> A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

(a) Aiding and Abetting

(i) Actus Reus

126. "Aiding and abetting" consists of acts or omissions directed at providing practical assistance, encouragement or moral support to the perpetration of the crime, which have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[257] The Appeals Chamber expressly stated that "specific direction" is not a requisite element of the actus reus of aiding and abetting.[258] There is no requirement of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime or that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime.[259] The actus reus of aiding and abetting a crime may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been committed[260] and at a location which is removed from that where the principal crime is committed.[261]

For a thorough analysis of the actus reus of aiding and abetting, see Furundžija Trial Judgement, paras 192-235.

258 Mrkšić and Šljivančanin Appeal Judgement, para. 159. The Appeals Chamber in Blagojević and Jokić held that "specific direction" has not always been included as element of the actus reus of aiding and abetting and that this may be explained that "such a finding will often be implicit in the finding that the accused has provided practical assistance to the principal perpetrator which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime" considered that "to the extent that specific direction forms an implicit part of the actus reus of aiding and abetting, where the accused knowingly participated in the commission of an offence and his or her participation substantially affected the commission of that offence, the fact that his or her participation amounted to no more than his or her 'routine duties' will not exculpate the accused", Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgement, paras 182, 185-189.

127. The aider and abettor is always an accessory to the crime perpetrated by another person, the principal.[262] For an accused to be liable for aiding and abetting, the underlying crime must ultimately be committed by the principal perpetrator. It is however not necessary that the latter be identified or tried, even in cases of crimes requiring specific intent.[263] It is also not necessary that the principal perpetrator be aware of the aider and abettor's contribution to the crime.[264]

128. The determination of whether conduct substantially assists the commission of a crime requires a fact-based inquiry.[265] The Appeals Chamber has determined that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may be satisfied by a commander permitting the use of resources under his or her control, including personnel, to facilitate the perpetration of a crime.[266] Furthermore, the fact that the aider and abettor's conduct amounted to no more than his "routine duties" does not exculpate him, if such conduct substantially contributed to the commission of the crime.[267]

(ii) Mens Rea

129. The requisite mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[268] The aider and abettor must be aware of the "essential elements" of the crime committed by the principal perpetrator, including the state of mind of the principal perpetrator.[269] It is not required, however, that the aider and abettor share the mens rea required for such crime.[270]

130. As consistently confirmed by the Appeals Chamber:

the operation was not successful,[4551] the Majority finds that Perišić's actions show that he intended to and in fact did provide assistance to Mladić and the VRS war-effort in the Sarajevo campaign, at a time when he already knew of the VRS criminal intent in the implementation of its war strategy.

7. Conclusion

1621. The Majority finds that Perišić repeatedly exercised his authority to assist the VRS in waging a war that encompassed systematic criminal actions against Bosnian Muslim civilians as a military strategy and objective. Perišić's actions substantially facilitated the commission of these crimes because the VRS heavily depended on the VJ's support to function as an army and conduct its operations, including besieging Sarajevo and taking over Srebrenica. The Majority is also satisfied that all of Perišić's actions described above were voluntary.

1622. As found earlier, Perišić urged the FRY SDC to continue its policy of assisting the VRS. He notably oversaw the provision of wide-ranging logistical and technical assistance to the VRS. Without the regular supply of considerable quantities of ammunition and other weaponry, as well as fuel, technical expertise, repair services and personnel training, the VRS would have been hampered in conducting its operations in Sarajevo and Srebrenica.

1623. In addition, the Majority found that the military personnel that Perišić provided for and sustained through the 30th PC included the officers holding positions of command and authority in the VRS Main Staff, as well as well-trained commanding officers of the lower units. The payment of salaries to the VRS's top officers, including Mladić, Dragomir Milošević, Galić, Popović, Gvero, Tolimir, and other principal perpetrators of the crimes charged in Srebrenica and Sarajevo was instrumental in helping the VRS plan and carry out its operations in Sarajevo and Srebrenica. By creating the PCs – a mechanism through which he ensured that these military personnel continued receiving their salaries and enjoying all their benefits in the VJ – Perišić allowed them to carry out their operations in the VRS with limited concern for their basic material needs and those of their families. Perišić sustained the very life line of the VRS and created the conditions for it to implement a war strategy that encompassed the commission of crimes against civilians.

1624. The Majority recognises that the evidence does not establish that the specific weapons used in committing the charged crimes stemmed from the logistical assistance process overseen by Perišić. However, the Majority recalls that the acts of the aider and abettor need not have been "specifically directed" to assist the crimes.[4552] The element of substantial assistance for aiding and assistance to the crimes and that he was aware of the essential elements of the crimes, including the mental state of the principal perpetrators.[4558]

1630. The Majority recalls its finding that the VRS committed the crimes of murder and attacks on civilians for Counts 2 and 4 as a violation of the laws or customs of war, as well as murder and inhumane acts as crimes against humanity for Counts 1 and 3. The Trial Chamber also found that the VRS and/or MUP forces committed the crimes of murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war (Count 10) and murder, inhumane acts, persecutions and exterminations as crimes against humanity (Counts 9, 11, 12 and 13).

1631. The Majority recalls its finding that from the early stages of the war, Perišić was provided with information, from a variety of sources, of the VRS's criminal behaviour and discriminatory intent.[4559] This information related to acts of violence against Bosnian Muslims perpetrated in the BiH theatre of war and made Perišić aware of the VRS's propensity to commit crimes.[4560] With this state of mind, Perišić provided substantial assistance to the VRS in terms of logistic and personnel and this assistance had a substantial effect on the crimes.[4561]

2. Sarajevo

1632. The Majority is satisfied that the general propensity to commit crimes in conjunction with specific information on crimes committed in Sarajevo made Perišić aware that other similar crimes would probably occur, including killing and wounding of civilians and/or persons not taking active part in the hostilities. Notwithstanding this knowledge, Perišić continued to provide significant assistance to the VRS until the end of the siege.

1633. The Majority is also satisfied that Perišić was aware of the essential elements of these crimes, including the mental state of the perpetrators. At the outset, the Majority recalls that Perišić knew that one of the strategic objectives of the Bosnian Serb leadership involved the partition of Sarajevo. Through international reports and cables as well as his intelligence and security organs and media coverage, Perišić soon became aware of the VRS's campaign of sniping and shelling against the civilian population. The Defence argues that at the time of the Indictment it was reasonable to believe that there was no such campaign.[4562] The Majority does not dispute that there were specific instances of sniping and shelling, notably the Markale I incident, where Perišić received conflicting information on the alleged perpetrators. That being noted, extensive evidence demonstrates that Perišić was put on notice of the general existence of a campaign of sniping and shelling of civilians at the time of his tenure as Chief of the VJ General Staff. The systematic and frequent coverage of crimes committed during the siege of Sarajevo in international reports and media spanning over a period of three years leads the Majority to find that the only reasonable conclusion is that Perišić knew of such a campaign.

1634. The Defence also argues that the UN Commission on Human Right's reports and the Mazowiecki reports were "replete with unsourced hearsay and unattributed conclusions and assumptions" and therefore it would "be entirely reasonable for the VJ, VJ intelligence organs, and Mr. Perišić to discount the report[s] in [their] entirety".[4563] Furthermore, it is the Defence's position that the information dispensed by the international and local news media "was unreliable and biased against the Bosnian Serbs"[4564] with the consequence that the Serbs in general (and in particular military commanders) distrusted the news reporting.[4565]

1635. The Majority is satisfied that the international community as well as international and Serbian media, consistently and for a considerable period of time, documented and reported allegations of crimes committed by the VRS. This information alerted Perišić to the high likelihood that the VRS was committing crimes. The Majority finds that Perišić could not have reasonably discounted this information simply because he considered it biased against the Serbs. The fact that information was, in some instances, biased or one-sided does not undermine the finding that Perišić had notice of the VRS's crimes.

1636. In conclusion, the Majority, Judge Moloto dissenting, finds beyond a reasonable doubt that Perišić knew that his conduct assisted in the commission of crimes in Sarajevo. The mental element of aiding and abetting is therefore established in relation to Counts 1 to 4 of the Indictment.

3. Srebrenica

1637. The Majority recalls its finding that Perišić knew of the escalating tensions and the build-up of the eventual attack on Srebrenica by the VRS.[4566] Since he was alerted to the VRS's propensity to commit crimes, the Majority is satisfied that Perišić also knew that it was very probable that the VRS would forcibly transfer Bosnian Muslims and commit some acts of mistreatment and killings with discriminatory intent once Srebrenica had fallen under their control. Through international documents, including reports, UNSC's resolutions and diplomatic cables as well as daily reports from his Intelligence organs and media coverage, Perišić also soon became aware of certain crimes perpetrated by the VRS in Srebrenica.[4567] Notwithstanding such knowledge, Perišić continued to provide substantial assistance to the VRS both prior to and during the period crimes were committed in Srebrenica.

1638. The Majority is therefore satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that Perišić knew that his actions provided practical assistance to the crimes of murder, inhumane acts and persecutions and that he was aware of the essential elements of these crimes, including the mental state of the principal perpetrators.

1639. The Trial Chamber will now turn to the question of whether Perišić knew that his assistance to the VRS would assist the commission of the crime of extermination (Count 13). In order to establish that Perišić aided and abetted the crime of extermination, the Trial Chamber must be satisfied that he had the requisite knowledge when he provided practical assistance to the crimes, that the principal perpetrators intended to kill on a large scale.

1640. The Trial Chamber recalls in this regard that, well before July 1995, a variety of sources had put Perišić on notice of the VRS's propensity to commit crimes. The catalogue of such crimes committed in the past by the VRS contained extremely serious ones, including murder, forcible displacements and other inhumane acts as part of a campaign of ethnic cleansing. The Trial Chamber notes, however, that none of the information provided to Perišić on the VRS's criminal conduct alerted him to the fact that the VRS intended to commit a crime on the scale of the one that occurred in Srebrenica in July 1995.

1641. In this regard, the Trial Chamber notes that an internal report of 30 April 1993, which was submitted to the President of the UNSC by the UN Mission in BiH, stated that the failure to reach an agreement between the Bosnian Serbs and the ABiH Commander in the area of Srebrenica, would "most probably" have led to the massacre of 25,000 people.[4568] Similarly, in the wake of a VRS offensive on Goražde, a letter by the permanent representative of BiH to the UNSC in June 1993 stated that "[w]e again, on the basis of past experience, fear the massacre of a civilian population".[4569] The Trial Chamber recalls, however, that there is no evidence that Perišić was privy to this information.

1642. The Trial Chamber also received conflicting evidence as to whether the massacre of civilians in Srebrenica was subjectively seen as foreseeable at that time.

1643. Witness Pyers Tucker, who worked as the personal staff officer to the Commander of UNPROFOR for BiH, General Phillipe Morillon,[4570] testified that based on his past experience and knowledge, it was to be expected that the Serb activities in Srebrenica would lead to the civilian population either being removed or killed.[4571] In fact, in his 20 March 1993 report which he sent to the UNPROFOR BiH Command, he assessed the situation in Srebrenica as follows:

> If free passage (with transport) [cannot] be arranged for the refugees in the Srebrenica pocket within the next 7 to 14 days, indications are that the Serbs will carry out a genocidal "cleansing" of the entire enclave, resulting in the potential death of up to 80,000 human beings. [...] [The Serbs] are unlikely to stop this offensive until the enclave is cleared one way or another.[4572]

1644. Similarly, witness Muhamed Sacirbey, the Permanent Ambassador of BiH to the United Nations between 1992 and 2000, when asked about his contemporary view as to what may happen in the event of an attack on Srebrenica, testified:

> Starting with the Drina River valley, places like Visoko, Višegrad, Foča, Bijeljina, going into, particularly, Prijedor where we believe many more thousands of people were murdered, this was all more or less done at the same military and political leadership and that continued through much of the war, of course, with the greater intensity during the beginning of the war. But it was from our perspective, that is the perspective of the mission of Bosnia and Herzegovina, and from my conversations with President Izetbegović and other Bosnian leaders, it was a very really possibility that [these] individuals, not only would be expelled, but, in fact, could be massacred.[4573]

1645. On the other hand, Carl Bildt, who served as the EU co-Chairman of the International Conference on the Former Yugoslavia, testified that it was foreseeable that ethnic cleansing would occur in Srebrenica if it was taken over by the VRS.[4574] He nonetheless remarked that the scale of the Srebrenica killings was not foreseeable.[4575] cared for and accommodated after they swam across the Drina River into FRY territory in July 1995 around the time of the Srebrenica events.[4903]

1646. This evidence reflecting conflicting views does not lead to the only reasonable conclusion that the outright extermination of Srebrenica inhabitants was foreseeable at the time.

1813. The Defence additionally mentions Perišić's post-conflict behaviour, including his support for peace and for democratic forces in the FRY, as well as his opposition to Slobodan Milošević's regime, in particular between 1998 and 2000.[4904] Perišić was a founding member of the opposition party named Movement for a Democratic Serbia.[4905] Moreover, the Defence submits that Perišić participated in the preparation and adoption of the FRY's Law on Cooperation with the ICTY, and was among the persons involved in drafting and signing the decision to transfer Milošević into the Tribunal's custody.[4906]

1814. Finally, the Defence notes that Perišić cooperated with the OTP, voluntarily surrendered into the Tribunal's custody once indicted, and conducted himself appropriately and professionally throughout court proceedings.[4907]

2. Findings of the Trial Chamber

(a) Gravity of the Crimes and the Role of the Accused

(i) Sarajevo

1815. The Trial Chamber has found, Judge Moloto dissenting, that Perišić aided and abetted the campaign of sniping and shelling that took place during the siege of Sarajevo.

1816. It would be difficult to overstate the magnitude of the crimes perpetrated in Sarajevo. The siege lasted for nearly four years during which Sarajevo civilians endured conditions of terror due to the indiscriminate nature of the attacks.[4908] Thousands of men, women and children were killed, and tens of thousands injured.[4909] In particular, Sarajevo civilians were regularly shelled and sniped in the course of Perišić's tenure as Chief of the VJ General Staff, a lengthy time span.[4910]

1817. The victims of these shelling and sniping attacks were especially vulnerable. The people of Sarajevo could hardly find refuge. Civilians were targeted in their homes, at places of worship, in hospitals and schools.[4911] Women, children, and the elderly were not spared.[4912]

(ii) Zagreb

1818. The Trial Chamber has held, Judge Moloto dissenting, that Perišić bears individual criminal responsibility for failing to punish his subordinates for the shelling of Zagreb.

1819. The shelling of Zagreb was executed with callous disregard for civilian life. On multiple occasions, the SVK fired Orkan rockets into the centre of Zagreb, unleashing powerful, unguided explosives into a densely populated urban area.[4913] These indiscriminate attacks struck several civilian areas and notably a children's hospital.[4914] They resulted in injuries to over 200 civilians and 7 deaths.[4915] The victims were especially vulnerable.

(iii) Srebrenica

1820. The Trial Chamber, has determined, Judge Moloto dissenting, that Perišić aided and abetted crimes perpetrated in Srebrenica.

1821. The Srebrenica tragedy stands as one of the darkest chapters in European history since World War Two. While the Srebrenica enclave was designated as a safe area, the VRS fiercely attacked civilians,[4916] as it had previously done in Sarajevo. The VRS's victims were, again, numerous[4917] and defenceless.[4918] The Srebrenica atrocities shattered families and left behind countless broken homes.

1822. However, the Majority recalls the Trial Chamber's finding that Perišić is not culpable for the crime of extermination because it was not foreseeable to him that this crime would occur in Srebrenica. For the same reason, the Majority finds that the fact that "thousands of Bosnian Muslim men and boys were summarily executed" in Srebrenica, as submitted by the Prosecution,[4919] cannot be considered for sentencing purposes.

(iv) Aggravating Circumstances

1823. The Majority finds, beyond a reasonable doubt, that Perišić's high rank in the VJ and the lengthy time span over which the crimes were committed are aggravating overall. In particular, the Majority recalls that the Accused was in charge of the highest professional and staff organ for the preparation and use of the VJ in times of war and peace.[4920]

1824. The Majority emphasises the death of numerous victims and the long-term physical, psychological and emotional suffering inflicted on survivors, as well as victims' relatives and loved ones.[4921] The Trial Chamber recalls that the vulnerability of the victims was taken into consideration in evaluating the gravity of the offences.

1825. With regard to the conviction under Article 7(1), it further takes note of Perišić's military rank and experience,[4922] and of the fact that Perišić wrongfully exercised his authority to aid and abet grave crimes perpetrated by the VRS.

1826. Finally, the Majority considers that Perišić showed callous disregard for the VRS's atrocities. It notably recalls that, while Perišić was aware that crimes were being committed in Srebrenica as early as 13 July 1995, he met with Mladić and Gvero nearby Han Pijesak on 18 July 1995 in a pic-nic area and that there was a "lot of joking around at lunch". Perišić continued approving logistical assistance to the VRS for months after learning of the enormous and monstrous massacre at Srebrenica. The Majority also recalls that, long after the atrocities of Srebrenica were uncovered, Perišić maintained a close relationship with Mladić. In 1997 and 1998, Mladić resided over long periods of time at VJ facilities in Rajac and Stragari and the Accused visited him on several occasions, as well as the fact that in 1997 Perišić attended the wedding of Mladić's son.

XII. DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE MOLOTO ON COUNTS 1 TO 4 AND 9 TO 12

1. I respectfully dissent from the Majority's finding as to Momčilo Perišić's individual criminal responsibility pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute in relation to Counts 1 to 4 and Counts 9 to 12 of the Indictment.

A. Introductory Remarks

2. The Majority's conclusion that the objective element of aiding and abetting has been met in this case is premised on two findings: (1) that the VRS heavily depended on the VJ for logistical and personnel support; and (2) that the crimes were inextricably linked with the strategy of the Bosnian Serb leadership.

1. VRS Dependence on VJ Logistical and Personnel Support

3. In my view, providing assistance to the VRS to wage war cannot and should not be equated with aiding and abetting the crimes committed during such war. The provision of assistance by Perišić to the VRS is too remote from the crimes committed during the war to qualify as aiding and abetting such crimes. To conclude otherwise, as the Majority has done, is to criminalise the waging of war, which is not a crime according to the Statute of the Tribunal. In addition, it raises the question: where is the cut-off line? For instance, would a manufacturer of weapons who supplies an army with weapons which are then used to commit crimes during a war also be criminally responsible? In this respect, I note that it is immaterial whether the arms are provided for cash or free of charge. It is noteworthy that, notwithstanding numerous opportunities to do so, no superior has been charged before the Tribunal with aiding and abetting the crimes of his soldiers merely for the reason that he supplied them with arms, sent them to war and they committed crimes. Unlike this example, Perišić was not supplying his soldiers, but soldiers of another army, thus placing him in a more remote position in relation to the crimes. Aiding and abetting has always been charged where the conduct of the accused is proximate to the crime committed by the principal perpetrator. Therefore, if a superior who supplies his soldiers is not charged, Perišić, who supplied a different army, should not be charged.

4. While there is no doubt in my mind that the VRS was, to a large degree, dependent upon the VJ to function as an army, I respectfully submit that it is inappropriate to infer ipso facto on the notion of dependence that Perišić's assistance had a substantial effect on the commission of crimes. It is noteworthy that the trial record established that the dependence of the VRS on the VJ was not absolute.

crime, which had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[2] I underscore that this definition was first articulated by the Appeals Chamber in the course of drawing a distinction between a case of aiding and abetting and one of JCE.[3] This is an important point which cannot go unnoticed in light of the Majority's reliance upon the Bosnian Serb leadership's strategic objectives to support a finding that the objective element for aiding and abetting has been met. I emphasise that the jurisprudence of this Tribunal has clearly established that in the case of aiding and abetting, proof is not required of the existence or pre-existence of a common concerted plan as compared to the case of acting in pursuance of a JCE where "it is sufficient for the participant to perform acts that in some way are directed to the furthering of the common plan or purpose".[4]

9. I respectfully disagree with the Majority's conclusion that "the acts of the aider and abettor need not have been 'specifically directed' to assist the crimes",[5] and stress that the notion of "specific direction" has been consistently cited by this Tribunal in the definition of aiding and abetting.[6] Although the Appeals Chamber in Blagojević held that "specific direction" has not been an essential element of the actus reus of aiding and abetting,[7] it clarified that the definition in Tadić had not been departed from and that whether an act is specifically directed at the commission of the crimes "will often be implicit in the finding that the accused has provided practical assistance to the principal perpetrator which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime".[8] I interpret the Appeals Chamber in Blagojević to say that there is no additional requirement in the notion of aiding and abetting beyond the requirement that the assistance given to the principal perpetrator had a substantial effect on the crimes.

10. However, if the notion of "specific direction" is in fact implicit in finding that an accused has provided practical assistance to the principal perpetrator which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime, I cannot but conclude that to reach this finding, a direct link needs to be dissolution of the SFRY had started by 25 June 1991,[47] and the conflict broke out in BiH in 1992.[48] In June 1992, the VRS was still in the nascent stages of its formation and the evidence suggests that paramilitary groups were responsible for much of the violence taking place at that time.[49] Perišić made no reference to the VRS in this statement thus, the exodus he referred to cannot necessarily be attributable to the actions of the VRS. This statement therefore does not establish as the only reasonable conclusion that Perišić became aware of the VRS's propensity to commit crimes at that time.

49. On a more general note, both of these statements involve knowledge that the Majority purports Perišić acquired prior to the Indictment period. Even accepting the Majority's interpretation of these statements – which I do not – it is important to recognise that situations during a war can change dramatically over time. What Perišić knew or thought he knew about the activities and propensities of the VRS during the initial break-up of the SFRY cannot be equated with his understanding of circumstances during the later stages of the war.

(b) Evidence Following Perišić's Appointment as Chief of the VJ General Staff

50. I respectfully dissent from the Majority's conclusion that Perišić was aware from the early stages of his appointment as Chief of the VJ General Staff of the VRS's discriminatory intent and criminal conduct in BiH.[50]

(i) Letter from the VRS

51. The congratulatory letter sent from the VRS Krajina Corps Command to Perišić on 26 August 1993 regarding his appointment as Chief of the VJ General Staff – reflecting a desire to unify the VRS and VJ to create a unified Serbian state – did not provide Perišić with knowledge of any sort of discriminatory intent or criminal conduct of the VRS.[51] The letter stated, in relevant part:

> We wish you to settle at your new duty as soon as possible, to choose your associates, transform the army where needed, removing the weaknesses of the old system and the former JNA, creating during the pre-trial phase.[110] A number of "Stipulations" between the Parties were filed and admitted into the record during the course of trial.[111] The Trial Chamber has treated such stipulations as agreed facts. The Trial Chamber recalls that it is not bound by any agreements reached between the parties,[112] and that it is not obliged to make explicit findings on facts agreed upon by the parties or on undisputed facts; the reference to such facts is by itself indicative that it accepts those facts as true.

(ii) Judicial Notice of Adjudicated Facts

69. The Trial Chamber took judicial notice of hundreds of adjudicated facts from the Krstić, Blagojević, Krajišnik, and Orić cases pursuant to Rule 94(B).[113]

70. The Trial Chamber recalls its Prosecution Adjudicated Facts Decision, wherein it had set out the Appeals Chamber finding in the Slobodan Milošević case that "by taking judicial notice of an adjudicated fact, a Chamber establishes a well-founded presumption for the accuracy of this fact, which therefore does not have to be proved again at trial, but which, subject to that presumption, may be challenged at that trial."[114]

71. Like all rebuttable evidence, judicially noticed adjudicated facts remain subject to challenge by the non-moving party during the course of trial. During its final deliberations, the Trial Chamber has therefore assessed the weight of the relevant facts, taking into consideration the totality of the trial record and, most particularly, any evidence submitted by the non-moving party to rebut the adjudicated fact.[115]

[110] Rule 65 ter (H) provides: "The pre-trial Judge shall record the points of agreement and disagreement on matters of law and fact. In this connection, he or she may order the parties to file written submissions with either the pre-trial Judge or the Trial Chamber."

This holding was reaffirmed by the Appeals Chamber in the Karemera case: "In the case of judicial notice under Rule 94(B), the effect is only to relieve the Prosecution of its initial burden to produce evidence on the point; the defence may then put the point into question by introducing reliable and credible evidence to the contrary." *Prosecutor v. omissions on his part which would constitute other Article 7(1) forms of responsibility, except for aiding and abetting which is discussed below, in relation to the crime of forcible transfer.

c. Aiding and Abetting

1497. To aid and abet a crime, the accused must carry out an act, whether a positive act or an omission, to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a crime, and this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of such crime.[4725] The requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal.[4726]

1498. At the outset, the Trial Chamber recalls that Borovčanin had no involvement in the attack on the Žepa enclave. Turning to the Srebrenica enclave, on 12 July, Borovčanin left the 1st Company of the Jahorina Recruits in Potočari to assist in the forcible transfer. He continued to permit them to practically assist on 13 July. The Trial Chamber has considered the evidence as to Borovčanin's subordinate commanders, Jević and Mane and the Jahorina Recruits' role in assisting with the boarding of the Bosnian Muslim women, children, and the elderly onto buses and trucks, separating the men from their families, counting the people as they stepped onto the buses, and patrolling the area in which the Bosnian Muslims were gathered until the forcible transfer was completed.[4727] It finds that they were instrumental in executing the actual physical forcible transfer out of Potočari, and it was a key role they played. By so doing, the Trial Chamber finds that they contributed substantially to the commission of the crime.

1499. The Trial Chamber recalls its majority finding above that Borovčanin knew, as of 12 July when he was in Potočari, that a forcible transfer of the civilian population was taking place.[4728] In ordering his commanders and units to participate in the operation to move the population, Borovčanin knew that this would assist substantially with the crime of forcible transfer. This knowledge would have only been reinforced on the evening of the 12 July when Jević reported to him on the actions of the unit during that day. [4729]

1500. As found above, the Trial Chamber is not satisfied that Borovčanin had any intent to forcibly transfer. Further, the evidence is insufficient to demonstrate that he intended to assist in a forcible transfer. As it is, however, under the jurisprudence of this Tribunal, not only is the accused frames, the Trial Chamber cannot be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt as to the timing of the shooting which Pepić heard. As a result, the Trial Chamber cannot infer from this evidence, individually or cumulatively with that of the survivors, that the shooting Pepić heard was the reaction to the "burnt-hands" incident, or the ongoing, full-scale execution.[4799]

1532. The Trial Chamber has also considered the hearsay evidence of PW-100 and PW-168. PW-100's statement, albeit not detailed, does provide support for the involvement of the SBP in the full-scale execution in that he refers to all the prisoners destined to be exchanged in Tuzla as having been killed at a "warehouse" by a "regular special police force".[4800] He makes no mention of a separate event triggered by the killing and injury of some police members present at the site and thus the statement supports the participation of the SBP in the full-blown execution. Yet, as noted previously, this statement is vague in content and the source of the hearsay is not identified beyond the person being a member of the Jahorina Recruits. PW-168, on the other hand, recounted a hearsay statement which is more detailed and in which the source is identified. He related that Stupar described that one of the prisoners grabbed a rifle and used it to kill a member of his unit. There was then an incident "whereby the police men and the soldiers who had been there opened fire on the prisoners and killed them".[4801] However, this statement is ambiguous in its content. It could be interpreted to mean the prisoners in the immediate vicinity were killed, i.e, the "burnt-hands" incident or all the prisoners at the Kravica Warehouse were killed, i.e, full-scale execution. While the Trial Chamber, as noted previously, is satisfied as to the reliability of the evidence, given the lack of detail as to the content and source of PW-100's information and the ambiguity of the statement made to PW-168, combined with the fact that both involve untested hearsay, the Trial Chamber finds the evidence is not sufficient to establish participation on the part of the SBP 2nd Šekovići Detachment in the full massacre at the Kravica Warehouse.

1533. From the totality of the evidence before it, the Trial Chamber finds that a full-scale execution took place at the Kravica Warehouse that evening, after the "burnt-hands" incident occurred.[4802] While there is evidence that there were pauses between the shooting, the length of the pauses is unclear.[4803] It could have ranged from a mere half hour to three hours. In addition, the Trial Chamber is unable on the evidence to establish the time when the full-scale execution began.

1534. As to who executed the Bosnian Muslim prisoners, the evidence is even more unclear. Taken cumulatively, the Trial Chamber finds that one reasonable inference in the circumstances is

19. Finally, some of the proposed adjudicated facts go to issues which are at the core of this case. In balancing judicial economy with the Accused's right to a fair and public trial, the Trial Chamber is of the view that a number of these facts should be excluded in the interests of justice.[64]

C. The legal effect of judicially noticing an adjudicated fact

20. The Appeals Chamber in Milošević established the legal effect of judicially noticing an adjudicated fact: "[B]y taking notice of an adjudicated fact a Chamber establishes a well-founded presumption for the accuracy of this fact, which therefore does not have to be proven again at trial, but which subject to that presumption may be challenged at that trial".[65] This holding was recently reaffirmed by the Appeals Chamber in Karemera: "In the case of judicial notice under Rule 94(B), the effect is only to relieve the Prosecution of its initial burden to produce evidence on the point; the defence may then put the point into question by introducing reliable and credible evidence to the contrary."[66]

21. The logical implication of the Karemera Chamber's language is that when a Trial Chamber judicially notices an adjudicated fact, that fact is admitted into evidence.[67] Like all rebuttable evidence, judicially noticed adjudicated facts remain subject to challenge by the non-moving party during the course of trial. Moreover, the Trial Chamber in future relevant deliberations, and particularly in those relating to the final judgement, retains the obligation to assess the facts' weight, "taking into consideration the evidence in the ... case in its entirety".[68] Perhaps most importantly, while the burden of producing evidence is shifted to the accused when the Chamber meaning of the term "parcel" became known by examining intercepts between VRS officers, including Beara and Popović. See Krstić Appeal Judgement, supra note 3, para. 76; Krstić Trial Judgement, supra note 2, para. 383.

[64] Proposed facts included within this group are the following: 14, 73, 81, 140, 157–163, 229–239, 241–244, 287–288, 290, 292–308, 310, 317–319, 321–324, 326–327, 335, 338, 340–363, 377–389, 391–398, 412–416, 418–422, 424–425, 427–430, 440–445, 447, 449–451, 457, 460, 467–470, 472, 487, 489–492, 494–495, 514–533.

[65] Milošević Appeal Decision, supra note 18, p. 4 (footnote removed). Popović objects to the accuracy or truthfulness of several proposed facts. See. e.g., Popović Response, paras. 22, 25–26, 35, 37–38, 40, 58, 64, 68, 76, 80, 86–90, 93, 118, 128. Borovčanin also appears to contest the accuracy or truthfulness of certain facts, and proposes his own reformulations to render them "suitable for judicial notice". See Borovčanin Response, para. 13. Nevertheless, since any challenge to the accuracy or truthfulness of an adjudicated fact may be made at trial, a challenge on either of these grounds in a response to the motion seeking judicial notice of the fact will ordinarily not suffice, on its own, to justify denial of such notice.

judicially notices an adjudicated fact proposed by the Prosecution, the burden of persuasion—that is, proof beyond a reasonable doubt—always remains on the Prosecution.[69]

IV. CONCLUSION

22. With the foregoing considerations in mind, the Chamber has decided to withhold judicial notice of the following purported adjudicated facts because they do not fulfil at least one of the admissibility requirements established in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal:

(a) Purported facts the formulation of which in the Prosecution Motion differs in a substantial way from their formulation in the original judgement: 89, 129, 275, 320, 325, 339, 370, 411, 417, 423, 426, 471, 479, and 534.

(b) Purported facts that are unclear or misleading in the context in which they are placed in the Prosecution Motion: 59, 225–227, and 390.

(c) Purported facts that may be based, at least in part, on an agreement between the parties to the original proceedings: 25, 141, 143, 150–151, 179–180, 214, 250, 254, and 266.

(d) Purported facts that relate to the acts, conduct, or mental state of one ore more of the Accused: 190–202 and 228.

(e) Purported facts that are or may be subject to pending appeal: 54, 74, 90–91, 98, 117, 135, 148, 240, 289, and 291.

23. In addition, the Trial Chamber exercises its discretion to withhold judicial notice of the following proposed adjudicated facts because, in the circumstances, judicially noticing them would not serve the interests of justice: 13–16, 28, 43, 45, 56, 73, 81, 88, 92, 111, 116, 126–128, 134, 136–137, 139–140, 142, 147, 156–164, 167, 169, 185, 212, 216, 220, 222, 229–239, 241–244, 255, 262, 267, 269, 273, 283, 287–288, 290, 292–308, 310, 317–319, 321–324, 335, 338, 340–363, 377–389, 391–398, 401, 409, 412–416, 418–422, 424–425, 427–430, 435, 440–445, 447, 449–451, 457, 460, 466–470, 472, 487, 489–492, 494–495, 499, and 514–533.

24. The Trial Chamber holds that the remainder of the proposed adjudicated facts are suitable for judicial notice, subject to the reformulations and typographical corrections implemented in the Annex to this Decision. These facts meet all nine of the admissibility requirements discussed above. Moreover, the Chamber considers that judicially noticing these facts, both individually and as a group, will further the interests of justice while not jeopardising the Accused's right to a fair,

52. The Appeals Chamber has already held that the right to cross-examination is not absolute.[87] It further noted that > application of a fair trial in favour of both parties is understandable because the Prosecution acts on behalf of and in the interests of the community, including the victims of the offences charged (in cases before the Tribunal the Prosecutor acts on behalf of the international community) [...] Seen in this way, it is difficult to see how a trial could ever be considered fair where the accused is favoured at the expense of the Prosecution beyond a strict compliance with those fundamental protections.[88]

Of even more relevance for the issue at hand, since the Tribunal's first cases, the jurisprudence has been constant in holding that, under the Tribunal's system, a statement of a person made otherwise than in the proceedings in which it is tendered, whether orally by a witness or in writing is not inadmissible, in particular when the source of hearsay is known and subject to potential evaluation by a Chamber.[89] In particular, the Appeals Chamber found that Trial Chambers have a wide discretion in admitting hearsay evidence, although establishing the reliability of this type of evidence is of paramount importance when hearsay evidence is admitted as substantive evidence in order to prove the truth of its contents.[90]

53. A different matter is, of course, what weight a trier of fact is allowed to give to evidence not subjected to the testing of cross-examination. It is in this matter that the jurisprudence of the ECtHR is valuable, as it has authoritatively stated the principle that "all the evidence must normally be produced at a public hearing, in the presence of the accused, with a view to adversarial argument. There are exceptions to this principle, but they must not infringe the rights of the defence."[91] Unacceptable infringements of the rights of the defence, in this sense, occur when a conviction is based solely, or in a decisive manner, on the depositions of a witness whom the accused has had no opportunity to examine or to have examined either during the investigation or at trial.[92] The ECtHR applied this reasoning to the statement of a co-accused in pre-trial proceedings in a case where neither the applicant nor his lawyer had been given the opportunity to question the co-accused at any stage of the proceedings.[93] The Appeals Chamber has already had occasion to elaborate on the fact that these principles serve as guidelines before the Tribunal.[94]

54. The Joint Defence further contests the Trial Chamber's conclusion that they had not shown where the December 2001 Transcript contained false accusations.[95] According to the Prosecution, arguments related to weight or the content of the December 2001 Transcript should be disregarded at this time, since the veracity of its content is not something to be considered at the admissibility stage. The Appeals Chamber understands the Impugned Decision to mean that the Trial Chamber in this case did not find prima facie elements that would make the December 2001 Transcript patently unreliable and therefore devoid of any probative value.[96]

(iv) Conclusion on the right to cross-examination

55. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not err in finding that the December 2001 Transcript could be introduced into evidence even if the co-accused might not be able to cross-examine Prlić on it, since as a matter of principle nothing bars the admission of evidence that is not tested or might not be tested through cross-examination.

(c) Constraints on admission of evidence

56. The Joint Defence finally remarks on the issue of the admission of evidence as opposed to its assessment (or weight), averring that the "extremely liberal approach" to admission of evidence adopted by the Trial Chamber throughout the proceedings is not suited to all circumstances. In particular, the Joint Defence suggests that a more rigorous approach – one with "definite constraints" – should be used in admitting written evidence related to the acts and conduct of the accused.[97]

57. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did refer to the principle according to which untested evidence relating to the acts and conduct of the accused may be admitted into the trial record, but must be corroborated by other evidence in order to form, if it comes to that, a basis for a conviction of an accused.[98] This principle is undoubtedly premised on the recognition that professional judges are better able to weigh evidence and consider it in its proper context than

The Office of the Prosecutor:

Mr. Kenneth Scott
Mr. Daryl Mundis

Counsel for the Accused:

Mr. Michael Karnavas and Ms. Suzana Tomanović for Jadranko Prlić
Ms. Senka Nožica and Mr. Peter Murphy for Bruno Stojić

Ms. Vesna Alaburić for Milivoj Petković
Ms. Dijana Tomašegović-Tomić for Valentin Ćorić
Mr. Fahrudin Ibrišimović and Mr. Roger Sahota for Berislav Pušić

FINDING that in the determination of this Interlocutory Appeal, it is not necessary for the Appeals Chamber to receive submissions from the Association of Defence Counsel;

NOTING that in their Interlocutory Appeal, the Appellants argue that "the Trial Chamber abused its discretion and committed discernible errors by:

(a) severely restricting the fundamental right of the Accused to cross-examine the witnesses against them;

(b) applying rigid time-constraints in preference to using less restrictive methods of control;

(c) effectively requiring the Accused to exercise the right of cross-examination as a group rather than individually, regardless of conflicts of interest, and to bargain with each other for time to cross-examine;

(d) preventing Defence Counsel from affording effective assistance of counsel to the Accused; and

(e) failing to exercise judicial independence by subjugating the right of the Accused to a fair trial to the political and economic pressures imposed upon the Trial Chamber by the UN Security Council through the Completion Strategy."[7]

NOTING that in its Response, the Prosecution opposes the Interlocutory Appeal, arguing that the Decision by the Trial Chamber establishes "a practical and flexible guideline that ensures a fair and expeditious trial, discourages unfocused and irrelevant cross-examination, and facilitates the scheduling of witnesses who must travel internationally to testify before the International Tribunal",[8] that thus far, the application of the rule has been fair and functional and that the Trial Chamber has in fact granted additional time to the Appellants where good cause was shown;[9]

CONSIDERING that the right to cross-examine witnesses is a fundamental right recognized under international human rights law[10] and restated in Article 21(4) of the Statute of this Tribunal; who raised an objection before the Trial Chamber and was told that the matter would be considered at the time of Judgement.

70. Likewise, the fact that the Appellant did not request an adjournment of the proceedings after having understood that the Prosecution intended to rely on the mode of liability of joint criminal enterprise in no way demonstrates that the Appellant was not or did not feel prejudiced given the Trial Chamber's assurance that the objection to the indictment would be considered at the time of Judgement. The Appellant had good grounds for not doing so. In the Appeals Chamber's opinion, the Appellant's "silence" after the filing of the Rule 98*bis* Response, denounced by the Prosecution during the Appeal Hearing, cannot be held against him.

71. The Appeals Chamber emphasises that the Prosecution is expected to know its case before it goes to trial.[232] An accused cannot be expected to engage in guesswork in order to ascertain what the case against him is, nor can he be expected to prepare alternative or entirely new lines of defence because the Prosecution has failed to make its case clear. Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber reiterates that if indeed it became clear to the Trial Chamber that this was a case of joint criminal enterprise at the time of the third amendment to the indictment in December 2001,[233] when seised of the Appellant's objection to the Prosecution's Motion to Amend the Third Amended Indictment[234] the Trial Chamber was under the obligation to ensure that the Appellant was sufficiently informed of the exact charges against him such that he had an opportunity to conduct investigations and prepare his defence.[235] Any accused before the International Tribunal has a fundamental right to a fair trial, and Chambers are obliged to ensure that this right is not violated.

72. The Appeals Chamber considers that the fact that the Appellant did not seek to recall Prosecution witnesses or ask for an adjournment does not demonstrate that he did not suffer prejudice.

73. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not discharged the burden of demonstrating that the Appellant's ability to prepare his defence was not materially impaired by its failure to plead the Appellant's participation in a joint criminal enterprise.

acknowledges that he presented a defence against an allegation of aiding and abetting.[257] In addition, the question of whether the Appellant's responsibility could be characterized as that of an aider and abettor was extensively litigated on appeal.[258] For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds it appropriate to ascertain whether the Trial Chamber's findings support the Appellant's responsibility for persecutions under Count 1 of the Fifth Amended Indictment as that of an aider and abettor pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute.

B. Applicable Law

85. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of aiding and abetting consists of acts directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime, and which have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[259] It is not required that a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime be shown, or that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime.[260] The actus reus of aiding and abetting a crime may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated, and the location at which the actus reus takes place may be removed from the location of the principal crime.[261]

86. The requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist in the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[262] The aider and abettor must be aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal.[263] In relation to the crime of persecutions, an offence with a specific intent, he must thus be aware not only of the crime whose perpetration he is facilitating but also of the discriminatory intent of the perpetrators of that crime. He need not share the intent but he must be aware of the discriminatory context in which the crime is to be committed and know that his support or encouragement has a substantial effect on its perpetration.[264] However, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor knows either the precise crime that was intended or the one that was, in the event, committed. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor.[265]

C. The Appellant's responsibility as an aider and abettor for persecutions (Count 1)

87. Under Count 1, the Trial Chamber convicted the Appellant of persecutions – as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise – based on the following underlying acts:[266] (1) unlawful arrests and detention;[267] (2) cruel and inhumane treatment, including beatings, torture and confinement under inhumane conditions;[268] (3) forced labour;[269] and (4) deportation and forcible transfer.[270]

88. On the basis of the same acts of deportation underlying the persecutions conviction, the Trial Chamber also found the Appellant responsible for deportation as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(d) of the Statute under Count 2.[271] However, finding that a conviction for deportation as a crime against humanity is impermissibly cumulative with a conviction for persecutions through deportation, the Trial Chamber did not enter a conviction for deportation as a crime against humanity under Count 2.[272]

1. Preliminary issues

89. At the outset, the Appeals Chamber will address the Appellant's third, fifth, sixth and seventh grounds of appeal, as they all raise issues of general significance to the Trial Chamber's findings.

(a) The Trial Chamber's findings relating to joint criminal enterprise (Third ground of appeal)

90. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in inferring from the evidence that there was a common plan to persecute the non-Serb population of the Municipality of Bosanski Šamac and that he was involved therein.[273] He argues that Judge Lindholm's Dissenting Opinion presents another reasonable inference which is consistent with his innocence.[274] He submits that "[a]t most, the Trial Chamber should have convicted [him] only on the basis of aiding and presumption of the accuracy of that fact, which therefore does not have to be proved again at trial, but which can be challenged at trial,[6] i.e. a rebuttable presumption .[7]

III. DISCUSSION

6. The Prosecution, in its further submissions, argues that the adjudicated facts in its Initial Motion are ideally suited to create a "rebuttable presumption" and therefore presses admission of all of the remaining 332 facts[8] pursuant to Rule 94 (B), as interpreted by the Appeals Chamber.

7. The Amici Curiae, in their further submissions, argue that it would be a proper exercise of the discretion referred to by the Appeals Chamber to refuse all or some of the outstanding facts, if the Trial Chamber considers that the large number of facts and detail contained in those facts put too onerous a burden of rebuttal upon the Accused.[9] At the heart of this argument is the proposition that the wholesale nature of the application to admit the remaining 332 facts is capable of offending the principle of a fair trial, as enshrined in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute of the Tribunal.[10]

8. The Trial Chamber finds force in these arguments of the Amici Curiae.

9. Furthermore, as we said in our Initial Decision, the wholesale admission of facts taken from a judgement based on an assessment of evidence by another Trial Chamber is not an appropriate exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion under Rule 94 (B),[11] and this is a matter the Trial Chamber will take into consideration in determining the admissibility of the facts.

10. In the exercise of our discretion, the Trial Chamber may also consider the tendentiousness of the facts sought to be admitted. In particular, there have been areas of evidence the Accused has strongly challenged and which the Trial Chamber, in its determination of applications for the admission of Rule 92 bis evidence, has consistently allowed the Accused to cross-examine. The starkest example of this is the evidence of participation by the JNA (or Serb paramilitaries) in the perpetration of crimes alleged in the Indictment. In one decision concerning the admission of transcripts under Rule 92 bis (D), the Trial Chamber ruled that witnesses whose evidence concerned the participation by the JNA (or Serb paramilitaries) in the takeover of Foca relating, as it did, to a live issue between the parties (i.e. the role of the JNA and Serb paramilitaries in the takeover of municipalities and villages in Croatia and Bosnia and Herzegovina), must be called for cross-examination by the Accused.[12] Indeed, the Prosecution conceded this point.[13] The Trial Chamber may accordingly take such matters into consideration in the exercise of its discretion to admit the adjudicated facts.

11. An additional issue concerns the basis for the admission of adjudicated facts. As the Appeals Chamber acknowledges in its Decision, the principle behind the exercise by the Chamber of its discretion to admit facts pursuant to Rule 94 (B) is judicial economy.[14] It is clear, however, that the admission on a wholesale basis of the 332 remaining facts the Prosecution seeks now to have admitted, may have the contrary effect on the proceedings. This is because, as the Appeals Chamber states, the admission of a fact only creates a presumption as to the accuracy of that fact, which may be rebutted by the Accused by way of evidence. Not only does this raise the possibility of placing a heavy burden upon the Accused in the preparation and conduct of his case, but attempts by an accused to rebut these facts may absorb considerable time and resources during the course of the proceedings,[15] thereby not promoting judicial economy or expeditiousness.[16]

12. The Trial Chamber must therefore determine, in the exercise of its discretion, which of the remaining 332 facts are admissible under Rule 94 (B). In doing so, the Chamber will concentrate on the salient facts, exclude those facts which, when taken together, will result in such a large number as to compromise the principle of a fair and expeditious trial. Moreover, the Trial Chamber will apply the other considerations discussed above.[17]

13. The remaining adjudicated facts for which the Prosecution seeks admission are dealt with by category as follows:

(a) Political background (facts 151 to 171)

14. These facts, taken from the Tadic and Celebici Judgments, cover wide -ranging assertions with respect to the political background of the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the relevance and role of political parties, the JNA, VRS and TO. The facts are broad and tendentious and when placed in the context of the overall breadth of the application, as well as the Accused's right to rebut the facts, may place an undue burden on the Accused. The Trial Chamber will, in the exercise of its discretion, deny admission of these facts under Rule 94 (B).

(b) Prijedor, including background and general facts, the attack on Kozorac, the existence of an armed conflict and the detention camps (facts 172 to 367)

15. The Trial Chamber has considered the 195 facts concerning the Prijedor municipality and applied the considerations set out above in exercising its discretion. These facts have all been taken from the Tadic Judgment. We will admit the following 141 facts as numbered in the Initial Motion: 175-178, 182-188, 190-201, 205-209, 213, 220-223, 243, 260-367. These facts concern relevant matters relating to the Serb takeover of Prijedor; the attack on the Kozorac area, and relevant facts pertaining to the detention of civilians at the Omarska, Keraterm and Trnopolje camps. The remainder of the facts sought to be admitted concerning Prijedor shall be refused. This finding is made in the context of the case as a whole, of which this municipality is a small part. All that is required with respect to the crime base matters is an overall picture. The excluded paragraphs are either not sufficiently significant, too detailed, too numerous or otherwise too tendentious to be admitted in the Trial Chamber's discretion.

(c) Foca, including background, the conflict there, sexual abuse in detention facilities, and the detention of civilians in the KP Dom (facts 369 to 415)

16. The Trial Chamber has already admitted into evidence the testimony of 11 witnesses who have dealt with the range of issues contained in these facts, which the Prosecution now seeks to have admitted.[18] second category, if indeed it does not belong outright to that category. It is different in four ways from Rule 94(A).

6. First, unlike Rule 94(A), Rule 94(B) is discretionary: the Trial Chamber may or may not decide to take judicial notice. Second, the parties have a right to be heard before the Trial Chamber acts; under Rule 94(A) they have no such right, even though they may be accorded a privilege. Third, Rule 94(B) is based on the circumstance that the fact has been adjudicated in other proceedings or that the documentary evidence has been presented in those proceedings, even though the adjudicated fact or the documentary evidence does not relate to "facts of common knowledge" within the meaning of Rule 94 (A) but rather to "matters at issue in the current proceedings". Fourth, Rule 94(B) in consequence relates to a case in which evidence is necessary unless excluded by the taking of judicial notice; evidence is unnecessary in the case of Rule 94(A).

7. It follows that if, in its discretion, the Trial Chamber decides not to use the power given to it by Rule 94(B), evidence of the "matters at issue" has to be given in the ordinary way; if evidence is given in the ordinary way by one party on "matters at issue", the other party unquestionably has a right to rebut the evidence so given . Is that right of rebuttal lost where the Trial Chamber decides instead to take judicial notice of the relevant fact as an adjudicated fact?

8. The circumstance that Rule 94(B) provides for recourse to the mechanism of "judicial notice" does not conceal the real nature of what it is doing; and the real nature of what it is doing is important to the analysis. The provision, on the face of it, is not dealing with matters of common knowledge of which evidence cannot be given if judicial notice is taken of those matters. It is using the device of "judicial notice" to provide for an exemption from the necessity to adduce evidence on matters which are "at issue" between the parties and which therefore need to be proved in the normal way by evidence. This being so, "judicial notice" does not carry the same consequence as in the case of matters of common knowledge.

9. There is argument that the term "judicial notice" should be given the same meaning in the two provisions in which it occurs. No doubt, it is a sound rule of construction to give the same meaning to the same words occurring in different parts of a law . But the rule is not inflexible; as the cases show, it can be varied if a variation is required by the context.[1] In my view, the context in this case requires the term "judicial notice" to bear different meanings in the two provisions under consideration.

10. It is possible that the model on which Rule 94(B) was crafted lies in the circumstance that states legislate to provide for judicial notice to be taken of matters which cannot all be described as matters of common knowledge. But there are three things about such legislation.

11. First, such legislation is concerned with matters which are manifestly capable of accurate verification, even if they are not of common knowledge. That being so , the state legislature has stepped in to say that evidence – though it can otherwise be led - is not necessary, the giving of it being a waste of time. In the instant case, the fact of adjudication is manifestly capable of accurate verification. But the

THE APPEALS CHAMBER of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 ("International Tribunal");

BEING SEISED of the "Prosecution's Interlocutory Appeal against the Trial Chamber's 10 April 2003 'Decision on Prosecution Motion for Judicial Notice of Adjudicated Facts'" filed on 21 May 2003 ("Interlocutory Appeal");[1]

NOTING the "Amici Curiae Observations on Prosecution's Interlocutory Appeal against the Trial Chamber's 10 April 2003 'Decision on Prosecution Motion for Judicial Notice of Adjudicated Facts'" filed on 30 May 2003 ("Observations");

NOTING the Prosecution's reply to the Observations filed on 3 June 2003 (" Reply");

NOTING the "Prosecution's Request for Early Decision on Appeal of Trial Chamber's 10 April 2003 'Decision on Prosecution Motion for Judicial Notice of Adjudicated Facts'" filed on 16 September 2003;

NOTING that on 12 December 2002, the Prosecution filed a motion before the Trial Chamber seeking to have judicial notice taken of 482 adjudicated facts derived from four cases which had been the subject of final appeal decisions before the International Tribunal ("Prosecution's Motion");[2]

NOTING that on 2 April 2003, the Prosecution filed the "Additional Information regarding the Prosecution Motion for Judicial Notice of Adjudicated Facts, 2 April 2003" ("Additional Information"), whereby it brought to the attention of the Trial Chamber in the present case[3] the fact that on 28 February 2003 the Trial Chamber in another trial, Prosecutor v. Momcilo Krajisnik, took judicial notice of approximately 620 facts,[4] and that "all of the facts proposed for judicial notice in the Prosecution's December Submission [i.e., Prosecution's Motion] were among those approximately 620 facts accepted by the Krajisnik Chamber";[5]

NOTING that on 10 April 2003, the Trial Chamber decided to admit 130 paragraphs of facts as set out in Annex A to the Prosecution's Motion, and rejected the remaining facts listed in the annex;[6]

NOTING that on 22 April 2003 the Prosecution requested certification from the Trial Chamber to appeal from the Impugned Decision;[7]

NOTING that on 6 May 2003 the Trial Chamber granted the Prosecution's request and certified the interlocutory appeal from the Impugned Decision,[8] acknowledging that one of the Prosecution's reasons for seeking certification was that the Trial Chamber in the Krajisnik Decision had reached a different conclusion from that of the Trial Chamber in the present case;

CONSIDERING that the main issue in this appeal concerns the legal test for the admission of adjudicated facts under Rule 94(B),[9] and that, in considering this issue, the Appeals Chamber will not consider the alleged error in relation to each of the facts rejected by the Impugned Decision, the application of that test to each rejected fact being a matter to be decided by the Trial Chamber on the criteria hereinafter set forth;

CONSIDERING that Rule 94(B) does not define adjudicated facts, nor does Rule 94(A) explain what "facts of common knowledge" are;

CONSIDERING that Rule 94(A) commands the taking of judicial notice and Rule 94(B) gives a discretion to do so, and that, in the case of Rule 94(A), the basis on which judicial notice is taken is that the material is notorious, whereas in the case of Rule 94(B), the basis is that the material, in the case of adjudicated facts, is the subject of an adjudication made by another Chamber;[10]

CONSIDERING that by taking judicial notice of an adjudicated fact, a Chamber establishes a well-founded presumption for the accuracy of this fact, which therefore does not have to be proven again at trial,[11] but which, subject to that presumption, may be challenged at that trial;

FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, the Appeals Chamber, by majority, Judge Hunt dissenting , RETURNS the matter to the Trial Chamber for it to review the taking of judicial notice of the adjudicated facts in accordance with the present decision.

II. THE STANDARD FOR APPELLATE REVIEW

7. On appeal, the Parties must limit their arguments to legal errors that invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and to factual errors that result in a miscarriage of justice within the scope of Article 25 of the Statute. These criteria are well established by the Appeals Chambers of both the ICTY[16] and the ICTR.[17] In exceptional circumstances, the Appeals Chamber will also hear appeals where a party has raised a legal issue that would not lead to the invalidation of the judgement but is nevertheless of general significance to the Tribunal's jurisprudence.[18]

8. Any party alleging an error of law must identify the alleged error, present arguments in support of its claim and explain how the error invalidates the decision. An allegation of an error of law which has no chance of changing the outcome of a decision may be rejected on that ground.[19] Even if the party's arguments are insufficient to support the contention of an error, however, the Appeals Chamber may conclude for other reasons that there is an error of law.[20]

9. The Appeals Chamber reviews the Trial Chamber's findings of law to determine whether or not they are correct.[21] Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the Trial Judgement arising from the application of the wrong legal standard by the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber will articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly.[22] In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record, where necessary, and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the Defence before that finding is confirmed on appeal.[23] The Appeals Chamber will not review the entire trial record de novo; rather it "will in principle only take into account ... evidence referred to by the Trial Chamber in the body of the Judgement or in a

(a) Ability to Prevent

255. The Appeals Chamber observes that in establishing that Strugar had the material ability to prevent the unlawful shelling of the Old Town, the Trial Chamber did not merely rely on findings that he could give orders and participate in negotiations. Rather, the Trial Chamber held that as the commander of the 2 OG, Strugar had, and indeed exercised, the authority to give direct combat orders not only to the units under his immediate or first level command, but also to units under his command at a second or further lower level.[634] The Trial Chamber further held that Strugar exercised his authority to give direct combat orders, including his authority to order a unit to cease fire and his authority to prohibit attacks on particular targets.[635] What is more, the Trial Chamber held that he had the authority to order re-subordination of units within the structure of the 2 OG[636] and that the command of the 2 OG retained responsibility for maintaining discipline and for the promotion and removal of officers.[637] Finally, the Trial Chamber was convinced that Strugar's authority to represent the JNA in negotiations with the ECMM and the Crisis Staff of Dubrovnik further illustrated the nature and extent of his material ability to prevent an attack on Dubrovnik by the JNA forces deployed in the region.[638]

256. The Appeals Chamber recalls that whether a superior's orders are in fact followed can be indicative of a superior's effective control over his subordinates.[639] In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that in addition to finding that Strugar had the authority to issue orders, the Trial Chamber also established that Strugar's orders were actually followed.[640]

257. The Appeals Chamber notes however that in other parts of the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber found that Strugar had issued a number of orders prohibiting the shelling of Dubrovnik or the Old Town and that these orders had not been complied with by his subordinates in November 1991.[641] In addition, the Trial Chamber noted that it had "[heard evidence that in the period October to December 1991 there were problems with discipline in the units of the 2 OG, in particular, incidents of unauthorised opening of fire, refusal to carry out orders, looting, arson and drinking".[642] Although evidence of prior instances of indiscipline and of non-compliance with orders would be clearly relevant to an assessment of whether Strugar had effective control over his subordinates, this evidence was not explicitly considered by the Trial Chamber in its findings on Strugar's effective control over his subordinates. While Strugar does not raise this issue in his appeal, the Appeals Chamber deems it appropriate to consider it proprio motu.

258. After having carefully considered the Trial Chamber's findings and the evidence on which they rely, the Appeals Chamber finds that a reasonable trier of fact could have found that Strugar had the material ability to prevent the commission of crimes by his subordinates, notwithstanding the disciplinary issues in the 3/472 mtbr and the prior instances of non-compliance with his orders. Although the Trial Chamber did not make an explicit finding to this effect, it is apparent that the Trial Chamber considered this evidence as being related to Strugar's on-going failure to comply with his responsibilities as a military commander. The Trial Chamber thus held as follows:

> The extent of the Accused's existing knowledge of the October and November shelling of the Old Town, of the disciplinary problems of the 3/472 mtbr and of its apparent role, at least as revealed by Admiral Jokić's November investigation, in the November shelling of Dubrovnik, especially the Old Town, and of his failure to clarify the intention of his order to attack Srd in regard to the shelling of Dubrovnik or the Old Town are each very relevant. In combination they give rise, in the Chamber's finding to a strong need to make very expressly clear, by an immediate and direct order to those commanding and leading the attacking forces, especially the artillery, the special status of the Old Town and the existing prohibitions on shelling it, and of the limitations or prohibition, if any, on shelling the Old Town intended by the Accused on 6 December 1991.[643]

Given the Trial Chamber's other findings regarding Strugar's apparent sympathy with the military objectives of the attack against Srd[644] and his role in ordering this attack in October, November and December 1991,[645] as well as its findings regarding his ability to issue orders and take disciplinary measures,[646] the Appeals Chamber understands the Trial Judgement as having established that Strugar effectively chose not to act with respect to the non-compliance with his previous orders regarding the shelling of the Old Town. In particular, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber cited the following evidence of Jokić regarding the lack of disciplinary measures taken against the perpetrators of the shelling of the Old Town that his request for two officers to be replaced was left unresolved as "General Strugar did not have any competent officers to offer as replacements" and thus told him "that he would send an officer who was the commander of an armoured unit, but that he would only send this officer later".[647]

259. Having due regard to the nature of the orders which Strugar had the capacity to issue, the nature of the negotiations in which he had the authority to represent the JNA, the nature of his position as the commander of the 2 OG, and the fact that, where it was important to him, his orders

December 1991" compiled by the "Institute for Protection and Conservation of the Historical Monuments" of Dubrovnik (hereinafter "Institute Report").[979] The Institute Report purports to deal with damage between 1 October and 31 December 1991, which of course includes damage caused on 6 December 1991, and subject of the Indictment, but it is necessary to be able to separate damage of 6 December from all other damage. While the Institute Report itself purports to specify damage occurring on 6 December 1991 by the date of damage given for each object surveyed, this specification has been shown not to be always accurate.[980]

322. Although two witnesses, architects Lucjiana Peko and Slobodan Vuković, who personally carried out inspections of the damage sustained by the buildings and structures in the Old Town, vouched generally for the accuracy and reliability of the extracts from the Institute Report,[981] the Chamber notes that the entries in the Institute Report were recorded on the basis of hearsay evidence. In most of the cases, information was collected from unknown persons who are described merely as neighbours or tenants.[982] Whether those neighbours or tenants spoke from personal knowledge or hearsay knowledge is not known.

323. Moreover, the Chamber notes that these two witnesses had not had previous experience in inspecting war damage. Neither they, nor the members of their inspection teams, had expertise in ballistic or criminal investigation.[983] The cross-examination of Slobodan Vuković on the contents of his part of the Institute Report revealed many inaccuracies and material typographical errors.[984] Finally, the Chamber recalls that the Institute Report was originally conceived as, and still bears the title "preliminary report", i.e. the expectation of its authors was that a final report on damage would follow.[985] However, no final report has been presented in the case. Colin Kaiser, one of the UNESCO consultants tasked to assist in assessing the damage sustained from the October and [979] The Institute Report was marked for identification as Exhibit MFI/P51 but was never admitted into evidence in its entirety. However, the extracts from it were admitted as Exhibits P174, P212 and P52. See Prosecutor v Pavle Strugar, Case No. IT-01-42-T, Decision on the Admissibility of Certain Documents, 26 May 2004, pp 8-11.

[980] It has been effectively pointed out during the cross-examination of Colin Kaiser that the damage described as damage of 6 December 1991 also included other damage which may have been incurred earlier (T 2556-2574). Colin Kaiser states that although the intention was to catalogue damage from 6 December 1991, it appears that other damage has been recorded. He could not guarantee that all the damage from the earlier period is contained in the report (T 2580-2584); Lucijana Peko, although insisting that during inspections she was able to "distinguish between old damage and recent damage" (T 1910-1911), concedes that she was not asked to distinguish between damage sustained in October/November and December and that, although, she was asked to "register all the damage that was sustained on the 6th of December", the Institute Report includes the damage from all three months, T 1912.

[981] Lucijana Peko confirms the list of buildings (Exhibit P52) which she personally examined, T 1862; 1944; Slobodan Vuković confirms the accuracy of the extracts from the Report on buildings which he personally examined (Exhibit P174), T 5922.

further inquiry by the information, i.e. that it indicated the need for additional investigation in order to ascertain whether offences were being committed or were about to be committed.[1083]

370. The Appeals Chamber upheld this approach and held that a superior will be criminally responsible by virtue of the principles of superior responsibility only if information was available to him which would have put him on notice of offences committed by subordinates,[1084] or about to be committed. It was further observed that even general information in his possession, which would put him on notice of possible unlawful acts by his subordinates would be sufficient.[1085] A superior may be regarded as having "reason to know" if he is in possession of sufficient information to be on notice of the likelihood of illegal acts by his subordinates, i.e., if the information available is sufficient to justify further inquiry.[1086]

371. This Chamber will approach its decision on the basis on this jurisprudence.

(c) Necessary and reasonable measures

372. The question of whether a superior has failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of an offence or to punish the perpetrators is intrinsically connected to the question of that superior's position of power. As the Tribunal's definition of a "superior" requires the existence of effective control, whether de jure or de facto, a superior will be held responsible for failing to take such measures that are within his material possibility. Therefore the question whether a superior had explicit legal capacity to take such measures will be immaterial if he had the material ability to act.[1087]

373. Article 7(3) does not provide a superior with two alternative options, but contains two distinct legal obligations to prevent the commission of the offence and to punish the perpetrators.[1088] The duty to prevent arises for a superior from the moment he acquires knowledge or has reasonable grounds to suspect that a crime is being or is about to be committed, while the duty to punish arises after the commission of the crime.[1089] Therefore, if a superior has knowledge or has reason to know that a crime is being or is about to be committed, he has a duty to prevent the crime from happening and is not entitled to wait and punish afterwards.

acts such as those charged might be committed by his forces in the execution of his order to attack Srd.[1205] Relevantly, however, the issue posed by Article 7(3) of the Statute is whether the Accused then had reason to know that offences were about to be committed by his forces. The language at first glance, could suggest a definite expectation that an offence will be committed. As the jurisprudence has helped to demonstrate, the operation intended by the provision is, relevantly, that an accused must be shown to have "reason to know" by virtue of information he possesses. This information must be such as at least to put him on notice of the risk of such offences so as to indicate the need for additional information or investigation to ascertain whether such offences were about to be committed. In other words an accused cannot avoid the intended reach of the provision by doing nothing, on the basis that what he knows does not make it entirely certain that his forces were actually about to commit offences, when the information he possesses gives rise to a clear prospect that his forces were about to commit an offence. In such circumstances the accused must at least investigate, i.e. take steps inter alia to determine whether in truth offences are about to be committed, or indeed by that stage have been committed or are being committed.

417. In the Chamber's assessment of what was known to the Accused at or before the commencement of the attack on Srd, there has been shown to be a real and obvious prospect, a clear possibility, that in the heat and emotion of the attack on Srd, the artillery under his command might well get out of hand once again and commit offences of the type charged. It has not been established, however, that the Accused had reason to know that this would occur. This is not shown to be a case, for example, where the Accused had information that before the attack his forces planned or intended to shell the Old Town unlawfully, or the like. It is not apparent that additional investigation before the attack could have put the Accused in any better position. Hence, the factual circumstances known to the Accused at the time are such that the issue of "reason to know" calls for a finely balanced assessment by the Chamber. In the final analysis, and giving due weight to the standard of proof required, the Chamber is not persuaded that it has been established that the Accused had reasonable grounds to suspect, before the attack on Srd, that his forces were about to commit offences such as those charged. Rather, he knew only of a risk of them getting out of hand and offending in this way, a risk that was not slight or remote, but nevertheless, in the Chamber's assessment, is not shown to have been so strong as to give rise, in the circumstances, to knowledge that his forces were about to commit an offence, as that notion is understood in the jurisprudence. It has not been established, therefore, that, before the commencement of the attack on Srd, the Accused knew or had reason to know that during the attack his forces would shell the Old Town in a manner constituting an offence.

418. That being so, the Chamber will therefore consider whether, in the course of the attack on Srd on 6 December 1991, what was known to the Accused changed so as to attract the operation of Article 7(3). In the very early stages of the attack, well before the attacking JNA infantry had actually reached the Srd feature and the fort, at a time around 0700 hours as the Chamber has found, the Accused was informed by the Federal Secretary of National Defence General Kadijević of a protest by the ECMM against the shelling of Dubrovnik.[1206] For reasons given earlier, the order of the Accused to attack Srd necessarily involved knowledge by him that JNA artillery might need to act against Croatian defensive positions in Dubrovnik which were threatening the lives of the attacking soldiers and the success of the attack on Srd.[1207] His knowledge, in the Chamber's finding, was that only a limited number of such Croatian defensive positions could exist and that, as the attack progressed, these positions could be subjected to controlled and limited JNA shelling targeted on these positions, or on what were believed by his forces to be such positions.[1208] While a protest such as had been made to General Kadijević could perhaps have arisen from shelling targeted at such Croatian defensive positions, the description that Dubrovnik was being shelled, the extremely early stage in the attack of the protest (before sunrise),[1209] and the circumstance that the seriousness of the situation had been thought by the ECMM to warrant a protest in Belgrade at effectively the highest level, would have put the Accused on notice, in the Chamber's finding, at the least that shelling of Dubrovnik beyond what he had anticipated at that stage by virtue of his order to attack Srd, was then occurring. This knowledge was of a nature, in the Chamber's view, that, when taken together with his earlier knowledge, he was on notice of the clear and strong risk that already his artillery was repeating its previous conduct and committing offences such as those charged. In the Chamber's assessment the risk that this was occurring was so real, and the implications were so serious, that the events concerning General Kadijević ought to have sounded alarm bells to the Accused, such that at the least he saw the urgent need for reliable additional information, i.e. for investigation, to better assess the situation to determine whether the JNA artillery were in fact shelling Dubrovnik, especially the Old Town, and doing so without justification, i.e. so as to constitute criminal conduct.

419. As the Chamber has found earlier in this decision, already by about 0700 hours, there had been shelling of Dubrovnik by the Accused's forces,[1210] and, at least in respect of the Old Town, shelling that was not targeted at Croatian defensive positions or believed positions.[1211] Unlawful

Counsel for the Appellant:

Mr. John Livingston

41. In contrast to the view put forward by the Defence, the Prosecution denies that the Decision on Admissibility of Additional Evidence supports the position that the Appellant did not receive a fair trial. It notes that the majority of the proposed additional evidence was found by the Appeals Chamber to have been available to the Defence at trial. Furthermore, with respect to that portion of the proposed additional evidence which was found not to have been available at trial, it notes that the Appeals Chamber, after careful consideration, found that the interests of justice did not require it to be admitted on appeal. Thus, in the Prosecution's view, rather than showing a denial of fair trial, this decision is consistent with the view that the rights of the Appellant in this respect were not violated by any lack of cooperation on the part of the authorities of the Republika Srpska.[69]

42. The Prosecution further emphasises that Defence counsel failed to make a motion for dismissal of the case on the basis that a fair trial was impossible because of lack of cooperation of the authorities of the Republika Srpska. It notes that, by not doing so, the Defence failed to give the Trial Chamber the opportunity to take additional measures to overcome the difficulties faced by the Defence. It is submitted that this omission by the Defence further provides an indication that it did not believe that the Appellant's right to a fair trial had been violated.[70]

B. Discussion

1. Applicability of Articles 20(1) and 21(4)(b) of the Statute

43. Article 20(1) of the Statute provides that "[t]he Trial Chambers shall ensure that a trial is fair and expeditious [...]". This provision mirrors the corresponding guarantee provided for in international and regional human rights instruments: the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (1966) ("ICCPR"),[71] the European Convention on

[71] Article 14(1) of the ICCPR provides in part: "All persons shall be equal before the courts and tribunals. In the determination of any criminal charge against him, or of his rights and obligations in a suit at law, everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law. [...]."

Human Rights (1950),[72] and the American Convention on Human Rights (1969).[73] The right to a fair trial is central to the rule of law: it upholds the due process of law. The Defence submits that due process includes not only formal or procedural due process but also substantive due process.[74]

44. The parties do not dispute that the right to a fair trial guaranteed by the Statute covers the principle of equality of arms. This interpretation accords with findings of the Human Rights Committee ("HRC") under the ICCPR. The HRC stated in Morael v. France[75] that a fair hearing under Article 14(1) of the ICCPR must at a minimum include, inter alia, equality of arms. Similarly, in Robinson v. Jamaica[76] and Wolf v. Panama[77] the HRC found that there was inequality of arms in violation of the right to a fair trial under Article 14(1) of the ICCPR. Likewise, the case law under the ECHR cited by the Defence accepts that the principle is implicit in the fundamental right of the accused to a fair trial. The principle of equality of arms between the prosecutor and accused in a criminal trial goes to the heart of the fair trial guarantee. The Appeals Chamber finds that there is no reason to distinguish the notion of fair trial under Article 20(1) of the Statute from its equivalent in the ECHR and ICCPR, as interpreted by the relevant judicial and supervisory treaty bodies under those instruments. Consequently, the Chamber holds that the principle of equality of arms falls within the fair trial guarantee under the Statute.

45. What has to be decided in the present appeal is the scope of application of the principle. The Defence alleges that it should include not only procedural equality, but also substantive equality.[78] In its view, matters outside the control of the Trial Chamber can prejudice equality of arms if their effect is to disadvantage one party disproportionately. The Prosecution rejoins that equality of arms refers to the equality of the parties before the Trial Chamber. It argues that the obligation on the Trial Chamber is to ensure that the

[72] Article 6(1) of the ECHR provides in part: "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations or of any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law."

[73] Article 8(1) of the American Convention on Human Rights provides in part:
"Every person has the right to a hearing, with due guarantees and within a reasonable time, by a competent, independent, and impartial tribunal, previously established by law, in the substantiation of any accusation of a criminal nature made against him or for the determination of his rights and obligations of a civil, labour, fiscal or any other nature."

parties before it are accorded the same procedural rights and operate under the same procedural conditions in court. According to the Prosecution, the lack of cooperation by the authorities in the Republika Srpska could not imperil the equality of arms enjoyed by the Defence at trial because the Trial Chamber had no control over the actions or the lack thereof of those authorities.

46. The Defence contends that the minimum guarantee in Article 21(4)(b) of the Statute to adequate time and facilities for the preparation of defence at trial forms part of the principle of equality of arms, implicit in Article 20(1). It argues that, since the authorities in the Republika Srpska failed to cooperate with the Defence, the Appellant did not have adequate facilities for the preparation of his defence, thereby prejudicing his enjoyment of equality of arms.

47. The Appeals Chamber accepts the argument of the Defence that, on this point, the relationship between Article 20(1) and Article 21(4)(b) is of the general to the particular. It also agrees that, as a minimum, a fair trial must entitle the accused to adequate time and facilities for his defence.

48. In deciding on the scope of application of the principle of equality of arms, account must be taken first of the international case law. In Kaufman v. Belgium,[79] a civil case, the Eur. Commission H. R. found that equality of arms means that each party must have a reasonable opportunity to defend its interests "under conditions which do not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent".[80] In Dombo Beheer B.V. v. The Netherlands,[81] another civil proceeding, the Eur. Court H. R. adopted the view expressed by the Eur. Commission H. R. on equality of arms, holding that "as regards litigation involving opposing private interests, 'equality of arms' implies that each party must be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his case – including his evidence – under conditions that do not place him at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his opponent".[82] The Court decided in a criminal proceeding, Delcourt v. Belgium,[83] that the principle entitled both parties to full equality of treatment, maintaining that the conditions of trial must not "put the accused Jaski}i could have been the "unauthorized and unforeseen act of one of the force that entered Sivci".

2. The Individual Criminal Responsibility of the Appellant for the Killings

(a) Article 7(1) of the Statute and the Notion of Common Purpose

185. The question therefore arises whether under international criminal law the Appellant can be held criminally responsible for the killing of the five men from Jaski}i even though there is no evidence that he personally killed any of them. The two central issues are:

(i) whether the acts of one person can give rise to the criminal culpability of another where both participate in the execution of a common criminal plan; and

(ii) what degree of mens rea is required in such a case.

186. The basic assumption must be that in international law as much as in national systems, the foundation of criminal responsibility is the principle of personal culpability: nobody may be held criminally responsible for acts or transactions in which he has not personally engaged or in some other way participated (nulla poena sine culpa). In national legal systems this principle is laid down in Constitutions,[228] in laws,[229] or in judicial decisions.[230] In international criminal law the principle is laid down, inter alia, in Article 7(1) of the Statute of the International Tribunal which states that:

> A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in Articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime. (emphasis added)

This provision is aptly explained by the Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of the International Tribunal, which states the following:

[228] An example is provided by Article 27 para. 1 of the Italian Constitution ("La responsibilità penale è personale." ("Criminal responsibility is personal.") (unofficial translation)).

[229] See for instance Article 121-1 of the French Code pénal ("Nul n'est responsable pénalement que de son propre fait"), para. 4 of the Austrian Strafgesetzbuch ("Strafbar ist nur, wer schuldhaft handelt" ("Only he who is culpable may be punished") (unofficial translation)).

[230] This rather basic proposition is usually tacitly assumed rather than explicitly acknowledged. For an example of where it was expressly stated, however, see, for Great Britain, R. v. Dalloway (1847) 3 Cox CC 273. See also the various decisions of the German Constitutional Court, e.g., BverfGE 6, 389 (439) and 50, 125 (133), as well as decisions of the German Federal Court of Justice (e.g., BGHSt 2, 194 (200)).

> An important element in relation to the competence ratione personae (personal jurisdiction) of the International Tribunal is the principle of individual criminal responsibility. As noted above, the Security Council has reaffirmed in a number of resolutions that persons committing serious violations of international humanitarian law in the former Yugoslavia are individually responsible for such violations.[231]

Article 7(1) also sets out the parameters of personal criminal responsibility under the Statute. Any act falling under one of the five categories contained in the provision may entail the criminal responsibility of the perpetrator or whoever has participated in the crime in one of the ways specified in the same provision of the Statute.

187. Bearing in mind the preceding general propositions, it must be ascertained whether criminal responsibility for participating in a common criminal purpose falls within the ambit of Article 7(1) of the Statute.

188. This provision covers first and foremost the physical perpetration of a crime by the offender himself, or the culpable omission of an act that was mandated by a rule of criminal law. However, the commission of one of the crimes envisaged in Articles 2, 3, 4 or 5 of the Statute might also occur through participation in the realisation of a common design or purpose.

189. An interpretation of the Statute based on its object and purpose leads to the conclusion that the Statute intends to extend the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal to all those "responsible for serious violations of international humanitarian law" committed in the former Yugoslavia (Article 1). As is apparent from the wording of both Article 7(1) and the provisions setting forth the crimes over which the International Tribunal has jurisdiction (Articles 2 to 5), such responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law is not limited merely to those who actually carry out the actus reus of the enumerated crimes but appears to extend also to other offenders (see in particular Article 2, which refers to committing or ordering to be committed grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions and Article 4 which sets forth various types of offences in relation to genocide, including conspiracy, incitement, attempt and complicity).

[231] Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), U.N. Doc. S/25704, 3 May 1993 ("Report of the Secretary-General"), para. 53 (emphasis added).

those who in some way made it possible for the perpetrator physically to carry out that criminal act. At the same time, depending upon the circumstances, to hold the latter liable only as aiders and abettors might understate the degree of their criminal responsibility.

193. This interpretation, based on the Statute and the inherent characteristics of many crimes perpetrated in wartime, warrants the conclusion that international criminal responsibility embraces actions perpetrated by a collectivity of persons in furtherance of a common criminal design. It may also be noted that – as will be mentioned below – international criminal rules on common purpose are substantially rooted in, and to a large extent reflect, the position taken by many States of the world in their national legal systems.

194. However, the Tribunal's Statute does not specify (either expressly or by implication) the objective and subjective elements (actus reus and mens rea) of this category of collective criminality. To identify these elements one must turn to customary international law. Customary rules on this matter are discernible on the basis of various elements: chiefly case law and a few instances of international legislation.

195. Many post-World War II cases concerning war crimes proceed upon the principle that when two or more persons act together to further a common criminal purpose, offences perpetrated by any of them may entail the criminal liability of all the members of the group. Close scrutiny of the relevant case law shows that broadly speaking, the notion of common purpose encompasses three distinct categories of collective criminality.

196. The first such category is represented by cases where all co-defendants, acting pursuant to a common design, possess the same criminal intention; for instance, the formulation of a plan among the co-perpetrators to kill, where, in effecting this common design (and even if each co-perpetrator carries out a different role within it), they nevertheless all possess the intent to kill. The objective and subjective prerequisites for imputing criminal responsibility to a participant who did not, or cannot be proven to have, effected the killing are as follows: (i) the accused must voluntarily participate in one aspect of the common design (for instance, by inflicting non-fatal violence upon the victim, or by providing material assistance to or facilitating the activities of his co-perpetrators); and (ii) the accused, even if not personally effecting the killing, must nevertheless intend this result.

197. With regard to this category, reference can be made to the Georg Otto Sandrock et al. case (also known as the Almelo Trial).[233] There a British court found that three Germans who had killed a British prisoner of war were guilty under the doctrine of "common enterprise". It was clear that they all had had the intention of killing the British soldier, although each of them played a different role. They therefore were all co-perpetrators of the crime of murder.[234] Similarly, in the Hoelzer et al. case, brought before a Canadian military court, in his summing up the Judge Advocate spoke of a "common enterprise" with regard to the murder of a Canadian prisoner of war by three Germans, and emphasised that the three all knew that the purpose of taking the Canadian to a particular area was to kill him.[235]

198. Another instance of co-perpetratorship of this nature is provided by the case of Jepsen and others.[236] A British court had to pronounce upon the responsibility of Jepsen (one of several accused) for the deaths of concentration camp internees who, in the few weeks leading up to the capitulation of Germany in 1945, were in transit to another concentration camp. In this regard, the Prosecutor submitted (and this was not rebutted by the Judge Advocate) that:

> [I]f Jepsen was joining in this voluntary slaughter of eighty or so people, helping the others by doing his share of killing, the whole eighty odd deaths can be laid at his door and at the door of any single man who was in any way assisting in that act.[237]

[233] Trial of Otto Sandrock and three others, British Military Court for the Trial of War Criminals, held at the Court House, Almelo, Holland, on 24th-26th November, 1945, UNWCC, vol. I, p. 35).

[234] The accused were German non-commissioned officers who had executed a British prisoner of war and a Dutch civilian in the house of whom the British airman was hiding. On the occasion of each execution one of the Germans had fired the lethal shot, another had given the order and a third had remained by the car used to go to a wood on the outskirts of the Dutch town of Almelo, to prevent people from coming near while the shooting took place. The Prosecutor stated that "the analogy which seemed to him most fitting in this case was that of a gangster crime, every member of the gang being equally responsible with the man who fired the actual shot" (ibid., p. 37). In his summing up the Judge Advocate pointed out that:

> "There is no dispute, as I understand it, that all three [Germans] knew what they were doing and had gone there for the very purpose of having this officer killed; and, as you know, if people are all present together at the same time taking part in a common enterprise which is unlawful, each one in their (sic) own way assisting the common purpose of all, they are all equally guilty in point of law" (see official transcript, Public Record Office, London, WO 235/8, p. 70; copy on file with the International Tribunal's Library; the report in the UNWCC, vol. I, p. 40 is slightly different).

All the accused were found guilty, but those who had ordered the shooting or carried out the shooting were sentenced to death, whereas the others were sentenced to fifteen years imprisonment (ibid., p. 41).

[235] Hoelzer et al., Canadian Military Court, Aurich, Germany, Record of Proceedings 25 March-6 April 1946, vol. I, pp. 341, 347, 349 (RCAF Binder 181.009 (D2474); copy on file with the International Tribunal's Library).

[236] Trial of Gustav Alfred Jepsen and others, Proceedings of a War Crimes Trial held at Luneberg, Germany (13-23 August, 1946), judgement of 24 August 1946 (original transcripts in Public Record Office, Kew, Richmond; on file with the International Tribunal's Library).

[237] Ibid., p. 241.

In a similar vein, the Judge Advocate noted in Schonfeld that:

> if several persons combine for an unlawful purpose or for a lawful purpose to be effected by unlawful means, and one of them in carrying out that purpose, kills a man, it is murder in all who are present [...] provided that the death was caused by a member of the party in the course of his endeavours to effect the common object of the assembly.[238]

199. It can be noted that some cases appear broadly to link the notion of common purpose to that of causation. In this regard, the Ponzano case,[239] which concerned the killing of four British prisoners of war in violation of the rules of warfare, can be mentioned. Here, the Judge Advocate adopted the approach suggested by the Prosecutor,[240] and stressed:

> [...] the requirement that an accused, before he can be found guilty, must have been concerned in the offence. [T]o be concerned in the commission of a criminal offence [...] does not only mean that you are the person who in fact inflicted the fatal injury and directly caused death, be it by shooting or by any other violent means; it also means an indirect degree of participation [...]. [I]n other words, he must be the cog in the wheel of events leading up to the result which in fact occurred. He can further that object not only by giving orders for a criminal offence to be committed, but he can further that object by a variety of other means [...].[241]

Further on, the Judge Advocate submitted that while the defendant's involvement in the criminal acts must form a link in the chain of causation, it was not necessary that his participation be a sine qua non, or that the offence would not have occurred but for his participation.[242] Consonant with the twin requirements of criminal responsibility under this category, however, the Judge Advocate stressed the necessity of knowledge on the part of the accused as to the intended purpose of the criminal enterprise.[243]

[240] The Prosecutor had stated the following:

"It is an opening principle of English law, and indeed of all law, that a man is responsible for his acts and is taken to intend the natural and normal consequences of his acts and if these men [...] set the machinery in motion by which the four men were shot, then they are guilty of the crime of killing these men. It does not – it never has been essential for any one of these men to have taken those soldiers out themselves and to have personally executed them or personally dispatched them. That is not at all necessary; all that is necessary to make them responsible is that they set the machinery in motion which ended in the volleys that killed the four men we are concerned with" (ibid., p. 4).

[241] Ibid., summing up of the Judge Advocate, p. 7.

[242] In this regard, the Judge Advocate noted that: "[o]f course, it is quite possible that it [the criminal offence] might have taken place in the absence of all these accused here, but that does not mean the same thing as saying [...] that [the accused] could not be a chain in the link of causation [...]" (ibid., pp. 7-8).

[243] In particular, it was held that in order to be "concerned in the commission of a criminal offence," it was necessary to prove:

200. A final case worthy of mention with regard to this first category is the Einsatzgruppen case.[244] With regard to common design, a United States Tribunal sitting at Nuremberg noted that:

> the elementary principle must be borne in mind that neither under Control Council Law No. 10 nor under any known system of criminal law is guilt for murder confined to the man who pulls the trigger or buries the corpse. In line with recognized principles common to all civilized legal systems, paragraph 2 of Article II of Control Council Law No. 10 specifies a number of types of connection with crime which are sufficient to establish guilt. Thus, not only are principals guilty but also accessories, those who take a consenting part in the commission of crime or are connected with plans or enterprises involved in its commission, those who order or abet crime, and those who belong to an organization or group engaged in the commission of crime. These provisions embody no harsh or novel principles of criminal responsibility [...].[245]

"that when he did take part in it he knew the intended purpose of it. If any accused were to have given an order for this execution, believing that it was a perfectly legal execution, that these four soldiers had been sentenced to death by a properly constituted court and that therefore an order for the execution was no more than an order to carry out the decision of the court, then that accused would not be guilty because he would not have any guilty knowledge. But where [...] a person was in fact concerned, and [...] he knew the intended purpose of these acts, then that accused is guilty of the offence in the charge" (ibid., p. 8).

The requisite knowledge of each participant, even if deducible only by implication, was also stressed in the Stalag Luft III case, Trial of Max Ernst Friedrich Gustav Wielen and Others, Proceedings of the Military Court at Hamburg, (1-3 July 1947) (original transcripts in Public Record Office, Kew, Richmond; on file with the International Tribunal's Library), which concerned the killing of fifty officers of the allied air force who had escaped from the Stalag Luft III camp in Silesia. The Prosecutor in his opening remarks stressed that:

"everybody, particularly every policeman of whatever sort it may be, knew quite well that there had been a mass escape of prisoners of war on the 25th March 1944 [...] [such] that every policeman knew that prisoners of war were at large. I think that is important to remember, and particularly with regard to some of the minor members of the Gestapo who are charged before you that is important to remember because they may say they did not know who these people were. They may say they did not know they were escaped prisoners of war but [in fact] they all knew [...]" (ibid., p. 276).

Furthermore, in two cases concerning an accused's participation in the Kristallnacht riots, the Supreme Court for the British zone stressed that it was not required that the accused knew about the rioting in the entire Reich. It was sufficient that he was aware of the local action, that he approved it, and that he wanted it "as his own" (unofficial translation). The fact that the accused participated consciously in the arbitrary measures directed against the Jews was sufficient to hold him responsible for a crime against humanity (Case no. 66, Strafsenat. Urteil vom 8 Februar 1949 gegen S. StS 120/48, p. 284-290, 286, vol. II). See also Case no. 17, vol. I, 94-98, 96, where the Supreme Court held that it was irrelevant that the scale of ill-treatment, deportation and destruction that happened in other parts of the country on that night were not undertaken in this village. It sufficed that the accused participated intentionally in the action and that he was "not unaware of the fact that the local action was a measure designed to instil terror which formed a part of the nation-wide persecution of the Jews" (unofficial translation).

[245] The tribunal went on to say:

"Even though these men [Radetsky, Ruehl, Schubert and Graf] were not in command, they cannot escape the fact that they were members of Einsatz units whose express mission, well known to all the members, was to carry out a large scale program of murder. Any member who assisted in enabling these units to function, knowing what was afoot, is guilty of the crimes committed by the unit. The cook in the galley of a pirate ship does not escape the yardarm merely because he himself does not

201. It should be noted that in many post-World War II trials held in other countries, courts took the same approach to instances of crimes in which two or more persons participated with a different degree of involvement. However, they did not rely upon the notion of common purpose or common design, preferring to refer instead to the notion of co-perpetration. This applies in particular to Italian[246] and German[247] cases.

202. The second distinct category of cases is in many respects similar to that set forth above, and embraces the so-called "concentration camp" cases. The notion of common purpose was applied to instances where the offences charged were alleged to have been committed by members of military or administrative units such as those running concentration camps; i.e., by groups of persons acting pursuant to a concerted plan. Cases illustrative of this category are Dachau Concentration Camp,[248] decided by a United States court sitting in Germany and Belsen,[249] decided by a British military court sitting in Germany. In these cases the accused held some position of authority within the hierarchy of brandish a cutlass. The man who stands at the door of a bank and scans the environs may appear to be the most peaceable of citizens, but if his purpose is to warn his robber confederates inside the bank of the approach of the police, his guilt is clear enough. And if we assume, for the purposes of argument, that the defendants such as Schubert and Graf have succeeded in establishing that their role was an auxiliary one, they are still in no better position than the cook or the robbers' watchman" (ibid., p. 373; emphasis added).

In this connection, the tribunal also addressed the contention that certain of the commanders did not participate directly in the crimes committed, noting that:

"[w]ith respect to the defendants such as Jost and Naumann, [...] it is [...] highly probable that these defendants did not, at least very often, participate personally in executions. And it would indeed be strange had they ?who were persons in authorityg done so. [...] Far from being a defense or even a circumstance in mitigation, the fact that ?these defendantsg did not personally shoot a great many people, but rather devoted themselves to directing the over-all operations of the Einsatzgruppen, only serves to establish their deeper responsibility for the crimes of the men under their command" (ibid.).

the concentration camps. Generally speaking, the charges against them were that they had acted in pursuance of a common design to kill or mistreat prisoners and hence to commit war crimes.[250] In his summing up in the Belsen case, the Judge Advocate adopted the three requirements identified by the Prosecution as necessary to establish guilt in each case: (i) the existence of an organised system to ill-treat the detainees and commit the various crimes alleged; (ii) the accused's awareness of the nature of the system; and (iii) the fact that the accused in some way actively participated in enforcing the system, i.e., encouraged, aided and abetted or in any case participated in the realisation of the common criminal design.[251] The convictions of several of the accused appear to have been explicitly based upon these criteria.[252]

203. This category of cases (which obviously is not applicable to the facts of the present case) is really a variant of the first category, considered above. The accused, when they were found guilty, were regarded as co-perpetrators of the crimes of ill-treatment, because of their objective "position of authority" within the concentration camp system and because they had "the power to look after the inmates and make their life satisfactory"[253] but failed to do so.[254] It would seem that in these cases the required actus reus was the active

"It seems, therefore, that what runs throughout the whole of this case, like a thread, is this: that there was in the camp a general system of cruelties and murders of the inmates (most of whom were allied nationals) and that this system was practised with the knowledge of the accused, who were members of the staff, and with their active participation. Such a course of conduct, then, was held by the court in this case to constitute 'acting in pursuance of a common design to violate the laws and usages of war'. Everybody who took any part in such common design was held guilty of a war crime, though the nature and extent of the participation may vary".

[251] The Judge Advocate summarised with approval the legal argument of the Prosecutor in the following terms:
"The case for the Prosecution is that all the accused employed on the staff at Auschwitz knew that a system and a course of conduct was in force, and that, in one way or another in furtherance of a common agreement to run the camp in a brutal way, all those people were taking part in that course of conduct. They asked the Court not to treat the individual acts which might be proved merely as offences committed by themselves, but also as evidence clearly indicating that the particular offender was acting willingly as a party in the furtherance of this system. They suggested that if the Court were satisfied that they were doing so, then they must, each and every one of them, assume responsibility for what happened." (Belsen case, UNWCC, vol. II, p. 121.)

[252] In particular, the accused Kramer appears to have been convicted on this basis. (See ibid., p. 121: "The Judge Advocate reminded the Court that when they considered the question of guilt and responsibility, the strongest case must surely be against Kramer, and then down the list of accused according to the positions they held." (emphasis added).

[254] In a similar vein, the Case against R. Mulka et al. ("Auschwitz concentration camp case") can be mentioned. Although the court reached the same result, it nevertheless did not apply the doctrine of common design but instead tended to treat the defendants as aiders and abettors as long as they remained within the framework provided by their orders and as principal offenders if they acted outside this framework. This meant that if it could not be proved that the accused actually identified himself with the aims of the Nazi participation in the enforcement of a system of repression, as it could be inferred from the position of authority and the specific functions held by each accused. The mens rea element comprised: (i) knowledge of the nature of the system and (ii) the intent to further the common concerted design to ill-treat inmates. It is important to note that, in these cases, the requisite intent could also be inferred from the position of authority held by the camp personnel. Indeed, it was scarcely necessary to prove intent where the individual's high rank or authority would have, in and of itself, indicated an awareness of the common design and an intent to participate therein. All those convicted were found guilty of the war crime of ill-treatment, although of course the penalty varied according to the degree of participation of each accused in the commission of the war crime.

204. The third category concerns cases involving a common design to pursue one course of conduct where one of the perpetrators commits an act which, while outside the common design, was nevertheless a natural and foreseeable consequence of the effecting of that common purpose. An example of this would be a common, shared intention on the part of a group to forcibly remove members of one ethnicity from their town, village or region (to effect "ethnic cleansing") with the consequence that, in the course of doing so, one or more of the victims is shot and killed. While murder may not have been explicitly acknowledged to be part of the common design, it was nevertheless foreseeable that the forcible removal of civilians at gunpoint might well result in the deaths of one or more of those civilians. Criminal responsibility may be imputed to all participants within the common enterprise where the risk of death occurring was both a predictable consequence of the execution of the common design and the accused was either reckless or indifferent to that risk. Another example is that of a common plan to forcibly evict civilians belonging to a particular ethnic group by burning their houses; if some of the participants in the plan, in carrying out this regime, then the court would treat him as an aider and abettor because he lacked the specific intent to "want the offence as his own" (see in particular the Bundesgerichtshof in Justiz und NS-Verbrechen, vol. XXI, pp. 838 ff., and especially pp. 881 ff). The BGH stated, p. 882:

> "[The view] that everybody who had been involved in the destruction program of the [KZ] Auschwitz and acted in any manner whatsoever in connection with this program participated in the murders and is responsible for all that happened is not correct. It would mean that even acts which did not further the main offence in any concrete manner would be punishable. In consequence even the physician who was in charge of taking care of the guard personnel and who restricted himself to doing only that, would be guilty of aiding and abetting murder. The same would even apply to the doctor who treated prisoners in the camp and saved their lives. Not even those who in their place put little obstacles in the plan, kill civilians by setting their houses on fire, all the other participants in the plan are criminally responsible for the killing if these deaths were predictable.

205. The case-law in this category has concerned first of all cases of mob violence, that is, situations of disorder where multiple offenders act out a common purpose, where each of them commit offences against the victim, but where it is unknown or impossible to ascertain exactly which acts were carried out by which perpetrator, or when the causal link between each act and the eventual harm caused to the victims is similarly indeterminate. Cases illustrative of this category are Essen Lynching and Borkum Island.

206. As is set forth in more detail below, the requirements which are established by these authorities are two-fold: that of a criminal intention to participate in a common criminal design and the foreseeability that criminal acts other than those envisaged in the common criminal design are likely to be committed by other participants in the common design.

207. The Essen Lynching (also called Essen West) case was brought before a British military court, although, as was stated by the court, it "was not a trial under English law".[255] Given the importance of this case, it is worth reviewing it at some length. Three British prisoners of war had been lynched by a mob of Germans in the town of Essen-West on 13 December 1944. Seven persons (two servicemen and five civilians) were charged with committing a war crime in that they were concerned in the killing of the three prisoners of war. They included a German captain, Heyer, who had placed the three British airmen under the escort of a German soldier who was to take the prisoners to a Luftwaffe unit for interrogation. While the escort with the prisoners was leaving, the captain had ordered that the escort should not interfere if German civilians should molest the prisoners, adding that they ought to be shot, or would be shot. This order had been given to the escort from the steps of the barracks in a loud voice so that the crowd, which had gathered, could hear and would know exactly what was going to take place. According to the summary given by the United Nations War Crimes Commission: way of this program of murder, albeit in a subordinate position and without success, would escape punishment. That cannot be right." (unofficial translation).

[255] Trial of Erich Heyer and six others, British Military Court for the Trial of War Criminals, Essen, 18th-19th and 21st-22nd December, 1945, UNWCC, vol. I, p. 88, at p. 91.

> [w]hen the prisoners of war were marched through one of the main streets of Essen, the crowd around grew bigger, started hitting them and throwing sticks and stones at them. An unknown German corporal actually fired a revolver at one of the airmen and wounded him in the head. When they reached the bridge, the airmen were eventually thrown over the parapet of the bridge; one of the airmen was killed by the fall; the others were not dead when they landed, but were killed by shots from the bridge and by members of the crowd who beat and kicked them to death.[256]

208. The Defence laid stress on the need to prove that each of the accused had the intent to kill. The Prosecution took a contrary view. Major Tayleur, the Prosecutor, stated the following:

> My friend [the Defence Counsel] has spoken to you about the intent which is necessary and he says that no evidence of intent to kill has been brought before you. In my submission there has been considerable evidence of intent to kill; but even if there were not, in my submission to prove this charge you do not have to prove an intent to kill. If you prove an intent to kill you would prove murder; but you can have an unlawful killing, which would be manslaughter, where there is not an intent to kill but merely the doing of an unlawful act of violence. A person might slap another's face with no intent to kill at all but if through some misfortune, for example that person having a weak skull, that person died, in my submission the person striking the blow would be guilty of manslaughter and that would be such killing as would come within the words of this charge. In my submission therefore what you have to be satisfied of – and the onus of proof is of course on the prosecution – is that each and everyone of the accused, before you can convict him, was concerned in the killing of these three unidentified airmen in circumstances which the British law would have amounted to either murder or manslaughter.[257]

The Prosecutor then went on to add:

> the allegation of the prosecution is that every person who, following the incitement to the crowd to murder these men, voluntarily took aggressive action against any one of these three airmen is guilty in that he is concerned in the killing. It is impossible to separate any one of these from another; they all make up what is known as lynching. In my submission from the moment they left those barracks those men were doomed and the crowd knew they were doomed and every person in that crowd who struck a blow is both morally and criminally responsible for the deaths of those three men.[258]

Since Heyer was convicted, it may be assumed that the court accepted the Prosecution arguments as to the criminal liability of Heyer (no Judge Advocate had been appointed in this case). As for the soldier escorting the airmen, he had a duty not only to prevent the prisoners from escaping but also of seeing that they were not molested; he was sentenced to imprisonment for five years (even though the Prosecutor had suggested that he was not criminally liable). According to the Report of the United Nations War Crimes Commission, three civilians "were found guilty [of murder] because every one of them had in one form or another taken part in the ill-treatment which eventually led to the death of the victims, though against none of the accused had it been exactly proved that they had individually shot nor given the blows which caused the death".[259]

209. It would seem warranted to infer from the arguments of the parties and the verdict that the court upheld the notion that all the accused who were found guilty took part, in various degrees, in the killing; not all of them intended to kill but all intended to participate in the unlawful ill-treatment of the prisoners of war. Nevertheless they were all found guilty of murder, because they were all "concerned in the killing". The inference seems therefore justified that the court assumed that the convicted persons who simply struck a blow or implicitly incited the murder could have foreseen that others would kill the prisoners; hence they too were found guilty of murder.[260]

210. A similar position was taken by a United States military court in Kurt Goebell et al. (also called the Borkum Island case). On 4 August 1944, a United States Flying Fortress was forced down on the German island of Borkum. Its seven crew members were taken prisoner and then forced to march, under military guard, through the streets of Borkum. They were first made to pass between members of the Reich's Labour Corps, who beat them with shovels, upon the order of a German officer of the Reichsarbeitsdienst. They were then struck by civilians on the street. Later on, while passing through another street, the mayor of Borkum shouted at them inciting the mob to kill them "like dogs". They were [259] UNWCC, vol. 1, p. 91. In addition to Heyer and the escort (Koenen), three civilians were also convicted. The first of the accused civilians, Boddenberg, admitted to have struck one of the airmen on the bridge, after one of them had already been thrown over the bridge, knowing "that the motives of the crowd against them [the airmen] were deadly, and yet he joined in" (Transcript in Public Record Office, London, WO 235/58, p. 67; copy on file with International Tribunal's Library); the second, Kaufer, was found to have "beaten the airmen" and taken "an active part" in the mob violence against them. Additionally, it was alleged that he tried to pull the rifle away from a subordinate officer to shoot the airmen below the bridge and that he called out words to the effect that the airmen deserved to be shot (ibid., pp. 67-68). The third, Braschoss, was seen hitting one of the airmen on the bridge, descending beneath the bridge to throw the airman, who was still alive, into the stream. He and an accomplice were further alleged to have thrown another of the airmen from the bridge (ibid., p. 68). Two of the accused civilians, Sambol and Hartung, were acquitted; the former because the blows he was alleged to have inflicted were neither particularly severe nor proximate to the airmen's death (comprising one of the earliest to be inflicted) and the latter because it was not proved beyond reasonable doubt that he actually took part in the affray (ibid., pp. 66-67, UNWCC, vol. I, p. 91).

[260] The charge, in a strict legal sense, was the commission of a war crime in violation of the laws and usages of war for being "concerned in the killing" of the airmen rather than murder as this was "not a trial under English law" (ibid., at p. 91). For all intents and purposes, however, the charge appeared to be treated as a murder charge, as it appeared to have been accepted in the course of the proceedings that "as long as everyone realised then beaten by civilians while the escorting guards, far from protecting them, fostered the assault and took part in the beating. When the airmen reached the city hall one was shot and killed by a German soldier, followed by the others a few minutes later, all shot by German soldiers. The accused included a few senior officers, some privates, the mayor of Borkum, some policemen, a civilian and the leader of the Reich Labour Corps. All were charged with war crimes, in particular both with "wilfully, deliberately and wrongfully encourag[ing], aid[ing], abett[ing] and participat[ing] in the killing" of the airmen and with "wilfully, deliberately and wrongfully encourag[ing], aid[ing], abett[ing] and participat[ing] in assaults upon" the airmen.[261] In his opening statement the Prosecutor developed the doctrine of common design. He stated the following:

> [I]t is important, as I see it, to determine the guilt of each of these accused in the light of the particular role that each one played. They did not all participate in exactly the same manner. Members of mobs seldom do. One will undertake one special or particular action and another will perform another particular action. It is the composite of the actions of all that results in the commission of the crime. Now, all legal authorities agree that where a common design of a mob exists and the mob has carried out its purpose, then no distinction can be drawn between the finger man and the trigger man (sic). No distinction is drawn between the one who, by his acts, caused the victims to be subjected to the pleasure of the mob or the one who incited the mob, or the ones who dealt the fatal blows. This rule of law and common sense must, of necessity, be so. Otherwise, many of the true instigators of crime would never be punished.
> Who can tell which particular act was the most responsible for the final shooting of these flyers? Can it not be truly said that any one of the acts of any one of these accused may have been the very act that produced the ultimate result? Although the ultimate act might have been something in which the former actor did not directly participate [, e]very time a member of a mob takes any action that is inclined to encourage, that is inclined to give heart to someone else who is present, to participate, then that person has lent his aid to the accomplishment of the final result.[262]

In short, noted the Prosecutor, the accused were "cogs in the wheel of common design, all equally important, each cog doing the part assigned to it. And the wheel of wholesale murder could not turn without all the cogs".[263] As a consequence, according to the Prosecutor, if it were proved beyond a reasonable doubt "that each one of these accused what was meant by the word 'murder' for the purposes of this trial, [there ...] was ?nog difficulty" (ibid., pp. 91-92).

played his part in mob violence which led to the unlawful killing of the seven American flyers, [...] under the law each and every one of the accused [was] guilty of murder".[264]

211. It bears emphasising that by taking the approach just summarised, the Prosecutor substantially propounded a doctrine of common purpose which presupposes that all the participants in the common purpose shared the same criminal intent, namely, to commit murder. In other words, the Prosecutor adhered to the doctrine of common purpose mentioned above with regard to the first category of cases. It is interesting to note that the various defence counsel denied the applicability of this common design doctrine, not, however, on principle, but merely on the facts of the case. For instance, some denied the existence of a criminal intent to participate in the common design, claiming that mere presence was not sufficient for the determination of the intent to take part in the killings.[265] Other defence counsel claimed that there was no evidence that there was a conspiracy among the German officers,[266] or they argued that, if there had been such a plot, it did not involve the killing of the airmen.[267]

212. In this case too, no Judge Advocate stated the law. However, it may be fairly assumed that in the event, the court upheld the common design doctrine, but in a different form, for it found some defendants guilty of both the killing and assault charges[268] while others were only found guilty of assault.[269]

213. It may be inferred from this case that all the accused found guilty were held responsible for pursuing a criminal common design, the intent being to assault the prisoners of war. However, some of them were also found guilty of murder, even where there was no evidence that they had actually killed the prisoners. Presumably, this was on the basis that the accused, whether by virtue of their status, role or conduct, were in a position to have predicted that the assault would lead to the killing of the victims by some of those participating in the assault.

[269] The accused Pointner, Witzke, Geyer, Albrecht, Weber, Rommel, Mammenga and Heinemann were found guilty only of assault and received terms of imprisonment ranging between 2 and 25 years (ibid.).

214. Mention must now be made of some cases brought before Italian courts after World War II concerning war crimes committed either by civilians or by military personnel belonging to the armed forces of the so-called "Repubblica Sociale Italiana" ("RSI"), a de facto government under German control established by the Fascist leadership in central and northern Italy, following the declaration of war by Italy against Germany on 13 October 1943. After the war several persons were brought to trial for crimes committed between 1943 and 1945 against prisoners of war, Italian partisans or members of the Italian army fighting against the Germans and the RSI. Some of these trials concerned the question of criminal culpability for acts perpetrated by groups of persons where only one member of the group had actually committed the crime.

215. In D'Ottavio et al., on appeal from the Assize Court of Teramo, the Court of Cassation on 12 March 1947 pronounced upon one of these cases. Some armed civilians had given unlawful pursuit to two prisoners of war who had escaped from a concentration camp, in order to capture them. One member of the group had shot at the prisoners without intending to kill them, but one had been wounded and had subsequently died as a result. The trial court held that all the other members of the group were accountable not only for "illegal restraint" (sequestro di persona) but also for manslaughter (omicidio preterintenzionale). The Court of Cassation upheld this finding. It held that for this type of criminal liability to arise, it was necessary that there exist not only a material but also a psychological "causal nexus" between the result all the members of the group intended to bring about and the different actions carried out by an individual member of that group. The court went on to point out that:

> [i]ndeed the responsibility of the participant (concorrente) [...] is not founded on the notion of objective responsibility [...], but on the fundamental principle of the concurrence of interdependent causes [...]; by virtue of this principle all the participants are accountable for the crime both where they directly cause it and where they indirectly cause it, in keeping with the well-known canon causa causae est causa causati.[270]

[270] See handwritten text of the (unpublished) judgement, p. 6 (unofficial translation; kindly provided by the Italian Public Record Office, Rome; on file with the International Tribunal's Library). See also Giustizia penale, 1948, Part II, col. 66, no. 71 (containing a headnote on the judgement).

The court then noted that in the case at issue:

> [t]here existed a nexus of material causality, as all the participants had directly cooperated in the crime of attempted "illegal restraint" [...] by surrounding and pursuing two prisoners of war on the run, armed with a gun and a rifle, with a view to illegally capturing them. This crime was the indirect cause of a subsequent and different event, namely the shooting (by d'Ottavio alone) at one of the fugitives, resulting in wounding followed by death. Furthermore, there existed psychological causality, as all the participants had the intent to perpetrate and knowledge of the actual perpetration of an attempted illegal restraint, and foresaw the possible commission of a different crime. This foresight (previsione) necessarily followed from the use of weapons: it being predictable (dovendo prevedersi) that one of the participants might shoot at the fugitives to attain the common purpose (lo scopo comune) of capturing them.[271]

216. In another case (Aratano et al.) the Court of Cassation dealt with the following circumstances: a group of RSI militiamen had planned to arrest some partisans, without intending to kill them; however, to frighten the partisans, one of the militiamen fired a few shots into the air. As a result the partisans shot back; a shoot-out ensued and in the event one of the partisans was killed by a member of the RSI militia. The court held that the trial court had erred in convicting all members of the militia of murder. In its view, as the trial court had found that the militiamen had not intended to kill the partisans:

> [I]t was clear that [the murder of one of the partisans] was an unintended event (evento non voluto) and consequently could not be attributed to all the participants: the crime committed was more serious than that intended and it proves necessary to resort to categories other than that of voluntary homicide. This Supreme Court has already had the opportunity to state the same principle, where it noted that in order to find a person responsible for a homicide perpetrated in the course of a mopping-up operation carried out by many persons, it was necessary to establish that, in participating in this operation, a voluntary activity also concerning homicide had been brought into being (fosse stata spiegata un'attività volontaria in relazione anche all'omicidio) (judgement of 27 August 1947 in re: Beraschi).[272]

217. Other cases relate to the applicability of the amnesty law passed by the Presidential Decree of 22 June 1946 no. 4. The amnesty applied among other things to crimes of "collaboration with the occupying Germans" but excluded offences involving murder. In Tossani the question was whether the law on amnesty covered a person who had taken part in a mopping-up operation against civilians in the course of which a German soldier had killed a partisan. The Court of Cassation found that the amnesty should apply. It emphasised that the appellant participating in the operation had not taken any active part in it and did not carry weapons; in addition, the killing was found to have been "an exceptional and unforeseen (imprevisto) event", for during a search a civilian had escaped to avoid being detained and had been shot at by the German soldier.[273] A similar position was taken by the same court in Ferrida. The appellant had participated, "only in his capacity as a nurse," in a mopping-up operation in the course of which some partisans had been killed. The court found that he was not guilty of murder; the law on amnesty was therefore applicable to him.[274] In Bonati et al. the appellant argued that the crime of murder, not envisaged by the group of persons concerned, had been perpetrated by another member of that group. The Court of Cassation rejected the appeal, holding that the appellant was also guilty of murder. Although this crime was more grave than that intended by some of the participants (concorrenti), it "was in any case a consequence, albeit indirect, of his participation".[275]

218. In these cases courts indisputably applied the notion that a person may be held criminally responsible for a crime committed by another member of a group and not envisaged in the criminal plan. Admittedly, in some of the cases the mens rea required for a member of the group to be held responsible for such an action was not clearly spelled out. However, in light of other judgements handed down in the same period on the same matter, although not relating to war crimes, it may nevertheless be assumed that courts required that the event must have been predictable. In this connection it suffices to mention the judgement of the Court of Cassation of 20 July 1949 in Mannelli, where the court explained the required causal nexus as follows:

> The relationship of material causality by virtue of which the law makes some of the participants liable for the crime other than that envisaged, must be correctly understood from the viewpoint of logic and law and be strictly differentiated from an incidental relationship (rapporto di occasionalita'). Indeed, the cause, whether immediate or mediate, direct or indirect, simultaneous or successive, can never be confused with mere coincidence. For there to be a relationship of material causality between the crime willed by one of the participants and the different crime committed by another, it is necessary that the latter crime should constitute the logical and predictable development of the former (il logico e prevedibile sviluppo del primo). Instead, where there exists full independence between the two crimes, one may find, depending upon the specific circumstances, a merely incidental relationship (un rapporto di mera occasionalita'), but not a causal relationship. In the light of these criteria, he who requests somebody else to wound or kill cannot answer for a robbery perpetrated by the other person, for this crime does not constitute the logical development of > the intended offence, but a new fact, having its own causal autonomy, and linked to the conduct willed by the instigator (mandante) by a merely incidental relationship (emphasis added).[276]

219. The same notion was enunciated by the same Court of Cassation in many other cases.[277] That this was the basic notion upheld by the court seems to be borne out by the fact that the one instance where the same court adopted a different approach is somewhat conspicuous.[278] Accordingly, it would seem that, with regard to the mens rea element required for the criminal responsibility of a person for acts committed within a common purpose but not envisaged in the criminal design, that court either applied the notion of an attenuated form of intent (dolus eventualis) or required a high degree of carelessness (culpa).

220. In sum, the Appeals Chamber holds the view that the notion of common design as a form of accomplice liability is firmly established in customary international law and in addition is upheld, albeit implicitly, in the Statute of the International Tribunal. As for the objective and subjective elements of the crime, the case law shows that the notion has been applied to three distinct categories of cases. First, in cases of co-perpetration, where all participants in the common design possess the same criminal intent to commit a crime (and one or more of them actually perpetrate the crime, with intent). Secondly, in the so-called "concentration camp" cases, where the requisite mens rea comprises knowledge of the nature of the system of ill-treatment and intent to further the common design of ill-treatment. Such intent may be proved either directly or as a matter of inference from the nature of the accused's authority within the camp or organisational hierarchy. With regard to the third category of cases, it is appropriate to apply the notion of "common purpose" only where the following requirements concerning mens rea are fulfilled: (i) the intention to take part in a joint criminal enterprise and to further – individually and jointly – the criminal purposes of that enterprise; and (ii) the foreseeability of the possible commission by other members of the group of offences that do not constitute the object of the common criminal purpose. Hence, the participants must have had in mind the intent, for instance, to ill-treat prisoners of war (even if such a plan arose extemporaneously) and one or some members of the group must have actually killed them. In order for responsibility for the deaths to be imputable to the others, however, everyone in the group must have been able to predict this result. It should be noted that more than negligence is required. What is required is a state of mind in which a person, although he did not intend to bring about a certain result, was aware that the actions of the group were most likely to lead to that result but nevertheless willingly took that risk. In other words, the so-called dolus eventualis is required (also called "advertent recklessness" in some national legal systems).

[277] See e.g. Court of Cassation, 15 March 1948, Peveri case, in Archivio penale, 1948, pp. 431-432; Court of Cassation, 20 July 1949, Mannelli case, in Giustizia penale, 1949, Part II, col. 906, no.599; Court of Cassation, 27 October 1949, P.M. v. Minafò, in Giustizia penale, 1950, Part II, col. 252, no. 202; 24 February 1950, Montagnino, ibid., col.821; 19 April 1950, Solesio et al., ibid., col. 822. By contrast, in a judgement of 23 October 1946 the same Court of Cassation, in Minapò et al., held that it was immaterial that the participant in a crime had or had not foreseen the criminal conduct carried out by another member of the criminal group (Giustizia penale, 1947, Part II, col. 483, no. 382).

[278] In the Antonini case (judgement of the Court of Cassation of 29 March 1949), the trial court had found the accused guilty not only of illegally arresting some civilians but also of their subsequent shooting by the Germans, as a "reprisal" for an attack on German troops in Via Rasella, in Rome. According to the trial court the accused, in arresting the civilians, had not intended to bring about their killing, but knew that he thus brought into being a situation likely to lead to their killing. The Court of Cassation reversed this finding,

221. In addition to the aforementioned case law, the notion of common plan has been upheld in at least two international treaties. The first of these is the International Convention for the Suppression of Terrorist Bombing, adopted by consensus by the United Nations General Assembly through resolution 52/164 of 15 December 1997 and opened for signature on 9 January 1998. Pursuant to Article 2(3)(c) of the Convention, offences envisaged in the Convention may be committed by any person who:

> [i]n any other way [other than participating as an accomplice, or organising or directing others to commit an offence] contributes to the commission of one or more offences as set forth in paragraphs 1 or 2 of the present article by a group of persons acting with a common purpose; such contribution shall be intentional and either be made with the aim of furthering the general criminal activity or purpose of the group or be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the offence or offences concerned.

The negotiating process does not shed any light on the reasons behind the adoption of this text.[279] This Convention would seem to be significant because it upholds the notion of a holding that for the accused to be found guilty, it was necessary that he had not only foreseen but also willed the killing (see text of the judgement in Giustizia penale, 1949, Part II, cols. 740-742).

[279] The Report of the Sixth Committee (25 November 1997, A/52/653) and the Official Records of the General Assembly session in which this Convention was adopted made scant reference to Article 2 and did not elaborate upon the doctrine of common purpose (see UNGAOR, 72nd plenary meeting, 52nd sess., Mon. 15 December 1997, U.N. Doc. A/52/PV.72). The Japanese delegate during the 33rd meeting of the Sixth Committee nevertheless noted that "some terms used ?in the Conventiong such as [...] 'such contribution' (Article 2, para. 3(c)) were ambiguous" (33rd Meeting of the Sixth Committee, 2 December 1997, UNGAOR A/C.6/52/SR.33, p. 8, para. 77). He concluded that his Government would therefore "interpret 'such contribution' [...] to mean abetment, assistance or other similar acts as defined by Japanese legislation" (ibid).

"common criminal purpose" as distinct from that of aiding and abetting (couched in the terms of "participating as an accomplice [in] an offence"). Although the Convention is not yet in force, one should not underestimate the fact that it was adopted by consensus by all the members of the General Assembly. It may therefore be taken to constitute significant evidence of the legal views of a large number of States.

222. A substantially similar notion was subsequently laid down in Article 25 of the Statute of the International Criminal Court, adopted by a Diplomatic Conference in Rome on 17 July 1998 ("Rome Statute").[280] At paragraph 3(d), this provision upholds the doctrine under discussion as follows:

> (d) In any other way [other than aiding and abetting or otherwise assisting in the commission or attempted commission of a crime] contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:
>
> i. Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or > ii. Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime.

223. The legal weight to be currently attributed to the provisions of the Rome Statute has been correctly set out by Trial Chamber II in Furund`ija.[281] There the Trial Chamber pointed out that the Statute is still a non-binding international treaty, for it has not yet entered into force. Nevertheless, it already possesses significant legal value. The Statute was adopted by an overwhelming majority of the States attending the Rome Diplomatic Conference and was substantially endorsed by the Sixth Committee of the United Nations General Assembly. This shows that that text is supported by a great number of States and may be taken to express the legal position i.e. opinio iuris of those States. This is consistent with the view that the mode of accomplice liability under discussion is well-established in international law and is distinct from aiding and abetting.[282]

224. As pointed out above, the doctrine of acting in pursuance of a common purpose is rooted in the national law of many States. Some countries act upon the principle that where multiple persons participate in a common purpose or common design, all are responsible for the ensuing criminal conduct, whatever their degree or form of participation, provided all had the intent to perpetrate the crime envisaged in the common purpose. If one of the participants commits a crime not envisaged in the common purpose or common design, he alone will incur criminal responsibility for such a crime. These countries include Germany[283] and the Netherlands.[284] Other countries also uphold the principle whereby if persons take part in a common plan or common design to commit a crime, all of them are criminally responsible for the crime, whatever the role played by each of them. However, in these countries, if one of the persons taking part in a common criminal plan or enterprise perpetrates another offence that was outside the common plan but nevertheless foreseeable, those persons are all fully liable for that offence. These countries include civil law systems, such as that of France[285] and Italy.[286]

[282] Even should it be argued that the objective and subjective elements of the crime, laid down in Article 25 (3) of the Rome Statute differ to some extent from those required by the case law cited above, the consequences of this departure may only be appreciable in the long run, once the Court is established. This is due to the inapplicability to Article 25(3) of Article 10 of the Statute, which provides that "?nothing in this Part shall be interpreted as limiting or prejudicing in any way existing or developing rules of international law for purposes other than this Statute". This provision does not embrace Article 25, as this Article appears in Part 2 of the Statute, whereas Article 25 is included in Part 3.

[283] See Para. 25(2) of the Strafgesetzbuch: "Begehen mehrere die Straftat gemeinschaftlich, so wird jeder als Täter bestraft (Mittäter)". ("If several persons commit a crime as co-perpetrators, each is liable to punishment as a principal perpetrator." (unofficial translation)). The German case law has clearly established the principle whereby if an offence is perpetrated that had not been envisaged in the common criminal plan, only the author of this offence is criminally responsible for it. See BGH GA 85, 270. According to the German Federal Court (in BGH GA 85, 270):

> "Mittäterschaft ist anzunehmen, wenn und soweit das Zusammenwirken der mehreren Beteiligten auf gegenseitigem Einverständnis beruht, während jede rechtsverletzende Handlung eines Mittäters, die über dieses Einverständnis hinausgeht, nur diesem allein zuzurechnen ist". ("There is co-perpetration (Mittäterschaft) when and to the extent that the joint action of the several participants is founded on a reciprocal agreement (Einverständnis), whereas any criminal action of a participant (Mittäter) going beyond this agreement can only be attributed to that participant." (unofficial translation)).

[284] In the Netherlands, the term designated for this form of criminal liability is "medeplegen". (See HR 6 December 1943, NJ 1944, 245; HR 17 May 1943, NJ 1943, 576; and HR 6 April 1925, NJ 1925, 723, W 11393).

[285] See Article 121-7 of the Code pénal, which reads:

> "Est complice d'un crime ou d'un délit la personne qui sciemment, par aide ou assistance, en a facilité la préparation ou la consommation. Est également complice la personne qui par don, promesse, menace, ordre, abus d'autorité ou de pouvoir aura provoqué à une infraction ou donné des instructions pour la commettre". ("Any person who knowingly has assisted in planning or committing a crime or

225. It should be emphasised that reference to national legislation and case law only serves to show that the notion of common purpose upheld in international criminal law has an underpinning in many national systems. By contrast, in the area under discussion, national legislation and case law cannot be relied upon as a source of international principles or rules, under the doctrine of the general principles of law recognised by the nations of the world: for this reliance to be permissible, it would be necessary to show that most, if not all, countries adopt the same notion of common purpose. More specifically, it would be necessary to show that, in any case, the major legal systems of the world take the same approach to this notion. The above brief survey shows that this is not the case. Nor can reference to national law have, in this case, the scope and purport adumbrated in general terms by the United Nations Secretary-General in his Report, where it is pointed out that "suggestions have been made that the international tribunal should apply domestic law in so far as it incorporates customary international humanitarian law".[292] In the area under discussion, domestic law does not originate from the implementation of international law but, rather, to a large extent runs parallel to, and precedes, international regulation.

226. The Appeals Chamber considers that the consistency and cogency of the case law and the treaties referred to above, as well as their consonance with the general principles on criminal responsibility laid down both in the Statute and general international criminal law [289] E.g., in Maine (17 Maine Criminal Code § 57 (1997), Minnesota (Minnesota Statutes § 609.05 (1998)), Iowa (Iowa Code § 703.2 (1997)), Kansas (Kansas Statutes § 21-3205 (19997)), Wisconsin (Wisconsin Statutes § 939.05 (West 1995)). Although there is no clearly defined doctrine of common purpose under the United States' Federal common law, similar principles are promulgated by the Pinkerton doctrine. This doctrine imposes criminal liability for acts committed in furtherance of a common criminal purpose, whether the acts are explicitly planned or not, provided that such acts might have been reasonably contemplated as a probable consequence or likely result of the common criminal purpose (see Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640, 66 S. Ct. 1180, 90 L. Ed. 1489 (1946); State v. Walton, 227 Conn. 32; 630 A.2d 990 (1993); State of Connecticut v. Diaz, 237 Conn. 518, 679 A. 2d 902 (1996)).

[290] Under Australian law, when two parties embark on a joint criminal enterprise, a party will be liable for an act which he contemplates may be carried out by the other party in the course of the enterprise, even if he has not explicitly or tacitly agreed to the commission of that act (McAuliffe v. R. (1995) 183 CLR 108 at 114). The test for determining whether a crime falls within the scope of the relevant joint enterprise is the subjective test of contemplation: "in accordance with the emphasis which the law now places upon the actual state of mind of an accused person, the test has become a subjective one, and the scope of the common purpose is to be determined by what was contemplated by the parties sharing that purpose" (ibid.).

[291] Article 22 of the Penal Code states:

"When two or more persons form a common intention to prosecute an unlawful purpose in conjunction with one another, and in the prosecution of such purpose an offence is committed of such a nature that its commission was a probable consequence of the prosecution of such purpose, each of them is deemed to have committed the offence."

circumstances of the case, (i) it was foreseeable that such a crime might be perpetrated by one or other members of the group and (ii) the accused willingly took that risk.

229. In light of the preceding propositions it is now appropriate to distinguish between acting in pursuance of a common purpose or design to commit a crime, and aiding and abetting.

(i) The aider and abettor is always an accessory to a crime perpetrated by another person, the principal.

(ii) In the case of aiding and abetting no proof is required of the existence of a common concerted plan, let alone of the pre-existence of such a plan. No plan or agreement is required: indeed, the principal may not even know about the accomplice's contribution.

(iii) The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime (murder, extermination, rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.), and this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. By contrast, in the case of acting in pursuance of a common purpose or design, it is sufficient for the participant to perform acts that in some way are directed to the furthering of the common plan or purpose.

(iv) In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of a specific crime by the principal. By contrast, in the case of common purpose or design more is required (i.e., either intent to perpetrate the crime or intent to pursue the common criminal design plus foresight that those crimes outside the criminal common purpose were likely to be committed), as stated above.

2. The Defence Case

244. In contrast to the Prosecution's Cross-Appeal, the Defence argues that the Trial Chamber's ruling that a crime against humanity cannot be committed for purely personal reasons is correct. Although it concedes that Article 5 of the Statute does not expressly stipulate that crimes against humanity cannot be committed for purely personal reasons, in its submission, the Trial Chamber nevertheless interpreted Article 5 correctly when it found that crimes against humanity cannot be committed for purely personal motives.[307]

245. The Defence contests the interpretation given to the applicable case law by the Prosecution, arguing that in all the cases cited, the defendants were linked to the system of extermination which formed the underlying predicate of crimes against humanity, and therefore did not commit their crimes for purely personal motives.[308] In other words, the activities of the defendants were linked to the general activities comprising the pogroms against the Jews and thus the Defence submits that the acts of the defendants were not acts committed for purely personal reasons.

246. The Defence also contests the Prosecution's submissions regarding the object and purpose of the Statute of the International Tribunal, arguing, to the contrary, that policy suggests that it would be unjust if a perpetrator of a criminal act guided solely by personal motives was instead to be prosecuted for a crime against humanity.[309]

B. Discussion

247. Neither Party asserts that the Trial Chamber's finding that crimes against humanity cannot be committed for purely personal motives had a bearing on the verdict in terms of Article 25(1) of the Tribunal Statute.[310] Nevertheless this is a matter of general significance for the Tribunal's jurisprudence. It is therefore appropriate for the Appeals Chamber to set forth its views on this matter.

[307] Appellant's Amended Brief on Judgement, para. 4.9; T. 227 (20 April 1999).
[308] Appellant's Amended Brief on Judgement, para. 4.12; T. 229 (20 April 1999).
[309] Appellant's Amended Brief on Judgement, paras. 4.17 – 4.18.

quintessentially genocidal frame of mind, the accused would have to be acquitted of crimes against humanity because he acted for "purely personal" reasons. Similarly, if the same man said that he participated in the genocide only for the "purely personal" reason that he feared losing his job, he would also be entitled to an acquittal. Thus, individuals at both ends of the spectrum would be acquitted. In the final analysis, any accused that played a role in mass murder purely out of self-interest would be acquitted. This shows the meaninglessness of any analysis requiring proof of "non-personal" motives. The Appeals Chamber does not believe, however, that the Trial Chamber meant to reach such a conclusion. Rather, the requirement that the accused's acts be part of a context of large-scale crimes, and that the accused knew of this context, was misstated by the Trial Chamber as a negative requirement that the accused not be acting for personal reasons. The Trial Chamber did not, the Appeals Chamber believes, wish to import a "motive" requirement; it simply duplicated the context and mens rea requirement, and confused it with the need for a link with an armed conflict, and thereby seemed to have unjustifiably and inadvertently added a new requirement.

270. The conclusion is therefore warranted that the relevant case-law and the spirit of international rules concerning crimes against humanity make it clear that under customary law, "purely personal motives" do not acquire any relevance for establishing whether or not a crime against humanity has been perpetrated.

C. Conclusion

271. The Trial Chamber correctly recognised that crimes which are unrelated to widespread or systematic attacks on a civilian population should not be prosecuted as crimes against humanity. Crimes against humanity are crimes of a special nature to which a greater degree of moral turpitude attaches than to an ordinary crime. Thus to convict an accused of crimes against humanity, it must be proved that the crimes were related to the attack on a civilian population (occurring during an armed conflict) and that the accused knew that his crimes were so related.

272. For the above reasons, however, the Appeals Chamber does not consider it necessary to further require, as a substantive element of mens rea, a nexus between the specific acts allegedly committed by the accused and the armed conflict, or to require proof

132. Attention should also be drawn to national legislation designed to implement the Geneva Conventions, some of which go so far as to make it possible for national courts to try persons responsible for violations of rules concerning internal armed conflicts. This holds true for the Criminal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, of 1990, as amended for the purpose of making the 1949 Geneva Conventions applicable at the national criminal level. Article 142 (on war crimes against the civilian population) and Article 143 (on war crimes against the wounded and the sick) expressly apply "at the time of war, armed conflict or occupation"; this would seem to imply that they also apply to internal armed conflicts. (Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Federal Criminal Code, arts. 142-43 (1990).) (It should be noted that by a decree having force of law, of 11 April 1992, the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina has adopted that Criminal Code, subject to some amendments.) (2 Official Gazette of the Republic of Bosnia and Herzegovina 98 (11 April 1992)(translation).) Furthermore, on 26 December 1978 a law was passed by the Yugoslav Parliament to implement the two Additional Protocols of 1977 (Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, Law of Ratification of the Geneva Protocols, Medunarodni Ugovori, at 1083 (26 December 1978).) as a result, by virtue of Article 210 of the Yugoslav Constitution, those two Protocols are "directly applicable" by the courts of Yugoslavia. (Constitution of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, art. 210.) Without any ambiguity, a Belgian law enacted on 16 June 1993 for the implementation of the 1949 Geneva Conventions and the two Additional Protocols provides that Belgian courts have jurisdiction to adjudicate breaches of Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions relating to victims of non-international armed conflicts. Article 1 of this law provides that a series of "grave breaches" (infractions graves) of the four Geneva Conventions and the two Additional Protocols, listed in the same Article 1, "constitute international law crimes" ([c]onstituent des crimes de droit international) within the jurisdiction of Belgian criminal courts (Article 7). (Loi du 16 juin 1993 relative à la répression des infractions graves aux Conventions internationales de Genève du 12 août 1949 et aux Protocoles I et II du 8 juin 1977, additionnels à ces Conventions, Moniteur Belge, (5 August 1993).)

133. Of great relevance to the formation of opinio juris to the effect that violations of general international humanitarian law governing internal armed conflicts entail the criminal responsibility of those committing or ordering those violations are certain resolutions unanimously adopted by the Security Council. Thus, for instance, in two resolutions on Somalia, where a civil strife was under way, the Security Council unanimously condemned breaches of humanitarian law and stated that the authors of such breaches or those who had ordered their commission would be held "individually responsible" for them. (See S.C. Res. 794 (3 December 1992); S.C. Res. 814 (26 March 1993).)

134. All of these factors confirm that customary international law imposes criminal liability for serious violations of common Article 3, as supplemented by other general principles and rules on the protection of victims of internal armed conflict, and for breaching certain fundamental principles and rules regarding means and methods of combat in civil strife.

135. It should be added that, in so far as it applies to offences committed in the former Yugoslavia, the notion that serious violations of international humanitarian law governing internal armed conflicts entail with the consequence that, in the course of doing so, one or more of the victims is shot and killed. While murder may not have been explicitly acknowledged to be part of the common purpose, it was nevertheless foreseeable that the forcible removal of civilians at gunpoint might well result in the deaths of one or more of those civilians.

100. The actus reus of the participant in a joint criminal enterprise is common to each of the three above categories and comprises the following three elements: First, a plurality of persons is required. They need not be organised in a military, political or administrative structure.[174] Second, the existence of a common purpose which amounts to or involves the commission of a crime provided for in the Statute is required. There is no necessity for this purpose to have been previously arranged or formulated. It may materialise extemporaneously and be inferred from the facts.[175] Third, the participation of the accused in the common purpose is required, which involves the perpetration of one of the crimes provided for in the Statute. This participation need not involve commission of a specific crime under one of the provisions (for example murder, extermination, torture or rape), but may take the form of assistance in, or contribution to, the execution of the common purpose.[176]

101. However, the mens rea differs according to the category of joint criminal enterprise under consideration:

- With regard to the basic form of joint criminal enterprise what is required is the intent to perpetrate a certain crime (this being the shared intent on the part of all co-perpetrators).[177]

- With regard to the systemic form of joint criminal enterprise (which, as noted above, is a variant of the first), personal knowledge of the system of ill-treatment is required (whether proved by express testimony or a matter of reasonable inference from the accused's position of authority), as well as the intent to further this system of ill-treatment.[178]

- With regard to the extended form of joint criminal enterprise, what is required is the intention to participate in and further the common criminal purpose of a group and to contribute to the joint criminal enterprise or in any event to the commission of a crime by the group. In addition, responsibility for a

Since the Trial Chamber's findings showed that the system in place at the KP Dom sought to subject non-Serb detainees to inhumane living conditions and ill-treatment on discriminatory grounds, the Trial Chamber should have examined whether or not Krnojelac knew of the system and agreed to it, without it being necessary to establish that he had entered into an agreement with the guards and soldiers - the principal perpetrators of the crimes committed under the system - to commit those crimes."

crime other than the one which was part of the common design arises "only if, under the circumstances of the case, (i) it was foreseeable that such a crime might be perpetrated by one or other members of the group and (ii) the accused willingly took that risk"[179] – that is, being aware that such crime was a possible consequence of the execution of that enterprise, and with that awareness, the accused decided to participate in that enterprise.

2. Differences between participating in a joint criminal enterprise as a co-perpetrator or as an aider and abettor

102. Participation in a joint criminal enterprise is a form of "commission" under Article 7(1) of the Statute. The participant therein is liable as a co-perpetrator of the crime(s). Aiding and abetting the commission of a crime is usually considered to incur a lesser degree of individual criminal responsibility than committing a crime. In the context of a crime committed by several co-perpetrators in a joint criminal enterprise, the aider and abettor is always an accessory to these co-perpetrators, although the co-perpetrators may not even know of the aider and abettor's contribution. Differences exist in relation to the actus reus as well as to the mens rea requirements between both forms of individual criminal responsibility:

(i) The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime (murder, extermination, rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.), and this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. By contrast, it is sufficient for a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to perform acts that in some way are directed to the furtherance of the common design.

(ii) In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal. By contrast, in the case of participation in a joint criminal enterprise, i.e. as a co-perpetrator, the requisite mens rea is intent to pursue a common purpose.

B. Alleged errors of law

1. Alleged errors of law related to the concept of joint criminal enterprise

103. Before turning to the alleged errors of law of the Trial Chamber concerning the concept of joint criminal enterprise and persecution, the Appeals Chamber will first determine under which category of joint criminal enterprise the Drina River incident falls.

[178] Ibid, paras 202, 220 and 228.
[179] Ibid, para. 228. See also paras 204 and 220.

stopped in Sase that the seven Muslim men were to be killed; vi) the behaviour of the soldiers changed drastically from the moment Milan Lukić ordered them to leave the car;[219] vii) that throughout the entire incident the impression of the two survivors was that no one around Milan Lukić could have influenced him or his decisions;[220] and viii) that the Appellant willingly accompanied Milan Lukić and his group with the seven Muslim men to the Drina River.[221]

131. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the question before it is whether no reasonable tribunal could find that the only reasonable inference available on the evidence cited above was that the Appellant shared the intent to commit murder. The Appeals Chamber considers that when a Chamber is confronted with the task of determining whether it can infer from the acts of an accused that he or she shared the intent to commit a crime, special attention must be paid to whether these acts are ambiguous, allowing for several reasonable inferences. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that no reasonable tribunal could have found that the only reasonable inference available on the evidence, as cited above, is that the Appellant had the intent to kill the seven Muslim men. The Trial Chamber found that the Appellant assisted Milan Lukić and his men by preventing the seven Muslim men from fleeing.[222] It did not find, however, that the Appellant shot at the Muslim men himself, nor that he exercised control over the firing. Compared to the involvement of Milan Lukić and potentially one or both of the other men, the participation of the Appellant in the overall course of the killings did not reach the same level. The above-mentioned acts of the Appellant were ambiguous as to whether or not the Appellant intended that the seven Muslim men be killed. This conclusion is further supported by the relatively short period of time between the change of attitude of Milan Lukić and the shooting, the strong personality of Milan Lukić compared to the Appellant, as well as the factors mentioned in paragraph 130. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, concludes that the Trial Chamber erred by finding that the only reasonable inference from the evidence was that the Appellant shared the intent to kill the seven Muslim men.

132. The error made by the Trial Chamber led to a miscarriage of justice since, without the proof the Appellant's intent, the Appellant would not be responsible as a co-perpetrator in the joint criminal enterprise. The Appeals Chamber will now consider whether the Appellant is, nevertheless, responsible as an aider and abettor.

[222] Cf. for a comparable situation in a national jurisdiction Prosecutor v. Novislav Djajić, 3St 20/96, Supreme Court of Bavaria, 23 May 1997. In this case, the accused was found guilty of, inter alia, aiding and abetting 14 murders by standing with a gun in the middle of a semi-circle that Serbs had formed around a group of Muslims who were then shot.

3. Aiding and abetting

133. The Appeals Chamber has found above that the Trial Chamber erred by finding that the only reasonable inference from the evidence was that the Appellant shared the intent to kill the seven Muslim men. The Appellant argues under his fourth ground of appeal that his actions do not in fact amount to aiding and abetting, as he did not facilitate the commission of the crime. He submits that Milan Lukić and the two unidentified men did not need any help from the Appellant at the Vilina Vlas Hotel or at the Drina River,[223] since they had managed to detain the seven Muslim men on the hill of Bikavac by themselves, despite the fact that the seven Muslim men could have resisted.[224] The Appellant infers from this that it would not be logical to conclude that Milan Lukić and his men needed the assistance of the Appellant at the Vilina Vlas Hotel or at the Drina River as the risk that the seven Muslim men might resist was less important at this stage.[225]

134. The Appeals Chamber has already found that the Appellant knew that the seven Muslim men were to be killed; that he walked armed with the group from the place where they had parked the cars to the Drina River; that he pointed his gun at the seven Muslim men; and that he stood behind the Muslim men with his gun together with the other three offenders shortly before the shooting started. The Appeals Chamber believes that the only reasonable inference available on the totality of evidence is that the Appellant knew that his acts would assist the commission of the murders. The Appeals Chamber finds that in preventing the men from escaping on the way to the river bank and during the shooting, the Appellant's actions had a "substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime."[226]

135. The Appeals Chamber finds that the acts of the Appellant were specifically directed to assist the perpetration of the murders and the inhumane acts and his support had a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crimes. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds the Appellant guilty for aiding and abetting murder pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute (Count 5). Further, the Appeals Chamber finds the Appellant guilty as an aider and abettor for murder as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) of the Statute (Count 4) and inhumane acts as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(i) of the Statute (Count 6). However, the Appellant is not convicted of the murder as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) of the Statute (Count 4) and inhumane acts as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(i) of the Statute (Count 6) in accordance with the Tribunal's jurisprudence on cumulative convictions.[227] finds that the Appellant has not shown a discernable error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion. This sub-ground of appeal is dismissed.

B. The Appeals Chamber's considerations

181. The Trial Chamber imposed a prison sentence of twenty years on the Appellant. The Appeals Chamber has not found in favour of any of the Appellant's alleged errors in relation to the sentence. However, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that the sentence needs to be adjusted due to the Appeals Chamber's finding that the Appellant was responsible as an aider and abettor with respect to murder as a violation of the laws or customs of war under Article 3 of the Statute (Count 5) and persecution by way of murder and inhumane acts as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute (Count 3), instead of being responsible as a co-perpetrator as was found by the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber considers that it has the mandate to revise the sentence by itself without remitting it to the Trial Chamber.[290]

182. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that aiding and abetting is a form of responsibility which generally warrants a lower sentence than is appropriate to responsibility as a co-perpetrator.[291] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the sentence to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of an accused. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Appellant committed very serious crimes. Therefore, taking into account the particular circumstances of this case as well as the form and degree of the participation of the Appellant in the crimes, the Appeals Chamber finds that a sentence of 15 years is appropriate.

VIII. VIOLENCE TO LIFE AND PERSON

A. The Law

193. The Accused is charged pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute with "violence to life and person".[524] Common Article 3 of the 1949 Geneva Conventions lists "violence to life and person" as one of the acts which must be prohibited at any time and in any place in the case of an armed conflict not of an international character.[525] The Appeals Chamber in Tadic stated that "customary international law imposes criminal liability for all serious violations of common Article 3".[526] This statement satisfies at once the first two requirements which must be met before a Trial Chamber may convict an accused for committing an offence under customary international law, namely, that the conduct in question is regarded as criminal under that body of law and that individual criminal responsibility may be imposed in case of breach. It may also be accepted that "violence to life and person" generally constitutes a "serious" violation of common Article 3.[527] However, the Trial Chamber must further satisfy itself that the criminal conduct in question was sufficiently defined and was sufficiently accessible at the relevant time for it to warrant a criminal conviction and sentencing under the criminal heading chosen by the Prosecution, in this case "violence to life and person". From the perspective of the nullum crimen sine lege principle, it would be wholly unacceptable for a Trial Chamber to convict an accused person on the basis of a prohibition which, taking into account the specificity of customary international law and allowing for the gradual clarification of the rules of criminal law, is either insufficiently precise to determine conduct and distinguish the criminal from the permissible, or was not sufficiently accessible at the relevant time. A criminal conviction should indeed never be based upon a norm which an accused could not reasonably have been aware of at the time of the acts, and this norm must make it sufficiently clear what act or omission could engage his criminal responsibility.[528]

194. The Blaškic Trial Chamber defined "violence to life and person" as "a broad offence which, at first glance, encompasses murder, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture and which is accordingly defined by the cumulation of the elements of these specific offences".[529] The Trial Chamber added that the mens rea for this offence is "characterised once it has been established that

XI. OPINION AND JUDGMENT

The indictment filed in this case on 29 July 1947 charged the 24 defendants enumerated therein with crimes against humanity, war crimes, and membership in criminal organizations. The 24 defendants were made up of 6 SS generals, 5 SS colonels, 6 SS lieutenant colonels, 4 SS majors, and 3 SS junior officers. Since the filing of the indictment the number of the defendants has been reduced to 22. Defendant SS Major Emil Haussmann committed suicide on 31 July 1947, and defendant SS Brigadier General Otto Rasch was severed from the case on 5 February 1948 because of his inability to testify. Although it is assumed that Rasch's disease (paralysis agitans or Parkinsonism) will become progressively worse, his severance from these proceedings is not to be regarded as any adjudication on the question of guilt or innocence.

The acts charged in counts one and two of the indictment are identical in character, but the indictment draws the distinction between acts constituting offenses against civilian populations, including German nationals and nationals of other countries, and the same acts committed as violations of the laws and customs of war involving murder and ill-treatment of prisoners of war and civilian populations of countries under the occupation of Germany. Count three charges the defendants with membership in the SS, SD, and Gestapo, organizations declared criminal by the International Military Tribunal and paragraph I(d) of article II of Control Council Law No. 10.

Although the indictment accuses the defendants of the commission of atrocities, persecutions, exterminations, imprisonment, and other inhumane acts, the principle charge in this case is murder. However, as unequivocal as this charge is, questions have arisen which must be definitely resolved so that this decision may add its voice in the present solemn re-affirmation and sound development of international precepts binding upon nations and individuals alike, to the end that never again will humanity witness the sad and miserable spectacle it has beheld and suffered during these last years.

At the outset it must be acknowledged that the facts with which the Tribunal must deal in this opinion are so beyond the experience of normal man and the range of man-made phenomena that only the most complete judicial inquiry, and the most exhaustive trial, could verify and confirm them. Although the principle accusation is murder and, unhappily, man has been killing man ever since lated how he shot 30 Jews because they had left the ghetto without permission. He did this, he said, under orders from the chief of the Einsatzgruppe, Nebe, who ordered him "to establish an example". At the trial he gave a different explanation of this episode which, however, establishes even a clearer case of guilt. He said that three women had contacted some partisans and, returning to the town, had talked to the thirty Jews in their homes. This, according to the defendant, made them guilty of partisan action and he had them shot. He, of course, also shot the three women. He did, however, accord them a special consideration. He had them blindfolded for the execution and then ordered that they be given a separate grave.

Klingelhoefer has stated that his function in the Einsatzgruppe operation was only that of interpreter. Even if this were true it would not exonerate him from guilt because in locating, evaluating and turning over lists of Communist party functionaries to the executive department of his organization he was aware that the people listed would be executed when found. In this function, therefore, he served as an accessory to the crime.

"Q. I asked you, Witness, didn't you know that when you were giving him these lists of Communist party functionaries that he was going to exterminate all those he could? You either knew it or you didn't know it.

"A. Of course, I did."

But the evidence is clear that Klingelhoefer was no mere interpreter in the grim business of the Einsatzgruppe. He was an active leader and commander. He knew what the Einsatz units were doing to the Jews.

"Q. You told us you knew that if he stayed in the ghetto he was killed. Now, if he left the ghetto, was he then set free?

"A. If he left the ghetto, he violated the directives which were given.

"Q. So that he was killed anyway?

"A. Then he had to be executed, yes."

In his own affidavit the defendant stated:

"While I was assigned by Nebe to the leadership of the Vorkommando Moscow, Nebe ordered me to go from Smolensk to Tatarsk and Mstislavl to get furs for the German troops and to liquidate part of the Jews there. The Jews had already been arrested by order of Hauptsturmfuehrer Egon Noack. The executions proper were carried out by Noack under my supervision." [Emphasis supplied.]

CASE No. 66

TRIAL OF FRANZ SCHONFELD AND NINE OTHERS

BRITISH MILITARY COURT, ESSEN,
JUNE 11TH–26TH, 1946

A. OUTLINE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

Franz Schonfeld, Albert Roesener, Karl Paul Schwanz, Karl Otto Klingbeil, Michael Rotschopf, Karl Brendle, Hans Harders, Eugen Rafflenbeul, Werner Koeny and Karl Cremer were charged with committing a war crime in that they, " at Tilburg, on the 9th July, 1944, in violation of the laws and usages of war, were concerned in the killing of " a member of the Royal Air Force, a member of the Royal Canadian Air Force and a member of the Royal Australian Air Force. All pleaded not guilty.

Harders was shown to have been in charge of an office (Dienststelle) of the German Security Police at 's Hertogenbosch, Holland, the purpose of which was to track down and suppress the Dutch Resistance Movement. Under his orders came one Hardegan, who was not among the accused, but who had been in charge of squads who went out to make arrests. Under Hardegan's directions came various persons including all the remaining accused.

It was shown that, on Hardegan's orders, three cars left the Dienststelle building on July 9th, 1944, containing between them all of the accused except Schonfeld, Klingbeil, Harders and Koeny. The cars proceeded to a house in Tilburg, 49 Diepenstraat, which was then raided by certain members of the party. During the raid, the three airmen, who were in hiding, were shot by Rotschopf. There was no evidence that the victims had been armed.

Miss Leoni van Harssel testified that she and a fellow member of the Dutch Resistance Movement who had been known as Aunt Coba,[1] and who had taken into hiding the three Allied flyers, had been interned by the Germans, and while in internment Aunt Coba had told the witness that on July 9th, 1944, at about 11.15 to 11.30 a.m., she went to the door of Diepenstraat 49, her home, in answer to a ring. A man entered, bearing a weapon. She followed him into the house and saw the three pilots with their hands raised, being backed through the kitchen door. She could not follow further because other Germans had entered the house, but she heard shooting.

Mr. Nico Pulskens, whose house was opposite that of Aunt Coba, stated that on the morning of 9th July, 1944, at about 11.0 to 11.15 a.m. he had

2. THE LAW APPLIED BY THE COURT

During the trial, rules of English law were quoted, particularly by the Judge Advocate, in connection with the possible liability of various accused either as principals in the second degree or under the doctrine of "common design." It may safely be said, however, that the intention was not to try the accused for offences against English law but simply to amplify and define the charge against them and the war crimes which they may have committed. As has been said in the notes to an earlier trial in this series of Reports(1) : "In the present state of vagueness prevailing in many branches of the law of nations, even given the fact that there are no binding precedents in International Law, such introduction therein of tested concepts from municipal systems is all to the good, provided that they are recognised to be in amplification of, and not in substitution for, rules of International Law."

The Permanent Court of International Justice was empowered, under Article 38 (3) of its Statute (as is now the International Court of Justice under Article 38 (c) of its Charter), to apply the "general principles of law recognised by civilised nations." Professor Gutteridge, in discussing this power, has said that : "All systems of law are incomplete in varying degree, but the problem of filling in the gaps is, perhaps, more acute in the case of the law of nations than in that of private law owing to the absence of an international legislature having power to remedy any deficiencies which may be discovered."(2)

It would not be hard to show that, for instance, the rules of English law regarding complicity in crimes, which are frequently quoted in war crime trials before British Military Courts, will be "found in substance in the majority" of systems of civilised law.(3)

Writing in 1944 of the war crime trials which were then envisaged rather than actual, Professor J. L. Brierly expressed the opinion that :

"In practice courts will probably follow more or less closely the definitions and the procedures of their own municipal law, and in so doing they will be well within the latitude that the laws of war allow. But again that will not mean that they follow their own municipal law because that is the law which they are bound to apply ; it will mean that in the absence of exact definition contained in the laws of war the municipal definition is likely to be the best available guide to the rule that natural justice requires them to apply."(4)

No lawyer of the Anglo-Saxon countries would have any proviso to make to Professor Brierly's view set out above. It must be added, however, that the continental practice is to require that an accused war criminal shall be shown either to have committed a breach of the municipal law of

THE ZYKLON B CASE

TRIAL OF BRUNO TESCH AND TWO OTHERS

BRITISH MILITARY COURT, HAMBURG,
1ST–8TH MARCH, 1946

Complicity of German industrialists in the murder of interned allied civilians by means of poison gas.

Bruno Tesch was owner of a firm which arranged for the supply of poison gas intended for the extermination of vermin, and among the customers of the firm were the S.S. Karl Weinbacher was Tesch's Procurist or second-in-command. Joachim Drosihn was the firm's first gassing technician. These three were accused of having supplied poison gas used for killing allied nationals interned in concentration camps, knowing that it was so to be used. The Defence claimed that the accused did not know of the use to which the gas was to be put; for Drosihn it was also pleaded that the supply of gas was beyond his control. Tesch and Weinbacher were condemned to death. Drosihn was acquitted.

A. OUTLINE OF THE PROCEEDINGS

1. THE COURT

The Court consisted of Brigadier R. B. L. Persse, as President, and, as members, Lt. Col. Sir Geoffrey Palmer, Bart., Coldstream Gds., and Major S. M. Johnstone, Royal Tank Regt.

Capt. H. S. Marshall was Waiting Member.

C. L. Stirling, Esq., C.B.E., Barrister-at-Law, Deputy Judge Advocate General, was Judge Advocate.

Major G. I. D. Draper, Irish Guards, Judge Advocate General's Branch, HQ. B.A.O.R., was Prosecutor.

Three German Counsel appeared on behalf of the accused. Dr. O. Zippel, Dr. C. Stumme and Dr. A. Stegemann defended Tesch, Weinbacher and Drosihn respectively.

2. THE CHARGE

The accused, Bruno Tesch, Joachim Drosihn and Karl Weinbacher, were charged with a war crime in that they "at Hamburg, Germany, between 1st January, 1941, and 31st March, 1945, in violation of the laws and usages of war did supply poison gas used for the extermination of allied nationals interned in concentration camps well knowing that the said gas was to be so used." The accused pleaded not guilty.

document which all the staff could read. If Sehm had found any other document, it must have been purely by accident ; and no such accident had happened to Weinbacher. In connection with the large supplies of gas which were sent to Auschwitz, Counsel pointed out that Weinbacher had stated on oath that he had never had a summary of supplies to a single customer because this was left to the accountants. In any case, it had been shown that the quantity of Zyklon B needed for the killing of human beings was much smaller than that required for the killing of insects. The quantities of Zyklon B needed for killing half a million or even a million human beings stood in such small proportion to the quantities needed for the killing of insects that it would not have been noticed at all. Therefore, there had been no need for Weinbacher to have grown suspicious, since, claimed Counsel, he knew that Auschwitz was one of the biggest camps and a sort of transit camp. Counsel did not think, therefore, that it was correct to assume that the large quantity of Zyklon going to Auschwitz was any indication of the fact that human beings were being killed there. Supplies for Neuengamme were much lower than those for Auschwitz.

Dr. Stumme did not deal with the law involved, except for stating that Weinbacher, although a procurist, was still only an employee like Sehm and Miss Biagini, against whom no action was being taken, despite the knowledge which they were said to have had.

(iii) Counsel for Drosihn

Dr. Stegemann, in his closing address, confined his remarks to what concerned his client exclusively, while claiming the benefit of everything favourable to him which had already been said by the other Counsel. Every witness who was asked had said that the accused had had nothing whatever to do with the firm's business activities. He could not, therefore, for instance, have known of the size of the consignments to Auschwitz. His relatively small salary showed his subordinate position. He was a zoologist, and first technical gassing master to the firm, and spent more than half the year in travelling. When both Tesch and Weinbacher were away, Mr. Zaun had had the power of attorney, not Drosihn.

Both Dr. Tesch and Dr. Drosihn had said that the latter had never instructed S.S. men in the use of Zyklon B, and not even Sehm claimed that he knew anything about the alleged travel report. Drosihn had been away from the office for irregular periods, and was in no position to read Dr. Tesch's travel reports, which were in any case of no interest to him. Counsel denied that there had been general knowledge in Germany before the end of of the war about the gassing of Jews ; his client could not therefore have acquired such knowledge from rumours.

8. THE PROSECUTOR'S CLOSING ADDRESS

In his closing address, the prosecuting Counsel said that the possibility that some firm other than Tesch and Stabenow could have supplied Zyklon B to Auschwitz could be ruled out, as the latter had the monopoly in that area. The essential question was whether the accused knew of the purpose to which their gas was being put. Counsel admitted that the S.S. were under no restrictions as to the use they made of the gas, and that the direct knowledge which was available to Tesch as to that use was of the scantiest, due to the fear and secrecy in which the S.S. worked. He relied for his case on the evidence of Sehm, Miss Biagini and Miss Uenzelmann.

Counsel said that it was unbelievable that Dr. Tesch did not know that anything wrong went on in the concentration camps. Dr. Drosihn had said without hesitation that he saw things there which were not worthy of human dignity, and that he had said so to Tesch. It was also unbelievable that Dr. Tesch had no knowledge of the amounts of gas being supplied to the S.S. and to Auschwitz in particular, by a firm which was wholly his property. In 1942 and 1943 Auschwitz had been the firm's second largest customer. Dr. Tesch had no reason to believe that Auschwitz was a transit camp, and moreover he was too efficient a man to be duped by the S.S. Counsel completed his case against Tesch by casting doubt on his veracity by showing how contradictions existed between his statements and those of other witnesses on certain details unrelated to the main issue.

Dealing very shortly with Weinbacher's position, Counsel contended that all that Tesch knew must, from the nature of the inner organisation of the business, have also been known by Weinbacher. For 200 days in the year he was in sole control of the firm, with access to all the books, able to read the travel reports, indeed compelled to read the travel reports if he was to carry on the business properly during the periods when his principal was away.

Prosecuting Counsel claimed that Drosihn must to some extent have shared the confidence of Tesch and Weinbacher, even although his activities were confined to the technical side of the firm as opposed to the sales and bookkeeping side.

He concluded that, by supplying gas, knowing that it was to be used for murder, the three accused had made themselves accessories before the fact to that murder.

9. THE SUMMING UP OF THE JUDGE ADVOCATE

The Judge Advocate, in summing up the evidence before the Court, pointed out that the latter must be sure of three facts, first, that Allied nationals had been gassed by means of Zyklon B ; secondly, that this gas had been supplied by Tesch and Stabenow ; and thirdly, that the accused knew that the gas was to be used for the purpose of killing human beings. On points of law he did not think that the Court needed any direction.

After summarising the evidence of the Prosecution witnesses, the Judge Advocate said : " To my mind, although it is entirely a question for you, the real strength of the Prosecution in this case rests rather upon the general proposition that, when you realise what kind of a man Dr. Tesch was, it inevitably follows that he must have known every little thing about his business. The Prosecution ask you to say that the accused and his second-in-command Weinbacher, both competent business men, were sensitive about admitting that they knew at the relevant time of the size of the deliveries of poison gas to Auschwitz. The Prosecution then ask : " Why is it that these competent business men are so sensitive about these particular deliveries ? Is it because they themselves knew that such large deliveries could not possibly be going there for the purpose of delousing clothing or for the purpose of disinfecting buildings ? "

In Weinbacher's case, there was no direct evidence, either by way of conversation or of anything that he had written among the documents of the firm produced during the trial, which formed any kind of evidence specifically imputing knowledge to Weinbacher as to how Zyklon B was being used at Auschwitz. " But the Prosecution," said the Judge Advocate, " ask you to say that, in his case as in Tesch's case, the real strength of their case is not the individual direct evidence, but the general atmosphere and conditions of the firm itself." The Judge Advocate asked the Court whether or not it was probable that Weinbacher would constantly watch the figures relating to a less profitable activity of the firm, particularly since he received a commission on profits as well as his salary.

The Judge Advocate emphasised Drosihn's subordinate position in the firm, and asked whether there was any evidence that he was in a position either to influence the transfer of gas to Auschwitz or to prevent it. If he were not in such a position, no knowledge of the use to which the gas was being put could make him guilty.

10. THE VERDICT

Tesch and Weinbacher were found guilty.
Drosihn was acquitted.

11. THE SENTENCE

Counsel for Tesch, pleading in mitigation of sentence, said that if Tesch did know the use to which the gas was being put, and had consented to it, this happened only under enormous pressure from the S.S. Furthermore, had Tesch not co-operated, the S.S. would certainly have achieved their aims by other means. Tesch was merely an accessory before the fact, and even so, an unimportant one.

Counsel for Weinbacher pleaded that the Court should consider the latter's wife and three children ; that he as a business employee might have thought that the ultimate use of the gas was Tesch's responsibility ; and that if he had refused to supply Zyklon B the S.S. would immediately have handed him over to the Gestapo.

Nevertheless, subject to confirmation, the two were sentenced to death by hanging.

The sentences were confirmed and carried into effect.

B. NOTES ON THE CASE

1. A QUESTION OF JURISDICTION : THE NATIONALITY OF THE VICTIMS

The Prosecutor specified a number of Allied countries from which, he claimed, many of the persons gassed had originated. Wilhelm Bahr told how he himself had gassed two hundred Russians. Perry Broad mentioned Jews from Belgium, Holland, France, Czechoslovakia and Poland, among those gassed at Auschwitz. The Judge Advocate, in his summing up, stated that " among those unfortunate creatures undoubtedly there were many Allied nationals."

It was not alleged that British citizens were among the victims.

B. JUDGMENT[1]

INTRODUCTION

On 18 November 1947,[2] an indictment against the above-named defendants was filed with the Secretary General of the United States Military Tribunals at Nuernberg. Generally stated, said indictment, consisting of eight counts, charged the defendants with having committed crimes against peace, war crimes, crimes against humanity, and with having participated in a common plan and conspiracy to commit crimes against peace, all as defined in Control Council Law No. 10, duly enacted by the Allied Control Council on 20 December 1945.

Several, but not all, of the defendants are charged under each of the counts of the indictment. The applicable provisions of Control Council Law No. 10 will hereinafter be referred to and set forth as they relate to each count of the indictment when such counts are reached for discussion and decision.

The indictment was served upon all of the defendants in the German language, more than 30 days before arraignment of the defendants thereunder. On 19 December 1947 the case was assigned to this Tribunal for trial by the Supervisory Committee of Presiding Judges of the United States Military Tribunals in Germany, in conformity with Article V of Military Government Ordinance No. 7, as amended, this Tribunal theretofore having been duly established and constituted, pursuant to said Ordinance No. 7, which ordinance was promulgated by the United States Military Governor of the United States Occupation Zone of Germany on 18 October 1946. The arraignment of the defendants took place on 20 December 1947, at which time all defendants pleaded "Not Guilty" to the charges in the indictment.

Throughout the trial of this case, all of the defendants were represented by German counsel of their own choice. One defendant requested that he also be allowed to retain American counsel to represent him. The request was granted.

The presentation of evidence in the case was commenced on 7 January 1948. Final arguments before the Tribunal were concluded on 18 November 1948. The transcript record of the case consists of 28,085 pages. In addition thereto, the prosecution and theless, when we appreciate the realities of the situation and from what is disclosed, not only by testimony of representatives of the Vatican but from contemporaneous, official documents regarding the actual policy and the action taken by the defendants of the Foreign Office, we are convinced that at the time they did the best, perhaps the most, they could to prevent the persecution of the Church, its priests, and its communicants. It is quite true that in one or more cases Woermann suggested that the concordats were no longer practicable in view of the political situation, but he did not recommend that they be abrogated, but that such action be postponed. His recommendation evidently was approved, and the concordats remained in effect, although without question other agencies of the Nazi government paid little or no attention to their terms. That this is the fact is shown by numerous documents offered on behalf of the defendant von Weizsaecker and the affidavit of Father Gehrmann who, from 1925 to 1945, was secretary of the Apostolic Nuncio in Berlin. This is also shown by the Woermann memorandum of 22 November 1939 and his memorandum of 21 April 1942 which ended with the words (Woermann 149, Woermann Ex. 90):

> "For these reasons I consider it necessary that all such measures directed against the Church be suspended or discontinued until the end of the war."

See also the memorandum of du Moulin of 9 March 1939; that of von Weizsaecker of 16 August 1941; the memorandum of Woermann and Haidlen of 24 May 1939 and 4 March 1940; the Haidlen and von Weizsaecker memoranda of 10 December 1940, 17 January 1941, and 5 February 1941; the Haidlen memoranda of 11 February and 6 March 1941; and the Hoffmann memorandum with Woermann's note of 16 September 1942.

It is clear that the Foreign Office defendants were not engaged in a program of persecution, but whenever and wherever possible they sought to modify, gain as many exceptions as they could, and mitigate those which could not be changed or modified.

We must not forget that guilt is a personal matter; that men are to be judged not by theoretical, but by practical standards; that we are here to define a standard of conduct of responsibility, not only for Germans as the vanquished in war, not only with regard to past and present events, but those which in the future can be reasonably and properly applied to men and officials of every state and nation, those of the victors as well as those of the vanquished. Any other approach would make a mockery of international law and would result in wrongs quite as serious and fatal as those which were sought to be remedied.

a fund placed at Himmler's personal disposal. There is no evidence, however, that matters relating to the resettlement program were ever discussed or acted upon in the meetings of this circle, or that it was in any way a policy-making body. Nor is there any evidence that Rasche knew that any part of the fund to which the bank made contributions was intended to be or was ever used by Himmler for any unlawful purposes.

His participation in the loans made by the Dresdner Bank to various SS enterprises which employed slave labor and to those engaged in the resettlement program presents a more difficult problem.

The defendant is a banker and businessman of long experience and is possessed of a keen and active mind. Bankers do not approve or make loans in the number and amount made by the Dresdner Bank without ascertaining, having, or obtaining information or knowledge as to the purpose for which the loan is sought, and how it is to be used. It is inconceivable to us that the defendant did not possess that knowledge, and we find that he did.

The real question is, is it a crime to make a loan, knowing or having good reason to believe that the borrower will us the funds in financing enterprises which are employed in using labor in violation of either national or international law? Does he stand in any different position than one who sells supplies or raw materials to a builder building a house, knowing that the structure will be used for an unlawful purpose? A bank sells money or credit in the same manner as the merchandiser of any other commodity. It does not become a partner in enterprise, and the interest charged is merely the gross profit which the bank realizes from the transaction, out of which it must deduct its business costs, and from which it hopes to realize a net profit. Loans or sale of commodities to be used in an unlawful enterprise may well be condemned from a moral standpoint and reflect no credit on the part of the lender or seller in either case, but the transaction can hardly be said to be a crime. Our duty is to try and punish those guilty of violating international law, and we are not prepared to state that such loans constitute a violation of that law, nor has our attention been drawn to any ruling to the contrary.

The defendant Rasche should be and is found not guilty under count five.

ASYLUM CASE

(COLOMBIA / PERU)

JUDGMENT OF NOVEMBER 20th, 1950

This provision has been interpreted by that Government in the sense that the usages, conventions and laws of Colombia relating to the qualification of the offence can be invoked against Peru. This interpretation, which would mean that the extent of the obligation of one of the signatory States would depend upon any modifications which might occur in the law of another, cannot be accepted. The provision must be regarded as a limitation of the extent to which asylum shall be respected. What the provision says in effect is that the State of refuge shall not exercise asylum to a larger extent than is warranted by its own usages, conventions or laws and that the asylum granted must be respected by the territorial State only where such asylum would be permitted according to the usages, conventions or laws of the State of refuge. Nothing therefore can be deduced from this provision in so far as qualification is concerned.

The Colombian Government has further referred to the Montevideo Convention on Political Asylum of 1933. It was in fact this Convention which was invoked in the note of January 14th, 1949, from the Colombian Ambassador to the Peruvian Minister for Foreign Affairs. It is argued that, by Article 2 of that Convention, the Havana Convention of 1928 is interpreted in the sense that the qualification of a political offence appertains to the State granting asylum. Articles 6 and 7 of the Montevideo Convention provide that it shall be ratified and will enter into force as and when the ratifications are deposited. The Montevideo Convention has not been ratified by Peru, and cannot be invoked against that State. The fact that it was considered necessary to incorporate in that Convention an article accepting the right of unilateral qualification, seems to indicate that this solution was regarded as a new rule not recognized by the Havana Convention. Moreover, the preamble of the Montevideo Convention states in its Spanish, French and Portuguese texts that it modifies the Havana Convention. It cannot therefore be considered as representing merely an interpretation of that Convention.

The Colombian Government has finally invoked "American international law in general". In addition to the rules arising from agreements which have already been considered, it has relied on an alleged regional or local custom peculiar to Latin-American States.

The Party which relies on a custom of this kind must prove that this custom is established in such a manner that it has become binding on the other Party. The Colombian Government must prove that the rule invoked by it is in accordance with a constant and uniform usage practised by the States in question, and that this usage is the expression of a right appertaining to the State granting asylum and a duty incumbent on the territorial State. This follows from Article 38 of the Statute of the Court, which refers to international custom "as evidence of a general practice accepted as law".

In support of its contention concerning the existence of such a custom, the Colombian Government has referred to a large number of extradition treaties which, as already explained, can have no bearing on the question now under consideration. It has cited conventions and agreements which do not contain any provision concerning the alleged rule of unilateral and definitive qualification such as the Montevideo Convention of 1889 on international penal law, the Bolivarian Agreement of 1911 and the Havana Convention of 1928. It has invoked conventions which have not been ratified by Peru, such as the Montevideo Conventions of 1933 and 1939. The Convention of 1933 has, in fact, been ratified by not more than eleven States and the Convention of 1939 by two States only.

It is particularly the Montevideo Convention of 1933 which Counsel for the Colombian Government has also relied on in this connexion. It is contended that this Convention has merely codified principles which were already recognized by Latin-American custom, and that it is valid against Peru as a proof of customary law. The limited number of States which have ratified this Convention reveals the weakness of this argument, and furthermore, it is invalidated by the preamble which states that this Convention modifies the Havana Convention.

Finally, the Colombian Government has referred to a large number of particular cases in which diplomatic asylum was in fact granted and respected. But it has not shown that the alleged rule of unilateral and definitive qualification was invoked or—if in some cases it was in fact invoked—that it was, apart from conventional stipulations, exercised by the States granting asylum as a right appertaining to them and respected by the territorial States as a duty incumbent on them and not merely for reasons of political expediency. The facts brought to the knowledge of the Court disclose so much uncertainty and contradiction, so much fluctuation and discrepancy in the exercise of diplomatic asylum and in the official views expressed on various occasions, there has been so much inconsistency in the rapid succession of conventions on asylum, ratified by some States and rejected by others, and the practice has been so much influenced by considerations of political expediency in the various cases, that it is not possible to discern in all this any constant and uniform usage, accepted as law, with regard to the alleged rule of unilateral and definitive qualification of the offence.

The Court cannot therefore find that the Colombian Government has proved the existence of such a custom. But even if it could be supposed that such a custom existed between certain Latin-American States only, it could not be invoked against Peru which, far "'torture' for purposes of the Convention can only mean torture that occurs subsequent to the entry into force of the Convention". However, when the Committee considered Mr. Habré's situation, the question of the temporal scope of the obligations contained in the Convention was not raised, nor did the Committee itself address that question (Guengueng et al. v. Senegal (Communication No. 181/2001, decision of 17 May 2006, UN doc. CAT/C/36/D/181/2001)).

102. The Court concludes that Senegal's obligation to prosecute pursuant to Article 7, paragraph 1, of the Convention does not apply to acts alleged to have been committed before the Convention entered into force for Senegal on 26 June 1987. The Court would recall, however, that the complaints against Mr. Habré include a number of serious offences allegedly committed after that date (see paragraphs 17, 19-21 and 32 above). Consequently, Senegal is under an obligation to submit the allegations concerning those acts to its competent authorities for the purpose of prosecution. Although Senegal is not required under the Convention to institute proceedings concerning acts that were committed before 26 June 1987, nothing in that instrument prevents it from doing so.

103. The Court now comes to the second aspect of the question put by a Member of the Court, namely, what was the effect of the date of entry into force of the Convention, for Belgium, on the scope of the obligation to prosecute. Belgium contends that Senegal was still bound by the obligation to prosecute Mr. Habré after Belgium had itself become party to the Convention, and that it was therefore entitled to invoke before the Court breaches of the Convention occurring after 25 July 1999. Senegal disputes Belgium's right to engage its responsibility for acts alleged to have occurred prior to that date. It considers that the obligation provided for in Article 7, paragraph 1, belongs to "the category of divisible erga omnes obligations", in that only the injured State could call for its breach to be sanctioned. Senegal accordingly concludes that Belgium was not entitled to rely on the status of injured State in respect of acts prior to 25 July 1999 and could not seek retroactive application of the Convention.

104. The Court considers that Belgium has been entitled, with effect from 25 July 1999, the date when it became party to the Convention, to request the Court to rule on Senegal's compliance with its obligation under Article 7, paragraph 1. In the present case, the Court notes that Belgium invokes Senegal's responsibility for the latter's conduct starting in the year 2000, when a complaint was filed against Mr. Habré in Senegal (see paragraph 17 above).

105. The Court notes that the previous findings are also valid for the temporal application of Article 6, paragraph 2, of the Convention.

3. Implementation of the obligation laid down in Article 7, paragraph 1

106. Belgium, while recognizing that the time frame for implementation of the obligation to prosecute depends on the circumstances of each case, and in particular on the evidence gathered, considers that the State in whose territory the suspect is present cannot indefinitely delay performing the obligation incumbent upon it to submit the matter to its competent authorities for

404. This is the case of the doctrine laid down in the Tadić Judgment. Insofar as the "overall control" test is employed to determine whether or not an armed conflict is international, which was the sole question which the Appeals Chamber was called upon to decide, it may well be that the test is applicable and suitable; the Court does not however think it appropriate to take a position on the point in the present case, as there is no need to resolve it for purposes of the present Judgment. On the other hand, the ICTY presented the "overall control" test as equally applicable under the law of State responsibility for the purpose of determining — as the Court is required to do in the present case — when a State is responsible for acts committed by paramilitary units, armed forces which are not among its official organs. In this context, the argument in favour of that test is unpersuasive.

405. It should first be observed that logic does not require the same test to be adopted in resolving the two issues, which are very different in nature: the degree and nature of a State's involvement in an armed conflict on another State's territory which is required for the conflict to be characterized as international, can very well, and without logical inconsistency, differ from the degree and nature of involvement required to give rise to that State's responsibility for a specific act committed in the course of the conflict.

406. It must next be noted that the "overall control" test has the major drawback of broadening the scope of State responsibility well beyond the fundamental principle governing the law of international responsibility: a State is responsible only for its own conduct, that is to say the conduct of persons acting, on whatever basis, on its behalf. That is true of acts carried out by its official organs, and also by persons or entities which are not formally recognized as official organs under internal law but which must nevertheless be equated with State organs because they are in a relationship of complete dependence on the State. Apart from these cases, a State's responsibility can be incurred for acts committed by persons or groups of persons — neither State organs nor to be equated with such organs — only if, assuming those acts to be internationally wrongful, they are attributable to it under the rule of customary international law reflected in Article 8 cited above (paragraph 398). This is so where an organ of the State gave the instructions or provided the direction pursuant to which the perpetrators of the wrongful act acted or where it exercised effective control over the action during which the wrong was committed. In this regard the "overall control" test is unsuitable, for it stretches too far, almost to breaking point, the connection which must exist between the conduct of a State's organs and its international responsibility.

407. Thus it is on the basis of its settled jurisprudence that the Court will determine whether the Respondent has incurred responsibility under the rule of customary international law set out in Article 8 of the ILC Articles on State Responsibility.

408. The Respondent has emphasized that in the final judgments of the Chambers of the ICTY relating to genocide in Srebrenica, none of its leaders have been found to have been implicated. The Applicant does not challenge that reading, but makes the point that that issue has not been before the ICTY for decision. The Court observes that the ICTY has indeed not up to the present been directly concerned in final judgments with the question whether those leaders might bear responsibility in that respect. The Court notes the fact that the report of the United Nations Secretary-General does not establish any direct involvement by President Milošević with the massacre. The Court has already recorded the contacts between Milošević and the United Nations on 10 and 11 July (paragraph 285). On 14 July, as recorded in the Secretary-General's Report,

> "the European Union negotiator, Mr. Bildt, travelled to Belgrade to meet with President Milošević. The meeting took place at Dobanovci, the hunting lodge outside Belgrade, where Mr. Bildt had met President Milošević and General Mladić one week earlier. According to Mr. Bildt's public account of that second meeting, he pressed the President to arrange immediate access for UNHCR to assist the people of Srebrenica, and for ICRC to start to register those who were being treated by the BSA as prisoners of war. He also insisted that the Netherlands soldiers be allowed to leave at will. Mr. Bildt added that the international community would not tolerate an attack on Goražde, and that a 'green light' would have to be secured for free and unimpeded access to the enclaves. He also demanded that the road between Kiseljak and Sarajevo ('Route Swan') be opened to all non-military transport. President Milošević apparently acceded to the various demands, but also claimed that he did not have control over the matter. Milošević had also apparently explained, earlier in the meeting, that the whole incident had been provoked by escalating Muslim attacks from the enclave, in violation of the 1993 demilitarization agreement.
> A few hours into the meeting, General Mladić arrived at Dobanovci. Mr. Bildt noted that General Mladić readily agreed to most of the demands on Srebrenica, but remained opposed to some of the arrangements pertaining to the other enclaves, Sarajevo in particular. Eventually, with President Milošević's intervention, it appeared that an agreement in principle had been reached. It was decided that

The response of the Applicant was to quote an earlier passage which refers to reports which "suggest" that VJ troops and possibly elements of the Serbian State Security Department may have been engaged in the battle in Srebrenica — as indeed the second sentence of the passage quoted by the Respondent indicates. It is a cautious passage, and significantly gives no indication of any involvement by the Respondent in the post-conflict atrocities which are the subject of genocide-related convictions. Counsel for the Respondent also quoted from the evidence of the Deputy Commander of Dutchbat, given in the Milošević trial, in which the accused put to the officer the point quoted earlier from the Epilogue to the Netherlands report. The officer responded:

> "At least for me, I did not have any evidence that it was launched in co-operation with Belgrade. And again, I read all kinds of reports and opinions and papers where all kinds of scenarios were analysed, and so forth. Again, I do not have any proof that the action, being the attack on the enclave, was launched in co-operation with Belgrade."

The other evidence on which the Applicant relied relates to the influence, rather than the control, that President Milošević had or did not have over the authorities in Pale. It mainly consists of the evidence given at the Milošević trial by Lord Owen and General Wesley Clark and also Lord Owen's publications. It does not establish a factual basis for finding the Respondent responsible on a basis of direction or control.

(5) Conclusion as to Responsibility for Events at Srebrenica under Article III, Paragraph (a), of the Genocide Convention

413. In the light of the information available to it, the Court finds, as indicated above, that it has not been established that the massacres at Srebrenica were committed by persons or entities ranking as organs of the Respondent (see paragraph 395 above). It finds also that it has not been established that those massacres were committed on the instructions or under the direction of organs of the respondent State, nor that the Respondent exercised effective control over the operations in the course of which those massacres, which, as indicated in paragraph 297 above, constituted the crime of genocide, were perpetrated.

The Applicant has not proved that instructions were issued by the federal authorities in Belgrade, or by any other organ of the FRY, to commit the massacres, still less that any such instructions were given with the specific intent (dolus specialis) characterizing the crime of genocide, which would have had to be present in order for the Respondent to be held responsible on this basis. All indications are to the contrary: that the decision to kill the adult male population of the Muslim community in Srebrenica was taken by some members of the VRS Main Staff, but without instructions from or effective control by the FRY.

As for the killings committed by the "Scorpions" paramilitary militias, notably at Trnovo (paragraph 289 above), even if it were accepted that they were an element of the genocide committed in the Srebrenica area, which is not clearly established by the decisions thus far rendered by the ICTY (see, in particular, the Trial Chamber's decision of 12 April 2006 in the Stanišić and Simatović case, IT-03-69), it has not been proved that they took place either on the instructions or under the control of organs of the FRY.

414. Finally, the Court observes that none of the situations, other than those referred to in Articles 4 and 8 of the ILC's Articles on State Responsibility, in which specific conduct may be attributed to a State, matches the circumstances of the present case in regard to the possibility of attributing the genocide at Srebrenica to the Respondent. The Court does not see itself required to decide at this stage whether the ILC's Articles dealing with attribution, apart from Articles 4 and 8, express present customary international law, it being clear that none of them apply in this case. The acts constituting genocide were not committed by persons or entities which, while not being organs of the FRY, were empowered by it to exercise elements of the governmental authority (Art. 5), nor by organs placed at the Respondent's disposal by another State (Art. 6), nor by persons in fact exercising elements of the governmental authority in the absence or default of the official authorities of the Respondent (Art. 9); finally, the Respondent has not acknowledged and adopted the conduct of the perpetrators of the acts of genocide as its own (Art. 11).

415. The Court concludes from the foregoing that the acts of those who committed genocide at Srebrenica cannot be attributed to the Respondent under the rules of international law of State responsibility: thus, the international responsibility of the Respondent is not engaged on this basis.

VIII. The Question of Responsibility, in Respect of Srebrenica, for Acts Enumerated in Article III, Paragraphs (b) to (e), of the Genocide Convention

416. The Court now comes to the second of the questions set out in paragraph 379 above, namely, that relating to the Respondent's possible responsibility on the ground of one of the acts related to genocide enumerated in Article III of the Convention. These are: conspiracy to

421. Before the Court turns to an examination of the facts, one further comment is required. It concerns the link between the specific intent (dolus specialis) which characterizes the crime of genocide and the motives which inspire the actions of an accomplice (meaning a person providing aid or assistance to the direct perpetrators of the crime): the question arises whether complicity presupposes that the accomplice shares the specific intent (dolus specialis) of the principal perpetrator. But whatever the reply to this question, there is no doubt that the conduct of an organ or a person furnishing aid or assistance to a perpetrator of the crime of genocide cannot be treated as complicity in genocide unless at the least that organ or person acted knowingly, that is to say, in particular, was aware of the specific intent (dolus specialis) of the principal perpetrator. If that condition is not fulfilled, that is sufficient to exclude categorization as complicity. The Court will thus first consider whether this latter condition is met in the present case. It is only if it replies to that question of fact in the affirmative that it will need to determine the legal point referred to above.

422. The Court is not convinced by the evidence furnished by the Applicant that the above conditions were met. Undoubtedly, the quite substantial aid of a political, military and financial nature provided by the FRY to the Republika Srpska and the VRS, beginning long before the tragic events of Srebrenica, continued during those events. There is thus little doubt that the atrocities in Srebrenica were committed, at least in part, with the resources which the perpetrators of those acts possessed as a result of the general policy of aid and assistance pursued towards them by the FRY. However, the sole task of the Court is to establish the legal responsibility of the Respondent, a responsibility which is subject to very specific conditions. One of those conditions is not fulfilled, because it is not established beyond any doubt in the argument between the Parties whether the authorities of the FRY supplied — and continued to supply — the VRS leaders who decided upon and carried out those acts of genocide with their aid and assistance, at a time when those authorities were clearly aware that genocide was about to take place or was under way; in other words that not only were massacres about to be carried out or already under way, but that their perpetrators had the specific intent characterizing genocide, namely, the intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a human group, as such.

423. A point which is clearly decisive in this connection is that it was not conclusively shown that the decision to eliminate physically the adult male population of the Muslim community from Srebrenica was brought to the attention of the Belgrade authorities when it was taken; the Court has found (paragraph 295 above) that that decision was taken shortly before it was actually carried out, a process which took a very short time (essentially between 13 and 16 July 1995), despite the exceptionally high number of victims. It has therefore not been conclusively established observe humanitarian standards and no reference to the concept of military necessity". In support of this, Nicaragua has catalogued numerous incidents, attributed to "CIA-trained mercenaries" or "mercenary forces", of kidnapping, assassination, torture, rape, killing of prisoners, and killing of civilians not dictated by military necessity. The declaration of Commander Carrión annexed to the Memorial lists the first such incident in December 1981, and continues up to the end of 1984. Two of the witnesses called by Nicaragua (Father Loison and Mr. Glennon) gave oral evidence as to events of this kind. By way of examples of evidence to provide "direct proof of the tactics adopted by the contras under United States guidance and control", the Memorial of Nicaragua offers a statement, reported in the press, by the ex-FDN leader Mr. Edgar Chamorro, repeated in the latter's affidavit, of assassinations in Nicaraguan villages ; the alleged existence of a classified Defence Intelligence Agency report of July 1982, reported in the New York Times on 21 October 1984, disclosing that the contras were carrying out assassinations ; and the preparation by the CIA in 1983 of a manual of psychological warfare. At the hearings, reliance was also placed on the affidavit of Mr. Chamorro.

114. In this respect, the Court notes that according to Nicaragua, the contras are no more than bands of mercenaries which have been recruited, organized, paid and commanded by the Government of the United States. This would mean that they have no real autonomy in relation to that Government. Consequently, any offences which they have committed would be imputable to the Government of the United States, like those of any other forces placed under the latter's command. In the view of Nicaragua, "stricto sensu, the military and paramilitary attacks launched by the United States against Nicaragua do not constitute a case of civil strife. They are essentially the acts of the United States." If such a finding of the imputability of the acts of the contras to the United States were to be made, no question would arise of mere complicity in those acts, or of incitement of the contras to commit them.

115. The Court has taken the view (paragraph 110 above) that United States participation, even if preponderant or decisive, in the financing, organizing, training, supplying and equipping of the contras, the selection of its military or paramilitary targets, and the planning of the whole of its operation, is still insufficient in itself, on the basis of the evidence in the possession of the Court, for the purpose of attributing to the United States the acts committed by the contras in the course of their military or paramilitary operations in Nicaragua. All the forms of United States participation mentioned above, and even the general control by the respondent State over a force with a high degree of dependency on it, would not in themselves mean, without further evidence, that the United States directed or enforced the perpetration of the acts contrary to human rights and humanitarian law alleged by the applicant State. Such acts could well be committed by members of the contras without the control of the United States. For this conduct to give rise to legal responsibility of the United States, it would in principle have to be proved that that State had effective control of the military or paramilitary operations in the course of which the alleged violations were committed.

116. The Court does not consider that the assistance given by the United States to the contras warrants the conclusion that these forces are subject to the United States to such an extent that any acts they have committed are imputable to that State. It takes the view that the contras remain responsible for their acts, and that the United States is not responsible for the acts of the contras, but for its own conduct vis-à-vis Nicaragua, including conduct related to the acts of the contras. What the Court has to investigate is not the complaints relating to alleged violations of humanitarian law by the contras, regarded by Nicaragua as imputable to the United States, but rather unlawful acts for which the United States may be responsible directly in connection with the activities of the contras. The lawfulness or otherwise of such acts of the United States is a question different from the violations of humanitarian law of which the contras may or may not have been guilty. It is for this reason that the Court does not have to determine whether the violations of humanitarian law attributed to the contras were in fact committed by them. At the same time, the question whether the United States Government was, or must have been, aware at the relevant time that allegations of breaches of humanitarian law were being made against the contras is relevant to an assessment of the lawfulness of the action of the United States. In this respect, the material facts are primarily those connected with the issue in 1983 of a manual of psychological operations.

117. Nicaragua has in fact produced in evidence before the Court two publications which it claims were prepared by the CIA and supplied to the contras in 1983. The first of these, in Spanish, is entitled "Operaciones sicológicas en guerra de guerrillas" (Psychological Operations in Guerrilla Warfare), by "Tayacán" ; the certified copy supplied to the Court carries no publisher's name or date. In its Preface, the publication is described as > "a manual for the training of guerrillas in psychological operations, and its application to the concrete case of the Christian and democratic crusade being waged in Nicaragua by the Freedom Commandos".

The second is entitled the Freedom Fighter's Manual, with the subtitle "Practical guide to liberating Nicaragua from oppression and misery by paralyzing the military-industrial complex of the traitorous marxist state without having to use special tools and with minimal risk for the combatant". The text is printed in English and Spanish, and illustrated with simple drawings : it consists of guidance for elementary sabotage techniques. The only indications available to the Court of its authorship are reports in the New York Times, quoting a United States Congressman and their action can only be problematical and must remain entirely speculative. Clearly, they were not applying the Convention. But from that no inference could justifiably be drawn that they believed themselves to be applying a mandatory rule of customary international law. There is not a shred of evidence that they did and, as has been seen (paragraphs 22 and 23), there is no lack of other reasons for using the equidistance method, so that acting, or agreeing to act in a certain way, does not of itself demonstrate anything of a juridical nature.

77. The essential point in this connection—and it seems necessary to stress it—is that even if these instances of action by non-parties to the Convention were much more numerous than they in fact are, they would not, even in the aggregate, suffice in themselves to constitute the opinio juris;—for, in order to achieve this result, two conditions must be fulfilled. Not only must the acts concerned amount to a settled practice, but they must also be such, or be carried out in such a way, as to be evidence of a belief that this practice is rendered obligatory by the existence of a rule of law requiring it. The need for such a belief, i.e., the existence of a subjective element, is implicit in the very notion of the opinio juris sive necessitatis. The States concerned must therefore feel that they are conforming to what amounts to a legal obligation. The frequency, or even habitual character of the acts is not in itself enough. There are many international acts, e.g., in the field of ceremonial and protocol, which are performed almost invariably, but which are motivated only by considerations of courtesy, convenience or tradition, and not by any sense of legal duty.

78. In this respect the Court follows the view adopted by the Permanent Court of International Justice in the Lotus case, as stated in the following passage, the principle of which is, by analogy, applicable almost word for word, mutatis mutandis, to the present case (P.C.I.J., Series A, No. 10, 1927, at p. 28):

> "Even if the rarity of the judicial decisions to be found . . . were sufficient to prove . . . the circumstance alleged . . ., it would merely show that States had often, in practice, abstained from instituting criminal proceedings, and not that they recognized themselves as being obliged to do so; for only if such abstention were based on their being conscious of having a duty to abstain would it be possible to speak of an international custom. The alleged fact does not allow one to infer that States have been conscious of having such a duty; on the other hand, . . . there are other circumstances calculated to show that the contrary is true."

Applying this dictum to the present case, the position is simply that in certain cases—not a great number—the States concerned agreed to draw or did draw the boundaries concerned according to the principle of equidistance. There is no evidence that they so acted because they felt for the purpose of collecting revenue and in pursuit of that purpose exercised such authority as had been delegated to them by the Marathas cannot, in the view of the Court, be equated to a right of passage for the exercise of sovereignty.

It is clear from a study of the material placed before the Court that the situation underwent a change with the advent of the British as sovereign of that part of the country in place of the Marathas. The British found the Portuguese in occupation of the villages and exercising full and exclusive administrative authority over them. They accepted the situation as they found it and left the Portuguese in occupation of, and in exercise of exclusive authority over, the villages. The Portuguese held themselves out as sovereign over the villages. The British did not, as successors of the Marathas, themselves claim sovereignty, nor did they accord express recognition of Portuguese sovereignty, over them. The exclusive authority of the Portuguese over the villages was never brought in question. Thus Portuguese sovereignty over the villages was recognized by the British in fact and by implication and was subsequently tacitly recognized by India. As a consequence the villages comprised in the Maratha grant acquired the character of Portuguese enclaves within Indian territory.

For the purpose of determining whether Portugal has established the right of passage claimed by it, the Court must have regard to what happened during the British and post-British periods. During these periods, there had developed between the Portuguese and the territorial sovereign with regard to passage to the enclaves a practice upon which Portugal relies for the purpose of establishing the right of passage claimed by it.

With regard to Portugal's claim of a right of passage as formulated by it on the basis of local custom, it is objected on behalf of India that no local custom could be established between only two States. It is difficult to see why the number of States between which a local custom may be established on the basis of long practice must necessarily be larger than two. The Court sees no reason why long continued practice between two States accepted by them as regulating their relations should not form the basis of mutual rights and obligations between the two States.

As already stated, Portugal claims a right of passage to the extent necessary for the exercise of its sovereignty over the enclaves, without any immunity and subject to the regulation and control of India. In the course of the written and oral proceedings, the existence of the right was discussed with reference to the different categories making up the right, namely private persons, civil officials, goods in general, armed forces, armed police, and arms and

1. At the Initial Hearing in Case 002, the Trial Chamber heard oral argument in relation to all matters that it considered to be preliminary objections within the scope of Internal Rule 89. The Chamber also indicated that early clarification of a number of other legal issues raised by the parties may nonetheless assist in the fair and expeditious conduct of the trial.[1]

2. On 17 June 2011, the Office of the Co-Prosecutors filed a motion requesting the Trial Chamber to consider JCE III (the so-called extended form of joint criminal enterprise ("JCE")) as an alternative mode of liability in Case 002.[2] The Civil Party Lead Co-Lawyers filed a brief in support of the Co-Prosecutors Motion.[3] All Defence teams have opposed this motion, on grounds of its admissibility and merits.[4] The Co-Prosecutors filed a reply on 11 August 2011.[5]

3. The Chamber is additionally seised of a motion by the IENG Sary Defence of 24 February 2011 requesting that portions of the Closing Order be struck out due to defects.[6] The Co-Prosecutors responded to this motion on 16 March 2011.[7] The Chamber in this decision rules also on this motion insofar as it pertains to the applicability of JCE.[8]

2. PROCEDURAL HISTORY

4. On 8 December 2009, the Co-Investigating Judges issued an order holding JCE to be applicable in all of its forms before the ECCC.[9] On 18 and 22 January 2010, three Defence teams appealed this order to the Pre-Trial Chamber.[10] On 19 February 2010, the Co-Prosecutors filed a joint response to the Defence Motions, addressing the applicability of JCE in all of its forms, including JCE III.[11]

5. On 20 May 2010, the Pre-Trial Chamber rejected the Co-Prosecutors' reasoning in part, ruling that JCE III did not form part of customary international law between 1975 and 1979, but upholding the applicability of JCE I and II.[12] The Closing Order in Case 002 consequently did not include JCE III as a form of responsibility against any of the Accused but did allege responsibility in relation to all Accused pursuant to JCE I and II.[13]

6. The Co-Prosecutors did not appeal the exclusion of JCE III from the Closing Order pursuant to Internal Rules 67(5) and 74. In its motion before this Chamber, the Co-Prosecutors ask the Trial Chamber instead to re-characterize the facts in the Indictment in the verdict, where appropriate, as crimes committed pursuant to JCE III (rather than JCE I or II).[14]

7. The IENG Sary Defence challenge the inclusion of JCE in the Closing Order, in particular, its identification of the elements required for participation in a common criminal plan, and its treatment of the specific intent requirement for genocide.[15]

April 2011 ("[t]he Chamber is seized of various Motions concerning alleged deficiencies in the Indictment or in the Investigation, [... including requests that] parts of the Indictment should be struck out [....]. It is clear from the Rules that the Chamber is bound by the scope of the Indictment. [....] Should any ambiguity in the Indictment arise at trial, the Chamber will, on a case-by-case basis state its interpretation of the scope of the Indictment and will consider itself bound by this interpretation").

3. SUBMISSIONS

3.1. The Defence Motions

8. The IENG Sary Defence submits that the Closing Order failed to apply the correct mens rea concerning IENG Sary's participation in a common criminal plan.[16] The Closing Order alleges he participated in a non-criminal common plan that merely resulted in the commission of crimes. Such an allegation, if proven, does not support a prima facie case of JCE I. In addition, he submits that JCE as applied to the crime of genocide requires proof of a specific intent (i.e. intent to destroy, in whole or in part, a national, ethnical, racial or religious group).[17] As the Closing Order simply alleges the members of the JCE were aware of the perpetrators' genocidal intent but not that IENG Sary shared this genocidal intent, all reference to genocide must consequently be stricken from it.[18]

9. Although conceding that JCE I was unambiguously part of Cambodian law between 1975 and 1979, the IENG Thirith Defence submits that JCE II is ambiguous and uncertain and therefore inapplicable before the ECCC.[19]

10. The Co-Prosecutors submit IENG Sary misconstrues the Closing Order and that the facts included in the Closing Order support an inference that IENG Sary shared the intent to perpetrate crimes through a joint criminal enterprise.[20] They submit that JCE in all its forms was considered a criminal mode of liability within customary international law at the time relevant to Case 002.[21]

3.2. The Co-Prosecutor's Motion

3.2.1. Admissibility

11. All Defence teams contend that the Co-Prosecutor's Motion is inadmissible because it constitutes a jurisdictional challenge pursuant to Rule 89 and the deadline for the filing of preliminary objections has long since passed.[22]

12. The Co-Prosecutors argue that their motion is instead admissible pursuant to Rule 98(2).[23] This Rule permits the Trial Chamber to change the legal characterization of a crime as set out in the Indictment. They consider re-characterization to be consistent with the fair trial rights of the Accused because the Accused have been appraised of the Co-Prosecutors' intent to seek re-characterisation, and as the applicability of JCE III was extensively litigated at the pre-trial stage.[24] The Co-Prosecutors also note that the Trial Chamber granted a similar motion in Case 001.[25]

3.2.2. Merits

13. In their motion, the Co-Prosecutors urge the Trial Chamber to adopt the approach taken by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in Prosecutor v. Tadić concerning the applicability of JCE III.[26] In this regard, the Co-Prosecutors place particular reliance on two cases cited by the Tadić Appeal Judgement: the Essen Lynching Case from the British Military Court for the Trial of War Criminals, and the Borkum Island Case from the American Military Tribunal at Dachau.[27] They also argue, in the alternative, that JCE III constitutes a general principle of law and is applicable on this basis.[28]

14. Three Defence teams counter that the authorities relied upon by the Tadić Appeal Judgement do not support the existence of JCE III as a form of responsibility in customary international law between 1975-1979.[29] Two Defence teams also argue that JCE III is not a general principle of law.[30] The IENG Sary Defence further notes that the Tadić Appeal Judgement itself stated that domestic sources could not be relied on as irrefutable evidence that JCE III constituted a general principle of law.[31]

4. DELIBERATIONS

4.1. Introduction

15. Joint criminal enterprise was first set out by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Appeal Judgement in 1999. The ICTY Appeals Chamber has held that participation in a joint criminal enterprise constitutes a mode of liability in the form of commission.[32] Both the ECCC Pre-Trial and Trial Chambers have similarly found participation in a joint criminal enterprise to amount to commission within the scope of Article 29 (new) of the ECCC law.[33] The three categories of JCE articulated in the Tadić Appeal Judgement comprise:

- The basic category or JCE I, involving cases where all participants act pursuant to a common purpose and share the same criminal intent[34];
- The systemic category or JCE II, referring to instances of systemic ill-treatment in organized institutions, such as concentration camps[35]; and
- The extended form or JCE III, entailing liability of the members of the group for acts that occur as a natural and foreseeable consequence of carrying out the common purpose of the group.[36] To be found liable under this extended form of JCE, it must be shown than an Accused intended to participate in and further criminal activity of a group, and to contribute to its joint criminal enterprise. It must also be shown that it was foreseeable that a crime outside the scope of this agreement might be perpetrated by one or other members of the group and that the Accused willingly took the risk that this would occur.[37]

4.2. Required specificity of the Indictment in relation to Joint Criminal Enterprise

4.2.1. Applicable law

16. The Chamber notes that where crimes of specific intent are concerned, proof is required that the Accused possessed not only the intent to commit the underlying crime but also the special intent required by these offences.[38] In order to convict for genocide committed as part of a JCE, it follows that proof is required that the Accused possessed the intent to destroy in whole or in part a protected group.[39] Proof of genocidal intent may, however, be established on the basis of circumstantial evidence where it is the only reasonable conclusion in the circumstances of a case.[40]

17. The Trial Chamber further notes that joint criminal enterprise is a form of responsibility and not a crime in itself. In this regard, it is sufficient to show that the Accused participated in some way in the JCE, and that this participation either amounts to or involves the commission of a crime.[41] The case law of other international tribunals has consistently found that the common plan forming part of the joint criminal enterprise need not be criminal in nature so long as crimes are contemplated as a means of bringing the common plan to fruition.[42] On appeal before the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("SCSL") in Brima et. al., the Defence argued that the indictment was defective because the common plan alleged by the Prosecution was not a crime under international law.[43] Noting several cases from the ICTY and the Rome Statute, the SCSL Appeals Chamber held that the common plan, design or purpose of a joint criminal enterprise must either have as its objective a crime or contemplate crimes as the means of achieving its objective.[44] It concluded that "[a]lthough the objective of gaining and exercising political power and control over the territory of Sierra Leone may not be a crime under the Statute, the actions contemplated as a means to achieve that objective are crimes within the Statute."[45] The ICTY Appeals Chamber in Kvočka similarly noted that the foundation of the Prosecution case regarding joint criminal enterprise was the alleged common purpose of "the creation of a Serbian State within the former Yugoslavia."[46] Therefore, the common plan, design or purpose of a joint criminal enterprise must either have as its objective a crime or contemplate crimes as the means of achieving its objective. The common plan itself need not be criminal. .

4.2.2. Treatment of common purpose and mens rea for JCE in the Closing Order

18. In relation to the nature of the common plan alleged in Case 002, the Closing Order states:

> The common purpose of the CPK leaders was to implement rapid socialist revolution by (sic) in Cambodia through a "great leap forward" and to defend the Party against internal and external enemies, by whatever means necessary. The purpose itself was not entirely criminal in nature but its implementation resulted in and /or involved the commission of crimes within the jurisdiction of the ECCC.[47]

19. Although the plain language of this paragraph asserts that the purpose of the common plan was not entirely criminal, it clarifies that its implementation involved the commission of crimes within the jurisdiction of the ECCC. Further, the subsequent paragraph of the Closing Order indicates a number of criminal activities that "resulted in" or "were committed by members and non-members of the JCE."[48] This language makes it clear that the plan involved the commission of criminal acts by members of the JCE. The language accords with the above jurisprudence and does not support an inference that IENG Sary is accused of commission solely by participation in a non-criminal common plan.

20. Concerning the Accused's alleged genocidal mens rea as a participant in the JCE, the Amended Closing Order states:

> With regard to the policies targeting Chams and Vietnamese, the plan to eliminate these groups may not have existed until April 1977 for the Vietnamese and from 1977 for the Cham. From that moment, the members of the JCE knew that the implementation of the common purpose expanded to include the commission of genocide of these protected groups. Acceptance of > this greater range of criminal means, coupled with persistence in implementation, amounted to an intention of the JCE members to pursue the common purpose through genocide.[49]

21. Further, paragraphs 1532 to 1541 of the Amended Closing Order set forth the alleged conduct of the Accused and their participation in a joint criminal enterprise. This conduct, if proven, may lead to the conclusion that the Accused possessed the special intent necessary to prove genocide.[50] The Trial Chamber concludes that paragraph 1527 when read with the Amended Closing Order as a whole, does not apply the incorrect mens rea to the crime of genocide as committed as part of a joint criminal enterprise.

4.3. Applicability of JCE I and II

22. The Duch Judgement found that the notion of commission through participation in a joint criminal enterprise falls within the scope of Article 29 (new) of the ECCC law.[51] It further held that the systemic form of joint criminal enterprise, along with the basic form from which it derives (i.e. JCE I and II), were a part of customary international law between 1975 and 1979.[52] The applicability of JCE I and II before the ECCC has been further endorsed by the Pre-Trial Chamber as comprising recognized forms of responsibility in customary international law at the time relevant for Case 002.[53] The Trial Chamber accordingly finds that the applicability of JCE I and II before the ECCC constitutes settled law within the ECCC jurisprudence.

4.4. Applicability of JCE III

4.4.1. Admissibility of Co-Prosecutor's Motion

23. The Chamber notes that the Co-Prosecutors' theory of the case relies primarily on JCE I. The Co-Prosecutors state in their motion that the first form of joint criminal enterprise (JCE I) best reflects the nature of the liability of the Accused in Case 002.[54] They seek to add JCE

III only in the event that their primary theory proves inapplicable to certain facts.[55] They argue that there is a possibility – even if only remote – that a very limited number of criminal events alleged in the Closing Order may not have been within the scope of the common criminal plan as originally conceived.[56] In this case, they request the Trial Chamber to retain the discretion to criminalize this conduct pursuant to JCE III in the verdict, if appropriate.[57]

24. The Trial Chamber has previously held that legal re-characterization is permissible before the ECCC pursuant to Rule 98(2).[58] The Trial Chamber in the Duch Judgement noted that the Accused in that case was on notice that the issue of JCE was before the Chamber and that it intended to rule on the issue in the verdict. It therefore held that application of this mode of responsibility did not breach the fair trial rights of the Accused.[59]

25. The Chamber finds that it may at any time change the legal characterisation of facts contained in the Amended Closing Order to accord with any other applicable form of criminal responsibility up to and including in the verdict. This is subject only to the overriding requirements of a fair trial.[60] Although, unlike in Case 001, the Co-Prosecutors did not notify the parties and the Judges at the Initial Hearing that it would ask the Trial Chamber to consider JCE III in this case, the Co-Prosecutor's Motion has nonetheless raised the issue before the commencement of the trial on the substance.[61] There is accordingly no unfairness to the Accused in considering the Co-Prosecutor's Motion at this time. The Chamber finds that the Prosecutor's request for re-characterisation does not breach the Accused's right to be adequately informed of the nature of the charges against him or any other fair trial principle. The Trial Chamber accordingly rejects IENG Sary's later request to determine this issue solely on grounds of admissibility.[62]

4.4.2. Merits of Co-Prosecutor's Motion

26. The Trial Chamber notes, at the outset, that the applicability of JCE III has been extensively litigated before the ECCC. This issue has also already undergone appellate scrutiny before the Pre-Trial Chamber in Case 002. Although the Trial Chamber is not a review or appellate body from decisions of the Pre-Trial Chamber, it is now confronted with a motion substantially similar to that previously before the Pre-Trial Chamber. For reasons of judicial economy, the Trial Chamber will not issue lengthy decisions in circumstances where it can find no cogent reasons to depart from the Pre-Trial Chamber's analysis and where it concurs in the result.

4.4.2.1. The Pre-Trial Chamber Decision

27. The Pre-Trial Chamber's JCE Decision extensively reviewed pre-1975 legal instruments, including the Nuremberg Charter and Control Council Law No. 10. It concurred with the findings of the Trial Chamber in the Duch Judgement that JCE I and JCE II were recognized forms of responsibility in customary international law during the period relevant to Case 002.[63] However, it held that these international instruments do not specifically recognize JCE III.[64] It also examined the post-World War II cases cited by the Tadić Appeal Judgement, including Borkum Island and Essen Lynching, to determine whether customary international law included JCE III as a form of responsibility at the relevant time.[65] It concluded that the cases decided pursuant to Control Council Law No. 10 did not support an inference that these convictions were based on JCE III.[66] It further found that several national authorities cited in support of the application of JCE III also provided insufficient evidence of consistent state practice or opinio juris at the time relevant to Case 002.[67]

28. Finally, the Pre-Trial Chamber considered whether JCE III could be upheld as a form of responsibility as a 'general principle of law recognized by civilized nations.'[68] The Pre-

68 PTC JCE Decision, para. 84. "General principles of law recognized by civilized nations" are a source of international law distinct from customary and conventional law (see Statute of the International Court of Justice, Article 38(1)(c)). It is unclear in both the case law and the scholarly literature as to whether this principle may independently provide the source of a principle of international law of general application, or whether it is instead merely supplementary proof that this principle has been accepted as a norm of customary international law; see e.g. Malcolm Shaw, International Law (Cambridge 2003) pp. 93-99 ("There are various opinions as to what the general principles of law concept is intended to refer. .... [M]ost writers are prepared to accept that the Trial Chamber noted the conclusion in the Tadić Appeal Judgement that common purpose liability was not adopted by most domestic legal systems.[69] Ultimately however, the Pre-Trial Chamber did not rule on whether JCE III amounted to a general principle of law, on grounds that any such a principle would not have been sufficiently foreseeable and accessible to the Accused in Case 002, because there was no basis for JCE III liability within Cambodian domestic law.[70]

29. For the reasons outlined below, the Trial Chamber agrees in substance with the Pre-Trial Chamber's analysis of the above post-WWII cases. Further, the Trial Chamber has undertaken its own analysis of the extent to which JCE III is recognized by various national legal systems. It has concluded that JCE III cannot be considered to have been a general principle of law between 1975 and 1979.

4.4.2.2. World War II era cases cited in the Tadić Appeal Judgement

4.4.2.2.1. Borkum Island and Essen Lynching

30. In the Borkum Island case, the charging instrument accused several German nationals of having wrongfully encouraged, aided, abetted and participated in the assault and killing of seven American airmen.[71] The Americans had crash-landed on Borkum Island and a German military commander ordered that the Americans be marched by a guard unit through the town and not protected against any attack by civilians. The Americans were beaten by several members of the public and, according to one account, one was shot by an off-duty German soldier. All seven Americans were ultimately killed.[72] Fifteen Accused were tried for the deaths, including two civilians, five officers, and the members of the guard detail.[73] Fourteen of the fifteen Accused were convicted and received sentences ranging from two years to the death penalty.[74] However, the basis for these convictions cannot be ascertained because no reasoned judgement was produced. Also unclear from the verdict is the extent to which any defendant was found criminally responsible for an act not directly perpetrated by him.

general principles do constitute a separate source of law but of fairly limited scope, and this is reflected in the decisions of the Permanent Court of International Justice and the International Court of Justice.")

72 Borkum Island case, at 191.

73 Borkum Island case, at 191.

74 Borkum Island case, at 191.

Although the basis for conviction in this case could have been JCE III, the Chamber finds that it might equally have been some other form of responsibility.

31. Similarly, the record of the judgement in the Essen Lynching case exists only as a summary provided by the UN War Crimes Commission.[75] The legal basis for its conviction is also unclear. In fact, the decision summary makes several references to incitement, instigation, and ordering, lending support to the conclusion that the convictions may have been based on other modes of liability.[76] The Chamber therefore finds that the inference drawn by the Tadić Appeal Judgement that this conviction was based on JCE III is not the only possible one based on the surviving record.

4.4.2.3. Other World War II era cases

32. The Trial Chamber has additionally considered other relevant decisions, cited in a recent decision of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon issued subsequent to the Pre-Trial Chamber's JCE Decision.[77] The Trial Chamber has reviewed these additional World War II era cases, but considers that they also do not support a conclusion as to the existence of JCE III in general international law between 1975 and 1979.

33. Although the Interlocutory Decision of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon found JCE III to be applicable, it distinguished the Pre-Trial Chamber's JCE Decision in view of the relevance to the Special Tribunal for Lebanon of jurisprudence dating from the early 1990s.[78] The Interlocutory Decision of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon, however, also cites a number of additional post-World War II era cases, which it claims support the earlier existence of JCE III within general international law.[79]

34. Two of these cases, U.S. v. Ulrich and Merkle and U.S. v. Wuelfert, originate from the Dachau Military Tribunal.[80] These cases involved private businessmen who owned factories near the Dachau concentration camp and employed prisoners at their factories for slave labour. They were held responsible for the mistreatment of the prisoners at the Dachau camp and at the factories, including killings, beatings, torture and starvation. Again, the Interlocutory Decision of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon cites review judgements which do not provide the legal reasoning behind the affirmed convictions. The review judgement in U.S. v. Ulrich merely concludes that "[b]oth of the Accused were shown to have participated in the mass atrocity and the Court was warranted by the evidence adduced … in concluding … that they not only participated to a substantial degree, but the nature and extent of their participation was such as to warrant the sentence imposed."[81] These cases appear to support JCE I or JCE II because the Accused were part of the concentration camp apparatus and personally participated in the mistreatment of prisoners. These crimes do not necessarily support guilt based upon JCE III; i.e., responsibility for crimes which were outside the scope of the common plan but which were nonetheless the natural and foreseeable consequence of it.

35. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber does not consider these additional authorities to support its conclusion that JCE III had emerged as a principle of customary international law by the time relevant to Case 002.

4.4.2.4. JCE III as a 'general principle of law'

36. Finally, the Co-Prosecutors cite several national criminal codes to show that JCE III constituted a 'general principle of law recognized by civilized nations' from 1975 until 1979.[82] As the Pre-Trial Chamber did not expressly rule on the issue of whether JCE III constituted a 'general principle of law', the Chamber has additionally considered these arguments.

37. The ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Tadić Appeal Judgement found that "reference to national legislation and case law only serves to show that the notion of common purpose upheld in international criminal law has an underpinning in many national systems."[83] However it also emphasised that "national legislation and case law cannot be relied upon as a source of international principles or rules, under the doctrine of the general principles of law recognised by the nations of the world: for this reliance to be permissible, it would be necessary to show that most, if not all, countries adopt the same notion of common purpose."[84] The Trial Chamber's own survey of several national legal systems, including the United Kingdom,[85] United States,[86] Germany,[87] the Soviet Union,[88] the Netherlands,[89] France,[90] and Cambodia[91] has also shown considerable divergence of approach between various national jurisdictions. It therefore confirms the assessment of the ICTY Appeals Chamber that state practice in this area lacks sufficient uniformity to be considered a general principle of law.

38. The Trial Chamber consequently finds that the Co-Prosecutors have failed to establish that JCE III formed part of customary international law between 1975 and 1979. It therefore

[84] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para. 225.

[85] The joint enterprise doctrine applied by English courts as of 1975 provided liability only for crimes, which were 'authorized' by the joint enterprise. This form of liability resembles JCE I rather than JCE III (see e.g. Anderson and Morris (1966) 2 QB 110; see also A. Ashworth, Principles of Criminal Law (Oxford, 1999), p. 448).

[86] In the United States, a type of common purpose liability exists under the label of conspiracy (see e.g. Pinkerton v. United States, 328 U.S. 640 (1946)). However, conspiracy is a distinct offence, consummated upon entering into the agreement to commit the offence, and not a form of responsibility.

[87] One form of intent within the German criminal code is referred to as dolus eventualis (see P. Cramer and G. Heine, in A. Schoenke, H. Schroeder et al., Strafgesetzbuch Kommentar (27th ed., Munich: C.H. Beck, 2006), at 277). However, the German High Court has refused to infer intent in the form of dolus eventualis in cases where crimes committed by the co-perpetrator were outside of the agreed plan (see e.g. Reichsgericht RGSt 44, 321; a judgment of 2 February 1911, where the common plan was to inflict bodily harm but where one perpetrator instead killed the victim).

[88] Soviet law applicable in 1975 provided that the commission of an offence with a prior agreement is an aggravating factor at sentencing (Article 17.1, Ugolovnii Kodeks RSFSR (The Criminal Code of Russian Soviet Republic), adopted on 27 October 1960). The person creating and directing a group is only liable for the offences committed by members of the group if that was part of the agreement and he intended these crimes to be committed. The modern Russian Criminal Code has further elaborated on that provision, providing that the participants of the agreement are not liable for the so-called 'excess of the perpetrator' when the principal commits crimes not intended by other members: see Articles 30(2), 35(7), 36 Ugolovnii Kodeks Rossiskoi Federacii (The Criminal Code of Russian Federation), adopted by the State Duma on 24 May 1996 and by the Federation Council on 5 June 5 1996.

[89] Co-perpetration in Dutch law prior to 1981 resembled JCE I type liability in that it requires shared intent in collaboration (see Dutch Supreme Court Ruling dated 17 November 1981, NJ 1983, 84/197 cited in van Sliedregt, The Criminal Responsibility of Individuals for Violations of International Humanitarian Law, TMC Asser Press, 2003, p. 75).

[90] Co-action and complicité (which encompasses, inter alia, aiding and abetting and instigation) are two modes of criminal liability foreseen in the French Penal Code. Co-action implies direct participation in the commission of the crimes together with one or more co-perpetrators (see Article 121-7). Both co-action and complicité imply the existence of a common or shared intent to commit or facilitate a crime. Neither concept reflects JCE III liability as defined in the Tadić Appeal judgment as they both exclude liability of co-perpetrators or accomplices for crimes outside the scope of the common or shared intent. In addition, the French legal concept of association de malfaiteurs is defined as "a criminal association consist[ing] of any group formed or any conspiracy established with a view to the preparation, marked by one or more material actions, of one or more crimes [...]". This differs from JCE III as association de malfaiteurs is not a mode of liability, but is a crime in itself. In 1992, genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes were criminalized in the French Penal Code, including a specific form of association de malfaiteurs with regard to any of the same; see Law No. 92-684, 22 July 1992, JORF No. 169, 23 July 1992, p. 9875.

[91] Cambodia law retains in the 1956 Cambodian Penal Code the same forms of responsibility as are present in French law, including co-action and complicité (see Articles 82-87). It also criminalizes association de malfaiteurs (see Article 290). As in French Law, a specific form of association de malfaiteurs with regard to genocide, crimes against humanity and, war crimes were recently criminalized in Cambodian law (see Articles 185, 190 and 196 of the Cambodian Penal Code of 2009). However, none of these forms of responsibility or crimes (in the case of association de malfaiteurs) supports the application of JCE III liability (see footnote 94).

denies the Co-Prosecutors' request that the Chamber re-characterize, if appropriate, the crimes alleged in the Closing Order to include JCE III in the verdict.

FOR THE FOREGOING REASONS, THE TRIAL CHAMBER:

REJECTS the Defence Motions insofar as they allege that joint criminal enterprise was improperly included in the Closing Order in Case 002;

DECLARES the Co-Prosecutors' Motion admissible pursuant to Rule 98;

REAFFIRMS the applicability of JCE I and II (the so-called basic and systematic forms of joint criminal enterprise) to Case 002 and consequently rejects the Defence Motions insofar as they allege that these forms of JCE did not constitute recognized forms of criminal participation within general international law between 1975 and 1979;

FINDS that JCE III (the so-called extended form of joint criminal enterprise) did not form part of customary international law and was not a general principle of law at the time relevant to Case 002; and DENIES in consequence the request of the Co-Prosecutors to re-characterise in the verdict, if appropriate, the crimes alleged in the Closing Order to include JCE III.

(iii) the law providing for that form of liability must have been sufficiently accessible at the relevant time to anyone who acted in such a way;

(iv) such person must have been able to foresee that he could be held criminally liable for his actions if apprehended.[114]

44. The Pre-Trial Chamber is not convinced by IENG Sary's argument that the OCIJ should have applied a stricter test than the one applied at the international level and required that JCE liability be established in Cambodian law because the ECCC "is a domestic court".[115] It finds that the above test, which was referred to by the OCIJ,[116] is the correct one.

45. The Pre-Trial Chamber considers that some ICTY decisions seem to imply that if a form of responsibility existed in customary international law at the relevant time, foreseeability and accessibility can be presumed.[117] However, the Pre-Trial Chamber considers it safer to ascertain not only whether JCE existed under customary international law at the relevant time, thus being punishable under international criminal law, but also whether it was sufficiently accessible and foreseeable to the Charged Persons. As to the requirement of foreseeability, a charged person must be able to appreciate that the conduct is criminal in the sense generally understood, without reference to any specific provision. As to accessibility, reliance can be placed on a law which is based on custom.[118] Contrary to what some of the Appellants assert, the question of whether JCE is a form of responsibility recognized in domestic law may be relevant when determining whether it was foreseeable to the Charged Person that his/her alleged conduct may entail criminal responsibility. However, it is not necessary that JCE also be punishable in domestic law in addition to being a recognized form of liability under customary international law for it to apply before the ECCC.[119]

46. The Pre-Trial Chamber will now turn to several errors alleged by the Ieng Sary Appeal and the Khieu Samphan Appeal which, in the Appellants' views, would bar the application of JCE at the ECCC irrespective of whether it was a form of liability recognized in customary international before or during the period of 1975-1979.

47. As to the allegation that the OCIJ erred when, citing the Pre-Trial Chamber in Case 001,[120] it found that "the application of international customary law before the ECCC is a corollary from the finding that ECCC holds indicia of an international court applying international law",[121] the Pre-Trial Chamber considers this immaterial to the issue of whether the ECCC can apply JCE. The OCIJ indeed referred both to the "international aspects of the ECCC, and [to the fact that] the jurisprudence relied upon in articulating JCE pre-dated the events under investigation at the ECCC [to conclude] that there is a basis under international law for applying JCE before the ECCC".[122] However, whether the ECCC "holds indicia of an international court applying international law", "[f]or all practical and legal purposes, [...] is, and operates as, an independent entity within the Cambodian court structure [...]" as found by the Pre-Trial Chamber in Case 001,[123] is "a separately constituted, independent and internationalised court" as found by the Trial Chamber in the same case,[124] or rather is a domestic, Cambodian court as alleged by the Appellant does > Secretariat. For the purpose of these Regulations, the expressions 'United Nations Secretariat', "staff members" or "staff" shall refer to all the staff members of the Secretariat, within the meaning of Article 97[3] of the Charter of the United Nations, whose employment and contractual relationship are defined by a letter of appointment subject to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly pursuant to Article 101, paragraph 1[4], of the Charter. The Secretary-General, as the chief administrative officer, shall provide and enforce such staff rules consistent with these principles as he or she considers necessary".

28. It is clear that the Charter requires that staff members be "appointed" by the Secretary-General (or those to whom this power has been delegated). The hallmark of a staff relationship is "appointment", and this is done through a letter of appointment pursuant to staff regulation 4.1. The Staff Regulations apply to all staff members of the Secretariat, within the meaning of Article 97 of the Charter, whose employment relationship and contractual link with the Organization are through a letter of appointment issued pursuant to regulations promulgated by the General Assembly. Such letter is signed either by the Secretary-General or by an official in the name of the Secretary-General.

29. Upon appointment, staff members become international civil servants pursuant to Regulation 1.1. As a consequence, their responsibilities as staff members are not national but exclusively international. Staff members have to subscribe to the following written declaration witnessed by the Secretary-General or his or her authorized representative:

> "I solemnly declare and promise to exercise in all loyalty, discretion and conscience the functions entrusted to me as an international civil servant of the United Nations, to discharge these functions and regulate my conduct with the interests of the United Nations only in view, and not to seek or accept instructions in regard to the performance of my duties from any Government or other source external to the Organization".

[3] The Secretariat shall comprise a Secretary General and such staff as the Organisation may require.
[4] The staff shall be appointed by the Secretary-General under Regulations established by the General Assembly.

FOURTH SECTION

CASE OF A.B. v. SLOVAKIA

(Application no. 41784/98)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

4 March 2003

FINAL

This judgment will become final in the circumstances set out in Article 44 § 2 of the Convention. It may be subject to editorial revision.

53. The applicant further submitted that, as a result, she had been placed at a disadvantage vis-à-vis the defendant whose representative had the possibility of consulting the case-file and submitting the arguments orally to the Regional Court. She concluded that her rights under Article 6 § 1 of the Convention had not been respected.

2. The Court's assessment

(a) The relevant principles

54. The key principle governing the application of Article 6 is fairness. The right to a fair trial holds so prominent a place in a democratic society that there can be no justification for interpreting the guarantees of Article 6 § 1 of the Convention restrictively (see, mutatis mutandis, Moreira de Azevedo v. Portugal, judgment of 23 October 1990, Series A no. 189, § 66).

55. The principle of equality of arms – one of the elements of the broader concept of fair trial – requires that each party should be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present his or her case under conditions that do not place him or her at a substantial disadvantage vis-à-vis his or her opponent (see Dombo Beheer B.V. v. the Netherlands, judgment of 27 October 1993, Series A no. 274, p. 19, § 33; Ankerl v. Switzerland, judgment of 23 October 1996, Reports of Judgments and Decisions 1996-V, pp. 1567-68, § 38). In this context, importance is to be attached to, inter alia, the appearance of the fair administration of justice. Here, as in other aspects of Article 6, the seriousness of what is at stake for the applicant will be of relevance to assessing the adequacy and fairness of the procedures (see P., C. and S. v. the United Kingdom, no. 56547/00, § 91, 16 July 2002).

56. Finally, from the Convention standpoint, a hearing may be held "unfair" and in breach of Article 6 even in the absence of proof of actual prejudice (see Artico v. Italy, judgment of 13 May 1980, Series A no. 37, § 35).

(b) Application of the above principles to the instant case

57. The Court notes that at the relevant time Article 250f of the Code of Civil Procedure permitted the courts to decide in similar cases without a prior oral hearing, in particular when there was no doubt that the administrative authority had established the facts correctly and the point at issue was a question of law. However, such was apparently not the case in the proceedings under consideration as the Regional Court scheduled a hearing and considered it appropriate to hear the parties prior to deciding on the case.

58. In her submissions to the Bratislava City Court and to the Bratislava Regional Court, which took over the case from the former, the applicant requested that a lawyer be appointed to represent her. On 23 January 1997 whether such proceedings would have led to a decision being given more rapidly, because in any event they constituted a remedy too indirect to be taken into consideration (see, mutatis mutandis, the Deweer judgment of 27 February 1980, Series A no. 35, pp. 17 and 18, paras. 29 in fine and 31).

The objection must therefore be dismissed.

II. ALLEGED VIOLATION OF ARTICLE 6 PARA. 1 (art. 6-1)

62. Before making any ruling on the alleged violation of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), the Court has to decide whether that provision is applicable.

A. Applicability of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1)

63. According to the Government, there is no sign in the contested proceedings of any "contestation" (dispute) concerning the applicant's "civil rights and obligations". Mr Moreira de Azevedo had never claimed compensation for the damage sustained inasmuch as the status of assistente was not equivalent to the submission of such a claim. Only an express application lodged at the same time as the indictment, or within the time-limit in which the indictment could be drawn up, would have constituted objective evidence of an intention to claim compensation.

64. Mr Moreira de Azevedo argued, on the other hand, and he referred to the case-law of the Supreme Court (see paragraph 54 above), that a statement expressing a wish to intervene as assistente in itself incorporated an implied claim for financial reparation. In support of this view he cited his request that the decision as to the amount of damages be deferred until the subsequent enforcement proceedings (see paragraph 46 above).

65. The Commission took the view that the applicant had never asserted his civil rights by filing a formal claim for compensation in the criminal proceedings, as was required under Article 32 of the Code of Criminal Procedure. It considered that the guarantees secured under Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention did not apply to situations in which, following a conviction, the court awarded a sum of money, of its own motion; it therefore concluded that Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) was not applicable.

66. In the Court's opinion, the right to a fair trial holds so prominent a place in a democratic society that there can be no justification for interpreting Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention restrictively.

Conformity with the spirit of the Convention requires that the word "contestation" should not be construed too technically and that it should be given a substantive rather than a formal meaning. Besides, it has no counterpart in the English text of Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1) ("in the determination of his civil rights and obligations"; cf. Article 49 (art. 49): "dispute" - see, mutatis mutandis, the Le Compte, Van Leuven and De Meyere judgment of 23 June 1981, Series A no. 43, p. 20, para. 45).

PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE ZUPANČIČ

I voted with the majority on all points except the question of just satisfaction. I find the statement that it is "impossible [for the Court] to speculate as to the outcome of the court-martial proceedings" (paragraph 26 of the judgment) wholly unsatisfactory, the more so since the Court's own case-law, going back to the Colozza v. Italy case, judgment of 12 February 1985, does not offer any substantive explanation for this doctrine.

The question turns on the interpretation of Article 41 of the Convention, that is to say on the meaning of the words "... if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made..." In these cases the domestic law of the respondent State ought to provide for a retrial.

It cannot be logically maintained that a conviction and sentence in a criminal case are legitimate if the criminal procedure in question violates the essential precepts of a fair trial, due process and so on. The legitimacy of a substantive judgment depends on the legitimacy of the procedure by which it was arrived at. To hold otherwise – that is, to separate the procedure entirely from its substantive outcome (conviction and sentence) – would reduce the meaning and import of the procedure to an ancillary status. This would mean, as it used to mean in the purely inquisitorial procedure, considering the procedure a mere "adjective" to the "substantive" importance of the case.

That, however, is no longer a tenable position. If it were, a fair trial would not be as central to the meaning of Article 6 of the Convention as it is, neither would the exclusionary rule figure as an essential procedural sanction in most national jurisdictions as well as in some international instruments such as the United Nations Convention against Torture (Article 15).

To say in the instant cases that it is "impossible to speculate as to the [substantive] outcome" of the case, in other words to say that the Court does not know what would have happened if the precepts of a fair trial had in fact been respected, is itself a speculation. It is a speculation that the case would have been decided identically – that the defendant would have been convicted – even if the trial had in fact been fair.

The Court is therefore faced with a dilemma. It is forced to speculate whether it accepts the final substantive outcome of the case or not.

The words in Article 41 "... if the internal law of the High Contracting Party concerned allows only partial reparation to be made..." ought, therefore, to be implemented so as to require the respondent State to permit retrial of the cases.

Some of the Contracting States' jurisdictions do in fact have appropriate provisions in their codes of criminal procedure. Those provisions afford a legal basis for convicted persons in situations similar to those of the applicants in the instant case to request retrials. Such convicted persons thus acquire standing to lodge a special appeal where the European Court of Human Rights has held that the national criminal proceedings in which they were convicted did not satisfy a particular procedural requirement of the Convention. Only in such circumstances, I think, is the purpose of Article 41 fully achieved.

In situations such as the ones we are faced with here, however – in which no special post-conviction remedy is provided in the national legislation – the Court ought to take a less defeatist approach. Our judgment should at least imply that the national legislation ought to provide for retrial of cases in which the proceedings have been found not to comply with essential procedural requirements. That, I think, is the purpose of the Article 41 words referring to the reparation allowed by internal law.

COURT (CHAMBER)

CASE OF EDWARDS v. THE UNITED KINGDOM

(Application no. 13071/87)

JUDGMENT

recognise her assailant, had failed to identify the applicant from a police photograph album (see paragraph 12 above) and (2) the existence of fingerprints which had been found at the scene of the crime (see paragraph 11 above). If his counsel had been aware of these facts he would have been able to attack the credibility of police testimony. Bearing in mind that this was the main evidence against him there existed a possibility that one more juror might have been persuaded that he was innocent which would have led to his acquittal (see paragraphs 6 and 18 above). As a result, the defence was denied an adequate opportunity to examine the police witnesses and was not on an equal footing with the prosecution as required by paragraph 3 (d) of Article 6 (art. 6-3-d).

In the applicant's view the proceedings before the Court of Appeal did not remedy the defects at the trial since it neither heard the police witnesses nor called for the production of the report of the independent police investigation (the Carmichael report) which had not been disclosed to his legal advisers (see paragraph 9 above). In consequence, he had two incomplete hearings before two separate courts.

31. The Government maintained that, in determining whether there had been unfairness, the proceedings must be considered as a whole including those before the Court of Appeal. The applicant who had been provided with all the relevant information concerning the undisclosed facts had every opportunity, through his lawyer, to submit to the Court of Appeal that his conviction should be quashed. Moreover that court had examined his conviction in the light of the new evidence thoroughly and conscientiously but had concluded that it should be upheld. It was not open to the European Court to substitute its judgment on the facts for that of the Court of Appeal. Finally the Government contended that Article 6 para. 3 (d) (art. 6-3-d) was not relevant to the issue of the non-disclosure of evidence to the defence which fell more appropriately to be considered under paragraph 1 of Article 6 (art. 6-1).

32. The Commission was of the view that paragraph 3 (d) (art. 6-3-d) was relevant to the applicant's complaint but concluded that, having regard to the proceedings as a whole, there had been no breach of Article 6 para. 1 read in conjunction with this provision (art. 6-1, art. 6-3-d).

33. The Court recalls that the guarantees in paragraph 3 of Article 6 (art. 6-3) are specific aspects of the right to a fair trial set forth in paragraph 1 (art. 6-1) (see, as the most recent authority, the T. v. Italy judgment of 12 October 1992, Series A no. 245-C, p. 41, para. 25). In the circumstances of the case it finds it unnecessary to examine the relevance of paragraph 3 (d) (art. 6-3-d) to the case since the applicant's allegations, in any event, amount to a complaint that the proceedings have been unfair. It will therefore confine its examination to this point.

34. In so doing, the Court must consider the proceedings as a whole including the decision of the appellate court (see, amongst other authorities, the Helmers v. Sweden judgment of 29 October 1991, Series A no. 212, p. 15, para. 31). Moreover it is not within the province of the European Court to substitute its own assessment of the facts for that of the domestic courts and, as a general rule, it is for these courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task is to ascertain whether the proceedings in their entirety, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair (see, inter alia, the Vidal v. Belgium judgment of 22 April 1992, Series A no. 235-B, pp. 32-33, para. 33).

35. The applicant's conviction was based mainly on police evidence, which he contested, that he had confessed to the offences. It subsequently came to light that certain facts (see paragraphs 11 and 12 above) had not been disclosed by the police to the defence which would have enabled it to attack the credibility and veracity of police testimony.

36. The Court considers that it is a requirement of fairness under paragraph 1 of Article 6 (art. 6-1), indeed one which is recognised under English law, that the prosecution authorities disclose to the defence all material evidence for or against the accused and that the failure to do so in the present case gave rise to a defect in the trial proceedings.

However, when this was discovered, the Secretary of State, following an independent police investigation, referred the case to the Court of Appeal which examined the transcript of the trial including the applicant's alleged confession and considered in detail the impact of the new information on the conviction (see paragraphs 11-14 above).

37. In the proceedings before the Court of Appeal the applicant was represented by senior and junior counsel who had every opportunity to seek to persuade the court that the conviction should not stand in view of the evidence of non-disclosure. Admittedly the police officers who had given evidence at the trial were not heard by the Court of Appeal. It was, none the less, open to counsel for the applicant to make an application to the Court - which they chose not to do - that the police officers be called as witnesses (see paragraph 15 above).

38. In the course of the hearing before the European Court the applicant claimed, for the first time, that without the disclosure of the Carmichael report to the applicant or to the Court of Appeal the proceedings, considered as a whole, could not be fair (see paragraph 9 above). However it is not disputed that he could have applied to the Court of Appeal for the production of this report but did not do so. It is no answer to the failure to make such an application that the Crown might have resisted by claiming public interest immunity since such a claim would have been for the court to determine (see paragraph 21 above).

39. Having regard to the above, the Court concludes that the defects of the original trial were remedied by the subsequent procedure before the Court of Appeal (see, in this respect, the Adolf v. Austria judgment of 26 March 1982, Series A no. 49, pp. 17-18, paras. 38-41 and, mutatis mutandis,

EUROPEAN COURT OF HUMAN RIGHTS

COURT (PLENARY)

CASE OF KOSTOVSKI v. THE NETHERLANDS

(Application no. 11454/85)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

20 November 1989

...

(d) to examine or have examined witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;

..."

The Commission arrived at the conclusion, which was contested by the Government, that there had been a breach of paragraph 1, taken together with paragraph 3 (d), of Article 6 (art. 6-1, art. 6-3-d).

38. The source of the applicant's allegation was the use as evidence, by the Utrecht District Court and the Amsterdam Court of Appeal, of reports of statements by two anonymous persons. The latter had been heard by the police and, in one case, also by the examining magistrate but were not themselves heard at either of the trials (see paragraphs 11, 13, 15, 16, 18 and 19 above).

39. It has to be recalled at the outset that the admissibility of evidence is primarily a matter for regulation by national law (see the Schenk judgment of 12 July 1988, Series A no. 140, p. 29, § 46). Again, as a general rule it is for the national courts to assess the evidence before them (see the Barberà, Messegué and Jabardo judgment of 6 December 1988, Series A no. 146, p. 31, § 68).

In the light of these principles the Court sees its task in the present case as being not to express a view as to whether the statements in question were correctly admitted and assessed but rather to ascertain whether the proceedings considered as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair (ibid.).

This being the basic issue, and also because the guarantees in paragraph 3 of Article 6 (art. 6-3) are specific aspects of the right to a fair trial set forth in paragraph 1 (art. 6-1) (see, inter alia, the same judgment, p. 31, § 67), the Court will consider the applicant's complaints from the angle of paragraphs 3 (d) and 1 taken together (art. 6-3-d, art. 6-1).

40. The Court notes that only one of the authors of the statements - namely the person whose statements were read out at the trial - was, under Netherlands law, regarded as a "witness" (see paragraph 18 above). However, in view of the autonomous interpretation to be given to this term (see the Bönisch judgment of 6 May 1985, Series A no. 92, p. 15, §§ 31-32), both authors should be so regarded for the purposes of Article 6 § 3 (d) (art. 6-3-d) of the Convention, since the statements of both of them, whether read out at the trial or not, were in fact before the court and were taken into account by it.

41. In principle, all the evidence must be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument (see the above-mentioned Barberà, Messegué and Jabardo judgment, Series A no. 146, p. 34, § 78). This does not mean, however, that in order to be used as evidence statements of witnesses should always be made at a public hearing in court: to use as evidence such statements obtained at the pre-trial stage is not in itself inconsistent with paragraphs 3 (d) and 1 of Article 6 (art. 6-3-d, art. 6-1) provided the rights of the defence have been respected.

As a rule, these rights require that an accused should be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either at the time the witness was making his statement or at some later stage of the proceedings (see, mutatis mutandis, the Unterpertinger judgment of 24 November 1986, Series A no. 110, pp. 14-15, § 31).

42. Yet such an opportunity was not afforded to the applicant in the present case, although there could be no doubt that he desired to challenge and question the anonymous persons involved. Not only were the latter not heard at the trials but also their declarations were taken, whether by the police or the examining magistrate, in the absence of Mr Kostovski and his counsel (see paragraphs 11, 13, 15 and 16 above). Accordingly, at no stage could they be questioned directly by him or on his behalf.

It is true that the defence was able, before both the Utrecht District Court and the Amsterdam Court of Appeal, to question one of the police officers and both of the examining magistrates who had taken the declarations (see paragraphs 17 and 19 above). It was also able, but as regards only one of the anonymous persons, to submit written questions to him/her indirectly through the examining magistrate (see paragraph 16 above). However, the nature and scope of the questions it could put in either of these ways were considerably restricted by reason of the decision that the anonymity of the authors of the statements should be preserved (see paragraphs 16, 17 and 19 above).

The latter feature of the case compounded the difficulties facing the applicant. If the defence is unaware of the identity of the person it seeks to question, it may be deprived of the very particulars enabling it to demonstrate that he or she is prejudiced, hostile or unreliable. Testimony or other declarations inculpating an accused may well be designedly untruthful or simply erroneous and the defence will scarcely be able to bring this to light if it lacks the information permitting it to test the author's reliability or cast doubt on his credibility. The dangers inherent in such a situation are obvious.

43. Furthermore, each of the trial courts was precluded by the absence of the said anonymous persons from observing their demeanour under questioning and thus forming its own impression of their reliability. The courts admittedly heard evidence on the latter point (see paragraphs 17 and 19 above) and no doubt - as is required by Netherlands law (see paragraph 32 above) - they observed caution in evaluating the statements in question, but this can scarcely be regarded as a proper substitute for direct observation.

CASE OF KRASNIKI v. THE CZECH REPUBLIC

(Application no. 51277/99)

JUDGMENT

28/05/2006

This judgment will become final in the circumstances set out in Article 44 § 2 of the Convention. It may be subject to editorial revision.

B. The Court's assessment

75. The Court reiterates that Article 6 does not grant the accused an unlimited right to secure the appearance of witnesses in court. It is normally for the domestic courts to decide whether it is necessary or advisable to hear a witness (see S.N. v. Sweden, no. 34209/96, § 44, ECHR 2002-V, with further references to Bricmont v. Belgium, judgment of 7 July 1989, Series A no. 158, p. 31, § 89). Furthermore, evidence must normally be produced at a public hearing, in the presence of the accused, with a view to adversarial argument. There are exceptions to this principle, but they must not infringe the rights of the defence; as a general rule, paragraphs 1 and 3 (d) of Article 6 require that the defendant be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either when he makes his statements or at a later stage (see Lüdi v. Switzerland, judgment of 15 June 1992, Series A no. 238, p. 21, § 49).

76. The Court has stated in Doorson v. the Netherlands (cited above, p. 470, § 69) and Van Mechelen and Others v. the Netherlands (judgment of 23 April 1997, Reports 1997-III, p. 711, § 52) that the use of statements made by anonymous witnesses to found a conviction is not in all circumstances incompatible with the Convention. However, if the anonymity of prosecution witnesses is maintained, the defence will be faced with unusual difficulties. Accordingly, the Court has recognised that in such cases Article 6 § 1, taken together with Article 6 § 3 (d), require that the handicaps under which the defence operates should be sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities. With this in mind, an applicant should not be prevented from testing the anonymous witness's reliability (see also Kostowski v. the Netherlands, judgment of 20 November 1989, Series A no. 166, p. 20, § 42). In addition, no conviction should be based either solely or to a decisive extent on anonymous statements (see Van Mechelen and Others, cited above, p. 712, §§ 54-55).

77. In paragraph 76 of its Doorson judgment, the Court further held that evidence obtained from witnesses under conditions in which the rights of the defence could not be secured to the extent normally required by the Convention should be treated with extreme care.

78. The Court has also had regard to its rulings, in a series of cases concerning reliance on witness testimony which was not adduced before the trial court, that Article 6 § 3 (d) of the Convention only required the possibility of cross-examining such witnesses in situations where this testimony played a main or decisive role in securing the conviction (see Delta v. France, judgment of 19 December 1990, Series A no. 191-A, § 37; Asch v. Austria, judgment of 26 April 1991, Series A no. 203, § 28; Artner v. Austria, judgment of 28 August 1992, Series A no. 242-A, §§ 22-24; Saïdi v. France, judgment of 20 September 1993, Series A no. 261-C, § 44).

and also Mr. M.-A. EISSEN, Registrar, and Mr. H. PETZOLD, Deputy Registrar, Having deliberated in private on 24 March and on 25 October 1983,

Delivers the following judgment, which was adopted on the last-mentioned date:

PROCEDURE

1. The present case was referred to the Court by the European Commission of Human Rights ("the Commission"). The case originated in an application (no. 7984/77) against the Italian Republic lodged with the Commission in 1977 under Article 25 (art. 25) of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("the Convention") by six Italian citizens, namely Mr. Rodolfo Pretto, his wife Cesira Possia, his son Palmerino Pretto, his daughter-in-law Rita Zordan and his grandsons Andrea and Rodolfo Pretto.

2. The Commission's request was lodged with the registry of the Court on 17 May 1982, within the period of three months laid down by Articles 32 § 1 and 47 (art. 32-1, art. 47). It referred to Articles 44 and 48 (art. 44, art.

* Note by the registry: In the version of the Rules applicable when proceedings were instituted. A revised version of the Rules entered into force on 1 January 1983, but only in respect of cases referred to the Court after that date.

48) and to the declaration whereby the Italian Republic recognised the compulsory jurisdiction of the Court (Article 46) (art. 46). The request sought a decision from the Court as to the existence of violations of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1).

3. The Chamber of seven judges to be constituted included, as ex officio members, Mr. C. Russo, the elected judge of Italian nationality (Article 43 of the Convention) (art. 43), and Mr. G. Wiarda, the President of the Court (Rule 21 § 3 (b) of the Rules of Court). On 28 May 1982, the President drew by lot, in the presence of the Registrar, the names of the five other members, namely Mr. J. Cremona, Mrs. D. Bindschedler-Robert, Mr. F. Matscher, Mr. R. Macdonald and Mr. R. Bernhardt (Article 43 in fine of the Convention and Rule 21 § 4) (art. 43).

4. Mr. Wiarda, who had assumed the office of President of the Chamber (Rule 21 § 5), ascertained, through the Registrar, the views of the Agent of the Government of the Italian Republic ("the Government") and the Delegates of the Commission regarding the procedure to be followed. On 9 June, he decided that the Agent should have until 30 September 1982 to file a memorial and that the Delegates should be entitled to reply in writing within two months from the date of the transmission of the Government's memorial to them by the Registrar.

5. On 29 June 1982, the Chamber decided under Rule 48 to relinquish jurisdiction forthwith in favour of the plenary Court.

6. By telex received on 4 October 1982, the Government informed the Registrar that they had decided not to file a memorial but to refer to the arguments previously set out in their observations to the Commission. On 9 November 1982, the Registrar, acting on the President's instructions, requested the Commission to produce a copy of those observations; its Secretary supplied this copy on 15 November.

7. After consulting, through the Registrar, the Agent of the Government and the Delegates of the Commission, the President directed on 1 December 1982 that the oral proceedings should open on 22 March 1983.

8. The hearings were held in public at the Human Rights Building, Strasbourg, on the said day. Immediately before they opened, the Court had held a preparatory meeting; it had authorised the Agent of the Government to use the Italian language (Rule 27 § 2).

There appeared before the Court:

- for the Government:

Mr. A. SQUILLANTE, Section President at the Consiglio di Stato, Head of the Diplomatic Legal Service at the Ministry of Foreign Affairs, Agent,

Mr. V. LIBRANDO, Judge
at the Court of Cassation, Ministry of Justice, Counsel;

- for the Commission:

Mr. A. WEITZEL, Delegates.

The Court heard addresses by Mr. Squillante for the Government and by Mr. Trechsel and Mr. Weitzel for the Commission, as well as their replies to its questions. However, the Agent of the Government was not in a position to supply on the spot one of the items of information requested (see paragraph 13 below); he was also unable to do so subsequently, as he informed the Registrar by letters of 29 April and 15 July 1983.

AS TO THE FACTS

9. Mr. Rodolfo Pretto, an Italian citizen, for more than forty years farmed, with the help of members of his family, land at Villaganzerla Castegnero (Vicenza) of which he was the tenant.

In 1971, the owner entered into a preliminary contract with a certain Mr. S. for the sale of the property at a price of 27 million Lire. In accordance with section 8 of the Agricultural Land Development Act (Act no. 590 of 26 May 1965 - "Disposizioni per lo sviluppo della proprietà coltivatrice"), he informed Mr. Pretto of the conclusion of this contract.

Mr. Pretto gave notice of his intention to exercise the right of pre-emption ("diritto di prelazione") conferred on him by the same Act. Nevertheless, by deed dated 9 June 1971, the owner sold the land to the brother-in-law of Mr. S. for the price that had been agreed with the latter.

10. On 24 September 1971, Mr. Pretto brought an action before the Vicenza Regional Court seeking the re-sale of the land to him by the new owner (azione di riscatto). He complained of the failure to respect his right of pre-emption and alleged that the price indicated in the contract was fictitious: according to the Agricultural Inspector's valuation, the land was in fact only worth about 12 million Lire. The applicant stated that he was willing to offer the new owner the price actually paid or, alternatively, the price shown in the sale contract or, in the further alternative, such price as the Regional Court might determine.

The defendant pleaded that the action was inadmissible since Mr. Pretto had not made an unconditional offer of the price mentioned in the contract. He also claimed that the plaintiff could in any event no longer avail himself of his right of pre-emption as he had not paid the said amount within the three-month period laid down by section 8 of Act no. 590.

11. The Regional Court gave judgment on 21 March 1973. It held that Mr. Pretto was entitled to have the land re-sold to him at the price specified in the contract, such price to be paid not later than one month and twenty-one days from the date on which the judgment became final.

12. On 7 July 1973, the new owner appealed to the Venice Court of Appeal which, after postponing the hearings three times at the request of both parties, reversed the Regional Court's decision by a judgment of 8 October 1974, which was deposited in the Court of Appeal's registry on 12 December. The Venice Court found that although Mr. Pretto's action had been admissible, he was estopped from availing himself of his right to obtain a re-sale since he had not paid the price stated in the sale contract within three months of the commencement of the proceedings at first instance. It held that this time-limit had to apply, by analogy with the rules on the exercise of the right of pre-emption (section 8 of Act no. 590).

13. On 12 February 1975, Mr. Pretto appealed on points of law to the Court of Cassation. The respondent lodged a cross-appeal (ricorso incidentale) on 26 March 1975 and the applicant filed a reply thereto (controricorso al ricorso incidentale) on 3 May 1975.

On a date which it has not been possible to trace (see paragraph 8 in fine above), the President of the 3rd Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation directed that the hearings be held on 18 February 1976. The applicants claimed that previously Mr. Pretto had twice asked for the case to be dealt with, but that for reasons beyond their control they were unable to prove this.

On 12 February, Mr. Pretto filed a supplementary memorial; under Article 378 of the Code of Civil Procedure, he was permitted to do so up to the fifth day before the hearings.

On 18 February, the 3rd Civil Chamber postponed the hearings: as section 8 of Act no. 590 had given rise to conflicting judicial decisions, it considered it preferable to await the ruling of the plenary Court of Cassation on other appeals bearing on the same point.

The plenary Court was to have sat on the following day, but in fact did not give judgment until 10 June 1976. On 19 October, the 3rd Civil Chamber applied that decision and dismissed Mr. Pretto's appeal; it confirmed the Venice Court of Appeal's interpretation of section 8 of Act no. 590. The full text of the judgment was made public by being deposited in the Court of Cassation's registry on 5 February 1977. Article 133 of the Code of Civil Procedure, which save for some rare exceptions applies to all civil court judgments, whether rendered at first instance, on appeal or on cassation, in fact provides (translation from the Italian):

> "The judgment (sentenza) shall be made public by being deposited in the registry of the court which delivered it. The Registrar shall record at the bottom of the judgment that it has been deposited, adding the date and his signature; within the next five days, he shall advise the parties (parti che si sono costituite) of the deposit by means of a written notice which shall contain the operative provisions of the judgment."

Under Article 120 of Royal Decree no. 1368 of 18 December 1941 (rules on the application of the Code of Civil Procedure and transitional provisions), the deposit has to be effected within thirty days of the examination of the case.

14. On 24 June 1977, the judgment was served on Mr. Pretto by the respondent and thereupon became enforceable.

15. Anyone can consult or obtain copies of the judgments of the Court of Cassation on application to its registry. If judgments contain features that are novel from the point of view of interpretation of the law, they may be published.

PROCEEDINGS BEFORE THE COMMISSION

16. In their application lodged with the Commission on 27 July 1977 (no. 7984/77), Mr. Pretto and the other members of his family relied on Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention and made the following complaints:

(a) In the present case the 3rd Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation had not constituted an independent and impartial tribunal since it had followed an opinion expressed by the plenary Court of Cassation in a judgment which was in the process of being published; moreover, the very existence of the plenary Court was contrary to this provision of the Convention.

(b) The said Chamber had violated the rights of the defence by basing its decision on a judgment which had not yet been published and could not have been known to the applicant's lawyer.

(c) The principle of equality of arms had been infringed, since the public prosecutor's office attached to the Court of Cassation had assisted that Court in its private deliberations (Article 380 of the Code of Civil Procedure, as in force at the time).

(d) The Court of Appeal had violated the right to a fair trial by denying Mr. Pretto the right to seek a judicial determination of the exact price he had to pay in order to exercise validly his right to obtain a re-sale.

(e) By not pronouncing their judgments publicly, the Court of Appeal and the Court of Cassation had failed to satisfy a further requirement of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1).

(f) Finally, the length of the proceedings had exceeded a "reasonable time".

17. On 11 July 1979, the Commission declared the application admissible as regards the final complaint and also part of the penultimate complaint (proceedings before the Court of Cassation only). It declared the remainder of the application inadmissible; in particular, in so far as Mr. Pretto complained of the lack of public pronouncement of the Venice Court of Appeal's judgment, it found that he had failed to exhaust domestic remedies.

In its report of 14 December 1981 (Article 31 of the Convention) (art. 31), the Commission expressed the opinion:

- by eight votes to seven, that the length of the proceedings in question had not exceeded a "reasonable time";

- by twelve votes to three, that there had also been no breach of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) as regards the requirement that judgment be pronounced publicly.

FINAL SUBMISSIONS MADE TO THE COURT BY THE GOVERNMENT

18. At the hearings on 22 March 1983, the Government requested the Court "to conclude that Italy has not violated Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention in the present case".

AS TO THE LAW

19. The applicants complained of the fact that the judgment of 19 October 1976 by the Court of Cassation had not been pronounced publicly (see paragraph 13 above); they further objected to the length of the proceedings. They relied on Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention, which reads:

> "In the determination of his civil rights and obligations ..., everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by [a] ... tribunal ... . Judgment shall be pronounced publicly but the press and public may be excluded from all or part of the trial in the interests of morals, public order or national security in a democratic society, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or to the extent strictly necessary in the opinion of the court in special circumstances where publicity would prejudice the interests of justice."

The Government contended, on the contrary, that the absence of public pronouncement of the judgment did not contravene the Convention and that the "reasonable time" had not been exceeded. The majority of the Commission was of the same opinion, whereas three of its members agreed with the applicants on the first point and seven on the second.

I. ABSENCE OF PUBLIC PRONOUNCEMENT

20. With regard to the first of the two breaches alleged, the cassation proceedings alone are in issue: the applicants raised no objection as to absence of public pronouncement in relation to the Vicenza Regional Court's judgment and their complaint that the Venice Court of Appeal's judgment was not pronounced publicly was declared inadmissible by the Commission on the ground of failure to exhaust domestic remedies (see paragraphs 16 and 17 above).

21. The public character of proceedings before the judicial bodies referred to in Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) protects litigants against the administration of justice in secret with no public scrutiny; it is also one of the means whereby confidence in the courts, superior and inferior, can be maintained. By rendering the administration of justice visible, publicity contributes to the achievement of the aim of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1), namely a fair trial, the guarantee of which is one of the fundamental principles of any democratic society, within the meaning of the Convention (see the Golder judgment of 21 February 1975, Series A no. 18, p. 18, § 36, and also the Lawless judgment of 14 November 1960, Series A no. 1, p. 13).

22. Whilst the member States of the Council of Europe all subscribe to this principle of publicity, their legislative systems and judicial practice reveal some diversity as to its scope and manner of implementation, as regards both the holding of hearings and the "pronouncement" of judgments. The formal aspect of the matter is, however, of secondary importance as compared with the purpose underlying the publicity required by Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1). The prominent place held in a democratic society by the right to a fair trial impels the Court, for the purposes of the review which it has to undertake in this area, to examine the realities of the procedure in question (see notably, mutatis mutandis, the Adolf judgment of 26 March 1982, Series A no. 49, p. 15, § 30).

23. The applicability of Article 6 (art. 6) to the present facts was not disputed and, moreover, is to be inferred from the established case-law of the Court (see notably the Delcourt judgment of 17 January 1970, Series A no. 11, pp. 13-15, §§ 24-26, and the Pakelli judgment of 25 April 1983, Series A no. 64, p. 14, § 29). The manner of application of this text depends, however, on the particular circumstances of the case (ibid.).

24. In accordance with Article 133 of the Code of Civil Procedure, the judgment adopted on 19 October 1976 by the Court of Cassation was simply deposited in the court registry, with written notification of the operative provisions being given to the parties, but not pronounced in open court (see paragraph 13 above). It therefore has to be determined whether, as the applicants and a minority of the Commission contended, this state of affairs violated the Convention.

25. The terms used in the second sentence of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) - "judgment shall be pronounced publicly", "le jugement sera rendu publiquement" - might suggest that a reading out aloud of the judgment is required. Admittedly the French text employs the participle "rendu" (given), whereas the corresponding word in the English version is "pronounced" (prononcé), but this slight difference is not sufficient to dispel the impression left by the language of the provision in question: in French,

"rendu publiquement" - as opposed to "rendu public" (made public) - can very well be regarded as the equivalent of "prononcé publiquement".

At first sight, Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the European Convention would thus appear to be stricter in this respect than Article 14 § 1 of the 1966 International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, which provides that the judgment "shall be made public", "sera public".

26. However, many member States of the Council of Europe have a long-standing tradition of recourse to other means, besides reading out aloud, for making public the decisions of all or some of their courts, and especially of their courts of cassation, for example deposit in a registry accessible to the public. The authors of the Convention cannot have overlooked that fact, even if concern to take it into account is not so easily identifiable in their working documents as in the travaux préparatoires of the 1966 Covenant (see, for instance, document A/4299 of 3 December 1959, pp. 12, 15 and 19, §§ 38 (b), 53 and 63 (c) in fine).

The Court therefore does not feel bound to adopt a literal interpretation. It considers that in each case the form of publicity to be given to the "judgment" under the domestic law of the respondent State must be assessed in the light of the special features of the proceedings in question and by reference to the object and purpose of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1).

27. In order to determine whether the manner in which the Court of Cassation delivered its judgment of 19 October 1976 met the requirements of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1), account must be taken of the entirety of the proceedings conducted in the Italian legal order and of the Court of Cassation's role therein.

That role was confined to reviewing in law the decision of the Venice Court of Appeal. The Court of Cassation could not itself determine the suit, but only, on this occasion, dismiss the applicant's appeal or, alternatively, quash the previous judgment and refer the case back to the trial court. After holding public hearings, the Court of Cassation adopted the former course. The Venice Court of Appeal's judgment thus became final; its consequences for Mr. Pretto were in no way changed.

The latter judgment, for its part, had been made public by being deposited on 12 December 1974 in the court registry. The applicant alleged that in this respect also there had been a violation of the Convention, but the Commission declared the complaint inadmissible on the ground of failure to exhaust domestic remedies. The Court therefore does not have jurisdiction to decide whether, in the case of the Venice Court, such a deposit is in conformity with the requirements of Article 6 (art. 6). An affirmative reply to this question would also be valid for the Court of Cassation's judgment, whereas the same could not be said of a possible negative reply: on the contrary, even in the latter eventuality, the deposit of the judgment in the registry of the Court of Cassation would satisfy the requirements of Article

6 (art. 6), having regard to the differences between the respective roles of the two courts.

Furthermore, the Court of Cassation took its decision after holding public hearings and, although the judgment dismissing the appeal on points of law was not delivered in open court, anyone may consult or obtain a copy of it on application to the court registry (see paragraph 15 above).

In the opinion of the Court, the object pursued by Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) in this context - namely, to ensure scrutiny of the judiciary by the public with a view to safeguarding the right to a fair trial - is, at any rate as regards cassation proceedings, no less achieved by a deposit in the court registry, making the full text of the judgment available to everyone, than by a reading in open court of a decision dismissing an appeal or quashing a previous judgment, such reading sometimes being limited to the operative provisions.

28. The absence of public pronouncement of the Court of Cassation's judgment therefore did not contravene the Convention in the present case.

II. COMPLIANCE WITH THE REASONABLE-TIME REQUIREMENT

29. The applicants also complained of the length of the proceedings instituted by Mr. Rodolfo Pretto before the Italian courts.

The Government contended on the other hand that the "reasonable time" referred to in Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) had not been exceeded. The Commission agreed in substance with this contention.

1. Length of the proceedings

30. The relevant period did not begin to run as from the institution of proceedings before the Vicenza Regional Court on 24 September 1971 (see paragraph 10 above), but only as from 1 August 1973, when the recognition by Italy of the right of individual petition took effect. However, in assessing the reasonableness of the time that elapsed after 31 July 1973, account must be taken of the then state of proceedings (see the Foti and others judgment of 10 December 1982, Series A no. 56, p. 18, § 53).

The closing date, for its part, was 5 February 1977, the day when the judgment of 19 October 1976 was deposited in the registry of the Court of Cassation (see paragraph 13 above).

To sum up, the period to be taken into consideration runs from 1 August 1973 until 5 February 1977, that is three years, six months and five days.

2. Reasonableness of the length of the proceedings

31. The reasonableness of the length of proceedings has to be assessed in each instance according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the criteria enunciated in the Court's case-law (see, as the most recent authority, the Zimmermann and Steiner judgment of 13 July 1983, Series no. 66, p. 11, § 24).

(a) Complexity of the case

32. The Commission and the Government both considered that the facts were undisputed but that they raised a rather complex problem of legal interpretation.

The Court is of the same view: what was involved was the application of a relatively recent statute which did not contain any specific provisions on the legal point in issue, namely whether the conditions to be satisfied in order to exercise the right of pre-emption also applied to the right to obtain a re-sale; in addition, the decided authorities - still scarce at that time - disclosed contradictory approaches. It was thus reasonable that, with a view to eliminating this divergence of approach and to ensuring certainty of the law, the 3rd Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation should have deferred its decision until judgment was given by the plenary Court, even though there was a possibility that this would lead to a prolongation of the proceedings (see paragraph 13 above).

(b) Conduct of Mr. Pretto

33. The Commission referred to its case-law to the effect that the exercise of the right to a hearing within a reasonable time is subject, in civil cases, to diligence being shown by the party concerned. In its opinion, there was no evidence that the applicant had failed to act with due diligence.

The Government disagreed. They pointed out that during the appeal proceedings the parties' lawyers, including Mr. Pretto's, had on three occasions requested that the hearings be postponed; that they had always lodged the various documents in the case just when the prescribed time-limits were on the point of expiring; that Mr. Pretto, for example, had filed a supplementary memorial barely six days before the hearings due to be held on 18 February 1976 (see paragraph 13 above); and finally that under Italian law the institution and conduct of civil litigation are matters left to the initiative of the parties, without any intervention on the part of the court.

34. Before the Commission, the applicants claimed that Mr. Rodolfo Pretto had twice asked for the appeals on points of law to be dealt with (see paragraph 13 above), but that for reasons beyond their control they were unable to prove this.

The Court sees no cause to doubt their statement, which was not contested by the Government. It also notes that Mr. Pretto was entitled to make full use of the time-limits available under Italian law and that he was never out of time.

Although no blame can be attached to him, the applicant was nevertheless responsible to a certain degree for the prolongation of the proceedings (see the Eckle judgment of 15 July 1982, Series A no. 51, p. 36, § 82). In this respect, he cannot level any reproach against the respondent State.

(c) Conduct of the judicial authorities

35. The manner in which the judicial authorities conducted the case is to be assessed by reference to five successive stages:

(a) from 1 August 1973 (entry into effect of Italy's recognition of the right of individual petition) to 12 December 1974 (deposit of the Venice Court of Appeal's judgment in its registry);

(b) from 12 February 1975 (filing of Mr. Pretto's appeal on points of law) to 3 May 1975 (lodging of his reply to the respondent's cross-appeal);

(c) from 3 May 1975 to 18 February 1976 (hearing devoted to an examination of the appeals, and decision by the 3rd Civil Chamber to defer judgment);

(d) from 18 February to 19 October 1976 (adoption of the judgment);

(e) from 19 October 1976 to 5 February 1977 (deposit of the judgment in the Court of Cassation's registry).

The period from 12 December 1974 to 12 February 1975 does not fall to be taken into account since it corresponds to the time-limit available to the parties for appealing on points of law.

36. The majority of the Commission considered that the different phases in the proceedings had been characterised by delays which could probably have been avoided, but that the overall duration could not be regarded as incompatible with Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1). For the minority, on the other hand, the intervals between the adoption of the Venice Court of Appeal's and the Court of Cassation's judgments and their deposit in the court registry (8 October 1974 - 12 December 1974, 19 October 1976 - 5 February 1977) and between the lodging of the applicant's reply to the cross-appeal and the first hearing (3 May 1975 - 18 February 1976) were not consonant with the "reasonable time" requirement.

According to the Government, the length of the proceedings had not been shown to be inordinate and was in any event the result of the complexity of the case, the conduct of the parties, the procedural complications at the cassation stage (filing of a cross-appeal and of a reply thereto, see paragraph 13 above) and the expediency, as far as the 3rd Civil Chamber was concerned, of deferring judgment until the plenary Court of Cassation had given its ruling on a similar case. The Government added that account should not be taken of the time-limits available to the parties for lodging cross-appeals and replies thereto, that is to say the period from 12 February to 3 May 1975.

37. The Court is of the same view as the Government on the last point. As regards the four other phases (see paragraph 35 above), it does not find their duration to be unreasonable. Admittedly, the hearings before the Court of Cassation could have taken place earlier: although it is not known exactly when their date was fixed (see paragraph 13 above), it can be assumed that the case was ready for hearing as from 3 May 1975, once the appeals and the reply had been filed. In addition, and even according to Italian law (Article 120 of the Royal Decree of 18 December 1941, see paragraph 13 above), there should not have been so long an interval between the adoption of the Venice Court of Appeal's and the Court of Cassation's judgments and their deposit in the court registry (8 October - 12 December 1974 and 19 October 1976 - 5 February 1977, respectively). Nevertheless, although these various delays could probably have been avoided, they are not sufficiently serious to warrant the conclusion that the total duration of the proceedings was excessive. The permissible limit was therefore not overstepped.

FOR THESE REASONS, THE COURT

1. Holds unanimously that the absence of public pronouncement of the Court of Cassation's judgment did not contravene Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1);

2. Holds by fourteen votes to one that there has also been no breach of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) as regards compliance with the "reasonable time" requirement.

CONCURRING OPINION OF MR. GANSHOF VAN DER MEERSCH

(Translation)

I am of the opinion, like my distinguished colleagues, that the absence of public pronouncement of the Italian Court of Cassation's judgment did not contravene Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention in the present case; however, I cannot agree with one of the reasons on which our Court has based its decision.

I regret that paragraph 27 of the judgment refers, in order to justify the absence of violation, to the fact that the role of the Court of Cassation "was confined to reviewing in law the decision of the Venice Court of Appeal".

Apparently this is not just an obiter dictum, and this impression is reinforced by the fact that in paragraph 26 the Court also cites in support of its decision the example, to be found in several member States of the Council of Europe, of the procedure consisting of the deposit of the judgment in a registry accessible to the public, such procedure being utilised "especially [in] their courts of cassation".

DISSENTING OPINION OF MR. PINHEIRO FARINHA

(Translation)

1. To my great regret I am unable to share the conclusion of the majority of the Court to the effect that the "reasonable time" referred to in Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention was not exceeded.

2. Like the majority, I am of the opinion that "the relevant period did not begin to run as from the institution of proceedings before the Vicenza Regional Court on 24 September 1971" - and I emphasise the date -, "but only as from 1 August 1973, when the recognition by Italy of the right of individual petition took effect", and that "in assessing the reasonableness of the time that elapsed after 31 July 1973, account must be taken of the then state of proceedings".

3. I also agree with paragraph 31, where it is stated that "the reasonableness of the length of proceedings has to be assessed in each instance according to the particular circumstances and having regard to the criteria enunciated in the Court's case-law"; this being so, I will now turn to an examination of the specific case.

4. Complexity of the case

The facts were undisputed.

Although the case raised a complex problem of legal interpretation, account must be taken of the fact that the Act which fell to be interpreted (Act no. 590) dated back to 26 May 1965; more than ten years had elapsed between that date and the time when the Court of Cassation was called upon to interpret the Act in the present case. Accordingly, I conclude that the case was not complex, since ten years appear to me to be more than sufficient for an examination of the Act, however complex it may have been.

5. Conduct of Mr. Pretto

I agree with the opinion of the majority to the effect that "Mr. Pretto was entitled to make full use of the time-limits available under Italian law and ... was never out of time".

Mr. Pretto's conduct cannot be criticised; in my view, he was in no way responsible for the prolongation of the proceedings.

6. Conduct of the judicial authorities

It does not seem to me reasonable that the Venice Court of Appeal's judgment, which was adopted on 8 October 1974, should have been deposited in that Court's registry on 12 December: this meant that two months elapsed before it was made public.

Although the case was ready for hearing as from 3 May 1975, the Court of Cassation directed that the hearings be held on 18 February 1976.

On the latter date, the Court of Cassation postponed the hearings in order to await the plenary Court's ruling on appeals on points of law that raised the same issue. The reason for the postponement was not any legal obligation to await the plenary Court's decision but the fact that the Civil Chamber of the Court of Cassation considered it proper. The plenary Court did not give judgment until 10 June 1976. There is no justification for this delay; in view of the fact that the case had already been pending for several years, Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention, to the extent that it secures the right to have proceedings conducted within a reasonable time, required that Mr. Pretto's appeal on points of law be examined immediately.

The appeal was only examined on 19 October 1976 (although the judgment adopted by the plenary Court of Cassation had not yet been made public) and the resulting judgment was made public, by being deposited in the Court of Cassation's registry, on 5 February 1977; there is no justification for this delay either.

7. I conclude that the duration of the proceedings exceeded the "reasonable time". I am therefore of the opinion that there was a violation of Article 6 § 1 (art. 6-1) of the Convention.

THIRD SECTION

CASE OF P.S. v. GERMANY

(Application no. 33900/96)

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

20 December 2001

FINAL

04/09/2002

This judgment will become final in the circumstances set out in Article 44 § 2.

Mechelen and Others judgment cited above, p. 711, § 49), the Court will consider the applicant's complaints from the angle of paragraphs 3 (d) and 1 taken together.

21. All the evidence must normally be produced at a public hearing, in the presence of the accused, with a view to adversarial argument. There are exceptions to this principle, but they must not infringe the rights of the defence. As a general rule, the accused must be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either when he makes his statement or at a later stage (see the Van Mechelen and Others judgment cited above, p. 711, § 51; and the Lüdi v. Switzerland judgment of 15 June 1992, Series A no. 238, p. 21, § 49).

22. In appropriate cases, principles of fair trial require that the interests of the defence are balanced against those of witnesses or victims called upon to testify, in particular where life, liberty or security of person are at stake, or interests coming generally within the ambit of Article 8 of the Convention (see the Doorson judgment cited above, p. 470, § 70).

23. However, only such measures restricting the rights of the defence which are strictly necessary are permissible under Article 6. Moreover, in order to ensure that the accused receives a fair trial, any difficulties caused to the defence by a limitation on its rights must be sufficiently counterbalanced by the procedures followed by the judicial authorities (ibid., p. 471, § 72).

24. Where a conviction is based solely or to a decisive degree on depositions that have been made by a person whom the accused has had no opportunity to examine or have examined, whether during the investigation or at the trial, the rights of the defence are restricted to an extent that is incompatible with the guarantees provided by Article 6 (see the van Mechelen and Others judgment cited above, p. 712, § 55; the Doorson judgment cited above, p. 472, § 76; and the Windisch v. Austria judgment of 27 September 1990, Series A no. 186, p. 11, § 31).

Accordingly, the Court has held in a previous case that there was a violation of Article 6 § 1, taken together with Article 6 § 3 (d), noting that "in convicting the applicant in the instant case [of a sexual offence on a minor] the domestic courts relied solely on the statements made in the United States before trial and that the applicant was at no stage in the proceedings confronted with his accusers" (see the A.M. v. Italy judgment, no. 37019/97, 14 December 1999, §§ 26, 28).

25. In the present case, the applicant was convicted of having sexually abused S., an eight-year-old girl.

no additional prosecution evidence to corroborate their testimony, such as physical evidence or the results of inquiries or expert reports. In those circumstances, the refusal of the judicial authorities to organise a confrontation between him and the persons in question had deprived him of a fair trial.

42. The Government emphasised the reasons which had led the criminal courts not to hear the witnesses.

They argued that the file had been complete, which meant that confrontations would have served little purpose; the accurate, consistent and concurring character of the testimony obtained first during the police inquiry and then during the judicial investigation gave grounds for considering that the facts were sufficiently established.

Secondly, the nature of the offence and the difficulty of obtaining testimony from drug addicts had made the organisation of confrontations a sensitive matter. In that field the protection of the witnesses took priority and called for exceptional precautions. It was necessary to take account of the psychological fragility of the drug users and their legitimate desire to remain anonymous. The persons concerned were often themselves petty dealers who were dependent on larger suppliers and who feared that they would face reprisals if they co-operated with the judicial authorities.

43. The Court reiterates that the taking of evidence is governed primarily by the rules of domestic law and that it is in principle for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention is to ascertain whether the proceedings in their entirety, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair (see, as the most recent authority, the Edwards v. the United Kingdom judgment of 16 December 1992, Series A no. 247-B, pp. 34-35, para. 34).

All the evidence must normally be produced in the presence of the accused at a public hearing with a view to adversarial argument. However, the use as evidence of statements obtained at the stage of the police inquiry and the judicial investigation is not in itself inconsistent with paragraphs 3 (d) and 1 of Article 6 (art. 6-3-d, art. 6-1), provided that the rights of the defence have been respected. As a rule these rights require that the defendant be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him either when he was making his statements or at a later stage of the proceedings (see, among other authorities, the Isgrò v. Italy judgment of 19 February 1991, Series A no. 194-A, p. 12, para. 34).

44. Like the Commission, the Court notes that in convicting the applicant the two courts which tried him referred to no evidence other than the statements obtained prior to the trial.

The Nice Criminal Court drew attention to the statements or depositions of several drug users or dealers; it concluded that Mr Saïdi had been "formally implicated by some of [his] regular customers ... and by the very people who carried out some of [his] deliveries" (see paragraph 18 above).

The Aix-en-Provence Court of Appeal stated that it endorsed the grounds relied on at first instance, which were, in its view, relevant. It considered that "the concurring and repeated statements of the people who sold the drugs supplied by [him] ... and those who bought the drugs ... [were] sufficiently convincing to establish the offence of which [he was] accused and also the role which [he had] played in the heroin traffic in Nice" (see paragraph 19 above).

The testimony therefore constituted the sole basis for the applicant's conviction, after having been the only ground for his committal for trial. Yet neither at the stage of the investigation nor during the trial was the applicant able to examine or have examined the witnesses concerned. The lack of any confrontation deprived him in certain respects of a fair trial. The Court is fully aware of the undeniable difficulties of the fight against drug-trafficking - in particular with regard to obtaining and producing evidence - and of the ravages caused to society by the drug problem, but such considerations cannot justify restricting to this extent the rights of the defence of "everyone charged with a criminal offence".

In short, there has been a violation of Article 6 paras. 1 and 3 (d) (art. 6-1, art. 6-3-d).

II. APPLICATION OF ARTICLE 50 (art. 50)

45. According to Article 50 (art. 50),

> "If the Court finds that a decision or a measure taken by a legal authority or any other authority of a High Contracting Party is completely or partially in conflict with the obligations arising from the ... Convention, and if the internal law of the said Party allows only partial reparation to be made for the consequences of this decision or measure, the decision of the Court shall, if necessary, afford just satisfaction to the injured party."

A. New trial or adoption of administrative measures

46. Mr Saïdi sought in the first place and above all a retrial. He requested that, in the event of the Court's considering it inappropriate to order a new trial, his criminal conviction should be removed from his police record or certain extracts (bulletins) therefrom and that his situation on French territory should be regularised, in particular by according him a right of residence.

Neither the Government nor the Commission submitted observations on this question.

47. The Court notes that the Convention does not give it jurisdiction to direct the French State to open a new trial (see, mutatis mutandis, the Belilos v. Switzerland judgment of 29 April 1988, Series A no. 132, p. 32, para. 76) or to adopt one of the other measures sought by the applicant.

decision by counsel with which the applicant could be taken to have agreed. Nothing therefore occurred during the course of the trial which would have put the judge on notice of this problem.

24. The Court must consider the proceedings as a whole including the decisions of the appellate courts. Its task is to ascertain whether the proceedings in their entirety, as well as the way in which evidence was taken, were fair (see, inter alia, the Edwards v. the United Kingdom judgment of 16 December 1992, Series A no. 247-B, pp. 34-35, para. 34).

25. It recalls that it is not in dispute between those appearing before the Court that the applicant had difficulties in hearing some of the evidence given during the trial.

26. Nor is it in dispute that Article 6 (art. 6), read as a whole, guarantees the right of an accused to participate effectively in a criminal trial. In general this includes, inter alia, not only his right to be present, but also to hear and follow the proceedings. Such rights are implicit in the very notion of an adversarial procedure and can also be derived from the guarantees contained in sub-paragraphs (c), (d) and (e) of paragraph 3 of Article 6 (art. 6-3-c, art. 6-3-d, art. 6-3-e), - "to defend himself in person", "to examine or have examined witnesses", and "to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court" (see, inter alia, the Colozza v. Italy judgment of 12 February 1985, Series A no. 89, p. 14, para. 27, and the Barberà, Messegué and Jabardo v. Spain judgment of 6 December 1988, Series A no. 146, p. 33, para. 78).

27. In the present case neither the applicant nor the legal representatives sought to bring his hearing difficulties to the attention of the trial judge at any stage throughout the six-day hearing. It is true that the applicant mentioned these problems to a prison officer and subsequently to his lawyers (see paragraphs 11 and 12 above). However, the officer was neither a court official nor an officer of the court. Moreover, counsel, who had lengthy experience in handling criminal cases, chose for tactical reasons to remain silent about the difficulties (see paragraphs 11 and 13 above) and there was nothing to indicate that, as subsequently claimed, the applicant disagreed with this decision.

28. The State cannot normally be held responsible for the actions or decisions of an accused's lawyer. It follows from the independence of the legal profession that the conduct of the defence is essentially a matter between the defendant and his representatives. The Contracting States are required to intervene only if a failure by counsel to provide effective representation is manifest or sufficiently brought to their attention (see, as the most recent authority, mutatis mutandis, the Imbrioscia v. Switzerland judgment of 24 November 1993, Series A no. 275, p. 14, para. 41).

This was not, however, the position in the present case (see paragraph 27 above).

CASE OF TAXQUET v. BELGIUM

JUDGMENT

STRASBOURG

This judgment will become final in the circumstances set out in Article 44 § 2 of the Convention. It may be subject to editorial revision.

D. Effective remedy

82. Relying on Article 6 § 1 and Article 13 of the Convention, the applicant complained that an appeal against the Assize Court's judgment lay only to the Court of Cassation, which did not determine cases on their merits.

83. The Court observes that the Articles relied on do not guarantee any right of appeal and that, moreover, Belgium is not a party to Protocol No. 7. In addition, the Court has held on a number of occasions that the fact that the review conducted by a supreme court is restricted to questions of law is not in breach of Article 6 § 1 (see, mutatis mutandis, Loewenguth v. France (dec.), no. 53183/99, ECHR 2000-VI; Pesti and Frodl v. Austria (dec.), nos. 27618/95 and 27619/95, ECHR 2000-I; Deperrois v. France (dec.), no. 48203/99, 22 June 2000; and Ramos Ruiz v. Spain (dec.), no. 65892/01, 19 February 2002).

84. It follows that this part of the application must be rejected as being manifestly ill-founded, pursuant to Article 35 §§ 3 and 4 of the Convention.

E. Difference in treatment

85. Relying on Article 6 § 1 and Article 14 of the Convention, the applicant submitted that the difference in the treatment of a defendant in the Assize Court as compared with a defendant in an ordinary criminal court, in terms of the possibilities of appealing, had no objective and reasonable justification, seeing that defendants in the Assize Court were in a more complex legal position, being accused of more serious offences.

86. According to the Court's settled case-law, Article 14 complements the other substantive provisions of the Convention and its Protocols. It has no independent existence since it has effect solely in relation to "the enjoyment of the rights and freedoms" safeguarded by those provisions. Although the application of Article 14 does not presuppose a breach of those provisions, there can be no room for its application unless the facts at issue fall within the ambit of one or more of the latter.

87. The Court notes that the applicant's complaint under Article 14 concerns the organisation and conduct of proceedings in the Assize Court and the court's composition. It observes that in the present case the difference in treatment relates not to different groups of people but to the type of offence and its seriousness under the law (see, mutatis mutandis, Budak and Others v. Turkey (dec.), no. 57345/00, 7 September 2004). The Court does not consider that such a practice constitutes a form of discrimination contrary to the Convention. This part of the application must therefore be rejected pursuant to Article 35 §§ 3 and 4 of the Convention.

B. The Court's assessment

1. Applicable principles

49. As the requirements of Article 6 para. 3 (art. 6-3) are to be seen as particular aspects of the right to a fair trial guaranteed by Article 6 para. 1 (art. 6-1), the Court will examine the complaints under Article 6 paras. 1 and 3 (d) taken together (art. 6-1+6-3-d) (see, among many other authorities, the above-mentioned Doorson judgment, pp. 469-70, para. 66).

50. The Court reiterates that the admissibility of evidence is primarily a matter for regulation by national law and as a general rule it is for the national courts to assess the evidence before them. The Court's task under the Convention is not to give a ruling as to whether statements of witnesses were properly admitted as evidence, but rather to ascertain whether the proceedings as a whole, including the way in which evidence was taken, were fair (see, among other authorities, the above-mentioned Doorson judgment, p. 470, para. 67).

51. In addition, all the evidence must normally be produced at a public hearing, in the presence of the accused, with a view to adversarial argument. There are exceptions to this principle, but they must not infringe the rights of the defence; as a general rule, paragraphs 1 and 3 (d) of Article 6 (art. 6-1, art. 6-3-d) require that the defendant be given an adequate and proper opportunity to challenge and question a witness against him, either when he makes his statements or at a later stage (see the Lüdi v. Switzerland judgment of 15 June 1992, Series A no. 238, p. 21, para. 49).

52. As the Court had occasion to state in its Doorson judgment (ibid., p. 470, para. 69), the use of statements made by anonymous witnesses to found a conviction is not under all circumstances incompatible with the Convention.

53. In that same judgment the Court noted the following:

> "It is true that Article 6 (art. 6) does not explicitly require the interests of witnesses in general, and those of victims called upon to testify in particular, to be taken into consideration. However, their life, liberty or security of person may be at stake, as may interests coming generally within the ambit of Article 8 of the Convention (art. 8). Such interests of witnesses and victims are in principle protected by other, substantive provisions of the Convention, which imply that Contracting States should organise their criminal proceedings in such a way that those interests are not unjustifiably imperilled. Against this background, principles of fair trial also require that in appropriate cases the interests of the defence are balanced against those of witnesses or victims called upon to testify." (see the above-mentioned Doorson judgment, p. 470, para. 70)

54. However, if the anonymity of prosecution witnesses is maintained, the defence will be faced with difficulties which criminal proceedings should not normally involve. Accordingly, the Court has recognised that in such cases Article 6 para. 1 taken together with Article 6 para. 3 (d) of the Furthermore, counsel points out that in reply to the complaint made by the author about his treatment in prison, the Commissioner of Police acknowledged receipt of the complaints and advised him that the matter was being referred to the Commissioner of Correctional Services for appropriate action. On 27 June 1994, counsel sent a further letter to the Commissioner of Corrections, but no response has been received to date.

10.2 Counsel maintains that there was a material discrepancy between the original statement of Walsh and his evidence in court of which the defence was not advised and that the failure to produce the original statement resulted in a miscarriage of justice.

Issues and proceedings before the Committee:

11.1 The Human Rights Committee has considered the present communication in the light of all the information made available to it by the parties, as provided in article 5, paragraph 1, of the Optional Protocol.

11.2 The Committee has noted the State party's argument that the claim with regard to the treatment suffered by Garfield Peart in prison is inadmissible because of failure to exhaust domestic remedies. The Committee has also noted that the author had complained to the acting Superintendent, and that his counsel had made a complaint to the Commissioner of Police and was subsequently informed that the complaint was referred to the Commissioner of Correctional Services for appropriate action. In the circumstances, the Committee considers that the author and his counsel have shown due diligence in the pursuit of domestic remedies and that there is no reason to review the Committee's decision on admissibility.

11.3 With regard to the authors' claim that the unavailability of the expert witness from the Meteorological Office constitutes a violation of article 14 of the Covenant, the Committee notes that it appears from the trial transcript that the defence had contacted the witness but had not secured his presence in court, and that, following a brief adjournment, the judge then ordered the Registrar to issue a subpoena for the witness and adjourned the trial. When the trial was resumed and the witness did not appear, counsel informed the judge that he would go ahead without the witness. In the circumstances, the Committee finds that the State party cannot be held accountable for the failure of the defence expert witness to appear.

11.4 With regard to the evidence given by the main witness for the prosecution, the Committee notes that it appears from the trial transcript that, during cross-examination by the defence, the witness admitted that he had made a written statement to the police on the night of the incident. Counsel then requested a copy of this statement, which the prosecution refused to give; the trial judge subsequently held that defence counsel had failed to put forward any reason why a copy of the statement should be provided. The trial proceeded without a copy of the statement being made available to the defence.

11.5 From the copy of the statement, which came into counsel's possession only after the Court of Appeal had rejected the appeal and after the initial petition for special leave to appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council had been submitted, it appears that the witness named another man as the one who shot the deceased, that he implicated Andrew Peart as having had a gun in his hand, and that he did not mention Garfield Peart's participation or presence during the killing. The Committee notes that the evidence of the only eye-witness produced at the trial was of primary importance in the absence of any corroborating evidence. The Committee considers that the failure to make the police statement of the witness available to the defence seriously obstructed the defence in its cross-examination of the witness, thereby precluding a fair trial of the defendants. The Committee finds therefore that the facts before it disclose a violation of article 14, paragraph 3(e), of the Covenant.

11.6 With regard to the authors' allegations about maltreatment on death row, the Committee notes that the State party has indicated that it would investigate the allegations, but that the results of the investigations have not been transmitted to the Committee. Due weight must therefore be given to the authors' allegations, to the

1984, December 5; 1985, April 18. 18:4:1985
APPLICATION for special leave to appeal from the Supreme Court of New South Wales.

DECISION

GIBBS C.J. This is an application for special leave to appeal from a decision of the Supreme Court of New South Wales constituted as the Court of Criminal Appeal dismissing the applicant's appeal from his conviction on five charges of culpable driving causing death and one charge of culpable driving causing grievous bodily harm. The charges arose out of an incident that occurred on 18 May 1979 when a truck heavily laden with coal got out of control while descending a steep incline at Mount Ousley and collided with other vehicles, causing the deaths of five persons and serious injury to another. The truck was driven by one Renshaw, an employee of the applicant Giorgianni. The brakes of the coal truck failed as it was making the descent and as it continued down the road at an increasing speed one Fraser, the driver of a Volvo truck, deliberately placed his vehicle in its path in an attempt to stop its progress. The two vehicles collided, but the effect of the collision was to damage the steering of the coal truck, which then careered quite out of control into other cars, some of whose passengers were killed or injured. The applicant was charged under s.52A of the Crimes Act 1900 (N.S.W.), as amended ("the Crimes Act"). The Crown case was that the brakes of the coal truck were dangerously defective and that Renshaw, by driving it in that condition, was driving in a manner dangerous to the public. It was not suggested that the applicant was present when Renshaw drove the truck; what was contended on behalf of the Crown was that the applicant procured Renshaw to drive the truck in its defective condition. The applicant was charged by virtue of s.351 of the Crimes Act, which provides as follows:

"Any person who aids, abets, counsels, or procures, the commission of any misdemeanour, whether the same is a misdemeanour at Common Law or by any statute, may be indicted, convicted, and punished as a principal offender."

2. There was evidence from which it appears that the last occasion on which the applicant had inspected the truck before the accident was during the weekend of 5-6 May 1979 when, together with Renshaw and one Fitzpatrick, he did some work on the vehicle. According to the evidence of Fitzpatrick and the applicant's statement to the jury, the condition of the brakes then appeared satisfactory, but it was open to the jury to infer, from police evidence which detailed the many defects that were apparent in the brakes after the accident, that a person who had worked on the vehicle a fortnight before would, or at least should, have noticed those defects. Amongst other things, one brake shoe was tied by wire to a U-bolt in an effort to retain it to the brake drum and that brake would have been completely ineffective. The applicant, in his statement, said that he had not noticed the wire. Renshaw gave evidence that after 6 May he drove the truck on about fifty occasions between a coal mine at Appin and the harbour at Port Kembla. He said that it was his practice to notify the applicant when he noticed any fault in the vehicle and that on 18 May he in fact noticed a leaking oil seal and rang the applicant to inform him of it. The evidence does not make it clear what was the applicant's response or what was the significance of that incident. Renshaw said that he did not notice anything wrong with the brakes until he was travelling on the fatal journey on 18 May.

3. The learned trial judge in the course of his summing up described as follows the nature of the contentions put on behalf of the Crown:

> "The Crown alleges - it must prove beyond reasonable doubt - that the brakes were defective, that the defective brakes constituted a danger to the public on the Mount Ousley road on a Friday afternoon, that the impact ... was caused while driving in a manner dangerous to the public with defective brakes, that the accused knew or ought to have known of the defect by the exercise of his reasonable care and diligence, that the accused knew or ought to have known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence of the danger thereby to the public, and that the accused either ignored it or knowingly took such negligent measures to cope with it to make his conduct in employing the driver so to drive driving in a manner dangerous to the public."

Later he said that "it is further put that ⇦ Giorgianni ⇨ either had knowledge or imputed knowledge of those circumstances ...". Towards the end of his summing up, after he had dealt with the facts, he directed the jury on this aspect of the matter as follows:

> "Of course, in this case the manner of driving the vehicle dangerous to the public involved the vehicle being driven in circumstances fully laden down the mountain with a defective braking system, which the prosecution has to establish he had knowledge of or imputed knowledge that could be > ascertained with the exercise of reasonable care and diligence ...".

After hearing some submissions from counsel in the absence of the jury, the learned trial judge gave the jury a further direction. He said that the statement "that the accused knew or ought to have known with the exercise of reasonable care and diligence that the truck on 18th May, 1979, had defective brakes, that the driving of it in that condition would constitute driving it in a manner dangerous to the public" should be qualified. He said that "a mere failure to make an inquiry which would yield knowledge of an essential fact is not in itself sufficient, for to act negligently does not make a person an aider or abetter". He concluded by saying (and repeating) that the prosecution must show that the applicant "knew when he procured the use of the vehicle by Renshaw on 18th May the brakes were defective and could fail and could constitute driving in a manner dangerous to the public or he acted recklessly not caring whether these facts existed or not".

4. In these circumstances two questions of principle arise for our decision. The first is whether a person who has aided, abetted, counselled or procured another person to drive in a manner dangerous to the public may, if death or grievous bodily harm has been occasioned, be properly convicted of an offence against s.52A of the Crimes Act. That question must in my opinion be answered in the affirmative. It is true that the application of provisions such as those of s.351 of the Crimes Act "may be excluded by the nature of the substantive offence or the general tenor or policy of the provisions by which it is created": Mallan v. Lee [1949] HCA 48; (1949) 80 CLR 198, at p 216. There is however nothing in the nature of the offence created by s.52A, or in the provisions of that section, which reveals any intention to exclude the ordinary rules governing the liability of a secondary party, as a person who has aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of a crime is now called. The section, so far as it is relevant, provides as follows:

> "(1) Where the death of, or grievous bodily harm to, any person is occasioned through -
>
> (d) the impact of a motor vehicle with any vehicle or other object in, on or near which that person was at the time of the impact,
>
> and the motor vehicle was at the time of the impact ... being driven by another person -
>
> (e) under the influence of intoxicating liquor or a drug; or
>
> (f) at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public,
>
> the person who was so driving the motor vehicle shall be guilty of the misdemeanour of culpable driving.
>
>

> attributable to the fact that the person charged was under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug or, as the case may be, to the speed at which or the manner in which the vehicle was driven."

There is no reason why a person who counsels or procures another to drive a vehicle, knowing that the person persuaded to drive the vehicle is drunk, or that the vehicle is so defective as to be dangerous, should not be liable, in accordance with the ordinary principles embodied in s.351 of the Crimes Act, if the vehicle is involved in a collision causing death. This view is supported by Reg. v. Robert Millar Ltd. (1970) 2 QB 54, where it was held that an employer who instructed an employee to drive a vehicle, knowing it to be in a dangerously defective condition, was guilty of the offence of dangerous driving causing death. That decision is consistent with other authorities. It has been held that the owner of a car who, travelling as a passenger, allowed the driver to drive at a speed which he knew to be dangerous could properly be convicted of the offence of driving at a speed dangerous to the public (Du Cros v. Lambourne (1907) 1 KB 40) and that the supervisor of a learner driver may be convicted of aiding and abetting the learner driver in the commission of the offence of driving without due care and attention (Rubie v. Faulkner (1940) 1 KB 571) or of the offence of driving with alcohol in his blood exceeding the prescribed limit (Carter v. Richardson (1974) RTR 314; mentioned (1975) C.L.J. 182). Counsel for the applicant sought to find an indication of a contrary intention in sub-s.(1) of s.52A, which states that "the person who was so driving the motor vehicle shall be guilty of the misdemeanour", and in sub-s.(3), which refers to "the fact that the person charged was under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug". However, those forms of words do not indicate that it is only the actual perpetrator of the offence who may be charged under the section. Many statutory provisions which create misdemeanours refer only to the person who directly engages in the forbidden conduct, yet the ordinary rule which makes any person who aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of the misdemeanour liable to be convicted and punished as a principal offender nevertheless applies. When a person is charged as a secondary party with an offence against s.52A(1)(f), the prosecution has to prove that the accused aided, abetted, counselled or procured another person to drive the vehicle at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public, but not that he aided, abetted, counselled or procured the driver to occasion the death or grievous bodily harm which must have been occasioned if the offence was committed. There can be no doubt in the present case that the applicant was rightly convicted if the evidence was such that a reasonable jury could have been satisfied that he had counselled or procured his employee to drive a truck which he knew to be dangerously defective. The questions whether the intervention of Fraser and the collision with his Volvo truck meant that thereafter the coal truck was not "being driven" by Renshaw, or that the deaths and grievous bodily harm were not occasioned by dangerous driving, were matters of fact for the jury.

5. The second question that arises is whether a person may be convicted of an offence against s.52A of the Crimes Act, on the footing that he aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of that offence, if it is not proved that he knew all the circumstances which made what was done an offence. In other words, is it necessary to prove that the person sought to be made liable as a secondary party had knowledge of all essential facts, or is it enough to prove that he should have had knowledge of those facts or that he acted recklessly not caring whether those facts existed or not?

6. Section 52A prescribes an objective standard and, speaking generally, the reference to a motor vehicle being driven "at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public" refers to the actual behaviour of the driver and does not require any given state of mind as an essential element of the offence: R v. Coventry [1938] HCA 31; (1938) 59 CLR 633, at pp 637-638. That does not mean that a person can aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of an offence of strict liability without having an intention to do so formed in the light of knowledge of the facts. The very words used in s.351, and the synonyms which express their meanings - e.g. help, encourage, advise, persuade, induce, bring about by effort - indicate that a particular state of mind is essential before a person can become liable as a secondary party for the commission of an offence, even if the offence is one of strict liability. In United States v. Peoni (1938) 100 F 2d. 401, at p 402, Judge Learned Hand referred to various statutory and common law definitions of "accessories", by which he meant secondary parties, and, in a passage cited by Bright J. in Lenzi v. Miller (1965) SASR 1, at p 15, went on to say:

> "It will be observed that all these definitions have nothing whatever to do with the probability that the forbidden result would follow upon the accessory's conduct; and that they all demand that he in some sort associate himself with the venture, that he participate in it as in something that he wishes to bring about, that he seek by his action to make it succeed. All the words used - even the most colourless 'abet' - carry an implication of purposive attitude towards it."

In other words, the person charged as a secondary party should in some way be "linked in purpose with the person actually committing the crime ...": R v. Russell [1933] VicLawRp 7; (1933) VLR 59, at p 67, per Cussen ACJ.

7. Section 351 of the Crimes Act is based on s.8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act, 1861 (U.K.), which, it has often been said, was only declaratory of the common law on the subject: Du Cros v. Lambourne, at p 44; Reg. v. Maxwell (1978) 1 WLR 1350, at p 1359; (1978) 3 All ER 1140, at p 1148. Although it was said, in Attorney-General's Reference (No. 1 of 1975) [1975] EWCA Crim 1; (1975) Q.B. 773, at p.779, that there is a difference between the four words (aids, abets, counsels, procures) used in the section, and that each word must be given its ordinary meaning, it is apparent that the ordinary meanings of some at least of those words overlap and that sometimes the words are used in particular combinations or as a phrase which is to be considered as a whole: In re Charles Smith (1858) 3 H & N 227, at pp 237-238 [1858] EngR 533; (157 ER 455, at p 459); A-G v. Able (1983) 3 WLR 845, at p 855; (1984) 1 All ER 277, at p 285. When used in relation to felonies, the words "aid and abet" described the action of a person who was present at the commission of the offence and took some part therein (who was called a principal in the second degree as well as an "aider and abettor"), whereas "counsel and procure" described an accessory before the fact who was not present at the commission of the offence: cf. Ferguson v. Weaving (1951) 1 KB 814, at pp 818-819. The usage was not always uniform or discriminating. The distinction between principals in the first and second degree and between principals and accessories now generally has no legal importance: see Johns (T.S.) v. The Queen [1980] HCA 3; (1980) 143 CLR 108, at p 117 and ss.345-347 of the Crimes Act. No similar distinction was drawn in the case of misdemeanours, and at common law, in cases of misdemeanour, anyone who, in the case of a felony, would have been a principal in the second degree, or an accessory, was a principal offender and was treated as if he had taken the same part as the active perpetrator of the facts constituting the offence: Gould & Co. v. Houghton (1921) 1 KB 509, at p 516. The reason for mentioning those matters, which are now largely of historical interest, is that statements in the authorities regarding the mental state necessary to constitute a person an accessory before the fact in the case of a felony will apply equally to a person who has counselled or procured the commission of a misdemeanour. Further it will be found that statements which refer to the knowledge and intention necessary to make a person an aider and abettor will often be equally applicable to a person who has counselled or procured the commission of the offence.

8. Russell on Crime 12th ed. (1964), p.151, states that "the bare minimum" which is necessary to constitute a person an accessory before the fact is that his conduct should indicate "(a) that he knew that the particular deed was contemplated, and (b) that he approved of or assented to it, and (c) that his attitude in respect of it in fact encouraged the principal offender to perform the deed". The passage is cited with approval in A-G v. Able, at p 855; p 285 of All ER There is a strong body of authority which supports the view that knowledge of the facts is necessary before a person can be made liable as a secondary party for the commission of an offence. In Johnson v. Youden (1950) 1 KB 544, Lord Goddard C.J. stated the position in relation to aiders and abettors as follows, at p.546:

> "Before a person can be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission of an offence he must at least know the essential matters which constitute that offence. He need not actually know that an offence has been committed, because he may not know that the facts constitute an offence and ignorance of the law is not a defence."

This statement has been frequently cited with approval, and not only in relation to the case of aiders and abettors. In Reg. v. Churchill (1967) 2 AC 224, at p 236, it was held that the law is the same for conspiracy. In Reg. v. Bainbridge (1960) 1 QB 129, the case of an accessory before the fact, Lord Parker C.J. said, at p 134, that "there must be not merely suspicion but knowledge that a crime of the type in question was intended ...". (We are not concerned in the present case with the question whether knowledge of an intention to commit the type of offence is enough.) In Reg. v. Maxwell, at p 1357; p 1146 of All ER, Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone was content to adopt the passages which I have cited from Johnson v. Youden and Reg. v. Bainbridge as sufficiently answering the question what degree of knowledge is required before an accused can be found guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring. In Reg. v. Robert Millar Ltd., a case similar to the present, it was said, at p 72, that "if a driver is sent out by his employer to drive a heavy vehicle on a trip extending over some hundreds of miles carrying heavy loads with a dangerously defective front offside tyre, by an employer who knows that the tyre is dangerous, and there is a serious risk of harm resulting to other road-users, then if that tyre does burst and thereby causes an accident killing somebody the employer is guilty of counselling and procuring death by dangerous driving ...". Numerous other cases, including, in Australia, Blackmore v. Linton [1961] VicRp 63; (1961) VR 374, at p 377 and Wilson v. Dobra (1955) 57 WALR 95, at p 97 (a case under the Criminal Code of Western Australia), accept that the general principle is that a person can be convicted as a secondary party only if he had knowledge of the essential circumstances. Further, as has already been indicated, the person charged must have intended to help, encourage or induce the principal offender to bring about the forbidden result. In other words, both knowledge of the circumstances and intention to aid, abet, counsel or procure are necessary to render a person liable as a secondary party: cf. National Coal Board v. Gamble (1959) 1 QB 11, at p 20.

9. However, some cases suggest that some qualifications should be admitted to the general principle that a person cannot be found guilty of having aided, abetted, counselled or procured an offence unless he had actual knowledge of all the essential matters which made the act done a crime. One qualification that must be accepted is that wilful blindness, the deliberate shutting of one's eyes to what is going on, is equivalent to knowledge. In R. v. Antonelli and Barberi (1905) 70 JP 4, where A was indicted for publishing a criminal libel, and B, who had sold copies of the pamphlet containing the libel, was charged with aiding and abetting him, Phillimore J., in summing up to the jury, said, at p.6:

> "If you think he knew what was in the document, or deliberately shut his eyes to what was in it, then you must find him guilty of aiding and abetting."

Lord Devlin has said that a person who has shut his eyes to an obvious means of knowledge may be described as having "knowledge of the second degree": see Roper v. Taylor's Central Garages (Exeter), Limited (1951) 2 TLR 284, at p 288. The relevant principle was recently explained by this Court in Reg. v. Crabbe (26 March 1985, unreported):

> "When a person deliberately refrains from making inquiries because he prefers not to have the result, when he wilfully shuts his eyes for fear that he may learn the truth, he may for some purposes be treated as having the knowledge which he deliberately abstained from acquiring."

10. In Davies, Turner & Co. Ltd. v. Brodie (1954) 1 WLR 1364, at p 1367; cf. (1954) 3 All ER 283, at p 286, Lord Goddard C.J., after repeating what he had said in Johnson v. Youden, continued:

> "If a person shuts his eyes to the obvious or refrains from making any inquiry where a reasonably sensible man would make inquiry, I think the court can find that he was aiding and abetting, certainly if he shuts his eyes to the obvious."

With all respect this dictum was too wide, as indeed Lord Goddard himself may have recognized by the concluding words of the sentence quoted; those words are omitted from the report in the All England series, but the word "perhaps" is inserted. As Lord Devlin pointed out in Roper v. Taylor's Central Garages (Exeter), Limited, at p 289:

> "There is a vast distinction between a state of mind which consists of deliberately refraining from making inquiries, the result of which the person does not care to have, and a state of mind which is merely neglecting to make such inquiries as a reasonable and prudent person would make."

The failure to make such inquiries as a reasonable person would have made is not equivalent to knowledge; it is not enough to render a person liable as a secondary party that he ought to have known all the facts and would have done so if he had acted with reasonable care and diligence. That is so even when the offence is one of strict liability, so that the actual perpetrator may be convicted in the absence of knowledge.

11. That this is so is shown by Callow v. Tillstone (1900) 83 LT 411. In that case a butcher was convicted of exposing unsound meat for sale. He had relied on a certificate given by a veterinary surgeon that the meat was sound and healthy. The veterinary surgeon had been guilty of negligence in examining the carcase and giving the certificate. It was held that the fact that he had been negligent, and that the negligence had caused the exposure of the unsound meat for sale, was not sufficient to justify his conviction for aiding and abetting the exposing of the unsound meat for sale. (Perhaps he should more properly have been charged with counselling or procuring the commission of the offence, but the decision did not turn on that point.) Similarly, in Bowker v. Woodroffe. Bowker v. Premier Drug Co. (1928) 1 KB 217, a wholesale firm was charged with aiding and abetting a retailer in committing the offence of selling to the prejudice of the purchaser an article of food not of the nature, substance and quality demanded. Although the retailer was convicted the wholesaler was held entitled to be acquitted, for a number of reasons, one of which was that there was no evidence to show that the wholesaler knew at any material time that the article sold was not what it purported to be: see at p.229.

12. One case which is out of line with these authorities, and which has unfortunately had some influence on two Australian cases, is Carter v. Mace (1949) 2 All ER 714. In that case the appellant, who carried on the business of a transport clearing house, arranged with the owner of a lorry to transport certain goods but did not inquire whether the owner of the lorry was licensed to carry those goods. The appellant was convicted of aiding and abetting the lorry driver in the commission of the offence, notwithstanding that he did not know that the lorry driver did not have the necessary licence and did not deliberately refrain from making inquiries for fear that he might learn the truth. The judgment of the Divisional Court suggests that the appellant was under a duty to see that the contracts that he made were carried out in a legal manner. If the case was correctly decided, it might provide authority for the view that a person can be found guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring if he failed to make reasonable inquiries. However, in Davies, Turner & Co. Ltd. v. Brodie it was said (at p 1367; p 286 of All ER) that Carter v. Mace was decided on its own particular facts, and in a later case, Smith v. Jenner (1968) Crim.LR 99, the opposite conclusion was reached on rather similar facts. There a driving instructor supervised the driving of a learner whose provisional licence had expired, although he was not aware of that fact. The instructor was convicted of aiding and abetting the learner to drive a car without a licence. A Divisional Court which allowed his appeal held that aiding and abetting involved knowledge of the facts. Carter v. Mace cannot be regarded as an authority for the proposition that a person may be liable as a secondary party simply because he fails to make such inquiries as a reasonable man would have made.

13. It is necessary to refer to two other lines of cases, which may cause confusion unless it is recognized that they are not concerned with the liability of persons who have aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of a crime. First, there are cases in which the court has considered the effect of statutes which make it an offence to permit a particular state of things, e.g. to permit any person not being the holder of a licence to drive a motor vehicle, or to permit a person to use a vehicle which is uninsured. It has been held that knowledge is not an ingredient of such offences, although honest and reasonable mistake of fact will exculpate the accused: see, e.g., Proudman v. Dayman [1941] HCA 28; (1941) 67 CLR 536; cf. Bateman v. Evans (1964) 108 Sol Jo 522. A second class of case is that in which the statute in question casts an absolute duty upon a principal who is accordingly made responsible for the acts of his servants. Quality Dairies (York) Ltd. v. Pedley (1952) 1 KB 275 is such a case. Decisions that fall within either of those classes have no bearing on the present question. Cases such as Provincial Motor Cab Company, Limited v. Dunning (1909) 2 KB 599 and Gough v. Rees (1929) 142 LT 424, in which the accused, although not made vicariously responsible by statute, was held liable for aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring an offence committed by his servant on the ground that the servant was under his control and he failed to take precautions to prevent the commission of the offence, can only be explained on the basis that the accused knew what would happen if the precautions were not taken: see Lord Hewart C.J. in Gough v. Rees, at p 426. The true principle was applied in Ferguson v. Weaving, where the employees of a licensee, who had the conduct and maintenance of a room in the licensee's premises, allowed customers to consume liquor there after hours. It was held that the licensee, who was unaware of what was happening, could not be convicted of counselling and procuring the offence committed by the customers; the knowledge of the employees could not be imputed to the licensee: see at p.821.

14. In Lenzi v. Miller the Full Court of the Supreme Court of South Australia held that on a charge of having aided, abetted, counselled and procured the commission of an offence, namely the driving of a motor vehicle on a road without there being in force a policy of insurance in relation to the vehicle, it was not necessary for the prosecution to prove that the accused, on whose instructions or with whose permission the vehicle was driven, knew that the vehicle was uninsured. It was said, at p.12, that authorities such as Carter v. Mace and Quality Dairies (York) Ltd. v. Pedley show an Act may be couched in such terms as to imply a duty to foresee and prevent the act or thing that is the offence and that in such circumstances any party, who could and should prevent the act or thing, but omits to do so, is a party to and participates in the offence. The reliance on those authorities was misplaced; Carter v. Mace lays down no acceptable principle and Quality Dairies (York) Ltd. v. Pedley does not deal with the position of aiders, abettors, counsellors and procurers. In Lenzi v. Miller at first instance Chamberlain J., at p 7, said that the cases "support the proposition that the accessory depends on terms of the statute creating the original offence, and that none of them supports the appellant's claim that in order to convict an accessory of an absolute offence it is necessary to prove the case as if mens rea were a necessary element". This passage was cited with approval by Walters A.J. in Kurucz v. Mayne (1966) SASR 82. However it is erroneous. Both those decisions may be supported on their facts, but not for all the reasons given by the court.

15. In Reg. v. Glennan (1970) 91 WN(NSW) 609 the Court of Appeal of New South Wales discussed the question whether a conviction for aiding, abetting, counselling and procuring the commission of an offence of driving with more than the prescribed quantity of alcohol present in the blood could be sustained when it had been found that the accused did not and could not know the concentration of alcohol in the driver's blood. It was rightly held that the accused could be convicted of aiding and abetting, because it was established that the accused was aware of all the circumstances that gave rise to the driver's offence, and in particular how much alcohol the driver had consumed. The judgment however contains some observations which with all respect cannot be supported. Their Honours said at p.614:

> "It may, therefore, be concluded that, in the case of statutory offences in which intention is not a necessary element, the law does not require actual knowledge on the part of the aider and abettor of all the essential facts of the offence. The element of knowledge or intention required of an aider and abettor might perhaps be more accurately expressed by saying that it must be shown that he either knew or suspected the existence of facts which would constitute the commission of the offence or, perhaps, that he acted recklessly, not caring whether the facts existed or not. Mere failure to make an inquiry which, if made, would yield knowledge of an essential fact, is not in itself enough to constitute knowledge of the fact, for it is accepted that to act negligently does not make a person an aider and abettor (Callow v. Tillstone; Bowker v. Premier Drug Co.). But the circumstances of a given case may be such as to reveal not merely a failure to make an inquiry, but a failure to make an inquiry which is of such a kind as to suggest that the defendant has deliberately abstained from acquiring knowledge because he suspected the existence of a fact which would have been ascertained on inquiry, or that the defendant has acted recklessly in the sense that he did not care whether the facts existed or not (Carter v. Mace; cf. Davies, Turner & Co. Ltd. v. Brodie)."

Suspicion of the existence of facts, although relevant when the accused has deliberately shut his eyes, does not by itself amount to or take the place of knowledge for present purposes. Further it is not correct to say that a person may be convicted of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence simply because he has acted recklessly. Dr Edwards, in Mens Rea in Statutory Offences (1955), pp.196-205, asserts that a person who deliberately closes his eyes to what is going on connives at it and that there is a close analogy between connivance and recklessness. However connivance, or wilful blindness, is only relevant to the liability of a secondary party to an offence because it virtually amounts to knowledge. Recklessness, in the sense of not caring whether the facts exist or not, would be relevant only if it too was virtually equivalent to knowledge, in other words only if it amounted to wilful blindness.

16. It is true that there are some remarks in the judgments of the members of the Divisional Court in Carter v. Richardson, at pp 317, 318, which suggest that it is enough that an aider and abettor was reckless as to whether the principal offender had consumed an excessive amount of alcohol before driving a motor vehicle. However the ratio of that case was expressed in the following words, at p.318:

> "The justices were right if they took the view that it was sufficient if the defendant was aware that the principal offender had consumed excessive alcohol even though the precise amount had not been determined."

It can never be right to direct a jury that recklessness is enough to constitute a person an aider, abettor, counsellor or procurer. Indeed in many, if not most, cases it will be unnecessary to introduce the subject of wilful blindness into a summing up and it would only be confusing to direct a jury on that subject if the facts of the case did not require it.

17. My view of the law may be summed up very shortly. No one may be convicted of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence unless, knowing all the essential facts which made what was done a crime, he intentionally aided, abetted, counselled or procured the acts of the principal offender. Wilful blindness, in the sense that I have described, is treated as equivalent to knowledge but neither negligence nor recklessness is sufficient.

18. It follows that the summing up in the present case was materially defective and that the conviction cannot stand. Since there was evidence on which the jury could have found that the applicant did counsel or procure the commission of the offence, the proper course for this Court is to order a new trial. However, the tragic circumstances of the incident, and the public reaction to it, should not obscure the fact that the case against the applicant is not a particularly strong one. It will be a matter for the Executive to consider whether, having regard to that fact, and to the fact that the applicant has already been tried twice, the applicant should be put on his trial for a third time.

19. I would grant the application for special leave to appeal, allow the appeal and order a new trial.

MASON J. This is an application for special leave to appeal from a judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal of New South Wales dismissing an appeal by the applicant against his conviction on six charges of culpable driving before Torrington D.C.J. and a jury in the District Court at Sydney. The charges consisted of five charges of driving in a manner dangerous to the public causing death and one charge of driving in a manner dangerous to the public causing grievous bodily harm. They related to an incident on 18 May 1979 in which a prime mover and trailer leased by the applicant and driven by his employee, named Renshaw, suffered a brake failure while loaded with over 22 tonnes of coal travelling down a steep gradient along Mount Ousley Road near Port Kembla in New South Wales. The vehicle collided with two other vehicles as a result of which five people were killed and one suffered grievous bodily harm.

2. The offence of culpable driving is created by s.52A of the Crimes Act 1900 (N.S.W.). That section relevantly provides:

>
> .....
>
> (c) impact with a motor vehicle;

2327

and the motor vehicle was at the time of the impact, or at the time of overturning or leaving the highway, being driven by another person -

(e) under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug; or

(f) at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public, the person who was so driving the motor vehicle shall be guilty of the misdemeanour of culpable driving.

(3) It shall be a defence to any charge under this section that the death or the grievous bodily harm occasioned, as the case may be, was not in any way attributable to the fact that the person charged was under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug or, as the case may be, to the speed at which or the manner in which the vehicle was driven."

3. In framing the indictment in conformity with s.52A, the Crown relied on s.351 of the Crimes Act. That section provides:

The case for the Crown was that the applicant had procured the commission of the misdemeanour of culpable driving by Renshaw in that, with knowledge of or reckless indifference to the state of the brakes of the vehicle and to the danger which they constituted to the public, he had employed Renshaw to drive the prime mover and trailer when its brakes were in such a defective state that to drive it loaded with coal on a public road having steep gradients was to drive in a manner dangerous to the public.

4. The evidence established that the brakes of the vehicle were manifestly defective at the time of the collision and that the applicant, a former service station proprietor who was accustomed to carrying out the maintenance of the vehicles he owned or leased, had carried out repairs to the vehicle on 4 and 5 May 1979, some two weeks before the collision. At that time he replaced an oil seal on the prime mover. In the circumstances, it was clearly open to the jury to infer that he was aware of or at least suspected the defective state of the vehicle's brakes on those dates. To some extent their defects were obvious. The brake components on one of the wheels of the trailer, for example, were held together with a piece of wire. There was also evidence that the established practice was for Renshaw to inform the applicant of all mechanical defects and that Renshaw had contacted the applicant earlier on the day of the collision reporting that he had observed oil leaking from one of the wheels of the prime mover.

5. Before this Court the principal arguments for the applicant relate first to the applicability of s.52A to a person other than the driver of a motor vehicle and secondly, if the section is applicable, to the sufficiency of recklessness as to the state of the brakes and the danger which they constituted to the public as the mental element required to establish liability.

6. The misdemeanour created by s.52A is capable of being committed by a person who is the driver of a motor vehicle. The section was introduced because of the reluctance of juries to convict motorists of manslaughter in the factual circumstances which it envisages (Attorney-General v. Bindoff (1953) 53 SR(NSW) 489, at p 490). However, it is apparent from the terms of the section that mens rea is not an essential element of the misdemeanour which it creates. In order to support a conviction under s.52A it is sufficient that death or grievous bodily harm to a person was occasioned through the specified means at a time when the defendant was driving under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug or at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public. It is well settled that the test for determining whether the defendant was driving "in a manner dangerous to the public" is an objective one which takes into account "all matters connected with the management and control of a car by a driver when it is being driven" (R. v. Coventry [1938] HCA 31; (1938) 59 CLR 633, at p 639). Those matters, of course, include the mechanical condition of the motor vehicle (cf. Reg. v. Spurge (1961) 2 QB 205; Reg. v. Robert Millar (Contractors) Ltd. (1970) 2 QB 54). But the language of the section does not exclude the operation of a defence of mistake of fact on reasonable grounds and the defendant will not be liable in a case in which the dangerous manner of driving is due to a mechanical defect if he neither knew nor ought to have known of the existence of that defect (R. v. Coventry, at p 638; Reg. v. Spurge).

7. Clearly, s.52A does not in its terms apply to a person in the position of the applicant who was not the driver of the motor vehicle. Its application to the circumstances of the present case is dependent upon the common law doctrine of secondary participation as it is embodied in s.351.

8. It has been recognized that provisions such as s.351 do not themselves create substantive offences but are declaratory of the common law and procedural in nature (Du Cros v. Lambourne (1907) 1 KB 40; Gould & Co. v. Houghton (1921) 1 KB 509; Ex parte Coorey (1944) 45 SR(NSW) 287, at p 295; Reg. v. Glennan (1970) 91 WN (NSW) 609, at pp 612-613; Lenzi v. Miller (1965) SASR 1, at p 10). In misdemeanour, as distinct from felony, a person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of an offence, and who may for convenience be called a secondary party, is regarded for all purposes of procedure as a principal offender. The reason is that the common law has not seen fit to "descend to distinguish the different shades of guilt in petty misdemeanours" (4 Bl. Comm. 36; cf. Gould & Co. v. Houghton, at p 522). Consequently, a secondary party to a misdemeanour may be convicted on an information or indictment which charges him with having committed the offence as principal (Du Cros v. Lambourne). It is essential to conviction on the basis of secondary participation, however, both (a) that the person charged aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of the misdemeanour and (b) that the misdemeanour is actually committed (Thornton v. Mitchell (1940) 1 All ER 339; cf. Walsh v. Sainsbury [1925] HCA 28; (1925) 36 CLR 464, at p 477; Cain v. Doyle [1946] HCA 38; (1946) 72 CLR 409, at p 419), though there is no requirement that commission of the misdemeanour result in the conviction of another person (R v. Williams (1932) 32 SR(NSW) 504; O'Sullivan v. Thurmer (1955) SASR 76; Schulz v. Paige (1961) SASR 258).

9. In Mallan v. Lee [1949] HCA 48; (1949) 80 CLR 198, at p 216, Dixon J. observed that "the application of sections dealing with aiding and abetting may be excluded by the nature of the substantive offence or the general tenor or policy of the provisions by which it is created". A similar approach must be taken to apply to the exclusion of the doctrine of secondary participation at common law. It may, therefore, be inapplicable to a person of a class whom the substantive offence is designed to protect (Reg. v. Tyrrell (1894) 1 QB 710; Reg. v. Whitehouse [1977] EWCA Crim 2; (1977) QB 868; cf. United States v. Annunziato [1961] USCA2 408; (1961) 293 F 2d 373, at p 379) or in respect of whose participation some lesser punishment is imposed (Ellis v. Guerin (1925) SASR 282; cf. People v. Pangelina (1981) 117 Cal. App. 3d 414, at pp 420-421). It may also be inapplicable where the substantive offence itself involves some element of secondary participation (cf. Jenks v. Turpin (1884) 13 QBD 505, at p 526; Carmichael & Sons (Worcester) Ltd. v. Cottle (1971) RTR 11, at p 14). And in McAteer v. Lester (1962) NZLR 485, a legislative intent to exclude responsibility for secondary participation was found in s.194(1) of the Licensing Act 1908 (N.Z.) which made it an offence for a person to be found on licensed premises at certain times unless he satisfied the Court that he was on the premises for a lawful purpose.

10. It is inherent in the concept of secondary participation, however, that a person may be convicted on the basis of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of a statutory offence although the statute creating the offence deals only with the liability of the principal offender. So much was stated by Coke and Hale (3 Co. Inst. 59; 1 P.C. 613, 614, 704). And it has been settled at common law at least since R. v. Potts [1818] EngR 57; (1818) Russ & Ry 353 (168 ER 841). This is also the case even where the offence is of such a nature that the person could not have committed it as a principal offender (cf. R. v. Goldie; Ex parte Picklum [1937] HCA 65; (1937) 59 CLR 254, at pp 263-264; Mallan v. Lee, at pp 210-211; Reg. v. Australian Industrial Court; Ex parte C.L.M. Holdings Pty. Ltd. (1977) 136 CLR 235, at pp 245-246). Morris v. Tolman (1923) 1 KB 166, to the extent to which it is based on the contrary view, should not be followed.

11. Contrary to the argument of counsel for the appellant, the mere description of the offender under s.52A as the driver of the motor vehicle cannot, therefore, be seen as evidencing a legislative intention to exclude the operation of the common law with respect to secondary participation. Nor, in my opinion, can any such intention be otherwise extracted from the nature of the offence or the terms of the section by which it is created. It follows that the applicant, although charged as a matter of procedure with the substantive offence, was liable to conviction on the basis of having aided, abetted, counselled or procured the commission of the misdemeanour of culpable driving by Renshaw.

12. The terms "aid, abet, counsel or procure" require some comment. In England the approach has been taken that those terms, as they occur in s.8 of the Accessories and Abettors Act 1861 (U.K.) (as amended by s.1 of the Criminal Law Act 1967 (U.K.) which abolished the distinction between felony and misdemeanour), should be treated as four separate words and, so far as possible, be given their ordinary meanings: Attorney-General's Reference (No. 1 of 1975) [1975] EWCA Crim 1; (1975) Q.B. 773. This approach has attracted some criticism (see: J.C. Smith, "Aid, Abet, Counsel or Procure" in P.R. Glazebrook (ed.), Reshaping the Criminal Law (1978), pp.120-137). In any case it has no application to the construction of the same terms as they appear in s.351. Once it is acknowledged that those terms are merely declaratory of the common law, it is to the common law concept of secondary participation, and not to the ordinary meaning of the words themselves, that regard must be had.

13. In felony at common law the terms "aid" and "abet" are generally used to refer to the conduct of a principal in the second degree, or one who is present at the commission of the offence by the principal offender, while the terms "counsel" or "procure" are generally used in relation to the conduct of an accessory before the fact, or one who is absent at the time of the commission of the offence (4 Bl. Comm. 34-36; Ferguson v. Weaving (1951) 1 KB 814, at pp 818-819). In substance, however, there appears to be no distinction between a principal in the second degree and an accessory before the fact beyond the question of presence. In misdemeanour, where no attempt has been made to classify the parties to an offence, each of the four terms is employed to refer to the conduct of a secondary participant. But the terms are descriptive of a single concept. In this regard, I would adopt the observation of Cussen A.C.J. in R v. Russell [1933] VicLawRp 7; (1933) VLR 59, at p 67, as being applicable to secondary participation in misdemeanour. Having listed various words, including "aiding" and "abetting" which have been used to refer to the conduct of a principal in the second degree in felony, his Honour observed:

> "All the words abovementioned are, I think, instances of one general idea, that the person charged as a principal in the second degree is in some way linked in purpose with the person actually committing the crime, and is by his words or conduct doing something to bring about, or rendering more likely, such commission."

As R v. Russell itself illustrates, there need not exist any agreement or consensus between the principal in the second degree or secondary participant and the principal offender.

14. In the present case, particular emphasis was placed by the Crown on the conduct of the applicant as having "procured" the misdemeanour of culpable driving by Renshaw. While it may be that in the circumstances of a particular case one term will be more closely descriptive of the conduct of a secondary party than another, it is important that this not be allowed to obscure the substantial overlap of the terms at common law and the general concept which they embody. In approaching the question of whether recklessness as to the state of the brakes is a sufficient mental element to establish liability on the part of the applicant, it is to the mental element required by that general concept that one must look and not to the particular mental state which might be thought to inhere in the word "procure".

15. The application of the doctrine of secondary participation to statutory offences involving no mental element has been considered in a number of cases. In general, the absence of intention as an element of the substantive offence has not been regarded as obviating the necessity for knowledge on the part of the secondary party of the essential facts constituting the offence. The "link in purpose" between the secondary party and the principal offender is not established where a person does something to bring about, or render more likely, the commission of an offence by another in circumstances in which, through ignorance of the facts, it appears to him to be an innocent act.

16. The classic statement of the position is that of Lord Goddard C.J. in Johnson v. Youden (1950) 1 KB 544, at pp 546-547:

> "Before a person can be convicted of aiding and abetting the commission of an offence he must at least know the essential matters which constitute that offence. He need not actually know that an offence has been committed, because he may not know that the facts constitute an offence and ignorance of the law is not a defence. If a person knows all the facts and is assisting another person to do certain things, and it turns out that the doing of those things constitutes an offence, the person who is assisting is guilty of aiding and abetting that offence, because to allow him to say, 'I knew of all those facts but I did not know that an offence was committed,' would be allowing him to set up ignorance of the law as a defence.
> The reason why, in our opinion, the justices were right in dismissing the informations against the first two defendants is that they found, and found on good grounds, that they did not know of the matters which in fact constituted the offence; > and, as they did not know of those matters, it follows that they cannot be guilty of aiding and abetting the commission of the offence."

2331

This statement has received the endorsement of the House of Lords in Reg. v. Churchill (1967) 2 AC 224, at pp 236-237, and Director of Public Prosecutions for Northern Ireland v. Maxwell (1978) 3 All ER 1140 and has been followed in a number of English cases (Ackroyds Air Travel Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions (1950) 1 All ER 933; Thomas v. Lindop (1950) 1 All ER 966; Ferguson v. Weaving; Smith v. Jenner (1968) Crim LR 99; D. Stanton & Son Ltd. v. Webber (1972) Crim.LR 544). The proposition that a person cannot be convicted of secondary participation at common law unless he knows the facts which must be proved to show that the offence has been committed has also been embraced in Australia (Abley v. Crosaro [1946] VicLawRp 11; (1946) VLR 53; Blackmore v. Linton [1961] VicRp 63; (1961) VR 374, at p 377; Reg. v. Glennan; Dennis v. Pight (1968) 11 FLR 458). The reasoning of the Full Court of South Australia in Lenzi v. Miller, if it proceeds on a different basis, cannot be supported.

17. The application of the proposition to the offence created by s.52A does not require that the applicant be shown to have any knowledge or intention concerning the impact with a motor vehicle or the occasioning of death or grievous bodily injury even though these matters must be proved to establish the offence. The reason is that the actions of both the principal offender and the secondary party under s.52A are complete where the vehicle is driven in a manner dangerous to the public. The circumstance that liability attaches under the section only where that manner of driving carries certain consequences, which are the natural and probable results of such driving, does not relieve the secondary party of culpability merely because he has no knowledge of those consequences.

18. As we have seen, knowledge of all the essential facts giving rise to the dangerous driving is necessary to constitute commission of the offence on the part of the applicant. But it is not necessary that there should be actual knowledge of all the essential facts constituting the offence in order to establish secondary participation. It is enough if the defendant has deliberately shut his eyes to a relevant fact or has deliberately abstained from obtaining knowledge by making an inquiry for fear that he may learn the truth (cf. Reg. v. Crabbe (unreported judgment, delivered 26 March 1985)). On this aspect of the case, notwithstanding my participation in the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal in Reg. v. Glennan, I am now in agreement with what the Chief Justice has written, including his comments on the passage in the judgment in Reg. v. Glennan (at p 614). It follows that the summing-up was defective to the extent that it referred to the concept of recklessness.

19. Further arguments for the applicant relate broadly to the manner in which the collision occurred. The evidence established that as the vehicle careered down the steep gradient along Mount Ousley Road following the failure of its brakes, the driver of another truck interposed his vehicle in front of it in an attempt to stop or slow it down. When the vehicle collided with the truck Renshaw lost his ability to steer. It was several seconds after this and some 200 metres further down the road that the vehicle collided with the two other vehicles as a result of which the deaths and injury occurred. In these circumstances, it is argued that there was a novus actus interveniens or alternatively that the vehicle was not being driven, either by Renshaw or in a manner dangerous to the public, at the time of impact with those vehicles.

20. The argument that there was a novus actus interveniens is in substance an argument that the deaths and harm occasioned were not attributable to the manner in which the vehicle was driven within the meaning of s.52A(3). The subsection requires only that the defence establish on the balance of probabilities the absence of any causal connection between the deaths and harm and the manner in which the vehicle was being driven (Reg. v. Windle (1958) 75 WN (NSW) 63). It is a question of fact and degree and one which was properly left to the jury.

21. The question of whether the vehicle was being driven by Renshaw or in a manner dangerous to the public at the time of impact is also one of fact and degree. A vehicle which becomes uncontrollable as a consequence of a dangerous manner of driving does not necessarily cease to be driven or to be driven in that manner because the driver is unable to steer it. In McBride v. The Queen [1966] HCA 22; (1965) 115 CLR 44, at p 47, Barwick C.J. said:

> "In some circumstances it may not be enough that the impact is the result of the vehicle having been driven at some earlier point of time in breach of the section. In other circumstances, the interval of time between the driving which is in breach of the section and the impact may be so short that the offending driving can be regarded as persisting to the moment of impact."

It was clearly open to the jury to conclude that the offending driving in this case persisted to the moment of impact.

22. The final argument for the applicant, which attacks the answer given by the trial judge to a question by the foreman of the jury on the issue of causation, is without substance. The foreman of the jury asked the following question:

> "Does a causal connection have to be established between
> (a) the driving in a manner dangerous (first section of the charge); and
> (b) 'when through impact ... with a certain other vehicle' (another section of the charge)?"

His Honour replied:

> "The position is that the death, or the grievous bodily harm must be occasioned to a person in a motor vehicle through the impact, that is caused by the impact, and the second thing is that impact must occur at a time when the vehicle is being driven in a manner dangerous to the public."

I can see no error in this reply.

23. However, having regard to my agreement with the Chief Justice as to the inadequacy of the instruction given to the jury on the question of knowledge, this being an important question in the law of criminal complicity, I would grant special leave to appeal, allow the appeal, quash the conviction and order a new trial.

WILSON, DEANE and DAWSON JJ. The appellant was convicted upon six counts of culpable driving under s.52A of the Crimes Act 1900 (N.S.W.). The charges arose from a series of collisions between a prime mover and semi-trailer owned or leased by the appellant and a number of motor cars in one of which a family of five persons were killed and in another of which the driver sustained grievous bodily harm. The appellant's motor vehicle was at the time of the accident driven by a man named Renshaw and the appellant, who was not present at the accident, was charged with culpable driving in reliance upon s.351 of the Crimes Act, which provides:

The counts contained in the indictment charged the appellant with driving a motor vehicle in a manner dangerous to the public when through impact of the said motor vehicle with a certain other motor vehicle, a death, in the case of five counts, and grievous bodily harm, in the case of the sixth count, was occasioned.

2. Where s.351 is applicable, it permits the indictment to be framed in this way, but it is an undesirable practice because it does not make clear the real nature of the case against the accused. The Crown in this case did not allege that the appellant himself drove the vehicle, but that he aided, abetted, counselled or procured the driving of the vehicle in the circumstances alleged. Upon the assumption that s.351 applied, it was plainly preferable, in order to avoid the possible confusion of the jury, to have added sufficient particulars to indicate how it was that the appellant was charged with the offences alleged against him. See Reg. v. Maxwell (1978) 1 WLR 1350; (1978) 3 All ER 1140.

3. The Crown case against the appellant was that he procured the commission by Renshaw of the offences of culpable driving by sending him on to the road in a vehicle with defective brakes on the date on which the accident happened, which was 18 May 1979.

4. The evidence was clearly sufficient to establish that Renshaw was driving the appellant's prime mover and semi-trailer for him on 18 May 1979 and that on that day the vehicle's brakes were grossly defective. Although causation was no necessary part of the Crown's proof (absence of causation nevertheless providing a defence: s.52A(3)), the evidence also established that it was the failure of the vehicle's brakes which caused the accident in which five persons were killed and one suffered serious injury. There was evidence upon which the jury could find that the appellant knew of the defective condition of the brakes, although it was a real question whether he did in fact have that knowledge.

5. The evidence revealed that the appellant used to own a garage and was a mechanic. He attended to the maintenance of the vehicle and carried out repairs on it. When Renshaw noticed any mechanical defects in the vehicle he told the appellant of them. On the week-end of 5 and 6 May 1979, the appellant, together with Renshaw and another man, did some work on the vehicle, including work on its braking system. At the same time, they replaced an oil seal on the brakes and adjusted them. A week or two before the accident, the appellant and Renshaw changed some of the tyres on the vehicle. On 18 May 1979, the day of the accident, Renshaw telephoned the appellant and told him there was an oil leak from one of the wheels of the prime mover. Upon inspection of the vehicle after the accident, apart from the many less obvious defects, it was apparent that the offside front leading shoe on the trailer had been wired back to the back plate to prevent the shoe from dragging on the inside surface of the brake drum.

6. Section 52A of the Crimes Act, under the heading "Culpable driving", provides:

>
> ...
>
> (c) impact with a motor vehicle; or

and the motor vehicle was at the time of the impact, or at the time of overturning or leaving the highway, being driven by another person -

(e) under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug; or

(f) at a speed or in a manner dangerous to the public, the person who was so driving the motor vehicle shall be guilty of the misdemeanour of culpable driving.

(3) It shall be a defence to any charge under this section that the death or the grievous bodily harm occasioned, as the case may be, was not in any way attributable to the fact that the person charged was under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug or, as the case may be, to the speed at which or the manner in which the vehicle was driven."

7. The manner in which a vehicle may be driven includes its mechanical condition and if that condition is defective, it may, by reason of that fact, be driven in a manner dangerous to the public. See R. v. Coventry [1938] HCA 31; (1938) 59 CLR 633, esp. at p 639; Reg. v. Spurge (1961) 2 QB 205; Reg. v. Robert Millar Ltd. (1970) 2 QB 54. The offence created by s.52A does not require the prosecution to prove any state of mind on the part of the driver, although his act of driving must be conscious and voluntary and he may have a defence of mistake of fact on reasonable grounds: R. v. Coventry, at p 638. It is unnecessary to pursue in this case whether the driver must establish such a defence or whether the effect of his raising it is to cast upon the Crown the ultimate burden of disproving it beyond reasonable doubt. It is sufficient to observe that the defence is available. Otherwise the mental state of the driver is irrelevant, for the section imports an objective standard by which his driving is to be judged.

8. No question was, however, raised in this case that the actions of Renshaw were other than conscious and voluntary and no reliance appears to have been placed upon any exculpatory belief which may have been entertained by him. The accident occurred when the brakes failed on the appellant's vehicle and it careered down a steep descent unable to slow down or stop. Seconds before the accident, the vehicle collided with another truck which had been intentionally placed in its path in an effort to avoid the collisions which nevertheless ensued. Renshaw gave evidence that, after colliding with the other truck, the steering mechanism of the appellant's vehicle failed and he lost control of it. Thereafter the vehicle veered on to the wrong side of the road and collided with other vehicles, including those in which the five people died and the sixth was injured. The question was raised whether Renshaw was driving the appellant's vehicle at the time of the impact with the latter vehicles, having regard to the collision with the other truck and his loss of control, but, as Barwick C.J. pointed out in McBride v. The Queen [1966] HCA 22; (1966) 115 CLR 44, at p 47, " ... the interval of time between the driving which is in breach of the section and the impact may be so short that the offending driving can be regarded as persisting to the moment of impact." It was a question for the jury and the learned trial judge drew their attention to it in clear terms. There was evidence upon which the jury could find that Renshaw was still driving the appellant's vehicle at the time of the two impacts in question and it is clear that they did so find.

9. It is necessary, therefore, to proceed upon the basis that the offences of culpable driving were committed by Renshaw. It is those offences which the appellant was alleged to have aided, abetted, counselled or procured. To have done so he must have intentionally participated in the principal offences and so must have had knowledge of the essential matters which went to make up the offences of culpable driving on the occasion in question, whether or not he knew that those matters amounted to a crime. See Johnson v. Youden (1950) 1 KB 544, at p 546; Reg. v. Churchill (1967) 2 AC 224. As Viscount Dilhorne put it in Reg. v. Maxwell, at p 1355 of WLR; p 1144 of All ER, " ... it is clear that a person cannot properly be convicted of aiding and abetting in the commission of acts which he does not know may be or are intended." See also Ableyv. Crosaro [1946] VicLawRp 11; (1946) VLR 53; Blackmore v. Linton [1961] VicRp 63; (1961) VR 374; Dennis v. Pight (1968) 11 FLR 458. The requirement of intention on the part of an aider, abettor, counsellor or procurer or, if we may use the term, a secondary participant in a crime, is a requirement at common law and it is a requirement which is not affected by s.351 of the Crimes Act. That section merely restates the common law by providing, in effect, that in proceeding against a secondary participant in a misdemeanour, no distinction is to be drawn between the principal offender and the secondary participant. See Du Cros v. Lambourne (1907) 1 KB 40; Gould & Co. v. Houghton (1921) 1 KB 509; Carter Patersons & Pickfords Carriers, Ld. v. Wessel (1947) KB 849, at p 852; Richards v. McPherson [1943] VicLawRp 7; (1943) VLR 44; Ex parte Coorey (1944) 45 SR (NSW) 287, at p 295. Whilst in the case of felonies, separate offences are committed by principals in the second degree (aiders and abettors) and accessories before the fact (counsellors and procurers), a person who aids, abets, counsels or procures the commission of a misdemeanour may at common law be proceeded against as a principal because " ... it is not worth while to regard inferior criminals through a microscope, or to classify them scientifically, as felons were treated when most felonies were capital offences so far as the principals were concerned." See Gould & Co. v. Houghton, at p 520 per Darling J. It is the common law position which s.351 of the Crimes Act expresses and in so doing it does not exclude a guilty mind as a necessary ingredient of secondary participation in the commission of a misdemeanour.

10. We have mentioned at the outset the requirement of intent on the part of a secondary participant, because, in each count, the principal offence, culpable driving, is, in the sense in which we have explained it, an offence involving strict liability: the prosecution is not required to prove any mental state on the part of the driver. That does not, however, relieve the prosecution of the burden of proving intention on the part of a secondary participant and it is this consideration which we think lies behind a submission that the offence of culpable driving created by s.52A of the Crimes Act is of such a nature as to preclude secondary participation in it with the result that the application of s.351 is excluded. The application of that section may be excluded by necessary implication (see Mallan v. Lee [1949] HCA 48; (1949) 80 CLR 198, at p 216 per Dixon J.; Morris v. Tolman (1923) 1 KB 166; Ellis v. Guerin (1925) SASR 282) and it would be excluded if it appeared that the offence of culpable driving created by the legislature was intended to apply only to the driver of the vehicle involved and not to a secondary participant. The mere absence in the section of any reference to secondary participation does not, however, show any intention to exclude it. See Hale's Pleas of the Crown, vol.1 (1800), p 704; R. v. Potts [1818] EngR 57; (1818) Russ & Ry 353 (168 ER 841).

11. There is no difficulty in the proposition that a person may intentionally aid, abet, counsel or procure the driving of a vehicle in a particular manner or whilst the driver is in a particular state. Thus there may be secondary participation in the offence of driving in a manner dangerous to the public or of driving whilst under the influence of intoxicating liquor or of a drug. Those offences are created by s.4(1) and s.5(2) of the Motor Traffic Act 1909 (N.S.W.). But the offence of culpable driving is something more than those offences. It includes the acts necessary to constitute those offences but requires in addition that the driving should be attended by death or grievous bodily harm occasioned through impact with the vehicle being driven. Although it is clear that a person may intend to aid, abet, counsel or procure the driving of a vehicle in a dangerous manner or whilst the driver is under the influence of intoxicating liquor, it is not to be expected, except, perhaps, in rare instances, that in so doing he would intend that there should be an impact occasioning death or grievous bodily harm. So it is said, as we understand the submission, that whilst the driver of the vehicle may be guilty of culpable driving because the offence does not involve any mental state on his part, he cannot be aided, abetted, counselled or procured to commit the offence because that would require on the part of the secondary participant an intention which encompassed the occurrence of death or grievous bodily harm. It may be enough to answer the submission to point to the rare instances - intentionally encouraging a driver to drive in the face of oncoming traffic, for example - where the intent of the secondary participant may be said to extend to an impact occasioning death or grievous bodily harm, but the real answer lies elsewhere.

12. Before the introduction of the offence of culpable driving, motorists who caused death in the course of committing unlawful acts on the roads were charged with manslaughter. Although the manslaughter charged was involuntary manslaughter, juries were nevertheless reluctant to convict and the less grave offence of culpable driving was conceived. See Attorney-General v. Bindoff (1953) 53 SR (NSW) 489, at p 490. As with involuntary manslaughter, culpable driving does not require that the death, if it is a case involving death, should be intended. It is merely a consequence which serves to convert what would otherwise amount to one offence - driving in a manner dangerous to the public, for instance - into another and more serious offence. The same may be said of grievous bodily harm if it is a case of grievous bodily harm. Just as an unintended death may convert a crime such as an assault into involuntary manslaughter, so death or grievous bodily harm may convert a lesser driving offence into culpable driving, even if the death or grievous bodily harm is unintended.

13. At one time there may have been some basis for the proposition that no offence is known to the law of being an accessory before the fact to involuntary manslaughter. See Hale's Pleas of the Crown, vol.1 (1800), p.436. The proposition is based upon the notion that a man cannot counsel or procure what he does not intend and he cannot intend an accidental killing. But in Blackstone's Commentaries (21st ed. 1844) vol.4, pp.36-37, it was said:

> "And it is also settled, that whoever procureth a felony to be committed, though it be by the intervention of a third person, is an accessory before the fact. It is likewise a rule, that he who in any wise commands or counsels another to commit an unlawful act, is accessory to all that ensues upon that unlawful act; but is not accessory to any act distinct from the other."

And Bramwell B. in Reg. v. Gaylor (1857) Dears & Bell 288, at p 291 (169 ER 1011, at p 1012) apparently thought that there was only one answer to the question:

> "Suppose a man, for mischief, gives another a strong dose of medicine, not intending any further injury than causing him to be sick and uncomfortable, and death ensues, would not that be manslaughter? Suppose, then, another had counselled him to do it, would not he who counselled be an accessory before the fact?"

See also Reg. v. Taylor (1875) 13 Cox CC 68; Reg. v. Buck and Buck (1960) 44 Cr App R 213.

14. In Reg. v. Creamer (1966) 1 QB 72, at p 82, the Court of Criminal Appeal reviewed the authorities and expressed the law to be as follows:

> "A man is guilty of involuntary manslaughter when he intends an unlawful act and one likely to do harm to the person and death results which was neither foreseen nor intended. It is the accident of death resulting which makes him guilty of manslaughter as opposed to some lesser offence such as assault, or, in the present case, abortion. This can no doubt be said to be illogical, since the culpability is the same, but nevertheless, it is an illogicality which runs throughout the whole of our law, both the common law and the statute law. A comparatively recent example is clearly that of dangerous driving and causing death by dangerous driving. Bearing that in mind, it is quite consistent that a man who has counselled and procured such an illegal and dangerous act from which death, unintended, results should be guilty of being accessory before the fact to manslaughter."

15. That seems to us to be an accurate statement of the law and it follows that, although a person cannot aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of an offence, even a statutory offence involving strict liability, without intent based upon knowledge of the essential facts which constitute the offence, the requisite intent and knowledge do not, in the case of culpable driving, extend to the occurrence of the death or grievous bodily harm which "ensues upon" the unlawful act the commission of which was aided, abetted, counselled or procured. The application of s.351 of the Crimes Act to the offence of culpable driving is not, therefore, excluded by necessary implication. Cf. Reg. v. Robert Millar (Contractors) Ltd.

16. The second main submission made on behalf of the appellant was that the learned trial judge misdirected the jury in charging them that it was sufficient to establish intent on the part of the accused if his vehicle was being driven by Renshaw with defective brakes and the applicant " ... ought to have known of the defect by the exercise of his reasonable care and diligence, that the accused knew or ought to have known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence of the danger thereby to the public, and that the accused either ignored it or knowingly took such negligent measures to cope with it to make his conduct in employing the driver so to drive in a manner dangerous to the public." Elsewhere in the charge the learned trial judge referred to the possibility of "imputed knowledge" or "presumed knowledge" of the applicant of the defective state of his vehicle's brakes and finally in a re-direction he qualified his former remarks by saying:

> "I qualify that by limiting the words, 'Ought to have known by the exercise of reasonable care and diligence' by saying that a mere failure to make an inquiry which would yield knowledge of an essential fact is not in itself sufficient, for to act negligently does not make a person an aider or abettor. The prosecution for its part must show that he knew on 18 May that the brakes were defective and could constitute the driving of the vehicle to be driving in a manner dangerous to the public ... or on 18 May he acted so recklessly not caring whether these facts existed or not."

17. In giving these directions, the trial judge no doubt had in mind the judgment of the New South Wales Court of Criminal Appeal in Reg. v. Glennan (1970) 91 WN (NSW) 609 in which the following passage appears at p 614:

> "It may, therefore, be concluded that, in the case of statutory offences in which intention is not a necessary element, the law does not require actual knowledge on the part of the aider and abettor of all the essential facts of the offence. The element of knowledge or intention required of an aider and abettor might perhaps be more accurately expressed by saying that it must be shown that he either knew or suspected the existence of facts which would constitute the commission of the offence or, perhaps, that he acted recklessly, not caring whether the facts existed or not. Mere failure to make an inquiry which, if made, would yield knowledge of an essential fact, is not in itself enough to constitute knowledge of the fact, for it is accepted that to act negligently does not make a person an aider and abettor ... But the circumstances of a given case may be such as to reveal not merely a failure to make an inquiry, but a failure to make an inquiry which is of such a kind as to suggest that the defendant has deliberately abstained from acquiring knowledge because he suspected the existence of a fact which would have been ascertained on inquiry, or that the defendant has acted recklessly in the sense that he did not care whether the facts existed or not (Carter v. Mace (1949) 2 All ER 714; cf. Davies, Turner & Co. Ltd. v. Brodie (1954) 1 WLR 1364; (1954) 3 All ER 283)."

18. A number of things might be said about that passage. In the first place, there is no basis upon which it can be said that where a statutory offence requires no proof of intent, it is unnecessary in order to establish secondary participation in the commission of that offence to prove actual knowledge of all the essential facts of the offence. Intent is an ingredient of the offence of aiding and abetting or counselling and procuring and knowledge of the essential facts of the principal offence is necessary before there can be intent. It is actual knowledge which is required and the law does not presume knowledge or impute it to an accused person where possession of knowledge is necessary for the formation of a criminal intent. Secondly, although it may be a proper inference from the fact that a person has deliberately abstained from making an inquiry about some matter that he knew of it and, perhaps, that he refrained from inquiry so that he could deny knowledge, it is nevertheless actual knowledge which must be proved and not knowledge which is imputed or presumed.

19. The third question raised by the passage which we have cited from Reg. v. Glennan is whether it is possible to aid, abet, counsel or procure the commission of an offence by acting recklessly. Aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence requires the intentional assistance or encouragement of the doing of those things which go to make up the offence. The necessary intent is absent if the person alleged to be a secondary participant lacks knowledge that the principal offender is doing something or is about to do something which amounts to an offence. We have already referred to Johnson v. Youden and the other cases in which this point is made clearly. The same point was expressed differently but with equal clarity by Lord Goddard C.J. in Thomas v. Lindop (1950) 1 All ER 966, at p 968, where he said:

> "More than once this court has pointed out that it is impossible to convict persons of aiding and abetting the commission of an offence unless they know the facts which must be proved to show that an offence has been committed ... It is, of course, not necessary to show that the person knew that it was an offence, because he cannot plead ignorance of the law, but where anyone is charged with aiding and abetting a person to commit an offence, it must, at least, be shown that he knew what that person was doing. A person who does not know of the acts which another person is doing cannot be charged with aiding and abetting him because he does not know that he is doing acts which amount to an offence."

There are, of course, those cases which hold that the requisite knowledge need not extend to the precise crime which is in fact committed, although some crime must be in contemplation at the time secondary participation is alleged to occur, a general criminal purpose being insufficient. See R. v. Lomas (1913) 9 Cr App R 220; Reg. v. Bullock (1955) 1 WLR 1; (1955) 1 All ER 15; R v. Bainbridge (1960) 1 KB 129; Reg. v. Maxwell. The questions which these cases raise do not arise in this case and it is unnecessary to do more than refer to them.

20. In this case, the Crown contends that the appellant procured the commission of the offences of culpable driving by Renshaw by sending him on to the road in a vehicle with defective brakes. It contends that, even if the appellant had no knowledge of the state of the vehicle's brakes, it was sufficient that he acted recklessly in doing what he did. The precise nature of the recklessness relied upon is not entirely clear and it is understandable that it occasioned the learned trial judge some difficulty in attempting to explain it to the jury. It cannot have been inadvertent carelessness, however gross, for it can hardly be suggested that a person can accidentally become a secondary participant in the commission of a crime. The recklessness contemplated must have involved some foresight on the part of the appellant that the driving of the vehicle on the road would probably (or possibly - it was not made clear which) be dangerous, because of the defective condition of the brakes. In effect, that would mean, if the Crown were correct, that it would have proved a sufficient intent on the part of the appellant in all the circumstances if it established that he knew that the brakes on the vehicle were probably (or possibly) defective.

21. For the purposes of many offences it may be true to say that if an act is done with foresight of its probable consequences, there is sufficient intent in law even if such intent may more properly be described as a form of recklessness. There are, however, offences in which it is not possible to speak of recklessness as constituting a sufficient intent. Attempt is one and conspiracy is another. And we think the offences of aiding and abetting and counselling and procuring are others. Those offences require intentional participation in a crime by lending assistance or encouragement. They do not, of course, require knowledge of the law and it is necessary to distinguish between knowledge of or belief in the existence of facts which constitute a criminal offence and knowledge or belief that those facts are made a criminal offence under the law. The necessary intent is absent if the person alleged to be a secondary participant does not know or believe that what he is assisting or encouraging is something which goes to make up the facts which constitute the commission of the relevant criminal offence. He need not recognize the criminal offence as such, but his participation must be intentionally aimed at the commission of the acts which constitute it. It is not sufficient if his knowledge or belief extends only to the possibility or even probability that the acts which he is assisting or encouraging are such, whether he realizes it or not, as to constitute the factual ingredients of a crime. If that were sufficient, a person might be guilty of aiding, abetting, counselling or procuring the commission of an offence which formed no part of his design. Intent is required and it is an intent which must be based upon knowledge or belief of the necessary facts. To the extent that Reg. v. Glennan suggests the contrary, it is not, in our view, in accordance with principle and does not correctly state the law.

22. The authorities relied upon in the passage which we have cited in Reg. v. Glennan do not appear to us to provide adequate support for the propositions which it contains. Carter v. Mace was a case in which the appellant was alleged to have aided and abetted the commission of the statutory offence of failing to comply with the conditions of a licence to carry goods. The principal offence was committed by the owner of a lorry which the appellant, who carried on the business of a transport clearing house, hired to carry goods for him. A Divisional Court held that if the appellant undertook this class of business he was bound to see that contracts were carried out in a legal manner and, having failed to do so, was guilty of aiding and abetting the commission of a statutory offence. The precise basis of the decision is difficult to discern. In Davies, Turner & Co. Ltd. v. Brodie, a Divisional Court was referred to Carter v. Mace and it expressed the view that it was a decision on its own particular facts and laid down no proposition of law. In Davies, Turner & Co. Ltd. v. Brodie, the defendant was charged with aiding and abetting the commission of the offence of using a goods vehicle without the required permit. The defendant had obtained an assurance from the driver of the vehicle that he had the necessary permit. The Court held that because the appellant " ... had no reason to suppose that the facts were present which would constitute an offence ... ", the offence of aiding and abetting was not made out. Lord Goddard C.J., who also presided in Carter v. Mace, said, at p 1367 of WLR; cf. p 286 of All ER:

> "If a person shuts his eyes to the obvious or refrains from making any inquiry where a reasonably sensible man would make inquiry, I think the court can find that he was aiding and abetting, certainly if he shuts his eyes to the obvious."

The fact of exposure to the obvious may warrant the inference of knowledge. The shutting of one's eyes to the obvious is not, however, an alternative to the actual knowledge which is required as the basis of intent to aid, abet, counsel or procure. Lord Goddard appears to have recognized this by concluding his judgment with the words:

> " ... that is the point: you must know the essential matters which constitute the offence."

23. The Court of Criminal Appeal in Reg. v. Glennan also referred in its judgment to Poultry World Ltd. v. Conder (1957) Crim LR 803 and Bateman v. Evans (1964) 108 SJ 522. In the report of Poultry World Ltd. v. Conder, a Divisional Court is said to have decided that a person could not be convicted of aiding and abetting unless he had knowledge of the facts which constitute the offence or unless he deliberately abstained from obtaining such knowledge. In the commentary upon the decision, however, it is made clear that the Court took the view that the offence of aiding and abetting could not be established unless there was proof of knowledge or " ... such negligence as to amount to deliberate shutting of the eyes, i.e. connivance." Connivance can, of course, only be established on the basis of knowledge, whether proved directly or by inference.

24. In Bateman v. Evans, the defendant was convicted of aiding and abetting the commission of the offence of driving while disqualified. The defendant believed the driver's assurance that he had lodged an appeal against his disqualification and was permitted to drive. On a case stated by justices of a Divisional Court, it was held that the conviction should be quashed upon the basis " ... that A had a bona fide belief that B was entitled to drive, and the case fell within Davies, Turner & Co. Ltd. v. Brodie".

25. The passage which we have cited from Reg. v. Glennan was unnecessary for the decision in that case, which held that a person charged with aiding and abetting the offence of driving with a prescribed percentage of alcohol in the blood did not have to know the percentage in order to know all the facts which gave rise to the commission of the principal offence.

26. It follows that, in our view, the trial judge was wrong in directing the jury that reckless behaviour on the part of the appellant would suffice to establish the intent necessary to constitute him the procurer of the offences of culpable driving. That is sufficient to determine this case and no point is to be served in examining the terms of the direction given. Since there was evidence, not without its weaknesses, from which the jury might have inferred that the appellant knew the facts which went to make up the offence of culpable driving, there was a case to answer. The proper course is, therefore, for this Court to grant special leave, allow the appeal, quash the conviction and order a new trial.

27. However, there are some special features of this case which should, perhaps, be mentioned. These proceedings against the appellant have been pending since May 1979. There have been two trials, two appeals to the Court of Criminal Appeal and an application for special leave to this Court. The appellant is a man of some 58 years of age who, as the Court of Criminal Appeal said, " ... came before the Court as a man of good character who had led a very hard-working and enterprising life in this country." On 17 September 1982, he was sentenced by the trial judge to concurrent periods of imprisonment of five years each on the first five counts and three years on the sixth count. A non-parole period of two years was specified. On 30 May 1984, these sentences were quashed by the Court of Criminal Appeal and concurrent periods of imprisonment of two and a half years on each of the first five counts and two years on the sixth were imposed. The legislation relating to parole having changed in the meantime, the Court of Criminal Appeal specified a non-probation period of one year and three months and made a probation order for the release of the appellant at the expiration of that period. It was not suggested that the appellant was in any way responsible for the delays which have occurred and it is plain that the protracted nature of the proceedings must have subjected him to prolonged strain. No doubt these matters will be given due weight when consideration is given by the Crown to the course which should be taken.

ORDER

Application for special leave to appeal granted.

Appeal allowed.

Order that the judgment of the Court of Criminal Appeal of the Supreme Court of New South Wales be set aside. In lieu thereof order that the appeal to that Court be allowed, that the conviction and sentence be set aside and that a new trial be had.

COURT OF APPEAL FOR ONTARIO

2004 CanLII 59974 (ON CA)

WEILER, BORINS AND SIMMONS JJ.A.

BETWEEN:

HER MAJESTY THE QUEENRespondent

- and -

RONALD WILLIAM ROACHAppellant

Gregory Lafontaine for the appellant
Christine Tier for the respondent

HEARD: December 8, 2003

On appeal from conviction entered on November 27, 2001, and the sentence imposed on March 27, 2002, by Justice Robert N. Weekes of the Superior Court of Justice, sitting with a jury.

BORINS J.A.:

I

[1] The appellant, Ronald Roach, and Robert Stoangi were tried by a jury presided over by Weekes J. upon an indictment alleging that:

> [B]etween the 1st day of January, in the year 1999 and the 27th day of April, in the year 1999, both dates inclusive, at the Town of Midland, in the Central East Region, and elsewhere in the Province of Ontario and in the United States of America, they did by deceit, falsehood or other fraudulent means, to wit: being parties to an enterprise which by telephone misrepresented to persons that they had won valuable prizes, defraud the public of money, property or other valuable security, of a value exceeding five thousand dollars, contrary to the Criminal Code of Canada.

And further that they:

> [B]etween the 1st day of January, in the year 1999 and the 27th day of April, in the year 1999, both dates inclusive, at the Town of Midland, in the Central East Region, and elsewhere in the Province of Ontario and in the United States of America, they standard may catch some legitimate undercover crime investigation techniques that involve encouragement of crime, with no intention that the crime counselled actually be carried out. (LaFave and Scott, Substantive Criminal Law at Ch. 6 §6.11, p. 14; Glanville Williams, Textbook of Criminal Law, 1st ed. (London: Steven & Sons, 1978 at p. 386).

[44] In summary, the mens rea for party liability is contained in s. 21(1)(b) of the Criminal Code that requires that the aid given by the accessory to the principal be "for the purpose of aiding" the principal to commit the crime of which the accessory has been charged. To be convicted as an aider, the defendant must not only assist the principal in the commission of the offence, but must intend to do so, although it is not necessary that the aider know all the details of the crime committed. It is sufficient that the aider was aware of the type of crime to be committed and knew the circumstances necessary to constitute the crime that he or she is accused of aiding. On the basis of Woolworth and McDaid knowledge will include actual knowledge or wilful blindness, but will not include recklessness. This accords with Professor Roach's approach regarding the high level of mens rea required for party liability and with the opinions of the other legal scholars that I have reviewed.

[45] With respect to the crime of aiding Dube to commit fraud, on the application of s. 21(1)(b), the appellant was entitled to a clear instruction in conformity with this analysis. Although the trial judge's instructions on s. 21(1)(b) were generally correct, as I have explained, his failure to instruct the jury on the proof of the appellant's knowledge and intention that he was aiding Dube to commit a crime coupled with his failure to correct the Crown's erroneous position that recklessness satisfies the mens rea of s. 21(1)(b) led the jury to believe that it did. Therefore, the appellant is entitled to a new trial on count one. In addition, because the appellant had provided an innocent explanation for his involvement in the fraudulent telemarketing scheme, and the possibility existed that Dube may have misled him to believe that it was legal, a better W.(D.) instruction more meaningfully situated in the trial judge's instruction would have been preferable. However, this in itself would not have warranted ordering a new trial.

[46] As for the instruction on the conspiracy count, I have earlier expressed my concern about the adequacy of this perfunctory instruction. As there is to be a new trial on count one, it is unnecessary to comment extensively on the trial judge's instruction on count two. As I understand the instruction, by telling the jury that it should apply his instruction on count one to count two, the trial judge could have been understood as saying that recklessness would satisfy the mens rea of the substantive offence of conspiracy to commit a criminal act. He made it clear that recklessness would satisfy the mens rea in his answers to the jury's questions that are reproduced in paragraph 25.

[47] In my view, the trial judge erred by leaving to the jury recklessness as a basis for liability for the offence of conspiracy to commit fraud. In R. v. Lessard (1982), 10 C.C.C. (3d) 61 at 86 (Que. C.A.) it was held that the crime of conspiracy cannot be committed by mere recklessness as to the object of the agreement. Lessard was applied in United States

The judgment of the Court was delivered by Kelly, J.A.:

1 On the application made on behalf of F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited (Woolworth) pursuant to s. 762 of the Criminal Code the summary conviction Court stated a case in the following terms:

> STATED CASE by His Honour Judge R.B. Dnieper, Provincial Court Judge, in the Provincial Court (Criminal Division) Judicial District of York, under the provisions of Section 734 of the Criminal Code of Canada.
>
> I On the 29th day of March, 1971, an Information was laid under oath by Mr. Jules Arvay for that the above-named F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited:

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. Govt. Works

Between the 3rd day of February, 1971, and the 10th day of February, 1971, at the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto in the Judicial District of York, unlawfully did for the purpose of promoting the sale of "Ball Point" Pens, named — Auto Magic — make a misleading representation to the public concerning the price at which such articles have been, are, or will be ordinarily sold, contrary to Section 33C (1) of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C., 314, and its amendments.

II On the 17th day of May, 1971, the said charge was duly heard before me in the presence of the accused and after hearing the evidence adduced and the submissions made by counsel on behalf of the Crown and the accused, I found the said F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited guilty of the said offence and convicted it thereof, but at the request of counsel for the said F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited, I state the following case for the consideration of this Honourable Court:

It was shown before me and I found as a fact:

1. The accused, F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited, the Appellant herein ("Woolworth") is a corporation carrying on the business of a retail department store at the corner of Yonge Street and Queen Street in the Municipality of Metropolitan Toronto in the Judicial District of York (the "store premises").

2. The said store premises were managed at the material times hereinafter set out by one Peter Fawcett ("Fawcett"), a full-time store manager employed by the accused Woolworth. Fawcett, as store manager, had authority to enter into agreements on behalf of Woolworth with persons for the purpose of allowing such persons to demonstrate, display, and sell or give away wares owned by the said persons in the said store premises.

3. On or about January 15, 1971, Fawcett was approached by one James Healey ("Healey") who requested that Fawcett agree to allow Healey to demonstrate and sell certain pens hereinafter more particularly described in the said store premises. Fawcett on behalf of the accused Woolworth in consideration for Healey's agreement to pay Woolworth thirty per cent of the sales of the said pens agreed to rent Healey a store counter and an area of floor space in front thereof in the said store premises for the purpose of demonstrating and selling the said pens during Woolworth's normal store hours. There was no discussion with respect to Healey being an employee of Woolworth and the parties understood that Healey was in business for himself. There was no discussion of Healey being a representative or agent of the accused Woolworth. The agreement was oral and there was no document or other written evidence of same admitted in evidence.

4. Healey employed one John McPhee ("McPhee") on a day-to-day basis in consideration for twenty-five per cent of the sales of the said pens. McPhee demonstrated and sold the pens to the public in the manner hereinafter more particularly set out.

5. For a period of approximately five weeks in January and February of 1971, including the dates hereinafter referred to, Healey and McPhee were on the said store premises under the terms of the said agreement referred to in paragraph 3 hereof.

6. The property, fixtures, equipment and wares used in connection with the demonstration and sale of the said pens were as follows:

(i) a store counter, floor space and cash register, being part of the said store premises and equipment owned by the accused Woolworth;

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. Govt. Works

(ii) a display booth which was placed on top of the said store counter and a sign affixed thereto with the wording "free sample" or similar words written on a sign attached thereto, and a small microphone and public address speaker, both of which were brought onto the premises and owned by Healey, and removed by him at the end of the said five week peri- od;

(iii) an inventory of the following types of pens and pen refills:

(a) a pen and pencil set consisting of a ball point pen named — "Auto Magic" ball point pen and a pencil said to be a liquid lead pencil also named — "Auto Magic",

(b) a ball point pen and pen stand with a clip called a "telephone clip-on" pen, and

(c) ball point pen refills.

Healey owned the inventory of "Auto Magic" ball point pen and pencil sets, telephone clip-on pens and ball point pen refills which he brought onto the said store premises at the commencement of the said five week period. Healey purchased further inventory of pens and pen refills in his own name which was ordered from a U.S. supplier, described as Speedy Sales, and picked up by Healey at the Toronto International Airport from time to time to replace pens and pen refills sold out of inventory. Healey removed the remainder of the inventory of pens and pen refills on the termination of the said five week period.

7. Any refunds requested by purchasers from time to time were the responsibility of Healey.

8. On February 4 of 1971 McPhee at the said counter and booth in the said store premises represented to a group of people in the course of a demonstration and sales speech in effect that he represented a large manufacturing company, that the said pen set which he called "Auto Magic" by Packard was made to retail for $7.95, that his company was giving the pens away free to persons who purchased the said telephone clip-on pen which was made to retail at $3.95, but which was being sold for $2.98, and that there were also further bonuses being refills for ball point pens.

9. On February 5 at the said store premises, McPhee made the following representations to a group of people in the course of demonstrating the said Auto Magic ball point pens and making a sales speech said to be for the purpose of launching a brand new product not yet on sale:

Now, remember the name, that's Auto Magic by Packard, the dual pen set, as you see. Designed to retail at $7.95, and Now, remember the name, that is telephone clip-on pen by Packard. Goes on sale and designed to retail at $3.98.

10. On February 5 at the said store premises, McPhee made the following representations to a group of people in the course of demonstrating the said Auto Magic ball point pens and making a sales speech said to be for the purpose of launching a brand new product not yet on sale:

It's Packard Auto Magic, the dual pen set. The two, designed to retail at $7.95, get one, they're really worth it, and

Now remember the name. It's telephone clip-on pen by Packard. Designed to retail at $3.98, and

One of our Packard Auto Magic dual pen sets which you see here is $7.95, and

One of our new telephone clip-on pens at the nationally advertised price of $3.98.

11. On completion of each of the said sales speeches, McPhee sold a number of telephone clip-on pens for $2.98 and subsequently delivered to each purchaser one "Auto Magic" ball point pen set, and a number of ball point pen refills which were represented to be as bonuses to the purchasers. No receipts were given to persons making purchases.

12. I found that the aforesaid representations were made for the purpose of promoting the sale of the ball point pens named "Auto Magic".

13. I also found as a fact that McPhee made the following statement as part of his sales speech:

How many of you same people would take this set from me now, absolutely free? Now take it home and show it to your friends and help us to advertise our new product and take along with you one of our new telephone clip-on pens at the nationally advertised price of $3.98. Would you like to raise your hands? Thank you sir, thank you sir, thank you ladies.

14. I found that the aforesaid representations were false representations of the ordinary selling price of the ball point pens named "Auto Magic" since testimony from the several witnesses which I accepted placed the maximum selling price between $2.00 and $6.95 and not $7.95 as was stated by McPhee.

15. The said sales speeches including the representations aforesaid were prepared in writing by Healey. They were not considered or approved by Fawcett. There was no evidence of consideration or approval of the said representations by any other person on behalf of the accused Woolworth.

16. McPhee in his sales speeches represented that he was associated with a large manufacturing company, the Packard Pen Company. At no time during the said sales speeches did McPhee represent that he was an employee, agent, servant or representative of Woolworth or hold himself out as being associated with Woolworth.

17. Fawcett made no express arrangement directly with McPhee permitting him to be on the premises but understood that he was employed by Healey. Fawcett had no knowledge of the terms of the agreement between McPhee and Healey or of what they did with the proceeds gained from sales.

18. Fawcett had no control over the manner in which Healey or McPhee demonstrated and sold the said pens except to terminate their permission to be on the said store premises.

19. I found that the accused Woolworth:

(i) Knew or should have known by informing itself as to what was said by Mr. McPhee;

(ii) was a participant;

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. Govt. Works

(iii) was a partner with Healey in this venture;

(iv) provided the facilities without charge for the selling of the ball point pens named "Auto Magic";

(v) received a commission from the accused Healey of 30% of the gross sales of the ball point pens named "Auto Magic".

20. Upon convicting the accused Woolworth, I pronounced the following Order pursuant to Section 31(1) of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1952, Chapter 314, as amended:

F.W. Woolworth Company is ordered by this Court not to commit the offence of which the company was this day convicted; that is, the company is prohibited from making any materially misleading representation to the public by any means whatsoever for the purpose of promoting the sale of articles which have or will be sold.

The said F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited desires to question the validity of the said conviction on the grounds that it is erroneous in point of law, the questions submitted for the judgment of this Honourable Court being:

QUESTIONS

1. Whether the evidence constituted any evidence upon which the said appellant could be convicted of the said offence.

2. Whether the evidence constituted any evidence of a representation made for the purpose of promoting the sale of "Ball Point Pens named Auto Magic".

3. Whether the evidence constituted any evidence of the ordinary selling price of "Ball Point" Pens named Auto Magic.

4. Whether the Court erred in law in holding that F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited was a participant.

5. Whether the Court erred in law in holding that F.W. Woolworth Co. Limited was a partner with one Healey.

6. Whether the Court erred in law in granting an Order under Section 31(1) of the Combines Investigation Act R.S.C. 1952, Chapter 314.

7. Whether the Court erred in law in refusing to restrict the terms of the said Order to a continuation or repetition of the making of misleading representations to the public concerning the price at which "Ball Point" Pens named Auto Magic have been, are, or will be ordinarily sold for the purpose of promoting the sale of such article.

2 On May 15, 1973, Houlden, J., answered in the affirmative solely the first question propounded and dismissed the appeal [11 C.C.C. (2d) 572, 11 C.P.R. (2d) 229, 21 C.R.N.S. 371]. From that disposition this appeal was taken by Woolworth.

3 The grounds which were advanced in support of the appeal were the following:

1. That the representations made related to the distribution of the ball point pen named "telephone clip-on" and not the sale of the pen as charged in the information.

2. That the learned trial Judge misdirected himself with respect to the necessary elements of mens rea.

3. That the learned trial Judge erred in law in granting an order under s. 31(1) [am 1953-54 c. 51, s. 750, 1960, c. 45, s. 12] of the Combines Investigation Act, R.S.C. 1952, c. 314, and amending Acts (now R.S.C. 1970, c. C-23, s. 30(1)).

4. That the learned trial Judge erred in refusing to restrict the order made under s. 31(1) to the repetition or the continuation of the offence of which Woolworth was convicted.

4 Before this Court it was conceded that Healey and his employee McPhee had violated s. 33C(1) of the Act (as enacted by 1960, c. 45, s. 13 [now s. 36]) and that Fawcett came within the class of employees whose acts were those of his corporate employer in relation to the arrangement made with Healey.

5 I am of the opinion that there was evidence to support the conviction of Healey and McPhee on the charge as particularized in the information.

6 Since the offence is the making of a misleading representation, to fix Woolworth with criminal responsibility for the making of it, the Crown was required to connect Woolworth with the "making" in some manner which would in law constitute Woolworth criminally liable for such representation. This could have been done only:

1. By fixing Woolworth with the vicarious liability for the acts of Healey and McPhee.

2. By establishing that Woolworth was a party to the offence by reason of s. 21 of the Criminal Code.

7 Before dealing with the legal responsibility flowing from the facts, some consideration must be given to the findings of the trial Court, particularly to those set out in para. 19 of the stated case:

1. "Woolworth knew, or ought to have known, by informing itself as to what was said by Mr. McPhee."

Devlin, J., in Roper v. Taylor's Central Garages (Exeter), Ltd., [1951] 2 T.L.R. 284, described three degrees of knowledge — first, actual knowledge; second, the situation where the person to whom the knowledge is imputed deliberately refrains from making inquiries, the result of which he might not care to have, and third, constructive knowledge often described by the words "ought to have known" meaning that the person had in effect the means of knowledge. He stated at p. 289:

> There is a vast distinction between a state of mind which consists of deliberately refraining from making inquiries, the result of which the person does not care to have, and a state of mind which is merely neglecting to make such inquiries as a reasonable and prudent person would make. If that distinction is kept well in mind I think that justices will have less difficulty than this case appears to show they have had in determining what is the true position. The case of shutting the eyes is actual knowledge in the eyes of the law; the case of merely neglecting to make inquiries is not knowledge at all — it comes within the legal conception of constructive knowledge, a conception which, generally speaking, has no place in the criminal law.

Since there is no foundation for the conclusion that Fawcett deliberately refrained from making inquiries as to McPhee's conduct in making sales, the finding of the trial Court was one of constructive knowledge which in criminal law is not knowledge at all.

2. "Woolworth was a participant."

The Act contains for the limited purposes of s. 41 [am. idem, s. 18] thereof (now s. 45), a definition of "participant" but this term has no relevancy whatsoever to the determination of Woolworth's guilt; nor, in my view, does the section under which Woolworth was charged impose criminal liability on one who could be styled broadly a "participant" unless it can be held a party within the meaning of s. 21 of the Criminal Code.

3. "Woolworth was a partner with Healey in this venture."

The undisputed facts as to the relationship between the appellant and Healey will not support the existence of a partnership. The provision of the facilities was not without charge and even if that had been the case it would not have been determinative of the existence of a partnership. The receipt of a percentage of the gross sales does not of itself create a partnership: Partnerships Act, R.S.O. 1960, c. 288, s. 3, para. 2 [now R.S.O. 1970, c. 339]. The inventory was owned by Healey and Woolworth had no proprietary interest in it. There is a complete absence of the carrying on of business in common with a view to profit which is the essential character of a partnership.

8 Accepting, as Woolworth appeared to accept, that the offence created by s. 33 is one of [rep. & sub. idem, s. 13] is one of strict liability in order to hold it vicariously liable, there still must be proven such a relationship between the actual maker and defendant that the act of the maker may be imputed to the defend- ant.

9 Examples of such relationship are that of master and servant where the master may be responsible for his servant's acts within the scope of his employment — principal and agent where the principal may be responsible for his agent's acts and that where there has been delegation to another of a sphere of activity within which the acts of the delegate are performed on behalf of the delegator. There existed no such relationship between Woolworth and Healey and McPhee since Healey was conducting his own business and Woolworth had no control over the manner in which Healey and McPhee demonstrated or sold the pens except to terminate their permission to be on the store premises. The appellant and Healey were either lessor and lessee or licensor and licensee; neither relationship would justify imposing vicarious liability on Woolworth for the acts of either Healey or McPhee.

10 It remains to consider whether Woolworth was a party to the offence by virtue of s. 21 of the Criminal Code made applicable to the offence created by the Act by s. 27 of the Interpretation Act, 1967-68 (Can.), c. 7 (now R.S.C. 1970, c. I-23).

11 As has been stated by Lord Reid in Sweet v. Parsley, [1970] A.C. 132, there is a presumption that mens rea is an essential element of every offence unless some reason can be found for holding that it is not necessarily so; when Parliament has chosen to create an offence of absolute liability the Courts must carry out its will but only to the extent that Parliament's intention to displace the presumption is clearly stated. In enacting s. 33 Parliament had the option of including in the Act provisions extending culpability for the infraction of the section to those other than the actual perpetrators in which even the Courts would have been called upon to interpret the scope of the words used by Parliament to convey its intention. However, instead of so doing Parliament has chosen to rely upon the extension by s. 21 imported into any offence created by statute. Section 21 reads as follows:

21(1) Every one is a party to an offence who

(a) actually commits it,

© 2012 Thomson Reuters. No Claim to Orig. Govt. Works

(b) does or omits to do anything for the purpose of aiding any person to commit it, or

(c) abets any person in committing it.

(2) Where two or more persons form an intention in common to carry out an unlawful purpose and to assist each other therein and any one of them, in carrying out the common purpose, commits an offence, each of them who knew or ought to have known that the commission of the offence would be a probable consequence of carrying out the common purpose is a party to that offence.

12 It is sought to make Woolworth a party as having done or omitted to do something for the purpose of aiding Healey and McPhee to commit the substantive offence.

13 There are two principal reasons for holding that Woolworth was not a party to the offence charged:

1. Even with respect to offences of strict liability the alleged aider must know that he is aiding. Although it is not necessary that it be proven that he know that the conduct he is aiding constitutes an offence it is necessary that the accused be proven at least to have known the circumstances necessary to constitute the offence he is accused of aiding.

Counsel before Houlden, J., informed him that diligent search had not disclosed any authority in point. He was left to rely upon the following dictum in R. v. Jacobs et al., [1944] K.B. 417 at p. 420, [1944] 1 All E.R. 485 at p. 487:

> We desire, however, to guard ourselves against being supposed to assent to the proposition that a person who aids and abets another in the commission of an offence not involving any mens rea in the principal cannot be convicted in the absence of proof of mens rea on his own part.

This dictum formed no essential part of the decision of the issue before the Court. The Court was dealing with the sufficiency of a direction given to a jury in the trial of charges of conspiracy as to what constituted aiding and abetting. After approving as correct the instructions given by the trial Judge the judgment went on to make, due perhaps to over-caution, a reservation as to what the Court was not deciding. It is sufficient to say that when a Court indicates the exact limits it wishes to be put upon its pronouncements no inference may be drawn as to what would have been its decision on the points it has disclaimed as part of its decision.

Subsequent cases appear to have more relevancy to the point at issue than has the case quoted. In National Coal Board v. Gamble, [1959] 1 Q.B. 11, the Board as the operator of a mine, through its employee, a weighmaster, gave to the driver of an independent haulage contractor a delivery ticket which indicated that the vehicle was overweight. The driver of the vehicle, who chose to risk driving as he had loaded, was apprehended and convicted. The Board which had no control over the driver, but whose ticket was necessary for the driver to leave the Board's premises, was charged as an aider and abettor. On the review of the conviction by the Queen's Bench Division, Lord Goddard, C.J., stated at p. 18:

> In Ackroyds Air Travel, Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1950] 1 All E.R. 933, 936, I stated the law with regard to aiding and abetting in this way: "...a person could only be convicted ... as an aider and abettor if he knew all the circumstances which constituted the offence. Whether he realized that those circumstances constituted an offence was immaterial. If he knew all the circumstances and those circumstances constituted the offence ... that was enough to convict him of being an aider and abettor." Humphreys J. in the same case said: "...it must be shown that the unlawful act has been committed, and, therefore, that the offence has been committed, and, further, that the person charged as an aider and abettor was aware of the facts sufficiently to enable him to know that the act was unlawful."

It may be noted that the judgment of Lord Goddard, C.J., in Ackroyds Air Travel, Ltd. v. Director of Public Prosecutions, [1950] 1 All E.R. 933, was delivered in 1950 and refers to an earlier statement to the same effect, in Carter Patersons & Pickfords Carriers Ltd. v. Wessel, [1947] 1 K.B. 849, [1947] 2 All E.R. 280.

The statement of Lord Goddard, C.J., above quoted was applied in John Henshall (Quarries) Ltd. v. Harvey, [1965] 2 W.L.R. 758.

In Sweet v. Parsley, supra, the attention of the Court was directed principally to another point: but there seems to have been no challenge to the Court's assumption that, even in offences of strict liability, to hold one guilty as an aider and abettor, the Crown had the onus of proving knowledge on the part of the alleged aider of the circumstances necessary to constitute the offence which he is alleged to have aided, although it is not required that it be proven the alleged aider knew that those circumstances constituted an offence.

In the light of the foregoing authorities I am of the view that, it not having been shown that Woolworth had knowledge of the facts which constituted the offence, it could not be convicted as an aider by the application of s. 21. I use knowledge in this connection as actual knowledge as defined by Devlin, J., that is, actual knowledge or deliberate ignorance which is the equivalent of actual knowledge.

2. There is another reason why I am of the opinion that the convictions cannot stand. Section 21 requires that an alleged party must do or omit to do something for the purpose of aiding the principal to commit the offence. That purpose must be the purpose of the one sought to be made a party to the offence (Sweet v. Parsley, supra) but if what is done incidentally and innocently assists in the commission of an offence that is not enough to involve the alleged party whose purpose was not that of furthering the perpetration of the offence.

If the owner of a car rents or loans it to one he knows contemplates using it for the purpose of committing a robbery, he would thereby render himself liable as a party, or if an owner of a house rents the house knowing it is to be used for recording bets, he similarly would be a party to the offence. But one does not render himself liable by renting or loaning a car for some legitimate business or recreational activity merely because the person to whom it is loaned or rented chooses in the course of his use to transport some stolen goods, or by renting a house for residential purposes to a tenant who surreptitiously uses it to store drugs.

Hence where, as here, the arrangement between Woolworth and the actual offender was for the purpose of merchandising in the normal conduct of which there would be no infraction of s. 33, the departure of Healey and McPhee from the legitimate course of business by making statements constituting an infraction of s. 33 was outside the purpose of the arrangement. There is no evidence that Woolworth's purpose in providing space and facilities in its store was for the purpose of aiding and abetting Healey in the commission of this offence. Woolworth, having no actual knowledge of the illegal conduct or of Healey's intention to commit it, cannot be held to have provided the facilities and premises for the purpose of aiding and abetting in the commission of an offence.

Since it is apparent that I consider there was no evidence upon which the appellant could be convicted of the offence charged, I would answer Q. 1 in the negative and, as I have already indicated, Qq. 2, 3, 4 and 5 in the affirmative.

On this disposition of the appeal it may be considered unnecessary to answer Qq. 6 and 7. However, as a further appeal may be taken from the decision of this Court, it is desirable that views of the Court be expressed on all the questions stated.

Even if it be assumed that a proper case had been made out for the making of an order under s. 31(1), the scope of the order, as framed by the trial Court, exceeds the jurisdiction conferred on it by the section. Cases dealing with prohibitory orders have not been restrictive of the power of the Court to make orders in a proper case directed to preventing the continuation or repetition of the offence of which a conviction had been registered: R. v. St. Lawrence Corp., [1969] 2 O.R. 305, 7 C.R.N.S. 265, [1969] 3 C.C.C. 263, 59 C.P.R. 97, 5 D.L.R. (3d) 263 (C.A.). Nonetheless the order to be made must relate to the continuation or repetition of the offence for which the conviction was made. Quite apart from the irrelevancy of prohibiting Woolworth from making any representations for the purpose of promoting a sale of articles which have been sold, I consider that the order herein does not bear a proper relationship in its terms to the terms of the offence charged in the information and it therefore offends as exceeding the authority conferred on the Court by the Act. It is on that account void or is at least unenforceable with respect to representations respecting articles which bear no generic similarity to the articles in respect of which the conviction has been registered. Orders which have been upheld by the Court in the past have been directed to the continuation or repetition, reasonably to be apprehended, of the unlawful conduct in respect of the class of goods which were the subject-matter of the charge. In R. v. St. Lawrence Corp. where a considerable period had elapsed between the impugned action and the prosecution, the order was confined to the repetition of the act complained of since continuation of the act which had terminated was at that time not possible. On this account I would answer Q. 7 in the affirmative.

Had Parliament so wished it could have made the prohibitory order a universal and necessary consequence of a conviction of an offence under Part V of the Act. It has not done so — it has made a separate provision in Part IV entitled "Special Remedies" whereby a convicting Court, or under certain circumstances a superior Court of criminal jurisdiction, within three years of a conviction may, but is not required to, make an order prohibiting the continuation or repetition of the offence. Since the making of such an order requires the judicial exercise by the Court of its discretion that discretion must be exercised for the purpose of achieving the purpose for which the section offended was intended to accomplish. The purpose of s. 33 is to prevent the making of misleading representations as to price for the purpose of promoting sales. It appears to me that Parliament has shown a clear intention that, in the usual course, the imposition of one or more of the penalties provided by the Criminal Code for the punishment of a person convicted of an offence punishable by summary conviction will be the adequate deterrent. In order to justify the Court in exercising the discretion to impose the special remedy under s. 31(1) a Court should be satisfied that there exist circumstances from which it is reasonably inferable that the purpose of the Act will not be accomplished unless the special remedy of a prohibitory order is invoked in addition to the normal penalty of fine and imprisonment. The evidence before the Court ought to show a deliberate and flagrant disobedience of this section and the likelihood of a continuation or repetition in the absence of prohibition. There has always been a reluctance on the part of Courts or Judges to invoke extraordinary powers unless satisfied that no other adequate remedy exists and that the use of the extraordinary power is necessary under the circumstances. In my opinion, the evidence before the trial Court related to a comparatively minor and isolated occurrence which did not merit or require the invocation of the special remedy of prohibition. For these reasons the answer to Q. 6 is in the affirmative.

14 As I am of the opinion that the evidence before the trial Court did not constitute any evidence upon which Woolworth could be convicted of the offence charged, I would allow the appeal and direct that the verdict be set aside on the ground that it cannot be supported by the evidence, and that the conviction recorded by the trial Court be quashed and a verdict of acquittal entered.

105. Kann ein Rechtsanwalt, indem er in Ausübung seines Berufes Rat in einer Rechtssache erteilt, sich der Beihülfe zu einer strafbaren Handlung schuldig machen?

St.G.B. § 49.

I. Strafsenat. Urt. v. 17. November 1904 g. B. u. Gen. Rep. 1178/04.

I. Landgericht Köln.

Der Kaufmann A. B. war rechtskräftig wegen Betruges zu einer Gefängnisstrafe verurteilt worden und verbüßte diese ihm auferlegte Strafe. Es wurde ihm gestattet, in Begleitung eines Schutzmannes seine Angehörigen in deren Wohnung zu besuchen. Seine Ehefrau und seine Söhne haben ihm nun bei dem Besuche vorsätzlich, indem sie die Aufmerksamkeit des bewachenden Schutzmannes ablenkten, dazu verholfen, aus der Gewalt des letzteren zu entfliehen. Sie sind wegen vorsätzlicher Beihülfe zur Selbstbefreiung eines Gefangenen verurteilt worden.

Der mitangeklagte Rechtsanwalt M., ihr Rechtsbeistand, um dessen Revision es sich hier allein handelt, ist wegen Beihülfe zu dieser Tat und zugleich — in idealer Konkurrenz — wegen Begünstigung des A. B., um ihn der Bestrafung zu entziehen, verurteilt worden.

Auf seine Revision wurde das Urteil der Strafkammer, soweit es seine Verurteilung ausspricht, aufgehoben und die Sache zur anderweiten Verhandlung und Entscheidung an die Vorinstanz zurückverwiesen aus folgenden

Gründen:

... Was den Angeklagten Rechtsanwalt M. betrifft, so hat die Strafkammer folgendes festgestellt: Bevor der Gefangene A. B. floh und seine Angehörigen, die Mitangeklagten, ihm zur Selbstbefreiung behülflich waren, haben letztere seinen, des M., Rat in seiner Eigenschaft als ihres Rechtsbeistandes verlangt. Der Beschwerdeführer hat zuerst abgeraten, dann aber, als er sah, daß die Flucht doch ins Werk gesetzt werden würde, „hat er als Rechtsbeistand geglaubt, der Ehefrau B. seinen Rat nicht vorenthalten zu sollen". Indem er den § 120 St.G.B.'s übersah, hat er seinen „Rat" dahin erteilt, daß die Mitangeklagten für ihre Hülfeleistung bei der Flucht ihres Ehemannes und Vaters nicht bestraft werden könnten. Dadurch hat er sie in ihrem Vorhaben gestärkt. Es wird als erwiesen bezeichnet, daß M. sich auch bewußt war, wie er durch Rat die zur Hülfeleistung bei der Flucht ihres Ehemannes und Vaters bereits entschlossenen Mitangeklagten in ihrem Entschlusse befestigt und bestärkt hat, und daß „sein Wille darauf gerichtet war, nachdem an der Flucht B.'s nichts mehr geändert werden konnte, seinerseits den Mitangeklagten bei der geplanten Hülfeleistung zur Flucht Beihülfe zu leisten, indem er sie über die dabei von ihnen zu vermeidenden Delikte belehrte und ihnen durch Hinweis auf ihre Straflosigkeit Sicherheit einflößte." Indem die Strafkammer darlegt, daß auch der rechtskundige M. durch seinen Irrtum über das Strafgesetz (§ 120 St.G.B.'s) nicht geschützt werde, hat sie ihn für schuldig erachtet, den Mitangeklagten, der Ehefrau und den Söhnen B., zur Begehung der vorsätzlichen Hülfeleistung zur Selbstbefreiung eines Gefangenen durch Rat wissentlich Hülfe gewährt und durch dieselbe Handlung dem A. B. nach Begehung des Vergehens der Unterschlagung wissentlich Beistand geleistet zu haben, um ihn der Bestrafung zu entziehen. Der Angeklagte M. ist aus §§ 120. 49. 257 und 73 St.G.B.'s zu Strafe verurteilt worden.

Der hiergegen von dem Angeklagten eingelegten Revision konnte der Erfolg nicht versagt werden.

Zwar ist dem ersten Richter zuzugeben, daß es nicht zu den Pflichten — oder auch nur Rechten — eines Rechtsanwaltes gehört, durch seinen Rat zur Begehung einer strafbaren Handlung wissentlich Hülfe zu leisten, und daß auch ihn ein Irrtum über das Strafrecht nicht straffrei macht. Andererseits aber ist es selbstverständlich, daß das — nach bestem Wissen abgegebene, richtige oder unrichtige — Rechtsgutachten eines Rechtsanwaltes darüber, ob eine gewisse, von dem das Gutachten Erheischenden geplante Handlung nach den Gesetzen mit Strafe belegt sei oder nicht, an und für sich nicht als Beihülfe im Sinne des § 49 St.G.B.'s angesehen werden darf, auch wenn das Gutachten die Ausführung der Tat zur Folge hat, der Gutachter diesen bevorstehenden Erfolg bereits bei seiner Ratserteilung wußte und die Tat in Wahrheit ein strafbares Delikt ist. Die Beihülfe durch Rat besteht in einer psychischen Einwirkung auf den Täter, allerdings auch, um den bereits zur Tat Entschlossenen in seinem Entschlusse zu befestigen oder zu bestärken.

Zur „Wissentlichkeit" — gleichbedeutend mit Vorsätzlichkeit — aber ist es nicht ausreichend, daß dem Gehülfen bekannt ist, der Täter wolle die betreffende strafbare Handlung begehen; es ist vielmehr für das subjektive Tatbestandsmerkmal erforderlich, daß der Täter seine Hülfe und insbesondere seinen Rat gewähre, in dem Bewußtsein, es werde durch diese seine Tätigkeit die Ausführung der von dem anderen beabsichtigten Tat gefördert werden, und daß somit auch der Wille des Ratgebenden auf diesen Erfolg gerichtet sei.

Vgl. Entsch. des R.G.'s in Strafs. Bd. 16 S. 25, Bd. 17 S. 377, Bd. 32 S. 353.

Gehört es nun, wie unzweifelhaft ist, zu den Berufshandlungen und Berufspflichten eines Rechtsanwaltes, denjenigen, die seinen Rat erfordern, nach bestem Wissen diesen Rat zu erteilen, so wird man von vornherein und präsumtiv davon ausgehen müssen, daß das Bewußtsein und der Wille des Anwaltes in solchen Fällen lediglich darauf gerichtet ist, pflichtmäßig Rat zu erteilen, insbesondere nicht darauf, auf das, was der Klient infolge der rechtsgutachtlichen Äußerung seines Rechtsbeistandes tut, einzuwirken. Das wird man im allgemeinen auch in dem Falle annehmen müssen, wenn der Anwalt sich sagt oder weiß, daß sein Rat den Klienten zur Vornahme irgendeiner bestimmten Handlung veranlassen wird, insbesondere, daß der gutachtliche Rat den anderen zur Begehung eines Delikts bestimmen, also objektiv zur Ausführung einer strafbaren Handlung Beihülfe leisten wird. Sollte der erste Richter bei Feststellung des Vorsatzes des Angeklagten auch schon in einem derartigen „Bewußtsein" das Tatbestandsmerkmal der Wissentlichkeit im Sinne des § 49 St.G.B.'s erblickt haben, so würde seine Feststellung des subjektiven Tatbestandes auf Rechtsirrtum beruhen. In Fällen der vorliegenden Art wird man besonders streng zu unterscheiden und bei Prüfung der Frage nach der Vorsätzlichkeit den Begriff des „Bewußtseins" und des „Willens" in Anpassung an die konkrete Sachlage mit besonderer Schärfe aufzufassen haben. Will der Anwalt — auf berufsmäßige Gutachten anderer Zweige wird dieselbe Erwägung zutreffen — nichts weiter tun, als seinen berufs- und pflichtmäßigen Rat (d. i. Belehrung) erteilen, ist ihm dabei bekannt, daß sein Gutachten zur Begehung eines Delikts führt, ... hat jedoch sein Wille mit dieser Folge seiner rechtlichen Begutachtung oder Ratserteilung nichts zu schaffen, so kann von einer wissentlichen Beihülfe nicht die Rede sein. Geht aber seine Geistes- und Willenstätigkeit nicht nur darauf hin, in der Ratserteilung seinen Beruf zu erfüllen, sondern auch durch die berufsmäßige Ratserteilung die Ausführung einer Straftat zu fördern, dann — und nur dann — liegt Beihülfe im Sinne des Strafgesetzes vor. Nun sagen zwar die Urteilsgründe hier, daß der Wille des Angeklagten darauf gerichtet war, seinerseits zur Flucht Beihülfe zu leisten, diese Feststellung aber wird — wie mangels jeder in einem so subtilen Falle doch unbedingt erforderlichen Angabe von Gründen angenommen werden muß — lediglich auf die unmittelbar vorhergehende Darlegung des Beweises des „Bewußtseins" des Angeklagten von den fraglichen Folgen seiner Ratserteilung gegründet, und somit ist es nicht ausgeschlossen, nach Lage des erwiesenen Sachverhaltes sogar höchstwahrscheinlich, daß die Strafkammer den Begriff des „Bewußtseins" in dem vorstehend gemißbilligten Sinne aufgefaßt hat. Hierfür spricht namentlich auch die Stelle in den Urteilsgründen, wo es wörtlich heißt, der Angeklagte habe als Rechtsbeistand geglaubt, der Ehefrau B. seinen Rat nicht vorenthalten zu sollen. Damit wäre das Tatbestandsmerkmal der „Wissentlichkeit" im Sinne des § 49 St.G.B.s verkannt. Zur anderweiten Feststellung dieses Merkmals mußte hiernach das angefochtene Urteil in dem entsprechenden Umfange aufgehoben werden, wobei noch zu bemerken ist, daß augenscheinlich der Mangel des Urteils auch die Feststellung des subjektiven Tatbestandes des § 257 St.G.B.'s trifft.

493). Denn unter diesen Voraussetzungen verliert sein Tun stets den "Alltagscharakter"; es ist als "Solidarisierung" mit dem Täter zu deuten (Roxin aaO § 27 Rdnr. 19). Anderenfalls kommt straflose Mitwirkung in Betracht.

3. Diese Grundsätze lassen sich auch auf den hier zu entscheidenden Fall übertragen (vgl. hierzu auch Rogall, Bewältigung von Systemkriminalität, in: 50 Jahre Bundesgerichtshof, Festgabe aus der Wissenschaft Bd. IV, S. 383, 397/398). Ihre Anwendung führt zur Verneinung einer Beihilfestrafbarkeit der Angeklagten:

Die Jahresbefehle 101 bis 20 betrafen nicht ausschließlich strafrechtlich relevantes Verhalten gegenüber sog. "Grenzverletzern", sondern auch legitime Belange der Landesverteidigung der ehemaligen DDR sowie deren Grenzsicherung nach Außen. Die Mitwirkung der beiden Angeklagten bei der Erstellung der Befehle 40 beschränkte sich zudem auf die ihnen zugewiesenen, in keinem Zusammenhang mit der Verminung des Grenzgebietes stehenden militärischen Aufgabenbereiche; sie war damit "berufstypisch" und bezogen auf die den Verfahrensgegenstand bildenden Rechtsgutsverletzungen "neutral". Zwar wußten die Angeklagten, daß die Jahresbefehle auch Anordnungen über die Verlegung, Instandhaltung und Bedienung von Minen enthalten würden. Ihre eigenen Beiträge hatten jedoch jeweils eine eigenständige Bedeutung; sie blieben auch ohne die strafbaren Handlungen der Haupttäter "sinnvoll" (vgl. Roxin aaO § 27 Rdnr. 17) und können hiervon losgelöst rechtlich beurteilt werden (vgl. auch BGHR StGB § 27 Abs. 1 Hilfeleisten 3; BGH StV 2000, 492, 494). Bei der gebotenen bewertenden Betrachtungsweise stellt sich daher das Verhalten dieser Angeklagten bei der Erstellung der Jahresbefehle nur als straflose Mitwirkung dar.

MAGISTRACY APPEAL NO 1040 OF 1987

HIGH COURT

DECIDED-DATE-1: 20 JANUARY 1988

DE BASTO J

CATCHWORDS:

Criminal Law and Procedure - Theft - Aiding and abetting - Appellant present when offence committed - Whether mere presence sufficient - Whether intentional encouragement necessary

HEADNOTES:

The appellant and two other defendants were charged with and convicted of theft. The other defendants pleaded guilty. The magistrate found that the appellant was an aider and abettor 'in a form of encouragement in the circumstances'.

Held, allowing the appeal:

(1) It was not enough that the presence of the accused person had, in fact, given encouragement. It must be proved that he intended to give encouragement, that he wilfully encouraged. R v Clarkson (1971) 55 Cr App R 445 followed.

(2) The magistrate did not mention that he found that the appellant intentionally gave encouragement to the others by his presence at the scene, thus omitting an important finding, namely, the appellant wilfully encouraged the commission of the crime.

R v Allan (1963) 47 Cr App R 243
R v Clarkson (1971) 55 Cr App R 445
R v Jones and Mirrless (1977) 65 Cr App R 250
R v Leung Tak Yin [1987] 2 HKC 250

This was an appeal against conviction for aiding and abetting the commission of theft. The facts appear sufficiently in

A Sedgwick QC and Selwyn So (Chan Lau & Wai) for the appellant.
J Shaw (Crown Prosecutor) for the respondent.

JUDGMENTBY: DE BASTO J

DE BASTO J The appellant was charged together with two other accused, D1 and D2 who pleaded guilty, with the offence of theft. He was convicted and placed on probation for a period of 12 months. He now appeals against his conviction

Very briefly, the appellant and the other two accused drove to a dead end road in Homantin at about 1am. They had all spent the evening together. D1 and D2 drove while the appellant drove his own car. D1 parked his car on one side of the road and the appellant on the other side. The appellant testified that he saw D1 and D2 tampering with the light covers of another car and he knew D1 had lost similar covers on his car. [*680] The police arrived and it is not disputed the car light in the appellant's car was on.

Upon being questioned, the appellant denied he knew D1 and D2 -- this was a lie and he said he lied because he did not want the police to think that he was associated with what D1 and D2 were doing.

I was referred to three cases -- R v Allan & Ors 1963 47 Cr App R 243, R v Clarkson & Ors 1971 55 Cr App R 445 and R v Jones and Mirrless 1977 65 Cr App R 250 -- and I referred to the case of R v Leung Tak-yin [1987] 2 HKC 250 in which the Court of Appeal approved the main principles set out in R v Clarkson & Ors 1971 55 Cr App R 445:

> It is no criminal offence to stand by, a mere passive spectator of a crime, even of a murder. Non-interference to prevent a crime is not itself a crime. But the fact that a person was voluntarily and purposely present witnessing the commission of a crime, and offered no opposition to it, though he might reasonably be expected to prevent and had the power so to do, or at least to express his dissent, might, under some circumstances, afford cogent evidence upon which a jury would be justified in finding that he wilfully encouraged and so aided and abetted. But it would be purely a question for a jury whether he did so or not.

It is not enough, then, that the presence of the accused person has, in fact, given encouragement. It must be proved that he intended to give encouragement; that he wilfully encouraged.

An accused person is entitled, as of right, to know precisely not only of that he was convicted, but the reasons therefore. The learned magistrate found that the appellant was an aider and abetter 'in a form of encouragement in the circumstances'. With respect, I found what the learned magistrate said at the bottom of p 51 and top of p 52 somewhat confusing. He appeared not to have chosen to say, of his findings of fact, that he found the appellant guilty because he was acting in concert with D1 and D2, for example, as a lookout. He may have had doubts about the appellant being a 'lookout' because when the police arrived at the scene, they found his car light on. A 'lookout' is highly unlikely to advertise his presence. By the same token, an aider and abetter is unlikely to do anything which might draw the attention of the police or of passers-by to the scene where a crime is being committed.

To find a person guilty as an aider and abetter, it is not only necessary to prove that he was present while the offence is committed, that he knew an offence was being committed and that his presence, in fact, gave encouragement to the perpetrators but it must be proved that he intended to give that encouragement, that he wilfully encouraged.

The learned magistrate makes no mention that he found that the appellant intentionally gave encouragement to the others by his presence at the scene.

The learned magistrate, having decided to find the appellant guilty not as a principal in the first degree but as an aider and abetter, omitted an important finding -- that the appellant wilfully encouraged the commission of the crime.

For these reasons, I allow the appeal, quash the conviction and set aside the sentence.

CRIMINAL APPEAL NO 10 OF 1987

COURT OF APPEAL

DECIDED-DATE-1: 10 MARCH 1987

ROBERTS CJ, YANG AND SILKE JJA

CATCHWORDS:

Criminal Law and Procedure - Indecent assault - Aiding and abetting - Whether mere presence sufficient to make person aider and abettor - Requirement that person wilfully encouraged commission of offence

HEADNOTES:

The complainant owed a substantial sum of money to a group of men which included the second defendant and the appellant. They had rented a room in which the second defendant, the appellant and two other men played mahjong. The second defendant demanded the complainant to take off her clothes when she failed to raise money to repay him for the money owed. The second defendant threatened to beat her if she did not take her clothes off. After she had taken off her clothes, the second defendant indecently assaulted her while the other three were sitting in the room. The judge held that the appellant was also guilty of indecent assault because he shared with the second defendant a common purpose which the indecent assault was designed to further, though he took no part in the indecent assault.

Held, allowing the appeal: Non-interference to prevent a crime was not itself a crime. But the fact that a person was voluntarily and purposely present witnessing the commission of a crime, and offered no opposition to it, might, under some circumstances, afford cogent evidence upon which a jury would be justified in finding that he wilfully encouraged and so aided and abetted. But it would be purely a question for a jury whether he did so or not. It was not enough that the presence of the accused person had given encouragement. R v Clarkson (1971) 55 Cr App R 445
R v Coney (1882) 8 QBD 534

This was an appeal against conviction and sentence on a charge of indecent assault. The facts appear sufficiently in the following judgment.

D MacKenzie-Ross (CW Leung & Co) for the appellant.
IG Cross (Crown Prosecutor) for the respondent.

JUDGMENTBY: ROBERTS CJ

ROBERTS CJ This is an application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence on one charge of indecent assault.

The applicant, who was the first defendant at the trial, was jointly charged with another man with eight different charges, one of false [*251] imprisonment, three of blackmail, three of criminal intimidation and one of indecent assault.

At the conclusion of the Crown case, the judge ruled that there was no case to answer on seven of the eight charges against both defendants.

We observe, in passing, that it was a matter of some surprise to us that he should have reached this conclusion in relation to the second and third charges of blackmail and criminal intimidation, since the principal witness on whom the Crown relied, in relation to those charges was the same witness as the one on whose evidence the judge relied, in order to convict the first defendant on the charge of indecent assault.

It is unnecessary to go into any detail as to the background facts giving rise to these charges, other than to say that the girl who was the subject of the alleged indecent assault, whom I will refer to as the complainant, had been to Macau for the purposes of gambling and had borrowed a substantial sum of money from a group of men there, who expressed themselves willing to lend money on certain conditions to those who wished to continue gambling.

After various incidents, into which it is unnecessary to go, the complainant found herself with the two defendants and other men on 9 September, in the afternoon, on the premises of the Tak Fuk Association in Wanchai, where a room had been rented by the group of men who were there with the complainant.

The evidence in relation to the indecent assault falls within a short compass. I quote the relevant passage of the complainant's evidence:

> At the Tak Fuk Association, I was accompanied by D1, D2, Ah Kan and Ah Chuen. A room was rented and they played mahjong and I stayed there to make further phone calls to my sister.
> D1 had burnt my arm with a cigarette butt and caused it to be injured -- about 3 pm. I had made calls to my sister but nothing came of it then D1 burnt my arm.
>
> Then D2 demanded that I should take off all my clothes when I failed to raise money, he lost his temper and demanded me to do that. I refused but he threatened to beat me if I did not obey. At that time D1, Ah Chuan and Ah Kan were present in the room. I took off all my clothes. Then D2 committed an act of indecent assault -- he touched my breasts with his hand -- both hands -- the other three were sitting there.
>
> Ah Kan later told me to put back on my clothes. I was without clothes about five minutes.
>
> I cried and then they asked me to make further phone calls to my elder sister.
>
> I took off my clothes because D2 said if not, he would beat me.
> There was a phone in the room.

D1, D2 and Ah Kan made phone calls to their friends asking how much would be paid working as a prostitute.

D1 and D2 said to me if money not paid by 5pm, I would have to work as a prostitute, before and after I took off my clothes.

[*252]

Mr MacKenzie-Ross submitted on behalf of the applicant that the second defendant, although no doubt he and the applicant shared a common purpose to regain the money that they had lent, had gone further on his own than can reasonably be said to have been the common intention of the group.

In his very short reasons for verdict, the judge directs himself on this issue in the following terms:

> I also accept that both D1 and D2 were endeavouring to get the return of a loan from PW1 and that was their common purpose or design. In the course of that common purpose, D2 acted by losing his temper and getting PW1 to remove all her clothes. That in itself was an indecent assault as she was forced to strip in the presence of four men.

I have given much consideration to this point and take the view that since D1 and D2 had a common purpose, which this incident was used to pursue, that D1 is equally guilty as D2 of the indecent assault.

There can, I think, be no criticism, and none was raised by Mr MacKenzie-Ross, of the judge's finding that an order to a woman to undress, accompanied by threats, would amount to an indecent assault in law.

The question, however, is whether the judge has correctly directed himself on the question of common purpose. As we interpret his ruling, it can be summarized as follows.

Firstly, the two defendants had a common purpose, namely, to secure the return of the money which they had lent to the complainant.

Secondly, in the course of that common purpose, the second defendant forced the complainant to remove her clothes.

Thirdly, that constituted an indecent assault by the second defendant.

Fourthly, the first defendant is also guilty of indecent assault because he shared with the second defendant a common purpose which the indecent assault was designed to further, though he took no part in the indecent assault, and there is no evidence that he encouraged it, though he watched it.

In our view, this is an incorrect direction on the law governing aiders and abettors. The authorities state that, before a person may properly be convicted as an aider and abettor, it is not sufficient merely for him to be present while an offence is committed. If he takes no part in it and does not act in concert with those who commit it, it is insufficient merely for him not to try to prevent the offence being committed. We were referred by counsel for the Crown, to R v Clarkson & Ors 1971 55 Cr App R 445, in which the main principles are set out. At p 450, Lord Justice Megaw quoted an earlier passage from the case of R v Coney 1882 8 QBD 534:

> It is no criminal offence to stand by, a mere passive spectator of a crime, even of a murder. Non-interference to prevent a crime is not itself a crime. But the fact that a person was voluntarily and purposely present witnessing the commission of a crime, and offered no opposition to it, though he might [*253] reasonably be expected to prevent and had the power so to do, or at least to express his dissent, might, under some circumstances, afford cogent evidence upon which a jury would be justified in finding that he wilfully encouraged and so aided and abetted. But it would be purely a question for a jury whether he did so or not.

It is not enough, then,that the presence of the accused person has, in fact, given encouragement. It must be proved that he intended to give encouragement;that he wilfully encouraged.

Had the judge directed himself in the manner required by R v Clarkson default (1971) 55 Cr App R 445 and various other authorities, he might well have come to the same conclusion which he did. However, for the reasons which we have already given, we are satisfied the judge did misdirect himself and that his approach to the evidence was in error.

We therefore feel obliged to allow the application for leave to appeal against conviction and sentence and to quash both the conviction and sentence, though we do so with some regret because, as we have already commented, had the judge correctly directed himself properly, it might very well be that he would have reached the same conclusion.

(Torna su)FATTO

RITENUTO IN FATTO

1. - Con la sentenza in epigrafe la Corte d'appello di Palermo ha riformato quella del Tribunale di Agrigento del 1 marzo 2000 con la quale i ricorrenti sopra indicati erano stati condannati alle pene ritenute di giustizia per il reato, commesso in concorso tra loro, di turbata libertà degli incanti, in esso assorbito il reato di abuso di ufficio, con riferimento a una licitazione privata per l'acquisto di un'attrezzatura sanitaria "TAC" per l'ospedale S. Giovanni di Dio di Agrigento: ha, infatti, concesso a tutti gli odierni ricorrenti le attenuanti generiche e, conseguentemente, ha dichiarato il delitto estinto per prescrizione (reato commesso fino all'agosto del 1990).

2. - In sintesi, la Corte ha ravvisato una serie di anomalie e violazioni di legge in relazione allo svolgimento della gara - compiute dal S. quale Presidente del Comitato di gestione della USL n. 11 di Agrigento e di Presidente della Commissione per l'aggiudicazione, dal R., quale Primario del reparto di radiologia, abilitato a partecipare alle operazioni di gara per le valutazioni tecniche, dal Lo B. quale vice Commissario straordinario della USL anzidetta (dal novembre '88 al novembre '89) e dal La G. quale "consulente tecnico qualificato" - allo scopo di far risultare vincitrice la ditta S., come poi concretamente avvenne.

3. - Sottolineava la Corte d'appello, riportandosi integralmente all'analisi svolta dai giudici di primo grado, che tali mezzi fraudolenti erano, in particolare, consistiti: a) nella indicazione nel bando di gara del 1989 (una precedente gara era stata annullata ex officio perché ritenuto non confacente il solo parametro di aggiudicazione del prezzo migliore) di criteri di valutazione diversi rispetto a quelli concretamente utilizzati, "posto che tale discrasia aveva penalizzato i possibili partecipanti alla gara, qualora fossero stati messi al corrente degli effettivi criteri e parametri di valutazione della gara stessa"; b) nel fatto che i parametri di aggiudicazione della gara proposti dal La G., e recepiti dal Comitato di gestione con delibera 416/1989, non erano conformi a quelli indicati dall'art. 40 della L. regionale 21/1985 e dall'art. 24 lett. b) L. statale n. 584/1977, dichiarati formalmente applicabili dalla stessa amministrazione procedente, delibera alle cui prescrizioni la USL si sarebbe dovuta attenere secondo quanto indicato dallo stesso Comitato provinciale di controllo, in pratica disattendendone le previsioni (in sostanza il citato art. 24 non consentiva che tra i criteri di aggiudicazione fosse previsto quello della "assistenza tecnica", previsto, invece, dall'art. 61, lett. b) della L. regionale 69/1981, legge che, nel caso, non doveva trovare applicazione alla licitazione, secondo quanto rilevato dal predetto Comitato provinciale di controllo).

Tali anomalie erano rese evidenti - secondo la Corte di merito - nelle conclusioni del perito C. che aveva sottolineato come nella semplice fornitura di un apparecchio di altissima tecnologia, le cui componenti fondamentali sono costruite da un numero ristrettissimo di aziende (solo tre ditte al mondo), non si sarebbe dovuto dare eccessivo peso valutativo a parametri diversi da quello del prezzo, evitando di enfatizzarne altri di tipo tecnico-gestionale; tanto che, secondo il perito, una valutazione più aderente al criterio anzidetto avrebbe dovuto condurre all'aggiudicazione alla società G. E. che aveva offerto un prezzo più basso di circa il 32 per cento.
4. - La Corte passava, quindi, ad elencare i singoli atteggiamenti dei correi dai quali si ricavava che le attività sopra richiamate si inserivano in un contesto di comportamenti individuali specifici che giustificavano l'esattezza della tesi dello sviamento della gara dal suo corretto andamento e, quindi, l'accoglimento dell'impostazione accusatoria.
5. - Osservava che: "In particolare, i comportamenti addebitati al S. concernono la pretestuosità delle giustificazione addotta per rinviare la gara alla seduta del 9.12.87, l'immotivata nomina del Prof. La G. quale consulente tecnico qualificato, nonostante il diverso suggerimento dell'Ufficio di Direzione di nominare il collega di pari grado dell'Università di Verona, nonché la ricezione del criterio di aggiudicazione suggerito dal prof. La G., nonostante la consapevolezza dell'erroneità dei criteri adottati. Con riferimento al Lo B., vengono in considerazione l'evidente falsità e pretestuosità delle giustificazioni addotte al commissario straordinario P. per giustificare le lungaggini della procedura, nonché l'avere emanato la delibera n. 189/89 (la cui attribuibilità al suddetto imputato, per le ragioni suesposte, non può essere revocata in dubbio), con cui la Usl, pur dichiarando di adeguarsi ai rilievi mossi dalla CPC, in realtà riproponeva gli stessi criteri censurati dal predetto organo di controllo, non rispondenti alla normativa vigente in materia. Quanto al La G. ed al R., è evidente che le anomalie evidenziate nell'iter procedimentale della gara in questione appaiono imputabili anche alla loro condotta ed ai loro interventi, estrinsecatisi nella nota del primo (rectius: del secondo) del 19.5.87, sopra indicata, e, per entrambi, nella complessiva attività dagli stessi svolta nell'ambito della Commissione tecnica relativa alla valutazione delle offerte. Appaiono infatti evidenti l'atipicità e l'irregolarità dei comportamenti degli imputati anzidetti nello svolgimento della gara, che lungi dall'essere rispondenti ai criteri di imparzialità e trasparenza cui deve essere informata l'attività della P.A., hanno certamente determinato uno sviamento della gara dal suo corretto andamento, impedendo che la stessa avesse un esito lineare e corretto, in che si sostanzia il reato di turbativa d'asta ascritto ai medesimi.
6. - Rilevava ancora che non poteva dubitarsi del concorso nelle condotte a ognuno ascritte, precisando che per la realizzazione del paradigma dell'art. 110 c.p. non è necessario il previo concerto, essendo sufficiente, al contrario, un individuale apporto materiale o psichico al realizzarsi dell'evento voluto da ciascuno dei singoli partecipi.
7. - Avverso la predetta sentenza ricorrono per cassazione tutti gli imputati chiedendone l'annullamento per il riconoscimento di una formula ampiamente liberatoria.
8. - In particolare il S. deduce, con unico motivo, la violazione degli artt. 110 e 353 c.p. e il difetto, l'illogicità, l'incompletezza e la contraddittorietà della motivazione al riguardo. Precisa che l'ultimo atto da lui compiuto risaliva all'ottobre 1988, epoca dalla quale aveva, lasciato l'incarico ricoperto nella USL. La gara di cui si contestava la turbativa era quella indetta nel 1989. L'ultimo atto da lui firmato era la delibera dell'agosto 1988 con cui si decideva il passaggio da una gara col sistema della licitazione con le modalità del prezzo più vantaggioso a quella con le modalità dell'offerta economicamente più vantaggiosa. Il bando per questa seconda gara era stato firmato nel 1989 dal Commissario straordinario. Non è dunque spiegato come sia ravvisabile il concorso.

9. - Il Lo B. formula due censure. La prima è rubricata come "Violazione art. 606 lett. D ed E CPP (omessa motivazione sulla richiesta di una prova decisiva". Sostiene che egli si limitò a firmare il bando e le lettere di invito. Non aveva firmato la deliberazione commissariale con la quale era stata indetta la gara del 1989. Il P., Commissario straordinario, sentito come teste, aveva affermato di aver delegato l'intera materia a lui, ma si sarebbe dovuta disporre nel giudizio di merito (ma la richiesta non era stata accolta) l'acquisizione di tale ultima deliberazione, perché dalla copia in atti la delibera non risultava sottoscritta da alcuno. Ciò rendeva impossibile ipotizzare un concorso nel delitto contestato. Con un secondo motivo lamenta la "Violazione dell'art. 606 lett. E e B CPP in relazione agli artt. 110 e 353 c.p. (erronea applicazione delle norme sul concorso di persone nel reato - motivazione illogica - motivazione incompleta e contraddittoria)" e ribadisce la mancanza di prova del concorso. Egli non aveva mai avuto contatti con chicchessia, tanto meno con i partecipanti alla gara. Non si comprendeva come mai avrebbe potuto favorire qualcuno.

10. Il La G. a sua volta deduce il vizio di mancanza e manifesta illogicità della motivazione, in quanto i Giudici di appello si erano limitati a fare riferimento agli argomenti del Giudice di primo grado senza dare risposta ai motivi di appello. Sottolinea che la pubblica amministrazione aveva ampio potere di modificare le modalità della gara originariamente indetta, ritenute inadatte. Era quindi normale che si nominassero consulenti tecnici per la valutazione della offerta più vantaggiosa, metodologia utilizzata per la seconda gara. Gli stessi giudici di primo grado avevano riconosciuto la legittimità di tale comportamento, la correttezza della indizione della nuova gara secondo i criteri di cui alla lett. b) dell'art. 24 L. n. 584/1977 e la esattezza della tesi della pubblicazione di criteri diversi nel bando rispetto a quelli stabiliti e concretamente utilizzati per mero errore materiale di scritturazione da parte della persona addetta. Correttamente erano stati, quindi, utilizzati i parametri stabiliti. Inoltre i criteri. adottati (sei) restringevano e non dilatavano i poteri della Commissione rispetto ai criteri (tre) riportati nel bando. E ancora, il perito C. aveva affermato che sia con gli uni che con gli altri avrebbe vinto la S.. Del tutto neutra poi si rilevava la circostanza che anche presso l'ospedale di Palermo dove operava esisteva un'apparecchiatura TAC di marca S.. Inoltre il Tribunale aveva affermato che l'apparecchiatura TAC della S. era la migliore. Né poteva rilevare che il prezzo di aggiudicazione corrispondesse più o meno alla somma stanziata. La sentenza di primo grado non aveva poi dato alcuna dimostrazione dei rapporti tra lui e il rappresentante della S. che era stato assolto. Infine nessuna prova era stata fornita sul concorso di persone nel reato.

11. - Il R., infine, deduce la nullità della sentenza per mancanza e vizi della motivazione. La doglianza si incentra sul mancato esame dei motivi di gravame da parte della Corte d'appello, che si era limitata a riportarsi alle argomentazioni della sentenza di primo grado. In specie si duole del fatto che erano stati ritenuti indizi a suo carico: a) la lettera del 19 maggio 1987 al Capo ripartizione provveditorato della USL e al Direttore sanitario dell'ospedale, con la quale, premessa la sua scarsa esperienza, suggeriva la possibilità di nominare esperti in apparecchiature TAC, indicati nominativamente (L. e La G.) (nota che fu ignorata, tanto che si procedette con l'originaria licitazione privata: nella seduta della Commissione del 9 dicembre 1987 si rinviò l'espletamento della gara da parte dei Presidente S. per l'assenza del ricorrente); b) la sua partecipazione alla riunione del 24 maggio 1998 (di cui al verbale n. 2): furono il La G. e il L., esperti appositamente nominati dalla USL, a proporre la possibilità di modificare il sistema di gara da effettuarsi con il metodo dell'offerta economicamente più vantaggiosa (suggerimento, ad avviso della difesa, del tutto legittimo; c) la sua attività valutativa svolta in sede di Commissione tecnica ed estrinsecatasi in varie deliberazioni: essa fu, invero, a suo avviso, del tutto legittima, perché svolta in base ai documenti consegnati alla Commissione, in forza dei quali fu redatta la definitiva relazione tecnica

CONSIDERATO IN DIRITTO

1. Osserva la Corte che - da un esame di quelli che appaiono motivi comuni, con sfumature diverse, di tutti i ricorrenti - le impugnazioni devono trovare accoglimento anche alla luce delle conclusioni del Procuratore generale che ha chiesto l'annullamento con rinvio della sentenza, per mancanza e per illogicità della motivazione, e perché si accerti, quindi, se le anomalie della gara evidenziate nella sentenza della Corte d'appello di merito possano avere rilievo ai fini della configurabilità del reato di turbata libertà degli incanti.

2. - Occorre, peraltro, prima ricordare che, nel caso, la prescrizione è stata dichiarata a seguito della concessione delle attenuanti generiche a tutti gli imputati. Orbene, conformemente a un orientamento di questa Corte che si ritiene di condividere (Cass., sez. II, 12 gennaio 2001, dep. 13 febbraio 2001, n. 6064, Mazzei), in ipotesi siffatte non può operare il principio più volte ribadito dalla giurisprudenza di legittimità secondo cui, in presenza di una causa di estinzione del reato, non è consentito al giudice di legittimità pronunciare l'annullamento con rinvio essendo impossibile la prosecuzione del processo penale a meno che non balzi all'evidenza ictu oculi la prova dell'innocenza (art. 129, secondo comma, c.p.p.). Tale principio, infatti, si fonda sull'esigenza di assicurare (allorquando il giudice abbia accertato la sussistenza dei presupposti per concludere il processo penale con un proscioglimento non di merito deve emettere l'immediata pronuncia in tal senso, a meno che non risulti la prova della evidenza dell'innocenza) la prevalenza di un postulato di ordine generale di economia processuale sul diritto dell'imputato di ottenere una pronuncia di non punibilità nel merito quando ancora non sia accertata la sua penale responsabilità. Ma se il giudice di merito per applicare la causa di non punibilità è costretto ad affermare previamente la responsabilità dell'imputato o a concedere dopo le attenuanti generiche, i presupposti logici del sistema delineato dall'art. 129 c.p.p. vengono a mancare. Il sacrificio dell'interesse dell'imputato di vedere accertata la sua innocenza per il prevalere del principio di economia processuale non si giustifica più. E se - come è evidenziato nella motivazione della sentenza ora citata - è ammissibile che in presenza di una causa estintiva applicabile de plano il giudice la dichiari immediatamente, accertando solo che non vi sia l'evidenza dell'innocenza dell'imputato, non è altrettanto ammissibile che quando la causa di estinzione passi attraverso un'affermazione di responsabilità dell'imputato non vi sia nel sistema un rimedio adeguato contro i vizi di quella sentenza; il principio di economia processuale deve in questa ipotesi venire meno anche nel giudizio di legittimità.

3. - Passando ora a esaminare i motivi di ordine generale comuni ad alcuni ricorrenti va osservato quanto segue.

3.1. - le perplessità di fondo che sorgono dalla lettura della sentenza impugnata (e di quella di primo grado) derivano dal fatto (il motivo è sviluppato nei ricorsi Lo B. e La G.) che l'ipotesi accusatoria partiva da un nitido presupposto: gli odierni ricorrenti erano sottoposti a giudizio per aver turbato la gara in collusione con il rappresentante legale della S., P. V., che invece è stato assolto in primo grado per non aver commesso il fatto, perché non ha svolto alcuna attività di turbativa della gara né avrebbe potuto svolgerla, dato che non aveva alcun potere decisionale in merito alla partecipazione o meno alla licitazione e alla determinazione della offerta (pag. 30 sent. di primo grado). La tesi della collusione con la S. cade, dunque, completamente, in quanto neppure si ipotizza, nelle sentenze di merito, che, dal lato della impresa aggiudicataria abbia agito qualcun altro, sia pure rimasto ignoto. Viene così totalmente a mancare la prova della esistenza di un accordo fraudolento con la ditta ora nominata a favorire la vincitrice della gara con l'accordo di questa.

3.2. - Lo sforzo dei giudici di merito a questo punto si sarebbe dovuto fondamentalmente rivolgere a dimostrare, per tener ferma l'ipotesi di reato di cui alla lettera a) del capo di imputazione, che quelle che sono individuate come anomalie dello svolgimento della gara (che come si vedrà fra breve possono trovare e trovano una spiegazione a volte ambigua, ma spesso nel senso di disvelare comportamenti del tutto innocui o giustificabili dei ricorrenti) costituivano comunque "altri mezzi fraudolenti" - spiegandone la finalizzazione -capaci di turbare la gara (posto che deve escludersi che la turbativa potesse nella specie essersi realizzata con le altre modalità previste dall'art. 354 c.p.p., cioè con la "violenza", la "minaccia", i "doni" o le "promesse").
3.3. - Non solo. La decisione impugnata non offre una motivazione logica sull'applicazione della norma dell'art. 110 c.p. (il motivo è approfondito nei ricorsi S., Lo B. e La G.), perché non spiega convenientemente in qual modo persone con i compiti più diversi ed intervenute in tempi differenti nel lunghissimo iter delle procedure necessarie ai fini della aggiudicazione abbiano in concorso tra loro agito per uno scopo comune, necessariamente fraudolento. La Corte di merito afferma che non occorre provare il previo concerto per dimostrare il concorso di persone. Nessun dubbio su tale affermazione. Ma il concorso di persone nel reato implica, tra i suoi requisiti di applicazione, che ciascuno dei concorrenti agisca per una finalità unitaria con la consapevolezza del ruolo svolto da ognuno dei partecipanti e la volontà di agire in comune. E se taluno decida di subentrare a progetto criminoso già iniziato, occorre una più attenta motivazione sul dolo di partecipazione, occorrendo la dimostrazione che il subentrante conosca quanto già sia stato realizzato dai singoli compartecipi, quanto ciascuno debba ancora da realizzare e quali siano i propri specifici compiti. Considerazioni analoghe valgono per chi, come S., sia cessato da ogni carica sin da prima della indizione delle seconda licitazione. Su tali elementi manca nella sentenza impugnata una qualsiasi analisi e l'affermazione che i quattro odierni ricorrenti abbiano agito in concorso appare davvero tautologica.
4. - Sui residui motivi di ordine generale comuni ad alcuni ricorrenti occorre ancora svolgere le seguenti osservazioni.
4.1. - La sentenza impugnata riscontra tre anomalie del procedimento di gara addebitate a tutti i ricorrenti. La prima è individuata nella indicazione, nel bando di gara del 1989 (come si è già ricordato, una precedente gara era stata annullata perché ritenuto non confacente il solo parametro dei prezzo migliore), di criteri di valutazione diversi rispetto a quelli concretamente utilizzati. Ma la stessa sentenza, subito dopo, afferma che ciò fu "probabilmente" dovuto a un errore materiale. Su questi argomenti si incentrano le doglianze di La G. e R.. Le doglianze sono fondate. La sola precisazione della Corte secondo cui la pubblicazione sarebbe dovuta "probabilmente" a un errore, azzera il valore probatorio che a tale elemento la sentenza vorrebbe attribuire al fine di dimostrare la frode (per di più in concorso) dei ricorrenti, senza che occorra spendere molte parole sul punto. L'argomentazione secondo cui la Commissione (e i rappresentanti della USL) avrebbero dovuto far ripubblicare il bando di concorso con i criteri esatti è priva di spessore, perché tale addebito aggiuntivo presuppone ed implica un dolo successivo, diverso da quello originariamente contestato. In sintesi, l' "anomalia" di che trattasi è stata posta a base del procedimento di inferenza per indurne la prova del reato e del concorso senza alcuna spiegazione sulla conclusione cui si è giunti o, in altri termini, applicando in modo erroneo le regole di esperienza che avrebbero condotto alla soluzione opposta a quella della malafede.
4.2. - Queste ultime considerazioni si attagliano pienamente anche alla seconda pretesa "anomalia" con particolare riguardo ai requisiti del reato di cui all'art. 353 c.p. Sè è contestato ai ricorrenti di aver aggiunto -un criterio di aggiudicazione non previsto dalla legge (quello della "assistenza tecnica"). Anche su tale punto della motivazione si incentrano in particolare le doglianze di La G. e di R.. Le censure sono fondate. La previsione di un criterio ulteriore potrebbe, al più, dar luogo a una violazione di legge (sempre che si ritenga che i criteri stabiliti dall'art. 40 della L. regionale 21/1985 e dall'art. 24 lett. b) L. statale n. 584/1977 siano tassativi) ma non consente di desumere tout court - la frode necessaria per il reato contestato di turbata libertà degli incanti. L'illogicità del ragionamento posto a base della conclusione cui perviene la Corte d'appello e l'erronea applicazione delle regole di esperienza risultano palesi ove si consideri che la frode si sarebbe potuta intravedere nel caso si fossero eliminati criteri da inserire necessariamente nel bando, di modo che ne risultassero ampliati i poteri discrezionali della Commissione; ma l'aggiunta di un criterio restringeva sicuramente, in modo ulteriore, detti poteri e occorreva quindi una particolare motivazione su tale aspetto, e non utilizzare sic et sempliciter (argomento per pervenire alla certezza dell'esistenza del requisito necessario per la configurabilità del reato di cui si discute.

4.3. - Del tutto inconferente appare, poi, l'inserimento tra gli argomenti generali a sostegno della responsabilità dei ricorrenti la questione della "perizia C.". Il tecnico si limita ad affermare che sarebbe stato più opportuno adottare il solo criterio del prezzo migliore. L'osservazione non è concludente, posto che la Commissione aveva deciso di adottare criteri diversi. Tale censura è svolta da R. e in modo più sfumato da La G. ed appare anch'essa fondata.

5. - Per quanto riguarda i residui profili della vicenda processuale e dei rimanenti mezzi proposti dai vari ricorrenti, la motivazione della sentenza impugnata si presta a censura sotto altri due importanti aspetti.

5.1. - Essa non spiega per quali ragioni si giunga a inferire dai restanti comportamenti contestati ai diversi ricorrenti (annullamento di una prima gara bandita con la previsione del criterio di aggiudicazione del solo prezzo migliore, senza la garanzia del vaglio da parte di una Commissione tecnica; indizione di una seconda gara con la previsione di un più articolato numero di criteri e la nomina di una Commissione di tre tecnici) la messa in atto di mezzi fraudolenti tali da turbare la licitazione (e quindi da giustificare l'applicazione della norma dell'art. 353 c.p.), e non piuttosto un ripensamento capace di salvaguardare al meglio, in via di autotutela, l'interesse della pubblica amministrazione di acquisire un macchinario e una serie di prestazioni accessorie connesse alla sua gestione in modo da conseguire il migliore risultato possibile in termini di economicità (in senso lato) e di buona amministrazione (v. i ricorsi Lo B., La G. e R.). Laddove, ancora una volta, le regole di esperienza avrebbero condotto a preferire la seconda conclusione: nel senso che l'adozione di garanzie più pregnanti avrebbe dovuto condurre proprio a escludere la frode.

5.2. - La sentenza, inoltre, non dà conto del fatto se sia stata effettivamente svolta un'indagine sul problema dell'interpello del cattedratico dell'università di Verona di cui alla nota 19 gennaio 1988 dell'Ufficio di Direzione della USL e sull'eventuale rifiuto da parte di costui prima della nomina dei La G. quale tecnico della Commissione. La sentenza affronta questo argomento solo per porre in evidenza un mendacio che il Lo B. ha reso al Commissario straordinario della USL che lo invitava ad accelerare i tempi della licitazione. Il mendacio, tuttavia, non riguarda l'effettivo interpello o meno del docente di Verona, ma tendeva a giustificare (in modo smentito dagli atti) le lungaggini della procedura derivanti dal dover sostituire "un docente del nord ... che aveva declinato l'incarico".

6. - Per tutte le suesposte ragioni la sentenza impugnata va annullata con rinvio ad altra sezione della Corte d'appello di Palermo per nuovo esame suoi profili analizzati.

WEST NORFOLK AND WISBECH AREA HEALTH AUTHORITY AND THE DEPARTMENT OF HEALTH AND SOCIAL SECURITY

(APPELLANTS) (ENGLAND)

Lord Fraser of Tullybelton
Lord Scarman
Lord Bridge of Harwich
Lord Brandon of Oakbrook
Lord Templeman

LORD FRASER OF TULLYBELTON

My Lords,

The main question in this appeal is whether a doctor can lawfully prescribe contraception for a girl under 16 years of age, without the consent of her parents. The second appellant, the Department of Health and Social Security ("the D.H.S.S.") maintains that a doctor can do so. The respondent, Mrs. Gillick, maintains that he cannot. The first appellant, West Norfolk and Wisbech Area Health Authority, was not represented when the appeal reached this House, but in the Court of Appeal they were represented by the same counsel as the D.H.S.S.

In December 1980, the D.H.S.S. issued guidance on family planning services for young people, which was a revised version of earlier guidance on the same subject, and which stated, or implied, that, at least in certain cases which were described as "exceptional," a doctor could lawfully prescribe contraception for a girl under 16 without her parents' consent. Mrs. Gillick, who is the mother of five daughters under the age of 16, objected to the guidance and she instituted the proceedings which have led to this appeal, and in which she claims a declaration against both appellants that the advice given in the guidance was unlawful. She also claims a further declaration against the first appellant alone, but it is of less general importance than the declaration to which I have already referred, and I defer consideration of it until later in this speech.

It will be convenient to dispose at once of some preliminary matters. In the first place, Mrs. Gillick's husband is not a party to the present proceedings, but we were informed that he is in full agreement with Mrs. Gillick's contention, and I proceed on that basis. Secondly, there is no suggestion that Mrs. Gillick's relationship with her daughters is other than normal and happy, nor is it suggested that there is any present likelihood of any of the daughters seeking contraceptive advice or treatment without the consent of their mother.

Thirdly, I must mention a procedural matter. The declaration which is claimed against the D.H.S.S., to the effect that the advice given in the guidance was unlawful, amounts to an assertion that the Secretary of State for Health and Social Security has acted illegally, in the sense of ultra vires. The remedy claimed is in the field of public law and, since the decision of your Lordships' House in the case of O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, it is one which should normally be claimed in an application for judicial review. But the writ and statement of claim in this action were issued on 5 August 1982, three months before the decision in O'Reilly, which was on 25 November 1982. Accordingly, Mr. Laws, who appeared for the D.H.S.S., merely mentioned the procedural point but he did not submit that the procedure was out of order. I have had the benefit of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend Lord Scarman and I agree with him that, for the reasons explained by him, Mrs. Gillick was fully entitled to proceed in the case by ordinary action.

The advice, the lawfulness of which is in dispute, is a revised version of part of a comprehensive Memorandum of Guidance on the family planning service which had been issued to health authorities in May 1974 under cover of a circular (H.S.C. (I.S.) 32) from the D.H.S.S. The Memorandum of Guidance was divided into a number of sections, one of which was section G which was headed "The Young." The revised section G, which contains the disputed advice, is as follows:

> "Clinic sessions should be available for people of all ages, but it may be helpful to make separate, less formal arrangements for young people. The staff should be experienced in dealing with young people and their problems.
> "There is widespread concern about counselling and treatment for children under 16. Special care is needed not to undermine parental responsibility and family stability. The Department would therefore hope that in any case where a doctor or other professional worker is approached by a person under the age of 16 for advice in these matters, the doctor, or other professional, will always seek to persuade the child to involve the parent or guardian (or other person in loco parentis) at the earliest stage of consultation, and will proceed from the assumption that it would be most unusual to provide advice about contraception without parental consent.
> "It is, however, widely accepted that consultations between doctors and patients are confidential; and the Department recognises the importance which doctors and patients attach to this principle. It is a principle which applies also to the other professions concerned. To abandon this principle for children under 16 might cause some not to seek professional advice at all. They could then be exposed to the immediate risks of pregnancy and of sexually-transmitted diseases, as well as other long-term physical, psychological and emotional consequences which are equally a threat to stable family life. This would apply particularly to young people whose parents are, for example, unconcerned, entirely unresponsive, or grossly disturbed. Some of these young people are away from their parents and in the care of local authorities or voluntary organisations standing in loco parentis.

> "The Department realises that in such exceptional cases the nature of any counselling must be a matter for the doctor or other professional worker concerned and that the decision whether or not to prescribe contraception must be for the clinical judgment of a doctor."

That advice emphasised, more strongly than section G in its original form had done, that the cases in which a doctor could properly advise a girl under 16 years of age about contraception without parental consent would be most unusual. If the advice had been contained in a legal document there might well have been room for argument as to its exact effect, but, in my view, it is perfectly clear that it would convey to any doctor or other person who read it that the decision whether or not to prescribe contraception for a girl under 16 was in the last resort a matter for the clinical judgment of a doctor, even if the girl's parents had not been informed that she had consulted the doctor, and even if they had expressed disapproval of contraception being prescribed for her. Mrs. Gillick objected to the guidance, in its amended form, and after some correspondence with the area health authority, she wrote to the acting area administrator on 3 March 1981 a letter which included this paragraph:

> "I formally FORBID any medical staff employed by Norfolk A.H.A. to give any contraceptive or abortion advice or treatment whatsoever to my four daughters whilst they are under 16 years without my consent."

Mrs. Gillick's youngest (fifth) daughter has been born since that letter was sent. The acting administrator replied on 9 March 1981 acknowledging the letter and stating that the A.M.A. held to the view "that treatment prescribed by a doctor is a matter for that doctor's clinical judgment, taking into account all the factors of the case."

On 5 August 1982 Mrs. Gillick began these proceedings against the area health authority and the D.H.S.S., in which she seeks the following declarations (as amended before the Master):

> "(i) A declaration against the [Area Health Authority] and the [D.H.S.S.] on a true construction of the said notice and in the events which have happened, including and in particular the publication and the circulation of the said notice, the said notice has no authority in law and gives advice which is unlawful and wrong, and which adversely affects or which may adversely affect the welfare of the plaintiff's said children, and/or the rights of the plaintiff as parent and custodian of the said children, and/or the ability of the plaintiff properly and effectively to discharge her duties as such parent and custodian;
> "(ii) A declaration against the [Area Health Authority] that no doctor or other professional person employed by > the [Area Health Authority] either in the Family Planning Service or otherwise may give any contraceptive and/or abortion advice and/or treatment to any child of the plaintiff below the age of 16 without the prior knowledge and consent of the said child's parent or guardian."

Woolf J. [1984] Q.B. 581 refused to grant the declarations sought by Mrs. Gillick and dismissed the action. The Court of Appeal (Eveleigh, Fox and Parker L.JJ.) [1985] 2 W.L.R. 413 allowed the appeal and granted the declarations. Against that decision the D.H.S.S. now appeals.

The central issue in the appeal is whether a doctor can ever, in any circumstances, lawfully give contraceptive advice or treatment to a girl under the age of 16 without her parents' consent. The effect of the Court of Appeal's judgment is to answer that question in the negative. The answer is subject certainly to one exception, in the case of an order by a competent court; this exception was recognised by Parker LJ. in the Court of Appeal, [1985] 2 W.L.R. 413, 420H, and it is accepted in Mrs. Gillick's printed case. But it is of theoretical rather than practical importance, because it would inevitably involve disclosing to the parents the doctor's advice to the girl, and thus would destroy its confidentiality, and also because the delay and expense of obtaining a court order makes frequent use of such procedure impracticable. There must, I think, be a second exception for cases in which the parents, or the sole surviving parent, have deliberately abandoned their parental responsibilities; in such cases it would, in my opinion, be wrong to allow them to emerge from the shadows solely in order to veto contraceptive advice or treatment for their daughter. But these exceptions do not touch the principle which is at issue in the appeal.

The guidance is addressed to regional health authorities and other authorities concerned in administering the National Health Service ("N.H.S."), and the appeal therefore only directly concerns doctors and other persons working in the N.H.S. I shall refer throughout to doctors, to include bevitatis causa other professional persons working in the N.H.S.

The first statutory provision for contraceptive advice and treatment in the N.H.S. was made by section 1 of the National Health Service (Family Planning) Act 1967. That section empowered local health authorities in England and Wales, with the approval of the Minister of Health, to make arrangements for giving advice on contraception, for medical examination of persons seeking such advice and for the supply of contraceptive substances and appliances. There appears to have been no similar provision applying to Scotland. The Act of 1967 was repealed by the National Health Service Reorganisation Act 1973 which, by section 4, replaced the power of local health authorities to provide such advice and treatment with a duty on the Secretary of State to do so. A similar duty was placed on the Secretary of State for Scotland by section 8 of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1972. The 1973 provision for England and Wales has now been superseded by the National Health Service Act 1977 which by section 5(I)(b) imposes a duty on the Secretary of State:

> "to arrange, to such extent as he considers necessary to meet all reasonable requirements in England and Wales, for the giving of advice on contraception, the medical examination of persons seeking advice on contraception, the treatment of such persons and the supply of contraceptive substances and appliances."

These, and other, provisions show that Parliament regarded "advice" and "treatment" on contraception and the supply of appliances for contraception as essentially medical matters. So they are, but they may also raise moral and social questions on which many people feel deeply, and in that respect they differ from ordinary medical advice and treatment. None of the provisions to which I have referred placed any limit on the age (or the sex) of the persons to whom such advice or treatment might be supplied.

Three strands of argument are raised by the appeal. These are:

1. Whether a girl under the age of 16 has the legal capacity to give valid consent to contraceptive advice and treatment including medical examination.

2. Whether giving such advice and treatment to a girl under 16 without her parents' consent infringes the parents' rights.

3. Whether a doctor who gives such advice or treatment to a girl under 16 without her parents' consent incurs criminal liability.

I shall consider these strands in order.

1. The legal capacity of a girl under 16 to consent to contraceptive advice, examination and treatment.

There are some indications in statutory provisions to which we were referred that a girl under 16 years of age in England and Wales does not have the capacity to give valid consent to contraceptive advice and treatment. If she does not have the capacity, then any physical examination or touching of her body without her parents' consent would be an assault by the examiner. One of those provisions is section 8 of the Family Law Reform Act 1969 which is in the following terms:

> "(1) The consent of a minor who has attained the age of 16 years to any surgical, medical or dental treatment which, in the absence of consent, would constitute a trespass to his person, shall be as effective as it would be if he were of full age; and where a minor has by virtue of this section given an effective consent to any treatment it shall not be necessary to obtain any consent for it from his parent or guardian.
> 2. In this section 'surgical, medical or dental treatment' includes . . .
> 3. Nothing in this section shall be construed as making ineffective any consent which would have been effective if this section had not been enacted."

The contention on behalf of Mrs. Gillick was that subsection (1) of section 8 shows that, apart from the subsection, the consent of a minor to such treatment would not be effective. But I do not accept that contention because subsection (3) leaves open the question whether consent by a minor under the age of 16 would have been effective if the section had not been enacted. That question is not answered by the section, and subsection (1) is, in my opinion, merely for the avoidance of doubt.

Another statutory provision which was referred to in this connection is the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Regulations 1974 (S.I. 1974 No. 160) as amended by the National Health Service (General Medical and Pharmaceutical Services) Amendment Regulations 1975 (S.I. 1975 No. 719). These regulations prescribe the mechanism by which the relationship of doctor and patient under the National Health Service is created. Contraceptive services, along with maternity medical services, are treated as somewhat apart from other medical services in respect that only a doctor who specially offers to provide contraceptive or maternity medical services is obliged to provide them. See the definition of "medical card" and "treatment" in regulation 2(1), regulations 6(I)(a) and 14(2)(a) and Schedule 1 paragraph 13. But nothing turns on this fact. Two points in those regulations have a bearing on the present question although, in my opinion, only an indirect bearing. The first is that by regulation 14 any "woman" may apply to a doctor to be accepted by him for the provision of contraceptive services. The word "woman" is not defined so as to exclude a girl under 16 or under any other age. But regulation 32 provides as follows:

> "An application to a doctor for inclusion on his list . . . may be made, either -
> > (a) on behalf of any person under 16 years of age, by the mother, or in her absence, the father, or in the absence of both parents the guardian or other adult person who has the care of the child; or
> > (b) on behalf of any other person who is incapable of making such an application by a relative or other adult person who has the care of such person; or . . ." (Emphasis added).

The words in paragraph (b) which I have emphasised are said, by counsel for Mrs. Gillick, to imply that a person under 16 years of age is incapable of applying to a doctor for services and therefore give some support to the argument on behalf of Mrs. Gillick. But I do not regard the implication as a strong one because the provision is merely that an application "may" be made by the mother or other parent or guardian and it applies to the doctor's list for the provision of all ordinary medical services as well as to his list for the provision of contraception services. I do not believe that a person aged 15, who may be living away from home, is incapable of applying on his own behalf for inclusion in the list of a doctor for medical services of an ordinary kind not connected with contraception.

Another provision, in a different branch of medicine, which is said to carry a similar implication is contained in the Mental Health Act 1983 section 131 which provides for informal admission of patients to mental hospitals. It provides by subsection (2) that:

> "In the case of a minor who has attained the age of 16 years and is capable of expressing his own wishes, any such arrangements as are mentioned in subsection (1) above [for informal admission] may be made, carried out and determined notwithstanding any right of custody or control vested by law in his parent or guardian."

That provision has only a remote bearing on the present question because there is no doubt that a minor under the age of 16 is in the custody of his or her parents. The question is whether such custody necessarily involves the right to veto contraceptive advice or treatment being given to the girl.

Reference was also made to the Education Act 1944 section 48 which deals with medical inspection and treatment of pupils at state school. Subsection (3) of section 48 which imposes on the Secretary of State a duty to provide for medical and dental inspection of pupils was repealed and superseded by the National Health Service Reorganisation Act 1973 section 3 and Schedule 5. The Act of 1973 in turn was replaced by the National Health Service Act 1977 section 5(l)(a). Subsection (4) of Section 48 of the Education Act 1944 which has not been repealed imposes a duty on the Secretary of State to arrange for encouraging pupils to take advantage of any medical treatment provided under Section 43 but it includes a proviso in the following terms:

> "Provided that if the parent of any pupil gives to the authority notice that he objects to the pupil availing himself of any medical treatment provided under this section, the pupil shall not be encouraged ... so to do."

I do not regard that provision as throwing light on the present question. It does not prohibit a child under the stipulated age from availing himself of medical treatment or an education authority from providing it for him. If the child, without encouragement from the education authority, "wishes to avail himself of medical treatment" the section imposes no obstacle in his way. Accordingly, in my opinion, the proviso gives no support to the contention from Mrs. Gillick, but on the contrary points in the opposite direction.

The statutory provisions to which I have referred do not differentiate so far as the capacity of a minor under 16 is concerned between contraceptive advice and treatment and other forms of medical advice and treatment. It would, therefore, appear that, if the inference which Mrs. Gillick's advisers seek to draw from the provisions is justified, a minor under the age of 16 has no capacity to authorise any kind of medical advice or treatment or examination of his own body. That seems to me so surprising that I cannot accept it in the absence of clear provisions to that effect. It seems to me verging on the absurd to suggest that a girl or a boy aged 15 could not effectively consent, for example, to have a medical examination of some trivial injury to his body or even to have a broken arm set. Of course the consent of the parents should normally be asked, but they may not be immediately available. Provided the patient, whether a boy or a girl, is capable of understanding what is proposed, and of expressing his or her own wishes, I see no good reason for holding that he or she lacks the capacity to express them validly and effectively and to authorise the medical man to make the examination or give the treatment which he advises. After all, a minor under the age of 16 can, within certain limits, enter into a contract. He or she can also sue and be sued, and can give evidence on oath. Moreover, a girl under 16 can give sufficiently effective consent to sexual intercourse to lead to the legal result that the man involved does not commit the crime of rape - see Reg. v. Howard [1966] 1 W.L.R. 13, 15 when Lord Parker C.3. said:

> "... in the case of a girl under 16 the prosecution, in order to prove rape, must prove either that she physically resisted, or if she did not, that her understanding and knowledge were such that she was not in a position to decide whether to consent or resist. . . There are many girls under 16 who know full well what it is all about and can properly consent."

Accordingly, I am not disposed to hold now, for the first time, that a girl aged less than 16 lacks the power to give valid consent to contraceptive advice or treatment, merely on account of her age.

Out of respect for the comprehensive and fully researched argument submitted by Mr. Laws for the D.H.S.S. I should notice briefly two old Acts to which he referred, but which do not appear to me to be helpful. One of these is the Abduction Act 1557 (4 and 5 Ph. & M. c.3) for punishing "such as shall take away maidens that be inheritors, being within the age of 16 years, or that marry them, without consent of their parents." That Act was evidently passed for the protection of property rather than for protection of the virtue of maidens. It was repealed by the Offences Against the Person Act 1823 (9 Geo. 4, c.31). We were referred to section 20 of the Act of 1823, but that section was concerned only with punishing abduction of any unmarried girl under the age of 16 and appears to me to have little or no bearing on the present problem.

On this part of the case accordingly I conclude that there is no statutory provision which compels me to hold that a girl under the age of 16 lacks the legal capacity to consent to contraceptive advice, examination and treatment provided that she has sufficient understanding and intelligence to know what they involve. I can deal with the case law more conveniently in what follows.

2. The parents' rights and duties in respect of medical treatment of their child. "

The amended guidance expressly states that the doctor will proceed from the assumption that it would be "most unusual" to provide advice about contraception without parental consent. It also refers to certain cases where difficulties might arise if the doctor refused to promise that his advice would remain confidential and it concludes that the department realises that "in such exceptional cases" the decision whether or not to prescribe contraception must be for the clinical judgment of a doctor. Mrs. Gillick's contention that the guidance adversely affects her rights and duties as a parent must, therefore, involve the assertion of an absolute right to be informed of and to veto such advice or treatment being given to her daughters even in the "most unusual" cases which might arise (subject, no doubt, to the qualifications applying to the case of court order or to abandonment of parents' duties).

It was, I think, accepted both by Mrs. Gillick and by the D.H.S.S., and in any event I hold, that parental rights to control a child do not exist for the benefit of the parent. They exist for the benefit of the child and they are justified only in so far as they enable the parent to perform his duties towards the child, and towards other children in the family. If necessary, this proposition can be supported by reference to Blackstone Commentaries, 17th ed. (1830), vol. 1, p. 452, where he wrote "The power of parents over their children is derived from . . . their duty." The proposition is also consistent with the provisions of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971 section 1 as follows:

> "Where in any proceedings before any court . . . -
> (a) the custody or upbringing of a minor; or ... is in question, the court, in deciding that question, shall regard the welfare of the minor as the first and paramount consideration, and shall not take into consideration whether from any other point of view the claim of the father, or any right at common law possessed by the father, in respect of such custody, upbringing, administration or application is superior to that of the mother, or the claim of the mother is superior to that of the father."

From the parents' right and duty of custody flows their right and duty of control of the child, but the fact that custody is its origin throws but little light on the question of the legal extent of control at any particular age. Counsel for Mrs. Gillick placed some reliance on the Children Act 1975. Section 85(1) provides that in that Act the expression "the parental rights and duties" means "all the rights and duties which by law the mother and father have in relation to a legitimate child and his property," but the subsection does not define the extent of the rights and duties which by law the mother and father have. Section 86 of the Act provides:

> "In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, 'legal custody' means, as respects a child, so much of the parental rights and duties as relate to the person of the child (including the place and manner in which his time is spent)."

In the Court of Appeal Parker L.J. attached much importance to that section especially to the words in brackets. He considered that the right relating to the place and manner in which the child's time is spent included the right, as he put it, "completely to control the child" subject of course always to the intervention of the court. The learned Lord Justice went on thus at [1985] 2 W.L.R. 413, 423A:

> "Indeed there must, it seems to me, be such a right from birth to a fixed age unless whenever, short of majority, a question arises it must be determined, in relation to a particular child and a particular matter, whether he or she > is of sufficient understanding to make a responsible and reasonable decision. This alternative appears to me singularly unattractive and impracticable, particularly in the context of medical treatment."

My Lords, I have, with the utmost respect reached a different conclusion from that of the learned Lord Justice. It is, in my view, contrary to the ordinary experience of mankind, at least in Western Europe in the present century, to say that a child or a young person remains in fact under the complete control of his parents until he attains the definite age of majority, now 18 in the United Kingdom, and that on attaining that age he suddenly acquires independence. In practice most wise parents relax their control gradually as the child develops and encourage him or her to become increasingly independent. Moreover, the degree of parental control actually exercised over a particular child does in practice vary considerably according to his understanding and intelligence and it would, in my opinion, be unrealistic for the courts not to recognise these facts. Social customs change, and the law ought to, and does in fact, have regard to such changes when they are of major importance. An example of such recognition is to be found in the view recently expressed in your

Lordships' House by my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, with which the other noble and learned Lords who were present agreed, in Reg. v. D [1984] 1 A.C. 778, 806 D. Dealing with the question of whether the consent of a child to being taken away by a stranger would be a good defence to a charge of kidnapping, my noble and learned friend said:

> "In the case of a very young child, it would not have the understanding or the intelligence to give its consent, so that absence of consent would be a necessary inference from its age. In the case of an older child, however, it must, I think be a question of fact for a jury whether the child concerned has sufficient understanding and intelligence to give its consent; if, but only if, the jury considers that a child has these qualities, it must then go on to consider whether it has been proved that the child did not give its consent. While the matter will always be for the jury alone to decide, I should not expect a jury to find at all frequently that a child under 14 had sufficient understanding and intelligence to give its consent."

That expression of opinion seems to me entirely contradictory of the view expressed by Cockburn C.J. in Reg. v. Howes (1860) 1 E. & E. 332, 336-337:

> "We repudiate utterly, as most dangerous, the notion that any intellectual precocity in an individual female child can hasten the period which appears to have been fixed by statute for the arrival at the age of discretion; for that very precocity, if uncontrolled, might very probably lead to her irreparable injury. The legislature has given us a guide, which we may safely follow, in pointing out 16 as the age up to which the father's right to custody of his female child > is to continue; and short of which such a child has no discretion to consent to leaving him."

The question for decision in that case was different from that in the present, but the view that the child's intellectual ability is irrelevant cannot, in my opinion, now be accepted. It is a question of fact for the judge (or jury) to decide whether a particular child can give effective consent to contraceptive treatment.

In times gone by the father had almost absolute authority over his children until they attained majority. A rather remarkable example of such authority being upheld by the court was the case of In re Agar-Ellis (1883) 24 Ch.D. 317 which was much relied on by the Court of Appeal. The father in that case restricted the communication which his daughter aged 17 was allowed to have with her mother, against whose moral character nothing was alleged, to an extent that would be universally-condemned today as quite unreasonable. The case has been much criticised in recent years and, in my opinion, with good reason. In Hewer v. Bryant [1970] 1 Q.B. 357,369 Lord Denning M.R. said:

> "I would get rid of the rule in In re Agar-Ellis and of the suggested exceptions to it. That case was decided in the year 1883. It reflects the attitude of a Victorian parent towards his children. He expected unquestioning obedience to his commands. If a son disobeyed, his father would cut him off with a shilling. If a daughter had an illegitimate child, he would turn her out of the house. His power only ceased when the child became 21. I decline to accept a view so much out of date. The common law can, and should, keep pace with the times. It should declare, in conformity with the recent Report of the Committee on the Age of Majority [Cmnd. 3342, 1967], that the legal right of a parent to the custody of a child ends at the 18th birthday: and even up till then, it is a dwindling right which the courts will hesitate to enforce against the wishes of the child, and the more so the older he is. It starts with a right of control and ends with little more than advice."

I respectfully agree with every word of that and especially with the description of the father's authority as a dwindling right. In J. v. C. [1970] A.C. 668 Lord Guest and Lord MacDermott referred to the decision in Agar-Ellis as an example of the almost absolute power asserted by the father over his children before the Judicature Act 1873 and plainly thought such an assertion was out of place at the present time - see Lord MacDermott at pp. 703-704. In Reg. v. D. [1984] A.C. 778 Lord Brandon of Oakbrook cited Agar-Ellis as an example of the older view of a father's authority which his Lordship and the other members of the House rejected. In my opinion, the view of absolute paternal authority continuing until a child attains majority which was applied in Agar-Ellis is so out of line with present day views that it should no longer be treated as having any authority. I regard it as a historical curiosity. As Fox L.J. pointed out in the Court of Appeal [1985] 2 W.L.R. 413, 439D, the Agar-Ellis cases (1878) 10 Ch.D. 49; 24 Ch.D. 317 seemed to have been regarded as somewhat extreme even in their own day, as they were quickly followed by the Guardianship of Infants Act 1886 (49 & 50 Vict. c.27) which, by section 5, provided that the court may:

> "upon the application of the mother of any infant [whether over 16 or not] make such order as it may think fit > regarding the custody of such infant and the right of access thereto of either parent, having regard to the welfare of the infant, and to the conduct of the parents, . . ." (Emphasis added).

Once the rule of the parents' absolute authority over minor children is abandoned, the solution to the problem in this appeal can no longer be found by referring to rigid parental rights at any particular age. The solution depends upon a judgment of what is best for the welfare of the particular child. Nobody. doubts, certainly I do not doubt, that in the overwhelming majority of cases the best judges of a child's welfare are his or her parents. Nor do I doubt that any important medical treatment of a child under 16 would normally only be carried out with the parents' approval. That is why it would and should be "most unusual" for a doctor to advise a child without the knowledge and consent of the parents on contraceptive matters. But, as I have already pointed out, Mrs. Gillick has to go further if she is to obtain the first declaration that she seeks. She has to justify the absolute right of veto in a parent. But there may be circumstances in which a doctor is a better judge of the medical advice and treatment which will conduce to a girl's welfare than her parents. It is notorious that children of both sexes are often reluctant to confide in their parents about sexual matters, and the D.H.S.S. guidance under consideration shows that to abandon the principle of confidentiality for contraceptive advice to girls under 16 might cause some of them not to seek professional advice at all, with the consequence of exposing them to "the immediate risks of pregnancy and of sexually-transmitted diseases." No doubt the risk could be avoided if the patient were to abstain from sexual intercourse, and one of the doctor's responsibilities will be to decide whether a particular patient can reasonably be expected to act upon advice to abstain. We were told that in a significant number of cases such abstinence could not reasonably be expected. An example is the case of In re P (A Minor) (1981) 80 L.G.R. 301 in which Butler-Sloss J. ordered that a girl aged 15 who had been pregnant for the second time and who was in the care of a local authority should be fitted with a contraceptive appliance because, as the learned judge is reported to have said at p. 312:

> "I assume that it is impossible for this local authority to monitor her sexual activities, and, therefore, contraception appears to be the only alternative."

There may well be other cases where the doctor feels that because the girl is under the influence of her sexual partner or for some other reason there is no- realistic prospect of her abstaining from intercourse. If that is right it points strongly to the desirability of the doctor being entitled in some cases, in the girl's best interest, to give her contraceptive advice and treatment if necessary without the consent or even the knowledge of her parents. The only practicable course is, in my opinion, to entrust the doctor with a discretion to act in accordance with his view of what is best in the interests of the girl who is his patient. He should, of course, always seek to persuade her to tell her parents that she is seeking contraceptive advice, and the nature of the advice that she receives. At least he should seek to persuade her to agree to the doctor's informing the parents. But there may well be cases, and I think there will be some cases, where the girl refuses either to tell the parents herself or to permit the doctor to do so and in such cases, the doctor will, in my opinion, be justified in proceeding without the parents' consent or even knowledge provided he is satisfied on the following matters:

1. that the girl (although under 16 years of age) will understand his advice;

2. that he cannot persuade her to inform her parents or to allow him to inform the parents that she is seeking contraceptive advice;

3. that she is very likely to begin or to continue having sexual intercourse with or without contraceptive treatment;

(4) that unless she receives contraceptive advice or treatment her physical or mental health or both are likely to suffer;

(5) that her best interests require him to give her contraceptive advice, treatment or both without the parental consent.

That result ought not to be regarded as a licence for doctors to disregard the wishes of parents on this matter whenever they find it convenient to do so. Any doctor who behaves in such a way would, in my opinion, be failing to discharge his professional responsibilities, and I would expect him to be disciplined by his own professional body accordingly. The medical profession have in modern times come to be entrusted with very wide discretionary powers going beyond the strict limits of clinical judgment and, in my opinion, there is nothing strange about entrusting them with this further responsibility which they alone are in a position to discharge satisfactorily.

3. Is a doctor who gives contraceptive advice or treatment to a girl under 16 without her parents' consent likely to incur criminal liability?

The submission was made to Woolf J. on behalf of Mrs.

Gillick that a doctor who provided contraceptive advice and treatment to a girl under 16 without her parents' authority would be committing an offence under section 28 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 by aiding and abetting the commission of unlawful sexual intercourse. When the case reached the Court of Appeal counsel on both sides conceded that whether a doctor who followed the guidelines would be committing an offence or not would depend on the circumstances. It would depend upon the doctor's intentions; this appeal is concerned with doctors who honestly intend to act in the best interests of the girl, and I think it is unlikely that a doctor who gives contraceptive advice or treatment with that intention would commit an offence under section 28. It must be remembered that a girl under 16 who has sexual intercourse does not thereby commit an offence herself, although her partner does - see the Sexual Offences Act 1956 sections 5 and 6. In any event, even if the doctor would be committing an offence, the fact that he had acted with the parents' consent would not exculpate him as Woolf 3. pointed out [1984] Q.B. 581, 595G. Accordingly, I regard this contention as irrelevant to the question that we have to answer in this appeal. Parker L.J. in the Court of Appeal dealt at some length with the provisions of criminal law intended to protect girls under the age of 16 from being seduced, and perhaps also to protect them from their own weakness. The learned Lord Justice at [1985] 2 W.L.R. 413, 435B expressed his conclusion on this part of the case as follows:

> "It appears to me that it is wholly incongruous, when the act of intercourse is criminal, when permitting it to take place on one's premises is criminal and when, if the girl were under 13, failing to report an act of intercourse to the police would up to 1967 have been criminal, that either the . department [or] the area health authority should provide facilities which would enable girls under 16 the more readily to commit such acts. It seems to me equally incongruous to assert that doctors have the right to accept the young, down, apparently to any age, as patients, and to provide them with contraceptive advice and treatment without reference to their parents and even against their known wishes."

My Lords, the first of those two sentences is directed to the question, which is not in issue in this appeal, of whether contraceptive facilities should be available at ail under the National Health Service for girls under 16. I have already explained my reasons for thinking that the legislation does not limit the duty of providing such facilities to women of 16 or more. The second sentence, which does bear directly on the question in the appeal, does not appear to me to follow necessarily from the first and with respect I cannot agree with it. If the doctor complies with the first of the conditions which I have specified, that is to say if he satisfies himself that the girl can understand his advice there will be no question of his giving contraceptive advice to very young girls.

For those reasons I do not consider that the guidance interferes with the parents' rights.

The Second Declaration

The second declaration is directed only against the area health authority. Its practical importance would be minimal because doctors are not "employed" by the area health authority in the family planning service and, if they were, the declaration could easily be avoided by the girl going to a doctor in a different area. The Court of Appeal made the declaration sought, and the authority has not appealed against its decision. I am, therefore, of opinion that we should not reverse the decision of the Court of Appeal on this part of the case. But it is clearly inconsistent with the views I have expressed on the first declaration, and I agree with Lord Scarman that it should be overruled.

I would allow the appeal against the first declaration granted by the Court of Appeal, and I would overrule the second declaration as being erroneous.

My Lords,

I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech delivered by my noble and learned friend, Lord Fraser of Tullybelton. Agreeing with it, I shall endeavour in delivering my opinion to avoid repetition. The importance of the case is, however, such that I believe it necessary, even at the cost of some repetition, to deliver my opinion in my own words. The case is the beginning, not the conclusion, of a legal development in a field glimpsed by one or two judges in recent times (notably Butler-Sloss 3. In re P (A Minor) (1981) 80 L.G.R. 301) but not yet fully explored. Mrs. Gillick, even though she may lose the appeal, has performed a notable public service in directing judicial attention to the problems arising from the interaction of parental right and a doctor's duty in a field of medicine unknown to our fathers but of immense consequence to our society. The contraceptive pill has introduced a new independence, and offers new options, for women: but has it in the process undermined parental right and duty? In my judgment, the answer is "no", even though parental right may not be as extensive or as long lasting as she believes it to be.

Victoria Gillick, mother of five daughters under the age of 16, challenges the lawfulness of a memorandum of guidance issued by the Department of Health and Social Security which she says encourages and in certain circumstances recommends health authorities, doctors, and others concerned in operating the department's family planning services to provide contraceptive advice and treatment to girls under the age of 16 without the knowledge or consent of a parent. Mrs. Gillick is a wife and mother living in a united family with her husband and their children. The husband supports the action being taken, as they both see it, to protect their daughters. No further need be said of their family situation in deciding this appeal.

Mrs. Gillick began her proceedings by the issue of a writ against two defendants, the health authority for the area in which she lives and the department. She claims in an ordinary civil action declaratory relief against both defendants that the guidance is unlawful, and against the area health authority alone a declaration that no doctor or other person in its employ may give contraception or abortion advice to Mrs. Gillick's children under the age of 16 without her prior knowledge and consent. The area health authority has taken no part in the litigation, but the department has fought the case strenuously. The appeal to the House is that of the department: the health authority has not appealed and is not represented.

The written case submitted on Mrs. Gillick's behalf to the House formulates three propositions of law, any one of which, if made good, would suffice to entitle her to relief. They are as follows:

> "(i) parental rights should be protected from any invasion or interference neither authorised by a competent court nor expressly authorised by statute: [the parental rights case]

> "(ii) the provision of contraceptive treatment to girls under the age of 16 either constitutes criminal conduct in itself or is so closely analogous thereto as to be contrary to public policy: [the criminal law case]
> "(iii) a girl below the age of 16 is not capable in law of giving a valid consent to medical treatment and in > the particular context of this case to contraceptive or abortion treatment." [the age of consent point].

Before, however, considering these propositions, it is necessary to clear out of the way certain procedural questions, which, though not urged upon our attention, do call for a brief consideration.

Procedure

Three procedural questions have emerged in the course of the litigation. First, Mr. Simon Brown, who before his elevation to the bench had the conduct of the case as counsel for the department, raised at the trial the question as to the propriety of the civil court granting a declaration in a case which involved the criminal law. The judge saw no reason why he should be inhibited on this ground from dealing with the issues in the action; and I agree with him. It was not contended that the issue of the guidance was itself a crime: the case against the department was simply that the guidance, if followed, would result in unlawful acts and that the department by issuing it was exercising a statutory discretion in a wholly unreasonable way; i.e. the classical "Wednesbury" case for judicial review: Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 K.B. 223.

The second question is as to the propriety of proceeding in this case by ordinary civil action. Should not Mrs. Gillick have proceeded by way of judicial review under R.S.C. Ord. 53? No point was taken at trial or in the Court of Appeal against Mrs. Gillick that she should have proceeded not by issuing a writ, but by applying for judicial review. Woolf J. did, however, mention the matter only to hold that there was a relevant precedent for proceeding by writ in this House's decision in Royal College of Nursing of the United Kingdom v. Department of Health and Social Security [1981] A.C. 800. "

The point having been brought to the attention of the House I think it desirable to consider it if only because of the later decision of the House in O'Reilly v. Mackman [1983] 2 A.C. 237, where Lord Diplock, with whose opinion their other Lordships agreed, laid down a rule in these terms at p. 285D:

> "Now that those disadvantages [i.e. those previously associated with prerogative order procedure] to applicants have been removed and all remedies for infringements of rights protected by public law can be obtained upon an application for judicial review, as can also remedies for infringements of rights under private law if such infringements should also be involved, it would in my view as a general rule [emphasis supplied] be contrary to public policy, and as such an abuse of the process of the court, to > permit a person seeking to establish that a decision of a public authority infringed rights to which he was entitled to protection under public law to proceed by way of an ordinary action and by this means to evade the provisions of Order 53 for the protection of such authorities."

If there be in the present case an abuse of the process of the court, the House cannot overlook it, even if the parties are prepared to do so, and even though the writ in this case was issued before the decision of the House in O'Reilly's case [1983] 2 A.C. 237.

Mrs. Gillick's action is essentially to protect what she alleges to be her rights as a parent under private law. Although she is proceeding against two public authorities and invokes the criminal law and public policy in support of her case, she claims as a parent whose right of custody and guardianship in respect of her children under the age of 16 is (she says) threatened by the guidance given by the department to area health authorities, doctors, and others concerned in the provision by the department of a family health service. This is a very different case from O'Reilly [1983] 2 A.C. 237 where it could not be contended that there was any infringement or threat of infringment of any right derived from private law. For the appellants in O'Reilly's case were convicted prisoners faced with forfeiture of remission, and they were held to have not a right to remission of their prison sentences but merely "a legitimate expectation" which could, if the necessary facts were established, entitle them "to a remedy in public law." They had, therefore, no private right in the matter, and could rely only on the "public law" doctrine of legitimate expectation.

It is unnecessary to embark upon an analysis of the newly fledged distinction in English law between public and private law, for I do not see Mrs. Gillick's claim as falling under the embargo imposed by O'Reilly's case [1983] 2 A.C. 237. If I should be wrong in this view, I would nevertheless think that the private law content of her claim was so great as to make her case an exception to the general rule. Lord Diplock at p. 285F recognised that the general rule which he was laying down admitted of exceptions including cases:

> "where the invalidity of [the public authority's] decision arises as a collateral issue in a claim for infringement of a right of the plaintiff arising under private law, or where none of the parties objects to the adoption of the procedure by writ or originating summons."

Both these exceptions can be said to apply in the present case. Like Lord Diplock, I think that procedural problems in the field of public law must be left to be decided on a case to case basis. Mrs. Gillick was, in my opinion, fully entitled to proceed by ordinary action, even though she could also have proceeded by way of judicial review.

The third and final procedural question is a mere technicality: as such, it creates - no lawyer would be surprised - more trouble than the other two. If the House should allow the department's appeal against the guidance declaration what is to be done about the other declaration granted exclusively against the area health authority? As a matter of common sense, if Mrs. Gillick fails to establish that the department's guidance is unlawful she cannot upon the evidence in this case establish her entitlement to the other declaration against the health authority. The Court of Appeal treated the second declaration as consequential upon the guidance declaration, which upon the evidence they were plainly, right to do. But there is a difficulty in allowing an appeal where there is no appellant and no appeal. Fortunately in this case there is no issue between the parties as to costs. If the department succeeds, it does not ask for costs against Mrs. Gillick here or below: and the area health authority has incurred no costs. Two courses are open to the House: one would be to ignore the technicalities, allow the appeal (if that be the view of the House), and set aside both declarations: the other, which is strictly correct, would be to allow the department's appeal and to declare that the reasoning was also applicable to the Court of Appeal's decision in favour of the health authority which must, therefore, be held to be overruled. If the second course should be taken, the only order to be made by the House would be to allow the department's appeal and set aside the "guidance" declaration. I favour the second course.

The Department's Guidance

In 1974 the department assumed statutory responsibility for the provision of family planning services on a national basis. This involved a reorganisation which included a transfer of services from the agencies previously concerned to area health authorities. In the course of the reorganisation which took some two years to complete the department issued guidance as to the duties and responsibilities of doctors and others concerned with the provision of such services. It was empowered so to do by its assumption, pursuant to statute, of responsibility for the provision of such services. In May 1974 the department circulated a memorandum of guidance HN(80)46: it included a section (section G.) as to the provision of services to young people. The text of section G. aroused some public concern, and in December 1980 a revised section G. was issued to replace the earlier text. It is this revision which lies at the heart of the case, being the subject of Mrs. Gillick's challenge. I set it out in full:

"REVISED SECTION G - THE YOUNG

"Clinic sessions should be available for people of all ages, but it may be helpful to make separate, less formal arrangements for young people. The staff should be experienced in dealing with young people and their problems.

"There is widespread concern about counselling and treatment for children under 16. Special care is needed not to undermine parental responsibility and family stability. The Department would therefore hope that in any case where a doctor or other professional worker is approached by a person under the age of 16 for advice in these matters, the doctor, or other professional, will always seek to persuade the child to involve the parent or guardian (or other person in loco parentis) at the earliest stage of consultation, and will proceed from the assumption that it would be most unusual to provide advice about contraception without parental consent.

"It is, however, widely accepted that consultations between doctors and patients are confidential; and the Department recognises the importance which doctors and patients attach to this principle. It is a principle which applies also to the other professions concerned. To abandon this principle for children under 16 might cause some not to seek professional advice at all. They could then be exposed to the immediate risks of pregnancy and of sexually-transmitted diseases, as well as other long-term physical, psychological and emotional consequences which are equally a threat to stable family life. This would apply particularly to young people whose parents are, for example, unconcerned, entirely unresponsive, or grossly disturbed. Some of these young people are away from their parents and in the care of local authorities or voluntary organisations standing in loco parentis.

"The Department realises that in such exceptional cases the nature of any counselling must be a matter for the doctor or other professional worker concerned and that the decision whether or not to prescribe contraception must be for the clinical judgment of a doctor."

The first question in the appeal is simply: what is the true meaning of this text? Does it, or does it not, permit doctors concerned in the provision of a statutory service to prescribe contraceptive treatment for a girl under 16 without the knowledge and consent of her parents? And, if it does, in what circumstances?

There can be no doubt that it does permit doctors to prescribe in certain circumstances contraception for girls under 16 without the knowledge and consent of a parent or guardian. (In this opinion I shall use the term "parent" to include "guardian"). The text is not, however, clear as to the circumstances (variously described as "unusual" and "exceptional") which justify a doctor in so doing. The House must be careful not to construe the guidance as though it was a statute or even to analyse it in the way appropriate to a judgment. The question to be asked is: what would a doctor understand to be the guidance offered to him, if he should be faced with a girl under 16 seeking contraceptive treatment without the knowledge or consent of her parents?

He would know that it was his duty to seek to persuade the girl to let him bring into consultation her parents (or one of them). If she refused, he (or the counsellor to whom the girl had gone) must ask himself whether the case was one of those exceptional cases in which the guidance permitted a doctor to prescribe contraception without the knowledge or consent of a parent (provided always that in the exercise of his clinical judgment he thought this course to be in the true interest of his patient). In my judgment the guidance clearly implies that in exceptional cases the parental right to make decisions as to the care of their children, which derives from their right of custody, can lawfully be overridden, and that in such cases the doctor may without parental consultation or consent prescribe contraceptive treatment in the exercise of his clinical judgment. And the guidance reminds the doctor that in such cases he owes the duty of confidentiality to his patient, by which is meant that the doctor would be in breach of his duty to her if he did communicate with her parents.

The guidance leaves two areas of the doctor's responsibility in some obscurity. Though it provides illustrations of exceptional cases, it offers no definition. And it gives no clue as to what is meant by "clinical judgment" other than that it must at least include the professional judgment of a doctor as to what is the medically appropriate advice or treatment to be offered to his patient. .

This lack of definition does not, in my judgment, assist Mrs. Gillick. If, contrary to her submission, the law recognises that exceptional cases can arise in which it is lawful for a doctor to prescribe contraceptive treatment for a girl under 16 without the knowledge and consent of a parent, the guidance would be within the law notwithstanding its lack of precision, unless its vagueness created so obscure a darkness that it could reasonably be understood by a doctor as authorising him to prescribe without the parent's consent whenever he should think fit.

I do not find upon a fair reading of the guidance anything to obscure or confuse its basic message that a doctor is only in exceptional circumstances to prescribe contraception for a young person under the age of 16 without the knowledge and consent of a parent. No reasonable person could read it as meaning that the doctor's discretion could ordinarily override parental right. Illustrations are given in the text of exceptional cases in which the doctor may take the "most unusual" course of not consulting the parent. Only in exceptional cases does the guidance contemplate him exercising his clinical judgment without the parent's knowledge and consent. Lastly, there really can be no compulsion in law upon a government department to spell out to a doctor what is meant by "clinical judgment."

The Question in the Appeal

It is only if the guidance permits or encourages unlawful conduct in the provision of contraceptive services that it can be set aside as being the exercise of a statutory discretionary power in an unreasonable way.

The question, therefore, for the House is - can a doctor in any circumstances lawfully prescribe contraception for a girl under 16 without the knowledge and consent of a parent?

Before discussing the question, I put out of the way the two exceptions which I understand both parties to the appeal accept? namely the order of a competent court, and emergency. Nobody disputes the existence of the court exception, nor does the other situation call for more than a brief mention.

If, as is clear in the light of section 5 of the National Health Service Act 1977 (re-enacting earlier legislation) and section 41 of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act 1978, contraceptive medical treatment is recognised as a legitimate and beneficial treatment in cases in which it is medically indicated, it must be an available option for the doctor in an emergency where treatment is urgently needed and the consent of the patient or his parent cannot be obtained either in time or at all. And the case of a teenage girl abandoned by her parents and not yet received into the care of a local authority or placed under the protection of a responsible adult in loco parentis can be seen to be a true emergency. Both Mrs. Gillick, as I understand her case, and the department accept these exceptions to the general rule that a parent must be consulted and give consent and I say no more than that it would be unthinkable for the law not to recognise them.

Parental Right and the Age of Consent

Mrs. Gillick relies on both the statute law and the case law to establish her proposition that parental consent is in all other circumstances necessary. The only statutory provision directly in point is section 8 of the Family Law Reform Act 1969. Subsection (1) of the section provides that the consent of a minor who has attained the age of 16 to any surgical, mental, or dental treatment which in the absence of consent would constitute a trespass to his person shall be as effective as if he were of full age and that the consent of his parent or guardian need not be obtained. Subsection (3) of the section provides that:

> "Nothing in this section shall be construed as making ineffective any consent which would have been effective if this section had not been enacted."

I cannot accept the submission made on Mrs. Gillick's behalf that subsection (1) necessarily implies that prior to its enactment the consent of a minor to medical treatment could not be effective in law. Subsection (3) leaves open the question whether the consent of a minor under 16 could be an effective consent. Like my noble and learned friend, Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, I read the section as clarifying the law without conveying any indication as to what the law was before it was enacted. So far as minors under 16 are concerned, the law today is as it was before the enactment of the section.

Nor do I find in the provisions of the statute law to which Parker L.J. refers in his judgment in the Court of Appeal [1985] 2 W.L.R. 413 any encouragement, let alone any compelling reason, for holding that Parliament has accepted that a child under 16 cannot consent to medical treatment. I respectfully agree with the reasoning and conclusion of my noble and learned friend, Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, on this point.

The law has, therefore, to be found by a search in the judge-made law for the true principle. The legal difficulty is that in our search we find ourselves in a field of medical practice where parental right and a doctor's duty may point us in different directions. This is not surprising. Three features have emerged in today's society which were not known to our predecessors:- (1) contraception as a subject for medical advice and treatment; (2) the increasing independence of young people; and (3) the changed status of women. In times past contraception was rarely a matter for the doctor: but with the development of the contraceptive pill for women it has become part and parcel of every-day medical practice, as is made clear by the Department's Handbook of Contraceptive Practice (1984 revision), particularly para. 1.2. Family planning services are now available under statutory powers to all without any express limitation as to age or marital status. Young people, once they have attained the age of 16, are capable of consenting to contraceptive treatment, since it is medical treatment: and, however extensive be parental right in the care and upbringing of children, it cannot prevail so as to nullify the 16-year's old capacity to consent which is now conferred by statute. Furthermore, women have obtained by the availability of the pill a choice of life-style with a degree of independence and of opportunity undreamed of until this generation and greater, I would add, than any law of equal opportunity could by itself effect.

The law ignores these developments at its peril. The House's task, therefore, as the supreme court in a legal system largely based on rules of law evolved over the years by the judicial process is to search the overfull and cluttered shelves of the law reports for a principle, or set of principles recognised by the judges over the years but stripped of the detail which, however appropriate in their day, would, if applied today, lay the judges open to a justified criticism for failing to keep the law abreast of the society in which they live and work.

It is, of course, a judicial common place to proclaim the adaptability and flexibility of the judge-made common law. But this is more frequently proclaimed than acted upon. The mark of the great judge from Coke through Mansfield to our day has been the capacity and the will to search out principle, to discard the detail appropriate (perhaps) to earlier times, and to apply principle in such a way as to satisfy the needs of their own time. If judge-made law is to survive as a living and relevant body of law, we must make the effort, however inadequately, to follow the lead of the great masters of the judicial art,

In this appeal, therefore, there is much in the earlier case law which the House must discard - almost everything I would say but its principle. For example, the horrendous Agar-Ellis decisions 10 Ch.D. 49; 24 Ch.D. 317 of the late 19th century asserting the power of the father over his child were rightly remaindered to the history books by the Court of Appeal in Hewer v. Bryant [1970] 1 Q.B. 357, an important case to which I shall return later. Yet the decisions of earlier generations may well afford clues to the true principle of the law: e.g. Reg. v. Howes (1860) 3 E. & E. 332, 336, which I also later quote. It is the duty of this House to look at, through, and past the decisions of earlier generations so that it may identify the principle which lies behind them. Even Lord Eldon, (no legal revolutionary), once remarked, when invited to study precedent, (the strength of which he never under-rated):

> "All law ought to stand upon principle; and unless decision has removed out of the way all argument and all principle, so as to make it impossible to apply them to the case before you, you must find out what is the principle upon which it must be decided." 1 Bligh 486 quoted by Lord Campbell, Lives of the Lord Chancellors, 4th ed. (1857), vol. 10, chap. 213, p. 244.

Approaching the earlier law in this way, one finds plenty of indications as to the principles governing the law's approach to parental right and the child's right to make his or her own decision. Parental rights clearly do exist, and they do not wholly disappear until the age of majority. Parental rights relate to both the person and the property of the child - custody, care, and control of the person and guardianship of the property of the child. But the common law has never treated such rights as sovereign or beyond review and control. Nor has our law ever treated the child as other than a person with capacities and rights recognised by law. The principle of the law, as I shall endeavour to show, is that parental rights are derived from parental duty and exist only so long as they are needed for the protection of the person and property of the child. The principle has been subjected to certain age limits set by statute for certain purposes: and in some cases the courts have declared an age of discretion at which a child acquires before the age of majority the right to make his (or her) own decision. But these limitations in no way undermine the principle of the law, and should not be allowed to obscure it.

Let me make good, quite shortly, the proposition of principle.

First, the guardianship legislation. Section 5 of the Guardianship of Infants Act 1886 began the process which is now complete of establishing the equal rights of mother and father. In doing so the legislation, which is currently embodied in section 1 of the Guardianship of Minors Act 1971, took over from the Chancery courts a rule which they had long followed (it was certainly applied by Lord Eldon, during his quarter of a century as Lord Chancellor, as Parker L.3. in this case, quoting Heilbron 3. at [1985] 2 W.L.R. 413, 424, reminds us) that when a court has before it a question as to the care and upbringing of a child it must treat the welfare of the child as the paramount consideration in determining the order to be made. There is here a principle which limits and governs the exercise of parental rights of custody, care, and control. It is a principle perfectly consistent with the law's recognition of the parent as the natural guardian of the child; but it is also a warning that parental right must be exercised in accordance with the welfare principle and can be challenged, even overridden, if it be not.

Secondly, there is the common law's understanding of the nature of parental right. We are not concerned in this appeal to catalogue all that is contained in what Sachs L.J. has felicitously described as the "bundle of rights" (Hewer v. Bryant, [1970] Q.B. 357, 373) which together constitute the rights of custody, care, and control. It is abundantly plain that the law recognises that there is a right and a duty of parents to determine whether or not to seek medical advice in respect of their child, and, having received advice, to give or withhold consent to medical treatment. The question in the appeal is as to the extent, and duration of the right and the circumstances in which outside the two admitted exceptions to which I have earlier referred it can be overridden by the exercise of medical judgment.

As Parker and Fox L.JJ. noted in the Court of Appeal, the modern statute law recognises the existence of parental right: e.g. sections 85 and 86 Children Act 1975 and sections 2. 3, and 4

Child Care Act 1980. It is derived from parental duty. A most illuminating discussion of parental right is to be found in Blackstone's Commentaries, 17th ed. (1830), vol. 1 chapters 16 and 17. He analyses the duty of the parent as the "maintenance . . . protection, and . . . education" of the child: p. 446. He declares that the power of parents over their children is derived from their duty and exists "to enable the parent more effectually to perform his duty, and partly as a recompense for his care and trouble in the faithful discharge of it:" op.cit. p. 452. In chapter 17 he discusses the relation of guardian and ward. It is, he points out, a relation "derived out of [the relation of parent and child]: the guardian being only a temporary parent, that is, for so long a time as the ward is an infant, or under age": op.cit. chap. 17, p. 460. A little later in the same chapter he again emphasises that the power and reciprocal duty of a guardian and ward are the same, pro tempore, as that of a father and child and adds that the guardian, when the ward comes of age, (as also the father who becomes guardian "at common law" if an estate be left to his child) must account to the child for all that he has transacted on his behalf: pp. 462-463. He then embarks upon a discussion of the different ages at which for different purposes a child comes of sufficient age to make his own decision; and he cites examples, viz. a boy might at 12 years old take the oath of allegiance; at 14 he might consent to marriage or choose his guardian "and, if his discretion be actually proved, may make his testament of his personal estate;" at 17 he could be an executor - all these rights and responsibilities being capable of his acquiring before reaching the age of majority at 21: op.cit. p. 463.

The two chapters provide a valuable insight into the principle and flexibility of the common law. The principle is that parental right or power of control of the person and property of his child exists primarily to enable the parent to discharge his duty of maintenance, protection, and education until he reaches such an age as to be able to look after himself and make his own decisions. Blackstone does suggest that there was a further justification for parental right, viz. as a recompense for the faithful discharge of parental duty: but the right of the father to the exclusion of the mother and the reward element as one of the reasons for the existence of the right have been swept away by the Guardianship of Minors legislation to which I have already referred. He also accepts that by statute and by case law varying ages of discretion have been fixed for various purposes. But it is clear that this was done to achieve certainty where it was considered necessary and in no way limits the principle that parental right endures only so long as it is needed for the protection of the child.

Although statute has intervened in respect of a child's capacity to consent to medical treatment from the age of 16 onwards, neither statute nor the case law has ruled on the extent and duration of parental right in respect of children under the age of 16. More specifically, there is no rule yet applied to contraceptive treatment, which has special problems of its own and is a late-comer in medical practice. It is open, therefore, to the House to formulate a rule. The Court of Appeal favoured a fixed age limit of 16, basing themselves on a view of the statute law which I do not share and upon their view of the effect of the older case law which for the reasons already given I cannot accept. They sought to justify the limit by the public interest in the law being certain. Certainty is always an advantage in the law, and in some branches of the law it is a necessity. But it brings with it an inflexibility and a rigidity which in some branches of the law can obstruct justice, impede the law's development, and stamp upon the law the mark of obsolescence where what is needed is the capacity for development. The law relating to parent and child is concerned with the problems of the growth and maturity of the human personality. If the law should impose upon the process of "growing up" fixed limits where nature knows only a continuous process, the price would be artificiality and a lack of realism in an area where the law must be sensitive to human development and social change. If certainty be thought desirable, it is better that the rigid demarcations necessary to achieve it should be laid down by legislation after a full consideration of all the relevant factors than by the courts confined as they are by the forensic process to the evidence adduced by the parties and to whatever may properly fall within the judicial notice of judges. Unless and until Parliament should think fit to intervene, the courts should establish a principle flexible enough to enable justice to be achieved by its application to the particular circumstances proved by the evidence placed before them.

The underlying principle of the law was exposed by Blackstone and can be seen to have been acknowledged in the case law. It is that parental right yields to the child's right to make his own decisions when he reaches a sufficient understanding and intelligence to be capable of making up his own mind on the matter requiring decision. Lord Denning M.R. captured the spirit and principle of the law when he said in Hewer v. Bryant [1970] 1 Q.B. 357, 369:

> "I would get rid of the rule in In re Agar-Ellis, 24 Ch.D. 317 and of the suggested exceptions to it. That case was decided in the year 1883. It reflects the attitude of a Victorian parent towards his children. He expected unquestioning obedience to his commands. If a son disobeyed, his father would cut him off with a shilling. If a daughter had an illegitimate child, he would turn her out of the house. His power only ceased when the child became 21. I decline to accept a view so much out of date. The common law can, and should, keep pace with the times. It should declare, in conformity with the recent Report of the Committee on the Age of Majority [Cmnd. 3342, 1967], that the legal right of a parent to the custody of a child ends at the 18th birthday: and even up till then, it is a dwindling right which the courts will hesitate to enforce against the wishes of the child, and the more so the older he is. It starts with a right of control and ends with little more than advice."

But his is by no means a solitary voice. It is consistent with the opinion expressed by the House in J. v. C. [1970] A.C. 668 where their Lordships clearly recognised as out of place the assertion in the Agar-Ellis cases 10 Ch.D. 49; 24 Ch.D. 317 of a father's power bordering on "patria potestas." It is consistent with the view of Lord Parker C.J. in Reg. v. Howard [1966] 1 W.L.R. 13, 14 where he ruled that in the case of a prosecution charging rape of a girl under 16 the Crown must prove either lack of her consent or that she was not in a position to decide whether to consent or resist and added the comment that "there are many girls who know full well what it is all about and can properly consent." And it is consistent with the views of the House in the recent criminal case where a father was accused of kidnapping his own child, Reg. v. D. [1984] A.C. 778, a case to which I shall return.

For the reasons which I have endeavoured to develop the case law of the 19th and earlier centuries is no guide to the application of the law in the conditions of today. The Agar-Ellis cases 10 Ch.D. 49; 24 Ch.D. 317 (the power of the father) cannot live with the modern statute law. The habeas corpus "age of discretion" cases are also no guide as to the limits which should be accepted today in marking out the bounds of parental right, of a child's capacity to make his or her own decision, and of a doctor's duty to his patient. Nevertheless the "age of discretion" cases are helpful in that they do reveal the judges as accepting that a minor can in law achieve an age of discretion before coming of full age. The "age of discretion" cases are cases in which a parent or guardian (usually the father) has applied for habeas corpus to secure the return of his child who has left home without his consent. The courts would refuse an order if the child had attained the age of discretion, which came to be regarded as 14 for boys and 16 for girls, and did not wish to return. The principle underlying them was plainly that an order would be refused if the child had sufficient intelligence and understanding to make up his own mind. A passage from the judgment of Cockburn C.J. in Reg. v. Howes (1860) 3 E. & E. 332, which Parker L.J. quoted in the Court of Appeal, illustrates their reasoning and shows how a fixed age was used as a working rule to establish an age at which the requisite "discretion" could be held to be achieved by the child. The Chief Justice said at pp. 336-337:

> "Now the cases which have been decided on this subject shew that, although a father is entitled to the custody of his children till they attain the age of 21, this court will not grant a habeas corpus to hand a child which is below that age over to its father, provided that it has attained an age of sufficient discretion to enable it to exercise a wise choice for its own interests. The whole question is, what is that age of discretion? We repudiate utterly, as most dangerous, the notion that any intellectual precocity in an individual female child can hasten the period which appears to have been fixed by statute for the arrival of the age of discretion; for that very precocity, if uncontrolled, might very probably lead to her irreparable injury. The legislature has given us a guide, which we may safely follow, in pointing out 16 as the age up to which the father's right to the custody of his female child is to continue; and short of which such a child has no discretion to consent to leaving him"

The principle is clear: and a fixed age of discretion was accepted by the courts by analogy from the Abduction Acts (the first being the Act of 1557 4 & 5 Ph. & M. c.8). While it is unrealistic today to treat a 16th century Act as a safe guide in the matter of a girl's discretion, and while no modern judge would dismiss the intelligence of a teenage girl as "intellectual precocity," we can agree with Cockburn C.J. as to the principle of the law - the attainment by a child of an age of sufficient discretion to enable him or her to exercise a wise choice in his or her own interests.

The modern law governing parental right and a child's capacity to make his own decisions was considered in Reg. v. D; [1984] A.C. 778. The House must, in my view, be understood as having in that case accepted that, save where statute otherwise provides, a minor's capacity to make his or her own decision depends upon the minor having sufficient understanding and intelligence to make the decision and is not to be determined by reference to any judicially fixed age limit. The House was faced with a submission that a father, even if he had taken his child away by force or fraud, could not be guilty of a criminal offence of any kind. Lord Brandon of Oakbrook, with whom their other Lordships agreed, commented at pp. 804-805 that this might well have been the view of the legislature and the courts in the 19th century, but had this to say about parental right and a child's capacity in our time to give or withhold a valid consent:

> "This is because in those times both the generally accepted conventions of society, and the courts by which such conventions were buttressed and enforced, regarded a father as having absolute and paramount authority, as against all the world, over any children of his who were still under the > age of majority (then 21), except for a married daughter. The nature of this view of a father's rights appears clearly from various reported cases, including, as a typical example, In re Agar-Ellis (1883) 24 Ch.D. 317. The common law, however, while generally immutable in its principles, unless different principles are laid down by statute, is not immutable in the way in which it adapts, develops and applies those principles in a radically changing world and against the background of radically changed social conventions and conditions."

> "I see no good reason why, in relation to the kidnapping of a child, it should not in all cases be the absence of the child's consent which is material, whatever its age may be. In the case of a very young child, it would not have the understanding or the intelligence to give its consent, so that absence of consent would be a necessary inference from its age. In the case of an older child, however, it must, I think be a question of fact for a jury whether the child concerned has sufficient understanding and intelligence to give its consent; if, but only if, the jury considers that a child has these qualities, it must then go on to consider whether it has been proved that the child did not give its consent. While the matter will always be for the jury alone to decide, I should not expect a jury to find at all frequently that a child under 14 had sufficient understanding and intelligence to give its consent."

In the light of the foregoing I would hold that as a matter of law the parental right to determine whether or not their minor child below the age of 16 will have medical treatment terminates if and when the child achieves a sufficient understanding and intelligence to enable him or her to understand fully what is proposed. It will be a question of fact whether a child seeking advice has sufficient understanding of what is involved to give a consent valid in law. Until the child achieves the capacity to consent, the parental right to make the decision continues save only in exceptional circumstances. Emergency, parental neglect, abandonment of the child, or inability to find the parent are examples of exceptional situations justifying the 'doctor proceeding to treat the child without parental knowledge and consent: but there will arise, no doubt, other exceptional situations in which it will be reasonable for the doctor to proceed without the parent's consent.

When applying these conclusions to contraceptive advice and treatment it has to be borne in mind that there is much that has to be understood by a girl under the age of 16 if she is to have legal capacity to consent to such treatment. It is not enough that she should understand the nature of the advice which is being given: she must also have a sufficient maturity to understand what is involved. There are moral and family questions, especially her relationship with her parents; long-term problems associated with the emotional impact of pregnancy and its termination; and there are the risks to health of sexual intercourse at her age, risks which contraception may diminish but cannot eliminate. It follows that a doctor will have to satisfy himself that she is able to appraise these factors before he can safely proceed upon the basis that she has at law capacity to consent to contraceptive treatment. And it further follows that ordinarily the proper course will be for him, as the guidance lays down, first to seek to persuade the girl to bring her parents into consultation, and if she refuses, not to prescribe contraceptive treatment unless he is satisfied that her circumstances are such that he ought to proceed without parental knowledge and consent.

Like Woolf J., I find illuminating and helpful the judgment of Addy J. of the Ontario High Court in Johnston v. Wellesley Hospital (1970) 17 D.L.R. (3d) 139, a passage from which he quotes in his judgment in this case, [1984] Q.B. 581, 597. The key passage bears repetition!

> "But, regardless of modern trend, I can find nothing in any of the old reported cases, except where infants of tender age or young children were involved, where the courts have found that a person under 21 years, of age was legally incapable of consenting to medical treatment. If a person under 21 years were unable to consent to medical treatment, he would also be incapable of consenting to other types of bodily interference. A proposition purporting to establish that any bodily interference acquiesced in by a youth of 20 years would nevertheless constitute an assault would be absurd. If such were the case, sexual intercourse with a girl under 21 years would constitute rape. Until the minimum age of consent to sexual acts was fixed at 14 years by a statute, the courts often held that infants were capable of consenting at a considerably earlier age than 14 years.

"I feel that the law on this point is well expressed in the volume on Medical Negligence (1957), by Lord Nathan, > p. 176: 'It is suggested that the most satisfactory solution of the problem is to rule that an infant who is capable of appreciating fully the nature and consequences of a particular operation or of particular treatment can give an effective consent thereto, and in such cases the consent of the guardian is unnecessary; but that where the infant is without that capacity, any apparent consent by him or her will be a nullity, the sole right to consent being vested in the guardian.'"

I am, therefore, satisfied that the Department's guidance can be followed without involving the doctor in any infringement of parental right. Unless, therefore, to prescribe contraceptive treatment for a girl under the age of 16 is either a criminal offence or so close to one that to prescribe such treatment is contrary to public policy, the department's appeal must succeed.

The Criminal Law Case

If this case should be made good, the discussion of parental right is, of course, an irrelevance. If it be criminal or contrary to public policy to prescribe contraception for a girl under the age of 16 on the ground that sexual intercourse with her is unlawful and a crime on the part of her male partner, the fact that her parent knew and consented would not make it any less so. I confess that I find the submission based upon criminality or public policy surprising. So far as criminality is concerned, I am happy to rest on the judgment of Woolf J. whose approach to the problem I believe to be correct. Clearly a doctor who gives a girl contraceptive advice or treatment not because in his clinical judgment the treatment is medically indicated for the maintenance or restoration of her health but with the intention of facilitating her having unlawful sexual intercourse may well be guilty of a criminal offence. It would depend, as my noble and learned friend, Lord Fraser of Tullybelton observes, upon the doctor's intention - a conclusion hardly to be wondered at in the field of the criminal law. The department's guidance avoids the trap of declaring that the decision to prescribe the treatment is wholly a matter of the doctor's discretion. He may prescribe only if she has the capacity to consent or if exceptional circumstances exist which justify him in exercising his clinical judgment without parental consent. The adjective "clinical" emphasises that it must be a medical judgment based upon what he honestly believes to be necessary for the physical, mental, and emotional health of his patient. The bona fide exercise by a doctor of his clinical judgment must be a complete negation of the guilty mind which is an essential ingredient of the criminal offence of aiding and abetting the commission of unlawful sexual intercourse*

The public policy point fails for the same reason. It cannot be said that there .is anything necessarily contrary to public policy in medical contraceptive treatment if it be medically indicated as in the interest of the patient's health: for the provision of such treatment is recognised as legitimate by Parliament: section 5 National Health Service Act 1977. If it should be prescribed for a girl under 16 the fact that it may eliminate a health risk in the event of the girl having unlawful sexual intercourse is an irrelevance unless the doctor intends to encourage her to have that intercourse. If the prescription is the bona fide exercise of his clinical judgment as to what is best for his patient's health, he has nothing to fear from the criminal law or from any public policy based on the criminality of a man having sexual intercourse with her.

It can be said by way of criticism of this view of the law that it will result in uncertainty and leave the law in the hands of the doctors. The uncertainty is the price which has to be paid to keep the law in line with social experience, which is that many girls are fully able to make sensible decisions about many matters before they reach the age of 16. I accept that great responsibilities will lie on the medical profession. It is, however, a learned and highly trained profession regulated by statute and governed by a strict ethical code which is vigorously enforced. Abuse of the power to prescribe contraceptive treatment for girls under the age of 16 would render a doctor liable to severe professional penalty. The truth may well be that the rights of parents and children in this sensitive area are better protected by the professional standards of the medical profession than by 'a priori' legal lines of division between capacity and lack of capacity to consent since any such general dividing line is sure to produce in some cases injustice, hardship, and injury to health.

For these reasons I would allow the Department's appeal, and set aside the declaration that the guidance is unlawful. I would add that, since the second declaration granted by the Court of Appeal, which concerns only the area health authority, was based on the same reasoning as the first, it must be held to have been wrongly granted. The Court of Appeal's decision to grant it should be, in my opinion, overruled as erroneous in law.

LORD BRIDGE OF HARWICH

My Lords,

The prelude to the proceedings from which this appeal arises was an exchange of correspondence between the present

respondent, Mrs. Victoria Gillick, and her local area health authority in which she sought, but failed to obtain, an assurance that in no circumstances would any of her daughters when under 16 be offered contraceptive advice or treatment. Mrs. Gillick now has her declaration against the health authority, from which they do not appeal. I should suppose that in such a family as Mrs. Gillick's the possibility of any of her daughters under 16 seeking to use contraceptives secretly was in any event so remote as to make the issue in the proceedings against the health authority purely academic. But what prompted the correspondence was a "Memorandum of Guidance" (to which I will refer simply as "the Memorandum") on the subject of contraceptive advice and treatment for children under 16 issued to all health authorities by the present appellants, the Department of Health and Social Security ("D.H.S.S."). The terms of the Memorandum are set out in full in the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Fraser of Tullybelton and Lord Scarman. The Memorandum has been declared by the Court of Appeal to be contrary to law and it is that declaration that gives rise to the only live issue in this appeal. It is against the ethos expressed in the Memorandum that Mrs. Gillick's crusade, as my noble and learned friend Lord Templeman aptly calls it, is primarily directed.

Throughout the hearing of the argument in the appeal and in subsequent reflection on the questions to which it gives rise I have felt doubt and difficulty as to the basis of the jurisdiction which Mrs. Gillick invokes in her claim to a declaration against the D.H.S.S. If the claim is well founded, it must surely lie in the field of public rather than private law. Mrs. Gillick has no private right which she is in a position to assert against the D.H.S.S. But the point which troubles me has nothing to do with the purely procedural technicality that the proceedings were commenced by writ rather than by application for judicial review. I agree that no objection has been, nor could now be, raised on that ground. My difficulty is more fundamental. I ask myself what is the nature of the action or decision taken by the D.H.S.S. in the exercise of a power conferred upon it which entitles a court of law to intervene and declare that it has stepped beyond the proper limits of its power. I frame the question in that way because I believe that hitherto, certainly in general terms, the court's supervisory jurisdiction over the conduct of administrative authorities has been confined to ensuring that their actions or decisions were taken within the scope of the power which they purported to exercise or conversely to providing a remedy for an authority's failure to act or to decide in circumstances where some appropriate statutory action or decision was called for.

Now it is true that the Secretary of State for Health and Social Security under section 5(I)(b) of the National Health Service Act 1977 has a general responsibility for the provision within the National Health Service of what may be described shortly as family planning services. But only in a very loose sense could the issue of the Memorandum be considered as part of the discharge of that responsibility. The Memorandum itself has no statutory force whatever. It is not and does not purport to be issued in the exercise of any statutory power or in the performance of any statutory function. It is purely advisory in character and practitioners in the National Health Service are, as a matter of law, in no way bound by it.

In the light of these considerations I cannot, with all respect, agree that the Memorandum is open to review on "Wednesbury" principles on the ground that it involves an unreasonable exercise of a statutory discretion. Such a review must always begin by examining the nature of the statutory power which the administrative authority whose action is called in question has purported to exercise, and asking, in the light of that examination, what were, and what were not, relevant considerations for the authority to take into account in deciding to exercise that power. It is only against such a specific statutory background that the question whether the authority has acted unreasonably, in the Wednesbury sense, can properly be asked and answered. Here there is no specific statutory background by reference to which the appropriate Wednesbury questions could be formulated.

The issue by a department of government with administrative responsibility in a particular field of non-statutory guidance to subordinate authorities operating in the same field is a familiar feature of modern administration. The innumerable circulars issued over the years by successive departments responsible in the field of town and country planning spring to mind as presenting a familiar example. The question whether the advice tendered in such non-statutory guidance is good or bad, reasonable or unreasonable, cannot, as a general rule, be subject to any form of judicial review. But the question arises whether there' is any exception to that general rule.

Your Lordships have been referred to the House's decision in Royal College of Nursing v. Department of Health and Social Security [1981] A.C. 800. The background to that case was exceptional, as only becomes fully clear when one reads the judgment of Woolf 3. at first instance, reported at [1981] 1 All

E.R. 545. The Royal College of Nursing ("R.C.N.") and the D.H.S.S. had received conflicting legal advice as to whether or not it was lawful, on the true construction of certain provisions of the Abortion Act 1967, for nurses to perform particular functions in the course of a novel medical procedure for the termination of pregnancy, when acting on the orders and under the general supervision of a registered medical practitioner but not necessarily in his presence. The R.C.N. had issued a memorandum and a later circular to its members to the effect that it was not lawful. The D.H.S.S. had issued a circular advising that it was lawful. The desirability of an authoritative resolution of this dispute on a pure question of law was obvious in the interests both of the nursing profession and of the public. The proceedings took the form of a claim by the R.C.N. against the D.H.S.S. for a suitable declaration and the D.H.S.S. in due course counterclaimed a declaration to the opposite effect. As Woolf J. pointed out, neither side took any point as to the jurisdiction of the court to grant a declaration. Woolf J. himself felt it necessary to raise and examine certain questions as to the locus standi of the R.C.N. to bring the proceedings and as to the propriety of their form. He answered these questions in a favourable sense to enable him to decide the disputed question of law on its merits. No technical question bearing on jurisdiction attracted any mention in the Court of Appeal or in this House. In the litigation the original conflict between the parties was reflected in a conflict of judicial opinion. On a count of judicial heads a majority of 5 to 4 favoured the R.C.N. But by a majority of 3 to 2 in your Lordships' House the D.H.S.S.. carried the day and obtained the declaration they sought.

Against this background it would have been surprising indeed if the courts had declined jurisdiction. But I think it must be recognised that the decision (whether or not it was so intended) does effect a significant extension of the court's power of judicial review. We must now say that if a government department, in a field of administration in which it exercises responsibility, promulgates in a public document, albeit non-statutory in form, advice which is erroneous in law, then the court, in proceedings in appropriate form commenced by an applicant or plaintiff who possesses the necessary locus standi, has jurisdiction to correct the error of law by an appropriate declaration. Such an extended jurisdiction is no doubt a salutary and indeed a necessary one in certain circumstances, as the Royal College of Nursing case [1981]

A.C. 800 itself well illustrates. But the occasions of a departmental non-statutory publication raising, as in that case, a clearly defined issue of law, unclouded by political, social or moral overtones, will be rare. In cases where any proposition of law implicit in a departmental advisory document is interwoven with questions of social and ethical controversy, the court should, in my opinion, exercise its jurisdiction with the utmost restraint, confine itself to deciding whether the proposition of law is erroneous and avoid either expressing ex cathedra opinions in areas of social and ethical controversy in which it has no claim to speak with authority or preferring answers to hypothetical questions of law which do not strictly arise for decision.

My Lords, the Memorandum, in expressing the view that in exceptional and unusual cases it may be proper for a doctor to offer contraceptive advice and treatment to a girl under 16 without the knowledge or consent of her parent, guardian or other person in loco parentis, implies that the law does not prohibit the doctor from so acting. The exceptional and unusual cases contemplated are clearly not confined to cases of children abandoned by their parents and not yet taken into care by a local authority or to cases of "emergency", whatever meaning one may give to that word in this context. I am content to assume, without deciding, that Mrs. Gillick, in view of her dispute with the health authority, has sufficient locus standi to contest the issue of the lawfulness of the Memorandum. To succeed in her action against the D.H.S.S. she must at least establish that, leaving aside cases of abandoned children or emergencies, the law does absolutely prohibit the prescription of contraception for a girl under 16 without parental consent or an order of the court.

The most direct support for that proposition is to be found in the opinion of my noble and learned friend Lord Brandon of Oakbrook that to prescribe contraception for a girl under 16, with or without parental consent, is either to aid and abet the offence which will be committed by the man with whom she has intercourse, or at least so far to facilitate his criminal conduct as to be contrary to public policy. I appreciate the logical cogency of my noble and learned friend's reasoning, but I cannot agree with his conclusion. With reference to the possible criminal complicity of the doctor I am content gratefully to adopt the relevant passage from the judgment of Woolf J., [1984] 1 Q.B. 581, 593B - 595G, with which I fully agree. On the issue of public policy, it seems to me that the policy consideration underlying the criminal sanction imposed by statute upon men who have intercourse with girls under 16 is the protection of young girls from the untoward consequences of intercourse. Foremost among these must surely be the risk of pregnancy leading either to abortion or the birth of a child to an immature and irresponsible mother. In circumstances where it is apparent that the criminal sanction will not or is unlikely to, afford the necessary protection it cannot, in my opinion, be contrary to public policy to prescribe contraception as the only effective means of avoiding a wholly undesirable pregnancy. On the facts presented to Butler-Sloss J. in the case of In re P. (A Minor) (1981) 80 L.G.R. 301, I think, if I may respectfully say so, that she took an eminently sensible and entirely proper course.

The alternative and more extensively argued ground on which Mrs. Gillick challenges the lawfulness of the Memorandum depends on the two closely related propositions:

1. that no girl under 16 can have the capacity in law to give a valid consent to submit to contraceptive treatment;

2. that the prescription of such treatment without parental consent is an unlawful invasion of parental rights.

Both these propositions are comprehensively examined in the speeches of my noble and learned friends Lord Fraser of Tullybelton and Lord Scarman. I fully agree with the reasons expressed by both my noble and learned friends for reaching the conclusion that neither proposition is well founded in law.

Accordingly I would allow the appeal of the D.H.S.S. to the extent of setting aside the declaration made by the Court of Appeal that the Memorandum was contrary to law.

LORD BRANDON OF OAKBROOK

My Lords,

In this case your Lordships are concerned with the legal aspect of three activities relating to the sexual conduct of girls who are under the age of 16. The first activity is the giving to such girls by professional persons other than doctors (e.g. social workers) of advice about contraception. The second activity is the physical examination of such girls by doctors with a view to their using one or other form of contraception. The third activity is the prescribing for such girls of contraceptive treatment, especially that form which is commonly called "the pill."

The question with regard to these three activities which has been raised in the two courts below, and again in your Lordships' House, is whether such activities can be lawfully carried on without the prior knowledge and consent of the parents of any girl of the age concerned.

In my opinion the formulation of the question for decision in this way involves the rolling up in one composite question of two quite separate and distinct points of law. The first point of law is whether the three activities to which I have referred can be carried on lawfully in any circumstances whatever. If, on the one hand, the right answer to this first point of law is "no", then no second point of law arises for decision. If, on the other hand, the answer to the first question is "yes", then a second point of law arises, namely, whether the three activities referred to can only be lawfully carried on with the prior knowledge and consent of the parents of the girl concerned.

The first point of law appears to me to be one of public policy, the answer to which is to be gathered from an examination of the statutory provisions which Parliament has enacted from time to time in relation to men having sexual intercourse with girls either under the age of 13 or between the ages of 13 to 16.

It is, I think, sufficient to begin with the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885 (48 & 49 Viet. C. 69) and then to go on to the Sexual Offences Act 1956, by which the former Act was repealed and largely replaced.

Part I of the Act of 1885, which contained sections 2-12, had the cross-heading "Protection of Women and Girls." Sections 4 and 5 provided, so far as material:

> "4. Any person who –
>
> unlawfully and carnally knows any girl under the age of 13 years shall be guilty of felony, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be kept in penal servitude for life, or for any term not less than five years, or to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour. . . .
>
>
> 6. unlawfully and carnally knows or attempts to have unlawful carnal knowledge of any girl being of or above the age of 13 years and under the age of 16 years; ...
>
> shall be guilty of a misdemeanour, and being convicted thereof shall be liable at the discretion of the court to be imprisoned for any term not exceeding two years, with or without hard labour. . . ."

In Reg. v. Tyrrell [1894] 1 Q.B. 710 it was held by the Court of Crown Cases Reserved that it was not a criminal offence for a girl between the ages of 13 and 16 to aid and abet a man in committing, or to incite him to commit, the misdemeanour of having carnal knowledge of her contrary to section 5 of the Criminal Law Amendment Act 1885 set out above. The ground of this decision was that the Act of 1885 had been passed for the purpose of protecting women and girls against themselves: see the judgment of Lord Coleridge C.J. at p. 712.

The Sexual Offences Act 1956 represents the latest pronouncement of Parliament on these matters. Sections 5 and 6 provide, so far as material!

> "5. It is a felony for a man to have unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under the age of 13.
> 6. - (i) It is an offence . . . for a man to have unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl not under the age of 13 but under the age of 16."

Further, by section 37 and the Second Schedule, the maximum punishment for an offence under section 5 is imprisonment for life, and that for an offence under section 6 imprisonment for two years. Since the passing of the Act of 1956 the distinction between felonies and misdemeanours has been abolished. For the purposes of this case, however, nothing turns on this change of terminology.

My Lords, the inescapable inference from the statutory provisions of the Acts of 1885 and 1956 to which I have referred is that Parliament has for the past century regarded, and still regards today, sexual intercourse between a man and a girl under 16 as a serious criminal offence so far as the man who has such intercourse is concerned. So far as the girl is concerned, she does not commit any criminal offence, even if she aids, abets or incites the having of such intercourse. The reason for. this, as explained earlier, is that the relevant statutory provisions have been enacted by Parliament for the purpose of protecting the girl from herself. The having of such intercourse is, however, unlawful, and the circumstance that the man is guilty of a criminal offence, while the girl is not, cannot alter that situation.

On the footing that the having of sexual intercourse by a man with a girl under 16 is an unlawful act, it follows necessarily that for any person to promote, encourage or facilitate the commission of such an act may itself be a criminal offence, and must, in any event, be contrary to public policy. Nor can it make any difference that the person who promotes, encourages or facilitates the commission of such an act is a parent or a doctor or a social worker.

The question then arises whether the three activities to which I referred earlier should properly be regarded as, directly or indirectly, promoting, encouraging or facilitating the having, contrary to public policy, of sexual intercourse between a man and a girl under 16. In my opinion there can be only one answer to this question, namely, that to give such a girl advice about contraception, to examine her with a view to her using one or more forms of protection, and finally to prescribe contraceptive treatment for her, necessarily involves promoting, encouraging or facilitating the having of sexual intercourse, contrary to public policy, by that girl with a man.

The inhibitions against the having of sexual intercourse between a man and a girl under 16 are primarily two-fold. So far as the man is concerned there is the inhibition of the criminal law as contained in sections 5 and 6 of the Act of 1956. So far as both are concerned there is the inhibition arising from the risk of an unwanted pregnancy. To give the girl contraceptive treatment, following appropriate advice and examination, is to remove largely the second of these two inhibitions. Such removal must involve promoting, encouraging or facilitating the having of sexual intercourse between the girl and the man.

It has been argued that some girls under 16 will have sexual intercourse with a man whether contraceptive treatment is made available to them or not, and that the provision of such treatment does not, therefore, promote, encourage or facilitate the having of such intercourse. In my opinion this argument should be rejected for two quite separate reasons. The first reason is that the mere fact that a girl under 16 seeks contraceptive advice and treatment, whether of her own accord or at the suggestion of others, itself indicates that she, and probably also the man with whom she is having, or contemplating having, sexual intercourse, are conscious of the inhibition arising from the risk of an unwanted pregnancy. They are conscious of it and are more likely to indulge their desires if it can be removed. The second reason is that, if all a girl under 16 needs to do in order to obtain contraceptive treatment is to threaten that she will go ahead with, or continue, unlawful sexual intercourse with a man unless she is given such treatment, a situation tantamount to blackmail will arise which no legal system ought to tolerate. The only answer which the law should give to such a threat is "wait till you are 16."

The D.H.S.S. has contended that section 5(1) of the National Health Service Act 1977 imposes on it a statutory duty to carry out, in relation to girls under 16 as well as to older girls or women, the three activities to which I referred earlier. That provision reads:

> "5. - (1) It is the Secretary of State's duty - . . .
> > (b) to arrange, to such extent as he considers necessary to meet all reasonable requirements in England and Wales, for the giving of advice on contraception, the medical examination of persons seeking advice on contraception, the treatment of such persons and the supply of contraceptive substances and appliances."

This provision does not define the "persons" who are the subject-matter of it, nor is there any definition of that expression anywhere else in the Act. In these circumstances it seems to me that a court, in interpreting the provision, must do so in a way which conforms with considerations of public policy rather than in a way which conflicts with them. For the reasons which I have given earlier, I am of the opinion that, in the case of girls under 16, the giving of advice about contraception, medical examination with a view to the use of one or other form of contraception, and the prescribing of contraceptive treatment, are all contrary to public policy. It follows that I would interpret the expression "persons" in section 5(1)(b) above as not including girls under 16. Alternatively I would say that the expression "all reasonable retirements", which occurs earlier in the provision, cannot be interpreted as including the requirements of a girl under 16 which, if satisfied, will promote, encourage or facilitate unlawful acts of sexual intercourse between a man and her.

My Lords, reference was made in the course of the argument before you to a decision of Butler-Sloss J. in In re P (A Minor) 80 L.G.R. 301. In that case the learned judge, in wardship proceedings, ordered that a girl of 15, who had been pregnant for the second time and was in the care of a local authority, should be fitted with a contraceptive appliance because it appeared that it was impossible for the local authority, in whose care she was, to control her sexual conduct. It was contended that this decision was authority for the proposition that, in wardship proceedings at any rate, an order could lawfully be made for the supply and fitting of a contraceptive appliance to a girl under 16.

I do not know what arguments were or were not addressed to Butler-Sloss J. in that case, and it is, in any event, unnecessary for your Lordships to decide in these proceedings the limits of the powers of a court exercising wardship jurisdiction. As at present advised, however, I am of opinion, with great respect to Butler-Sloss 3., that the order which she made was not one which she could lawfully make.

My Lords, great play was made in the argument before you of the disastrous consequences for a girl under 16 of becoming pregnant as a result of her willingly having unlawful sexual intercourse with a man. I am fully conscious of these considerations, but I do not consider that, if the views which I have so far expressed are right in law, those considerations can alter the position.

It is sometimes said that the age of consent for girls is presently 16. This is, however, an inaccurate way of putting the matter, since, if a man has sexual intercourse with a girl under 16 without her consent, the crime which he thereby commits is that of rape. The right way to put the matter is that 16 is the age of a girl below which a man cannot lawfully have sexual intercourse with her. It was open to Parliament in 1956, when the Sexual Offences Act of that year was passed, and it has remained open to Parliament throughout the 29 years which have since elapsed, to pass legislation providing for some lower age than 16, if it thought fit to do so. Parliament has not thought fit to do so, and I do not consider that it would be right for your Lordships' House, by-holding that girls under 16 can lawfully be provided with contraceptive facilities, to undermine or circumvent the criminal law which Parliament has enacted. The criminal law and the civil law should, as it seems to me, march hand in hand on all issues, including that raised in this case, and to allow inconsistency or contradiction between them would, in my view, serve only to discredit the rule of law as a whole.

Since I am of opinion that the first question which I posed earlier, namely, whether the provision of contraceptive facilities to girls under 16 was lawful in any circumstances at all, should be answered in the negative, the second question which I posed relating to the need for prior parental knowledge and consent, does not arise. This is because, on the view which I take of the law, making contraception available to girls under 16" is unlawful, whether their parents know of and consent to it or not.

My Lords, it remains for me to indicate what order I Consider that the House should make on this appeal. With regard to the first declaration made by the Court of Appeal, I would uphold it, albeit on grounds wider than those on which it was founded in that court. With regard to the second declaration, there is no appeal against it and I would uphold it also, although, for the reasons which I have given, I regard the four lines which follow the words "the age of 16" as surplusage.

In the result, I would dismiss the appeal of the D.H.S.S. with costs.

LORD TEMPLEMAN

My Lords,

This appeal involves consideration of the independence of a teenager, the powers of a parent and the duties of a doctor. The question is, who has the right to decide whether an unmarried girl under the age of 16 may practise contraception?

An unmarried girl under the age of 16 does not, in my opinion, possess the power in law to decide for herself to practise contraception. Section 6 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 makes it an offence for a man to have unlawful sexual intercourse with a girl under the age of 16. Consent by the girl does not afford a defence to the man or constitute an offence by the girl. Parliament has thus indicated that an unmarried girl under the age of 16 is not sufficiently mature to be allowed to decide for herself that she will take part in sexual intercourse. Such a girl cannot therefore be regarded as sufficiently mature to be allowed to decide for herself that she will practise contraception for the purpose of frequent or regular or casual sexual intercourse. Section 6 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 does not, however, in my view, prevent parent and doctor from deciding that contraceptive facilities shall be made available to an unmarried girl under the age of 16 whose sexual activities are recognised to be uncontrolled and uncontrollable. Section 6 is designed to protect the girl from sexual intercourse. But if the girl cannot be deterred then contraceptive facilities may be provided, not for the purpose of aiding and abetting an offence under Section 6 but for the purpose of avoiding the consequences, principally pregnancy, which the girl may suffer from illegal sexual intercourse where sexual intercourse cannot be prevented. In general, where parent and doctor agree that any form of treatment, including contraceptive treatment, is in the best interests of the girl, there is, in my opinion, no legal bar to that treatment.

Difficulties arise when parent and doctor differ. The parent, claiming the right to decide what is in the best interests of a girl in the custody of that parent may forbid the -provision of contraceptive facilities. A doctor, claiming the right to decide what is in the best interests of a patient, may wish to override the parent's objections. A conflict which is express may be resolved by the court which may accept the view of either parent or doctor or modify the views of both of them as to what is in the best interests of the girl. The present appeal is concerned with a conflict which is known to the doctor but is concealed from the parent and from the court. The girl, aware that the parent will forbid contraception, requests the doctor to provide and the doctor agrees to provide contraceptive facilities and to keep the parent in ignorance.

A parent is the natural and legal guardian of an infant under the age of 18 and is responsible for the upbringing of an infant who is in the custody of that parent. The practical exercise of parental powers varies from control and supervision to guidance and advice depending on the discipline enforced by the parent and the age and temperament of the infant. Parental power must be exercised in the best interests of the infant and the court may intervene in the interests of the infant at the behest of the parent or at the behest of a third party. The court may enforce parental right, control the misuse of parental power or uphold independent views asserted by the infant. The court will be guided by the principle that the welfare of the infant is paramount. But subject to the discretion of the court to differ from the views of the parent, the court will, in my opinion, uphold the right of the parent having custody of the infant to decide on behalf of the infant all matters which the infant is not competent to decide. The prudent parent will pay attention to the wishes of the infant and will normally accept them as the infant approaches adulthood. The parent is not bound by the infant's wishes, but an infant approaching adulthood may be able to flout the wishes of the parent with ease.

A doctor tenders advice and offers treatment which the doctor considers to be in the best interests of the patient. A patient is free to reject the advice and refuse the treatment; Sidaway v. Board of Governors of the Bethlem Royal Hospital and the Maudsley Hospital [1985] 2 W.L.R. 480, 508. Where the patient is an infant, the medical profession accept that a parent having custody and being responsible for the infant is entitled on behalf of the infant to consent to or reject treatment if the parent considers that the best interests of the infant so require. Where doctor and parent disagree, the court can decide and is not slow to act. I accept that if there is no time to obtain a decision from the court, a doctor may safely carry out treatment in an emergency if the doctor believes the treatment to be vital to the survival or health of an infant and notwithstanding the opposition of a parent or the impossibility of alerting the parent before the treatment is carried out. In such a case the doctor must have the courage of his convictions that the treatment is necessary and urgent in the interests of the patient and the court will, if necessary, approve after the event treatment which the court would have authorised in advance, even if the treatment proves to be unsuccessful.

I accept also that a doctor may lawfully carry out some forms of treatment with the consent of an infant patient and against the opposition of a parent based on religious or any other grounds. The effect of the consent of the infant depends on the nature of the treatment and the age and understanding of the infant. For example, a doctor with the consent of an intelligent boy or girl of 15 could in my opinion safely remove tonsils or a troublesome appendix. But any decision on the part of a girl to practise sex and contraception requires not only knowledge of the facts of life and of the dangers of pregnancy and disease but also an understanding of the emotional and other consequences to her family, her male partner and to herself. I doubt whether a girl under the age of 16 is capable of a balanced judgment to embark on frequent, regular or casual sexual intercourse fortified by the illusion that medical science can protect her in mind and body and ignoring the danger of leaping from childhood to adulthood without the difficult formative transitional experiences of adolescence. There are many things which a girl under 16 needs to practise but sex is not one of them. Parliament could declare this view to be out of date. But in my opinion the statutory provisions discussed in the speech of noble and learned friend Lord Fraser of Tullybelton, and the provisions of section 6 of the Sexual Offences Act 1956 indicate that as the law now stands an unmarried girl under 16 is not competent to decide to practise sex and contraception.

In the present case it is submitted that a doctor may lawfully make a decision on behalf of the girl and in so doing may overrule or ignore the parent who has custody of the girl. It is submitted that a doctor may at the request of a girl under 16 provide contraceptive facilities against the known or assumed wishes of the parent and on terms that the parent shall be kept in ignorance of the treatment. The justification is advanced that if the girl's request is not met, the girl may persist in sexual intercourse and run the risk of pregnancy. It is not in the interests of a girl under 16 to become pregnant and therefore the doctor may, in her interests, confidentially provide contraceptive facilities unless the doctor can persuade the girl to abstain from sexual intercourse or can persuade her to ensure that precautions are taken by the male participant. The doctor is not bound to provide contraceptive facilities but, it is said, is entitled to do so in the best interests of the girl. The girl must be assured that the doctor will be pledged to secrecy otherwise the girl may .not seek advice or treatment but will run all the risks of disease and pregnancy involved in sexual activities without adequate knowledge or mature consideration and preparation. The D.H.S.S.

memorandum instructs a doctor to seek to persuade the girl to involve the parent but concludes that "the decision whether or not to prescribe contraception must be for the clinical judgment of a doctor."

There are several objections to this approach. The first objection is that a doctor, acting without the views of the parent, cannot form a "clinical" or any other reliable judgment that the best interests of the girl require the provision of contraceptive facilities. The doctor at the family planning clinic only knows that which the girl chooses to tell him. The family doctor may know some of the circumstances of some of the families who form his registered patients but his information may be incomplete or misleading. The doctor who provides contraceptive facilities without the knowledge of the parent deprives the parent of the opportunity to protect the girl from sexual intercourse by persuading and helping her to avoid sexual intercourse or by the exercise of parental power which may prevent sexual intercourse. The parent might be able to bring pressure on a male participant to desist from the commission of the offence of sexual intercourse with a girl under 16. The parent might be able and willing to exercise parental power by removing the family or the girl to a different neighbourhood and environment and away from the danger of sexual intercourse.

The second objection is that a parent will sooner or later find out the truth, probably sooner, and may do so in circumstances which bring about a complete rupture of good relations between members of the family and between the family and the doctor. It is inevitable that when the parent discovers that the girl is practising sexual intercourse, the girl will in self justification and in an attempt to reassure the parent reveal that she is relying on contraceptive facilities provided by the doctor in order to avoid pregnancy. The girl and the doctor will be the loser by this revelation.

The third and main objection advanced on behalf of the respondent parent, Mrs. Gillick, in this appeal is that the secret provision of contraceptive facilities for a girl under 16 will, it is said, encourage participation by the girl in sexual intercourse and this practice offends basic principles of morality and religion which ought not to be sabotaged in stealth by kind permission of the National Health Service. The interests of a girl under 16 require her to be protected against sexual intercourse. Such a girl is not sufficiently mature to be allowed to decide to flout the accepted rules of society. The pornographic press and the lascivious film may falsely pretend that sexual intercourse is a form of entertainment available to females on request and to males on demand but the regular frequent or casual practice of sexual intercourse by a girl or a boy under the age of 16 cannot be beneficial to anybody and may cause harm to character and personality. Before a girl under 16 is supplied with contraceptive facilities, the parent who knows most about the girl and ought to have the most influence with the girl is entitled to exercise parental rights of control, supervision, guidance and advice in order that the girl may, if possible, avoid sexual intercourse until she is older. Contraception should only be considered if and when the combined efforts of parent and doctor fail to prevent the girl from participating in sexual intercourse and there remains only the possibility of protecting the girl against pregnancy resulting from sexual intercourse.

These arguments have provoked great controversy which is not legal in character. Some doctors approve and some doctors disapprove of the idea that a doctor may decide to provide contraception for a girl under 16 without the knowledge of the parent. Some parents agree and some parents disagree with the proposition that the decision must depend on the judgment of the doctor. Those who favour doctor power assert that the failure to provide confidential contraceptive treatment will lead to an increase in pregnancies amongst girls under 16. As a general proposition, this assertion is not supported by evidence in this case, is not susceptible to proof and in my opinion is of doubtful validity. Availability of confidential contraceptive treatment may increase the demand for such treatment. Contraceptive treatment for females usually requires daily discipline in order to be effective and girls under 16 frequently lack that discipline. The total number of pregnancies amongst girls of under 16 may, therefore, be increased and not decreased by the availability of contraceptive treatment. But there is no doubt that an individual girl who is denied the opportunity of confidential contraceptive treatment may invite or succumb to sexual intercourse and thereby become pregnant. Those who favour parental power assert that the availability of confidential contraceptive treatment will increase sexual activity by girls under 16. This argument is also not supported by evidence in the present case, and is not susceptible to proof. But it is clear that contraception removes or gives an illusion of removing the possibility of pregnancy and therefore removes restraint on sexual intercourse. Some girls would come under pressure if contraceptive facilities were known to be available and some girls under 16 are susceptible to male domination.

Parliament could decide whether it is better to have more contraception with the possibility of fewer pregnancies and less disease or whether it is better to have less contraception with the possibility of reduced sexual activity by girls under 16. Parliament could ensure that the doctor prevailed over the parent by reducing the age of consent or by expressly authorising a doctor to provide contraceptive facilities for any girl without informing the parent, provided the doctor considered that his actions were for the benefit of the girl. Parliament could, on the other hand, ensure that the parent prevailed over the doctor by forbidding contraceptive treatment for a girl under 16 save by or on the recommendation of the girl's general medical practitioner and with the consent of the parent who has registered the girl as a patient of that general practitioner. Some girls, it is said, might pretend to be over 16 but a doctor in doubt could always require confirmation from the girl's registered medical practitioner.

This appeal falls to be determined by the existing law. No authority has been cited which prevents an infant from seeking medical or any other advice or which forbids a doctor to advise an infant who has not been tendered by the parent as a patient. No authority compels a doctor to disclose to a parent, otherwise than in the course of litigation, any information obtained as a result of a conversation between the doctor and the infant. On the other hand, in my opinion, confidentiality owed to an infant is not breached by disclosure to a parent responsible for that infant if the doctor considers that such disclosure is necessary in the interests of the infant. A doctor who gave a pledge to a girl under 16 that he would not disclose the fact or content of a conversation would no doubt honour that pledge, but the doctor ought to hesitate before committing himself. A doctor who gave an unconditional pledge of confidentiality to a girl under 16 would, for example, be in a difficult position if the girl then disclosed information which made the doctor suspect that she was being introduced to sexual intercourse by a man who was also introducing her to drugs.

Although a doctor is entitled to give confidential advice to an infant, the law will, in my opinion, uphold the right of a parent to make a decision which the infant is not competent to make. The decision to authorise and accept medical examination and treatment for contraception is a decision which a girl under 16 is not competent to make. In my opinion a doctor may not lawfully provide a girl under 16 with contraceptive facilities without the approval of the parent responsible for the girl save pursuant to a court order, or in the case of emergency or in exceptional cases where the parent has abandoned or forfeited by abuse the right to be consulted. Parental rights cannot be insisted upon by a parent who is not responsible for the custody and upbringing of a infant or where the parent has abandoned or abused parental rights. And a doctor is not obliged to give effect to parental rights in an emergency.

A girl under 16 is usually living with a parent and is usually attending school. It is sufficient for the doctor to obtain the consent of the parent or guardian with whom the girl is living. It seems to me to be contrary to law and offensive to professional standards that a doctor should provide contraceptive facilities against the known or presumed wishes of such a parent and that the doctor should conspire with the girl to keep the parent in ignorance of the fact that the girl intends to participate in frequent, regular or casual sexual intercourse in the belief that the only bar to sexual intercourse is the risk of pregnancy and in complacent reliance on the doctor's contraceptive facilities to obviate that risk.

But parental rights may have been abandoned. If the doctor discovers, for example, that the girl is not living with a parent but has been allowed to live in an environment in which the danger of sexual intercourse is pressing, the doctor may lawfully provide facilities for contraception until the parent has been alerted to the danger and has been afforded the opportunity to reassert parental rights and to protect the girl by means other than contraception. The court will uphold the doctor's actions if the doctor reasonably believes that parental rights have, for the time being at any rate, been abandoned.

Parental rights may have been abused. The dangers of sexual intercourse may emanate from the girl's home. The doctor would be entitled to provide the girl with contraceptive facilities but would then be bound to consider whether the local welfare authorities should be alerted to the possibility that the girl is in need of care and protection. Again, the doctor may be satisfied that the parent is a brute and that the girl has been driven to seek solace outside the family. The doctor might decide that it was necessary to provide contraceptive facilities for the girl without informing the parent but the doctor would be bound to consider the possible consequences if the parent, known to be brutal, discovered the truth.

The doctor may also be faced with circumstances which could properly be described as a medical emergency. The doctor may decide that the girl is unable to control her sexual appetite or is acting under an influence which cannot be counteracted immediately. The doctor would be entitled to provide contraceptive facilities as a temporary measure but would, in my opinion, be bound to inform the parent. A subsequent decision to continue contraceptive treatment would be open to the doctor and the parent acting jointly; in default of agreement between them, the welfare authority or the court could be asked to intervene.

There may be other exceptional circumstances and emergencies which would impel the doctor to provide contraceptive facilities without the prior consent of the parent but in most cases the doctor would be bound to inform the parent as soon as possible in order that the parent might have the opportunity of exercising parental rights in such manner as to deter or prevent the girl from indulging in sexual intercourse.

The position seems to me to be as follows. A doctor is not entitled to decide whether a girl under the age of 16 shall be provided with contraceptive facilities if a parent who is in charge of the girl is ready and willing to make that decision in exercise of parental rights. The doctor is entitled in exceptional circumstances and in emergencies to make provision, normally temporary provision, for contraception but in most cases would be bound to inform the parent of the treatment. The court would not hold the doctor liable for providing contraceptive facilities if the doctor had reasonable grounds for believing that the parent had abandoned or abused parental rights or that there was no parent immediately available for consultation or that there was no parent who was responsible for the girl. But exceptional circumstances and emergencies cannot be expanded into a general discretion for the doctor to provide contraceptive facilities without the knowledge of the parent because of the possibility that a girl to whom contraceptive facilities are not available may irresponsibly court the risk of pregnancy. Such a discretion would enable any girl to obtain contraception on request by threatening to sleep with a man.

In the present state of the law the D.H.S.S. memorandum appears to me to be defective. The principal defect lies. in the assertion that "the decision whether or not to prescribe contraception must be for the clinical judgment of a doctor." In my opinion a decision by a doctor to provide contraceptive facilities for an unmarried girl of 16 against the known or presumed wishes of a parent who has custody of the girl and without the knowledge, of the parent would constitute an unlawful interference with the rights of the parent, subject to the intervention of the court, to make that decision on behalf of the girl and an unlawful interference with the right of the parent to influence the conduct of the girl by the exercise of parental powers of control, guidance and advice.

There are two further defects. The memorandum asserts "that consultations between doctors and patients are confidential" without making any distinction between adult patients and infant patients. The memorandum also suggests that doctors should consider providing contraceptive facilities without the knowledge of the parent where "parents are, for example, unconcerned, entirely unresponsive or grossly disturbed." Of course a doctor must protect a girl against a parent who is grossly disturbed although the doctor must also consider the possible consequences if such a parent discovers that the daughter has been practising sexual intercourse with the ostensible approval of the doctor manifested by the secret supply of contraceptives. And if it is plain that the parent is "unconcerned" in the sense that parental control has been abandoned, then the provision of contraceptive facilities without the prior knowledge of the parent would be lawful. But any girl who is anxious to practise sexual intercourse may plausibly represent that the parent is "entirely unresponsive." On behalf of Mrs. Gillick it was urged with some force that the practical effect of the memorandum couched in this opaque language was to enable an inexperienced doctor in a family planning clinic, exuding sympathy and veiled in ignorance of the girl's personality and history, to provide contraceptives as if they were sweets withheld from a deprived child by an unfeeling parent; and that any parent who was concerned with the girl's immortal soul or with moral or religious principles might be said to be "entirely unresponsive" to a proposal that an unmarried girl under the age of 16 should be provided with contraceptives. As the memorandum now stands, a "clinical judgment" by the doctor may amount to no more than a belief that a parent will not consent to contraception and a fear that the girl may practise sex without contraception.

These defects in the memorandum constitute in my opinion a mistake of law on the part of the D.H.S.S. The memorandum assumes and asserts that the doctor is entitled by himself to decide whether an unmarried girl under the age of 16 shall be provided with contraceptive facilities and that the doctor is entitled to conceal that decision from the parent. In my opinion the decision cannot lawfully be made without the consent of the parent in charge of the girl unless the parent has abandoned or abused parental powers or is not available. If the memorandum is defective by reason of a mistake of law and if, in consequence, a doctor making a decision in reliance on the views, expressed in the memorandum may unlawfully interfere with the rights of a parent and make and act upon a decision which the doctor is in law not entitled to make, then in my opinion, the D.H.S.S. which is responsible for the memorandum is amenable to the remedies of judicial review. It matters not whether the memorandum constitutes an order or guidance or advice or a mere expression of views directed to the medical profession or directed to doctors who are engaged in the National Health Service. The issue is not whether the D.H.S.S. are exercising a statutory discretion in a reasonable way but whether by mistake of law the D.H.S.S., a public authority, purports by the memorandum to authorise or approve an unlawful interference with parental rights. In this respect I gratefully acknowledge and accept the observations of my noble and learned friend, Lord Bridge of Harwich, and his warning against the involvement of the courts in areas of social and ethical controversy or hypothetical questions. Nevertheless the questions raised by this appeal must now be answered and, differing from a majority of your Lordships, I consider that Mrs. Gillick has succeeded in her crusade and is entitled in judicial review proceedings to a declaration that the memorandum is unlawful insofar as it purports to authorise or approve of the provision of contraceptive facilities for an unmarried girl under the age of 16 without the knowledge of a parent who holds custody of the girl and has not abandoned or abused the parental right to decide whether such facilities shall be provided. The danger that other parents or individuals may exploit judicial review proceedings by referring social problems to the courts or by seeking general pronouncements of law based on hypothetical facts can be averted by the exercise of the judicial, discretion to refuse leave to prosecute judicial review proceedings. In the present case the proceedings are not in form judicial review proceedings but at this stage the technicality can be ignored because the legal issues raised in these proceedings cannot be allowed to remain unanswered. I would therefore grant the relief I have indicated in substitution for the declarations made by the Court of Appeal and I would order Mrs. Gillick's costs to be paid by the D.H.S.S.

My Lords, in this appeal social issues are entangled with legal issues. In my view the law is consistent with social policy in forbidding the provision of contraceptive facilities for young girls who are under the' care and protection of a parent without the involvement of the parent. But social issues need not finally be determined and are not best determined by lawyers or by doctors.

HOUSE OF LORDS

IN RE EVANS (A.P.)

Lord Chancellor
Lord Fraser of Tullybelton
Lord Roskill
Lord Bridge of Harwich
Lord Brightman

Lord Hailsham of St. Marylebone

My Lords,

The analysis of the facts and argument contained in the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Brightman, which I have read in draft, relieve me of much of the labour in this case, and enable me to reduce the few observations I wish to make to reasonably concise proportions. I desire, however, to say at the outset that I agree with every word which is about to fall from my noble and learned friend as to the treatment to which this young respondent has been subjected by the appellant. Like my noble and learned friend, I do not doubt the appellant's good faith, but in the result, partly as the result of muddle, partly as the result of a false view of the law, and partly as the result of a disregard of the elementary principles of natural justice, I regard the treatment meted out to this young man as little short of outrageous.

Briefly, the proceedings originated in an application by the respondent for judicial review under R.S.C. Or. 53 of a decision by the appellant (then Chief Constable of the Police Force of North Wales) whereby in November 1978 he had given the respondent, at that time a probationary constable, the option of resignation from office or dismissal on a month's notice under Regulation 16 of the relevant Regulations. In the event, the respondent had chosen resignation, but had sought relief under R.S.C. Or. 53 on the basis that he had been treated unfairly and in a manner contrary to natural justice.

The first observation I wish to make is by way of criticism of some remarks of the learned Master of the Rolls which seem to me capable of an erroneous construction of the purpose of the remedy by way of judicial review under R.S.C. Or. 53. This remedy, vastly increased in extent, and rendered, over a long period in recent years, of infinitely more convenient access than that provided by the old prerogative writs and actions for a declaration, is intended to protect the individual against the abuse of power by a wide range of authorities, judicial, quasi judicial, and, as would originally have been thought when I first practised at the Bar, administrative. It is not intended to take away from those authorities the powers and discretions properly vested in them by law and to substitute the courts as the bodies making the decisions. It is intended to see that the relevant authorities use their powers in a proper manner.

Since the range of authorities, and the circumstances of the use of their power, are almost infinitely various, it is of course unwise to lay down rules for the application of the remedy which appear to be of universal validity in every type of case. But it is important to remember in every case that the purpose of the remedies is to ensure that the individual is given fair treatment by the authority to which he has been subjected and that it is no part of that purpose to substitute the opinion of the judiciary or of individual judges for that of the authority constituted by law to decide the matters in question. The function of the court is to see that lawful authority is not abused by unfair treatment and not to attempt itself the task entrusted to that authority by the law. There are passages in the judgment of the learned Master of the Rolls (and perhaps in the other judgments of the Court of Appeal) in the instant case and quoted by my noble and learned friend which might be read as giving the courts carte blanche to review the decision of the authority on the basis of what the courts themselves consider fair and reasonable on the merits. I am not sure whether the Master of the Rolls really intended his remarks to be construed in such a way as to permit the court to examine, as for instance in the present case, the reasoning of the subordinate authority with a view to substituting its own opinion. If so, I do not think this is a correct statement of principle. The purpose of judicial review is to ensure that the individual receives fair treatment, and not to ensure that the authority, after according fair treatment, reaches on a matter which it is authorised or enjoined by law to decide for itself a conclusion which is correct in the eyes of the court.

In the instant case I have no doubt that the respondent was not treated fairly by the appellant. In the first place by his own affidavit the appellant establishes that he asked himself the wrong question, and, once this has been established, for the purposes of judicial review, that by itself is surely enough to vitiate an impugned decision which is not otherwise self-evidently justified. The relevant Regulation enjoined the appellant to consider whether the respondent was " fitted physically or mentally to perform the duties of his " office " or was likely to " become an efficient or well-conducted constable " before dispensing with his services. In his affidavit the appellant claimed that this Regulation " gives me an absolute discretion to dispense with a " probationer's services ". In my opinion the discretion, although wide, is not absolute. The Chief Constable should have directed his mind to the criteria laid down in the Regulation in accordance with the appropriate principles of natural justice. He did not do so, and I think it only too likely that it was precisely the belief that his discretion was absolute which led to the cavalier treatment to which, in the event, the respondent was subjected.

To this treatment I now come. Once it is established as was conceded here, that the office held by the appellant was of the third class enumerated by Lord Reid in Ridge v. Baldwin [1964] A.C. 40 at p.66, it becomes clear, quoting Lord Reid (ibid), that there is " an unbroken line of authority to the effect " that an officer cannot lawfully be dismissed without first telling him what is " alleged against him and hearing his defence or explanation ". I regard this rule as fundamental in cases of this kind when deprivation of office is in question. I agree with the appellant's affidavit that " a formal hearing " may well be unnecessary if by that is meant an oral hearing in every case held before the Chief Constable himself. But this does not dispense a Chief Constable from observing the rule laid down by Lord Reid. It may well be also that part or all of the enquiry on the facts may be delegated to a subordinate official, as was done here by the appellant to the Deputy Chief Constable, though, where this is done, the ultimate decision must not be delegated, and in my view, common prudence should dictate that the report by the delegated officer, in this case the Deputy Chief Constable, or at least its substance, should be shown to the officer the subject of review and an opportunity afforded him to comment on it before the final decision is taken by the Chief Constable himself. This was not done here. Moreover, where there has been delegation, the delegated enquiry itself must be conducted in accordance with Lord Reid's rule, and, where it is not, the ultimate decision, even if not delegated, will almost certainly be vitiated.

Apart from his self misdirection on the scope of his discretion, in the present case the appellant clearly admitted in his affidavit that he had taken into account matters concerning the domestic life of the respondent, some of which, if properly put to the respondent, might perhaps, after his explanation had been given and heard, have influenced the decision as to whether the respondent was likely to become an efficient or well-conducted constable. But some of the allegations were plainly erroneous and none, whether erroneous or otherwise, was ever put to the respondent at all in connexion with the relevant enquiry, whether at the delegated hearing or otherwise. Moreover, it was conceded by the appellant's counsel that, at the time of the extremely brief interview at which the decision was made by the appellant, the appellant had already made up his mind to dispense with the respondent's services on the basis of the report made to him by the Deputy Chief Constable, and the respondent was given no chance to say anything by way of denial of the facts alleged in the report or in mitigation of them.

As an example of the extreme danger of proceeding in this way, it must be observed, that, as one of the two clinching matters which seem to have influenced him, the appellant says in his affidavit: " Further, it became known " (sic) to Senior Officers that the applicant and his wife had lived a ' hippy '

" type lifestyle at Tyddyn Mynyddig Farm, Bangor ". This had never been put to the respondent at all, and had the appellant or his deputy to whom he delegated the enquiry taken the trouble to ask the respondent about it, he would have discovered at once that this allegedly clinching allegation was palpably untrue, and simply the result of a mistaken address. It was, in short, an utterly incorrect statement relied upon precisely owing to the failure of natural justice of which complaint is made.

There is room for greater controversy regarding the other matter supposedly clinching. There was a finding by the deputy who conducted the enquiry that the respondent had " deliberately flouted " the conditions of tenancy at his council house by keeping dogs in excess of the number permitted by the council and that this exhibited an attitude to authority improper in a member of the police force. This matter had indeed been put to the respondent in some form, but there is a conflict of evidence relating to the interview, of which only the respondent's version is on oath. Without seeking to resolve this conflict, I am of the opinion that natural justice required that it should have been put precisely to the respondent that exact compliance with the conditions of tenancy within the extended time permitted by the council, which at the time of the interview had not yet expired, would probably be a condition of his continuance in office as a probationary constable. It is clear that this was not done and it is fair to the respondent to say that he deposed on oath that, had it been put in this way, " I would have disposed of the dogs ". Without going into this conclusively, I must express doubt whether, on a fair view of the evidence, the appellant, had he applied his mind at all to the correct criteria, or to the evidence available to him in his file, or had he given the respondent a chance to speak, could possibly have come to the conclusion that the facts relating to this aspect of the matter betrayed an attitude to authority inconsistent with the view that he could at the conclusion of his probationary period become an efficient or well-conducted constable, or that the respondent was in any sense deliberately flouting authority. However this may be, the decision of the appellant was, it seems to me, vitiated beyond repair partly by the fact that the appellant does not appear to have directed his mind to the correct criteria laid down in the Regulations, and partly by the fact that he certainly took into account matters which were never put to the respondent in connexion with the relevant enquiry, one of which, and not the least important, had it been put, would have been immediately exposed as nonsense.

Like my noble and learned friend, I find much more difficulty in deciding the order which it is appropriate for the House to make in a case such as the present. In Ridge v. Baldwin (supra), a majority of the House, in not dissimilar circumstances, granted a declaration that the decision of the Chief Constable was " void ". This was the language adopted by the Court of Appeal in the instant case. Personally, I find difficulty in applying the language of " void " and " voidable " (appropriate enough in situations of contract or of alleged nullity of marriage) to administrative decisions which give rise to practical and legal consequences which cannot be reversed. Under pressure, which I have considered to be inappropriate and unfair, the respondent, nearly four years ago, was compelled to resign as an alternative to dismissal from office. That was in November 1978. He was then a probationary constable with ten months of service to run. I am inclined to think that his decision, though made under duress, to pursue the option of resignation did put an end to the tenure of his office as constable. If so, a declaration simply to declare void the decision of the appellant to offer the respondent a Hobson's choice between resignation and dismissal is a mere brutum fulmen without practical consequences. This may be illustrated by asking a number of quasi rhetorical questions. If the decision was " void ", has the respondent been a constable in the police force in North Wales in the intervening four years and what has happened to the ten months of uncompleted probationary service? Since the only decision removing him from office was the decision now impugned has he now become an established constable? Has he acquired pension rights? Is he entitled to back pay? The respondent has moved house. We are told that he has found other, though less rewarding, employment in the Civil Service. Can we simply put the clock back as if nothing has taken place? Presumably the respondent has lost much of his training and experience. If he returned, and if he is still a probationary constable, he would still be subject to Regulation 16 and the possibility, after a fair enquiry, of dismissal on a month's notice. It might well be thought that after what has happened it might be considered by the new Chief Constable that the respondent could not become an efficient constable or at least not without further training. His counsel said that, if reinstated, he would apply for a transfer to another force. But what possible guarantee have we that another force would now have him, or that the transfer would be in the public interest if it did ? These would be matters for the relevant authority. The respondent has not sought damages, which, in my view, might well have proved substantial, and, though the appellant stated to us that he would be prepared to pay compensation if the appeal went against him on the merits, even in the face of this, through his counsel, the respondent firmly stated that he was not interested in money and simply wanted " reinstatement " whatever that might mean. This problem did not arise in Ridge v. Baldwin where the Chief Constable did not seek reinstatement, and was content with a declaration and his pension rights.

Are we then to leave the respondent wholly without remedy without spelling out the consequences ? In that case, the order of the Court of Appeal stands and the decision of the Chief Constable is declared " void " without spelling out what this means. It would be possible, of course, simply to quash the decision of the appellant as in the old writ of certiorari. But this, too, would leave the parties without a clue as to their present position or any direction as to their future conduct. But what the respondent wishes is reinstatement. There is no cross appeal, but it must be within the power of your Lordships' House to vary the order of the Court of Appeal. My own belief is that this would have been pre-eminently a case which would have been dealt with most effectively either by re-engagement perhaps on a fresh term, which the appellant does not offer, or by substantial monetary compensation for which the respondent does not ask. Your Lordships' House is therefore put in a position in which it is compelled to make an order within the limits of the powers given the court by R.S.C. Or. 53 which must in any circumstances be less than satisfactory. I must confess to surprise, and, even to some degree of indignation, that, despite the offer of compensation should the tide of argument go against him, the appellant gave no instructions to counsel to tender to the respondent the smallest expression of regret at the really extraordinary treatment meted out to him or even the most qualified offer of re-engagement in the face of the respondent's persistent desire to rejoin the force (described in much greater detail and with great restraint by my noble and learned friend). As it is, the order of the Court of Appeal cannot stand unaltered, and the best that your Lordships' House can properly do for the respondent is the course proposed by my noble and learned friend with which I now concur. Happily, the Appeal Committee, as a condition of giving leave to appeal, directed that the appellant bear the respondent's costs of the appeal in any event.

Lord Fraser of Tullybelton

My Lords,

I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Brightman, and I agree with it.

I wish to emphasize that the only matter which I am deciding is that the process by which the Chief Constable reached his decision in this case was unfair in respect that the respondent was never told the reasons why his dismissal was being considered, and that he was given no opportunity of making an explanation about the matters of complaint against him. I am far from saying that, if the procedure had been fair, the Chief Constable would not have been entitled to reach the decision that he did. Whether the decision itself was fair and reasonable is not a matter that can be raised in the present proceedings, but, having regard to the criticisms of the Chief Constable's decision made by the Court of Appeal, I think it is only right to say that if he had decided, after hearing the respondent's explanations, that the respondent's conduct in marrying a woman who had been living in the same house as him on the footing that she was his aunt showed that he was not likely to become a well conducted constable, I very much doubt whether the decision could have been said to be unreasonable.

I agree that the two declarations proposed by Lord Brightman should be made.

Lord Roskill

My Lords,

I have had the advantage of reading in draft the speech prepared by my noble and learned friend, Lord Brightman, with which I agree and I too would dismiss the appeal.

Lord Bridge of Harwich

My Lords,,

The facts of this most unhappy case are fully set out in the speech of my noble and learned friend, Lord Brightman. There are only certain aspects of the case on which I wish to comment.

The Chief Constable's decision to force the resignation of the respondent was vitiated both by his erroneous assumption that he had an absolute discretion and by his total failure to observe the rules of natural justice. The matters considered fell into two categories, first the respondent's private life and domestic circumstances, secondly his keeping four dogs in the council house rented for his occupation by the police authority. In the first category because the Chief Constable gave the respondent no opportunity to refute the allegations against him, he acted on false information. If the truth had been established, the only matters for consideration under this head would have been that the respondent was married to a lady some fourteen years older than himself whom he had previously treated as an aunt, because she had for some years lived as man and wife, although not married, with the respondent's uncle by whom she had four children. For my part, I should regard these matters as irrelevant to the question whether the respondent was likely to become an efficient or well-conducted constable.

With regard to the dogs, I do not dissent from the view that a chief officer of police who is contemplating dispensing with the services of a probationer constable under Regulation 16 of the Police Regulations 1971 may delegate to a suitable subordinate the investigation of a specific complaint with a view to giving the constable a fair opportunity to meet the allegations made against him. But in the case of such delegation certain conditions should be observed. First the delegate should make clear to the constable the precise nature of the complaint and that he, the delegate, is acting on behalf of the chief officer of police to hear whatever the constable wishes to say about it. Secondly, the delegate should make a full report to the chief officer of what the constable has said. Thirdly, the chief officer should himself show the report to the constable and invite any comment on it before reaching any decision under Regulation 16.

The evidence as to what happened with regard to the respondent's dogs is the least satisfactory part of this case. The memorandum of 6th November 1978 of the Deputy Chief Constable exhibited to the affidavit of the Chief Constable contains matter which has never been verified by an affidavit of the Deputy Chief Constable, although much of it is flatly contradicted by the affidavit of the respondent. Of the three conditions I have referred to above as necessary to the investigation of a complaint by a delegate of the chief officer of police, it is doubtful if the first two were observed. It is certain that the third was not. On the probabilities, it is hard to believe that the respondent, whose dedicated enthusiasm for a police career has never been doubted, if faced with the stark alternatives of removing three of his dogs from his council house or being dismissed from the force, would have chosen the latter.

My Lords, I agree with my noble and learned friends, the Lord Chancellor and Lord Brightman, that the most difficult problem posed by this appeal is to decide what remedy is appropriate and further that the form of declaration made by the Court of Appeal is unsatisfactory in that its practical consequences are uncertain. So far as it lies within our power, we should, above all, make clear to the parties what their respective rights and obligations are in consequence of any order to be pronounced. There is no doubt in my mind that the respondent has suffered a grievous wrong. It should not be beyond the power of the courts to provide a suitable remedy. The respondent has throughout disclaimed any interest in monetary compensation. What he seeks is reinstatement. This could only be secured by an order of mandamus requiring the present Chief Constable of the North Wales Police to reinstate him as a probationer constable who has already completed fourteen months of his probationer service. I have no doubt your Lordships have power to make such an order and was at one time strongly inclined to think that it should be made. I know now that none of your Lordships favour such an order and it would therefore be an empty gesture for me to express a formal dissent on the point. But, that apart, I appreciate the weight of the objections to it. Great practical problems would arise in relation to his training and perhaps other matters from the fact that his service has been interrupted for nearly four years. Moreover, human nature being what it is, if the North Wales Police Force had the respondent forced upon them by order of your Lordships' House as the culmination of this lengthy litigation, there would be an obvious danger that an undercurrent of ill-feeling would affect his future relations with his superiors in the force.

I am reluctantly driven to the conclusion that the best service we can render to the respondent—and indeed this is the least we should do—is to make clear to the North Wales Police Force or indeed to any other police force he may now seek to join that he emerges from this litigation with his reputation wholly untarnished, that nothing has ever been proved against him to show that he is unlikely to become an efficient and well-conducted constable, but that, on the contrary, all the formal reports on his work and training during the period of his service in 1977 and 1978 were highly favourable to him.

As regards the formal disposal of the appeal I concur in the order proposed by my noble and learned friend, Lord Brightman.

Lord Brightman

My Lords,

The issue in this case is whether the Chief Constable of North Wales Police acted lawfully when he forced a probationer constable to resign his office; and, if not, what remedies can properly be granted to the aggrieved constable.

The matter first came before a Divisional Court of the Queen's Bench Division. It was heard by Mr. Justice Woolf. He came to the conclusion that the decision reached by the Chief Constable did not accord with the standards of fairness that should have been observed, but that no relief should be granted except in regard to costs. The constable appealed in order to obtain substantive relief. The Chief Constable cross-appealed. The Court of Appeal confirmed the conclusion of the Divisional Court but added a declaration that the Chief Constable's decision to require the constable to resign or be dismissed was void. The Chief Constable now appeals to your Lordships' House.

My Lords, I will narrate the story as briefly as I can, but some detail is inevitable. In the summer of 1977 the respondent, Mr. Michael John Evans, applied to join the North Wales Police. He had an unfortunate upbringing, His father, who had been in the Royal Navy, died when he was five years old. His mother suffered from ill health and was unable to look after him. In consequence, he was brought up in an orphanage until he was sixteen. In May 1971, when he was about nineteen, he had a serious motor cycle accident. He received a considerable sum of money as compensation. He was in hospital for almost a year. While there, he was visited and befriended by Miss Margaret Farey. She was a lady who had been living with his uncle for a number of years. There were four children of the liaison. The respondent believed that his uncle and Miss Farey were married. She called herself Mrs. Evans and he referred to her as his aunt. At about this time, Miss Farey and the respondent's uncle parted company. After the respondent left hospital he stayed for a while with his grandmother, and later with Miss Farey. He came to know that she was unmarried but he continued to refer to her as his aunt.

The respondent went out to work. He was first employed as a chauffeur. He then spent a year as an operating theatre technician in a hospital. This was followed by a spell of unemployment. In the autumn of 1976 he accepted an offer of a place at the University College of North Wales, Bangor, beginning in the autumn of 1976. He first lived in lodgings, but later secured the tenancy of a house on a farm hear Bangor, where Miss Farey and her two younger children joined him.

The respondent's first year at the university was not a success. He did not achieve the requisite academic standard and he left. He applied to join the North Wales Police. He was interviewed in July 1977 by Police Sergeant Morris. The Police Sergeant recorded the following in his suitability report:

> " The address where the applicant resides is a house on Tyddyn
> " Mynyddig Farm some two miles from Bangor, which his aunt rents
> " from the owner of the farm. It is a comfortable home, clean and well > " cared for ... For the past twelve months he has resided with his aunt,
> " Mrs. Margaret Evans, at the farm, and it appears that she has been the > " one person in his life who has cared for him, and encouraged him in > " his studies".

A fortnight later he was interviewed by Superintendent Ellis. Finally he had a brief interview with the Chief Constable, the appellant, and was accepted into the force. He was duly sworn into the office of constable on 31st August and became a probationary member of the police force for a period of two years pursuant to Regulation 15(2) of the Police Regulations 1971. He was then just under 25 years of age.

On 5th September he began his initial course of training at the Police Training Centre at Cwmbran. It lasted for two months. He obtained a good report. The Commandant of the centre described him as " a very good prospect with " all the attributes to develop into a reliable and competent police officer". He then spent a month on the beat at Holyhead attached to a tutor constable. He was given a satisfactory report. During this period he gave formal notice to his Divisional Chief Superintendent of his intention to be married to " Miss Margaret Farey of Tyddyn Mynddig Farm " and requested police accommodation. Within a week the Deputy Chief Constable allocated accommodation to him at Llangefni, and changed his station from Holyhead to Llangefni. The accommodation provided was a house belonging to the local council. On 26th January the respondent gave the Divisional Chief Superintendent formal notification of his marriage. This showed that his wife was 14 years older than he.

On 31st January 1978 Police Sergeant Roberts, of the Llangefni Police Station made a report to the Divisional Chief Superintendent. He said that as a result of various observations and various rumours spread about the police station, he had decided to make some discreet inquiries about the respondent and his wife. It is a long report. It is sufficient to pick out these items:

1. A year previously a police officer visiting the Evans' household about the absence from school of one of the children, had been introduced to the respondent as the stepson of Mrs. Evans.

2. Police Sergeant Morris, who had made the suitability report, had been led to believe that Mrs. Evans was the respondent's aunt.

3. The respondent's council house was untidy, poorly carpeted and furnished.

4. Despite the poor state of the house, the respondent had just bought a large car and he also owned an almost new Honda motor cycle; and there were four or five dogs in the house.

5. It was also within the police sergeant's knowledge that the respondent's referees (in the plural) described him as plausible and possibly dishonest.

Inspector Yates added a footnote to the report:

(6) Prior to their marriage, the respondent and Mrs. Evans resided at a hippy commune at Tyddyn Mynyddig; it was believed that Mrs. Evans was the sister of the respondent's mother (and therefore within the prohibited degree of relationship); and there was no proof that Mrs. Evans was divorced from her previous husband (thus also indicating bigamy).

On 3rd February this report was forwarded by the Divisional Chief Superintendent to the Deputy Chief Constable. On 8th February the Divisional Chief Superintendent added fuel to the fire. Current information, he said, suggested that in the past the respondent had had several (query severe) financial difficulties; he was said to be plausible; and he had a medical history of chronic leg injuries.

On 9th February the Deputy Chief Constable asked the Divisional Chief Superintendent to interview the respondent with a view to resolving the various issues which had recently come to notice. The respondent was summoned to an interview. Superintendent Ellis attended with the Divisional Chief Superintendent. The Divisional Chief Superintendent gave the respondent to believe that the interview was concerned only with a discrepancy in the number of children in the family, in order to ensure that the family would obtain the full benefit of the pension arrangements.

According to the evidence, none of the various items—I am tempted to call them smears—appeared to have been brought out into the open so as to enable the respondent to put the record straight. The rumour that Mrs. Evans was still the wife of the respondent's uncle, and the alternative rumour that Mrs. Evans was the sister of the respondent's mother, were ultimately laid to rest by an investigation conducted by New Scotland Yard at the request of the Divisional Chief Superintendent. A report of his investigation was made on 19th July. As to the rest of the items:—

1. As regards the untidy and poorly equipped house the respondent and his wife had only just moved in and there is uncontradicted evidence that they had not had time to get their furniture out of store and carpets fitted.

2. There is uncontradicted evidence that the respondent had suffered from no financial difficulties.

3. It was somewhat misleading to record that the respondent's referees (in the plural) had described him as plausible and possibly dishonest. The truth was that one referee, the Dean of the Faculty of Science at the University had concluded his letter as follows—

" I believe Evans to be reasonably intelligent and, on first acquaintance, " he has an outgoing and fairly attractive personality. However, I should " say that I doubt somewhat his plausibility. In some ways it is perhaps " a minor matter but he tendered a number of excuses about his academic " performance which I saw no reason to disbelieve. Quite by accident, " as a result of an inquiry from his Local Education Authority, I came to " discover that much of what he had said was in fact untrue. When " subsequently tackled about this matter he still wished me to believe " most of what he had previously told me. He therefore is either dis- " honest with himself and/or is willing himself to believe a situation exists " when it clearly does not. I am sorry to have to report on Evans in this " way because I firmly believe he has had a difficult home environment " in his earlier days and I think he is deserving of some help."

4. The reference to the hippy commune was a most damaging error. Inspector Yates had confused the farm where the respondent lived with another locality where he had never been.

5. The respondent's leg injury had been fully disclosed in his medical report and he had completely recovered from it.

In the meantime the respondent undertook phase 1. of the Headquarters Training Course, a Traffic Course, an Administration Course and a C.I.D. Course. All reports from those instructing him were good.

To go back in time for a moment: in January 1978 when the respondent's house had been allocated to him, the respondent had called at the Council's Housing Department to discover the Council's attitude towards the keeping of domestic pets. He had four dogs. He was told that as a rule pets were not allowed, but that the Council took no notice unless there were complaints. At a routine meeting with the Divisional Chief Superintendent a little later, the respondent told him about the dogs. The Divisional Chief Superintendent informed him that there was no problem as long as the dogs were kept under control. In the autumn of 1978, acting on information that the respondent had four dogs, a Health Inspector called at the house. He said that as a rule only one dog was allowed, but it appeared that no actual complaint had been made by anyone. The Health Inspector agreed that the dogs were well cared for and said that the Health Department could have no complaint. However, two days later a Council official called and told the respondent that he would have to get rid of the dogs.

On 19th October Superintendent Jones of Caernarvon interviewed the respondent as a result of what he had heard about the dogs. On the next day the respondent made a written report to the Divisional Chief Superintendent explaining his predicament. He referred to the interview with Superintendent Jones and added that at this interview he had indicated that he would try to find alternative accommodation, but the possibility of success seemed remote. The respondent handed his memorandum to Superintendent

Jones who forwarded it to the Divisional Chief Superintendent with his own covering letter. In his covering letter Superintendent Jones wrongly informed the Divisional Chief Superintendent that prior to being moved to Llangefni the respondent and his family were living in a hippy commune at Bangor, and added that his wife continued to dress in the hippy fashion; and that all the dogs were strays. The respondent denies that his wife dressed in hippy clothes, and there is undisputed evidence that none of the dogs was a stray. Superintendent Jones added that he had told the respondent that he had the alternative of getting rid of three of the dogs or finding alternative accommodation.

On 20th October a routine assessment report was made on the respondent. This followed the pattern of earlier reports; his appearance and bearing were of high standard; in the performance of his duties he got through a great deal of work; he accepted responsibility; was considerate and firm in his attitude to the public; showed a great deal of interest; and was well liked and respected by his colleagues. Sergeant Evans, who signed the assessment, considered that he would do well in his career. Inspector Yates, who endorsed the assessment, said the respondent showed a great deal of interest and enthusiasm, and intended to establish a career for himself within the police force. It was Inspector Yates who started the damaging canard about the hippy commune. He did not repeat it. But unfortunately it had already been repeated by Superintendent Jones.

On 23rd October the respondent visited the Senior Management Officer of the Local Council to discuss the question of the dogs. In a letter of the same day the Senior Management Officer wrote to the respondent requesting him to find other accommodation for the animals within the next four weeks, i.e. by the third week in November.

On 25th October the respondent reported to his Divisional Chief Superintendent. He said that he had been given four weeks to leave the Council house. That was not an accurate account of the Council's letter, although it would come to the same thing if he adhered to his expressed intention of not parting with the dogs. The respondent said that he could see no prospect of finding suitable alternative accommodation.

On 30th October the Divisional Chief Superintendent forwarded the memoranda of 19th, 20th and 25th October to the Deputy Chief Constable.

On 6th November the Deputy Chief Constable interviewed the respondent. He was told that there were only two alternatives, that he " should comply " with the conditions of tenancy or that we should take other action by e.g. " terminating his employment ". The Deputy Chief Constable added in his memorandum of the interview, which he forwarded to the Chief Constable, " it was very doubtful in my view whether people who deliberately flouted " conditions of tenancy were suitable to be in the police service." Your Lordships may feel that an accusation of deliberately flouting the terms of the tenancy is an extravagant description of the respondent's conduct in the light of the clear evidence that he began with a revocable permission to keep the dogs and, though the permission was now revoked, he still had another fortnight within which to comply with the Council's requirements.

On 8th November the respondent was summoned to an interview with the Chief Constable. He was told by the Chief Constable that " I had made a mistake in accepting him and gave him the opportunity to resign as an alter- " native to formally dispensing with his services". He was given no indication of the reasons for his enforced resignation. The respondent in his affidavit says this about the interview, and his account is not disputed:— " I asked if " I could have a reason for this action but he refused outright. I was not " informed of what was alleged against me nor afforded any opportunity " to be heard by way of defence or explanation. I asked for time to consider " and he said that I must let him know by 10 a.m. the following morning. " I was not given any document recording this decision." As a result of the Chief Constable's threat, the respondent signed on 9th November a formal letter of resignation.

At the time of his enforced resignation it should be observed that the respondent still had a fortnight within which to comply with the Council's requirements: that all the routine reports on his suitability as a police constable had been highly satisfactory, and likely, viewed in isolation, to lead to his being confirmed in office; and that he was due in only three weeks' time to attend a routine interview with his Divisional Chief Superintendent pursuant to the ordinary probationary procedure.

Within a week of his enforced resignation, the respondent applied to join the Metropolitan Police. The Metropolitan Police, naturally enough, communicated with the North Wales Police. The Deputy Chief Constable replied by letter in fairly innocuous terms. The Chief Constable of the North Wales Police also spoke personally to the Assistant Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police. Not surprisingly his application was rejected. It has no particular importance except to demonstrate the respondent's dedication to police work, and the then practical impossibility of his regaining acceptance into a police force.

My Lords, before I conclude this unhappy story, I must turn to the statutory provision. Regulation 16 of the Police Regulations 1971, which I need not quote verbatim, provides that during his period of probation in the force, the services of a constable may be dispensed with at any time if the Chief Officer of Police considers:

1. that he is not fitted, physically or mentally, to perform the duties of his office, or
2. that he is not likely to become an efficient constable, or
3. that he is not likely to become a well conducted constable.

It is plain from the wording of the regulation that the power of a Chief Officer of Police to dispense with the services of a person accepted as a probationer constable is to be exercised, and exercised only, after due consideration and determination of the specified questions. It is not a discretion that may be exercised arbitrally and without accountability.

A year went by. The respondent tried unsuccessfully to pursue a remedy before an Industrial Tribunal. He consulted solicitors and applied for legal aid which took some time to arrange. On 23rd October 1979 his solicitors wrote to the Chief Constable. They indicated that he would be seeking judicial review of the decision to dispense with his services. They asked the Chief Constable to reconsider his decision. They also requested disclosure of various reports about him which the respondent knew, or suspected, were in existence. This request was peremptorily refused in a letter despatched by the Chief Constable two days later.

In early January 1980 the respondent filed the requisite statement and swore the requisite affidavit in support of his application for leave to apply for judicial review. At this time he was still unaware of the facts or supposed facts which had led the Chief Constable to force his resignation. So far as he was aware, there was only one matter over which any problem arose, namely, his ownership of the dogs, of which the North Wales Police were aware shortly after he took up accommodation at Llangefni. Leave was given by a Divisional Court on 29th January. On the following day the respondent issued a Notice of Motion seeking (1) an Order of Certiorari to quash the Chief Constable's decision of 8th November 1978, (2) an Order of Mandamus directed to the Chief Constable requiring his reinstatement, and (3) a declaration that the decision of the Chief Constable was illegal, ultra vires and void. On 8th May 1980 the respondent obtained a consent order for the discovery of the documents which he had requested six months earlier.

On 12th June 1980 the Chief Constable swore an affidavit in answer to the respondent's filed statement and affidavit. There are two important matters revealed in the affidavit. First, the Chief Constable asserted that Regulation 16(1) gave him an absolute discretion to dispense with a probationer's services. Secondly, in deciding as he did, the Chief Constable was principally concerned with three adverse factors—

1. The respondent had married a woman much older than himself; she was the former mistress of his uncle; such a marriage might give rise to some scandal, which would not be in the interests of the force.
2. The respondent and his wife were keeping four or five dogs in a police/ council house, when there was a permitted limit of one dog.
3. The respondent and his wife had lived a " hippy " life style at the Bangor farm.

The second of these adverse factors was inaccurate, because the dogs were initially kept in the house with the Council permission; and that permission was still extant at the date of the Chief Constable's decision. The third adverse factor was the result of a complete misunderstanding and was devoid of all substance.

The respondent swore an affidavit in reply on 15th January 1981. He furnished his answers to all the criticisms of which he had by now become aware and he convincingly disposed of the damaging statement about the previous life style of himself and his wife. Furthermore, he deposed that if he had realised that he had to choose between keeping his career and keeping the dogs, the dogs would have gone. It is difficult to suppose otherwise.

The Chief Constable has never challenged the truth of the respondent's second affidavit.

The motion came before Mr. Justice Woolf on 23rd March 1981. The learned judge found in favour of the respondent to the extent that he held that the proper approach to this type of case was that the Chief Constable was bound to act fairly in the course of exercising his statutory discretion under

Regulation 16; and that the decision which was reached did not accord with the standards of fairness because the respondent was not given an opportunity to answer the accusations which led the Chief Constable to the conclusion which he reached. However, the learned judge declined to grant any relief except in costs. His reasoning was this. The court could give no remedy now which would enable the respondent to serve the period which would have remained if his engagement had not been terminated, because the two year probationary period was long since expired. Even if that period had not ended, the court would not in the normal way make an Order of Mandamus requiring a Chief Constable to re-engage a constable. The only order which could be made would be one which would have required the Chief Constable to reconsider his decision of 8th November. There was no purpose to be served by such an order now that the probationary period had expired. To put the matter shortly, an Order of Mandamus would be contrary to all precedent and an Order of Certiorari would be academic. He could not make a Declaratory Order that the respondent was still a probationary constable, nor could he make a declaration that the Chief Constable's decision was wrong. All that could be declared would be that the decision had been reached irregularly, and such a declaration would serve no purpose.

Mr Lords, I must address myself later to the question of remedy. All that I would say at this moment is that it would, to my mind, be regrettable if a litigant who establishes that he has been legally wronged and particularly in so important a matter as the pursuit of his chosen profession, has to be sent away from a court of justice empty handed save for an order for the recoupment of the expense to which he has been put in establishing a barren victory.

The respondent appealed. By his notice of appeal, he sought an Order of Certiorari, an Order of Mandamus and a declaration in the terms set out in his application for leave to apply for judicial review. The Chief Constable cross-appealed. He attacked the findings of the learned judge. He claimed not only that the decision was fairly reached, but also that the respondent's office was held during pleasure so that, on established principles, he had no right to be heard before dismissal.

Before I turn to the judgments in the Court of Appeal, I would make certain observations on the law as I understand it. I turn first to the decision of this House in Ridge v. Baldwin (1964) A.C. 40 where I find useful guidance on the proper approach to this type of case. As was pointed out by Lord Reid (page 64 et seq.) The application of principles of natural justice to a variety of different situations is likely to lead to varying definitions of those principles. For example, " what a minister ought to do in considering objections to a " scheme may be very different from what a watch committee ought to do in " considering whether to dismiss a Chief Constable." So cases of dismissal need to be considered on their own. Lord Reid divided these into three categories. First, dismissal of a servant by his master. Here no relevant question arises as to whether the master has heard the servant in his defence unless, presumably, the principle of audi alteram partem has been made a term of the contract. The question is whether the facts emerging at the trial prove a breach of contract. If so, damages are payable for the breach. Secondly, dismissal from an office held during pleasure. " It has always " been held, I think rightly, that such an officer has no right to be heard before " he is dismissed, and the reason is clear. As the person having the power " of dismissal need not have anything against the officer, he need not give " any reason." (Per Lord Reid, at page 65). Thirdly, dismissal from an office where there must be something against the office holder to warrant his dismissal. " There I find an unbroken line of authority to the effect that an " officer cannot lawfully be dismissed without first telling him what is alleged

13

" against him and hearing his defence or explanation." (Per Lord Reid, at page 66.)

I turn secondly to the proper purpose of the remedy of judicial review, what it is and what it is not. In my opinion the law was correctly stated in the speech of Lord Evershed (at page 96). His was a dissenting judgment but the dissent was not concerned with this point. Lord Evershed referred to " a danger of usurpation of power on the part of the courts . . . under the " pretext of having regard to the principles of natural justice." He added " I do observe again that it is not the decision as such which is liable to review; " it is only the circumstances in which the decision was reached, and particularly " in such a case as the present the need for giving to the party dismissed an " opportunity for putting his case." Judicial review is concerned, not with the decision, but with the decision-making process. Unless that restriction on the power of the court is observed, the court will in my view, under the guise of preventing the abuse of power, be itself guilty of usurping power.

I leave these preliminary observations in order to consider the judgments in the Court of Appeal. It was accepted by each member of the court that the case fell within the third of Lord Reid's categories; that the respondent was entitled to a fair hearing; and that he had not had one. However the learned Master of the Rolls added this:

> " I go further. Not only must he be given a fair hearing, but the " decision itself must be fair and reasonable. That is the protection " afforded to every servant who is employed under a contract of service. " He is protected against unfair dismissal. No less protection should " be afforded to a probationer constable."

The learned Master of the Rolls then concluded by saying that,

> " It is my opinion that the Chief Constable was not justified in dispensing " with the services of Constable Evans or in requiring him to resign."

Lord Justice Shaw and Lord Justice Ackner concurred.

In his submissions to this House, counsel for the appellant submitted that the Chief Constable took into account all the matters which appeared on the respondent's file; that he was entitled to rely on the accuracy of the reports of his officers; and that he was not bound to put every adverse point to the respondent.

My Lords, for my part I emphatically reject the approach of the Chief Constable to his duties under Regulation 16. He made the fundamental mistake, as appears from his affidavit, of assuming that he had an absolute discretion to discharge the respondent under Regulation 16, a right to dismiss him at pleasure. That was not his right. His mistake coloured and indeed tainted the decision-making process. His discretion to discharge was a qualified one, exercisable only if he considered that the respondent was not fitted to perform the duties of the office or was not likely to become an efficient constable or a well conducted constable. It is implicit in Regulation 16 that there must be a fair consideration of the constable's fitness to perform his duties and a fair consideration of the likelihood of his becoming an efficient and well conducted constable. The legality of the choice given to the respondent to resign or be discharged must be judged by the same criteria as applied to the legality of discharge without the alternative of resignation; for clearly the Chief Constable could not use an invalid threat of discharge to compel resignation, as that would be an abuse of power.

As I have indicated, the Chief Constable forced the respondent's discharge on account of three adverse factors which he believed to exist: the allegedly undesirable marital circumstances, the alleged hippy life style and the alleged flouting of authority. It was the duty of the Chief Constable to deal fairly with the respondent in relation to the adverse factors upon which he was proposing to act. The Chief Constable failed in his performance of that duty because these supposedly adverse factors were never put to the respondent. He was given no opportunity to offer one word of explanation. Your

Lordships will not doubt the honesty of the Chief Constable and that he reached a decision which he truly believed was in the interests of the North Wales Police on the information that had been laid before him. But the inescapable fact is that he misunderstood the extent of his discretion and the nature of his duty under Regulation 16. The decision-making process was therefore defective.

There is however a wider point than the injustice of the decision-making process of the Chief Constable. With profound respect to the Court of Appeal, I dissent from the view that " Not only must [the probationer constable] be " given a fair hearing, but the decision itself must be fair and reasonable ". If that statement of the law passed into authority without comment, it would in my opinion transform, and wrongly transform, the remedy of judicial review. Judicial review, as the words imply, is not an appeal from a decision, but a review of the manner in which the decision was made. The statement of law which I have quoted implies that the court sits in judgment not only on the correctness of the decision-making process but also on the correctness of the decision itself. In his printed case counsel for the appellant made this submission: " Where Parliament has entrusted to an administrative authority " the duty of making a decision which affects the rights of an individual, " the court's supervisory function on a judicial review of that decision is " limited. The court cannot be expected to possess knowledge of the reasons " of policy which lie behind the administrative decision nor is it desirable that " evidence should be called before the court of the implications of such policy. " It follows that the court ought not to attempt to weigh the merits of the " particular decision but should confine its function to a consideration of " the manner in which the decision was reached." When the sole issue raised on an application for judicial review is whether the rules of natural justice have been observed, these propositions are unexceptionable. Other considerations arise when an administrative decision is attacked on the ground that it is vitiated by self-misdirection, by taking account of irrelevant or neglecting to take account of relevant factors, or is so manifestly unreasonable that no reasonable authority, entrusted with the power in question, could reasonably have made such a decision. See the well known judgment of Lord Greene M.R. in Associated Provincial Picture Houses Ltd. v. Wednesbury Corporation [1948] 1 K.B. 223.

I agree entirely with the Court of Appeal, and indeed with the Divisional Court, that the respondent did not have the fair hearing to which he was entitled. I differ only from the Court of Appeal on the extent of the Court's

I turn now to the question of remedies. The Court of Appeal granted the respondent a declaration that the decision requiring the respondent to resign or be dismissed was void. I feel some misgivings about a declaration in that form, because it is not clear to me what consequences flow from it. Whatever remedy may be granted by the Court in this case, I think it is highly desirable that the North Wales Police and the respondent should be in no doubt how, under the Order, they will stand in relation to each other.

The conclusion reached by the Divisional Court, the Court of Appeal and by this House, if your Lordships are in agreement with me, is that the Chief Constable acted unlawfully and in breach of his duty under Regulation 16 in threatening to dispense with the respondent's services unless he resigned from the North Wales Police and in thus causing him to resign. That having been established, the respondent is, in my view, entitled at least to a declaration to that effect. But the matter cannot be satisfactorily left there. One must know what are the consequences that flow from the breach of duty.

One possibility would be to add to that declaration an Order of Mandamus. The respondent has one desire and one desire only, namely, to be reinstated in the police force. This would be secured if an Order of Mandamus were to issue, directed to the Chief Constable now in office, requiring him, for example, to restore the respondent to the office of probationer constable as held by him on 8th November 1978.

An alternative to an Order of Mandamus would be a declaration affirming that, by reason of such unlawfully induced resignation, the respondent thereby became entitled to the same rights and remedies, not including re-instatement, as he would have had if the appellant had unlawfully dispensed with his services under Regulation 16(1). Such a declaration would clarify the status of the respondent vis-a-vis the North Wales Police, and would leave him free to pursue such remedies, short of re-instatement, as may be open to him. I have in mind that under Order 53 Rule 7 an applicant for judicial review may claim damages if they are sought in the filed statement and if damages could have been awarded in an action brought for the purpose. I have not, however, addressed my mind to the question whether it is still open to the respondent to apply to amend his filed statement by adding a claim to damages.

It is possible that the respondent would not wish, nor indeed would have any incentive, to pursue a claim for damages. Counsel for the appellant, acting on instructions, told your Lordships that if the decision of your Lordships' House went in favour of the respondent it would be the intention of the North Wales Police to offer him monetary compensation. I trust that the compensation which the Chief Constable has in mind to offer would be on a generous scale, and amply reflect the fact that the respondent has been unlawfully deprived of his profession as a consequence of the wrongful procedures of the Chief Constable's predecessor in office.

I feel that the choice of remedy is a difficult one. It is a matter of discretion. From the point of view of the respondent who has been wronged in a matter so vital to his life, an Order of Mandamus is the only satisfactory remedy. I have been much tempted to suggest to your Lordships that it would in the circumstances be a remedy proper to be granted. But it is unusual, in a case such as the present, for the court to make an Order of Mandamus, and I think that in practice it might border on usurpation of the powers of the Chief Constable, which is to be avoided. With some reluctance and hesitation, I feel that the respondent will have to content himself with the less satisfactory declaration that I have outlined.

So far as I am aware, it would be open to the respondent to apply in the ordinary way to re-join the North Wales Police as a new entrant. If the respondent does make such an application, I for my part express the hope that the North Wales Police will give very serious consideration to it. If an objective assessment of his accomplishments and character were made, the North Wales Police might come to the conclusion that a person so dedicated to the profession is police material which ought not lightly to be discarded. They might feel that his re-acceptance would go some way towards remedying the wrong which he has suffered as well as benefiting the force itself. This would be a happy solution, if it could properly be brought about; it would give the respondent the chance which he merits; and the way that I have expressed myself avoids any usurpation of the power of the Chief Constable, because a decision to accept or reject must lie with him.

My Lords, I would dismiss the appeal but vary the Order of the Court of Appeal by substituting the declarations which I have outlined for that which is contained in the Order of the Court of Appeal.

ESTES v. TEXAS

No. 256

SUPREME COURT OF THE UNITED STATES

381 U.S. 532; 85 S. Ct. 1628; 14 L. Ed. 2d 543; 1965 U.S. LEXIS 2339; 6 Rad. Reg. 2d (P & F) 2104; 1 Media L. Rep. 1187

April 1, 1965, Argued
June 7, 1965, Decided

PRIOR HISTORY: CERTIORARI TO THE COURT OF CRIMINAL APPEALS OF TEXAS.

DISPOSITION: Reversed.

SUMMARY:

A much publicized financier was convicted in the District Court for the Seventh Judicial District of Texas at Tyler of the offense of swindling, after a trial of great notoriety which was televised and broadcast over his objection. The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed.

On certiorari, the Supreme Court of the United States reversed. In an opinion by Clark, J., expressing the views of five members of the Court, it was held that in view of the great notoriety of the trial, due process of law was denied the accused by the televising and broadcasting of the proceedings.

Warren, Ch. J., with Douglas and Goldberg, JJ., joined in the Court's opinion but filed a separate opinion stating that it violates the Sixth Amendment for federal courts and the Fourteenth Amendment for state courts to allow criminal trials to be televised to the public at large.

Harlan, J., concurred in the Court's opinion subject to the reservation that the case dealt with a criminal trial of great notoriety and not with one of a more or less routine nature.

Stewart, J., joined by Black, Brennan, and White, JJ., dissented on the ground that the televising of the accused's trial did not violate his constitutional rights.

White, J., joined by Brennan, J., filed a separate dissenting opinion stating that it was premature to promulgate a flat ban on the use of cameras in the courtroom.

Brennan, J., emphasized in a separate memorandum that only four of the majority viewed televised criminal trials as constitutionally infirm, whatever the circumstances.

SYLLABUS

Petitioner had been indicted by a Texas county grand jury for swindling. Massive pretrial publicity had given the case national notoriety. On the trial date, following a change of venue, a hearing commenced on petitioner's motion to prevent telecasting, radio broadcasting, and news photography. The hearing, conducted in the presence of some trial witnesses and veniremen later released, was carried live on television and radio, and news photography was permitted. The original jury panel, petitioner, counsel, and the trial judge were highly publicized during the two days the pretrial hearing lasted, emphasizing throughout the community the notorious character that the trial would take. Four of the jurors selected later at the trial had seen or heard all or part of the broadcasts. The profusion of cameramen with their equipment in various parts of the crowded courtroom caused considerable disruption. The trial court denied petitioner's motion but granted a continuance of almost a month. During the interim a booth was erected in the rear of the courtroom to which television cameramen and equipment were restricted. Live telecasting was prohibited during most of the actual trial. The State's opening and closing arguments were carried live with sound (though because of mechanical difficulty there was no picture of the former), as were the return of the jury's verdict and its receipt by the judge. The court's order allowed videotapes without sound of the whole proceeding and the cameras operated intermittently during the three-day trial, which ended with petitioner's conviction. Film clips of the trial were shown largely on regularly scheduled news programs. Both the trial court and the appellate court rejected petitioner's claim of denial of due process in violation of the Fourteenth Amendment by the televising and broadcasting of the trial. Held: The televising over petitioner's objections of the courtroom proceedings of petitioner's criminal trial, in which there was widespread public interest, was inherently invalid as infringing the fundamental right to a fair trial guaranteed by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Pp. 536-552.

(a) The high degree of publicity given to the two-day hearing, which could only have impressed those present and the community at large with the notorious character of the petitioner and the proceeding, made what occurred at the pretrial relevant to determining whether petitioner was accorded due process at his trial. Pp. 536-537.

(b) The constitutional guarantee of a public trial is to ensure that the accused is fairly dealt with and not unjustly condemned. Pp. 538-539.

(c) The freedom granted to the press under the First Amendment must be subject to the maintenance of absolute fairness in the judicial process; and in the present state of television techniques such freedom does not confer the right to use equipment in the courtroom which might jeopardize a fair trial, the atmosphere for which must be preserved at all costs. Pp. 539-540.

(d) The public's right to be informed about court proceedings is satisfied if reporters are free to attend and to report on the proceedings through their respective media. Pp. 541-542.

(e) Where, as here, the procedure employed by the State involves the probability that prejudice to the accused will result, that procedure, in line with the principle established in such cases as Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723, will be deemed lacking in due process whether or not isolatable prejudice can be demonstrated. Pp. 542-544.

(f) There are numerous respects in which televising court proceedings may alone, and in combination almost certainly will, cause unfairness, such as: (1) improperly influencing jurors by emphasizing the notoriety of the trial and affecting their impartial judgment, distracting their attention, facilitating (in States which do not sequester jurors) their viewing of selected parts of the proceedings, and improperly influencing potential jurors and thus jeopardizing the fairness of new trials; (2) impairing the testimony of witnesses, as by causing some to be frightened and others to overstate their testimony, and generally influencing the testimony of witnesses, thus frustrating invocation of the "rule" against witnesses; (3) distracting judges generally and exercising an adverse psychological effect particularly upon those who are elected; and (4) imposing pressures upon the defendant and intruding into the confidential attorney-client relationship. Pp. 544-550.

(g) The foregoing factors are not merely "hypothetical," as is evidenced by the bar on television in federal criminal trials imposed by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure and by such a bar in all but two States. P. 550.

(h) Application of the rule of the Rideau case, supra, is clearly warranted by the facts of this case. Pp. 550-552.

COUNSEL: John D. Cofer and Hume Cofer argued the cause and filed a brief for petitioner.

Waggoner Carr, Attorney General of Texas, and Leon Jaworski, Special Assistant Attorney General, argued the cause for respondent. With them on the brief were Hawthorne Phillips, Stanton Stone, Howard M. Fender and Gilbert J. Pena, Assistant Attorneys General, and Alton F. Curry, Special Assistant Attorney General.

Briefs of amici curiae, urging reversal, were filed by Whitney North Seymour, Richmond C. Coburn and John H. Yauch for the American Bar Association, and by Norman Dorsen and Melvin L. Wulf for the American Civil Liberties Union et al.

Briefs of amici curiae, urging affirmance, were filed by Davis Grant for the State Bar of Texas, joined by Duke W. Dunbar, Attorney General of Colorado; and by Douglas A. Anello, W. Theodore Pierson and Harold David Cohen for the National Association of Broadcasters et al.

OPINION

[*534] [545] [1628] MR. JUSTICE CLARK delivered the opinion of the Court. *

* MR. JUSTICE HARLAN concurs in this opinion subject to the reservations and to the extent indicated in his concurring opinion, post, p. 587.

[LEdHR1] [1]The question presented here is whether the petitioner, who stands convicted in the District Court for the Seventh Judicial District of Texas at Tyler for swindling, [1] was [*535] deprived of his [1629] right under the Fourteenth Amendment to due process by the televising and broadcasting of his trial. Both the trial court and the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals found against the petitioner. We hold to the contrary and reverse his conviction.

1 The evidence indicated that petitioner, through false pretenses and fraudulent representations, induced certain farmers to purchase fertilizer tanks and accompanying equipment, which in fact did not exist, and to sign and deliver to him chattel mortgages on the fictitious property.

I.

[546] [LEdHR2] [2]While petitioner recites his claim in the framework of Canon 35 of the Judicial Canons of the American Bar Association he does not contend that we should enshrine Canon 35 in the Fourteenth Amendment, but only that the time-honored principles of a fair trial were not followed in his case and that he was thus convicted without due process of law. Canon 35, of course, has of itself no binding effect on the courts but merely expresses the view of the Association in opposition to the broadcasting, televising and photographing of court proceedings. Likewise, Judicial Canon 28 of the Integrated State Bar of Texas, 27 Tex. B. J. 102 (1964), which leaves to the trial judge's sound discretion the telecasting and photographing of court proceedings, is of itself not law. In short, the question here is not the validity of either Canon 35 of the American Bar Association or Canon 28 of the State Bar of Texas, but only whether petitioner was tried in a manner which comports with the due process requirement of the Fourteenth Amendment.

Petitioner's case was originally called for trial on September 24, 1962, in Smith County after a change of venue from Reeves County, some 500 miles west. Massive pretrial publicity totaling 11 volumes of press clippings, which are on file with the Clerk, had given it national notoriety. All available seats in the courtroom were taken and some 30 persons stood in the aisles. However, at that time a defense motion to prevent telecasting, broadcasting by radio and news photography and a defense motion for continuance were presented, and after a two-day hearing the former was denied and the latter granted.

[*536] [LEdHR3] [3]These initial hearings were carried live by both radio and television, and news photography was permitted throughout. The videotapes of these hearings clearly illustrate that the picture presented was not one of that judicial serenity and calm to which petitioner was entitled. Cf. *Wood v. Georgia, 370 U.S. 375, 383 (1962);Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466, 472 (1965);Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 562 (1965).*Indeed, at least 12 cameramen were engaged in the courtroom throughout the hearing taking motion and still pictures and televising the proceedings. Cables and wires were snaked across the courtroom floor, three microphones were on the judge's bench and others were beamed at the jury box and the counsel table. It is conceded that the activities of the television crews and news photographers led to considerable disruption of the hearings. Moreover, veniremen had been summoned and were present in the courtroom during the entire hearing but were later released after petitioner's motion for continuance had been granted. The court also had the names of the witnesses called; some answered but the absence of others led to a continuance of the case until October 22, 1962. It is contended that this two-day pretrial hearing cannot be considered in determining the question before us. We cannot agree. Pretrial can create a major problem for the defendant in a criminal case. Indeed, it may be more harmful than publicity during the trial for it may well set the community opinion as to guilt or innocence. Though the September hearings dealt with motions to prohibit television coverage [547] and to postpone the trial, they are unquestionably relevant to the issue before us. All of this two-day affair was highly publicized and could only have impressed those present, and also the community [1630] at large, with the notorious character of the petitioner as well as the proceeding. The trial witnesses present at the hearing, as well as the original jury panel, were undoubtedly [*537] made aware of the peculiar public importance of the case by the press and television coverage being provided, and by the fact that they themselves were televised live and their pictures rebroadcast on the evening show.

When the case was called for trial on October 22 the scene had been altered. A booth had been constructed at the back of the courtroom which was painted to blend with the permanent structure of the room. It had an aperture to allow the lens of the cameras an unrestricted view of the courtroom. All television cameras and newsreel photographers were restricted to the area of the booth when shooting film or telecasting.

Because of continual objection, the rules governing live telecasting, as well as radio and still photos, were changed as the exigencies of the situation seemed to require. As a result, live telecasting was prohibited during a great portion of the actual trial. Only the opening [2] and closing arguments of the State, the return of the jury's verdict and its receipt by the trial judge were carried live with sound. Although the order allowed videotapes of the entire proceeding without sound, the cameras operated only intermittently, recording various portions of the trial for broadcast on regularly scheduled newscasts later in the day and evening. At the request of the petitioner, the trial judge prohibited coverage of any kind, still or television, of the defense counsel during their summations to the jury.

2 Due to mechanical difficulty there was no picture during the opening argument.

Because of the varying restrictions placed on sound and live telecasting the telecasts of the trial were confined largely to film clips shown on the stations' regularly scheduled news programs. The news commentators would use the film of a particular part of the day's trial activities as a backdrop for their reports. Their commentary [*538] included excerpts from testimony and the usual reportorial remarks. On one occasion the videotapes of the September hearings were rebroadcast in place of the "late movie."

II.

In Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723 (1963), this Court constructed a rule that the televising of a defendant in the act of confessing to a crime was inherently invalid under the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment even without a showing of prejudice or a demonstration of the nexus between the televised confession and the trial. See id., at 729 (dissenting opinion of CLARK, J.). Here, although there was nothing so dramatic as a home-viewed confession, there had been a bombardment of the community with the sights and sounds of a two-day hearing during which the original jury panel, the petitioner, the lawyers and the judge were highly publicized. The petitioner was subjected to characterization and minute electronic scrutiny to such an extent that at one point the photographers were found attempting to picture [548] the page of the paper from which he was reading while sitting at the counsel table. The two-day hearing and the order permitting television at the actual trial were widely known throughout the community. This emphasized the notorious character that the trial would take and, therefore, set it apart in the public mind as an extraordinary case or, as Shaw would say, something "not conventionally unconventional." When the new jury was empaneled at the trial four of the jurors selected had seen and heard all or part of the broadcasts of the earlier proceedings.

[LEdHR4] [4]We start with the proposition that it is a "public trial" that the Sixth Amendment guarantees to the "accused." The purpose of the requirement of a public trial was to guarantee that the accused would be fairly dealt with and [*539] not unjustly condemned. History had proven that secret tribunals were effective instruments of oppression. As our Brother BLACK so well said in In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257 (1948):

"The traditional Anglo-American distrust for secret trials has been variously ascribed to the notorious use of this practice by the Spanish Inquisition, to the excesses of the English Court of Star Chamber, and to the French monarchy's abuse of the lettre de cachet. . . . Whatever other benefits the guarantee to an accused that his trial be conducted in public may confer upon our society, the guarantee has always been recognized as a safeguard against any attempt to employ our courts as instruments of persecution." At 268-270. (Footnotes omitted.)

[LEdHR5] [5]It is said, however, that the freedoms granted in the First Amendment extend a right to the news media to televise from the courtroom, and that to refuse to honor this privilege is to discriminate between the newspapers and television. This is a misconception of the rights of the press.

[LEdHR6] [6]The free press has been a mighty catalyst in awakening public interest in governmental affairs, exposing corruption among public officers and employees and generally informing the citizenry of public events and occurrences, including court proceedings. While maximum freedom must be allowed the press in carrying on this important function in a democratic society its exercise must necessarily be subject to the maintenance of absolute fairness in the judicial process. While the state and federal courts have differed over what spectators may be excluded from a criminal trial, 6 Wigmore, Evidence § 1834 (3d ed. 1940), the amici curiae brief of the National Association of Broadcasters and the Radio Television News Directors Association, says, as indeed it must, that "neither of these two amendments [First and Sixth] speaks of an unlimited [*540] right of access to the courtroom on the part of the broadcasting media . . . ." At 7. Moreover, they recognize that the "primary concern of all must be the proper administration of justice"; that "the life or liberty of any individual in this land should not be put in jeopardy because of actions of any news media"; and that "the due process requirements in both the Fifth and Fourteenth Amendments and the provisions of the Sixth Amendment require a procedure that will assure a fair trial . . . ." At 3-4.

[LEdHR7] [7] [LEdHR8] [8] Nor can the courts be said [549] to discriminate where they permit the newspaper reporter access to the courtroom. The television and radio reporter has the same privilege. All are entitled to the same rights as the general public. The news reporter is not permitted to bring his typewriter or printing press. When the advances in these arts permit reporting by printing press or by television without their present hazards to a fair trial we will have another case.

IV.

[LEdHR9A] [9A] [LEdHR10] [10]Court proceedings are held for the solemn purpose of endeavoring to ascertain the truth which is the sine qua non of a fair trial. Over the centuries Anglo-American courts have devised careful safeguards by rule and otherwise to protect and facilitate the performance of this high function. As a result, at this time those safeguards do not permit the televising and photographing of a criminal trial, save in two States and there only under restrictions. The federal courts prohibit it by specific rule. This is weighty evidence that our concepts of a [1632] fair trial do not tolerate such an indulgence. We have always held that the atmosphere essential to the preservation of a fair trial -- the most fundamental of all freedoms -- must be maintained at all costs. Our approach has been through rules, contempt proceedings and reversal of convictions obtained under unfair conditions. Here the remedy is [*541] clear and certain of application and it is our duty to continue to enforce the principles that from time immemorial have proven efficacious and necessary to a fair trial.

V.

The State contends that the televising of portions of a criminal trial does not constitute a denial of due process. Its position is that because no prejudice has been shown by the petitioner as resulting from the televising, it is permissible; that claims of "distractions" during the trial due to the physical presence of television are wholly unfounded; and that psychological considerations are for psychologists, not courts, because they are purely hypothetical. It argues further that the public has a right to know what goes on in the courts; that the court has no power to "suppress, edit, or censor events which transpire in proceedings before it," citing Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 374 (1947); and that the televising of criminal trials would be enlightening to the public and would promote greater respect for the courts.

At the outset the notion should be dispelled that telecasting is dangerous because it is new. It is true that our empirical knowledge of its full effect on the public, the jury or the participants in a trial, including the judge, witnesses and lawyers, is limited. However, the nub of the question is not its newness but, as MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS says, "the insidious influences which it puts to work in the administration of justice." Douglas, The Public Trial and the Free Press, 33 Rocky Mt. L. Rev. 1 (1960). These influences will be detailed below, but before turning to them the State's argument that the public has a right to know what goes on in the courtroom should be dealt with.

[LEdHR11] [11]It is true that the public has the right to be informed as to what occurs in its courts, but reporters of all media, including television, are always present if they wish to be [*542] and are plainly free to report [550] whatever occurs in open court through their respective media. This was settled in Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252 (1941), and Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331 (1946), which we reaffirm. These reportorial privileges of the press were stated years ago:

"The law, however, favors publicity in legal proceedings, so far as that object can be attained without injustice to the persons immediately concerned. The public are permitted to attend nearly all judicial inquiries, and there appears to be no sufficient reason why they should not also be allowed to see in print the reports of trials, if they can thus have them presented as fully as they are exhibited in court, or at least all the material portion of the proceedings impartially stated, so that one shall not, by means of them, derive erroneous impressions, which he would not have been likely to receive from hearing the trial itself." 2 Cooley's Constitutional Limitations 931-932 (Carrington ed. 1927).

[LEdHR12] [12]The State, however, says that the use of television in the instant case was "without injustice to the person immediately concerned," basing its position on the fact that the petitioner has established no isolatable prejudice and that this must be shown in order to invalidate a conviction in these circumstances. The State paints too broadly in this contention, for this Court itself has found instances in which a showing of actual prejudice is not a prerequisite to reversal. This is such a case. It is true that in [1633] most cases involving claims of due process deprivations we require a showing of identifiable prejudice to the accused. Nevertheless, at times a procedure employed by the State involves such a probability that prejudice will result that it is deemed inherently lacking in due [*543] process. Such a case was In re Murchison, 349 U.S. 133 (1955), where MR. JUSTICE BLACK for the Court pointed up with his usual clarity and force:

[LEdHR14] [14]"A fair trial in a fair tribunal is a basic requirement of due process. Fairness of course requires an absence of actual bias in the trial of cases. But our system of law has always endeavored to prevent even the probability of unfairness. . . . To perform its high function in the best way 'justice must satisfy the appearance of justice.' Offutt v. United States, 348 U.S. 11, 14." At 136. (Emphasis supplied.)

And, as Chief Justice Taft said in Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, almost 30 years before:

"the requirement of due process of law in judicial procedure is not satisfied by the argument that men of the highest honor and the greatest self-sacrifice could carry it on without danger of injustice. Every procedure which would offer a possible temptation to the average man . . . to forget the burden of proof required to convict the defendant, or which might lead him not to hold the balance nice, clear and true between the State and the accused, denies the latter due process of law." At 532. (Emphasis supplied.)

This rule was followed in Rideau, supra, and in Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466 (1965). In each of these cases the Court departed from the approach it charted in Stroble v. California, 343 U.S. 181 (1952), and in Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717 [551] (1961), where we made a careful examination of the facts in order to determine whether prejudice resulted. In Rideau and Turner the Court did not stop to consider the actual effect of the practice but struck down the conviction on the ground that prejudice was inherent in it. Likewise in Gideon v. Wainwright, [*544] 372 U.S. 335 (1963), and White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59 (1963), we applied the same rule, although in different contexts.

In this case it is even clearer that such a rule must be applied. In Rideau, Irvin and Stroble, the pretrial publicity occurred outside the courtroom and could not be effectively curtailed. The only recourse other than reversal was by contempt proceedings. In Turner the probability of prejudice was present through the use of deputy sheriffs, who were also witnesses in the case, as shepherds for the jury. No prejudice was shown but the circumstances were held to be inherently suspect, and, therefore, such a showing was not held to be a requisite to reversal. Likewise in this case the application of this principle is especially appropriate. Television in its present state and by its very nature, reaches into a variety of areas in which it may cause prejudice to an accused. Still one cannot put his finger on its specific mischief and prove with particularity wherein he was prejudiced. This was found true in Murchison, Tumey, Rideau and Turner. Such untoward circumstances as were found in those cases are inherently bad and prejudice to the accused was presumed. Forty-eight of our States and the Federal Rules have deemed the use of television improper in the courtroom. This fact is most telling in buttressing our conclusion that any change in procedure which would permit its use would [1634] be inconsistent with our concepts of due process in this field.

VI.

[LEdHR9B] [9B]

As has been said, the chief function of our judicial machinery is to ascertain the truth. The use of television, however, cannot be said to contribute materially to this objective. Rather its use amounts to the injection of an irrelevant factor into court proceedings. In addition experience teaches that there are numerous situations [*545] in which it might cause actual unfairness -- some so subtle as to defy detection by the accused or control by the judge. We enumerate some in summary:

1. The potential impact of television on the jurors is perhaps of the greatest significance. They are the nerve center of the fact-finding process. It is true that in States like Texas where they are required to be sequestered in trials of this nature the jurors will probably not see any of the proceedings as televised from the courtroom. But the inquiry cannot end there. From the moment the trial judge announces that a case will be televised it becomes a cause celebre. The whole community, including prospective jurors, becomes interested in all the morbid details surrounding it. The approaching trial immediately assumes an important status in the public press and the accused is highly publicized along with the offense with which he is charged. Every juror carries with him into the jury box these solemn facts and thus increases the chance of prejudice that is present [552] in every criminal case. And we must remember that realistically it is only the notorious trial which will be broadcast, because of the necessity for paid sponsorship. The conscious or unconscious effect that this may have on the juror's judgment cannot be evaluated, but experience indicates that it is not only possible but highly probable that it will have a direct bearing on his vote as to guilt or innocence. Where pretrial publicity of all kinds has created intense public feeling which is aggravated by the telecasting or picturing of the trial the televised jurors cannot help but feel the pressures of knowing that friends and neighbors have their eyes upon them. If the community be hostile to an accused a televised juror, realizing that he must return to neighbors who saw the trial themselves, may well be led "not to hold the balance nice, clear and true between the State and the accused . . . ."

[*546] Moreover, while it is practically impossible to assess the effect of television on jury attentiveness, those of us who know juries realize the problem of jury "distraction." The State argues this is de minimis since the physical disturbances have been eliminated. But we know that distractions are not caused solely by the physical presence of the camera and its telltale red lights. It is the awareness of the fact of telecasting that is felt by the juror throughout the trial. We are all self-conscious and uneasy when being televised. Human nature being what it is, not only will a juror's eyes be fixed on the camera, but also his mind will be preoccupied with the telecasting rather than with the testimony.

Furthermore, in many States the jurors serving in the trial may see the broadcasts of the trial proceedings. Admittedly, the Texas sequestration rule would prevent this occurring there. [3] In other States following no such practice jurors would return home and turn on the TV if only to see how they appeared upon it. They would also be subjected to re-enactment and emphasis of the selected parts of the proceedings which the requirements of the broadcasters determined would be telecast and would be subconsciously influenced the more by [1635] that testimony. Moreover, they would be subjected to the broadest commentary and criticism and perhaps the well-meant advice of friends, relatives and inquiring strangers who recognized them on the streets.

> 3 Only six States, in addition to Texas, require sequestration of the jury prior to its deliberations in a non-capital felony trial. The great majority of jurisdictions leave the matter to the trial judge's discretion, while in at least one State the jury will be kept together in such circumstances only upon a showing of cause by the defendant.

Finally, new trials plainly would be jeopardized in that potential jurors will often have seen and heard the original trial when it was telecast. Yet viewers may later [*547] be called upon to sit in the jury box during the new trial. These very dangers are illustrated in this case where the court, due to the defendant's objections, permitted only the State's opening and closing arguments to be broadcast with sound to the public.

2. The quality of the testimony in criminal trials will often be impaired. The impact upon a witness of the knowledge that he is being viewed by a vast audience is simply incalculable. Some may be demoralized and frightened, some cocky and given to overstatement; memories may falter, as with anyone speaking publicly, and accuracy of statement [553] may be severely undermined. Embarrassment may impede the search for the truth, as may a natural tendency toward overdramatization. Furthermore, inquisitive strangers and "cranks" might approach witnesses on the street with jibes, advice or demands for explanation of testimony. There is little wonder that the defendant cannot "prove" the existence of such factors. Yet we all know from experience that they exist.

In addition the invocation of the rule against witnesses is frustrated. In most instances witnesses would be able to go to their homes and view broadcasts of the day's trial proceedings, notwithstanding the fact that they had been admonished not to do so. They could view and hear the testimony of preceding witnesses, and so shape their own testimony as to make its impact crucial. And even in the absence of sound, the influences of such viewing on the attitude of the witness toward testifying, his frame of mind upon taking the stand or his apprehension of withering cross-examination defy objective assessment. Indeed, the mere fact that the trial is to be televised might render witnesses reluctant to appear and thereby impede the trial as well as the discovery of the truth.

[*548] While some of the dangers mentioned above are present as well in newspaper coverage of any important trial, the circumstances and extraneous influences intruding upon the solemn decorum of court procedure in the televised trial are far more serious than in cases involving only newspaper coverage.

3. A major aspect of the problem is the additional responsibilities the presence of television places on the trial judge. His job is to make certain that the accused receives a fair trial. This most difficult task requires his undivided attention. Still when television comes into the courtroom he must also supervise it. In this trial, for example, the judge on several different occasions -- aside from the two days of pretrial -- was obliged to have a hearing or enter an order made necessary solely because of the presence of television. Thus, where telecasting is restricted as it was here, and as even the State concedes it must be, his task is made much more difficult and exacting. And, as happened here, such rulings may unfortunately militate against the fairness of the trial. In addition, laying physical interruptions aside, there is the everpresent distraction that the mere awareness of television's presence prompts. Judges are human beings also and are subject to the same psychological reactions as laymen. Telecasting is particularly bad where the judge is elected, as is the case in all save a half dozen of our States. The telecasting of a trial becomes a political weapon, which, along with other distractions inherent in broadcasting, diverts his attention from the task at hand -- the fair trial of the accused.

But this is not all. There is the initial decision that must be made as to whether the use of television will be permitted. [1636] This is perhaps an even more crucial consideration. Our judges are high-minded men and women. But it is difficult to remain oblivious to the pressures that the news media can bring to bear on them both directly [*549] and through the shaping of public opinion. Moreover, where one judge in a district or even in a State permits telecasting, the requirement that the others do the same is almost mandatory. [554] Especially is this true where the judge is selected at the ballot box.

[LEdHR15] [15]4. Finally, we cannot ignore the impact of courtroom television on the defendant. Its presence is a form of mental -- if not physical -- harassment, resembling a police line-up or the third degree. The inevitable close-ups of his gestures and expressions during the ordeal of his trial might well transgress his personal sensibilities, his dignity, and his ability to concentrate on the proceedings before him -- sometimes the difference between life and death -- dispassionately, freely and without the distraction of wide public surveillance. A defendant on trial for a specific crime is entitled to his day in court, not in a stadium, or a city or nationwide arena. The heightened public clamor resulting from radio and television coverage will inevitably result in prejudice. Trial by television is, therefore, foreign to our system. Furthermore, telecasting may also deprive an accused of effective counsel. The distractions, intrusions into confidential attorney-client relationships and the temptation offered by television to play to the public audience might often have a direct effect not only upon the lawyers, but the judge, the jury and the witnesses. See Pye, The Lessons of Dallas -- Threats to Fair Trial and Free Press, National Civil Liberties Clearing House, 16th Annual Conference.

The television camera is a powerful weapon. Intentionally or inadvertently it can destroy an accused and his case in the eyes of the public. While our telecasters are honorable men, they too are human. The necessity for sponsorship weighs heavily in favor of the televising of only notorious cases, such as this one, and invariably focuses the lens upon the unpopular or infamous [*550] accused. Such a selection is necessary in order to obtain a sponsor willing to pay a sufficient fee to cover the costs and return a profit. We have already examined the ways in which public sentiment can affect the trial participants. To the extent that television shapes that sentiment, it can strip the accused of a fair trial.

The State would dispose of all these observations with the simple statement that they are for psychologists because they are purely hypothetical. But we cannot afford the luxury of saying that, because these factors are difficult of ascertainment in particular cases, they must be ignored. Nor are they "purely hypothetical." They are no more hypothetical than were the considerations deemed controlling in Tumey, Murchison, Rideau and Turner. They are real enough to have convinced the Judicial Conference of the United States, this Court and the Congress that television should be barred in federal trials by the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure; in addition they have persuaded all but two of our States to prohibit television in the courtroom. They are effects that may, and in some combination almost certainly will, exist in any case in which television is injected into the trial process.

VII.

The facts in this case demonstrate clearly the necessity for the application of the rule announced in Rideau. The sole issue before the court for two days of pretrial hearing was the question now before us. The hearing was televised live and repeated on tape in the same evening, reaching approximately 100,000 viewers. In addition, the courtroom was a mass of wires, television cameras, [555] microphones and photographers. The petitioner, the panel of prospective jurors, who were sworn the second day, the witnesses [1637] and the lawyers were all exposed to this untoward situation. The judge decided that the trial [*551] proceedings would be telecast. He announced no restrictions at the time. This emphasized the notorious nature of the coming trial, increased the intensity of the publicity on the petitioner and together with the subsequent televising of the trial beginning 30 days later inherently prevented a sober search for the truth. This is underscored by the fact that the selection of the jury took an entire week. As might be expected, a substantial amount of that time was devoted to ascertaining the impact of the pretrial televising on the prospective jurors. As we have noted, four of the jurors selected had seen all or part of those broadcasts. The trial, on the other hand, lasted only three days.

Moreover, the trial judge was himself harassed. After the initial decision to permit telecasting he apparently decided that a booth should be built at the broadcasters' expense to confine its operations; he then decided to limit the parts of the trial that might be televised live; then he decided to film the testimony of the witnesses without sound in an attempt to protect those under the rule; and finally he ordered that defense counsel and their argument not be televised, in the light of their objection. Plagued by his original error -- recurring each day of the trial -- his day-to-day orders made the trial more confusing to the jury, the participants and to the viewers. Indeed, it resulted in a public presentation of only the State's side of the case.

As Mr. Justice Holmes said in Patterson v. Colorado, 205 U.S. 454, 462 (1907):

"The theory of our system is that the conclusions to be reached in a case will be induced only by evidence and argument in open court, and not by any outside influence, whether of private talk or public print."

It is said that the ever-advancing techniques of public communication and the adjustment of the public to its [*552] presence may bring about a change in the effect of telecasting upon the fairness of criminal trials. But we are not dealing here with future developments in the field of electronics. Our judgment cannot be rested on the hypothesis of tomorrow but must take the facts as they are presented today.

The judgment is therefore Reversed.

CONCUR BY: WARREN; HARLAN

CONCUR

MR. CHIEF JUSTICE WARREN, whom MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS and MR. JUSTICE GOLDBERG join, concurring.

While I join the Court's opinion and agree that the televising of criminal trials is inherently a denial of due process, I desire to express additional views on why this is so. In doing this, I wish to emphasize that our condemnation of televised criminal trials is not based on generalities or abstract fears. The record in this case presents a vivid illustration of the inherent prejudice of televised criminal trials and supports our conclusion that this is the appropriate time to make a definitive appraisal of television in the courtroom.

[556] I.

Petitioner, a much-publicized financier, was indicted by a Reeves County, Texas, grand jury for obtaining property through false pretenses. The case was transferred to the City of Tyler, in Smith County, Texas, and was set for trial on September 24, 1962. Prior to that date petitioner's counsel informed the trial judge that he would make a motion on September 24 to exclude all cameras from the courtroom during the trial.

On September 24, a hearing was held to consider petitioner's motion to prohibit television, motion pictures, and still photography at the trial. The courtroom was filled with newspaper reporters and [1638] cameramen, television cameramen, and spectators. At least 12 cameramen with [*553] their equipment were seen by one observer, and there were 30 or more people standing in the aisles. An article appearing in the New York Times the next day stated:

"A television motor van, big as an intercontinental bus, was parked outside the courthouse and the second-floor courtroom was a forest of equipment. Two television cameras had been set up inside the bar and four more marked cameras were aligned just outside the gates. . . . Cables and wires snaked over the floor." [1]

With photographers roaming at will through the courtroom, petitioner's counsel made his motion that all cameras be excluded. As he spoke, a cameraman wandered behind the judge's bench and snapped his picture. Counsel argued that the presence of cameras would make it difficult for him to consult with his client, make his client ill at ease, and make it impossible to obtain a fair trial since the cameras would distract the jury, witnesses and lawyers. He also expressed the view that televising selected cases tends to give the jury an impression that the particular trial is different from ordinary criminal trials. The court, however, ruled that the taking of pictures and televising would be allowed so long as the cameramen stood outside the railing that separates the trial participants from the spectators. The court also ruled that if a complaint was made that any camera was too noisy, the cameramen would have to stop taking pictures; that no pictures could be taken in the corridors outside the courtroom; and that those with microphones were not to pick up conversations between petitioner and his lawyers. Subsequent to the court's ruling petitioner arrived in the courtroom, [2] and the defense introduced testimony [*554] concerning the atmosphere in the court on that day. At the conclusion of the day's hearing the judge reasserted his earlier ruling. He then ordered a roll call of the prosecution witnesses, at least some of whom had been in the courtroom during the proceedings.

1 N. Y. Times, Sept. 25, 1962, p. 46, col. 4. See Appendix, Photographs 1, 2, 3.

2 Counsel explained to the trial court that he desired to protect petitioner from the cameras until the court had made its ruling.

The entire hearing on September 24 was televised live by station KLTV of Tyler, Texas, and station WFAA-TV of Dallas, Texas. Commercials were inserted when there was a pause in the proceedings. On the evening of Monday, September 24, both stations ran an edited tape of the day's proceedings and interrupted the tape to play the commercials ordinarily seen in the particular time slot. In addition to the [557] live television coverage there was also a live radio pickup of the proceedings by at least one station.

The proceedings continued on September 25. There was again a significant number of cameramen taking motion pictures, still pictures and television pictures. The judge once more ordered cameramen to stay on the other side of the railing and stated that this order was to be observed even during court recesses. The panel from which the petit jury was to be selected was then sworn in the presence of the cameramen. The panel was excused to permit counsel to renew his motion to prohibit photography in the courtroom. The court denied the motion, but granted a continuance of trial until October 22 and dismissed the jury panel. At the suggestion of petitioner's counsel the trial judge warned the prosecution witnesses who were present not to discuss the case during the continuance. The proceedings were televised live and portions of the television tape were shown on the regularly scheduled evening news programs. Live radio transmission apparently occurred as on the day before.

[1639] On October 1, 1962, the trial judge issued an order explaining what coverage he would permit during the trial. The judge delivered the order in his chambers for the [*555] benefit of television cameramen so that they could film him. The judge ruled that although he would permit television cameras to be present during the trial, they would not be permitted to present live coverage of the interrogation of prospective jurors or the testimony of witnesses. He ruled that each of the three major television networks, NBC, CBS, ABC, and the local television station KLTV could install one camera not equipped to pick up sound and the film would be available to other television stations on a pooled basis. In addition, he ruled that with respect to news photographers only cameramen for the local press, Associated Press, and United Press would be permitted in the courtroom. Photographs taken were also to be made available to others on a pooled basis. The judge did not explain how he decided which television cameramen and which still photographers were to be permitted in the courtroom and which were to be excluded.

For the proceedings beginning on October 22, station KLTV, at its own expense, and with the permission of the court, had constructed a booth in the rear of the courtroom painted the same or near the same color as the courtroom. An opening running lengthwise across the booth permitted the four television cameras to photograph the proceedings. The courtroom was small and the cameras were clearly visible to all in the courtroom. [3] The cameras were equipped with "electronic sound on camera" which permitted them to take both film and sound. Upon entering the courtroom the judge told all those with television cameras to go back to the booth; asked the press photographers not to move around any more than necessary; ordered that no flashbulbs or floodlights be used; and again told cameramen that they could not go inside the railing. Defense counsel renewed his motion [*556] to ban all "sound equipment . . . still cameras, movie cameras and television; and all radio facilities" from the courtroom. Witnesses were again called on this issue, but at the conclusion of the hearing the trial [558] judge reaffirmed his prior ruling to permit cameramen in the courtroom. In response to petitioner's argument that his rights under the Constitution of the United States were being violated, the judge remarked that the "case [was] not being tried under the Federal Constitution."

3 See Appendix, Photograph 6.

None of the proceedings on October 22 was televised live. Television cameras, however, recorded the day's entire proceedings with sound for later showings. Apparently none of the October 22 proceedings was carried live on radio, although the proceedings were recorded on tape. The still photographers admitted by the court were free to take photographs from outside the railing.

On October 23 the selection of the jury began. Overnight an additional strip had been placed across the television booth so that the opening for the television cameras was reduced, but the cameras and their operators were still quite visible. [4] A panel of 86 prospective jurors was ready for the voir dire. The judge excused the jurors from the courtroom and made still another ruling on news coverage at the trial. He ordered the television recording to proceed from that point on without an audio pickup, and, in addition, forbade radio tapes of any further proceedings until all the evidence had been introduced. During the course of the trial the television cameras recorded without sound whatever matters appeared interesting to them for use on later newscasts; radio broadcasts in the form of spot reports were made from a room next to the courtroom. There was no live television or radio coverage until November 7 when the trial judge permitted live [1640] coverage of the prosecution's [*557] arguments to the jury, the return of the jury's verdict and its acceptance by the court. Since the defense objected to being photographed during the summation, the judge prohibited television cameramen or still photographers from taking any pictures of the defense during its argument. But the show went on, and while the defense was speaking the cameras were directed at the judge and the arguments were monitored by audio equipment and relayed to the television audience by an announcer. On November 7 the judge, for the first time, directed news photographers desiring to take pictures to take them only from the back of the room. Up until this time the trial judge's orders merely limited news photographers to the spectator section.

The decision below affirming petitioner's conviction runs counter to the evolution of Anglo-American criminal procedure over a period of centuries. During that time the criminal trial has developed from a ritual practically devoid of rational justification [5] to a fact-finding process, the acknowledged purpose of which is to provide a fair and reliable determination of guilt. [6]

An element of rationality was introduced into the guilt-determining [559] process in England over 600 years ago when a rudimentary trial by jury became "the principal institution for criminal cases." [7] Initially members of the jury were expected to make their own examinations of the cases they were to try and come to court already familiar [*558] with the facts, [8] which made it impossible to limit the jury's determination to legally relevant evidence. Gradually, however, the jury was transformed from a panel of witnesses to a panel of triers passing on evidence given by others in the courtroom. [9] The next step was to insure the independence of the jury, and this was accomplished by the decision in the case of Edward Bushell, 6 How. St. Tr. 999 (1670), which put an end to the practice of fining or otherwise punishing jury members who failed to reach the decision directed by the court. As the purpose of trial as a vehicle for discovering the truth became clearer, it was recognized that the defendant should have the right to call witnesses and to place them under oath, [10] to be informed of the charges against him before the trial, [11] and to have counsel assist him with his defense. [12] All these protections, and others which could be cited, were part of a development by which "the administration of criminal justice was set upon a firm and dignified basis." [13]

When the colonists undertook the responsibility of governing themselves, one of their prime concerns was the establishment of trial procedures which would be consistent with the purpose of trial. The Continental Congress passed measures designed to safeguard the right to a fair trial, [14] and the various States adopted constitutional provisions [*559] directed to the [1641] same end. [15] Eventually the Sixth Amendment incorporated into the Constitution certain provisions dealing with the conduct of trials:

"In all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the Assistance of Counsel for his defence."

Significantly, in the Sixth Amendment the words "speedy and public" qualify the term trial and the rest of the Amendment defines specific protections the accused is to have at his trial. Thus, the Sixth Amendment, by its own terms, not only requires that the accused have certain specific rights but also that he enjoy them at a trial -- a word with a meaning of its own, see Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 271.

The Fourteenth Amendment which places limitations on the States' administration of their criminal laws also gives content to the term trial. Whether the Sixth Amendment as a whole applies to [560] the States through the Fourteenth, [16] or the Fourteenth Amendment embraces only those portions of the Sixth Amendment that are "fundamental," [17] or the Fourteenth Amendment incorporates a standard of "ordered liberty" apart from the [*560] specific guarantees of the Bill of Rights, [18] it has been recognized that state prosecutions must, at the least, comport with "the fundamental conception" of a fair trial. 18 Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, 408 (opinion of MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, concurring in the result).

It has been held on one or another of these theories that the fundamental conception of a fair trial includes many of the specific provisions of the Sixth Amendment, such as the right to have the proceedings open to the public, In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257; the right to notice of specific charges, Cole v. Arkansas, 333 U.S. 196; the right to confrontation, Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400; Douglas v. Alabama, 380 U.S. 415; and the right to counsel, Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335. But it also has been agreed that neither the Sixth nor the Fourteenth Amendment is to be read formalistically, for the clear intent of the amendments is that these specific rights be enjoyed at a constitutional trial. In the words of Justice Holmes, even though "every form [be] preserved," the forms may amount to no "more than an empty shell" when considered in the context or setting in which they were actually applied. [20] 20 Frank v. Mangum, 237 U.S. 309, 346 (dissenting opinion).

In [1642] cases arising from state prosecutions this Court has acted to prevent the right to a constitutional trial from being reduced to a formality by the intrusion of factors into the trial process that tend to subvert its purpose. The Court recognized in Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 334, [*561] that the "orderly operation of courts" is "the primary and dominant requirement in the administration of justice." And, in Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86, 90-91, it was held that the atmosphere in and around the courtroom might be so hostile as to interfere with the trial process, even though an examination of the record disclosed that all the forms of trial conformed to the requirements of law: the defendant had counsel, the jury members stated they were impartial, the jury was correctly charged, and the evidence was legally sufficient to convict. Moreover, in Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, a conviction was reversed where extensive pretrial publicity rendered a fair trial unlikely despite the observance [561] of the formal requisites of a legal trial. We commented in that case:

"No doubt each juror was sincere when he said that he would be fair and impartial to petitioner, but the psychological impact requiring such a declaration before one's fellows is often its father." Id., at 728.

To recognize that disorder can convert a trial into a ritual without meaning is not to pay homage to order as an end in itself. Rather, it recognizes that the courtroom in Anglo-American jurisprudence is more than a location with seats for a judge, jury, witnesses, defendant, prosecutor, defense counsel and public observers; the setting that the courtroom provides is itself an important element in the constitutional conception of trial, contributing a dignity essential to "the integrity of the trial" process. Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 377. As MR. JUSTICE BLACK said, in another context: "The very purpose of a court system is to adjudicate controversies, both criminal and civil, in the calmness and solemnity of the courtroom according to legal procedures." [21] In light of this fundamental conception of what the term trial [*562] means, this Court has recognized that often, despite widespread, hostile publicity about a case, it is possible to conduct a trial meeting constitutional standards. Significantly, in each of these cases, the basic premise behind the Court's conclusion has been the notion that judicial proceedings can be conducted with dignity and integrity so as to shield the trial process itself from these irrelevant, external factors, rather than to aggravate them as here. Thus, in reversing contempt convictions for out-of-court statements, this Court referred to "the power of courts to protect themselves from disturbances and disorder in the court room," Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252, 266 (emphasis added); "the necessity for fair adjudication, free from interruption of its processes," Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 336; "the integrity of the trial," Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 377. And, in upholding a conviction against a claim of unfavorable publicity, this Court commented "that petitioner's trial was conducted in a calm judicial manner," Darcy v. Handy, 351 U.S. 454, 463.

Similarly, when state procedures have been found to thwart the purpose of trial this Court has declared those procedures to be unconstitutional. In Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510, the Court considered a state procedure under which judges were paid for presiding over a case only if the defendant was found guilty and costs assessed against him. An argument was [1643] made that the practice should not be condemned broadly, since some judges undoubtedly would not let their judgment be affected by such an arrangement. However, the Court found the procedure so inconsistent with the conception of what a trial should be and so likely to produce prejudice that it declared the practice unconstitutional even though no specific prejudice was shown.

In Lyons v. Oklahoma, 322 U.S. 596, this [562] Court stated that if an involuntary confession is introduced into evidence [*563] at a state trial the conviction must be reversed, even though there is other evidence in the record to justify a verdict of guilty. We explained the rationale behind this judgment in Payne v. Arkansas, 356 U.S. 560, 568:

"Where . . . a coerced confession constitutes a part of the evidence before the jury and a general verdict is returned, no one can say what credit and weight the jury gave to the confession."

Similar reasoning led to the decision last Term in Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368. We held there that when the voluntariness of a confession is at issue there must be a procedure adopted which provides "a reliable and clearcut determination of . . . voluntariness." Id., at 391. We found insufficient a procedure whereby the jury heard the confession but was instructed to disregard it if the jury found the confession involuntary:

"The New York procedure poses substantial threats to a defendant's constitutional rights to have an involuntary confession entirely disregarded and to have the coercion issue fairly and reliably determined. These hazards we cannot ignore." Id., at 389.

Earlier this Term, in Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466, we considered a case in which deputy sheriffs, who were the prosecution's principal witnesses, were in charge of a sequestered jury during the trial. The Supreme Court of Louisiana criticized the practice but said that in the absence of a showing of prejudice there was no ground for reversal. We reversed because the "extreme prejudice inherent" in the practice required its condemnation on constitutional grounds.

Finally, the Court has on numerous other occasions reversed convictions, where the formalities of trial were [*564] observed, because of practices that negate the fundamental conception of trial. [22]

22 See Mooney v. Holohan, 294 U.S. 103; Alcorta v. Texas, 355 U.S. 28; Napue v. Illinois, 360 U.S. 264; and Brady v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 83.

This line of cases does not indicate a disregard for the position of the States in our federal system. Rather, it stands for the proposition that the criminal trial under our Constitution has a clearly defined purpose, to provide a fair and reliable determination of guilt, and no procedure or occurrence which seriously threatens to divert it from that purpose can be tolerated.

III.

For the Constitution to have vitality, this Court must be able to apply its principles to situations that may not have been foreseen at the time those principles were adopted. As was said in Weems v. United States, 217 U.S. 349, 373, and reaffirmed in Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483, 492-493:

"Legislation, both statutory and constitutional, is enacted, it is true, from an experience of evils, but its general language should not, therefore, be necessarily confined to the form that evil had theretofore [563] taken. [1644] Time works changes, brings into existence new conditions and purposes. Therefore a principle to be vital must be capable of wider application than the mischief which gave it birth. . . . In the application of a constitution, therefore, our contemplation cannot be only of what has been but of what may be. Under any other rule a constitution would indeed be as easy of application as it would be deficient in efficacy and power. Its general principles would have little value and be converted by precedent [*565] into impotent and lifeless formulas. Rights declared in words might be lost in reality."

[LEdHR16] [16]I believe that it violates the Sixth Amendment for federal courts and the Fourteenth Amendment for state courts to allow criminal trials to be televised to the public at large. I base this conclusion on three grounds: (1) that the televising of trials diverts the trial from its proper purpose in that it has an inevitable impact on all the trial participants; (2) that it gives the public the wrong impression about the purpose of trials, thereby detracting from the dignity of court proceedings and lessening the reliability of trials; and (3) that it singles out certain defendants and subjects them to trials under prejudicial conditions not experienced by others.

I have attempted to show that our common-law heritage, our Constitution, and our experience in applying that Constitution have committed us irrevocably to the position that the criminal trial has one well-defined purpose -- to provide a fair and reliable determination of guilt. In Tumey v. Ohio, supra, at 532, this Court condemned the procedure there employed for compensating judges because it offered a "possible temptation" to judges "not to hold the balance nice, clear and true between the State and the accused." How much more harmful is a procedure which not only offers the temptation to judges to use the bench as a vehicle for their own ends, but offers the same temptation to every participant in the trial, be he defense counsel, prosecutor, witness or juror! It is not necessary to speak in the abstract on this point. In the present case, on October 1, the trial judge invited the television cameras into his chambers so they could take films of him reading one of his pretrial orders. On this occasion, at least, the trial judge clearly took the initiative in placing himself before the television audience and in giving his order, and himself, the maximum possible publicity. Moreover, on October 22, when trial counsel renewed [*566] his motion to exclude television from the courtroom on the ground that it violated petitioner's rights under the Federal Constitution, the trial judge made the following speech:

"This case is not being tried under the Federal Constitution. This Defendant has been brought into this Court under the state laws, under the State Constitution.

"I took an oath to uphold this Constitution; not the Federal Constitution but the State Constitution; and I am going to do my best to do that as long as I preside on this Court, and if it is distasteful in following my oath and upholding the constitution, it will just have to be distasteful."

One is entitled to wonder if such a statement would be made in a court of justice by any state trial judge except as an appeal calculated to gain the favor of his viewing [564] audience. I find it difficult to believe that this trial judge, with over 20 years' experience on the bench, was unfamiliar with the fundamental duty imposed on him by Article VI of the Constitution of the United States:

"This Constitution, and the Laws of the United States which shall be made in Pursuance thereof; and all Treaties made, or which shall be [1645] made, under the Authority of the United States, shall be the supreme Law of the Land; and the Judges in every State shall be bound thereby, any Thing in the Constitution or Laws of any State to the Contrary notwithstanding."

This is not to say that all participants in the trial would distort it by deliberately playing to the television audience, but some undoubtedly would. The even more serious danger is that neither the judge, prosecutor, defense counsel, jurors or witnesses would be able to go [*567] through trial without considering the effect of their conduct on the viewing public. It is admitted in dissent that "if the scene at the September hearing had been repeated in the courtroom during this jury trial, it is difficult to conceive how a fair trial in the constitutional sense could have been afforded the defendant." Post, p. 612. But it is contended that what went on at the September hearing is irrelevant to the issue before us. With this I cannot agree. We granted certiorari to consider whether petitioner was denied due process when he was required to submit to a televised trial. In this, as in other cases involving rights under the Due Process Clause, we have an obligation to make an independent examination of the record, e. g., Watts v. Indiana, 338 U.S. 49, 51; Norris v. Alabama, 294 U.S. 587, 590; and the limited grant of certiorari does not prohibit us from considering all the facts in this record relevant to the question before us. The parties to this case, and those who filed briefs as amici curiae, recognize this, since they treat the televising of the September proceedings as a factor relevant to our consideration. Our decisions in White v. Maryland, 373 U.S. 59, and Hamilton v. Alabama, 368 U.S. 52, clearly hold that an accused is entitled to procedural protections at pretrial hearings as well as at actual trial and his conviction will be reversed if he is not accorded these protections. In addition, in Pointer v. Texas, 380 U.S. 400, we held that a pretrial hearing can have a profound effect on the trial itself and effectively prevent an accused from having a fair trial. Petitioner clearly did not have a fair determination of his motion to exclude cameras from the courtroom. The very presence of the cameras at the September hearing tended to impress upon the trial judge the power of the communications media and the criticism to which he would have been subjected if he had ruled that the presence of the cameras was inconsistent with petitioner's right to a fair trial. The prejudice to petitioner [*568] did not end here. Most of the trial participants were present at the September hearing -- the judge, defense counsel, prosecutor, prosecution witnesses and defendant himself -- and they saw for themselves the desecration of the courtroom. After undergoing this experience it is unrealistic to suppose that they would come to the October trial unaware that court procedures were being [565] sacrificed in this case for the convenience of television. The manner in which the October proceedings were conducted only intensified this awareness. It was impossible for any of the trial participants ever to be unaware of the presence of television cameras in court for the actual trial. [23] The snouts of the four television cameras protruded through the opening in the booth, and the cameras and their operators were not only readily visible but were impossible to ignore by all who were surveying the activities in this small courtroom. No one could forget that he was constantly in the focus of the "all-seeing eye." Although the law of Texas purportedly permits witnesses to object to being televised, it is ludicrous to place this burden on them. They would naturally accept the conditions of the [1646] courtroom as the judge establishes them, and feel that it would be as presumptuous for them to object to the court's permitting television as to object to the court reporter's recording their testimony. Yet, it is argued that no witnesses objected to being televised. This is indeed a slender reed to rely on, particularly in view of the trial judge's failure, in the course of his self-exculpating statements justifying his decision to allow television, to advise the witnesses or the jurors that they had the right to object to being televised. Defense counsel, however, stated forcefully that he could not concentrate on the case because of the distraction caused by the cameras. And the trial judge's attention [*569] was distracted from the trial since he was compelled to make seven extensive rulings concerning television coverage during the October proceedings alone, when he should, instead, have been concentrating on the trial itself.

23 See Appendix, Photograph 7.

[LEdHR17] [17] It is common knowledge that "television . . . can . . . work profound changes in the behavior of the people it focuses on." [24] The present record provides ample support for scholars who have claimed that awareness that a trial is being televised to a vast, but unseen audience, is bound to increase nervousness and tension, [25] [566] cause an increased [*570] concern about appearances, [26] and bring to the surface latent opportunism that the traditional dignity of the courtroom would discourage. Whether they do so consciously or subconsciously, all trial participants act differently in the presence of television cameras. And, even if all participants make a conscientious and studied effort to be unaffected by the presence of television, this effort in itself prevents them from giving their [1647] full attention to their proper functions at trial. Thus, the evil of televised trials, as demonstrated by this case, lies not in the noise and appearance of the cameras, but in the trial participants' awareness that they are being televised. To the extent that television has such an inevitable impact it undercuts the reliability of the trial process.

25 See, e. g., Douglas, The Public Trial and the Free Press, 46 A. B. A. J. 840, 842 (1960). In United States v. Kleinman, 107 F.Supp. 407 (D. C. D. C. 1952), the court refused to hold in contempt witnesses in a congressional hearing who refused to answer questions while television cameras were focused on them. The court stated:

"The only reason for having a witness on the stand, either before a committee of Congress or before a court, is to get a thoughtful, calm, considered and, it is to be hoped, truthful disclosure of facts. That is not always accomplished, even under the best of circumstances. But at least the atmosphere of the forum should lend itself to that end.

"In the cases now to be decided, the stipulation of facts discloses that there were, in close proximity to the witness, television cameras, newsreel cameras, news photographers with their concomitant flashbulbs, radio microphones, a large and crowded hearing room with spectators standing along the walls, etc. The obdurate stand taken by these two defendants must be viewed in the context of all these conditions. The concentration of all of these elements seems to me necessarily so to disturb and distract any witness to the point that he might say today something that next week he will realize was erroneous. And the mistake could get him in trouble all over again." Id., at 408.

In the early days of this country's development, the entertainment a trial might provide often tended to obfuscate its proper role.

"The people thought holding court one of the greatest performances in the range of their experience. . . . The country folks would crowd in for ten miles to hear these 'great lawyers' plead; and it was a secondary matter with the client whether he won or lost his case, so the 'pleading' was loud and long." [27]

"In early frontier America, when no motion pictures, no television, and no radio provided entertainment, [*571] trial day in the county was like fair day, and from near and far citizens young and old converged on the county seat. The criminal trial was the theater and spectaculum of old rural America. Applause and cat calls were not infrequent. All too easily lawyers and judges became part-time actors at the bar . . . ." [28]

I had thought that these days of frontier justice were long behind us, but the courts below would return the theater to the courtroom.

The televising of trials would cause the public to equate the trial process with the forms of entertainment regularly seen on television and with the commercial objectives of the television industry. In the present case, tapes of the September 24 hearing were run in place of the "Tonight Show" by one station and in place of the late night movie by another. Commercials for soft drinks, soups, eyedrops and seatcovers were inserted when there was a pause in the proceedings. In addition, if trials were televised there would be a natural tendency on the part of broadcasters to develop the personalities of the trial participants, so as to give the proceedings more of an element of drama. This tendency was noticeable in the present case. Television commentators gave the viewing audience a homey, flattering sketch about the trial judge, obviously to add an extra element of viewer appeal to the trial:

"Tomorrow morning at 9:55 the [567] WFAA T. V. cameras will be in Tyler to telecast live [the trial judge's] decision whether or not he will permit live coverage of the Billie Sol Estes trial. If so, this will be the first such famous national criminal proceeding to be televised in its entirety live. [The trial judge] [*572] was appointed to the bench here in Tyler in 1942 by [the Governor]. The judge has served every two years since then. This very beautiful Smith County Courthouse was built and dedicated in 1954, but before that [the trial judge] had made a reputation for himself that reached not only throughout Texas, but throughout the United States as well. It is said that [the trial judge], who is now 53 years old, has tried more cases than any other judge during his time in office."

The television industry might also decide that the bareboned trial itself does not contain sufficient drama to sustain an audience. It might provide expert commentary on the proceedings and hire persons with legal backgrounds to anticipate possible trial strategy, as the football expert anticipates plays for his audience. The trial judge himself stated at the September hearing that if he wanted [1648] to see a ball game he would turn on his television set, so why not the same for a trial.

Moreover, should television become an accepted part of the courtroom, greater sacrifices would be made for the benefit of broadcasters. In the present case construction of a television booth in the courtroom made it necessary to alter the physical layout of the courtroom and to move from their accustomed position two benches reserved for spectators. [29] If this can be done in order better to accommodate the television industry, I see no reason why another court might not move a trial to a theater, if such a move would provide improved television coverage. Our memories are short indeed if we have already forgotten the wave of horror that swept over this country when Premier Fidel Castro conducted his prosecutions before 18,000 people in Havana Stadium. [30] But in the decision [*573] below, which completely ignores the importance of the courtroom in the trial process, we have the beginnings of a similar approach toward criminal "justice." This is not an abstract fear I am expressing because this very situation confronted the Nebraska Supreme Court in Roberts v. State, 100 Neb. 199, 203, 158 N. W. 930, 931-932 (1916):

"The court removed the trial from the court-room to the theater, and stated as a reason therefor: 'By reason of the insufficiency of the court-room to seat and accommodate the people applying for admission . . . it is by the court ordered that the further trial of this cause be had at the Keith Theater, and thereupon the court was adjourned to Keith Theater, where trial proceeded.' The stage was occupied by court, counsel, jury, witnesses, and officers connected with the trial. The theater proper was crowded with curious spectators. Before the trial was completed it was returned to the court-room and concluded there. At the adjournment of court on one occasion the bailiff announced from the stage: 'The regular show will be tomorrow; matinee in the afternoon and another performance at 8:30. Court is now adjourned until 7:30.'"

There [568] would be a real threat to the integrity of the trial process if the television industry and trial judges were allowed to become partners in the staging of criminal proceedings. The trial judge in the case before us had several "conferences [with] representatives of the news media." Post, p. 606. He then entered into a joint enterprise with a television station for the construction of a booth in his courtroom. The next logical step in this partnership might be to schedule the trial for a time that would permit the maximum number of viewers to watch and to schedule recesses to coincide with the need for station breaks. Should the television industry become an [*574] integral part of our system of criminal justice, it would not be unnatural for the public to attribute the shortcomings of the industry to the trial process itself. The public is aware of the television industry's consuming interest in ratings, and it is also aware of the steps that have been taken in the past to maintain viewer interest in television programs. Memories still recall vividly the scandal caused by the disclosure that quiz programs had been corrupted in order to heighten their dramatic appeal. Can we be sure that similar efforts would not be made to heighten the dramatic appeal of televised trials? Can we be sure that the public would not inherently distrust our system of justice because of its intimate association with a commercial enterprise?

Broadcasting in the courtroom would give the television industry an awesome [1649] power to condition the public mind either for or against an accused. By showing only those parts of its films or tapes which depict the defendant or his witnesses in an awkward or unattractive position, television directors could give the community, state or country a false and unfavorable impression of the man on trial. Moreover, if the case should end in a mistrial, the showing of selected portions of the trial, or even of the whole trial, would make it almost impossible to select an impartial jury for a second trial. Cf. Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723. To permit this powerful medium to use the trial process itself to influence the opinions of vast numbers of people, before a verdict of guilt or innocence has been rendered, would be entirely foreign to our system of justice.

The sense of fairness, dignity and integrity that all associate with the courtroom would become lost with its commercialization. Thus, the televising of trials would not only have an effect on those participating in the trials that are being televised, but also on those who observe the trials and later become trial participants.

[*575] It is argued that television not only entertains but also educates the public. But the function of a trial is not to provide an educational experience; and there is a serious danger that any attempt to use a trial as an educational tool will both divert it from its proper purpose and lead to suspicions concerning the integrity of the trial process. The Soviet Union's trial of Francis Gary Powers provides an example in point. The integrity of the trial was suspect because it was concerned not only with determining the guilt of the individual on trial but also with providing an object lesson to the public. This divided effort undercut confidence in the guilt-determining aspect of the procedure and by so doing rendered [569] the educational aspect self-defeating.

"Was it prejudicial to [Powers] that the trial took place in a special hall with over 2,000 spectators, that it was televised, that prominent representatives of many organizations in various countries were invited to attend, that simultaneous oral translations of the proceedings . . . were provided, and that detailed . . . reports of the case in various languages were distributed to the press before, during and after the trial?"

". . . The Soviet legal system . . . consciously and explicitly uses the trial, and indeed the very safeguards of justice themselves, as instruments of the social and political objectives of the state. . . .

". . . A Soviet trial is supposed to be correct, impartial, just, reasonable, and at the same time it is supposed to serve as an object-lesson to society, a means of teaching the participants, the spectators and the public generally to be loyal, obedient, disciplined fighters for Communist ideals. . . .

". . . The tension between the demands of justice and the demands of politics can never be entirely [*576] eliminated. The fate of the accused is bound to be influenced in one way or another when the trial is lifted above its individual facts and deliberately made an object-lesson to the public."

". . . The deliberate use of a trial as a means of political education threatens the integrity of the judicial process." [31]

31 Berman, Introduction to the Trial of the U 2 xiii, xii-xiii, xxix (1960).

Finally, if the televising of criminal proceedings were approved, trials would be selected for television coverage for reasons having nothing to do with the purpose of trial. A trial might be televised because a particular judge has gained the fancy of the public by his unorthodox [1650] approach; or because the district attorney has decided to run for another office and it is believed his appearance would attract a large audience; or simply because a particular courtroom has a layout that best accommodates television coverage. [32] For the most part, however, the most important factor that would draw television to the courtroom would be the nature of the case. The alleged perpetrator of the sensational murder, the fallen idol, or some other person who, like petitioner, has attracted the public interest would find his trial turned into [*577] a vehicle for television. Yet, these are the very persons who encounter the greatest difficulty in securing an impartial trial, even without the presence of television. This Court would no longer be able to point to the dignity and calmness of the courtroom as a protection from outside influences. For the television camera penetrates this protection and brings into the courtroom tangible evidence of the widespread interest in a case -- an interest which has often been fanned by exhaustive reports in the newspapers, [570] television and radio for weeks before trial. The present case presents a clear example of this danger. In the words of petitioner's counsel:

"The Saturday Evening Post, The Readers Digest, Time, Life all had feature stories upon [petitioner's] story giving in detail his life history and the details of . . . alleged fraudulent transactions . . . .

"The metropolitan papers throughout the country featured the story daily. Each day for weeks the broadcasts carried some features of the story." [33]

After living in the glare of this publicity for weeks, petitioner came to court for a legal adjudication of the charges against him. As he approached the courthouse he was confronted by an army of photographers, reporters and television commentators shoving microphones in his face. [34] When he finally made his way into the courthouse it was reasonable for him to expect that he could have a respite from this merciless badgering and have his case adjudicated in a calm atmosphere. Instead, the carnival atmosphere of the September hearing served only to increase the publicity surrounding petitioner and to condition further the public's mind against him. Then, upon his entrance into the courtroom for his actual trial he was [*578] confronted with the sight of the television camera zeroed in on him and the ever-present still photographers snapping pictures of interest. As he opened a newspaper waiting for the proceedings to begin, the close-up lens of a television camera zoomed over his shoulder in an effort to find out what he was reading. In no sense did the dignity and integrity of the trial process shield this petitioner from the prejudicial publicity to which he had been exposed, because that publicity marched right through the courtroom door and made itself at home in heretofore unfamiliar surroundings. We stated in Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335, 344, "From the very beginning, our state and national constitutions and laws have laid great emphasis on procedural and substantive safeguards designed to assure fair trials before impartial tribunals in which every defendant stands equal before the law." This [1651] principle was not applied by the courts below.

32 A revealing dialogue took place in the present case between defense counsel and one of the television executives present in the courtroom during the September 24 hearing.

"Q. The camera on the other side of the room has to look over a corner of the jury box and past the jurors to be aimed at the witness box, does it not?

"A. I think that is pretty clear, sir. I don't think the jurors would be in the way there.

"Q. You don't think the jurors would get in the way of your operations?

"A. I don't mean that exactly, sir."

34 See Appendix, Photograph 4.

I believe petitioner in this case has shown that he was actually prejudiced by the conduct of these proceedings, but I cannot agree with those who say that a televised trial deprives a defendant of a fair trial only if "actual prejudice" can be shown. The prejudice of television may be so subtle that it escapes the ordinary methods of proof, [35] but it would gradually erode our fundamental conception of trial. [36] A defendant may be unable to prove that he was actually prejudiced by a televised trial, just as he may be unable to prove that the introduction of a coerced confession at his trial influenced the jury to convict him when there was substantial evidence to support his conviction aside from the confession, Payne v. Arkansas, supra; that the jury refrained from making a [*579] clear-cut determination [571] on the voluntariness question, Jackson v. Denno, supra; that a particular judge was swayed by a direct financial interest in his conviction, Tumey v. Ohio, supra; or that the jury gave additional weight to the testimony of certain prosecution witnesses because of the jury's repeated contacts with those witnesses during the trial, Turner v. Louisiana, supra. How is the defendant to prove that the prosecutor acted differently than he ordinarily would have, that defense counsel was more concerned with impressing prospective clients than with the interests of the defendant, that a juror was so concerned with how he appeared on television that his mind continually wandered from the proceedings, that an important defense witness made a bad impression on the jury because he was "playing" to the television audience, or that the judge was a little more lenient or a little more strict than he usually might be? And then, how is petitioner to show that this combination of changed attitudes diverted the trial sufficiently from its purpose to deprive him of a fair trial? It is no answer to say that an appellate court can review for itself tapes or films of the proceedings. In the first place, it is not clear that the court would be able to obtain unedited tapes or films to review. Even with the cooperation of counsel on both sides, this Court was unable to obtain films of this trial which were in any sense complete. In addition, time limitations might restrict the television companies to taking pictures only of those portions of the trial that are most newsworthy and most likely to attract the attention of the viewing audience. More importantly, the tapes or films, even if unedited, could give a wrong impression of the proceedings. The camera which takes pictures cannot take a picture of itself. In addition, the camera cannot possibly cover the actions of all trial participants during the trial. While the camera is focused on the [*580] judge who is apparently acting properly, a juror may be glancing up to see where the camera is pointing and counsel may be looking around to see whether he can confer with his client without the close-up lens of the camera focusing on them. Needless to say, the camera cannot penetrate the minds of the trial participants and show their awareness that they may at that moment be the subject of the camera's focus. The most the camera can show is that a formally correct trial took place, but our Constitution requires more than form.

35 See, e. g., Douglas, supra, note 25, at 844.

36 Cf. Fay v. New York, 332 U.S. 261, 300 (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Murphy).

I recognize that the television industry has shown in the past that it can be an enlightening and informing institution, but like other institutions it must respect the rights of others and cannot demand that we alter fundamental constitutional conceptions for its benefit. We must take notice of the inherent unfairness of television [1652] in the courtroom and rule that its presence is inconsistent with the "fundamental conception" of what a trial should be. My conviction that this is the proper holding in this case is buttressed by the almost unanimous condemnation of televised court proceedings by the judiciary in this country and by the strong opposition to the practice by the organized bar in this country. Canon 35 of the American Bar Association's Canons of Judicial Ethics prohibits the televising of court trials. [37] With only [572] two, or possibly three exceptions, [38] the highest court of each [*581] State which has considered the question has declared that televised criminal trials are inconsistent with the Anglo-American conception of "trial." [39] Similarly, [1653] Rule 53 of the Federal [573] Rules of Criminal Procedure prohibits [*582] the "broadcasting" of trials, [40] and the Judicial Conference of the United States has unanimously condemned televised trials. [41] This condemnation rests on more than notions of policy; it arises from an understanding of the [*583] constitutional conception of the term "trial." Such a general consensus is certainly relevant to this Court's determination of the question. See Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643, 651.

37 The Canon provides in pertinent part:

"Proceedings in court should be conducted with fitting dignity and decorum. The taking of photographs in the court room, during sessions of the court or recesses between sessions, and the broadcasting or televising of court proceedings detract from the essential dignity of the proceedings, distract participants and witnesses in giving testimony, and create misconceptions with respect thereto in the mind of the public and should not be permitted."

38 Colorado, In re Hearings Concerning Canon 35 of the Canons of Judicial Ethics, 296 P. 2d 465

(Colo. Sup. Ct. 1956), and Texas permit televising of trials in the discretion of the trial judge. The current situation in Oklahoma is unclear. In Lyles v. State, 330 P. 2d 734 (1958), the Criminal Court of Appeals of Oklahoma stated that the televising of proceedings was in the discretion of the trial judge. In 1959, however, the Supreme Court adopted a rule prohibiting television during actual proceedings. Okla. Stat. Ann., Tit. 5, at 65-66 (1963 Supp.). Nevertheless, in 1961 the court again stated that the televising of trials is a matter for the trial judge's discretion. Cody v. State, 361 P. 2d 307 (Ct. Crim. App. Okla. 1961).

39 With the exceptions stated in note 38, supra, no State affirmatively permits televised trials. It has been stated that Canon 35 is in effect in 30 States. 48 J. Am. Jud. Soc. 80 (1964); Brief for Petitioner, p. 39. It is difficult to verify this figure because of the lack of uniformity among the States in reporting their court rules. However, the following States have clearly adopted Canon 35, or its equivalent: Alaska, Alaska Rules Crim. Proc. 48; Arizona, Ariz. Sup. Ct. Rule 45, 17 Ariz. Rev. Stat. Ann., at 40; Connecticut, Conn. Practice Book 27 (1963); Delaware, Del. Sup. Ct. Rule 33, 13 Del. Code Ann., at 23 (1964 Supp.) (adopted Canon 35 in its pre-1952 form, which does not explicitly prohibit television, but does prohibit "the taking of photographs" and "broadcasting of court proceedings"); Florida, Code of Ethics, Rule A35, 31 Fla. Stat. Ann., at 285 (1964 Supp.), see Brumfield v. State, 108 So. 2d 33 (Fla. Sup. Ct. 1958); Hawaii, Hawaii Sup. Ct. Rule 16, 43 Haw. 450; Illinois, 1964 Ann. Rep. of the Ill. Judicial Conference 168-169, see People v. Ulrich, 376 Ill. 461, 34 N. E. 2d 393 (1941), People v. Munday, 280 Ill. 32, 117 N. E. 286 (1917); Iowa, Iowa Sup. Ct. Rule 119, 40 Iowa Code Ann., c. 610 (1964 Supp.); Kansas, Kansas Sup. Ct. Rule 117, 191 Kan. xxiv (1963) (does not refer specifically to television); Kentucky, Ky. Ct. App. Rule 3.170, Russell's Kentucky Practice and Service 21 (1964); Louisiana, Canon of Judicial Ethics XXIII, 242 La. LI (1960); Michigan, Canon of Judicial Ethics 35, Callaghan's Michigan Pleading and Practice, Rules at 422-423 (2d ed. 1962); New Jersey, Canon of Judicial Ethics 35, 1 Waltzinger, New Jersey Practice 299 (Rev. ed. 1954); New Mexico, N. M. Sup. Ct. Rule 27, 4 N. M. Stat. Ann., at 95 (1963 Supp.); New York, N. Y. Rules of the Administrative Board of the Judicial Conference, Rule 5, N. Y. Judiciary Law, at 320 (1964 Supp.); Ohio, 176 Ohio St. lxiv (1964), see State v. Clifford, 162 Ohio St. 370, 123 N. E. 2d 8 (1954), cert. denied, 349 U.S. 929; Tennessee, Tenn. Sup. Ct. Rule 38, 209 Tenn. 818 (1961); Virginia, 201 Va. cvii (1960) (prohibits taking of photographs and broadcasting, although it does not refer specifically to television); Washington, 61 Wash. 2d xxviii (1963); West Virginia, 141 W. Va. viii (1955).

In addition, Brand, Bar Associations, Attorneys and Judges (1956 and 1959 Supp.) reports that the Idaho Supreme Court adopted Canon 35 in its present form and the Supreme Courts of Oregon, South Dakota and Utah adopted the Canon when it merely prohibited "photographing" and "broadcasting" without specifically mentioning television. It has also been reported that the Supreme Court of Arkansas adopted Canon 35. 44 J. Am. Jud. Soc. 120 (1960).

Moreover, the Supreme Court of California assumed it was "improper" to televise criminal proceedings in People v. Stroble, 36 Cal. 2d 615, 226 P. 2d 330 (1951), affirmed 343 U.S. 181, rehearing denied 343 U.S. 952; see the rule adopted by the Conference of California Judges, 24 Cal. State Bar J. 299 (1949); the Court of Appeals of Maryland in Ex parte Sturm, 152 Md. 114, 122, 136 A. 312, 315 (1927), used language indicating that Maryland would probably bar television from the courtroom if faced with the problem; and the Supreme Court of Pennsylvania cited with approval Canon 35 in Mack Appeal, 386 Pa. 251, 257, n. 5, 126 A. 2d 679, 681-682, n. 4 (1956), cert. denied, 352 U.S. 1002, see 48 J. Am. Jud. Soc. 200 (1965).

40 Rule 53 provides:

"The taking of photographs in the court room during the progress of judicial proceedings or radio broadcasting of judicial proceedings from the court room shall not be permitted by the court."

41 "Resolved, That the Judicial Conference of the United States condemns the taking of photographs in the courtroom or its environs in connection with any judicial proceedings, and the broadcasting of judicial proceedings by radio, television, or other means, and considers such practices to be inconsistent with fair judicial procedure and that they ought not to be permitted in any federal court." Annual Report of the Proceedings of the Judicial Conference of the United States, March 8-9, 1962, p. 10.

IV.

Nothing in this opinion is inconsistent with the constitutional guarantees of a public trial and the freedoms of speech and the press.

This Court explained in In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, 266, 270, that the public trial provision of the Sixth Amendment is a "guarantee to an accused" designed to "safeguard against any attempt to employ our courts as instruments of persecution." Clearly the openness of the proceedings provides other benefits as well: it arguably improves the quality of testimony, it may induce unknown witnesses to come forward with relevant testimony, it may move all trial participants to perform their duties conscientiously, and it gives the public the opportunity to observe the courts in the performance of their duties and to determine whether they are performing adequately. [42] But the guarantee of a public trial confers no special benefit on the press, the radio industry or the television industry. A public trial is a necessary component of an accused's right to a fair trial and the concept of public trial cannot be used to defend conditions which prevent the trial process from providing a fair and reliable determination of guilt.

42 See, e. g., 3 Blackstone, Commentaries on the Laws of England 372-373 (15th ed. 1809); 6 Wigmore, Evidence 332-335 (3d ed. 1940).

[LEdHR18] [18] [LEdHR19] [19]To satisfy the constitutional requirement that trials be public it is not necessary to provide facilities large enough [*584] for all who might like to attend a particular trial, since to do so would interfere with the integrity of the trial process and make the publicity of trial proceedings an end in itself. Nor does the requirement that trials be public mean that observers are free to act as they please in the courtroom, for persons who attend trials cannot act in such a way as to interfere with the trial [1654] process, see Moore v. Dempsey, supra. When representatives of the communications media attend trials they have no greater rights than other members of the public. Just as an ordinary citizen might be prohibited from using field glasses or a motion picture camera in the courthouse because by so doing he would interfere with the conduct of the trial, representatives of the press and broadcasting industries [574] are subject to similar limitations when they attend court. Since the televising of criminal trials diverts the trial process from its proper end, it must be prohibited. This prohibition does not conflict with the constitutional guarantee of a public trial, because a trial is public, in the constitutional sense, when a courtroom has facilities for a reasonable number of the public to observe the proceedings, which facilities are not so small as to render the openness negligible and not so large as to distract the trial participants from their proper function, when the public is free to use those facilities, and when all those who attend the trial are free to report what they observed at the proceedings.

Nor does the exclusion of television cameras from the courtroom in any way impinge upon the freedoms of speech and the press. Court proceedings, as well as other public matters, are proper subjects for press coverage.

"A trial is a public event. What transpires in the court room is public property. If a transcript of the court proceedings had been published, we suppose [*585] none would claim that the judge could punish the publisher for contempt. And we can see no difference though the conduct of the attorneys, of the jury, or even of the judge himself, may have reflected on the court. Those who see and hear what transpired can report it with impunity. There is no special perquisite of the judiciary which enables it, as distinguished from other institutions of democratic government, to suppress, edit, or censor events which transpire in proceedings before it." [43]

So long as the television industry, like the other communications media, is free to send representatives to trials and to report on those trials to its viewers, there is no abridgment of the freedom of press. The right of the communications media to comment on court proceedings does not bring with it the right to inject themselves into the fabric of the trial process to alter the purpose of that process.

43 Craig v. Harney, 331 U.S. 367, 374. See

In summary, television is one of the great inventions of all time and can perform a large and useful role in society. But the television camera, like other technological innovations, is not entitled to pervade the lives of everyone in disregard of constitutionally protected rights. [44] The television industry, like other institutions, has a proper area of activities and limitations beyond which it cannot go with its cameras. That area does not extend into an American courtroom. On entering that [*586] hallowed sanctuary, where the lives, liberty and property of people are in jeopardy, television representatives have only the rights of the general public, namely, to be present, to observe the proceedings, and thereafter, if they choose, to report them.

44 Compare Olmstead v. United States, 277 U.S. 438, 471 (dissenting opinion of Mr. Justice Brandeis); On Lee v. United States, 343 U.S. 747, 762 (dissenting opinion of MR. JUSTICE DOUGLAS); Silverman v. United States, 365 U.S. 505; Lopez v. United States, 373 U.S. 427, 445-446 (opinion concurring in the result), 465 (dissenting opinion of MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN).

[*587] [583] [1662] MR. JUSTICE HARLAN, concurring.

I concur in the opinion of the Court, subject, however, to the reservations and only to the extent indicated in this opinion.

The constitutional issue presented by this case is far-reaching in its implications for the administration of justice in this country. The precise question is whether the Fourteenth Amendment prohibits a State, over the objection of a defendant, from employing television in the courtroom to televise contemporaneously, or subsequently by means of videotape, the courtroom proceedings of a criminal trial of widespread public interest. The issue is no narrower than this because petitioner has not asserted any isolatable prejudice resulting from the presence of television apparatus within the courtroom or from the contemporaneous or subsequent broadcasting of the trial proceedings. On the other hand, the issue is no broader, for we are concerned here only with a criminal trial of great notoriety, and not with criminal proceedings of a more or less routine nature.

The question is fraught with unusual difficulties. Permitting television in the courtroom undeniably has mischievous potentialities for intruding upon the detached atmosphere which should always surround the judicial process. Forbidding this innovation, however, would doubtless impinge upon one of the valued attributes of our federalism by preventing the States from pursuing a novel course of procedural experimentation. My conclusion is that there is no constitutional requirement that television be allowed in the courtroom, and, at least as to a notorious criminal trial such as this one, the considerations against allowing television in the courtroom so far outweigh the countervailing factors advanced in its support as to require a holding that what was done in this case infringed the fundamental right to a fair trial assured by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment.

[*588] Some preliminary observations are in order: All would agree, I am sure, that at its worst, television is capable of distorting the trial process so as to deprive it of fundamental fairness. Cables, kleig lights, interviews with the principal participants, commentary on their performances, "commercials" at frequent intervals, special wearing apparel and makeup for the trial participants -- certainly such things would not conduce to the sound administration of justice by any acceptable standard. But that is not the case before us. We must judge television as we find it in this trial -- relatively unobtrusive, with the cameras contained in a booth at the back of the courtroom.

I.

[LEdHR20] [20]No constitutional provision guarantees a right to televise trials. The "public trial" guarantee of the Sixth Amendment, which reflects a concept fundamental to the administration of justice in this Country, In re Oliver, 333 U.S. 257, certainly does not require that television be admitted to the courtroom. See United Press Assns. v. Valente, 308 N. Y. 71, 123 N. E. 2d 777. Essentially, the public-trial guarantee embodies a view of human nature, true as a general rule, that judges, lawyers, witnesses, and jurors will perform their respective functions more responsibly in an open court than in secret proceedings. In re Oliver, supra, at 266-273. [584] A fair trial is the objective, and "public trial" is an institutional safeguard for attaining it.

Thus the right of "public trial" is not one belonging to the public, but one belonging to the accused, and inhering in the institutional process by which justice is administered. Obviously, the public-trial guarantee is not violated if an individual member of the public cannot gain admittance to a courtroom because there are no available seats. The guarantee will already have been met, for the "public" will be present in the form of those [1663] persons [*589] who did gain admission. Even the actual presence of the public is not guaranteed. A public trial implies only that the court must be open to those who wish to come, sit in the available seats, conduct themselves with decorum, and observe the trial process. It does not give anyone a concomitant right to photograph, record, broadcast, or otherwise transmit the trial proceedings to those members of the public not present, although to be sure, the guarantee of public trial does not of itself prohibit such activity.

The free speech and press guarantees of the First and Fourteenth Amendments are also asserted as embodying a positive right to televise trials, but the argument is greatly overdrawn. Unquestionably, television has become a very effective medium for transmitting news. Many trials are newsworthy, and televising them might well provide the most accurate and comprehensive means of conveying their content to the public. Furthermore, television is capable of performing an educational function by acquainting the public with the judicial process in action. Albeit these are credible policy arguments in favor of television, they are not arguments of constitutional proportions. The rights to print and speak, over television as elsewhere, do not embody an independent right to bring the mechanical facilities of the broadcasting and printing industries into the courtroom. Once beyond the confines of the courthouse, a news-gathering agency may publicize, within wide limits, what its representatives have heard and seen in the courtroom. But the line is drawn at the courthouse door; and within, a reporter's constitutional rights are no greater than those of any other member of the public. Within the courthouse the only relevant constitutional consideration is that the accused be accorded a fair trial. If the presence of television substantially detracts from that goal, due process requires that its use be forbidden.

[*590] I see no force in the argument that to exclude television apparatus from the courtroom, while at the same time permitting newspaper reporters to bring in their pencils and notebooks, would discriminate in favor of the press as against the broadcasting services. The distinctions to be drawn between the accouterments of the press and the television media turn not on differences of size and shape but of function and effect. The presence of the press at trials may have a distorting effect, but it is not caused by their pencils and notebooks. If it were, I would not hesitate to say that such physical paraphernalia should be barred.

II.

The probable impact of courtroom television on the fairness of a trial may vary according to the particular kind of case involved. The impact of television on a trial exciting [585] wide popular interest may be one thing; the impact on a run-of-the-mill case may be quite another. Furthermore, the propriety of closed circuit television for the purpose of making a court recording or for limited use in educational institutions obviously presents markedly different considerations. The Estes trial was a heavily publicized and highly sensational affair. I therefore put aside all other types of cases; in so doing, however, I wish to make it perfectly clear that I am by no means prepared to say that the constitutional issue should ultimately turn upon the nature of the particular case involved. When the issue of television in a non-notorious trial is presented it may appear that no workable distinction can be drawn based on the type of case involved, or that the possibilities for prejudice, though less severe, are nonetheless of constitutional proportions. Compare Powell v. Alabama, 287 U.S. 45; Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455; Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335. The resolution of those further questions should await an appropriate [1664] case; the [*591] Court should proceed only step by step in this unplowed field. The opinion of the Court necessarily goes no farther, for only the four members of the majority who unreservedly join the Court's opinion would resolve those questions now.

I do not deem the constitutional inquiry in this case ended by the finding, in effect conceded by petitioner's counsel, that no isolatable prejudice was occasioned by the manner in which television was employed in this case. [1] Courtroom television introduces into the conduct of a criminal trial the element of professional "showmanship," an extraneous influence whose subtle capacities for serious mischief in a case of this sort will not be underestimated by any lawyer experienced in the elusive imponderables of the trial arena. In the context of a trial of intense public interest, there is certainly a strong possibility that the timid or reluctant witness, for whom a court appearance even at its traditional best is a harrowing affair, will become more timid or reluctant when he finds that he will also be appearing before a "hidden audience" of unknown but large dimensions. There is certainly a strong possibility that the "cocky" witness having a thirst for the limelight will become more "cocky" under the influence of television. And who can say that the juror who is gratified by having been chosen for a front-line case, an ambitious prosecutor, a publicity-minded defense counsel, and even a conscientious judge will not stray, albeit unconsciously, from doing what "comes naturally" into pluming themselves for a satisfactory television "performance"?

1 The trial judge ordered that there was to be no audio transmission of the witnesses' testimony. The witnesses, however, were present at the September hearing when everything was broadcast, and the record does not show affirmatively that they were aware that the microphone which confronted them during the actual trial was not being used for the same purpose.

[*592] Surely possibilities of this kind carry grave potentialities for distorting the integrity of the judicial process bearing on the determination of the guilt or innocence of the accused, and, more particularly, for casting doubt on the reliability of the fact-finding process carried on under such conditions. See Douglas, [586] The Public Trial and the Free Press, 46 A. B. A. J. 840 (1960). To be sure, such distortions may produce no telltale signs, but in a highly publicized trial the danger of their presence is substantial, and their effects may be far more pervasive and deleterious than the physical disruptions which all concede would vitiate a conviction. A lively public interest could increase the size of the viewing audience immensely, and the masses of spectators to whom the trial is telecast would have become emotionally involved with the case through the dissemination of pretrial publicity, the usual concomitant of such a case. The presence of television would certainly emphasize to the trial participants that the case is something "special." Particularly treacherous situations are presented in cases where pretrial publicity has been massive [2] even when jurors positively state they will not be influenced by it; see Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723; Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717. To increase the possibility of influence and the danger of a "popular verdict" by subjecting the jurors to the view of a mass audience whose approach to the case has been conditioned by pretrial publicity can only make a bad situation worse. The entire thrust of rules of evidence and the other protections attendant upon the modern trial is to keep extraneous influences out of the courtroom. Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466, 472-473. [1665] As we recently observed in Turner, "Mr. Justice Holmes stated no more than a truism when he observed that 'Any judge who has sat with juries knows that in spite of forms they [*593] are extremely likely to be impregnated by the environing atmosphere.' Frank v. Mangum, 237 U.S. 309, at 349 (dissenting opinion)." Id., at 472. [3] The knowledge on the part of the jury and other trial participants that they are being televised to an emotionally involved audience can only aggravate the atmosphere created by pretrial publicity.

2 Petitioner in this case amassed 11 volumes of pretrial press clippings.

3 The Court had occasion to recognize in Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 565, that even "judges are human" and not immune from outside environmental influences.

The State argues that specific prejudice must be shown for the Due Process Clause to apply. I do not believe that the Fourteenth Amendment is so impotent when the trial practices in question are instinct with dangers to constitutional guarantees. I am at a loss to understand how the Fourteenth Amendment can be thought not to encompass protection of a state criminal trial from the dangers created by the intrusion of collateral and wholly irrelevant influences into the courtroom. The Court has not hesitated in the past to condemn such practices, even without any positive showing of isolatable prejudice. In Turner v. Louisiana, supra, decided just this Term, we held that the "potentialities" for distortion of the trial created by a key witness serving as bailiff to a sequestered jury were sufficient to violate the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. In Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, the Court made the judgment that a trial judge's determination of a coerced-confession issue is more likely to avoid prejudice than a jury [587] determination, a judgment which indeed overrode a long-standing contrary state practice. And in Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717, we held that flamboyant pretrial publicity cast sufficient doubt on the impartiality of the jury to vitiate a conviction, even in the face of statements by all the jurors that they were not subject to its influence. See 366 U.S., at 729 (Frankfurter, J., concurring). Other examples of [*594] instances in which the Court has exercised its judgment as to the effects of one thing or another on human behavior are plentiful. See, e. g., Griffin v. California, 380 U.S. 609; Tancil v. Woolls, 379 U.S. 19; Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643 (compare People v. Defore, 242 N. Y. 13, 150 N. E. 585); Avery v. Georgia, 345 U.S. 559; Brown v. Board of Education, 347 U.S. 483; Tumey v. Ohio, 273 U.S. 510.

The judgment that the presence of television in the courtroom represents a serious danger to the trial process is supported by a vast segment of the Bar of this country, as evidenced by Canon 35 of the Canons of Judicial Ethics of the American Bar Association, counseling against such practices, [4] the views of the Judicial Conference of the United States (infra, p. 601), Rule 53 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure, and even the "personal views" (post, pp. 601-602) of the Justices on the dissenting side of the present case.

4 The consistent position of the American Bar Association is set out in the Appendix.

The arguments advanced against the constitutional banning of televised trials seem to me peculiarly unpersuasive. It is said that the pictorial broadcasting of trials will serve to educate the public as to the nature of the judicial process. Whatever force such arguments might [1666] have in run-of-the-mill cases, they carry little weight in cases of the sort before us, where the public's interest in viewing the trial is likely to be engendered more by curiosity about the personality of the well-known figure who is the defendant (as here), or about famous witnesses or lawyers who will appear on the television screen, or about the details of the particular crime involved, than by innate curiosity to learn about the workings of the judicial process itself. Indeed it would be naive not to suppose that it would be largely such factors that would qualify a trial for commercial television [*595] "billing," and it is precisely that kind of case where the risks of permitting television coverage of the proceedings are at their greatest.

It is also asserted that televised trials will cause witnesses to be more truthful, and jurors, judges, and lawyers more diligent. To say the least this argument is sophistic, for it is impossible to believe that the reliability of a trial as a method of finding facts and determining guilt or innocence increases in relation to the size of the crowd which is watching it. Attendance by interested spectators in the courtroom will fully satisfy the safeguards of "public trial." Once openness is thus assured, the addition of masses of spectators would, I venture to say, detract rather than add to the reliability of the process. See Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 562. A trial in Yankee Stadium, even if the [588] crowd sat in stony silence, would be a substantially different affair from a trial in a traditional courtroom under traditional conditions, and the difference would not, I think, be that the witnesses, lawyers, judges, and jurors in the stadium would be more truthful, diligent, and capable of reliably finding facts and determining guilt or innocence. [5] There will be no disagreement, I am sure, among those competent to judge that precisely the opposite would likely be the case.

5 There may, of course, be a difference in impact upon the atmosphere and trial participants between the physical presence of masses of people and the presence of a camera lens which permits masses of people to observe the process remotely. However, the critical element is the knowledge of the trial participants that they are subject to such visual observation, an element which is, of course, present in this case.

Finally, we should not be deterred from making the constitutional judgment which this case demands by the prospect that the day may come when television will have become so commonplace an affair in the daily life of the average person as to dissipate all reasonable likelihood that its use in courtrooms may disparage the judicial process. If and when that day arrives the constitutional [*596] judgment called for now would of course be subject to re-examination in accordance with the traditional workings of the Due Process Clause. At the present juncture I can only conclude that televised trials, at least in cases like this one, possess such capabilities for interfering with the even course of the judicial process that they are constitutionally banned. On these premises I concur in the opinion of the Court.

APPENDIX TO OPINION OF MR. JUSTICE

HARLAN, CONCURRING.

The development of Canon 35 is set out at length in the amicus curiae brief of the American Bar Association, pp. 3-8, as follows:

"It [Canon 35] was originally adopted on September 30, 1937 by the House of Delegates [1] in the following form:

"'Proceedings in court should be conducted with fitting dignity and decorum. The taking of photographs [1667] in the court room, during sessions of the court or recesses between sessions, and the broadcasting of court proceedings are calculated to detract from the essential dignity of the proceedings, degrade the court and create misconceptions with respect thereto in the mind of the public and should not be permitted.' 62 A. B. A. Rep. 1134-35 (1937).

1 "The House of Delegates is not only the governing body of the American Bar Association; because of the presence of representatives of all State Bar Associations, the largest and most important local bar associations, and of other important national professional groups, it is in fact a broadly representative policy forum for the profession as a whole."

"A Special Committee on Cooperation Between Press, Radio and Bar, as to Publicity Interfering with Fair Trial of Judicial and Quasi-Judicial Proceedings had reported to the Association its grave concern with the dangers attendant upon the use of radio in connection with trials, particularly [*597] in light of the spectacular publicity and broadcast of the trial of Bruno Hauptmann. [2] The Committee specifically referred to the evil of 'trial in the air'. [3] 62 A. B. A. REP. 860 (1937).

2 "See State v. Hauptmann, 115 N. J. L. 412, 180 Atl. 809 (Ct. Err. & App.), cert. denied, 296 U.S. 649 (1935)."

3 "Prior to the adoption of Judicial Canon 35, the impropriety of permitting radio broadcasts of court proceedings was recognized by the Committee on Professional Ethics and Grievances of the Association in its Opinion No. 67, March 21, 1932. The Committee had recourse to Judicial Canon 34 which provides that a judge should not administer his office 'for the purpose of advancing his personal ambitions or increasing his popularity.' The Committee found that radio broadcasting of a trial changes 'what should be the most serious of human institutions either into an enterprise for the entertainment of the public or of one for promoting publicity for the judge.' AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, OPINIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON PROFESSIONAL ETHICS AND GRIEVANCES 163 (1957)."

"After [589] the adoption of Judicial Canon 35, the direct radio broadcasting of court proceedings was disapproved by the Association's Committee on Professional Ethics and Grievances in its Opinion No. 212, March 15, 1941, as being specifically condemned. The Committee quoted with approval the following statement of the Michigan and Detroit Bar Associations:

"'Such broadcasts are unfair to the defendant and to the witnesses. The natural embarrassment and confusion of a citizen on trial should not be increased by a realization that his voice and his difficulties are being used as entertainment for a vast radio audience. The fear expressed by most persons when facing an audience or microphone is a matter of common knowledge, and but few defendants or witnesses can properly concentrate on facts and testify fully and fairly when so handicapped. . . . Such broadcasts are unfair to the Judge, who should be permitted to devote his undivided attention to the case, unmindful of the effect which his comments or decision may [*598] have upon the radio audience.' AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION, OPINIONS OF THE COMMITTEE ON PROFESSIONAL ETHICS AND GRIEVANCES 426 (1957).

"In 1952, the growing prominence of television as a medium of mass communication was dealt with in a report of the Special Committee on Televising and Broadcasting Legislative and Judicial Proceedings [headed by the late John W. Davis]. 77 A. B. A. REP. 607 (1952). In condemning the practice of televising judicial proceedings, the Committee called attention to the fact that:

"'The attention of the court, the jury, lawyers and witnesses should be concentrated upon the trial itself and ought not to be divided with the television or broadcast audience who for the most part have merely the interest of curiosity in the proceedings. It is not difficult to conceive that all participants may become over-concerned with the impression their actions, [1668] rulings or testimony will make on the absent multitude.' Id. at 610.

"As a result of this report, and the recommendation of the Committee on Professional Ethics and Grievances, Judicial Canon 35 was amended by inserting a ban on the 'televising' of court proceedings and inserting the descriptive phrase 'distract the witness in giving his testimony' before the phrase 'degrade the court.' In addition, a second paragraph was added providing for the televising and broadcasting of certain ceremonial proceedings. Id. at 110-11.

"In October, 1954, the Board of Governors authorized the appointment of a Special Bar-Media Conference Committee on Fair Trial-Free Press to meet with representatives of the press, radio, and television. The views of both sides were thoroughly explored and were presented in detail in the September, [590] 1956 issue of the American Bar Association Journal. [4] After extensive joint debate, [*599] no solutions or agreements were reached. 83 A. B. A. REP. 790-91 (1958). The Committee did report that it was convinced that "'courtroom photographing or broadcasting or both would impose undue police duties upon the trial judge[,] . . . that the broadcasting and the photographing in the courtroom might have an adverse psychological effect upon trial participants, judges, lawyers, witnesses and juries[,] . . . [and] that partial broadcasts of trials, particularly on television, might influence public opinion which in turn might influence trial results. . . .' Id. at 645.

4 " 42 A.B.A.J. 834, 838, 843 (1956)."

"Following the presentation of the Bar-Media Conference Committee report and in connection with the consideration of a report and recommendation of a Special Committee of the American Bar Foundation created in July, 1955 (83 A. B. A. REP. 643-45 (1958)), the House of Delegates conducted a hearing as a 'Committee of the Whole' during its February, 1958 session at which proponents and opponents of Judicial Canon 35 were fully heard. 83 A. B. A. REP. 648-69 (1958). Thereafter, at the August, 1958 meeting of the House of Delegates, it was decided to have a Special Committee study Canon 35 and "'conduct further studies of the problem, including the obtaining of a body of reliable factual data on the experience of judges and lawyers in those courts where either photography, televising or broadcasting, or all of them, are permitted. . . . The fundamental objective of the Committee and of all others interested must be to consider and make recommendations which will preserve the right of fair trial.' 83 A. B. A. REP. 284 (1958).

"The Special Committee filed an Interim Report and Recommendations with the House of Delegates in August, [*600] 1962 setting forth the 'Area and Perspective' of its survey and studies. The report included portions of testimony by media representatives taken at a hearing held in Chicago on February 18, 1962, as well as a summary of the Committee's informal conference with certain representatives from Colorado and Texas. In addition, the report included written comments by officers of State Bar Associations responding to a Committee survey, and certain general correspondence received by the Committee regarding Judicial Canon 35. The report also listed significant publications favoring either revision or retention of the Canon. . . . [Hereinafter cited Int. Rep.]

"The Special Committee thereafter submitted its final report and recommendations, concluding that the substantive provisions of Judicial Canon 35 remain valid and 'should be retained as essential safeguards of the individual's inviolate [1669] and personal right of fair trial.' . . . The Committee did recommend certain minor deletions . . . and changes . . . which were adopted by the House of Delegates, after full debate, on February 5, 1963:

"'The taking of photographs in the court room, during sessions of the court or recesses between sessions, and the broadcasting or televising of court proceedings [are calculated to] detract from the essential dignity of the proceedings, distract [the] participants and witnesses in giving [his] testimony, [degrade the court] and create misconceptions [591] with respect thereto in the mind of the public and should not be permitted.' [5] 5 "The full text of Judicial Canon 35, as amended, is as follows:

"'IMPROPER PUBLICIZING OF COURT PROCEEDINGS

"'Proceedings in court should be conducted with fitting dignity and decorum. The taking of photographs in the court room, during sessions of the court or recesses between sessions, and the broadcasting or televising of court proceedings detract from the essential dignity of the proceedings, distract participants and witnesses in giving testimony, and create misconceptions with respect thereto in the mind of the public and should not be permitted.

"'Provided that this restriction shall not apply to the broadcasting or televising, under the supervision of the court, of such portions of naturalization proceedings (other than the interrogation of applicants) as are designed and carried out exclusively as a ceremony for the purpose of publicly demonstrating in an impressive manner the essential dignity and the serious nature of naturalization.'"

[*601] "A vast majority of the states have voluntarily adopted Judicial Canon 35 in one form or another, and it has been embodied in principle in Rule 53 of the Federal Rules of Criminal Procedure. In a recent Resolution of the Judicial Conference of the United States, the philosophy of Canon 35 was unanimously reaffirmed:

"'Resolved, That the Judicial Conference of the United States condemns the taking of photographs in the courtroom or its environs in connection with any judicial proceeding, and the broadcasting of judicial proceedings by radio, television, or other means, and considers such practices to be inconsistent with fair judicial procedure and that they ought not to be permitted in any federal court.' Int. Rep. p. 97."

DISSENT BY: STEWART; WHITE; BRENNAN

DISSENT

MR. JUSTICE STEWART, whom MR. JUSTICE BLACK, MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN, and MR. JUSTICE WHITE join, dissenting.

I cannot agree with the Court's decision that the circumstances of this trial led to a denial of the petitioner's Fourteenth Amendment rights. I think that the introduction of television into a courtroom is, at least in the present state of the art, an extremely unwise policy. It invites many constitutional risks, and it detracts from the inherent dignity of a courtroom. But I am unable to escalate this personal view into a per se constitutional [*602] rule. And I am unable to find, on the specific record of this case, that the circumstances attending the limited televising of the petitioner's trial resulted in the denial of any right guaranteed to him by the United States Constitution.

On October 22, 1962, the petitioner went to trial in the Seventh Judicial District Court of Smith County, Texas, upon an indictment charging him with the offenses of (1) swindling, (2) theft by false pretenses, and (3) theft by a bailee. After a week spent in selecting a jury, the trial itself lasted some three and a half days. At its conclusion the jury found the petitioner guilty of the offense of swindling under the first count of the indictment. The trial judge permitted portions of the trial proceedings [1670] to be televised, under the limitations described below. He also gave news photographers permission to take still pictures in the courtroom under specified conditions.

The Texas Court of Criminal Appeals affirmed the petitioner's conviction, and we granted certiorari, [592] limited to a single question. The question, as phrased by the petitioner, is this:

"Whether the action of the trial court, over petitioner's continued objection, denied him due process of law and equal protection of the laws under the Fourteenth Amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in requiring petitioner to submit to live television of his trial, and in refusing to adopt in this all out publicity case, as a rule of trial procedure, Canon 35 of the Canons of Judicial Ethics of the American Bar Association, and instead adopting and following, over defendant's objection, Canon 28 of the Canons of Judicial Ethics, since approved by the Judicial Section of the integrated (State agency) State Bar of Texas."

The two Canons of Judicial Ethics referred to in the petitioner's statement of the question presented are set [*603] out in the margin. [1] But, as the Court rightly says, the problem before us is not one of choosing between the conflicting guidelines reflected in these Canons of Judicial Ethics. It is a problem rooted in the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. We deal here with matters subject to continuous and unforeseeable change -- the [*604] techniques of public communication. In an area where all the [1671] variables may be modified tomorrow, I cannot at this time rest my determination on hypothetical possibilities not present in the record of this case. There is no claim here based upon any right guaranteed by the [593] First Amendment. But it is important to remember that we move in an area touching the realm of free communication, and for that reason, if for no other, I would be wary of imposing any per se rule which, in the light of future technology, might serve to stifle or abridge true First Amendment rights.

1 Canons of Judicial Ethics. American Bar Association: Judicial Canon 35. Improper publicizing of Court proceedings.

"Proceedings in court should be conducted with fitting dignity and decorum. The taking of photographs in the court room, during sessions of the court or recesses between sessions, and the broadcasting or televising of court proceedings detract from the essential dignity of the proceedings, distract participants and witnesses in giving testimony, and create misconceptions with respect thereto in the mind of the public and should not be permitted.

"Provided that this restriction shall not apply to the broadcasting or televising, under the supervision of the court, of such portions of naturalization proceedings (other than the interrogation of applicants) as are designed and carried out exclusively as a ceremony for the purpose of publicly demonstrating in an impressive manner the essential dignity and the serious nature of naturalization."

Canons of Judicial Ethics, Integrated State Bar of Texas: Judicial Canon 28. Improper Publicizing of Court Proceedings.

"Proceedings in court should be conducted with fitting dignity and decorum. The taking of photographs in the court room, during sessions of the court or recesses between sessions, and the broadcasting or televising of court proceedings unless properly supervised and controlled, may detract from the essential dignity of the proceedings, distract participants and witnesses in giving testimony, and create misconceptions with respect thereto in the mind of the public. The supervision and control of such trial coverage shall be left to the trial judge who has the inherent power to exclude or control coverage in the proper case in the interest of justice.

"In connection with the control of such coverage the following declaration of principles is adopted:

"(1) There should be no use of flash bulbs or other artificial lighting.

"(2) No witness, over his expressed objection, should be photographed, his voice broadcast or be televised.

"(3) The representatives of news media must obtain permission of the trial judge to cover by photograph, broadcasting or televising, and shall comply with the rules prescribed by the judge for the exercise of the privilege.

"(4) Any violation of the Court's Rules shall be punished as a contempt.

"(5) Where a judge has refused to allow coverage or has regulated it, any attempt, other than argument by representatives of the news media directly with the Court, to bring pressure of any kind on the judge, pending final disposition of the cause in trial, shall be punished as a contempt."

I.

The indictment was originally returned by a grand jury in Reeves County, Texas, and it engendered widespread publicity. After some preliminary proceedings there, the case was transferred for trial to Smith County, more than 500 miles away. The trial was set for September 24, 1962, but it did not commence on that date. Instead, that day and the next were spent in hearings on two motions filed by defense counsel: a motion to bar television and news cameras from the trial, and a motion to continue the trial to a later date. Those proceedings were themselves telecast "live," and news photographers were permitted to take pictures in the courtroom. The activities of the television crews and news photographers led to considerable disruption of the hearings. [2] At the conclusion [*605] of the hearings the motion for a continuance was granted, and the case reset for trial on October 22. The motion to bar television and news photographers from the trial was denied. [3]

2 A contemporary newspaper account described the scene as follows:

"A television motor van, big as an intercontinental bus, was parked outside the courthouse and the second-floor courtroom was a forest of equipment. Two television cameras had been set up inside the bar and four more marked cameras were aligned just outside the gates.

"A microphone stuck its 12-inch snout inside the jury box, now occupied by an overflow of reporters from the press table, and three microphones confronted Judge Dunagan on his bench. Cables and wires snaked over the floor." The New York Times, September 25, 1962, p. 46, col. 4.

3 In ruling on the motion, the trial judge stated:

"In the past, it has been the policy of this Court to permit televising in the court room under the rules and supervision of the Court. Heretofore, I have not encountered any difficulty with it. I was unable to observe any detraction from the witnesses or the attorneys in those cases. We have watched television, of course, grow up from its infancy and now into its maturity; and it is a news media. So I really do not see any justified reason why it should not be permitted to take its proper seat in the family circle. However, it will be under the strict supervision of the Court. I know there has been pro and con about televising in the court room. I have heard some say that it makes a circus out of the Court. I had the privilege yesterday morning of sitting in my home and viewing a sermon by the First Baptist Church over in Dallas and certainly it wasn't any circus in that church; and I feel that if it is a proper instrument in the house of the Lord, it is not out of place in the court room, if properly supervised.

"Now, television is going to be televising whatever the scene is here. If you want to watch a ball game and that is what they televise, you are going to see a ball game. If you want to see a preacher and hear a sermon, you tune in on that and that is what you are going to get. If the Court permits a circus in this court room, it will be televised, that is true, but they will not be creating a circus.

"Now, the most important point is whether or not it would interfere with a fair and impartial trial of this Defendant. That is the most important point, and that is the purpose, or will be the primary purpose of the Court, to insure that he gets that fair trial.

"There is not anything the Court can do about the interest in this case, but I can control your activities and your conduct here; and I can assure you now that this Court is not going to be turned into a circus with TV or without it. Whatever action is necessary for the Court to take to insure that, the Court will take it.

"There has been one consideration that the Court has given and it is that this is a small court room and there will be hundreds of people trying to get into this court room to witness this trial. I believe we would have less confusion if they would stay at home and stay out of the court room and look in on the trial. With all of those people trying to crowd in and push into this court room, that is another consideration I have given to it."

[*606] On [594] [1672] October 1, the trial judge issued an order delineating what coverage he would permit during the trial. [4] As a result of that order and ensuing conferences between the judge and representatives of the news media, the environment for the trial, which began on October 22, was in sharp contrast to that of the September hearings. The actual extent of television and news photography in the [*607] courtroom was described by the judge, after the trial had ended, in certifying the petitioner's bill of exceptions. This description is confirmed by my understanding of the entire record and was agreed to and accepted by defense counsel:

"Prior to the trial of October 22, 1962, there was a booth constructed and placed in the rear of the courtroom painted the same or near the same color as the courtroom with a small opening across the top for the use of cameras

"Live telecasting and radio broadcasting were not permitted and the only telecasting was on film without sound, and there was not any broadcasting of the trial by radio permitted. Each network, ABC, NBC, CBS and KRLD [KLTV] Television in Tyler was allowed a camera in the courtroom . . . . The telecasting on film of this case was not a continuous camera operation and only pictures being taken at intervals during the day to be used on their regular news casts later in the day. There were some days during the trial that the cameras of only one or two stations were in operation, the others not being in attendance upon the Court each and every day. The Court did not permit any cameras [595] other than those that were noiseless nor were flood lights and [1673] flash bulbs allowed to be used in the courtroom. The Court permitted one news photographer with [*608] Associated Press, United Press International and Tyler Morning Telegraph and Courier Times. However, they were not permitted inside the Bar; and the Court did not permit any telecasting or photographing in the hallways leading into the courtroom or on the second floor of the courthouse where the courtroom is situated, in order that the Defendant and his attorneys would not be hindered, molested or harassed in approaching or leaving the courtroom. The Court did permit live telecasting of the arguments of State's counsel and the returning of the verdict by the Jury and its acceptance by the Court. The opening argument of the District Attorney of Smith County was carried by sound and because of transmission difficulty, there was not any picture. The closing argument for the State by the District Attorney of Reeves County was carried live by both picture and sound. The arguments of attorneys for Defendant, John D. Cofer and Hume Cofer, were not telecast or broadcast as the Court granted their Motion that same not be permitted.

"There was not any televising at any time during the trial except from the booth in the rear of the courtroom, and during the argument of counsel to the jury, news photography was required to operate from the booth so that they would not interfere or detract from the attention of either the jurors or the attorneys.

"During the trial that began October 22nd, there was never at any time any radio broadcasting equipment in the courtroom. There was some equipment in a room off of the courtroom where there were periodic news reports given; and throughout the trial that began October 22nd, not any witness requested not to be televised or photographed while they were testifying. Neither did any juror, while being interrogated [*609] on voir dire or at any other time, make any request of the Court not to be televised."

4 "In my statement of September 24, 1962, admitting television and other cameras in the court room during the trial of Billie Sol Estes, I said cameras would be allowed under the control and direction of the Court so long as they did not violate the legal rights of the Defendant or the State of Texas.

"In line with my statement of September 24, 1962, I am at this time informing both television and radio that live broadcasting or telecasting by either news media cannot and will not be permitted during the interrogation of jurors in testing their qualifications, or of the testimony given by the witnesses, as to do so would be in violation of Art. 644 of the Code of Criminal Procedure of Texas, which provides as follows: 'At the request of either party, the witnesses on both sides may be sworn and placed in the custody of an officer and removed out of the court room to some place where they can not hear the testimony as delivered by any other witness in the case. This is termed placing witnesses under rule.'

". . . Each television network and the local television station will be allowed one film camera without sound in the court room and the film will be made available to other television stations on a pool basis. Marshall Pengra, manager of Television Station KLTV, Tyler, will be in charge of the independent pool and independent stations may contact him. The same will be true of cameras for the press, which will be limited to the local press, Associated Press and United Press.

"I am making this statement at this time in order that the two news media affected may have sufficient notice before the case is called on October 22nd.

"The rules I have set forth above concerning the use of cameras are subject to change if I find that they are too restrictive or not workable, for any reason."

Thus, except for the closing arguments for the prosecution and the return of the jury's verdict, there was no "live" telecasting of the trial. And, even for purposes of delayed telecasting on later news programs, no words or other sounds were permitted to be recorded while the members of the jury were being selected or while any witness was testifying. No witnesses and no jurors were televised or photographed over their objection. [5]

5 There were nine witnesses for the prosecution and no witnesses for the defense.

Finally, the members of the jury saw no telecasts and no pictures of anything that went on during the trial. In accord with Texas law, the jurors were sequestered, day and night, from the beginning of the trial until it ended. [6] The jurors were lodged each night in quarters provided for that purpose in the courthouse itself. On the evening of November 6, by agreement of counsel and special permission of the court, the members of the jury were permitted to watch the election returns on television for a short period. For this purpose a portable television was brought into the jury's quarters by a court officer, [596] and operated by him. Otherwise the jurors were not permitted to watch television at any time during the trial. The only newspapers permitted the jury were ones from which all coverage of the trial had been physically removed.

II.

It is important to bear in mind the precise limits of the question before us in this case. The petition for a writ of [1674] certiorari asked us to review four separate constitutional claims. We declined to review three of them, among which was the claim that the members of the jury "had received through the news media damaging and prejudicial [*610] evidence . . . ." [7] We thus left undisturbed the determination of the Texas Court of Criminal Appeals that the members of the jury were not prejudiced by the widespread publicity which preceded the petitioner's trial. One ingredient of this pretrial publicity was the telecast of the September hearings. Despite the confusion in the courtroom during those hearings, all that a potential juror could have possibly learned from watching them on television was that the petitioner's case had been called for trial, and that motions had been made and acted upon for a continuance, and to exclude cameras and television. At those hearings, there was no discussion whatever of anything bearing on the petitioner's guilt or innocence. This was conceded by the petitioner's counsel at the trial. [8]

7 Petition for Writ of Certiorari, Question 3, p. 3.

8 "A. [Mr. Hume Cofer, counsel for petitioner] . . . . The publicity that was given this trial on the last occasion and the number of cameras here, I think was sufficient to spread the news of this case throughout the county, to every available juror; and it is my opinion that on that occasion, there were so many cameras and so much paraphernalia here that it gave an opportunity for every prospective juror in Smith County to know about this case.

"Q. Not about the facts of the case?

"A. No, sir; not about the facts, nor any of the evidence."

Because of our refusal to review the petitioner's claim that pretrial publicity had a prejudicial effect upon the jurors in this case, and because, insofar as the September hearings were an element of that publicity, the claim is patently without merit, that issue is simply not here. Our decision in Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723, therefore, has no bearing at all in this case. There the record showed that the inhabitants of the small Louisiana parish where the trial was held had repeatedly been exposed to a television film showing "Rideau, in jail, flanked by the sheriff and two state troopers, admitting in detail the commission of the robbery, kidnapping, and murder, in response to leading questions by the sheriff." 373 U.S., at 725. [*611] We found that "any subsequent court proceedings in a community so pervasively exposed to such a spectacle could be but a hollow formality." Id., at 726. See also Irvin v. Dowd, 366 U.S. 717.

The Rideau case was no more than a contemporary application of enduring principles of procedural due process, principles reflected in such earlier cases as Moore v. Dempsey, 261 U.S. 86; Brown v. Mississippi, 297 U.S. 278; and Chambers v. Florida, 309 U.S. 227, 235-241. "Under our Constitution's guarantee of due process," we said, "a person accused of committing a [597] crime is vouchsafed basic minimal rights. Among these are the right to counsel, the right to plead not guilty, and the right to be tried in a courtroom presided over by a judge." 373 U.S., at 726-727. We had occasion to apply the same basic concepts of procedural due process earlier this Term in Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466. "In the constitutional sense, trial by jury in a criminal case necessarily implies at the very least that the 'evidence developed' against a defendant shall come from the witness stand in a public courtroom where there is full judicial protection of the defendant's right of confrontation, of cross-examination, and of counsel." 379 U.S., at 472-473.

[1675] But we do not deal here with mob domination of a courtroom, with a kangaroo trial, with a prejudiced judge or a jury inflamed with bias. Under the limited grant of certiorari in this case, the sole question before us is an entirely different one. It concerns only the regulated presence of television and still photography at the trial itself, which began on October 22, 1962. Any discussion of pretrial events can do no more than obscure the important question which is actually before us.

III.

It is obvious that the introduction of television and news cameras into a criminal trial invites many serious constitutional hazards. The very presence of photographers [*612] and television cameramen plying their trade in a courtroom might be so completely and thoroughly disruptive and distracting as to make a fair trial impossible. Thus, if the scene at the September hearing had been repeated in the courtroom during this jury trial, it is difficult to conceive how a fair trial in the constitutional sense could have been afforded the defendant. [9] And even if, as was true here, the television cameras are so controlled and concealed as to be hardly perceptible in the courtroom itself, there are risks of constitutional dimensions that lurk in the very process of televising court proceedings at all.

9 See note 2.

Some of those risks are catalogued in the amicus curiae brief filed in this case by the American Bar Association: "Potential or actual jurors, in the absence of enforceable and effective safeguards, may arrive at certain misconceptions regarding the defendant and his trial by viewing televised pre-trial hearings and motions from which the jury is ordinarily excluded. Evidence otherwise inadmissible may leave an indelible mark. . . . Once the trial begins, exposure to nightly rebroadcasts of selected portions of the day's proceedings will be difficult to guard against, as jurors spend frequent evenings before the television set. The obvious impact of witnessing repeated trial episodes and hearing accompanying commentary, episodes admittedly chosen for their news value and not for evidentiary purposes, can serve only to distort the jurors' perspective. . . . Despite the court's injunction not to discuss the case, it seems undeniable that jurors will be subject to the pressure of television-watching family, friends and, indeed, strangers. . . . It is not too much to imagine a juror being confronted with his wife's television-oriented viewpoint. . . . Additionally, the jurors' daily television appearances may make them recognizable celebrities, likely to be stopped by passing [*613] strangers, or perhaps harried by intruding telephone [598] calls. . . ." Constitutional problems of another kind might arise if a witness or juror were subjected to being televised over his objection.

The plain fact of the matter, however, is that none of these things happened or could have happened in this case. The jurors themselves were prevented from seeing any telecasts of the trial, and completely insulated from association with any members of the public who did see such telecasts. This case, therefore, does not remotely resemble Turner v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 466, where, during the trial, the jurors were subjected outside the courtroom to unmeasured and unmeasurable influences by key witnesses for the prosecution.

In the courtroom itself, there is nothing to show that the trial proceeded in any way other than it would have proceeded if cameras and television had not been present. In appearance, the courtroom was practically unaltered. There was no obtrusiveness and no distraction, no noise and no special lighting. There is no indication anywhere in the record of [1676] any disturbance whatever of the judicial proceedings. There is no claim that the conduct of the judge, or that any deed or word of counsel, or of any witness, or of any juror, was influenced in any way by the presence of photographers or by television.

Furthermore, from a reading of the record it is crystal clear that this was not a trial where the judge was harassed or confused or lacking in command of the proceedings before the jury. Not once, after the first witness was called, was there any interruption at all of the trial proper to secure a ruling concerning the presence of cameramen in the courtroom. There was no occasion, during the entire trial -- until after the jury adjourned to reach its verdict -- for any cautionary word to members of the press in the courtroom. The only time a motion was made, the jury was not in the courtroom. The trial itself was a [*614] most mundane affair, totally lacking in the lurid and completely emotionless. The evidence related solely to the circumstances in which various documents had been signed and negotiated. It was highly technical, if not downright dull. The petitioner called no witnesses, and counsel for petitioner made only a brief closing argument to the jury. There is nothing to indicate that the issues involved were of the kind where emotion could hold sway. The transcript of the trial belies any notion that frequent interruptions and inconsistent rulings communicated to the jury any sense that the judge was unable to concentrate on protecting the defendant and conducting the trial in a fair manner, in accordance with the State and Federal Constitutions.

IV.

What ultimately emerges from this record, therefore, is one bald question -- whether the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution prohibits all television cameras from a state courtroom whenever a criminal trial is in progress. In the light of this record and what we now know about the impact of television on a criminal trial, I can find no such prohibition in the Fourteenth Amendment or in any other provision of the Constitution. If what occurred did not deprive the petitioner of his constitutional right to a fair trial, then the fact that the public could view the proceeding on television has no constitutional significance. The Constitution [599] does not make us arbiters of the image that a televised state criminal trial projects to the public.

While no First Amendment claim is made in this case, there are intimations in the opinions filed by my Brethren in the majority which strike me as disturbingly alien to the First and Fourteenth Amendments' guarantees against federal or state interference with the free communication of information and ideas. The suggestion that there are limits upon the public's right to know what goes on in [*615] the courts causes me deep concern. The idea of imposing upon any medium of communications the burden of justifying its presence is contrary to where I had always thought the presumption must lie in the area of First Amendment freedoms. See Speiser v. Randall, 357 U.S. 513, 525. And the proposition that nonparticipants in a trial might get the "wrong impression" from unfettered reporting and commentary contains an invitation to censorship which I cannot accept. Where there is no disruption of the "essential requirement of the fair and orderly administration of justice," "freedom of discussion should be given the widest range." Pennekamp v. Florida, 328 U.S. 331, 347; Bridges v. California, 314 U.S. 252. Cf. Cox v. Louisiana, 379 U.S. 559, 563.

I do not think that the Constitution denies to the State or to individual trial judges all discretion to conduct criminal trials with television cameras present, no [1677] matter how unobtrusive the cameras may be. I cannot say at this time that it is impossible to have a constitutional trial whenever any part of the proceedings is televised or recorded on television film. I cannot now hold that the Constitution absolutely bars television cameras from every criminal courtroom, even if they have no impact upon the jury, no effect upon any witness, and no influence upon the conduct of the judge.

For these reasons I would affirm the judgment.

MR. JUSTICE WHITE, with whom MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN joins, dissenting.

I agree with MR. JUSTICE STEWART that a finding of constitutional prejudice on this record entails erecting a flat ban on the use of cameras in the courtroom and believe that it is premature to promulgate such a broad constitutional principle at the present time. This is the first case in this Court dealing with the subject of television [*616] coverage of criminal trials; our cases dealing with analogous subjects are not really controlling, cf. Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723; and there is, on the whole, a very limited amount of experience in this country with television coverage of trials. In my view, the currently available materials assessing the effect of cameras in the courtroom are too sparse and fragmentary to constitute the basis for a constitutional judgment permanently barring any and all forms of television coverage. As was said in another context, "we know too little of the actual impact . . . to reach a conclusion on the bare bones of the . . . evidence before us." White Motor Co. v. United States, 372 U.S. 253, 261. It may well be, however, that as further experience and informed judgment do become available, [600] the use of cameras in the courtroom, as in this trial, will prove to pose such a serious hazard to a defendant's rights that a violation of the Fourteenth Amendment will be found without a showing on the record of specific demonstrable prejudice to the defendant. Compare Wolf v. Colorado, 338 U.S. 25, with Mapp v. Ohio, 367 U.S. 643; Betts v. Brady, 316 U.S. 455, with Gideon v. Wainwright, 372 U.S. 335; Stein v. New York, 346 U.S. 156, with Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 389-390.

The opinion of the Court in effect precludes further opportunity for intelligent assessment of the probable hazards imposed by the use of cameras at criminal trials. Serious threats to constitutional rights in some instances justify a prophylactic rule dispensing with the necessity of showing specific prejudice in a particular case. Rideau v. Louisiana, 373 U.S. 723, 727; Jackson v. Denno, 378 U.S. 368, 389. But these are instances in which there has been ample experience on which to base an informed judgment. Here, although our experience is inadequate and our judgment correspondingly infirm, the Court discourages further meaningful study of the use of television at criminal trials. Accordingly, I dissent.

[*617] MR. JUSTICE BRENNAN.

I write merely to emphasize that only four of the five Justices voting to reverse rest on the proposition that televised criminal trials are constitutionally infirm, whatever the circumstances. Although the opinion announced by my Brother CLARK purports to be an "opinion of the Court," my Brother HARLAN subscribes to a significantly less sweeping proposition. He states:

"The Estes trial was a heavily publicized and highly sensational affair. I therefore put aside all other types of cases . . . . The resolution of [1678] those further questions should await an appropriate case; the Court should proceed only step by step in this unplowed field. The opinion of the Court necessarily goes no farther, for only the four members of the majority who unreservedly join the Court's opinion would resolve those questions now." Ante, pp. 590-591. (Emphasis supplied.)

Thus today's decision is not a blanket constitutional prohibition against the televising of state criminal trials.

While I join the dissents of my Brothers STEWART and WHITE, I do so on the understanding that their use of the expressions "the Court's opinion" or "the opinion of the Court" refers only to those views of our four Brethren which my Brother HARLAN explicitly states he shares.

[*61] [628] LINDER, J.

Defendant appeals his conviction for possession of a precursor substance with intent to manufacture, ORS 475.967, assigning error to the denial of his motion for a judgment of acquittal. On appeal, the only issue is whether stealing and possessing a large quantity of pseudoephedrine is sufficient to support a finding, beyond a reasonable doubt, that defendant intended to manufacture methamphetamine. We conclude that it is not, and we therefore reverse in part. [1]

1 Defendant was also charged with and convicted of unlawful possession of pseudoephedrine, ORS 475.973, and theft in the second degree, ORS 164.045. On appeal, defendant does not challenge those convictions.

[2] The pertinent facts are relatively few. [2] Defendant stole five packages of Sudafed [629] cold medicine, containing a total of approximately 15 grams of pseudoephedrine, from a Rite-Aid pharmacy. Police apprehended him at a nearby apartment complex. Defendant admitted to police that he stole the Sudafed and that he intended to sell it on the street for money, stating that "somebody on the street needs it." Defendant acknowledged to police that he knew that Sudafed contains pseudoephedrine and that pseudoephedrine is a precursor substance used to manufacture methamphetamine. Defendant denied, however, that he intended personally to manufacture methamphetamine or that he even knew how to manufacture it.

2 We set forth the facts in the light most favorable to the state. State v. Evans, 161 Ore. App. 86, 89, 983 P.2d 1055 (1999) (on judgment of conviction, facts are viewed in the light most > favorable to the state to determine whether any rational trier of fact, accepting reasonable inferences and reasonable credibility choices, could have found the essential elements of the crime beyond a reasonable doubt).

[3] Defendant was charged with and convicted of possession of a precursor substance (pseudoephedrine) with intent to manufacture a controlled substance (methamphetamine), ORS 475.967. At trial, in addition to establishing the facts of defendant's theft and his statements to police, the state also established the street uses to which pseudoephedrine is put and the ways in which the drug is obtained. In particular, according to police, the only plausible street use for such a large quantity of pseudoephedrine is to manufacture methamphetamine. Police therefore are involved in tracking [*62] suspicious purchases, and individuals who manufacture methamphetamine generally are aware of that fact. As a result, to avoid personal detection, individuals manufacturing methamphetamine commonly use other people to purchase drugs such as Sudafed that contain pseudoephedrine. On the street, Sudafed can sell for two to three times its normal retail value.

At the close of the state's case, defendant moved for a judgment of acquittal, arguing that there was no evidence from which the jury could find that he intended to personally manufacture methamphetamine. The trial court denied [4] the motion, reasoning:

> "The information before the jury is that the defendant attempted to steal a larger than normal use quantity of Pseudoephedrine. That the defendant intended to sell that on the street. That Pseudoephedrine is a required product of the manufacture of meth. And that on the street it's sometimes worth two or three or four times more than what it would be in the store. That you can not legally purchase more than 9 grams, other than under certain circumstances. And is that sufficient for a reasonable juror to find the defendant guilty of Possession of a Precursor with Intent to Manufacture?
> "Looking at the evidence in the light most favorable to the State the motion is denied."

On appeal, the parties renew the arguments they made below. Defendant asserts that the state presented no evidence from which a jury reasonably could find that he intended personally to manufacture methamphetamine. At most, according to defendant, he intended to sell the Sudafed to someone else who would manufacture methamphetamine, which establishes his knowledge that the Sudafed would be used in that way but not his intent that it be so used. In response, the state points to [5] the quantity of the Sudafed in defendant's possession, coupled with his admission that he knew that it is used to manufacture methamphetamine. According to the state, that evidence permitted an inference that defendant personally was going to manufacture methamphetamine or was acting "in concert" with someone else who would perform the actual manufacturing steps. Alternatively, the state argues that the evidence permitted the [*63] jury to find defendant guilty on the theory that he was aiding and abetting someone else in the manufacture of methamphetamine. As we explain below, we agree with defendant.

Under ORS 475.967,

> "[a] person commits the crime of possession of a precursor substance with intent to manufacture a controlled substance if the person possesses one or more precursor substances with the intent to manufacture a controlled substance in violation of ORS 475.992(1)."

[630] "'Manufacture' means the production, preparation, propagation, compounding, conversion or processing of a controlled substance, either directly or indirectly by extraction from substances of natural origin, or independently by means of chemical synthesis[. [6]]" ORS 475.005(15). "Intent" means that "a person acts with a conscious objective to cause the result or to engage in the conduct so described." ORS 161.085(7).

Thus, to convict a defendant of possession of a precursor substance with intent to manufacture, the state must prove the following: (1) the defendant possessed some amount of a precursor substance; and (2) the defendant did so with the conscious objective of extracting pseudoephedrine and converting it to methamphetamine.

The state's burden in that regard differs significantly from its burden in proving the offense of possession of pseudoephedrine, which is prohibited by ORS 475.973(1)(a):

> "[A] person commits the crime of unlawful possession of ephedrine, pseudoephedrine or phenylpropanolamine if the person knowingly possesses more than nine grams of ephedrine, pseudoephedrine or phenylpropanolamine * * *."

Violation of that statute is a Class A misdemeanor. ORS 475.973(5)(a). By contrast, possession of a precursor substance with intent to manufacture is a Class B felony. ORS 475.967(2) [7] . The key distinctions between the two offenses are the person's mental state and the amount of the pseudoephedrine that the person must possess. The misdemeanor offense is committed by the knowing possession of more than nine grams of pseudoephedrine. The felony offense is committed by possession of any amount, as long as the possession [*64] is with the heightened and more specific mental state of intent to manufacture (i.e., the conscious objective to extract pseudoephedrine and convert it to methamphetamine).

In this case, the evidence was ample to establish defendant's guilt of the misdemeanor offense, but it falls short of providing a basis for a reasonable jury to infer that defendant had the intent required for the felony offense. The direct evidence reduces to proof that defendant stole and possessed 15 grams of Sudafed and that he claimed to have done so to sell it for money on the street. As the state correctly argues, the jury was free to disbelieve defendant's statements to police about his intent to sell it. But, contrary to the state's position, simply disbelieving defendant in that regard does not provide a basis to reasonably infer that defendant consciously intended [8] to extract the pseudoephedrine himself and make methamphetamine with it. The problem with drawing that inference here--or at least, with drawing it beyond a reasonable doubt--is that the only evidentiary support for it is the mere fact of defendant's possession of 15 grams of Sudafed. The state presented evidence that defendant knew how to extract the pseudoephedrine from Sudafed or how to turn that precursor substance into methamphetamine. Nor does the record suggest that defendant owned or possessed any paraphernalia or chemicals associated with methamphetamine manufacture or that he has a residence or other physical site where he could engage in manufacturing methamphetamine. See State v. Brown, 109 Ore. App. 636, 644-45, 820 P.2d 878 (1991), rev den, 313 Ore. 210, 830 P.2d 596 (1992) (evidence that defendant had taken the steps necessary to manufacture methamphetamine sufficient when defendant "possessed precursor chemicals, laboratory equipment, formulas and other" necessary materials).

In effect, the state asks us to conclude that a jury could infer the requisite "conscious objective to" manufacture methamphetamine from the same facts that constitute the [9] misdemeanor offense of possession of pseudoephedrine. On this record, however, such an inference requires too great a leap and would require speculation, rather than logical inference. See State v. Lopez-Medina, 143 Ore. App. 195, 201, 923 P.2d 1240 (1996) (evidence is insufficient to support an inference when the conclusion to be drawn from it requires "too [*65] great an inferential leap" because the logic is too strained). The same is true of any inference that defendant was working "in concert" with a specific individual who had the wherewithal to manufacture methamphetamine and the physical equipment and site to do it. Not a shred of [631] evidence in this record suggests the existence of such a person.

Nor is the state's case aided if, alternatively, the jury believed--as it reasonably could--that defendant stole the Sudafed intending to sell it on the street for money. To be sure, the jury in that event reasonably could then also conclude that defendant, in intending to sell it, knew that whoever bought it would likely--if not certainly--use it to make methamphetamine. But defendant is correct that such evidence establishes only that he acted with knowledge of how the [10] Sudafed would be used, not with a "conscious objective" that it be used in that way. Nothing in the record suggests that defendant had a personal interest in selling the Sudafed that went beyond his desire to get money. For example, there is no evidence that he would be paid with some of the methamphetamine produced. Without anything more than defendant's admission that he hoped to sell the Sudafed on the street for money, the jury could not reasonably infer that defendant had the conscious objective to have the buyer make methamphetamine out of it, as opposed to the conscious awareness--that is, knowledge--that the buyer likely would do so. Knowledge, however, is not enough to establish liability on the state's alternative theory that defendant aided and abetted another in the commission of the crime. The mental state required for criminal liability on an aid and abet theory is essentially the same as for a principal's liability in this circumstance. A person is guilty of a crime committed by another if that person, "with the intent to promote or facilitate the commission of the crime," aids and abets the "other person in planning or committing the crime." ORS 161.155(2) [11] (emphasis added). [3]

3 Because of that conclusion, we need not reach defendant's argument that, in the context of aiding and abetting, an accomplice is criminally liable only for a crime that is actually committed.

For those reasons, we conclude that the established facts are too few and too limited to support the inference that [*66] the state needed to establish--namely, that defendant had the requisite intent to manufacture. Defendant's motion for a judgment of acquittal should have been granted.

Conviction of possession of a precursor substance with intent to manufacture reversed; otherwise affirmed.

UNITED STATES v. PEONI.

No. 155

UNITED STATES COURT OF APPEALS FOR THE SECOND CIRCUIT

100 F.2d 401; 1938 U.S. App. LEXIS 2663

December 12, 1938

PRIOR HISTORY: [1] Appeal from the District Court of the United States for the Eastern District of New York.

COUNSEL: Abraham Solomon, of New York City (Bernard Weiss, of New York City, of counsel), for appellant.

Michael F. Walsh, U.S. Atty., of Brooklyn, N.Y. (Vine H. Smith and James D. Saver, Asst. U.S. Attys., both of Brooklyn, N.Y., of counsel), for the United States.

OPINION

[*401] Before L. HAND, SWAN and CHASE, Circuit Judges.

L. HAND, Circuit Judge.

Peoni was indicted in the Eastern District of New York upon three counts for possessing counterfeit money, and upon one for conspiracy to possess it. The jury convicted him on all counts, and the only question we need consider is whether the evidence was enough to sustain the verdict. It was this. In the Borough of the Bronx Peoni sold counterfeit bills to one, Regno; and Regno sold the same bills to one, Dorsey, also in the Bronx. All three knew that the bills were counterfeit, and Dorsey was arrested while trying to pass them in the Borough of Brooklyn. The question is whether Peoni was guilty as an accessory to Dorsey's possession, and [*402] whether he was party to a conspiracy by which Dorsey should possess [2] the bills.

The prosecution's argument is that, as Peoni put the bills in circulation and knew that Regno would be likely, not to pass them himself, but to sell them to another guilty possessor, the possession of the second buyer was a natural consequence of Peoni's original act, with which he might be charged. If this were a civil case, that would be true; as innocent buyer from Dorsey could sue Peoni and get judgment against him for his loss. But the rule of criminal liability is not the same; since Dorsey's possession was not de facto Peoni's, and since Dorsey was not Peoni's agent, Peoni can be liable only as an accessory to Dorsey's act of possession. The test of that must be found in the appropriate federal statute (§ 550 of Title 18, U.S. Code, 18 U.S.C.A. § 550). The first statute dealing with the matter was passed in 1790 (1 St. at L. 114) and made those accessories who should "aid and assist, procure, command, counsel or advise", murder or robbery on land or sea, or piracy at sea. Section 10. This was broadened in 1870 (16 St. at L. 254) to include any felony, and by it an accessory was anyone who "counsels, advises or procures" the crime, section 2: this phrase [3] was probably regarded as an equivalent of the first. Both those statutes were repealed in 1909 by § 341 of the Criminal Code (35 St. at L. 1088, 1153), and supplanted by § 332 of that act, which like § 550 of Title 18 U.S. Code, 18 U.S.C.A. § 550, read as follows: "aids, abets, counsels, commands, induces, or procures". The substance of that formula goes back a long way. Pollock & Maitland, Vol. II, p. 507, in speaking of the English law at the beginning of the 14th Century, say that already "the law of homicide is quite wide enough to comprise * * * those who have 'procured, counselled, commanded or abetted' the felony"; citing Bracton, f. 142, as follows: "for it is colloquially said that he sufficiently kills who advises" (praecipit) the killing. In 1557, by chapter 4 of 4 & 5 P. & M., benefit of clergy was taken away from those who should "command, hire and counsel" another to commit petit treason, murder, robbery or "willful" arson; and the indictment in Parker's Case, 1560, Dyer 186 a, read that the accused had "counselled, commanded, procured and abetted" the murder. Code, Inst. II, p. 182, in commenting on the Stat. of West. 1, Chap. XIV, which dealt with accessories, [4] declared that they were divided into three "branches"; "commandement, force et aide". "Commandement" was "praeceptum" which included those who "incite, set on or stir up" others to the deed. "Force" was to furnish a weapon; and "aide" ("auxilium") included "all persons counselling, abetting, plotting, assenting, consenting or encouraging to doe the act." In 1691, by Chapter 9 of 3 & 4 W. & M., benefit of clergy was denied those who "comfort, aid, abet, assist, counsel, hire or command" certain enumerated felonies. Hale, Pleas of the Crown p. 615, 1736, defined an accessory as one who "doth * * * procure, counsel, command or abet another". In The Case of Macdaniel & others, 1755, Foster, 125, the question was bruited whether one might be an accessory at one remove, and it was said, though obiter, that he might, for "whoever procured a felony to be committed though it be by the intervention of a third person is an accessory * * * For what is there in the notion of commanding, hiring, counselling, aiding or abetting which may not be effected by the intervention of a third person." Blackstone, 1768, Book IV, pp. 36 & 37, described an accessory as "he who in any wise commands or counsels [5] another to commit an unlawful act." Hawkins, 1771, Pleas of the Crown Chap. 29 § 16, specified "Those who by Hire, Command, Counsel or Conspiracy; and it seems to be generally holden, That those who by showing an express Liking Approbation or Assent to another's felonious Design of committing Felony abet and encourage him to commit it".

It will be observed that all these definitions have nothing whatever to do with the probability that the forbidden result would follow upon the accessory's conduct; and that they all demand that he in some sort associate himself with the venture, that he participate in it as in something that he wishes to bring about, that he seek by his action to make it succeed. All the words used - even the most colorless, "abet" - carry an implication of purposive attitude towards it. So understood, Peoni was not an accessory to Dorsey's possession; his connection with the business ended when he got his money from Regno, who might dispose of the bills as he chose; it was of no moment to him whether Regno passed them himself, and so ended the possibility of further guilty possession, or [*403] whether he sold them to a second possible passer. His utterance [6] of the bills was indeed a step in the causal chain which ended in Dorsey's possession, but that was all. Perhaps he was Regno's accessory. Rudner v. United States 6 Cir., 281 F. 516, and Anstess v. United States, 7 Cir., 22 F.2d 594, do indeed hold that a seller, knowing the buyer's criminal purpose, is a conspirator with him. On the other hand in Rex v. Lomas, 22 Cox's Cr. Cas. 765, the court acquitted the accused who had given back to a burglar a jimmy which the burglar had lent him, though he knew the burglar would use it to commit the crime; Lord Reading saying that in such cases "advice or procuring" was a necessary element. Moreover, the law is at least unsettled whether action for the price will not lie, though the seller knows that the buyer means to use the goods to commit a crime, Williston, § 1754, and in perhaps the leading case, Graves v. Johnson, 179 Mass. 53 60 N.E. 383, 88 Am. St. Rep. 355 the seller recovered. Be that as it may, nobody, so far as we can find, has ever held that a contract is criminal, because the seller has reason to know, not that the buyer will use the goods unlawfully, but that some one further down the line may do so. Nor is it at all desirable [7] that the seller should be held indefinitely. The real gravamen of the charge against him is his utterance of the bills; and he ought not to be tried for that wherever the prosecution may pick up any guilty possessor - perhaps thousands of miles away. The oppression against which the Sixth Amendment is directed could be easily compassed by this device, because if the seller be a real accessory he may be removed to the place of the crime. Hoss v. United States, 8 Cir., 232 F. 328, 335; United States v. Littleton, D.C., 1 F.2d 751.

The same reasoning applies to the conspiracy count. Assuming that Peoni and Regno agreed that Regno should have possession of the bills, it is absurd to say that Peoni agreed that Dorsey should have them from Regno. Peoni knew that somebody besides Regno might get them, but a conspiracy also imports a concert of purpose, and again Peoni had no concern with the bills after Regno paid for them. At times it seemed to be supposed that, once some kind of criminal concert is established, all parties are liable for everything anyone of the original participants does, and even for what those do who join later. Nothing could be more untrue. Nobody is liable [8] in conspiracy except for the fair import of the concerted purpose or agreement as he understands it; if later comes change that, he is not liable for the change; his liability is limited to the common purpose while he remains in it. The confusion is perhaps due to the fact that everything done by the conspirators - including the declarations of later entrants - is competent evidence against all, so far as it may fairly be thought to be in execution of the concert to which the accused is privy, though that doctrine too is often abused.

Conviction reversed; accused discharged.

PENAL CODE
SECTION 2-24

5129

2. This Code takes effect at twelve o'clock, noon, on the first day of January, eighteen hundred and seventy-three.

3. No part of it is retroactive, unless expressly so declared.

4. The rule of the common law, that penal statutes are to be strictly construed, has no application to this Code. All its provisions are to be construed according to the fair import of their terms, with a view to effect its objects and to promote justice.

5. The provisions of this Code, so far as they are substantially the same as existing statutes, must be construed as continuations thereof, and not as new enactments.

6. No act or omission, commenced after twelve o'clock noon of the day on which this Code takes effect as a law, is criminal or punishable, except as prescribed or authorized by this Code, or by some of the statutes which it specifies as continuing in force and as not affected by its provisions, or by some ordinance, municipal, county, or township regulation, passed or adopted, under such statutes and in force when this Code takes effect. Any act or omission commenced prior to that time may be inquired of, prosecuted, and punished in the same manner as if this Code had not been passed.

7. Words used in this code in the present tense include the future as well as the present; words used in the masculine gender include the feminine and neuter; the singular number includes the plural, and the plural the singular; the word "person" includes a corporation as well as a natural person; the word "county" includes "city and county"; writing includes printing and typewriting; oath includes affirmation or declaration; and every mode of oral statement, under oath or affirmation, is embraced by the term "testify," and every written one in the term "depose"; signature or subscription includes mark, when the person cannot write, his or her name being written near it, by a person who writes his or her own name as a witness; provided, that when a signature is made by mark it must, in order that the same may be acknowledged or serve as the signature to any sworn statement, be witnessed by two persons who must subscribe their own names as witnesses thereto.

The following words have in this code the signification attached to them in this section, unless otherwise apparent from the context:

1. The word "willfully," when applied to the intent with which an act is done or omitted, implies simply a purpose or willingness to commit the act, or make the omission referred to. It does not require any intent to violate law, or to injure another, or to acquire any advantage.

2. The words "neglect," "negligence," "negligent," and "negligently" import a want of such attention to the nature or probable consequences of the act or omission as a prudent man ordinarily bestows in acting in his own concerns.

3. The word "corruptly" imports a wrongful design to acquire or cause some pecuniary or other advantage to the person guilty of the act or omission referred to, or to some other person.

4. The words "malice" and "maliciously" import a wish to vex, annoy, or injure another person, or an intent to do a wrongful act, established either by proof or presumption of law.

5. The word "knowingly" imports only a knowledge that the facts exist which bring the act or omission within the provisions of this code. It does not require any knowledge of the unlawfulness of such act or omission.

6. The word "bribe" signifies anything of value or advantage, present or prospective, or any promise or undertaking to give any, asked, given, or accepted, with a corrupt intent to influence, unlawfully, the person to whom it is given, in his or her action, vote, or opinion, in any public or official capacity.

7. The word "vessel," when used with reference to shipping, includes ships of all kinds, steamboats, canalboats, barges, and every structure adapted to be navigated from place to place for the transportation of merchandise or persons, except that, as used in Sections 192.5 and 193.5, the word "vessel" means a vessel as defined in subdivision (c) of Section 651 of the Harbors and Navigation Code.

8. The words "peace officer" signify any one of the officers mentioned in Chapter 4.5 (commencing with Section 830) of Title 3 of Part 2.

9. The word "magistrate" signifies any one of the officers mentioned in Section 808.

10. The word "property" includes both real and personal property.

11. The words "real property" are coextensive with lands, tenements, and hereditaments.

12. The words "personal property" include money, goods, chattels, things in action, and evidences of debt.

13. The word "month" means a calendar month, unless otherwise expressed; the word "daytime" means the period between sunrise and sunset, and the word "nighttime" means the period between sunset and sunrise.

14. The word "will" includes codicil.

15. The word "writ" signifies an order or precept in writing, issued in the name of the people, or of a court or judicial officer, and the word "process" a writ or summons issued in the course of judicial proceedings.

16. Words and phrases must be construed according to the context and the approved usage of the language; but technical words and phrases, and such others as may have acquired a peculiar and appropriate meaning in law, must be construed according to such peculiar and appropriate meaning.

17. Words giving a joint authority to three or more public officers or other persons, are construed as giving such authority to a majority of them, unless it is otherwise expressed in the act giving the authority.

18. When the seal of a court or public officer is required by law to be affixed to any paper, the word "seal" includes an impression of such seal upon the paper alone, or upon any substance attached to the paper capable of receiving a visible impression. The seal of a private person may be made in like manner, or by the scroll of a pen, or by writing the word "seal" against his or her name.

19. The word "state," when applied to the different parts of the United States, includes the District of Columbia and the territories, and the words "United States" may include the district and territories.

20. The word "section," whenever hereinafter employed, refers to a section of this code, unless some other code or statute is expressly mentioned.

21. To "book" signifies the recordation of an arrest in official police records, and the taking by the police of fingerprints and photographs of the person arrested, or any of these acts following an arrest.

7.5. Whenever any offense is described in this code, the Uniform Controlled Substances Act (Division 10 (commencing with Section 11000) of the Health and Safety Code), or the Welfare and Institutions Code, as criminal conduct and as a violation of a specified code section or a particular provision of a code section, in the case of any ambiguity or conflict in interpretation, the code section or particular provision of the code section shall take precedence over the descriptive language. The descriptive language shall be deemed as being offered only for ease of reference unless it is otherwise clearly apparent from the context that the descriptive language is intended to narrow the application of the referenced code section or particular provision of the code section.

8. Whenever, by any of the provisions of this Code, an intent to defraud is required in order to constitute any offense, it is sufficient if an intent appears to defraud any person, association, or body politic or corporate, whatever.

9. The omission to specify or affirm in this Code any liability to damages, penalty, forfeiture, or other remedy imposed by law and allowed to be recovered or enforced in any civil action or proceeding, for any act or omission declared punishable herein, does not affect any right to recover or enforce the same.

10. The omission to specify or affirm in this Code any ground of forfeiture of a public office, or other trust or special authority conferred by law, or any power conferred by law to impeach, remove, depose, or suspend any public officer or other person holding any trust, appointment, or other special authority conferred by law, does not affect such forfeiture or power, or any proceeding authorized by law to carry into effect such impeachment, removal, deposition, or suspension.

11. This code does not affect any power conferred by law upon any court-martial, or other military authority or officer, to impose or inflict punishment upon offenders; nor, except as provided in Section 19.2 of this code, any power conferred by law upon any public body, tribunal, or officer, to impose or inflict punishment for a contempt.

12. The several sections of this Code which declare certain crimes to be punishable as therein mentioned, devolve a duty upon the Court authorized to pass sentence, to determine and impose the punishment prescribed.

13. Whenever in this Code the punishment for a crime is left undetermined between certain limits, the punishment to be inflicted in a particular case must be determined by the Court authorized to pass sentence, within such limits as may be prescribed by this Code.

14. The various sections of this Code which declare that evidence obtained upon the examination of a person as a witness cannot be received against him in any criminal proceeding, do not forbid such evidence being proved against such person upon any proceedings founded upon a charge of perjury committed in such examination.

15. A crime or public offense is an act committed or omitted in violation of a law forbidding or commanding it, and to which is annexed, upon conviction, either of the following punishments:

1. Death;
2. Imprisonment;
3. Fine;
4. Removal from office; or,
5. Disqualification to hold and enjoy any office of honor, trust, or profit in this State.

16. Crimes and public offenses include:

1. Felonies;
2. Misdemeanors; and
3. Infractions.

17. (a) A felony is a crime that is punishable with death, by imprisonment in the state prison, or notwithstanding any other provision of law, by imprisonment in a county jail under the provisions of subdivision (h) of Section 1170. Every other crime or public offense is a misdemeanor except those offenses that are classified as infractions.

(b) When a crime is punishable, in the discretion of the court, either by imprisonment in the state prison or imprisonment in a county jail under the provisions of subdivision (h) of Section 1170, or by fine or imprisonment in the county jail, it is a misdemeanor for all purposes under the following circumstances:

(1) After a judgment imposing a punishment other than imprisonment in the state prison or imprisonment in a county jail under the provisions of subdivision (h) of Section 1170.

(2) When the court, upon committing the defendant to the Division of Juvenile Justice, designates the offense to be a misdemeanor.

(3) When the court grants probation to a defendant without imposition of sentence and at the time of granting probation, or on application of the defendant or probation officer thereafter, the court declares the offense to be a misdemeanor.

(4) When the prosecuting attorney files in a court having jurisdiction over misdemeanor offenses a complaint specifying that the offense is a misdemeanor, unless the defendant at the time of his or her arraignment or plea objects to the offense being made a misdemeanor, in which event the complaint shall be amended to charge the felony and the case shall proceed on the felony complaint.

(5) When, at or before the preliminary examination or prior to filing an order pursuant to Section 872, the magistrate determines that the offense is a misdemeanor, in which event the case shall proceed as if the defendant had been arraigned on a misdemeanor complaint.

(c) When a defendant is committed to the Division of Juvenile Justice for a crime punishable, in the discretion of the court, either by imprisonment in the state prison or imprisonment in a county jail under the provisions of subdivision (h) of Section 1170, or by fine or imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year, the offense shall, upon the discharge of the defendant from the Division of Juvenile Justice, thereafter be deemed a misdemeanor for all purposes.

(d) A violation of any code section listed in Section 19.8 is an infraction subject to the procedures described in Sections 19.6 and 19.7 when:

(1) The prosecutor files a complaint charging the offense as an infraction unless the defendant, at the time he or she is arraigned, after being informed of his or her rights, elects to have the case proceed as a misdemeanor, or;

(2) The court, with the consent of the defendant, determines that the offense is an infraction in which event the case shall proceed as if the defendant had been arraigned on an infraction complaint.

(e) Nothing in this section authorizes a judge to relieve a defendant of the duty to register as a sex offender pursuant to Section 290 if the defendant is charged with an offense for which registration as a sex offender is required pursuant to Section 290, and for which the trier of fact has found the defendant guilty.

17.5. (a) The Legislature finds and declares all of the following:

(1) The Legislature reaffirms its commitment to reducing recidivism among criminal offenders.

(2) Despite the dramatic increase in corrections spending over the past two decades, national reincarceration rates for people released from prison remain unchanged or have worsened. National data show that about 40 percent of released individuals are reincarcerated within three years. In California, the recidivism rate for persons who have served time in prison is even greater than the national average.

(3) Criminal justice policies that rely on building and operating more prisons to address community safety concerns are not sustainable, and will not result in improved public safety.

(4) California must reinvest its criminal justice resources to support community-based corrections programs and evidence-based practices that will achieve improved public safety returns on this state's substantial investment in its criminal justice system.

(5) Realigning low-level felony offenders who do not have prior convictions for serious, violent, or sex offenses to locally run community-based corrections programs, which are strengthened through community-based punishment, evidence-based practices, improved supervision strategies, and enhanced secured capacity, will improve public safety outcomes among adult felons and facilitate their reintegration back into society.

(6) Community-based corrections programs require a partnership between local public safety entities and the county to provide and expand the use of community-based punishment for low-level offender populations. Each county's Local Community Corrections Partnership, as established in paragraph (2) of subdivision (b) of Section 1230, should play a critical role in developing programs and ensuring appropriate outcomes for low-level offenders.

(7) Fiscal policy and correctional practices should align to promote a justice reinvestment strategy that fits each county. "Justice reinvestment" is a data-driven approach to reduce corrections and related criminal justice spending and reinvest savings in strategies designed to increase public safety. The purpose of justice reinvestment is to manage and allocate criminal justice populations more cost-effectively, generating savings that can be reinvested in evidence-based strategies that increase public safety while holding offenders accountable.

(8) "Community-based punishment" means correctional sanctions and programming encompassing a range of custodial and noncustodial responses to criminal or noncompliant offender activity. Community-based punishment may be provided by local public safety entities directly or through community-based public or private correctional service providers, and include, but are not limited to, the following:

(A) Short-term flash incarceration in jail for a period of not more than 10 days.

(B) Intensive community supervision.

(C) Home detention with electronic monitoring or GPS monitoring.

(D) Mandatory community service.

(E) Restorative justice programs such as mandatory victim restitution and victim-offender reconciliation.

(F) Work, training, or education in a furlough program pursuant to Section 1208.

(G) Work, in lieu of confinement, in a work release program pursuant to Section 4024.2.

(H) Day reporting.

(I) Mandatory residential or nonresidential substance abuse treatment programs.

(J) Mandatory random drug testing.

(K) Mother-infant care programs.

(L) Community-based residential programs offering structure, supervision, drug treatment, alcohol treatment, literacy programming, employment counseling, psychological counseling, mental health treatment, or any combination of these and other interventions.

(9) "Evidence-based practices" refers to supervision policies, procedures, programs, and practices demonstrated by scientific research to reduce recidivism among individuals under probation, parole, or post release supervision.

(b) The provisions of this act are not intended to alleviate state prison overcrowding.

18. (a) Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by any law of this state, every offense declared to be a felony is punishable by imprisonment for 16 months, or two or three years in the state prison unless the offense is punishable pursuant to subdivision (h) of Section 1170.

(b) Every offense which is prescribed by any law of the state to be a felony punishable by imprisonment or by a fine, but without an alternate sentence to the county jail for a period not exceeding one year, may be punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding one year or by a fine, or by both.

19. Except in cases where a different punishment is prescribed by any law of this state, every offense declared to be a misdemeanor is punishable by imprisonment in the county jail not exceeding six months, or by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars ($1,000), or by both.

19.2. In no case shall any person sentenced to confinement in a county or city jail, or in a county or joint county penal farm, road camp, work camp, or other county adult detention facility, or committed to the sheriff for placement in any county adult detention facility, on conviction of a misdemeanor, or as a condition of probation upon conviction of either a felony or a misdemeanor, or upon commitment for civil contempt, or upon default in the payment of a fine upon conviction of either a felony or a misdemeanor, or for any reason except upon conviction of a crime that specifies a felony punishment pursuant to subdivision (h) of Section 1170 or a conviction of more than one offense when consecutive sentences have been imposed, be committed for a period in excess of one year; provided, however, that the time allowed on parole shall not be considered as a part of the period of confinement.

19.4. When an act or omission is declared by a statute to be a public offense and no penalty for the offense is prescribed in any statute, the act or omission is punishable as a misdemeanor.

19.6. An infraction is not punishable by imprisonment. A person charged with an infraction shall not be entitled to a trial by jury. A person charged with an infraction shall not be entitled to have the public defender or other counsel appointed at public expense to represent him or her unless he or she is arrested and not released on his or her written promise to appear, his or her own recognizance, or a deposit of bail.

19.7. Except as otherwise provided by law, all provisions of law relating to misdemeanors shall apply to infractions including, but not limited to, powers of peace officers, jurisdiction of courts, periods for commencing action and for bringing a case to trial and burden of proof.

19.8. The following offenses are subject to subdivision (d) of Section 17: Sections 193.8, 330, 415, 485, 490.7, 555, 602.13, 652, and 853.7 of this code; subdivision (c) of Section 532b, and subdivision (n) of Section 602 of this code; subdivision (b) of Section 25658 and Sections 21672, 25658.5, 25661, and 25662 of the Business and Professions Code; Section 27204 of the Government Code; subdivision (c) of Section 23109 and Sections 12500, 14601.1, 27150.1, 40508, and 42005 of the Vehicle Code, and any other offense which the Legislature makes subject to subdivision (d) of Section 17. Except where a lesser maximum fine is expressly provided for a violation of any of those sections, any violation which is an infraction is punishable by a fine not exceeding two hundred fifty dollars ($250).

Except for the violations enumerated in subdivision (d) of Section 13202.5 of the Vehicle Code, and Section 14601.1 of the Vehicle Code based upon failure to appear, a conviction for any offense made an infraction under subdivision (d) of Section 17 is not grounds for the suspension, revocation, or denial of any license, or for the revocation of probation or parole of the person convicted.

19.9. For purposes of this code, "mandatory supervision" shall mean the portion of a defendant's sentenced term during which time he or she is supervised by the county probation officer pursuant to subparagraph (B) of paragraph (5) of subdivision (h) of Section 1170.

20. In every crime or public offense there must exist a union, or joint operation of act and intent, or criminal negligence.

21. (a) The intent or intention is manifested by the circumstances connected with the offense.

(b) In the guilt phase of a criminal action or a juvenile adjudication hearing, evidence that the accused lacked the capacity or ability to control his conduct for any reason shall not be admissible on the issue of whether the accused actually had any mental state with respect to the commission of any crime. This subdivision is not applicable to Section 26.

21a. An attempt to commit a crime consists of two elements: a specific intent to commit the crime, and a direct but ineffectual act done toward its commission.

22. (a) No act committed by a person while in a state of voluntary intoxication is less criminal by reason of his or her having been in that condition. Evidence of voluntary intoxication shall not be admitted to negate the capacity to form any mental states for the crimes charged, including, but not limited to, purpose, intent, knowledge, premeditation, deliberation, or malice aforethought, with which the accused committed the act.

(b) Evidence of voluntary intoxication is admissible solely on the issue of whether or not the defendant actually formed a required specific intent, or, when charged with murder, whether the defendant premeditated, deliberated, or harbored express malice aforethought.

(c) Voluntary intoxication includes the voluntary ingestion, injection, or taking by any other means of any intoxicating liquor, drug, or other substance.

23. In any criminal proceeding against a person who has been issued a license to engage in a business or profession by a state agency pursuant to provisions of the Business and Professions Code or the Education Code, or the Chiropractic Initiative Act, the state agency which issued the license may voluntarily appear to furnish pertinent information, make recommendations regarding specific conditions of probation, or provide any other assistance necessary to promote the interests of justice and protect the interests of the public, or may be ordered by the court to do so, if the crime charged is substantially related to the qualifications, functions, or duties of a licensee.

For purposes of this section, the term "license" shall include a permit or a certificate issued by a state agency.

For purposes of this section, the term "state agency" shall include any state board, commission, bureau, or division created pursuant to the provisions of the Business and Professions Code, the Education Code, or the Chiropractic Initiative Act to license and regulate individuals who engage in certain businesses and professions.

24. This Act, whenever cited, enumerated, referred to, or amended, may be designated simply as THE PENAL CODE, adding, when necessary, the number of the section.

Amicus Brief

COUNSEL: [1] DAVID J. SCHEFFER, ESQ., CENTER FOR INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS, NORTHWESTERN UNIVERSITY SCHOOL OF LAW, Chicago, Illinois, Amicus Curiae. [*i]

n1 Counsel of record for all parties received notice at least 10 days prior to the due date of my intention to file this amicus brief; all counsel have consented to the filing of this brief; and the consent letters have been filed with the Clerk of the Court with this brief. No counsel for any party authored this brief in whole or in part, and no person or entity, other than the amicus curiae, made a monetary contribution to the preparation or submission of this brief.

David J. Scheffer is the Mayer Brown/Robert A. Helman Professor of Law and Director of the Center for International Human Rights at Northwestern University School of Law, where he teaches international human rights and criminal law and corporate human rights responsibility. He served as U.S. Ambassador-at-Large for War Crimes Issues (1997-2001) and counsel to the U.S. Permanent Representative to the United Nations (1993-1997). He was deeply engaged in the policy formulation, negotiations, and drafting of the constitutional documents governing the International Criminal Court. He led the U.S. delegation that negotiated the Rome Statute (Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, adopted July 17, 1998, 2187 U.N.T.S. 90 (1998)), and its supplemental documents from 1997 to 2001. He was deputy head of the delegation from 1995 to 1997. On behalf of the U.S. Government, he negotiated the statutes of and coordinated support for the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, Special Court for Sierra Leone, and Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of [*2] Cambodia. He exercised responsibility within the U.S. Government for the investigation and prosecution of atrocity crimes (namely, genocide, crimes against humanity, and war crimes) on a global basis. He has written extensively about the tribunals, including the International Criminal Court, and the negotiations leading to their creation.

Ambassador Scheffer submits this brief out of concern that the Second Circuit erred in its analysis of the Rome Statute's mens rea provision for aiding and abetting liability, most particularly in the Second Circuit's conclusions that this provision of the Rome Statute was meant to reflect customary international law and that the accessorial liability of aiding and abetting arises only when there is shared intent with the perpetrator of the underlying crime. Neither conclusion is correct. Ambassador Scheffer believes this brief is necessary to clarify the meaning of the Rome Statute and aiding and abetting liability thereunder. The Second Circuit judgment reflects serious misunderstandings of the Rome Statute and it merits review by this Court.

TITLE: BRIEF OF DAVID J. SCHEFFER, DIRECTOR OF THE CENTER FOR INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS, AS AMICUS CURIAE IN SUPPORT OF THE ISSUANCE OF A WRIT OF CERTIORARI

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT

The Second Circuit errs in drawing upon Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court as a demonstration of customary international law for aiding and abetting atrocity [*3] crimes under the Court's subject matter jurisdiction. Article 25(3)(c) reads:

> 3. In accordance with this Statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:
> . . . .
> (c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission. . . .

This provision was a negotiated compromise among mostly common law and civil law governments after years [5] of talks leading to the Rome Statute and was not finalized to express a rule of customary law.

The Rome Statute was never intended, in its entirety, to reflect customary international law. Some of the document's provisions -- particularly those pertaining to the subject matter jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court -- were negotiated for the purpose of codifying customary international law. However, many provisions were not so negotiated and clearly embody compromises unique to the treaty and to the operation of the International Criminal Court. Indeed, aiding and abetting liability remained an unresolved issue until very late in the negotiations. The final wording of Article 25(3)(c) is an example of compromise language far removed from any effort to mirror customary international law.

[*4] The Second Circuit further errs in concluding that the reference to "purpose" in Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute establishes the requirement of a shared intent between the perpetrator of the crime and the aider or abettor. The negotiating history of Article 25(3)(c) demonstrates that there was no definitive agreement pointing to either an intention standard or a knowledge [6] standard with respect to aiding and abetting liability. The compromise "purpose" language chosen for Article 25(3)(c) reflects the obvious point that an aider or abettor purposely acts in a manner that has the consequence of facilitating the commission of a crime, but the aider or abettor's intention cannot be established without reference to the mens rea principles set forth in Article 30 of the Rome Statute. n2 Since the judges of the International [*5] Criminal Court have had no occasion yet to interpret Article 25(3)(c), particularly in conjunction with Article 30, there is no judicial precedent from which to gain a definitive understanding by anyone of aiding and abetting liability under the Rome Statute. As it now stands, however, the Rome Statute can be reasonably construed as establishing, for purposes of cases before the International Criminal Court, a knowledge standard for aiding and abetting liability.

n2 Article 30 of the Rome Statute reads in its entirety:

1. Unless otherwise provided, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court only if the material elements are committed with intent and knowledge.

2. For the purposes of this article, a person has intent where:

(a) In relation to conduct, that person means to engage in the conduct;

(b) In relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events.

3. For the purposes of this article, "knowledge" means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. "Know" and "knowingly" shall be construed accordingly.

[7]

This Court should grant certiorari in order to examine whether the mens rea standard for aiding and abetting under the Alien Tort Statute (28 U.S.C. § 1350) should be determined by reference to Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute, which represents a negotiated formula uniquely crafted for the International Criminal Court, or whether it should be ascertained from an examination of customary international law, which has long applied the knowledge standard.

ARGUMENT

I. ARTICLE 25(3)(c) OF THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT DOES NOT REFLECT CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW

The Second Circuit holds that the mens rea standard for aiding and abetting liability under the Alien Tort Statute must be a "norm of international character accepted by the civilized world and defined [*6] with a specificity comparable to the features of the 18th-century paradigms" recognized by this Court in Sosa v. Alvarez-Machain, 542 U.S. 692, 725 (2004). Curiously, the Second Circuit looks to the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court for definitive guidance by interpreting it as both adopting the purpose standard and embodying [8] the customary international law standard of Sosa with respect to aiding and abetting liability. The Presbyterian Church of Sudan et al. v. Talisman Energy, Inc., 582 F.3d 244, 258-259 (2d Cir. 2009). The Second Circuit errs on all counts with these findings. Petitioners correctly point out that customary international law has long established a knowledge standard for aiding and abetting liability and that federal common law, which is informed by customary international law, should guide the courts in determining accessorial liability under the Alien Tort Statute. Petition for Writ of Certiorari, The Presbyterian Church of Sudan et al. v. Talisman Energy, Inc., No. 09-1262 at 19-26 (2d Cir. April 15, 2010).

While fully embracing such reasoning, this amicus brief explicates two narrow but essential points not fully addressed elsewhere. The first objective is to explain, in this Part I, why Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute, which the Second Circuit relies upon for its finding of a purpose standard, should not be interpreted as customary international law. Nonetheless, even if the provision were to be firmly settled as customary international law in the view of [9] the federal judiciary, the second objective of [*7] this amicus brief is to explain, in Part II, how the Second Circuit's interpretation of the wording of Article 25(3)(c) betrays both what transpired in the negotiations leading to the Rome Statute and how the mens rea standard for aiding and abetting is established under the treaty.

The Rome Statute is a negotiated treaty of considerable complexity designed to govern only the International Criminal Court. The Rome Statute was never intended, in its entirety, to reflect customary international law. Relatively few of the provisions of the Rome Statute merit that rigorous categorization and they do not include Article 25(3)(c). Nonetheless, the Second Circuit leaps to the conclusion that Article 25(3)(c) embodies customary international law.

Article 25(3)(c) was a negotiated compromise among primarily common law and civil law governments after years of talks leading to the Rome Statute and was not finalized to express a rule of customary law. There is no international consensus reflected in Article 25(3)(c), which in any event must be read in conjunction with Article 30, the mens rea provision of the Rome Statute.

A. The substantive [10] crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Criminal Court were drafted to reflect customary international law

The provisions of the Rome Statute that the drafters understood were being negotiated to record [*8] customary international law were the atrocity crimes defined in Articles 6 (genocide), 7 (crimes against humanity), and 8 (war crimes) of the treaty -- the very provisions federal courts should be looking to for guidance about the primary violations of international law at stake in Alien Tort Statute litigation. See WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT 103 (3d ed. 2007).

For years the drafters, including myself and a team of State, Defense, and Justice Department lawyers working with our foreign counterparts, examined and debated the development of international humanitarian law and international criminal law to arrive at a general agreement as to what constituted customary international law for the substantive crimes that would be prosecuted before the International Criminal Court. Thus, if one applies the stringent universality requirements of Sosa to the Rome Statute, one can confidently identify the atrocity [11] crimes defined therein as representing the types of crimes (or torts) that have universal character and are of such a magnitude that they fall within the jurisdictional scope of the Alien Tort Statute. But that sharp focus on customary international law never was the aim of the negotiations regarding other provisions of the Rome Statute, including the negotiations on accessorial liability. While some other articles of the Rome Statute happened, in the end, to reflect customary international law, Article 25(3)(c) is not one of them.

[*9] B. The general principles of law and other key provisions of the Rome Statute were not all drafted to reflect customary international law

The general principles of criminal law set forth in Articles 22-33 of the Rome Statute were intensively negotiated, often leading to compromises between common law and civil (Romano-Germanic) law countries in particular and with the active intervention of delegations schooled in Sharia law or other major legal systems. In some instances, the end product of this process of negotiation was a provision that mirrors customary international law. For example, the provisions of the Rome Statute that [12] doubtless fall within this category include Articles 22 (nullum crimen sine lege), 23 (nulla poena sine lege), 24 (non-retroactivity ratione personae), 25(3)(e) (incitement to commit genocide), 32 (mistake of fact or mistake of law), and 67 (rights of the accused).

It would be erroneous to claim, however, following the deals struck and compromises arrived at during years of talks, that all of the provisions on general principles of law and all rules of evidence and procedure, penalties, and sentencing were reflections of customary international law -- many were not. As explained above, negotiators labored very hard to create a subject matter jurisdiction of only crimes of customary international law, but the Rome Statute never would have come to pass if that standard of universal acceptance had been required for other [*10] provisions, including all of the general principles of law.

For example, Article 33, a general principle of law on superior orders and prescription of law, was heavily negotiated, resulting in compromise language that does not mirror comparable provisions in the charters of the Nuremberg and Tokyo International Military Tribunals or the statutes [13] of the other international or hybrid criminal tribunals of recent years. Indeed, the end result in Rome reflected more what was acceptable to NATO military commanders than what was desired by many other governments. The former President of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, Professor Antonio Cassese, writes, "[Article 33] is at odds with customary international law, for it does not include war crimes in the category of offences with regard to which superior order [sic] enjoining their commission are always manifestly unlawful." ANTONIO CASSESE, INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL

Beyond the general principles of law, another example of negotiated compromise language arises with Article 77, which establishes a maximum sentence of life imprisonment "when justified by the extreme gravity of the crime and the individual circumstances of the convicted person." Arab and Caribbean delegations strongly objected to the absence of the death penalty in the Rome Statute and would never concede that Article 77 reflects the maximum degree of punishment permitted under customary international law. WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, AN [*11] INTRODUCTION TO THE [14] INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT 316 n. 17 (3d ed. 2007). Indeed, the U.S. Government would not concede that point.

C. Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute was not drafted to reflect customary international law

Similarly, Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute was negotiated not to codify customary international law but to accommodate the numerous views of common law and civil law experts about how, precisely, to express the mens rea of the aider or abettor. Per Saland, the Swedish Chairman of the Working Group on the General Principles of Criminal Law for years prior to and throughout the Rome Conference, writes that Article 25 > posed great difficulties to negotiate in a number of ways. One problem was that experts from different legal systems took strongly held positions, based on their national laws, as to the exact content of the various concepts involved. They seemed to find it hard to understand that another legal system might approach the issue in another way: e.g., have a different concept, or give the same name to a concept but with a slightly different content. . . . The text was also burdened with references to the mental element (e.g., intent and knowledge) because [15] agreement had not yet been reached as to the text of a separate article dealing with the mental element in general terms.

[*12] Per Saland, International Criminal Law Principles, in THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: THE MAKING OF THE ROME STATUTE 189, 198 (Roy Lee ed., 1999).

As the lead U.S. negotiator, I do not recall hearing directly or being advised by my Justice Department team of negotiators of a single discussion prior to or during the Rome negotiations where the text of what laboriously became Article 25(3)(c) on aiding and abetting as a mode of participation was being settled as a matter of customary international law. It was a very contentious provision, with some delegations seeking explicit reference to intention, notwithstanding the important complication that the word "intention" has different meanings in different legal systems. In some countries, for example, passive intention is inferred from an actor's engaging in conduct with knowledge of some likely consequence of that conduct. Other delegations were wedded to the term "knowledge," believing that it better reflected the standard that was employed in their national practice and that had been endorsed [16] in the jurisprudence of the Nuremberg and Tokyo International Military Tribunals and of the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda.

Negotiators struggled to find compromise wording and ultimately settled on using neither "intent" nor "knowledge" but "purpose." Reaching this compromise was made easier, in the end, by the prior resolution of the final language of Article 30, an article that deals expressly with the issue of the mental element of crimes. Finalizing the language of [*13] Article 30 helped enormously, as it enabled negotiators to look to Article 30 for intent and knowledge standards while seeking an accommodation for Article 25(3)(c). However, if anyone had claimed we were writing customary international law on aiding and abetting liability in Article 25(3)(c), they would have been laughed out of the room.

Thus, the wording of Article 25(3)(c) was uniquely crafted for the International Criminal Court, and when read in conjunction with the mens rea standards set forth in Article 30 of the Rome Statute, leaves to the judges of the International Criminal Court the task of determining precisely the proper criteria for accessorial liability. [17] Nothing discourages or prevents them from looking to the growing jurisprudence of the International Criminal Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and Rwanda, the Special Court for Sierra Leone, the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia, to state practice, and to scholarly texts for guidance on this issue.

Article 25(3)(c) is not a statement of customary international law. Since the International Criminal Court has yet to interpret the provision's meaning and application with respect to accessorial liability for aiding and abetting, national courts can only speculate as to its scope and meaning; yet that speculation should be fully informed by the negotiating history. One pillar of certainty in that history is that Article 25(3)(c) has no standing as customary international law.

[*14] II. THE MENS REA REQUIREMENT FOR AIDING AND ABETTING UNDER THE ROME STATUTE IS AMBIGUOUS BUT CAN BE REASONABLY INTERPRETED AS A KNOWLEDGE STANDARD

In the years following the Rome Statute negotiations, scholars have debated what Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute achieves -- whether the provision creates a shared purpose requirement for aiding and abetting or whether, when [18] joined with the mental element provision of Article 30, it builds upon longstanding and growing precedents from international and hybrid criminal tribunals that sustain the knowledge standard for aiding and abetting. See ANTONIO CASSESE, INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW 74, 214-29 (2d ed. 2008); Roger S. Clark, The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences, 2 CRIM. L.F. 291, 301-03 (2001); Donald K. Piragoff & Darryl Robinson, Article 30: Mental Element, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT 849, 854-55 (Otto Trifftrer ed., 2d ed. 2008); Kai Ambos, Article 25: Individual Criminal Responsibility, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT 743, 759-60 (Otto Trifftrer ed., 2d ed. 2008); WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT 213 (3d ed. 2007); WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY 435-46 (2010); Albin Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, in 1 THE [*15] ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY 767, 798-801, 900-02 (Antonio [19] Cassese, et al. eds., 2002). Such debate demonstrates that there are reasonable interpretations, one of them certainly being application of the knowledge standard. But until the judges of the International Criminal Court rule on the mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting under the Rome Statute, no national court can dictate that one standard (such as purpose or shared intention) negates a second standard (such as knowledge) in the International Criminal Court's constitutional framework or in its practice.

A. Article 25(3)(c) is reasonably read with a knowledge standard because imposition of an intent standard would destroy the distinction between aider or abettor and co-perpetrator

The great weight of international precedent has identified aiding and abetting with a knowledge standard. See, e.g., ANTONIO CASSESE, INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL LAW 211, 214-18 (2d ed. 2008); Prosecutor v. Furundzija, Case No. IT-95-17/1-T, Judgment, PP 234-35, 245 (Dec. 10, 1998); Brief for International Law Scholars William Aceves et al. as Amici Curiae Supporting Petitioners at 12-15, Presbyterian Church of Sudan, et al. v. Talisman Energy, Inc., No. 09-1262 (2d Cir. April 30, 2010). [20] The Second Circuit nevertheless reached a contrary conclusion: "Thus, applying international law, we hold that the mens rea [*16] standard for aiding and abetting liability in ATS actions is purpose rather than knowledge alone." Presbyterian Church of Sudan, et al., 582 F.3d at 259.

Among the problems with this conclusion is that it obliterates the distinction between aiders and abettors, on the one hand, and perpetrators of atrocity crimes on the other hand. The character of atrocity crimes, which are massive assaults on civilian populations or egregious violations of the laws of war, means that: 1) the intention of the perpetrator can often be inferred more readily; and 2) the many additional participants in the vast criminal enterprise necessarily act with a multiplicity of intentions among them, but the aiders and abettors do so only knowing that their participation facilitates the intentional commission of the principal crime while they act upon their separate individual intentions, such as the pursuit of profit, survival, status, or even discrimination against the victims.

Professor William Schabas explains, "Some judgments [of the war crimes tribunals] [21] have attempted to explain the distinction [between aiding and abetting and perpetration] in another way, stating that when the accomplice 'shares' the intent of the principal perpetrator, he or she becomes a 'co-perpetrator.'" WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, THE U.N. INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL TRIBUNALS: THE FORMER YUGOSLAVIA, RWANDA AND SIERRA LEONE 307-08 (2006). Had the drafters of the Rome Statute meant to require an intent standard for aiding and abetting, they would have agreed to recast aiding and abetting more coherently as a co-perpetrator [*17] mode of liability. But they did not. Consequently, a national court would be mistaken to identify the Rome Statute as somehow confirming a shared intention standard and denying the knowledge standard. The final wording of Article 25(3)(c) negated neither the large body of precedents for a knowledge standard in aiding and abetting liability nor the common sense reality of how atrocity crimes are committed.

B. Article 25(3)(c) must be interpreted together with the general principle of law on mental element set forth in Article 30(2)(b) of the Rome Statute Negotiators repeatedly stumbled over what eventually was consolidated in Article [22] 30 of the Rome Statute regarding the required mental element for all of the atrocity crimes, including the mental element for accessorial liability for such crimes. There remained a lingering and significant problem prior to Rome among largely common law and civil law delegations about precisely how the mens rea for aiding and abetting should be worded. The Preparatory Committee draft in spring 1998, which was the initial working draft in Rome, reflected this continued indecision with its draft language for the aiding and abetting provision: "[With [intent] [knowledge] to facilitate the commission of such a crime,] aids, abets or otherwise assists . . ." United Nations Diplomatic Conference of Plenipotentiaries on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court, Rome 15 June -- [*18] 17 July 1998, Official Records, Volume III, U.N. Doc. A/CONF.183/13 (Vol. III) (2002), at 31.

It was only after negotiators reached Rome in the summer of 1998 that they finally arrived at compromise language. We knew that Article 30 of the Rome Statute, which deals with the required mental element, would be the agreed formula for how both intent and knowledge would be described and [23] applied as the mental element for criminal acts, "[u]nless otherwise provided." Rome Statute, art. 30(1). The latter proviso relates to explicit formulations of intent and knowledge for some of the atrocity crimes defined in Articles 6, 7, and 8, for command responsibility under Article 28, and for participants in a "common purpose" under Article 25(3)(d)(ii). WILLIAM A. SCHABAS, AN INTRODUCTION TO THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT 224-25 (3d ed. 2007). But the proviso's relevance, if any, to Article 25(3)(c) is far from clear and was never confirmed in the negotiations.

The final text of Article 30(2)(b) easily captures the mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting, namely, "[i]n relation to a consequence, that person means to cause that consequence or is aware that it will occur in the ordinary course of events." (emphasis added). At Rome, negotiators did not relegate aiding and abetting to the first prong of this formulation -- "means to cause that consequence" -- which would have injected a shared intention standard into aiding and abetting. Rather, the intent of the aider or abettor is logically discovered within the awareness of the "consequence," namely that he or [24] she who aids or [*19] abets is someone who "is aware that [the consequence] will occur in the ordinary course of events." Rome Statute, art. 30(2)(b).

Article 25(3)(c)'s opening phrase, "For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime," was agreed to in Rome during the final negotiations as an acceptable compromise phrase to resolve the inconclusive talks over whether to use the word "intent" or the word "knowledge" for this particular mode of participation. The "purpose" language stated the de minimus and obvious point, namely, that an aider or abettor purposely acts in a manner that has the consequence of facilitating the commission of a crime, but one must look to Article 30(2)(b) for guidance on how to frame the intent of the aider or abettor with respect to that consequence.

Donald Piragoff, lead Canadian Government negotiator on general principles of law throughout the years of negotiations culminating in Rome, writes about the relationship between aiding and abetting liability under Article 25(3)(c) and mental element requirements of Article 30(2):

> A question arises as to whether the conjunctive formulation [intent and knowledge] changes existing [25] international jurisprudence that an accomplice (such as an aider or abettor) need not share the same mens rea of the principal, and that a knowing participation in the commission of an offence or awareness of the act of participation coupled with a conscious decision to participate is [*20] sufficient mental culpability for an accomplice. It is submitted that the conjunctive formulation has not altered this jurisprudence, but merely reflects the fact that aiding and abetting by an accused requires both knowledge of the crime being committed by the principal and some intentional conduct by the accused that constitutes the participation. . . . Article 30 para. 2(b) makes it clear that "intent" may be satisfied by an awareness that a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. This same type of awareness can also satisfy the mental element of "knowledge," as defined in article 30, para. 3. Therefore, if both "intent" and "knowledge" are required on the part of an accomplice, these mental elements can be satisfied by such awareness.

Donald K. Piragoff & Darryl Robinson, Article 30: Mental Element, in COMMENTARY ON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL [26] CRIMINAL COURT 849, 855 (Otto Trifftrer ed., 2d ed. 2008).

There has been no ruling by the judges of the International Criminal Court on whether the "purpose" language in Article 25(3)(c) constitutes a form of specific intent, whereby evidence of a particular intention must be demonstrated and the mental element of Article 30(2)(a) or the first prong of Article 30(2)(b) ("that person means to cause that consequence") must be applied. For the present, the compromise struck in Article 25(3)(c) reflects the [*21] ambiguity that uniquely characterizes the Rome Statute on aiding and abetting liability.

C. The "purpose" requirement was not added to Article 25(3)(c) during the Rome negotiations to require a shared intention by the aider or abettor and the perpetrator of the crime

The Second Circuit equates the "purpose to facilitate" requirement in Article 25(3)(c) with the perpetrator's intent to commit the crime, thus marrying the perpetrator's intent with that of the aider or abettor as a virtual co-perpetrator. That is a mistaken reading of the provision.

Professor William Schabas writes, "The purpose requirement was added during the Rome Conference, but nothing in [27] the official records provides any clarification for the purposes of interpretation." WILLIAM SCHABAS, THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY 435 (2010). When the intention of the principal perpetrator is known to the aider or abettor, who nonetheless proceeds to assist such perpetrator in the commission of the principal crime, then aiding and abetting liability logically arises. This is so even though the aider or abettor acts with a different intention, which may be an intent that on its face is perfectly legal (such as seeking to profit from a business enterprise).

The most generous interpretation one can afford Article 25(3)(c) is that it connotes an inferred intent [*22] from the act of providing assistance that one knows is facilitating the commission of a crime. That one can infer intent from knowledge is well established. For example, in the context of the Alien Tort Statute, while making a profit may be a corporation's primary objective, a secondary objective can arise in the realization that one's actions facilitate the commission of the crime and such knowledge can give rise to an inferred intent to join in the criminal conduct because [28] it is profitable. In some cases -- probably rare -- a corporation may actually come to embrace not only its primary objective of making a profit, but also the criminal purpose of the perpetrator. But when that additional objective is fully embraced, it transforms the criminal character of the corporation from that of an aider or abettor into that of a full co-perpetrator of the crime. See infra at 15-17.

A small group of European scholars -- with whom the Second Circuit seemingly aligns itself -- seeks to impose a far-reaching and provocative interpretation on Article 25(3)(c), setting aside precedent and favoring a narrow interpretation that attaches to the defendant aider or abettor an intention to join the perpetrator in the commission of the underlying crime. See Albin Eser, Individual Criminal Responsibility, in 1 THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT: A COMMENTARY, 767, 798-801, 900-02 (Antonio Cassese, et al. eds., 2002). Such a view, at the heart of the debate in Rome, would lead one to believe that the Rome Statute definitively establishes a whole new playing field for aiding and abetting [*23] that, at a minimum, would have to be uniquely [29] tailored for the International Criminal Court and far removed from any claim of customary international law.

The Second Circuit succumbs to the notion that insertion of the word "purpose" in Article 25(3)(c) must really mean a purpose or shared intent standard for aiding and abetting, when in reality the phrase "purpose to facilitate" was a compromise usage of those words to avoid any agreement on precisely the issue of shared intent. In Rome there was no agreement to so limit aiding and abetting to such a narrow range of liability requiring the finding of a shared intent to commit the underlying crime. That theory may exist in the aspirations of certain academics determined to declare victory ex post facto at Rome, but it has no reality in either the Rome Statute or the Alien Tort Statute.

Professor Roger Clark, a principal negotiator advising Samoa before and during the Rome Conference, writes:

> Article 25 sometimes uses terms like "purpose" and "with the aim of" that may need to be read in the light of article 30. Speaking generally, one who does not personally "do" the deed, must know of it and intend to associate himself with it. . . . There was considerable debate throughout [30] the process about the conjunctive "and" between intent and knowledge [in Article 30]. Some delegations, the French in particular, insisted [*24] that both were necessary. Others of us, especially from common law jurisdictions, believed that the appropriate mental element for each separate material element had to be considered on its own merits. Particularly for circumstance elements, as the term "circumstance" is used in article 30(3) (and some consequence ones), knowledge (in the sense of awareness) might well be enough, although intent might be required as to other relevant elements. The debate shed more heat than light. In part, the differences of perspective coincided with the ease with which some of us are prepared to see several different material elements combining with appropriate mental elements (plural) to form "the offence," where others tend to see the material element, a global "thing," and a single intent/knowledge mental element which gets attached to that thing.

Roger S. Clark, The Mental Element in International Criminal Law: The Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court and the Elements of Offences, 2 CRIM. L.F. 291, 302-303 (2001). [31] Only the judges of the International Criminal Court will sort this out when faced with a real case.

I believe, however, that when Article 25(3)(c) is interpreted by the judges of the International Criminal Court, they are more likely to discover the standard for aiding and abetting as it has developed in the jurisprudence of the international military tribunals at Nuremberg and Tokyo and the international [*25] and hybrid criminal tribunals or recent years, in state practice, and in the writings of leading scholars: a knowledge standard of substantial assistance and an intent standard arising from awareness that the criminal consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. A fair reading of Articles 25(3)(c), 30(2)(b), and 30(3) of the Rome Statute achieves such a standard.

III. THIS COURT SHOULD GRANT CERTIORARI TO CONFIRM THAT LOWER COURTS CANNOT RELY UPON THE ROME STATUTE OF THE INTERNATIONAL CRIMINAL COURT FOR A RULE OF CUSTOMARY INTERNATIONAL LAW ON AIDING AND ABETTING LIABILITY

The ambiguity that burdens the meaning of aiding and abetting liability under Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome Statute one day will be replaced with clarity, but only by the judges [32] of the International Criminal Court when they deliberate on a relevant case. Even then their ruling will not necessarily be formulated to reflect customary international law. Neither the Second Circuit nor this Court can substitute itself for their judgment about the Rome Statute's meaning. Scholars only can speculate at this stage. What can be stated with certainty is that Article 25(3)(c) was a negotiated compromise during the Rome negotiations that achieved the utilitarian objective of ensuring that aiding and abetting liability can be prosecuted before the International Criminal [*26] Court, and that the provision was uniquely crafted for the Court and thus never negotiated as a rule of customary international law.

While the subject matter jurisdiction provisions of the Rome Statute offer a valuable resource for the federal courts in their determination of what violations of international law under the Alien Tort Statute meet this Court's standard set in Sosa, an examination of accessorial liability standards for aiding and abetting under the Rome Statute offers no such guidance. This Court would seriously misread the Rome Statute to award Article 25(3)(c) of the Rome [33] Statute with the weighty significance of customary international law when the facts so clearly challenge that finding. Only the most self-inflated negotiators at Rome would hope for such a prize in the aftermath.

CONCLUSION

As a long-time participant in the American struggle over the merits and risks of the International Criminal Court, I find it ironic that the Second Circuit relies upon a mistaken reading of the Rome Statute to ascertain aiding and abetting liability. The United States has not ratified the Rome Statute because of continuing opposition from some quarters to its purported jurisdictional reach and even, in some respects, to its divergence from customary international law. Many of these critics no doubt would be [*27] surprised to learn that a federal court is relying heavily on the unratified Rome Statute for guidance on a form of accessorial liability -- aiding and abetting -- so easily and correctly found within the federal common law. Even the Sosa standard, which focuses on determining the primary violations of international law that should qualify for Alien Tort Statute litigation, does not purport to abandon federal common law, which itself [34] is informed by customary international law, with respect to secondary, or accessorial, liability standards.

For the above reasons, this Court should grant the petition for certiorari.

Summary

Section 1206 of the National Defense Authorization Act (NDAA) for Fiscal Year 2006, as amended and regularly extended, provides the Secretary of Defense with authority to train and equip foreign military forces for two specified purposes—counterterrorism and stability operations—and foreign maritime security forces for counterterrorism operations. The Department of Defense (DOD) values this authority as an important tool to train and equip military partners. Funds may be obligated only with the concurrence of the Secretary of State. Thus far, the Department of Defense (DOD) has used Section 1206 authority primarily to provide counterterrorism (CT) support. In FY2010 and FY2011, Section 1206 funds were also used to provide significant assistance to train and equip foreign military forces for military and stability operations in which U.S. forces participate. This authority will expire in FY2013.

Section 1206 allocations or notifications for FY2006-FY2011totaled $1.574 billion. (FY2012 plans are still under consideration.) During this period, Section 1206 supported bilateral programs in 40 countries, 16 multilateral programs, and a global human rights program.

FY2011 funding totaled $247.5 million, significantly below the $350 million cap on Section 1206 funding. The largest amount, totaling $44.8 million or some 18% of the funding, was provided to Uganda and Burundi to improve the tactical effectiveness of their military forces (the Ugandan Peoples Defense Force and the Burundian National Defense Forces) engaged in counterterrorism operations in Somalia. Over $20 million was provided to each Mauritania (for 1 fixed-wing aircraft and the modernization of others) and Georgia (to support Georgian deployments to Afghanistan under the International Security Assistance Force.) By region, FY2012 funding was as follows: Africa $113.9 million; Greater Europe, $88.7 million, Middle East and South/Southwestern Asia, $19.2 million.

Some Members have been concerned with several issues related to Section 1206 authority, both narrow and broad. Specific current concerns include whether Section 1206 funds are being used appropriately and effectively, and whether the authority should be expanded to provide training not only military forces but also to a wide range of foreign security forces. (Currently, Section 1206 limits security force training to maritime security forces.) An overarching issue is whether Congress should place Section 1206 train and equip (T&E) authority under the State Department with other T&E authorities. (Members have thus far refrained from codifying Section 1206 in permanent law, as requested by DOD.) Finally, some Members may wish to examine the status of Section 1206 in the context of broader security assistance reform.

Appendix A. FY2006-FY2010 Recipients and Funding

The $1.3 billion in FY2006-FY2010 Section 1206 funding was divided among more than 34 bilateral recipients and 14 multilateral groups of 2-15 members. Of these, three—Yemen, Pakistan, and Lebanon—received 44% of total Section 1206 assistance for these years. The top seven recipients (i.e., the top three recipients plus the Philippines, Indonesia, Bahrain, and Malaysia) received 63%, or a bit short of two-thirds of total Section 1206 funding. These seven countries constituent one-fifth of all bilateral recipients. Over half the bilateral and multilateral recipients received under $15 million in Section 1206 assistance.

Yemen was the largest recipient during this period. The $252.6 million it received from FY2006 through FY20010 constituted almost a fifth of total Section 1206 funding during this period. Over 60% of Section 1206 assistance to Yemen during this period was provided with FY2010 funds, most used to supply small airplanes and helicopters and other aircraft support to the Yemeni air force, to enable it to support Yemeni CT units, and the rest to enhance the CT capability of Yemeni SOF.

Over a quarter of Section 1206 aid to Yemen was provided through FY2009 funding. This assistance included not only trucks, radio systems (with operation and maintenance training), and body armor to help the Yemeni Border Security Force deter, detect, and detain terrorists along the Yemen, Saudi Arabia, and Oman borders, but also equipment for the Yemeni Coast Guard (patrol boats and accessories, and shipboard radios) and for the Yemini Air Force (helicopter spare parts and surveillance cameras) to enhance CT capability. FY2009 funds also supported Yemen's Ministry of Defense with an explosive ordnance disposal program. Section 1206 assistance to Yemen started in FY2006 with a relatively small package of equipment (small arms and ammunition, computers, radios and their installation, and light tactical vehicles) to aid the Yemeni Armed Forces in preventing cross-border arms trafficking. Significantly more FY2007 funds, about 10% of the current total, were devoted to enhance Yemen's border security CT capability, with vehicles of various types (as well as maintenance training and support), spare parts, crisis action center equipment, and transportation

Pakistan, the second-largest recipient with $203.4 million, or about 15% of total Section 1206 funding, did not receive funds in FY2010. Some $113.5 million, or over half Pakistan's funding, was provided in FY2009. Most Section 1206 funding to Pakistan provided equipment and training to increase the government's ability to counter terrorism threats emanating from the Federally Administered Tribal Areas (FATA).

- A central feature was helicopter support. In FY2006, Section 1206 assistance was first used to address spare part shortages that limited availability from Pakistan's "impressive inventory of helicopters."[66] These funds provided spare parts for Mi-17 and Cobra helicopters, as well as aviation body armor, night vision goggles, and limited visibility training for pilots. FY2008 and FY2009 funds also have provided the means, technical support, and training to repair,

Part I. General Provisions
Article 2. General Principles of Liability
→→ § 2.02. General Requirements of Culpability.

(1) Minimum Requirements of Culpability. Except as provided in Section 2.05, a person is not guilty of an offense unless he acted purposely, knowingly, recklessly or negligently, as the law may require, with respect to each material element of the offense.

(2) Kinds of Culpability Defined.

(a) Purposely.

A person acts purposely with respect to a material element of an offense when:

(i) if the element involves the nature of his conduct or a result thereof, it is his conscious object to engage in conduct of that nature or to cause such a result; and

(ii) if the element involves the attendant circumstances, he is aware of the existence of such circumstances or he believes or hopes that they exist.

(b) Knowingly.

A person acts knowingly with respect to a material element of an offense when:

(i) if the element involves the nature of his conduct or the attendant circumstances, he is aware that his conduct is of that nature or that such circumstances exist; and

(ii) if the element involves a result of his conduct, he is aware that it is practically certain that his conduct will cause such a result.

(c) Recklessly.

A person acts recklessly with respect to a material element of an offense when he consciously disregards a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct. The risk must be of such a nature and degree that, considering the nature and purpose of the actor's conduct and the circumstances known to him, its disregard involves a gross deviation from the standard of conduct that a law-abiding person would observe in the actor's situation.

(d) Negligently.

A person acts negligently with respect to a material element of an offense when he should be aware of a substantial and unjustifiable risk that the material element exists or will result from his conduct. The risk must be of such a nature and degree that the actor's failure to perceive it, considering the nature and purpose of his conduct and the circumstances known to him, involves a gross deviation from the standard of care that a reasonable person would observe in the actor's situation.

(3) Culpability Required Unless Otherwise Provided. When the culpability sufficient to establish a material element of an offense is not prescribed by law, such element is established if a person acts purposely, knowingly or recklessly with respect thereto.

(4) Prescribed Culpability Requirement Applies to All Material Elements. When the law defining an offense prescribes the kind of culpability that is sufficient for the commission of an offense, without distinguishing among the material elements thereof, such provision shall apply to all the material elements of the offense, unless a contrary purpose plainly appears.

(5) Substitutes for Negligence, Recklessness and Knowledge. When the law provides that negligence suffices to establish an element of an offense, such element also is established if a person acts purposely, knowingly or recklessly. When recklessness suffices to establish an element, such element also is established if a person acts purposely or knowingly. When acting knowingly suffices to establish an element, such element also is established if a person acts purposely.

(6) Requirement of Purpose Satisfied if Purpose Is Conditional. When a particular purpose is an element of an offense, the element is established although such purpose is conditional, unless the condition negatives the harm or evil sought to be prevented by the law defining the offense.

(7) Requirement of Knowledge Satisfied by Knowledge of High Probability. When knowledge of the existence of a particular fact is an element of an offense, such knowledge is established if a person is aware of a high probability of its existence, unless he actually believes that it does not exist.

(8) Requirement of Wilfulness Satisfied by Acting Knowingly. A requirement that an offense be committed wilfully is satisfied if a person acts knowingly with respect to the material elements of the offense, unless a purpose to impose further requirements appears.

(9) Culpability as to Illegality of Conduct. Neither knowledge nor recklessness or negligence as to whether conduct constitutes an offense or as to the existence, meaning or application of the law determining the elements of an offense is an element of such offense, unless the definition of the offense or the Code so provides.

(10) Culpability as Determinant of Grade of Offense. When the grade or degree of an offense depends on whether the offense is committed purposely, knowingly, recklessly or negligently, its grade or degree shall

YEMEN

Yemen, with a population of approximately 23 million, is a republic whose law provides for presidential election by popular vote from among at least two candidates endorsed by parliament. In 2006 citizens reelected President Ali Abdullah Saleh to another seven-year term in a generally open and competitive election, but one characterized by multiple problems with the voting process and the use of state resources on behalf of the ruling party. Saleh has led the country since 1978. The president appoints the prime minister, who is the head of government. The prime minister, in consultation with the president, selects the Council of Ministers. Although there are a number of parties, President Saleh's General People's Congress (GPC) dominated the government. Armed conflicts with the Houthi rebels in the North and with elements of the Southern Mobility Movement in southern governorates, as well as with Al-Qaida in the Arabian Peninsula (AQAP) terrorists, affected the government's human rights performance. There were instances in which elements of the security forces acted independently of civilian control.

Armed conflict in the northern Saada region declined markedly after a February 11 ceasefire. Nonetheless, violence and abuses persisted in connection with ongoing protests by the Southern Mobility Movement, a decentralized umbrella group formed in 2008 as a result of widespread antigovernment protests that sought more rights for southerners and during the year increasingly became associated with activists seeking to reestablish an independent South Yemen.

During the year attacks, often by unknown actors, occurred on government security forces, usually attributed to AQAP, although government claims of AQAP responsibility could not be verified in many cases.

The main government human rights abuses included severe limitations on citizens' ability to change their government due to, among other factors, corruption, fraudulent voter registration, administrative weakness, and close political-military relationships at high levels. Arbitrary and unlawful killings, politically motivated disappearances, and reports of torture and other physical abuse accompanied the use of excessive force against civilians in internal conflict. Prisons and detention centers were in poor condition, and some private, largely tribal, ones operated without legal authorization or control. Arbitrary arrest and detention, sometimes incommunicado, and denial of fair public trial were widespread. Official impunity was common. The government restricted civil liberties, including freedoms of

In northern Saada Governorate another round of intense fighting started in August 2009 and lasted until the parties announced partially observed January 23, then February 11 cease-fires, followed by President Saleh officially declaring the war "over" in a March 19 television interview. Large-scale conflict erupted again in August-September and continued sporadically at low levels at year's end.

According to the NGO Human Rights Watch (HRW) and other humanitarian organizations, witnesses reported four separate air raids on September 16 in which government bombs killed almost 90 civilians, mostly women, children, and the elderly in Adl, near Harf Sufyan in Amran Governorate. On September 18, the government announced a plan to investigate the deaths. By year's end no results of an investigation had been presented. Independent investigation into the shelling did not occur because of heightened insecurity in the region.

YODPRL recorded more than 20 forcible disappearances attributed to government forces during the year in connection with the fighting in Saada.

In fighting between government forces and Houthi rebels between August 2009 and February, international NGOs providing humanitarian assistance in Saada estimated more than 300,000 persons were displaced from their homes, then spreading across four northern governorates in search of aid (see section 2.d.).

There were reports during the year of the use by both sides of antipersonnel mines, including antitank and improvised mines, during the conflict in northern Saada Governorate between rebel forces led by Abdul-Malik al-Houthi and government troops. Houthi rebels actively interfered with government demining efforts.

The government and local and international human rights organizations claimed that Houthis also committed human rights violations during the year. According to an August 2009 government report, Houthi abuses included unlawful killing, rape and sexual assault, looting and destruction of civilian property, and plunder and destruction of public buildings. Some human rights activists said Houthis used human shields and killed and threatened civilians who did not support them. Independent verification of these allegations was difficult because the government and Houthi rebels blocked nearly all access to Saada during the year.

Although the law barred the use of underage soldiers, local and international human rights organizations reported that both Houthis and government-affiliated tribes deployed child soldiers into armed conflict during the latest round of fighting a. The act for which he or she was tried was characterized as an ordinary crime; or

b. The national court proceedings were not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility or the case was not diligently prosecuted.

3. In considering the penalty to be imposed on a person convicted of a crime under the present Statute, the Special Court shall take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served.

Security Council

4 October 2000

Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone

I. Introduction

1. The Security Council, by its resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, requested me to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court (hereinafter "the Special Court") to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, as well as crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone.

2. The Security Council further requested that I submit a report on the implementation of the resolution, in particular on my consultations and negotiations with the Government of Sierra Leone concerning the establishment of the Special Court. In the report I was requested, in particular, to address the questions of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court; an appeals process, including the advisability, feasibility and appropriateness of an appeals chamber in the Special Court, or of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda; and a possible alternative host State, should it be necessary to convene the Special Court outside the seat of the Court in Sierra Leone, if circumstances so require.

3. Specific recommendations were also requested by the Security Council on the following issues:

(a) Any additional agreements that might be required for the provision of the international assistance necessary for the establishment and functioning of the Special Court;

(b) The level of participation, support and technical assistance of qualified persons required from Member States, including, in particular, States members of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the Commonwealth, and from the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) that would be necessary for the efficient, independent and impartial functioning of the Special Court;

(c) The amount of voluntary contributions of funds, equipment and services, including expert personnel from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations;

(d) Whether the Special Court could receive, as necessary and feasible, expertise and advice from the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda.

4. The present report, submitted in response to the above requests, is in two parts. The first part (chaps. II-VI) examines and analyses the nature and specificity of the Special Court, its jurisdiction (subject-matter, temporal and personal), the organizational structure (the Chambers and the nature of the appeals process, the offices of the Prosecutor and the Registry), enforcement of sentences in third States and the choice of the alternative seat. The second part (chaps. VII and VIII) deals with the practical implementation of the resolution on the establishment of the Special Court. It describes the requirements of the Court in terms of personnel, equipment, services and funds that would be required of States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, the type of advice and expertise that may be expected from the two International Tribunals, and the logistical support and security requirements for premises and personnel that could, under an appropriate mandate, be provided by UNAMSIL. The Court's requirements in all of these respects have been placed within the specific context of Sierra Leone, and represent the minimum necessary, in the words of resolution 1315 (2000), "for the efficient, independent and impartial functioning of the Special Court". An assessment of the viability and sustainability of the financial mechanism envisaged, together with an alternative solution for the consideration of the Security Council, concludes the second part of the report.

5. The negotiations with the Government of Sierra Leone, represented by the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice, were conducted in two stages. The first stage of the negotiations, held at United Nations Headquarters from 12 to 14 September 2000, focused on the legal framework and constitutive instruments establishing the Special Court: the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and the Statute of the Special Court which is an integral part thereof. (For the texts of the Agreement and the Statute, see the annex to the present report.)

6. Following the Attorney General's visit to Headquarters, a small United Nations team led by Ralph Zacklin, Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs, visited Freetown from 18 to 20 September 2000. Mr. Zacklin was accompanied by Daphna Shraga, Senior Legal Officer, Office of the Legal Counsel, Office of Legal Affairs; Gerald Ganz, Security Coordination Officer, Office of the United Nations Security Coordinator; and Robert Kirkwood, Chief, Buildings Management, International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. During its three-day visit, the team concluded the negotiations on the remaining legal issues, assessed the adequacy of possible premises for the seat of the Special Court, their operational state and security conditions, and had substantive discussions on all aspects of the Special Court with the President of Sierra Leone, senior government officials, members of the judiciary and the legal profession, the Ombudsman, members of civil society, national and international non-governmental organizations and institutions involved in child-care programmes and rehabilitation of child ex-combatants, as well as with senior officials of UNAMSIL.

7. In its many meetings with Sierra Leoneans of all segments of society, the team was made aware of the high level of expectations created in anticipation of the establishment of a special court. If the role of the Special Court in dealing with impunity and developing respect for the rule of law in Sierra Leone is to be fully understood and its educative message conveyed to Sierra Leoneans of all ages, a broad public information and education campaign will have to be undertaken as an integral part of the Court's activities. The purpose of such a campaign would be both to inform and to reassure the population that while a credible Special Court cannot be established overnight, everything possible will be done to expedite its functioning; that while the number of persons prosecuted before the Special Court will be limited, it would not be selective or otherwise discriminatory; and that although the children of Sierra Leone may be among those who have committed the worst crimes, they are to be regarded first and foremost as victims. For a nation which has attested to atrocities that only few societies have witnessed, it will require a great deal of persuasion to convince it that the exclusion of the death penalty and its replacement by imprisonment is not an "acquittal" of the accused, but an imposition of a more humane punishment. In this public information campaign, UNAMSIL, alongside the Government and non-governmental organizations, could play an important role.

8. Since the present report is limited to an analysis of the legal framework and the practical operation of the Special Court, it does not address in detail specifics of the relationship between the Special Court and the national courts in Sierra Leone, or between the Court and the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission. It is envisaged, however, that upon the establishment of the Special Court and the appointment of its Prosecutor, arrangements regarding cooperation, assistance and sharing of information between the respective courts would be concluded and the status of detainees awaiting trial would be urgently reviewed. In a similar vein, relationship and cooperation arrangements would be required between the Prosecutor and the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission, including the use of the Commission as an alternative to prosecution, and the prosecution of juveniles, in particular.

II. Nature and specificity of the Special Court

9. The legal nature of the Special Court, like that of any other legal entity, is determined by its constitutive instrument. Unlike either the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, which were established by resolutions of the Security Council and constituted as subsidiary organs of the United Nations, or national courts established by law, the Special Court, as foreseen, is established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and is therefore a treaty-based sui generis court of mixed jurisdiction and composition. Its implementation at the national level would require that the agreement is incorporated in the national law of Sierra Leone in accordance with constitutional requirements. Its applicable law includes international as well as Sierra Leonean law, and it is composed of both international and Sierra Leonean judges,[1] prosecutors and administrative support staff.[2] As a treaty-based organ, the Special Court is not anchored in any existing system (i.e., United Nations administrative law or the national law of the State of the seat) which would be automatically applicable to its non-judicial, administrative and financial activities. In the absence of such a framework, it would be necessary to identify rules for various purposes, such as recruitment, staff administration, procurement, etc., to be applied as the need arose.[3]

10. The Special Court has concurrent jurisdiction with and primacy over Sierra Leonean courts. Consequently, it has the power to request at any stage of the proceedings that any national Sierra Leonean court defer to its jurisdiction (article 8, para. 2 of the Statute). The primacy of the Special Court, however, is limited to the national courts of Sierra Leone and does not extend to the courts of third States. Lacking the power to assert its primacy over national courts in third States in connection with the crimes committed in Sierra Leone, it also lacks the power to request the surrender of an accused from any third State and to induce the compliance of its authorities with any such request. In examining measures to enhance the deterrent powers of the Special Court, the Security Council may wish to consider endowing it with Chapter VII powers for the specific purpose of requesting the surrender of an accused from outside the jurisdiction of the Court.

11. Beyond its legal and technical aspects, which in many ways resemble those of other international jurisdictions, the Special Court is Sierra Leone-specific. Many of the legal choices made are intended to address the specificities of the Sierra Leonean conflict, the brutality of the crimes committed and the young age of those presumed responsible. The moral dilemma that some of these choices represent has not been lost upon those who negotiated its constitutive instruments.

III. Competence of the Special Court

A. Subject-matter jurisdiction

12. The subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court comprises crimes under international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law. It covers the most egregious practices of mass killing, extrajudicial executions, widespread mutilation, in particular amputation of hands, arms, legs, lips and other parts of the body, sexual violence against girls and women, and sexual slavery, abduction of thousands of children and adults, hard labour and forced recruitment into armed groups, looting and setting fire to large urban dwellings and villages. In recognition of the principle of legality, in particular nullum crimen sine lege, and the prohibition on retroactive criminal legislation, the international crimes enumerated, are crimes considered to have had the character of customary international law at the time of the alleged commission of the crime.

1. Crimes under international law

13. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council recommended that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court should include crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. Because of the lack of any evidence that the massive, large-scale killing in Sierra Leone was at any time perpetrated against an identified national, ethnic, racial or religious group with an intent to annihilate the group as such, the Security Council did not include the crime of genocide in its recommendation, nor was it considered appropriate by the Secretary-General to include it in the list of international crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court.

14. The list of crimes against humanity follows the enumeration included in the Statutes of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, which were patterned on article 6 of the Nürnberg Charter. Violations of common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and of article 4 of Additional Protocol II thereto committed in an armed conflict not of an international character have long been considered customary international law, and in particular since the establishment of the two International Tribunals, have been recognized as customarily entailing the individual criminal responsibility of the accused. Under the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), though it is not yet in force, they are recognized as war crimes.

15. Other serious violations of international humanitarian law falling within the jurisdiction of the Court include:

(a) Attacks against the civilian population as such, or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities;

(b) Attacks against peacekeeping personnel involved in a humanitarian assistance or a peacekeeping mission, as long as they are entitled to the protection given to civilians under the international law of armed conflict; and

(c) Abduction and forced recruitment of children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities.

16. The prohibition on attacks against civilians is based on the most fundamental distinction drawn in international humanitarian law between the civilian and the military and the absolute prohibition on directing attacks against the former. Its customary international law nature is, therefore, firmly established. Attacks against peacekeeping personnel, to the extent that they are entitled to protection recognized under international law to civilians in armed conflict, do not represent a new crime. Although established for the first time as an international crime in the Statute of the International Criminal Court, it was not viewed at the time of the adoption of the Rome Statute as adding to the already existing customary international law crime of attacks against civilians and persons hors de combat. Based on the distinction between peacekeepers as civilians and peacekeepers turned combatants, the crime defined in article 4 of the Statute of the Special Court is a specification of a targeted group within the generally protected group of civilians which because of its humanitarian or peacekeeping mission deserves special protection. The specification of the crime of attacks against peacekeepers, however, does not imply a more serious crime than attacks against civilians in similar circumstances and should not entail, therefore, a heavier penalty.

17. The prohibition on the recruitment of children below the age of 15, a fundamental element of the protection of children, was for the first time established in the 1977 Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, article 4, paragraph 3 (c), of which provides that children shall be provided with the care and aid they require, and that in particular:

A decade later, the prohibition on the recruitment of children below 15 into armed forces was established in article 38, paragraph 3, of the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child; and in 1998, the Statute of the International Criminal Court criminalized the prohibition and qualified it as a war crime. But while the prohibition on child recruitment has by now acquired a customary international law status, it is far less clear whether it is customarily recognized as a war crime entailing the individual criminal responsibility of the accused.

18. Owing to the doubtful customary nature of the ICC Statutory crime which criminalizes the conscription or enlistment of children under the age of 15, whether forced or "voluntary", the crime which is included in article 4 (c) of the Statute of the Special Court is not the equivalent of the ICC provision. While the definition of the crime as "conscripting" or "enlisting" connotes an administrative act of putting one's name on a list and formal entry into the armed forces, the elements of the crime under the proposed Statute of the Special Court are: (a) abduction, which in the case of the children of Sierra Leone was the original crime and is in itself a crime under common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions; (b) forced recruitment in the most general sense — administrative formalities, obviously, notwithstanding; and (c) transformation of the child into, and its use as, among other degrading uses, a "child-combatant".

2. Crimes under Sierra Leonean law

19. The Security Council recommended that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court should also include crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone. While most of the crimes committed in the Sierra Leonean conflict during the relevant period are governed by the international law provisions set out in articles 2 to 4 of the Statute, recourse to Sierra Leonean law has been had in cases where a specific situation or an aspect of it was considered to be either unregulated or inadequately regulated under international law. The crimes considered to be relevant for this purpose and included in the Statute are: offences relating to the abuse of girls under the 1926 Prevention of Cruelty to Children Act and offences relating to the wanton destruction of property, and in particular arson, under the 1861 Malicious Damage Act.

20. The applicability of two systems of law implies that the elements of the crimes are governed by the respective international or national law, and that the Rules of Evidence differ according to the nature of the crime as a common or international crime. In that connection, article 14 of the Statute provides that the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to proceedings before the Special Court, and that the judges shall have the power to amend or adopt additional rules, where a specific situation is not provided for. In so doing, they may be guided, as appropriate, by the 1965 Criminal Procedure Act of Sierra Leone.

B. Temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court

21. In addressing the question of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court as requested by the Security Council, a determination of the validity of the sweeping amnesty granted under the Lomé Peace Agreement of 7 July 1999 was first required. If valid, it would limit the temporal jurisdiction of the Court to offences committed after 7 July 1999; if invalid, it would make possible a determination of a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court at any time in the pre-Lomé period.

1. The amnesty clause in the Lomé Peace Agreement

22. While recognizing that amnesty is an accepted legal concept and a gesture of peace and reconciliation at the end of a civil war or an internal armed conflict,[4] the United Nations has consistently maintained the position that amnesty cannot be granted in respect of international crimes, such as genocide, crimes against humanity or other serious violations of international humanitarian law.

23. At the time of the signature of the Lomé Peace Agreement, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General for Sierra Leone was instructed to append to his signature on behalf of the United Nations a disclaimer to the effect that the amnesty provision contained in article IX of the Agreement ("absolute and free pardon") shall not apply to international crimes of genocide, crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. This reservation is recalled by the Security Council in a preambular paragraph of resolution 1315 (2000).

24. In the negotiations on the Statute of the Special Court, the Government of Sierra Leone concurred with the position of the United Nations and agreed to the inclusion of an amnesty clause which would read as follows:

> "An amnesty granted to any person falling within the jurisdiction of the Special Court in respect of the crimes referred to in articles 2 to 4 of the present Statute shall not be a bar to prosecution."

With the denial of legal effect to the amnesty granted at Lomé, to the extent of its illegality under international law, the obstacle to the determination of a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court within the pre-Lomé period has been removed.

2. Beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction

25. It is generally accepted that the decade-long civil war in Sierra Leone dates back to 1991, when on 23 March of that year forces of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF) entered Sierra Leone from Liberia and launched a rebellion to overthrow the one-party military rule of the All People's Congress (APC). In determining a beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court within the period since

23 March 1991, the Secretary-General has been guided by the following considerations: (a) the temporal jurisdiction should be reasonably limited in time so that the Prosecutor is not overburdened and the Court overloaded; (b) the beginning date should correspond to an event or a new phase in the conflict without necessarily having any political connotations; and (c) it should encompass the most serious crimes committed by persons of all political and military groups and in all geographical areas of the country. A temporal jurisdiction limited in any of these respects would rightly be perceived as a selective or discriminatory justice.

26. Imposing a temporal jurisdiction on the Special Court reaching back to 1991 would create a heavy burden for the prosecution and the Court. The following alternative dates were therefore considered as realistic options:

(a) 30 November 1996 — the conclusion of the Abidjan Peace Agreement, the first comprehensive Peace Agreement between the Government of Sierra Leone and RUF. Soon after its signature the Peace Agreement had collapsed and large-scale hostilities had resumed;

(b) 25 May 1997 — the date of the coup d'état orchestrated by the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) against the Government that was democratically elected in early 1996. The period which ensued was characterized by serious violations of international humanitarian law, including, in particular, mass rape and abduction of women, forced recruitment of children and summary executions;

(c) 6 January 1999 — the date on which RUF/AFRC launched a military operation to take control of Freetown. The first three-week period of full control by these entities over Freetown marked the most intensified, systematic and widespread violations of human rights and international humanitarian law against the civilian population. During its retreat in February 1999, RUF abducted hundreds of young people, particularly young women used as forced labourers, fighting forces, human shields and sexual slaves.

27. In considering the three options for the beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court, the parties have concluded that the choice of 30 November 1996 would have the benefit of putting the Sierra Leone conflict in perspective without unnecessarily extending the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court. It would also ensure that the most serious crimes committed by all parties and armed groups would be encompassed within its jurisdiction. The choice of 25 May 1997 would have all these advantages, with the disadvantage of having a political connotation, implying, wrongly, that the prosecution of those responsible for the most serious violations of international humanitarian law is aimed at punishment for their participation in the coup d'état. The last option marks in many ways the peak of the campaign of systematic and widespread crimes against the civilian population, as experienced mostly by the inhabitants of Freetown. If the temporal jurisdiction of the Court were to be limited to that period only, it would exclude all crimes committed before that period in the rural areas and the countryside. In view of the perceived advantages of the first option and the disadvantages associated with the other options, the date of 30 November 1996 was selected as the beginning date of the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court, a decision in which the government negotiators have actively concurred.

28. As the armed conflict in various parts of the territory of Sierra Leone is still ongoing, it was decided that the temporal jurisdiction of the Special Court should be left open-ended. The lifespan of the Special Court, however, as distinguished from its temporal jurisdiction, will be determined by a subsequent agreement between the parties upon the completion of its judicial activities, an indication of the capacity acquired by the local courts to assume the prosecution of the remaining cases, or the unavailability of resources. In setting an end to the operation of the Court, the Agreement would also determine all matters relating to enforcement of sentences, pardon or commutation, transfer of pending cases to the local courts and the disposition of the financial and other assets of the Special Court.

C. Personal jurisdiction

1. Persons "most responsible"

29. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council recommended that the personal jurisdiction of the Special Court should extend to those "who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of the crimes", which is understood as an indication of a limitation on the number of accused by reference to their command authority and the gravity and scale of the crime. I propose, however, that the more general term "persons most responsible" should be used.

30. While those "most responsible" obviously include the political or military leadership, others in command authority down the chain of command may also be regarded "most responsible" judging by the severity of the crime or its massive scale. "Most responsible", therefore, denotes both a leadership or authority position of the accused, and a sense of the gravity, seriousness or massive scale of the crime. It must be seen, however, not as a test criterion or a distinct jurisdictional threshold, but as a guidance to the Prosecutor in the adoption of a prosecution strategy and in making decisions to prosecute in individual cases.

31. Within the meaning attributed to it in the present Statute, the term "most responsible" would not necessarily exclude children between 15 and 18 years of age. While it is inconceivable that children could be in a political or military leadership position (although in Sierra Leone the rank of "Brigadier" was often granted to children as young as 11 years), the gravity and seriousness of the crimes they have allegedly committed would allow for their inclusion within the jurisdiction of the Court.

2. Individual criminal responsibility at 15 years of age

32. The possible prosecution of children for crimes against humanity and war crimes presents a difficult moral dilemma. More than in any other conflict where children have been used as combatants, in Sierra Leone, child combatants were initially abducted, forcibly recruited, sexually abused, reduced to slavery of all kinds and trained, often under the influence of drugs, to kill, maim and burn. Though feared by many for their brutality, most if not all of these children have been subjected to a process of psychological and physical abuse and duress which has transformed them from victims into perpetrators.

33. The solution to this terrible dilemma with respect to the Special Court[5] could be found in a number of options: (a) determining a minimum age of 18 and exempting all persons under that age from accountability and individual criminal responsibility; (b) having children between 15 to 18 years of age, both victims and perpetrators, recount their story before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission or similar mechanisms, none of which is as yet functional; and (c) having them go through the judicial process of accountability without punishment, in a court of law providing all internationally recognized guarantees of juvenile justice.

34. The question of child prosecution was discussed at length with the Government of Sierra Leone both in New York and in Freetown. It was raised with all the interlocutors of the United Nations team: the members of the judiciary, members of the legal profession and the Ombudsman, and was vigorously debated with members of civil society, non-governmental organizations and institutions actively engaged in child-care and rehabilitation programmes.

35. The Government of Sierra Leone and representatives of Sierra Leone civil society clearly wish to see a process of judicial accountability for child combatants presumed responsible for the crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court. It was said that the people of Sierra Leone would not look kindly upon a court which failed to bring to justice children who committed crimes of that nature and spared them the judicial process of accountability. The international non-governmental organizations responsible for child-care and rehabilitation programmes, together with some of their national counterparts, however, were unanimous in their objection to any kind of judicial accountability for children below 18 years of age for fear that such a process would place at risk the entire rehabilitation programme so painstakingly achieved. While the extent to which this view represents the majority view of the people of Sierra Leone is debatable, it nevertheless underscores the importance of the child rehabilitation programme and the need to ensure that in the prosecution of children presumed responsible, the rehabilitation process of scores of other children is not endangered.

36. Given these highly diverging opinions, it is not easy to strike a balance between the interests at stake. I am mindful of the Security Council's recommendation that only those who bear "the greatest responsibility" should be prosecuted. However, in view of the most horrific aspects of the child combatancy in Sierra Leone, the employment of this term would not necessarily exclude persons of young age from the jurisdiction of the Court. I therefore thought that it would be most prudent to demonstrate to the Security Council for its consideration how provisions on prosecution of persons below the age of 18 — "children" within the definition of the Convention on the Rights of the Child — before an international jurisdiction could be formulated.[6] Therefore, in order to meet the concerns expressed by, in particular, those responsible for child care and rehabilitation programmes, article 15, paragraph 5, of the Statute contains the following provision:

> "In the prosecution of juvenile offenders, the Prosecutor shall ensure that the child-rehabilitation programme is not placed at risk, and that, where appropriate, resort should be had to alternative truth and reconciliation mechanisms, to the extent of their availability."

37. Furthermore, the Statute of the Special Court, in article 7 and throughout the text, contains internationally recognized standards of juvenile justice and guarantees that juvenile offenders are treated in dignity and with a sense of worth. Accordingly, the overall composition of the judges should reflect their experiences in a variety of fields, including in juvenile justice (article 13, para. 1); the Office of the Prosecutor should be staffed with persons experienced in gender-related crimes and juvenile justice (article 15, para. 4). In a trial of a juvenile offender, the Special Court should, to the extent possible, order the immediate release of the accused, constitute a "Juvenile Chamber", order the separation of the trial of a juvenile from that of an adult, and provide all legal and other assistance and order protective measures to ensure the privacy of the juvenile. The penalty of imprisonment is excluded in the case of a juvenile offender, and a number of alternative options of correctional or educational nature are provided for instead.

38. Consequently, if the Council, also weighing in the moral-educational message to the present and next generation of children in Sierra Leone, comes to the conclusion that persons under the age of 18 should be eligible for prosecution, the statutory provisions elaborated will strike an appropriate balance between all conflicting interests and provide the necessary guarantees of juvenile justice. It should also be stressed that, ultimately, it will be for the Prosecutor to decide if, all things considered, action should be taken against a juvenile offender in any individual case.

IV. Organizational structure of the Special Court

39. Organizationally, the Special Court has been conceived as a self-contained entity, consisting of three organs: the Chambers (two Trial Chambers and an Appeals Chamber), the Prosecutor's Office and the Registry. In the establishment of ad hoc international tribunals or special courts operating as separate institutions, independently of the relevant national legal system, it has proved to be necessary to comprise within one and the same entity all three organs. Like the two International Tribunals, the Special Court for Sierra Leone is established outside the national court system, and the inclusion of the Appeals Chamber within the same Court was thus the obvious choice.

A. The Chambers

40. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested that the question of the advisability, feasibility and appropriateness of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda should be addressed. In analysing this option from the legal and practical viewpoints, I have concluded that the sharing of a single Appeals Chamber between jurisdictions as diverse as the two International Tribunals and the Special Court for Sierra Leone is legally unsound and practically not feasible, without incurring unacceptably high administrative and financial costs.

41. While in theory the establishment of an overarching Appeals Chamber as the ultimate judicial authority in matters of interpretation and application of international humanitarian law offers a guarantee of developing a coherent body of law, in practice, the same result may be achieved by linking the jurisprudence of the Special Court to that of the International Tribunals, without imposing on the shared Appeals Chamber the financial and administrative constraints of a formal institutional link. Article 20, paragraph 3, of the Statute accordingly provides that the judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the Yugoslav and the Rwanda Tribunals; article 14, paragraph 1, of the Statute provides that the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Rwanda Tribunal shall be applicable mutatis mutandis to the proceedings before the Special Court.

42. The sharing of one Appeals chamber between all three jurisdictions would strain the capacity of the already heavily burdened Appeals Chamber of the two Tribunals in ways which could either bring about the collapse of the appeals system as a whole, or delay beyond acceptable human rights standards the detention of accused pending the hearing of appeals from either or all jurisdictions. On the assumption that all judgements and sentencing decisions of the Trial Chambers of the Special Court will be appealed, as they have been in the cases of the two International Tribunals, and that the number of accused will be roughly the same as in each of the International Tribunals, the Appeals Chamber would be required to add to its current workload a gradual increase of approximately one third.

43. Faced with an exponential growth in the number of appeals lodged on judgements and interlocutory appeals in relation to an increasing number of accused and decisions rendered, the existing workload of the Appeals Chamber sitting in appeals from six Trial Chambers of the two ad hoc Tribunals is constantly growing. Based on current and anticipated growth in workload, existing trends[7] and the projected pace of three to six appeals on judgements every year, the Appeals Chamber has requested additional resources in funds and personnel. With the addition of two Trial Chambers of the Special Court, making a total of eight Trial Chambers for one Appeals Chamber, the burden on the Yugoslav and Rwanda Appeals Chamber would be untenable, and the Special Court would be deprived of an effective and viable appeals process.

44. The financial costs which would be entailed for the Appeals Chamber when sitting on appeals from the Special Court will have to be borne by the regular budget, regardless of the financial mechanism established for the Special Court itself. These financial costs would include also costs of translation into French, which is one of the working languages of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals; the working language of the Special Court will be English.

45. In his letter to the Legal Counsel in response to the request for comments on the eventuality of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the two international Tribunals with the Special Court, the President of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia wrote:

> "With regard to paragraph 7 of Security Council resolution 1315 (2000), while the sharing of the Appeals Chamber of [the two International Tribunals] with that of the Special Court would bear the significant advantage of ensuring a better standardization of international humanitarian law, it appeared that the disadvantages of this option — excessive increase of the Appeals Chambers' workload, problems arising from the mixing of sources of law, problems caused by the increase in travelling by the judges of the Appeals Chambers and difficulties caused by mixing the different judges of the three tribunals — outweigh its benefits."[8]

46. For these reasons, the parties came to the conclusion that the Special Court should have two Trial Chambers, each with three judges, and an Appeals Chamber with five judges. Article 12, paragraph 4, provides for extra judges to sit on the bench in cases where protracted proceedings can be foreseen and it is necessary to make certain that the proceedings do not have to be discontinued in case one of the ordinary judges is unable to continue hearing the case.

B. The Prosecutor

47. An international prosecutor will be appointed by the Secretary-General to lead the investigations and prosecutions, with a Sierra Leonean Deputy. The appointment of an international prosecutor will guarantee that the Prosecutor is, and is seen to be, independent, objective and impartial.

C. The Registrar

48. The Registrar will service the Chambers and the Office of the Prosecutor and will have the responsibility for the financial management and external relations of the Court. The Registrar will be appointed by the Secretary-General as a staff member of the United Nations.

V. Enforcement of sentences

49. The possibility of serving prison sentences in third States is provided for in article 22 of the Statute. While imprisonment shall normally be served in Sierra Leone, particular circumstances, such as the security risk entailed in the continued imprisonment of some of the convicted persons on Sierra Leonean territory, may require their relocation to a third State.

50. Enforcement of sentences in third countries will be based on an agreement between the Special Court[9] and the State of enforcement. In seeking indications of the willingness of States to accept convicted persons, priority should be given to those which have already concluded similar agreements with either of the International Tribunals, as an indication that their prison facilities meet the minimum standards of conditions of detention. Although an agreement for the enforcement of sentences will be concluded between the Court and the State of enforcement, the wishes of the Government of Sierra Leone should be respected. In that connection, preference was expressed for such locations to be identified in an East African State.

VI. An alternative host country

51. In paragraph 7 of resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested that the question of a possible alternative host State be addressed, should it be necessary to convene the Special Court outside its seat in Sierra Leone, if circumstances so required. As the efforts of the United Nations Secretariat, the Government of Sierra Leone and other interested Member States are currently focused on the establishment of the Special Court in Sierra Leone, it is proposed that the question of the alternative seat should be addressed in phases. An important element in proceeding with this issue is also the way in which the Security Council addresses the present report, that is, if a Chapter VII element is included.

52. In the first phase, criteria for the choice of the alternative seat should be determined and a range of potential host countries identified. An agreement, in principle, should be sought both from the Government of Sierra Leone for the transfer of the Special Court to the State of the alternative seat, and from the authorities of the latter, for the relocation of the seat to its territory.

53. In the second phase, a technical assessment team would be sent to identify adequate premises in the third State or States. Once identified, the three parties, namely, the United Nations, the Government of Sierra Leone and the Government of the alternative seat, would conclude a Framework Agreement, or "an agreement to agree" for the transfer of the seat when circumstances so required. The Agreement would stipulate the nature of the circumstances which would require the transfer of the seat and an undertaking to conclude in such an eventuality a Headquarters Agreement. Such a principled Agreement would facilitate the transfer of the seat on an emergency basis and enable the conclusion of a Headquarters Agreement soon thereafter.

54. In the choice of an alternative seat for the Special Court, the following considerations should be taken into account: the proximity to the place where the crimes were committed, and easy access to victims, witnesses and accused. Such proximity and easy access will greatly facilitate the work of the Prosecutor, who will continue to conduct his investigations in the territory of Sierra Leone.[10] During the negotiations, the Government expressed a preference for a West African alternative seat, in an English-speaking country sharing a common-law legal system.

VII. Practical arrangements for the operation of the Special Court

55. The Agreement and the Statute of the Special Court establish the legal and institutional framework of the Court and the mutual obligations of the parties with regard, in particular, to appointments to the Chambers, the Office of the Prosecutor and the Registry and, the provision of premises. However, the practical arrangements for the establishment and operation of the Special Court remain outside the scope of the Agreement in the sense that they depend on contributions of personnel, equipment, services and funds from Member States and intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations. It is somewhat anomalous, therefore, that the parties which establish the Special Court, in practice, are dependent for the implementation of their treaty obligations on States and international organizations which are not parties to the Agreement or otherwise bound by its provisions.

56. Proceeding from the premise that voluntary contributions would constitute the financial mechanism of the Special Court, the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to include in the report recommendations regarding the amount of voluntary contributions, as appropriate, of funds, equipment and services to the Special Court, contributions in personnel, the kind of advice and expertise expected of the two ad hoc Tribunals, and the type of support and technical assistance to be provided by UNAMSIL. In considering the estimated requirements of the Special Court in all of these respects, it must be borne in mind that at the current stage, the Government of Sierra Leone is unable to contribute in any significant way to the operational costs of the Special Court, other than in the provision of premises, which would require substantial refurbishment, and the appointment of personnel, some of whom may not even be Sierra Leonean nationals. The requirements set out below should therefore be understood for all practical purposes as requirements that have to be met through contributions from sources other than the Government of Sierra Leone.

A. Estimated requirements of the Special Court for the first operational phase

1. Personnel and equipment

57. The personnel requirements of the Special Court for the initial operational phase[11] are estimated to include:

(a) Eight Trial Chamber judges (3 sitting judges and 1 alternate judge in each Chamber) and 6 Appeals Chamber judges (5 sitting judges and 1 alternate judge), 1 law clerk, 2 support staff for each Chamber and 1 security guard detailed to each judge (14);

(b) A Prosecutor and a Deputy Prosecutor, 20 investigators, 20 prosecutors and 26 support staff;

(c) A Registrar, a Deputy Registrar, 27 administrative support staff and 40 security officers;

(d) Four staff in the Victims and Witnesses Unit;

(e) One correction officer and 12 security officers in the detention facilities.

58. Based on the United Nations scale of salaries for a one-year period, the personnel requirements along with the corresponding equipment and vehicles are estimated on a very preliminary basis to be US$ 22 million. The calculation of the personnel requirements is premised on the assumption that all persons appointed (whether by the United Nations or the Government of Sierra Leone) will be paid from United Nations sources.

59. In seeking qualified personnel from States Members of the United Nations, the importance of obtaining such personnel from members of the Commonwealth, sharing the same language and common-law legal system, has been recognized. The Office of Legal Affairs has therefore approached the Commonwealth Secretariat with a request to identify possible candidates for the positions of judges, prosecutors, Registrar, investigators and administrative support staff. How many of the Commonwealth countries would be in a position to voluntarily contribute such personnel with their salaries and emoluments is an open question. A request similar to that which has been made to the Commonwealth will also be made to the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS).

2. Premises

60. The second most significant component of the requirements of the Court for the first operational phase is the cost of premises. During its visit to Freetown, the United Nations team visited a number of facilities and buildings which the Government believes may accommodate the Special Court and its detention facilities: the High Court of Sierra Leone, the Miatta Conference Centre and an adjacent hotel, the Presidential Lodge, the Central Prison (Pademba Road Prison), and the New England Prison. In evaluating their state of operation, the team concluded that none of the facilities offered were suitable or could be made operational without substantial investment. The use of the existing High Court would incur the least expenditure (estimated at $1.5 million); but would considerably disrupt the ordinary schedule of the Court and eventually bring it to a halt. Since it is located in central Freetown, the use of the High Court would pose, in addition, serious security risks. The use of the Conference Centre, the most secure site visited, would require large-scale renovation, estimated at $5.8 million. The Presidential Lodge was ruled out on security grounds.

61. In the light of the above, the team has considered the option of constructing a prefabricated, self-contained compound on government land. This option would have the advantage of an easy expansion paced with the growth of the Special Court, a salvage value at the completion of the activities of the Court, the prospect of a donation in kind and construction at no rental costs. The estimated cost of this option is $2.9 million.

62. The two detention facilities visited by the team were found to be inadequate in their current state. The Central Prison (Pademba Road Prison) was ruled out for lack of space and security reasons. The New England Prison would be a possible option at an estimated renovation cost of $600,000.

63. The estimated cost requirements of personnel and premises set out in the present report cover the two most significant components of its prospective budget for the first operational stage. Not included in the present report are the general operational costs of the Special Court and of the detention facilities; costs of prosecutorial and investigative activities; conference services, including the employment of court translators from and into English, Krio and other tribal languages; and defence counsel, to name but a few.

B. Expertise and advice from the two International Tribunals

64. The kind of advice and expertise which the two International Tribunals may be expected to share with the Special Court for Sierra Leone could take the form of any or all of the following: consultations among judges of both jurisdictions on matters of mutual interest; training of prosecutors, investigators and administrative support staff of the Special Court in The Hague, Kigali and Arusha, and training of such personnel on the spot by a team of prosecutors, investigators and administrators from both Tribunals; advice on the requirements for a Court library and assistance in its establishment, and sharing of information, documents, judgements and other relevant legal material on a continuous basis.

65. Both International Tribunals have expressed willingness to share their experience in all of these respects with the Special Court. They have accordingly offered to convene regular meetings with the judges of the Special Court to assist in adopting and formulating Rules of Procedure based on experience acquired in the practice of both Tribunals; to train personnel of the Special Court in The Hague and Arusha to enable them to acquire practical knowledge of the operation of an international tribunal; and when necessary, to temporarily deploy experienced staff, including a librarian, to the Special Court. In addition, the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has offered to provide to the Special Court legal material in the form of CD-ROMs containing motions, decisions, judgements, court orders and the like. The transmission of such material to the Special Court in the period pending the establishment of a full-fledged library would be of great assistance.

C. Support and technical assistance from UNAMSIL

66. The support and technical assistance of UNAMSIL in providing security, logistics, administrative support and temporary accommodation would be necessary in the first operational phase of the Special Court. In the precarious security situation now prevailing in Sierra Leone and given the state of the national security forces, UNAMSIL represents the only credible force capable of providing adequate security to the personnel and the premises of the Special Court. The specificities of the security measures required would have to be elaborated by the United Nations, the Government of Sierra Leone and UNAMSIL, it being understood, however, that any such additional tasks entrusted to UNAMSIL would have to be approved by the Security Council and reflected in a revised mandate with a commensurate increase in financial, staff and other resources.

67. UNAMSIL's administrative support could be provided in the areas of finance, personnel and procurement. Utilizing the existing administrative support in UNAMSIL, including, when feasible, shared facilities and communication systems, would greatly facilitate the start-up phase of the Special Court and reduce the overall resource requirements. In that connection, limited space at the headquarters of UNAMSIL could be made available for the temporary accommodation of the Office of the Prosecutor, pending the establishment or refurbishment of a site for the duration of the Special Court.

VIII. Financial mechanism of the Special Court

68. In paragraph 8 (c) of resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council requested the Secretary-General to include recommendations on "the amount of voluntary contributions, as appropriate, of funds, equipment and services to the special court, including through the offer of expert personnel that may be needed from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations". It would thus seem that the intention of the Council is that a Special Court for Sierra Leone would be financed from voluntary contributions. Implicit in the Security Council resolution, therefore, given the paucity of resources available to the Government of Sierra Leone, was the intention that most if not all operational costs of the Special Court would be borne by States Members of the Organization in the form of voluntary contributions.

69. The experience gained in the operation of the two ad hoc International Tribunals provides an indication of the scope, costs and long-term duration of the judicial activities of an international jurisdiction of this kind. While the Special Court differs from the two Tribunals in its nature and legal status, the similarity in the kind of crimes committed, the temporal, territorial and personal scope of jurisdiction, the number of accused, the organizational structure of the Court and the Rules of Procedure and Evidence suggest a similar scope and duration of operation and a similar need for a viable and sustainable financial mechanism.

70. A financial mechanism based entirely on voluntary contributions will not provide the assured and continuous source of funding which would be required to appoint the judges, the Prosecutor and the Registrar, to contract the services of all administrative and support staff and to purchase the necessary equipment. The risks associated with the establishment of an operation of this kind with insufficient funds, or without long-term assurances of continuous availability of funds, are very high, in terms of both moral responsibility and loss of credibility of the Organization, and its exposure to legal liability. In entering into contractual commitments which the Special Court and, vicariously, the Organization might not be able to honour, the United Nations would expose itself to unlimited third-party liability. A special court based on voluntary contributions would be neither viable nor sustainable.

71. In my view, the only realistic solution is financing through assessed contributions. This would produce a viable and sustainable financial mechanism affording secure and continuous funding. It is understood, however, that the financing of the Special Court through assessed contributions of the Member States would for all practical purposes transform a treaty-based court into a United Nations organ governed in its financial and administrative activities by the relevant United Nations financial and staff regulations and rules.

72. The Security Council may wish to consider an alternative solution, based on the concept of a "national jurisdiction" with international assistance, which would rely on the existing — however inadequate — Sierra Leonean court system, both in terms of premises (for the Court and the detention facilities) and administrative support. The judges, prosecutors, investigators and administrative support staff would be contributed by interested States. The legal basis for the special "national" court would be a national law, patterned on the Statute as agreed between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone (the international crimes being automatically incorporated into the Sierra Leonean common-law system). Since the mandate of the Secretary-General is to recommend measures consistent with resolution 1315 (2000), the present report does not elaborate further on this alternative other than to merely note its existence.

IX. Conclusion

73. At the request of the Security Council, the present report sets out the legal framework and practical arrangements for the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone. It describes the requirements of the Special Court in terms of funds, personnel and services and underscores the acute need for a viable financial mechanism to sustain it for the duration of its lifespan. It concludes that assessed contributions is the only viable and sustainable financial mechanism of the Special Court.

74. As the Security Council itself has recognized, in the past circumstances of Sierra Leone, a credible system of justice and accountability for the very serious crimes committed there would end impunity and would contribute to the process of national reconciliation and to the restoration and maintenance of peace in that country. In reviewing the present report and considering what further action must be taken, the Council should bear in mind the expectations that have been created and the state of urgency that permeates all discussions of the problem of impunity in Sierra Leone.

Notes

[1] At the request of the Government, reference in the Statute and the Agreement to "Sierra Leonean judges" was replaced by "judges appointed by the Government of Sierra Leone". This would allow the Government flexibility of choice between Sierra Leonean and non-Sierra Leonean nationals and broaden the range of potential candidates from within and outside Sierra Leone.

[2] In the case of the Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, the non-inclusion in any position of nationals of the country most directly affected was considered a condition for the impartiality, objectivity and neutrality of the Tribunal.

[3] This method may not be advisable, since the Court would be manned by a substantial number of staff and financed through voluntary contributions in the amount of millions of dollars every year.

[4] Article 6, paragraph 5, of the 1977 Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions and Relating to the Protection of Non-international Armed Conflicts provides that:

> "At the end of hostilities, the authorities in power shall endeavour to grant the broadest possible amnesty to persons who have participated in the armed conflict, or those deprived of their liberty for reasons related to the armed conflict, whether they are interned or detained."

[5] The jurisdiction of the national courts of Sierra Leone is not limited by the Statute, except in cases where they have to defer to the Special Court.

[6] While there is no international law standard for the minimum age for criminal responsibility, the ICC Statute excludes from the jurisdiction of the Court persons under the age of 18. In so doing, however, it was not the intention of its drafters to establish, in general, a minimum age for individual criminal responsibility. Premised on the notion of complementarity between national courts and ICC, it was intended that persons under 18 presumed responsible for the crimes for which the ICC had jurisdiction would be brought before their national courts, if the national law in question provides for such jurisdiction over minors.

[7] The Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia has so far disposed of a total of 5 appeals from judgements and 44 interlocutory appeals; and the Appeals Chamber of the Rwanda Tribunal of only 1 judgement on the merits with 28 interlocutory appeals.

[8] Letter addressed to Mr. Hans Corell, Under-Secretary-General, The Legal Counsel, from Judge Claude Jorda, President of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia, dated 29 August 2000.

[9] Article 10 of the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government endows the Special Court with a treaty-making power "to enter into agreements with States as may be necessary for the exercise of its functions and for the operation of the Court".

[10] Criteria for the choice of the seat of the Rwanda Tribunal were drawn up by the Security Council in its resolution 955 (1994). The Security Council decided that the seat of the International Tribunal shall be determined by the Council "having regard to considerations of justice and fairness as well as administrative efficiency, including access to witnesses, and economy".

[11] It is important to stress that this estimate should be regarded as an illustration of a possible scenario. Not until the Registrar and the Prosecutor are in place will it be possible to make detailed and precise estimates.

2. In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chamber should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

3. In addition to imprisonment, the Trial Chamber may order the forfeiture of the property, proceeds and any assets acquired unlawfully or by criminal conduct, and their return to their rightful owner or to the State of Sierra Leone.

Article 20

(c) An error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.

2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chamber.

3. The judges of the Appeals Chamber of the Special Court shall be guided by the decisions of the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda. 1. A request to the Government of Rwanda to enforce a sentence shall be made by the Registrar of the Special Court (hereinafter "the Registrar"), with the approval of the President of the Special Court.

2. The Registrar shall provide the following documents to the Government of Rwanda when making the request:

If, pursuant to the applicable national law of the Government of Rwanda, the convicted person is eligible for early release, pardon or commutation of the sentence, the Government of Rwanda shall notify this to the Registrar of the Special Court in advance of such eligibility, and shall include in any such notification all the circumstances pertaining to the eligibility for early release, pardon or commutation of the sentence.

2. In the determination of eligibility of the convicted person, consideration shall be given to the length of the sentence imposed by the Special Court and the necessity to ensure equality of treatment among convicted persons.

3. The President of the Special Court shall determine, in consultation with the Judges of the Special Court, whether any early release, pardon or commutation of the sentence is appropriate in the interest of justice and the general principles of law. CHAPTER I - ORGANIZATION OF THE COURT

The Court shall be composed of a body of independent judges, elected regardless of their nationality from among persons of high moral character, who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices, or are jurisconsults of recognized competence in international law.

Article 3

1. The Court shall consist of fifteen members, no two of whom may be nationals of the same state.

2. A person who for the purposes of membership in the Court could be regarded as a national of more than one state shall be deemed to be a national of the one in which he ordinarily exercises civil and political rights.

Article 4

1. The members of the Court shall be elected by the General Assembly and by the Security Council from a list of persons nominated by the national groups in the Permanent Court of Arbitration, in accordance with the following provisions.

2. In the case of Members of the United Nations not represented in the Permanent Court of Arbitration, candidates shall be nominated by national groups appointed for this purpose by their governments under the same conditions as those prescribed for members of the Permanent Court of Arbitration by Article 44 of the Convention of The Hague of 1907 for the pacific settlement of international disputes.

3. The conditions under which a state which is a party to the present Statute but is not a Member of the United Nations may participate in electing the members of the Court shall, in the absence of a special agreement, be laid down by the General Assembly upon recommendation of the Security Council.

Article 5

1. At least three months before the date of the election, the Secretary-General of the United Nations shall address a written request to the members of the Permanent Court of Arbitration belonging to the states which are parties to the present Statute, and to the members of the national groups appointed under Article 4, paragraph 2, inviting them to undertake, within a given time, by national groups, the nomination of persons in a position to accept the duties of a member of the Court.

2. No group may nominate more than four persons, not more than two of whom shall be of their own nationality. In no case may the number of candidates nominated by a group be more than double the number of seats to be filled.

Article 6

Before making these nominations, each national group is recommended to consult its highest court of justice, its legal faculties and schools of law, and its national academies and national sections of international academies devoted to the study of law.

Article 7

1. The Secretary-General shall prepare a list in alphabetical order of all the persons thus nominated. Save as provided in Article 12, paragraph 2, these shall be the only persons eligible.

2. The Secretary-General shall submit this list to the General Assembly and to the Security Council.

Article 8

The General Assembly and the Security Council shall proceed independently of one another to elect the members of the Court.

Article 9

At every election, the electors shall bear in mind not only that the persons to be elected should individually possess the qualifications required, but also that in the body as a whole the representation of the main forms of civilization and of the principal legal systems of the world should be assured.

Article 10

1. Those candidates who obtain an absolute majority of votes in the General Assembly and in the Security Council shall be considered as elected.

2. Any vote of the Security Council, whether for the election of judges or for the appointment of members of the conference envisaged in Article 12, shall be taken without any distinction between permanent and non-permanent members of the Security Council.

Article 12

1. If, after the third meeting, one or more seats still remain unfilled, a joint conference consisting of six members, three appointed by the General Assembly and three by the Security Council, may be formed at any time at the request of either the General Assembly or the Security Council, for the purpose of choosing by the vote of an absolute majority one name for each seat still vacant, to submit to the General Assembly and the Security Council for their respective acceptance.

2. If the joint conference is unanimously agreed upon any person who fulfills the required conditions, he may be included in its list, even though he was not included in the list of nominations referred to in Article 7.

3. If the joint conference is satisfied that it will not be successful in procuring an election, those members of the Court who have already been elected shall, within a period to be fixed by the Security Council, proceed to fill the vacant seats by selection from among those candidates who have obtained votes either in the General Assembly or in the Security Council.

4. In the event of an equality of votes among the judges, the eldest judge shall have a casting vote.

1. The members of the Court shall be elected for nine years and may be re-elected; provided, however, that of the judges elected at the first election, the terms of five judges shall expire at the end of three years and the terms of five more judges shall expire at the end of six years.

2. The judges whose terms are to expire at the end of the above-mentioned initial periods of three and six years shall be chosen by lot to be drawn by the Secretary-General immediately after the first election has been completed.

3. The members of the Court shall continue to discharge their duties until their places have been filled. Though replaced, they shall finish any cases which they may have begun.

4. In the case of the resignation of a member of the Court, the resignation shall be addressed to the President of the Court for transmission to the Secretary-General. This last notification makes the place vacant.

Article 14

Vacancies shall be filled by the same method as that laid down for the first election, subject to the following provision: the Secretary-General shall, within one month of the occurrence of the vacancy, proceed to issue the invitations provided for in Article 5, and the date of the election shall be fixed by the Security Council.

Article 15

A member of the Court elected to replace a member whose term of office has not expired shall hold office for the remainder of his predecessor's term.

Article 33

Statute of the Special Tribunal for Lebanon

Having been established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Lebanese Republic (hereinafter "the Agreement") pursuant to Security Council resolution 1664 (2006) of 29 March 2006, which responded to the request of the Government of Lebanon to establish a tribunal of an international character to try all those who are found responsible for the terrorist crime which killed the former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and others, the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (hereinafter "the Special Tribunal") shall function in accordance with the provisions of this Statute.

Section I
Jurisdiction and applicable law

Article 1
Jurisdiction of the Special Tribunal

The Special Tribunal shall have jurisdiction over persons responsible for the attack of 14 February 2005 resulting in the death of former Lebanese Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and in the death or injury of other persons. If the Tribunal finds that other attacks that occurred in Lebanon between 1 October 2004 and 12 December 2005, or any later date decided by the Parties and with the consent of the Security Council, are connected in accordance with the principles of criminal justice and are of a nature and gravity similar to the attack of 14 February 2005, it shall also have jurisdiction over persons responsible for such attacks. This connection includes but is not limited to a combination of the following elements: criminal intent (motive), the purpose behind the attacks, the nature of the victims targeted, the pattern of the attacks (modus operandi) and the perpetrators.

Article 2
Applicable criminal law

The following shall be applicable to the prosecution and punishment of the crimes referred to in article 1, subject to the provisions of this Statute:

(a) The provisions of the Lebanese Criminal Code relating to the prosecution and punishment of acts of terrorism, crimes and offences against life and personal integrity, illicit associations and failure to report crimes and offences, including the rules regarding the material elements of a crime, criminal participation and conspiracy; and

(b) Articles 6 and 7 of the Lebanese law of 11 January 1958 on "Increasing the penalties for sedition, civil war and interfaith struggle".

(b) Contributed in any other way to the commission of the crime set forth in article 2 of this Statute by a group of persons acting with a common purpose, where such contribution is intentional and is either made with the aim of furthering the general criminal activity or purpose of the group or in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime.

2. With respect to superior and subordinate relationships, a superior shall be criminally responsible for any of the crimes set forth in article 2 of this Statute committed by subordinates under his or her effective authority and control, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such subordinates, where:

(a) The superior either knew, or consciously disregarded information that clearly indicated that the subordinates were committing or about to commit such crimes;

(b) The crimes concerned activities that were within the effective responsibility and control of the superior; and

(c) The superior failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.

3. The fact that the person acted pursuant to an order of a superior shall not relieve him or her of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if the Special Tribunal determines that justice so requires.

Article 4
Concurrent jurisdiction

1. The Special Tribunal and the national courts of Lebanon shall have concurrent jurisdiction. Within its jurisdiction, the Tribunal shall have primacy over the national courts of Lebanon.

2. Upon the assumption of office of the Prosecutor, as determined by the Secretary-General, and no later than two months thereafter, the Special Tribunal shall request the national judicial authority seized with the case of the attack against Prime Minister Rafiq Hariri and others to defer to its competence. The Lebanese judicial authority shall refer to the Tribunal the results of the investigation and a copy of the court's records, if any. Persons detained in connection with the investigation shall be transferred to the custody of the Tribunal.

3. (a) At the request of the Special Tribunal, the national judicial authority seized with any of the other crimes committed between 1 October 2004 and 12 December 2005, or a later date decided pursuant to article 1, shall refer to the Tribunal the results of the investigation and a copy of the court's records, if any, for review by the Prosecutor;

(b) At the further request of the Tribunal, the national authority in question shall defer to the competence of the Tribunal. It shall refer to the Tribunal the results of the investigation and a copy of the court's records, if any, and persons detained in connection with any such case shall be transferred to the custody of the Tribunal;

(c) The national judicial authorities shall regularly inform the Tribunal of the progress of their investigation. At any stage of the proceedings, the Tribunal may formally request a national judicial authority to defer to its competence.

Article 5
Non bis in idem

1. No person shall be tried before a national court of Lebanon for acts for which he or she has already been tried by the Special Tribunal.

2. A person who has been tried by a national court may be subsequently tried by the Special Tribunal if the national court proceedings were not impartial or independent, were designed to shield the accused from criminal responsibility for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Tribunal or the case was not diligently prosecuted.

3. In considering the penalty to be imposed on a person convicted of a crime under this Statute, the Special Tribunal shall take into account the extent to which any penalty imposed by a national court on the same person for the same act has already been served.

Article 6

» AMERICAN CONVENTION ON HUMAN RIGHTS "PACT OF SAN JOSE, COSTA RICA" (B-32)

Preamble

The American states signatory to the present Convention,

Reaffirming their intention to consolidate in this hemisphere, within the framework of democratic institutions, a system of personal liberty and social justice based on respect for the essential rights of man;

Recognizing that the essential rights of man are not derived from one's being a national of a certain state, but are based upon attributes of the human personality, and that they therefore justify international protection in the form of a convention reinforcing or complementing the protection provided by the domestic law of the American states;

Considering that these principles have been set forth in the Charter of the Organization of American States, in the American Declaration of the Rights and Duties of Man, and in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, and that they have been reaffirmed and refined in other international instruments, worldwide as well as regional in scope;

Reiterating that, in accordance with the Universal Declaration of Human Rights, the ideal of free men enjoying freedom from fear and want can be achieved only if conditions are created whereby everyone may enjoy his economic, social, and cultural rights, as well as his civil and political rights; and

Considering that the Third Special Inter-American Conference (Buenos Aires, 1967) approved the incorporation into the Charter of the Organization itself of broader standards with respect to economic, social, and educational rights and resolved that an inter-American convention on human rights should determine the

2. No one shall be deprived of his physical liberty except for the reasons and under the conditions established beforehand by the constitution of the State Party concerned or by a law established pursuant thereto.

3. No one shall be subject to arbitrary arrest or imprisonment.

4. Anyone who is detained shall be informed of the reasons for his detention and shall be promptly notified of the charge or charges against him.

Anyone who is deprived of his liberty shall be entitled to recourse to a competent court, in order that the court may decide without delay on the lawfulness of his arrest or detention and order his release if the arrest or detention is unlawful. In States Parties whose laws provide that anyone who believes himself to be threatened with deprivation of his liberty is entitled to recourse to a competent court in order that it may decide on the lawfulness of such threat, this remedy may not be restricted or abolished. The interested party or another person in his behalf is entitled to seek these remedies.

7. No one shall be detained for debt. This principle shall not limit the orders of a competent judicial authority issued for nonfulfillment of duties of support.

Article 8. Right to a Fair Trial

Preamble

Whereas recognition of the inherent dignity and of the equal and inalienable rights of all members of the human family is the foundation of freedom, justice and peace in the world,

Whereas it is essential, if man is not to be compelled to have recourse, as a last resort, to rebellion against tyranny and oppression, that human rights should be protected by the rule of law,

Whereas it is essential to promote the development of friendly relations between nations,

The Burgh House Principles On The Independence Of The International Judiciary

The Study Group of the International Law Association on the Practice and Procedure of International Courts and Tribunals, in association with the Project on International Courts and Tribunals:

Recognising the need for guidelines of general application to contribute to the independence and impartiality of the international judiciary, with a view to ensuring the legitimacy and effectiveness of the international judicial process;

Having regard to the United Nations Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary (1985) and other international rules and standards relating to judicial independence and the right to a fair trial;

Mindful of the special challenges facing the international judiciary in view of the non-national context in which they operate;

Noting in particular that each court or tribunal has its own characteristics and functions and that in certain instances judges serve on a part-time basis or as ad hoc or ad litem judges;

Considering the following principles of international law to be of general application:

- to ensure the independence of the judiciary, judges must enjoy independence from the parties to cases before them, their own states of nationality or residence, the host countries in which they serve, and the international organisations under the auspices of which the court or tribunal is established;
- judges must be free from undue influence from any source;
- judges shall decide cases impartially, on the basis of the facts of the case and the applicable law;
- judges shall avoid any conflict of interest, as well as being placed in a situation which might reasonably be perceived as giving rise to any conflict of interests;
- judges shall refrain from impropriety in their judicial and related activities;

Proposes the following Principles which shall apply primarily to standing international courts and tribunals (hereafter "courts") and to full-time judges. The Principles should also be applied as appropriate to judges ad hoc, judges ad litem and part-time judges, to international arbitral proceedings and to other exercises of international judicial power.

1. Independence and freedom from interference

1.1 The court and the judges shall exercise their functions free from direct or indirect interference or influence by any person or entity.

1.2 Where a court is established as an organ or under the auspices of an international organisation, the court and judges shall exercise their judicial functions free from interference from other organs or authorities of that organisation. This freedom shall apply both to the judicial process in pending cases, including the assignment of cases to particular judges, and to the operation of the court and its registry.

1.3 The court shall be free to determine the conditions for its internal administration, including staff recruitment policy, information systems and allocation of budgetary expenditure.

1.4 Deliberations of the court shall remain confidential.

2. Nomination, election and appointment

2.1 In accordance with the governing instruments, judges shall be chosen from among persons of high moral character, integrity and conscientiousness who possess the appropriate professional qualifications, competence and experience required for the court concerned.

2.2 While procedures for nomination, election and appointment should consider fair representation of different geographic regions and the principal legal systems, as appropriate, as well as of female and male judges, appropriate personal and professional qualifications must be the overriding consideration in the nomination, election and appointment of judges.

2.3 Procedures for the nomination, election and appointment of judges should be transparent and provide appropriate safeguards against nominations, elections and appointments motivated by improper considerations.

2.4 Information regarding the nomination, election and appointment process and information about candidates for judicial office should be made public, in due time and in an effective manner, by the international organisation or other body responsible for the nomination, election and appointment process.

2.5 Where the governing instruments of the court concerned permits the re-election of judges, the principles and criteria set out above for the nomination, election and appointment of judges shall apply mutatis mutandis to their re-election.

3. Security of tenure

3.1 Judges shall have security of tenure in relation to their term of office. They may only be removed from office upon specified grounds and in accordance with appropriate procedures specified in advance.

3.2 The governing instruments of each court should provide for judges to be appointed for a minimum term to enable them to exercise their judicial functions in an independent manner.

4. Service and remuneration

4.1 Judges' essential conditions of service shall be enumerated in legally binding instruments.

4.2 No adverse changes shall be introduced with regard to judges' remuneration and other essential conditions of service during their terms of office.

4.3 Judges should receive adequate remuneration which should be periodically adjusted in line with any increases in the cost of living at the seat of the court.

4.4 Conditions of service should include adequate pension arrangements.

5. Privileges and immunities

5.1 Judges shall enjoy immunities equivalent to full diplomatic immunities, and in particular shall enjoy immunities from all claims arising from the exercise of their judicial function.

5.2 The court alone shall be competent to waive the immunity of judges; it should waive immunity in any case where, in its opinion, the immunity would impede the course of justice and can be waived without prejudice to the exercise of the judicial function.

5.3 Documents and papers of the court, judges and registry, in so far as they relate to the business of the court, shall be inviolable.

5.4 The state in which an international court has its seat shall take the necessary measures to protect the security of the judges and their families, and to protect them from adverse measures related to the exercise of their judicial function.

6. Budget

States parties and international organisations shall provide adequate resources, including facilities and levels of staffing, to enable courts and the judges to perform their functions effectively.

7. Freedom of expression and association

7.1 Judges shall enjoy freedom of expression and association while in office. These freedoms must be exercised in a manner that is compatible with the judicial function and that may not affect or reasonably appear to affect judicial independence or impartiality.

7.2 Judges shall maintain the confidentiality of deliberations, and shall not comment extrajudicially upon pending cases.

7.3 Judges shall exercise appropriate restraint in commenting extrajudicially upon judgments and procedures of their own and other courts and upon any legislation, drafts, proposals or subject-matter likely to come before their court.

8. Extra-judicial activity

8.1 Judges shall not engage in any extra-judicial activity that is incompatible with their judicial function or the efficient and timely functioning of the court of which they are members, or that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality.

8.2 Judges shall not exercise any political function.

8.3 Each court should establish an appropriate mechanism to give guidance to judges in relation to extra-judicial activities, and to ensure that appropriate means exist for parties to proceedings to raise any concerns.

9. Past links to a case

9.1 Judges shall not serve in a case in which they have previously served as agent, counsel, adviser, advocate, expert or in any other capacity for one of the parties, or as a member of a national or international court or other dispute settlement body which has considered the subject matter of the dispute.

9.2 Judges shall not serve in a case with the subject-matter of which they have had any other form of association that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality.

10. Past links to a party

Judges shall not sit in any case involving a party for whom they have served as agent, counsel, adviser, advocate or expert within the previous three years or such other period as the court may establish within its rules; or with whom they have had any other significant professional or personal link within the previous three years or such other period as the court may establish within its rules.

11. Interest in the outcome of a case

11.1 Judges shall not sit in any case in the outcome of which they hold any material personal, professional or financial interest.

11.2 Judges shall not sit in any case in the outcome of which other persons or entities closely related to them hold a material personal, professional or financial interest.

11.3 Judges must not accept any undisclosed payment from a party to the proceedings or any payment whatsoever on account of the judge's participation in the proceedings.

12. Contacts with a party

12.1 Judges shall exercise appropriate caution in their personal contacts with parties, agents, counsel, advocates, advisers and other persons and entities associated with a pending case. Any such contacts should be conducted in a manner that is compatible with their judicial function and that may not affect or reasonably appear to affect their independence and impartiality.

12.2 Judges shall discourage ex parte communications from parties, and except as provided by the rules of the court such communications shall be disclosed to the court and the other party.

13. Post-service limitations

13.1 Judges shall not seek or accept, while they are in office, any future employment, appointment or benefit, from a party to a case on which they sat or from any entity related to such a party, that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality.

13.2 Former judges shall not, except as permitted by rules of the court, act in any capacity in relation to any case on which they sat while serving on the court.

13.3 Former judges shall not act as agent, counsel, adviser or advocate in any proceedings before the court on which they previously served for a period of three years after they have left office or such other period as the court may establish and publish.

13.4 Former judges should exercise appropriate caution as regards the acceptance of any employment, appointment or benefit, in particular from a party to a case on which they sat or from any entity related to such a party

14. Disclosure

14.1 Judges shall disclose to the court and, as appropriate, to the parties to the proceedings any circumstances which come to their notice at any time by virtue of which any of Principles 7 to 13 apply.

14.2 Each court shall establish appropriate procedures to enable judges to disclose to the court and, as appropriate, to the parties to the proceedings matters that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality in relation to any particular case.

15. Waiver

Notwithstanding Principles 7 to 13, judges shall not be prevented from sitting in a case where they have made appropriate disclosure of any facts bringing any of those Principles into operation, and where the court expresses no objections and the parties give their express and informed consent to the judge acting.

16. Withdrawal or disqualification

Each court shall establish rules of procedure to enable the determination whether judges are prevented from sitting in a particular case as a result of the application of these Principles or for reasons of incapacity. Such procedures shall be available to a judge, the court, or any party to the proceedings.

17. Misconduct

17.1 Each court shall establish rules of procedure to address a specific complaint of misconduct or breach of duty on the part of a judge that may affect independence or impartiality.

17.2 Such a complaint may, if clearly unfounded, be resolved on a summary basis. In any case where the court determines that fuller investigation is required, the rules shall establish adequate safeguards to protect the judges' rights and interests and to ensure appropriate confidentiality of the proceedings.

17.3 The governing instruments of the court shall provide for appropriate measures, including the removal from office of a judge.

17.4 The outcome of any complaint shall be communicated to the complainant.

Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE)

Opinion no. 3 of the Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) to the attention of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the principles and rules governing judges' professional conduct, in particular ethics, incompatible behaviour and impartiality

1. The Consultative Council of European Judges (CCJE) drafted this opinion on the basis of replies by the Member States to a questionnaire and texts drawn up by the CCJE Working Party and the specialist of the CCJE on this topic, Mr Denis SALAS (France).

2. The present opinion makes reference to CCJE Opinion No. 1 (2001) (www.coe.int/legalprof, CCJE(2001) 43) on standards concerning the independence of the judiciary and the irremovability of judges, particularly paragraphs 13, 59, 60 and 71.

3. In preparing this opinion, the CCJE took into account a number of other documents, in particular:

- the United Nations "Basic principles on the independence of the judiciary" (1985);

- Recommendation No. R (94) 12 of the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe on the independence, efficiency and role of judges;

- the European Charter on the Statute for Judges (1998) (DAJ/DOC(98) 23);

- the Code of judicial conduct, the Bangalore draft[1].

4. The present opinion covers two main areas:

- the principles and rules governing judges' professional conduct, based on determination of ethical principles, which must meet very high standards and may be incorporated in a statement of standards of professional conduct drawn up by the judges themselves (A);

- the principles and procedures governing criminal, civil and disciplinary liability of judges (B).

5. The CCJE questioned, in this context, whether existing rules and principles were in all respects consistent with the independence and impartiality of tribunals required by the European Convention on Human Rights.

6. The CCJE therefore sought to answer the following questions:

- What standards of conduct should apply to judges?

- How should standards of conduct be formulated?

- What if any criminal, civil and disciplinary liability should apply to judges?

7. The CCJE believes that answers to these questions will contribute to the implementation of the framework global action plan for judges in Europe, especially the priorities relating to the rights and responsibilities of judges, professional conduct and ethics (see doc. CCJE (2001) 24, Appendix A, part III B), and refers in this context its conclusions in paragraphs 49, 50, 75, 76 and 77 below.

A. STANDARDS OF JUDICIAL CONDUCT

8. The ethical aspects of judges' conduct need to be discussed for various reasons. The methods used in the settlement of disputes should always inspire confidence. The powers entrusted to judges are strictly linked to the values of justice, truth and freedom. The standards of conduct applying to judges are the corollary of these values and a precondition for confidence in the administration of justice.

9. Confidence in the justice system is all the more important in view of the increasing globalisation of disputes and the wide circulation of judgments. Further, in a State governed by the rule of law, the public is entitled to expect general principles, compatible with the notion of a fair trial and guaranteeing fundamental rights, to be set out. The obligations incumbent on judges have been put in place in order to guarantee their impartiality and the effectiveness of their action.

1°) What standards of conduct should apply to judges?

10. Any analysis of the rules governing the professional demands applicable to judges should include consideration of the underlying principles and the objectives pursued.

11. Whatever methods are used to recruit and train them and however broad their mandate, judges are entrusted with powers and operate in spheres which affect the very fabric of people's lives. A recent research report points out that, of all the public authorities, it is probably the judiciary which has changed the most in the European countries[2]. In recent years, democratic societies have been placing increasing demands on their judicial systems. The increasing pluralism of our societies leads each group to seek recognition or protection which it does not always receive. Whilst the architecture of democracies has been profoundly affected, national variations remain marked. It is a truism that the East European countries that are emerging from authoritarian regimes see law and justice as providing the legitimacy essential for the reconstruction of democracy. There more than elsewhere, the judicial system is asserting itself in relation to other public authorities through its function of judicial supervision.

12. The powers entrusted to judges are subject not only to domestic law, an expression of the will of the nation, but also to the principles of international law and justice as recognised in modern democratic societies.

13. The purpose for which these powers are entrusted to judges is to enable them to administer justice, by applying the law, and ensuring that every person enjoys the rights and/or assets that are legally theirs and of which they have been or may be unfairly deprived.

14. This aim is expressed in Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights which, speaking purely from the point of view of users of the judicial system, states that "everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law". Far from suggesting that judges are all-powerful, the Convention highlights the safeguards that are in place for persons on trial and sets out the principles on which the judge's duties are founded: independence and impartiality.

15. In recent years, there has been some recognition of the need for increased assurances of judicial independence and impartiality; independent bodies have been set up to protect the judiciary from partisan interference; the significance of the European Convention on Human Rights has been developed and felt through the case-law of the European Court in Strasbourg and national courts.

16. Independence of the judge is an essential principle and is the right of the citizens of each State, including its judges. It has both an institutional and an individual aspect. The modern democratic State should be founded on the separation of powers. Each individual judge should do everything to uphold judicial independence at both the institutional and the individual level. The rationale of such independence has been discussed in detail in the Opinion N° 1 (2001) of the CCJE, paragraphs 10-13. It is, as there stated, inextricably complemented by and the pre-condition of the impartiality of the judge, which is essential to the credibility of the judicial system and the confidence that it should inspire in a democratic society.

17. Article 2 of the "Basic principles on the independence of the judiciary" drawn up by the United Nations in 1985 stipulates that "the judiciary shall decide matters before them impartially, on the basis of facts and in accordance with the law, without any restrictions, improper influences, inducements, pressures, threats or interferences, direct or indirect, from any quarter or for any reason". Under Article 8, judges "shall always conduct themselves in such a manner as to preserve the dignity of their office and the impartiality and independence of the judiciary".

18. In its Recommendation N° R (94) 12 on the independence, efficiency and role of judges (Principle I.2.d), the Committee of Ministers of the Council of Europe stated that "judges should have unfettered freedom to decide cases impartially, in accordance with their conscience and their interpretation of the facts, and in pursuance of the prevailing rules of the law".

19. The European Charter on the Statute for Judges indicates that the statute for judges should ensure the impartiality which all members of the public are entitled to expect of the courts (paragraph 1.1). The CCJE fully endorses this provision of the Charter.

20. Impartiality is determined by the European Court both according to a subjective approach, which takes into account the personal conviction or interest of a particular judge in a given case, and according to an objective test, ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect[3].

21. Judges should, in all circumstances, act impartially, to ensure that there can be no legitimate reason for citizens to suspect any partiality. In this regard, impartiality should be apparent in the exercise of both the judge's judicial functions and his or her other activities.

a. Impartiality and conduct of judges in the exercise of their judicial functions

22. Public confidence in and respect for the judiciary are the guarantees of the effectiveness of the judicial system: the conduct of judges in their professional activities is understandably seen by members of the public as essential to the credibility of the courts.

23. Judges should therefore discharge their duties without any favouritism, display of prejudice or bias. They should not reach their decisions by taking into consideration anything which falls outside the application of the rules of law. As long as they are dealing with a case or could be required to do so, they should not consciously make any observations which could reasonably suggest some degree of pre-judgment of the resolution of the dispute or which could influence the fairness of the proceedings. They should show the consideration due to all persons (parties, witnesses, counsel, for example) with no distinction based on unlawful grounds or incompatible with the appropriate discharge of their functions. They should also ensure that their professional competence is evident in the discharge of their duties.

24. Judges should also discharge their functions with due respect for the principle of equal treatment of parties, by avoiding any bias and any discrimination, maintaining a balance between the parties and ensuring that each receives a fair hearing.

25. The effectiveness of the judicial system also requires judges to have a high degree of professional awareness. They should ensure that they maintain a high degree of professional competence through basic and further training, providing them with the appropriate qualifications.

26. Judges must also fulfil their functions with diligence and reasonable despatch. For this, it is of course necessary that they should be provided with proper facilities, equipment and assistance. So provided, judges should both be mindful of and be able to perform their obligations under Article 6.1 of the European Convention on Human Rights to deliver judgment within a reasonable time.

b. Impartiality and extra-judicial conduct of judges

27. Judges should not be isolated from the society in which they live, since the judicial system can only function properly if judges are in touch with reality. Moreover, as citizens, judges enjoy the fundamental rights and freedoms protected, in particular, by the European Convention on Human Rights (freedom of opinion, religious freedom, etc). They should therefore remain generally free to engage in the extra-professional activities of their choice.

28. However, such activities may jeopardise their impartiality or sometimes even their independence. A reasonable balance therefore needs to be struck between the degree to which judges may be involved in society and the need for them to be and to be seen as independent and impartial in the discharge of their duties. In the last analysis, the question must always be asked whether, in the particular social context and in the eyes of a reasonable, informed observer, the judge has engaged in an activity which could objectively compromise his or her independence or impartiality

29. Judges should conduct themselves in a respectable way in their private life. In view of the cultural diversity of the member states of the Council of Europe and the constant evolution in moral values, the standards applying to judges' behaviour in their private lives cannot be laid down too precisely. The CCJE encourages the establishment within the judiciary of one or more bodies or persons having a consultative and advisory role and available to judges whenever they have some uncertainty as to whether a given activity in the private sphere is compatible with their status of judge. The presence of such bodies or persons could encourage discussion within the judiciary on the content and significance of ethical rules. To take just two possibilities, such bodies or persons could be established under the aegis of the Supreme Court or judges' associations. They should in any event be separate from and pursue different objectives to existing bodies responsible for imposing disciplinary sanctions.

30. Judges' participation in political activities poses some major problems. Of course, judges remain citizens and should be allowed to exercise the political rights enjoyed by all citizens. However, in view of the right to a fair trial and legitimate public expectations, judges should show restraint in the exercise of public political activity. Some States have included this principle in their disciplinary rules and sanction any conduct which conflicts with the obligation of judges to exercise reserve. They have also expressly stated that a judge's duties are incompatible with certain political mandates (in the national parliament, European Parliament or local council), sometimes even prohibiting judges' spouses from taking up such positions.

31. More generally, it is necessary to consider the participation of judges in public debates of a political nature. In order to preserve public confidence in the judicial system, judges should not expose themselves to political attacks that are incompatible with the neutrality required by the judiciary.

32. From reading the replies to the questionnaire, it seems that in some States a restrictive view is taken of judges' involvement in politics.

33. The discussions within the CCJE have shown the need to strike a balance between the judges' freedom of opinion and expression and the requirement of neutrality. It is therefore necessary for judges, even though their membership of a political party or their participation in public debate on the major problems of society cannot be proscribed, to refrain at least from any political activity liable to compromise their independence or jeopardise the appearance of impartiality.

34. However, judges should be allowed to participate in certain debates concerning national judicial policy. They should be able to be consulted and play an active part in the preparation of legislation concerning their statute and, more generally, the functioning of the judicial system. This subject also raises the question of whether judges should be allowed to join trade unions. Under their freedom of expression and opinion, judges may exercise the right to join trade unions (freedom of association), although restrictions may be placed on the right to strike.

35. Working in a different field offers judges an opportunity to broaden their horizons and gives them an awareness of problems in society which supplements the knowledge acquired from the exercise of their profession. In contrast, it entails some not inconsiderable risks: it could be viewed as contrary to the separation of powers, and could also weaken the public view of the independence and impartiality of judges.

36. The question of judges' involvement in a certain governmental activities, such as service in the private offices of a minister (cabinet ministériel), poses particular problems. There is nothing to prevent a judge from exercising functions in an administrative department of a ministry (for example a civil or criminal legislation department in the Ministry of Justice); however, the matter is more delicate with regard to a judge who becomes part of the staff of a minister's private office. Ministers are perfectly entitled to appoint whomsoever they wish to work in their private office but, as the minister's close collaborators, such staff participate to a certain extent in the minister's political activities. In such circumstances, before a judge enters into service in a minister's private office, an opinion should ideally be obtained from the independent organ responsible for the appointment of judges, so that this body could set out the rules of conduct applicable in each individual case.

c. Impartiality and other professional activities of judges [4]

37. The specific nature of the judicial function and the need to maintain the dignity of the office and protect judges from all kinds of pressures mean that judges should behave in such a way as to avoid conflicts of interest or abuses of power. This requires judges to refrain from any professional activity that might divert them from their judicial responsibilities or cause them to exercise those responsibilities in a partial manner. In some States, incompatibilities with the function of judge are clearly defined by the judges' statute and members of the judiciary are forbidden from carrying out any professional or paid activity. Exceptions are made for educational, research, scientific, literary or artistic activities.

38. Different countries have dealt with incompatible activities to varying effects (a brief summary is annexed) and by various procedures, though in each case with the general objective of avoiding erecting any insurmountable barrier between judges and society.

39. The CCJE considers that rules of professional conduct should require judges to avoid any activities liable to compromise the dignity of their office and to maintain public confidence in the judicial system by minimising the risk of conflicts of interest. To this end, they should refrain from any supplementary professional activity that would restrict their independence and jeopardise their impartiality. In this context, the CCJE endorses the provision of the European Charter on the Statute for Judges under which judges' freedom to carry out activities outside their judicial mandate "may not be limited except in so far as such outside activities are incompatible with confidence in, or the impartiality or the independence of a judge, or his or her required availability to deal attentively and within a reasonable period with the matters put before him or her" (para. 4.2). The European Charter also recognises the right of judges to join professional organisations and a right of expression (para. 1.7) in order to avoid "excessive rigidity" which might set up barriers between society and the judges themselves (para. 4.3). It is however essential that judges continue to devote the most of their working time to their role as judges, including associated activities, and not be tempted to devote excessive attention to extra-judicial activities. There is obviously a heightened risk of excessive attention being devoted to such activities, if they are permitted for reward. The precise line between what is permitted and not permitted has however to be drawn on a country by country basis, and there is a role here also for such a body or person as recommended in paragraph 29 above.

d. Impartiality and judges' relations with the media

40. There has been a general trend towards greater media attention focused on judicial matters, especially in the criminal law field, and in particular in certain west European countries. Bearing in mind the links which may be forged between judges and the media, there is a danger that the way judges conduct themselves could be influenced by journalists. The CCJE points out in this connection that in its Opinion No. 1 (2001) it stated that, while the freedom of the press was a pre-eminent principle, the judicial process had to be protected from undue external influence. Accordingly, judges have to show circumspection in their relations with the press and be able to maintain their independence and impartiality, refraining from any personal exploitation of any relations with journalists and any unjustified comments on the cases they are dealing with. The right of the public to information is nevertheless a fundamental principle resulting from Article 10 of the European Convention on Human Rights. It implies that the judge answers the legitimate expectations of the citizens by clearly motivated decisions. Judges should also be free to prepare a summary or communiqué setting up the tenor or clarifying the significance of their judgements for the public. Besides, for the countries where the judges are involved in criminal investigations, it is advisable for them to reconcile the necessary restraint relating to the cases they are dealing with, with the right to information. Only under such conditions can judges freely fulfil their role, without fear of media pressure. The CCJE has noted with interest the practice in force in certain countries of appointing a judge with communication responsibilities or a spokesperson to deal with the press on subjects of interest to the public.

2°) How should standards of conduct be formulated?

41. Continental judicial tradition strongly supports the idea of codification. Several countries have already established codes of conduct in the public sector (police), in regulated professions (solicitors, doctors) and in the private sector (press). Codes of ethics have also recently been introduced for judges, particularly in East European countries, following the example of the United States.

42. The oldest is the Italian "Ethical Code" adopted on 7 May 1994 by the Italian Judges' Association, a professional organisation of the judiciary. The word "code" is inappropriate, since it consists of 14 articles which cover the conduct of judges (including presidents of courts) in its entirety and includes public prosecutors[5]. It is clear that the code does not consist of disciplinary or criminal rules, but is a self-regulatory instrument generated by the judiciary itself. Article 1 sets out the general principle: "In social life, the judge must behave with dignity and propriety and remain attentive to the public interest. Within the framework of his functions and in each professional act he must be inspired by the values of personal disinterest, independence and impartiality".

43. Other countries, such as Estonia, Lithuania, Ukraine, Moldova, Slovenia, the Czech Republic and Slovakia, have a "judicial code of ethics" or "principles of conduct" adopted by representative assemblies of judges and distinct from disciplinary rules.

44. Codes of conduct have some important benefits: firstly, they help judges to resolve questions of professional ethics, giving them autonomy in their decision-making and guaranteeing their independence from other authorities. Secondly, they inform the public about the standards of conduct it is entitled to expect from judges. Thirdly, they contribute to give the public assurance that justice is administrated independently and impartially.

45. However, the CCJE points out that independence and impartiality cannot be protected solely by principles of conduct and that numerous statutory and procedural rules should also play a part. Standards of professional conduct are different from statutory and disciplinary rules. They express the profession's ability to reflect its function in values matching public expectations by way of counterpart to the powers conferred on it. These are self-regulatory standards which involve recognising that the application of the law is not a mechanical exercise, involves real discretionary power and places judges in a relationship of responsibility to themselves and to citizens.

46. Codes of professional conduct also create a number of problems. For example, they can give the impression that they contain all the rules and that anything not prohibited must be admissible. They tend to oversimplify situations and, finally, they create the impression that standards of conduct are fixed for a certain period of time, whereas in fact they are constantly evolving. The CCJE suggests that it is desirable to prepare and speak of a "statement of standards of professional conduct", rather than a code.

47. The CCJE considers that the preparation of such statements is to be encouraged in each country, even though they are not the only way of disseminating rules of professional conduct, since:

- appropriate basic and further training should play a part in the preparation and dissemination of rules of professional conduct[6];

- in States where they exist, judicial inspectorates, on the basis of their observations of judges' behaviour, could contribute to the development of ethical thinking; their views could be made known through their annual reports;

- through its decisions, the independent authority described in the European Charter on the Statute for Judges, if it is involved in disciplinary proceedings, outlines judges' duties and obligations; if these decisions were published in an appropriate form, awareness of the values underlying them could be raised more effectively;

- high-level groups, consisting of representatives of different interests involved in the administration of justice, could be set up to consider ethical issues and their conclusions disseminated;

- professional associations should act as forums for the discussion of judges' responsibilities and deontology; they should provide wide dissemination of rules of conduct within judicial circles.

48. The CCJE would like to stress that, in order to provide the necessary protection of judges' independence, any statement of standards of professional conduct should be based on two fundamental principles:

i) firstly, it should address basic principles of professional conduct. It should recognise the general impossibility of compiling complete lists of pre-determined activities which judges are forbidden from pursuing; the principles set out should serve as self-regulatory instruments for judges, i.e. general rules that guide their activities. Further, although there is both an overlap and an interplay, principles of conduct should remain independent of the disciplinary rules applicable to judges in the sense that failure to observe one of such principles should not of itself constitute a disciplinary infringement or a civil or criminal offence;

ii) secondly, principles of professional conduct should be drawn up by the judges themselves. They should be self-regulatory instruments generated by the judiciary itself, enabling the judicial authority to acquire legitimacy by operating within a framework of generally accepted ethical standards. Broad consultation should be organised, possibly under the aegis of a person or body as stated in paragraph 29, which could also be responsible for explaining and interpreting the statement of standards of professional conduct.

3°) Conclusions on the standards of conduct

49. The CCJE is of the opinion that:

i) judges should be guided in their activities by principles of professional conduct,

ii) such principles should offer judges guidelines on how to proceed, thereby enabling them to overcome the difficulties they are faced with as regards their independence and impartiality, iii) the said principles should be drawn up by the judges themselves and be totally separate from the judges' disciplinary system, iv) it is desirable to establish in each country one or more bodies or persons within the judiciary to advise judges confronted with a problem related to professional ethics or compatibility of non judicial activities with their status.

50. As regards the rules of conduct of every judge, the CCJE is of the opinion that:

i) each individual judge should do everything to uphold judicial independence at both the institutional and the individual level, ii) judges should behave with integrity in office and in their private lives, iii) they should at all times adopt an approach which both is and appears impartial, iv) they should discharge their duties without favountism and without actual or apparent prejudice or bias,

v) their decisions should be reached by taking into account all considerations material to the application of the relevant rules of law, and excluding from account all immaterial considerations, vi) they should show the consideration due to all persons taking part in the judicial proceedings or affected by these proceedings, vii) they should discharge their duties with due respect for the equal treatment of parties, by avoiding any bias and any discrimination, maintaining a balance between the parties and ensuring each a fair hearing, viii) they should show circumspection in their relations with the media, maintain their independence and impartiality by refraining from any personal exploitation of any relations with the media and from making any unjustified comments on the cases they are dealing with, ix) they should ensure they maintain a high degree of professional competence,

x) they should have a high degree of professional awareness and be subject to an obligation of diligence in order to comply with the requirement to deliver their judgments in a reasonable time, xi) they should devote the most of their working time to their judicial functions, including associated activities, xii) they should refrain from any political activity which could compromise their independence and cause detriment to their image of impartiality.

B. CRIMINAL, CIVIL AND DISCIPLINARY LIABILITY OF JUDGES

4°) What criminal, civil and disciplinary liability should apply to judges?

51. The corollary of the powers and the trust conferred by society upon judges is that there should be some means of holding judges responsible, and even removing them from office, in cases of misbehaviour so gross as to justify such a course. The need for caution in the recognition of any such liability arises from the need to maintain judicial independence and freedom from undue pressure. Against this background, the CCJE considers in turn the topics of criminal, civil and disciplinary liability. In practice, it is the potential disciplinary liability of judges which is most important.

a. Criminal liability

52. Judges who in the conduct of their office commit what would in any circumstances be regarded as crimes (e.g. accept bribes) cannot claim immunity from ordinary criminal process. The answers to questionnaire show that in some countries even well-intentioned judicial failings could constitute crimes. Thus, in Sweden and Austria judges (being assimilated to other public functionaries) can be punished (e.g. by fine) in some cases of gross negligence (e.g. involving putting or keeping someone in prison for too long).

53. Nevertheless, while current practice does not therefore entirely exclude criminal liability on the part of judges for unintentional failings in the exercise of their functions, the CCJE does not regard the introduction of such liability as either generally acceptable or to be encouraged. A judge should not have to operate under the threat of a financial penalty, still less imprisonment, the presence of which may, however sub-consciously, affect his judgment.

54. The vexatious pursuit of criminal proceedings against a judge whom a litigant dislikes has became common in some European states. The CCJE considers that in countries where a criminal investigation or proceedings can be started at the instigation of a private individual, there should be a mechanism for preventing or stopping such investigation or proceedings against a judge relating to the purported performance of his or her office where there is no proper case for suggesting that any criminal liability exists on the part of the judge.

b. Civil liability

55. Similar considerations to those identified in paragraph 53 apply to the imposition on judges personally of civil liability for the consequences of their wrong decisions or for other failings (e.g. excessive delay). As a general principle, judges personally should enjoy absolute freedom from liability in respect of claims made directly against them relating to their exercise in good faith of their functions. Judicial errors, whether in respect of jurisdiction or procedure, in ascertaining or applying the law or in evaluating evidence, should be dealt with by an appeal; other judicial failings which cannot be rectified in this way (including e.g. excessive delay) should, at most, lead to a claim by the dissatisfied litigant against the State. That the state may, in some circumstances, be liable under the European Convention of Human Rights, to compensate a litigant, is a different matter, with which this opinion is not directly concerned.

56. There are however European countries, in which judges may incur civil liability for grossly wrong decisions or other gross failings[7], particularly at the instance of the state, after the dissatisfied litigant has established a right to compensation against the state. Thus, for example, in the Czech Republic the state may be held liable for damages caused by a judge's illegal decision or incorrect judicial action, but may claim recourse from the judge if and after the judge's misconduct has been established in criminal or disciplinary proceedings. In Italy, the state may, under certain conditions, claim to be reimbursed by a judge who has rendered it liable by either wilful deceit or "gross negligence", subject in the latter case to a potential limitation of liability.

57. The European Charter on the statute for judges contemplates the possibility of recourse proceedings of this nature in paragraph 5.2 of its text - with the safeguard that prior agreement should obtained from an independent authority with substantial judicial representation, such as that commended in paragraph 43 of the CCJE's opinion no. 1 (2001). The commentary to the Charter emphasises in its paragraph 5.2 the need to restrict judges' civil liability to (a) reimbursing the state for (b) "gross and inexcusable negligence" by way of (c) legal proceedings (d) requiring the prior agreement of such an independent authority. The CCJE endorses all these points, and goes further. The application of concepts such as gross or inexcusable negligence is often difficult. If there was any potential for a recourse action by the state, the judge would be bound to have to become closely concerned at the stage when a claim was made against the state. The CCJE's conclusion is that it is not appropriate for a judge to be exposed, in respect of the purported exercise of judicial functions, to any personal liability, even by way of reimbursement of the state, except in a case of wilful default.

c. Disciplinary liability

58. All legal systems need some form of disciplinary system, although it is evident from the answers given by different member states to the questionnaires that the need is much more directly felt in some, as opposed to other, member states. There is in this connection a basic distinction between common-law countries, with smaller professional judiciaries appointed from the ranks of experienced practitioners, and civil law countries with larger and on average younger, career judiciaries.

59. The questions which arise are:

i) What conduct is it that should render a judge liable to disciplinary proceedings?

ii) By whom and how should such proceedings be initiated?

iii) By whom and how should they be determined?

iv) What sanctions should be available for misconduct established in disciplinary proceedings?

60. As to question (i), the first point which the CCJE identifies (repeating in substance a point made earlier in this opinion) is that it is incorrect to correlate breaches of proper professional standards with misconduct giving rise potentially to disciplinary sanctions. Professional standards, which have been the subject of the first part of this opinion, represent best practice, which all judges should aim to develop and towards which all judges should aspire. It would discourage the future development of such standards and misunderstand their purpose to equate them with misconduct justifying disciplinary proceedings. In order to justify disciplinary proceedings, misconduct must be serious and flagrant, in a way which cannot be posited simply because there has been a failure to observe professional standards set out in guidelines such as those discussed in the first part of this opinion.[8]

61. This is not to say that breach of the professional standards identified in this opinion may not be of considerable relevance, where it is alleged that there has been misconduct sufficient to justify and require disciplinary sanction. Some of the answers to questionnaires recognise this explicitly: for example, professional standards are described as having "a certain authority" in disciplinary proceedings in Lithuania and as constituting a way "of helping the judge hearing disciplinary proceedings by illuminating the provisions of the law on judges" in Estonia. They have also been used in disciplinary proceedings in Moldova. (On the other hand, the Ukrainian and Slovakian answers deny that there is any relationship between the two).

62. In some countries, separate systems have even been established to try to regulate or enforce professional standards. In Slovenia, failure to observe such standards may attract a sanction before a "Court of Honour" within the Judges' Association, and not before the judges' disciplinary body. In the Czech Republic, in a particularly serious situation of non-observance of the rules of professional conduct, a judge may be excluded from the "Judges' Union", which is the source of these principles.

63. The second point which the CCJE identifies is that it is for each State to specify by law what conduct may give rise to disciplinary action. The CCJE notes that in some countries attempts have been made to specify in detail all conduct that might give grounds for disciplinary proceedings leading to some form of sanction. Thus, the Turkish law on Judges and Prosecutors specifies gradations of offence (including for example staying away from work without excuse for various lengths of period) with matching gradations of sanction, ranging from a warning, through condemnation [i.e. reprimand], various effects on promotion to transfer and finally dismissal. Similarly, a recent 2002 law in Slovenia seeks to give effect to the general principle nulla poena sine lege by specifying 27 categories of disciplinary offence. It is, however, very noticeable in all such attempts that, ultimately, they all resort to general "catch-all" formulations which raise questions of judgment and degree. The CCJE does not itself consider that it is necessary (either by virtue of the principle nulla poena sine lege or on any other basis) or even possible to seek to specify in precise or detailed terms at a European level the nature of all misconduct that could lead to disciplinary proceedings and sanctions. The essence of disciplinary proceedings lies in conduct fundamentally contrary to that to be expected of a professional in the position of the person who has allegedly misconducted him or herself.

64. At first sight, Principle VI.2 of Recommendation No. R (94) 12 might be thought to suggest that precise grounds for disciplinary proceedings should always "be defined" in advance "in precise terms by the law". The CCJE fully accepts that precise reasons must be given for any disciplinary action, as and when it is proposed to be or is brought. But, as it has said, it does not conceive it to be necessary or even possible at the European level to seek to define all such potential reasons in advance in other terms than the general formulations currently adopted in most European countries. In that respect therefore, the CCJE has concluded that the aim stated in pragraph 60 c) of its Opinion No. 1 (2001) cannot be pursued at a European level.

65. Further definition by individual member States by law of the precise reasons for disciplinary action as recommended by Recommended No. R (94) 12 appears, however, to be desirable. At present, the grounds for disciplinary action are usually stated in terms of great generality.

66. The CCJE next considers question (ii): by whom and how should disciplinary proceedings be initiated? Disciplinary proceedings are in some countries brought by the Ministry of Justice, in others they are instigated by or in conjunction with certain judges or councils of judges or prosecutors, such as the First President of the Court of Appeal in France or the General Public Prosecutor in Italy. In England, the initiator is the Lord Chancellor, but he has agreed only to initiate disciplinary action with the concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice.

67. An important question is what if any steps can be taken by persons alleging that they have suffered by reason of a judge's professional error. Such persons must have the right to bring any complaint they have to the person or body responsible for initiating disciplinary action. But they cannot have a right themselves to initiate or insist upon disciplinary action. There must be a filter, or judges could often find themselves facing disciplinary proceedings, brought at the instance of disappointed litigants.

68. The CCJE considers that the procedures leading to the initiation of disciplinary action need greater formalisation. It proposes that countries should envisage introducing a specific body or person in each country with responsibility for receiving complaints, for obtaining the representations of the judge concerned upon them and for deciding in their light whether or not there is a sufficient case against the judge to call for the initiation of disciplinary action, in which case it would pass the matter to the disciplinary authority.

69. The next question (iii) is: by whom and how should disciplinary proceedings be determined? A whole section of the United Nations Basic Principles is devoted to discipline, suspension and removal. Article 17 recognises judges' "right to a fair hearing". Under Article 19, "all disciplinary (...) proceedings shall be determined in accordance with established standards of judicial conduct". Finally, Article 20 sets out the principle that "decisions in disciplinary, suspension or removal proceedings should be subject to an independent review". At the European level, guidance is provided in Principle VI of Recommendation No. R (94) 12, which recommends that disciplinary measures should be dealt with by "a special competent body which has as its task to apply any disciplinary sanctions and measures, where they are not dealt with by a court, and whose decisions shall be controlled by a superior judicial organ, or which is a superior judicial organ itself" and that judges should in this connection benefit, at the least, by protections equivalent to those afforded under Article 6.1 of the Convention on Human Rights. Further, the CCJE emphasises in this context that disciplinary measures include any measures adversely affecting a judge's status or career, including transfer of court, loss of promotion rights or pay.

70. The replies to the questionnaire show that, in some countries, discipline is ensured by courts specialising in cases of this type: the disciplinary committee of the Supreme Court (Estonia, Slovenia - where each level is represented). In Ukraine, there is a committee including judges of the same level of jurisdiction as the judge concerned. In Slovakia, there are now two tiers of committee, one of three judges, the second of five Supreme Court judges. In Lithuania, there is a committee of judges from the various tiers of general jurisdiction and administrative courts. In some countries, judgment is given by a Judicial Council, sitting as a disciplinary court (Moldova, France, Portugal).[9]

71. The CCJE has already expressed the view that disciplinary proceedings against any judge should only be determined by an independent authority (or "tribunal") operating procedures which guarantee full rights of defence - see para. 60(b) of CCJE Opinion No. 1 (2001) on standards concerning the independence of the judiciary and the irremovability of judges. It also considers that the body responsible for appointing such a tribunal can and should be the independent body (with substantial judicial representation chosen democratically by other judges) which, as the CCJE advocated in paragraph 46 of its first Opinion, should generally be responsible for appointing judges. That in no way excludes the inclusion in the membership of a disciplinary tribunal of persons other than judges (thus averting the risk of corporatism), always provided that such other persons are not members of the legislature, government or administration.

72. In some countries, the initial disciplinary body is the highest judicial body (the Supreme Court). The CCJE considers that the arrangements regarding disciplinary proceedings in each country should be such as to allow an appeal from the initial disciplinary body (whether that is itself an authority, tribunal or court) to a court.

73. The final question (iv) is: what sanctions should be available for misconduct established in disciplinary proceedings? The answers to questionnaire reveal wide differences, no doubt reflecting the different legal systems and exigencies. In common law systems, with small, homogeneous judiciaries composed of senior and experienced practitioners, the only formal sanction evidently found to be necessary (and then only as a remote back-up possibility) is the extreme measure of removal, but informal warnings or contact can prove very effective. In other countries, with larger, much more disparate and in some cases less experienced judiciaries, a gradation of formally expressed sanctions is found appropriate, sometimes even including financial penalties.

74. The European Charter on the Statute for Judges (Article 5.1) states that "the scale of sanctions which may be imposed is set out in the statute and must be subject to the principle of proportionality". Some examples of possible sanctions appear in Recommendation No. R (94) 12 (Principle VI.1). The CCJE endorses the need for each jurisdiction to identify the sanctions permissible under its own disciplinary system, and for such sanctions to be, both in principle and in application, proportionate. But it does not consider that any definitive list can or should be attempted at the European level.

5°) Conclusions on liability

75. As regards criminal liability, the CCJE considers that:

i) judges should be criminally liable in ordinary law for offences committed outside their judicial office;

ii) criminal liability should not be imposed on judges for unintentional failings in the exercise of their functions.

76. As regards civil liability, the CCJE considers that, bearing in mind the principle of independence:

i) the remedy for judicial errors (whether in respect of jurisdiction, substance or procedure) should lie in an appropriate system of appeals (whether with or without permission of the court);

ii) any remedy for other failings in the administration of justice (including for example excessive delay) lies only against the state;

iii) it is not appropriate for a judge to be exposed, in respect of the purported exercise of judicial functions, to any personal liability, even by way of reimbursement of the state, except in a case of wilful default.

77. As regards disciplinary liability, the CCJE considers that:

i) in each country the statute or fundamental charter applicable to judges should define, as far as possible in specific terms, the failings that may give rise to disciplinary sanctions as well as the procedures to be followed;

ii) as regard the institution of disciplinary proceedings, countries should envisage introducing a specific body or person with responsibility for receiving complaints, for obtaining the representations of the judge and for considering in their light whether or not there is a sufficient case against the judge to call for the initiation of such proceedings;

iii) any disciplinary proceedings initiated should be determined by an independent authority or tribunal, operating a procedure guaranteeing full rights of defence;

iv) when such authority or tribunal is not itself a court, then its members should be appointed by the independent authority (with substantial judicial representation chosen democratically by other judges) advocated by the CCJE in paragraph 46 of its Opinion N° 1 (2001);

v) the arrangements regarding disciplinary proceedings in each country should be such as to allow an appeal from the initial disciplinary body (whether that is itself an authority, tribunal or court) to a court;

vi) the sanctions available to such authority in a case of a proven misconduct should be defined, as far as possible in specific terms, by the statute or fundamental charter of judges, and should be applied in a proportionate manner.

[5] It covers relations with individuals, the duty of competence, the use of public resources, the use of professional information, relations with the press, membership of associations, the image of impartiality and independence, the obligation to act correctly with collaborators, conduct in office and outside and the duties of presiding judges.

[6] In his summary report, presented following the first meeting of the Lisbon Network, Daniel Ludet stressed that training should offer a link and encourage discussion of judges' professional practices and the ethical principles on which they are based (see Training of judges and prosecutors in matters relating to their professional obligations and ethics. 1st meeting of the members of the network for the exchange of information on the training of judges and prosecutors, Council of Europe Publishing).

[7] Merely because the State has been held liable for excessive delay, it by no means follows, of course, that any individual judge is at fault. The CCJE repeats what it said in paragraph 27 above.

[8] It was for these reasons that the CCJE Working Party, during and after its meeting with the United Nations Commissioner for Human Rights on 18th June 2002, qualified its otherwise substantially positive attitude to the Bangalore Code in its present draft form by disagreeing with the direct link which it drew between the principles of conduct which it stated and the subjects of complaints and discipline (see paragraph 2(iii) of Appendix V, doc. CCJE-GT (2002) 7): see the CCJE-GT's comments No. 1 (2002) on the Bangalore draft.

[3] In England, the Lord Chancellor is responsible for initiating and deciding disciplinary action. By agreement disciplinary action is initiated only with the concurrence of the Lord Chief Justice, and thereafter (unless the judge concerned waives this) another judge of appropriate standing, nominated by the Lord Chief Justice, is appointed to investigate the facts and to report, with recommendations. If the Lord Chief Justice concurs the Lord Chancellor may then refer the matter to Parliament (in the case of higher tier judges) or remove a lower tier judge from office, or take or authorise any other disciplinary action.

FOREWORD

The activities carried out in the Council of Europe for many years now, on the organisation of Justice in a democratic State governed by the rule of law, have allowed the various aspects of the issue of the status of judges to be addressed on numerous occasions. These meetings over the past years have been devoted to the recruitment, training, career and responsibilities of judges, as well as the disciplinary system governing them. The number of these meetings has increased since the end of the eighties due to the profound changes that have taken place in Eastern Europe.

In 1997, the idea developed to maximise the results of the work and discussions in order to give this work better 'visibility' and above all to give a new impulse to the continuing effort to improve legal institutions as an essential element of the rule of law.

The need to draft a European charter on the statute for judges was confirmed in July 1997, following a first multilateral meeting in Strasbourg devoted to the Status of Judges in Europe. The participants at this meeting came from 13 Western, Central and Eastern European countries, as well as from the European Association of Judges (EAJ) and the European Association of Judges for Democracy and Freedom (MEDEL). The participants expressed a wish for the Council of Europe to give the necessary framework and support to the elaboration of the Charter.

On the basis of these conclusions, the Directorate of Legal Affairs entrusted three experts from France, Poland and United Kingdom with the realisation of a draft charter.

This draft, created in Spring 1998, was laid before the participants of a second multilateral meeting, also held in Strasbourg, on 8-10 July 1998. At the end of the three days of discussion, the text, after having been improved by a certain number of amendments, was unanimously adopted.

The value of this Charter is not a result of a formal status, which, in fact, it does not have, but of the relevance and strength that its authors intended to give to its contents. A thorough knowledge of its contents and a wide distribution of the Charter are essential for its goals to be realised . The Charter is aimed at judges, lawyers, politicians and more generally to every person who has an interest in the rule of law and democracy.

EUROPEAN CHARTER ON THE STATUTE FOR JUDGES

The participants at the multilateral meeting on the statute for judges in Europe, organized by the Council of Europe, between 8-10 July 1998,

Having regard to Article 6 of the Convention for the Protection of Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms which provides that "everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law" ;

Having regard to the United Nations Basic Principles on the Independence of the Judiciary, endorsed by the United Nations General Assembly in November 1985;

Having referred to Recommendation No R (94) 12 of the Committee of Ministers to member states on the independence, efficiency and role of judges, and having made their own, the objectives which it expresses ;

Being concerned to see the promotion of judicial independence, necessary for the strengthening of the pre-eminence of law and for the protection of individual liberties within democratic states, made more effective ;

Conscious of the necessity that provisions calculated to ensure the best guarantees of the competence, independence and impartiality of judges should be specified in a formal document intended for all European States ;

Desiring to see the judges' statutes of the different European States take into account these provisions in order to ensure in concrete terms the best level of guarantees;

Have adopted the present European Charter on the statute for judges.

1. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

1.1. The statute for judges aims at ensuring the competence, independence and impartiality which every individual legitimately expects from the courts of law and from every judge to whom is entrusted the protection of his or her rights. It excludes every provision and every procedure liable to impair confidence in such competence, such independence and such impartiality. The present Charter is composed hereafter of the provisions which are best able to guarantee the achievement of those objectives. Its provisions aim at raising the level of guarantees in the various European States. They cannot justify modifications in national statutes tending to decrease the level of guarantees already achieved in the countries concerned.

1.2. In each European State, the fundamental principles of the statute for judges are set out in internal norms at the highest level, and its rules in norms at least at the legislative level.

1.3. In respect of every decision affecting the selection, recruitment, appointment, career progress or termination of office of a judge, the statute envisages the intervention of an authority independent of the executive and legislative powers within which at least one half of those who sit are judges elected by their peers following methods guaranteeing the widest representation of the judiciary.

1.4. The statute gives to every judge who considers that his or her rights under the statute, or more generally his or her independence, or that of the legal process, are threatened or ignored in any way whatsoever, the possibility of making a reference to such an independent authority, with effective means available to it of remedying or proposing a remedy.

1.5. Judges must show, in discharging their duties, availability, respect for individuals, and vigilance in maintaining the high level of competence which the decision of cases requires on every occasion - decisions on which depend the guarantee of individual rights and in preserving the secrecy of information which is entrusted to them in the course of proceedings.

1.6. The State has the duty of ensuring that judges have the means necessary to accomplish their tasks properly, and in particular to deal with cases within a reasonable period.

1.7. Professional organizations set up by judges, and to which all judges may freely adhere, contribute notably to the defence of those rights which are conferred on them by their statute, in particular in relation to authorities and bodies which are involved in decisions regarding them.

1.8. Judges are associated through their representatives and their professional organizations in decisions relating to the administration of the courts and as to the determination of their means, and their allocation at a national and local level. They are consulted in the same manner over plans to modify their statute, and over the determination of the terms of their remuneration and of their social welfare.

2. SELECTION, RECRUITMENT, INITIAL TRAINING

2.1. The rules of the statute relating to the selection and recruitment of judges by an independent body or panel, base the choice of candidates on their ability to assess freely and impartially the legal matters which will be referred to them, and to apply the law to them with respect for individual dignity. The statute excludes any candidate being ruled out by reason only of their sex, or ethnic or social origin, or by reason of their philosophical and political opinions or religious convictions.

2.2. The statute makes provision for the conditions which guarantee, by requirements linked to educational qualifications or previous experience, the ability specifically to discharge judicial duties.

2.3. The statute ensures by means of appropriate training at the expense of the State, the preparation of the chosen candidates for the effective exercise of judicial duties. The authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof, ensures the appropriateness of training programmes and of the organization which implements them, in the light of the requirements of open-mindedness, competence and impartiality which are bound up with the exercise of judicial duties.

3. APPOINTMENT AND IRREMOVABILITY

3.1. The decision to appoint a selected candidate as a judge, and to assign him or her to a tribunal, are taken by the independent authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof or on its proposal, or its recommendation or with its agreement or following its opinion.

3.2. The statute establishes the circumstances in which a candidate's previous activities, or those engaged in by his or her close relations, may, by reason of the legitimate and objective doubts to which they give rise as to the impartiality and independence of the candidate concerned, constitute an impediment to his or her appointment to a court.

3.3. Where the recruitment procedure provides for a trial period, necessarily short, after nomination to the position of judge but before confirmation on a permanent basis, or where recruitment is made for a limited period capable of renewal, the decision not to make a permanent appointment or not to renew, may only be taken by the independent authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof, or on its proposal, or its recommendation or with its agreement or following its opinion. The provisions at point 1.4 hereof are also applicable to an individual subject to a trial period.

3.4. A judge holding office at a court may not in principle be appointed to another judicial office or assigned elsewhere, even by way of promotion, without having freely consented thereto. An exception to this principle is permitted only in the case where transfer is provided for and has been pronounced by way of a disciplinary sanction, in the case of a lawful alteration of the court system, and in the case of a temporary assignment to reinforce a neighbouring court, the maximum duration of such assignment being strictly limited by the statute, without prejudice to the application of the provisions at paragraph 1.4 hereof.

4. CAREER DEVELOPMENT

4.1. When it is not based on seniority, a system of promotion is based exclusively on the qualities and merits observed in the performance of duties entrusted to the judge, by means of objective appraisals performed by one or several judges and discussed with the judge concerned. Decisions as to promotion are then pronounced by the authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof or on its proposal, or with its agreement. Judges who are not proposed with a view to promotion must be entitled to lodge a complaint before this authority.

4.2. Judges freely carry out activities outside their judicial mandate including those which are the embodiment of their rights as citizens. This freedom may not be limited except in so far as such outside activities are incompatible with confidence in, or the impartiality or the independence of a judge, or his or her required availability to deal attentively and within a reasonable period with the matters put before him or her. The exercise of an outside activity, other than literary or artistic, giving rise to remuneration, must be the object of a prior authorization on conditions laiddown by the statute.

4.3. Judges must refrain from any behaviour, action or expression of a kind effectively to affect confidence in their impartiality and their independence.

4.4. The statute guarantees to judges the maintenance and broadening of their knowledge, technical as well as social and cultural, needed to perform their duties, through regular access to training which the State pays for, and ensures its organization whilst respecting the conditions set out at paragraph 2.3 hereof.

5. LIABILITY

5.1. The dereliction by a judge of one of the duties expressly defined by the statute, may only give rise to a sanction upon the decision, following the proposal, the recommendation, or with the agreement of a tribunal or authority composed at least as to one half of elected judges, within the framework of proceedings of a character involving the full hearing of the parties, in which the judge proceeded against must be entitled to representation. The scale of sanctions which may be imposed is set out in the statute, and their imposition is subject to the principle of proportionality. The decision of an executive authority, of a tribunal, or of an authority pronouncing a sanction, as envisaged herein, is open to an appeal to a higher judicial authority.

5.2. Compensation for harm wrongfully suffered as a result of the decision or the behaviour of a judge in the exercise of his or her duties is guaranteed by the State. The statute may provide that the State has the possibility of applying, within a fixed limit, for reimbursement from the judge by way of legal proceedings in the case of a gross and inexcusable breach of the rules governing the performance of judicial duties. The submission of the claim to the competent court must form the subject of prior agreement with the authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof.

5.3. Each individual must have the possibility of submitting without specific formality a complaint relating to the miscarriage of justice in a given case to an independent body. This body has the power, if a careful and close examination makes a dereliction on the part of a judge indisputably appear, such as envisaged at paragraph 5.1 hereof, to refer the matter to the disciplinary authority, or at the very least to recommend such referral to an authority normally competent in accordance with the statute, to make such a reference.

6. REMUNERATION AND SOCIAL WELFARE

6.1. Judges exercising judicial functions in a professional capacity are entitled to remuneration, the level of which is fixed so as to shield them from pressures aimed at influencing their decisions and more generally their behaviour within their jurisdiction, thereby impairing their independence and impartiality.

6.2. Remuneration may vary depending on length of service, the nature of the duties which judges are assigned to discharge in a professional capacity, and the importance of the tasks which are imposed on them, assessed under transparent conditions.

6.3. The statute provides a guarantee for judges acting in a professional capacity against social risks linked with illness, maternity, invalidity, old age and death.

6.4. In particular the statute ensures that judges who have reached the legal age of judicial retirement, having performed their judicial duties for a fixed period, are paid a retirement pension, the level of which must be as close as possible to the level of their final salary as a judge.

7. TERMINATION OF OFFICE

7.1. A judge permanently ceases to exercise office through resignation, medical certification of physical unfitness, reaching the age limit, the expiry of a fixed legal term, or dismissal pronounced within the framework of a procedure such as envisaged at paragraph 5.1 hereof.

7.2. The occurence of one of the causes envisaged at paragraph 7.1 hereof, other than reaching the age limit or the expiry of a fixed term of office, must be verified by the authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof.

EXPLANATORY MEMORANDUM TO THE EUROPEAN CHARTER ON THE STATUTE FOR JUDGES

1. GENERAL PRINCIPLES

The provisions of the European Charter cover not only professional but also non-professional judges, because it is important that all judges should enjoy certain safeguards relating to their recruitment, incompatibilities, conduct outside, and the termination of their office.

However, the Charter also lays down specific provisions on professional judges, and in fact this specificity is inherent in certain concepts such as careers.

The provisions of the Charter concern the statute for judges of all jurisdictions to which people are called to submit their case or which are called upon to decide their case, be it a civil, criminal, administrative or other jurisdiction.

1.1 The Charter endeavours to define the content of the statute for judges on the basis of the objectives to be attained: ensuring the competence, independence and impartiality which all members of the public are entitled to expect of the courts and judges entrusted with protecting their rights. The Charter is therefore not an end in itself but rather a means of guaranteeing that the individuals whose rights are to be protected by the courts and judges have the requisite safeguards on the effectiveness of such protection.

These safeguards on individuals' rights are ensured by judicial competence, in the sense of ability, independence and impartiality. These are positive references because the judge's statute must strive to guarantee them; however, they are also negative because the statute must not include any element which might adversely affect public confidence in such competence, independence and impartiality.

The question arose whether the provisions of the Charter should be mandatory, ie whether it should be made compulsory to include them in national statutes regulating the judiciary, or whether they should have the force of recommendations, so that different provisions deemed capable of ensuring equivalent guarantees could be implemented instead.

The latter approach could be justified by a reluctance to criticise national systems in which a long-standing, well-established practice has ensured effective guarantees on statutory protection of the judiciary, even if the system barely mentions such protection.

However, it has also been argued that in a fair number of countries, including new Council of Europe member States, which do not regulate the exercise by political authorities of powers in the area of appointing, assigning, promoting or terminating the office of judges, the safeguards on competence, independence and impartiality are ineffective.

This is why, even though the Charter's provisions are not actually mandatory, they are presented as being the optimum means of ensuring that the aforementioned objectives are attained.

Many of the Charter's provisions are inapplicable in systems where judges are directly elected by the citizens. It would have been impossible to draw up a Charter exclusively comprising provisions compatible with such elective systems, as this would have reduced the text to the lowest common denominator. Nor is the Charter aimed at "invalidating" elective systems, because where they do exist they may be regarded by nationals of the countries concerned as "quintessentially democratic". We might consider that the provisions apply as far as possible to systems in which the judiciary is elected. For instance, the provisions set out in paragraphs 2.2 and 2.3 (first sentence) are certainly applicable to such systems, for which they provide highly appropriate safeguards.

The provisions of the Charter aim to raise the level of guarantees in the various European States. The importance of such raising will depend on the level already achieved in a country. But the provisions of the Charter must not in any way serve as the basis for modifying national statutes so as on the contrary to decrease the level of guarantees already achieved in any one country.

1.2 The fundamental principles constituting a statute for judges, determining the safeguard on the competence, independence and impartiality of the judges and courts, must be enacted in the normative rules at the highest level, that is to say in the Constitution, in the case of European States which have established such a basic text. The rules included in the statute will normally be enacted at the legislative level, which is also the highest level in States with flexible constitutions.

The requirement to enshrine the fundamental principles and rules in legislation or the Constitution protects the latter from being amended under a cursory procedure unsuited to the issues at stake. In particular, where the fundamental principles are enshrined in the Constitution, it prevents the enactment of legislation aimed at or having the effect of infringing them.

In stipulating that these principles must be included in domestic legal systems, the Charter is not prejudging the respect that is due under such systems for protective provisions set out in international instruments binding upon the European States. This is especially true because the Charter takes the foremost among these provisions as a source of inspiration, as stated in the preamble.

1.3 The Charter provides for the intervention of a body independent from the executive and the legislature where a decision is required on the selection, recruitment or appointment of judges, the development of their careers or the termination of their office.

The wording of this provision is intended to cover a variety of situations, ranging from the mere provision of advice for an executive or legislative body to actual decisions by the independent body.

Account had to be taken here of certain differences in the national systems. Some countries would find it difficult to accept an independent body replacing the political body responsible for appointments. However, the requirement in such cases to obtain at least the recommendation or the opinion of an independent body is bound to be a great incentive, if not an actual obligation, for the official appointments body. In the spirit of the Charter, recommendations and opinions of the independent body do not constitute guarantees that they will in a general way be followed in practice. The political or administrative authority which does not follow such recommendation or opinion should at the very least be obliged to make known its reasons for its refusal so to do.

The wording of this provision of the Charter also enables the independent body to intervene either with a straightforward opinion, an official opinion, a recommendation, a proposal or an actual decision.

The question arose of the membership of the independent body. The Charter at this point stipulates that at least one half of the body's members should be judges elected by their peers, which means that it wants neither to allow judges to be in a minority in the independent body nor to require them to be in the majority. In view of the variety of philosophical conceptions and debates in European States, a reference to a minimum of 50% judges emerged as capable of ensuring a fairly high level of safeguards while respecting any other considerations of principle prevailing in different national systems.

The Charter states that judges who are members of the independent body should be elected by their peers, on the grounds that the requisite independence of this body precludes the election or appointment of its members by a political authority belonging to the executive or the legislature.

There would be a risk of party-political bias in the appointment and role of judges under such a procedure. Judges sitting on the independent body are expected, precisely, to refrain from seeking the favour of political parties or bodies that are themselves appointed or elected by or through such parties.

Finally, without insisting on any particular voting system, the Charter indicates that the method of electing judges to this body must guarantee the widest representation of judges.

1.4 The Charter enshrines the "right of appeal" of any judge who considers that his or her rights under the statute or more generally independence, or that of the legal process, is threatened or infringed in any way, so that he or she can refer the matter to an independent body as described above.

This means that judges are not left defenceless against an infringement of their independence. The right of appeal is a necessary safeguard because it is mere wishful thinking to set out principles to protect the judiciary unless they are consistently backed with mechanisms to guarantee their effective implementation. The intervention of the independent body before any decision is taken on the judge's individual status does not necessarily cover all possible situations in which his or her independence is affected, and it is vital to ensure that judges can apply to this body on their own initiative.

The Charter stipulates that the body thus applied to must have the power to remedy the situation affecting the judge's independence of its own accord, or to propose that the competent authority remedy it. This formula takes account of the diversity of national systems, and even a straightforward recommendation from an independent body on a given situation provides a considerable incentive for the authority in question to remedy the situation complained of.

1.5 The Charter sets out the judge's main duties in the exercise of his or her functions. "Availability" refers both to the time required to judge cases properly and to the attention and alertness that are obviously required for such important duties, since it is the judge's decision that safeguards individual rights. Respect for individuals is particularly vital in positions of power such as that occupied by the judge, especially since individuals often feel very vulnerable when confronted with the judicial system. This paragraph also mentions the judge's obligation to respect the confidentiality of information which comes to his or her attention in the course of proceedings. It ends by pointing out that judges must ensure that they maintain the high level of competence that the hearing of cases demands. This means that the high level of competence and of ability is a constant requirement for the judge in examining and adjudicating on cases, and also that he or she must maintain this high level, if necessary through further training. As is pointed out later in the text, judges must be granted access to training facilities.

1.6 The Charter makes it clear that the State has the duty of ensuring that judges have the means necessary to accomplish their tasks properly, and in particular to deal with cases within a reasonable period.

Without explicit indication of this obligation which is the responsibility of the State, the justifications of the propositions related to the responsibility of the judges would be deteriorated.

1.7 The Charter recognises the role of professional associations formed by judges, to which all judges are freely entitled to adhere, which precludes any form of legal discrimination vis-à-vis the right to join them. It also points out that such associations contribute in particular to the defence of judges' statutory rights before such authorities and bodies as may be involved in decisions affecting them. Judges may therefore not be prohibited from forming or adhering to professional associations.

Although the Charter does not assign these associations exclusive responsibility for defending judges' statutory rights, it does indicate that their contribution to such defence before the authorities and bodies involved in decisions affecting judges must be recognised and respected. This applies, inter alia, to the independent authority referred to in paragraph 1.3.

1.8 The Charter provides that judges should be associated through their representatives, particularly those that are members of the authority referred to in paragraph 1.3, and through their professional associations, with any decisions taken on the administration of the courts, the determination of the courts' budgetary resources and the implementation of such decisions at the local and national levels.

Without advocating any specific legal form or degree of constraint, this provision lays down that judges should be associated in the determination of the overall judicial budget and the resources earmarked for individual courts, which implies establishing consultation or representation procedures at the national and local levels. This also applies more broadly to the administration of justice and of the courts. The Charter does not stipulate that judges should be responsible for such administration, but it does require them not to be left out of administrative decisions.

Consultation of judges by their representatives or professional associations on any proposed change in their statute or any change proposed as to the basis on which they are remunerated, or as to their social welfare, including their retirement pension, should ensure that judges are not left out of the decision-making process in these fields. Nevertheless, the Charter does not authorise encroachment on the decision-making powers vested in the national bodies responsible for such matters under the Constitution.

2. SELECTION, RECRUITMENT AND INITIAL TRAINING

2.1 Judicial candidates must be selected and recruited by an independent body or panel. The Charter does not require that the latter be the independent authority referred to in paragraph 1.3, which means, for instance, that examination or selection panels can be used, provided they are independent. In practice, the selection procedure is often separate from the actual appointment procedure. It is important to specify the particular safeguards accompanying the selection procedure.

The choice made by the selection body must be based on criteria relevant to the nature of the duties to be discharged.

The main aim must be to evaluate the candidate's ability to assess independently cases heard by judges, which implies independent thinking. The ability to show impartiality in the exercise of judicial functions is also an essential element. The ability to apply the law refers both to knowledge of the law and the capacity to put it into practice, which are two different things. The selection body must also ensure that the candidate's conduct as a judge will be based on respect for human dignity, which is vital in encounters between persons in positions of power and the litigants, who are often people in great difficulties.

Lastly, selection must not be based on discriminatory criteria relating to gender, ethnic or social origin, philosophical or political opinions or religious convictions.

2.2 In order to ensure the ability to carry out the duties involved in judicial office, the rules on selection and recruitment must set out requirements as to qualifications and previous experience. This applies, for instance, to systems in which recruitment is conditional upon a set number of years' legal or judicial experience.

2.3 The nature of judicial office, which requires the judge to intervene in complex situations that are often difficult in terms of respect for human dignity, is such that "abstract" verification of aptitude for such office is not enough.

Candidates selected to discharge judicial duties must therefore be prepared for the task by means of appropriate training, which must be financed by the State.

Certain precautions must be taken in preparing judges for the giving of independent and impartial decisions, whereby competence, impartiality and the requisite open-mindedness are guaranteed in both the content of the training programmes and the functioning of the bodies implementing them. This is why the Charter provides that the authority referred to in paragraph 1.3 must ensure the appropriateness of training programmes and of the organization which implements them, in the light of the requirements of open-mindedness, competence and impartiality which are bound up with the exercise of judicial duties. The said authority must have the resources so to ensure. Accordingly, the rules set out in the the statute must specify the procedure for supervision by this body in relation to the requirements in question concerning the programmes and their implementation by the training bodies.

3. APPOINTMENT AND IRREMOVABILITY

3.1 National systems may draw a distinction between the actual selection procedure and the procedures of appointing a judge and assigning him or her to a specific court. It should be noted that decisions to appoint or assign judges are taken by the independent authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof or are reached upon its proposal or recommendation or with its agreement or following its opinion.

3.2 The Charter deals with the question of incompatibilities. It discarded the hypothesis of absolute incompatibilities as this would hamper judicial appointments on the grounds of candidates' or their relatives' previous activities. On the other hand, it considers that when a judge is to be assigned to a specific court, regard must be had to the above-mentioned circumstances where they give rise to legitimate and objective doubts as to his or her impartiality and independence.

For example, a lawyer who has previously practised in a given town cannot possibly be immediately assigned as a judge to a court in the same town. It is also difficult to imagine a judge being assigned to a court in a town in which his or her spouse, father or mother, for instance, is mayor or member of parliament. Therefore, where judges are to be assigned to a given court, the relevant statute must take account of situations liable to give rise to legitimate and objective doubts as to their independence and impartiality.

3.3 The recruitment procedure in some national systems provides for a probationary period before a permanent judicial appointment is made, and others recruit judges on fixed-term renewable contracts.

In such cases the decision not to make a permanent appointment or not to renew an appointment can only be taken by the independent authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 hereof or upon its proposal, recommendation or following its opinion. Clearly, the existence of probationary periods or renewal requirements presents difficulties if not dangers from the angle of the independence and impartiality of the judge in question, who is hoping to be established in post or to have his or her contract renewed. Safeguards must therefore be provided through the intervention of the independent authority. In so far as the quality as a judge of an individual who is the subject of a trial period may be under discussion, the Charter lays down that the right to make a reference to an independent authority, as referred to in paragraph 1.4, is applicable to such an individual.

3.4 The Charter enshrines the irremovability of judges, which means that a judge cannot be assigned to another court or have his or her duties changed without his or her free consent. However, exceptions must be allowed where transfer is provided for within a disciplinary framework, when a lawful re-organization of the court system takes place involving for example the closing down of a court or a temporary transfer is required to assist a neighbouring court. In the latter case, the duration of the temporary transfer must be limited by the relevant statute. Nevertheless, since the problem of transferring a judge without his or her consent is highly sensitive, it is recalled that under the terms of paragraph 1.4 he or she has a general right of appeal before an independent authority, which can investigate the legitimacy of the transfer. In fact, this right of appeal can also remedy situations which have not been specifically catered for in the provisions of the Charter where a judge has such an excessive workload as to be unable in practice to carry out his or her responsibilities normally.

4. CAREER DEVELOPMENT

4.1 Apart from cases where judges are promoted strictly on the basis of length of service, a system which the Charter did not in any way exclude because it is deemed to provide very effective protection for independence, but which presupposes that high-quality recruitment will be absolutely guaranted in the countries concerned, it is important to ensure that the judge's independence and impartiality are not infringed in the area of promotion. It must be specified that there are two potential issues here: judges illegitimately barred from promotion, and judges unduly promoted.

This is why the Charter defines the criteria for promotion exclusively as the qualities and merits observed in the performance of judicial duties by means of objective assessments carried out by one or more judges and discussed with the judge assessed.

Decisions concerning promotion are then taken on the basis of these assessments in the light of the proposal by the independent authority referred to in paragraph 1.3 or upon its recommendation or with its agreement or following its opinion. It is expressly stipulated that a judge who is proposed with a view to promotion submitted for examination by the independent authority must be entitled to present his or her case before the said authority.

The provisions of paragraph 4.1 are obviously not intended to apply to systems in which judges are not promoted, and there is no judicial hierarchy, systems which are also in this regard highly protective of judicial independence.

4.2 The Charter deals here with activities conducted alongside judicial functions. It provides that judges may freely exercise activities outside their judicial mandate, including those which are the embodiment of their rights as citizens. This freedom, which constitutes the principle, may not know of limitation except only in so far as judges engage in outside activities incompatible either with public confidence in their impartiality and independence or with the availability required to consider the cases submitted to them with due care and within a reasonable time. The Charter does not specify any particular type of activity. The negative effects of outside activities on the conditions under which judicial duties are discharged must be pragmatically assessed. The Charter stipulates that judges should request authorisation to engage in activities other than literary or artistic when they are renumerated.

4.3 The Charter addresses the question of what is sometimes called "judicial discretion". It adopts a position which derives from Article 6 of the European Convention on Human Rights and the case-law of the European Court of Human Rights thereupon, laying down that judges must refrain from any behaviour, action or expression likely to affect public confidence in their impartiality and independence. The reference to the risk of such confidence being undermined obviates any excessive rigidity which would result in the judge becoming a social and civic outcast.

4.4 The Charter lays down "the judge's right to in-house training": he or she must have regular access to training courses organized at public expense, aimed at ensuring that judges can maintain and improve their technical, social and cultural skills. The State must ensure that such training programmes are so organised as to respect the conditions set out in paragraph 2.3, which relate to the role of the independent authority referred to in paragraph 1.3, in order to guarantee appropriateness in the content of training courses and in the functioning of the bodies implementing such courses, to the requirements of open-mindedness, competence and impartiality.

The definition of these guarantees set out in paragraphs 2.3 and 4.4 on training is very flexible, enabling them to be tailored to the various national training systems: training colleges administered by the Ministry of Justice, institutes operating under the higher council of judges, private law foundations, etc.

5. LIABILITY

5.1 The Charter deals here with the judge's disciplinary liability. It begins with a reference to the principle of the legality of disciplinary sanctions, stipulating that the only valid reason for imposing sanctions is the failure to perform one of the duties explicitly defined in the Judges' Statute and that the scale of applicable sanctions must be set out in the judges' statute. Moreover, the Charter lays down guarantees on disciplinary hearings: disciplinary sanctions can only be imposed on the basis of a decision taken following a proposal or recommendation or with the agreement of a tribunal or authority, at least one half of whose members must be elected judges. The judge must be given a full hearing and be entitled to representation. If the sanction is actually imposed, it must be chosen from the scale of sanctions, having due regard to the principle of proportionality. Lastly, the Charter provides for a right of appeal to a higher judicial authority against any decision to impose a sanction taken by an executive authority, tribunal or body, at least half of whose membership are elected judges.

The current wording of this provision does not require the availability of such a right of appeal against a sanction imposed by Parliament.

5.2 Here the Charter relates to judges' civil and pecuniary liability. It posits the principle that State compensation shall be paid for damage sustained as a result of a judge's wrongful conduct or unlawful exercise of his or her functions whilst acting as a judge. This means that it is the State which is in every case the guarantor of compensation to the victim for such damage.

In specifying that such a State guarantee applies to damage sustained as a result of a judge's wrongful conduct or unlawful exercise of his or her functions, the Charter does not necessarily refer to the wrongful or unlawful nature of the conduct or of the exercise of functions, but rather emphasises the damage sustained as a result of that "wrongful" or "unlawful" nature. This is fully compatible with liability based not upon misconduct by the judge, but upon the abnormal, special and serious nature of the damage resulting from his or her wrongful conduct or unlawful exercise of functions. This is important in the light of concerns that judges' judicial independence should not be affected through a civil liability system.

The Charter also provides that, when the damage which the State had to guarantee is the result of a gross and inexcusable breach of the rules governing the performance of judicial duties, the statute may confer on the State the possibility of bringing legal proceedings with a view to requiring the judge to reimburse it for the compensation paid within a limit fixed by the statute. The requirement for gross and inexcusable negligence and the legal nature of the proceedings to obtain reimbursement must constitute significant guarantees that the procedure is not abused. An additional guarantee is provided by way of the prior agreement which the authority referred to at paragraph 1.3 must give before a claim may be submitted to the competent court.

5.3 Here the Charter looks at the issue of complaints by members of the public about miscarriages of justice.

States have organised their complaints procedures to varying degrees, and it is not always very well organised.

This is why the Charter provides for the possibility to be open to an individual to make a complaint of miscarriage of justice in a given case to an independent body, without having to observe specific formalities. Were full and careful consideration by such a body to reveal a clear prima facie disciplinary breach by a judge, the body concerned would have the power to refer the matter to the disciplinary authority having jurisdiction over judges, or at least to a body competent, under the rules of the national statute, to make such referral. Neither this body nor this authority will be constrained to adopt the same opinion as the body to which the complaint was made. In the outcome there are genuine guarantees against the risks of the complaints procedure being led astray by those to be tried, desiring in reality to bring pressure to bear on the justice system.

The independent body concerned would not necessarily be designed specifically to verify whether judges have committed breaches. Judges have no monopoly on miscarriages of justice. It would therefore be conceivable for this same independent body similarly to refer matters, when it considers such referral justified, to the disciplinary authority having jurisdiction over, or to the body responsible for taking proceedings against lawyers, court officials, bailiffs, etc.

The Charter, however, relating to the judges' statute, has to cover in greater detail only the matter of referral relating to judges.

6. REMUNERATION AND SOCIAL WELFARE

The provisions under this heading relate only to professional judges.

6.1 The Charter provides that the level of the remuneration to which judges are entitled for performing their professional judicial duties must be set so as to shield them from pressures intended to influence their decisions or judicial conduct in general, impairing their independence and impartiality.

It seemed preferable to state that the level of the remuneration paid had to be such as to shield judges from pressures, rather than to provide for this level to be set by reference to the remuneration paid to holders of senior posts in the legislature or the executive, as the holders of such posts are far from being treated on a comparable basis in the different national systems.

6.2 The level of remuneration of one judge as compared to another may be subject to variations depending on length of service, the nature of the duties which they are assigned to discharge and the importance of the tasks which are imposed on them, such as weekend duties. However, such tasks justifying higher remuneration must be assessed on the basis of transparent criteria, so as to avoid differences in treatment unconnected with considerations relating to the work done or the availability required.

6.3 The Charter provides for judges to benefit from social security, ie protection against the usual social risks, namely illness, maternity, invalidity, old age and death.

6.4 It specifies in this context that judges who have reached the age of judicial retirement after the requisite time spent as judges must benefit from payment of a retirement pension, the level of which must be as close as possible to the level of their final salary as a judge.

7. TERMINATION OF OFFICE

7.1 Vigilance is necessary about the conditions in which judges' employment comes to be terminated. It is important to lay down an exhaustive list of the reasons for termination of employment. These are when a judge resigns, is medically certified as physically unfit for further judicial office, reaches the age limit, comes to the end of a fixed term of office or is dismissed in the context of disciplinary liability.

7.2 On occurrence of the events which are grounds for termination of employment other than the ones - ie the reaching of the age limit or the coming to an end of a fixed term of office - which may be ascertained without difficulty, they must be verified by the authority referred to in paragraph 1.3. This condition is easily realised when the termination of office results from a dismissal decided precisely by this authority, or on its proposal or recommendation, or with its agreement.

Article 3

The Judges shall be immune from legal proceedings. After they have ceased to hold office, they shall continue to enjoy immunity in respect of acts performed by them in their official capacity, including words spoken or written.

The Court of Justice, sitting as a full Court, may waive the immunity. If the decision concerns a member of the General Court or of a specialised court, the Court shall decide after consulting the court concerned.

The Assistant Rapporteurs shall be chosen from persons whose independence is beyond doubt and who possess the necessary legal qualifications; they shall be appointed by the Council, acting by a simple majority. TITLE III

PROCEDURE BEFORE THE COURT OF JUSTICE

Article 19

The Member States and the institutions of the Union shall be represented before the Court of Justice by an agent appointed for each case; the agent may be assisted by an adviser or by a lawyer.

The States, other than the Member States, which are parties to the Agreement on the European Economic Area and also the EFTA Surveillance Authority referred to in that Agreement shall be represented in same manner.

Other parties must be represented by a lawyer.

Only a lawyer authorised to practise before a court of a Member State or of another State which is a party to the Agreement on the European Economic Area may represent or assist a party before the Court.

Such agents, advisers and lawyers shall, when they appear before the Court, enjoy the rights and immunities necessary to the independent exercise of their duties, under conditions laid down in the Rules of Procedure.

As regards such advisers and lawyers who appear before it, the Court shall have the powers normally accorded to courts of law, under conditions laid down in the Rules of Procedure.

University teachers being nationals of a Member State whose law accords them a right of audience shall have the same rights before the Court as are accorded by this Article to lawyers.

5395

The procedure before the Court of Justice shall consist of two parts: written and oral.

The written procedure shall consist of the communication to the parties and to the institutions of the Union whose decisions are in dispute, of applications, statements of case, defences and observations, and of replies, if any, as well as of all papers and documents in support or of certified copies of them.

Communications shall be made by the Registrar in the order and within the time laid down in the Rules of Procedure.

The oral procedure shall consist of the reading of the report presented by a Judge acting as Rapporteur, the hearing by the Court of agents, advisers and lawyers and of the submissions of the Advocate-General, as well as the hearing, if any, of witnesses and experts.

Where it considers that the case raises no new point of law, the Court may decide, after hearing the Advocate-General, that the case shall be determined without a submission from the Advocate-General.

Article 21

A case shall be brought before the Court of Justice by a written application addressed to the Registrar. The application shall contain the applicant's name and permanent address and the description of the signatory, the name of the party or names of the parties against whom the application is made, the subject-matter of the dispute, the form of order sought and a brief statement of the pleas in law on which the application is based.

The application shall be accompanied, where appropriate, by the measure the annulment of which is sought or, in the circumstances referred to in Article 265 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, by documentary evidence of the date on which an institution was, in accordance with those Articles, requested to act. If the documents are not submitted with the application, the Registrar shall ask the party concerned to produce them within a reasonable period, but in that event the rights of the party shall not lapse even if such documents are produced after the time limit for bringing proceedings.

Article 22

A case governed by Article 18 of the EAEC Treaty shall be brought before the Court of Justice by an appeal addressed to the Registrar. The appeal shall contain the name and permanent address of the applicant and the description of the signatory, a reference to the decision against which the appeal is brought, the names of the respondents, the subject-matter of the dispute, the submissions and a brief statement of the grounds on which the appeal is based.

The appeal shall be accompanied by a certified copy of the decision of the Arbitration Committee which is contested.

If the Court rejects the appeal, the decision of the Arbitration Committee shall become final.

If the Court annuls the decision of the Arbitration Committee, the matter may be re-opened, where appropriate, on the initiative of one of the parties in the case, before the Arbitration Committee. The latter shall conform to any decisions on points of law given by the Court.

In the cases governed by Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the decision of the court or tribunal of a Member State which suspends its proceedings and refers a case to the Court of Justice shall be notified to the Court by the court or tribunal concerned. The decision shall then be notified by the Registrar of the Court to the parties, to the Member States and to the Commission, and to the institution, body, office or agency of the Union which adopted the act the validity or interpretation of which is in dispute.

Within two months of this notification, the parties, the Member States, the Commission and, where appropriate, the institution, body, office or agency which adopted the act the validity or interpretation of which is in dispute, shall be entitled to submit statements of case or written observations to the Court.

In the cases governed by Article 267 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, the decision of the national court or tribunal shall, moreover, be notified by the Registrar of the Court to the States, other than the Member States, which are parties to the Agreement on the European Economic Area and also to the EFTA Surveillance Authority referred to in that Agreement which may, within two months of notification, where one of the fields of application of that Agreement is concerned, submit statements of case or written observations to the Court.

Where an agreement relating to a specific subject matter, concluded by the Council and one or more non-member States, provides that those States are to be entitled to submit statements of case or written observations where a court or tribunal of a Member State refers to the Court of Justice for a preliminary ruling a question falling within the scope of the agreement, the decision of the national court or tribunal containing that question shall also be notified to the non-member States concerned. Within two months from such notification, those States may lodge at the Court statements of case or written observations.

Article 23a [1]

The Rules of Procedure may provide for an expedited or accelerated procedure and, for references for a preliminary ruling relating to the area of freedom, security and justice, an urgent procedure.

Those procedures may provide, in respect of the submission of statements of case or written observations, for a shorter period than that provided for by Article 23, and, in derogation from the fourth paragraph of Article 20, for the case to be determined without a submission from the Advocate General.

In addition, the urgent procedure may provide for restriction of the parties and other interested persons mentioned in Article 23, authorised to submit statements of case or written observations and, in cases of extreme urgency, for the written stage of the procedure to be omitted.

The Court of Justice shall adjudicate upon costs.

Article 39

The President of the Court of Justice may, by way of summary procedure, which may, in so far as necessary, differ from some of the rules contained in this Statute and which shall be laid down in the Rules of Procedure, adjudicate upon applications to suspend execution, as provided for in Article 278 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union and Article 157 of the EAEC Treaty, or to prescribe interim measures pursuant to Article 279 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, or to suspend enforcement in accordance with the fourth paragraph of Article 299 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union or the third paragraph of Article 164 of the EAEC Treaty.

Should the President be prevented from attending, his place shall be taken by another Judge under conditions laid down in the Rules of Procedure.

The ruling of the President or of the Judge replacing him shall be provisional and shall in no way prejudice the decision of the Court on the substance of the case.

Article 40

Member States and institutions of the Union may intervene in cases before the Court of Justice.

The same right shall be open to the bodies, offices and agencies of the Union and to any other person which can establish an interest in the result of a case submitted to the Court. Natural or legal persons shall not intervene in cases between Member States, between institutions of the Union or between Member States and institutions of the Union.

Without prejudice to the second paragraph, the States, other than the Member States, which are parties to the Agreement on the European Economic Area, and also the EFTA Surveillance Authority referred to in that Agreement, may intervene in cases before the Court where one of the fields of application of that Agreement is concerned.

An application to intervene shall be limited to supporting the form of order sought by one of the parties.

Article 41

Where the defending party, after having been duly summoned, fails to file written submissions in defence, judgment shall be given against that party by default. An objection may be lodged against the judgment within one month of it being notified. The objection shall not have the effect of staying enforcement of the judgment by default unless the Court of Justice decides otherwise.

Article 42

Member States, institutions, bodies, offices and agencies of the Union and any other natural or legal persons may, in cases and under conditions to be determined by the Rules of Procedure, institute third-party proceedings to contest a judgment rendered without their being heard, where the judgment is prejudicial to their rights.

Article 43

If the meaning or scope of a judgment is in doubt, the Court of Justice shall construe it on application by any party or any institution of the Union establishing an interest therein.

5400

Article 44

An application for revision of a judgment may be made to the Court of Justice only on discovery of a fact which is of such a nature as to be a decisive factor, and which, when the judgment was given, was unknown to the Court and to the party claiming the revision.

The revision shall be opened by a judgment of the Court expressly recording the existence of a new fact, recognising that it is of such a character as to lay the case open to revision and declaring the application admissible on this ground.

No application for revision may be made after the lapse of 10 years from the date of the judgment.

Article 45

Periods of grace based on considerations of distance shall be determined by the Rules of Procedure.

No right shall be prejudiced in consequence of the expiry of a time limit if the party concerned proves the existence of unforeseeable circumstances or of force majeure.

Article 46

Proceedings against the Union in matters arising from non-contractual liability shall be barred after a period of five years from the occurrence of the event giving rise thereto. The period of limitation shall be interrupted if proceedings are instituted before the Court of Justice or if prior to such proceedings an application is made by the aggrieved party to the relevant institution of the Union. In the latter event the proceedings must be instituted within the period of two months provided for in Article 263 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union; the provisions of the second paragraph of Article 265 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union shall apply where appropriate.

This Article shall also apply to proceedings against the European Central Bank regarding non-contractual liability.

TITLE IV

GENERAL COURT

Article 47

The first paragraph of Article 9, Articles 14 and 15, the first, second, fourth and fifth paragraphs of Article 17 and Article 18 shall apply to the General Court and its members.

The fourth paragraph of Article 3 and Articles 10, 11 and 14 shall apply to the Registrar of the General Court mutatis mutandis.

Article 48

The General Court shall consist of 27 Judges.

2774

Article 49

The Members of the General Court may be called upon to perform the task of an Advocate-General.

It shall be the duty of the Advocate-General, acting with complete impartiality and independence, to make, in open court, reasoned submissions on certain cases brought before the General Court in order to assist the General Court in the performance of its task.

The criteria for selecting such cases, as well as the procedures for designating the Advocates-General, shall be laid down in the Rules of Procedure of the General Court.

A Member called upon to perform the task of Advocate-General in a case may not take part in the judgment of the case.

Article 50

The General Court shall sit in chambers of three or five Judges. The Judges shall elect the Presidents of the chambers from among their number. The Presidents of the chambers of five Judges shall be elected for three years. They may be re-elected once.

The composition of the chambers and the assignment of cases to them shall be governed by the Rules of Procedure. In certain cases governed by the Rules of Procedure, the General Court may sit as a full court or be constituted by a single Judge.

The Rules of Procedure may also provide that the General Court may sit in a Grand Chamber in cases and under the conditions specified therein.

Article 51

By way of derogation from the rule laid down in Article 256(1) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, jurisdiction shall be reserved to the Court of Justice in the actions referred to in Articles 263 and 265 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union when they are brought by a Member State against:

(a) an act of or failure to act by the European Parliament or the Council, or by those institutions acting jointly, except for:

— decisions taken by the Council under the third subparagraph of Article 108(2) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union;

— acts of the Council adopted pursuant to a Council regulation concerning measures to protect trade within the meaning of Article 207 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union;

— acts of the Council by which the Council exercises implementing powers in accordance with the second paragraph of Article 291 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union;

(b) against an act of or failure to act by the Commission under the first paragraph of Article 331 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union.

Jurisdiction shall also be reserved to the Court of Justice in the actions referred to in the same Articles when they are brought by an institution of the Union against an act of or failure to act by the European Parliament, the Council, both those institutions acting jointly, or the Commission, or brought by an institution of the Union against an act of or failure to act by the European Central Bank.

Article 52

The President of the Court of Justice and the President of the General Court shall determine, by common accord, the conditions under which officials and other servants attached to the Court of Justice shall render their services to the General Court to enable it to function. Certain officials or other servants shall be responsible to the Registrar of the General Court under the authority of the President of the General Court.

Article 53

The procedure before the General Court shall be governed by Title III.

Such further and more detailed provisions as may be necessary shall be laid down in its Rules of Procedure. The Rules of Procedure may derogate from the fourth paragraph of Article 40 and from Article 41 in order to take account of the specific features of litigation in the field of intellectual property.

Notwithstanding the fourth paragraph of Article 20, the Advocate-General may make his reasoned submissions in writing.

Article 54

Where an application or other procedural document addressed to the General Court is lodged by mistake with the Registrar of the Court of Justice, it shall be transmitted immediately by that Registrar to the Registrar of the General Court; likewise, where an application or other procedural document addressed to the Court of Justice is lodged by mistake with the Registrar of the General Court, it shall be transmitted immediately by that Registrar to the Registrar of the Court of Justice.

Where the General Court finds that it does not have jurisdiction to hear and determine an action in respect of which the Court of Justice has jurisdiction, it shall refer that action to the Court of Justice; likewise, where the Court of Justice finds that an action falls within the jurisdiction of the General Court, it shall refer that action to the General Court, whereupon that Court may not decline jurisdiction.

Where the Court of Justice and the General Court are seised of cases in which the same relief is sought, the same issue of interpretation is raised or the validity of the same act is called in question, the General Court may, after hearing the parties, stay the proceedings before it until such time as the Court of Justice has delivered judgment or, where the action is one brought pursuant to Article 263 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, may decline jurisdiction so as to allow the Court of Justice to rule on such actions. In the same circumstances, the Court of Justice may also decide to stay the proceedings before it; in that event, the proceedings before the General Court shall continue.

Where a Member State and an institution of the Union are challenging the same act, the General Court shall decline jurisdiction so that the Court of Justice may rule on those applications.

Article 55

Final decisions of the General Court, decisions disposing of the substantive issues in part only or disposing of a procedural issue concerning a plea of lack of competence or inadmissibility, shall be notified by the Registrar of the General Court to all parties as well as all Member States and the institutions of the Union even if they did not intervene in the case before the General Court.

Article 56

An appeal may be brought before the Court of Justice, within two months of the notification of the decision appealed against, against final decisions of the General Court and decisions of that Court disposing of the substantive issues in part only or disposing of a procedural issue concerning a plea of lack of competence or inadmissibility.

Such an appeal may be brought by any party which has been unsuccessful, in whole or in part, in its submissions. However, interveners other than the Member States and the institutions of the Union may bring such an appeal only where the decision of the General Court directly affects them.

With the exception of cases relating to disputes between the Union and its servants, an appeal may also be brought by Member States and institutions of the Union which did not intervene in the proceedings before the General Court. Such Member States and institutions shall be in the same position as Member States or institutions which intervened at first instance.

Article 57

Any person whose application to intervene has been dismissed by the General Court may appeal to the Court of Justice within two weeks from the notification of the decision dismissing the application.

The parties to the proceedings may appeal to the Court of Justice against any decision of the General Court made pursuant to Article 278 or Article 279 or the fourth paragraph of Article 299 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union or Article 157 or the third paragraph of Article 164 of the EAEC Treaty within two months from their notification.

The appeal referred to in the first two paragraphs of this Article shall be heard and determined under the procedure referred to in Article 39.

Article 58

An appeal to the Court of Justice shall be limited to points of law. It shall lie on the grounds of lack of competence of the General Court, a breach of procedure before it which adversely affects the interests of the appellant as well as the infringement of Union law by the General Court.

No appeal shall lie regarding only the amount of the costs or the party ordered to pay them.

Article 59

Where an appeal is brought against a decision of the General Court, the procedure before the Court of Justice shall consist of a written part and an oral part. In accordance with conditions laid down in the Rules of Procedure, the Court of Justice, having heard the Advocate-General and the parties, may dispense with the oral procedure.

Article 60

Without prejudice to Articles 278 and 279 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union or Article 157 of the EAEC Treaty, an appeal shall not have suspensory effect.

By way of derogation from Article 280 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, decisions of the General Court declaring a regulation to be void shall take effect only as from the date of expiry of the period referred to in the first paragraph of Article 56 of this Statute or, if an appeal shall have been brought within that period, as from the date of dismissal of the appeal, without prejudice, however, to the right of a party to apply to the Court of Justice, pursuant to Articles 278 and 279 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union or Article 157 of the EAEC Treaty, for the suspension of the effects of the regulation which has been declared void or for the prescription of any other interim measure.

Article 61

If the appeal is well founded, the Court of Justice shall quash the decision of the General Court. It may itself give final judgment in the matter, where the state of the proceedings so permits, or refer the case back to the General Court for judgment.

Where a case is referred back to the General Court, that Court shall be bound by the decision of the Court of Justice on points of law.

When an appeal brought by a Member State or an institution of the Union, which did not intervene in the proceedings before the General Court, is well founded, the Court of Justice may, if it considers this necessary, state which of the effects of the decision of the General Court which has been quashed shall be considered as definitive in respect of the parties to the litigation.

Article 62

In the cases provided for in Article 256(2) and (3) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, where the First Advocate-General considers that there is a serious risk of the unity or consistency of Union law being affected, he may propose that the Court of Justice review the decision of the General Court.

The proposal must be made within one month of delivery of the decision by the General Court. Within one month of receiving the proposal made by the First Advocate-General, the Court of Justice shall decide whether or not the decision should be reviewed.

Article 62a

The Court of Justice shall give a ruling on the questions which are subject to review by means of an urgent procedure on the basis of the file forwarded to it by the General Court.

5405

Those referred to in Article 23 of this Statute and, in the cases provided for in Article 256(2) of the EC Treaty, the parties to the proceedings before the General Court shall be entitled to lodge statements or written observations with the Court of Justice relating to questions which are subject to review within a period prescribed for that purpose.

The Court of Justice may decide to open the oral procedure before giving a ruling.

Article 62b

In the cases provided for in Article 256(2) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, without prejudice to Articles 278 and 279 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, proposals for review and decisions to open the review procedure shall not have suspensory effect. If the Court of Justice finds that the decision of the General Court affects the unity or consistency of Union law, it shall refer the case back to the General Court which shall be bound by the points of law decided by the Court of Justice; the Court of Justice may state which of the effects of the decision of the General Court are to be considered as definitive in respect of the parties to the litigation. If, however, having regard to the result of the review, the outcome of the proceedings flows from the findings of fact on which the decision of the General Court was based, the Court of Justice shall give final judgment.

In the cases provided for in Article 256(3) of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, in the absence of proposals for review or decisions to open the review procedure, the answer(s) given by the General Court to the questions submitted to it shall take effect upon expiry of the periods prescribed for that purpose in the second paragraph of Article 62. Should a review procedure be opened, the answer(s) subject to review shall take effect following that procedure, unless the Court of Justice decides otherwise. If the Court of Justice finds that the decision of the General Court affects the unity or consistency of Union law, the answer given by the Court of Justice to the questions subject to review shall be substituted for that given by the General Court.

TITLE IVa

SPECIALISED COURTS

Article 62c

The provisions relating to the jurisdiction, composition, organisation and procedure of the specialised courts established under Article 257 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union are set out in an Annex to this Statute.

The Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice and of the General Court shall contain any provisions necessary for applying and, where required, supplementing this Statute.

This regulation shall be adopted either at the request of the Court of Justice and after consultation of the Commission and the European Parliament, or on a proposal from the Commission and after consultation of the Court of Justice and of the European Parliament.

Until those rules have been adopted, the provisions of the Rules of Procedure of the Court of Justice and of the Rules of Procedure of the General Court governing language arrangements shall continue to apply. By way of derogation from Articles 253 and 254 of the Treaty on the Functioning of the European Union, those provisions may only be amended or repealed with the unanimous consent of the Council.

1. The judges shall elect the President of the Civil Service Tribunal from among their number for a term of three years. He may be re-elected.

4. At all stages of the procedure, including the time when the application is filed, the Civil Service Tribunal may examine the possibilities of an amicable settlement of the dispute and may try to facilitate such settlement.

5. The Civil Service Tribunal shall rule on the costs of a case. Subject to the specific provisions of the Rules of Procedure, the unsuccessful party shall be ordered to pay the costs should the court so decide.

3. The President of the General Court may, by way of summary procedure, which may, in so far as necessary, differ from some of the rules contained in this Annex and which shall be laid down in the rules of procedure of the General Court, adjudicate upon appeals brought in accordance with paragraphs 1 and 2.

Article 11

1. An appeal to the General Court shall be limited to points of law. It shall lie on the grounds of lack of jurisdiction of the Civil Service Tribunal, a breach of procedure before it which adversely affects the interests of the appellant, as well as the infringement of Union law by the Tribunal.

In accordance with conditions laid down in the rules of procedure, the General Court, having heard the parties, may dispense with the oral procedure.

Article 13

1. If the appeal is well founded, the General Court shall quash the decision of the Civil Service Tribunal and itself give judgment in the matter. It shall refer the case back to the Civil Service Tribunal for judgment where the state of the proceedings does not permit a decision by the Court.

Security Council
Sixty-sixth year

Identical letters dated 20 May 2011 from the Secretary-General addressed to the President of the General Assembly and the President of the Security Council

I have the honour to transmit to you the attached letter dated 5 May 2011 that I have received from Judge Dennis Byron, President of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda (see annex).

The letter contains two requests. The first relates to filling the position of President of the Tribunal. President Byron's term of office expires at the end of this month. The Statute of the Tribunal requires that the President be elected from among the permanent judges and be a member of one of the Trial Chambers. However, two permanent judges will resign and four will be redeployed to the Appeals Chamber in The Hague upon the completion of their remaining cases this year or early next year, leaving the Tribunal without any Arusha-based permanent judges. President Byron therefore requests amendments to the Statute of the Tribunal in order to allow the President to be a member of the Appeals Chamber and to be based in The Hague.

As an alternative, if it is decided that the President should continue to be a member of one of the Trial Chambers and to be based in Arusha, President Byron proposes that the Statute be amended to allow an ad litem judge to be eligible for election as President.

The second request is that President Byron be permitted to work part-time at the Tribunal and simultaneously to engage in another occupation from 1 September 2011. This is because President Byron has been appointed as President of the Caribbean Court of Justice and will be sworn in on 1 September 2011. He intends to resign from the Tribunal upon the delivery of the judgement in the Karemera et al. case around December 2011.

As a result of President Byron's intended resignation from the Tribunal upon the completion of his remaining case, Judge Bakhtiyar Tuzmukhamedov will be redeployed to the Appeals Chamber instead of him.

It falls to the General Assembly and the Security Council to consider and decide on these requests. Accordingly, I would be grateful if you would bring the letter from President Byron to the attention of the members of the General Assembly and the members of the Security Council.

Letter dated 5 May 2011 from the President of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda addressed to the Secretary-General

I would be grateful if you could bring these three urgent matters to the attention of the Security Council.

1. The Offices of President and Vice-President of the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda

I hereby request that the Security Council remove the requirement in article 13 (2) of the Statute that the President be a trial judge and the requirement pursuant to article 12 bis (3) with reference to article 13 bis (3) of the Statute of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia with reference to article 22 (2) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice that the President be resident at the seat of the Court to enable the President to be redeployed to the Appeals Chamber and reside in The Hague, if need be, and authorize and make provision for an ad litem judge to be elected Vice-President, to act as President in the absence of the President and, if required, to become President by election or otherwise.

Background

On 1 April 2011, the Tribunal held a plenary, which all permanent appeals and trial judges, except Judge de Silva, and most ad litem judges attended, at which it was discussed how to fill the managerial posts of the Tribunal in order to accomplish the Tribunal's completion strategy. I was authorized by all judges to request the assistance of the Office of Legal Affairs to obtain the approval and the necessary action of the Secretary-General and the Security Council with respect to what needs to be done for the Tribunal to fill its managerial posts after the expiry in May 2011 of my second term as President and of Judge Khan's second term as Vice-President.

Rationale

The discussion at the plenary was caused by the fact that by March 2012, all permanent judges, after completion of their judgements, will either have resigned (Judge De Silva and I) or be redeployed to the Appeals Chamber (Judges Khan, Sekule, Ramaroson and Tuzmukhamedov). It is expected that there will be trial activities until June 2012. The enclosure to this letter shows the residual tasks of the Tribunal for which provision is being made in the budget for service until the end of 2012.

The plenary was in agreement that the Tribunal's completion strategy requires that the Tribunal, at least until the completion of all trial activities, retain a President and a Vice-President who both must be resident in Arusha as required by the Statute with respect to the President, and that all appeals judges reside in The Hague. Furthermore, there was agreement that the Rules should not be amended to allow an extension of my term as President. To this end, no intervention of the Security Council will be required, as a permanent judge should be elected as the new President. During discussions, Judge Sekule agreed to consider whether to accept election as President, but underscored that he will not forgo his redeployment to the Appeals Chamber after the delivery of the judgement in Ngirabatware, currently scheduled for March 2012. The Security Council could consider that it may facilitate the Tribunal in case the President to be elected is redeployed to the Appeals Chamber, if article 13 (2) of the Statute were amended to remove the provision that the President must be a trial judge and if article 13 bis (3) were modified to allow the President, after redeployment to the Appeals Chamber, to reside in The Hague.

With respect to the Vice-President, the majority of the permanent judges and all ad litem judges agreed that the unavailability of any permanent judges made it necessary that an experienced ad litem judge could be elected Vice-President and act as President during the absence of the President. Should the Security Council consider that it cannot provide for the President to be redeployed to the Appeals Chamber and reside in The Hague, we would request, as an alternate solution, that if for any reason the President/permanent judge ceased to be President and no other permanent judge was available to serve in Arusha, the ad litem judge/Vice-President could become President, by election or otherwise.

2. Part-time service of Judge Dennis Byron

Leave is requested for Judge Dennis Byron (myself) to demit office as a permanent judge of the Tribunal on the delivery of the judgement in the Karemera et al. case and to work on a part-time basis from 1 September 2011 until the date of that judgement while engaged in another judicial occupation.

Background

I have been at the Tribunal since June 2004, and have sat as a judge in the Simba case and as Presiding Judge in the Rwamakuba, Nchamihigo, GAA, Kalimanzira, Muvunyi (retrial) and Karemera et al. cases. In addition, I presided over the pretrial of several cases and performed many other judicial functions. Since May 2007, I have been President of the Tribunal, and I am due to conclude my tour of duty in that Office on 27 May 2011. At that time, my main remaining duty will be the delivery of the judgement in the Karemera et al. case. The case is very advanced. The evidence phase is completed; the closing arguments are scheduled for 22 August 2011 and judgement delivery for December 2011. This workplan takes into account my work on a part-time basis from September until judgement delivery.

The Caribbean Community Heads of Government appointed me to be the next President of the Caribbean Court of Justice and to succeed the current President when he retires later this year. The action plan is for me to be sworn in on 1 September 2011 and to work part-time at the Tribunal until I have completed my obligations to the Tribunal.

I would like to assure you of my commitment to the work of the Tribunal and the complete and honourable discharge of my obligations. This arrangement will not give rise to any conflict of interest and will not delay the judgement delivery in this case. I should point out, however, that we have prepared a very aggressive deliberation schedule as part of our determination to meet the completion strategy targets and reduce delay in the judicial process.

In these exceptional circumstances, and considering the importance of the timely completion of the Karemera et al. case, I request that the Security Council authorize me to work part-time from September 2011 until the delivery of the judgement in the Karemera et al. case and to engage in another judicial occupation in my home region during that period.

3. Assignment of Judge Tuzmukhamedov to the Appeals Chamber

I would like to refer to my letter of 29 May 2009, in which I discussed the expansion of the Appeals Chamber and redeployment of trial judges. I now confirm that I have decided not to join the Appeals Chamber. After consultation with the permanent judges, I have decided to assign Judge Tuzmukhamedov (Russian Federation) to the Appeals Chamber upon the completion of his current cases.

Judge Tuzmukhamedov joined the Tribunal as a permanent judge in September 2009. Since then, he has been assigned to the Bagaragaza, Ndahimana and Nzabonimana cases. Judgement delivery in the last of these cases is scheduled for December 2011.

Mt. Scopus Approved Revised International Standards of Judicial Independence

Approved March 19, 2008

Preamble

These Revised standards are approved in recognition of the need for the revision of the guidelines of general application to contribute to the independence and impartiality of the judiciary, with a view to ensuring the legitimacy and effectiveness of the judicial process;

In formulating these standards due regard has been given to the IBA Minimum Standards on Judicial independence 1982 and the UN Basic Principles of Judicial Independence 1985 and the long series of sets of other international rules and standards relating to judicial independence and the right to a fair trial; and The Burgh House Principles of Judicial Independence in International Law (for the international judiciary). Inspiration has also been drawn from the Tokyo Law Asia Principles; the Montréal Universal Declaration on the Independence of Justice; Council of Europe Staetements on judicial independence particularly Recommendation of the Committee of Ministers to Member States on the independence, efficiency and role of judges. Council of Europe 1998[1] ,The Bangalore Principles of Judicial Conduct November 2002,[2] and the American Bar Association's revision of its ethical standards for judges

The Standards were drafted bearing in mind the special challenges facing the judiciary in view of the challenges and problems in both the national and international spheres.

An updated comprehensive revision of minimum standards for judicial independence is called for in order to give appropriate response to the developments and challenges regarding the position of courts and judges in contemporary society. This revision is important to enable the judiciary to play a role in the adequate protection of human rights and in the operation of an efficient and fair market economy with a human face in the era of globalisation.

The standards give due consideration particularly to the fact that that each jurisdiction and legal tradition has own characteristics that must be recognised .It is also recognized that in the international judiciary each court or tribunal has its unique features and functions and that in certain instances judges serve on a part-time basis or as ad hoc or ad litem judges.

A. NATIONAL JUDGES

1. THE SIGNIFICANCE OF THE INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY

1.1. An independent and impartial[3] judiciary is an institution of the highest value in every society[4] and an essential pillar of liberty[5] and the rule of law.

[1] http://www.coe.int

[2] adopted by Judicial Group on Strengthening Judicial Integrity, AJA, http://www.ajs.org

[3] Stating this in the body of the standards themselves in addition to the preamble helps stress the section's importance and ensures that it is more easily referred to.

→This is preferred to the first version as it describes exactly what elements are required in the Judiciary →Tokyo Law Asia Principles. Stating this in the body of the standards themselves rather than in a preamble helps stress the section's importance and ensures that it is more easily referred to.

1.2. The objectives and functions of the judiciary shall include:

1.2.1.1. To resolve disputes and to administer the law impartially between persons and between persons and public authorities;

1.2.1.2. To promote, within the proper limits of the judicial function, the observance and the attainment of human rights; and

1.2.1.3. To ensure that all people are able to live securely under the rule of law.[6]

2. THE JUDICIARY[7] AND THE EXECUTIVE

2.1. The Judiciary as a whole shall be independent.

2.2. Each judge shall enjoy both personal independence and substantive independence:[8]

2.2.1. Personal independence means that the terms and conditions of judicial service are adequately secured by law[9] so as to ensure that individual judges are not subject to executive control; and

2.2.2. Substantive independence means that in the discharge of his judicial function, a judge is subject to nothing but the law and the commands of his conscience.

2.3. The Judiciary as a whole shall[10] enjoy collective independence and autonomy vis-à-vis the Executive.

2.4. Judicial appointments and promotions by the Executive are not inconsistent with judicial independence as long as they are in accordance with Principles 4.

2.5. No executive decree shall reverse specific court decisions, or change the composition of the court in order to affect its decision-making.[11]

2.6. The Executive may only participate in the discipline of judges by referring complaints against judges, or by the initiation of disciplinary proceedings, but not by the adjudication of such matters.

[6] Montréal Declaration.

→Recall competing values of judicial independence and judicial accountability: "As phrased by a Canadian judge, Mr. Justice Riddell, commenting on an arrangement of divisions of labour among the judges, 'Judges are the servants, not the masters of the people.' Servants are accountable, so are judges." From Shetreet, Judicial Independence: The Contemporary Debate, at 593, referring to Davis Acetylene Gas Co. v. Morrison, (1915) 34 O.L.R. 155, 23 D.L.R. 871 (C.A.).

[7] The focus is really on the relationship with the judiciary as a whole, rather than with individual judges.

[8] Although substantive independence warrants wide protection, it is not without boundaries. Judges must exercise their powers subject to the general limit of mutual respect between the various branches of the government and accepted lines of demarcation of their respective responsibilities. The mutual respect is expressed in judge-made rules, including the rule that courts will not engage in the adjudication of unjusticiable issues, such as political questions: Shetreet, Judicial Independence :New Conceptual Dimensions and Contemporary Challenges , in Shetreet and Descenes Judicial Independence: The Contemporary Debate at 635.(1985)

[9] To clarify that these important conditions must be legally entrenched.

[10] Adds mandatory language.

[11] Montréal Declaration section 2.08.

2.7. The power to discipline or remove a judge must be vested in an institution which is independent of the Executive.

2.8. The power of removal of a judge shall preferably be vested in a judicial tribunal.

2.9. The Executive shall not have control over judicial functions.

2.10. Rules of procedure and practice shall be made by legislation or by the Judiciary in cooperation with the legal profession, subject to parliamentary approval.

2.11. The state shall have a duty to provide for the execution of judgments of the Court. The Judiciary shall exercise supervision over the execution process.

2.12. Judicial matters are exclusively within the responsibility of the Judiciary, both in central judicial administration and in court level judicial administration.

2.13. The central responsibility for judicial administration shall preferably be vested in the Judiciary or jointly in the Judiciary and the Executive.

2.14. The principle of democratic accountability should be respected and therefore it is legitimate for the legislature to play a role in judicial appointments and central administration of justice provided that due consideration is given to the principle of judicial independence.

2.15. The process and standards of judicial selection shall give due consideration to the principle of fair reflection by the judiciary of the society in all its aspects.[12]

2.15.1. Taking into consideration the principle of fair reflection by the judiciary of the society in all its aspects, in the selection of judges, there shall be no discrimination on the grounds of race, colour, gender, language, religion, national or social origin, property, birth or status, subject however to citizenship requirements.[13].

2.16. Candidates for judicial office shall be individuals of integrity[14] and ability, well- trained in the law. They shall have equality of access to judicial office.[15]

2.17. It is the duty of the state to provide adequate financial resources to allow for the due administration of justice.

2.18. Division of work among judges should ordinarily be done under a predetermined plan, which can be changed in certain clearly defined circumstances.

2.18.1. In countries where the power of division of judicial work is vested in the chief justice, it is not considered inconsistent with judicial independence to accord to →"Political opinion" is also taken from PH Lane, Fragile Bastion: Constitutional Aspects of Judicial Independence (judicial independence is composed of at least five aspects: (1) non-political appointments to a court; (2) guaranteed tenure and salary; (3) executive and legislative interference with court proceedings or office holders; (4) budgetary autonomy; (5) administrative autonomy.

the chief justice the power to change the predetermined plan for sound reasons, preferably in consultation with the senior judges when practicable.

2.18.2. Subject to 2.18.1, the exclusive responsibility for case assignment should be vested in a responsible judge, preferably the President of the Court.

2.19. The power to transfer a judge from one court to another shall be vested in a judicial authority according to grounds provided by law and preferably shall be subject to the judge's consent, such consent not to be unreasonably withheld.

2.20. Judicial salaries and pensions shall be adequate at all times, fixed by law, and should be periodically reviewed independently of Executive control

2.21. The position of the judges, their independence, their security of tenure, and their adequate remuneration shall be entrenched constitutionally[16] or secured by law.

2.22. Judicial salaries, pensions, and benefits[17] cannot be decreased during judges' service except as a coherent part of an overall public economic measure.

2.23. The Ministers of the government shall not exercise any form of pressure on judges, whether overt or covert, and shall not make statements which adversely affect the independence of individual judges, or of the Judiciary as a whole.

2.24. The power of pardon shall be exercised cautiously so as to avoid its use as an interference with judicial decision.

2.25. The Executive shall refrain from any act or omission which pre-empts the judicial resolution of a dispute, or frustrates the proper execution of a court judgment.

2.26. The Executive shall not have the power to close down, or suspend, or delay, the operation of the court system at any level.

3. THE JUDICIARY[18] AND THE LEGISLATURE

3.1. The Legislature shall not pass legislation which reverses specific court decisions.

3.2. Legislation introducing changes in the terms and conditions of judicial service shall not be applied to judges holding office at the time of passing the legislation unless the changes improve the terms of service and are generally applied.[19]

[16] UN Basic Principles.
→Change suggested in order to provide additional flexibility, and also to stress how this is an important enough issue to be constitutionally entrenched.

[17] In the interests of completeness

[18] The focus is really on the relationship with the judiciary as a whole, rather than with individual judges.

[19] In order to prevent "rewarding" specific judges.
→The US Constitution's Compensation Clause guarantees federal judges a "Compensation, which shall not be diminished during their Continuance in Office." U.S. Const., Art. III, §1.
→See US v. Hatter (99-1978) 532 U.S. 557 (2001) 203 F.3d 795: Congress is prohibited from singling out judges for specially unfavourable taxation treatment, although it is permitted to impose a "non-discriminatory tax laid generally" upon judges and other citizens.

3.3. In case of legislation reorganising or abolishing courts, judges serving in these courts shall not be affected, except for their transfer to another court of the same or materially comparable[20] status.

3.4. Everyone shall have the right to be tried expeditiously by the established ordinary courts or judicial tribunals under law, subject to review by the courts.[21]

3.5. Part-time judges should be appointed only with proper safeguards secured by law.

3.6. The Legislature may be vested with the powers of removal of judges, upon a recommendation of a judicial commission or pursuant to constitutional provisions or validly enacted legislation.[22]

4. TERMS AND NATURE OF JUDICIAL APPOINTMENTS

4.1. The method of judicial selection shall safeguard against judicial appointments for improper motives[23] and shall not threaten judicial independence.

4.2. a) The principle of democratic accountability should be respected and therefore it is legitimate for the Executive and the Legislature to play a role in judicial appointments provided that due consideration is given to the principle of Judicial Independence.

b) The recent trend of establishing judicial selection boards or commissions in which members or representatives of the Legislature ,the Executive ,the Judiciary and the legal profession take part ,should be viewed favourably, provided that a proper balance is maintained in the composition of such boards or commissions of each of the branches of government

4.3. Judicial appointments should generally be for life, subject to removal for cause and compulsory retirement at an age fixed by law at the date of appointment.

4.3.1. Retirement age shall not be reduced for existing judges.[24]

→See United States v. Will, 449 U.S. 200, 220-21 (1980): though Congress may not rescind a salary increase for judges once it has gone into effect - that would be a diminishment of compensation - Congress is under no constitutional obligation to grant salary increases.

→See Evans v. Gore, 253 U.S. 245, 253 (1920): The imposition of a new federal tax that has the effect of reducing the judicial compensation of judges already in office is unconstitutional.

→But see O'Malley v. Woodrough, 307 U.S. 277 (1939): an income tax levied against the judicial salary of judges who took office after the levy is in effect is constitutional, when the taxing measure is of general, non-discriminatory application to all earners of income.

This resulted in

4.4. Promotion of judges shall[25] be based on objective factors, in particular merit,[26] integrity and experience.[27]

4.5. Judicial appointments and promotions shall be based on transparency of the procedures and standards and shall be based on professional qualifications, integrity, ability and efficiency.

4.6. Judges should not be appointed for probationary periods except in legal systems in which appointments of judges do not depend on having practical experience in the profession as a condition of appointment, and provided that permanent appointment will be granted on merit.[28]

4.7. The institution of temporary judges should be avoided as far as possible except where there exists a long historic democratic tradition.

4.8. Part-time judges should be appointed only with proper safeguards secured by law.

4.9. The number of the members of the highest court should be fixed, with the exception of courts modeled after the courts of cassion, and in the case of all courts, should not be altered for improper motives.

5. JUDICIAL REMOVAL AND DISCIPLINE

5.1. The proceedings for discipline and removal of judges[29] shall be processed expeditiously and fairly[30] and shall ensure fairness to the judge including adequate opportunity for hearing.

5.2. With the exception of proceedings before the Legislature[31], the procedure for discipline should be held in camera. The judge may however request that the hearing be held in public[32] and such request should be respected, subject to expeditious, final and reasoned disposition of this request by the disciplinary tribunal. Judgments in disciplinary proceedings, whether held in camera or in public, may be published.[33]

5.3. All of the grounds for the discipline, suspension and removal of judges shall be entrenched constitutionally or fixed by law and shall be clearly defined.

5.4. All disciplinary, suspension and removal[34] actions shall be based upon established standards of judicial conduct.[35]

5.5. A judge shall not be subject to removal, unless by reason of a criminal act or through gross or repeated neglect or serious infringements of disciplinary rules or physical or mental incapacity he has shown himself manifestly unfit to hold the position of judge. The grounds for removal shall be limited to reasons of medical incapacity or behaviour that renders the judge unfit to discharge their duties.[36]

5.6. In systems where the power to discipline and remove judges is vested in an institution other than the Legislature, the tribunal for discipline and removal of judges shall be permanent, and be composed predominantly of members of the Judiciary.

5.7. The head of the court may legitimately have supervisory powers to control judges on administrative matters.

6. THE MEDIA AND THE JUDICIARY

6.1. It should be recognized that judicial independence does not render judges free from public accountability, however, the media and other institutions should show respect for judicial independence and exercise restrain in criticism of judicial decisions.[37]

6.2. While recognising the general right of freedom of expression of all citizens, a judge should not interview directly with the general media. If a judge needs to respond to the media in regard to a media report or inquiry, it shall be done via a spokesperson assigned by the court or a judge specifically assigned by the court for this purpose. In exceptional circumstances a judge may respond directly to the media if that judge's direct response will prevent an irreparable damage.

6.3. The media should show responsibility and restraint in publications on pending cases where such publication may influence the outcome of the case.

6.4. A judge shall not knowingly, while a proceeding is, or could come before the judge, make any comment that might reasonably be expected to affect the outcome of such proceeding or impair the manifest fairness of the process. Nor shall the judge make any comment in public or otherwise that might affect the fair trial of any person or issue. [38]

A judge should refrain from business activities and should avoid from engaging in other remunerative activity,[40] that can affect the exercise of judicial functions or the image of the judge, except in respect of that judge's personal investments, ownership of property, the business activities or ownership of property of family members[41], or that judge's teaching at a university or a college.

7.5. A judge should always behave in such a manner as to preserve the dignity of the office and the impartiality, integrity and independence of the Judiciary.

7.6. Judges may be organized in associations designed for judges, for furthering their rights and interests as judges.

7.7. Judges may take appropriate action to protect their judicial independence.[42]

7.8. A judge shall disqualify himself or herself from participating in any proceedings in which the judge is unable to decide the matter impartially or in which it may appear to a reasonable observer that the judge is unable to decide the matter impartially.

7.9. Such proceedings include, but are not limited to, instances where

a) the judge has actual bias or prejudice concerning a party or personal knowledge of disputed evidentiary facts concerning the proceedings;

b) the judge previously served as a lawyer or was a material witness in the matter in controversy; or

c) the judge, or a member of the judge's family, has an economic interest in the outcome of the matter in controversy:

8. SECURING IMPARTIALITY AND INDEPENDENCE[45]

8.2. A judge shall not sit in a case where there is a reasonable suspicion of bias or potential bias.[48]

8.3. A judge shall avoid any course of conduct which might give rise to an appearance of partiality.

8.4. The state shall ensure that in the decision-making process, judges should be independent and be able to act without any restriction, improper influence, inducements, pressures, threats[49] or interferences, direct or indirect, from any quarter or for any reason. The law should provide for sanctions against persons seeking to influence judges in any such manner. Judges should have unfettered freedom to decide cases impartially, in accordance with their conscience and their interpretation of the facts, and in pursuance of the prevailing rules of the law. Judges should not be obliged to report on the merits of their cases to anyone outside the judiciary [50]

9. THE INTERNAL INDEPENDENCE OF THE JUDICIARY

9.1 In the decision-making process, a judge must be independent vis-à-vis his judicial colleagues and superiors.

9.2 Any hierarchical organization of the judiciary and any difference in grade or rank shall in no way interfere with the right of judges to pronounce their judgments freely.[51]

B. INTERNATIONAL JUDGES

The following text on minimum standards for the independence of the international judiciary is based, with minor amendments, on the Burgh House Principles on the Independence of the International Judiciary which were formulated by the Study Group of the International Law Association on the Practice and Procedure of International Courts and Tribunals

10. INDEPENDENCE

10.1 The international courts and the judges shall exercise their functions free from direct or indirect interference or influence by any person or entity.

10.2 This freedom of the judges and courts shall apply both to the judicial process in pending cases, including the assignment of cases to particular judges, and to the operation of the court and its registry.

10.3 The court shall be free to determine the conditions for its international administration, including staff recruitment policy, information systems and allocation of budgetary expenditure.

10.4 Deliberations of the court shall remain confidential.

10.5 All Judges of international courts and tribunals shall adhere to the principle that a judges who are nationals of a member state of the organisation establishing the court or tribunal when exercising judicial discretion and function shall engage in fair and independent adjudication of the case and by no means in representation of the member state.

11 NOMINATION, ELECTION AND APPOINTMENT

11.1 In accordance with the governing instruments, judges shall be chosen from among persons of high moral character, integrity and conscientiousness who possess the appropriate professional qualifications, competence and experience required for the court concerned.

11.2 While procedures for nomination, election and appointment should consider fair representation of different geographic regions and the principal legal systems, as appropriate, as well as of female and male judges, appropriate personal and professional qualifications must be the overriding consideration in the nomination, election and appointment of judges.

11.3 Procedures for the nomination, election, and appointment of judges should be transparent and provide appropriate safeguards against nominations, elections and appointments motivated by improper considerations.

11.4 Information regarding the nomination, election and appointment process and information about candidates for judicial office should be made public, in due time and in an effective manner, by the international organisation or other body responsible for the nomination, election and appointment process.

11.5 For the promotion of the independence of judges it is preferable that appointment of judges to the international courts and tribunals shall be for one long term and shall not be open for re-election.

12 SECURITY OF TENURE

12.1 Judges shall have security of tenure in relations to their term of office. They may only be removed from office upon specified grounds and in accordance with appropriate procedures specified in advance.

12.2 The governing instruments of each court should provide for judges to be appointed for a minimum term to enable them to exercise their judicial functions in an independent manner.

13 SERVICE AND REMUNERATION

13.1 Judges' essential conditions of service shall be enumerated in legally binding instruments.

13.2 No adverse changes shall be introduced with regard to judges' remuneration and other essential conditions of service during their terms of office.

13.3 Judges should receive adequate remuneration which should be periodically adjusted in line with any increases in the cost of living at the seat of the court.

13.4 Conditions of service should include adequate pension arrangements.

14 PRIVILEGES AND IMMUNITIES

14.1 Judges shall enjoy immunities equivalent to full diplomatic immunities, and in particular shall enjoy immunities from all claims arising from the exercise of their judicial functions.

14.2 The court alone shall be competent to waive the immunity of judges; it should waive immunity in any case where, in its opinion, the immunity would impede the course of justice and can be waived without prejudice to the exercise of the judicial function.

14.3 Documents and papers of the courts, judges and registry, in so far as they relate to the business of the court, shall be inviolable.

14.4 The state in which an international court has its seat shall take the necessary measures to protect the security of the judges and their families, and to protect them from adverse measures related to the exercise of their judicial function.

15 BUDGET

15.1 States, parties and international organisations shall provide adequate resources, including facilities and levels of staffing, to enable courts and the judges to perform their functions effectively.

16 FREEDOM OF EXPRESSION AND ASSOCIATION

16.1 Judges shall enjoy freedom of expression and association. These freedoms must be exercised in a manner that is compatible with the judicial function and that may not affect or reasonably appear to affect judicial independence or impartiality.

16.2 Judges shall maintain the confidentiality of deliberations, and shall not comment extra-judicially upon pending cases.

16.3 Judges shall exercise appropriate restrain in commenting extra-judicially upon judgements and procedures of their own and other courts and may upon any legislation, drafts, proposals or subject-matter likely to come before their court.

17.2 Judges shall not exercise any political function.

17.3 Each court should establish an appropriate mechanism to give guidance to judges in relation to extra-judicial activities, and to ensure that appropriate means exist for parties to proceedings to raise any concerns.

18 PAST LINKS TO A CASE

18.1 Judges shall not serve in a case in which they have previously served as agent, counsel, advisor, advocate, expert or in any other capacity for one of the parties, or as a member of a national or international court or other dispute settlement body which has considered the subject matter of the dispute or in a case where they had previously commented or expressed an opinion concerning the subject matter in a manner that is likely to affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality.

18.2 Judges shall not serve in a case with the subject matter of which they had other forms of association that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality.

19 PAST LINKS TO A PARTY

19.1 Judges shall not sit in any case involving a party for whom they have served as agent, counsel, advisor, advocate or expert within the previous three years or such other period as the court may establish within its rules; or with whom they have had any other significant professional or personal link within the previous three years or such other period as the court may establish within its rules.

21.1 Judges shall exercise appropriate caution in their personal contacts with parties, agents, counsel, advocates, advisors, and other persons and entities associated with a pending case. Any such contacts should be conducted in a manner that is compatible with the judicial function and that may not affect or reasonably appear to affect the judge's independence and impartiality.

22 POST-SERVICE LIMITATIONS

22.1 Judges shall not serve in a case with the subject-matter of which they have had any other form of association that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality.

22.2 Judges shall not seek or accept, while they are in office, any future employment, appointment or benefit, from a party to a case on which they sat or from any entity related to such a party that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality.

22.3 Former judges shall not, except as permitted by rules of the court, act in any capacity in relations to any case on which they sat during their judicial term of office.

22.4 Former judges shall not act as agent, counsel, advisor or advocate in any proceedings before the court on which they previously served for a period of three years after they have left office or such other period as the court may establish and publish.

22.5 Former judges should exercise appropriate caution as regards the acceptance of any employment, appointment or benefit, in particular from a party to a case on which they sat or from any entity related to such a party.

23.1 Judges shall disclose to the court and, as appropriate, to the parties of the proceedings any circumstances which come to their notice at any time by virtue of which any of Principles 16 to 22 apply.

23.2 Each court shall establish appropriate procedures to enable judges to disclose to the court and, as appropriate, to the parties to the proceedings matters that may affect or may reasonably appear to affect their independence or impartiality in relations to any particular case.

24 WAIVER

24.1 Notwithstanding Principles 16 to 22, judges shall not be prevented from sitting in a case where they have made appropriate disclosure of any facts bringing any of those Principles into operation, where the court expresses no objections and the parties give their express and informed consent to the judge acting.

25 WITHDRAWAL OR DISQUALIFICATION

25.1 Each court shall establish rules of procedure to enable the determination whether judges are prevented from sitting in a particular case as a result of the application of these Principles or for reasons of incapacity. Such procedures shall be available to a judge, the court, or any party to the proceedings.

26 MISCONDUCT

26.1 Each court shall establish rules of procedure to address a specific complaint of misconduct or breach of duty on the party of a judge that may affect independence or impartiality.

26.2 Such a complaint may, if clearly unfounded, be resolved on a summary basis. IN any case where the court determines that more detailed investigation is required, the rules shall establish adequate safeguards to protect the judges' rights and interests and to ensure appropriate confidentiality of the proceedings.

26.3 The governing instruments of the court shall provide for appropriate measures, including the removal from office of a judge.

26.4 The outcome of any complaint shall be communicated to the complainant.

Second Annual Report of the President of the

SPECIAL COURT FOR SIERRA LEONE

FOR THE PERIOD 1 JANUARY 2004 - 17 JANUARY 2005

INTRODUCTION

This is the second Annual Report of the Special Court for Sierra Leone, prepared pursuant to Article 25 of the Statute of the Special Court, which states "The President of the Special Court shall submit an annual report on the operation and activities of the Court to the Secretary-General and to the Government of Sierra Leone".

This report covers the period from 2 December 2003 and the ensuing 12 months. However, following the approach adopted in the previous Annual Report, where it is sensible to include events that occurred up until the time of writing, such as the swearing in of the Special Court's Trial Chamber II on 17 January 2005, then such events will be included.

The report covers the activities of all Sections of the Court: Chambers, Registry (including the Office of the Principal Defender) and the Office of the Prosecutor. Drawing upon the first Annual Report, it will also reflect the significant steps forward taken by the Court during the period in respect of creating, defining and implementing policies to ensure a sustainable legacy. The Report will explain the Court's funding situation and illustrate the work undertaken by the Management Committee during the period in relation to its funding and administration duties.

The Special Court for Sierra Leone was set up jointly by the Government of Sierra Leone and the United Nations. It is mandated to prosecute those who bear the greatest responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in the territory of Sierra Leone since 30 November 1996.

Currently, eleven persons alleged to be associated with all three of the country's former warring factions stand indicted by the Special Court. In accordance with the Special Court Statute, they are charged with war crimes, crimes against humanity, and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. Some of the charges include murder, rape, extermination, acts of terror, enslavement, looting and burning, sexual slavery, conscription of children into an armed force and attacks on UN peacekeepers and humanitarian workers. At the time of writing, there are nine individuals in custody in Freetown.

SUMMARY OF ACTIVITIES

The Special Court was created pursuant to Security Council Resolution No. 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000 by an agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone dated 16 January 2002, to which is annexed the Statute of the Special Court for Sierra Leone ("Statute") thereby forming an integral part of the Agreement.

The period of this report saw significant growth on the foundations laid in the previous year, including the construction of the courthouse in Freetown.

The new courthouse was opened and dedicated on 10 March 2004. The ceremony was attended by members of the Cabinet of the Government of Sierra Leone, senior representatives of interested and donor states, as well as members of the international diplomatic community. The courthouse was officially inaugurated by His Excellency President Alhaji Dr. Ahmad Tejan Kabbah and Mr Hans Corell, the then Under Secretary-General for Legal Affairs for the United Nations, on behalf of H.E. Kofi Annan, Secretary-General.

"I would like to extend to the President of the Court, the judges and the Court's other members my best wishes for success in the difficult work ahead. Your efforts matter greatly not only to Sierra Leone, but to the international community as a whole. In your rulings and convictions for the capacity to advance the cause of international criminal justice. To uphold the principles of responsibility and accountability, and to build up a deterrent that could keep other military and political leaders from directing and committing atrocities in the future." A message by [illegible] delivered by the Hon'ble Corell, Legal Counsel of the UN on 10 March 2004.

The opening of the courthouse coincided with the fifth Plenary of the Judges of the Special Court and the swearing in of the fifth Appeals Chamber Judge, Justice Raja Fernando of Sri Lanka, who replaced Justice Hassan Jallow. During the Plenary, several amendments to the Rules of Procedure and Evidence were adopted, including Rule 18, which by a unanimous vote limited the mandate of the Presiding Judge of the Appeals Chamber (who is also the President of the Court) to a non-renewable term of one year. As a result, Justice Geoffrey Robertson completed his term as the first President and Vice President Justice Renate Winter became acting President.

In May, the fifth Plenary reconvened and the Appeals Chamber Judges also met. Justice Emmanuel Ayoola from Nigeria was elected as President. The Appeals Chamber issued five decisions which greatly contributed to the development of international jurisprudence. The decisions on head of state immunity and the recruitment of child soldiers are considered landmark decisions for international jurisprudence.

On 3 June, the first trial before the Special Court for Sierra Leone opened before Trial Chamber I. Prosecutor David Crane, assisted by Trial Attorney Joseph Kamara, delivered the opening statements in the trial of three alleged leaders of the CDF before Trial Chamber I, composed of Justice Benjamin Itoe (Cameroon, Presiding), Justice Pierre Boutet (Canada) and Justice Bankole Thompson (Sierra Leone). The second trial, of three alleged members of the Revolutionary United Front (RUF), began on 5 July before the same Chamber.

On 4 December, the first foreign head of state visited the Court. German President Horst Kohler was welcomed by the President of the Special Court, Justice Emmanuel Ayoola.

On 17 January 2005, Trial Chamber II was sworn in, Presiding Justice Teresa Doherty (Northern Ireland), Justice Richard Lussick (Samoa) and Justice Julia Sebutinde (Uganda) began hearing evidence in the third trial, that of three alleged former members of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC), shortly thereafter.

The year under review saw significant cooperation between the Court and the international community in a number of respects. In Freetown, both international and Sierra Leonean staff worked together to implement the many and varied functions of a hybrid court.

Interaction between the Special Court and governments and international organizations resulted in agreements on a number of issues, including detention of indictees and the relocation of witnesses. The Court also reached agreements with health care institutions within Sierra Leone.

Addendum to the interim report of the Group of Experts on the Democratic Republic of the Congo (S/2012/348) concerning violations of the arms embargo and sanctions regime by the Government of Rwanda

I. Introduction

1. Pursuant to its oral briefing to the Sanctions Committee on 13 June 2012 and in fulfilment of its commitment to provide timely information on arms embargo and sanctions violations to the Committee, the Group of Experts on the Democratic Republic of the Congo submits the present addendum to its interim report (S/2012/348).[1]

2. Since the outset of its current mandate, the Group has gathered evidence of arms embargo and sanctions regime violations committed by the Rwandan Government. These violations consist of the provision of material and financial support to armed groups operating in the eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo, including the recently established M23, in contravention of paragraph 1 of Security Council resolution 1807 (2008).[2] The arms embargo and sanctions regimes violations include the following:

- Direct assistance in the creation of M23 through the transport of weapons and soldiers through Rwandan territory
- Recruitment of Rwandan youth and demobilized ex-combatants as well as Congolese refugees for M23
- Provision of weapons and ammunition to M23
- Mobilization and lobbying of Congolese political and financial leaders for the benefit of M23
- Direct Rwandan Defence Forces (RDF) interventions into Congolese territory to reinforce M23
- Support to several other armed groups as well as Forces armées de la République démocratique du Congo (FARDC) mutinies in the eastern Congo
- Violation of the assets freeze and travel ban through supporting sanctioned individuals.[3]

[1] The Group submitted its interim report to the Sanctions Committee on 18 May 2012, which in turn transmitted it to the Security Council on 21 June 2012.

[2] In paragraph 1 of its resolution 1807 (2008) the Security Council decided that "all States shall take the necessary measures to prevent the direct or indirect supply, sale or transfer, from their territories or by their nationals, or using their flag vessels or aircraft, of arms and any related materiel, and the provision of any assistance, advice or training related to military activities, including financing and financial assistance, to all non-governmental entities and individuals operating in the territory of the Democratic Republic of the Congo;".

[3] See official list of designated individuals and entities for Sanctions Committee 1533 (2004) available from www.un.org/sc/committees/1533/pdf/1533_list.pdf.

3. Over the course of its investigation since late 2011, the Group has found substantial evidence attesting to support from Rwandan officials to armed groups operating in the eastern Democratic Republic of the Congo. Initially the RDF appeared to establish these alliances to facilitate a wave of targeted assassinations against key officers of the Forces démocratique pour la libération du Rwanda (FDLR) thus significantly weakening the rebel movement (see S/2012/348, paras. 37 and 38). However, these activities quickly extended to support for a series of post-electoral mutinies within the FARDC and eventually included the direct facilitation, through the use of Rwandan territory, of the creation of the M23 rebellion. The latter is comprised of ex-CNDP officers integrated into the Congolese army (FARDC) in January 2009. Since M23 established itself in strategic positions along the Rwandan border in May 2012, the Group has gathered overwhelming evidence demonstrating that senior RDF officers, in their official capacities, have been backstopping the rebels through providing weapons, military supplies, and new recruits.

4. In turn, M23 continues to solidify alliances with many other armed groups and mutineer movements, including those previously benefiting from RDF support. This has created enormous security challenges, extending from Ituri district in the north to Fizi territory in the south, for the already overstretched Congolese army (FARDC). Through such arms embargo violations, Rwandan officials have also been in contravention of the sanctions regime's travel ban and assets freeze measures, by including three designated individuals among their direct allies.

5. In an attempt to solve the crisis which this Rwandan support to armed groups had exacerbated, the Governments of the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda have held a series of high-level bilateral meetings since early in April 2012. During these discussions, Rwandan officials have insisted on impunity for their armed group and mutineer allies, including ex-CNDP General Bosco Ntaganda, and the deployment of additional RDF units to the Kivus to conduct large-scale joint operations against the FDLR. The latter request has been repeatedly made despite the fact that: (a) the RDF halted its unilateral initiatives to weaken the FDLR in late-February;[4] (b) RDF Special Forces have already been deployed officially in Rutshuru territory for over a year; (c) RDF operational units are periodically reinforcing the M23 on the battlefield against the Congolese army; (d) M23 is directly and indirectly allied with several FDLR splinter groups; and (e) the RDF is remobilizing previously repatriated FDLR to boost the ranks of M23.

Elevated standards of evidence

6. In the light of the serious nature of these findings, the Group has adopted elevated methodological standards. Since early in April 2012, the Group has interviewed over 80 deserters of FARDC mutinies and Congolese armed groups, including from M23. Among the latter, the Group has interviewed 31 Rwandan nationals. Furthermore, the Group has also photographed weapons and military equipment found in arms caches and on the battlefield, and has obtained official documents and intercepts of radio communications. The Group has also consulted dozens of senior Congolese military commanders and intelligence officials as well as political and community leaders with intricate knowledge of developments between the Democratic Republic of the Congo and Rwanda. Moreover, the Group has communicated regularly with several active participants of the ex-CNDP mutiny, the M23 rebellion, and other armed groups. Finally, while the Group's standard methodology requires a minimum of three sources, assessed to be credible and independent of one another, it has raised this to five sources when naming specific individuals involved in these cases of arms embargo and sanctions regime violations.

II. Rwandan support to M23

7. Since the earliest stages of its inception, the Group documented a systematic pattern of military and political support provided to the M23 rebellion by Rwandan authorities. Upon taking control over the strategic position of Runyoni, along the Rwandan border with the Democratic Republic of the Congo, M23 officers opened two supply routes going from Runyoni to Kinigi or Njerima in Rwanda, which RDF officers used to deliver such support as troops, recruits and weapons. The Group also found evidence that Rwandan officials mobilized ex-CNDP cadres and officers, North Kivu politicians, business leaders and youth in support of M23.

A. Direct assistance in the creation of M23 through Rwandan territory

8. Colonel Sultani Makenga deserted the FARDC in order to create the M23 rebellion using Rwandan territory and benefiting directly from RDF facilitation (see S/2012/348, para. 104). On 4 May, Makenga crossed the border from Goma into Gisenyi, Rwanda, and waited for his soldiers to join him from Goma and Bukavu. Intelligence sources, M23 collaborators and local politicians confirmed for the Group that RDF Western Division commander, General Emmanuel Ruvusha, welcomed Makenga upon his arrival to Gisenyi. The same sources indicated that Ruvusha subsequently held a series of coordination meetings with other RDF officers in Gisenyi and Ruhengeri over the following days with Makenga.

9. According to ex-CNDP and FARDC officers, also on 4 May, Col. Kazarama, Col. Munyakazi and Col. Masozera, and an estimated 30 of Makenga's loyal troops departed from Goma crossing into Rwanda through fields close to the Kanyamuyagha border. Several FARDC officers, civilian border officials, and intelligence officers stationed at Kanyamuyagha confirmed that they saw clear boot tracks of Makenga's troops crossing the border into Rwanda only a few metres away from an RDF position on the Rwandan side. These same sources also recovered several FARDC uniforms discarded by the deserters at that location the same night.

10. A second group of Makenga's loyal troops deserted the FARDC ranks in Bukavu, also via Rwanda. Three former M23 combatants who took part in the operation told the Group that ahead of his desertion, Makenga had gathered about 60 troops under the command of Maj. Imani Nzenze, his secretary, as well as Col. Seraphin Mirindi and Col. Jimmy Nzamuyein at his residence by Lake Kivu in the Nguba neighbourhood of Bukavu (see image 1). At 2030 hours on 4 May, the two large motorized boats transported the 60 troops and several tons of ammunitions and weapons 200 metres across the lake to the Rwandan town of Cyangugu (see S/2012/348, para. 118). The same sources indicated that upon arrival to Rwanda, the boats were sent back once again to Makenga's residence to recover the remainder of the weapons and ammunition (see image 2). According to one of the M23 combatants who later deserted the movement, and Congolese intelligence services, the evacuated weapons included such heavy weapons as Katyusha rocket launchers, RPG 7, and 14.5 mm machine guns, some of which were brought from Makenga's weapons caches at Nyamunyoni (see S/2012/348, para. 118).

11. The three former M23 combatants who participated in the operation also told the Group that upon arrival in Cyangugu, RDF and Rwandan police brought them to a military camp. The RDF subsequently provided them with full Rwandan army uniforms to be worn while travelling within Rwanda. The troops and the military equipment were afterwards loaded onto three RDF trucks, and transported via the towns of Kamembe, Gikongoro, Butare, Ngororero, Nkamira and brought to the RDF position at Kabuhanga. This military position is situated on the Democratic Republic of the Congo-Rwanda border, near the village of Gasizi in Rwanda (roughly 27 km north of Goma). This ex-combatant testimony was corroborated by several sources interviewed by the Group, who all attested to the movement of troops from Rwanda into the DRC:

(a) Four local leaders interviewed separately in Kibumba personally witnessed Rwandan soldiers offloading equipment and soldiers from RDF trucks and jeeps at Gasizi on those same dates;

(b) Two Congolese border agents observed the RDF trucks which brought the troops and military equipment to Gasizi;

(c) A civilian intelligence officer reported that the troops had been brought to Gasizi in trucks;

(d) An FARDC internal intelligence report states that the troops were brought to join Makenga at Gasizi (see annex 1).

12. Several former M23 combatants also told the Group that General Ruvusha accompanied Makenga to meet with his troops in the RDF base at Kabuhanga (see image 3). RDF commanders ordered the Congolese soldiers to once again put on their FARDC uniforms and provided them with plastic sheets, food, soap and kitchen utensils. RDF officers also instructed the soldiers to remove any signs identifying Rwanda, such as labels on uniforms and water bottles.

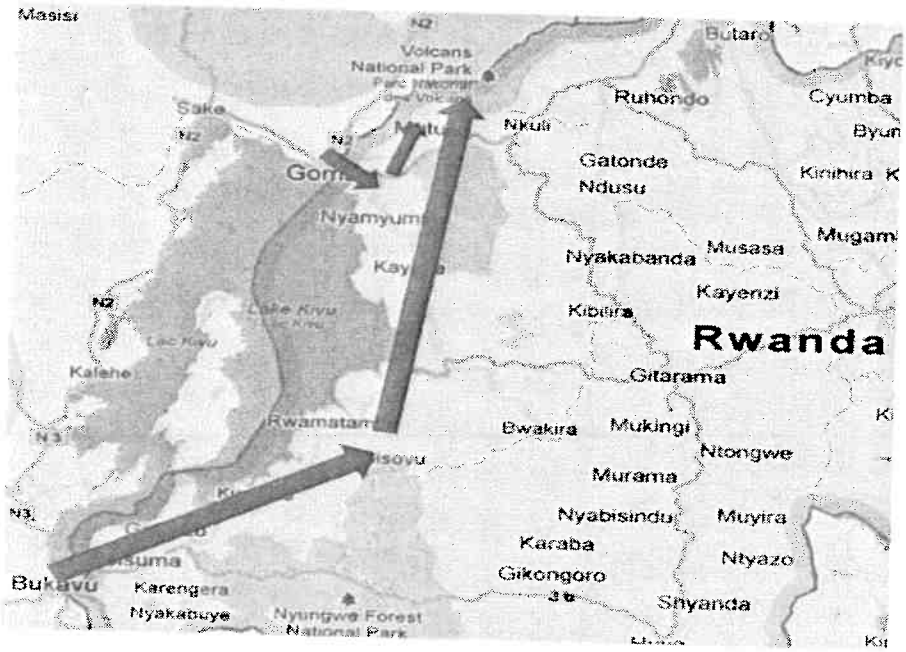
M23 travel through Rwanda facilitated by the RDF



13. That night, RDF officers ordered the FARDC deserters to offload and transport the weapons brought from Bukavu through the Virunga National Park, to Gasizi on the Democratic Republic of the Congo side,[5] between Karisimbi and Mikeno volcanoes. On 8 May, these soldiers joined up with the mutineers who came from Masisi territory to the assembly point at Gasizi. Military and police officers, as well as local authorities from Kibumba reported on the arrival of the mutineers from Masisi near the border, and the movement of Makenga's troops from Rwanda into the Democratic Republic of the Congo. A local authority gathered reports from Rwandan civilians who had been forced to carry the weapons from Gasizi, in Rwanda, to the Democratic Republic of the Congo border. After Ntaganda's and Makenga's groups merged, they advanced further through the park and took control of Runyoni on 10 May to officially launch military operations of the M23 rebellion (see S/2012/348, para. 104).[6]

B. RDF recruitment for M23

14. Once M23 established their positions near the Rwandan border at Runyoni,[7] the RDF began facilitating the arrival of new civilian recruits and demobilized former combatants of the FDLR to strengthen the ranks of the rebels.

Civilian new recruits

15. The Group interviewed 30 Rwandan nationals who had been recruited into M23 and managed to escape. Interviewed separately, each confirmed that they had been recruited in Rwanda. While some interacted with civilian "sensitizers", most stated that RDF officers directly participated in their recruitment process. M23 collaborators, ex-CNDP officers, politicians, ex-M23 combatants, and Congolese refugees in Rwanda, informed the Group that a wide network of mobilization had been established in the main Rwandan towns bordering the Democratic Republic of the Congo, as well as in refugee camps, targeting Rwandan nationals and Congolese refugees for recruitment. Recruitment focal points operating at Kinigi, Ruhengeri, Mudende, Gisenyi, Mukamira, and Bigogwe, are tasked with identifying and gathering young men for recruitment and handing them over to RDF soldiers. Two Congolese refugees, as well as a visitor of Nkamira refugee camp (situated 27 km from Gisenyi in Rwanda) told the Group that there had been a systematic campaign in the camp to encourage young men to join M23.

16. Former M23 combatants from Rwanda stated that the main transit point for recruitment is the RDF position at Kinigi, where recruits are regrouped and sent to the Democratic Republic of the Congo (see image 4). This pattern has also been independently confirmed by Congolese intelligence services and a former RDF officer. According to some of the recruits, they often receive a meal in Hotel Bishokoro, which belongs to General Bosco Ntaganda and his brother at Kinigi. Afterwards, RDF soldiers escort large groups of new recruits to the border and send them into the Democratic Republic of the Congo.

[5] The corresponding village along the border in the Democratic Republic of the Congo is also called Gasizi.

[6] CNDP issued an official communiqué announcing the creation of M23 on 6 May 2012, just after the desertion of Colonel Makenga.

[7] CNDP held a stronghold in Runyoni in 2008. See S/2008/773, para. 64 (b).

OFFICE OF THE HIGH COMMISSIONER FOR HUMAN RIGHTS

General Comment No. 13: Equality before the courts and the right to a fair and public hearing by an independent court established by law (Art. 14) : . 13/04/1984. CCPR General Comment No. 13. (General Comments)

Convention Abbreviation: CCPR

GENERAL COMMENT 13

Equality before the courts and the right to a fair and public hearing by an independent court established by law

(Article 14)

(Twenty-first session, 1984)

1. The Committee notes that article 14 of the Covenant is of a complex nature and that different aspects of its provisions will need specific comments. All of these provisions are aimed at ensuring the proper administration of justice, and to this end uphold a series of individual rights such as equality before the courts and tribunals and the right to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law. Not all reports provided details on the legislative or other measures adopted specifically to implement each of the provisions of article 14.

2. In general, the reports of States parties fail to recognize that article 14 applies not only to procedures for the determination of criminal charges against individuals but also to procedures to determine their rights and obligations in a suit at law. Laws and practices dealing with these matters vary widely from State to State. This diversity makes it all the more necessary for States parties to provide all relevant information and to explain in greater detail how the concepts of "criminal charge" and "rights and obligations in a suit at law" are interpreted in relation to their respective legal systems.

3. The Committee would find it useful if, in their future reports, States parties could provide more detailed information on the steps taken to ensure that equality before the courts, including equal access to courts, fair and public hearings and competence, impartiality and independence of the judiciary are established by law and guaranteed in practice. In particular, States parties should specify the relevant constitutional and legislative texts which provide for the establishment of the courts and ensure that they are independent, impartial and competent, in particular with regard to the manner in which judges are appointed, the qualifications for appointment, and the duration of their terms of office; the condition governing promotion, transfer and cessation of their functions and the actual independence of the judiciary from the executive branch and the legislative.

4. The provisions of article 14 apply to all courts and tribunals within the scope of that article whether ordinary or specialized. The Committee notes the existence, in many countries, of military or special courts which try civilians. This could present serious problems as far as the equitable, impartial and independent administration of justice is concerned. Quite often the reason for the establishment of such courts is to enable exceptional procedures to be applied which do not comply with normal standards of justice. While the Covenant does not prohibit such categories of courts, nevertheless the conditions which it lays down clearly indicate that the trying of civilians by such courts should be very exceptional and take place under conditions which genuinely afford the full guarantees stipulated in article 14. The Committee has noted a serious lack of information in this regard in the reports of some States parties whose judicial institutions include such courts for the trying of civilians. In some countries such military and special courts do not afford the strict guarantees of the proper administration of justice in accordance with the requirements of article 14 which are essential for the effective protection of human rights. If States parties decide in circumstances of a public emergency as contemplated by article 4 to derogate from normal procedures required under article 14, they should ensure that such derogations do not exceed those strictly required by the exigencies of the actual situation, and respect the other conditions in paragraph 1 of article 14.

5. The second sentence of article 14, paragraph 1, provides that "everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing". Paragraph 3 of the article elaborates on the requirements of a "fair hearing" in regard to the determination of criminal charges. However, the requirements of paragraph 3 are minimum guarantees, the observance of which is not always sufficient to ensure the fairness of a hearing as required by paragraph 1.

6. The publicity of hearings is an important safeguard in the interest of the individual and of society at large. At the same time article 14, paragraph 1, acknowledges that courts have the power to exclude all or part of the public for reasons spelt out in that paragraph. It should be noted that, apart from such exceptional circumstances, the Committee considers that a hearing must be open to the public in general, including members of the press, and must not, for instance, be limited only to a particular category of persons. It should be noted that, even in cases in which the public is excluded from the trial, the judgement must, with certain strictly defined exceptions, be made public.

7. The Committee has noted a lack of information regarding article 14, paragraph 2 and, in some cases, has even observed that the presumption of innocence, which is fundamental to the protection of human rights, is expressed in very ambiguous terms or entails conditions which render it ineffective. By reason of the presumption of innocence, the burden of proof of the charge is on the prosecution and the accused has the benefit of doubt. No guilt can be presumed until the charge has been proved beyond reasonable doubt. Further, the presumption of innocence implies a right to be treated in accordance with this principle. It is, therefore, a duty for all public authorities to refrain from prejudging the outcome of a trial.

8. Among the minimum guarantees in criminal proceedings prescribed by paragraph 3, the first concerns the right of everyone to be informed in a language which he understands of the charge against him (subpara. (a)). The Committee notes that State reports often do not explain how this right is respected and ensured. Article 14 (3) (a) applies to all cases of criminal charges, including those of persons not in detention. The Committee notes further that the right to be informed of the charge "promptly" requires that information is given in the manner described as soon as the charge is first made by a competent authority. In the opinion of the Committee this right must arise when in the course of an investigation a court or an authority of the prosecution decides to take procedural steps against a person suspected of a crime or publicly names him as such. The specific requirements of subparagraph 3 (a) may be met by stating the charge either orally or in writing, provided that the information indicates both the law and the alleged facts on which it is based.

9. Subparagraph 3 (b) provides that the accused must have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence and to communicate with counsel of his own choosing. What is "adequate time" depends on the circumstances of each case, but the facilities must include access to documents and other evidence which the accused requires to prepare his case, as well as the opportunity to engage and communicate with counsel.

When the accused does not want to defend himself in person or request a person or an association of his choice, he should be able to have recourse to a lawyer. Furthermore, this subparagraph requires counsel to communicate with the accused in conditions giving full respect for the confidentiality of their communications. Lawyers should be able to counsel and to represent their clients in accordance with their established professional standards and judgement without any restrictions, influences, pressures or undue interference from any quarter.

10. Subparagraph 3 (c) provides that the accused shall be tried without undue delay. This guarantee relates not only to the time by which a trial should commence, but also the time by which it should end and judgement be rendered; all stages must take place "without undue delay". To make this right effective, a procedure must be available in order to ensure that the trial will proceed "without undue delay", both in first instance and on appeal.

11. Not all reports have dealt with all aspects of the right of defence as defined in subparagraph 3 (d). The Committee has not always received sufficient information concerning the protection of the right of the accused to be present during the determination of any charge against him nor how the legal system assures his right either to defend himself in person or to be assisted by counsel of his own choosing, or what arrangements are made if a person does not have sufficient means to pay for legal assistance. The accused or his lawyer must have the right to act diligently and fearlessly in pursuing all available defences and the right to challenge the conduct of the case if they believe it to be unfair. When exceptionally for justified reasons trials in absentia are held, strict observance of the rights of the defence is all the more necessary.

12. Subparagraph 3 (e) states that the accused shall be entitled to examine or have examined the witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him. This provision is designed to guarantee to the accused the same legal powers of compelling the attendance of witnesses and of examining or cross-examining any witnesses as are available to the prosecution.

13. Subparagraph 3 (f) provides that if the accused cannot understand or speak the language used in court he is entitled to the assistance of an interpreter free of any charge. This right is independent of the outcome of the proceedings and applies to aliens as well as to nationals. It is of basic importance in cases in which ignorance of the language used by a court or difficulty in understanding may constitute a major obstacle to the right of defence.

14. Subparagraph 3 (g) provides that the accused may not be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt. In considering this safeguard the provisions of article 7 and article 10, paragraph 1, should be borne in mind. In order to compel the accused to confess or to testify against himself, frequently methods which violate these provisions are used. The law should require that evidence provided by means of such methods or any other form of compulsion is wholly unacceptable.

15. In order to safeguard the rights of the accused under paragraphs 1 and 3 of article 14, judges should have authority to consider any allegations made of violations of the rights of the accused during any stage of the prosecution.

16. Article 14, paragraph 4, provides that in the case of juvenile persons, the procedure shall be such as will take account of their age and the desirability of promoting their rehabilitation. Not many reports have furnished sufficient information concerning such relevant matters as the minimum age at which a juvenile may be charged with a criminal offence, the maximum age at which a person is still considered to be a juvenile, the existence of special courts and procedures, the laws governing procedures against juveniles and how all these special arrangements for juveniles take account of "the desirability of promoting their rehabilitation". Juveniles are to enjoy at least the same guarantees and protection as are accorded to adults under article 14.

17. Article 14, paragraph 5, provides that everyone convicted of a crime shall have the right to his conviction and sentence being reviewed by a higher tribunal according to law. Particular attention is drawn to the other language versions of the word "crime" ("infraction", "delito", "prestuplenie") which show that the guarantee is not confined only to the most serious offences. In this connection, not enough information has been provided concerning the procedures of appeal, in particular the access to and the powers of reviewing tribunals, what requirements must be satisfied to appeal against a judgement, and the way in which the procedures before review tribunals take account of the fair and public hearing requirements of paragraph 1 of article 14.

18. Article 14, paragraph 6, provides for compensation according to law in certain cases of a miscarriage of justice as described therein. It seems from many State reports that this right is often not observed or insufficiently guaranteed by domestic legislation. States should, where necessary, supplement their legislation in this area in order to bring it into line with the provisions of the Covenant.

19. In considering State reports differing views have often been expressed as to the scope of paragraph 7 of article 14. Some States parties have even felt the need to make reservations in relation to procedures for the resumption of criminal cases. It seems to the Committee that most States parties make a clear distinction between a resumption of a trial justified by exceptional circumstances and a re-trial prohibited pursuant to the principle of ne bis in idem as contained in paragraph 7. This understanding of the meaning of ne bis in idem may encourage States parties to reconsider their reservations to article 14, paragraph 7.

Commentary

(1) Article 16 deals with the situation where one State provides aid or assistance to another with a view to facilitating the commission of an internationally wrongful act by the latter. Such situations arise where a State voluntarily assists or aids another State in carrying out conduct which violates the international obligations of the latter, for example, by knowingly providing an essential facility or financing the activity in question. Other examples include providing means for the closing of an international waterway, facilitating the abduction of persons on foreign soil, or assisting in the destruction of property belonging to nationals of a third country. The State primarily responsible in each case is the acting State, and the assisting State has only a supporting role. Hence the use of the term "by the latter" in the chapeau to article 16, which distinguishes the situation of aid or assistance from that of co-perpetrators or co-participants in an internationally wrongful act. Under article 16, aid or assistance by the assisting State is not to be confused with the responsibility of the acting State. In such a case, the assisting State will only be responsible to the extent that its own conduct has caused or contributed to the internationally wrongful act. Thus, in cases where that internationally wrongful act would clearly have occurred in any event, the responsibility of the assisting State will not extend to compensating for the act itself.

(2) Various specific substantive rules exist, prohibiting one State from providing assistance in the commission of certain wrongful acts by other States or even requiring third States to prevent or repress such acts.[273] Such provisions do not rely on any general principle of derived responsibility, nor do they deny the existence of such a principle, and it would be wrong to infer from them the non-existence of any general rule. As to treaty provisions such as Article 2, paragraph 5, of the Charter of the United Nations, again these have a specific rationale which goes well beyond the scope and purpose of article 16.

(3) Article 16 limits the scope of responsibility for aid or assistance in three ways. First, the relevant State organ or agency providing aid or assistance must be aware of the circumstances making the conduct of the assisted State internationally wrongful; secondly, the aid or assistance must be given with a view to facilitating the commission of that act, and must actually do so; and thirdly, the completed act must be such that it would have been wrongful had it been committed by the assisting State itself.

(4) The requirement that the assisting State be aware of the circumstances making the conduct of the assisted State internationally wrongful is reflected by the phrase "knowledge of the circumstances of the internationally wrongful act". A State providing material or financial assistance or aid to another State does not normally assume the risk that its assistance or aid may be used to carry out an internationally wrongful act. If the assisting or aiding State is unaware of the circumstances in which its aid or assistance is intended to be used by the other State, it bears no international responsibility.

(5) The second requirement is that the aid or assistance must be given with a view to facilitating the commission of the wrongful act, and must actually do so. This limits the application of article 16 to those cases where the aid or assistance given is clearly linked to the subsequent wrongful conduct. A State is not responsible for aid or assistance under article 16 unless the relevant State organ intended, by the aid or assistance given, to facilitate the occurrence of the wrongful conduct and the internationally wrongful conduct is actually committed by the aided or assisted State. There is no requirement that the aid or assistance should have been essential to the performance of the internationally wrongful act; it is sufficient if it contributed significantly to that act.

(6) The third condition limits article 16 to aid or assistance in the breach of obligations by which the aiding or assisting State is itself bound. An aiding or assisting State may not deliberately procure the breach by another State of an obligation by which both States are bound; a State cannot do by another what it cannot do by itself. On the other hand, a State is not bound by obligations of another State vis-à-vis third States. This basic principle is also embodied in articles 34 and 35 of the 1969 Vienna Convention. Correspondingly, a State is free to act for itself in a way which is inconsistent with the obligations of another State vis-à-vis third States. Any question of responsibility in such cases will be a matter for the State to whom assistance is provided vis-à-vis the injured State. Thus, it is a necessary requirement for the responsibility of an assisting State that the conduct in question, if attributable to the assisting State, would have constituted a breach of its own international obligations.

(7) State practice supports assigning international responsibility to a State which deliberately participates in the internationally wrongful conduct of another through the provision of aid or assistance, in circumstances where the obligation breached is equally opposable to the assisting State. For example, in 1984 the Islamic Republic of Iran protested against the supply of financial and military aid to Iraq by the United Kingdom, which allegedly included chemical weapons used in attacks against Iranian troops, on the ground that the assistance was facilitating acts of aggression by Iraq.[274] The Government of the United Kingdom denied both the allegation that it had chemical weapons and that it had supplied them to Iraq.[275] In 1998, a similar allegation surfaced that the Sudan had assisted Iraq to manufacture chemical weapons by allowing Sudanese installations to be used by Iraqi technicians for steps in the production of nerve gas. The allegation was denied by Iraq's representative to the United Nations.[276]

(8) The obligation not to use force may also be breached by an assisting State through permitting the use of its territory by another State to carry out an armed attack against a third State. An example is provided by a statement made by the Government of the Federal Republic of Germany

[273] See, e.g., the first principle of the Declaration on Principles of International Law concerning Friendly Relations and Cooperation among States in accordance with the Charter of the United Nations (General Assembly resolution 2625 (XXV) of 24 October 1970, annex); and article 3 (f) of the Definition of Aggression (General Assembly resolution 3314 (XXIX) of 14 December 1974, annex).

Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1996)

PART ONE
GENERAL PROVISIONS

Article 1
Scope and application of the present Code

1. The present Code applies to the crimes against the peace and security of mankind set out in part two.

2. Crimes against the peace and security of mankind are crimes under international law and punishable as such, whether or not they are punishable under national law.

Article 2
Individual responsibility

1. A crime against the peace and security of mankind entails individual responsibility.

2. An individual shall be responsible for the crime of aggression in accordance with article 16.

3. An individual shall be responsible for a crime set out in article 17, 18, 19 or 20 if that individual:

(a) intentionally commits such a crime;

(b) orders the commission of such a crime which in fact occurs or is attempted;

(c) fails to prevent or repress the commission of such a crime in the circumstances set out in article 6;

(d) knowingly aids, abets or otherwise assists, directly and substantially, in the commission of such a crime, including providing the means for its commission;

(e) directly participates in planning or conspiring to commit such a crime which in fact occurs;

(f) directly and publicly incites another individual to commit such a crime which in fact occurs;

(g) attempts to commit such a crime by taking action commencing the execution of a crime which does not in fact occur because of circumstances independent of his intentions.

Article 3
Punishment

An individual who is responsible for a crime against the peace and security of mankind shall be liable to punishment. The punishment shall be commensurate with the character and gravity of the crime.

Article 4

Responsibility of States

The fact that the present Code provides for the responsibility of individuals for crimes against the peace and security of mankind is without prejudice to any question of the responsibility of States under international law.

Article 5

Order of a Government or a superior

The fact that an individual charged with a crime against the peace and security of mankind acted pursuant to an order of a Government or a superior does not relieve him of criminal responsibility, but may be considered in mitigation of punishment if justice so requires.

Article 6

Responsibility of the superior

The fact that a crime against the peace and security of mankind was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superiors of criminal responsibility, if they knew or had reason to know, in the circumstances at the time, that the subordinate was committing or was going to commit such a crime and if they did not take all necessary measures within their power to prevent or repress the crime.

Article 7

Official position and responsibility

The official position of an individual who commits a crime against the peace and security of mankind, even if he acted as head of State or Government, does not relieve him of criminal responsibility or mitigate punishment.

Article 8

Establishment of jurisdiction

Without prejudice to the jurisdiction of an international criminal court, each State Party shall take such measures as may be necessary to establish its jurisdiction over the crimes set out in articles 17, 18, 19 and 20, irrespective of where or by whom those crimes were committed. Jurisdiction over the crime set out in article 16 shall rest with an international criminal court. However, a State referred to in article 16 is not precluded from trying its nationals for the crime set out in that article.

Article 9

Obligation to extradite or prosecute

Without prejudice to the jurisdiction of an international criminal court, the State Party in the territory of which an individual alleged to have committed a crime set out in article 17, 18, 19 or 20 is found shall extradite or prosecute that individual.

Article 10

Extradition of alleged offenders

1. To the extent that the crimes set out in articles 17, 18, 19 and 20 are not extraditable offences in any extradition treaty existing between States Parties, they shall be deemed to be included as such therein. States Parties undertake to include those crimes as extraditable offences in every extradition treaty to be concluded between them.

2. If a State Party which makes extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty receives a request for extradition from another State Party with which it has no extradition treaty, it may at its option consider the present Code as the legal basis for extradition in respect of those crimes. Extradition shall be subject to the conditions provided in the law of the requested State.

3. States Parties which do not make extradition conditional on the existence of a treaty shall recognize those crimes as extraditable offences between themselves subject to the conditions provided in the law of the requested State.

4. Each of those crimes shall be treated, for the purpose of extradition between States Parties, as if it had been committed not only in the place in which it occurred but also in the territory of any other State Party.

Article 11

Judicial guarantees

1. An individual charged with a crime against the peace and security of mankind shall be presumed innocent until proved guilty and shall be entitled without discrimination to the minimum guarantees due to all human beings with regard to the law and the facts and shall have the rights:

(a) in the determination of any charge against him, to have a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal duly established by law;

(b) to be informed promptly and in detail in a language which he understands of the nature and cause of the charge against him;

(c) to have adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his defence and to communicate with counsel of his own choosing;

(d) to be tried without undue delay;

(e) to be tried in his presence, and to defend himself in person or through legal assistance of his own choosing; to be informed, if he does not have legal assistance, of this right; and to have legal assistance assigned to him and without payment by him if he does not have sufficient means to pay for it;

(f) to examine, or have examined, the witnesses against him and to obtain the attendance and examination of witnesses on his behalf under the same conditions as witnesses against him;

(g) to have the free assistance of an interpreter if he cannot understand or speak the language used in court;

(h) not to be compelled to testify against himself or to confess guilt.

2. An individual convicted of a crime shall have the right to his conviction and sentence being reviewed according to law.

Article 12

Non bis in idem

1. No one shall be tried for a crime against the peace and security of mankind of which he has already been finally convicted or acquitted by an international criminal court.

2. An individual may not be tried again for a crime of which he has been finally convicted or acquitted by a national court except in the following cases:

(a) by an international criminal court, if:

(i) the act which was the subject of the judgement in the national court was characterized by that court as an ordinary crime and not as a crime against the peace and security of mankind; or

(ii) the national court proceedings were not impartial or independent or were designed to shield the accused from international criminal responsibility or the case was not diligently prosecuted;

(b) by a national court of another State, if:

(i) the act which was the subject of the previous judgement took place in the territory of that State; or

(ii) that State was the main victim of the crime.

Human rights situations that require the Council's attention

Report of the independent international commission of inquiry on the Syrian Arab Republic*

Summary

The situation of human rights in the Syrian Arab Republic has deteriorated significantly since 15 February 2012. Armed violence increased in intensity and spread to new areas. Active hostilities raged between Government forces (and the Shabbiha) and anti-Government armed groups. Sporadic clashes between the armed actors evolved into continuous combat, involving more brutal tactics and new military capabilities on both sides. The level of armed violence varied throughout the country.

During the reporting period, the commission of inquiry determined that the intensity and duration of the conflict, combined with the increased organizational capabilities of anti-Government armed groups, had met the legal threshold for a non-international armed conflict. The commission therefore applied both international humanitarian law and international human rights law in its assessment of the actions of the parties to the hostilities.

The commission found reasonable grounds to believe that Government forces and the Shabbiha had committed the crimes against humanity of murder and of torture, war crimes and gross violations of international human rights law and international humanitarian law, including unlawful killing, torture, arbitrary arrest and detention, sexual violence, indiscriminate attack, pillaging and destruction of property. The commission found that Government forces and Shabbiha members were responsible for the killings in Al-Houla.

The commission confirms its previous finding that violations were committed pursuant to State policy. Large-scale operations conducted in different governorates, their similar modus operandi, their complexity and integrated military-security apparatus indicate the involvement at the highest levels of the armed and security forces and the Government. The Shabbiha were identified as perpetrators of many of the crimes described in the present report. Although the nature, composition and hierarchy of the Shabbiha remains unclear, credible information led to the conclusion that they acted in concert with Government forces.

The commission found reasonable grounds to believe that war crimes, including murder, extrajudicial execution and torture, had been perpetrated by organized anti-Government armed groups. Although not a party to the Geneva Conventions, these groups must abide by the principles of international humanitarian law. The violations and abuses committed by anti-Government armed groups did not reach the gravity, frequency and scale of those committed by Government forces and the Shabbiha.

Both groups violated the rights of children.

The commission is unaware of efforts meeting international standards made by either the Government or anti-Government armed groups to prevent or punish the crimes documented in the present report.

The lack of access significantly hampered the commission's ability to fulfil its mandate. Its access to Government officials and to members of the armed and security forces was negligible. Importantly, victims and witnesses inside the country could not be interviewed in person.

A confidential list of individuals and units believed to be responsible for crimes against humanity, breaches of international humanitarian law and gross human rights violations will be submitted to the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights at the close of the commission's current mandate, in September 2012.

The commission reiterates that the best solution is a negotiated settlement involving an inclusive and meaningful dialogue among all parties, leading to a political transition that reflects the legitimate aspirations of all segments of Syrian society, including ethnic and religious minorities.

Programme budget for the biennium 1998–1999

Conditions of service and compensation for officials other than Secretariat officials: members of the International Court of Justice

Report of the Secretary-General

I. Introduction

1. The General Assembly, in section IV, paragraph 3, of its resolution 50/216 of 23 December 1995, requested the Secretary-General to address the issues raised by the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions (ACABQ) concerning the conditions of service of members of the International Court of Justice (ICJ) in the context of the next review, at the fifty-third session of the General Assembly, in the light of the recommendation contained in the report of the Advisory Committee.[1]

2. In order to facilitate consideration of the various issues regarding the compensation and conditions of service of members of the Court, the present report is divided into the following sections: remuneration, including adjustment for currency fluctuation and cost of living; other conditions of service; pensions; analysis of the practice of the Court with respect to Article 16, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the Court; residence and non-residence status of the members of the Court; financial implications; and the next comprehensive review.

II. Remuneration

3. Article 32 of the Statute of ICJ provides, inter alia, that each member of the Court shall receive an annual salary (para. 1), that these salaries and allowances "shall be fixed by the General Assembly" and that "they may not be decreased during the term of office" (para. 5).

4. Since 1976, the General Assembly has conducted periodic reviews of the emoluments of the members of the Court, with the last comprehensive review having been undertaken at the fiftieth session of the General Assembly (see A/C.5/50/18). By paragraph 1 of its resolution 45/250 A of 21 December 1990, the General Assembly decided that, with effect from 1 January 1991, the annual salary of the members of ICJ would be US$ 145,000. By paragraph 2 of its resolution 48/252 A of 26 May 1994, the Assembly maintained the annual salary of the members of ICJ at $145,000. On the occasion of the comprehensive review of the emoluments of the members of the Court undertaken in 1995, the Assembly, by paragraph 2 of part IV of its resolution 50/216, agreed with ACABQ's recommendation to maintain the salary of the members of the Court at $145,000 per annum.

5. The emoluments of the members of the Court are sui generis. However, on the occasion of the periodic comprehensive reviews of the emoluments and conditions of service of the members of the Court, information on the net remuneration of senior Secretariat officials, of the Chairman of the Advisory Committee on Administrative and Budgetary Questions, of the Chairman and Vice-Chairman of the International Civil Service Commission (ICSC) and of the members of the Joint Inspection Unit (JIU) as well as the gross emoluments of the president and members of the highest courts in national judiciaries of a number of States and of international courts have been provided as reference points for purposes of comparative assessment.

6. Tables 1 and 2 contain updated information concerning the evolution of emoluments from January 1995 to June 1998. Table 1 compares the movement of the judges' total emoluments with changes in the remuneration of senior Secretariat officials and that of full-time members of other subsidiary bodies of the United Nations; Table 2 provides information obtained, with the assistance of permanent missions to the United Nations, on the movement of gross emoluments of the president and members of the highest courts in a number of national judiciaries. The table also presents information on the movement in emoluments of the President and members of the Court of the European Communities in Luxembourg and of the Iran-United States Claims Tribunal in The Hague, as well as the emoluments of the President and members of the European Court of Human Rights in Strasbourg which, as of the last quarter of 1998, will be transformed into a full-time court.

7. In April 1987, ICSC introduced the concept of a local currency floor and ceiling at a number of duty stations, including The Hague, to protect staff against the weakening of the dollar. The background and the functioning of the floor/ceiling system, as applied to the emoluments of the members of the Court, are discussed in paragraphs 11 to 15 of the Secretary-General's report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session (A/C.5/48/66).

8. In paragraph 4 of its resolution 48/252 A, the General Assembly decided to continue the system of floor/ceiling measures introduced for members of the Court pursuant to section VI of General Assembly resolution 43/217. In paragraph 8 of his report to the General Assembly, at its fiftieth session (A/C.5/50/18), the Secretary-General indicated that the 1994 floor/ceiling exchange rates had been derived by applying the previous formula of 4 per cent above and 4 per cent below the average exchange rate to the year 1993. The average exchange rate in 1994 was 1.82 guilders to the dollar and yielded revised floor/ceiling exchange rates of 1.75 and 1.89 guilders, respectively. The floor exchange rate of 1.75 guilders to the dollar resulted in a revised currency floor of 21,145 guilders per month and the ceiling exchange rate of 1.89 guilders to the dollar resulted in a revised currency ceiling of 22,837 guilders per month.

9. In paragraph 12 of the same report, the Secretary-General expressed the opinion that the annual emoluments of members of the Court should be maintained at their current level of $145,000. He also noted that the mechanism used to regulate emoluments against the weakening/strengthening of the dollar had provided only limited protection for the judges over the period since the beginning of 1994. Although he proposed that the same mechanism continue to be applied, he drew the attention of ACABQ to the serious diminution in the real level of emoluments as a result of the use of the United States dollar as a reference currency. He inferred that action could be taken to restore the real 1991 value of those emoluments, in line with the spirit of Article 32 of the Statute of the Court.

10. In paragraph 6 of its report,[1] the Advisory Committee expressed its agreement with the Secretary-General's opinion that the annual emoluments of the members of the Court should be maintained at the current level of $145,000 and recommended that, "should the current mechanism used to regulate emoluments against the weakening/strengthening of the dollar be considered inadequate, the Secretary-General [should] make proposals in this regard, bearing in mind the various studies that have been carried out on this issue in the recent past."

11. In 1996, the Advisory Committee was advised that it had been found reasonable to continue to apply through 1996 the floor/ceiling mechanism that had been applied in 1995 in the light of the provisions of Article 32 of the Statute of the Court, which specify that the remuneration and allowances of the members of the Court "shall be fixed by the General Assembly, and may not be decreased during the term of office", and pending the next review of the conditions of service for the members of the Court.

12. Consequently, floor/ceiling exchange rates of 1.75 and 1.89 guilders, respectively, applied in 1995 for the purpose of effecting monthly payments in guilders to the members of the Court, were applied in 1996 and 1997.

13. The Advisory Committee was further advised that the movement in the exchange rate of the guilder to the dollar would continue to be monitored. If any significant strengthening of the dollar were to be noted vis-à-vis the guilder and if it was found that a revision in the floor/ceiling exchange rates was needed, the Committee would be informed accordingly.

14. The dollar strengthened significantly during 1997. In this light, for the year 1998, it was found reasonable to revise the floor/ceiling rates used for effecting monthly payments in guilders to the members of the Court. Based on the methodology proposed by the Secretary-General and, as recommended by ACABQ and approved by the General Assembly, the floor/ceiling rates were set at 4 per cent below and 4 per cent above the average exchange rate of the previous year. For the year 1997, the average exchange rate is 1.94 guilders to $1.00. On this basis, the floor/ceiling exchange rates were revised to 1.86 and 2.02 guilders, respectively. The floor exchange rate of 1.86 guilders to the dollar results in a currency floor of 22,474 guilders per month and the ceiling exchange rate of 2.02 guilders to the dollar results in a currency ceiling of 24,408 guilders per month.

15. Table 3 indicates the official exchange rate for the guilder against the dollar for the period from January 1994 to September 1998. Over the period, the floor amount has been payable for 26 months and the ceiling amount for 17 months.

16. The floor/ceiling mechanism used to regulate emoluments against the weakening/strengthening of the dollar has served to limit the diminution of the emoluments of the members of ICJ expressed in guilders, particularly in 1995 and 1996, when the dollar weakened against the guilder, as well as restricting the increase in the judges' emoluments in 1997 and 1998, when the dollar strengthened against the guilder. Overall, the floor/ceiling mechanism has served to offset fluctuations in the value of the dollar against the guilder. Nevertheless, as a result of the increase in the cost of living in the Netherlands, the emoluments of the members of ICJ have experienced a diminution in real value since 1991. According to official statistics of the Netherlands provided by the Court, the consumer price index for the Netherlands for the period from 1 January 1990 to 31 December 1997 increased by 19 per cent.

17. The Court has noted that, if the emoluments of the members of the Court had been adjusted every year in relation to the consumer price index, the total sum of these emoluments would, over the period from 1 January 1990 to 31 December 1997, have reached a level of $1,101,275, or $157,325 per year. A comparison of the latter amount with the annual salary of $145,000 shows a difference, i.e, a loss, of $12,325 per year. When compared to the real value of the emoluments, while taking into account the floor/ceiling mechanism for the conversion of salary from United States dollars into guilders, the value of the annual salary over the seven-year period would show a difference of $1,035,125, or an annual salary of $147,732. On this basis it can be seen that, while the floor/ceiling mechanism provided a certain amount of protection in maintaining the value of the level of annual remuneration, it failed to keep pace with the increase in the cost of living in the Netherlands. The total loss in remuneration over the seven-year period was $66,150 or, on average, $9,450 per year.

18. In its earlier report on the subject,[2] the Advisory Committee had expressed its view that under the existing system of adjustment for currency fluctuations and cost of living, the strengthening of the United States dollar vis-à-vis the guilder had more than offset the increases in the local cost of living. While this may have been the case in some years, it has not been so in other years, and is not so currently. It is a fact that, over time, the cost of living in the Netherlands has continued to increase cumulatively. As at 1 January 1994, the rise in the cost of living in the Netherlands, compared to 1 January 1991, was 8.7 per cent. As at 1 January 1998, the cost of living in the Netherlands had increased by 19 per cent. Even when taking into account the floor/ceiling mechanism, the loss in purchasing power has been considerable. As at 1 January 1991, the floor/ceiling exchange rates were 1.77 and 1.91, respectively. With effect from 1 January 1998, the floor/ceiling exchange rates are 1.86 and 2.02, respectively. There has been a 5.4 per cent increase in the floor/ceiling exchange rates. In real terms, the loss in purchasing power between 1 January 1991 and 1 January 1998 was 13.57 per cent (18.97% – 5.4% = 13.57%). The members of the Court have made representations to the effect that, in order to restore the real level of the emoluments of the members of ICJ, the annual salary should be increased by $19,500, from $145,000 to $164,500, i.e., by 13.4 per cent.

19. Paragraph 5 of Article 32 of the Statute of the Court provides, inter alia, that the salaries of the members of the Court "may not be decreased during the term of office". Based on the above information and, in line with the spirit of Article 32 of the Statute of the Court, it would seem reasonable that measures should be taken to restore the purchasing power of the emoluments of the judges. In this regard, it is also noted that no retroactive adjustment is proposed to be made to the salaries of members of ICJ to offset fluctuations in the value of the United States dollar against the guilder. Consequently, it is recommended that action be taken to increase the level of annual remuneration of the members of the Court from the current level of $145,000 to $164,500. It is also noted that the mechanism used to regulate emoluments against the weakening/strengthening of the dollar has provided a measure of protection against the erosion in the level of salary of the judges. Therefore, it is also proposed that the same floor/ceiling mechanism continue to be applied to the emoluments of the judges.

III. Other conditions of service

20. The background of other conditions of service of the members of ICJ is provided in the report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session (A/C.5/48/66), i.e., in section IV (paras. 16-21), concerning the special allowances of the President and of the Vice-President when acting as President; section V (in paras. 22 and 23), relating to compensation of ad hoc judges; and in section VI (paras. 24-31), pertaining to the costs of educating children.

21. Article 32 of the Statute of the Court provides that the President shall receive a special annual allowance (paragraph 2) and that the Vice-President shall receive a special allowance for each day on which he acts as President (paragraph 3). As is the case with remuneration, these allowances "shall be fixed by the General Assembly" and "may not be decreased during the term of office" (paragraph 5). General Assembly resolution 31/204 provides that the allowances "shall be reviewed concurrently with the periodic review of their annual salary" (paragraph 3).

22. The General Assembly, by its resolution 50/216, part IV, paragraph 2, decided that the President's special allowance should remain at $15,000 a year and that the special daily allowance paid to the Vice-President when acting as President should remain at $94 per day, subject to a maximum of $9,400 per year.

23. Accordingly, the Secretary-General recommends no change in the current level of the special allowances of the President of the Court and the Vice-President when acting as President.

24. Turning to the issue of compensation of ad hoc judges, under Article 31 of the Statute of the Court, persons whom parties to cases before the Court choose to "take part in the decision on terms of complete equality with their colleagues" (para. 6) are known as ad hoc judges. Further to Article 32, paragraph 4, of the Statute, they "shall receive compensation for each day on which they exercise their functions". The historical background to the determination of the amount of that compensation was presented in the report of the Secretary-General to the General Assembly at its fortieth session (A/C.5/40/32, paras. 35-41).

25. The General Assembly, in paragraph 3 of its resolution 48/252 A, decided that, with effect from 1 January 1994, the ad hoc judges referred to in Article 31 of the ICJ Statute should receive for each day they exercise their functions, one three-hundred-and-sixty-fifth of the annual salary payable at the time to a member of the Court. On the occasion of the 1995 review, the Secretary-General proposed that no change be made in these arrangements. The General Assembly, by part IV, paragraph 2, of its resolution 50/216, concurred with this proposal. On this occasion, the Secretary-General proposes that no change be effected in these arrangements.

26. The background to the issue of costs of educating children, as applied to the members of the Court, is provided in paragraphs 24 through 29 of document A/C.5/48/66. By paragraphs 1 and 2 of its resolution 48/252 C of 26 May 1994, the General Assembly decided that, with effect from 1 January 1994, the President and the members of the International Court of Justice who had taken up residence at The Hague should be reimbursed, up to a ceiling of $9,750, for the actual cost of educating their children, and $13,000 for the actual cost of educating their disabled children, in respect of each child each year up to the award of the first recognized degree and that provision should be made for one related return journey per year in respect of each child from the place of scholastic attendance, when outside the Netherlands, and The Hague.

27. In his report to the General Assembly at its fiftieth session, the Secretary-General proposed that, further to resolution 45/250 C, the increase in the level of the education grant (including that for disabled children) applicable to staff in the Professional and higher categories approved by the General Assembly in resolution 49/223 should be extended, under the same conditions, to the members of the Court, as from the school year in progress on 1 January 1995 (A/C.5/50/18, para. 21). In paragraph 8 of its report,[3] ACABQ agreed with the proposal of the Secretary-General, on the understanding that this benefit would be extended only to the members of the Court who had taken up residence at The Hague. The General Assembly, in part IV, paragraph 2, of its resolution 50/216, concurred with the recommendation of the Advisory Committee.

28. Subsequent to the 1996 review of the level of the education grant by the International Civil Service Commission, the General Assembly, by part IV of its resolution 51/216 of 18 December 1996, approved the increases in the maximum reimbursement levels in seven currency areas, as well as other adjustments to the management of the reimbursement of expenses under the education grant, recommended by ICSC in its report to the Assembly at its fifty-first session[4] (see table 4).

[a] The amount of the special education grant for each disabled child is equal to 100 per cent of the revised amount of maximum admissible educational expenses for the regular education grant. In areas where education-related expenses are reimbursed in other currencies, the amounts remained unchanged.

29. The Secretary-General recalls that, in accordance with the recommendation of the Advisory Committee in its seventh report to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session,[5] the next review of the costs of educating children of the members of ICJ will be conducted at the time of the next comprehensive review of conditions of service.

30. The Secretary-General would propose that, further to General Assembly resolution 45/250 C of 21 December 1990, the increase in the level of education grant (including that for disabled children) effective 1 January 1997, applicable to staff in the Professional and higher categories approved by the Assembly in part IV of resolution 51/216 of 18 December 1996, should be extended, under the same conditions, to the members of the Court, as from the school year in progress on 1 January 1998. The programme budget implications of the proposed change are discussed in paragraph 60 below.

31. ICSC has made recommendations to the General Assembly to update the current levels of the education grant. It is expected that a decision thereon will be taken by the Assembly at its fifty-third session. Any increase decided upon by the Assembly in the level of the grant or changes in the provisions regarding disabled children should be extended to the members of the Court.

32. No change is proposed with regard to other conditions of service of the members of the International Court of Justice.

IV. Pensions

33. The members of ICJ are entitled to retirement pensions in accordance with Article 32, paragraph 7, of the Statute of the Court, the specific conditions of which are governed by regulations adopted by the General Assembly. The General Assembly, in paragraph 1 of its resolution 48/252 B of 26 May 1994, invited the Secretary-General to undertake a study of the pension scheme for the members of ICJ and to report thereon to the Assembly at its forty-ninth session.

34. A review of the pension benefits and the corollary aspects of the current pension scheme were presented in the report of the Secretary-General to the forty-eighth and forty-ninth sessions of the Assembly (A/C.5/48/66, paras. 32-41 and A/C.5/49/8, paras. 6-16). In reviewing the latter report, the Advisory Committee reiterated its 1994 recommendation that it was not necessary to recommend a change in the pension benefits of the members of the Court. The Advisory Committee expressed its view that the request by the General Assembly for a study of the pension scheme for the members of the International Court of Justice had not been fully addressed. It recommended that the Secretary-General include a comprehensive review of the pension scheme for the members of the Court in his report to be submitted to the General Assembly at its fiftieth session. The report should include, on the advice of qualified actuaries, a review of benefit provisions, including those of retirement age, minimum period of service, rate of accumulation of pension benefits, early retirement benefits, contributory participation, cost-of-living adjustments and retroactive rights of pensioners.[6]

35. Pursuant to the request of the Advisory Committee, the Secretary-General sought the advice of a consulting actuary on the pension scheme of the members of ICJ. The text of the comprehensive actuarial review conducted by the consultant is contained in the annex to the Secretary-General's report (A/C.5/50/18) to the fiftieth session of the General Assembly. Based on the findings of the consultant's report, the Secretary-General concluded that the review corroborated most of the recommendations he had presented to the General Assembly at its forty-eighth session (A/C.5/48/66 paras. 32-41). On that basis, the Secretary-General recommended that:

(a) The pensionable remuneration of a judge should be defined as being equal to half the annual salary;

(b) The pension should constitute the pensionable remuneration of a judge who completes a nine-year term, with a proportional reduction for a judge who has not completed a full term. A judge who is re-elected should receive 1/300th of his pension benefit for each further month of service, up to a maximum pension of two thirds of annual salary;

(c) The pension scheme should remain non-contributory;

(d) An actuarial reduction factor at a rate of one half of one per cent per month should be applied in a case of early retirement;

(e) Surviving spouses should receive a pension equal to 60 per cent of a judge's pension; alternatively, judges could opt to increase a spouse's pension up to a maximum of a further 50 per cent by means of an actuarial reduction in their pension;

(f) Upon remarriage, a surviving spouse should be granted a lump sum equal to twice the amount of the spouse's current annual benefit as a final settlement (A/C.5/50/18, para. 27).

36. However, in reviewing the Secretary-General's recommendations, ACABQ, expressed its belief "that the various recommendations and options discussed in the report of the consulting actuary should have been analysed in the main text of the report of the Secretary-General. In particular, the rationale for the recommendations of the Secretary-General, as mentioned in paragraphs 27 (a) to (f) of the report, should have been explained in the main text of the report and cross-referenced to the corresponding paragraphs in the report of the consulting actuary in the annex". Therefore, the Advisory Committee recommended, and the General Assembly agreed, "that the Secretary-General re-examine the pension scheme of the members of the Court in a report that takes full account of the request of the Advisory Committee".[7]

37. As described in paragraph 35 (a) and (b) above, the Secretary-General recommended that the pensionable remuneration of a judge should be defined as being equal to half the annual salary, and that the pension should constitute the pensionable remuneration of a judge who completes a nine-year term, with a proportional reduction for a judge who has not completed a full term. A judge who is re-elected should receive 1/300th of his pension benefit for each further month of service, up to a maximum pension of two-thirds of annual salary. Those recommendations were based on the findings of the consulting actuary as set out in part II of the annex to the Secretary-General's report (A/C.5/50/18).

38. In response to the request of the General Assembly, the following analysis of the actuary is as follows:

(a) Design of pension scheme. In regard to the designing of the pension scheme, the consulting actuary observed that "the modern view on pension scheme design is that an acceptable scheme should provide a reasonable replacement income, after allowing for social security and personal savings, following a full career with the employer. A 'reasonable replacement income' is generally held to be an income sufficient to maintain a standard of living after retirement equivalent to that enjoyed in the immediate years prior to retirement. A 'full career' is usually defined as a career assuming entry age for a typical new entrant at the start of his or her career and continued employment until normal retirement age" (para. 2.2). Reference to the practice of certain Member States is contained in para. 2.3 of the consultant's report;

The consulting actuary also noted the unusual nature of service in the Court. First, members were elected at a relatively advanced age, the average age at entry for all cohorts being around age 60. Second, the average service was about 10 years' duration, with an average retirement age in the range of 70 to 72. He also observed that, over the last 21 years, 8 out of the 36 deceased judges, or approximately 22 per cent, had died in the course of service and therefore prior to receipt of a pension payment. Finally, the consulting actuary noted that the average duration of pension for a retired member of the ICJ was about 12 years, (paras. 2.7, 2.9 and 2.10). In view of the foregoing, the consulting actuary concluded that a full career in the service of the Court could reasonably be taken to mean two full terms, i.e., 18 years. Moreover, based solely on general principles as applied to pension scheme construction, he further concluded that the overall design of the scheme in force prior to 1 January 1991 was "not unreasonable" (para. 2.12);

(b) Pensionable remuneration – methodology for its determination. Based on the analysis presented and the comparative data available, the consulting actuary indicated that a soundly designed pension scheme should relate pension benefits directly to pay at or near retirement by formula rather than by fixed amount, since this provided an automatic link between pre-retirement and post-retirement income (para. 2.24). In summary, the consulting actuary recommended that the pension formula relating to the accrual rate should revert to that in effect immediately prior to 1 January 1991, subject to a review of the definition of pensionable remuneration. Such a change would make clear the relationship between pre-retirement and post-retirement income and thus facilitate direct comparison with other schemes, as opposed to the current regime of fixed pensions which had the appearance of being arbitrary (para. 2.26);

Regarding pensionable remuneration, the consulting actuary concluded that pensionable remuneration could be defined as full annual salary or the portion of such salary that did not reflect the cost of living in The Hague (para. 2.43). In the former case, there would be less need for a local currency provision with attendant initial adjustment in pension for high-cost countries, and the principle of full retroactivity for pensioners would be maintained. In the latter case, retirees in high-cost countries would not achieve the levels of replacement income envisaged in the scheme design during periods when the United States dollar was weak; that would therefore suggest a need for a two-track pension adjustment system along the lines of that employed by the United Nations Joint Staff Pension Fund (UNJSPF). In practical terms, the choice would appear to be between simplicity with some inequity on the one hand and complexity with equity on the other hand. If the full annual salary were applied to the pension regime in force prior to 1 January 1991, simplicity would result but there would be some inequity as regards those who retire to particularly high-cost countries. If only a portion of the full annual salary were applied to pensionable remuneration with the introduction of a local currency pension adjustment system, there would be a larger degree of equity coupled with more complexity in administration. On balance, the consultant tended to favour the simple approach given the size of the group in question. It followed therefore that a return to the 1 January 1991 pension regime but with the application of the revised annual salary in force as of that date would be suitable;

(c) Contributory participation. On the issue of establishing a contribution requirement, the consulting actuary recommended against having the members of the Court contribute to their pensions in the light of the fact that, for the members of the Court, anticipated service was much shorter than for those participating in the UNJSPF, "which leads us to believe that meaningful cost-sharing could not occur without the members' contributions being set at inordinately high levels" (para. 2.36). In addition, in the more usual pension schemes, members' contributions were made on the expectation that they would be returned as part of the pension payments over many years of retirement. This was not the case for the members of the Court, who often served beyond the age when most employed persons retired and who had a more limited expectation of return. Moreover, those members who chose to serve longer would be treated inequitably in comparison with those who served the Court for a limited period, because they would be required to contribute over a longer period while expecting to receive pension payments over a shorter number of years. This issue did not arise in the more usual pension arrangements because the vast majority of members retired either before or at normal retirement age, with the result that the expected length of pension payments was relatively similar for all retirees. It did not seem appropriate to require contributions if the scheme was not funded;

(d) Retirement benefits:

(i) Early retirement benefits. As regards the question of early-retirement benefits, is was noted that the pension scheme provided that members of the Court retiring before age 60 might elect to receive an immediate pension of equivalent actuarial value to the pension which would have been paid at age 60. However, the actuarial basis for determining actuarial equivalence was not defined in the scheme rules. The consulting actuary expressed the view that the early retirement provisions as set forth in the scheme were reasonable and in keeping with sound, modern pension design. Therefore, the recommendation was made that actuarial reduction factors be adopted as part of the scheme rules as that would provide a readily available basis for determining early retirement pensions. As the calculations indicated that the actuarial equivalencies could be approximated very closely by a standard reduction of ½ per cent per month by which the pension commencement date preceded age 60, it was recommended that that factor be adopted as part of the scheme rules. (para. 2.28);

(ii) Surviving spouse pension benefit. On the issue of surviving spouse's pensions, the consulting actuary noted that pension schemes in several European countries, such as Germany and the Netherlands, commonly provided surviving spouses' pensions at the rate of 60 per cent rather than the rate of 50 per cent more commonly found in the United States and within the United States-based international organizations (para. 2.32). The consulting actuary therefore submitted that a rate of 60 per cent for surviving spouses pensions was not unreasonable and that a lump sum settlement of twice the annual pension upon the remarriage of the surviving spouse also was reasonable (para. 2.33).

V. Conclusions regarding the pension scheme for the judges of the International Court of Justice

39. Based on the analysis and findings of the consulting actuary's report, the Secretary-General believes that the pension scheme for the members of ICJ should provide adequate after-service benefits to judges having met the requisite eligibility criteria relating to retirement age and period of service based upon the premise that the pension benefit maintains a standard of living as replacement income.

40. Based on the consulting actuary's recommendations vis-à-vis the pension scheme for the members of the Court, the Secretary-General recommends that:

(a) The pensionable remuneration, or retirement pension, of a judge should be defined as being equal to half the annual salary;

(b) The pension benefit should constitute the retirement pension of a judge who completes a nine-year term, with a proportional reduction for a judge who has not completed a full term. A judge who is re-elected should receive 1/300th of his pension benefit for each further month of service, up to a maximum pension of two thirds of annual salary;

(c) The pension scheme should be non-contributory;

(d) An actuarial reduction factor at a rate of one-half of one per cent per month should be applied in a case of early retirement;

(e) Surviving spouses should receive a pension equal to 60 per cent of a judge's pension; alternatively, judges could opt to increase a spouse's pension up to a maximum of a further 50 per cent by means of an actuarial reduction in their pension;

(f) Upon remarriage, a surviving spouse should be granted a lump sum equal to twice the amount of the spouse's current annual benefit as a final settlement.

41. However, in order to avoid a disproportionate increase in pension, the Secretary-General would propose that the recommendation to base the retirement pension at half the annual salary shall be implemented in two stages: half to come into force as of 1 January 1999 and half as of 1 January 2000. Therefore, he would recommend that, with effect from 1 January 1999, the pension benefit be increased from $50,000 to $66,125 and that, effective 1 January 2000, the retirement pension be set at 50 per cent of the annual salary.

Table 5
Percentage increase in level of pension benefits

Amount of annual pension (United States dollars)
From	To	Percentage increase
50 000	66 125	32.25
50 000	82 250	64.50
66 125	82 250	24.40

42. Should the proposals above with regard to pensions be found acceptable, the Secretary-General would propose that the Registrar of the Court amend the pension scheme regulations accordingly.

VI. Analysis of the practice of the Court with respect to Article 16, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the Court

43. In paragraph 8 of its report,[8] the Advisory Committee expressed its view that the broader review of the conditions of service of the judges should include an analysis of the practice of the Court with respect to Article 16 of the Statute of the Court. That Article provides as follows:

> "1. No member of the Court may exercise any political or administrative function, or engage in any other occupation of a professional nature.
> "2. Any doubt on this point shall be settled by the decision of the Court."

44. In keeping with Article 16, paragraph 2, of the Statute of ICJ, the Secretary-General requested the Court to provide clarification on the matters raised by the Advisory Committee. The response of the Court was presented in paragraphs 29 to 33 of his report (A/C.5/50/18), presented to the Assembly at its fiftieth session.

45. The Advisory Committee indicated in its report[9] that, despite the analysis presented, there were still a number of questions which remained unanswered. Consequently, it recommended, and the General Assembly agreed, to invite the Court to look again at this issue in the light of the observations and concerns of the Advisory Committee.

46. In response to the comments and concerns of the Advisory Committee regarding the application of Article 16, the Court has provided clarification of its practice as follows. The Court has interpreted the provisions of Article 16 as prohibiting judges of the Court from maintaining or exercising any political or administrative function, whether international, national, or local, whether commercial or otherwise; engaging in any other occupation of a professional nature, inter alia, holding a position in a commercial concern, engaging in the practice of law, maintaining membership in a law firm or rendering legal or expert opinions; or holding a permanent teaching or administrative position in a university or faculty of law.

47. Under the authority vested in the Court under Article 16, paragraph 2, ICJ has, in view of the judicial character of the activities involved, interpreted the bar to the members of the Court engaging in other occupations of a professional nature as not debarring a limited participation of judges in other judicial or quasi-judicial activities of an occasional nature, as well as scholarly pursuits in the sphere of international law as members of learned societies or as occasional lecturers. The judges accepting such occasional activities give the fullest precedence to their supervening duties as members of the Court. Based on a long-standing tradition of the Permanent Court of International Justice, founded in 1922, as well as the recorded intention of the Conference that adopted the text of Article 16 of the Statute, the Court further interpreted the Article as permitting acceptance of occasional appointments as arbitrators. In doing so, the Court referred to a similar practice existing in the courts of a number of Member States, such as France, Germany, the Netherlands, India, Canada, Australia, Sweden, Norway, Denmark, Tunisia and the Libyan Arab Jamahiriya, as well as some states of the United States of America.

48. The Court has consistently taken the position that contributions by its members to third-party settlement of disputes by legal processes in other forums, as occasional service as arbitrators, are compatible with the judges' functions as members of the Court. These activities are subject, however, to two conditions. The first is that the judges must give absolute precedence to their obligations as members of the Court. The second is that they should not accept appointment in an arbitral case, which, in another phase, is subject to being submitted to the Court.

49. As regards its practice, the possibilities of members of the Court engaging in such outside activities have varied in accordance with the intensity of the work of the Court. During times when the workload of the Court was reduced (as it was in the years 1967–1983), participation in outside activities was more feasible than when the work of the Court was as intense as it has been during the past decade. Thus at one time a judge could simultaneously sit on the Court and on the European Court of Human Rights, an arrangement which nowadays would not be conceivable.

50. At the present time, because of the Court's heavy caseload, the members of the Court have little possibility of engaging in activities other than those required by the Court. A certain number of members occasionally lecture or write articles in learned journals. Members of the Court participate in meetings of learned societies such as the Institute of International Law. These activities are largely without compensation, and the Court provides no kind of payment or travel or other expenses incidental to such activities. When on exceptional occasion a judge acts as arbitrator, the Court ensures that such service in no way detracts from the work of the Court and that the Court pays no expenditures arising out of such service.

51. In reply to questions of ACABQ as to whether the premises or resources of the Court, including staff, have been utilized for outside activities, the Court has affirmed that all judges, in accordance with guidelines circulated to them, are obligated to reimburse all telephone, facsimile and postage and other expenses relating to any of these activities. Court premises are not used for arbitral sessions; however, judges as well as Registry staff give lectures on the work of the Court to visiting groups on Court premises. Staff of the Court do not participate in arbitral activities.

52. In clarification of its practice under Article 16 of the Statute, and in response to its own concerns as well as those of ACABQ, the Court, in July 1996, adopted a new directive as follows:

> "In cases in which a member of the Court is invited to accept an arbitral commitment, membership in another tribunal, remunerated series of lectures or a contract for the publication of a book, or series of articles, he or she shall consult, before acceptance, the President of the Court, who, should the need arise, shall consult the Court; in cases where the President of the Court is invited, he or she shall, before acceptance, consult the Court. In view of the increased workload of the Court, members of the Court shall exercise restraint in accepting undertakings of this kind (whether remunerated or not)."

VII. Residence and non-residence status of the Members of the Court

53. In paragraph 6 of its report,[9] the Advisory Committee recommended that "the Secretary-General address the issue of residence and non-residence status of the members of the Court as it impacts on their salary and other conditions of service, as well as the need to issue rules and procedures that regulate the administration of the benefits of the members of the Court".

54. Article 22, paragraph 2, of the Statute of ICJ provides that the President and the Registrar shall reside at the seat of the Court. Article 23 provides that members of the Court shall hold themselves permanently at the disposal of the Court.

55. Article 3 of the Travel and Subsistence Regulations of ICJ provides that "the President of the Court, who by virtue of Article 22 of its Statute shall reside at the seat of the Court, and any other member of the Court who takes up residence at the seat of the Court in compliance with Article 23 of the Statute, shall be entitled ... to full removal costs of household goods and personal effects to the seat of the Court from his home at the time of appointment (or any country other than that where the Court has its seat if less expenditure is entailed) [and] to an amount corresponding to the installation grant provisions applicable to senior officials of the Secretariat of the United Nations".

56. Based on the above, bona fide residence status at The Hague could be defined as being applicable to any member for whom full removal and installation have been paid under the provisions of Article 3, paragraph 1, of the Travel and Subsistence Regulations of the International Court of Justice, adopted by the General Assembly in its resolution 37/240 of 21 December 1982.

57. As regards the impact of residence or non-residence of members of the Court on conditions of service, the Secretary-General recalls that the General Assembly has conditioned the eligibility of members of the Court for education, installation and repatriation allowances on their having taken up residence in The Hague, whereas travel entitlements of non-resident and resident members are governed by General Assembly resolution 37/240.

58. As far as the effect of the status of residence or non-residence on the salary of the members of the Court, the Secretary-General notes that the annual salary is expressed in United States dollars and paid in guilders and it is not affected by residential status.

59. The Court has communicated its view on residence status as follows:

> "As a consequence of its increased workload over the last dozen years, the Court meets throughout the year, except for mid-summer and the turn of the year. The presence of the judges at the seat of the Court is accordingly required throughout the year. This situation is not going to change soon. Under these circumstances, the appropriate definition of the residence status of judges is the establishment, through acquisition or long-term lease, of a permanent residence in The Hague, coupled with the option by the judge concerned for resident status."

VIII. Financial implications

60. Should the General Assembly approve the proposals contained in paragraphs 19, 25, 30, 31, 40 and 41 above, the programme budget implications of the increase in annual salary and the changes proposed in the pension scheme for members of the International Court of Justice and costs of educating children of its members are estimated at $726,400 for the biennium 1998–1999, as reflected in Table 6 below. No changes are proposed to the other conditions of service of the members of the Court.

Table 6
Programme budget implications 1998–1999
(In United States dollars)

Salary increase (para. 19)	292 500
Increase in emoluments of ad hoc judges (para. 25)	38 500
Education grant increase (paras. 30 and 31)	4 200
Pensions (paras. 40 and 41)	391 200
Total	726 400

61. The estimated requirements of $38,500 for the emoluments of ad hoc judges would fall under the provisions of paragraph 1 (b) (i) of General Assembly resolution 52/223 of 22 December 1997 on unforeseen and extraordinary expenses for the biennium 1998–1999.

62. In respect of the balance of the estimated requirements, i.e. $687,900, arising from the Secretary-General's proposals, relating to an increase in the annual salary and the costs of educating children of members of the Court, and additional pension payments in respect of former judges and the widows of judges, for the 1998–1999 biennium, the requirements are seen as relating to inflation and should be treated outside the procedure related to the contingency fund, as provided for in paragraph 11 of annex I to General Assembly resolution 41/213 of 23 December 1986. In accordance with the decision of the General Assembly contained in part III, paragraph 34, of its resolution 52/220 of 22 December 1997, any resource change resulting from decisions taken by the Assembly with regard to emoluments and other conditions of service for the members of the Court will be reported in the performance report on the programme budget for the biennium 1998–1999.

63. In accordance with their respective statutes, the terms and conditions of service of the judges of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia are those of the judges of the International Court of Justice, while the terms and conditions of service of the judges of the International Tribunal for Rwanda are those of judges of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. In its review of the conditions of service for the judges of the two ad hoc Tribunals as contained in the report of the Secretary-General (A/52/520), the General Assembly, upon the recommendation of ACABQ, agreed in its resolutions 52/217 and 52/218 of 22 December 1998, respectively, to defer the consideration of the pension entitlement for members of the two Tribunals until the review of the report of the Secretary-General on the emoluments and pension scheme of members of the International Court of Justice to be submitted to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session.

64. Should the General Assembly approve the proposals contained in paragraphs 19, 25, 30, 31, 40 and 41 of the present report, the financial implications for the proposed resource requirements for 1999 for the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia and the International Tribunal for Rwanda to be submitted to the General Assembly at its fifty-third session will be as follows:

Table 7

	Former Yugoslavia Tribunal	Rwanda Tribunal
	(In United States dollars)
Emoluments – salary increase	273 000	175 500
Relocation allowance	—	9 000
Pensions	49 600	8 800
Total	322 600	193 300

IX. Next comprehensive review

65. By its resolution 48/252 A, the General Assembly decided that the periodicity of review of the conditions of service of the members of ICJ should be determined at the fiftieth session of the Assembly.

66. By its resolution 50/216 of 23 December 1995, the General Assembly, decided that the next comprehensive review of the conditions of service of the judges would take place at its fifty-third session. Should the General Assembly decide to continue the three-year review cycle, the next comprehensive review by the Assembly would be undertaken at its fifty-sixth session in 2001.

Adoption of the agenda

The agenda was adopted.

Election of five members of the International Court of Justice (S/2011/452, S/2011/453 and S/2011/454)

The President (spoke in Russian): The Security Council will now proceed to the election of one remaining member of the International Court of Justice, in accordance with Article 13 of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, to fill the remaining seat that will become vacant on 5 February 2012.

Document S/2011/453 indicates, inter alia, the national groups by which each of the two remaining candidates was nominated.

On 10 and 22 November the Council conducted a total of eight ballots. Today the Council will conduct a ninth ballot.

The Security Council has before it a memorandum by the Secretary-General contained in document S/2011/452, describing the present composition of the Court and setting out the procedure to be followed in the conduct of the election.

I should like to remind the Council that, under Article 10, paragraph 1, of the Statute of the International Court of Justice,

> "Those candidates who obtain an absolute majority of votes in the General Assembly and in the Security Council shall be considered as elected".

The required majority in the Security Council is eight votes.

The voting will be held by secret ballot. When we proceed to the vote, members of the Council will receive a ballot containing the names of the two remaining candidates. No candidacy withdrawal will be accepted once the ballot papers have been distributed. However, it will be possible to withdraw between ballots.

Members of the Council will be requested to place an "X" in the box next to the name of the candidate for whom they wish to vote. Only the two candidates whose names appear on the ballot are eligible for election.

I should like to remind members of paragraph 10 of the Secretary-General's memorandum, which specifies that "[e]ach elector may vote for not more than five candidates on the first ballot". Given that the Council will now vote to elect the one remaining member of the International Court of Justice, any ballot paper containing votes for more than one name will be considered invalid.

I should like to inform Council members that, in accordance with established practice, the ballot papers in the Security Council will not be counted until it has been verified that the ballot papers in the General Assembly have also been collected. The Council will remain in session pending the receipt of that information.

When one candidate has obtained the required majority of votes in the Security Council, I shall communicate the result to the President of the General Assembly. I will request the Council to remain in session pending receipt from the President of the General Assembly of the result of the voting in the Assembly.

At the 6551st meeting of the Council, the delegations of Gabon and Nigeria were selected to serve as tellers. The delegation of Gabon is unable to serve as a teller today. The delegations of Nigeria and South Africa have been invited to serve as tellers. I invite the tellers to be seated at the tables behind the Council table.

At the invitation of the President, Mrs. Aguwa (Nigeria) and Mr. Laher (South Africa) acted as tellers.

The President (spoke in Russian): May I take it that the Council is now ready to proceed with the election of the one remaining member of the International Court of Justice?

It is so decided.

The Council will now proceed to the ninth ballot. I request the Conference Officer to distribute the ballot papers.

Members of the Council should place an "X" in the box next to the name of the candidate for whom they wish to vote.

* * *

The President (spoke in Russian): I take it that all the members of the Council have now voted and I ask the Conference Officer to collect the ballot papers.

* * *

The President (spoke in Russian): All the ballot papers have been collected. I should like to remind Council members that, in accordance with the established practice, the ballots will not be counted until it has been verified that the ballot papers in the General Assembly have also been collected. The Council will remain in session pending the receipt of that information.

* * *

The President (spoke in Russian): I have now been informed that the ballot papers have been collected in the General Assembly. The counting of the ballots in the Security Council will now begin. The tellers will now count the ballots. As agreed in our consultations, there will be two independent countings of the ballots, one by each teller. I should like to remind Council members that in accordance with established practice, I shall wait for the General Assembly to complete its count before I announce the results of the voting in the Security Council. The Council will remain in session.

* * *

The President (spoke in Russian): The result of the voting is as follows:

Number of ballot papers:	15
Number of invalid ballots:	0
Number of valid ballots:	15
Number of abstentions:	0
Required majority:	8
Number of votes obtained:
Ms. Julia Sebutinde	9
Ms. Julia Sebutinde	6

I wish to inform members of the Council that I have received the following letter from the President of the General Assembly:

(spoke in English)

> "I have the honour to inform you that, at the 84th plenary meeting of the General Assembly, held today for the purpose of electing five members of the International Court of Justice, the following candidate obtained an absolute majority of votes in the General Assembly: Ms. Julia Sebutinde."

(spoke in Russian)

Accordingly, the same candidate has received the required absolute majority of votes in the Council and in the General Assembly. As both the Security Council and the General Assembly have agreed on the same candidate, the jurists Mr. Giorgio Gaja, Mr. Hisashi Owada, Ms. Julia Sebutinde, Mr. Peter Tomka and Ms. Xue Hanqin have been elected to the International Court of Justice for a period of nine years, beginning on 6 February 2012. I should like to congratulate them warmly and to wish them every success in the high office to which they have been elected.

On behalf of the Council, I would like to thank the tellers for their assistance in the conduct of the elections.

The Security Council has thus concluded its consideration of the item on its agenda.

Report of the Secretary-General on the establishment of a Special Court for Sierra Leone

I. Introduction

1. The Security Council, by its resolution 1315 (2000) of 14 August 2000, requested me to negotiate an agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone to create an independent special court (hereinafter "the Special Court") to prosecute persons who bear the greatest responsibility for the commission of crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law, as well as crimes under relevant Sierra Leonean law committed within the territory of Sierra Leone.

2. The Security Council further requested that I submit a report on the implementation of the resolution, in particular on my consultations and negotiations with the Government of Sierra Leone concerning the establishment of the Special Court. In the report I was requested, in particular, to address the questions of the temporal jurisdiction of the Court; an appeals process, including the advisability, feasibility and appropriateness of an appeals chamber in the Special Court, or of sharing the Appeals Chamber of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda; and a possible alternative host State, should it be necessary to convene the Special Court outside the seat of the Court in Sierra Leone, if circumstances so require.

3. Specific recommendations were also requested by the Security Council on the following issues:

(a) Any additional agreements that might be required for the provision of the international assistance necessary for the establishment and functioning of the Special Court;

(b) The level of participation, support and technical assistance of qualified persons required from Member States, including, in particular, States members of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) and the Commonwealth, and from the United Nations Mission in Sierra Leone (UNAMSIL) that would be necessary for the efficient, independent and impartial functioning of the Special Court;

(c) The amount of voluntary contributions of funds, equipment and services, including expert personnel from States, intergovernmental organizations and non-governmental organizations;

(d) Whether the Special Court could receive, as necessary and feasible, expertise and advice from the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda.

4. The present report, submitted in response to the above requests, is in two parts. The first part (chaps. II-VI) examines and analyses the nature and specificity of the Special Court, its jurisdiction (subject-matter, temporal and personal), the organizational structure (the Chambers and the nature of the appeals process, the offices of the Prosecutor and the Registry), enforcement of sentences in third States and the choice of the alternative seat. The second part (chaps. VII and VIII) deals with the practical implementation of the resolution on the establishment of the Special Court. It describes the requirements of the Court in terms of personnel, equipment, services and funds that would be required of States, intergovernmental and non-governmental organizations, the type of advice and expertise that may be expected from the two International Tribunals, and the logistical support and security requirements for premises and personnel that could, under an appropriate mandate, be provided by UNAMSIL. The Court's requirements in all of these respects have been placed within the specific context of Sierra Leone, and represent the minimum necessary, in the words of resolution 1315 (2000), "for the efficient, independent and impartial functioning of the Special Court". An assessment of the viability and sustainability of the financial mechanism envisaged, together with an alternative solution for the consideration of the Security Council, concludes the second part of the report.

5. The negotiations with the Government of Sierra Leone, represented by the Attorney General and the Minister of Justice, were conducted in two stages. The first stage of the negotiations, held at United Nations Headquarters from 12 to 14 September 2000, focused on the legal framework and constitutive instruments establishing the Special Court: the Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and the Statute of the Special Court which is an integral part thereof. (For the texts of the Agreement and the Statute, see the annex to the present report.)

6. Following the Attorney General's visit to Headquarters, a small United Nations team led by Ralph Zacklin, Assistant Secretary-General for Legal Affairs, visited Freetown from 18 to 20 September 2000. Mr. Zacklin was accompanied by Daphna Shraga, Senior Legal Officer, Office of the Legal Counsel, Office of Legal Affairs; Gerald Ganz, Security Coordination Officer, Office of the United Nations Security Coordinator; and Robert Kirkwood, Chief, Buildings Management, International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia. During its three-day visit, the team concluded the negotiations on the remaining legal issues, assessed the adequacy of possible premises for the seat of the Special Court, their operational state and security conditions, and had substantive discussions on all aspects of the Special Court with the President of Sierra Leone, senior government officials, members of the judiciary and the legal profession, the Ombudsman, members of civil society, national and international non-governmental organizations and institutions involved in child-care programmes and rehabilitation of child ex-combatants, as well as with senior officials of UNAMSIL.

7. In its many meetings with Sierra Leoneans of all segments of society, the team was made aware of the high level of expectations created in anticipation of the establishment of a special court. If the role of the Special Court in dealing with impunity and developing respect for the rule of law in Sierra Leone is to be fully understood and its educative message conveyed to Sierra Leoneans of all ages, a broad public information and education campaign will have to be undertaken as an integral part of the Court's activities. The purpose of such a campaign would be both to inform and to reassure the population that while a credible Special Court cannot be established overnight, everything possible will be done to expedite its functioning; that while the number of persons prosecuted before the Special Court will be limited, it would not be selective or otherwise discriminatory; and that although the children of Sierra Leone may be among those who have committed the worst crimes, they are to be regarded first and foremost as victims. For a nation which has attested to atrocities that only few societies have witnessed, it will require a great deal of persuasion to convince it that the exclusion of the death penalty and its replacement by imprisonment is not an "acquittal" of the accused, but an imposition of a more humane punishment. In this public information campaign, UNAMSIL, alongside the Government and non-governmental organizations, could play an important role.

8. Since the present report is limited to an analysis of the legal framework and the practical operation of the Special Court, it does not address in detail specifics of the relationship between the Special Court and the national courts in Sierra Leone, or between the Court and the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission. It is envisaged, however, that upon the establishment of the Special Court and the appointment of its Prosecutor, arrangements regarding cooperation, assistance and sharing of information between the respective courts would be concluded and the status of detainees awaiting trial would be urgently reviewed. In a similar vein, relationship and cooperation arrangements would be required between the Prosecutor and the National Truth and Reconciliation Commission, including the use of the Commission as an alternative to prosecution, and the prosecution of juveniles, in particular.

II. Nature and specificity of the Special Court

9. The legal nature of the Special Court, like that of any other legal entity, is determined by its constitutive instrument. Unlike either the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, which were established by resolutions of the Security Council and constituted as subsidiary organs of the United Nations, or national courts established by law, the Special Court, as foreseen, is established by an Agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone and is therefore a treaty-based sui generis court of mixed jurisdiction and composition. Its implementation at the national level would require that the agreement is incorporated in the national law of Sierra Leone in accordance with constitutional requirements. Its applicable law includes international as well as Sierra Leonean law, and it is composed of both international and Sierra Leonean judges,[1] prosecutors and administrative support staff.[2] As a treaty-based organ, the Special Court is not anchored in any existing system (i.e., United Nations administrative law or the national law of the State of the seat) which would be automatically applicable to its non-judicial, administrative and financial activities. In the absence of such a framework, it would be necessary to identify rules for various purposes, such as recruitment, staff administration, procurement, etc., to be applied as the need arose.[3]

10. The Special Court has concurrent jurisdiction with and primacy over Sierra Leonean courts. Consequently, it has the power to request at any stage of the proceedings that any national Sierra Leonean court defer to its jurisdiction (article 8, para. 2 of the Statute). The primacy of the Special Court, however, is limited to the national courts of Sierra Leone and does not extend to the courts of third States. Lacking the power to assert its primacy over national courts in third States in connection with the crimes committed in Sierra Leone, it also lacks the power to request the surrender of an accused from any third State and to induce the compliance of its authorities with any such request. In examining measures to enhance the deterrent powers of the Special Court, the Security Council may wish to consider endowing it with Chapter VII powers for the specific purpose of requesting the surrender of an accused from outside the jurisdiction of the Court.

11. Beyond its legal and technical aspects, which in many ways resemble those of other international jurisdictions, the Special Court is Sierra Leone-specific. Many of the legal choices made are intended to address the specificities of the Sierra Leonean conflict, the brutality of the crimes committed and the young age of those presumed responsible. The moral dilemma that some of these choices represent has not been lost upon those who negotiated its constitutive instruments.

III. Competence of the Special Court

A. Subject-matter jurisdiction

12. The subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court comprises crimes under international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law. It covers the most egregious practices of mass killing, extrajudicial executions, widespread mutilation, in particular amputation of hands, arms, legs, lips and other parts of the body, sexual violence against girls and women, and sexual slavery, abduction of thousands of children and adults, hard labour and forced recruitment into armed groups, looting and setting fire to large urban dwellings and villages. In recognition of the principle of legality, in particular nullum crimen sine lege, and the prohibition on retroactive criminal legislation, the international crimes enumerated, are crimes considered to have had the character of customary international law at the time of the alleged commission of the crime.

1. Crimes under international law

13. In its resolution 1315 (2000), the Security Council recommended that the subject-matter jurisdiction of the Special Court should include crimes against humanity, war crimes and other serious violations of international humanitarian law. Because of the lack of any evidence that the massive, large-scale killing in Sierra Leone was at any time perpetrated against an identified national, ethnic, racial or religious group with an intent to annihilate the group as such, the Security Council did not include the crime of genocide in its recommendation, nor was it considered appropriate by the Secretary-General to include it in the list of international crimes falling within the jurisdiction of the Court.

14. The list of crimes against humanity follows the enumeration included in the Statutes of the International Tribunals for the Former Yugoslavia and for Rwanda, which were patterned on article 6 of the Nürnberg Charter. Violations of common article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and of article 4 of Additional Protocol II thereto committed in an armed conflict not of an international character have long been considered customary international law, and in particular since the establishment of the two International Tribunals, have been recognized as customarily entailing the individual criminal responsibility of the accused. Under the Statute of the International Criminal Court (ICC), though it is not yet in force, they are recognized as war crimes.

15. Other serious violations of international humanitarian law falling within the jurisdiction of the Court include:

(a) Attacks against the civilian population as such, or against individual civilians not taking direct part in hostilities;

(b) Attacks against peacekeeping personnel involved in a humanitarian assistance or a peacekeeping mission, as long as they are entitled to the protection given to civilians under the international law of armed conflict; and

(c) Abduction and forced recruitment of children under the age of 15 years into armed forces or groups for the purpose of using them to participate actively in hostilities.

16. The prohibition on attacks against civilians is based on the most fundamental distinction drawn in international humanitarian law between the civilian and the military and the absolute prohibition on directing attacks against the former. Its customary international law nature is, therefore, firmly established. Attacks against peacekeeping personnel, to the extent that they are entitled to protection recognized under international law to civilians in armed conflict, do not represent a new crime. Although established for the first time as an international crime in the Statute of the International Criminal Court, it was not viewed at the time of the adoption of the Rome Statute as adding to the already existing customary international law crime of attacks against civilians and persons hors de combat. Based on the distinction between peacekeepers as civilians and peacekeepers turned combatants, the crime defined in article 4 of the Statute of the Special Court is a specification of a targeted group within the generally protected group of civilians which because of its humanitarian or peacekeeping mission deserves special protection. The specification of the crime of attacks against peacekeepers, however, does not imply a more serious crime than attacks against civilians in similar circumstances and should not entail, therefore, a heavier penalty.

17. The prohibition on the recruitment of children below the age of 15, a fundamental element of the protection of children, was for the first time established in the 1977 Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions, article 4, paragraph 3 (c), of which provides that children shall be provided with the care and aid they require, and that in particular:

> "Children who have not attained the age of fifteen years shall neither be recruited in the armed forces or groups nor allowed to take part in hostilities".

A decade later, the prohibition on the recruitment of children below 15 into armed forces was established in article 38, paragraph 3, of the 1989 Convention on the Rights of the Child; and in 1998, the Statute of the International Criminal Court criminalized the prohibition and qualified it as a war crime. But while the prohibition on child recruitment has by now acquired a customary international law status, it is far less clear whether it is customarily recognized as a war crime entailing the individual criminal responsibility of the accused.
