary power to rely on uncorroborated witness testimony.

9. In light of the above, I also dissent on the reduction in the sentence decided by the Appeals Chamber. I would leave the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber undisturbed.

unverifiable hearsay. While hearsay evidence is not per se inadmissible, it is well established that a Trial Chamber must be cautious in considering such evidence.[257] Hence, the Appeals Chamber finds, by majority, Judge Shahabuddeen dissenting, that the Trial Chamber failed to adhere to this principle and that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion beyond reasonable doubt that Mr. Nors was killed shortly after the Appellant's visit on or about 20 May 1994.

116. In relation to the question whether the Appellant's actions on 20 May 1994 substantially contributed to the killing of Mr. Nors on 26 May 1994 – if Witness DB and Exh. D.34 were to be believed – the Appeals Chamber notes that Witness CGC testified that people were killed at the roadblock even before the Appellant's visit, that is, without his contribution.[258] Also, it is not established whether the persons who were instigated by the Appellant on 20 May 1994 were those who killed Mr. Nors on 26 May 1994. Thus, it is unclear whether the Appellant's acts substantially contributed to Mr. Nors's killing had it occurred six days after these acts or even later.

117. Also, the Trial Chamber did not make a finding on any criminal act of the Appellant during mid-April 1994 (see paragraph 25 of the Indictment) that could have substantially contributed to the murder of Mr. Nors in late May 1994 (see paragraph 11 of the Indictment). Thus, the Prosecution failed to establish a link between the murder of Mr. Nors at the Gaseke roadblock and a substantial contribution of the Appellant. Without that crime being committed, the Appellant cannot be held liable for instigating and aiding and abetting genocide for the murder of Mr. Nors pursuant to Article 6 of the Statute.[259] Instigating means prompting another person to commit an offence, thus requiring a subsequent criminal action.[260] Similarly, a conviction for aiding and abetting presupposes that the support of the aider and abetter has a substantial effect upon the perpetrated crime.[261] No reasonable trier of fact could have concluded beyond reasonable doubt that the killing of Mr. Nors was a result attributable to the Appellant's acts. In this context, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the Prosecution had withdrawn the charge of direct and public incitement to commit

This principle was recognized by the Trial Chamber in this case: see Trial Judgement, para. 23. In this context, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber held in para. 216 of the Trial Judgement that "Rwandans do not always express clearly the difference between what they have seen with their own eyes and what they have heard". The Appeals Chamber does not accept this characterization as being specific to Rwandans. Rather, it interprets the Trial Chamber's finding as a general reference to inaccuracies which often occur in the testimony of witnesses, regardless of their nationality.

[258] T. 29 September 2003, p. 33.

[259] The modes of liability as regulated under Article 6(1) of the Statute are also applicable to the crime of genocide pursuant to Article 2 of the Statute, Ntakirutimana Appeal Judgement, para. 500. See also Krstić Appeal Judgement, para. 138.

genocide.[262] Hence, the Trial Chamber erroneously convicted the Appellant for instigating and aiding and abetting the murder of Mr. Nors as a crime against humanity.

118. In this context, the Appeals Chamber notes that the pleadings of the parties have to be clear and unambiguous. On the basis of ambiguous submissions made by the Prosecution during closing arguments, the Appeals Chamber might have come to the conclusion that the Prosecution had abandoned its case in relation to the killing of Mr. Nors.

2. Conclusion

In light of the above, the Appellant's eleventh ground of appeal is granted.

IX. ALLEGED VAGUENESS OF THE INDICTMENT (SUB-GROUND OF APPEAL 1 - GASEKE ROADBLOCK)

119. As the eleventh ground of appeal is granted on the basis of the reasoning set out above, it is not necessary for the Appeals Chamber to consider under the first sub-ground of appeal relating to the Gaseke roadblock whether the case concerning Mr. Nors was withdrawn by the Prosecution.[263] By the same token, it is not necessary to consider allegations of the vagueness of the Indictment relating to Mr. Nors[264] as both issues are rendered moot.

X. ALLEGED ERROR IN FINDING A LEGAL BASIS FOR THE GENOCIDE CONVICTION (GROUND OF APPEAL 7)

120. In addition, for the reasons set out above under the eleventh ground of appeal, it is not necessary for the Appeals Chamber to consider whether the Appellant was erroneously convicted of instigating and aiding and abetting genocide at the Gaseke roadblock on the basis of the killing of Mr. Nors. Consequently, the seventh ground of appeal has become moot.

[262] See supra note 4. As the offence of direct and public incitement to commit genocide is an inchoate offence, the legal assessment of such a charge may have been different.

[264] Appellant's Brief, paras 21-29. This argument was also raised during the appeal hearing: the Defence argued that ambiguity must be resolved in favour of the Appellant, at T. 6 July 2006, p. 18, see also T. 6 July 2006, pp. 26-27, 34, 64. The Prosecution argued that the act of instigation was not limited to Mr. Nors, T. 6 July 2006, p. 52.

XI. GROUND OF APPEAL 12 – WITHDRAWN

XII. ALTERNATIVE CONVICTIONS

121. The Appeals Chamber proprio motu raises the issue of alternative convictions arising from paragraph 485 of the Trial Judgement:[265]

> [T]he Chamber finds that the Accused himself committed the crime of extermination. He participated in creating, and contributed to, the conditions for the mass killing of Tutsi on Gitwa Hill on 26 April 1994, by distributing weapons, transporting attackers, and speaking words of encouragement that would have reasonably appeared to give official approval for an attack. Alternatively, the Chamber finds that by these words and deeds, the Accused directly and substantially contributed to the crime of extermination committed by the attackers at Gitwa Hill, and is thereby guilty of both instigating, and of aiding and abetting, that crime. (emphasis added).

122. While an accused can be convicted for a single crime on the basis of several modes of liability, alternative convictions for several modes of liability are, in general, incompatible with the principle that a judgement has to express unambiguously the scope of the convicted person's criminal responsibility. This principle requires, inter alia, that the sentence corresponds to the totality of guilt incurred by the convicted person. This totality of guilt is determined by the actus reus and the mens rea of the convicted person. The modes of liability may either augment (e.g., commission of the crime with direct intent) or lessen (e.g., aiding and abetting a crime with awareness that a crime will probably be committed[266]) the gravity of the crime.[267] Thus, the criminal liability of a convicted person has to be established unequivocally.

123. However, the Appeals Chamber finds, by majority, Judge Güney dissenting, that the Trial Chamber did not convict the Appellant in the alternative. Rather, the Trial Chamber was seeking to provide a further characterisation of the Appellant's criminal conduct. The Trial Chamber was convinced beyond a reasonable doubt that the Appellant committed acts constituting extermination,[268] namely by distributing weapons, transporting attackers and speaking words of [265] Upon invitation of the Appeals Chamber, this issue was discussed at the Appeals Hearing: T. 6 July 2006, pp. 53, 54, 58: the Prosecution argued that although conviction in the alternative is incorrect, it is not sufficient grounds to overturn the Trial Judgement, and suggested the term "additionally" would have been more appropriate. The Defence replied that it is not permissible to substitute language for the Trial Chamber, T. 6 July 2006, p. 67.

[266] See Blaškić Appeal Judgement, para. 50.

[267] In this context, the Appeals Chamber recalls that in Krstić, the ICTY Appeals Chamber stated that it had taken into account the sentencing practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia applicable in that case, in particular the practice that "the sentence of a person who aided a principal perpetrator to commit a crime can be reduced to a sentence less than the one given to the principal perpetrator", Krstić Appeal Judgement, para. 270 (note omitted).

[268] The Trial Chamber stated that "[e]xtermination may be committed less directly than murder, as by participation in measures intended to bring about the deaths of a large number of individuals, but without actually committing a killing of any person" (Trial Judgement, para. 479). The words "without actually committing a killing" could mean, in the ordinary sense of the word, "without causing death". The Appeals Chamber finds, however, that the word "actually" in this context rather describes what other judgements have referred to as "indirectly" causing death, in particular as these he helped save some persons therefore carries limited weight.

496. The Chamber has also considered in mitigation the fact that the Accused was a person of good character prior to the events. As a public figure and a member of the MDR, he advocated democracy and opposed ethnic discrimination. As such, he proved courageous, despite threats to his life and property.

497. However, after 6 April 1994, when faced with the choice between participating in massacres of civilians or holding fast to his principles, he chose the path of ethnic bias and participated in the massacres committed in Rwanda at the time. The fact that he was formerly a good man is accordingly of little weight.

498. Finally, the Chamber has given credit to the Accused for the extent to which his Counsel co-operated with it and with the Prosecution in the efficient conduct of the trial.

499. The Chamber considers as aggravating, in the Accused's case, the following circumstances:

(i) That the Accused was a well-known and influential figure in his native prefecture of Kibuye, where his crimes were committed. As such, the Accused abused the trust placed in him by the population;

(ii) That, at the time of the events, the Accused held an official position at the national level, as a member of the Interim Government. The Chamber considers it particularly aggravating that instead of promoting peace and reconciliation in his capacity as Minister of Information, he turned to violence and actively participated in the commission of the massacres in Bisesero and influenced others to commit crimes while, in some instances, he gave instructions to attackers or acted as one of their leaders;

(iii) The callous nature of the murders of a girl of 13-15 years of age in Bisesero by the Gisovu-Kibuye road on 20 May 1994, of an old man and a young boy on 18 June 1994 at Kiziba;

(iv) The fact that the Accused joined in the jubilation over the killing, decapitation and castration of Kabanda, and the piercing of his skull through the ears with a spike;

(v) The cruel and insensitive disregard for human life and dignity shown by the order given by the Accused to Interahamwe to insert a sharpened piece of wood into the genitalia of the dead Tutsi woman on the road in Kibuye near the ENT on, and after, 28 June 1994;

(vi) The prolonged nature of his participation in widespread and systematic attacks against defenceless civilians.

500. Having reviewed both mitigating and aggravating circumstances, the Chamber finds that the aggravating circumstances outweigh the mitigating circumstances in the Accused's case.

54. In the Trial Judgement, however, imprecise date ranges were enumerated as one of the defects in the Ntagerura Indictment.[144] Moreover, having dismissed Ntagerura's preliminary motion with regard to the lack of specificity concerning the locations and the description of the alleged events, his personal participation in the events, as well as the identity of his subordinates and his mens rea under Article 6(3) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber nevertheless found in the Trial Judgement that the Ntagerura Indictment was defective in these respects.[145]

55. It is apparent from the foregoing that the Trial Chamber reconsidered in the Trial Judgement some of the findings it had made in certain pre-trial decisions on the form of the Indictments. This does not in itself constitute an error, as it is within the discretion of a Trial Chamber to reconsider a decision it has previously made[146] if a clear error of reasoning has been demonstrated or if it is necessary to do so to prevent an injustice.[147] However, the Appeals Chamber emphasises that "where such a decision is changed, there will be a need in every case for the Trial Chamber to consider with great care and to deal with the consequences of the change upon the proceedings which have in the meantime been conducted in accordance with the original decision".[148] In the present case, the Appeals Chamber considers that, once the Trial Chamber decided to reconsider its pre-trial decisions relating to the specificity of the Indictments at the stage of deliberations, it should have interrupted the deliberation process and reopened the hearings. At such an advanced stage of the proceedings, after all the evidence had been heard and the parties had made their final submissions, the Prosecution could not move to amend the Indictment. On the other hand, reopening the hearings would have allowed the Prosecution to try to convince the Trial Chamber of the correctness of its initial pre-trial decisions on the form of the Indictment, or to argue that any defects had since been remedied. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in remaining silent on its decision to find the abovementioned parts of the Indictments defective until the rendering of the Trial Judgement.

56. The question of whether this error invalidated the decision will be examined below, in the light of the Appeals Chamber's conclusions as to the other errors alleged by the Prosecution under this ground of appeal. The Appeals Chamber will first address the question of whether the two Indictments should have been read together.

2. Alleged failure to read the Indictments together as a whole

57. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in not reading the two Indictments together because, as per the Decision on Joinder, the Indictments "became, in law, a single Indictment".[149] It further submits that the Trial Chamber in that Decision "expressly accepted arguments in support of reading the two Indictments as one them to do so".[735] The Prosecution submits that the actus reus of aiding and abetting in this instance is established by Imanishimwe's omission to prevent his soldiers from going to Gashirabwoba, and that this omission had a decisive effect on their ability to participate in the attack.[736] It further contends that Imanishimwe possessed the requisite knowledge to be an aider and abettor in the Gashirabwoba massacre,[737] given that the Trial Chamber found that he knew or should have known about the participation of his soldiers in the attack.[738]

368. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not expressly rule on the issue as to whether Imanishimwe could have incurred criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting the crimes committed at the Gashirabwoba football field on 12 April 1994. This notwithstanding, the Appeals Chamber does not conclude that the Trial Chamber failed to consider this form of responsibility. It indeed transpires from the legal findings made by the Trial Chamber that this form of responsibility was considered and even accepted when the facts lent themselves to it. The Appeals Chamber understands the Trial Chamber's silence with respect to aiding and abetting as an indication that it was not established that the Accued's conduct could in this particular instance be characterized as aiding and abetting.[739]

369. Accordingly, the issue is for the Appeals Chamber to inquire into whether this finding is one which a reasonable trier of fact could have made.

370. To establish the material element (or actus reus) of aiding and abetting under Article 6(1) of the Statute, it must be proven that the aider and abettor committed acts specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, lending moral support[740] for the perpetration of a specific crime, and that the said support had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. The Appeals Chamber adds that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may, in certain circumstances, be perpetrated through an omission.[741] The requisite mens rea is the fact that the aider and abettor knows that his acts assist in the commission of the specific crime of the principal.[742]

371. In the instant case, the Trial Chamber considered that it was not established that the Accused had ordered or was present during the attack launched at Gashirabwoba on 12 April 1994.[743] On the other hand, it found that the soldiers responsible for the attack could not have conclusion, the Krstić Appeals Chamber derived aiding and abetting as a mode of liability from Article 7(1) of the ICTY Statute, but also considered that aiding and abetting constitutes a form of complicity, suggesting that complicity under Article 2 of the ICTR Statute and Article 4 of the ICTY Statute would also encompass aiding and abetting, based on the same mens rea, while other forms of complicity may require proof of specific intent.

501. The Appeals Chamber endorses this view and finds that a conviction for aiding and abetting genocide upon proof that the defendant knew about the principal perpetrator's genocidal intent is permitted by the Statute and case-law of this Tribunal. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber erred in determining that the mens rea for aiding and abetting genocide requires intent to commit genocide. It is not disputed that the above-mentioned error did not invalidate the Trial Chamber's verdict in the present case.

502. It is now possible to go back to the Prosecution's allegation that the Trial Chamber erred in confining Gérard Ntakirutimana's conviction for genocide to the acts of killing or serious bodily harm that he personally inflicted on Tutsi at the Mugonero Complex and Bisesero. The issue before the Appeals Chamber is whether the Trial Chamber's findings which have not been reversed on appeal support a conviction for aiding and abetting genocide.

503. In the part of the Judgement dealing with Gérard Ntakirutimana's legal errors the Appeals Chamber has upheld a number of his grounds of appeal arguing that he and Elizaphan Ntakirutimana were given insufficient notice of the material facts of the Prosecution's case and that the Trial Chamber erred in basing a conviction on those material facts.

504. As a result of the errors committed by the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber has quashed the findings of the Trial Chamber supporting Gérard Ntakirutimana's convictions under the Bisesero Indictment that: "on or about 18 April 1994 Gérard Ntakirutimana was with Interahamwe in Murambi Hill pursuing and attacking Tutsi refugees" and "in the last part of April or possibly in May, Gérard Ntakirutimana was with attackers in Gitwe Hill where he shot at refugees;"[857] "sometime between April and June 1994, Gérard Ntakirutimana was in Kidashya Hill transporting armed attackers, and he participated in chasing and shooting at Tutsi refugees in the hills;"[858] "sometime in June 1994, Gérard Ntakirutimana was in an attack at Mutiti Hill with Interahamwe, Chamber to supply adequate proof that Radislav Krstić possessed the genocidal intent. Krstić, therefore, is not guilty of genocide as a principal perpetrator."

attack at Mubuga Primary School in June 1994 and shooting at Tutsi refugees; under the Mugonero Indictment, a conviction of aiding and abetting genocide is supported by the procurement of gendarmes and ammunition for the attack on Mugonero Complex on 16 April 1994.

508. As established above, intent to commit genocide is not required for an accused to be found guilty for aiding and abetting genocide. However, a finding by the Trial Chamber that the accused had the intent to commit genocide and did so by killing and causing harm to members of the group does not per se prevent a finding that he also knowingly aided and abetted other perpetrators of genocide. Accordingly to establish that Gérard Ntakirutimana aided and abetted genocide requires proof that (i) by his acts and conduct Gérard Ntakirutimana assisted, encouraged or lent moral support to the perpetration of genocide by others which had a substantial effect upon the perpetration of that crime, and (ii) Gérard Ntakirutimana knew that the above acts and conduct assisted the commission of genocide by others.

509. It is clear from the Trial Chamber's findings at paragraphs 785 and 826 of the Trial Judgement that it found that the attacks were carried out with intent to destroy, in its whole, the Tutsi population at the Mugonero Complex and in Bisesero. It results further from the Trial Chamber findings at paragraphs 793 and 834 that it found that by his conduct and participation in the attacks Gérard Ntakirutimana had the intent to destroy, in whole, the Tutsi ethnic group. The only reasonable inference from the circumstances described by the Trial Chamber to support the above findings is that Gérard Ntakirutimana had knowledge that his acts and conduct had a substantial effect upon the commission of genocide by others. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber finds that by the other acts of assistance identified by the Trial Chamber Gérard Ntakirutimana incurred criminal responsibility as an aider and abettor to genocide.

1994, where he pursued and shot at Tutsi refugees, his killing of Charles Ukobizaba by shooting him in the chest, from a short distance, in Mugonero Hospital courtyard around midday on 16 April 1994, and his procurement of gendarmes and ammunition for the attack on the Mugonero Complex, are, taken as a whole, extremely grave. The Trial Chamber's finding that Gérard Ntakirutimana committed these crimes with the intent to destroy in whole or in part the Tutsi group is still applicable.[961] So is the Trial Chamber's finding that these acts were committed with the knowledge that they were part of a widespread and systematic attack against the civilian Tutsi population.[962]

563. The Appeals Chamber has also considered the mitigating and aggravating factors discussed by the Trial Chamber, and concurs with the Trial Chamber that the aggravating factors outweigh the mitigating factors in Gérard Ntakirutimana's case.[963] In particular, the Appeals Chamber has considered the following aggravating factors, namely that Gérard Ntakirutimana (i) abused his personal position in the community to commit the crimes, (ii) personally shot at Tutsi refugees, including Charles Ukobizaba, and (iii) participated in attacks at the Mugonero Complex, where he was a doctor, as well as in other safe havens in which refugees had sought shelter.

564. The Appeals Chamber finds that the revision of the verdict in respect of both the acquittals and the new convictions does not affect the validity of the elements which form the basis of the sentence of 25 years' imprisonment imposed by the Trial Chamber. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber maintains the sentence of 25 years' imprisonment handed down by the Trial Chamber.

C. Convictions and Sentence for Elizaphan Ntakirutimana

565. Elizaphan Ntakirutimana was sentenced to ten years' imprisonment. He was arrested at the request of the Tribunal on 29 September 1996 and initially detained in Texas, USA. Having petitioned against his arrest and transfer to the International Tribunal, he was released on 17 December 1997 by a US Magistrate on constitutional grounds.[964] The US State Department petitioned against that decision, and he was ultimately re-arrested on 26 February 1998 and transferred to the United Nations Detention Facilities in Arusha on 24 March 2000.

566. As a result of the errors committed by the Trial Chamber in basing convictions on unpleaded material facts, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana's conviction under the Mugonero Indictment, for

THE PROSECUTOR

V.

ELIZAPHAN and GÉRARD NTAKIRUTIMANA

Cases No. ICTR-96-10 & ICTR-96-17-T

JUDGEMENT AND SENTENCE

Counsel for the Defence:

Ramsey Clark
David Jacobs

Counsel for the Prosecution:

Charles Adeogun-Phillips
Wallace Kapaya
Boi-Tia Stevens

(i) That Elizaphan Ntakirutimana or Gérard Ntakirutimana killed or caused serious bodily or mental harm to members of an ethnic or racial group;[1147] and

(ii) That the killing or causing of serious bodily or mental harm was committed with intent to destroy, in whole or in part, that ethnic or racial group, as such.

675. The Chamber found that a large number of men, women and children, the majority unarmed Tutsi, sought shelter from violence and attacks around Mugonero in the days following 6 April 1994 and that many assembled at the Mugonero Complex for that purpose. The Chamber further found that the attack of 16 April at the Complex, which lasted throughout the day and into the night, claimed hundreds of lives among the refugees at the Complex and left many wounded. It further found that the attack specifically targeted the Tutsi population -- irrespective of age or sex -- for the sole reason of their ethnicity. In the Chamber's view, the massive and systematic character of the attack and ensuing onslaught, as described above, leaves no doubt as to the fact that the violent assault proceeded on the basis of an intent to destroy, in its whole, the Tutsi population at the Complex.[1148]

Elizaphan Ntakirutimana

676. Article 6(1) of the Statute provides that:

> "A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime."

677. The elements of "aiding and abetting" within the meaning of Article 6(1) are well established.[1149] In order for the Chamber to enter a conviction on this count, it must find that the following three elements have been proved beyond a reasonable doubt:

(i) That Elizaphan Ntakirutimana provided to persons practical assistance ("aiding"), or facilitated the commission of the crime by being sympathetic thereto ("abetting");[1150]

(ii) That the act of aiding or abetting contributed substantially to the commission of the crime of genocide; and

(iii) That the Accused provided such assistance or encouragement with the intent to commit genocide, that is, the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, an ethnic or racial group, as such.

678. At para. 310 in Section II.3.8.3 (e) above (see also paras. 283-285 in II.3.8.3(c)), [1147] Other acts are deliberately inflicting conditions of life calculated to bring about the group's physical destruction, preventing births within the group, and forcibly transferring children of the group to another. The Statute also includes "national" or "religious" groups, but this is not part of the Prosecution's case.

[1148] See in particular II.3.2 paras. 69-77, II.3.9.3 paras. 334-339, II.3.10.3 para. 350.

[1149] See Akayesu (TC) paras. 484-485; Furundzija (AC) paras. 124-127.

[1150] Either "aiding" or "abetting" alone would suffice for this count, see Akayesu (TC) para. 484.

the Chamber found that Elizaphan Ntakirutimana conveyed armed attackers to the Mugonero Complex in his vehicle on the morning of 16 April 1994, and that these attackers proceeded to kill Tutsi refugees at the Complex. Considering his position of authority in the community as a senior pastor, the Chamber finds that his act of personally driving armed attackers in his own vehicle to the scene of the attack, his association with these armed attackers, and his presence at the scene of the attack at the Complex, constituted practical assistance and encouragement to these attackers, which substantially contributed to the commission of the crime of genocide by these attackers.

679. From his presence and actions in relation to the attack at the Complex, from the letter he received on the eve of the attack, in which the Tutsi Pastors plead for his assistance adding, "tomorrow we shall die with our families", Elizaphan Ntakirutimana knew that Tutsi, in particular, were being targeted for attack, and that by transporting attackers to the Complex, he would be assisting in the attack against the Tutsi. The Chamber has also taken into account his actions in Bisesero, for instance, transporting armed attackers to various parts of Bisesero and pointing out Tutsi refugees to the armed attackers who then attacked these refugees, and ordering attackers to remove the roof of Murambi Church so that it could not be used as a hiding-place for Tutsi. Based on the totality of the evidence before it, the Chamber finds that Elizaphan Ntakirutimana had the requisite intent to commit genocide, that is, the intent to destroy, in whole the Tutsi ethnic group.

680. The Chamber finds that, in conveying armed attackers to the Complex, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana is individually criminally responsible for aiding and abetting in the killing and causing of serious bodily or mental harm to the Tutsi refugees at the Complex on 16 April 1994, pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute. Accordingly, the Chamber finds that Elizaphan Ntakirutimana is guilty of genocide as charged in Count 1A of the Mugonero Indictment.

Gérard Ntakirutimana

681. The Chamber found, in II.3.13.3 above, that Gérard Ntakirutimana participated in attacks on 16 April 1994 at the Complex and shot at refugees. Whilst participating in the attack on the refugees at the Complex, Gérard Ntakirutimana killed Charles Ukobizaba by shooting him in his chest, from a short distance, in Mugonero Hospital courtyard around midday on 16 April 1994 (see II.3.11.5 above). Gérard Ntakirutimana also procured ammunition and gendarmes for the attack on the Complex (see II.3.7.3 above). In addition, he participated in the attack on Witness SS (a refugee in the Complex), during which time he was armed and in the company of other armed attackers (see II.3.12.3 above).

682. The Chamber recalls that Charles Ukobizaba, Witness SS, and finds that the refugees whom Gérard Ntakirutimana shot at in the Complex were of the Tutsi ethnic group.

whole or in part, an ethnic or racial group as such, and have thereby committed genocide.

715. The elements of the offence were dealt with in paragraph 784 above.

716. In Section II.4 above, the Chamber found that a large number of men, women and children, who were predominantly Tutsi, sought refuge in the area of Bisesero from April through June 1994, where there was widespread violence during that period, in the form of attacks targeting this population on an almost daily basis. Witnesses heard attackers singing songs referring to the extermination of the Tutsi. The Chamber concludes that these attacks were carried out with the specific intent to destroy in whole the Tutsi population in Bisesero, for the sole reason of its ethnicity.[1160]

Elizaphan Ntakirutimana

717. The elements of Article 6(1), in relation to aiding and abetting, have been considered in paras. 786 and 787 above.

718. The Chamber has previously made the following findings:

(i) Sometime between 17 April and early May 1994, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana conveyed attackers to Murambi Church and ordered the removal of the church roof so that it could no longer be used as a hiding place for the Tutsi, and in so doing, he facilitated the hunting down and the killing of the Tutsi refugees hiding in Murambi Church in Bisesero (see II.4.23.3 (a) above);

(ii) One day in the middle of May 1994, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana brought armed attackers in the rear hold of his vehicle to Nyarutovu Hill, and the group was searching for Tutsi refugees and chasing them. Elizaphan Ntakirutimana pointed out the fleeing refugees to the attackers who then chased these refugees singing: "Exterminate them; look for them everywhere; kill them; and get it over with, in all the forests" (see II.4.12.3 above);

(iii) At the end of May 1994, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana participated in a convoy of vehicles carrying armed attackers to Kabatwa Hill, and later the same day, at neighbouring Gitwa Hill, he pointed out the whereabouts of Tutsi refugees to attackers who attacked the refugees, causing injury to Witness KK (see II.4.13.3 above);

(iv) In mid-May, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana was present in the midst of the killing of Tutsi individuals at Mubuga, the Accused was in his vehicle transporting armed attackers as part of a convoy which included two buses, all carrying armed attackers, the attackers sang "Let us exterminate them" and proceeded to kill people until the evening. (see II. 4.14.3 above);

(v) One day in May or June 1994, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana transported armed attackers who were chasing Tutsi survivors at Murambi Hill (see II.4.10.3 above);

(vi) One day in May or June 1994, Elizaphan Ntakirutimana arrived at Ku Cyapa in a vehicle followed by two buses of attackers and he was part of a convoy, which included attackers (see II.4.20.3 above).

[1160] See, II.4.4 to 4.25 in conjunction with II.4.2 supra.

life work was dedicated to saving souls and his son's, to healing the sick and saving lives. Furthermore, both Accused testified about their many years of dedication to church and community. Finally, it is submitted that neither of the Accused was in a position to prevent or stop the massacres, and that they were themselves victims who became refugees.[1184]

4. Discussion

780. The Chamber has already noted the gravity of the crimes of which the Accused have been found guilty. It now turns to the personal and individual circumstances of the Accused, prior to reviewing the practice of the Tribunal in respect of sentences in cases with similarities to the present one.

781. The Chamber recalls at the outset the general principle that only matters proved a beyond a reasonable doubt against the Accused are to be considered against them at the sentencing stage. This principle extends to the assessment of any aggravating factors.[1185] Another standard applies to the Chamber's assessment of mitigating factors. These shall be taken into consideration if established on a balance of probabilities.[1186] Also, the Chamber agrees with the Vasiljevic Trial Chamber of the ICTY that a particular circumstance shall not be retained as aggravating if it is included as an element of the crime in consideration.[1187]

4.1 Elizaphan Ntakirutimana

782. It is recalled that Elizaphan Ntakirutimana was born in 1924 in Ngoma sector, Gishyita commune, Kibuye prefecture, Rwanda.

(a) Mitigating Circumstances

782. The Chamber has found that the Accused was a highly respected personality within the Seventh-Day Adventist Church of the West-Rwanda Field and beyond, in the Kibuye prefecture. It heard and reviewed moving testimony from colleagues and supervisors of the Accused within the Seventh-Day Adventist Church. This evidence consistently described the Pastor's exemplary life as a church leader, a highly religious and tolerant person, who did not show ethnic bias, even in times of unrest and ethnic tension, for over half a century. Significantly, one such colleague praised "a faithful and honest worker who manifested courage in confronting irregularities with workers of [1186] Kunarac (TC) para. 857, Sikirica (TC) para. 110; Vasiljevic (TC) para. 272.

[1187] Specifically, the Vasiljevic Trial Chamber ruled that the perpetrator's discriminatory intent in the commission of the crime "can only [constitute an aggravating factor] where the crime for which an accused is convicted does not include a discriminatory state of mind as an element." Hence, one's discriminatory intent was not deemed an aggravating factor in respect of a count of persecution considered as a crime against humanity (Article 5(h) of the ICTY Statute). It was however considered an aggravating factor in respect of a count of murder considered as a violation of the laws and customs of war (Article 3 of the ICTY Statute). Vasiljevic (TC) para. 277-278.

either tribal affiliation" while an other described Pastor Ntakirutimana as "a kind Christian gentleman", an outstanding worker whom he found to be fair and trustworthy, whom he never saw lose his temper, who "worked well with the Hutus and the Tutsis" and whom he never saw making any distinction in their respect. As already stated, the Chamber accepts this evidence and finds that Elizaphan Ntakirutimana was essentially a person of good moral character until the events of April to July 1994 during which he was swept along with many Rwandans into criminal conduct.[1188]

783. The family situation of the Accused has been taken into account (Elizaphan Ntakirutimana is married with eight children of whom seven were alive in 2002).

784. In respect of his conduct during the events of 1994, the Chamber has considered that Elizaphan Ntakirutimana did not play a leading role in the attacks. He did not personally participate in these killings, nor was he found to have fired on refugees or even to have carried a weapon.

785. Finally, 78 years of age at the time of sentencing, the Accused has spent more than four years in detention. His wife, among other witnesses, has testified about his frail health, due to a condition from which he has suffered for years. His poor health was evident throughout the trial proceedings. Considered together, the Chamber finds that these are important mitigating circumstances in Elizaphan Ntakirutimana's case.

(b) Aggravating Circumstances:

786. The Chamber now turns to the circumstances considered as aggravating in the Accused's case.

787. As a highly respected personality and a man wielding certain authority within the Seventh-Day Adventist Church of the West-Rwanda Field and in the Kibuye prefecture, the Accused was deemed to have abused the trust placed in him.

788. The letter written to him by the Tutsi Pastors on behalf of the refugees at the Mugonero Complex was found, among other evidence, to be a symbol of his perceived authority among the general population. It is recalled that the Mugonero refugees trusted that, on the eve of the attack, Pastor Ntakirutimana would intercede in their favor before a municipal authority such as bourgmestre Sikubwabo, and that his intervention could prove instrumental in saving their lives.

788. Many among the refugees at the Mugonero Complex on 16 April 1994 were parishioners and pastors of the West-Rwanda Field of the Seventh Day Adventist Church for which Pastor Ntakirutimana was responsible. These persons were in his care. They his prior good conduct is inconsistent with any possible moral support or encouragement, and that his presence at Kabuye hill would therefore have been of no consequence to the assailants.[529]

212. The Prosecution responds that the elements of aiding and abetting were clearly established beyond reasonable doubt, and that prior good conduct is not a relevant factor.[530]

213. In reply, Ntawukulilyayo contends that, contrary to the Trial Chamber's finding, Kabuye hill was not an isolated area, and that its conclusion that the transfer of refugees provided a "tactical advantage" was therefore purely speculative.[531]

214. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of aiding and abetting is constituted by acts or omissions specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, or lending moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[532] Whether a particular contribution qualifies as "substantial" is a "fact-based inquiry", and need not "serve as condition precedent for the commission of the crime."[533]

215. The Trial Chamber found beyond reasonable doubt that, in the early afternoon of Saturday, 23 April 1994, Ntawukulilyayo directed mostly Tutsi refugees at Gisagara market to go to Kabuye hill, promising them food and protection there, and that the refugees complied with his instructions.[534] The Trial Chamber further found that Ntawukulilyayo arrived at Kabuye hill later that day, and left shortly after dropping off soldiers who, along with others, subsequently attacked the civilian refugees at the hill.[535] As discussed above, the Appeals Chamber has found no error in the Trial Chamber's factual findings regarding Ntawukulilyayo's instructions to refugees at Gisagara market, and his arrival at Kabuye hill with soldiers.[536] Ntawukulilyayo has also failed to demonstrate error in the Trial Chamber's conclusion that the soldiers who accompanied him, along with others, attacked the refugees.[537] As regards the number of soldiers, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber did not rely on the specific number of soldiers who accompanied Ntawukulilyayo but on Ntawukulilyayo's contribution to the killings by bringing armed reinforcements.[538] Ntawukulilyayo's arguments that no reasonable trier of fact could determine with aim of ameliorating the situation at the marketplace and the belief that the protection promised would be given to the refugees.[541] Ntawukulilyayo further argues that it would also have been reasonable to find that he naively believed that the security staff he allegedly transported to the hill would protect the refugees.[542] In support of his contentions, Ntawukulilyayo argues that the tragic turn of events on Kabuye hill was not necessarily predictable as, until 23 April 1994, Gisagara was considered one of the last safe areas, and the warning signs and isolated incidents of which he was aware at the time did not involve soldiers, policemen, or gendarmes.[543]

220. Ntawukulilyayo further submits that the Trial Chamber's findings in relation to his personality and positive actions at the relevant time run counter to the idea that he could knowingly have aided and abetted the killing of Tutsis on Kabuye hill.[544] He also contends that the Trial Chamber's reliance on the planning of the attack is contradicted by its own finding that the record did not reflect that he participated in the planning of the attack.[545] Ntawukulilyayo argues that there is a complete lack of evidence that the attack was planned, and that the mere fact that he was accompanied by soldiers is insufficient to prove that he had knowledge of any planning, since nothing is known about how he met the soldiers or where they had come from.[546]

221. The Prosecution responds that the elements of aiding and abetting were clearly established beyond reasonable doubt.[547] It argues that Ntawukulilyayo's claim that he was unable to anticipate the tragic turn of events is unconvincing and that his conduct in saving Tutsis was properly assessed.[548]

222. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the mens rea for aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[549] Specific intent crimes such as genocide do not require that the aider and abettor share the mens rea of the principal perpetrator; it suffices to prove that he knew of the principal perpetrator's specific intent.[550]

223. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber's finding that the assailants at Kabuye hill acted with genocidal intent is not in dispute. The question before the Appeals Chamber is therefore whether the Trial Chamber reasonably found that Ntawukulilyayo had knowledge that his acts would assist the assailants in killing the refugees at Kabuye hill, and that he had knowledge of the assailants' genocidal intent.

224. The Appeals Chamber does not agree with Ntawukulilyayo's contention that the Trial Judgement contains contradictory findings with respect to planning. The Trial Chamber clearly found that, although the scale and nature of the attacks on Kabuye hill would have required planning and organization by various civilian and military officials, it was not clear that Ntawukulilyayo himself participated in the planning of the operation.[551] In the Appeals Chamber's view, this is not contradicted by the statement that "Ntawukulilyayo's arrival on Kabuye hill with soldiers would no doubt have required planning",[552] which merely implies that the Trial Chamber considered that Ntawukulilyayo could not reasonably have ignored that the transport of soldiers to the hill was part of a broader, premeditated scheme. The Appeals Chamber sees no error in this finding.

225. The Appeals Chamber also sees no error in the Trial Chamber's finding that the range of assailants and their participation in the assault just hours after Ntawukulilyayo sent refugees to Kabuye hill evinces considerable coordination.[553] In the Appeals Chamber's view, in the context of determining Ntawukulilyayo's mens rea it was not necessary for the Trial Chamber to consider how he met the soldiers whom he brought to Kabuye hill, or from where they came.[554]

226. The Appeals Chamber notes that Ntawukulilyayo personally observed the situation at Kabuye hill shortly before the killings took place there on such a large scale.[555] The Appeals Chamber further observes that Ntawukulilyayo issued his instructions to refugees at Gisagara market to move to Kabuye hill just hours before the attack took place, and only two days after President Sindikubwabo's public speech in Gisagara referring to the 1959 revolution, during which

68. Evidence of facts outside the testifying witness's own knowledge constitutes hearsay evidence. The Chamber must closely scrutinise and cautiously consider any hearsay evidence before relying upon it,[113] as hearsay evidence may be affected by a compounding of errors of perception, memory, narration, sincerity and recall, and thus should be subjected to careful scrutiny before being relied upon.[114]

69. The Chamber has the discretion to cautiously consider hearsay evidence and to rely on it. While the weight and probative value to be afforded to hearsay evidence will usually be less than that accorded to the evidence of a witness who has given it under oath and who has been cross-examined, it will depend upon the infinitely variable circumstances which surround hearsay evidence.[115]

2.7.3 Identification of the Accused

70. In assessing a witness's identification evidence, the Chamber must proceed with caution and carefully scrutinise factors in support of the identification, factors that may impact negatively on the reliability of the identification, and any corroborating testimony.[116] The Chamber will take into account the following factors: prior knowledge of the accused, the existence of adequate opportunity in which to observe the accused, reliability of witness's testimony, the possible influence of third parties, the existence of stressful conditions at the time the event took place, the passage of time between the events and the witness's testimony and the general credibility of the witness.[117]

71. The Chamber must always, in the interests of justice, proceed with extreme caution when assessing a witness's identification of the accused made under difficult circumstances. While the Chamber is not obliged to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record in its judgement, where a finding of guilt is made on the basis of identification evidence given by a witness under difficult circumstances, the Chamber must rigorously implement its duty to provide a "reasoned opinion." In particular, a reasoned opinion must carefully articulate the factors relied upon in support of the identification of the accused and adequately address any significant factors impacting negatively on the reliability of the identification evidence.[118] In-court identification evidence will be assigned little or no credence.[119]

2.7.4 Corroboration

72. There is no requirement that convictions be made only on evidence of two or more witnesses. The Chamber may rule on the basis of a single testimony if, in its opinion, that testimony is relevant and credible.[120] Corroboration is simply one of many potential factors in the Chamber's assessment of a witness's credibility. If the Chamber finds a witness credible, that witness's testimony may be accepted even if not corroborated. Similarly, even if the Chamber finds that a witness's testimony is inconsistent or otherwise problematic enough to warrant its rejection, it might choose to accept the evidence nonetheless because it is corroborated by other evidence.[121]

73. The ability of the Chamber to rule on the basis of testimonies and other evidence is not bound by any rule of corroboration, but rather on the Chamber's own assessment of the probative value of the evidence before it. The Chamber may freely assess the relevance and credibility of all evidence presented to it. The Chamber notes that this freedom to assess evidence extends even to those testimonies which are corroborated; the corroboration of testimonies, even by many witnesses, does not establish absolutely the credibility of those testimonies.[122]

74. When evidence of only one witness is available in relation to a certain material fact, the Chamber may rely on such evidence even in the absence of corroboration, but should carefully scrutinise all uncorroborated evidence before making any findings on the basis of such evidence.[123]

2.7.5 Circumstantial Evidence

75. The Chamber may infer the existence of a particular fact upon which the guilt of the accused depends on circumstantial evidence, but only if it is the only reasonable conclusion that could be drawn from the evidence presented. If there is another conclusion which is also reasonably open from the evidence, and which is consistent with the non-existence of that fact, the conclusion of guilt beyond reasonable doubt cannot be drawn.[124]

2.7.6 Prior Statements

76. Rule 90(A) of the Rules provides that witnesses shall be heard by the Chamber, and there is a general, though not absolute, preference for live testimony before the Tribunal.[125] Prior out-of-court witness statements are normally relevant only as necessary for the Chamber to assess credibility. While there is no absolute prohibition on accepting prior statements for the truth of 1452. Witness T133 asserted that he had no knowledge of the meeting held in Masango commune and that Witness CNAC did not inform him of the meeting.[1859] The Chamber observes, however, that the meeting at Masango commune could have been convened without Witness T133's knowledge. The Chamber further does not find as plausible Witness T133's evidence that because of his close friendship and daily contact with Witness CNAC, he would have necessarily been informed of the meeting. Moreover, the Chamber notes that Witness T133 had a family relationship with Nzabonimana, which in the Chamber's view may have motivated the witness to deny Nzabonimana's involvement in the events.

1453. Witness T134 did not know of any orders given by Nzabonimana to destroy Tutsi houses in Masango commune in May 1994, or that Mpamo held a meeting with MRND supporters urging them to implement Nzabonimana's orders.[1860] Again, however, the Chamber notes that the orders and the meeting could have occurred without the witness's knowledge. Furthermore, the Chamber finds that Witness T134 was not credible when he testified that he would go outside at night while he was hiding at Mpamo's, particularly as Witness T134's wife had informed him that he was being sought after. As Witness T134 was in hiding, he was therefore not necessarily aware of what was going on in the commune during the period in question.

1454. Nevertheless, the Chamber observes that the Prosecution relied on the uncorroborated hearsay evidence of a single witness to support this allegation. The Chamber recalls that it may find an allegation proven beyond a reasonable doubt on the basis of a single witness's testimony (2.7.4). However, in this instance, given the hearsay nature of the witness's evidence and the lack of corroborating evidence, the Chamber does not find this evidence sufficient to support this allegation. Having considered the totality of the evidence, the Chamber concludes that the Prosecution has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the allegation contained in Paragraph 47 of the Indictment. In light of the foregoing, the Chamber need not address whether sufficient notice was provided for this event.

3.6.2 Destruction of Houses in Nyamabuye Commune

3.6.2.1 Introduction

1455. Paragraph 46 of the Indictment alleges that in April 1994, Callixte Nzabonimana visited the Nyamabuye commune office and told the Hutu civilians present to destroy the house of a dead Tutsi and to cover it up, so that in the event of an enquiry, the death of the Tutsi would not be known.[1861]

1456. The Prosecution submits that in May 1994, at the Nyamabuye commune office, Nzabonimana gave orders that Tutsi houses, including that of a man named Mpambara, should be destroyed and crops planted to cover any traces of the massacre of Tutsis. These orders were given to ensure that evidence of the massacre was destroyed in case a commission of enquiry carried out investigations. The Prosecution relies on Witness CNAA.[1862]

1806. Under Rwandan law, similar crimes as those at issue in the present case carry the possible penalty of life imprisonment, depending on the nature of the accused's participation.[2223] In this Tribunal, a sentence of life imprisonment is generally reserved for those who planned or ordered atrocities, as well as the most senior authorities.[2224]

1807. Aggravating circumstances must be proven beyond a reasonable doubt.[2225] The Chamber may only consider aggravating circumstances that are pled in the indictment.[2226] Any circumstance included as an element of the crime for which an individual is convicted will not be considered as an aggravating factor.[2227]

1808. The Appeals Chamber has listed various factors which, if proven beyond a reasonable doubt, may qualify as aggravating circumstances. These include the position of the accused, the length of time during which the crime continued, premeditation, the vulnerability of the victims, the status of the victims and the circumstances of the offences generally.[2228] The Appeals Chamber has also held that an abuse of influence by the accused may be considered as an aggravating factor.[2229]

1809. A particularly large number of victims may also be an aggravating circumstance. This is true even for extermination as a crime against humanity, which requires "killing on a large scale," so long as the extent of the killings exceeds that required for extermination.[2230]

1810. Mitigating circumstances need only be established by a balance of probabilities.[2231] Such circumstances include cooperation with the Prosecution, voluntary surrender, good character with no prior criminal convictions, comportment in detention, personal and family

II. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

7. The Appeals Chamber recalls the applicable standards of appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber only reviews errors of law which invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and errors of fact which have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[19]

8. Regarding errors of law, the Appeals Chamber has stated:

> Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[20]

9. Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in a trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, it will articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly. In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but, when necessary, also applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the appellant before that finding may be confirmed on appeal.[21]

10. Regarding errors of fact, it is well established that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by a Trial Chamber:

> Where the Defence alleges an erroneous finding of fact, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial, and it will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. Furthermore, the erroneous finding will be revoked or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[22]

11. A party cannot merely repeat on appeal arguments that did not succeed at trial, unless it can demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's rejection of those arguments constituted an error warranting the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[23] Arguments which do not have the potential to cause the impugned decision to be reversed or revised may be immediately dismissed by the Appeals Chamber and need not be considered on the merits.[24]

12. In order for the Appeals Chamber to assess arguments on appeal, the appealing party must provide precise references to relevant transcript pages or paragraphs in the decision or judgement to which the challenge is made.[25] Further, the Appeals Chamber cannot be expected to consider a party's submissions in detail if they are obscure, vague, or suffer from other formal and obvious insufficiencies.[26] Finally, the Appeals Chamber has inherent discretion in selecting which submissions merit a detailed reasoned opinion in writing and will dismiss arguments which are evidently unfounded without providing detailed reasoning.[27]

other forms of responsibility pleaded in the Indictment. In the course of doing so, the Appeals Chamber will consider whether there was a sufficient nexus between Rukundo's acts, which he disputes under this ground of appeal, and the perpetration of the crimes as required by the relevant form of responsibility.

51. In determining Rukundo's role in the murder of Madame Rudahunga and the beating of the four others, the Trial Chamber noted that all four of the Prosecution witnesses who testified about this event connected him to the attacks.[107] It found that Rukundo was at the scene of the abduction and that he followed the vehicle carrying Madame Rudahunga and the soldiers who abducted her.[108] It further found that these same soldiers returned to Saint Joseph's College about 20 minutes later and abducted her children and two other Tutsi civilians.[109] Rukundo's car was also observed in the area of Madame Rudahunga's house after the killing and the beatings.[110] Furthermore, the Trial Chamber noted that Witness BLC attested to hearing him boast that "[w]e entered in Rudahunga's Inyenzi's house, we killed the wife and the children, but the idiot managed to get away",[111] while Witness CCH stated that Rukundo told her that Louis Rudahunga had to be killed.[112] The Appeals Chamber finds that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that this evidence was sufficient to support a finding that Rukundo was involved in the killing of Madame Rudahunga and the beatings of the four others.

52. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an "aider and abettor commitFsğ acts specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, or lending moral support for the perpetration of a specific crime, and that this support had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[113] It recalls that there is no requirement of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime nor that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime.[114] It is sufficient for the aider and abettor's assistance or encouragement to have had a substantial effect on the realisation of that crime,[115] the establishment of which is a "fact-based inquiry".[116] The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber's findings on Rukundo's role in the attacks, as set out above, demonstrate that his acts substantially contributed to the commission of the crimes.

53. With regard to the mens rea required for aiding and abetting, the Appeals Chamber has held that "Ftğhe requisite mental element Ł...ğ is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator."[117] Specific intent crimes such as genocide also require that "the aider and abettor must know of the principal perpetrator's specific intent."[118]

54. Bearing in mind the Trial Chamber's findings that these attacks formed part of a larger campaign of ethnic violence in the area and country,[119] the Appeals Chamber is convinced that the perpetrators acted with both genocidal intent and knowledge of the widespread and systematic attack against Tutsi civilians. In his consultation with the assailants prior to the crimes, his presence during the abduction of Madame Rudahunga, and his subsequent boasting of the killing, Rukundo would have been aware of his role in the crimes and the perpetrators' mens rea. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber finds that Rukundo's actions aided and abetted genocide and murder as a crime against humanity.

(c) Chapeau Elements of Crimes Against Humanity

55. Rukundo challenges his conviction for murder as a crime against humanity on the basis that Madame Rudahunga did not belong to a political group and it was not proven that he was aware of the existence of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population.[120]

56. Article 3 of the Statute requires that the crimes be committed "as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds." In the present case, the Trial Chamber found that the killing of Madame Rudahunga, a Tutsi, was part of a widespread and systematic attack against Tutsi civilians on ethnic grounds.[121]

Witnesses BLP, BLJ, and BLC is contradictory with respect to the date and time of the events as well as the type of vehicle used.[177]

76. The Appeals Chamber recalls its holding in the Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgement that:

> two testimonies corroborate one another when one prima facie credible testimony is compatible with the other prima facie credible testimony regarding the same fact or a sequence of linked facts. It is not necessary that both testimonies be identical in all aspects or describe the same fact in the same way. Every witness presents what he has seen from his own point of view at the time of the events, or according to how he understood the events recounted by others. It follows that corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony.[178]

77. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's finding that Witnesses BLP, BLJ, BLC, and CCH corroborated each other on the sequence of events at Saint Joseph's College, despite the fact that they did not all testify about the same fact or from the same vantage point. The Trial Chamber took into consideration that Witness BLJ corroborated Witness BLP on the fact that Madame Rudahunga was abducted from Saint Joseph's College by a group of soldiers and that the same soldiers returned about 20 minutes later and abducted two of her children and two other Tutsi civilians.[179] It also found that these two witnesses corroborated each other regarding the fact that Rukundo was acting with the soldiers.[180] While Witness BLP saw Rukundo leave Saint Joseph's College with the soldiers and Madame Rudahunga, Witness BLJ was told of "Father Emmanuel's car" still being in the vicinity of the attack, and she saw Rukundo at the hospital with the same soldiers who abducted her.[181] Although their evidence was different, both gave evidence that Rukundo was involved.

78. Similarly, the Trial Chamber noted that Witness BLC's evidence that Rukundo boasted about the killing of the Rudahunga family was consistent with the evidence of Witnesses BLP and BLJ.[182] Witness BLC's evidence was from a different perspective, as he was not present at the events but was told about them by Rukundo. However, it nonetheless supports the conclusion that Rukundo was involved in the attacks.

79. Finally, the Trial Chamber noted that Witness CCH's evidence that Rukundo told her that Louis Rudahunga had to be killed and that they had found documents at Louis Rudahunga's house was consistent with Witness BLC's evidence.[183] According to Witness BLC, Rukundo had said that Louis Rudahunga had escaped but that Madame Rudahunga and her children had been killed.[184]

80. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's reasoning that this evidence is corroborative of Witness BLP's evidence despite coming from different perspectives.

81. The Appeals Chamber further recalls that minor inconsistencies commonly occur in witness testimony without rendering the testimony unreliable and that it is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to evaluate such inconsistencies and to consider whether the evidence as a whole is credible, without explaining its decision in every detail.[185]

82. The Appeals Chamber is not convinced that the evidence of Witnesses BLP, BLJ, and BLC regarding the dates of the abductions from Saint Joseph's College is sufficiently inconsistent to render unreasonable the Trial Chamber's finding that these witnesses corroborated each other. Witnesses BLP and BLJ placed the event in late April 1994 and on 27 April 1994 respectively,[186] whereas Witness BLC testified that it was in May when Rukundo boasted that they had killed Madame Rudahunga and her children after coming from the Rudahunga home.[187] While Witness BLC's evidence about the date of the attacks varies from that of Witnesses BLP and BLJ, the latter two witnesses' testimony is consistent. As Witnesses BLP and BLJ were the two eyewitnesses to the attack, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that this minor inconsistency in Witness BLC's evidence undermines the general finding that these witnesses corroborated each other.

83. Similarly, while the Trial Chamber did not explicitly address at what time the abductions and attacks on Madame Rudahunga, her children, and the two others took place, the Appeals Chamber considers that the inconsistencies between the witnesses' evidence were minor and that their testimonies on this point were largely consistent. All the witnesses placed the abductions in the [187] T. 7 December 2006 p. 39. Witness BLC did not specify the date on which he heard Rukundo boasting about the killing of the Rudahunga family during his examination-in-chief. T. 4 December 2006 pp. 21, 22. However, during cross-examination he stated: "A. I'm talking about a particular day but not a date that I recall. I'm talking about the images that I recall, the weather. It had just rained, for example, and I did not say that it was such a date. Q. Witness, are you able to situate this event in April, May, early – early April, early May – early April, early – end of May, early April, end of May? A. It is true that it was a certain period, obviously not in April. It must have been in May, certainly. Q. (Microphones overlapping) A. It was – I believe it was around mid May, but it's certain that it was in May, not in April. That I recall." See T. 7 December 2006 p. 39. When confronted with the assertion that Madam Rudahunga died in the middle of April 1994, Witness BLC stated: "Of course. You can contest or question the time. You see, when I came here, I said, 'Let me not be asked questions about specific dates.'" See T. 7 December 2006 p. 41.

According to Rukundo, Witness BLC's testimony is inconsistent with the accounts of Witnesses CSF and CSG in relation to his location during the abductions.[470] Finally, Rukundo acknowledged that Witnesses CCH and CCG did know him.[471] However, he contends that they would have heard about his role in any of the abductions, but did not mention it.[472]

195. The Appeals Chamber recalls that a Trial Chamber must take into account the difficulties associated with identification evidence in a given case and must carefully evaluate any such evidence before accepting it as the basis for sustaining a conviction.[473] The Trial Chamber relied principally on Witness CSF's account and considered the evidence of Witnesses CSG and BLC as corroboration.[474] Although in summarizing their evidence it noted that they did not previously know Rukundo and that the basis of their identification was hearsay,[475] it did not expressly discuss this issue in its deliberations. Trial Chambers are not required to refer to every piece of evidence on the trial record.[476] However, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber's failure to address these points amounts to a failure to provide a reasoned opinion.

196. Nonetheless, the Appeals Chamber is not convinced that this error invalidated the Trial Chamber's reliance on these witnesses' accounts. Specifically, Witness CSF testified that he learned of Rukundo's identity from religious personnel who knew him and attended his ordination.[477] Therefore, although hearsay from unidentified sources, this additional and specific detail provides greater indicia of reliability.

197. With respect to Witness BLC's identification of Rukundo, the Appeals Chamber recalls that, in addition to observing Rukundo's role in the abductions, the witness overheard him boast of killing Madame Rudahunga.[478] This claim is similar to what Witness CCH heard Rukundo say on another occasion in relation to that killing.[479] In view of the Trial Chamber's findings on Rukundo's role in Madame Rudahunga's death,[480] the Appeals Chamber considers that this provides a reasonable basis for his identification. The Appeals Chamber also observes that Witness BLC was a seminarian, spent time near the seminary's administration building, and saw Rukundo spending time with another priest, whom the witness knew.[481] Given this background, he would have also been better placed to verify Rukundo's identity.

198. Witness CSG heard other refugees say, "[y]ou have to flee because Emmanuel Rukundo [is] coming", each time he arrived at the seminary.[482] When the witness first saw Rukundo, he specifically discussed with the other refugees why they referred to him as "Father Rukundo" given that he appeared to be a soldier.[483] The Appeals Chamber considers that, when taken together with the identification evidence of Witnesses CSF and BLC, it is clear that a number of refugees at the Saint Léon Minor Seminary were in a position to identify Rukundo.

199. The Appeals Chamber is not persuaded that the various differences between the accounts of Witnesses CSF, CSG, BLC, CCH, and CCG call into question the identification evidence of the main witnesses on this event. As discussed below, the Trial Chamber reasonably explained the discrepancies between the accounts of Witnesses CSF, CSG, and BLC. Although it did not expressly discuss the fact that Witnesses CCH and CCG did not mention Rukundo's role in the abductions, the Appeals Chamber observes that it is highly speculative to suggest that their failure to mention Rukundo's involvement meant that he had none, particularly because they only arrived at the seminary in the second half of May 1994.[484]

(b) Corroboration

200. Rukundo submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Witness CSF's testimony was corroborated by the evidence of Witnesses CSG and BLC in light of the differences in their accounts related to the use of lists, the composition of the groups accompanying Rukundo who conducted the searches, Rukundo's location and active involvement during the searches, the frequency of his visits, and the timing of the abductions.[485]

201. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony."[486] Although there are various differences between the accounts of Witnesses CSF, CSG, and BLC, as explained in the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber clearly expressed its preference for and relied principally on the "firsthand and largely consistent account of [Rukundo's] four visits" provided by Witness CSF.[487] Moreover, it provided reasons for viewing the evidence of Witnesses CSG and BLC simply as corroboration. In reconciling the different descriptions of the events provided by Witnesses BLC and CSG, the Trial Chamber noted their varying vantage points and the impact of Witness CSG's injury, her pregnancy at the time, and the desperate living conditions at the seminary.[488] Therefore, it follows from the Trial Chamber's discussion that it accepted only the specific details of Witness CSF's account and relied only on the fundamental features of the evidence of Witnesses CSG and BLC.[489] The Appeals Chamber can identify no error in this approach since there is no legal requirement for the corroboration of evidence.[490]

202. The Appeals Chamber also finds no merit in Rukundo's suggestion that the Trial Chamber relied solely on Witness CSG to establish that Rukundo used lists to identify refugees notwithstanding its decision not to accept Witness CSG's testimony absent corroboration.[491] It follows from Witness CSF's testimony that Rukundo arrived with a list and handed it to soldiers, who then called the names of refugees.[492] Based on this evidence, the Appeals Chamber considers that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to determine that Rukundo identified refugees with a list. It is immaterial whether he personally called out the names or whether a soldier did.

203. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber is not convinced that Rukundo has demonstrated that the Trial Chamber's assessment was unreasonable.

(c) Credibility

204. Rukundo submits that the Trial Chamber unreasonably considered the evidence of Witnesses CSF, CSG, and BLC as credible despite numerous inconsistencies within their accounts as well as the likelihood of collusion between Witnesses CSF and CSG.[493] In particular, Rukundo argues that Witness CSF's evidence is "implausible" because he testified that the four abductions occurred four days apart with the first around 20 April 1994 and the last around 2 June 1994.[494] In addition, Rukundo contends that Witness CSF provided no significant detail with respect to the recalls that, once it has determined the law applicable to a particular issue, it should in principle follow its previous decisions, in the interests of certainty and predictability of the law.[53]

1. Corroboration

27. Rutaganda raised arguments concerning the corroboration of testimonies before the International Tribunal in his grounds of appeal relating to crimes committed at the Amgar garage, and to the murder of Emmanuel Kayitare.

28. The Appeals Chamber recalls that, as a general rule, a Trial Chamber is primarily responsible for assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial, and that, in this regard, it is incumbent on the Trial Chamber to consider whether a witness is reliable and whether evidence presented is credible.[54] In this exercise, the Trial Chamber has the inherent discretion to decide what approach is most appropriate for the assessment of evidence in the circumstances of the case.[55]

29. Similarly, the issue as to whether it is necessary to rely on one or several witness testimonies to establish proof of a material fact depends on different factors that have to be assessed in the circumstances of each case.[56] It is possible for one Trial Chamber to prefer that a witness statement be corroborated, but neither the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal nor of the ICTY makes this an obligation.[57] Where testimonies are divergent, it is the duty of the Trial Chamber, which heard the witnesses, to decide which evidence it deems to be more probative,[58] and to choose which of the two divergent versions of the same event it may admit.

2. Right to cross-examination

30. Rutaganda raised arguments concerning the right to cross-examination in his grounds of appeal pertaining to general errors of law and to crimes committed at the Amgar garage.

31. Under Rule 85(B) of the Rules, each witness may, following his examination-in-chief, be subjected to cross-examination and re-examination. As to the procedure for cross-examination, Rule 90 (F) (sic) stipulates that cross-examination shall be limited to points raised in the examination-in-chief or to matters affecting the credibility of the witness. The Rules provide no other indication as to the scope of cross-examination or the form it should take, and only give general rules on examination and cross-examination of witnesses that are patterned after the U.S Federal Rules of Evidence.[59] With regard to leading questions in particular, the Rules do not contain any specific provision thereon, but, as the Appeals Chamber pointed out in the Akayesu case:[60]

> [...] The Defence has not provided evidence which effectively refutes the evidence presented by the Prosecutor in support of the allegations set forth in paragraph 10 of the Indictment.[283]

171. The Prosecution points out that the aforementioned passages of the Trial Judgement cited by the Appellant are quoted out of context, and that the argument reveals a misapprehension of the language used by the Trial Chamber. According to the Prosecution, the language used simply illustrates that the Trial Chamber did what it was required to do, namely, consider all the evidence presented at trial before ruling on the guilt or innocence of the Accused, without misapprehending the principle that the burden of proving guilt beyond reasonable doubt lies on the Prosecution. The Prosecution further submits that, in so doing, the Trial Chamber correctly held that the Appellant's defence was more of a bare denial than an alibi.[284]

172. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the standard of proof to be applied is that of proof beyond a reasonable doubt, and that the burden of proof lies on the Prosecution, insofar as the Accused enjoys the benefit of the presumption of innocence.[285] The Appeals Chamber also endorses the Appeals Chamber's considerations in Kayishema and Ruzindana whereby:

> The Appeals Chamber recalls that at the trial stage, the Trial Chamber limited itself to assessing the evidence presented by the parties. The Prosecutor must always prove the existence of the facts charged as well as the accused's responsibility therefor. The Defence, for its part, must produce evidence before the Chamber in support of its claims that the crimes charged cannot be imputed to the accused because of his alibi. However, in that case, the burden of proof is not shouldered by the Defence. It is merely required to produce evidence likely to raise reasonable doubt regarding the case of the Prosecution.[286]

173. In response to the question as to whether the Trial Chamber did, as the second passage cited by the Appellant seems to suggest, make an erroneous application of the burden of proof and shifted it, the Appeals Chamber considers that it is first of all necessary to find out what standard was applied in respect of the burden of proof by the Trial Chamber in the Judgement beyond the impugned paragraph. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber points out that Section 1.4 of the Trial Judgement dealing with evidentiary matters does not set out the standard applicable to the burden of proof.

174. An analysis of parts of the Trial Judgement dealing with the Chamber's factual findings relating to paragraphs 11 to 18 of the Indictment helps to show that the Trial Chamber actually indicated that the onus was on the Prosecution to prove the charges brought against the Appellant beyond a reasonable doubt, and then went on to apply this standard by acquitting the Appellant of the charge against him when it deemed that the Prosecution had not discharged this burden.

> However, the Chamber notes that the Prosecutor has not led evidence to the effect that the Interahamwe manning the roadblock had been stationed there by the Accused. Hence, the Chamber finds that it has not been proven beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused stationed Interahamwe members at the said roadblock.[287]

> The Chamber notes however that only Prosecution Witness V had testified that the Accused had chaired the meeting and had taken the floor. The Chamber notes that V's testimony on this point is not corroborated by those of Witnesses C and EE, both of whom had declared that the Accused was indeed present at the meeting and had taken a seat at the table of speakers but had himself not taken the floor. Accordingly, the Chamber holds that, on the basis of uncorroborated testimonies > presented to it, it has not been proven beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused ordered that all Tutsis be tracked and thrown into the river.[288]

175. The Appeals Chamber further underscores the fact that, incidentally, the Trial Chamber explicitly recalled the standard of the burden of proof in most of its legal findings.[289] It is therefore not correct to claim, as the Appellant does, that the Trial Chamber in general misapprehended the principle of presumption of innocence and of burden of proof.

176. The Appeals Chamber considers next that it would be proper to place the passages cited by the Appellant in their context. Paragraph 196 of the Trial Judgement falls within the purview of the factual findings of the Trial Chamber in relation to the charges under paragraph 10 of the Indictment dealing with the distribution of weapons. After finding in paragraph 195 of the Trial Judgement that Prosecution Witnesses J, U, T and Q were credible, and deciding to rely on their testimonies, the Trial Chamber examined in paragraph 196 of the Judgement the Appellant's rebuttal of the evidence brought against him in respect of this charge. The paragraph in question reads as follows:

> The Chamber notes that the testimony of the Accused and Witness DDD indicates that the Accused did leave his house on 8 April, and that he was in Kigali at the Amgar office on 15 April and on 24 April. His defence to the allegations set forth in paragraph 10 of the Indictment is a bare denial. The Chamber notes that under cross-examination, the Defence did not suggest to the Prosecution witnesses that the Accused had not participated in the distribution of weapons, or that he was not present at Nyarugenge commune on 8, 15 and 24 April 1994. Further the Defence did not produce any witnesses to confirm an alibi by testifying that the Accused was elsewhere when the events described by the Prosecution witnesses took place, as he does in respect of other allegations in the Indictment. A number of Defence witnesses testified that the Accused was very busy selling beer after his return to Kigali on 14 April, but the Chamber considers that selling beer would not have precluded the Accused from also engaging in the distribution of guns as alleged by the Prosecutor. For these reasons, the Chamber considers that the Defence has not provided evidence which effectively refutes the evidence presented by the Prosecutor in support of the allegations set forth in paragraph 10 of the Indictment. (Emphasis added)

177. The Appeals Chamber considers that the language used by the Trial Chamber in the last sentence of the paragraph in question is ambiguous with respect to the standard of proof applied, particularly as the said standard has not been previously enunciated in the Judgement. The Appeals Chamber nonetheless concurs with the findings of the Appeals Chamber in Musema, which did not consider that the fact that the Trial Chamber assessed "the relative weight and probative value to be accorded to each piece of evidence in the context of all other evidence presented to it in the course of the trial," did not allow for the conclusion that it had shifted the burden of proof, but, on the contrary, was proof of the correct application of the relevant rules of procedure and evidence. In the instant case, it appears that the Trial Chamber first considered that the testimonies of four of the witnesses called by the Prosecution in support of this charge were credible and reliable; and next it considered whether the Appellant's rebuttals were sufficiently supported. The Appeals Chamber understands that this approach is in line with the first passage cited by the Appellant. The Appeals Chamber understands the expression "the Defence has not provided evidence which effectively refutes the evidence presented by the Prosecutor" to mean that, according to the Trial Chamber, the evidence adduced by the Appellant in support of his denial of the charges was not sufficient to cast reasonable doubt on the issue as to whether the Prosecution had discharged the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt. The last sentence of the paragraph illustrates this position:

[288] Ibid., para. 315.

> A number of Defence witnesses testified that the Accused was very busy selling beer after his return to Kigali on 14 April, but the Chamber considers that selling beer would not have precluded the Accused from also engaging in the distribution of guns as alleged by the Prosecutor.

178. Accordingly, an analysis of the Trial Chamber's approach in assessing the evidence presented before it by the parties shows that in this instance, it did not depart from the approach used in the rest of the Judgement, and did not apply a different standard of proof nor, as a result, commit an error of law in this respect.

179. The Appellant also raises, in support of his argument, the alleged violation by the Trial Chamber of the rule that the Accused should be given the benefit of the doubt because: first, it considered in paragraph 195 of the Trial Judgement (distribution of weapons) that Witness J was credible on the grounds that, during cross-examination, he had given reasonable answers to the questions put to him regarding the discrepancies between his testimony and his statement prior to the trial;[290] second, it considered in paragraph 253 of the Judgement (attack at the Amgar garage), with regard to Witness Q, "that the said contradictions can probably be attributed to the trauma he may have suffered from having to recount the painful events he witnessed and of which he was a victim";[291] third, it considered as negligible the contradiction between the testimonies of Professor Haglund and of Witness Q and dismissed, in paragraph 259 of the Judgement, the findings by the former on the ground that the Trial Chamber was "not satisfied that the grave site referred to by Witness Q and the one exhumed by Professor Haglund are one and the same."

180. In response, the Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber, in general, ascribes probative value to the evidence before it based on its relevance and credibility, and that at the end of the proceedings the Prosecution should discharge its burden of proving that all the elements of the crime have been established beyond a reasonable doubt.

181. The Appeals Chamber considers that the aforementioned passages of the Judgement relating to the Trial Chamber's assessment of the probative value of the testimonies of J and Q clearly show that the Chamber actually considered the testimonies to be credible and reliable after having measured the scope of the discrepancies referred to above. There is nothing to show that following this assessment the Trial Chamber entertained any doubts on the matter, as the Appellant's allegation seems to suggest. The Appeals Chamber notes that the examples cited supra have also been used by the Appellant as allegations of factual errors in support of his ground of appeal pertaining to the distribution of weapons and to crimes committed at Amgar garage. The Appeals Chamber will thus re-endorse the relevant findings it made with reference to those grounds of appeal under Parts VI and VII of this Judgement. The Appeals Chamber holds that the argument that the examples in question also reflect a violation of the rule that the Accused should be given the benefit of the doubt is clearly unfounded.

182. The Appellant also submits that the approach taken by the Trial Chamber with regard to the non-corroboration of evidence denotes a violation of the principle that it is the Prosecution's duty to prove the charges beyond a reasonable doubt. The Appellant refers in particular to a passage in paragraph 18 of the Trial Judgement:

> The Chamber's approach is that it will rely on the evidence of a single witness, provided such evidence is relevant, admissible and credible.

The Appellant submits that, where corroboration of some evidence is not effectively requested, it is not sufficient for the said evidence to be "relevant, admissible and credible" for it to serve validly as the only basis for conviction; it must also be sufficiently strong to be believed beyond all reasonable doubt.[292] The Prosecution does not respond specifically to this contention.

183. With reference to paragraph 18 of the Trial Judgement, the Appeals Chamber notes that the French version of the passage cited above differs significantly from the English, without such difference affecting the assessment of the contention raised by the Appellant. The French version reads as follows:

> La Chambre note qu'aux termes de l'Article 96i), la corroboration du témoignage de la victime n'est pas requise en cas de viol et de violences sexuelles. La Chambre s'associe aux Jugement Akayesu et au Jugement « Le Procureur contre Dusko Tadic » (le « Jugement Tadic ») selon lesquels le fait que le Règlement stipule que la corroboration du témoignage de la victime de violences sexuelles n'est pas requise n'autorise pas à déduire que la corroboration de témoignages est nécessaire dans les cas de crimes autres que les violences sexuelles. Toutefois, la Chambre examinera avec prudence tout témoignage unique. Elle pourrait s'en contenter pour autant qu'elle le juge pertinent, recevable et crédible. Conformément à l'Article 89 du Règlement, la Chambre peut recevoir tout élément de preuve pertinent dont elle estime qu'il a valeur probante. Le Règlement n'exclut pas la preuve par ouï-dire et la Chambre est libre d'examiner des preuves de cette nature. Cependant, lorsqu'elle décide de le faire, la Chambre procède en toute précaution[293]

184. The Appeals Chamber considers that paragraph 18 of the Judgement contains a relevant and accurate statement on the application of the rules of evidence, drawn on the Rules and case-law of the Tribunal with respect to the evidence of a single witness, hearsay evidence, and the principle of caution related thereto. The indication by the Trial Chamber that it would rely on the evidence of a single witness, so long as it considered such evidence relevant, admissible and credible, should not be interpreted to mean a misapprehension of the general rule of evidence, which requires the Prosecution to prove its case beyond a reasonable doubt. As indicated earlier, although Section 1.4 of the Judgement devoted to evidentiary matters does not contain a reminder of the principle relating to the burden of proof, the Trial Chamber well and truly applied it throughout the Judgement. The Appeals Chamber finds no reason to think that the passage cited, which is perfectly compatible with this principle, would signify that the Trial Chamber implicitly decided not to apply the principle in respect of uncorroborated evidence. The argument must therefore be dismissed.

F. Error relating to prior witness statements [294]

185. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber committed an error of law by adopting erroneous and general criteria in its assessment of the contradictions between witnesses' prior statements and their in-court testimony, with a view to minimizing their importance.[295] According to him, this error has occasioned an incorrect assessment of the evidence presented by the Prosecution, and this calls for a retrial.[296] In support of his allegations, the Appellant invokes in particular the Judgement rendered in Kayishema and Ruzindana.[297]

(c) Direct and public incitement to commit genocide;

(d) Attempt to commit genocide;

(e) Complicity in genocide.

524. As recalled by the Appeals Chamber of ICTY in Jelisic, the Statute[980] defines the specific intent required for the crime of genocide as "the intent to accomplish certain specific types of destruction"[981] against a targeted group. Pursuant to the Statute, therefore, specific intent implies that the perpetrator seeks to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnic, racial or religious group as such, by means of the acts enumerated under Article 2 of the said Statute.[982] In order to prove specific intent, it must be established that the enumerated acts were directed against a group referred to under Article 2 of the Statute and committed with the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, the said group as such.

525. The crime of genocide sometimes implies several offenders participating in the commission of the crime. The Appeals Chamber concurs with the Appellant that in order to find a person guilty of genocide, it must be established that such a person was personally possessed of the specific intent to commit the crime at the time he did so. Nonetheless, as stated by the Appeals Chamber in Kayishema/Ruzindana, "explicit manifestations of criminal intent are [...] often rare in the context of criminal trials".[983] In the absence of explicit, direct proof, the dolus specialis may therefore be inferred from relevant facts and circumstances.[984] Such an approach prevents perpetrators from escaping convictions simply because such manifestations are absent.[985] The validity of this interpretation was confirmed by the Appeals Chambers of both ad hoc Tribunals.[986] With respect to the facts and circumstances from which specific intent may be inferred, the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Jelisic stated that such facts are, inter alia:

> [...] the general context, the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against the same group, the scale of atrocities committed, the systematic targeting of victims on account of their membership of a particular group, or the repetition of destructive and discriminatory acts.[987] (Emphasis added)

The ICTY Appeals Chamber also indicated that the existence of a plan or policy is not "a legal ingredient" of the crime of genocide,[988] but that proving the existence of such a plan or policy may facilitate proof of the crime.[989] Moreover, the Kayishema/Ruzindana Appeal Judgement reveals that making anti-Tutsi utterances or being affiliated to an extremist anti-Tutsi group is not a sine qua non for establishing dolus specialis.[990] The Appeals Chamber holds the view that establishing such a fact may, nonetheless, facilitate proof of specific intent.

526. The Appeals Chamber will now examine the Trial Chamber's determination of the dolus specialis. It appears helpful, to this end, to examine paragraphs 398, 399 and 400 of the Trial Judgement, which read as follows:

> 398. In its findings on the applicable law with respect to the crime of genocide, the Chamber held that, in practice, intent may be determined, on a case by case basis, through a logical inference from the material evidence submitted to

456. That said, it is clear that the penalties imposed on accused persons found guilty by the Tribunal must be directed, on the one hand, at retribution of the said accused, who must see their crimes punished, and over and above that, on other hand, at deterrence, namely to dissuade for ever, others who may be tempted in the future to perpetrate such atrocities by showing them that the international community shall not tolerate the serious violations of international humanitarian law and human rights.

457. The Chamber also recalls that, in the determination of sentences, it is required under Article 23(2) of the Statute and Rule 101(B) of the Rules to take into account a number of factors including the gravity of the offence, the individual circumstances of the convicted person, the existence of any aggravating or mitigating circumstances, including the substantial co-operation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after his conviction. It is a matter, as it were, of individualizing the penalty.

458. Clearly, however, as far as the individualization of penalties is concerned, the judges of the Chamber cannot limit themselves to the factors mentioned in the Statute and the Rules. Here again, their unfettered discretion in assessing the facts and attendant circumstances should enable them to take into account any other factor that they deem pertinent.

459. Similarly, the factors referred to in the Statute and in the Rules cannot be interpreted as having to be applied cumulatively in the determination of the sentence.

ATHANASE SEROMBA

Counsel for Athanase Seromba:

Mr. Patrice Monthé
Ms. Sarah Ngo Bihegué

78. Third, Athanase Seromba submits that the Trial Chamber violated the legal principle "unus testis, nullus testis" by relying on the evidence of Witness CBK, as he was the only witness to testify that Athanase Seromba expelled the employees from the parish.[191]

79. The Appeals Chamber recalls that where a Trial Chamber relies on the evidence of a single witness, this alone does not render its finding erroneous. A witness's testimony need not be corroborated in order to have probative value[192] and a Trial Chamber has the discretion to decide in the circumstances of the case whether corroboration is necessary.[193] Athanase Seromba has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's reliance on the sole evidence of Witness CBK on this point was erroneous.

2. Alleged Errors relating to Witness NA1

80. As summarized in the Trial Judgement, Defence Witness NA1 testified that he arrived at Nyange parish on 15 April 1994, where he had previously worked between 1992 and 1993.[194] He stated that none of the employees of the parish had been dismissed.[195] Under cross-examination, he testified that he had no idea which employees were among the refugees and that he was not in a position to know who was an employee of the parish and who was not.[196]

81. Athanase Seromba submits that the Trial Chamber erred in attaching "no credibility" to the "precise, coherent and consistent" testimony of Witness NA1.[197] He argues that the Trial Chamber "distorted" the evidence of Witness NA1 given during his cross-examination by "decontextualizing" it.[198] He also claims that the Trial Chamber erroneously referred to certain statements as having been given during cross-examination while, in fact, the witness had made those statements during examination-in-chief.[199] perpetrators of the crime, which would merely constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting.[412] Quite the contrary, the findings of the Trial Chamber allow for only one conclusion, namely, that Athanase Seromba was a principal perpetrator in the killing of the refugees in Nyange church. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Athanase Seromba's conduct can only be characterized as "committing" these crimes.

82. The Appeals Chamber notes that Athanase Seromba refers to the following passage in support of his submission that the Trial Chamber distorted the testimony of Witness NA1:

173. The Appeals Chamber recalls that an accused evinces the requisite mens rea for committing a crime when he acts with an intent to commit that crime.[413] This stands in contrast to the mens rea for aiding and abetting, which "is indicated by the requirement that the act of participation be performed with knowledge that it will assist the principal in the commission of the criminal act."[414]

174. The Appeals Chamber finds, Judge Liu dissenting, that the only reasonable conclusion to be drawn is that, by his acts, Athanase Seromba intended that the approximately 1,500 Tutsi refugees be killed. Therefore, the mens rea requirement for committing is satisfied. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the acts of Athanase Seromba were not carried out merely with the knowledge that they would assist in the killing of the refugees.

175. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the Prosecution's submission that the Trial Chamber erred by finding that Athanase Seromba did not have the required specific intent to incur liability for genocide. The Appeals Chamber recalls that in addition to intent and knowledge as regards the material elements of the crime of genocide, the mental element of the crime also requires that the perpetrator have acted with the specific intent to destroy a protected group as such in whole or in part.[415]

176. The Trial Chamber correctly held that genocide is a crime requiring specific intent,[416] and that this intent may be proven through inference from the facts and circumstances of a case.[417] In this case, the Trial Chamber, in line with the Appeals Chamber's previous holdings,[418] stated that > the specific intent of genocide may be inferred from certain facts or indicia, including but not limited to (a) the general context of the perpetration of other culpable acts systematically directed against that same group, whether these acts were committed by the same offender or by others, (b) the scale of atrocities committed, (c) their general nature, (d) their execution in a region or a

177. The Appeals Chamber finds, Judge Liu dissenting, that while the Trial Chamber correctly set out the applicable law, it erred in concluding that the Prosecution had not proved that Athanase Seromba acted with the required specific intent. The Appeals Chamber particularly notes that, in any event at least on 16 April 1994, Athanase Seromba approved and joined the decision of Kayishema, Ndahimana, Kanyarukiga, Habarugira and other persons to destroy the church when no other means were available to kill the Tutsis who were seeking refuge inside.[420] Further, Athanase Seromba advised the bulldozer driver on where the weakest side of the church was and directed him to destroy the church, assuring him that it would be Hutus who would be able to rebuild it.[421] The Appeals Chamber notes that this in effect meant killing the Tutsis inside the church. Indeed, Athanase Seromba knew that there were approximately 1,500 Tutsis in the church and that the destruction of the church would necessarily cause their death.

178. Moreover, on two occasions, already before the destruction of the church on 16 April 1994, Athanase Seromba turned away Tutsi refugees from the presbytery, whereupon two of them were killed.[422] With respect to these factual findings, the Trial Chamber relied on the testimony of several witnesses. Witness CBJ, who the Trial Chamber deemed credible with respect to the circumstances of Meriam's death,[423] testified as follows:

> At the beginning, when people started fleeing and taking refuge at the church, she took refuge in the church after the death of Habyarimana. But on the 14th -- or before the 14th of April 1994, Father Seromba -- the girls from Miriam's family and the people who were educated, in particular the teachers -- so Father Seromba had given to these people lodgings, accommodation at the presbytery. But on the 14th, when they held the meeting, the purpose of which was to decide on our being killed, he sent away these people to whom he had provided accommodation. So Miriam and her family joined us in the church. I was together with Miriam and her family in the church. And on the 15th, the doors were opened for us and we came out. And after having gotten outside, during the attacks, Miriam went to the same building in which she was before, and Father Seromba, once again, sent her -- sent away the people who were in the rear court to the presbytery, and where these people were coming out, they were being shot at. Miriam was captured after she had been sent away by Father Seromba. She was beaten up in front of the secretariat, and I saw people bring her to the front of the church. I didn't quite observe the scene, but subsequently I saw [422] Trial Judgement, paras. 193, 201, 202. As a further indicia for Athanase Seromba's mens rea vis-à-vis the Tutsis, the Appeals Chamber notes that four of the parish's six employees were dismissed by him on 13 April 1994, all of them Tutsis. The remaining employees were Hutus. See Trial Judgement, para. 114.

22. Clearly, however, as far as the individualization of penalties is concerned, the judges of the Chamber cannot limit themselves to the factors mentioned in the Statute and the Rules. Here again, their unfettered discretion to evaluate the facts and attendant circumstances should enable them to take into account any other factor that they deem pertinent.

23. Similarly, the factors at issue in the Statute and in the Rules cannot be interpreted as having to be mandatorily cumulative in the determination of the sentence.

III. Case on Merits

24. Having reviewed the principles set out above, the Trial Chamber proceeds to consider all relevant information submitted by both parties in order to determine an appropriate sentence in terms of Rule 101 of the Rules.

A. Facts of the Case

25. In addition to the guilty plea of Omar Serushago, the Prosecutor submitted to the Chamber a document entitled "Plea Agreement between Omar Serushago and the Office of the Prosecutor", signed by the representatives of the Prosecutor, on the one hand, and Omar Serushago and his defence counsel, Mohamed Ismail, on the other hand. In this document, Omar Serushago makes full of all the relevant facts alleged in counts one to four of the indictment, facts pertaining exclusively to count 5 of the indictment having been withdrawn by the Prosecutor with the permission of the Chamber. In particular:

> (i) Omar Serushago acknowledges that there was in Rwanda between 7 April-17 July 1994 a widespread or systematic attack against a civilian population, notably on civilian Tutsi and moderate Hutu, on political, ethnic or racial grounds, and which resulted in the death of hundreds of thousands of persons throughout Rwanda. Omar Serushago admits that the purpose of the mass killings of the Tutsi in Rwanda and those in Gisenyi between April and July 1994 was to exterminate them. Omar Serushago further recognizes that this is evidenced by the selective searching and targeting of Tutsi; the indiscriminate nature of the mass killings which victimized women and children, young people and old people alike, and the fact that they were pursued in the places where they had taken refuge, i.e. prefectures and communal offices, schools, churches and stadiums with the intent of exterminating them.
> (ii) Omar Serushago acknowledges that Gisenyi, the prefecture of origin of the deceased President, Juvénal Habyarimana, located in northwestern Rwanda, was the bastion of the Mouvement républicain national pour la démocratie et le développement (MRND) and the Coalition pour la défense de la république (CDR). He further declares that several prominent civil and military leaders who had espoused the extremist Hutu

30. Setako avers that the Trial Chamber erred in finding Witnesses SLA and SAT credible.[82] In particular, he submits that the Trial Chamber erred in its assessment of: (a) their prior confessions and statements;[83] (b) inconsistencies between Witness SLA's testimony in the present case and his testimony in the Ndindiliyimana et al. case;[84] (c) inconsistencies between the testimonies of Witnesses SLA and SAT in the present case;[85] (d) allegations of fabrication and manipulation of evidence;[86] (e) allegations of collusion;[87] and (f) Witnesses SLA's and SAT's evidence in light of the fact that they were accomplice witnesses.[88]

31. The Appeals Chamber will consider these challenges in turn. At the outset, it recalls that it is within the discretion of a trial chamber to evaluate inconsistencies in the evidence, to consider whether the evidence taken as a whole is reliable and credible, and to accept or reject the fundamental features of the evidence.[89] The Appeals Chamber will defer to a trial chamber's judgement on issues of credibility, including its resolution of disparities among different witnesses' accounts, and will only find an error of fact if it determines that no reasonable trier of fact could have made the impugned finding.[90] Furthermore, corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony.[91]

(a) Prior Confessions and Statements

32. Witnesses SLA and SAT made several confessions to the Rwandan judicial authorities about their participation in crimes committed during the genocide. Witness SLA made a pro justitia statement in January 1997[92] and a confession and guilty plea in July[93] and August 1999.[94] Witness SAT confessed and entered a guilty plea in March 2001[95] and May 2005.[96] Both witnesses

46. Setako submits that the Trial Chamber erred in so finding.[123]

47. The Prosecution responds that Setako does not demonstrate an error in the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Witness SLA's claim of torture was irrelevant to its assessment of his evidence.[124]

48. The Appeals Chamber recalls that a trial chamber may rely on part of a witness's testimony and reject other parts.[125] Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber only relied on Witness SLA's testimony where corroborated.[126] The Trial Chamber was therefore entitled to disregard Witness SLA's claim of torture and still rely on his evidence with respect to the 25 April and 11 May Killings.

49. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Setako's argument.

b. Admission of Lying in Confessions

50. Setako submits that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to consider that Witness SLA admitted to having lied in his confessions and that this admission affected the "veracity and truthfulness in his testimony".[127] Specifically, Setako challenges the Trial Chamber's failure to properly assess the witness's explanation that, if he had told the truth, he would have risked being killed by his co-perpetrators with whom he was incarcerated.[128] Setako argues that "[t]he problem with this explanation is that it does not explain his failure to mention the massacres at Mukamira".[129]

51. The Prosecution responds that Setako ignores Witness SLA's explanations.[130]

52. The Appeals Chamber notes that Setako does not indicate in which confessions Witness SLA is alleged to have lied. However, Setako refers to portions of Witness SLA's testimony in which the Defence confronted the witness with his January 1997 pro justitia statement and his confession from July 1999.[131] A review of the trial record shows that Witness SLA's explanation

> A. Mr. President, Your Honour, wherever I was, in Nyamagumba or elsewhere, my duty was to supply provisions to my friends; that is, I brought foodstuff. And in order to bring foodstuff in the morning, I left the position at about 10 o'clock in the morning. And to provide the evening meal, I left the position at about 3 p.m. or 4 p.m., and I came back at 6 p.m. to spend the night at the position. And the next morning I would go to the camp at about 6 a.m. to take care of the morning meal.
> Q. So is it your testimony here, Witness, that as you went to all of the various camps, that you left on a daily basis to go back to Mukamira in order to get supplies? Is that your testimony, Witness?
>
> A. Yes, Mr. President.[214]

95. The Appeals Chamber finds that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to accept Witness SLA's explanation for his presence at Mukamira camp on 11 May 1994 in the present case and conclude that it was compatible with the witness's testimony in Ndindiliyimana et al. case. Furthermore, Witness SLA's testimony in respect of various details of the 11 May Killings was corroborated by Witness SAT.[215] Consequently, even if Witness SLA's explanations about his presence at Mukamira camp were inconsistent, any difference was minor and did not call into question the overall credibility of his account. For the same reason, it is irrelevant that Witness SLA made no mention of his daily returns to Mukamira camp in his April 2003 statement.[216]

96. Setako's arguments are therefore dismissed.

(c) Inconsistencies Between the Testimonies of Witnesses SLA and SAT at Trial

97. The Trial Chamber found that the fundamental features of Witnesses SAT's and SLA's accounts of the events at Mukamira camp were largely consistent.[217] It further found that, although there were differences in their testimonies, many of those differences were reasonably explained by the witnesses' varying vantage points and the passage of time.[218]

98. Setako submits that the Trial Chamber ignored significant contradictions between Witnesses SLA's and SAT's testimonies at trial.[219] The Appeals Chamber will consider Setako's specific challenges relating to the 25 April and 11 May Killings in turn.

including at least one woman and a child. Witness SAT saw their killing from his position at the camp, and Witness SLA heard about their murder.

341. There are also differences between the two testimonies. Many of them are reasonably explained by their varying vantage points and the passage of time. In particular concerning the events of 25 April, both witnesses testified that General Augustin Bizimungu, Juvénal Kajelijeli, Bourgmestre Dominique Gatsimbanyi and Major Bizabarimana were present. However, Witness SAT added that Colonel Marcel Bivugabagabo, Captain Hasengineza and Lieutenant Mburuburengero were also among the attendants. In the Chamber's view, this is not a significant difference.

342. More notably, Witness SLA indicated that only Setako addressed the crowd, whereas Witness SAT recalled Bizimungu speaking as well. However, the intervention of Bizimungu, as described by Witness SAT, amounts only to a brief comment. The difference in their accounts on this point is not surprising or material.

343. Finally, Witness SLA was the only witness to mention Setako's order to establish roadblocks. He was also alone in discussing the killing of 30 to 40 Tutsis that evening who were captured at a roadblock that had been established based on Setako's instructions. The Chamber notes, however, that Witness SLA was ultimately tasked with mounting the barrier outside of the camp, which accounts for his more precise recollection of this instruction. Furthermore, Witness SAT's general lack of knowledge concerning the killing of the refugees captured at the roadblock follows from Witness SLA's evidence that the Tutsis stopped at the roadblock were killed in a relatively inconspicuous manner. The attackers used knives, instead of loud-sounding firearms, and their bodies were disposed of in a pit and not left out in the open.[413]

344. In connection with the 11 May incident, Witness SLA stated that Setako addressed supervisory staff, including Colonel Marcel Bivugabagabo and Lieutenant Mburuburengero, other junior soldiers as well as civil defence forces that had gathered. Three soldiers and two civilians took the detainees away. According to Witness SAT, Setako addressed Captain Hasengineza, who then removed the prisoners. During cross-examination, Witness SLA indicated that he was uncertain whether Hasengineza was there, but later said that he was.[414]

345. Bearing in mind that the fundamental features of the two mostly first-hand accounts are largely consistent, the Chamber will now view the two testimonies in the context of their criminal proceedings in Rwanda, prior statements to Tribunal investigators and evidence in other trials in Arusha.

346. The Defence confronted Witnesses SLA and SAT with documents from their criminal proceedings in Rwanda, which do not refer to the events of 25 April and 11 May. Specifically, Witness SLA was shown his January 1997 pro justitia statement, his July 1999 crime[44] indicates that the Trial Chamber misapplied the burden of proof. Indeed, as stated in the Musema Appeal Judgement, "[i]n considering the manner in which the Trial Chamber applied the burden and standard of proof, the Appeals Chamber must start off by assuming that the words used in the Trial Judgement accurately describe the approach adopted by the Trial Chamber."[45]

20. In assessing whether a Trial Chamber, when using this type of language, has in fact shifted the burden of proof, the Appeals Chamber carries out an in-depth analysis of the specific findings related to a given incident.[46] The Appeals Chamber has generally found that such language, while inappropriate, is not fatal when viewed in the broader context of a Trial Chamber's findings. This is especially the case where the Trial Chamber accurately refers elsewhere in the judgement to the appropriate burden of proof for the evaluation of alibi evidence, its overall approach evinces a careful assessment of the alibi evidence, and its conclusion that the alibi evidence is ultimately not credible is reasonable when weighed against the evidence of participation in a crime.[47]

2. Alleged Errors in Evaluating Exculpatory Evidence Related to Kesho Hill (Ground 6)

(a) Introduction

21. The Trial Chamber convicted Zigiranyirazo of genocide and extermination as a crime against humanity based on his participation in a joint criminal enterprise to kill Tutsi civilians at Kesho Hill in Gisenyi Prefecture.[48] The Trial Chamber found that he was present at Kesho Hill at some point on the morning of 8 April 1994 and that he addressed the assembled assailants before they launched an attack on the Tutsi refugees there.[49] As part of his defence, Zigiranyirazo presented evidence that he was not observed at Kesho Hill during the attack.[50] The Trial Chamber did not find this evidence to be credible or to have probative value.[51]

(emphasis in original).

[44] See Musema Appeal Judgement, para. 295 ("The wording 'are by themselves, insufficient to refute the possibility' used by the Trial Chamber with respect to alibi evidence might be an error on a point of law, had Musema's evidence been sufficient to sustain a potential alibi.")(emphasis in original), quoting Musema Trial Judgement, para. 740.

factors into consideration, Zigiranyirazo submits that the journey under optimal conditions would have taken approximately three hours and 18 minutes, which the Appeals Chamber accepts as a reasonable estimate.[118] In addition, other estimates following from the site visit suggest that the journey could have taken between four and 10 hours one way.[119] There is no basis in the record for the Prosecution's theory that the journey would have taken Zigiranyirazo approximately 45 minutes by helicopter.[120]

45. The Appeals Chamber notes that "[t]here is a presumption that a Trial Chamber has evaluated all the evidence presented to it, as long as there is no indication that the Trial Chamber completely disregarded any particular piece of evidence."[121] However, this presumption may be rebutted "when evidence which is clearly relevant to the findings is not addressed by the Trial Chamber's reasoning."[122] The Appeals Chamber is mindful of potential limitations to evidence taken after the passage of several years concerning specifics of travel; however all relevant evidence shows that Kesho Hill in Gisenyi Prefecture is not in close geographic proximity to Kanombe, which is southwest of Kigali. As a result, the distance, time, and feasibility of travel are highly relevant factors to consider in view of the considerable evidence placing Zigiranyirazo at Kanombe at various times on 8 April 1994. Despite the crucial importance of this issue, the Trial Chamber failed to address it.

46. In addition, Zigiranyirazo presented the evidence of Witnesses Bernadette Niyonizeye and Agnès Kampundu, who recalled that Zigiranyirazo returned to Kanombe on 8 April 1994 shortly

[118] See T. 28 September 2009 p. 10. At the hearing, the Prosecution maintained that it would take around two and a half hours to travel from Kanombe to Kesho Hill. It further admitted that it would take no more than 20 minutes to travel from Kanombe to Kigali. See T. 28 September 2009 pp. 47, 48. Zigiranyirazo noted that the last seven or eight kilometres before reaching Kesho Hill was along a dirt road. See T. 28 September 2009 p. 10. In view of these factors, the Appeals Chamber considers Zigiranyirazo's estimate of the journey taking more than three hours under optimal conditions as more reasonable.

[119] The estimate of 10 hours is based on the longest route via Butare Prefecture. With respect to the route via Gitarama, the approximate times offered by the Prosecution and Zigiranyirazo are similar. See T. 28 September 2009 p. 49 ("[The Prosecution] would stipulate [that the route via Gitarama took] four to five hours. The Defence estimate is five to six, so we're not really that far apart.").

[120] The Prosecution cites its own counsel's question during cross-examination of a defence witness for the proposition that it only took 45 minutes to travel from Kanombe to Gisenyi Prefecture. See Prosecution Response Brief, para. 84, citing T. 27 February 2007 p. 81. The relevant exchange reads: "Q. Would you agree or would you have no idea that to travel from Kanombe camp to the Rubaya tea factory area in a helicopter would take about 45 minutes? A. I wouldn't know. I don't know. I saw -- that a journey by car took a whole day." During oral argument, the Appeals Chamber asked the Prosecution whether it had abandoned its theory of Zigiranyirazo's possible use of a helicopter. See T. 28 September 2009 p. 45 ("MR. PRESIDENT: During the trial, the point was made that there was some kind of a possibility of helicopter travel. I take it that you are not maintaining this any longer. MS. Charity Kagwi-Ndungu
Gina Butler

3.3.3 Deliberations

135. Prosecution Witness Sagahutu testified that the Accused influenced the appointment of the heads of the Interahamwe and military leaders. The Chamber notes, however, that Sagahutu appears to have reached this conclusion on the basis that the Accused attended all the meetings. The Chamber is unwilling to find that the Accused had such influence on the basis of uncorroborated speculation.

136. The Chamber considered the testimony of Prosecution Witnesses Sagahutu, PA, and AVY regarding the training of the Interahamwe, but finds that they did not specifically connect the Accused to this training. Sagahutu testified that Colonel Nsengiyumva was tasked with training the Interahamwe, but the only connection his evidence suggests with this training, and the Accused, is that Colonel Nsengiyumva was very close to the Accused and was tasked with this training by the Akazu.[172] The Chamber further notes that Sagahutu did not explain how he came to know that the Akazu tasked Colonel Nsengiyumva with taking on such training. Witness PA testified regarding training provided by Bernard Munyagashiri and Colonel Nsengiyumva, but did not link the Accused to the training, other than to suggest that Colonel Nsengiyumva and Zigiranyirazo were both members of the Akazu.[173] Witness AVY testified that he was ordered to attend training by Faziri Hakizimana, but did not link the Accused to this training.[174]

137. The Chamber has several concerns regarding the testimony of Prosecution Witness Bagaragaza that the Accused supported the Interahamwe with his personal escort and Presidential Guards. First, Bagaragaza's testimony consists entirely of hearsay. Contrary to the Prosecution's suggestion, the fact that nearly all Bagaragaza's sources, namely, Bahufite, Bizumuremye, Juvenal Uwilingiyimana, Kuradusenge, and Pascal Hitimana, are deceased, does not make this hearsay evidence more reliable.[175]

138. Second, Bagaragaza's status as an accused person before this Tribunal and an alleged accomplice to the Accused warrants caution when considering his evidence.[176] The indictment against Bagaragaza implicates him in some of the same crimes as the Accused, and it is conceivable that by testifying against the Accused, Bagaragaza seeks to shift blame away from himself.[177] In addition, Bagarazaga acknowledged that he provided money to Kuradusenge, to "give the Interahamwe drinks in order to motivate [them]." He added that Kuradusenge was always asking him for money, and

[174] In addition, the Chamber notes its findings with regard to Witness AVY's credibility, see infra, paras. 154, 376-379.
[175] In paragraph 125 of its Closing Brief, the Prosecution argues that Bagaragaza's hearsay evidence on another event, the alleged 6 April Meeting at Kanombe, should be considered reliable because Bagaragaza's source, Pasteur Musabe, is deceased. However, the Prosecution provides no support for this argument.

> Corresponding to this is the care evinced by the Court not formally to overrule earlier decisions, but rather, where necessary, to try to explain away, usually on the ground of some factual particularity, an earlier decision which it feels unable to follow. The attitudes adopted in 1961 and 1964 in the Temple of Preah Vihear and the Barcelona Traction cases towards the 1959 decision in the Aerial Incident case are illustrative of this process, and of the relative character of the requirement of consistency of jurisprudence (which is probably the guiding element in this aspect of the Court's work).[245]

104. The right of appeal is a component of the fair trial requirement[246] set out in Article 14 of the ICCPR, and Article 21(4) of the Statute. The right to a fair trial is, of course, a requirement of customary international law.[247]

105. An aspect of the fair trial requirement is the right of an accused to have like cases treated alike, so that in general, the same cases will be treated in the same way and decided as Judge Tanaka said, "possibly by the same reasoning."[248]

106. The right to a fair trial requires and ensures the correction of errors made at trial. At the hearing of an appeal, the principle of fairness is the ultimate corrective of errors of law and fact, but it is also a continuing requirement in any appeal in which a previous decision of an appellate body is being considered.

107. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, concludes that a proper construction of the Statute, taking due account of its text and purpose, yields the conclusion that in the interests of certainty and predictability, the Appeals Chamber should follow its previous decisions, but should be free to depart from them for cogent reasons in the interests of justice.

108. Instances of situations where cogent reasons in the interests of justice require a departure from a previous decision include cases where the previous decision has been decided on the basis of a wrong legal principle or cases where a previous decision has been given per incuriam, that is a judicial decision that has been "wrongly decided, usually because the judge or judges were ill-informed about the applicable law."[249]

[246] Nowak, UN Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, CCPR Commentary (1993) comments that the bundle of rights which constitute the right to a fair trial are those set out in Articles 14 and 15 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights 1966 ("ICCPR") (ibid., Article 14, para. 19).

[248] See footnote 243, Judge Tanaka's Separate Opinion.
[249] Black's Law Dictionary (7th ed., 1999).

109. It is necessary to stress that the normal rule is that previous decisions are to be followed, and departure from them is the exception. The Appeals Chamber will only depart from a previous decision after the most careful consideration has been given to it, both as to the law, including the authorities cited, and the facts.

110. What is followed in previous decisions is the legal principle (ratio decidendi), and the obligation to follow that principle only applies in similar cases, or substantially similar cases. This means less that the facts are similar or substantially similar, than that the question raised by the facts in the subsequent case is the same as the question decided by the legal principle in the previous decision. There is no obligation to follow previous decisions which may be distinguished for one reason or another from the case before the court.

111. Where, in a case before it, the Appeals Chamber is faced with previous decisions that are conflicting, it is obliged to determine which decision it will follow, or whether to depart from both decisions for cogent reasons in the interests of justice.

2. Whether the Decisions of the Appeals Chamber are Binding on Trial Chambers

112. Generally, in common law jurisdictions, decisions of a higher court are binding on lower courts. In civil law jurisdictions there is no doctrine of binding precedent. However, as a matter of practice, lower courts tend to follow decisions of higher courts. As one commentator has stated:

> ... it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the doctrine of stare decisis in the Common Law and the practice of Continental courts generally lead to the same results... In fact, when a judge can find in one or more decisions of a supreme court a rule which seems to him relevant for the decision in the case before him, he will follow those decisions and the rules they contain as much in Germany as in England or France.[250]

113. The Appeals Chamber considers that a proper construction of the Statute requires that the ratio decidendi of its decisions is binding on Trial Chambers for the following reasons:

(i) the Statute establishes a hierarchical structure in which the Appeals Chamber is given the function of settling definitively certain questions of law and fact arising from decisions of the Trial Chambers. Under Article 25, the Appeals Chamber hears an appeal on the ground of an error on a question of law invalidating a Trial Chamber's decision or on the ground of an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice, and its decisions are final;

(ii) the fundamental mandate of the Tribunal to prosecute persons responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law cannot be achieved if the accused and the Prosecution do not have the assurance of certainty and predictability in the application of the applicable law; and

(iii) the right of appeal is, as the Chamber has stated before,[251] a component of the fair trial requirement, which is itself a rule of customary international law and gives rise to the right of the accused to have like cases treated alike. This will not be achieved if each Trial Chamber is free to disregard decisions of law made by the Appeals Chamber, and to decide the law as it sees fit. In such a system, it would be possible to have four statements of the law from the Tribunal on a single legal issue - one from the Appeals Chamber and one from each of the three Trial Chambers, as though the Security Council had established not a single, but four, tribunals. This would be inconsistent with the intention of the Security Council, which, from a plain reading of the Statute and the Report of the Secretary-General, envisaged a tribunal comprising three trial chambers and one appeals chamber, applying a single, unified, coherent and rational corpus of law. The need for coherence is particularly acute in the context in which the Tribunal operates, where the norms of international humanitarian law and international criminal law are developing, and where, therefore, the need for those appearing before the Tribunal, the accused and the Prosecution, to be certain of the regime in which cases are tried is even more pronounced.

3. Whether the Decisions of the Trial Chambers are Binding on Each Other

114. The Appeals Chamber considers that decisions of Trial Chambers, which are bodies with coordinate jurisdiction, have no binding force on each other, although a Trial Chamber is free to follow the decision of another Trial Chamber if it finds that decision persuasive.

---

[250] Zweigert and Kotz, An Introduction to Comparative Law (1998), p. 263.
[251] See para. 104, supra.

The Prosecution submits that the Appeals Chamber should not depart from its previous decision in Tadi} unless it decides that decision was clearly erroneous and cannot stand.[256]

123. The Defence, on the other hand, makes a general case against the application by the Tribunal of the doctrine of stare decisis, but concludes that, if it is to be applied, it "can be only exceptionally applied in the procedure before ICC [sic] and only after all priority legal sources have failed to direct to the decision with respect to the specific factual and legal question."[257] In particular, the Defence stresses that if the doctrine of stare decisis is to be applied by the Tribunal, it can only be applied in circumstances where the factual situations are the same or substantially similar.[258] The Defence contends that in the instant case, since "the armed conflict between Serbian and Muslim ethnicities in the territory of Bosnia and Herzegovina was basically different from the armed conflict between the Croatian and Muslim ethnicities",[259] the principle is inapplicable here. The Defence further argues that the doctrine of stare decisis or binding precedent is inconsistent with the principle of legality, or nullem crimen sine lege.[260]

124. The Appeals Chamber will now address the arguments advanced by the Defence.

125. The argument that the principle of stare decisis is only to be applied in circumstances where the facts are the same, is unmeritorious. As explained earlier in this Judgement,[261] what is followed in relation to a previous decision is the legal principle that it establishes, and the obligation to follow it only arises where, on the facts, the question settled by that principle is the same as the question that is raised by the facts of the subsequent case. Thus, it is irrelevant that the Tadi} Judgement dealt with an armed conflict between the Serbian and Muslim groups in Bosnia and Herzegovina, while the present case dealt with an armed conflict between the Croatian and Muslim groups. What is important is whether, in the subsequent case, the legal principle enunciated in the Tadi} Judgement as to "overall control" may be applied in relation to the conflict between the Bosnian Croats and the Bosnian Muslims in Bosnia and Herzegovina. In the Tadi} Judgement, that legal principle was derived from a factual situation in which there was a question of the level of control by a State (the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia

[257] Appellant's Additional Submissions, para. 7.

(Serbia and Montenegro)) or entity (the Yugoslav Peoples's Army, "JNA") over a military group (the Army of the Serbian Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina/Republika Srpska, "VRS") that was involved in an armed conflict that was prima facie internal. The same question arises from the facts of the instant case, that is, the level of control by a State or entity (Croatia or the Army of the Republic of Croatia, "HV") over a military group (the HVO) that was engaged in an armed conflict that was prima facie internal. It is, therefore, perfectly proper in the instant case to recall and rely upon the legal principle enunciated in the Tadi} Judgement.

[261] See para. 110, supra.

126. The Defence argument on the principle of legality or nullum crimen sine lege, is based on a misunderstanding of that principle. The Appeals Chamber understands the Defence to be saying that reliance cannot be placed on a previous decision as a statement of the law, since that decision would necessarily have been made after the commission of the crimes, and for that reason would not meet the requirements of the principle of legality. There is nothing in that principle that prohibits the interpretation of the law through decisions of a court and the reliance on those decisions in subsequent cases in appropriate circumstances. The principle of legality is reflected in Article 15 of the ICCPR.[262] What this principle requires is that a person may only be found guilty of a crime in respect of acts which constituted a violation of the law at the time of their commission. In the instant case, the acts in respect of which the accused was indicted, all constituted crimes under international law at the time of their commission. Inhuman treatment and wilfully causing grave suffering or serious injury to body or health under Article 2 of the Statute were violations of the grave breaches provisions of the Geneva Conventions, and outrages against personal dignity under Article 3 of the Statute constituted a violation of the laws or customs of war, at the time of the commission of the crimes.

127. There is, therefore, no breach of the principle of nullum crimen sine lege. That principle does not prevent a court, either at the national or international level, from determining an issue through a process of interpretation and clarification as to the elements of a particular crime; nor does it prevent a court from relying on previous decisions which reflect an interpretation as to the meaning to be ascribed to particular ingredients of a crime.

128. The Appeals Chamber now turns to a consideration of the Tadi} Judgement in order to determine whether it should be followed, applying the principle set out in paragraph 107, supra, that a previous decision of the Chamber should be followed unless there are cogent reasons in the interests of justice for departing from it.

[262] Article 15 of the ICCPR states in relevant part: "No one shall be held guilty of any criminal offence on account of any act or omission which did not constitute a criminal offence, under national or international law, at the time when it was committed."

80. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the arguments raised at the Appeal Hearing with regard to this ground of appeal.[260] The Prosecution reiterated its position that the Trial Chamber did not consider the Appellant's position as a political leader as being equivalent to a leadership position in the joint criminal enterprise.[261] In reply, the Defence stated the following:

> If that reasoning holds, then anyone who is indicted, who is in a high political office no matter what their role in the joint criminal enterprise [is] must be given an aggravating circumstance. Is that what the law intends? Or does the law intend that a person be given an aggravating circumstance for a leadership role if they in fact [held] a leadership role in the joint criminal enterprise?[262]

Counsel for the Defence concluded that "[i]ndeed there have been cases where people in high political offices have been found to warrant the aggravating circumstance, but they were also leaders of the joint criminal enterprise."[263] The Appeals Chamber notes that, contrary to the Defence's assertion, the position of an accused in "high political offices" has been considered as an aggravating factor for the purposes of sentencing even where an accused's leadership of a joint criminal enterprise is not at issue.[264] Several cases before the International Tribunal in which the mode of liability of joint criminal enterprise was not at issue illustrate that a Trial Chamber has the discretion to take into account, as an aggravating circumstance, the seniority, position of authority, or high position of leadership held by a person criminally responsible under Article 7(1) of the Statute.[265] A high rank in the military or political field does not, in itself, merit a harsher sentence. But a person who abuses or wrongly exercises power deserves a harsher sentence.[266] Consequently, what matters is not the position of authority taken alone, but that position coupled with the manner in which the authority is exercised.[267] For instance, in the Aleksovski case, the Appeals Chamber considered that the superior responsibility of the appellant, who was a prison warden, "seriously aggravated [his] offences, [as] [i]nstead of preventing it, he involved himself in violence against those whom he should have been protecting".[268] In Ntakirutimana, the ICTR Appeals Chamber concurred with the Trial Chamber that the abuse of the appellant's personal position in the community was an aggravating circumstance.[269]

81. In the present case, the Trial Chamber did not hold that the Appellant's position as a regional political leader in itself constituted an aggravating circumstance. The Trial Chamber thoroughly considered the Appellant's behaviour as a regional political leader and stressed that it considered his leadership position as an aggravating circumstance because he used his authority to enlist resources of the SAO Krajina to further the joint criminal enterprise, made inflammatory speeches during public events and in the media which prepared the ground for the Serb population to accept that their goals could be achieved through acts of persecution, and amplified the consequences of the campaign of persecutions by allowing it to continue.[270] Therefore, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber correctly found that the Appellant's leadership position was an aggravating circumstance.

82. For the foregoing reasons, the Appellant's seventh ground of appeal is dismissed.

G. Alleged Errors relating to Aiding and Abetting (Ground 7)

125. The Trial Chamber determined that Blagojević permitted the use of the Bratunac Brigade's resources, including personnel, to facilitate the commission of the crimes for which he was convicted.[338] The Trial Chamber considered that aiding and abetting constituted the most appropriate form of participation under Article 7(1) of the Statute to describe his criminal responsibility.[339] Under this ground of appeal, Blagojević raises four errors of law and fact in connection with his conviction for aiding and abetting, including an alleged legal error in the definition of aiding and abetting and alleged factual errors related to his knowledge of the underlying crimes, whether he made Bratunac Brigade resources available, and whether this constituted substantial assistance.[340]

1. Alleged Error in Defining Aiding and Abetting

126. Initially, Blagojević submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in setting forth the elements of aiding and abetting.[341]

127. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime, which have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[342] The actus reus need not serve as condition precedent for the crime and may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated.[343] The Appeals Chamber has also determined that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may be satisfied by a commander permitting the use of resources under his or her control, including personnel, to facilitate the perpetration of a crime.[344] The requisite mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[345] In cases of specific intent crimes such as persecutions or genocide, the aider and abettor must know of the principal perpetrator's specific intent.[346]

Brigade resources to be used to facilitate the crimes.[362] In connection with Blagojević's conviction for the mistreatment and murder, which occurred in and around the Vuk Karadžić School in Bratunac town from 12 to 14 July 1995, the Trial Chamber concluded that members of the Bratunac Brigade Military Police gave "practical assistance" by guarding the detainees and helping to control access to them which ensured their further detention and allowed the murders to take place.[363] In addition, in connection with Blagojević's conviction for persecutions, the Trial Chamber concluded that members of the Bratunac Brigade gave practical assistance to terrorising the civilian population and to creating the inhumane conditions in Potočari and Bratunac town from 11 to 14 July 1995 by shelling and shooting around the civilians moving toward Potočari on 11 July; by participating in the separation process; by patrolling in Potočari on 12 and 13 July; and by guarding the detainees in Bratunac town from 12 to 14 July.[364] In addition, in connection with Blagojević's conviction for forcible transfer, the Trial Chamber concluded that members of the Bratunac Brigade gave practical assistance by separating the men from the women, children, and the elderly; loading buses; counting people as they entered buses; escorting the buses; and patrolling the area where the population was being held pending the completion of the transfer.[365]

133. In his submissions, Blagojević points to the relatively few members of the Bratunac Brigade who participated in the crimes when compared with the overall operation as well as the fact that the brigade members were not direct participants in the mistreatment or murder.[366]

134. The Appeals Chamber observes that the question of whether a given act constitutes substantial assistance to a crime requires a fact-based inquiry. Blagojević's primary argument on the point of substantial assistance is that the role played by the Bratunac Brigade was inconsequential in the overall context of the event. The Appeals Chamber, however, has already held that it is not required that the act of assistance serve as a condition precedent for the commission of the crime.[367] In making its findings, the Trial Chamber was aware of the more limited scope of assistance provided by the Bratunac Brigade in relation to other elements of the VRS and civilian authorities.[368] Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber described the contribution of the resources made available by Blagojević as "practical assistance" to the crimes which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crimes.[369] The Appeals Chamber recalls that, in a similar context, it reached the same conclusion in the Krstić Appeal Judgement.[370] Blagojević has therefore failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred on this point.

5. Conclusion

135. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber grants Blagojević's seventh ground of appeal with respect to the crime of genocide, as discussed in detail in his sixth ground of appeal. In all other respects, the Appeals Chamber finds that Blagojević's appeal against the Trial Chamber's findings related to aiding and abetting is not founded and, therefore, dismisses it. Judge Shahabuddeen dissents in all respects on the ground that Blagojević was denied the right to a fair trial and considers that his case should be remanded for a new trial.

referenced statement in relation to the aider and abettor carrying out acts which are specifically directed to assist.[492]

187. In the Blaškić Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber considered whether the actus reus of aiding and abetting requires causation between the act of the accused and the act of the principal, or in other words, whether the contribution "must have a direct and important impact on the commission of the crime."[493] The Appeals Chamber found that "proof of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime, or proof that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime, is not required."[494] However, the Appeals Chamber reiterated that one of the requirements for the actus reus of aiding and abetting is that the support of the aider and abettor have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[495]

188. In reaching this conclusion, in the Blaškić Appeal Judgement the Appeals Chamber referenced the definition of aiding and abetting in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement, which is identical to that set out in the Tadić Appeal Judgement, and which, in specifying that the assistance given by an aider and abettor must be specifically directed, also contrasted aiding and abetting liability with that of joint criminal enterprise.[496] However, in the Blaškić Appeal Judgement the Appeals Chamber also found that the Trial Chamber correctly held that the standard for the actus reus was that set out in the Furundžija Trial Judgement: "consist[ing] of practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[497]

189. The Appeals Chamber observes that while the Tadić definition has not been explicitly departed from, specific direction has not always been included as an element of the actus reus of aiding and abetting.[498] This may be explained by the fact that such a finding will often be implicit in the finding that the accused has provided practical assistance to the principal perpetrator which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime. The Appeals Chamber also considers that, to the extent specific direction forms an implicit part of the actus reus of aiding and abetting, where the accused knowingly participated in the commission of an offence and his or her participation substantially affected the commission of that offence, the fact that his or her participation amounted to no more than his or her "routine duties" will not exculpate the accused.

190. Jokić seeks to rely on the statement of the Appeals Chamber in the Čelebići Appeal Judgement that it "would not accept that the circumstance alone of holding a position as a guard somewhere within a camp in which civilians are unlawfully detained suffices to render that guard responsible for the crime of unlawful confinement of civilians."[499] On this basis, Jokić argues that "while the work of camp guards directly contributed to the unlawful confinement of prisoners within the camp, the Appeals Chamber accepted, as a matter of law, that such contribution alone was too insignificant or insubstantial to constitute aiding and abetting that crime."[500] From this, Jokić extrapolates that "where a person holds a position within an organized structure to which certain lawful duties attach, the mere performance by that person of their routine duties will not of itself constitute aiding and abetting crimes that may be committed by others within that organized structure."[501]

191. The Appeals Chamber considers it unreasonable to compare Jokić's position within the Zvornik Brigade to that of a camp guard in the Čelebići case. At issue in the Čelebići case was the ability of the accused, Zejnil Delalić and Hazim Delić, to affect the continued detention of the civilians in the camp.[502] The Appeals Chamber considers that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber in this case to find, with respect to the three execution sites, that Jokić's role, whether as duty officer or Chief of Engineering, went beyond that of merely relaying orders up and down the chain of command.[503] The Trial Chamber's findings make it clear that Jokić's ability to affect the commission of the crime was substantial. In particular, the Trial Chamber found that, while Jokić did not directly issue orders in his capacity as Chief of Engineering, he assisted in carrying out the orders of the Brigade Commander which were based on his advice and proposals.[504]

192. Finally, Jokić's attempt to ground his argument in its apparent consistency with the principle that a person convicted of aiding and abetting "is convicted of the crime itself, in the same way as the principal perpetrator who actually commits the crime"[505] and thus must be specifically directed, is fundamentally misguided. The Appeals Chamber recalls that Article 7(1) of the Statute deals not only with individual responsibility by way of direct or personal participation in the criminal act but forms of liability under Article 7(1) of the Statute, including ordering, instigating, and planning, which, in its view, require only an awareness of the substantial likelihood that the crime will be committed.[579]

221. In describing the applicable law for aiding and abetting, the Trial Chamber restated the formulation of the mens rea for aiding and abetting found in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement:

> [I]t is not required that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea required for the crime; it is sufficient that the aider and abettor had knowledge that his or her own acts assisted in the commission of the specific crime by the principal offender. The aider and abettor must also be aware of the "essential elements" of the crime committed by the principal offender, including the state of mind of the principal offender.[580]

The Appeals Chamber has applied this formulation consistently in its judgements.[581] Consequently, the Appeals Chamber finds no legal error on the part of the Trial Chamber in this regard.

222. The Prosecution faults the Trial Chamber for not recalling the following additional language from the Blaškić Appeal Judgement and applying it in this case:

> The Trial Chamber agreed with the statement in the Furundžija Trial Judgement that "it is not necessary that the aider and abettor [...] know the precise crime that was intended and which in the event was committed. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor." The Appeals Chamber concurs with this conclusion.[582]

The Appeals Chamber, however, recalls its position from the Blaškić Appeal Judgement that there are no reasons to depart from the definition of mens rea of aiding and abetting found in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement.[583] The Blaškić Appeal Judgement did not extend the definition of mens rea of aiding and abetting.

223. The Prosecution also points to the Trial Chamber's statement that it had reasonable doubt that Blagojević "knew" that his acts furthered the mass killing operation,[584] suggesting that this indicates that the Trial Chamber examined the evidence to determine whether Blagojević knew that the mass killings were a virtual certainty. The Appeals Chamber, however, can identify no error on the part of the Trial Chamber based on the use of this formulation. The Appeals Chamber has employed the same formulation in its examination of the mens rea of aiding and abetting in other cases.[585] Moreover, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber's reasonable doubt as to Blagojević's knowledge of the impending murder operation arose out of the equally plausible inference that "he saw [the detention and capture of Bosnian Muslim men] as further steps in transporting the Bosnian Muslim population out of Serb-held territory".[586] In this respect, the Trial Chamber also noted throughout the Trial Judgement that Bosnian Muslim men, who were captured, were told that they would be exchanged.[587] It is also telling that the Trial Chamber accepted as credible testimony from a former Bratunac Brigade officer who stated that he did not assist a particular detainee who was taken to the Vuk Karadžić School and later killed because he thought that the detainee was going to be exchanged.[588] Thus, the Trial Chamber did not decline to find that Blagojević knew about the mass killing operation because he lacked certainty, but because it could not rule out the equally reasonable inference that he thought that his acts were directed towards another goal. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber did not err in its formulation of the mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting, and the Appeals Chamber dismisses this sub-ground of appeal.

2. Alleged Error of Law in the Application of the Standard of Proof Beyond Reasonable Doubt

224. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in its application of the standard of proof. Specifically, the Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber applied the standard of proof in a two-stage process, first to the individual strands of evidence and then to the issue of mens rea, rather than reserving the application of the standard to the ultimate conclusion of guilt.[589] The Prosecution argues that this approach led the Trial Chamber to consider the evidence "piecemeal", failing to consider all of the established facts as a coherent whole in assessing Blagojević's mens rea for the mass killings.[590]

225. In particular, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber failed to incorporate the following findings into its analysis of Blagojević's knowledge of the mass killings: (1) Blagojević's knowledge of the killings in Bratunac town on the nights of 12 and 13 July 1995 and the assistance provided by the Bratunac Brigade units in those killings;[591] (2) the vastness of the murder operation, involving many elements of VRS and MUP forces and occurring in many towns in a geographically small area, including Potočari, Jadar River, Kravica Warehouse, and Tišca;[592] (3) Blagojević's knowledge of his units' participation in the separation and transport of Muslims from Potočari, in testimony, in its view, indicated that Blagojević would have known about the killings.[610] Finally, Blagojević was at the Bratunac Brigade headquarters and slept in his apartment in Bratunac town between 12 and 14 July 1995.[611] The Prosecution also argues that the Trial Chamber erred in characterizing Blagojević as searching the woods in the days immediately following the killings at the Kravica Warehouse.[612]

231. A review of the Trial Judgement reflects that the Trial Chamber expressly noted much of the evidence that the Prosecution points to in support of its contention that the Trial Chamber gave scant or no regard to several findings indicating that Blagojević must have known about the killing at the Kravica Warehouse shortly after they occurred. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber finds no evidence that renders the Trial Chamber's finding on this point unreasonable.

232. The strongest evidence suggesting that Blagojević knew about the Kravica Warehouse killings came from Momir Nikolić's testimony that "already on the 14th" the Kravica Warehouse killings were "common knowledge" in Bratunac town, "[t]hat is, almost the entire town, all the soldiers, had heard about it."[613] The Trial Chamber did not reference this specific statement in the Trial Judgement; however, it clearly took account of this testimony because it cited the same transcript page when discussing when and how the Kravica Warehouse massacre became known.[614] The Trial Chamber, however, did not consider Nikolić to be a "wholly credible or reliable witness", and concluded that "on matters that bear directly on [Blagojević's] knowledge [...] such as what [Nikolić] reported to Colonel Blagojević [...] or was told to do [by Blagojević], it must require corroboration for such evidence, in order to enter a finding against [Blagojević]."[615] The Prosecution does not challenge the Trial Chamber's assessment of Nikolić's credibility, nor does the Prosecution make a specific argument as to why the testimony at issue here should be credited. In addition, the Trial Chamber found that, according to Momir Nikolić, he did not discuss the Kravica Warehouse killings with Blagojević until sometime around 24 July 1995.[616]

The Prosecution is likely referring to the Trial Chamber's statement about Blagojević that "he and his units continued to participate in the search operation [emphasis added]" in the days following the Kravica Warehouse massacre. Mr. Michael Karnavas and Ms. Suzana Tomanović for Vidoje Blagojević

724. As will be discussed below and recalling that joint criminal enterprise is a form of "commission", the Trial Chamber finds that the appropriate form of liability to describe Dragan Jokić's participation in these crimes is aiding and abetting.

725. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that Dragan Jokić did not commit murder, extermination or persecutions as part of a joint criminal enterprise.

2. Aiding and Abetting

(a) Applicable Law

726. The Trial Chamber finds that the actus reus for 'aiding and abetting' is that the accused carried out an act which consisted of practical assistance, encouragement or moral support to the principal.[2175] The criminal act of the principal for which the aider and abettor is responsible must be established.[2176] The assistance need not have caused the act of the principal, but it must have had a "substantial effect" on the commission of the crime.[2177] The assistance may be provided by either an act or by an omission,[2178] and it may occur before, during or after the act of the principal.[2179]

727. For aiding and abetting, it is not required that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea required for the crime; it is sufficient that the aider and abettor had knowledge that his or her own acts assisted in the commission of the specific crime by the principal offender.[2180] The aider and abettor must also be aware of the "essential elements" of the crime committed by the principal offender, including the state of mind of the principal offender.[2181]

41. Having examined the approaches of national systems as well as International Tribunal precedents, the Appeals Chamber considers that none of the Trial Chamber's above articulations of the mens rea for ordering under Article 7(1) of the Statute, in relation to a culpable mental state that is lower than direct intent, is correct. The knowledge of any kind of risk, however low, does not suffice for the imposition of criminal responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law. The Trial Chamber does not specify what degree of risk must be proven. Indeed, it appears that under the Trial Chamber's standard, any military commander who issues an order would be criminally responsible, because there is always a possibility that violations could occur. The Appeals Chamber considers that an awareness of a higher likelihood of risk and a volitional element must be incorporated in the legal standard.

42. The Appeals Chamber therefore holds that a person who orders an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that order, has the requisite mens rea for establishing liability under Article 7(1) pursuant to ordering. Ordering with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting that crime.[76]

2. Aiding and Abetting

43. The Appellant submits that liability for aiding and abetting requires, at a minimum, actual knowledge.[77] He submits that not only must the aider and abettor know that his acts provide support to another person's offence, but he must also know the specifics of that offence. Recklessness or negligence on his part is not sufficient, he asserts, contrary to the Trial Chamber's alleged finding on that point.[78] Furthermore, the Appellant submits that the actus reus of aiding and abetting includes a causation requirement which the Trial Chamber failed to acknowledge and to apply.[79] In other words, the contribution must "have a direct and important impact on the commission of the crime."[80] Instead, the Appellant maintains, the Trial Chamber erroneously applied a strict liability standard to find the Appellant guilty as an aider and abettor and reiterates that the Trial Chamber's conclusion that "he could be found guilty if he accepted the possibility that some unspecified crime was a 'possible or foreseeable consequence' of military action effectively eliminates the 'actual knowledge' mens rea of aiding and abetting, and is thus erroneous as a matter

[76] The French translation of this legal standard reads as follows:
> Quiconque ordonne un acte ou une omission en ayant conscience de la réelle probabilité qu'un crime soit commis au cours de l'exécution de cet ordre possède la mens rea requise pour établir la responsabilité aux termes de l'article 7 alinéa 1 pour avoir ordonné. Le fait d'ordonner avec une telle conscience doit être considéré comme l'acceptation dudit crime.

of law."[81] He states that this standard was set out at the beginning of the Trial Judgement and pervades the entire analysis that followed.[82]

44. The Prosecution submits that the Appellant's claim that the mens rea adopted by the Trial Chamber in relation to aiding and abetting — "possible and foreseeable consequence of the conduct" — was too low is unsupported by any "standard" or authority. Nor did the Appellant, according to the Prosecution, indicate any instance where the application of such a standard would have impacted upon his conviction thereby possibly enabling him to claim prejudice.[83] The Prosecution further submits that the Trial Chamber did not apply a negligence standard in the instant case but that, if it had, it would have been completely appropriate to do so.[84] Finally, the Prosecution rejects the Appellant's unsupported assertion that aiding and abetting liability requires an element of causation between the act of the accused and the act of the principal.[85]

45. In Vasiljević, the Appeals Chamber set out the actus reus and mens rea of aiding and abetting. It stated:

> (i) The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime (murder, extermination, rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.), and this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. [...]
>
> (ii) In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist [in] the commission of the specific crime of the principal. [...][86]

The Appeals Chamber considers that there are no reasons to depart from this definition.

46. In this case, the Trial Chamber, following the standard set out in Furundžija, held that the actus reus of aiding and abetting "consists of practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[87] It further stated that the mens rea required is "the knowledge that these acts assist the commission of the offense."[88] The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber was correct in so holding.

47. The Trial Chamber further stated that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may be perpetrated through an omission, "provided this failure to act had a decisive effect on the commission of the crime and that it was coupled with the requisite mens rea."[89] It considered:

> In this respect, the mere presence at the crime scene of a person with superior authority, such as a military commander, is a probative indication for determining whether that person encouraged or supported the perpetrators of the crime.[90]

The Appeals Chamber leaves open the possibility that in the circumstances of a given case, an omission may constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting.

48. The Trial Chamber in this case went on to state:

> Proof that the conduct of the aider and abettor had a causal effect on the act of the principal perpetrator is not required. Furthermore, participation may occur before, during or after the act is committed and be geographically separated therefrom.[91]

The Appeals Chamber reiterates that one of the requirements of the actus reus of aiding and abetting is that the support of the aider and abettor has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. In this regard, it agrees with the Trial Chamber that proof of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime, or proof that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime, is not required. It further agrees that the actus reus of aiding and abetting a crime may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated, and that the location at which the actus reus takes place may be removed from the location of the principal crime.

49. In relation to the mens rea of an aider and abettor, the Trial Chamber held that "in addition to knowledge that his acts assist the commission of the crime, the aider and abettor needs to have intended to provide assistance, or as a minimum, accepted that such assistance would be a possible and foreseeable consequence of his conduct."[92] However, as previously stated in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement, knowledge on the part of the aider and abettor that his acts assist in the commission of the principal perpetrator's crime suffices for the mens rea requirement of this mode of participation.[93] In this respect, the Trial Chamber erred.

50. The Trial Chamber agreed with the statement in the Furundžija Trial Judgement that "it is not necessary that the aider and abettor...know the precise crime that was intended and which in the event was committed. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor."[94] The Appeals Chamber concurs with this conclusion.

51. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber was correct in part and erred in part in setting out the legal requirements of aiding and abetting.

52. The Appeals Chamber notes that in this case, the Trial Chamber did not hold the Appellant responsible for aiding and abetting the crimes at issue. In addition, the Appeals Chamber considers that this form of participation was insufficiently litigated on appeal.[95] Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that this form of participation was fairly encompassed by the Indictment.[96] In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber declines to consider this form of participation any further.

B. Command Responsibilty under Article 7(3) of the Statute

53. In this section,[97] the Appeals Chamber will only address alleged legal errors concerning Article 7(3) of the Statute, and will leave contentions raised by the Appellant in his second ground of appeal, concerning whether the facts of the case support a finding that the Appellant had effective control in the Central Bosnia Operative Zone (CBOZ), to the parts of the Judgement where the factual grounds of appeal are considered.

1. Actual knowledge of a superior

54. The Appellant claims that the mens rea under Article 7(3) of the Statute is actual knowledge or "information which, if at hand, would oblige the commander to conduct further inquiry."[98] Regarding actual knowledge, the Appellant submits that it requires more than proof of a person's rank as a military commander, and that the Trial Chamber failed to look beyond the Appellant's status to establish his knowledge, thus relying "almost exclusively" on the Appellant's rank and status. This, the Appellant contends, is an unacceptable form of strict liability which in effect shifts the burden of proof.[99]

55. The Prosecution responds that the Appellant has failed to make a single reference to any paragraph of the Trial Judgement that would lend credence to this allegation. On the contrary, it > attacks on property. In other words, the perpetrator of the acts of persecution does not initially target the individual but rather membership in a specific racial, religious or political group.[334]

164. The Appeals Chamber reiterates that the mens rea of the perpetrator carrying out the underlying physical acts of persecutions as a crime against humanity requires evidence of a "specific intent to discriminate on political, racial, or religious grounds."[335] The requisite discriminatory intent may not be "inferred directly from the general discriminatory nature of an attack characterised as a crime against humanity."[336] However, the Appeals Chamber considers that the "discriminatory intent may be inferred from such a context as long as, in view of the facts of the case, circumstances surrounding the commission of the alleged acts substantiate the existence of such intent."[337]

165. Pursuant to the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal, the Appeals Chamber holds that a showing of a specific persecutory intent behind an alleged persecutory plan or policy, that is, the removal of targeted persons from society or humanity, is not required to establish the mens rea of the perpetrator carrying out the underlying physical acts of persecutions. The Appeals Chamber further dismisses the Appellant's allegation that a discriminatory purpose alone is insufficient to establish the mens rea for the crime of persecutions. The Trial Chamber was correct when it held at paragraph 235 of the Trial Judgement that the mens rea for persecutions "is the specific intent to cause injury to a human being because he belongs to a particular community or group." The Appeals Chamber stresses that there is no requirement in law that the actor possess a "persecutory intent" over and above a discriminatory intent.

166. The Appeals Chamber has also examined the Appellant's argument that the Trial Chamber erred in applying a recklessness standard in relation to the mens rea requirement for persecutions. In paragraph 235 of the Trial Judgement, reproduced above, there is no reference to recklessness. Paragraph 254 of the Trial Judgement outlines a standard of indirect malicious intent, or recklessness, for the knowing participation in the attack, as a chapeau requirement of crimes against humanity, and not for the crime of persecution. However, the Appeals Chamber is cognizant of the fact that in making its factual findings relating to the ordering of crimes under Article 7(1) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber frequently employed language such as "took the risk" or "deliberately ran the risk."[338] As stated above, the correct legal standard in relation thereto is that a person who orders an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that order, has the requisite mens rea for establishing liability under Article 7(1) pursuant to ordering. Ordering with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting that crime. Thus, an individual who orders an act with the awareness of a substantial likelihood that persecutions as a crime against humanity will be committed in the order's execution, may be liable under Article 7(1) for the crime of persecutions. Whether the facts in this case support a finding that the Appellant is responsible for ordering persecutions as a crime against humanity will be considered in the factual chapters of this Judgement.

against Bosnian Muslims. Their arbitrary detention in pitiful conditions, and in a climate of fear, combined with their employment for forced labour or as human shields, establishes the gravity of the offences in this case. In particular the abuse of the sizeable number of 247 human beings as human shields and – in doing so – endangering their lives at least in abstracto has to be seen as a serious aggravating factor.

(c) The individual circumstances of the accused[1446]
