Marvel to Foya to collect materials which were in bales. We only knew in fact those bales contained ammunition when we crossed into Sierra Leone back to Buedu and the G4 commander was called to come and collect the materials to the warehouse. Those bales were opened into and what we saw were materials, ammunitions, and they were handed over to Captain Felix and taken to the ammo dump in Buedu.

Q. Thank you. Do you recall when you made this trip on board the vehicle with Marvel to Foya?

14:59:26 A. I really cannot recall because what I stated last was really just - it was a mistake really, because at the time I stated those vehicles were present in Buedu the mission - the operation in Freetown had long been undertaken.

Q. Now you were asked about names by which you go and let me 15:00:04 caution you before you get to answer the questions I am going to ask you shortly.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Do not call out any name by which you go.

A. Yes, sir.

15:00:14 Q. Right. Answer the questions without calling out names.

A. Yes, sir.

Q. You were asked about names by which you go other than your actual name. Do you remember?

A. Yes, sir.

15:00:25 Q. And you talked about code names which were different from a call sign that you go by. Do you recall?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Now what is a code name?

A. A code name is a sort of a nickname given to somebody

Q. Now the name Ebony, what was it? This same person called Samuel Lamboi was called Ebony. Ebony was what? What kind of name was that?

A. It was just a nickname.

11:19:41 Q. Do you know how he got that name?

A. Before I joined the signal unit Ebony was already on the radio operating, that is across the Moa River.

JUDGE LUSSICK: So that answer is no. Is that correct?

THE WITNESS: No, sir.

11:20:08 MR BANGURA: Thank you, your Honour:

Q. Do you recall the name Senegalese?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Who was that person?

A. Senegalese at one time was a member of the RUF. That was 11:20:29 the time ECOMOG intervention took place. I think he met me in Sengema and he was to travel to Kono. He was once a member of the ULIMO fighters. According to report we gathered when RUF joined their forces with AFRC was that that Senegalese was one of the soldiers who were fighting alongside the government forces, 11:21:02 the SLAs. So when ECOMOG intervention took place he also retreated to Buedu. So he was commanded by Sam Bockarie to move to Kono on assignment.

MR BANGURA: Thank you. Your Honours, that will be all for this witness. Thank you, Mr Witness.

reported that they were persistently attacked and Sam Bockarie came on the radio and told Gullit to instruct the men to burn down some areas, in fact the government buildings, so that will raise alarm in the international community.

09:35:01 Q. Now, this communication which Bockarie had with Gullit, my question was, "Do you recall a situation where after communicating on a 21 with 020 in Liberia, do you recall a situation where Bockarie came back and gave an order?" So are you saying that this order which he gave followed a conversation 09:35:34 on the 21 with 020?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Thank you. Do you recall any other communication that Bockarie had during this period with 020?

A. Communications was going on with 020 and Base 1 and some of 09:36:00 those communications were like one I have explained and the other was the instructions to Gullit to report with the POWs who were released from the prison. I mean the prisoners who were released from Pademba Road prison, that they were to be taken to Bockarie's location.

09:36:30 Q. It's not so clear, was there a communication on the question of the prisoners between Bockarie and another radio?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Which radio was that?

A. That was Base 1.

09:36:46 Q. And following that you said Bockarie then communicated with Gullit?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. In Freetown?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And what did he specifically say?
A. Bockarie told Gullit to ensure that all the prisoners who were released from Pademba Road prison were sent to his location.
Q. How do you know this?
09:37:09 A. I monitored this on the radio myself.
Q. You mentioned yesterday that a radio operator with the forces in Freetown would communicate with your radio in Buedu and you called the name of Elongima, is that correct?
A. Yes, sir.
09:37:35 Q. Apart from Elongima was there any other radio operator in Freetown who communicated with Buedu?
A. After the death of SAJ Musa, King Perry also used to communicate, operator King Perry.
Q. Thank you. Now, you mentioned that Sam Bockarie gave an 09:37:52 orderer to "burn down the fucking place" when there was pressure in Freetown. Do you recall that?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And did you get any report about atrocities in Freetown?
A. Yes, sir. The operator reported and he went further to 09:38:15 tell them to listen to BBC, that he had had an interview with the BBC correspondents.
Q. Now, the question was did you get any report about atrocities in Freetown?
A. Yes, sir. The radio operator, Elongima, briefed us that 09:38:39 the men who were left by the commander at that particular location were engaged in some kind of atrocities, that in fact they had gone on the rampage. He said, "They are just doing things at their wish."
Q. Did he say exactly what sort of atrocities were being operations.

Q. And back to Buedu, what role did you perform there?
A. I was still a radio operator. I was communicating still.
Q. Were you working alone as a radio operator?
10:49:04 A. No, I had some other senior radio operators like Ebony, Mohamed Kabbah, Tolo - Osman Tolo - and Zedman Sahr James.
MR BANGURA: Your Honours, Tolo is T-O-L-O:
Q. Ebony, did he have another name?
A. Sam Lamboi. Samuel Lamboi.
10:49:33 Q. Thank you. Now, were you assigned to any particular commander at Buedu at this time?
A. To Sam Bockarie. I was appointed to Sam Bockarie. Appointed - assigned to Sam Bockarie.
Q. Now, do you recall which particular radio you were 10:49:55 operating in Buedu at this time?
A. Sam Bockarie's radio, but the call sign was changing. For example today it is Bravo Zulu 4, tomorrow it is Marvel and the next day it is Planet 1. Just like that.
Q. At the particular time that you got - that you were sent 10:50:17 back from Sengema to Buedu, what was the call sign for Sam Bockarie's radio?
A. Okay, it was Bravo Zulu 4.
Q. Bravo Zulu 4, is represented - is it represented by letters?
10:50:38 A. Yes, sir.
Q. So, what letters would it be?
A. BZ4.
Q. Thank you.
A. So, in communication at times we will refer to that as communicate with the other side?

A. When I got to Buedu it was at that time I was given the authority to communicate.
Q. Now, which radios did you communicate with in Liberia on the other side?
10:56:52
A. On the other side - before crossing there I was given a radio set. I crossed into Liberia with a radio set. Of course, when I arrived and 50 received me from Foya --
Q. Can I pause you. I think you are not actually answering the question. Before you left to go to Liberia when you said at some point at Buedu you had authority to communicate, you could also communicate with the radios in Liberia. Is that correct?
10:57:11
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Now which radios in Liberia, or which stations in Liberia, would you communicate with at that time?
10:57:27
A. Call sign 020, 020, that was located at the Executive Mansion Ground in Monrovia, and one call sign, Base 1, like I said earlier, was located in Congo town at Benjamin D Yeaten's residence. That is by White Flower and White Flower is the personal residence of President Charles Taylor of Liberia.
10:57:56
Q. Thank you. Before these - before this time when you could communicate to 020 and Base 1, was there any radio - any other radio - that you communicated with in Liberia?
A. Yes, there was also another radio station located in Foya. That is Foxtrot Yankee as we referred to.
10:58:29
Q. So, at the point of your assignment to Liberia there were - (your Honours, my attention has just been called to the spelling for Foxtrot. Foxtrot Yankee.)
THE WITNESS: We just say "FY" and we were referring to

A. One Base 1 had our code. Base 1 was operated by an operator called Sunlight.
Q. Where was Base 1?
A. Base 1 was located in Congo Town, that is to Benjamin 12:30:18 Yeaten's personal residence.
Q. And you stay it was operated by?
A. Operator Sunlight, one, and, two, operator Dew.
Q. Can you spell Dew?
A. D-E-W.
12:30:34 Q. Now, these names that you've just mentioned, the names of the operators, how do you refer to them in communication parlance?
A. Those were code names and I knew them only by those code names.
12:30:48 Q. So the operators for the radio called Base 1 were?
A. The name Base 1 was the call sign of the radio. Dew, Sunlight were the code names of the operators who operated that radio.
Q. And you say that radio had access to the RUF code?
12:31:10 A. Yes, sir. They had a copy of our code and the other station Zero 20 at the Executive Mansion Ground, that was operated by Sky 1.
Q. When you say operated by Sky 1, what do you mean?
A. Sky 1 is the name of the operator who operated that radio 12:31:32 with the call sign 020, 020.
Q. To your knowledge who did the operators Sunlight and Dew for the radio Base 1 report to?
A. They reported to Benjamin D Yeaten, Unit 50.
Q. And when you say Unit 50 and you call Benjamin Yeaten's name, what was Unit 50? Why was it called Unit 50?

A. That was his code name. He was called by that name, Unit 50.
Q. Now, you also mentioned radio call sign 020 which you say 12:32:25 was at the Executive Mansion, is that correct?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. It had a radio operator whose code name was --
A. Sky 1.
Q. Sky 1. Now, who do you recall that - the radio at the 12:32:45 Executive Mansion reported to who?
A. To the president.
Q. Who was the president then?
A. President Charles Taylor was in power at that time.
Q. Now, let us focus briefly. You say that these two radios 12:32:56 had the code for the Sierra Leone - for the RUF radio network, is that correct?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. How do you know this?
A. I was an operator and when I was taken to Liberia the 12:33:11 number of times I received a message from them in our code and besides when I was to cross into Liberia I was given a special code which was distributed to operators Sunlight, Sky 1 and the other radio that was in Foya and that was the code we used.
Q. Now, let's for a brief moment focus on communication within 12:33:42 Sierra Leone, the RUF within Sierra Leone. Now, you have mentioned that the RUF operated on a 7 megahertz and that means that the frequency numbers on this network started with the number 7, is that correct?
A. Yes, sir.

they be initiated?

A. They could call us. Sometimes if our call sign - when it was Bravo Zulu 4 they could call, "020 calling for Bravo Zulu 4" and we could respond. And in response they could tell us, "Have 14:42:32 your principal informed to get on the 21, that the chief is on the 21 the talk to him" and the message would be relayed to Sam Bockarie.

Q. Now here you have just given an example using Bravo Zulu 4. In your earlier testimony you said this was the previous call 14:42:52 sign for Bockarie's radio. Is that correct?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. So if you got a call on Bravo Zulu 4 it means that call came before a certain time, a certain period in time. Is that right?

14:43:03 A. Yes.

Q. It would be before what time?

A. Before the operation in Voinjama, because the call sign changed to Planet 1 when the operation in Voinjama was carried out and those recruits brought to Buedu. That was the time the 14:43:20 call sign changed.

Q. Now when there was a call from 020 and indicating that they wanted log to go on the 21, who would come on the 21 to speak to Log?

A. They made reference to the chief. The operator could make 14:43:44 reference to the chief by telling us on the radio to have Log informed to go on the telephone and Log was Sam Bockarie in the code and the chief they were referring to was Charles Taylor.

Q. Now how did you know that he would be speaking to Charles Taylor?

A. After their conversation himself could come on the radio to draft message to be transmitted to the front line and he could tell us. He never used to hide anything from us.

Q. Now apart from telling you, would you tell from the nature of the conversation who he was talking to?

A. He could say, "Yes, sir", the thing would be implemented, "Yes, sir", and thereafter he would go. We had the radio room like this. In fact when the radio was transferred to the vehicle and when the station was now in the vehicle the vehicle was parked just by or let's say outside of the radio room where he had the computer and the satellite phone.

Q. And did Bockarie in your experience and the time you were with the RUF, who would he defer to by answering "Yes, sir" in your recollection?

A. He could refer to Benjamin D Yeaten as sir and his chief.

Q. Apart from those two do you recall anyone else who would call him on the radio and to whom he would answer "Yes, sir"?

A. No, I can cannot confirm that.

MR BANGURA: Now, your Honours, at this stage I want to deal with the document which I had referred to earlier.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Yes.

MR BANGURA: Can the witness be shown - the document is marked ERN 00047121:

Q. Mr Witness, do you recognise that piece of paper that has been shown to you?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. What do you recognise it as?

A. It is an example of how the messages were processed. As you can see the preamble, let's say for example there is a Q. Okay. And Elongima's message was to the effect that - can you go over that again? His message was to what effect? What did he say?

A. That the men have gone on the rampage. He said they are just killing - wounding civilians.

Q. But what did he say in relation to his Sunray, meaning his commander?

A. His commander?

Q. Yes, what did he say in relation to his commander?

A. He said his commander had gone somewhere around - because he left them at certain point and told them he was going to collect ammunition.

Q. Now apart from this --

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: Sorry, what is the name of this person you just called, Mr Bangura?

MR BANGURA: Elongima.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: Did you spell that before?

MR BANGURA: He spelt that before, E-L-U-G-E-M-A:

Q. Mr Witness, would you like to spell it again, please

A. E-L-O-N-G-I-M-A

Q. Now did you follow the activities of the group in Freetown until the end of that operation?

A. We were serving duty and sometimes I was not on duty, at times I was on duty, but I could read the details from the message book.

Q. Now during the course of this operation in Freetown and you were at Buedu do you recall any communication by Bockarie with any other persons outside Sierra Leone?

A. He was in persistent communication with 020 and Base 1.

Q. Do you recall what was the subject of the communications he had with those two stations?

A. Okay. Having heard the message about the release of the prisoners from Pademba Road Prison and those that were released were the former President of Sierra Leone, Joseph Saidu Momoh, one Walter Nicholls, Dr Lee, a man who established a network African BBC, Hilton Fyle, Victor Foh and some others. This message was transmitted. In fact it was not transmitted. Base 1 intercepted that communication and later on called and 50 was called to come on the radio and to talk to our principal. Our principal requested to talk to 50 and the message was transmitted to Sunlight. Sunlight made available his principal and 50 came on the radio and then Sam Bockarie was congratulated. He said, "I have heard - I have got the information." He said, "Congratulations, job well done."

Q. Thank you, Mr Witness, but would you like to explain this again using more the names of the persons who communicated rather than their code names?

A. Sunlight.

Q. Sunlight meaning the operator for --

A. The operator for call sign Base 1.

Q. That is whose radio?

A. Benjamin D Yeaten's radio, the SSS director.

Q. Okay. So what happened? What did Sunlight do?

A. It was a conversation that was conducted between 50 and Sam Bockarie.

Q. 50 meaning?

A. SSS director, Benjamin D Yeaten, general.

Q. Thank you. And what was the conversation about?

A. Sunlight monitored that conversation and reported to his commander and then a request was made for 50 to get on the radio, because we told him that, oh, this message had already been received by Base 1.

15:17:35 Q. Which message did Sunlight monitor?

A. The release of the prisoners from Pademba Road Prison. And whilst communicating with - that was Gullit's station communicating with Sam Bockarie's radio station. Whilst communicating and Sunlight intercepted that communication -- 15:17:57 Q. From Liberia?

A. -- from Liberia and said he had got all necessary details, okay. Sam Bockarie was then informed about this message and then he came on set requesting to talk to 50 on the other side and 50 came on the radio. They had that radio conversation and in that 15:18:17 conversation 50 congratulated Sam Bockarie that indeed he had got all the details, his operator had briefed him about all that was communicated on that radio.

Q. What details? What did he specifically say about?

A. 50 stated that he had had the message of the release of the 15:18:38 prisoners from Pademba Road Prison, including ex-President Joseph Saidu Momoh.

Q. Now, how did Sunlight - or how was Sunlight able to monitor this message that was being communicated by Gullit to Sam Bockarie, the initial message? How was Sunlight able to 15:18:59 monitor that?

A. Sunlight, like I said earlier, had access to our radio net. They knew almost all our frequencies. There was nothing hidden from them on our radio network.

Q. Now, in your experience was this the first time that a

A. Most of the messages transmitted by ECOMOG were transmitted through the Morse code and those SLAs I am talking about had already been trained in Morse key code communication before joining the RUF.

15:29:30 Q. Thank you. Now, do you recall whether any other form of support was coming from outside Sierra Leone for the RUF?

A. Yes, added to the three men I have named, one other one is Ache. Ache was also part of the monitoring team.

Q. The SLA operators?

15:29:54 A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you spell that?

A. Ache Pon [phon], Ache. We only used to call it in short, Ache.

MR BANGURA: Your Honours, A-R-C-H-I-E?

15:30:11 A. Or A-C-H-E, take it like that, Ache.

Q. A-C-H-E?

A. Yes, sir.

MR BANGURA: We will go by the witness's spelling, your Honour:

15:30:20 Q. Now, was there any other support coming from outside Sierra Leone for the Freetown operation as far as you recall?

A. For Freetown operation Sam Bockarie could cross into Liberia to get materials, but really these things happened for quite so long really to have to think to recollect.

15:30:49 Q. Now, when you say Sam Bockarie could --

A. Cross into Liberia to get ammunition.

Q. Are you saying that he did cross into Liberia during that period? Is that what you are saying?

A. Yes, sir. In fact, at one time he had a call from Base 1 to report to Monrovia for briefing. He went and within 72 hours time he came back.

Q. To your recollection the Freetown invasion lasted for a certain period. .is that right?

15:31:20 A. Yes, sir.

Q. How long was it to your recollection?

A. Manoeuvring to go to Freetown, fighting in Freetown and the time of withdrawal, I think happened in three weeks time, approximately or estimatedly.

15:31:38 Q. And within that period you said Bockarie travelled to Liberia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. On a call from who?

A. From Base 1. Base 1, 020.

15:31:50 Q. Now, you have called two different radios here and meaning from two different persons. Who particularly was Bockarie answering a call to?

A. Messages were transmitted from Base 1 and reinforced by 020. Messages transmitted by 020 and reinforced by Base 1. That 15:32:16 was the kind of situation.

Q. Do you know why Bockarie was called to Liberia during that period?

A. He went, according to him, that he was called by his chief for briefing.

15:32:32 Q. And did anything happen? When he came back did you learn what had happened in Liberia?

A. He came with some materials.

Q. What happened to those materials? What materials?

A. Ammunition and commanders were called to come from Kono to receive those materials.

Q. Thank you.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: I am sorry, Mr Bangura. What command? RUF or what?

15:33:07 MR BANGURA: I will get the witness to clarify, your Honour:

Q. When you say commanders were called from Kono to get the materials, which commanders were called from Kono?

A. During that time the AFRC/RUF - the RUF was mixed up with 15:33:22 the SLAs and at that time the government soldiers were referred to as the junta forces and the RUF were called the People's Army.

Q. Now at the time of the Freetown invasion what was the state of RUF operations generally around the country, apart from the troops in Freetown? Do you recall where RUF had operations at 15:33:53 that time, or about that period?

A. Around Segbwema. Somewhere around Segbwema.

Q. And do you recall who was there, I mean which commander was there?

A. I can't recall now.

15:34:35 Q. Thank you. Now coming back to communications generally between the RUF and Liberia, the other side, generally what was the subject of these communications as far as you know? This is not limiting you now to the period of the Freetown invasion, but generally when you were at Buedu before you left to go across to 15:34:58 Liberia what would be the substance of these communications between your radio in Buedu and the radios with which you communicated in Liberia?

A. Sometimes it was Sam Bockarie requesting for ammunition.

Q. And to who would this request be made?

A. To Base 1. Base 1. And he could come on the set, sometimes communicating with 50, and he could say he is hungry and response could be, "The iron bird will come with your food."

Q. Now --

15:35:42 A. Meaning, when we talk about the iron bird we are referring to a helicopter. And food, when he says he was hungry, that is he needed a replenishment of ammunition.

MR BANGURA: Now, your Honours, I just notice that "iron bird" has come up "board":

15:35:58 THE WITNESS: Iron bird. That was the helicopter.

MR BANGURA:

Q. Right. I believe bird is intended to be the bird?

A. And sometimes this information could be transmitted by 020.

Q. 020 is the radio station at the Executive Mansion?

15:36:18 A. Executive Mansion Ground.

Q. Now Sam Bockarie, if he wanted supply of ammunition would come on the radio and would say he was hungry. Is that what you said?

A. Yes, sir.

15:36:28 Q. And Yeaten would respond saying that the iron bird was coming. How did 020, the Executive Mansion radio, get into this? How would they get into this?

A. Sometimes the message was transmitted to Base 1 and the movement of the iron bird to Foxtrot Yankee, which is Foya, could 15:36:48 be transmitted by 020.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: Excuse me, Mr Bangura, I thought Base 1 was Benjamin Yeaten?

MR BANGURA: That is so, your Honour.

THE WITNESS: That is correct.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: So Base 1, he would sometimes be communicating with 50? I thought 50 was Benjamin Yeaten.

MR BANGURA: It doesn't sound right.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: You see.

15:37:14 THE WITNESS: That might be a slip of tongue.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: I am looking at page 147, the last three lines, 22, 23 and 24, you see? He is talking of Base 1 communicating with 50. What is that?

MR BANGURA:

15:37:30 Q. Can you clarify, Mr Witness, when these communications take place - the question was specifically about communications between Bockarie and Bockarie's radio stations referring - we are referring here to Planet 1 and Marvel?

A. Yes, sir.

15:37:48 Q. Communications between Bockarie's station and the other side. The question was the other side?

A. Base 1. Base 1.

Q. So when if Bockarie was in need he would normally communicate with Base 1. Is that what you're saying?

15:38:05 A. Yes, sir.

Q. And how did 020, which is the other radio, how would they come into this?

A. There was communication between 020 and Base 1.

Q. Yes.

15:38:18 A. Requests were sometimes made to Base 1 and the acknowledgement of the movement of the iron bird, meaning the helicopter, sometimes came from 020.

Q. Now, the request, how was it made? Was it made by radio or was it made by another form of communication?

A. Sometimes by form of communication and sometimes verbally between Sam Bockarie and 50.

Q. Now when you say verbally, would they communicate on the radio?

15:38:52 A. That is when we talk about verbal communication you are having the commander himself on set and the commander in the distance on set and communication going on between them.

Q. Without the use of operators on either side? Is that what you're suggesting?

15:39:06 A. The operator trains the radio to a particular frequency and calls the commander to come on the radio. So also the other commander in the other station calls - I mean the other operator in the distance calls the commander on set - I mean the two commanders on set and they communicate directly.

15:39:26 Q. Now in these communications would there be people present in the radio room when Bockarie communicated?

A. The radio operator is obliged to be by the radio.

Q. Have you been present in any of these communications when Bockarie spoke to Benjamin Yeaten on the other side?

15:39:49 A. Yes, sir. Otherwise I would not have explained what I am explaining here today.

Q. Now you mentioned that when a request is made for weapons and to Base 1, Yeaten, that request would be transmitted to 020 which is the other radio, the radio at the Executive Mansion.

15:40:15 What would they then do when they got this request?

A. The communication we are talking about is purely about ammunitions. Ammunitions.

Q. Yes?

A. Okay.

Q. And what would be the situation when 020 got this message?
A. They are could respond by telling Bockarie to go to Foxtrot Yankee that the iron bird will be there with his food. That is to go to Foya, the helicopter would be coming with the 15:40:49 ammunition. But sometimes they could call us to tell us to expect either Zigzag and Colonel Jungle, or General Dopoe that they were en route with materials to his location in Buedu.
Q. Now you have mentioned a few names. You mentioned Colonel Jungle?
15:41:14 A. Yes, sir.
Q. Earlier in your evidence you mentioned Jungle. Are they one and the same person?
A. Jungle, yes, sir. Jungle is the same Daniel Tamba.
Q. Right. And you also have now mentioned Dopoe. Who is that 15:41:28 person?
A. Dopoe Menkarzon was said to be a special force in the NPFL, but at one point in time crossed into Sierra Leone. He was asked to return because they carried out certain operation which led to the killing of civilians in Sierra Leone. That was early 1992.
15:41:51 The operation was code named Top 20. They killed our people and the people grew annoyed. They had to in turn go on the rampage to fight against them. In fact they were saying that Corporal Sankoh was nobody, that they were only answerable to Charles Taylor. And a particular group came. After Top 20 that was 15:42:14 resisted. They again carried out another operation called Top 40. They killed our people. We could not bear it up, you know. There was that confrontation between the Liberians and the junior commandos. So they told us that their chief was working out modalities to send or dispatch a particular group that was to calm down that situation. So we received a group. They referred to them as Special Forces, SBUs. They came into Sierra Leone and they had Dopoe and others disarmed. They were sent back to Gbarnga.

15:42:52 Q. So Dopoe Menkarzon had been in Sierra Leone long before this time?

A. Yes, they were the ones that entered into Sierra Leone in 1991, but because of their mischievous attitude --

Q. Okay, thank you, Mr Witness.

15:43:04 A. He was deported. He started coming in again with arms and ammunitions at the time Sam Bockarie was in Buedu.

Q. About what time was this? When did they start coming - when did they restart coming into Buedu with arms and ammunition?

A. They started coming back to Buedu in the year 1998 and he 15:43:25 remained coming until a UN patrol team started coming into Buedu.

Q. Now you also mentioned Jungle. You had mentioned a name earlier. At what stage did Jungle get involved in the transport of material from Liberia?

A. At first he was placed in a sort of cut off like I said.

15:43:54 At some point in time in 1993 the ULIMO-K cut off the supply line between the RUF and the NPFL, but there was still a pocket of NPFL fighters along the Sierra Leone-Liberian border. So when ECOMOG came to disarm those combatants including Colonel Jungle came on the side of the RUF and he was in Buedu with 15:44:26 Sam Bockarie.

Q. About what time did he actually join Sam Bockarie in Buedu?

A. This started - 1996 he started coming. But at that time the road was still blocked.

Q. So when did he actually get involved in transporting --

A. 1998.
Q. '98?
A. Yes.
Q. When in 1998?
15:44:49 A. In 1998 after the ECOMOG intervention in Freetown.
Q. And you mentioned also that Dopoe Menkarzon started coming back into Sierra Leone with materials from Liberia in '98. About what time in '98?
A. After ECOMOG intervention.
15:45:10 Q. Now ECOMOG intervention we know was in what --
A. After ECOMOG intervention and Sam Bockarie retreated from Kenema back to Buedu.
Q. Was it very long after the intervention that we are talking about?
15:45:25 A. No, not. Not too long.
Q. Now what about Zigzag Marzah, do you know when he started coming into Sierra Leone with materials?
A. The same time. The same time. And of course that Zigzag was SOD, Special Operational Division.
15:45:42 Q. And which unit is that?
A. There was a unit in Liberia called SOD. Those were Charles Taylor's security forces.
Q. Now these three men that you have just mentioned, now on whose instructions did they come to Sierra Leone with material?
15:46:02 A. They could - in fact it was Sam Bockarie who told us that his chief had told him that certain people were coming and the operators could tell us. If it was Zigzag that was coming they could tell us that Zigzag would be at your location, he has moved. And if it were Jungle we were informed before that Jungle was on the way coming.

Q. How would you be informed?
A. By the radio. The radio was meant for free flow of communication. There was nothing hidden.
15:46:36 Q. With these messages that came about material, were they messages that were written down or were they just -
A. Some of the messages. In fact transmitting messages about the movement of materials were put into code.
Q. When you say they were put into code, would they not be 15:47:00 decoded using the normal code charts --
A. They were --
Q. -- that the operators had?
A. They were put into code. When our messages are put into code they are then sent to be transcribed and recorded into the 15:47:14 operational books.
Q. Okay. Now, how frequently did these men bring materials from Liberia to your recollection?
A. One cannot really state that they brought materials that has taken five days and other materials is going to be sent, no, 15:47:40 but it was happening regularly.
Q. How regular? Weekly, monthly?
A. One cannot be precise on that, really, but this is the kind of situation that I witnessed myself.
Q. How were the materials - how was the transaction initiated?
15:48:12 You have said that Bockarie, when he needed, he would indicate that he was hungry and then how would the request be processed from the other side?
A. We could at times send message requesting for materials, ammunitions, in code, and they could in turn receive the message, process it and the response would be transmitted to us, either telling Bockarie to go to Foya, or telling us about the movement of those men - any of those men I have mentioned into Buedu, or sometimes to Foya. It was not certain: Today it is going to be a helicopter flying from Monrovia to Foya with ammunition and tomorrow it is going to be materials brought by Colonel Jungle, either from Monrovia with the helicopter, or by the helicopter, and moving from Foya on land. We had vehicles there in Foya. When the helicopter came to Foya the materials were then loaded into the vehicle and taken to Buedu.

Q. Now, was it --

A. Let me make that point clear. The flying of ammunitions from Monrovia to Foya really came into being when the insurgents, as the Liberians referred to them, the insurgents started attacking Lofa, Voinjama and its environs.

Q. When was this?

A. That was some time in 1999 and onwards to the last date we closed down our communication.

Q. Before this time how were materials transported from Liberia to Sierra Leone?

A. On land. On land. Sam Bockarie could go to Monrovia and come with ammunitions in a vehicle. He had a ten tyre truck that he was travelling by quite often into Liberia and back, but the flying started when there was a threat in Lofa County. Fighting was taking place in Lofa County. That was the time they strategised the flying of ammunitions by air to Foya. we had a special group of armed men assigned in Foya and that group included one FOC and one other Takpo. They were in Foya. They were there to take care of - to keep security at the airfield.

A. Yes, I can remember travelling to Foya. What I told the investigator last, I was not sure really whether it was during the time of the Freetown operation, that was yet to be confirmed. But I could remember travelling to Foya, myself, Zedman and one operator, Tolo, were on board one of those communication vehicles.

Q. Which one of the communication vehicles?

A. The one we had Marvel planted in. We went to Foya. In fact at first he travelled to Foya and then he was flown into Monrovia. He told us he was called by the chief. So he went to Monrovia. After 72 hours he came back and we were called to receive him at Foya. So those materials - in fact what we saw coming from the helicopter were bales of jeans, were bales of jeans, but when we got to Buedu on the contrary we saw the content of those bales were ammunitions and the ammunitions were handed over to the G4 in Buedu called Captain Felix.

Q. Now, Mr Witness, you started by saying that you told the investigator, and you're not sure whether this was in the - around the Freetown invasion. Are you referring to the time that you went on this trip to Foya? Is that what you were trying to say?

A. Yes, sir, together with about 18 of his bodyguards.

Q. Now this trip to Foya, was it before you left Buedu for your assignment in Liberia?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. Right. And you say Bockarie had left before you went to Buedu on a call to Monrovia. Is that right?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And you say he was called by who?
A. By his chief. That was what he told us. That after the satellite conversation he was called by his chief and he was travelling to Monrovia.
16:06:18 Q. And your understanding of his chief was?
A. Charles Taylor. That was what he told us.
Q. And he came back, you said, 72 hours later?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. Where did he come?
16:06:34 A. To Foya and that very day back to Buedu.
Q. And you were informed that he was back at Foya. Did you get informed before he arrived at Foya?
A. We were informed by the radio station 020 and also Base 1.
Q. Those are the radio stations in Liberia?
16:06:56 A. In Liberia.
Q. What were you specifically informed about?
A. That Log was on his way back to Foya.
Q. And so you went to Foya?
A. Yes, sir.
16:07:12 Q. Yourself and who?
A. We were on board the other vehicle and that vehicle was to be used to transport those materials to Foya.
Q. Now when you say the other vehicle, which vehicle are you talking about?
16:07:23 A. Marvel. There was another Land Cruiser which we had the radio Marvel planted in.
Q. Right. And so you got to Foya. What happened when you got there?
A. Sam Bockarie came on the helicopter.

Q. Who arrived there first, yourselves or the helicopter that brought him?

A. We were there. We were there before his arrival. We had already received information about his movement and we set in for Foya.

Q. So you were there when the helicopter arrived?

A. Yes, sir.

Q. And what happened when it arrived?

A. The drivers were commanded to load those vehicles with those bales of jeans.

Q. Now you said that those bales of jeans contained ammunition. How did you know this?

A. When we got to the base, to Mosquito's ground --

Q. Where?

A. In Buedu. It was in Buedu those bales were dismantled and he said that he is doing that not for any other purpose but really to keep security, because journalists, according to him, were going to Foya to really see the relationship that was going on between the RUF and the Liberian side. So those materials were concealed. Myself, I knew the content of those bales were ammunitions when we arrived at Buedu.

MR BANGURA: Your Honours, the last answer started with in and I don't quite make out what --

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: The word is Buedu.

MR BANGURA: Buedu comes up later in the sentence.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: No, the sentence reads, "In Buedu" full stop. "It was mainly in Buedu that those bales were dismantled."

MR BANGURA: Thank you, your Honour:

Q. Now you said the reason for them being concealed in jeans was to?

A. To maintain security.
Q. How did you know this?
A. Sam Bockarie told us everything when he arrived.
16:09:44 Q. Now do you recall any other shipment of arms and ammunition or other material, very specific ones, not the general?
A. I have said materials were - ammunitions were coming in.
Q. Now how frequently would you recall that these materials came in?
16:10:31 A. Materials were requested for when operations were going on on the front lines.
Q. And were these requests ever denied?
A. No, no, only sometimes when requisition was made he was told to wait a little while.
16:10:55 JUDGE SEBUTINDE: Mr Bangura, the witness's testimony has been that materials means ammunition, but you then go on to ask him a question can he tell us of any other shipment where arms and ammunition were shipped, so I don't know.
MR BANGURA: Your Honours, I believe I had in the 16:11:15 previous --
THE WITNESS: I have explained in the particular --
MR BANGURA: Mr Witness, just hold on, please. I believe I had in a previous question asked him what the material consisted of apart from ammunition, but I will get the witness to say 16:11:28 again:
Q. Mr Witness, apart from ammunition, the materials that were brought from Liberia, what did they include apart from ammunition?
A. Medicine, petrol and food. And I said during General of the dates when you were interviewed, is that correct?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. We looked last week at some of those occasions and I am not going to go over that material again, but I will just go through it, as it were, to tick off those dates. So we start on the first page of tab 17. We have looked already at box number 1, 28 August. That was prior to your first interview. The first interview was in the second box, 30 August, and we looked at that. We also looked at the next interview in box number 3 where you received 50,000 leones, the same as box number 2, for transport, meals and lost wages, and again the third interview, on 4 September, the same sum for the same reasons.

If you go over the page, please, box number 5 is Friday, 8 September. Again the same amount of money, 50,000 leones, for meals, transport and lost wages. Now, number 5, 8 September, follows on from number 4 which is 4 September, but we know that you were interviewed in between those two dates: On 5 September and then again on 6 September, but there are no sums recorded for those two dates of interview.

The next time you were interviewed after 8 September, in box 6, was 17 September, but there is no receipt for that date, or on that date as such. The next receipt we see is box 6. Can you have a look at that, please. Friday, September 29th 2006, transport and lost wages, 15,000 leones. No reference to meals there. Can you pause for a moment and just think back. Was there ever a time when you went along to see the Prosecution for an interview, but they didn't at the end of that interview, on that day, hand over the money to you, they gave it to you at some later date? Did that ever happen, or did you always get it on the same day as you have told us both this morning and last week?

A. No, I can't recall that. The one you have spoken about, I don't think I was given the money on that same day.
Q. Well, I am not going to spend a long time on this, but the 09:37:56 one I have spoken about is 17 September 2006. How can you now remember whether on 17 September 2006, one out of 26 different days on which you were interviewed, that on that specific date you weren't given the money on the day?
A. Well, as we go along discussing issues about the monies
09:38:43 then maybe my - I will reflect and recall about the money issues that you are talking about. That was why I said so.
Q. The question I asked you is how can you remember on 7 April 2008 that on the day you were interviewed, 17 September 2006, on that particular day they didn't give you the money there and 09:39:10 then, they gave it you at some other time? How can you remember that now?
A. Well, I want to tell you that the date you are talking about I can't recall it actually, but I recall that there were days that I went there that they did not give me money and I 09:39:35 returned.
Q. Well, can you recall saying in the last eight minutes that every time you were interviewed you were paid? You certainly said that when I first asked you about this last week?
A. Yes, I said it. I have said it. I have not denied that.
09:40:09 Q. Are you now saying that you have got that wrong and there were in fact days on which they didn't pay you?
A. Well, it was not a large amount, but I think they were always giving me money, but if I am not mistaken I think it was just about two times that I was not given money, but the money was later given to me.

Q. Let me see if I have understood that. Are you saying that there were about two occasions on which they didn't give you any money on the day, but they gave it to you later, or are you saying there were about two occasions on which they gave you no money at all, either on the day or at any time after that?

A. I said they gave me the money later.

Q. All right. After 17 September the next time you were interviewed was 1 October 2006. In fact, in box 6, Friday 29 September, you are given 15,000 leones, although that wasn't a date on which you were interviewed. You were interviewed two days later on Sunday, 1 October; but if you look at box 7, which is the next one in time after box 6, that relates to 23 December 2006 when you were given 40,000 leones for meals, transport and lost wages again. Now, in the meantime, between 29 September and 23 December, you had been interviewed on 1 October, 8 October, 11 December and 23 December, the same date of the next receipt in box 7. Were there four occasions when you received - well, let me put that in another way. Were there three occasions on which you can think that you weren't paid at all in October and December 2006, or is the position that you just don't know now?

A. Well, I can't recall now.

Q. Box 8, 20,000 for meals, transport and lost wages, another Sunday. You said last week that you wouldn't lose wages on a Sunday. Do you still maintain that?

A. I don't sell on Sundays.

Q. No, all right. Box 8, Sunday 28 January, meals, transport and lost wages. Lost wages there for that Sunday, is that a mystery to you as to why they would pay you for lost wages?

A. Well, maybe that is the procedure of their own job. I cannot dispute that.

Q. Box 9, please. Another Sunday, 4 February, which was indeed a date on which you were interviewed. The reason given 09:45:01 there is "monies provided to witness to enable clarification interview on 4 February 2007", that is the Sunday, another 20,000 for meals, transport and lost wages.

The next occasion on which you were interviewed was 8 February 2007, but there is no payment specific to that date in 09:45:31 this document. The next date where there is a payment is box 10, Wednesday 21 February 2007, "monies provided during interview with witness management unit/investigations on 21 to 22 February 2007". Now, I just want to ask you - I don't want to know the detail, certainly not at the moment at any rate. Did you have 09:46:13 interviews with the witness management unit/investigations on 21 and 22 February 2007, that is just over a year ago, that you can now remember?

A. Well, the people who were there, all I know is that they are Special Court workers who are there, who normally went to 09:46:53 call me. So I can't tell the difference between them to say this person is this and that other person is that, but all I know is that they were all Special Court people, so when they needed me they called me.

MR MUNYARD: Would your Honour bear with me for just a 09:47:10 moment:

Q. This is a document supplied to us by the Prosecution, you understand, not from court staff as such. Can you remember being interviewed on two consecutive days, one day after another, in late February last year by somebody in the Prosecution?

A. Well, I can't recall that now because it has taken a long time, but I know that those things have been happening.

Q. Right. We don't have any interviews for either of those dates, so if you were interviewed on those dates then that brings the total number of days on which you were interviewed to 28. Again, 40,000 for transport, lost wages and meals on 21 February. The next box is Monday, 26 February 2006 and it is described as follows, "reimbursement provided to witness during clarification by Witness Management Unit on same date", presumably meaning the date Monday, 26 February 2007. 20,000 for meals, lost wages and transportation then. We don't have any document relating to an interview on that date, but if you were interviewed on that date by the Prosecution then that would bring it to 29 separate dates.

The next time you were interviewed you were interviewed on 14 and then on 15 June 2007.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Just pause a moment, Mr Munyard. Did you ask - I didn't record or hear a reply when you put the 26 February interview to the witness.

MR MUNYARD: Yes, to be fair to the witness I think the only thing he could say is "yes" because I was simply putting the fact in evidence that this document demonstrates that there was an interview on that date, 26 February.

09:49:51

MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honour, I would say that is a matter of interpretation of grammar: Whether "on same date" refers to the reimbursement, or the clarification.

09:50:11

PRESIDING JUDGE: I think you have a question on record, Mr Munyard. In fairness to the witness he should be allowed to answer it.

MR MUNYARD: I completely agree. Shall I put it again?

PRESIDING JUDGE: I think it would be best. Put it again.

MR MUNYARD: I will put it again in a way I hope the witness is able to answer:

Q. Mr Mongor, if you have a look at box 11 the date is Monday, 26 February 2007. On that date you were given 20,000 leones for meals, lost wages and transport and the reason that is specified there is "reimbursements provided to witness during clarification by Witness Management Unit on same date". Now, do you have any memory now of being paid for - or being paid on that date during a clarification interview?

A. Well, the date that you are talking about I can't recall now because it has taken a long time, but I received money, but I can't recall the dates.

Q. Right, but do you agree that the document suggests that you were paid money for an interview on Monday, 26 February 2007?

MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honour, I would object because that is asking this witness to give an opinion as to the grammar of that sentence and what it means and I would say since clarification by WMU, WMU does not do the clarification. So clarification - "reimbursements provided to witness during clarification by WMU on same date", to me it is quite clear what the meaning of that is and I don't think it is proper to ask the witness to give his interpretation of the English.

MR MUNYARD: I am very happy for my learned friend to give what his interpretation is. I, of course, have nothing to do with the WMU of the Prosecution. He will know better than me.

MR KOUMJIAN: I would just point out that it is logical that WMU does not do clarifications. They to do do reimbursements, so if it says "reimbursement by WMU on this date" that is what took place.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Thank you for that clarification, Mr Koumjian. Likewise I am not aware of the bureaucratic procedures, but clarification is now before us and it would appear that "on the same date" refers to --

MR MUNYARD: Can I have a try at this and Mr Koumjian will correct me if I have got it wrong:

Q. Mr Mongor, it appears that you were paid by the Witness Management Unit on the same date, i.e. Monday 26 February 2007, for your expenses during a clarification interview. Do you agree?

A. Yes, I agree that I received money, but I can't recall the date now, my Lord.

MR MUNYARD: All right, thank you. Can I invite the Prosecution to supply us with records of the interviews referred to in both boxes 10 and 11?

MR KOUMJIAN: Yes, thank you, your Honour. I want to make it absolutely clear that the Prosecution has provided the Defence with all interviews with this witness and if there is a record of a payment on a certain day we have checked all interviews have been provided to the Defence of this witness.

MR MUNYARD:

Q. Box 12, please. Mr Mongor, the next date on which you are paid anything is Thursday, 29 November 2007. It is for communication and it is 30,000 leones. Now, that is some nine months after the previous payment in February of 2007. In the meantime, we know that you were interviewed on 14 and then on 15 June 2007 and on 25 and then on 26 July 2007. So that is four separate dates between boxes 11 and 12. Do you have any recollection of not being paid for four interviews in the middle of last year?

A. I can't recall now concerning the dates you are talking about.

09:56:02 Q. Box 12, 29 November 2007, you were interviewed on that date. Then if we go over the page to box 13, Wednesday 5 December 2007, again for communication another 30,000 leones. You had been interviewed the previous day on 4 December 2007. Do you now know what you were either given money for, or what given 09:56:38 something to the value of 30,000 leones for communication means?

A. Well, I can recall that the 30,000 that you are talking about was for me to buy a top-up card for my phone.

Q. Right. The next box, 14, Wednesday 5 December 2007, 120,000 leones for communication. Was that top-up cards, or was 09:57:18 that something else? Sorry, it is the same date, but it is a separate receipt.

A. I received that money they gave me.

Q. And what was it for?

A. Well, I had requested for communication business so they 09:57:55 gave it to me.

Q. Yes, but what do you mean by communication business? It is four times as much as the two previous payments of 30,000 which were top-up cards.

A. Yes.

09:58:15 Q. What was this one for?

A. Well, the 120,000 leones that you are talking about was given to me and I used some for communication business. That is also to buy some top-ups for my phone. Then the remaining, I used it for meals.

Q. So can you remember now how much you spent of it on communication, on top-ups?

A. Well, I can't recall everything now. To say that I can recall everything now and give you the exact amount that I used on communication I cannot recall it now, but I am sure that I was given money for me to buy top-up and put it into my phone most times.

Q. Can I just clarify something with you and I know you told us last week, but can you remember the date when you came to The Hague this year?

A. I came here in January.

Q. Right.

A. That was the time I came to The Hague.

Q. All right, thank you. Any idea now whether it was early January, late January? Can you be any more specific than that?

A. I can say it was in late January that I came here.

Q. All right. The next tab, please, number 18. I think the witness is still on the previous tab. Yes, thank you. Mr Mongor, this is a further sum of money that was expended in relation to you and your family by the Witness and Victim Service. That is a separate body of the Court, different from the Prosecution. You can see there, in paragraph numbered 2, "subsistence allowance", that you were brought under the protection of the Court on 10 March 2007, that is just about 13 months ago, and since then, to 26 February of this year, you have been paid a total as follows: A subsistence allowance of 7,852,000 leones. Now, I don't want to know details of any addresses, or anything like that, but did you move house at all on or around 10 March 2007? I am not talking about coming to The Hague. I am talking about when you were still in Sierra Leone.

A. Yes, my Lord.
Q. Right. Was your rent paid for on or after that date, around 10 March of last year?
10:02:48 A. Well, it was the Court that paid. I did not pay myself.
Q. Thank you. As well as having your rent paid for, were you also provided with money for food for you and your family?
A. Yes, my Lord.
Q. So is this right: That the Court provided you with an 10:03:14 allowance? They paid money to you to pay for the food for yourself and your family since around 10 March last year?
A. Yes, my Lord.
Q. In addition to that, we see under the heading "Other Expenditure", medical 234,600 leones. Now, I don't want to know 10:03:46 the details of that, but were those medical expenses for you, or for your family, or for both you and your family?
A. It was for me and my family.
Q. Right. Childcare 660,000 leones. Again, I don't want to know any of the detail, but were you paying for childcare before 10:04:20 10 March 2007, or not?
A. Before coming to the Court, is that what you mean?
Q. No, this is all since 10 March 2007 that these payments appear to have been made and I am just trying to find out whether these were payments to you that constituted a benefit to you that 10:04:54 you hadn't had before. Now, if you want me to explain that in a different way I will, but do you follow? If you hadn't had to pay for childcare before March 2007, then receiving 660,000 leones for childcare after that date would be a benefit to you, wouldn't it?

A. No, my Lord.
Q. Is it no that you didn't have to pay for childcare before March 2007, or no it wasn't a benefit to you?
A. I was paying for childcare.
10:05:45 Q. Right. Before March 2007, before you moved?
A. Yes, my Lord.
Q. So after that date the Court paid for the childcare, is that right?
A. Yes, my Lord.
10:06:07 Q. So that was a sum that you no longer had to find out of your own pocket because the Court were now paying for it, is that right?
A. Yes, my Lord.
Q. Transportation 285,000 leones. Can you just give us, in 10:06:32 very broad terms, some understanding of what your transportation costs were after March of 2007? Where was it you were having - what travel were you having to do that the Court paid for? Again, I don't want to know addresses, or locations. I just want the know in general terms.
10:06:59 A. What? To say what?
Q. We see here a figure of 285,000 leones for transportation. Was this transportation cost something that you had to undertake because of your move, or what was it for?
A. Well, I think those were the monies given to me for 10:07:40 transportation. That is what I totalled up to that amount. That is what I want to believe.
Q. Right. What transportation was involved?
A. Yes, sometimes I went to the provinces. Sometimes I used taxi and the puda pudas that went to the provinces.

Q. Did you go to the provinces as part of your giving assistance to the Prosecution, or were you going to the provinces for your own personal reasons?

A. Well, I did not go to the provinces on behalf of the 10:08:44 Prosecution, but I went to the provinces to visit my other family members.

Q. Right, and the Court paid for that?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. So again that was something that you didn't have to pay for 10:09:02 out of your own pocket?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. And so that was a benefit to you?

A. Well, it was the Court that told me that if I was planning to visit anywhere, to go anywhere, I should inform them. So that 10:09:29 was the assistance that they used to give me.

Q. Right. Then finally we have got rent, maintenance and utility bills, 1,039 dollars, the equivalent to 3,117,000 leones. Now, you told us when I was asking you about the 7,852,000 leones up above that they paid your rent and they also paid you money 10:10:04 for food and so on, but the rent appears as a separate figure down here, the equivalent of just over 3 million leones. So does this follow: That the 7,852,000 up above must relate to food only?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. The grand total there is 14,337,000 leones. Do you see 10:10:45 that?

A. I have seen it there, my Lord.

Q. And out of that the medical expences, the childcare, some of the transportation and the food payments are all a benefit to you, aren't they?

A. These were things that I used to do before. I did it myself. So if I was - so I was now under their auspices, then maybe that was the way their office operated, so I had no objection against it, my Lord.

10:11:37

Q. Well, I am not suggesting that you would object, Mr Mongor. The one thing I haven't asked you about is the heading, "Miscellaneous". Do you see that down there in that list just below "Transportation", 2,223,400 leones? Miscellaneous presumably means all sorts of other bits and pieces that don't fall in the categories we have looked at so far. Can you give us some idea of what you were given money for that didn't fall under the headings that we have looked at thus far?

10:12:01

A. Well, I lost my phone, my communication set, at one time and at that time even when they tried to contact me they couldn't get me and so I made them understand that I lost my phone, so they assisted me with a new phone at that time. So some of those things they did them.

10:12:41

Q. Right. A new phone wouldn't cost 2 million leones, would it? What else? Could you give us some other examples?

10:13:05

A. It wouldn't cost 2 million leones, but I think I have been requesting from them sometimes - in fact, I can recall when my father was sick, when he was admitted in the hospital I informed them and they gave me some money.

Q. Yes, they gave you some money for what?

A. Well, I asked them to assist me because my father was sick and it is because you are talking about other things that were expenditures that they did to me, that did not concern food and other things, and I have told you about the issue of the phone and I have told you about the other assistance that they gave me, like the case of my father. When I asked them, they assisted me.

Q. Yes, but doesn't your father's visit to hospital come up the category of medical that we have already looked at? I asked you if it covered both yourself and your family and you said it did cover your family as well.

A. Yes.

Q. So that wouldn't come under miscellaneous, would it? Can you give us examples of anything else, apart from buying you a new telephone, that would come under the category of miscellaneous?

A. Well, there were so many things, but some of them I might have forgotten now. These were monies that they assisted me with. Actually I can't recall all of them now, but I believe that they gave me money. Even at the time my father was in Liberia and at that time he was sick, I recall that I informed them and even at that time when I was about to travel to go there, I informed them about that also. They helped me with money also. All of those things.

Q. Right. Well, that would come under transportation, wouldn't it?

A. Yes, it should come under transportation. I am not disagreeing with that fact.

Q. Not miscellaneous. Is there anything else you can think of that isn't covered in the categories above, apart from a mobile phone, that would account for the expenditure of some 2 million plus leones?

A. I might have forgotten, really.

Q. Can we go back, please, to tab 2.

the moment.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Witness, did you say that SAJ Musa did not voice his opinion to you, or did not voice his opinion to "us"?

11:02:51 THE WITNESS: To us.

MR MUNYARD: All right. Right, Madam President, are we ready to move on from that one?

PRESIDING JUDGE: Please proceed.

MR MUNYARD: Thank you:

11:03:23 Q. Mr Mongor, I want you to think carefully about this question that I am going to ask you now. When you were first being interviewed by the Prosecution, was it your position that Charles - that you didn't really know anything about Charles Taylor's role, if any, in the invasion of Freetown on 6 January 11:03:50 1999?

A. Yes, if my memory serves me well maybe I said that.

Q. And is that right: That you didn't really know anything about Charles Taylor's role, if any, in the invasion of Freetown in January 1999?

11:04:29 A. Well, I did not know initially, but later I came to know.

Q. Well, I don't want to be unfair to you. When you say "later I came to know", what do you mean by that? When is later?

A. When communication started going on.

Q. Right. Let me make it perfectly plain, I am not talking to 11:05:00 you about the time that these things were happening, 1998 and 1999. I am talking about your discussions, your interviews, with the Prosecution that start at the end of August 2006. Now, when you were first being interviewed by the Prosecution in 2006, you couldn't really tell them anything about Charles Taylor's involvement in the invasion of Freetown on 6 January 1999 because you didn't know anything about it, did you? Do you agree?

A. I want you to ask that question again. Let me understand it well.

11:06:00 Q. Right. You start to be interviewed at the end of August 2006 and you are then interviewed many times in 2006 and again many times in 2007. When the Prosecution first started to ask you questions about Charles Taylor's involvement, if any, in the invasion of Freetown on 6 January 1999, you told them you didn't 11:06:45 really know anything about whether or not he had any part in that, didn't you?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. And that was the truth, wasn't it?

A. That was what I said.

11:07:05 Q. What you first said to them, that you didn't know anything about Charles Taylor's involvement in the invasion of Freetown, was true, wasn't it? You didn't have any knowledge about Charles Taylor being involved in the plan to attack Freetown in January 1999, did you?

11:07:31 A. I told them that, my Lord.

Q. Thank you. There came a later stage later on when you started to tell them a story along the lines of the evidence that you had given to us in March, namely that Charles Taylor had told Sam Bockarie that you should attack all these other towns and 11:08:06 then move on to Freetown. That is right, isn't it?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. Why did you tell them that Charles Taylor had the plan to attack Freetown later on when earlier you had told the Prosecution that you really didn't know anything about his involvement in the invasion of Freetown in January 1999?

A. Yes, I said that.
Q. No, why did you change your story - hang on - later on, when you were being interviewed later on, having originally said 11:08:53 that you don't know anything about Charles Taylor's involvement in the attack on Freetown in January 1999?
A. When they asked me whether I was saying the truth, what I was talking was the truth, and they said they wanted me to say the truth, I said, "Well, the plan was something that Mosquito 11:09:19 brought and he explained to us that it was he and the Pa who discussed that we should attack all the other areas and then advance on Freetown and capture there." That was the time I told them, "Okay, I will tell you the truth. This was what Mosquito explained to us when he returned."
11:09:47 Q. So why didn't you tell the Prosecutors that when they were first asking you about what, if anything, you knew of Charles Taylor's involvement in the attack on Freetown in January 1999.
A. Yes, I did not initially tell them, but later when they asked me they said to me that they wanted me to say the truth 11:10:19 about what I was explaining and then I also told them that, "I don't want to lie. Now I will tell you the truth." I said, "This plan came from Mr Taylor and it was when Sam Bockarie returned that he brought the whole plan that the attacks should go on", and that was the time I told them that.
11:10:43 Q. Right, so before you were ever interviewed by the Prosecution you knew all along that the plan to attack Freetown was Charles Taylor's idea, yes?
A. Yes, I knew.
Q. When they first start interviewing you were you telling them lies?

A. I did not tell them at all.

Q. I am going to try again on that one. When they first asked you, "What can you tell us about Charles Taylor's involvement in the attack on Freetown in January 1999?", did you tell them the truth, or did you tell them lies?

11:11:21

A. I did not tell them the truth. At the start, at the first time, I did not tell them the truth, but later I came out plain to them.

11:11:50

Q. Would you like to explain to the learned judges why you claim that you lied to the Prosecution in the early stages of your interviews?

A. What did you say, sir?

Q. Would you like to explain to the learned judges sitting there why you lied to the Prosecution in the early stages of your interviews?

A. Well I myself who is sitting here now I thought those things were strategies that the people used and, although they had told me that they had nothing to do with me, I think it was something that they were doing to cajole me so that later they will be able to get me round and to arrest me for something. But later when they actually told me that I shouldn't hide anything away from them, I should tell them the truth, and then I later came out to plain to them and said, "Okay, I will tell you the truth", and I said to them that, "Yes, this plan was a plan that came from Liberia and it was Mosquito that brought it that we should carry out the attack".

Q. Right, let us look at what you have just told us:

"I thought those things were strategies that the people used and, although they had told me that they had nothing to do with me, I think it was something they were doing to cajole me so that later they will be able to get me round and to arrest me for something".

11:13:46 On 12 September of 2006 you had been given a letter granting you immunity from prosecution, hadn't you?

A. They told me that.

Q. You have told us this morning that you knew before you ever started being interviewed by them that they were going to give 11:14:09 you this letter. Did you think that the letter might not be worth the paper that it was written on? Is that what you are saying?

A. Well it worth it, but I am a human being. I needed to think. Sometimes somebody will write something on a piece of 11:14:40 paper and then I will read it and sometimes what is said in the paper then I will just look at it that way, but equally so I am a human being. I had my own way to feel about it.

Q. So, you were still worried? Despite having had the promise of immunity, you were still worried that they might actually 11:15:10 charge you with an offence and you would end up being on trial in front of this Court. Is that right?

A. At times I had the feelings in mind and sometimes I thought over them, but sometimes again I will sit down and say, "What actually did I do? I did not do anything", but as a human being 11:15:38 you will be sure - you will not be cock sure, so sometimes I sat down and said, "Maybe these things will happen, or maybe they will not happen", and sometimes I had a free mind and sometimes I had it in mind I thought that it was going to end up this way.

Q. So, have I understood you correctly? Throughout 2006 are you saying that you were still worried that they might prosecute you even though you were co-operating with them?

A. Yes, I was co-operating with them. Yes, I had really accepted to talk to them and they also had assured me that they were not going to do anything to me, but at the same time I had a shaky heart.

Q. Right, and because of your shaky heart you decided you wouldn't tell them the truth about some things. Is that right?

A. Well it was when I started, but later when they actually assured me I said, "Okay", this thing - I decided to give in and I decided to tell the truth. So whether anything was going to happen to me now let it just happen, whether they were going to kill me let them kill me, but I said, "Okay, I will say the truth", but as long as I wanted peace for myself and I also wanted peace for them I decided to give in to say the truth to them.

Q. So, in how many interviews did you tell them lies?

A. Well I don't think I can recall that it was so and so interview, but based on this particular interview that we are talking about I decided to give in myself and say the truth. And as long as I wanted peace I decided to say the truth and if anything was going to happen after that let it happen, but I said I will say the truth to them.

Q. Let me see if I have understood, Mr Mongor. You were worried that they would still prosecute you and so you decided that you would give them more information that they wanted to hear in order that they would not prosecute you. Is that what you are saying?

A. No, my Lord, not what they wanted to hear that I told them only to satisfy them, but I am saying that I gave in myself so that I will say the truth for the sake of peace. This was the reason why I was willing to say the truth for to them, but I am not saying that this was any reason just for me to say something 11:19:06 that will satisfy them. I was not trying to satisfy them at all.

Q. Did you feel at any stage during the whole interview process that you were being pressed by them?
A. What is the pressed, my Lord?
Q. You understood it last week because you said when I used 11:19:33 the same term, "No, I wasn't being pressed by them". Have another go at that question, please, and try and give me an honest answer. Did you feel that you were being pressed by the Prosecution to give them information at any stage during the interview process?
11:20:03 A. Well, when you talk about press I take it that it is just like when you press somebody to say something that you want to satisfy you. That was not the case actually. It was not the case that I was being pressed just to say, okay, say this, or say this or say that. That was not what they were doing to me.
11:20:33 Q. Are you sure about that?
A. But at times they asked me question and later they will ask me the same question. Like, for instance, if they asked me a question today and when I went some other time when I came back they will ask me that same question. Something like that.
11:20:53 Q. Yes. In fact, you do know what pressed means because last week you asked me to stop pressing you. Do you remember that? Do you recall?
A. Yes, I recall when I told you not to press me. It was when you were asking me over and over, over and over.

Q. Right. Was there ever a time when the Prosecution made it clear to you that they really wanted more information out of you than you were currently giving them and that there must be more information you could give them?

11:21:42 A. They wanted more information from me based on the roles that I played and the things that I knew about for me to come out plain and explain to them.

Q. Mr Mongor, just tell the learned judges, would you, some of the lies that you told in the first interviews? Give them some 11:22:07 example of things you told the Prosecution that were lies.

A. Well I can't recall now, except this topic that we are discussing on now concerning the J6 that we were discussing, I told you that initially I did not tell them with regards Mr Taylor's plans. But when they later told me that, "We 11:22:50 actually want you to tell this Court the truth", and then I also accepted that I will be willing to say the truth, then I decided to come out plain, but if you think there is any other that you have recognised or that you have realised that I did that I had not said initially that I have not been able to say now, you come

11:23:11 up with it and then I will answer before this Court plainly that, yes, that is it.

Q. Well, I am not going to rise to the challenge. You just tell us - tell the Court - how it was to your advantage not to tell them the truth about Charles Taylor's involvement in the 11:23:41 attack on Freetown on January 6th 1999?

A. Well I don't know about any advantage that you are talking at, my Lord.

Q. You have told the Court this morning a series of questions - sorry, a series of answers and I am just going to go through

A. Yes, I have it.

Q. It is headed "Additional information provided by witness TF1-532", that's you. "The witness gave the following additional information in the course of proofing interviews on 16 and 20 February in The Hague." Then it also says, "This material has not been reviewed with the witness or read back to him."

I am now going to review at least one passage of it and read it back to you to see if you agree that this is an accurate note of what you told the Prosecutors just a few weeks ago here in The Hague. I would like you to go to the third paragraph from the bottom where there is a sentence that starts, "In discussing the Magburaka plane shipment." Would you let us know when you have got that?

A. I have seen it, my Lord.

Q. Let's read it and see what you say about this:

"In discussing the Magburaka plane shipment the witness said that the shipment received included two single barrel AA guns with ammunition."

Is that right? Have they recorded that correctly?

A. It is correct.

Q. "And GMG ammunition." Did you tell them that?

A. I told them.

Q. General machine gun, I think. "But did not include any AK-47 ammunition." Did you tell them that?

A. I told them.

Q. "Which limited the military benefit of the shipment." Did you tell them that? Did you tell them that by not including any ammunition for your AK-47s that rather limited the value of what you'd received in the Magburaka airdrop?

A. Yes, I told them.
Q. "He understood the shipment was from Libya." Did you tell them that?
A. I told them that.
10:18:48 Q. So why was it, Mr Mongor, that not five minutes ago you told this Court that you didn't know about any arms from Libya?
A. Yes, the reason why I said so, it was because you were talking about the RUF and this particular shipment was not for the RUF. It was Johnny Paul through whom this particular 10:19:23 shipment came. So that was why I said when you are talking about the RUF arms deal and money issues with Libya, I told you I don't know about that.
Q. I asked you at page 19, on my screen line 12, "Do you know anything at all about arms from Libya?" Answer, line 13,
10:19:55 "I don't know about arms from Libya."

MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honour, to be fair to the witness the context - I believe we should begin reading from line 6. Line 6 on my screen. I have font 14. It begins with, "You know perfectly well."

10:20:15 MR MUNYARD: Yes, that's line 7 on mine, but there you are.

"Q. You know perfectly well that the RUF and in particular Foday Sankoh was in contact with Libya seeking either arms or money for arms during the mid-1990s, don't you?
A. I don't know whether he had direct contact with Libya
10:20:35 for arms and ammunition.
Q. Do you know anything at all about arms from Libya?
A. I don't know about arms from Libya."

That is in the context of the RUF seeking arms from Libya in the mid-1990s. I hope I have properly put it into context

Q. So you told them there, did you, that the Magburaka arms came from Liberia?

A. Yes, it came from Liberia because it passed through there before it arrived. That was why I said that.

10:30:53 Q. But you told us just a moment ago that those arms came from Libya?

A. Yes, even if you read that particular page that we have just come from the sentence from there will tell you that the shipment came from Libya, but it was through the help of 10:31:22 Mr Taylor in Liberia before it entered Sierra Leone. If you go back to that page you will see it there.

Q. Right, let us just do that. You want us to go back to the previous page that we were looking at a moment ago?

A. Yes, where we talked about the Magburaka shipment.

10:32:24 Q. Page 100209. Yes, you are quite right. You say it was arranged with the help of Mr Taylor and came through Liberia, yes? So you have now got it coming from Libya but through Liberia, yes?

A. Yes, it came to Liberia through the help of Mr Taylor

10:33:09 before it came to Sierra Leone.

Q. Right. I would like you to look, please, at page 39007, which is in the tab we were looking at a moment ago from July 2007, tab 12. Now can you confirm that you have got that, please? Have you got that page?

10:34:33 A. Yes, I have seen it, my Lord.

Q. That page has numbered paragraphs on it. I would like you to look, please, at paragraph 76, the second paragraph from the bottom. Do you see there?

A. Yes, my Lord.

Q. Paragraph 76:

"Witness was present in Magburaka before the intervention when a plane dropped boxes of arms/ammos at an improvised Airport. The plane dipped down a short distance from the ground and dropped the boxes."

Pausing there for a moment, was it before the intervention, or was it after the intervention? You told us this morning that it was after the intervention?

MR KOUMJIAN: Objection, that misstates the evidence. The witness said he referred to Johnny Paul Koroma as Head of State even after the intervention. He never made that remark about the shipment.

10:35:30

MR MUNYARD: The Court knows what the evidence was.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Yes, I recall that remark being made.

MR MUNYARD: Oh, that remark was made, but he gave the date as 1998 which is why that led to that remark, because I then said, "Well, if it is 1998 and Johnny Paul is Head of State, does it mean January before they were pushed out, or are you referring to him as Head of State after they were pushed out?" Answer: "Yes, I still called him Head of State after they had been pushed out." That is how we got onto the discussion of Johnny Paul being referred to as the Head of State, because he had been specific about the year in which this arms drop took place. 1998 is the year he gave for the arms drop in his evidence to the Court this morning.

10:36:24

PRESIDING JUDGE: I am getting lost. Mr Munyard, put your question again, please.

MR MUNYARD:

Q. This morning you told the Court that the air drop at Magburaka was in 1998. Do you remember telling them that?

A. Yes, I recall that I said that.

Q. Thank you. In this paragraph here you say it was before the intervention, so are you saying that it was during the very 10:37:04 first few weeks of 1998? Is that what you are saying? Because we know the intervention comes around January/February of 1998. I will be corrected if I am being imprecise there.

PRESIDING JUDGE: I think it was February.

MR MUNYARD: Yes.

10:37:22 MR KOUMJIAN: It is a stipulated fact. February 14, I believe.

MR MUNYARD: Fine. Valentines Day, yes:

Q. Was it in the first six weeks then of 1998 that the Magburaka air drop occurred?

10:37:43 A. Well, I have said that the shipment came in 1998 and after that it was not a long time after that that we were pushed out of Freetown.

Q. Paragraph 77, please:

"The witness was part of the team that received the 10:38:15 arms/ammos. The team was led by [Colonel] SO Williams."

Did you tell them that, those two facts?

A. I talked about SO Williams. I also talked about Fonti Kanu.

Q. Right. All I am concerned at the moment to ask is did you 10:38:51 tell them the two things that are in that paragraph: first of all that you were part of the team that received the arms and, secondly, that the team was led by Colonel Williams? You have answered the second part. Have they recorded it accurately? That is all I am interested in knowing.

A. Yes, I told them that I went there. I was part of the team that went there; that went to the airfield.

Q. Over the page, please, paragraph 78:

"Witness did not know where the plane came from but knew the RUF/AFRC were expecting materials from Burkina Faso."

Did you tell them that?

A. I did not talk about Burkina Faso.

Q. Are you quite sure about that?

A. I am sure.

10:39:59 Q. All right, so the investigator and/or the lawyer who were interviewing you on that date have got that wrong, have they?

A. How can I talk about Libya and the next moment I move from that and talk about Burkina Faso? I talked about Libya.

Q. This is the second part of that interview. If we go back 10:40:34 to it - I am not asking you to go back to it, but if anyone wants to check the date it is on page 39004 and it is 10.30 am on 26 July 2007. Paragraphs 49 onwards are on 26 July. So you told them Libya and they managed to write down not just a mistake like Liberia instead of Libya, but a country that doesn't even sound 10:41:07 like Libya. Is that what you are telling the Court, Mr Mongor?

A. I would not talk about Libya and then later I come and talk about Burkina Faso again. I want to believe even the person who was interviewing me should have asked a question that will have enhanced correction to be made, because I told them that the 10:41:50 plane came from Libya and then passed through Liberia to Magburaka. So, I will not go the next moment and say the plane came from Burkina Faso. You know, we are all human beings. Think if I will say something like that to you and you make sense out of it.

Q. And so this is one of the interviews that you have told us was read back to you. This is one of the interviews that took place in Freetown and was read back to you so that you could correct any errors that the interviewers had made in the course 10:42:42 of writing down what you say. Now, Mr Mongor, I specifically asked about this interview this morning before I started asking you questions. There are no handwritten notes of this interview. On the face of it, therefore, it appears that this must have been typed directly into a computer. I say on the face of it, 10:43:07 I simply don't know, but that is what appears to be the case with this interview.

A. Yes, maybe that is what you will say. I will not deny the fact of what you are saying.

Q. That wasn't my question. I was just stating the fact that 10:43:28 this appears to be an interview that was typed at the time. Now do you remember who was interviewing you on 25 and 26 July last year, the middle of last year?

A. I can't recall.

Q. All right. We will come back to that in due course. When 10:43:59 you were interviewed on earlier occasions we know that you remember the interviewer writing things down on pieces of paper. Can you remember any interviewers at any stage typing the interview into a computer as it was happening?

A. Well, I can't recall that now, whether it happened that 10:44:29 way, because I will not be able to remember everything now.

Q. But you are quite clear, aren't you, that at the end of each interview they read back to you what they had recorded so that you could correct any mistakes they had made?

A. I can't remember that now.

Q. I am just asking you generally, a general question, do you understand, that the process of interviewing involved somebody asking you questions, those questions being either written down or typed into a computer and then your answers, the information 10:45:19 that you had given them, being read back to you so that you could correct it. That's what happened in the course of the very many interviews in Freetown, isn't it?

A. When you talk about computer this and that, or whether they wrote - they typed it directly into a computer and later read it 10:45:50 back to me, I can't recall that, but I will tell you that yes, if they wrote any interviews they will read it back to me.

Q. And when you say wrote it doesn't matter whether they were writing in handwriting or typing into a computer, everything that you said was written down, recorded in some way, and then read 10:46:15 back to you, is that right?

A. Well, I can't recall that somebody interviewed me and typed it into a computer and read it back to me. I can't recall. But I am sure that the interviews that were written by the investigators were read back to me.

10:46:48 Q. Thank you. Now let's go back to Burkina Faso. When the interview took place in July of last year was it read back to you?

A. I can't recall that now, but I have told you that I believe and I assume that all the documents that were prepared by the 10:47:24 investigators were read back to me, my Lord.

Q. Right. And indeed later on, particularly at the end of 2007 and again in 2008, you had quite lengthy interviews, didn't you, in which your earlier interview notes were gone through with you and you were asked to clarify, or expand on those earlier interviews, weren't you? I can show you if you wish to jog your memory, but it's there. Indeed we have looked at some of these where it says clarification of such and such an earlier interview.

10:48:17 A. I am not denying that.

Q. When this interview was read back to you why didn't you put your hand up and say, "What on earth are you saying? I never mentioned Burkina Faso"?

A. I will not say that I had never spoken about Burkina Faso 10:48:46 because in a topic generally the issue of Burkina Faso must come inside, but on this particular topic I was unable to remember to call the attention of the investigator at that particular time.

Q. Right. Well, let's just look at that. So you remember the investigator reading back to you the words "Burkina Faso", do 10:49:29 you, and for some reason you weren't able to call the attention of the investigator at that particular time? Is that what you're telling us?

A. Well, I can't say it was for some reason, because if I say it was for some reason it means I had certain things in mind and 10:50:01 maybe that was the reason why I did not tell him at that time to correct it, but sometimes maybe it is possible that it was a mistake and that I should have told the investigator, but I did not actually ask any further questions for corrections to be made at that moment.

10:50:27 Q. How do you remember?

A. What do you mean, my Lord?

Q. We're talking about the 16th time on which you were interviewed by the Office of the Prosecutor. How do you remember what went on in the course of interview number 16 when you can't even remember who it was who was interviewing you on that occasion?

A. Well, I can't understand the way you are talking - you are saying it, about what I did not remember, but I have so many other things in mind that I cannot tell you specifically the things that I would recall, or maybe my memory did not serve me well at that time to go back to this mistake and correct it.

Q. I think I might have made a mistake as well. I think I have double counted the 14 and 15 June and both the 25 and 26 July interviews so we are probably on interview number 18 at this stage. Mr Mongor, are you saying that you have a recollection of the interviewer reading out to you "Burkina Faso" but for some reason you didn't correct him or her?

A. I did not talk about and I am unable to say it was for some reason. I am saying maybe the idea did not occur to me, or maybe my mind did not run there early.

Q. Well, your mind ran very fast to it when I put it to you just now, didn't it? You said, "How could I have said Burkina Faso when I have been telling you they came from Libya?"

A. Yes, because I was confused just now in that area.

Q. Paragraph 79, please. Sorry, before we finish paragraph 78 I should read the second sentence. Back to paragraph 78, please, Mr Mongor, "He thinks Ibrahim Bah was involved in arranging the plane to bring the arms/ammo." Did you tell them that?

A. Yes, I told them that.

Q. This is the arms and ammo from Burkina Faso. Do you understand what this sentence is actually referring to?

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Munyard, I find that somewhat confusing. You have put to him that the arms were from Libya.

He said they were from Libya via Liberia. Are you now putting to him they were actually from Burkina Faso?

MR MUNYARD: Your Honour, I hope I haven't put any destination - sorry, not destination, provenance to him. I am simply putting what he has been saying. I'm not claiming that any arms ever came from anywhere.

PRESIDING JUDGE: I understand that, but the series of questions is whether the word "Burkina Faso" or the word "Libya" was used.

10:54:21 MR MUNYARD: All right. I will try and tie it up now. We will just do paragraph 78 and then we will do 79 and then we will move on:

Q. I am going to read paragraph 78 again to you:

"Witness did not know where the plane came from but knew 10:54:42 the RUF/AFRC were expecting materials from Burkina Faso. He thinks Ibrahim Bah was involved in arranging the plane to bring the arms/ammo."

Were you telling the interviewers that Ibrahim Bah was arranging a plane to bring arms and ammo from Burkina Faso, or 10:55:07 from Libya?

A. Ibrahim Bah, he did arrangements on both sides.

Q. Well, that may well be, I don't know, but would you now please go back to the question I asked you and deal with that?

A. Yes, I spoke about Burkina - Libya that he made the 10:55:47 arrangements at the time he came to Freetown, Ibrahim Bah.

Q. I don't want to take an unfair point against you. You have just used both countries there. Which one are you intending to convey to the Court Ibrahim Bah had arranged for the arms/ammo to come from?

A. The arrangement he made for the ammos to come, the first one was from Libya when they brought the AAs at that time.
Q. We are talking about the Magburaka air shipment in this section. No, hang on -- 10:56:44 A. Yes, yes, it is --
Q. Are you talking about the Magburaka air shipment?
A. Isn't that what you are talking about, my Lord?
Q. Yes, that's what we're discussing, the Magburaka air shipment.
10:57:06 A. The Magburaka air shipment was from Libya and the aircraft left and it passed through Liberia. Through the help of Mr Taylor it came to Magburaka and it was Ibrahim Bah that came to JPK and they made the arrangement before he left.
Q. Were you there when this happened?
10:57:48 A. Well, I went with Ibrahim Bah because we were the ones who took Ibrahim Bah to JPK's house and after we had all spoken together they later had a closed door meeting and then after that JPK told us what the arrangements were that they have made for us to get something for supplies to come.
10:58:23 Q. So the answer to my question is, "No, I wasn't there when JPK and Ibrahim Bah made this arrangements because that was in a closed door session", is that right?
MR KOUMJIAN: That was not the question that was asked. The question was, "Were you there?", which is rather - could be 10:58:44 interpreted in a number of ways: in the country, in the city, in the location.
PRESIDING JUDGE: We really don't know what they spoke about together whilst the witness was present. That is unclear as well.

MR MUNYARD: All right:

Q. Were you there when JPK and Ibrahim Bah made this arrangement to bring in arms from Libya?

A. At the time they were in the room talking I was not there, but I was within Johnny Paul's compound.

Q. Right. Would you turn, please - well, that is just - it may just be me, but - no, it is all right. We have established this is from Libya. Turn to paragraph 79 then, please, over the - sorry, it is on the same page, 39008. Do you see that?

A. Yes, I have seen 79.

Q. "Before the arrival of the plane the RUF had arrangements for arms to be shipped in from Burkina Faso but when they joined the AFRC, the contract was renewed by JPK."

Did you tell them that?

A. Yes, I told them that.

Q. Which contract was renewed by JPK?

A. He renewed the contract by talking to Ibrahim Bah so that he will be able to bring arms and ammunition for the movement at that time.

Q. "Before the arrival of the plane ...", this is the plane at Magburaka, yes?

A. It was before we received the first supply that came.

Q. "Before the arrival of the plane ...", are you referring to the plane at Magburaka?

A. Yes, the plane that came to Magburaka.

Q. "... the RUF had arrangement for arms to be shipped in from Burkina Faso but when they joined the AFRC, the contract was renewed by JPK."

Now, you have told us that he renewed the contract by talking to Ibrahim Bah?

A. Yes.

Q. So this is the contract - this is the arms that were brought in by that plane at Magburaka, is it?

11:02:16 A. No, that was not it.

Q. This is another contract, is it?

A. Yes, after he had spoken to the man and the man agreed to carry on, but it did not happen until we were pushed out. He did not bring any consignment any longer until the time we were 11:02:50 pushed out.

Q. And after you were pushed out, did he bring a consignment from Burkina Faso?

A. Well the time we were pushed out of Freetown I did not hear about, or I did not know about, any further ammunition that was 11:03:19 brought from Burkina Faso, although we had some ammunition that came behind rebel lines, but I did not understand whether it came from Burkina Faso.

Q. Mr Mongor, you have just said:

"Yes, after he had spoken to the man and the man agreed to 11:03:40 carry on, but it did not happen until we were pushed out. He did not bring any consignment any longer until the time we were pushed out."

So after you were pushed out, did he bring a consignment?

A. No, he did not bring any consignment that I am aware of 11:04:16 with regards the contract that JPK that had given - that JPK had given to the man that he agreed to, or whether he later brought arms for that reason. I don't know about that.

Q. And we are talking here about a contract between JPK and Ibrahim Bah for arms to be shipped in from Burkina Faso, yes?

A. Yes, my Lord.
Q. You were telling the interviewers in July 2007 that the Magburaka air drop came from Burkina Faso because Ibrahim Bah, who had previously arranged a contract with the RUF, now arranged 11:05:05 it with Johnny Paul Koroma and that is where these arms came from, weren't you, Burkina Faso, the Magburaka air drop?
A. No, my Lord, that was not where it came from.
Q. I am going to ask you just one last time. Are you aware of any arms and ammunition - arms or ammunition coming from Burkina 11:05:42 Faso after you were pushed out?
A. Well, when we were pushed out I can't recall now whether any arms or ammunition came from Burkina Faso for us. I can't recall that, my Lord.
Q. Well, just try please. Try a bit harder. Was there any 11:06:14 time after you were pushed out when you were aware that any members of the RUF and/or the AFRC obtained arms as a result of contacts in Burkina Faso?
A. Well I can't recall it now, because I don't think I have it in mind now that arms and ammunition came from Burkina Faso that 11:06:59 I recall, my Lord.
Q. Do you remember when you first started giving evidence telling these judges about an occasion when you heard that Sam Bockarie and SYB Rogers had been to Burkina Faso and they showed you photographs of the hotel that they had been in?
11:07:24 A. Yes, my Lord, I said that.
Q. Does that help to jog your memory about the question of arms coming from Burkina Faso?
A. I said that, but I don't think and I can't recall whether I did say that arms and ammunition came from that place that came you want me to go over that. I did say that it was something like a container, like a jar, where normally it is something like - it was a jar in which the diamonds were and normally when they brought them he will call the commanders all to come to be present so he will show them to the commanders so after seeing them before he kept it.

Q. Okay, thank you. You have reminded me that you did discuss that previously. Mr Witness, who were the mining commanders for the RUF?

11:15:28 A. Well, the commander who was there on behalf of the RUF was Kennedy. Kennedy and Alpha were there. They were in charge of the mining. I think I have said this before.

Q. Thank you. Now, you have mentioned seeing Johnny Paul Koroma with diamonds. Did you ever see any RUF commanders with 11:16:01 diamonds?

A. Yes, RUF commanders had diamonds. Like Mosquito had diamonds.

Q. Can you tell us when you saw Mosquito with diamonds?

A. The mining which was taking place in Tongo Field, the 11:16:34 diamonds that came out as proceeds from there were handed over to Mosquito. I think I have said before that there was a point in time when I also left Freetown, I went to Tongo Field and I met with Mosquito in Tongo Field at that time and in fact he left me there when he came back to Kenema Town. I think I have said that 11:17:02 before.

Q. Did Sam Bockarie ever tell you what he did with the diamonds that he obtained?

A. Yes, he told me that the diamonds that he had been receiving were always taken to Monrovia to Mr Taylor in exchange of ammunitions. In fact it was the issue of the diamonds that brought a problem between Mosquito and Foday Sankoh and, if you can recall, I had said that when Foday Sankoh came from Lome to Monrovia Mr Taylor showed him some diamonds that were taken to him by Mosquito, but he did not take them from him.

And according to Foday Sankoh he said that Mr Taylor showed him the diamonds that Bockarie had been taking to him in exchange of ammunition, so Foday Sankoh went angry and on his return he blamed some of us who were the commanders, especially me. He blamed me, saying that the diamonds that we have been getting we have not given any up-to-date report to him with regards all the diamonds that we have been getting - that we have been gathering. We have all taken the diamonds and taken them and handed them over in Liberia and so he was angry with us, but I tried to clear my own area because I told him that I never went to Liberia so I had no hands in it. And then he said, "Well, when I am saying that you have been taking diamonds over to Liberia I am not accusing you specifically, but I am accusing all of you because it is your commander who took those diamonds to Charles Taylor in Liberia".

Q. Thank you. I want to move on to a different topic for a short period of time and that is the military discipline system, if any, in the RUF. Mr Witness, did the RUF have any kind of internal discipline system?

A. Yes, they had it.

Q. Can you describe the system?

A. Yes, well we had the MPs who were in charge of discipline. They were there to ensure that any soldier who intended to move from one point to the other should have a pass. If you didn't

A. The first meeting took place at Hill Station where Sam Bockarie was residing. That is his house. That was where the first meeting took place and the meeting took place amongst us the RUF authorities and Ibrahim Bah.

09:34:34 MR KOUMJIAN: Unless I misheard, I believe the witness said Hill Station:

Q. Is that correct, Mr Witness?

PRESIDING JUDGE: I heard Hill Station.

THE WITNESS: Yes, Hill Station.

09:34:45 MR KOUMJIAN: H-I-L-L, capitalised:

Q. Sir, you said it was Sam Bockarie's house. Was Sam Bockarie present?

A. No, Sam Bockarie was not present, but it was in that house that Sam Bockarie resided at the time we went to Freetown.

09:35:10 Q. At the time you had this meeting, to your knowledge was Sam Bockarie in Freetown?

A. He was not in Freetown. He was in Kenema.

Q. Who was present at this first meeting at Bockarie's house with Bah?

09:35:29 A. Issa Sesay was there, Morris Kallon, CO Nya, who is also called Foday K Lansana, Gibril Massaquoi and then they sent for me, I was also present, and some other people.

Q. Thank you, Mr Witness. What happened at the meeting?

A. During that meeting Mr Bah came to talk to us, the RUF, for 09:36:38 us to join hands with the AFRC people whom had called on us for us to work together with them. He said it was that message that he brought from Mr Taylor for us.

Q. What was the reaction, if any, from the RUF members present?

A. Well, we did not do anything because we knew Ibrahim Bah. He had been with us before and we knew him to be a liaison officer who had been with the RUF, so when we saw him, and when he brought the message, we were happy and we received the message according to how he brought it.

Q. Mr Witness, this message from Mr Taylor that you should work - the RUF should work with the AFRC, did the members of the RUF discuss that, or was there any reaction given to General Bah about whether they accepted that?

09:38:20

A. Well, we accepted it because it was not that we went to have another meeting because of the message that he brought. We accepted it. We accepted that the message he brought, we received it and then we took him, the Bah - we took him, the Bah, to JPK's place, that is Johnny Paul Koroma, so that he will also get to know the message that Ibrahim Bah brought.

09:38:51

Q. Where was Johnny Paul Koroma's place that you took Mr Bah to?

A. Johnny Paul Koroma's house was at Spur Road.

Q. When you got to Johnny Paul Koroma's house who was present there?

09:39:15

A. Johnny Paul Koroma, he sent to call the other officers. Those were the SLA officers. They called SO Williams, they called Gullit, Bazzy. They called on all the other authorities who belonged to the AFRC and they were also present there.

Q. What was said at this meeting at JPK's house?

A. JPK and all of us who were there together with Ibrahim Bah, we went to introduce the man to him to tell him that, "This man was the man who has been with us and that it is the Pa who sent him for him to come and talk to all of us." When I say the Pa, that is Mr Taylor. "So, he brought a message that we should all work hand in hand and that is the reason why Mr Taylor sent him here. So, we brought him so that you will also see him and then he will explain to you the reason why he was sent."

09:41:12 Q. When Mr Bah delivered this message, what was the reaction of those present?

A. Well, everybody was happy for the message. We all accepted it and we all agreed with him.

Q. Did Johnny Paul Koroma say anything?

09:41:43 A. Johnny Paul Koroma himself received the message and he was happy too for the reason being that for the message for which Mr Taylor had sent the man.

Q. You say that the reaction was that those present were happy. Can you explain why they were happy?

09:42:19 A. Well, they were happy because we also needed help and the reason why they also accepted it was because that man will be able to help us to get ammunition because we were fighting and the AFRC also never had enough ammunition that they would use to continue the war.

09:42:54 Q. Was this something that was stated at the meeting: That there was a need for ammunition?

A. Yes, we discussed that one. In fact, that was our main topic that we had in mind.

Q. How long, to your knowledge, did Ibrahim Bah stay in 09:43:25 Freetown on that occasion?

A. Well, after that day, the next morning I didn't see him again. He went.

Q. At the meeting when Bah delivered this message from Taylor, was there any response given to Bah to take back?

took place in February 1998. Prior to the intervention was there fighting in Freetown with ECOMOG and these other opponents that you mentioned?

A. We were fighting against the students. We would attack the ECOMOG at Jui. That was where they were. That was where we were attacking them. They were also based at Lungi from where they were shelling into Freetown. They were bombing Freetown. It was at Jui that ECOMOG had their base, so that was where we used to launch attacks on them. They moved from that position and advanced.

MR KOUMJIAN: Jui, your Honours, is J-U-I. Thank you:

Q. Now, Mr Witness, I want to go to February 1998, the intervention. Can you tell us what happened to you at that time?

A. Well, at that time when we were fighting against the ECOMOG, at that time we were running short of ammunition. The guns, that is the AKs, which most of the fighters had had, there were no ammunitions for them, so we started running away. We pulled out through the peninsula to go to Tombo. That was where we went. We crossed using the fishing boats that the people had there and went to Four Mile, up to Masiaka. That was what we did.

Q. Thank you. Masiaka is spelt correctly. I am sorry to go back, but, Mr Witness, you mentioned the lack of AK rounds and I want to go back for a moment to the Magburaka shipment you told us about. You said that there were two AA guns. What happened to those two guns?

A. Well, one of the guns was with the AFRC people, which they had mounted at JPK's house for the Alpha Jet. One was given to the RUF fighters, which was with Mike Lamin, but he had taken it rainy season.

Q. After the failure of the Fiti Fata mission to take Koidu Town, were there any subsequent operations?

A. Yes, we had another operation called Operation Spare No Soul.

Q. How did you hear about this operation?

A. I heard about the operation when Morris Kallon left Buedu and came for us to undertake this mission. The mission was for one of the towns in the Kono District.

11:25:53

Q. Which town was the target of the mission?

A. It was Njaima Nimikoro where we were to carry out the mission.

MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honours, the spelling for Njaima Nimikoro. I see Nimikoro is spelt correctly in the transcript,

but Njaima, N-J-A-I-M-A, Njaiama Nimikoro:

Q. Did this mission have a name?

A. Yes, I said it was Operation Spare No Soul.

Q. Who was the commander for this mission?

A. It was Morris Kallon.

Q. Do you know if this mission was successful in taking Njaima Nimikoro?

A. We did not succeed in taking the entire Njaiama Nimikoro. I too, talking here, did not go on that mission, but I sent some of my men who went with a group on that Njaiama Nimikoro mission.

11:27:30

Q. You indicated, Mr Witness, that it had the name Spare No Soul. Where did you hear this name? From which person, or persons did you hear the name?

A. The Spare No Soul name came from Buedu. When Morris Kallon came they went over the air and said it. It was Eldred Collins who went over the air and said it over the BBC.

Q. Did you hear Eldred Collins on the BBC?
A. Yes, I heard him.
Q. What do you recall Eldred Collins saying about this 11:28:24 mission?
A. He said the mission which the RUF and the AFRC are going to run was Operation Spare No Soul.
PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Koumjian, I am just watching the time. I think we are up to our limit now on the tape, if this is a 11:28:54 convenient moment?
MR KOUMJIAN: Yes.
PRESIDING JUDGE: Thank you. Mr Witness, we are now going to take the mid-morning break. We will adjourn for 30 minutes and we will come back at 12.00. Please adjourn court.
11:29:11 [Break taken at 11.30 a.m.]
[Upon resuming at 12.00 p.m.]
PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Koumjian, please proceed.
MR KOUMJIAN: Thank you. Your Honours, it would be convenient now for me to have the witness be shown P-51.
11:59:41 PRESIDING JUDGE: [Microphone not activated]. P-51, that is fine.
MR KOUMJIAN: My mistake. It was under tab 11 of that binder, but it is P-51.
PRESIDING JUDGE: Oh, I see.
12:00:30 MR KOUMJIAN: I am sorry, we have a different document as P-51. P-51 and it has the ERN number 0025572 on the first page:
Q. Actually I can ask you some questions, Mr Witness, about this before it is shown to you. I want to ask you whether you recognise some names and, if you can, can you tell us what you

A. Well I was in charge there, but later I too was replaced. They called me. Something happened and they called me and the command changed again.

12:35:56

Q. For how long were you in charge in Kono before you were replaced, approximately?

A. Well, I did not stay long. I did not stay long when he was in command there, because a problem ensued.

12:36:29

Q. Okay, we will come to that. Can you tell us when Superman went to Koinadugu District, do you consider first of all Koinadugu the north?

A. Yes, that is where it is.

Q. And Superman went to the north. Can you tell us if anything happened at that time?

A. Yes, something happened. When Superman went there his bodyguards and SAJ Musa's bodyguards had a problem and that resulted in some shooting between them, but it resulted - it also resulted in the separation of the two men. Later, Mosquito sent for Superman to leave that end. Superman was unable to come back, so they sent Rocky CO. They gave him ammunition, and another boy whom they called Senegalese, and they went there to ensure - they sent Rocky CO to go and kill Superman, but when he went he was unable to do anything to Superman, so he joined

Superman.

So, Mosquito became angry and he said a problem had erupted between him and Superman. Superman refused to take command from him, so Mosquito wanted to send troops to go and fight against Superman in that area because the first one had failed. So during the ensuing argument over the communication set, the operator called me and said, "Your brothers were calling over the communication set". I came to advise Mosquito, that is Sam Bockarie. I told him, "Well, this quarrel, that you are 12:39:02 quarrelling is not good. When you say you are sending troops to go and fight against Superman there ...", I said, "... that was not good. It is not good for us to be fighting against each other. It would be good for us to concentrate on the enemies that we are fighting against".

12:39:18 So Sam Bockarie told me that we will not be able to discuss everything over the radio, but that I should go to Buedu for us to sit together and talk. So, that was why the command structure - that was why the command changed. When I went it was Morris Kallon who was in charged - who was in charge, sorry. Then I 12:39:46 went to Buedu.

Q. Okay, thank you. You gave a long answer and so I want to ask you just a few questions just to clarify and make sure we understand. When you said that they sent Rocky CO and I believe you said Senegalese to kill Superman, who sent them?

12:40:08 A. It was Mosquito who sent them and, when they were going, Rocky CO met me and he had ammunition. He called me. He said, "Big Brother, this is the mission that Sam Bockarie has given me to implement", but he said, "That man is my own brother. I cannot do a thing like that to him, but I am just telling you and 12:40:34 you should keep it in the dark. You should not tell anybody". And I said, "Okay", but when I go - he said "But when I go there I am not going to do it".

Q. Now, you said that you were called by your operator and that Superman and Bockarie were arguing over the communication.

Alpha Jets that was in the air and troubling us and we had a station that was monitoring the movement of the enemy troops that we were fighting against. Especially when they were sending the Alpha Jet, they had a signal that they sent to all stations for us to be on the alert. That was why I was monitoring.

Q. I was going to deal with that later, but perhaps this is an appropriate time. What was the signal that you are talking about that was used for the alert?

A. Well, we had - for the Alpha Jet we had a code name 448 which they send to all stations. They will say "448". As long as the monitoring team is monitoring the ECOMOG troops and the Alpha Jet movement either from Liberia or from Buedu, they would alert us. They would alert all stations.

MR MUNYARD: I don't think that has actually answered the question, which was about a signal. Which signal?

PRESIDING JUDGE: I thought he had said the code name was 448. It was a signal.

MR MUNYARD: That was a code name. That was not a signal, as I understood it. If I have misunderstood then I am happy to have that clarified, but I thought the signal was the radio signal.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Well, perhaps we will make that clear.

MR KOUMJIAN: I believe it is quite clear.

PRESIDING JUDGE: The signal is 448, is that correct? Is that what the witness is saying?

MR KOUMJIAN: I can ask the witness.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Yes, it should come from him.

MR KOUMJIAN:

Q. Sir, when you used the word "signal" and then I asked you

"What was the signal?", what was the signal?
A. The signal was the "448" which was the password that comes to all stations.
Q. What does that mean? When you hear "448" as a field 12:50:46 commander, what does that mean to you?
A. When I hear "448" - when I heard "448" it meant that the Alpha Jet was in the air, so when I have monitored the station and they have alerted all stations "448", whether it was coming to your location or not, because they were not saying - they 12:51:16 wouldn't say it was coming to a specific area, but wherever the RUF and AFRC occupied, that was their target. So, those areas where we had the front lines and where the radio sets were, they would alert everybody to be on the alert when they say "448".
Q. As a front line commander, did these alerts, 448, have any 12:51:44 value to you? Did they help you?
A. It helped us a lot.
Q. Can you explain why hearing the 448 alert when Alpha Jets were in the air would help the front line commanders?
A. Yes, it is good for you who is at the front line to know 12:52:17 about it, so that you will be able to take cover, you and your men, so as to avoid a lot of casualties.
Q. Were the Alpha Jets a threat to the RUF and AFRC forces?
A. Yes, it was a threat to us.
Q. Would the Alpha Jets make any difference in your 12:52:57 operations?
A. Yes, it used to make a difference because it did not allow us to advance the way we wanted to advance.
Q. You have mentioned monitoring teams in various locations. Can you go over those again, where the monitors were and tell us what you know about what they did? Well, first, where were the monitoring teams?

A. The monitoring teams were in Buedu. Most of the men who were there were operators - were the operators who were SLAs, because their own way of monitoring was different from that of the RUF communication. The Nigerians too, when they are communicating they were not using voice procedures. They had something which was a key that made that sound, so those SLAs had been trained with the Nigerians so they know those sounds, so they were using keys. So, when they are monitoring - when they are monitoring they put the message that they have received and they will put it together and tell the commander. That is the field commander. If it was the Alpha Jets' movement that they monitored, or the movement of ground troops, they would alert all of us to know that their ground troops were moving, or the ground troops are moving - the ground troops are moving and they have an Alpha Jet that is going to give them support.

MR KOUMJIAN: I will attempt, for the record, to describe the sound that the witness made.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Please go ahead, Mr Koumjian.

MR KOUMJIAN: The witness gave a series of long and short what sounded like electronic tones.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Thank you.

MR KOUMJIAN:

Q. Now, sir, you mentioned Buedu. Was there any other monitoring location for the Alpha Jets?

A. Yes, some were in Liberia. They too, at that time, ECOMOG was in Liberia where the Alpha Jets depart from to hit targets in Sierra Leone, so when they are taking off from there they too will be monitoring them and they will alert us too. They will tell us.

Q. Do you know the names of the monitors in Liberia?

A. I have told you about Memuna. I told you about Tollo. I told you about Ebony.

Q. Thank you. Sir, in your answer a few answers ago you said in addition to alerting on the movements of the Alpha Jets, there were alerts on ground troops that were moving. Did that have any value to you as a front line commander?

A. Yes, you had asked me. I told you it had value to us, the front line commanders, because it would always put us on alert and we would know how to move so that we will not just sit by and allow the thing to take us unawares, because sometimes we will lose manpower. We lost - so when we were alerted we will know how to manoeuvre, or how to take position for it. So, it was value to us.

Q. I just want to make sure, Mr Witness, you understood my question. I am asking you now not about the Alpha Jets, but you also said that you were alerted about the movement of ground troops. So, first, when the alerts came about the movement of ground troops, which troops are you referring to?

A. We are talking about the ECOMOG troops when they were about to move. If we knew that they were moving and that they were coming to hit a particular area, then the commander who was around that area, he will ensure that he and his men were in readiness to meet with them for the battle.

Q. Okay, thank you. Now, I want to go back and you have told us about hearing the argument over the radio between Superman and Bockarie and then your intervention and you said that Bockarie

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: He said "the one we have".

MR KOUMJIAN: Thank you, your Honour.

MR MUNYARD: "Bra" just disappeared off the top of the page, which I think must mean "Bro". I think it is line 20.

13:09:21 MR KOUMJIAN: Thank you:

Q. So, do you want to go back for a moment. When you talked about the advice you gave Mosquito/Sam Bockarie about Superman, can you tell us again what advice you gave to Sam Bockarie about his argument with Superman?

13:09:43 A. When I told him that we should forget about this and that he should forget about Superman, I said we shouldn't have anything like infighting because I wanted us to concentrate on the enemies, but if we started petty conflict amongst ourselves the enemy will take that as an advantage to advance on our

13:10:10 positions. So, I told him that we should forget about those things. So, he listened to me and he agreed. That was the reason why he brought the discussion up when he was trying to get some other people and when I came he said I was lucky to be present and that when we all meet, we sit and discuss it. That 13:10:40 was how it happened.

Q. Then you told us that the next day there was a meeting of commanders; is that correct?

A. Yes, we met.

Q. Where did that meeting take place?

13:10:55 A. Well, we held the meeting in Buedu. That was where we held the meeting.

Q. Okay. Who was present at the meeting?

A. Myself who is speaking, I was there. Mosquito was there. Jungle was there because he was also based in Buedu. We had other commanders who were also based on that ground, like one SLA he was called Sambebe. He was also present and some other commanders who were in Buedu, we and the late Pa Rogers.

Q. At first you mentioned an SLA and I just wasn't familiar with the name. Can you say the name of the SLA who you said was present and based in Buedu?

A. Sambebe.

MR KOUMJIAN: Taking a guess, it is S-A-M-B-E-B-E:

Q. Who is Pa Rogers?

A. Pa Rogers was the - one of the RUF - he was the RUF Secretary-General who was there and he was the War Council Chairman.

Q. At that meeting - sorry, and then you said Jungle was there. Are you referring to the person who you said was also named Tamba?

A. Yes, that is the person that I am talking about.

Q. What was discussed again at this meeting of the commanders?

A. Well, I have told you that we did - during our discussions we were talking about ammunition because we had run out of ammunition. So, we did not have enough ammunition again to continue our offensive, or to fight, or to even defend our areas, so we discussed that it will be better that this time around we all ensure to write a letter and give it to Brother Jungle to take it to Mr Taylor for him to help us get some ammunition. So, those were the things that we discussed and we all came to the conclusion that we agreed. We told the adjutant, who was Rashid Sandy, to write a letter and he wrote it. He read the letter out to everybody and from there we enveloped it and we gave it to Colonel Jungle to take along. So, Colonel Jungle went with the letter and after three days Sam Bockarie called us and said he had received a message from the Pa, and that is Mr Taylor, that he himself should go, that is Sam Bockarie, that he should go to Monrovia. So, Sam Bockarie called us and informed us and we also said okay, it is not bad, and he said, "Okay, but since I am leaving I want Issa to come to Buedu and stay here and you, Isaac, you should go to Pendembu and stay there", because that was where Issa was. That was his own area of control. So, I went to where Issa was and then Issa came to Buedu. So, when Mosquito was leaving he said, "I will not go alone. I wanted to go with some other people." So, he went with Rashid Sandy, he went with Pa Rogers and then he went with Lawrence Wohmandia and Eddie Kanneh also.

13:15:36

Q. Mr Witness, do you recall, or can you give us an estimate of when it was that you held this meeting in Buedu where you drafted the letter for Charles Taylor?

13:16:09

A. Well, at Buedu the place where they used to hold meetings, or discussions, it was not actually in the town itself, but it was out of the town going towards Liberia. There was a place that was called Waterworks. That was where we used to hold our meetings.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: Mr Koumjian, I think the question you asked was when. It relates to a time frame, not where.

MR KOUMJIAN: Yes, your Honour, before I re-ask the question I believe Wohmandia may not be spelt correctly. Our spelling is W-O-H-M-A-N-D-I-A:

13:16:57

Q. Mr Witness, do you recall when the month, or the season, that it was that you held the meeting in Buedu where you drafted the letter to Jungle? I realise it was ten years ago.

to go replace Issa Sesay temporarily in Pendembu. How long were you in Pendembu?

A. I went there and was there let me say for three weeks when Mosquito came back.

14:32:49 Q. How did you find out that Mosquito had come back?

A. Well, when he came they made it possible for us to know through communication.

Q. What were the messages you received about Bockarie's return?

14:33:20 A. Well, Bockarie - the message that I received was that he said he has come and that he was calling the commanders from the other areas to report at Buedu.

Q. Did you then go and report to Buedu at that time?

A. Yes, they sent a vehicle for me and I went to Buedu.

14:33:48 Q. How long was it between when you learned that Bockarie had returned and when you arrived in Buedu?

A. Bockarie arrived, like this evening they told us and - they told us that we should come to Buedu the following morning. The following morning we came.

14:34:19 Q. Mr Witness, if you can help us can you tell us to the best of your recollection when this was that you went to Buedu on this occasion. Can you give us a month or a year?

A. It was in that same November that I have spoken about. It was in that November that I came to Buedu.

14:34:43 Q. So this is 1998?

A. Yes, it's 1998.

Q. When you got to Buedu where did you go exactly?

A. I went and I arrived in the evening because we did not travel during the day because of the Alpha Jet, especially when we were using vehicles. So I arrived in the evening and went to Sam Bockarie's house.

Q. What happened when you got to Sam Bockarie's house?

A. When I arrived at Sam Bockarie's house we went into his room, the two of us, we sat down there and he briefed me about his return and what he has brought. He told me that he's brought some ammunition, food, medicines.

Q. What did you observe about Sam Bockarie's mood at that time?

14:36:01 A. Well, Sam Bockarie, he was happy. I saw that he was happy. So when we entered his room we started talking and he was telling me how they did things, the result of the invitation that was extended him to by the Pa, he came with some ammunition, he came back so that we can run some missions. He said they went to 14:36:33 Burkina Faso, he brought some pictures of the hotel where they lodged. He showed me the pictures and the swimming pools, the restaurants where they ate. He brought out those pictures and showed them to me and he told me that he brought some ammunition.

So in his room he had a door there leading to a place where 14:37:00 he packed the ammunition. It was a shop like place. So he opened the door leading from his room into the shop. So we entered there and saw the ammunition that he had brought. He showed those ammunitions to me. When I saw the ammunitions I was happy because they were many.

14:37:29 Q. Okay, thank you. Now you said in Bockarie's room, next to his room, there was a shop like place. Before this was Bockarie's house do you know what kind of place this was, what it was used for?

A. Well, that place was owned by people. It's - the house had a shop.

Q. And do you know, if you don't know or if you don't know just tell us, what kind of shop that was before it became Sam Bockarie's house?

14:38:09 A. Well, that shop, that was where we kept the ammunition. It's a store. That's where we kept the ammunition and the food stuff which he brought. That's where we kept them. It was not owned by Mosquito himself. The house was owned by civilians, but the house had a shop before Mosquito moved into that house. So 14:38:30 he just turned the shop into a store.

Q. Had you been inside that shop area in Mosquito's house before?

A. Yes, I went there,

Q. When you went into the shop, when he took you into the shop 14:38:51 area of his house this time what did you see?

A. I said I saw the ammunition that he'd brought. They were packed from the floor up to the ceiling, that was how the ammunition boxes were packed. The ammunition was plenty at the time that he brought them. So when I saw the ammunitions I was 14:39:17 very happy.

Q. You indicated that the ammunition was packed up to the ceiling. Can you point to something perhaps in this room or give us an idea of the height in comparison to my height or in comparison to something you see in the room as to how high the 14:39:35 ammunition was?

A. Well, the ceiling that was in the house, I can say this one is higher a little. This one is higher a little. But it could be where that - I don't know if that's a speaker, where that speaker is. From down here to where that speaker is. That's how the boxes were packed.

MR KOUMJIAN: It appears to me, your Honours, that the speaker is about three metres. Two and a half, three metres high.

14:40:21 MR MUNYARD: From here - I suppose it's the same height as this. Yes, I'd agree with that.

PRESIDING JUDGE: We will put on the record that the witness has indicated a piece of machinery on the wall which is approximately three metres from the floor.

14:40:39 MR KOUMJIAN:

Q. Can you give any estimate or did Sam Bockarie tell you how many boxes there were of ammunition in that room?

A. Well, the ammunition boxes that were packed there, he told me they were more than a hundred, but they were mixed because 14:41:01 they were different. He brought AK rounds, RPG and GMG rounds. So it was mixed.

Q. Just so the record is clear, when you say RPG what do you mean?

A. RPG is a rocket. It's a bomb. It's a rocket that we 14:41:25 launch.

Q. Had you ever seen this much ammunition before, you yourself, in Sierra Leone?

A. Well, when we started the war I did not see any kind of ammunition that Bockarie showed to me. I have not seen any - I 14:41:53 had not seen any ammunition that could be up to that quantity.

Q. Now you also mentioned that Bockarie said he brought back medicine. Do you know what kind of medicine he brought back?

A. They brought injections, medicines, tablets, but they were in cartons.

Q. Do you know, and if you don't just tell us, what the injections were for?

A. Well, the injections, they were injections for like when somebody gets injured. Like if somebody gets injured in the front line, for the combat medics to be treating them.

Q. You also mentioned a phone. Can you explain what you mean when you said Bockarie said he brought back a phone?

A. I said food.

MR KOUMJIAN: Sorry, the record had said phone earlier.

PRESIDING JUDGE: It did say phone. I remember seeing that.

MR KOUMJIAN:

Q. Now you've told us quite a bit about Bockarie talking to you about his trip. I would just like you to go over that more slowly. Where did Bockarie indicate he had been on this trip outside of Sierra Leone?

A. He went to Liberia because that was where he had received a call to go. When he called us to inform us, that was why he gave me that assignment to go to Pendembu. But when he went to Liberia, what he told me, when he had gotten those things and brought them, he said Mr Taylor had made another connection for him when he connected him to the Burkina Faso president. So he went there to see the man, the president. So it was he and Mr Rogers who went there.

Q. When Sam Bockarie went to Liberia you said he was looking - trying to obtain ammunition, correct?

A. Yes, in Liberia.

Q. Was he planning on exchanging anything for that ammunition?

A. Yes. The thing that we had heard, I told you that when I was coming I came along with some people who were in the mining group who brought some diamonds. So those diamonds were the ones he took along and when he came back he told us that the diamonds that he went with, he left them there with Mr Taylor.

14:45:29 Q. Now you said that Mr Taylor had made a connection for Bockarie with Burkina Faso and Bockarie went to Burkina Faso. Did he say who he went with on this trip to Burkina Faso?

A. Yes, he said he went with SYB Rogers.

Q. Okay. And the photographs that he showed you, did he 14:46:09 indicate where they were taken?

A. Yes, he said they took those photographs at the restaurants where they were eating in Burkina Faso and the hotel where they lodged and the swimming pool where they used to go swimming.

Q. Did you see the photographs?

14:46:36 A. Yes, I looked at them and I saw them.

Q. And do you recall now, I realise it's a long time ago, any persons you recognised in those photographs?

A. I saw Sam Bockarie himself. He was on that picture. The late SYB Rogers, he too was on that picture.

14:47:14 Q. Did Sam Bockarie indicate what the result was of his time in Burkina Faso?

A. Well, he said he had gone and seen the Burkina Faso president and they have spoken for us to be able to buy ammunition from there. So they had made those - that arrangement 14:47:44 - they had made that arrangement already. So whenever we want those things he will make sure that he goes there. So that was what he said.

Q. Did Sam Bockarie indicate where the ammunition came from that you saw in the storeroom?

A. The ammunition which he brought, he told me he had brought them from Liberia and that it was Mr Taylor who gave them to him.

Q. After your conversation with Sam Bockarie where he showed you the ammunition what happened then in Buedu?

14:48:45 A. Well, after he had shown the ammunitions to me he told me the plan that he had come with with respect to those ammunitions. He told me that he and Mr Taylor sat together and planned to come and run an operation. He said he sat with the Pa, Mr Taylor, who took out a map and showed the locations where the RUF and the 14:49:26 SLAs, where we occupied. He showed that to him. He came with a plan for us to launch an operation whereby we'll capture Kono, Makeni and advance to Freetown. And we were also to attack Joru. So those were the areas we were to capture. We were also to launch another attack on Kenema. We were to attack Kenema as 14:50:06 well.

He said he discussed with the Pa, that is Mr Taylor, to meet with Superman, that of the two of us one person should attack Joru, when that person would have attacked Joru he should advance on Zimmi. He said he discussed that.

14:50:33 MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honour, if I can just get a clarification. Well, I'll ask the witness:

Q. The interpretation we got is that Bockarie told you he discussed with the Pa, that is Mr Taylor, to meet with Superman and I thought I heard you say something different. When Bockarie 14:50:50 discussed with Taylor what did they say about you and Superman?

A. Bockarie discussed with Mr Taylor for I and Superman, one of us should attack Joru. But Superman was in Koinadugu District, so Mosquito told the Pa, that is Mr Taylor, that Superman was far away from the Buedu end. So I was close to the place and they said I should attack Joru and advance, when I would have captured Joru I should advance on Zimmi because I was to receive some other people from the NPFL who were to come from Liberia. I was to receive them. I was to receive them in Zimmi, I should be in Zimmi when they came. That was the reinforcement that would have arrived.

Q. Now you indicated that Mr Taylor had told Bockarie that you or Superman should attack Joru and advance to Zimmi in order to receive some NPFL who were to come from Liberia. Do you know why it would be you or Superman who would have been chosen for that assignment?

A. Yes, because the two of us used to be NPFL fighters and we were familiar with the NPFL brothers.

Q. Did Sam Bockarie indicate what the purpose of this attack was going to be? What was the ultimate purpose?

A. The reason for this attack, for this advance on the various places and for us to take those places, you can remember that at that time Foday Sankoh had been moved from Nigeria and he was in jail in Freetown. So we were to attack Kono and take there. We were to attack Freetown in order to free Foday Sankoh and the others who were in jail there. We were also to ensure that we seized power.

Q. Did Sam Bockarie indicate to you in his discussions with Mr Taylor if there was any discussion about how the attack should be carried out in order to free Sankoh?

A. Yes, he said they discussed it. After he had shown those places to him they discussed that we should run that mission to ensure that we free Foday Sankoh and others and on the operation we should ensure that the ammunition is not wasted. We should make the operation fearful than all the other operations that we had undertaken because we want to make sure that we take Freetown and hold on to power.

Q. Mr Witness, are you telling us now when you talk about the plan for a fearful operation that this is what Bockarie told you he discussed with Charles Taylor?

A. Yes, that was what Sam Bockarie said.

Q. What happened after your private discussion there in the storeroom and in the house with Bockarie?

A. After that, because they had sent for the commanders to come, the following morning the commanders came to Buedu. Then we had a meeting where he told us all I have explained here and what he had brought to show them to the commanders and what the mission was for those ammunitions that he's brought. So just like he told me, that was what he also told the commanders after they had all come, including the SLA commanders who had come. We had the meeting and he explained the same thing that he had briefed me on. He also showed the ammunition to the people.

So when he spoke at the meeting the late Pa Rogers, SYB Rogers that I spoke about with whom he came, he stood and told and thanked Sam Bockarie and he told us that if Sam Bockarie was the rebel leader at the time the war started then the war would have ended quickly because the ammunition which they brought, the man who was Foday Sankoh who was the rebel leader had never brought that quantity of ammunition which they had now brought.

Q. Who was present at this meeting of commanders in Buedu that you just discussed?

A. I was there. Mike Lamin was there. Leather Boot was at that meeting. Akim Turay, Eddie Kanneh and other commanders from other places, they too came and they were present.

Q. First, Mr Witness, can you tell us what faction Akim Turay belonged to?

A. Akim Turay was an SLA. He was a soldier in the Sierra Leone Army.

14:58:10

Q. What faction did Leather Boot belong to?

A. Leather Boot too was a soldier, an SLA.

Q. What faction did Eddie Kanneh belong to? Who was Eddie Kanneh?

14:58:31

A. Eddie Kanneh was one of the soldiers. He too was a soldier, an SLA.

Q. Can you tell us if you recall any RUF commanders besides Mike Lamin being present at this meeting, and yourself?

A. You had Monkey Brown who was also another RUF commander.

14:59:12

Q. Thank you.

A. Issa Sesay too was there. Morris Kallon was there.

Q. Thank you. Do you recall any other names at this time?

A. Augustine Gbao, he too was there.

Q. Now, sir, you indicated that the plan for your own assignment was to go and attack Joru and Zimmi to receive NPFL troops. What do you mean at this time in 1998 by NPFL forces?

A. NPFL fighters were those who came from Liberia who were Charles Taylor's men and who were in Liberia. They were the ones who were to join us. But I was to go and receive. That was why he said I should attack Joru and advance on Zimmi for me to receive them. They were to join us for us all to run the operation.

Q. You did not mention Superman. Was Superman at the meeting?

A. No, Superman was not there. I had told you that Superman was now in Koinadugu District and there was no space - there was no way he could have left that place to come because ECOMOG were at Koidu Town, they had occupied Koidu Town.

Q. Thank you and that is part of my next question. You talked about an attack on Kono. Can you explain when the plan was to attack the Kono District what was the situation in Kono at the time you had this meeting, what forces were occupying various locations in Kono?

A. In Kono ECOMOG occupied there, Kamajors and you had loyalists, that is the SLAs of former President Tejan Kabbah.

Q. Did these forces occupy all of Kono District or parts of Kono District?

A. Well, they were in Koidu Town itself. They occupied Koidu Town itself. They were in some other areas, but we too had men around them.

Q. Thank you. At this meeting in Buedu that you've talked about was SAJ Musa present?

A. No, SAJ Musa was not there. SAJ Musa and Superman were in that Koinadugu area, so he was not there.

Q. At the meeting was there any discussion of the forces in the north, SAJ Musa and Superman's forces, taking any part in your plans?

A. Yes, we discussed them and we all agreed that we should send - Mosquito should send radio message to them for all of them to join hands so that we can run the operation. But we all decided that Mosquito would not be the best person, but it would be better for Johnny Paul to talk to SAJ Musa, for us to forget about the past, to put all that infighting behind us and run the operation. That was what we agreed upon and sent to Johnny Paul and Johnny Paul was able to talk to SAJ Musa and others for us all to join hands together to run the operation and they agreed.

Q. How do you know about the communication between Johnny Paul Koroma and SAJ Musa?

15:04:14 A. Well, that was something that we talked about at the meeting and we all agreed that Johnny Paul should do it because he will be the best person and it went on because I too had a radio in my own area. So my radio man monitored it and he told me that the message went, that they've sent the message to 15:04:48 SAJ Musa and others for all of them to join hands in the operation.

Q. Do you know if SAJ Musa gave any response to Johnny Paul Koroma's request that they all join hands?

A. Well, SAJ Musa accepted to run the operation.

15:05:16 Q. Do you know if there were any RUF with SAJ Musa at that time?

A. Yes, I had said it from the early stages that at that place we had some RUF men who retreated from Makeni to that end. So there were some RUF men with SAJ Musa.

15:05:39 Q. Can you remember any names of RUF that you know were with SAJ Musa at the time you had these discussions in Buedu about the national offensive?

A. I told you that the RUF men like one of the senior men who was there, Alfred Brown, I told you about that. He was a radio 15:06:08 man. He was a radio operator. I told you about King Perry and other fighters who were there.

Q. Did you know Alfred Brown yourself?

A. Yes, I know Alfred Brown.

Q. During this period of time in November in 1998 you told us was the meeting were you in any communication with Alfred Brown yourself?

A. At the time that he was in Koinadugu I did not communicate with him, but at the time that the offensive started when all of us had gone on the offensive in our different areas I communicated with him.

Q. Okay. So when the offensive started you had some direct communications with Alfred Brown, is that correct? On the radio, I mean?

15:07:11 A. Yes, yes.

Q. After that meeting what did you do, after the meeting of all the commanders where the plan was made for the offensive?

A. Well, everybody agreed to run the operation. People had their various targets where they should go and they were to be 15:07:40 supplied with ammunition to go. The only people who were not able to receive the supplies at that moment were the ones who were in the northern jungle in the Koinadugu District. At that moment they were not able to receive any supplies. But those of us who were to go to the various targets, we received supplies.

15:08:06 Q. And can you explain again why those in the northern district could not receive supplies at that time?

A. I think I have said it and I'll say it again. I said because there was no way for us to transport any ammunition to go their way because the enemies who we were fighting, that is the 15:08:32 ECOMOG troops and the loyalists to former President Tejan Kabbah and the Kamajors, were based in Koidu Town. So we had no way of taking any ammunition to them.

Q. After the meeting did you receive ammunition?

A. Yes, I received ammunition to go to my own target.

Q. And do you recall what ammunition you received?
A. Yes, I received AK rounds, RPG and GMG.
Q. Do you recall how many boxes of AK rounds you received, and if you don't recall just tell us?
15:09:30 A. Well, I can recall I received 15 boxes of AK rounds but the 15 boxes which I received, I was to leave five at the other place called Mobai. I was to take it there and leave it there. The 10 was to stay with me.

MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honour, we're checking the spelling of 15:10:02 Mobai but in the meantime - apparently it's spelled correctly on the transcript - we did receive some information that there is a word in Krio that the witness was saying jorbush and that is spelt J-O B-U-S-H. I was talking about what he was saying before the break.

15:10:31 MR MUNYARD: I think he was saying zorbush before the break.

MR KOUMJIAN: Correct, he was - I would stipulate to that.

MR MUNYARD: And I don't personally remember hearing him call it jorbush since the break, but I might have missed that.

15:10:49 PRESIDING JUDGE: He didn't. I don't think he referred to it at all, but rather than go into the semantics, it is a word that we've come across before and we accept that the witness has a different accent so that's as far as I'm prepared to go.

MR MUNYARD: Madam President, I entirely agree. We've all 15:11:09 seen it, amongst other places, in transcripts from other cases.

MR KOUMJIAN:

Q. Now, Mr Witness, you've indicated that you left five boxes in Mobai. Who did you leave those boxes with?
A. The commander who was there, that was where I left them.

troops or the forces who were considered our enemies and against whom we were fighting.

So he started communicating with Sam Bockarie and saying that he was getting pressure and he was calling for reinforcements, but there was no easy way because the other men on the Hastings side were also trying to fight to enter but they didn't make it to enter. So the other men who were inside, they had too much pressure so they decided to retreat.

Q. When you say the men on the Hastings side which men are you referring to?

A. Well, I am talking about Rambo, Rambo's own group. So when those men were receiving this pressure in Freetown Mosquito passed instruction to them telling him that if there was no way to stand the men they should start carrying out some destruction, they should set fire on the Nigerian embassy and other areas. So the men also started carrying out the orders that Mosquito passed to them. So they started setting the houses on fire, but they were - they didn't make it to burn the Nigerian embassy, but the other areas where they set the fire, they were burnt down and they carried out some other destructions.

Q. Mr Witness, could you recognise Gullit's voice?

A. I know Gullit's voice very well.

Q. When you told us about Gullit calling for reinforcements, calling Bockarie for reinforcements, is that something someone told you or is that something you heard yourself on the radio?

A. Well, I heard it over the radio and whilst the instructions were given to the men telling him that they should do it or they should do that, it was not something that they encoded. They were saying it out now so that even the enemy against whom they were fighting would be afraid.

Q. You said Sam Bockarie gave orders to burn houses and the Nigerian embassy. Is that something someone told you or how did you learn that?

16:12:19 A. I said I heard him when he was passing the order that they should set the Nigerian embassy on fire.

Q. By the way what did Gullit call Bockarie, do you recall?

A. He called him Sir because he knew that the man was chief of defence staff, he knew about his position.

16:12:57 Q. Now earlier in your testimony you talked about 448s. At this time you said the troops entered Freetown on January 6 did you hear any of these alerts, these 448s, over the radio while you were monitoring?

A. Yes, that 448, they were saying it and they were sending it 16:13:33 to the men who were in Freetown and they were alerting them that 448 was around.

Q. Mr Witness, how often did you hear Gullit communicating with Bockarie?

A. Well, they did it frequently. Let's say in half an hour

16:14:06 they would communicate, because it was not just Sam Bockarie but we were all focused on the capital city at that time and all the mission that we had planned to carry out was focused on the capital city, because that was where we wanted, so we all had our attentions focused there so Mosquito was talking to Gullit

16:14:34 frequently.

Q. Now you indicated that the 448s, they were saying it and they were sending it. Who was sending the 448s to those in Freetown?

A. I had told the Court that we had a monitoring team that was

For the Office of the Principal Defender:	Mr Silas Chekera

A. Yes, it was confirmed that he was executed, but the instruction was given by Sam Bockarie on the air.

Q. Was it Massaquoi who told you that, yes, Gullit - that, yes, Moinama had been executed?

10:02:46 A. Gibril Massaquoi said it and other combatants proved that he was executed based on the instruction given by Sam Bockarie.

Q. And when you met with the Office of the Prosecution in January of 2007, specifically 17 January, you told them who carried out the execution. You said it was Alhaji Conteh or 10:03:24 Black Jesus, yes?

A. Yes.

Q. He was the triggerman or the person who actually did the deed, yes?

A. Yes.

10:03:37 MR ANYAH: Madam Court Officer, if you could assist me, please. I will be referring to tab 1, page 21 from the witness's interview with the Office of the Prosecution on 17 November 2003. The ERN number on that page is 00037118 and I will start at line 17.

10:04:26 Q. Mr Lansana, you were asked the question - actually, your Honours, it might be best if I were to start from page 20 for contextual reasons and that will be the last line, line 15, and there's a question posed to you:

"Q. Who was now in charge of the communication in Kangari 10:04:58 Hills?

A. Kangari Hill?

Q. Yeah.

A. One Martin Moinama, who - Martin Moinama was in charge.

Q. And where is Martin Moinama now?

A. Really, I cannot give a specific location of Martin Moinama, but according to other information that I got, he was the one that prosecuted Mr Sankoh in 1990 - the last case that he got, that he was condemned, yeah, he was the one who do the Prosecution. So I cannot tell his whereabouts now and I have not seen him from that time."

This is what you told the Prosecution in 2003?

A. That is what is recorded on this tab.

Q. But you did not tell them that Martin Moinama was dead, true? True?

A. Yes, yes.

Q. Yes you did not tell them, correct?

A. No, no.

Q. Yes or no, did you tell them?

A. No, I did not tell them.

Q. You did not tell them that Alhaji Conteh killed Martin Moinama, true or false?

A. Yes, but I also revealed it to them that Martin was executed by Alhaji Conteh.

Q. You told them this information on 17 November 2003, is that your evidence?

A. Yes.

Q. On the day that this interview was recorded you told them that information, that's what you're telling the Court?

A. Yes.

Q. I am putting it to you that you only mentioned that Martin Moinama was killed when you spoke with them in January 2007, true or false?

A. It was in 2007, yes.

Q. So the first time you told them Alhaji Conteh or Black Jesus killed Martin Moinama was in 2007, right?
A. Yes.
Q. In 2003, however, you did not know the whereabouts of 10:07:33 Martin Moinama, yes?
A. I never had a complete clue on the information that I gave. I mean the information was not actually put through to them that Martin was killed at that particular time.
Q. Well, let me suggest --
10:07:59 PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Witness, I'm having trouble understanding that answer. The question was in 2003 did you know where Martin Moinama was.
THE WITNESS: No. It was one of the points that I based my information on that I cannot give information or continue to give 10:08:27 information to the Special Court if they wanted me to be a witness, because Martin who had served as Prosecution witness against Mr Sankoh was killed when the troops of the RUF and the junta entered Freetown on January 6 and Martin was recaptured by those troops under Gullit's command and he was executed because 10:08:55 he never had protection. So that was my point of contention, that I would not want to be a witness based on this experience until the security was put in place.
MR ANYAH:
Q. So your evidence to the Court is as a result of the death
10:09:18 of Martin Moinama you were reluctant to be a Prosecution witness, is that your evidence?
A. Yes, very fine, from 2003.
Q. And when they interviewed you on 17 November 2003 when they came to this particular issue of Kangari Hills and Martin Moinama you told them that it was one of the points of contention you did not wish to speak about. Is that a fair assumption to make?

A. From the initial stage that had been my ground, because I never wanted to be a victim after giving my testimony or anything

10:10:09 that had to do with the war, after giving my information I would not want be a victim because Martin had already been a victim and he was executed after he had given testimony against Mr Sankoh.

Q. But this account of your concerns that you echoed to the Prosecution is not recorded in this interview, is it?

10:10:39 A. This is what I am saying. I said this was a recorded information. I was interviewed and it was only later that this material were written, but it was a tape recording. So --

THE INTERPRETER: Your Honours, the witness is running too fast for me, please.

10:11:04 PRESIDING JUDGE: Pause, Mr Witness, please. The interpreter is having a problem keeping up with you. Please speak more slowly. Please repeat the last part of your answer.

THE WITNESS: Thank you, madam. What I am trying to say with regards this particular interview, I was contesting and 10:11:29 arguing that I will not serve as a witness because Martin Moinama, a radio operator, who served as Prosecution witness in the 1998 trial of Mr Sankoh was executed because he did not have security or protection in Freetown and it was based on this information that I was not in position to serve as a witness at 10:12:26 this moment.

MR ANYAH:

Q. So your evidence is that you told them all of that you have told us now and it is not reflected in this transcript, yes?

A. Yes, this is what I am saying, it was not recorded in this transcript.

Q. But yesterday I read you another paragraph in tab 5 where you expressed concerns about your security in relation to other prisoners at Pademba Road and the Prosecution did record those concerns. Do you recall that?

10:12:59

A. Yes, I did.

Q. But in the case of your concerns relative to Martin Moinama they did not record that, yes?

A. Yes, it is not recorded as I can see on the script.

MR ANYAH: Madam Court Officer, can we go to tab 16, please:

Q. Mr Witness, I had shown you this document previously from the High Court of Sierra Leone. It is the case of the state or the people in Sierra Leone against Foday Sankoh, yourself and others and we have reviewed it on Friday, I believe, and if you look three lines down from Mr Sankoh's name you see the name "Alhaji Conteh (alias Black Jesus)". Do you see that?

10:13:57

A. Yes.

Q. Black Jesus was one of the defendants in your criminal case in Sierra Leone, yes?

10:14:26

A. Black Jesus was --

Q. He was one of the defendants in your criminal case in Sierra Leone, true?

A. Yes.

Q. Black Jesus was with you at Pademba Road prison, correct?

10:14:44

A. Yes.

Q. I put it to you that the entire story you have told us about the death of Martin Moinama, you heard that story while you were at Pademba Road prison; true or false?

A. False.

MR ANYAH: Madam Court Officer, I would like the documents in tabs 13 and 14 to be displayed, please. Tab 13, page 1:

Q. Mr Witness, these are records kept by the Special Court in this case the first page by the Office of the Prosecution regarding money that they gave to you and on page 1 we see that on 23 January 2007, 97,000 leones were given to you and the reason for the money - your Honours, it's number 3 on page 1 of tab 13?

10:16:44 PRESIDING JUDGE: My page 1 is all blank so maybe it's on - let me have the figures again, please, Mr Anyah.

MR ANYAH: Yes, Madam President. 97,000 leones.

PRESIDING JUDGE: I think that might be on page 2 of ours. Is it broken into two bits, 37,000 and 60,000 leones 10:17:07 respectively?

MR ANYAH: Yes, Madam President.

PRESIDING JUDGE: In that case it's on page 2. Thank you, I've found it.

MR ANYAH: Perhaps you have a different version than I

10:17:16 have. I understand why. I am using an older version and I should revert to the newer version.

JUDGE LUSSICK: I wouldn't bother, Mr Anyah. The page 1 on the version that we have doesn't have any figures on it at all, so you're probably better off starting at page 2.

10:17:39 MR ANYAH:

Q. Mr Witness, the entry on entry 5 says that on 23 January 2007 you were given 97,000 leones and the indication is for medication required for witness, meals and drinks provided to both witness and escort of Pademba Road. That is an accurate

TRIAL CHAMBER II

Before the Judges:	Justice Teresa Doherty, Presiding Justice Richard Lussick Justice Julia Sebutinde Justice Al Hadji Malick Sow, Alternate
For Chambers:	Mr Simon Meisenberg Ms Sidney Thompson
For the Registry:	Ms Rachel Irura
For the Prosecution:	Mr Christopher Santora Ms Julia Baly Ms Maja Dimitrova
For the accused Charles Ghankay Taylor:	Mr Terry Munyard Mr Morris Anyah

A. Yes. Immediately after the departure of the 1,000 manpower that left Koinadugu there erupted a serious misunderstanding between SAJ Musa and Superman and it was based on the information that Sam Bockarie had discussed with Superman during a radio
09:57:30 conversation: That he had deviated from his mission that was given to him from Buedu. At this time SAJ Musa also expressed that he had been informed in the past that Superman was on a special mission to assassinate him and it was based on this conversation that a serious infighting erupted between SAJ Musa's 09:58:28 men and the rest of the RUF in Koinadugu.

Q. Mr Witness, what I am asking you is particularly with relation to any misunderstandings between Superman and Sam Bockarie.

A. Yes. It was during this particular time that Sam Bockarie
09:58:59 accused Superman of not performing his duty and during a specific conversation between Superman and Sam Bockarie, Sam Bockarie told Superman that he knew the reason why he did not carry out his task as he was instructed and that, "It was because of that white Lebanese idiot, I mean the lady that you are carrying presently 09:59:46 with you in Koinadugu." It was based on this insult that Superman became very much annoyed with Sam Bockarie and it became very serious at that point in time.

MR SANTORA: I would ask the witness at this point be shown the document behind tab 14:

10:00:56 Q. Can you take a moment to look at that document, please.

A. Yes.

Q. Do you recognise this document?

A. Yes.

Q. What is it?

these communications done over the national frequency, or were they done over coded frequencies?

A. Coded frequency.

Q. Mr Witness, where were you when the RUF and the AFRC forces attacked Freetown on 6 January 1999?

A. I was in Lunsar.

Q. What were you doing in Lunsar?

A. Our attack stopped at Lunsar and we were waiting for the troops coming from Kono, in order for us to move as a reinforcement for Freetown.

Q. You said earlier you were travelling with Superman. Was he with you in Lunsar, or not?

A. Yes, that was the base for Superman.

Q. Now, throughout the course of your testimony you have said that you listened to the BBC at many occasions. Were you listening to the BBC around the time the troops entered Freetown?

A. Yes.

MR SANTORA: At this point, your Honours, I would ask that the recording under tab 21 be played to the witness.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Anyah?

MR ANYAH: Yes, Madam President. I am just concerned, before the audio is played, whether counsel has sufficiently put to the witness whether he heard a particular radio conversation over the BBC at this time, or that will be the put to the witness after he has heard the subject of the conversation.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Santora?

MR SANTORA: Your Honour, the witness has testified specifically that he was listening to the BBC at the time the RUF and AFRC have entered Freetown.

communicating with CY or Jumbo Blah.

Q. Now, were there any other radio operators present with you in Lunsar during the Freetown invasion?

A. Yes.

12:11:29 Q. Do you know who they were?

A. Yes, Alice Pyne was the operator for Superman in Lunsar.

Q. Now, again after the Freetown invasion you said you moved back to Lunsar and you were still - and you were with Superman. You were still with Superman. Is that correct?

12:12:08 A. Yes.

MR ANYAH: I thought I heard the witness say he went to Waterloo. He was in Lunsar and then went to Waterloo.

PRESIDING JUDGE: I have that after Freetown he was based in Waterloo, later Makeni and back to Lunsar.

12:12:26 MR SANTORA: And I was just referring to when he was back to Lunsar and not - I am not sure if it is an objection, or is it --

MR ANYAH: Well, the question is - and I am reading from lines 64.6 - "Now, again after the Freetown invasion you said you 12:12:46 moved back to Lunsar". It assumes he moved from somewhere to Lunsar. I understood him to say he was always in Lunsar and retreated to Waterloo.

MR SANTORA: I understand.

PRESIDING JUDGE: I don't recall the word "retreat", but 12:13:01 let us not quibble over this. Let us clarify the movement, Mr Santora.

MR SANTORA: Okay, thank you, Madam President:

MR BANGURA:

Q. Mr Witness, you talked about a street in your area. What's the name of that street, please?

A. Bus stop. It was an old bus stop closer to Kissy Mental Home, in that area.

Q. And what happened there?

A. So all of them came and parked the vehicles in which they had come.

Q. Can you remember how many of them?

A. They were more than 40.

Q. Mr Witness, who are you referring to when you say "he"? Please give the name?

A. Rambo met us there along with the people he had come with. When he met us there, the commando and the others, all of them saluted him. After they had saluted him Rambo asked the commando, he said, "What are you doing here?" He said, "Why are you killing these people?" He said, "Why are you chopping off these people's arms?" He said, "Is that why you came here?" He said, "I am going to punish you." Then he said, "Release these people, release these remaining people." He told him - at that time he was holding to my one hand, my one arm, that is Rambo, he still held my one arm. He told the commando who had chopped off our arms, whom he had said he would punish, he said, "All of you follow me to the base." We went up there. Look at the church and there was - look at the Kissy Mental Home. It was in that area that I was. So when we arrived there we met a lot of guns. When we arrived he told them to stand there, that is he told the commando and the other rebels who were there, he put them outside, he told them to stand there. He asked for one Captain Blood. I saw the Pa come out. He asked him, "Where is the doctors?"

THE INTERPRETER: Sorry, correction, interpreter, "Where are the doctors?"

16:20:29 THE WITNESS: And the Pa told him that they had gone out. So Rambo told Captain Blood that, "Have you seen what this man did to these people?" He said, "I was going to punish him." He said, "That was not why he came." Then he took out 100,000, that is Rambo took out 100,000 and placed it in my pocket. He told me 16:21:09 to endure, that was what God ordained. Then he took - he asked one rebel to accompany me. So the rebel accompanied me up to Taylor Street and he returned. At that time I was feeling dizzy. I was not seeing properly and I fell down close to the bathroom. That was where I laid. In the morning of Friday I tried to get 16:21:57 to Helena.

MR BANGURA: Your Honours, Helena is H-E-L-E-N-A:

Q. Yes?

A. So the ECOMOG met me there with their armoured car. They put me in, took me to Ferry Junction. After Ferry Junction they 16:22:29 took me to Connaught Hospital. I was there at Connaught Hospital for 26 days, but when we went there there were no medicines there.

Q. At Connaught Hospital - your Honours, Connaught is C-O-N-N-A-U-G-H-T. At Connaught Hospital were you the only

For the Registry:	Ms Rosette Muzigo-Morrison Ms Rachel Irura

For the accused Charles Ghankay Taylor:	Mr Courtenay Griffiths QC Mr Terry Munyard Mr Morris Anyah Ms Elizabeth Duby

they give you money - did you have to pay to travel by car? Was it like a taxi?

A. Yes, yes, I had to hire a car.

Q. You had to pay for that. Did you also - did you get reimbursed for that?

A. Yes, it was refunded.

Q. Did you get a meal allowance for that day?

A. Yes, because the amount they gave me exceeded my transport cost. I knew that it was more than what I spent, so I thought that the rest was a kind of assistance.

Q. What currency were you paid in?

A. Sorry, can you repeat that question, please?

Q. Certainly. What currency were you paid in? What kind of money? Was it Gambian money, or was it United States dollars, or what was it?

A. They gave me some assistance. US dollars, in US dollars.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: Mr Munyard, I am just concerned and I am seeking guidance from Madam Interpreter. Is the witness using the word "assistance" or "subsistence"?

THE INTERPRETER: In fact it is assistance, help assistance, not subsistence.

MR MUNYARD: Thank you, your Honour:

Q. What was the amount of this assistance, over and above the cost of you having to hire the car?

A. They gave me 100 US dollars.

Q. On top of the money that you had spent hiring the car, is that right?

A. I always paid my transport myself. Since I have left my village, until I arrived, I always paid - I always paid my

Q. Four days later, on 5 March 2007, Mr Haddad gave you 100 US dollars for assistance rendered in the form of information. Do you see that?

A. Yes, yes, I see that.

14:54:49 Q. Pausing there. In other words, you were paid money by the investigators to give them information, do you agree?

A. It is an assistance. It was not a payment. You are using payment. It was not a payment.

Q. Forget the word I used. You were given $100 for giving the 14:55:23 investigators information, weren't you?

A. Yes, yes, they gave it to me because of that. For that.

Q. So, why was it that you told this Court on Monday of this week that you were never paid for giving information to the investigators?

14:55:53 A. I told you not to say that they have paid me. They didn't pay me. It was - it was for assistance. It was not a payment. Don't say that they paid me.

Q. What did they do with the 100 United States dollars on 5 March? How was it - how did it end up in your hands?

14:56:27 A. I am a chief of family. I have wives and kids. I am a married man and I have a family. I have problems.

Q. Mr Camara, I don't think you are understanding. How did the one pounds get from Mr Haddad's hand into your hand?

MR WERNER: US dollars, your Honours.

14:56:49 PRESIDING JUDGE: It is actually dollars [microphone not activated].

MR MUNYARD: I may have slip --

PRESIDING JUDGE: A slip of the tongue, Mr Munyard. You said pounds.

A. Yes, me too, I answered to their questions. That is why I am using the term "assistance".

Q. I don't think you're going to get any answers from that side of the Courtroom, Mr Camara, so don't keep looking over there. Look towards the judges, please. Now let us go to box 7.

THE INTERPRETER: Sorry, can the witness repeat?

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Witness, the interpreter didn't catch what you said. Can you repeat it, please.

THE WITNESS: I am not looking at a particular person. I am looking in the room, in the Courtroom.

15:00:33

MR MUNYARD:

Q. Look at the page now, please, box 7. Four days later on Friday 9 March Mr Haddad gave you 50 United States dollars?

A. Yes, indeed.

Q. For assistance rendered by you to them. Do you agree?

15:00:56

A. Yes, I do agree.

Q. And it was in order to reimburse you for your meals, your transportation, your telephone calls and then something called assistance, this time assistance from them to you?

A. Yes.

15:01:27

Q. Do you know what their assistance to you was? How much of the $50 amounted to assistance? If you don't know, just say so?

A. It is exactly what is written there.

Q. Box number 8, please. Six days after that, on 15 March, Mr Haddad gave you another 100 United States dollars. The reason --

15:02:08

A. Yes, that's true.

Q. The reason for it is the assistance rendered by you to them and the money is to cover your transport, your loss of wages and the information that you have given them. Transport we know about - sorry?

A. Yes.
Q. Transport we know about. You told us yesterday that you had not been in work I think from the time you got back from 15:02:57 Liberia in 2003. So what's lost wages here?
A. Yes, yes, indeed, I was not working.
Q. So you didn't have any loss of wages for which you had to be compensated in March of last year?
A. Why don't you ask Haddad for that what he means by loss of 15:03:33 wages? He would explain it to you. What I know is that they gave me assistance and they made me sign the receipt. They asked me to sign and I signed. And then I have seen on the paper - I have seen the lost wages written there, transport, loss of wages, information. That I have seen. I have seen that on the paper.
15:04:04 I can't say that I haven't seen it.
Q. Did you tell them that you had lost earnings in coming to see them at some point in March of 2007?
A. No, no, I don't - I didn't - I didn't go there for that. I'm a cultivator.
15:04:40 Q. We know that you gave them more information that day because it's recorded there. When you gave them information they always wrote it down, you told us earlier, and so can we assume that they wrote down what you told them on 15 March 2007?
A. Yes, that's what they have written down.
15:05:13 Q. Box 9, please, and I think Madam Court Officer will have to move the page on the screen. We are now on the third page of this document. Wednesday 18 April last year. This is a day when we do have interview notes for, unlike the previous date we have just been looking at, 15 March. On 18 April you were paid 100

United States dollars again and the reason you were paid that money was because you had given them assistance in locating people and in transportation and communication?

A. Yes, yes.

15:06:15 Q. It doesn't actually say there that you were given the money for information, does it?

A. Yes, indeed. Indeed. It's not written there.

Q. Although we know that you did give them information that day because for that particular day we do have interview notes?

15:06:45 A. Yes, it's possible.

Q. Box 10, please. On 24 May you were paid 57.69 United States dollars. This was to cover family assistance to you?

A. Yes.

Q. The reason, what you had done for them, is a number 1,500.

15:07:29 Does that make any sense to you, the 1,500?

A. No, I don't know. They are the ones who know what it means. I don't know what it means.

Q. Box 11, the same day, you are given 38.46 United States dollars, this time for family assistance and transport and the 15:08:04 reason given there is 1,000 and I don't suppose that the 1,000 means anything to you in that box, does it, Mr Camara?

A. That you are talking about I don't - I really don't know, but maybe - I don't know what they have written. I am not used to what they are writing. I don't know their terms. I don't 15:08:42 know what they have written there.

Q. Yes, don't worry about that. I don't claim to know what it means either. But on that day, 24 May, you were given close to 100 United States dollars to cover family assistance and transport and we - just pause for a moment. We know that you were interviewed by the investigators on 23, 24 and 28 May?

A. No, this was - I didn't say that all these things - occasions were for interviews. I didn't say that. It was not for interviews.
15:09:41 Q. Did you take your family with you when you went to see them in late May last year, or is this simply money that they gave you because you wanted it for your family?
A. No, that was not the case.
Q. No, you didn't take your family with you?
15:10:09 A. No.
Q. So they gave you this money in order for you to spend it on your family?
A. They knew my conditions. They know that I had a family. I have wives, I have kids. They knew my conditions, so they had 15:10:34 asked me about my conditions.
Q. Box 12, please. On Tuesday 12 June you were given another 100 United States dollars, no reason was given, but it was to cover family assistance and your telephone calls?
A. Yes, it was assistance indeed. They have been helping me.
15:11:07 Q. Do you know if you gave them any information in June of last year?
A. No, no, I don't remember. I don't remember having given them any information on that date.
MR MUNYARD: Madam Court Officer, could you turn over the 15:11:28 page, please, and we will look at box 13:
Q. Two days later on 14 June last year you were given 100 United States dollars again also for family assistance?
A. These people, they usually - that's usually what they write when they gave me the assistance, but I don't remember each and

Just let me finish the question. Somebody has recorded here that on 26 September last year you were paid 200 US dollars. Can you remember if that was put into your hand?

A. I am telling you that this is not a big issue. I have got much more than 200. People, brothers have given me much more than this.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Witness, the question is can you remember if that amount of money was put into your hand.

THE WITNESS: No, I don't remember. I don't remember. It's possible, but I didn't put it on record. It's possible, because they have given me assistance on many occasions. I didn't say that it didn't happen. It's quite possible.

MR MUNYARD:

Q. Do you have a bank account, Mr Camara?

A. No.

Q. So are you able to help us with the security aspect of this money. Did you yourself have to spend any money on your personal security or that of your family, or your home, or homes, in October of last year?

A. Unless you ask the person named Swart, you ask him that question. What I know is what I have told you already. They usually gave me assistance and they gave me a receipt to sign and I signed, because normally they were supposed to report to their supervisors when they gave me an amount of money.

Q. I am taking that as the answer no to my last question and I am going to move you on to the box 18. The very next day Mr Morris reimbursed you 43.18 United States dollars for transport?

A. That's possible.

Q. Can you remember what you would have spent 43 United States dollars on for transport?
A. I didn't put things on record. I didn't note those informations. Really I don't remember on which occasion I was 15:30:59 given a specific amount of money. I don't remember all of the different occasions. I know that they used to write it down, so what they have written, it's true. It is not a lie.
Q. Boxes 19 and 20, please, the same page. Box 19 on 5 November and box 20 on 4 December you were paid 100 dollars on 15:31:41 each of those dates for something entitled "Security". Can we assume that you don't know what that security refers to?
A. I can't tell you what it means. You should maybe ask those people who gave me the money. I think they would be in a better position to explain why they gave me that money, but I am not in 15:32:20 a position to explain.
Q. You took the money on these two occasions. Did you spend it on your own security?
A. The amount they gave me, you mean?
Q. Yes.
15:32:45 A. They have given me the money and they wrote down the reason, but the way I use the money they gave me, that was left up to me.
Q. I don't want to be unfair to you. Were you actually given 100 United States dollars in your hand at the beginning of 15:33:07 November and again at the beginning of December?
A. When they came to The Gambia, I was the one who took them to the hotel and they want to go to what is called a cultural area - cultural area and so I had to go there with them. Maybe that's why they have written "Security", because you know they for me it is just a matter of relations - personal relations.

Q. Thank you. So you have removed the idea that you're being paid security money to show them round as tourists?
A. I didn't tell you that.
15:36:55 MR MUNYARD: Madam Court Officer, can we now turn, please, to the final page and look at box 21 next, Mr Camara.
Q. Do you see that on the screen in front of you?
A. Yes, I see the page.
Q. On 7 January this year you were paid 100 United States
15:37:33 dollars as security for the month of January 2008 and under "Category" it says "Property". Was your property given security measures?
A. No, no, no, I don't remember that. No, no, that's not the case.
15:38:09 Q. So, as far as --
A. My orchard was not fenced and so maybe it was an assistance in that they gave me some kind of assistance for my orchard to have it fenced. I remember talking to them about that.
Q. Are you saying that they gave you the money and you spent 15:38:45 it on fencing your orchard?
A. Yes, yes, yes, to - they wanted to help me to fence my orchard, yes, so that I could protect my property. Yes, I remember having told them that and so they gave me - they just helped me for that.
15:39:24 Q. And quite by chance it happened to cost 100 US dollars to put a fence round your orchard, did it?
A. Yes, that's why they helped me.
Q. And when did you pay this 100 dollars to fence your orchard?

need to know where either of them are?
A. I was in The Gambia. Where else would I be?
Q. Were you at your home or at some other place?
A. [Inaudible] telling me. These people have given me the 15:46:04 assistance, yes. They have given me an assistance. The person who did this, I don't know that person. I just know that that person works for the Special Court. I didn't ask for anything.
I told them that I wanted to fence my orchard, but the receipt itself, I haven't seen the receipt.
15:46:45 Q. Did the person come to your property, your home, to give you the money, or did you have to travel somewhere to get it from them?
A. I went to receive the money.
Q. Did you incur travel expenses in going to receive the 15:47:12 money?
A. Yes.
Q. Were you reimbursed for your travel expenses?
A. No, it was a kind - it was an assistance I was receiving.
Q. Assistance in West Africa means financial support, doesn't 15:47:37 it?
A. Yes.
Q. Thank you. We can see here at the bottom of this - well, below box 21 we can see the total that you are said to have received according to these receipts and the total is 1,506.18 15:48:07 United States dollars. If you turn back - again Madam Court Officer. If you turn back to the first page this total only relates to money you were given on or after 27 February 2007 and so we have to add to the total $100 for your interview in October 2006 and $100 for your interview in November 2006, don't we?

For Chambers:	Mr Simon Meisenberg Ms Doreen Kiggundu

For the Prosecution:	Mr Mohamed A Bangura Mr Nicholas Koumjian Ms Kirsten Keith Ms Christopher Santora

arrived in Koinadugu he prepared an open message. The question was did you know what or how he was received in Buedu - in Koinadugu when he arrived there and your answer was he opened up - he prepared an open message. What do you mean when you said he prepared an open message?

A. What I mean when I talk about open message from Superman to all RUF stations, that was the way how SAJ Musa received it. He received him very well and welcomed him and all the fighters welcomed Superman and the manpower he took to them, so that message was open to all combatants to hear from Superman.

09:37:01

Q. Now, also yesterday we discussed the Fitti Fatta mission and you did say that your side took many casualties from that mission and some of the casualties were sent to Liberia for medical care, is that correct?

09:37:30

A. Yes.

Q. Where in Liberia were they taken to?

A. It was in Monrovia.

Q. Do you know who facilitated this arrangement?

A. It was Sam Bockarie and Mr Taylor.

Q. How did you know this?

A. Like, for example, when those people were wounded his response to Superman was he had made arrangements with Mr Taylor: Whenever we had serious wounded fighters let them be taken to Buedu, so that he will send helicopters to take them from Foya.

09:38:19

Q. In your experience was this the first time that fighters of the RUF, or wounded fighters of the RUF, had been evacuated to Liberia for medical care?

A. No, any time we had serious wounded fighters they would take them to Liberia for treatment. Those who had problems would be taken to Monrovia, Liberia. The helicopter would take them to Monrovia.

THE INTERPRETER: Your Honours, can the counsel wait for the interpretation.

09:38:56 PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Bangura, did you hear the interpreter? He asked if you would wait until the interpretation is finished before proceeding.

MR BANGURA: Sorry, your Honour. I am not on the interpreter's channel this morning. I am sorry about that.

09:39:11 THE WITNESS: I am not through.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Please finish your answer, Mr Witness.

THE WITNESS: I will give you one example: It was a senior man, Dennis Mingo, he had a serious accident during the time the RUF attacked UN in Makeni. He was taken to Taylor. Taylor 09:39:39 requested for him. He said he should be taken to Liberia. He himself was taken for a helicopter, by a helicopter. He was taken to Liberia for treatment.

MR BANGURA:

Q. When was this?

09:39:55 A. It was in 2000, year 2000, during the time RUF attacked UN in Makeni.

Q. Thank you. Now, yesterday also we discussed a situation that occurred in Tombodu where Savage was a commander. Do you recall?

09:40:18 A. Yes.

Q. Your testimony was that Savage had been killing civilians who were in his care in Tombodu, is that right?

A. Yes.

Q. And that reports - this practice had been going on for over

Was it the same number that arrived at Rosos?

A. No. Let me just make it clear so that you will understand. During the period of the intervention from Freetown to Makeni not everybody was able to follow us to go to the jungle. For example, back in Kabala some people left their deployment in other villages and they found it difficult to go to the towns and, therefore, they hid themselves in bushes so they were staying there. Therefore, they divided themselves into groups and then when they heard that we were going along attacking areas from Koinadugu to Rosos a good number of the RUF came back and joined us. In fact, the number that we now reported to Gullit, we were more than 500. The number increased to 500 and most of the men who came, they had guns, and we welcomed them to join us. So that was how the number increased.

10:31:28 Q. Thank you. Now, you have said that when you arrived Gullit prepared and sent a message about your arrival. To whom was the message sent?

A. Gullit sent the message to SAJ Musa and Superman and they informed Sam Bockarie. That was how the message was addressed.

10:31:56 Q. Now, did you yourself engage in radio communication during the period that you were at Rosos?

A. Yes, beside Alfred Brown I was the most senior radio officer on the ground. Alfred Brown was just there to supervise the work that we did.

10:32:26 Q. Now, what was going on at Rosos about this time?

A. Say that again. What time are you referring to?

Q. At the time that you arrived there what were the main activities that the troops there were engaged in?

A. After we got to Rosos we didn't meet food on the ground, so were going to attack us we would hide elsewhere until they pass and we come out again.

Q. Now, in what form was this information passed on to you about ECOMOG air raids?

12:02:17 A. Well, all information about the movement of our enemy troops - and when I say enemy troops that includes the Kamajors, the Sierra Leone army, ECOMOG - that was all coded. For example, when the jet was coming from Freetown or Lungi we had a particular code name for that. We called it 448. So when I 12:02:54 called the other station I said "448", I will call the location of the station and where it will be heading for, but if that jet was attacking my position I will just say "448". That was my location code. The word 448 means jet has moved, or it has attacked our location.

12:03:18 Q. So to be clear, Mr Witness, 448 referred to a possible air raid by the jet - ECOMOG jet. Is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. And did you get these sort of messages on your way from Koinadugu to Rosos?

12:03:44 A. Yes. Yes, many times I received that message myself and other people who took over after me for a while when I was resting they will get that message. When that message will come, everybody would know. In fact, all the AFRC/RUF combatants had that code. When they heard that code, "448", that meant there 12:04:12 was a jet around and so everybody would run to hide.

Q. Where were these messages coming from?

A. As I was talking about monitoring communication set, we had a particular radio set in Buedu monitored by the AFRC that was the former SLA. That group was monitoring and giving the message to the transmission. That was the control station in Buedu and they would send it to all stations. That was their responsibility. That 448 information was coming from Buedu, Sam Bockarie's station.

12:04:51 Q. Now, let us come to Freetown. You have testified already that you entered Freetown on 6 January 1999, correct?

A. Yes, it is correct.

Q. Now, can you describe your entry into Freetown. From which end of Freetown did you get into the city?

12:05:22 A. Well, we used the main highway from Waterloo to Freetown, from Kossoh Town - from Hastings, Kossoh Town to Freetown. We entered from the eastern part of Freetown and we entered with heavy firing. We entered Freetown fighting, but before we got to Freetown we divided ourselves into groups.

12:05:52 Q. Hold on, Mr Witness. (Your Honours, Kossoh Town is K-O-S-S-O-H, Kossoh). Yes, you have said you divided yourselves into groups. Which groups did you divide yourselves into?

A. We divided ourselves into fighting groups. That means - you know, Freetown is not a small village. It is a very big city

12:06:23 if we didn't divide ourselves into groups. Every group had a commander, who will lead it. We appointed some areas where the commanders would go like Ferry Junction, that is one point, Ferry Junction covered Upgun, and also State House in Freetown, that was one target, the second target was Pademba Road, which is the 12:06:53 maximum prison in Freetown, and we had the National Stadium and these are the areas I can recall. We divided our groups according to these areas and appointed commanders to go to these areas.

As for me personally, I was in a group with my radio with been happening and the discussion by Gullit, that was going on through my radio communication set.

Q. Now on this first day that you entered Freetown, was there any communication between the forces - your forces - and Sam Bockarie?

12:17:10

A. Yes, as we entered Freetown we were based and settled, the authorities got settled at State House, they were able to communicate with Sam Bockarie about the situation. Gullit told Sam Bockarie that, "You said we should not enter, but however we have now entered and thanks to God we were able to get State House, Pademba Road and the National Stadium. Our men are still advancing, were still under fighting and we were able to release JS Momoh, Gibril Massaquoi, Hilton Fyle and some other prominent authorities. In response, Massaquoi - I am sorry, Mosquito told Gibril Massaquoi that, "Do as a military man".

Q. Can you just pause. Was Mosquito - you said, "Mosquito told Gibril Massaquoi". Who was Mosquito responding to? Who called Mosquito and who was he responding to?

A. I am sorry, Gullit called Mosquito and told him those whom we had released from Pademba Road. In response, Mosquito said Gullit should - Gullit and others should take great care of those people and Gullit told him that they were under safekeeping at State House. Mosquito said Gullit should provide security and take great care of those people, until he tried by all possible means and dispatch them to Kailahun. So, whatever activities that was going on Gullit used to transmit the message to Mosquito. At that time SAJ Musa was dead. And even myself as a radio man I had my personal radio, because it was my responsibility according to Mosquito to give him all detailed information about the Freetown operation. That was what I was doing. Any conversation going on between Mosquito and Gullit I used to monitor that. At times I will be at the radio station and I will get information about that and -- 12:19:52 THE INTERPRETER: Your Honours, can the witness go over the last bit?

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Witness, the interpreter needs you to repeat the last part of your answer.

THE WITNESS: Any information that was going around in 12:20:09 Freetown either by voice or by messages, that is written messages, I used to monitor that and write it down, and any information that Gullit failed to tell Mosquito that was my responsibility to tell him. And from there I was able to give him details, but when SAJ Musa entered Camp Rosos and what 12:20:37 happened around his death and after his death, what actions, why we didn't wait and we entered Freetown. I gave all of these pieces of information to Mosquito.

MR BANGURA:

Q. Mr Witness, apart from the prisoners from Pademba Road whom 12:21:00 you had taken to State House, were you holding any other persons there at State House?

A. Yes, as we were fighting so we were capturing ECOMOG troops, but for the SLA we didn't have much problems with them because some of them were running from the government and coming 12:21:21 to join us with their guns. And for the ECOMOG soldiers, when we captured the ECOMOG we killed them at the front line and those that we would bring to the State House we report them to Gullit and he himself would report to Sam Bockarie. Sam Bockarie would tell him that he had no prison for ECOMOG. No politicians. As a result, those ECOMOG soldiers were killed under the Cotton Tree. That area there were more than ten or 15 ECOMOG corpses and some other areas, so we never spared ECOMOG.

Q. Now, you have mentioned that - what was the state of - what was the situation regarding civilians in Freetown when you entered?

12:22:12

A. Oh, it was pathetic. Of course I am a member of the RUF, but it was pathetic, but there was no other way to do. The civilians were suffering. They suffered raping, hard labour, execution, amputation, burning of the property. That was how they were in Freetown. And this was effective when the situation changed, when the military situation changed, that when the ECOMOG had had power over us again all those atrocities that I had mentioned became more rampant.

12:22:40

Q. Mr Witness, how long were you at State House? How long did you occupy State House?

12:23:12

A. State House, it was almost a day. Of course, ECOMOG did not drive us there. The air raid was going on. Every two hours we will get a report on the radio that "448". So the 448 always was directed at State House, that ECOMOG had planned to bombard State House because of the massive killing that was going on at Cotton Tree. So, from that point we changed our location. We slept there and the next day we changed our location, but we were beyond State House towards the west. Two days we started retreating.

Q. Now, did you have further communications with Sam Bockarie about the situation?

A. Yes, of course. That was our daily activity. Every morning, every afternoon, every evening we would send situation clarify that? What exactly were you supposed to do from both sides?

A. Gullit's side, Gullit was to send fighters at a point where they will meet and attack Kossoh Town and Superman, Issa Sesay, 12:38:21 Morris Kallon were to also dispatch fighters to go and attack Kossoh Town so they will clear the route, so that the fighters could come and enter Freetown and join Gullit so we could re-attack and regain all the areas we had lost and even to take over - to take all over the city. That was the plan.

12:38:42 Q. Now, which forces were at Waterloo at this time?

A. The forces which were at Waterloo were Superman's group, including Morris Kallon and Issa Sesay. That was the group which was at Kono and Koinadugu which led - they all came and joined at Waterloo. According to the plan which we had at Buedu, they had 12:39:10 now come and merged. If they had met us there we would have entered Freetown together, we wouldn't have stopped getting Freetown, but our group did not wait.

Q. Now, did you send - did Gullit send troops to Kossoh Town as was ordered by Mosquito?

12:39:33 A. No.

Q. What about the troops waiting at Waterloo? Did they advance to Kossoh Town as was the plan?

A. Yes, those men organised themselves. They attacked Kossoh Town at night until daybreak, but they could not get the town. 12:40:00 But among that group they had one AFRC strong fighter who was Red Lion - sorry, Red Goat, Rambo Red Goat. He was the only man who could garner up to 15 manpower and they bypassed ECOMOG and came to Freetown and joined us.

Q. Now, this fighter who you have just mentioned, Rambo Red

Goat, you say he was an SLA and he had 15 manpower, I assume fighters, is that correct, with him?

A. Yes, he came to Freetown with 15 manpower.

Q. Now, at the time that he left, or up until the time that he left Waterloo and bypassed ECOMOG positions, who was he fighting under?

A. Well, he was with Superman's group.

Q. Now, when this group came into Freetown, did anything happen?

A. Those 15 men that I told you about, they came to Freetown and met us at Kissi Old Road. When they arrived they said from Waterloo they attacked Kossoh Town but they could not succeed, but Rambo, who was Red Lion - sorry, Red Goat, was able to take 15 men to come and join Gullit's group in Freetown, but at that time they met us now on our way going. The day they arrived Gullit passed an order that all those who had motorcycles and vehicles and what you could not - somebody could not carry, let us burn everything. So, everything was put at one place and they were burned. Vehicles and everything was burnt, those that we could not carry. So, when Red Goat Rambo came he said he had not come to return. He said he had come to stay in Freetown. Some men were happy to be with Rambo in Freetown and Gullit himself, who he met there, he gave him the okay to stay. In fact, at that moment only a few of us returned because we were more than 4,000 in Freetown. Most of the people hadn't guns, particularly those who were released from Pademba Road, so most of us, the armed men - a few armed men and a few unarmed men returned to Waterloo. Rambo stayed in Freetown with many other men.

Q. Now, amongst the men that stayed in Freetown with Rambo, do you recall any of them that you now remember?

A. Yes, I can recall one name: Rambo Red Goat himself.

THE INTERPRETER: Your Honours, the witness has called a name that I need clarification on.

12:43:42 PRESIDING JUDGE: Could you please repeat the name for the interpreter.

MR BANGURA:

Q. Could you go back, Mr Witness?

A. Striker, who was the Red Lion's commander, Red Lion

12:43:55 Battalion Commander.

Q. And what was the size of the force that you said decided to stay in Freetown with Rambo Red Goat?

A. That number was too much. I cannot recall now.

Q. Now, were any orders given to Rambo Red Goat before you 12:44:23 pulled out of Freetown?

A. Yes, of course. Rambo was given an order by Gullit.

Q. Now, the decision to allow Rambo Red Goat to stay in Freetown, was it discussed at all in any communication with Mosquito?

12:44:44 A. Yes, Mosquito told him that as far as that man has said that he is living there and he is able to get manpower, they should leave and they should come back to Waterloo, reorganise themselves and re-attack Freetown. I want to ease myself.

MR BANGURA: Your Honours?

12:45:12 PRESIDING JUDGE: I see. Madam Court Attendant, if you would assist the witness to leave, please.

[In the absence of the witness]

MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honour, could I take advantage of the break and just bring to the Court's attention that we have

Q. Apart from Zogoda which other bases did you operate about the same period '95, '96?

A. Well, the other base that I would call which was the first page was Kailahun District, Ngeima. We called there Burkina base which was in the Kailahun District in the eastern part of Sierra Leone. Then the other one I can recall is Libya. Those names we used to call them because we didn't want people to know that we were at this or that area, but amongst ourselves we knew, and therefore Libya was Pujehun District, southern part of Sierra Leone. Then from there we had Gandorhun which was Kono District. We had Peyama which was very close to Tongo. Then we had Kangari Hills, Tonkolili District, northern province. Then we had Bradford which we called Western Jungle. Then we also had Bo Jungle.

MR BANGURA: Before we continue on, your Honours, I will do some spellings here. I see most of them are actually correctly spelt.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: What about Peyama?

MR BANGURA: Peyama is P-E-Y-A-M-A.

Q. Mr Witness, how long was the RUF able to keep these bases that you have mentioned?

A. Some bases RUF was there from '95, 6 - early 1996. I mean at the end of 1996 some bases were dissolved like Peyama, sorry, Peyama, Gandorhun, Libya, Zogoda, those ends were dissolved at about '96, '97.

Q. Why were these bases dissolved?

A. Because when our leader Foday Sankoh moved away and went on peace talk, while he was on the peace process we were not ready to fight again. So the Kamajors used that as an advantage and our manpower to the various areas that I have been naming. We had manpower at Kono which was at a diamondiferous area in Sierra Leone. From Kono to Magburaka we had Masingbi, Sewafe, Makali, Matotoka, Magburaka, all those areas that I have named we had 10:33:07 deployments there. It was a mixed group now with the AFRC.

Q. Pause a while. They are all correctly spelled, your Honour. Now you yourself, did you have any particular appointment during that period?

A. Yes. In fact I from start, when I completed my radio 10:33:46 course since 1992 the only job I did was on the radio. I was not entitled to fighting. I was always behind the radio to receive and send messages. So I was at Makeni as the overall signal commander and I covered Kono, Kabala, Makeni itself, Lunsar, Magburaka and all the other areas I have named in Magburaka and 10:34:18 Kono.

Q. Now during this period are you able to tell the Court or give an idea to the Court of how many radio stations that you monitored or that you supervised in these areas that you have mentioned?

10:34:38 A. Yes. One was Makeni itself, Kabala, Lunsar, Magburaka, Matotoka, Makali, Masingbi and Kono.

Q. Now apart from being assigned to supervising radio communication in these areas did you take on any other role or were you assigned to any other duty during that period?

10:35:22 A. Yes, it was at a point in time I used to come to Freetown and receive supplies. Sometimes I came with other commanders to receive supplies. And also I was the one who came to receive our own supply because the signal units on the radios, they always supplied us together with the other fighters. Our own salaries

Q. Which town did you go to when you arrived in Kono?
A. It was Koidu Town itself, which is the headquarters of Kono District, Koidu Town. Kono District has two names. We call it Koidu Town and mostly people call it Kono. Also, for the 11:44:05 district it is Kono, but the two names that the town carries that is Koidu Town and Sefadu. That is how we call that town. The two names belong to the same town, that is Sefadu and Koidu Town. That is the same town. The district is Kono.
Q. Can you describe what happened when you arrived in Koidu?
11:44:32 A. Immediately we got to Koidu there was now communication between the authorities, Issa Sesay, Superman and Sam Bockarie for them to reorganise and base in Kono, for us not to lose Kono. The first message that we monitored, that we received in our message log book, according to Sam Bockarie he said he had 11:45:03 consulted Mr Taylor in Liberia saying that in Kono, as long as we have Kono we will not fail in taking over the rest of Sierra Leone again because we already knew that Kono was one of the prominent diamond mining areas in Sierra Leone. Therefore, all the troops should be on standby there except Issa Sesay, Johnny
11:45:39 Paul Koroma and the securities who were going to escort them to Buedu. Therefore, Issa Sesay should organise Superman as the overall commander for Kono District jungle and Morris Kallon should act as his deputy, and that they should make sure that they hold fast to the ground and should not allow to lose the 11:46:10 ground before he left, but before Issa left he said we were guerillas and anywhere a guerilla was you should make the area fearsome. In the RUF when we talk about making the area fearsome it is a word that carries different meanings. It means we should burn down houses, destroy other properties, killing and construct communication systems in Sierra Leone.

Q. Now, coming back to the orders which had been given about how - what you were to do in Koidu, you have already mentioned that Morris Kallon subsequently gave specific orders to commanders. Apart from those orders, do you recall anything else to do with Morris Kallon in Koidu at this time?

11:53:07

A. Yes, there are so many things. I can recall some, some of the orders that were given to Kallon and not only Kallon, the orders that were given to Superman. They used to give orders with regards attacks and ambushing and this always happened. They always gave orders, but before the orders were given Sam Bockarie, I can recall, transmitted a message that he had finally had an arrangement with Mr Taylor because we were now in Kono and we should be able to take care of Kono. He said Mr Taylor has told him that they should try and reorganise and re-prepare the airfield at Buedu, so in there they would need civilians to do the work on the field. The RUF sent over 200 to 300 civilians to Kailahun to do forced labour, to work on the field day and night with security escorts. Beside that we also got rid of some civilians for the mining purposes in Koidu Town, in Kono District.

Q. Within Koidu Town, while you were there at this time, do you recall anything else that occurred apart from the fact that houses were burned and civilians were abducted?

A. Yes, in Koidu Town before ever we left there we had another message from Sam Bockarie in which he said he needed money. The arrangement between himself and Taylor has been confirmed and now he needed money, but by then there was a commercial bank in Koidu Town. He passed the order to Superman and he told him that they correct? It could not be?

A. No, it was not easy. It was not easy.

Q. Thank you. Now, shall we move on to the messages that you received from Sam Bockarie in relation to mining. You - I think the question I had asked before we took the break was when was the earliest period that you received a message from him relating to mining. Can you go over that again?

A. Yes, the first stage was the first time we entered Kono we had a message from Superman - sorry from Sam Bockarie, Buedu, to Superman concerning mining in Koidu Town. The message said we should not lose Kono at all, because it had gone over to Mr Taylor - he had gone over to Mr Taylor for arms and ammunitions and what Taylor told him is he should try and get Kono, he should not lose Kono and from Kono we could get diamonds and we use these diamonds, give it to Taylor and he in return would give us ammunition. That was the first message we got.

From there we came to the bank, moved down to Superman Ground. When Bockarie, Mr Sam Bockarie alias Mosquito, came from Monrovia again, when he brought this ammunition out of this money he still insisted on the same message. At that time Superman had been organising men for this mining and the process had just started when we got to Superman Ground and luckily for us we used to have diamonds.

Q. Tell this Court in what locations you actually carried out mining activities?

A. It was around Koidu Town itself. That is where we started. At that time we were not in Koidu Town itself because ECOMOG was there. It was the surroundings.

Q. Apart from the vicinity around Koidu Town, did you engage allowed ourselves to hold our meetings in town. At any time we wanted to hold a meeting we will do that at the edge of the town. Where we held that particular meeting the communication radio station was also located very close to their and the field radio, it was very close to where the meeting was held. It was very close to Sam Bockarie's house alias Mosquito.

Q. Mr Witness, can you give the Court an idea of who was present at this meeting? Who were the persons present at the meeting?

15:41:10 A. At the meeting Mosquito was there, Superman was there, Isaac Mongor was there, Mike Lamin was there, Pa Rogers also was there and other authorities on the ground. And most of the battalion and brigade commanders were present.

Q. Now, Pa Rogers does he have - what is his full name?

15:41:56 A. SYB Rogers. I don't know what the initials SYB stand for, but he was SYB Rogers.

Q. Now can you tell this Court what transpired at the meeting?

A. Yes, what I can say what happened in the meeting, after everybody had assembled the first point on the agenda, 15:42:39 Sam Bockarie said he was going to clear the air to the people what actually obtained in the diamond transaction when Issa Sesay went to the diamonds and misused them according to what he came back and said. That was what happened in Liberia.

He first appealed to all - with all combatants and 15:43:04 commanders. He said, "Please, the issue of the diamonds that Issa has returned and spoken about", he said he is pleading with everybody to go back to their stations and resume their normal job. He said he has sent Issa Sesay to Pendembu and he considered that to be part of the punishment for him. He said

A. Please, sir. Your Honours, I want you to repeat the question, sir.

Q. If any of those names I have mentioned, Akim, Nancy, or Mary, were to come to this Court and tell the Court that they overheard you saying what I have said to Idrissa Kargbo, they would be lying. Is that your testimony?

A. Yes.

MR ANYAH: Your Honours, I would refer the Chamber to the last tab in the set of documents, tab number 12, and these are records of disbursements made by the Office of the Prosecutor to the witness:

Q. Mr Keita, I want to ask you about amounts you have received from the Office of the Prosecutor in this case. The records, starting on page 1, line 1, indicate that on 20 June 2003 you received the sum of $445. That is correct, true?

A. Yes.

Q. On the second row it says that three days later, on 23 June 2003, Corinne Dufka made a payment to you in the amount of $885, correct?

Q. Besides money that you have received from the Office of the Prosecutor, you have received money from another section of the Court, have you not?
12:39:53
A. Which section, sir?
Q. Have you received any money during the course of your involvement with the Special Court from the witnesses and victims section of the Special Court?
A. Yes.
12:40:10
Q. Can you tell us the total amount that you have received from that section since you have been involved with the Special Court?
A. No.
Q. Has the money been paid to you in United States currency?

A. Yes.
Q. Is the amount you have received less than, or greater than, $1,000?
A. Not even close to it.
12:40:44 Q. Then you have an approximate amount that you can give us. Can you tell us what the approximate amount is?
A. I cannot estimate, sir.
MR ANYAH: Madam President, may I have a moment, please? Madam President, I tender the witness. I have nothing further.
12:41:22 PRESIDING JUDGE: Thank you. Re-examination, Mr Koumjian?

RE-EXAMINATION BY MR KOUMJIAN

MR KOUMJIAN: Your Honour, very briefly, but the document that counsel was last cross-examining on in tab 12 I would like to have that marked for identification and I would like to ask 12:41:40 the witness some questions about that. I have an extra copy I could give to the Usher to put on the screen. Actually, my copy I have just scratched the word "payments" on it. That is the only way it differs, but let me use the copy that is in the Defence binder. I think it is unmarked.
12:42:39 PRESIDING JUDGE: Very well. That will be a document, three pages, headed "Special Court for Sierra Leone: All disbursements for witness" and then a number, and that will be MFI-20.
MR KOUMJIAN: Is it on the screen now?
12:43:07 Q. Sir, I am asking you some questions about the payments that the Defence counsel just asked you about. You were asked about a payment on 20 June 2003 of $445. Do you know the nature of that payment? What it paid for?

did you have any discussion about your bodyguards?
A. The bodyguards, they later changed. He gave me his own bodyguards and then the bodyguards who came with me, he took them over.
Q. How many bodyguards did Sam Bockarie give you?
A. He gave me three bodyguards.
Q. Did you have anything else with you that Sam Bockarie took?
A. He requested for the Yaesu radio that I brought with me and then he took the Yaesu radio that I brought, the one that was assigned to me by Benjamin Yeaten. He requested that I turn it over to him.
Q. Did you do that?
A. Yes.
Q. Can you tell us, when Sam Bockarie came to Buedu with the 300 boxes of ammunition, what was the atmosphere among the RUF present in Buedu?
A. They were very happy and then he called a muster, he called a meeting, and then those of us who were vanguards, he invited us into his house to discuss about the ammunition and then the plan that we should take towards the ammunitions.
Q. Okay. Let us take these slowly. You mentioned several meetings with Sam Bockarie. On that day when Sam Bockarie came back, what was the first meeting he had that you recall?
A. The first meeting, you know it was not with me in particular, but it was the whole RUF. He called Issa Sesay who was in that meeting, Lawrence Wohmandia was there, SB Rogers, Lawrence Wohmandia, Akim, Leatherboot and he said, "That is the material, that is the ammunition, and the operation is that we should take over Kono and Makeni and to terrorise the highway", he said, because Kono was a strategic area for us to get arms so that the mining will continue.

Q. Okay, where it did this meeting with these commanders take place?

A. The meeting took place at his house and then from there they had a vanguard meeting which was in closed doors in his bedroom. The people who they called vanguards, those were the people who brought the war into Sierra Leone. Those were the ones they called the vanguards.

Q. Okay, thank you. I was going to ask you to clarify that, but let me make sure we understand. When you say the vanguards are the people that brought the war into Sierra Leone, what do you mean?

A. I mean the first people who entered into Sierra Leone with the war, with the RUF. Those were the ones who were called vanguards.

Q. Were vanguards Sierra Leoneans, Liberians, or both?

A. They were a mixture. There were Liberians, there were Sierra Leoneans.

Q. Now, you have explained to us what vanguards are. Perhaps I will take this opportunity, you mentioned earlier the word "honourable", can you explain who were the honourables?

THE INTERPRETER: Your Honours, could counsel go over his question please.

A. Vanguard means -

MR KOUMJIAN: Wait, the interpreter asked me to restate the question.

Q. Can you tell us what the term "honourbles" means?

A. Of the vanguard, or the honourables, or the ones who were the honourbles, who were honourable, Adams, Suleh. They were the form of people who did the overthrow of the AFRC. Those were the people. But the vanguards were the special forces, the first group that crossed into Sierra Leone with the RUF. Those were the ones that were called the vanguards.

Q. Thank you. This first meeting that Bockarie had at the house after bringing the ammunition, you mentioned some commanders and in your answer you also mentioned - you said it was an RUF meeting and you mentioned Akim and Leatherboot. Akim and Leatherboot were AFRC, they were SLAs, is that right?

A. Yes, but they all worked with the RUF.

Q. Can you explain to us, you said Bockarie said Kono was strategic, did he explain why?

A. He said because we needed to generate funds for the RUF and then the only place where we can get more resources to generate funds was Kono, so we could be able to do mining.

Q. Okay, so after the meeting at the house you said there was a meeting in Bockarie's bedroom of the vanguards, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. So were you allowed into that meeting? Were you present for that?

A. No, they never allowed me to attend the meeting, sir. It was only for vanguards and I was not a vanguard.

Q. After the closed door vanguard meeting, was there another meeting?

A. That was a muster parade it was not a meeting, where all the soldiers assembled at the military grounds before Kaisoko's office. That was the time he instructed Issa Sesay that this mission, that the mission is that there should be no retreat, no surrender, "You should make sure you take over Kono and Makeni", and then he said President Taylor said they should be very vigilant and maintain the ground of the RUF, during that muster parade.

Q. You said it was in front of Kaisoko's office?

A. Not Kasava [phon], it is Kaisoko, the military police commander in Buedu.

MR KOUMJIAN: Thank you, I believe that is K-A-I-S-O-K-O.

Q. Sir, after this meeting was there an offensive?

A. Yes, that was the time we took the offensive against Kono and Makeni, and then myself there was an operation from Segwema, from Bunumbu to Segwema, to Jumo Kafebu, Gbava and Bendu junction.

MR KOUMJIAN: Okay, thank you. It is going to take me a few moments to spell some of these. Jumo Kafebu, J-U-M-O and second word K-A-F-E-B-U. Segwema, S-E-G-W-E-M-A. Bunumbu, B-U-N-U-M-B-U. B-U-N-U-M-B-U.

Q. I believe, sir, did you say Gbava?

A. Gbava, Gbava.

Q. That is G-B-A-V-A. In that offensive do you know if the main town in Kono, Kono Town, or Koindu Town as it is sometimes called, was taken?

A. Officially Kono Town was announced on Christmas day that Koindu has been taken over by the RUF.

Q. So that was Christmas day 1998?

A. Yes.

Q. Just so we have an idea, about how long before Kono Town fell did Sam Bockarie come back with the 300 boxes of ammunition?

would they send the number?
A. Through the radio, sir.
Q. You have told us about Sam Bockarie having a sat phone. Did you ever see anyone else in the RUF with a sat phone?
A. Yes.
Q. Who was that?
A. That was Issa Sesay after Sam Bockarie's regime.
Q. Do you know where Issa Sesay got the sat phone from?
A. He said the sat phone was given to him by Charles Taylor from Liberia.
Q. Sir, after this offensive in the Kono area did you become aware of more fighting occurring somewhere else in Sierra Leone?
A. Yes.
Q. What happened next?
A. The next operation after Kono and Makeni operations, and Freetown, the next one was that we fought in Liberia.
Q. Sorry, you mentioned Freetown so I want to concentrate on that.
A. Okay.
Q. The attack on Freetown. Where were you when the attack on Freetown was happening in January 1999?

PRESIDING JUDGE: You are definitely leading again, Mr Koumjian.

MR KOUMJIAN: I thought it was established that it was January, was the Freetown offensive.

PRESIDING JUDGE: No, the term - in any event, it is not established.

MR KOUMJIAN:

Q. Sir, when did you become aware - let me start all over.

Sir, where were you when the attack on Freetown happened?
A. When the attack on Freetown happened I was in Buedu.
Q. Where was Sam Bockarie?
A. Sam Bockarie was in Buedu. That was the time I told you that he came with these jean trousers and T'shirts and the car.
Q. How did you become aware of what was happening in Freetown?
A. At 3 o'clock we listened to BBC Focus on Africa and one commander spoke from Freetown saying that they were in control of the State House. Sam Bockarie became angry. He called up Issa Sesay and Morris Kallon asking them why they should allow someone to call the BBC while he, the commander, has not called the BBC. Then from there he himself called the BBC when they were in Buedu. He was speaking to Robin White over the satellite phone. He shot and said we were coming around the State House, but we were in Buedu.

JUDGE SEBUTINDE: Mr Koumjian, who is this "he himself called the BBC", is that Issa Sesay?
A. Sam Bockarie, General Sam Bockarie [indiscernible]. He called the BBC from Buedu over his satellite phone.

MR KOUMJIAN:
Q. Did Sam Bockarie maintain any communications with people in Freetown?
A. In Freetown?
Q. In and around Freetown?
A. He was talking to the various commanders over the Yaesu radios. He also communicated with Benjamin Yeaten and Joe Tuah over his satellite phone at night.
Q. Starting with the commanders you mentioned over the Yaesu radios, do you know the names of the commanders he was communicating with?

A. He was communicating with Issa and Morris Kallon.
Q. Anyone else that you recall him communicating with?
A. Those were the names - those are the names I can remember.
Q. On the Yaesu radios, can you tell us, are all of the commanders normally communicating on the same channel?
A. Yes.
Q. Was there someone in Buedu monitoring those channels?
A. There was a chief signal operator called Zedman. He monitored all the radio channels.
Q. You mentioned that Bockarie was on the satellite phone with Benjamin Yeaten, Joe Tuah - those are the names I recall. Did you hear him talking to Benjamin Yeaten and Joe Tuah during the Freetown fighting?
A. Yes.
Q. Do you know when the Freetown fighting occurred?
A. It started in January. It was on 6 January that they called from the State House saying they were in control of the State House.
Q. What year?
A. That was in 1999, sir.
Q. When Bockarie called Yeaten did you hear any of the conversation?
A. Yes.
Q. After the calls, would Bockarie ever discuss with you what he had talked to Yeaten about?
A. He said he just explained about the operation, how the men were progressing.
Q. Did Bockarie ever indicate whether he got any instruction from Yeaten, or anyone else in Liberia, during that offensive?

A. Coordinating in which way? I want you to explain, sir.

Q. Let me try the question again because I didn't say coordinating. Did Bockarie ever indicate whether he got any instruction from Liberia during the Freetown fighting?

MR ANYAH: Madam President -

A. He only communicated to Benjamin Yeaten.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Just pause, Mr Witness.

MR ANYAH: I object to the form of the question. Counsel is tacitly, or indirectly, leading the witness with phrases like "instructions" and this has been going on for a while. He could easily just ask the witness what Bockarie told the witness was the nature of these calls.

PRESIDING JUDGE: Mr Koumjian, there have been a few objections to leading. There are implications in some of the wordings you use. Please reword these questions to avoid any form of leading.

MR KOUMJIAN:

Q. What did Bockarie tell you, or what did you hear him say to Benjamin Yeaten?

A. I heard Bockarie and Benjamin Yeaten conversing about the progressive move that RUF has made. I didn't hear any instruction from Benjamin Yeaten to Bockarie to say do this, or do that, at that time.

Q. Thank you. During the fighting in Freetown, in the January offensive, did you play any part in that? What was your assignment?

A. I told you that I was assigned to Segbwema, Bunumbu, just in case any wounded soldier comes, I will take that wounded should maintain the RUF and to maintain the controlled areas of the RUF.

Q. Who said, just to be clear, who said that the message had come from President Taylor?

A. Sam Bockarie, Sam Bockarie, sir, Sam Bockarie.

Q. Thank you, now it is clear. Did Sam Bockarie pass that message to anyone?

A. Yes. He talked to Issa, Morris Kallon.

Q. Sir, when you were with the RUF did you become aware of any strategies to deal with attacks from jets?

A. Yes.

Q. Can you tell us about those RUF strategies?

A. The strategy was you should not cook during the day time. You should not set fire during the day. You do not launder and hang the clothes on a line. You are not entitled to rear chicken in the town. You are not entitled to keep a dog, because those things, when the jet discovers them they can operate.

Q. Was there any strategy involving radios?

A. The strategy was the monitor - Zedman monitored the radio stations from the Nigerian ECOMOG who were based in Lungi. Also Memunatu and Sita, they monitored from Monrovia. If a jet takes off from Monrovia on the RIA - because Victor Malu, who was the first commander, was staying in Monrovia - so they will call "448", so the radio operator would ring a bell and everybody would escape. That was the only strategy that I knew about.

MR KOUMJIAN: Some of these names we have spelt before. Situ, S-I-T-U, Memunatu, M-A-M-A-N-T-U:

Q. Sir, you said RIA, what do you mean by RIA?

A. The international airport of Liberia.

A. Point 50 calibre. It is a gun too.
Q. What did you see on this particular in July 1998? What did you see? 50 calibre what?
A. 50 and bombs - rocket propelled bombs - and mortars.
12:59:32 Q. In terms of 50 calibre did you see ammunitions, or did you see guns? Which was it?
A. I did not see the gun, because we met the gun with them. It was the ammunitions. And 60 millimetre mortars and 82 mortars, the bombs.
13:00:02 Q. You said 60 millimetre mortars?
A. Yes, sir.
Q. And 82 millimetre mortars?
A. Yes, sir, and TNT. It is a bomb. You will fix it for instance on the AK, on the barrel of the AK, the nozzle of the 13:00:27 AK. You can even use that to put down a jet if it is not too far. You can fix it on the nozzle of the AK and shoot at the Alpha jet and it can bring it down.
Q. Mr Witness, how were these materials packaged when you saw them?
13:00:54 A. They would be in boxes. In boxes. Some would be in cans, like sardine tins. Some would be in plastic containers, like the RPG. The tubes would be in plastic containers in a sealed wooden box.
Q. Now, you said that you remember four times when I asked you 13:01:26 about visitors to Sam Bockarie. You have just described what you remember from visitors in July 1998. The other times that you remember, can you briefly describe what those times were?
A. Four times, but I actually saw it on two occasions. The other two occasions I did not see it myself. The guard post person would bring the information and said that people had brought materials, but when I would come if they met Master - we met Master at the household they were stopped at the house. But the one that Mosquito himself sent, Mosquito would send one MP to 13:02:30 go there to off-load and so I was sent there twice. I saw that twice. I don't want to tell a lie. I am speaking for my God. I saw that myself twice.

Q. Mr Witness, the second time you saw this, who brought the ammunitions?

13:02:54 A. The second one Mosquito himself came at night. When he was coming, he came along with a lot of vehicles with Liberians, trucks. At that time he brought a lot of people.

Q. You say there were people - Liberians. How do you know?

A. My mother hailed from Kolahun. My mother's mother is 13:03:34 connected with the Gbandi people, Kolahun District. In that, our area, if your mother is not a Liberian your father could be a Guinean. Once you are coming from Kolahun, if the person is not a Kissi person he could be a Loma person, or Gbandi person. We are sharing boundaries. We are related. Liberians are related 13:04:03 to Sierra Leoneans. When they talk I will know that they are Liberians, because my motherland is sharing boundary with those people.

Q. The second - this time you were describing, about how long after the first time you just described was this second instance?
13:04:21 How much time passed between the two instances that you personally saw?

A. It was in that same month that Mosquito went and came back. I was there. He met me there. When Mosquito went he came himself. When he was coming he brought some people - Liberians.

THE WITNESS: If you want me to help me it is Lizzi that they call it that way. Omah just as you would say Mr or Madam, Lizzi is what they cut short. They called it Lizzi. As I told you, if a Liberian speaks you would understand if you are from Sierra Leone.

MR SANTORA: Okay, so Lizzi, L-i-z-z-i.

Q. You said she was Foday Sankoh's wife?

A. Yes.

Q. Now, Mr Witness, the second time how were the Liberians dressed; the second time you observed them coming?

13:19:37

A. Some of them had on military uniforms, some in ordinary clothing and they had boots on and they had guns as well and they were entering our own country with their own personal guns.

Q. Can you describe their uniforms?

13:20:07

A. Yes. It was jungle type, but it's a blue one, sky blue, and it was mixed with black, navy blue and green colour. Then they had on the black beret and boots. They had on the trousers.

Q. So, Mr Witness, just to clarify, you said initially - when I asked you how many times you remember Sam Bockarie having visitors you initially said four times and then you said two times you directly saw visitors. Is that correct?

A. Yes, whatever I say here, even in the world beyond, if they ask me that's the same I will say and I am not telling lies.

Q. Now the other two times you referred to, you personally didn't observe that. Is that correct?

A. No, but documents used to come. Documents used to come and when that came it would be given to Tom Sandy. At that time the Nigerians I was - the Nigerians were in my custody and in the night I would put them in their cells and lock them up at that time. What I saw - what I saw - what I witnessed with my own eyes that I recorded is what I am saying to you. I am not speaking here to impress anybody. What I saw - whatever I did during the war I will tell you.

13:22:08 Q. Mr Witness, the Nigerian POWs, who were they?

A. They were ECOMOG soldiers who had been captured alive.

Q. And you said that you saw documents from Tom Sandy. Was that the basis for your information that there were other visitors. Is that correct?

13:22:49 A. The way they made that movement, even if you were a commander when you arrived you would first go to the MP. MP was like the immigration. Just like in Freetown we have the Lungi airport. Even if a minister comes from another country you go through Lungi. So whatever you were going you would go through 13:23:08 MP for clearance before going to your house.

Mosquito, when he was - he wouldn't travel without going to MP. When Issa is travelling he wouldn't go to MP. Mike Lamin wouldn't go to MP. But whoever came to Buedu would go to MP hand, yourself over and then go to Buedu. That is how I know. I 13:23:28 knew by document. It would be written on it first battalion, second battalion. It is second battalion, Lofa County. That was how it was written on the address. From scorpion second battalion, scorpion regiment second battalion, that is how it was written, Lofa County. I am not telling lies. I saw it with my 13:23:53 own very eyes.

Q. Mr Witness, earlier you said you left Buedu on December 16th 1999, is that correct?

A. Yes.

Q. Okay. And you said you went to Kailahun, is that correct?

ATU report?

A. He reported to Mr Taylor directly.

Q. Now you have told us that Benjamin Yeaten was the joint chief of staff and during this time period we're talking about he 09:34:11 was based in Lofa County. Could you tell us what other commanders were in Lofa County at that time?

A. I said the navy division was in Foya, the marine division was in Foya, and we had the terrorist in Zorzor and we had a Strike force based in Nimba County and we had the army division 09:34:46 at Tubmanburg, that is Bomi Hills. We had the acting terrorist at Gbatala. That is in Bong County. Then we had White Geese also in Gbarnga.

Q. Thank you, Mr Witness. Now you also testified yesterday that the RUF were invited to assist the militias against the 09:35:14 LURD. Did the RUF come to assist in the fight against the LURD?

A. Yes.

Q. And where did they operate, in what area?

A. They operated in Foya, Kolahun and Voinjama.

Q. Do you recall the names of any of the RUF commanders?

09:35:39 A. The only person that I could recall his name, when Abu Keita came to Voinjama he sent me a written message that he's in good hands and that now he has been just sent forth to assist the Liberian government to fight against the LURD.

Q. Now to your knowledge who did the RUF report to?

09:36:06 A. RUF at that time when they came into Liberian territory to help the government they were reporting to Benjamin Yeaten directly.

Q. Now if you know during this time the RUF were in Liberia assisting in the fight against of the LURD who gave the arms and ammunition that they used, who gave them the arms and ammunition?

A. Mr Taylor will give the guns to Benjamin Yeaten and Benjamin Yeaten in return will distribute the guns and ammunitions between the RUF and all the other fighting groups in 09:36:49 Lofa County.
Q. Now while the RUF were fighting in Lofa County do you recall where any wounded RUF were taken for treatment?
A. Yes. Some of the wounded RUF fighters were taken to JFK in Monrovia, in the hospital. And now at that time the press people
09:37:20 visited the hospital and some other politicians visited the area and they said on the radio and in the newspaper that the war in Liberia is not true because they are seeing some other citizens from other countries like from Sierra Leone in the hospital and they were accusing the government that they were taking their 09:37:45 Liberian - sending them to Sierra Leone to fight there and now the people they see in the hospitals are speaking Krio, so some people were arrested for that reason. So some people were sent to the battle front to prove actually whether there was war in Liberia or not. That was what happened.
09:38:06 Q. Now you said some people were arrested for that reason. What do you mean?
A. I mean especially the lady who handled the last election that gained the power, the elections commission. They sent people to the battle front to prove actually whether there was 09:38:27 war in Liberia because when they visited the hospital they saw Sierra Leonean people. That means there is no war in Liberia, the war is in Sierra Leone and then Mr Taylor is taking Liberians to go and fight war in Sierra Leone. So they were arrested for that reason. Paul Molrbah arrested people, some of the politicians, including the last electoral commissioner because they sent people to the battle front to prove that reason.

Q. Are you saying these people were arrested because they were saying that Liberians were being sent to Sierra Leone?

09:39:08 A. Yes, they said they didn't believe whether there was any war in Liberia because they visited the hospital and have seen the Sierra Leonean fighters all over in the hospital.

Q. Now when you were the deputy chief of staff and then acting chief of staff of the army division would you tell us again from 09:39:30 whom you received instruction and direction?

A. I took instruction from Benjamin Yeaten and sometimes Mr Taylor would call me on the direct phone on which he gave me a satellite phone on which he will call me and he will call me directly and he will issue arm and ammunition to me.

09:39:53 Q. And can you recall how often Charles Taylor would contact you directly with instruction or directions?

A. Many times. I can't recall. It is many times. Because almost every two or three days he will call me, he wanted to know the situation at the battle front.

09:40:19 Q. Now to your knowledge the chiefs of staff of these other divisions, from whom did they receive their instructions or directions?

A. The same instruction that I received, they also received the same instruction. Sometimes they received the instruction 09:40:42 from Benjamin Yeaten, sometimes they received their instruction from Mr Taylor directly, because they were all issued phones because so he could call the person directly.

Q. Now during this time that you were deputy chief of staff and then acting chief of staff for the army division were you visited upon Sierra Leone are apparently Sierra Leoneans themselves. The savagery experienced was evidently a part of a national predisposition dormant for many years and then set off without external catalyst. In short, Sierra Leone has only itself to blame.

That is not the view of the Prosecution and it is not what the evidence will show.

The witnesses that we will call and the documents that we will present will prove that the accused is responsible for the development and execution of a plan that caused the death and destruction in Sierra Leone. That plan, formulated by the accused and others, was to take political and physical control of Sierra Leone in order to exploit its abundant natural resources and to establish a friendly or subordinate government there to facilitate that exploitation.

Your Honours will hear in this address that within that overall plan there were, of course, sub-plans and strategies and operations, and the execution of that plan, of course, changed and varied in its tactics due to the unfolding of events and the resistance that it faced. The parties, however, to that plan engaged in a multitude of activities designed to ensure its fulfillment.

11:29:06

The evidence will show that the accused's involvement in the crimes alleged in the indictment took a variety of forms - committing acts, planning, instigating, ordering, aiding and abetting, all in the commission of the alleged crimes, and otherwise participating in the execution of a common plan, design or purpose, what in some courts is referred to as a joint criminal enterprise. Additionally, we allege that he is

They therefore extended the operation to port-loko as far as Waterloo and kamb.a axis.

Furthermore, Col Rambo also tried his level best to link up with the other brothers that entered Freetown, but the Freetown operation was not Co-ordinated as the said Commander Blacks-Sah was not going by the instruction from the High Command. When they retreated from Freetown, the B.F.C met them and told them to present a Comprehensive report pertaining the whole Freetown operation, but they deliberately fail to do so.

According to the Black Guards security information, they brought some diamonds and lot of foreign Currency from Freetown, but they never presented anything to the High Command.

SIERRA LEONE

1998 - a year of atrocities against civilians

Introduction

During 1998 the scale of atrocities against civilians in Sierra Leone has reached unprecedented levels. Several thousand unarmed civilians, including many women and children, have been deliberately and arbitrarily killed and mutilated by forces of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC) and the armed opposition Revolutionary Front (RUF) since February 1998. These atrocities are continuing.

The AFRC, which seized power in a military coup in May 1997 and which was joined by the RUF, was deposed in February 1998 by West African forces deployed in Sierra Leone. The government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah, which had been elected in 1996, returned to Freetown in March 1998. Although security has since returned to the capital, Freetown, and much of the south of the country, the scale of human rights abuses committed by AFRC and RUF forces in the north and east of the country has escalated and taken on grotesque forms. From April 1998 reports emerged of civilians suffering mutilations such as crude amputations of their feet, hands, arms, lips or ears. Women and girls have been systematically raped. Hundreds of civilians, in particular children and young men and women, have been abducted by rebel forces. The violence has resulted in hundreds of thousands of Sierra Leoneans fleeing to neighbouring Guinea and Liberia or becoming internally displaced within Sierra Leone. AFRC and RUF forces must respect international humanitarian law and immediately end the gross human rights abuses which they are perpetrating against unarmed civilians.

The international community, including the United Nations (UN), the Organization of African Unity (OAU), the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), the Commonwealth and the European Union (EU), has devoted considerable attention and effort to resolving the political crisis in Sierra Leone and to restoring the government of President Kabbah. It has since repeatedly condemned the atrocities being committed by AFRC and RUF forces. The international community has committed itself to bringing peace and security to Sierra Leone and also to assisting in its reconstruction and rehabilitation. This commitment must include initiatives to help end the gross human rights abuses being perpetrated by AFRC and RUF forces, to prevent further abuses and also to lay solid foundations for the respect and protection of human rights in the future.

The challenges facing Sierra Leone in confronting the widespread and gross human rights abuses which have continued and worsened since May 1997 are difficult and daunting. Sierra Leone's social and economic infrastructure needs to be rebuilt. Its institutions, such as the legal and judicial systems and the army and police, need to be restructured and reinforced in order to ensure protection of human rights. Civil society, including the human rights community, has a crucial role to play. The government of Sierra Leone has to respond to these challenges in a way that ensures that the fundamental human rights of all those in Sierra Leone are protected.

West African forces and a civilian militia who are fighting rebel forces must also respect international humanitarian and human rights law. Forces of the civilian militia have been responsible for extrajudicial executions, torture and ill-treatment, although on a far lesser scale than rebel forces. West African forces have in some cases illegally detained civilians and tortured and ill-treated captured combatants. Concerns have also been expressed about the protection of non-combatants during military operations.

Accountability for the gross human rights abuses which have occurred in Sierra Leone must be established. National reconciliation within Sierra Leone will not be possible if there is impunity for those who have perpetrated human rights abuses. All those charged in connection with the military coup in May 1997 and the period of AFRC rule must be granted trials which conform to international standards of fairness. Recourse to the death penalty will not contribute to the process of reconciliation.

The international community should continue to assist Sierra Leone to respond effectively to the challenges which it faces in ensuring the long-term protection and respect of human rights in Sierra Leone.

The political context

On 25 May 1997 the government of President Kabbah was overthrown in a military coup and the military formed the AFRC, headed by Major Johnny Paul Koroma. President Kabbah had come to power in March 1996 following parliamentary and presidential elections, ending four years of military rule. The AFRC claimed that they had overthrown the government because it had failed to consolidate peace in Sierra Leone following a peace agreement concluded in Abidjan, Côte d'Ivoire, in November 1996 between the government and the RUF to end the internal armed conflict which began in 1991. It also claimed that the government was undemocratic and that it had promoted tribalism by appointing people mainly from the Mende ethnic group from the south and the east to prominent government positions. A major grievance was the perceived lack of resources accorded by the government to the Sierra Leone armed forces and a favouring of a civilian militia composed of traditional hunters of the Mende ethnic group, known as kamajors, which supported the government in the conflict against the RUF. These accusations were strongly denied by President Kabbah, members of his government and their supporters. The AFRC also called for the release and return of the RUF's leader, Foday Sankoh, in detention in Nigeria.

Foday Sankoh remained held, effectively under house arrest, in Abuja, Nigeria. He had been detained by Nigerian authorities on arrival in Nigeria in March 1997, apparently for possession of arms and ammunition. From Nigeria, Foday Sankoh announced his support for the military coup. The AFRC was subsequently joined by RUF forces who arrived in large numbers in Freetown. Foday Sankoh was named as Vice-Chairman of the AFRC and prominent members of the RUF were appointed to the AFRC's ruling council.

The overthrow of President Kabbah was condemned by the international community which demanded the return of constitutional order to Sierra Leone. Negotiations by the international community with the AFRC faltered, a global economic embargo was imposed and military intervention to restore the government of President Kabbah was seriously considered by countries in the region if dialogue and sanctions failed. Following the military coup the OAU gave a mandate to ECOWAS to take necessary action to restore legality and constitutionality to Sierra Leone and subsequently provided strong support for ECOWAS's initiatives to bring peace, security and stability to Sierra Leone. The UN Security Council also expressed its full support for the efforts of ECOWAS to resolve the political crisis in Sierra Leone.

On 23 October 1997 the AFRC signed an agreement in Conakry, in neighbouring Guinea, with representatives of five other West African governments to return power to President Kabbah by 22 April 1998. Implementation of this agreement, however, which included cessation of hostilities, disarmament and demobilization, encountered serious set-backs. Fighting between AFRC and RUF forces on the one hand and the kamajors on the other intensified.

In early February 1998, following attacks on its bases outside Freetown, West African forces deployed in Sierra Leone, the ECOWAS Cease-fire Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) [1], launched an offensive on Freetown. Chaos and violence ensued the following week during which there were many civilian casualties. Civilians were killed by AFRC and RUF forces who also looted and destroyed their homes. Reports described soldiers and RUF forces, also joined by Liberian fighters, going from house to house of those they suspected of opposing them and deliberately and arbitrarily killing them. Others died as a result of shelling both by ECOMOG and also AFRC and RUF forces. While fighting continued in Freetown, civilians in Southern and Eastern Provinces were facing an equally desperate situation as they were caught in fighting between the kamajors and AFRC and RUF forces. Thousands of people, including women and children, fled into neighbouring Liberia to escape. The humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone, already critical, deteriorated still further with the increase in hostilities.

Although after the ECOMOG intervention and the return of President Kabbah's government comparative calm and the rule of law returned to Freetown and Southern Province, armed confrontation has continued throughout the following months in Northern and Eastern Provinces as ECOMOG forces have fought to defeat remaining rebel forces. Appalling atrocities have been committed against civilians as conflict has continued. Major Johnny Paul Koroma and other prominent members of the AFRC and the RUF, including Sam Bockarie, known as Mosquito, remained with rebel forces in the north and east of the country.

The government of Sierra Leone has adopted a comprehensive program for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants which contains clearly defined roles for ECOMOG and the UN Observer Mission in Sierra Leone (UNOMSIL), which was established by the UN Security Council in July 1998. The program is aimed at some 33,000 former combatants of the disbanded national army, the RUF and the civilian militia, known as the Civil Defence Forces (CDF). The government has expressed a particular commitment to demobilizing some 2,500 child soldiers who have fought in the internal armed conflict. Funding was expected from international financial institutions, several UN agencies and important donor nations such as the United States and the United Kingdom. As violence has escalated and offensives by ECOMOG and CDF against rebel forces have continued, however, effective implementation of this program has been prevented.

On 25 July 1998 Foday Sankoh was released by the Nigerian government into the custody of the Sierra Leonean authorities. He appeared in a television interview calling on his fighters to end atrocities against civilians and to surrender to either ECOMOG or UNOMSIL. The government subsequently reiterated a deadline of 8 August 1998 for an amnesty for rebel forces but there was no significant response. Members of the RUF were subsequently reported as claiming that Foday Sankoh had made these statements under duress and continued to demand his release. The RUF threatened to continue their campaign of violence against civilians if he remained in detention. The government announced its intention to prosecute Foday Sankoh for crimes, including gross human rights abuses, committed during Sierra Leone's internal armed conflict. He was brought to trial on 24 September 1998 and convicted and sentenced to death the following month. This prompted further attacks by rebel forces against unarmed civilians in retaliation.

Also in September 1998 rebel forces called on the government to begin negotiations for peace through the UN, the OAU and the Commonwealth Secretariat, the moral guarantors of the peace agreement signed in Abidjan. The Commonwealth Ministerial Action Group on the Harare Declaration (CMAG)[2] on 9 October 1998 called on rebel forces to make an immediate statement accepting the following terms: the recognition of the legitimacy and authority of the government; an unconditional and indefinite cessation of all hostilities; and a willingness to enter into talks to bring about an immediate end to the conflict. At the same time CMAG expressed its grave concern about the humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone, in particular the continuing atrocities by rebel forces, which it condemned unreservedly. The government also responded to the call by rebel forces for negotiations by saying that they should lay down their arms and surrender to UNOMSIL military observers.

President Kabbah repeated calls for rebel forces to surrender on 19 October 1998 and renewed an offer of amnesty for those surrendering. It appeared that the amnesty implied that those surrendering who had not been responsible for crimes would be included in the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process whereas those who were accused of criminal offences would prosecuted with due process of the law. There was, however, no significant increase in the number of those surrendering.

The West Africa sub-region

Liberia was widely reported to be providing combatants, arms and ammunition to AFRC and RUF forces in Sierra Leone. Liberian fighters were present in Freetown at the time of the ECOMOG intervention and survivors of the gross human rights abuses which followed stated that the armed groups which had attacked them had included Liberians.

In the Vahun and Kolahun areas of Lofa Country in northwestern Liberia, where tens of thousands of Sierra Leonean refugees had fled escalating fighting in eastern Sierra Leone, cooperation between rebel forces and the Liberian military was reported to be witnessed regularly. The RUF second-in-command, Sam Bockarie, was reported to have been in direct contact with Liberian military forces and to have regularly crossed the border into Liberia.

On 12 May 1998 a statement by the United States Department of State referred to "distressing rumours that RUF and AFRC forces were being assisted in their campaign of terror by other governments. Although we cannot confirm these rumours, it should be clear that any government or other party which is found to be helping the rebels to prolong the tragedy in Sierra Leone will face the strongest condemnation of the United States and the international community."

On 20 May 1998 the President of the UN Security Council condemned as gross violations of international humanitarian law the atrocities carried out against the civilian population, particularly women and children, by the deposed AFRC and RUF, including widespread rape, mutilation and killings, and called for an immediate end to continuing violence against civilians. The Security Council also expressed grave concern about reports of military support being provided to the AFRC and RUF by other countries and called on all states to observe strictly the provisions of Security Council Resolution 1132 (1997) of 8 October 1997, which had imposed an arms embargo on Sierra Leone, and to avoid any action which might further destabilize the situation in Sierra Leone. Security Council Resolution 1171 (1998) of 5 June 1998 lifted the arms embargo on the government of Sierra Leone. The same resolution prohibited the sale and supply of arms and related matériel to non-governmental forces in Sierra Leone. The Security Council subsequently praised the efforts of the UN Secretary-General to stop the flow of arms across the border from Liberia to rebels forces in Kailahun District, Eastern Province. All states were urged to comply strictly with the terms of the UN embargo on sales of arms to rebel forces still fighting in the interior of the country.

In his Fifth Report on the Situation in Sierra Leone to the UN Security Council of 9 June 1998, the UN Secretary-General stated that the deployment of ECOMOG troops at the border with Liberia could help dispel allegations of the influx of arms or the provision of armed assistance to the AFRC and RUF by foreign forces. While welcoming a commitment by the government of Liberia not to allow its territory to be used to destabilize any neighbouring country, the Secretary-General expressed the view that verification of this would improve the security climate throughout the sub-region and improve mutual confidence among countries in the sub-region.

On 22 and 23 June 1998 a Liberian delegation visited Freetown to deliver a message from President Charles Taylor to President Kabbah on ways to promote peace between Guinea, Liberia and Sierra Leone, the three Mano River Union countries. The delegation denied allegations that the Liberian government was supporting AFRC and RUF forces. President Kabbah and President Taylor met in Abuja on 1 July 1998 at a meeting convened by the UN Secretary-General. Agreement was reached on a number of confidence-building measures. A further meeting between President Kabbah and President Taylor took place in Monrovia, Liberia, on 20 July 1998. In a communiqué signed at the conclusion of the meeting both leaders condemned atrocities and human rights abuses committed by combatants in Sierra Leone against civilians, as well as continued rebel activities in Sierra Leone. They reaffirmed their commitment to non-aggression against the territorial integrity of each other's country and pledged to continue cooperation towards peace and security in the sub-region. Both leaders renewed a call to the UN and ECOWAS to deploy observer units on the border between Liberia and Sierra Leone and agreed to coordinate border security activities.

At a UN special conference on Sierra Leone in New York in July 1998 the meetings between President Kabbah and President Taylor were welcomed and the two leaders were urged to continue to work towards improving relations between their two countries and regional security. The importance of stopping entry of illegal supplies of weapons into Sierra Leone and ending the direct or indirect support of neighbouring countries to rebel forces was stressed.

Relations between the two countries appeared to deteriorate, however, in October 1998 when the government of Sierra Leone was reported to have complained to the international community, including the UN Secretary-General, about the presence of Liberian combatants among rebel forces in Sierra Leone and about preparations for an incursion of Liberian fighters into Sierra Leone. These allegations were vigorously denied by President Taylor. UNOMSIL military observers at that time detected no evidence of an armed incursion from Liberia.

The UN Secretary-General in his Second Progress Report on UNOMSIL on 16 October 1998 expressed deep concern about developments in the situation between Sierra Leone and Liberia and urged both governments to exercise maximum restraint, pursue dialogue and implement the confidence-building measures agreed in July 1998. He also proposed that, should both countries agree, the deployment of ECOMOG forces at the border, subsequently accompanied by UNOMSIL military observers, could help stabilize the situation and restore mutual confidence.

During a visit by Reverend Jesse Jackson, special envoy of United States President Bill Clinton, to West Africa in November 1998 he held meetings in Conakry with President Kabbah, President Taylor and President Lansana Conté of Guinea. The three heads of state on 12 November 1998 stated their commitment to non-aggression and cooperation on security issues within the Mano River Union and also to promoting peace in Sierra Leone and maintaining stability within the sub-region.

In view of the appalling level of violence against civilians which has characterized the conflict in Sierra Leone, including the widespread and gross human rights abuses being perpetrated by AFRC and RUF and their stated intention to attack unarmed civilians, Amnesty International believes that military transfers, including arms, ammunition and combatants, to rebel forces will contribute to abuses of international human rights and humanitarian principles governing the conduct of war.

Recommendations

- all governments should take all possible measures to end immediately military transfers, including arms, ammunition and combatants, to AFRC and RUF forces;
- in addition, the governments of Liberia and Guinea, which border Sierra Leone, should take all possible measures to prevent military supplies, whether they originate in their country or not, destined for AFRC and RUF forces, from entering Sierra Leone across their borders;
- effective monitoring of the border between Sierra Leone and Liberia by ECOMOG forces and UNOMSIL military observers could assist in preventing military transfers to AFRC and RUF forces;
- governments in the sub-region should use whatever influence they may have on AFRC and RUF forces to bring about an end to the atrocities they continue to perpetrate against civilians.

International response to the human rights crisis

Following the military coup in May 1997 the international community made strenuous efforts to resolve the political crisis in Sierra Leone. Since the reinstatement of President Kabbah's government in March 1998, serious attention continues to be paid to consolidating the government's position, ending the conflict in the north and east of the country, which is still claiming hundreds of civilian victims, and to assisting rehabilitation and reconstruction of the country. The continuing gross human rights abuses committed by AFRC and RUF forces have been universally condemned, including by the UN, the OAU, the EU and the Commonwealth.

United Nations

On 17 April 1998 the UN Security Council authorized the deployment of a UN liaison unit in Sierra Leone. Resolution 1162 (1998) provided for up to 10 UN military liaison and security advisory personnel in Freetown with a mandate for up to three months. The group was to coordinate closely with ECOMOG to report on the military situation in Sierra Leone and to assist in disarming former combatants. The resolution also welcomed efforts of President Kabbah and his government to restore peaceful and secure conditions, to re-establish an effective administration and democratic process and to embark on reconstruction. The resolution noted the need to promote national reconciliation and encouraged all parties to work towards that objective. All countries and international organizations were urged to provide urgent humanitarian assistance in Sierra Leone and were encouraged to help with its reconstruction and economic and social recovery. A human rights officer was also appointed to assist the UN Secretary-General's Special Envoy to Sierra Leone, Francis Okelo (who was subsequently appointed as Special Representative).

In the UN Secretary-General's Fifth Report on Sierra Leone, the deteriorating human rights situation was emphasized, and it was recommended that the number of UN human rights officers in Freetown be increased.

The UN Observer Mission in Sierra Leone

On 13 July 1998 the UN Security Council established a new peace-keeping operation, UNOMSIL, which expanded the office of the Secretary General's Special Envoy, to monitor the military and security situation in Sierra Leone, as security conditions permitted, for an initial six-month period until 13 January 1999. UNOMSIL would consist of 70 military observers and would be accompanied by a small medical unit and civilian support staff. The civilian staff would advise the government and local police, report on violations of international humanitarian and human rights law in Sierra Leone, and assist the government in its efforts to address the country's human rights needs. UNOMSIL was to be led by the Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General in Sierra Leone. Initially, 40 military observers were to be deployed from July 1998 in Freetown, Hastings and Lungi. Depending on the security situation, a second phase of deployment would take place.

In approving Resolution 1181 (1998), which established UNOMSIL, the Security Council also condemned the continued resistance by remnants of the AFRC and RUF to the legitimate government and demanded that they lay down their arms immediately. It expressed its grave concern "at the loss of life and immense suffering undergone by the people of Sierra Leone, including refugees and displaced persons, as a result of continuing rebel attacks".

Resolution 1181 (1998), in addition to establishing a military and civilian police peace-keeping mission, also mandated the monitoring of human rights and the provision of assistance to the government of Sierra Leone in addressing its human rights obligations [3]. The resolution also gave UNOMSIL military observers a mandate to monitor respect of international humanitarian law during the demobilization process.

By October 1998 the human rights component of UNOMSIL had been increased to seven staff: four international human rights officers, one national human rights officer and two support staff. Subsequent progress reports by the UN Secretary-General on UNOMSIL to the Security Council referred extensively and in detail to continuing human rights abuses in Sierra Leone. The prominence given to the human rights crisis in Sierra Leone in these reports is welcomed and should continue.

In his First Progress Report on 12 August 1998, the Secretary-General reported that "there is strong evidence of the systematic and widespread perpetration of multiple forms of human rights abuse against the civilian population, including rape. In recent weeks, elements of the former junta have continued to shell population centres such as Koidu and Daru and have used civilians as human shields in their military operations. There have been numerous instances of arbitrary execution, including of women and children, followed in some cases by mutilation of the bodies."

In his Second Progress Report on 16 October 1998, the Secretary-General stated that "the continuing conflict in Sierra Leone imposes immense suffering on the people of that country. I strongly condemn the summary executions, torture, mutilation, rapes, looting and other acts of barbarism carried out by former junta elements and call on them to lay down their arms and surrender. I am particularly outraged by the senseless acts of terror perpetrated against children, such as the amputation of limbs of boys and girls as young as six years of age, and support the efforts to bring to justice the authors of these especially abhorrent crimes."

The UN Secretary-General concluded his Second Progress Report by stating that he would "examine with great care any realistic proposal to end the armed conflict with minimal loss of life to combatants and to innocent civilians, and to promote lasting peace and national reconciliation in Sierra Leone".

Major initiatives have been undertaken by UNOMSIL human rights officers. Continued monitoring and reporting of human rights abuses have been reflected in the UN Secretary-General's reports to the Security Council. A preliminary human rights needs assessment has been developed. Human rights officers have also closely observed trials before the High Court and court martial in Freetown of those charged with treason in connection with the military coup in May 1997 and have intervened with the government in relation to these trials when appropriate. Guidance on human rights reporting to UNOMSIL military observers has been provided and human rights training programs for police officers, prison officials, the legal profession and the media have been developed and implemented. A human rights monitoring network including local non-governmental human rights organizations throughout the country and international non-governmental organizations has also been developed. Training for the network in human rights monitoring and reporting has been planned by UNOMSIL human rights officers, in cooperation with the National Commission for Democracy and Human Rights and a coalition of local groups, the National Forum for Human Rights. Increased cooperation between local human rights groups has been encouraged and it is anticipated that the human rights training program will involve relevant sectors of civil society from all parts of the country.

The role of UNOMSIL human rights officers in human rights monitoring and reporting should be continued for as long as necessary, including until it is clear that the government is implementing international human rights guarantees effectively. In September 1998 UNOMSIL human rights officers also began to provide human rights technical assistance to the government, including assistance in meeting its reporting requirements under international human rights treaties to which it is a party, such as the UN Convention on the Rights of the Child [4].

The human rights component plays a dominant role within UNOMSIL and is an essential part of the military mandate of the peace-keeping operation. Sierra Leone continues to face a human rights emergency and monitoring and reporting of human rights abuses therefore remain essential. Strategies to develop continued and enhanced support for the UNOMSIL human rights component should be developed by the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights.

The UN special conference on Sierra Leone

The UN Secretary-General, Kofi Annan, convened a special conference in New York on 30 July 1998 to galvanize the international community's response to the political, humanitarian and human rights situation in Sierra Leone. The purpose of the meeting was to focus international attention on the situation in Sierra Leone and the government's initiatives aimed at resolving the conflict, restoring secure conditions and effective administration throughout the country. The conference brought together representatives of the government of Sierra Leone, intergovernmental organizations, including the UN, the OAU, ECOWAS, the EU and the Commonwealth. The special conference on Sierra Leone specifically sought assistance from the international community for UNOMSIL and for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of former combatants, including child soldiers.

At the time of the UN special conference Amnesty International recommended that the international community's commitment to bring peace and security to Sierra Leone and to assist in its reconstruction and rehabilitation include initiatives which would help to stop the gross human rights abuses being perpetrated by AFRC and RUF forces, prevent further abuses and also lay solid foundations for the respect and protection of human rights in the future[5].

The UN special conference strongly condemned the continued resistance of AFRC and RUF forces, and in particular their perpetration of appalling atrocities, and they were called on to lay down their arms and surrender. The Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General in Sierra Leone urged the international community to match their pledges of support to Sierra Leone with concrete action to consolidate its democratic gains. The conference agreed to establish an international contact group to mobilize and coordinate further support for Sierra Leone. The contact group was convened by the government of the United Kingdom in London on 5 November 1998[6]. Those participating included representatives of the government of Sierra Leone, the Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General in Sierra Leone and Lansana Kouyaté, Executive Secretary of ECOWAS. In his opening address to the meeting, Tony Lloyd, United Kingdom Minister of State, Foreign and Commonwealth Office, said that: "Atrocities are still being carried out by remaining rebel forces. Sierra Leone needs peace, reconciliation and lasting restoration of democracy and human rights ... we hope to boost the efforts of the international community to meet these needs."

Recommendations

- the human rights component of UNOMSIL should continue to be supported and strengthened; adequate resources, including additional staff, should be provided to effectively monitor and report on human rights abuses throughout the country, implement technical assistance programs with the Sierra Leone government and provide support and training to Sierra Leonean human rights groups;
- the UN Office of the High Commissioner for Human Rights should play a major role in reinforcing and providing support to the human rights component of UNOMSIL;
- the human rights component of UNOMSIL should include experts in the area of violence against women, including rape and sexual abuse;
- UNOMSIL human rights officers should continue to submit reports of violations of international humanitarian and human rights law to the UN Secretary-General and to the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights; comprehensive reports on the human right situation in Sierra Leone should be made public and submitted to the UN Security Council;
- the human rights component of UNOMSIL should have sufficient resources to effectively contribute towards long-term measures for human rights protection and its human rights monitoring and reporting roles should be continued for as long as necessary;
- visits to Sierra Leone by the UN Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions and the UN Special Rapporteur on torture should take place in order to investigate and report on the gross human rights abuses which continue to be perpetrated;
- the international contact group on Sierra Leone should place human rights at the centre of its efforts to coordinate the international community's response to the situation in Sierra Leone and ensure that adequate resources are provided to initiatives aimed at the protection and respect of human rights.

OAU and ECOWAS

Immediately after the military coup in May 1997, the OAU Secretary General, Dr Salim Ahmed Salim, condemned it as "unacceptable to the continent". The Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution unequivocally condemned the military coup and called for the immediate restoration of constitutional order [7]. It appealed to the leaders of ECOWAS states to pursue efforts aimed at assisting the people of Sierra Leone in the restoration of constitutional order and to the international community to support those efforts.

The 33rd OAU Assembly of Heads of State and Government meeting in Harare, Zimbabwe, in early June 1997 gave a mandate to ECOWAS to take necessary action to restore legality and constitutionality to Sierra Leone. The specific measures to be taken were to be decided by ECOWAS. The OAU Secretary General reiterated the OAU's strong support for ECOWAS's initiatives to bring peace, security and stability to Sierra Leone at the ECOWAS summit in Abuja at the end of August 1997.

It was under this mandate from the OAU that ECOWAS forces were deployed in Sierra Leone to monitor a cease-fire, to enforce the sanctions and embargo imposed by the UN Security Council and to secure peace in Sierra Leone. Military intervention by ECOMOG remained an option if dialogue between the AFRC and representatives of other ECOWAS countries and sanctions failed.

ECOWAS and ECOMOG have played a dominant role in political developments in Sierra Leone since the military coup, culminating in the removal of the AFRC and the reinstatement of President Kabbah's government in February 1998. ECOMOG forces in Sierra Leone have been widely praised by the international community. At the ECOWAS summit in Abuja in late October 1998 ECOWAS heads of state and government endorsed the extension of ECOMOG's mandate in Sierra Leone and agreed that it should be strengthened, adding that efforts to achieve a lasting solution to the conflict should continue.

Between 10,000 and 12,000 ECOMOG forces were reported to have been deployed in Sierra Leone by October 1998. ECOMOG, which is composed largely of Nigerian forces, also comprises Guinean and Ghanaian troops and further contingents from Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Guinea, Mali and Niger were envisaged. ECOMOG headquarters were to be transferred from Monrovia to Freetown. In April 1998 President Kabbah appointed the ECOMOG commander in Sierra Leone, Brigadier-General Maxwell Khobe, as head of internal security in Sierra Leone. He was subsequently appointed in July 1998 as Chief of Defence Staff of the Republic of Sierra Leone Military Force (RSLMF). The national Sierra Leone army had effectively ceased to exist but was to be re-established.

The ECOMOG force in Sierra Leone is generally considered by the international community and within Sierra Leone to be disciplined and its intervention in February 1998 was welcomed by the majority of Sierra Leoneans. During the following months, as atrocities in the north and east of the country escalated, ECOMOG forces evacuated to safety and medical facilities some of the hundreds of victims of amputations and other injuries, saving many lives.

In the following months, however, reports began to be received of human rights violations committed by ECOMOG forces, including illegal detention of civilians, and torture and ill-treatment of civilian detainees and captured combatants. Concerns have also been expressed that the safety of the civilian population might be endangered during ECOMOG operations, especially air strikes, against rebel forces, particularly in Kailahun District, a rebel stronghold. Measures to minimise the risk to civilians during combat must be undertaken during all military operations by ECOMOG forces. The OAU and ECOWAS have a responsibility to ensure that ECOMOG forces in Sierra Leone conform to international humanitarian and human rights law at all times.

As atrocities against unarmed civilians by rebel forces have continued, the need for concerted action by the international community remains. The OAU Central Organ should continue to play a role both in attempts to resolve the conflict in Sierra Leone and also to respond to post-conflict needs, in particular assistance for creating and reinforcing institutions aimed at long-term protection of human rights in Sierra Leone.

The African Commission on Human and Peoples' Rights (African Commission), meeting in Banjul, Gambia, on 22 October 1998 agreed to send its Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, arbitrary or summary executions, Dr Mohamed Hatem Ben-Salem, to Sierra Leone in November 1998.

Recommendations

- In view of the continuing gross human rights abuses in Sierra Leone, the Central Organ of the OAU Mechanism for Conflict Prevention, Management and Resolution should consider requesting that the UN Security Council increase the resources of the human rights component of UNOMSIL in order to investigate and document these abuses;

- in addition to its Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, arbitrary or summary executions, the African Commission should also consider a visit to Sierra Leone by its Special Rapporteur on women in order to investigate and report the gross human rights abuses which continue to be committed in Sierra Leone, including against girls and women;

- the OAU Central Organ should send a delegation to Sierra Leone to assess the country's post-conflict needs including the establishment of effective structures for the future protection and respect of human rights;

- ECOWAS should ensure full compliance of its forces in Sierra Leone to international humanitarian and human rights law; there should be a mechanism to monitor human rights violations and take measures to prevent further violations.

Human rights violations during the period of AFRC rule

The period from 25 May 1997 until 12 February 1998 was marked by a total disregard for the rule of law and demands from the international community to respect international humanitarian and human rights law. The rule of law completely collapsed and violence engulfed the country.

Hundreds of people who were associated with the government of President Kabbah or his political party, the Sierra Leone People's Party (SLPP), or who were perceived to be opposed to the AFRC were detained without charge or trial, torture and ill-treatment were systematic, and many of those perceived to be political opponents of the AFRC were extrajudicially executed.

On 20 October 1997 Amnesty International published a report which documented the human rights violations systematically committed by the AFRC and the RUF after the military coup [8]. The victims included those associated with the government of President Kabbah, journalists, students and human rights activists. Between October 1997 and February 1998 arrests, torture and killings continued relentlessly. The full toll of those detained, tortured, ill-treated and killed while the AFRC and RUF held power only emerged after they were forced from power.

During the period of AFRC rule, while it was possible to obtain limited information about human rights violations in Freetown, few details of what was happening in the Provinces were accessible. When an Amnesty International delegation travelled to Sierra Leone in May 1998, the extent of the suffering of civilians became evident. Killings, rape and looting were systematic in all parts of the country. Hundreds of people had been deliberately and arbitrarily killed, thousands lost their possessions, homes and livelihoods. Rape of girls and women was systematic throughout the country.

Amnesty International repeatedly called on the AFRC to end the systematic human rights violations which occurred after May 1997 and to adhere to its obligations under international human rights law, in particular the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights (ICCPR) and the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights (African Charter)[9]. It called for urgent measures to end arbitrary arrest and detention of those perceived to be opposed to the AFRC and to end torture, ill-treatment and extrajudicial executions.

It is important that there continue to be full and independent investigations into the human rights violations committed during the period of AFRC rule and that the truth of what occurred during those months is established and documented in order to bring those responsible to justice. There should be no impunity for the grave human rights violations committed throughout the period of AFRC rule. Investigation and accountability for these human rights violations will also contribute towards the process of national reconciliation within Sierra Leone.

Arbitrary arrest and detention

Hundreds of political detainees were held incommunicado without charge or trial. It was difficult to assess with any accuracy the number of those detained because of continuous arrests and releases, the failure of the authorities to provide information about detainees and lack of access to places of detention. Detainees were held at the Central Prison, Pademba Road, the police Criminal Investigation Department (CID) headquarters and Cockerill military headquarters in Freetown as well as other military camps, such as that known as the SS camp at the village of Regent in the hills above Freetown.

Throughout the period of AFRC rule journalists were particular targets of arrest, detention and torture. During October and November 1997 the crack-down on the press intensified; at least 20 journalists were detained and many were tortured and ill-treated. They included Jon Z. Foray, editor of the New Storm newspaper, who was arrested by soldiers on 11 October 1997. He was taken first to Cockerill military headquarters where he was handed over to the military police and then held in a freight container. Also held in the container was Prince Akpu, a Nigerian journalist who had established a newspaper called Alpha jet, and who was arrested around the same time and accused of subversive activities. (Nigerian ECOMOG forces had used military aircraft called Alpha jets in their operations.) Two days later the two journalists were collected by a senior AFRC member, apparently to be taken to CID headquarters. They were, however, blindfolded and taken to the SS camp. Jon Z. Foray was beaten and stabbed with bayonets by soldiers and sustained a serious injury to his spine. He and Prince Akpu were released on 22 October 1997. With the help of friends, Jon Z. Foray managed to leave Sierra Leone for Ghana where he was admitted to hospital and received two months of medical treatment.

Arrests of journalists continued into November 1997: Dorothy Awoonor Gordon, acting editor of the Concord Times, Ibrahim Karim-Sei, editor of the Standard Times, and Pius Foray, editor of The Democrat, were among those detained and subsequently released without charge.

Sylvanus Kanyako, a journalist working for the Herald Guardian, and David Kamara, the newspaper's proprietor, were arrested on 10 January 1998, the day after an article suggested that a prominent member of the AFRC, Sergeant Abu "Zagalo" Sankoh, should be arrested in connection with the looting of the Iranian Embassy in Freetown on 31 December 1997. Sylvanus Kanyako was arrested by soldiers after being identified by an AFRC supporter. He and David Kamara were detained for three weeks. Both men were tortured. Sylvanus Kanyako was tied tightly with his arms behind his back, beaten all over his body and burned with a cigarette. At one point he lost consciousness. He sustained serious injuries to his arms and hands. He was then taken to CID cells where he remained, without any medical treatment, until he managed to escape on 30 January 1998.

On 30 January 1998 Michael Lawson, a university student at Fourah Bay College in Freetown, was arrested. He was apparently accused of passing information to a radio station broadcasting in support of the government of President Kabbah. The radio station, 98.1 FM, had been broadcasting clandestinely since July 1997. Many people suspected of providing information to the radio station, or knowing from where broadcasts were transmitted, had previously been arrested and detained. He was reported to be held at CID headquarters until his release in February 1998 after the intervention by ECOMOG.

Torture and extrajudicial executions

Ill-treatment, torture and extrajudicial executions were systematic throughout the period of AFRC rule. Soldiers and RUF members operated with impunity and created a climate of fear both in Freetown and throughout the country.

On 14 January 1998 a trader, Sama Turay, was shot dead by soldiers on Wilkinson Road in Freetown after an argument. Local residents were forced to hand the body over to soldiers. Residents of the area staged a demonstration along Wilkinson Road the following day in protest against the killing. This demonstration coincided with a visit to Freetown of a delegation headed by the UN Secretary-General's Special Envoy to Sierra Leone, at that time based in Conakry, for discussions with the AFRC on the implementation of the peace agreement signed in Conakry in October 1997.

The demonstration on 15 January 1998 was brutally suppressed; soldiers indiscriminately beat civilians and raided homes in the area around Wilkinson Road. They went from house to house accusing civilians of deliberately discrediting the AFRC during the visit of the delegation. One of the victims was a 25-year-old trader. When soldiers arrived at his stall he was hit in the face with butt of an AK 47 gun and was also badly beaten on his back. He recognized the soldiers who beat him and described them as relatives of Major Johnny Paul Koroma.

Another of the victims was an 18-year-old girl, also living in the Wilkinson Road area, who had joined the demonstration. Three days later six soldiers came to her home. She was raped by all six soldiers who then cut her hair and shaved her head with a broken bottle.

In Kenema, Eastern Province, terror reigned throughout the period of AFRC rule. The town was effectively under the control of the RUF and, in particular, Sam Bockarie. As in Freetown and other parts of the country, rape of girls and women was systematic and at least a hundred civilians were reported to have been deliberately and arbitrarily killed in Kenema. Every house in the town was looted. The homes of those perceived to have been supporters of the SLPP were destroyed.

On 13 and 14 January 1998 several prominent members of the community in Kenema were arrested by members of the RUF under the supervision of Sam Bockarie. They included B.S. Massaquoi, the chairman of the town council, Dr P.B. Momoh, a medical doctor, Paramount Chief Moinama Kamor, a traditional leader, and Ibrahim Kpaka, a businessman. They were arrested at a time of fierce fighting between the kamajors and AFRC and RUF forces around Kenema and were accused of supporting the kamajors. They were held at the AFRC Secretariat building in Kenema, which had been the local SLPP headquarters, and some were later moved to the police station and army brigade headquarters. They were stripped and repeatedly beaten with sticks, electric cable and strips of tyres and were threatened with death. Their arms were tied tightly behind them. One of those detained sustained a serious head wound and injury to his eye after being beaten on his head with a gun. At least one of these detained died as a result of beatings.

Some of those arrested were released on 26 January 1998 and escaped to safety. B.S. Massaquoi, however, was among those who remained held at army brigade headquarters. He was killed by members of the RUF on 8 February 1998 as news arrived of ECOMOG's offensive on Freetown and as kamajors entered Kenema. Dozens of other people were also reported to have been killed. The mutilated body of B.S. Massaquoi and 35 other people were reported to have been found in mass grave near Kènema on 23 March 1998.

The use of the death penalty by the AFRC

The AFRC resorted to the use of the death penalty in an apparent attempt to be seen to be taking action to impose law and order but in doing so violated international human rights standards. On 25 October 1997 10 soldiers were executed after being convicted of murder and sentenced to death by a military court. A further 17 people were reported to have been executed on 2 November 1997, apparently after conviction by a military court although some reports suggested that summary executions took place without any form of legal proceedings. Another eight people were publicly executed in Koidu on 2 December 1997. According to reports, they had been convicted of armed robbery by a military court, from which there was no right of appeal.

On 28 November 1997 a new decree was promulgated which was retroactive to the time of the military coup and which extended the scope of the death penalty by making death sentences statutory for the offences of looting and commandeering vehicles.

International standards prohibit the retroactive use of the death penalty. The ICCPR states that the death sentence may be imposed only "in accordance with the law in force at the time of the commission of the crime" and also that a heavier penalty shall not be imposed than the one that was applicable at the time when the criminal offence was committed. The Safeguards Guaranteeing the Protection of the Rights of Those Facing the Death Penalty state that: "Capital punishment may be imposed only for a crime for which the death penalty is prescribed by law at the time of its commission...".

In addition, the ICCPR states that: "In countries which have not abolished the death penalty, sentence of death may be imposed only for the most serious crimes...". The Safeguards Guaranteeing the Protection of the Rights of Those Facing the Death Penalty, adopted by the UN Economic and Social Council (ECOSOC) in 1994, also state that "... capital punishment may be imposed only for the most serious crimes ... with lethal or other extremely grave circumstances." The UN Human Rights Committee, a body of 18 experts established under the ICCPR, stated in 1996 that: "Extension of the scope of the application of the death penalty raises questions as to the compatibility with Article 6 of the Covenant", which guarantees the right to life. The UN Commission on Human Rights, in a resolution adopted in April 1997, called on all states which have not yet abolished the death penalty "progressively to restrict the number of offences for which the death penalty may be imposed".

Amnesty International urged the AFRC to repeal this legislation and to ensure that all death sentences were commuted and that no further executions took place.

Recommendations

- investigations into the human rights violations committed during the period of AFRC rule should continue to be undertaken in order to bring those responsible to justice and to provide compensation to the victims of human rights violations;

- assistance for documenting the human rights violations which occurred during this period should be provided by the international community.

Human rights abuses by AFRC and RUF forces since February 1998

Since their removal from power the AFRC and RUF have wreaked a campaign of terror against unarmed civilians and human rights abuses have reached unprecedented levels. Several thousand civilians have been brutally killed or mutilated. Hundreds of others have been abducted from their villages and forced to join their attackers. Members of the AFRC and the RUF again inflicted on unarmed civilians the atrocities which they had endured throughout Sierra Leone's internal armed conflict but now on a much greater scale [10].

The abuses perpetrated by rebel forces of the AFRC and RUF constitute the most egregious violations of international humanitarian law. The Geneva Conventions of 1949 which apply to international conflicts - wars between nations - also contain provisions which apply to internal armed conflicts. Article 3, common to all four Conventions, extends to "armed conflict not of an international character" fundamental rules for the protection of non-combatants which each party to the conflict is "bound to apply, as a minimum". Under the terms of common Article 3, people who take no active part or who have ceased to take an active part in hostilities must be treated humanely in all circumstances. Common Article 3 specifically prohibits: violence to life and person, in particular murder of all kinds, mutilation, cruel treatment and torture; the taking of hostages; and outrages upon personal dignity, in particular humiliating and degrading treatment. This prohibition applies not only to government forces but to all parties to internal armed conflicts including armed political groups.

Article 4 of the Additional Protocol II of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 relating to the protection of victims of internal armed conflicts prohibits violence to life, health and physical well-being, in particular murder as well as cruel treatment such as torture, mutilation or any form of corporal punishment, of all those not taking a direct part in hostilities or who have ceased to take part in hostilities. [11]

In the days immediately after their removal from power by ECOMOG, AFRC and RUF forces indiscriminately killed unarmed civilians, looted and burned houses, both in Freetown and other towns. As the rebel forces were pursued eastwards by ECOMOG forces through towns such as Bo in Southern Province, Kenema and Koidu in Eastern Province and Makeni in Northern Province during February, March and April 1998, they were responsible for widespread killings, torture and ill-treatment, including rape and other forms of sexual assault, and abduction. Villages and towns were burnt to the ground, destroying thousands of homes. Koidu, a major town in the diamond-rich Kono District, was almost totally destroyed by AFRC and RUF forces and villages between Njaiama-Sewafe and Koidu were repeatedly attacked.

Several foreign nationals were captured by RUF forces in mid-February 1998. They included Spanish, Italian and Austrian religious brothers working at St Joseph's Hospital in Lunsar, Port Loko District, Northern Province, who were abducted on 14 February 1998. Eldred Collins, a prominent RUF member, was reported to have demanded the release of Foday Sankoh, at that time still detained in Nigeria, in exchange for the release of the hostages. They were, however, released on 27 February 1998. Two staff of the humanitarian organization Médecins Sans Frontiéres (MSF), a Canadian and a French national, were also abducted around 14 February 1998 at Rogberi while driving between Port Loko and Lunsar. They were also released after two weeks.

Those perceived to be opposed to the AFRC and the RUF were particularly targeted by rebel forces. They included Catholic priests. As almost all other sectors of Sierra Leonean society, the Catholic Church in Sierra Leone had condemned the military coup. Catholic priests were specifically sought by AFRC and RUF forces after February 1998 and some narrowly escaped death. Their homes were looted and destroyed. Traditional leaders, known as Paramount Chiefs, were also singled out; 44 Paramount Chiefs were reported to have been killed in the months following February 1998.

"Operation no living thing"

An even more grotesque pattern of killing, rape and mutilation became evident in April 1998 and the number of victims increased dramatically. Rebel forces called their campaign of terror against civilians "Operation no living thing". As fighting continued between ECOMOG and rebel forces around Koidu attacks on civilians in villages in the area persisted and then spread west and north. Later in April and into May 1998 Alikalia, Yifin and other villages in Koinadugu District, Northern Province, were attacked. Unarmed civilians who were taking no active part in the conflict were killed, their homes burned and their villages destroyed.

Although the exact number of those killed is unknown, it is likely to be several thousand. Most survivors of attacks described hundreds of bodies lying in the bush where they had fled and of several members of their families and communities being killed. More than 200 people were killed during an attack on one village, Yifin, in Koinadugu District, in late April 1998. More than 650 bodies, many of them women and children, were reported to have been buried following fighting in the area around Koidu in mid-June 1998.

With these attacks came reports of mutilations. The arms, hands, legs, ears and lips of victims were deliberately cut off. By early May 1998 some 120 victims of severe mutilations had been admitted to Connaught Hospital in the centre of Freetown; about 60 were admitted on one day alone, 26 April 1998. Four had both arms cut off, another 23 had one arm cut off, and others had deep lacerations on their lower arms, severed tendons or broken bones in their arms after being attacked with machetes. Some had a complete hand, several fingers or ears missing. They were all civilians: farmers, housewives, traders, miners, school students. These numbers swelled in the weeks and months which followed as more victims arrived at Connaught Hospital and other hospitals in the north of the country, including in Makeni and Magburaka. Some of these hospitals lacked the equipment needed to perform war surgery. Connaught Hospital in the centre of Freetown, which had the necessary facilities, struggled to cope with the influx of patients. Between 6 April 1998 and 27 July 1998 an MSF surgical team treated almost 300 patients with amputations, severe mutilations or gunshot wounds at the hospital. The majority of the cases treated were lacerations to the head or neck or amputations of arms, hands, fingers, ears or lips. About a fifth of these victims were children, one aged 18 months. This number represented, however, only a fraction of the number of such victims, many of whom never reached medical help. Between 25 May 1998 and 12 June 1998 International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) delegates evacuated 23 people from the north of the country with gunshot wounds, deep lacerations and amputated limbs requiring urgent reconstructive surgery. A helicopter was used to reach areas inaccessible by road because of insecurity and fear of attack by armed groups. Evacuation of wounded civilians continued throughout the following months. According to humanitarian agencies in Freetown, only about one in four victims of mutilations by rebel forces survived their injuries. In June 1998 the ICRC rehabilitated Netland Hospital in Freetown for the surgical treatment of victims of amputations. By the end of September 1998, some 400 victims of amputations were reported to have undergone surgery at Netland Hospital. By October 1998 estimates of the number of victims of mutilations since February 1998 were put as high as 4,000.

Among the thousands of refugees arriving from Eastern and Northern Provinces into Guinea to escape attacks were civilians with similar mutilations. Between April and June 1998 some one hundred refugees were reported to have arrived in Guinea with serious injuries; half of them had suffered deliberate mutilation. By September 1998 a regional representative of the UN High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) reported that more than 400 refugees in a camp at Kissidougou in Guinea had hands, limbs or ears cut off or were suffering other injuries.

Many of the survivors provided accounts of the violence inflicted upon them. Groups of armed men arrived in their villages, claiming to be ECOMOG, that they had come to liberate the villagers and that they were safe. Forced out of their homes, they realised that they were not ECOMOG troops. Civilians were rounded up, in groups or in lines, and then taken individually to a pounding block in the village where their hands, arms or legs were cut with a machete. In some villages, after the civilians were rounded up, they were stripped naked. Men were then ordered to rape members of their own family. If they refused, their arms were cut off and the women were raped by rebel forces, often in front of their husbands. As well as rape, women and girls also suffered other forms of sexual assault such as having foreign objects inserted into their vaginas. Victims of these atrocities also reported women and children being rounded up, locked into houses which were then set alight.

The UN Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs, Sergio Vieira de Mello, following a visit to Sierra Leone, said on 15 June 1998 that the brutal treatment of civilians by AFRC and RUF forces was unlike anything he had seen in 29 years of humanitarian work. Describing the pattern of amputations, lacerations and maiming of civilians, including of children, he said that "hands are cut off and ears and noses are amputated ... there are no words to condemn this sort of practice ...".

Villagers from Kondeya, Kono District, fled into the bush when they heard that rebel forces were approaching their village in early April 1998. On 9 April 1998 a group of about 50 rebel forces found them and captured about 120. One of the men was strangled. A baby who was crying was pulled from its mother's back and thrown into a river. They were forced to return to the village where all the houses were burned. Twenty-seven of the captured villagers were then attacked with machetes; some were decapitated, others had their throats cut or their eyes gouged out.

Survivors were often taunted by rebel forces to go to ECOMOG and tell them that the AFRC and RUF were there or to go to President Kabbah to ask for a new limb. One was given a letter and told to deliver it to President Kabbah. Victims who had one or both ears cut off were told that without their ears they could no longer listen to the government or ECOMOG.

In some cases it took victims days or weeks to reach medical assistance. One man who had both arms cut off in April 1998 walked for several weeks from village to village until he was able to find a vehicle to take him to Freetown. Many more, unable to reach a medical centre in time, died as a result of their injuries. Some spent weeks in the bush either attempting to walk to safety or waiting until it was safe to return to their homes. The fate of several thousand people who fled into the bush during attacks on villages remains unknown. Many of those wounded have died in the bush.

An Amnesty International delegation which visited Sierra Leone in May 1998 met some of the victims of these atrocities at Connaught Hospital. One, a farmer aged 40 from the village of Badala, in Koinadugu District, had both hands cut off when the village was attacked on 3 May 1998. Hearing reports of advancing attacks, including those on Yifin and Alikalia, he had previously sent his family to safety in Kabala. At the time of the attack he was preparing food in his compound. Up to 400 men, armed with machetes, AK 47 guns and rocket propelled grenades entered the village. They caught him and asked him where ECOMOG was. When he said that he did not know, he was hit on the head with an AK 47. He was then forced to lie down and both arms were cut off. He was also beaten on his legs. He begged to be killed. The men who attacked him wrote three letters and put them in the pockets of his trousers. He was then told to go to tell President Kabbah that they were coming to Freetown, adding "No AFRC, no peace". He lay injured for three days in Badala and arrived at Connaught Hospital four days later. He had no news of his wife and three children. Other villagers, of all ages, from Badala were also mutilated and killed; they included a woman who was raped and then cut with machetes.

Another of the victims, a 15-year-old schoolboy from Koidu who had arrived at Connaught Hospital on 10 May 1998, had suffered severe lacerations to his right ankle in an attempted amputation. He and his family - his parents and six brothers and sisters - had been hiding in the bush for more than two months after being driven from Koidu after it was attacked by rebel forces. They had no food throughout that time other than bananas. On 1 May 1998 the family had heard reports that ECOMOG had arrived in Koidu and they went to enter the eastern part of the town. They and those with them were attacked by rebel forces who accused them of supporting President Kabbah. Almost 50 people were killed. The young boy stayed for four days in a house without food or treatment for his severely injured leg. He was taken first to Makeni by ECOMOG forces and then brought to Connaught Hospital. He did not know what had happened to his family.

Three young women survived an attack on the village of Boima in Bombali District, Northern Province, on 7 May 1998; one had a deep cut to her arm, the other two had been beaten all over their bodies. One of the women had witnessed the killing of several members of her family, including her children. Twelve people, including three of her children, died when their house was set alight. Another child, a girl aged three, was pulled from her back and cut with machetes.

There were many atrocities in villages around Karina, between Makeni and Fadugu, in Northern Province, which were attacked on 7 May 1998. All those who were unable to run away were killed; others had limbs amputated.

In an incident which occurred on 7 May 1998 in Northern Province, a woman survivor recounted that one of her sisters had been killed by having her throat cut and two others were covered in kerosene and burned. Other victims, including children, were wrapped in a foam mattress which was then set alight.

The village of Tumbodu, north of Koidu, was attacked repeatedly during April and May 1998. During one of these attacks, on 11 May 1998, a woman aged in her twenties who was hiding in the bush outside the town was caught and asked for rice, which she did not have. She was forced to carry a heavy load; when she faltered she was beaten. When she reached Tumbodu she was forced to place her legs on a stone which were then cut in an attempted amputation. She suffered deep laceration to both legs and also to her arms. She arrived in Connaught Hospital on 15 May 1998. Her 10-year-old son was abducted by the rebels.

Massenbendu, a village close to Tumbodu, was also attacked on 11 May 1998. One of the victims, a farmer, was in his house when the door was broken down by rebel forces who demanded money; he said that he had none. Rebel forces told him that they were going to kill him because he supported President Kabbah. He sustained deep lacerations to his neck, head and arms. He was taken first to an ECOMOG base at Masingbi and was then transferred to Freetown. Three members of his family - two men and a small boy -were abducted.

Human rights abuses by rebel forces since July 1998

Atrocities declined significantly during July and August 1998 as the rainy season advanced. Despite this decreased level of atrocities concerns remained that rebel forces could mount future attacks against unarmed civilians. In his First Progress Report on UNOMSIL, the UN Secretary-General said that he remained "deeply concerned about the plight of innocent civilians in the country, who may still be suffering the depredations of the rebel forces or at risk from future attacks."

Incidents of killing and mutilations continued to be reported. On 27 July 1998 rebel forces, after feigning surrender, attacked Kabala was held by ECOMOG. Rebel forces threatened to use civilians as human shields. No mutilations were reported but a large number of civilians, including children and young people, were reported to have been abducted. Rebel forces held Kabala for about four days before it was retaken by ECOMOG. Some 200 houses had been destroyed, property was looted and money extorted from civilians. All relief goods, medical supplies and logistics for humanitarian efforts had been looted or destroyed. At about the same time, rebel forces attacked a bus carrying civilians about 10 kilometres south of Kabala, killing seven people. Three young boys were also reported to have been abducted.

During attacks on villages in the area of Gbinti, Port Loko District, in early August 1998 victims of killings and mutilations included three women and a two-year-old child who were subsequently admitted to hospital with gunshot wounds, either to the backs of their bodies or their head. Three men were also admitted to hospital with deep lacerations apparently inflicted in attempted amputations.

In late August and during September 1998 an escalation of attacks was reported in Northern Province. Reports began to be received of victims having the initials "AFRC" carved into their foreheads and backs. Around 24 August 1998 there were attacks on villages, including Thawuya and Masunthu, in Kambia District. Several civilians were subsequently admitted to the Government Hospital in the town of Kambia with amputated limbs or severe lacerations. Three had both hands and ears amputated; others had deep wounds to their arms, shoulders and faces. One of the victims was a three-month-old baby with lacerations to the nape of its neck. On 6 September 1998 the town of Kamalu, near Kamakwie, in Bombali District, was attacked by rebel forces. At least 40 civilians, including children, were reported to have been killed in the attack; others were seriously injured with machete wounds. Some of those killed had been first been subjected to torture and sexual abuse; others had been burned alive. A Paramount Chief, Samura Bangura, was reported to have been abducted from Kamalu, together with some 50 others. On 11 September 1998 Fadugu, Koinadugu District, was attacked. According to reports, during that attack eight civilians, including a Paramount Chief, Alimamy Fanna Thoronka II, were burned alive.

Three villages in Kambia District, Yebaya, Kathatinah and Kakula, were reported to have been attacked by around one hundred rebel forces on 12 September 1998, resulting in the deaths of at least 16 civilians. According to witnesses of the attack on Yebaya, at least nine people were killed either by being shot or attacked with machetes. In late September 1998 and early October 1998 more than 50 people were reported to have been killed in attacks in Kambia District, near the border with Guinea, including on the village of Kukuna, and at least 25 civilians were reported to have been mutilated, including by amputations, by rebel forces.

On 8 October 1998 the town of Mange in Port Loko District, some 150 kilometres from Freetown and on the main road to Guinea, was attacked by more than 200 rebel forces in an attempt to gain control of a strategic bridge. Some 25 civilians were reported to have been killed in the attack but the toll was expected to be higher since rebel forces were reported to have set fire to more than 40 homes, in some cases with civilians inside. Most of the town's 15,000 inhabitants fled and many of the wounded arrived at the hospital in the town of Port Loko for treatment. ECOMOG forces maintained control of the bridge after three days of fighting.

There were further attacks by rebel forces on villages in Bombali District during September 1998. Among the victims were two men, Pa Bai Munu and Morlai Munu, from the village of Mabunduka, between Pendembu and Mateboi, some 40 kilometres from Makeni. Pa Bai Munu, a farmer aged over 70, had fled his village for Makeni following an earlier attack during which two other members of his family, including Sorie Kabbie Munu, were abducted by rebel forces. The village was burned. Other members of the same family, Pa Amadu Munu and Pa Santigie Munu, had been killed by having their throats cut during an attack on Mateboi in May 1998. Pa Bai Munu later returned to a village, Four Road Loko, close to his home at Mabunduka. He, Morlai Munu and about 20 other people were killed when Four Road Loko was attacked on 16 September 1998. According to reports, Pa Bai Munu was tied by the neck and dragged for about 10 kilometres before he was hacked to death and his body mutilated. At least six members of the family had been killed or abducted.

Attacks on villages around Kabala, including Benikoro and Badala, resumed and intensified during September 1998. The town of Kabala itself, earlier attacked and held briefly by rebel forces in late July 1998, was again attacked on 18 September 1998. Some 20 civilians were reported to have been killed and houses burned. Among the victims who were evacuated to Freetown by the ICRC were three children, two of whom were suffering from extensive burns. One of them had hidden with his family in a hut which was set alight by rebel forces; he was the only survivor.

On 24 October 1998, apparently in retaliation at the death sentence imposed on Foday Sankoh the previous day, the village of Alikalia was attacked by some 300 rebel forces. Reports of the attack referred to civilians, including women and children, being shot, decapitated or having their arms amputated. Civilian survivors of the attack on Alikalia were admitted to Connaught Hospital with gunshot wounds and multiple lacerations.

Attacks by rebel forces also escalated in Kenema District from August 1998. Among the villages affected were Mendekelema, Neama and Sandaru, which was completely destroyed, less than 30 kilometres from the town of Kenema. One of the victims of the attack on Mendekelema in late August 1998 had both hands amputated. Survivors of attacks consistently described mutilation, rape, torture, killing and the burning of houses. Entire local communities were displaced from the area, many fleeing to the towns of Kenema, Segbwema and Daru.

Recommendations

- the international community must continue to condemn in the strongest possible terms the grave breaches of international humanitarian law committed by forces of the AFRC and RUF;
- leaders of AFRC and RUF forces must take immediate measures to end human rights abuses committed by their combatants, including deliberate and arbitrary killing of non-combatants, torture, mutilation and rape, and must publicly state their commitment to respecting international humanitarian law;
- those in command of AFRC and RUF forces should exert effective control over those under their command in order to prevent torture and killing of non-combatants; those suspected of committing human rights abuses should be removed from any position of authority or duties which bring them into contact with prisoners or others at risk of abuse;
- AFRC and RUF forces must respect human rights and the basic principles of international humanitarian law and abide by minimum standards of humane behaviour at all times.

Children at the centre of the violence

Children have not escaped the violence and brutality of the conflict in Sierra Leone; they have often been the principal victims of gross human rights abuses, including the atrocities in Eastern and Northern Provinces which occurred in the months following the removal of the AFRC and RUF from power in February 1998. They have been deliberately and arbitrarily killed, mutilated and maimed, abducted and forcibly recruited by rebel forces. Among the thousands of Sierra Leonean refugees in neighbouring countries or internally displaced within Sierra Leone after February 1998 were hundreds of unaccompanied children, separated from their families as a result of the violence.

Several thousand children, including babies and very young children, have been separated from their families as a result of seven years of internal armed conflict. Most of those abducted in the earlier years of the war were from Southern and Eastern Provinces. The most common reason for the separation of children from their families was abduction by rebel forces. Others became separated from their parents as a result of attacks on their towns and villages when their parents were killed, abducted or became missing.

Many families have rejected children who had been forcibly recruited into rebel forces and have refused to take them back into their homes. Even in cases where parents are willing to take back their children, the level of resentment and bitterness within their communities sometimes prevents them from doing so.

Significant and coordinated efforts are being undertaken by the UN Children's Fund (UNICEF) together with a coalition of non-governmental organizations to reunite these children with their families and to help their reintegration into their families and communities, often in the most difficult of circumstances.

The work of UN agencies and non-governmental organizations in providing help and protection to children traumatized by the conflict, including former child combatants, should be supported and reinforced by the international community.

Abduction of children

Large numbers of civilians, in particular children and young men and women, have been abducted by the RUF throughout the years of the internal armed conflict. They have been forcibly recruited to fight or forced to undertake other tasks such as carrying loads, including looted property and food, and cooking. Women and girls have been forced to become the sexual partners of rebel forces. While in the early years of the conflict representatives of the RUF claimed publicly that some of those abducted had joined rebel forces willingly, in most cases captured civilians have been held under duress, threatened with killing or ill-treatment, and have had little option but to cooperate.

Capture and abduction of civilians, including many children, has continued throughout the months since the AFRC and RUF were deposed and has occurred increasingly in Northern Province. In those areas of the country which remained under the control of rebel forces thousands of civilians, including women and children, effectively remained captive, many of them in Kailahun District, a stronghold of the RUF since the beginning of the internal armed conflict. Some estimates put this number as high as 10,000. They were used to carry goods, as human shields or for sexual slavery.

Testimonies of victims of the attacks by rebel forces which occurred in Northern Province from April 1998 invariably referred to the abduction of large numbers of people, including children. When the town of Kabala was attacked by a large group of rebel forces in July 1998, a large number of children were abducted. Njalia Nimikoro, a village some 10 kilometres southwest of Koidu, was reported to have been attacked around 18 August 1998. Nine civilians, including a 10-year-old child were admitted to hospital with gunshot wounds, and a woman and her five children were reported to have been abducted by rebel forces. A few days earlier, on 15 August 1998, rebels in the area around Koidu were reported to have released around 250 captured civilians. Dozens of civilians were reported to have been abducted, however, when three villages in Kambia District were attacked in September 1998.

The abuse of children by rebel forces

Many of those abducted have been trained and forced to fight. When RUF forces joined the AFRC in Freetown following the military coup in May 1997 many of its fighters, some as young as 11 or 12 years and many in their teens, who had previously been abducted arrived in Freetown. Many had spent several years in RUF camps in the bush and had fought in the conflict. In some cases their names had been changed by the RUF. Fear played a significant role in forcing these children to remain with the RUF. Those who attempted to escape were beaten or killed. Former RUF child combatants have recounted summary killing, torture and ill-treatment. These children also relied on the RUF for their means of survival, including food and shelter. As well as being forced to fight, they were used as porters to carry goods and looted property. The use of drugs such as amphetamines was reported to be widespread. Sex was used in a systematic way by the RUF to enslave girls, often very young, and young women. While some later expressed a wish to remain with their partners, most remained under duress. Many had become pregnant and had children, making eventual reintegration into their own communities even more difficult.

The histories of many of the children abducted by the RUF since 1991 emerged when they arrived in Freetown. An 11-year-old boy caught and abducted during an ambush by the RUF near Bo several years earlier had been forced to take drugs and fight. Another boy had been captured in Kailahun District in 1992 when he was six years old and separated from his mother, sister and brother. Six years later he did not know where his family were or whether they were still alive. Another boy had been abducted during an attack in Kenema District in 1992, in which both his parents had been killed, when he was 10 or 11 years old. He had been with the RUF for six years and had been trained to use a gun and fight. A girl, aged 14 at the time of her abduction in 1995, was forced to become the sexual partner of a member of the RUF. She was forced to cook and taught how to use a gun.

Victims and perpetrators of human rights abuses

When the AFRC and RUF were forced by ECOMOG from Freetown in mid-February 1998 many of these children, some of whom had been responsible for killings and torture, were identified as members of the RUF and risked revenge attacks by civilians, placing their safety and lives in jeopardy. Almost 3,000 children associated with the RUF, fearing reprisals from civilians, were reported to have fled from Freetown in a matter of days. There were reports of such children being beaten by civilians before being handed over to ECOMOG troops and one child who had been living on the streets of Freetown was reported to have been burned alive in an apparent revenge attack. ECOMOG troops were also reported to have ill-treated some of these children when they were handed over into their custody.

Recruitment of children by Civil Defence Forces

Large numbers of children have also been recruited into the ranks of the CDF which support President Kabbah and are fighting with ECOMOG against rebel forces. Although the CDF has made a commitment to end initiation of children into the traditional hunters' societies which form the CDF, there were reports that new members, including children between the ages of 15 and 17, were recruited near Magburaka in Tonkolili District, Northern Province, in July 1998. Initiation of children into the CDF was also reported to be continuing in Southern and Eastern Provinces, for example at Daru and Segbwema, during the following months and children, some as young as seven years, were still seen carrying arms and guarding CDF checkpoints. In early October 1998 Chief Samuel Hinga Norman, Deputy Minister of Defence, during a visit to Sierra Leone by the Executive Director of UNICEF, Carol Bellamy, was reported as stating his commitment to disarming and demobilizing children recruited by the kamajors, adding, however, that the conflict in Sierra Leone was not yet over.

Efforts by the international community to meet the needs of children

The Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, Olara Otunnu, visited Sierra Leone in both March and May 1998. During his visit in May 1998, when he travelled to the east of the country, it became clear that one of the most pressing challenges facing Sierra Leone was the "crisis of the young": the plight of children affected directly or indirectly by the conflict. He identified five areas requiring urgent action by the international community: demobilization and reintegration of child combatants; resettlement of internally displaced people; tracing the families of unaccompanied children; rehabilitation and support of victims without limbs; and provision and rehabilitation of medical and educational services.

At a meeting with the UN Special Representative during his visit in May 1998, the government agreed not to recruit children under the age of 18 years into a reconstituted national army. The CDF also agreed to stop initiation and recruitment of children under the age of 18 and to begin the process of demobilization of child combatants within their ranks [12]. Both ECOMOG and the CDF agreed to provide special protection to AFRC and RUF child combatants in their custody as a result of surrender, capture or escape. On 5 November 1998 Olara Otunnu again appealed to both the CDF and rebel forces to end the recruitment of child soldiers.

Olara Otunnu called on the international community to respond in a more vigorous and concerted way to the needs of children affected by the conflict in Sierra Leone and urged it to make the rehabilitation of children in Sierra Leone a pilot project for post-conflict reconstruction. Meeting the specific needs of children, young people and women affected by the conflict in Sierra Leone were particularly important in plans for rehabilitation and reconstruction.

In a press conference following his address to the UN General Assembly in October 1998, Olara Otunnu made specific references to the plight of children in Sierra Leone and called for the international community to provide both political commitment and resources. He recommended to the key actors responsible for post-conflict reconstruction programs, such as the World Bank and the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), that the needs of women and children who had been victims of conflict should be at the centre of such programs.

On 29 June 1998 the UN Security Council strongly condemned the targeting of children in war, in particular their abduction, sexual abuse and recruitment as soldiers, and said that it would pay serious attention to the situation of children affected by armed conflicts.

In his address to the UN special conference, the UN Secretary-General acknowledged the terrible suffering of children in Sierra Leone: "To an appalling degree, it was children who were, and still are, the victims of war, either as conscripted fighters or as casualties of indiscriminate attacks." The Secretary-General welcomed the government of Sierra Leone's decision to offer an amnesty for child soldiers from all combatant groups and efforts to develop a national program to meet the needs of children who had been particularly adversely affected by seven years of conflict.

At the UN special conference the Executive Director of UNICEF referred to the importance of demobilizing and reintegrating into society an estimated 4,000 children still attached to fighting forces which would require an intensive and long-term commitment of resources from the international community. Some 2,500 of these children were being forced to fight with rebel forces; the others had been recruited by the CDF. The safety of all children who had been captured needed to be ensured and ways found to release them and include them in the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration program.

During her visit to Sierra Leone in early October 1998, the Executive Director of UNICEF again urged that all child combatants be disarmed and demobilized: "the fact that the conflict is (still going) on should not justify recruitment of children". During discussions with government officials, she sought assurances that the government would abide by its commitments to demobilize child combatants, not to recruit new child combatants and to provide an amnesty for those children who had been fighting with rebel forces. She urged that the process be speeded up. She also called for the release of all child prisoners of war, the number of which is unknown.

The demobilization of soldiers and their reintegration into society - socially, psychologically, politically and economically - is critical to post-conflict reconstruction and rehabilitation. Support for such programs, particularly those for children, is vital. UNICEF and UNOMSIL, with the National Commission for Human Rights and Democracy and ECOMOG, are undertaking a program of registration and interviewing of former RUF child combatants in order to include them into the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process. The children, once registered, are released from ECOMOG custody into the care of UNICEF. In October 1998 some 60 children, aged from eight to 18, were reported to have been registered in Makeni and another 120 in Bo; registration in Port Loko was due to commence in November 1998.

Recommendations

- AFRC and RUF forces must end the gross human rights abuses being perpetrated against children, including killing, mutilation, rape and other forms of sexual abuse, abduction and forcible recruitment as combatants;

- AFRC and RUF forces should release all children currently held as captives or child soldiers;

- immediate measures to end the recruitment of children under the age of 18 by the CDF should be taken and the government should be assisted and supported in the registration of child combatants among the CDF in order to ascertain their exact number and location and to incorporate them into the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration program;

- the Sierra Leone government and the international community should fully support and assist relevant UN agencies and non-governmental organizations to identify and address the social, psychological and material needs of children, particularly former child combatants, affected by the conflict in Sierra Leone;

- the international community should fully support the proposal of the Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict for Sierra Leone to be made a pilot project for a more effective response in the context of post-conflict peace building; this pilot project should coordinate, reinforce, and provide adequate resources for initiatives aimed at the protection of children in Sierra Leone.

Human rights violations by ECOMOG forces

At the time of its offensive on Freetown which began on 5 February 1998, shelling by ECOMOG forces was reported to have caused a high number of civilian casualties. Shelling continued in densely populated areas of Freetown throughout the week of the offensive, including in areas where medical facilities, such as Connaught Hospital, were situated. More than 600 people with war-related injuries were reported to have been admitted to hospital during that period. The high number of civilian casualties suggested that ECOMOG may have taken inadequate measures to protect civilians during the offensive on Freetown.

Shelling by AFRC and RUF forces was, however, also intensive during that period and some civilians claimed that residential areas in Freetown were being deliberately shelled by AFRC and RUF forces, particularly by those positioned at Fourah Bay College on a hill overlooking Freetown.

Thousands of civilians in rebel-controlled areas, in particular Kailahun District, remain at risk of being caught in hostilities between ECOMOG, fighting with the CDF, and rebel forces. There are fears that the safety of the civilian population might be endangered, especially during air strikes which are reported to be taking place. Measures to minimise the risk to civilians during combat, in conformity with international humanitarian law, must be undertaken during military operations, including aerial bombardments of rebel forces' bases located near or within areas where there are high concentrations of civilians.

In his Second Progress Report on UNOMSIL the UN Secretary-General referred to reports which suggested that "certain ECOMOG personnel do not consistently ensure full respect for provisions of international humanitarian law, such as those regarding the protection of non-combatants in combat situations and the proper treatment of combatants during surrender or capture. UNOMSIL is encouraging the ECOMOG leadership to raise awareness among all troops to ensure full respect for all relevant aspects of international humanitarian law".

In the days after it took control of Freetown, several thousand soldiers surrendered to or were captured by ECOMOG forces. In subsequent weeks and months, ECOMOG supervised thousands of military detainees, in particular at Benguema, a military training camp some 25 kilometres from Freetown, but also at military bases at Lungi, Bo, Kenema and Makeni. According to the Attorney-General and Minister of Justice, Solomon Berewa, all military detainees held by ECOMOG remained under the authority of the Sierra Leone government; the role of ECOMOG was to screen those detained, assess whether they were a security risk and whether they could be deployed as part of the ECOMOG force or the eventual reconstituted national army.

It was claimed that AFRC and RUF combatants captured by the CDF were handed over to the police or ECOMOG forces after February 1998. It appeared, however, that CDF forces summarily killed some captured combatants and reports also suggested that ECOMOG forces handed over captured AFRC and RUF forces to the CDF who subsequently killed them.

A significant number of civilians are being detained by ECOMOG forces under the category of "safe custody" in prisons and other places of detention throughout the country. An unspecified number of people are held under ECOMOG "safe custody" at Pademba Road prison. At the Central Prison in Kenema more than 30 people, some apparently accused of collaboration with rebel forces, were reported to be held under ECOMOG "safe custody" in October 1998 without any referral of their cases to the civilian authorities. There is apparently no legal basis for their detention; it is unclear whether they are held under the provisions of the Public Emergency Regulations which came into effect in March 1998. In October 1998 there were reports that a suspected member of rebel forces had been taken into custody by ECOMOG in Makeni despite substantial evidence that he was innocent.

There have also been reports that those taken into custody by ECOMOG forces have been ill-treated by being beaten and tied tightly. Among the victims in Freetown were children who had been among RUF forces and who were detained shortly after the ECOMOG intervention. During September 1998 there were reports, although few in number, of torture and ill-treatment of both civilian detainees and captured combatants. A number of former RUF child combatants who were registered as part of the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration program claimed that they had been ill-treated while in the custody of ECOMOG.

There have also been reports of acts of violence and intimidation by ECOMOG forces against civilians in Freetown and other parts of the country. On 5 October 1998 at a checkpoint at Magbenteh, about three kilometres from Makeni, a driver was reported to have been beaten and stabbed with a bayonet by a member of ECOMOG during an argument about a search of his vehicle and request for his documents. Sexual assault of women at ECOMOG checkpoints has also been reported in the area around Makeni.

There were several reports of harassment of humanitarian convoys by both ECOMOG and CDF forces in the area of Masingbi and Njaiama-Sewafe during October 1998. For example, the driver of vehicle belonging to a non-governmental organization was reported to have been physically assaulted by ECOMOG forces near Masingbi who also stole property from the vehicle. UNOMSIL military observers have frequently been requested to intervene with ECOMOG and the CDF on behalf of UN agencies and non-governmental organizations.

ECOMOG commanders have expressed a determination to address problems of ill-discipline and were reported to have established a complaints procedure to investigate any allegations of harassment of civilians by ECOMOG forces.

Recommendations

- all military personnel participating in the ECOMOG force in Sierra Leone must adhere to international humanitarian and human rights law at all times;
- all troops participating in ECOMOG should be fully trained in these standards and understand their obligation to adhere to them;
- in accordance with international humanitarian law, civilians should not be targeted during military operations by ECOMOG forces; ECOMOG forces must at all times distinguish between the civilian population and combatants and take all necessary measures to protect civilians from the dangers arising from military operations;
- the cases of civilian detainees reported to be held "in safe custody" by ECOMOG forces should be reviewed by a civilian judicial authority in order to establish the legal basis for their detention and to determine whether they should be charged or released;
- specific mechanisms for monitoring, investigating and reporting any violations of international humanitarian and human rights law by ECOMOG forces should be established;
- UNOMSIL military observers should be provided with adequate resources to monitor the respect by ECOMOG forces of international humanitarian and human rights law during both military operations and during disarmament, demobilization and reintegration programs for former combatants;
- any allegations of human rights violations by ECOMOG forces, such as extrajudicial execution, torture and ill-treatment, should be promptly and independently investigated and those responsible brought to justice, in accordance with international standards.

Human rights violations by Civil Defence Forces

The CDF have also failed to respect international human rights and humanitarian law and have been responsible for torture, ill-treatment and extrajudicial executions, although not on the scale of abuses committed by AFRC and RUF forces.

The CDF are composed of traditional hunters and include kamajors from the south and east of the country, and kapras, donsos, tamaboros from the north. The National Coordinator of the CDF is the Deputy Minister of Defence. Although attempts have been made to register all members of the CDF throughout the country, this has been made difficult because of the lack of a formal structure and control over some of the CDF, continuing recruitment and fighting.

The CDF have killed, tortured and ill-treated both captured AFRC and RUF combatants and also civilians suspected of supporting or collaborating with the AFRC and RUF. In September 1997 four people, including a woman, who were suspected of being soldiers or AFRC supporters were reported to have been summarily executed by being decapitated when the vehicle in which they were travelling from Bo to Makeni was stopped by kamajors. In January 1998 kamajors were reported to have summarily killed civilians suspected of supporting the AFRC and RUF in two villages near the town of Rotifunk, Southern Province, some 90 kilometres from Freetown.

In February 1998, in the days following the removal of the AFRC and RUF, there were many cases of torture, ill-treatment and extrajudicial executions by the kamajors, including in the towns of Bo, Kenema and Koidu. They were often mutilated and many were killed by being burned alive; some had tyres placed around their heads which were then set alight. At least 50 people accused of having supported the AFRC and RUF were extrajudicially executed in Kenema. Black marks on the dirt roads where people had been burned alive were still visible months later. When kamajors entered Koidu on 11 and 12 February 1998 they captured and killed AFRC soldiers. Some were decapitated, others were doused with petrol or had tyres placed around them and were burned alive. Such killings also took place in Freetown in the days immediately following the removal of the AFRC and RUF. At least six people were killed by civilians in revenge attacks. They included Mohamed Bangura, also known as Saccoma, who was burned alive, Sheik Mustapha, who was beaten to death, and Musa Kabia.

Several independent sources referred to isolated incidents of extrajudicial execution together with ritual cannibalism by members of the CDF. Ritual cannibalism is not, however, accepted behaviour or policy among the CDF and is rejected as abhorrent by most CDF. It appears to be carried out only by a small number of kamajors, in particular in the region around Kenema, who subscribe to animist beliefs. One such incident was reported to have occurred on 27 March 1998 when a boy aged 17 from Kenema was detained by kamajors and accused of collaborating with the AFRC and RUF. He was taken to the market place and forced to buy vegetables and other ingredients. He was then reported to have been killed in a cannibalistic ritual. His partially burned body, with the heart removed, was later seen by witnesses. Other incidents of ritual cannibalism were reported to have taken place during April and May 1998 at Panguma, north of Kenema. These incidents must be investigated by the authorities and those responsible brought to justice. Longer-term measures, including increasing awareness and understanding of the cultural basis for this practice, are also needed in order to eradicate ritual cannibalism.

On 28 April 1998 President Kabbah announced that the CDF had been placed under the command of ECOMOG. The following day a kamajor leader in Bo was reported to have criticized the growing lawlessness of the kamajors and called for the registration of all CDF, who were apparently roaming the streets of Bo. Although nominally under the command and control of ECOMOG, the behaviour of the CDF continued to be undisciplined in the following months, particularly in areas other than their own villages, towns and districts. Reports of extrajudicial executions and torture of prisoners decreased significantly, however, from June 1998, apparently as a result of intervention by the government and ECOMOG, and the discipline of many CDF units improved significantly.

Some incidents of extrajudicial execution, torture and ill-treatment, however, continue to be reported. On 26 October 1998 four captured rebels were reported to have been extrajudicially executed in the village of Romeni, north of Port Loko. At least another 10 were reported to have been killed after being captured during the attack on Alikalia in October 1998.

In late August 1998 a young woman from the area around Kenema who had previously handled goods looted from the World Food Programme (WFP) by rebel forces was reported to have been interrogated by a group of about 20 CDF in the town of Kenema. When she made remarks considered offensive by the CDF, she was stripped and beaten. She was then taken to an unknown destination. Reports were also received in September 1998 of illegal arrest and detention of civilians by the CDF although it is unclear whether this practice is continuing.

Criminal acts, such as looting, confiscation of vehicles and civil disturbance, by the CDF have continued. Civilians have been harassed and money and goods extorted in exchange for permission to pass through checkpoints along major roads. The CDF have imposed their authority through fear and intimidation with the result that many people are afraid to make formal complaints to the authorities about their conduct. During September 1998 there were persistent reports of interference with the delivery of humanitarian supplies.

Little or no action is known to have been taken by the authorities against members of the CDF who have been responsible for illegal arrest and detention, torture and ill-treatment and extrajudicial executions of those suspected of having collaborated with the AFRC which have occurred since February 1998. The CDF appear to act with impunity. There is an urgent need to investigate human rights violations committed by the CDF and bring those responsible to justice.

Recommendations

- strict chain of command must be enforced over members of the CDF in order to prevent extrajudicial executions, torture and ill-treatment, illegal arrest and detention;

- all reports of extrajudicial executions, torture and ill-treatment, illegal arrest and detention by the CDF should be promptly and independently investigated in order to bring those responsible to justice.

Refugees and internally displaced people - still at risk

In July 1998 at the UN special conference on Sierra Leone, the UN High Commissioner for Refugees, Sadako Ogata, stated that the refugee crisis in Sierra Leone had been the worst in Africa so far during 1998. On 10 November 1998 she again referred to the plight of Sierra Leonean refugees and internally displaced people when she called on the UN Security Council to respond more effectively to refugee crises in Africa.

As fighting has intensified in the east and north of the country since the intervention by ECOMOG in February 1998, at least 550,000 Sierra Leoneans are estimated to have fled areas affected by conflict. They include hundreds of unaccompanied children. According to UNHCR, since the beginning of 1998, some 210,000 Sierra Leoneans have sought refuge in Guinea and another 57,000 in Liberia. It is also estimated that more than 300,000 have become internally displaced within Sierra Leone during 1998.

The continuing violence perpetrated by rebel forces has not only prevented the return of refugees and internally displaced people to their homes but has also caused a serious humanitarian situation which threatens lives. Both refugees and internally displaced people remain vulnerable to attacks by rebel forces and face acute hardship, disease and malnutrition. The violence and insecurity in areas affected by the conflict has often prevented adequate assistance reaching them.

Refugees in Guinea and Liberia

When fighting between ECOMOG and rebel forces intensified in Kailahun District in April 1998, some 1,000 civilians were reported to be fleeing to Liberia daily. Thousands of refugees also fled into Guinea; 6,000 new refugees arrived during the first week of June 1998. Many, including children, died as a result of malnutrition, diarrhoea and malaria.

The majority of Sierra Leonean refugees were in areas where access was extremely difficult. In both Guinea and Liberia, poor road conditions and the onset of the rainy season, combined with concerns about security by both the Liberian and Guinean authorities, aggravated still further problems of access by humanitarian agencies to refugees in camps near the border, threatening food deliveries and basic medical care, including vaccinations.

Between 15 June 1998 and 10 July 1998 humanitarian agencies were denied access by the Guinean authorities to camps close to the border in the Guéckédou region where more than 150,00 refugees had recently arrived. The Guinean authorities cited insecurity and difficulties in guaranteeing the safety of humanitarian agencies in the area. UNHCR and its partners did not have access to these refugees for more than three weeks. Many of the refugees in this area were already in poor physical condition when they had arrived. In early September 1998 heavy rains disrupted the delivery of relief assistance to some 180,000 Sierra Leonean refugees in camps in the Guéckédou region of Guinea.

In Guinea most camps were near the border with Sierra Leone, leaving refugees close to areas of the fighting and vulnerable to attacks. On 3 July 1998 the refugee camp at Forokonia in Guinea was attacked during an incursion by rebel forces from Sierra Leone. Six refugees were killed and the camp was looted and almost entirely burned.

In early September 1998 UNHCR reported that rebel forces were continuing to brutalize Sierra Leonean refugees in Guinea. Rebel forces had attacked a refugee camp at Tomandu inside Guinea on 1 September 1998, killing at least 10 people - seven women refugees and several Guineans - as they forced other refugees to carry stolen goods back across the border into Sierra Leone. UNHCR sent representatives to the village which had been attacked. They found Sierra Leonean refugees who had previously been abducted by rebel forces, including a girl who said that she had been repeatedly raped and a boy who had the letters RUF carved into his chest and forehead. Witnesses said that rebel forces had raided local food stores killing everyone nearby. Three women refugees were reported to have been shot and seriously wounded when they refused to continue across a bridge into Sierra Leone. UNHCR subsequently moved thousands of refugees from Tomandu to camps further inside Guinea.

Conclusion 22 of the UNHCR Executive Committee states that: "The location of asylum-seekers should be determined by their safety and well-being as well as by the security needs of the receiving State. Asylum-seekers should, as far as possible, be located at a reasonable distance from the frontier of their country of origin". In addition, Conclusion 48: "Condemns all violations of the rights and safety of refugees and asylum-seekers and in particular military or armed attacks on refugee camps and settlements".

On 8 September 1998 the WFP appealed for assistance for more than 200,000 Sierra Leonean refugees in the Guéckédou region, most of whom had fled continuing rebel attacks in Kono and Kailahun Districts. According to the WFP, some 80 per cent of civilians from these areas were either dead or unaccounted for. Several thousand others were believed to be held captive by rebel forces. Refugees were arriving destitute, suffering from exhaustion, malnutrition and disease.

There was a further large influx of Sierra Leonean refugees into the Forécariah region of Guinea in late September 1998. According to UNHCR, more than 3,000 people crossed the border on 29 September 1998 after rebel forces had killed civilians and burned homes in Kukuna. Concern was expressed that refugee camps in the Forécariah region, close to the border, were vulnerable to incursions by rebel forces from Sierra Leone. Another 2,000 were reported to have also fled their homes and become internally displaced.

Most Sierra Leonean refugees in Liberia, the majority unaccompanied women and children, were based at camps at Vahun and Kolahun in Lofa Country in northwestern Liberia. An unknown number of others were scattered along the border without access to humanitarian assistance. Bad roads and rains hampered access by humanitarian organizations to refugee camps.

The large concentrations of Sierra Leonean refugees in Liberia, in particular at camps in Vahun and Kolahun, contained significant numbers of both active and former combatants. They included rebel forces who regularly crossed the border between Sierra Leone and Liberia. Others were former Sierra Leonean soldiers who feared returning to Sierra Leone because of possible reprisals by the CDF. Also among Sierra Leonean refugees in Liberia were former combatants of the RUF who had voluntarily ceased combat. Conclusion 77 of the UNHCR Executive Committee "calls on States of refuge to take all necessary measures to ensure that the civilian and humanitarian character of refugee camps and settlements is maintained".

In addition to the severe physical hardship encountered by refugees and internally displaced people, there was also concern that refugees returning to Sierra Leone who might be considered to be associated with rebel forces could be at risk of revenge attacks on their return and might become victims of arbitrary detention, torture and ill-treatment or extrajudicial execution.

Internally displaced people

Some 20,000 internally displaced people sought safety from the increasing attacks in Northern and Eastern Provinces from April 1998 at Masingbi, between Koidu and Makeni, swelling the town's normal population of 7,000. During June and early July 1998 up to 300 people arrived daily at Masingbi, decreasing to between 50 and 100 a day during August 1998. The humanitarian situation of internally displaced people at Masingbi remained critical during the following months and there was a high mortality rate as a result of disease and malnutrition. Children under five years were the worst affected. Fears for the safety of displaced people at Masingbi heightened after ECOMOG forces repelled an attack by rebel forces on Masingbi in late October 1998.

With the onset of the rainy season from May, when endemic diseases such as cholera resurface, many civilians caught in areas under the control of rebel forces, forced from their homes and seeking refuge in the bush and with no access to medical assistance were reported to be suffering from vomiting and diarrhoea.

As attacks by rebel forces in both Northern and Eastern Provinces resumed during September and October 1998 entire local communities in Kambia, Koinadugu, Bombali and Kenema Districts were displaced. Attacks by rebel forces on villages in Kenema District in late September 1998 were reported to have resulted in as many as 10,000 people fleeing their homes, half of whom sought refuge in the town of Kenema.

Recommendations

- all violations of the rights and safety of refugees and, in particular, military or armed attacks on refugee camps and settlements should be condemned; all efforts should be made to protect the safety of refugees in camps and settlements, including location to secure areas and, whenever possible, at a reasonable distance from the border with Sierra Leone;
- effective measures should be taken to preserve the civilian and humanitarian nature of refugee camps and settlements;
- every effort should be made to ensure the safety of internally displaced people; internally displaced people's camps should be provided adequate protection from human rights abuses;
- all efforts should be made to ensure that there is adequate access to refugees and internally displaced people in order to monitor their safety and provide humanitarian assistance;
- refugee repatriation programs should include effective monitoring and protection for as long as necessary; international refugee law and protection standards must be adhered to at all times, including the principles of non-refoulement, the right to seek asylum and repatriation only on a voluntary basis with international supervision.

Accountability for human rights abuses

The government of President Kabbah, since it was reinstated in March 1998, has taken measures to establish accountability for human rights abuses and to bring those responsible to justice. This is essential for achieving justice and moving towards national reconciliation. Such a process, however, must be undertaken in accordance with international standards and must not itself violate human rights. Trials of those accused of human rights abuses must conform to international standards for a fair trial and there should be no recourse to the death penalty.

Impunity contributes to continuing human rights abuses. It is only when those responsible for human rights abuses are brought to justice for their crimes that a clear message is sent that these abuses will not be tolerated or allowed to go unpunished.

The scale of the atrocities committed by the AFRC and the RUF, both before and after they held power, demand that those responsible be brought to justice. This is not incompatible with peace and reconciliation. Peace and security will not be achieved in Sierra Leone until there is an end to impunity. True reconciliation cannot be achieved if the right of victims and their families to truth, justice and redress are ignored.

On 17 June 1998, shortly after a conference on the creation of an international criminal court opened in Rome, Italy, a joint statement by the heads of five UN agencies said that the atrocities being committed in Sierra Leone were a brutal reminder of the urgent need for an international criminal court to try those responsible for war crimes and crimes against humanity. The statement by UNICEF, UNHCR, the Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict, the UN High Commissioner for Human Rights and the UN Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs urged those participating at the conference in Rome to study carefully the situation in Sierra Leone and to ensure that the statute they adopted would be able to combat impunity, provide justice and contribute to a lasting peace in the country.

The statement added that, despite the willingness of the Sierra Leone government, it was unlikely that the judicial system would have sufficient resources to bring those responsible for human rights abuses to justice, which would raise "the prospect of yet another round of mindless violence going unpunished".

The delegation of Sierra Leone to the conference in Rome repeatedly cited its country as evidence of the need for the establishment of a permanent international criminal court. Amnesty International believes that the international community must assist in establishing accountability for the atrocities in Sierra Leone. This assistance should include both political commitment and practical assistance towards the re-establishment of a functioning and effective justice system and the investigation and documentation of past human rights abuses.

At the UN special conference on Sierra Leone, the UN Secretary-General also stressed the need for national reconciliation and for Sierra Leoneans to put the past behind them and put the future first. The process of reconciliation did not, however, preclude accountability for human rights abuses: "Those responsible for the atrocities and other gross violations of human rights will in time be brought to justice". The need to pursue policies promoting national reconciliation had to be combined with ensuring that those responsible for crimes and atrocities against civilians were brought to justice. All those accused had to be given fair trials with full respect for due process of the law.

Recommendations

- those responsible for the gross human rights abuses which have occurred in Sierra Leone since May 1997 must be held accountable for their crimes, in accordance with international standards;
- the international community should assist Sierra Leone in establishing accountability for the atrocities in Sierra Leone and bringing those responsible to justice, in accordance with international standards.

Detentions and trials after February 1998

After ECOMOG forced the AFRC from power in February 1998, some 2,000 people were arrested and detained. A significant number were former combatants who were considered to be prisoners of war. Others were associated or perceived to be associated with the AFRC and RUF. Many of those detained were suspected of criminal offences which included gross human rights abuses such as torture and deliberate and arbitrary killing of civilians. Some of those detained had given themselves up to police and ECOMOG forces as a means of protection from civilians who attacked, and in some cases killed, those closely associated with the AFRC and RUF.

On 10 March 1998, President Kabbah proclaimed a state of emergency, under Section 29 of the Constitution of 1991, which includes provisions for indefinite detention without charge or trial. The Proclamation of Emergency was ratified by parliament on 26 March 1998. The Public Emergency Regulations, 1998, state that:

"2. The President may, if in his opinion it is necessary, for the purpose of maintaining and securing peace, order and good government in Sierra Leone, make an Order-

(a) directing that any person be detained or continues to be detained and so long as such an Order is in force in respect of any person, that person shall be liable to be detained in such place and under such circumstances as the President may from time to time determine and shall, while so detained, be deemed to be in legal custody".

Although Article 4 of the ICCPR allows the Sierra Leone government to derogate from its obligations under the treaty, it requires that derogation has to be to the "extent strictly required by the exigencies of the situation". Certain rights, including the right to life in Article 6 and the prohibition of torture, cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment in Article 7, cannot be derogated from. The UN Human Rights Committee which monitors compliance with the ICCPR has stated that "measures taken under Article 4 are of an exceptional and temporary nature and may only last as long as the life of the nation concerned is threatened and that, in times of emergency, the protection of human rights becomes all the more important, particularly those rights from which no derogations can be made".

Hundreds of people alleged to have collaborated with the AFRC and RUF have been held without charge under the Public Emergency Regulations. The scope of these regulations raises concern that people could be held indefinitely without charge or trial, in violation of international human rights standards, in particular the ICCPR.

Throughout the months following the return of the government of President Kabbah arrests of those suspected of collaborating with the AFRC have continued, although the scale of arrests has gradually decreased and some of the detainees have been released without charge. It has been difficult to determine at any one time exactly how many detainees are held without charge. At the end of September 1998, however, several hundred people, including some 130 children, were believed to be held without charge in detention in Pademba Road prison and other places of detention in and around Freetown. In some cases detentions appeared to be entirely arbitrary, for example, in cases where people were denounced as collaborators for reasons of personal revenge or settling of scores. In September 1998, 18 women were reported to have been arrested in Freetown after being denounced for having fraternized with members of the AFRC.

Significant numbers of civilians are also being held illegally by ECOMOG forces in "safe custody" without any process of review of their detention by a civilian judicial authority.

Among those released without charge from Pademba Road prison after several months in detention were more than 20 senior police officers, who were reported to have been released on 20 August 1998. More than 270 Sierra Leonean soldiers who had been part of the ECOMOG contingent in Liberia at the time of the ECOMOG intervention in Freetown, repatriated in March 1998 and detained in Pademba Road prison were also released from custody for retraining on 31 August 1998.

Fifty-nine civilians were charged with treason and other offences in April 1998 and were brought to trial before the High Court early the following month. Trials before a court martial of 37 soldiers began in July 1998. Foday Sankoh was brought before a magistrates' court on 4 September 1998 and charged with treason and other related offences; his trial before the High Court began later that month. It was also expected that further trials of both civilians and soldiers would begin in November 1998. The Court of Appeal ruled in 1975 that the death penalty for the offence of treason was discretionary.

The cases of some of the hundreds of other detainees who remained held without charge or trial were to be reviewed by an independent committee of investigation.

The committee of investigation

In late May 1998 the government established an independent committee of investigation to review the cases of the several hundred people arrested for alleged collaboration with the AFRC who remained detained without charge. The purpose of the committee is to review the cases of those detained in order to expedite release or prosecution. The terms of reference of the committee was to advise the government on action to be taken in the cases of: those alleged to have collaborated with the AFRC; civil servants who had resumed work under the AFRC at their own request or on the invitation of the AFRC; and managers and employees of public sector services who allowed the use of funds by the AFRC or others who facilitated payment of public funds.

The committee of investigation is headed by Nasiru Tejan-Cole, a former Director of Public Prosecution, and includes seven other prominent members of the community. It began its work on 17 July 1998 but its hearings were not held in public. Human rights officers from UNOMSIL were, however, allowed to attend. Detainees appeared before the committee in person and were not represented by lawyers. They were invited to comment on statements that they had made to the police after their arrest and were also able to call witnesses. The committee then made recommendations to the government on whether to prosecute or release them.

Amnesty International welcomed the establishment of the committee of investigation by the government as a positive initiative. While its progress in reviewing cases has been slower than anticipated, the committee is reported to have conducted its work professionally and competently.

By late September 1998 the cases of some 120 detainees had been considered by the committee. More than 70 had been released unconditionally and another 17 were released either on bail or pending further investigations. In other cases the committee concluded that there was evidence of criminal offences. The committee of investigation is continuing its work and has repeated its calls for witnesses of suspected collaboration to provide evidence and cooperate with the committee.

Recommendations

- the cases of those who remain detained without charge or trial should be reviewed by the committee of investigation with a minimum of delay with a view to either charging or releasing them.

Trials before the High Court

Among the 59 civilians charged in April 1998 with treason and some also with other offences, including murder and arson, were those who had participated in the AFRC by accepting government posts. The defendants also included a number of former politicians including former President Joseph Saidu Momoh. One of the defendants, Abdul B. Sankoh, died as a result of ill-health on 21 June 1998. Trials in three groups began in early May 1998 before the High Court in Freetown.

The government stated its commitment to ensuring fair trials for those charged, whereas the public mood was one of anger and a desire for swift justice. The trials were open to the media and public and were monitored by UNOMSIL human rights officers, assisted from July until October 1998 by representatives of the International Bar Association. Independent observers concluded that there had been a genuine attempt by the government to conduct fair and transparent trials before the High Court and that the trials appeared to comply to international procedural standards.

On 25 August 1998, 16 defendants in one of the trials were convicted and sentenced to death; the two remaining defendants were acquitted. Among those sentenced to death were Victor Foh, a member of parliament of the All People's Congress (APC) party, Allieu Badara Kamara, AFRC Under-Secretary of State for Information, Christian Kargbo, former Governor of the Central Bank, Hilton Fyle, a journalist and broadcaster, who had formerly worked for the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) World Service, Ibrahim Ben Kargbo, a journalist and editor of the New Citizen newspaper, Gipu Felix-George, Director General of the Sierra Leone Broadcasting Service (SLBS), and two other SLBS broadcasters, Dennis Ayodele Smith and Olivia Mensah. Olivia Mensah, who was pregnant at the time of her arrest and who gave birth in July 1998, was also convicted of murder.

A second trial concluded on 19 October 1998; 16 defendants were convicted and three acquitted. On 21 October 1998, 11 of those convicted were sentenced to death and the five others were sentenced to 10 years' imprisonment. Those sentenced to death included Claude Victor Campbell, a former Attorney General and Minister of Justice, Ahmed Charrid Dumbuya, former head of the National Power Authority, Brigadier (rtd.) Leslie Modibo Lymon, AFRC Secretary of State for the Interior, and Nancy Steele, a former APC politician.

The third trial concluded on 4 November 1998. Fifteen of the defendants were convicted of treason and were sentenced to death the following day. They included several people who had held ministerial positions during the period of AFRC rule, including Victor Brandon, Secretary of State for Development, Dr Bailah Leigh, Secretary of State for Health, Dr Matilda King, Under-Secretary of State for Health, and Ajibola Manley-Spaine, Attorney General and Minister of Justice. Former President Momoh was found not guilty of treason but was convicted of two counts of conspiracy and sentenced to two five-year terms of imprisonment to be served concurrently. Five other defendants were acquitted.

All those convicted by the High Court have the right to appeal to the Court of Appeal and, if unsuccessful, to the Supreme Court. If conviction and sentence are confirmed on appeal, those sentenced to death may seek the exercise of the prerogative of mercy, under Section 63 of the Constitution of 1991. The prerogative of mercy is exercised by a special committee chaired by the President. All those convicted and sentenced to death have appealed against their conviction and sentence; a date for hearings before the Court of Appeal had not been set by early November 1998.

Following interventions by the international community calling for commutation of the death sentences passed in August 1998, the government responded that the judicial process was continuing, that those sentenced had the right to appeal to the Court of Appeal and the Supreme Court, that it remained committed to due process of the law and that the President would consider exercising clemency in any cases where a death sentence was confirmed at the completion of the judicial appeal procedure.

The trial of Foday Sankoh began on 24 September 1998 and he appeared before the High Court on several occasions during October 1998, pleading not guilty to charges of treason and other offences related to the military coup of May 1997. Sierra Leonean lawyers feared reprisals if they agreed to represent Foday Sankoh and genuine efforts by the government to provide legal representation for him proved unsuccessful. He therefore conducted his own defence.

Under Article 14(3)(d) of the ICCPR, a defendant should be allowed to defend himself through a legal representative of his own choosing and that, if he does not have legal assistance, such assistance should be assigned to him. Article 7 of the African Charter, as interpreted by the African Commission, also includes the right to be defended by a lawyer of the defendant's choice. Safeguard 5 of the Safeguards Guaranteeing Protection of the Rights of Those Facing the Death Penalty, states that: "Capital punishment may only be carried out pursuant to a final judgment rendered by a competent court after legal process which gives all possible safeguards to ensure fair trial, at least to those contained in Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, including the right of anyone suspected of or charged with a crime for which capital punishment may be imposed to adequate legal assistance at all stages of the proceedings." The UN Special Rapporteur on extrajudicial, summary or arbitrary executions reiterated in December 1996, that: "All defendants facing the imposition of capital punishment must benefit from the services of a competent defence counsel at every stage of the proceedings."

On 23 October 1998 Foday Sankoh was convicted on seven of the nine counts against him and sentenced to death. He appealed against his conviction and sentence and requested representation by a defence lawyer for the appeal procedure. The government sought assistance in providing a lawyer for Foday Sankoh from the United Kingdom and other Commonwealth countries.

Recommendations

- all trials should continue to be open to international observers and to conform to international standards for a fair trial;

- all those tried for offences which carry a mandatory or discretionary death sentence should be ensured all appropriate safeguards as guaranteed by international standards, including adequate legal assistance at all stages of the proceedings and the right to appeal against conviction and sentence to a higher jurisdiction.

Trials before court martial

The trial of 37 soldiers charged with mutiny, failure to suppress a mutiny, treason and conspiracy began on 23 July 1998. The defendants included senior members of the AFRC such as Colonel Abdul Karim Sesay, AFRC Secretary General, Sergeant Abu "Zagalo" Sankoh and Corporal Tamba Gborie who had announced the military coup on 25 May 1997 on state radio. The judicial panel comprised Sierra Leonean army officers and was presided by a Judge Advocate who was a Nigerian ECOMOG officer.

As with the trials before the High Court, the court martial was open to independent observers. In addition to monitors from UNOMSIL and the International Bar Association, an Amnesty International representative observed the early proceedings of the trial before the court martial in late July and early August 1998.

Trials before court martial in Sierra Leone allow no right of appeal against conviction and sentence to a higher jurisdiction. The right of appeal from a decision of a court martial was abolished by statute in 1971. This lack of judicial appeal violates international standards for a fair trial. Amnesty International repeatedly urged the government to allow a judicial appeal from the court martial.

Article 14(5) of the ICCPR states that: "Everyone convicted of a crime shall have the right to his conviction and sentence being reviewed by a higher tribunal according to law." Under the Optional Protocol to the ICCPR, ratified by Sierra Leone in 1996, where rights guaranteed by the ICCPR, including the right to fair trial, have been violated, recourse may be sought from the UN Human Rights Committee.

The Human Rights Committee has concluded that imposition of a death sentence after a trial which violates the provisions of the ICCPR, including Article 14, constitutes a violation of the right to life which is guaranteed by Article 6 of the treaty.

In addition, Safeguard 6 of the Safeguards Guaranteeing Protection of the Rights of Those Facing the Death Penalty states that: "Anyone sentenced to death shall have the right to appeal to a court of higher jurisdiction, and steps should be taken to ensure that such appeals shall become mandatory." [13]

The African Charter also guarantees, under Article 7, the right to fair trial. The African Commission has made several decisions which interpret Article 7 of the African Charter to include a right of appeal to a higher jurisdiction. In April 1998 the African Commission, before the execution of 23 people in Rwanda, issued a statement saying that the executions of people who had been denied a fair trial violated Article 4 of the African Charter which prohibits the arbitrary deprivation of the right to life.

As with those sentenced to death by a civilian court, the presidential committee for the prerogative of mercy may meet after judgment has been made to confirm or reduce sentences by the court martial.

In the final stages of the trial, the judicial panel of the court martial refused to accept legal arguments, which had previously been accepted by the prosecution in the case of civilians being tried for treason before the High Court, that the death penalty was discretionary, rather than mandatory, for the offence of treason. It therefore refused to accept evidence in mitigation.

On 12 October 1998 34 of the defendants before the court martial were convicted of treason, murder and collaborating with the enemy and sentenced to death. They included Colonel Abdul Karim Sesay, Sergeant Abu "Zagalo" Sankoh, Corporal Tamba Gborie, Brigadier Hassan Karim Conteh, a former Chief of Defence Staff, Colonel Samuel Francis Koroma, also former Chief of Defence Staff, Squadron Leader Victor L. King, and a woman, Major Kula Samba, who had been AFRC Secretary of State for Social Welfare, Children and Gender Affairs. The three other defendants were acquitted.

Complaints of violations of the ICCPR were submitted to the UN Human Rights Committee on behalf of 18 of those sentenced to death by the court martial. Despite these submissions and appeals for stays of execution and clemency by the international community, including the UN Secretary-General and UN High Commissioner for Human Rights, 24 of those sentenced to death, including those named above, were executed on 19 October 1998. The other 10 had their sentences commuted to life imprisonment by the committee for the prerogative of mercy.

The executions were carried out by a firing squad using automatic weapons and took place in public on the outskirts of Freetown. The executions were reported to have been observed by a large number of people, although not specifically invited, who included the news media. Photographs of the executions were subsequently published. Amnesty International considers that the death penalty in all circumstances is a cruel, inhuman and degrading punishment. The manner in which these executions were carried out, however, was particularly cruel, inhuman and degrading. The graphic publicity subsequently appearing in the news media in Sierra Leone both emphasized and aggravated the brutalizing effect that the executions have on society within Sierra Leone.

These executions violated Sierra Leone's commitments under international human rights law and were condemned by the international community, including the UN and the EU, as well as Amnesty International and other human rights organizations. The UN Secretary-General said on 22 October 1998 that he regretted that the executions had taken place despite his appeal to the government to consider, at the very least, a stay of execution pending review of the proceedings before relevant international monitoring bodies. He added that he hoped that the government would ensure due process of the law in subsequent trials. The UN Human Rights Committee requested the government to explain why it had disregarded the Committee's request for a stay of execution and carried out the executions.

It was reported in late October 1998 that a further 16 soldiers would be tried on treason charges before the court martial; if convicted, they too faced death sentences without the right to appeal to a higher jurisdiction.

Recommendations

- trials before court martial must conform to international standards for a fair trial, including the right of appeal against conviction and sentence to a higher jurisdiction;
- in addition, those tried before court martial for offences which carry a mandatory or discretionary death sentence should be ensured all appropriate safeguards.

The death penalty - a violation of human rights

All those convicted of treason and other offences relating to the military coup of May 1997 face a possible death sentence. By early November 1998, 42 civilians and Foday Sankoh had been sentenced to death and 24 of 34 soldiers sentenced to death by court martial had been executed.

The anger and bitterness of the people of Sierra Leone against those tried for crimes committed during the period of AFRC rule and the desire for retribution and swift justice was demonstrated by the series of revenge killings which took place in Freetown and other parts of the country after the removal of the AFRC and RUF. Public opinion in Sierra Leone demands that strong action is taken by the government against those responsible for crimes committed during that period, which included gross human rights abuses such as killings and torture. The atmosphere surrounding the trials has been highly charged and support for the death penalty in Sierra Leone is inevitably widespread.

Amnesty International acknowledges the government's responsibility to bring to justice those responsible for such crimes, in accordance with international standards. Amnesty International is opposed to impunity and always encourages governments to investigate human rights abuses and to bring the perpetrators to justice. It is precisely because Amnesty International is concerned that those guilty of human rights abuses should not escape justice that it urges the government to ensure that all trials are conducted fairly.

Amnesty International is, however, unconditionally opposed to the death penalty on the grounds that it is a violation of the fundamental right to life and the right not to be subjected to cruel, inhuman or degrading punishment as set out in the Universal Declaration of Human Rights and the ICCPR. There is particular concern when those sentenced to death and executed do not receive fair trials.

The scale of human rights abuses committed in Sierra Leone has been horrendous. An argument used in favour of the death penalty is that it is justified retribution for particularly atrocious crimes. The use of the death penalty, however, perpetuates a cycle of violence, bitterness and revenge, instead of bringing reconciliation and respect for human rights. The death penalty is an official form of violence which has a brutalizing effect on society. Violent retribution is not justice but vengeance disguised as justice. A government and people committed to end human rights abuses must rise above vengeance and promote and protect human rights, in particular the right to life.

A difficult and daunting task faces Sierra Leone in achieving reconciliation within its society after the atrocities committed by the AFRC and RUF. Amnesty International, however, does not believe that the use of the death penalty will contribute in any way to the process of reconciliation. On the contrary, it considers that the public executions of 24 soldiers in October 1998 after an unfair trial are incompatible with initiatives aimed at reconciliation within Sierra Leone.

There has been significant progress towards ending the use of the death penalty both in Africa and throughout the world; 19 states in Africa and a majority of states worldwide have abolished the death penalty in law or in practice. The government of Sierra Leone should move in the direction of this trend, rather than against it.

Recommendations

- the government of Sierra Leone should take steps towards the abolition of the death penalty in law
- pending abolition, all death sentences should be commuted and no executions should take place;
- the government and non-governmental organizations should initiate and promote open debate on the death penalty among the Sierra Leonean population in order to raise awareness of the human rights issues involved.

Harsh prison conditions

Conditions in prisons, police stations and other places of detention in Freetown and throughout the country fall far short of international standards for the treatment of prisoners and in some cases amount to cruel, inhuman and degrading treatment. The severity of conditions in Sierra Leone's prisons appears to be attributable to material shortages in a country which faces acute economic problems. Conditions have been further exacerbated by the destruction and damage of prison facilities at the time of the military coup in May 1997.

All places of detention hold numbers of detainees well beyond the capacity for which they were designed. Following the detention of some 2,000 people in the weeks following the removal of the AFRC and RUF from power, conditions in Pademba Road prison and police cells in Freetown became severely overcrowded. In October 1998 some 1,200 detainees were reported to be held at Pademba Road prison, more than three times the capacity for which it was constructed. Most of these detainees were held under the Public Emergency Regulations. Detainees were also held in military camps, including ECOMOG bases at Wilberforce and Lungi barracks.

In August 1998 a local human rights organization, Prison Watch Sierra Leone, reviewed conditions both at Pademba Road prison and the Kingtom Remand Home for children in Freetown. It concluded that generally the diet of prisoners was deficient. With the exception of separate facilities provided for women prisoners, sanitation was poor at Pademba Road prison. Prisoners depended on family and relatives for the provision of clothing. Prison Watch Sierra Leone drew particular attention to the neglect of 24 children held at that time at the Kingtom Remand Home, the youngest of whom was 11 years old. Few received visits from members of their families and most appeared to be children who had lost contact with their families as a result of the conflict.

Conditions are particularly harsh at CID headquarters and also at the Central Police Station in the centre of Freetown. Large number of detainees, accused of criminal offences or of crimes committed during the period of AFRC rule, are reported to have been held for lengthy periods at CID headquarters in small, dark cells with inadequate ventilation and sanitary facilities. Cells at the Central Police Station, which is situated next to the sea, are reported to be extremely damp and subject to flooding. Often detainees have no bedding and have to sleep on the floor. Food and medical care are inadequate. Detainees held in police stations rely on food being provided by relatives and friends.

Conditions in prisons outside the capital are also extremely poor. Food and sanitary provisions are particularly deficient. There is no effective system for providing food to prisoners and those without support from relatives are at particular risk of deprivation. Often there is no space for exercise within the prison. In prisons outside Freetown, for example in Kenema, female prisoners are not segregated from males and minors are held with adult prisoners.

As a result of severe overcrowding, inadequate hygiene and medical care diseases, including malaria, diarrhoea and skin complaints, are rife in Pademba Road prison and other places of detention. Some prisoners and detainees were reported to have died as a result of ill-health. While Pademba Road prison has medical facilities within the prison and a prison doctor, most prisons outside Freetown have no such provision.

Following the detention of hundreds of people alleged to have collaborated with the AFRC and RUF visits were severely restricted and denied altogether on several occasions. The authorities justified these restrictions on security grounds.

Shortly after the removal of the AFRC and RUF a delegation of the ICRC, accompanied by a doctor and a nurse, were authorized to visit all places of detention in areas under the control of ECOMOG, including Pademba Road prison, and visits have since continued.

The government is reported to be reviewing the prison system in Sierra Leone in order to undertake major reforms. Financial assistance from the international community will, however, be necessary to implement improvements to conditions in prisons and other places of detention. Following visits to several places of detention in late October 1998 UNOMSIL human rights officers prepared an analysis of the problems faced by the prison system in order to provide a more coordinated response to the needs of prisons and other places of detention.

Recommendations

- urgent and effective measures should be taken to ensure that all places of detention in Sierra Leone conform to international standards for the treatment of prisoners, including the UN Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners;
- the health of all detainees and prisoners should be ensured while in custody; adequate medical facilities and treatment, food, washing and sanitary facilities should be provided, and prisoners should have daily exercise in the fresh air;
- the international community should assist the Sierra Leone government in ensuring acceptable conditions of detention.

Long-term measures for the protection and respect of human rights

Establishing accountability for human rights abuses is essential to prevent human rights violations in the future. Also needed are strong and effective institutions within Sierra Leone to ensure that fundamental human rights are respected and protected. This includes the legal and judicial systems, the army and the police, as well as an independent national human rights commission. Civil society, including human rights groups, are also integral to promoting human rights and creating an environment in which human rights are respected.

Despite the exceptionally difficult circumstances that all sectors of civil society, including the human rights community, in Sierra Leone have recently endured, human rights groups have emerged as a committed and active force. Their potential should be acknowledged and their activities supported. A National Forum for Human Rights, which is a coalition of 18 organizations working in diverse areas, has been established.

It is essential that basic institutional reforms are guided by strict adherence to international standards relating to the independence of the judiciary, human rights in the administration of justice and codes of conduct for law enforcement officials. All sectors of Sierra Leonean society, including the human rights community, should be involved in these reforms and should receive education and training on human rights standards and complaints procedures.

The international community, including the UN and international financial institutions such as the World Bank and the International Monetary Fund, should work closely together to promote post-conflict reconstruction and rehabilitation in Sierra Leone which is based on good governance and respect for human rights. International financial institutions should use their influence - official and unofficial - to ensure that the restoration of good and effective governance includes the re-establishment of mechanisms and systems to promote the rule of law and the protection of human rights. This should include assistance towards the establishment of permanent, independent and effective national institutions for the long-term protection of human rights and the rule of law, including an independent judiciary and fair criminal justice system.

Reform of the legal and judicial system

The long-term protection of human rights in Sierra Leone depends fundamentally on an effective legal system which is enforced by an independent, impartial and accessible judiciary with adequate resources. The Sierra Leone government, following its return to power, admitted that the judicial system was entirely inadequate. Courts outside Freetown are not functioning, other than magistrates courts in Bo, Kenema and Makeni, and the traditional court system has collapsed.

There should be a thorough review of existing legal institutions in order to make them more effective in the protection of human rights. These initiatives should be accompanied by a determined government policy to hold those responsible for human rights violations fully accountable.
UNOMSIL, UNDP, other UN agencies and international financial institutions should contribute towards the reconstruction of an effective judiciary and legal system in Sierra Leone. Some initiatives have already been undertaken. UNOMSIL has provided law books to the legal profession and has distributed legal technical documents to lawyers representing defendants in the treason trials. It has also conducted seminars for lawyers to discuss aspects of trial practice and procedure.

Restructuring the armed forces

The Sierra Leone national army, the RSLMF, was effectively disbanded following its participation in the military coup and the period of rule by the AFRC. Programs for disarmament, demobilization and reintegration have commenced but at a slower pace than anticipated.

In May 1998 the government announced plans for the establishment of a new national army. Recruitment and training was entrusted to ECOMOG. During a meeting with the Special Representative of the UN Secretary-General for Children and Armed Conflict in May 1998, the government agreed not to recruit children under the age of 18 years. The government and ECOMOG have also agreed to receive assistance from UN agencies in providing training materials on humanitarian and human rights standards concerning the protection of civilians, particularly women and children.

In early September 1998 President Kabbah announced the government's strategy for the re-establishment of a professional and disciplined Sierra Leonean national army which would comprise 5,000 soldiers, including some of those who had remained loyal to President Kabbah's government after the military coup and who had surrendered to ECOMOG forces after February 1998. Some of these soldiers have already been deployed alongside ECOMOG and CDF forces in those parts of the country still affected by conflict. The international community, including the United Kingdom and the Commonwealth, are providing assistance in training and equipping the new national army. Restructuring, training and equipping the national army should include provisions for the protection of human rights contained in international humanitarian and human rights law.

Human rights training for the police force

Restructuring and training of the police force should also include training in human rights. In August 1998 the government announced its intention to create a police force which would be able to assist Sierra Leone in returning to peace and prosperity and which would eventually remove the need for the deployment of military and paramilitary forces, including the CDF, in towns and villages.

UNOMSIL civilian police advisers should continue to monitor, supervise and train national police and security forces and verify their adherence to international human rights and criminal justice standards. A UN civilian police adviser was deployed in Sierra Leone in accordance with UN Security Council resolution 1162 (1998) in July 1998; Resolution 1181 (1988) provided for the deployment of a further four police advisers. Their role is to assist in restoring the confidence of the government and the people of Sierra Leone in the police force and to advise the government on training and re-equipment needs. UNOMSIL civilian police advisers are working closely with a team of police advisers from Commonwealth countries, the Commonwealth Police Development Task Force, deployed at the request of the government, as well as with UNOMSIL human rights officers.

In his Second Progress Report on UNOMSIL, the UN Secretary-General acknowledged that reform of the police force in Sierra Leone poses great challenges. Parts of the country are without a police presence, since many police officers have been killed or have abandoned their posts as a result of the conflict. Little or no training has been available for several years and the police suffer from inadequate logistical support, lack of equipment and poor conditions of service. Respect for human rights has been emphasized and police training initiatives have begun.

UNOMSIL human rights officers have conducted a series of human rights training workshops for police officers, including at the Sierra Leone police training college and in Bo and Kenema, as part of continuing efforts by UNOMSIL and the Commonwealth to restructure and train the Sierra Leonean police force.

The National Commission for Human Rights and Democracy

Long-term respect for human rights requires national human rights institutions to redress human rights violations. Rarely do they receive the necessary funding. If empowered with political support and resources national human rights institutions are the most sustainable mechanisms for the protection human rights. National institutions, which include government bodies as well as those of civil society such as human rights groups, the media, trade unions and professional organizations, are an important element of post-conflict reconstruction.

A National Commission for Human Rights and Democracy has been established in Sierra Leone and with the return

President Kabbah's government has begun to resume its activities. The National Commission has a crucial role to play within Sierra Leone in building a culture based on the universality, interdependence and indivisibility of all human rights for all people. It should be supported and strengthened and its independence and impartiality guaranteed [14].

An effective national human rights commission, with the power to investigate human rights violations and to institute legal proceedings where appropriate, can play a central role in protecting human rights. It is crucial, however, that the National Commission is supported by the government in bringing those responsible for human rights violations to justice.

An effective national human rights commission is an important mechanism for strengthening human rights protection and bringing about institutional reform. It should not, however, replace or detract from the importance of safeguards provided by an effective legal system.

On 18 September 1998 the National Commission established four committees, composed of prominent civilians, to monitor and report on areas of concern for the protection and respect of human rights. These included the conduct of the police, prison conditions and the situation of women and children. On 10 October 1998 UNOMSIL human rights officers conducted a human rights training session for the committee monitoring women and children which was also attended by members of the National Commission.

The National Commission should continue to work closely with local human rights groups in order to develop a strong and effective human rights movement in Sierra Leone which includes all sectors of civil society.

Recommendations

- the international community, including international financial institutions, should continue to contribute to institutional reform in Sierra Leone, including strengthening the independence of the judiciary and reforming the military and civilian police force;

- the National Commission for Human Rights and Democracy should have the necessary powers, resources, professional competence and guarantees of independence and impartiality to carry out prompt and effective investigations into human rights violations; its findings should be made public and it should include recommendations for bringing those responsible for human rights violations to justice and for providing compensation to the victims;

- the National Commission for Human Rights and Democracy should also make recommendations for institutional reform and other preventive measures, such as human rights education aimed at all sectors of society, including military, police and judicial officials.

(1) ECOMOG had been deployed under the authority of ECOWAS in neighbouring Liberia since 1990. Immediately after the military coup in May 1997, Nigerian forces already present in Sierra Leone under the provisions of a defence agreement between Sierra Leone and Nigeria were significantly reinforced by ECOMOG forces, who were predominantly Nigerian. ECOWAS is an intergovernmental organization of 16 states (Benin, Burkina Faso, Cape Verde, Côte d'Ivoire, Gambia, Ghana, Guinea, Guinea-Bissau, Liberia, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Nigeria, Senegal, Sierra Leone, Togo) with its headquarters in Nigeria. Established in 1975, the aim of ECOWAS is to promote cooperation and development and to improve relations among member states.

FIFTH REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL ON THE SITUATION IN SIERRA LEONE

I. INTRODUCTION

1. By paragraph 5 of its resolution 1162 (1998) of 17 April 1998, the Security Council authorized the deployment, with immediate effect, of up to 10 United Nations military liaison and security advisory personnel in accordance with paragraph 44 of my report of 18 March 1998 (S/1998/249) to Sierra Leone for a period of up to 90 days, to work under the authority of my Special Envoy, to coordinate closely with the Government of Sierra Leone and with ECOMOG, the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS), to report on the military situation in the country, to ascertain the state of and to assist in the finalization of planning by the Government of Sierra Leone and ECOMOG for future tasks, such as the identification of the former combatant elements to be disarmed and the design of a disarmament plan, as well as to perform other related security tasks as identified in other paragraphs of my above-mentioned report.

2. By paragraph 10 of that resolution, the Council requested me to report periodically, including on the activities of those military liaison and security advisory personnel and on the work of the office of my Special Envoy in Sierra Leone, within the reporting time-frame set out in paragraph 16 of resolution 1132 (1998) of 8 October 1997. The present report is submitted in accordance with that time-frame, by which the Security Council requested the submission of a report every 60 days.

II. DEVELOPMENTS SINCE MY LAST REPORT

Action taken by the Government of Sierra Leone

3. Following its restoration on 10 March 1998, the Government of Sierra Leone has acted to consolidate its authority throughout the country as far as possible. On 16 March, President Kabbah, acting with the support of Parliament, proclaimed a state of emergency empowering him to take measures to ensure security and stability. These measures included the right to detain suspects and restrict their movements, the imposition of a curfew and the right to requisition property. The Government also announced the expulsion of 22 persons and the deprivation of 10 others of Sierra Leonean citizenship for collaborating with the junta and for economic crimes and immigration irregularities.

4. On 20 March 1998, President Kabbah announced that his new streamlined Cabinet would comprise persons of known competence and integrity. The members of the Cabinet, which consists of 15 Ministers, 11 Deputy Ministers and 5 Ministers of State, have all been confirmed by Parliament, as have the President's nominees for the post of Chief Justice and many positions in parastatal bodies. The President has also appointed a Policy Advisory Committee to guide the Government on crucial issues of national interest and to monitor the functioning of the public institutions.

5. The Government has also taken steps to establish a National Commission for Reconstruction, Resettlement and Rehabilitation, responsible for stimulating and coordinating related donor, Government and non-governmental activities. In accordance with its terms of reference, the National Commission would, in close collaboration with domestic and international funding agencies, draw up a two-year national rehabilitation, resettlement and reconstruction plan involving, inter alia, the repatriation and resettlement of internally displaced persons and refugees.

6. On 27 March 1998, the Minister for Foreign Affairs of Zimbabwe, Mr. Stan Mudenge, led a five-person Commonwealth delegation on a visit to Freetown in order to explore ways in which the Commonwealth could assist Sierra Leone in the task of national reconstruction and peace-building. At the conclusion of the visit, the participants announced that they would urge all member Governments of the Commonwealth to assist Sierra Leone bilaterally in every practicable way in its efforts to achieve national reconstruction and reconciliation, and to contribute to the Trust Fund to support peacekeeping and related activities in Sierra Leone.

7. On 21 April 1998, a three-man team of British police experts visited Sierra Leone to advise the Government on the restructuring of the police force and the improvement of its equipment. The team also discussed the recruitment and role of police advisers and relations between the police and armed forces, among other matters. The United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland has also provided the Government with communications equipment for the police.

8. From 4 to 8 May 1998, the Government received a multi-donor joint mission by the World Bank, the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), the African Development Bank (AfDB), the United Kingdom Department for International Development and the European Union (EU) to discuss a range of development-related matters. The joint mission also discussed the demobilization and reintegration of ex-combatants, as described in more detail in section V below.

9. As described in section III below, on 6 May 1998, the Government instituted, in Freetown, the trials of a number of persons accused of plotting, participating in or collaborating with the coup d'état and the illegal junta.

10. On 22 May 1998, President Kabbah, in a comprehensive policy statement delivered at the State opening of the second session of Parliament, outlined major national policies his Government intends to pursue. These include: establishing guidelines for development activities, a framework for the creation of a new army and the restructuring and retraining of the police force; improving relations with neighbouring countries; reviving the national economy; strengthening key sectors of activity; and promoting civic education to sensitize Sierra Leoneans to the true meaning of peace and democracy. The President has also called for national reconciliation.

11. From 30 to 31 May 1998, the Minister of Internal Affairs, Mr. Charles Margai, and the Deputy Defence Minister, Chief Hinga Norman, visited Makeni and Kenema and called on all remnants of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council/Revolutionary United Front (AFRC/RUF) forces to surrender within two weeks, promising them that they would be protected and treated fairly in accordance with the law.

12. On 4 June 1998, at a summit meeting of the leaders of the three Mano River Union countries, President Conteh and President Kabbah of Sierra Leone met at Conakry to discuss mutual cooperation in the subregion and relations between Liberia and Sierra Leone. Liberia was represented by the Vice-President, Mr. Enoch Dogolea.

Action taken by the Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States

13. Following the expulsion of the illegal military junta from the capital, Freetown, in mid-February and the restoration of the democratically elected Government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah in the capital, ECOMOG moved swiftly to secure the area around Freetown, as well as the northern and southern provinces of the country, especially the towns of Makeni, Kambia and Kabala in the north and Bo and Kenema in the south. ECOMOG forces also advanced eastwards towards the Kono and Kailahun districts, where the forces of the former junta were concentrated.

14. Though ECOMOG has continued to make progress, it is severely overextended and its advance has been beset by logistical constraints, as well as by fierce resistance from elements of the AFRC and the RUF, the partners in the former junta. In mid-May, however, ECOMOG seized Koindu and Buedu on the eastern border of Sierra Leone with Guinea.

15. As ECOMOG troops approached, armed former junta elements attacked the local civilian population, killing, raping and mutilating hundreds of them, causing tens of thousands of Sierra Leoneans to flee into Liberia and Guinea in the last few weeks and tens of thousands more to flee into the interior of Sierra Leone. Hundreds of patients have been admitted to hospitals suffering from amputation of limbs and ears and severe lacerations. Humanitarian organizations fear that the actual number of victims may be much larger (see sect. III below).

16. ECOMOG is being supported by units of the Sierra Leonean Civil Defence Force (CDF), which is composed of irregular community-based fighters who fought the junta before the restoration of the legitimate Government. The Civil Defence Force includes Kamajors, who are regionally based rural militia mainly from the south and parts of the east, as well as Tamaboros from the Koinadugu district, Donsos from the Kono district and Kapras, who are mainly from the Tonkolili district in the north. Though many CDF members are hunters who use traditional weapons, others are primarily farmers or students who joined the armed struggle against the junta. They are armed with a wide variety of weapons and often lack formal training and discipline. Though technically under ECOMOG control, their command and control structures are loose and informal.

17. On 4 and 5 May 1998 at Accra, my Special Envoy attended the seventeenth meeting of ECOWAS Chiefs of Staff convened to discuss the situation in Sierra Leone. At the meeting, the Nigerian Chief of Defence Staff, Major-General A. A. Abubakar, outlined ECOMOG's objectives in Sierra Leone as follows: the attainment of peace, the training of a new Sierra Leonean army, and the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of Sierra Leonean combatants into society, accompanied by humanitarian assistance. The achievement of these objectives would be followed by the withdrawal of ECOMOG.

18. ECOMOG has deployed three brigades and an independent battalion, altogether comprising approximately 12,000 men, in Sierra Leone and has appealed for a further 6,000 to enable it to carry out its functions more effectively. A number of participants expressed willingness, in principle, to contribute forces to ECOMOG's operations in Sierra Leone. However, the countries concerned stressed that they were not in a position to do so without substantial financial and logistical assistance.

Action taken by the United Nations

19. Beginning on 4 May 1998, pursuant to resolution 1162 (1998), eight military liaison personnel were deployed in Freetown under the authority of my Special Envoy. The military officers, who are led by a Brigadier-General from India, are from Kenya (two), the Russian Federation (two), the United Kingdom (one) and Zambia (two). Two police advisers, one from Namibia and one from Kenya, as well as an adviser on planning for disarmament and demobilization, are expected to be deployed shortly. Some vehicles and communications equipment have also been deployed to Sierra Leone for the use of the officers.

20. The liaison officers have begun to travel through parts of the country to assess the situation with a view to finalizing plans for their deployment and for the disarmament of former combatants. The ECOMOG Force Commander, Brigadier-General Maxwell Khobe, has welcomed their arrival and promised his full cooperation.

21. The office of my Special Envoy has also been strengthened by the addition of a political affairs officer and a human rights adviser. In addition, I have taken steps to strengthen the human rights element of the office of my Special Envoy and have approached a number of Governments on an urgent basis to request them to make available suitably qualified trial monitors.

22. From 26 to 29 May 1998, my Special Representative for Children in Armed Conflict, Mr. Olara A. Otunnu, visited Sierra Leone to assess the plight of children affected by the conflict. During his visit, Mr. Otunnu met with President Kabbah, Ministers and Parliamentarians, as well as with the Force Commander of ECOMOG, the National Coordinator of CDF and representatives of United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations. He visited Daru, Segbwema and Kenema, accompanied by the Minister for Social Welfare, Gender and Children's Affairs, Mrs. Shirley Gbujama, my Special Envoy, the United Nations Resident Coordinator and the representative of UNICEF.

23. In discussions with the Government, ECOMOG and CDF, important commitments were made to my Special Representative in relation to the rights, protection and welfare of children. It was agreed that a joint task force for the demobilization of child combatants, comprising the Government, ECOMOG, CDF, the United Nations and international humanitarian agencies, would be constituted. The Government agreed not to recruit children under 18 years of age into a new national army. The Civil Defence Force committed to stop recruiting and initiating children under 18 and to begin the process of demobilization of child combatants within their ranks. Along with ECOMOG, CDF also undertook that children captured in or fleeing from areas held by junta elements would receive special protection. President Kabbah directed that a coordination group consisting of relevant Ministries, United Nations agencies and non-governmental organizations, be established to coordinate an effective national response to the needs of children affected by armed conflict. Following their discussion with Mr. Otunnu, an all-party group of Parliamentarians constituted a caucus to serve as parliamentary advocates for the rights, protection and welfare of children affected by armed conflict in Sierra Leone.

24. At the conclusion of his visit, Mr. Otunnu proposed that the international community make Sierra Leone one of the pilot projects for a more concerted and effective response in the context of post-conflict peace-building.

Military and security situation in Sierra Leone

25. The security situation in Freetown continues to be favourable, with a strong but discreet ECOMOG presence and widespread deployment of the Sierra Leonean police. Schools, banks and markets are functioning normally, some international air links to the airport at Lungi have been restored and food and fuel products are widely available. Nevertheless, ECOMOG has continued to recover weapons in house-to-house searches conducted on the basis of information received about the presence in Freetown of former junta members and common criminals.

26. Despite ECOMOG's initial success in driving the elements of the junta rebels back towards the east of the country, several groups of rebels appear to have broken out of the Kailahun district and have moved northwards and westwards in an apparent attempt to re-establish some of their former bush camps in the north. They have been attacking towns and villages, terrorizing local communities and extorting food from them. The situation in the north is now considered unsatisfactory and food convoys have to be guarded by armed escort.

27. Moreover, in the course of their retreat towards the eastern part of the country, former junta elements inflicted extensive damage and engaged in indiscriminate looting and property destruction. In particular, hospitals in most communities lack beds, drugs and equipment.

28. The United States has contributed $3.9 million to ECOMOG over a four-month period through the logistics services company Pacific Architects and Engineers, which provided services to ECOMOG in Liberia. Some vehicles have already been made available. It is anticipated that this assistance will result in further gains by ECOMOG against the former junta forces. However, this contribution is not expected to assist in the deployment of additional ECOMOG forces, for which further contributions, whether bilaterally or through the Trust Fund to support peacekeeping and related activities in Sierra Leone, will be needed.

29. There are reports that many of the fighters supporting the former junta in the east are in fact Liberian nationals. The Monitoring Group of the Economic Community of West African States believes it has identified some of the dead combatants as Liberians after clashes with junta elements and has reportedly captured more than 100 Liberian fighters in the vicinity of Kailahun and in Kono district.

30. On 5 May 1998, President Taylor wrote to me deprecating the "disturbing allegation" that the Government of Liberia was involved in the conflict in Sierra Leone and stressing his commitment to the maintenance of peace in the region. President Taylor informed me that he had proposed to the Chairman of ECOWAS that ECOMOG "cordon off" the border between the two countries, and said he would welcome the concurrence of the United Nations with his suggestion that United Nations monitors be deployed in the border area.

31. On 7 May 1998, the Liberian Government issued a policy statement reaffirming that it would not permit its territory to be used to destabilize any neighbouring country and stating that President Taylor had approved the deployment of an ECOMOG observer unit at the border between Liberia and Sierra Leone in Lofa County, Liberia.

32. The Government of Sierra Leone has welcomed the issuance of the policy statement and has disclosed that a Liberian delegation visiting Freetown to attend the funeral of the late spouse of the President, Mrs. Patricia Kabbah, had met with President Kabbah and discussed the improvement of relations between the two countries.

33. In some parts of the country, misconduct by some members of CDF, arising from their indiscipline and lack of training, has given rise to complaints from civilians.

III. HUMAN RIGHTS

34. Since early May 1998, a human rights adviser has been attached to the office of my Special Envoy. His main tasks have included the observation of the treason trials and, in close consultation with the Special Envoy and the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, examining modalities to increase the capacity of the office to monitor the human rights situation in Sierra Leone and to assist the Government in meeting its international human rights obligations in a sustainable manner. In carrying out its human rights functions, the office will work closely with all relevant elements of civil society, including national and international non-governmental organizations. Both the Attorney-General and the Chief Justice of Sierra Leone have offered their full cooperation to my Special Envoy and his staff in the exercise of his human rights functions.

35. The main focus of human rights concerns since my last report has been the attacks on civilians by armed, uniformed groups, which are consistently reported to be members of the rebel forces. They have systematically mutilated or severed the limbs of non-combatants around the towns of Koidu and Kabala, in a zone that stretches as far west as Masiaka, south of Port Loko. The scale of the attacks can be estimated from the accounts of victims who have been admitted to hospital. For instance, in the period from 6 April to 21 May 1998, 225 people were admitted to Connaught Hospital in Freetown with war wounds. All but one were reported to be civilians. Of these, a quarter were amputees and half were victims of deep lacerations. The patients report that for every one person who reached the hospital, some five other victims of attacks are either dead or missing. In the same period, there have been some 500 admissions of war-wounded persons to other hospitals in Sierra Leone.

36. Of those victims who have received treatment, most are male, ranging in age from 8 to 60 years. The youngest amputee admitted to hospital is, however, a six-year-old girl, one of whose arms was completely severed. Victims also report that babies have been taken from their mothers' arms and burned alive. There are numerous reports of rape, including one of the multiple rape of a 12-year-old girl. Doctors at one hospital state that lacerations inflicted on one 60-year-old woman are the result of a failed attempt to behead her.

37. The office of my Special Envoy continues to receive information about human rights abuses perpetrated by forces loyal to the junta in the period before the restoration of the Government. From all parts of the country there are reports of extrajudicial killings, rape, arbitrary detention, including for purposes of sexual abuse, torture of children (especially of child-combatants), forced labour and the looting and destruction of residential and commercial premises and property. It will remain important to document these actions with a view to tackling issues of impunity and as an element in the process of promoting reconciliation and healing of society.

38. Information has also been received regarding widespread acts of extrajudicial revenge killings perpetrated against alleged junta collaborators following the restoration of the Government. In just one town, Kenema, there are reports of some 50 revenge killings. Some of those killed were children, with at least one case occurring in Freetown. There are reportedly still many people in hiding for fear of being subjected to revenge attacks. Reportedly some 100 of those hiding in the Freetown area are children. The Government has given assurances that revenge attacks will be investigated and prosecuted.

39. Reports indicate that elements of the Kamajors are responsible for violation of the human rights and rights under humanitarian law of both combatants and non-combatants. This militia force continues to include large numbers of male children. Concerns have been expressed to the Government on these matters and it has indicated that it is taking action to correct the situation (see paras. 22-24 above).

40. My Special Envoy continues to monitor the implementation of the state of emergency declared by the President on 10 March 1998, under which, inter alia, persons may be detained indefinitely without being charged or tried. There are more than 1,000 such detainees held at Pademba Road Prison in Freetown. The Government has established a screening committee to expedite the process of releasing detainees and bringing others to trial.

41. The Government is prosecuting 59 persons in the regular courts for charges, variously, of treason, murder and arson. Another trial of some 20 people is scheduled to start in the coming weeks, as are a number of courts martial. The civilian trials have, so far, proceeded in conformity with normal criminal procedure. Matters of concern are brought to the attention of the Government. The office of my Special Envoy will continue to observe the trials and will seek to augment its capacity in this regard.

42. On 27 May 1998, a delegation of Amnesty International, which had been studying the situation in Sierra Leone, met with my Special Envoy. The purpose of the Amnesty mission was to examine incidents that had occurred during the period of junta rule, as well as the extent of atrocities currently being committed by the remnants of the junta. Amnesty International is also reviewing the detention and trial in Freetown of persons accused of participating in or collaborating with the junta.

IV. HUMANITARIAN SITUATION

43. The humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone is fluid. In the western area and the southern and eastern provinces (with the exception of Kailahun district), aid agencies have begun to reactivate programmes as they have benefited from improved security and access. In northern and north-eastern Sierra Leone, however, the situation has continued to deteriorate as a result of the activity of the former junta forces described above.

44. The humanitarian consequences of the wave of atrocities are very severe. Government hospitals in Makeni, Magburaka and Kabala and health clinics throughout the north have been overwhelmed by the influx of civilians suffering from amputations and maimings and are hampered by staff shortages and logistical constraints.

45. There has already been an outbreak of measles in two camps in the north and there is a severe risk of further outbreaks of epidemics such as cholera with the imminent onset of the rainy season. Furthermore, the non-governmental organization Action contre la Faim, which operates therapeutic feeding centres in Makeni and Magburaka, has reported a large influx of malnourished children under the age of five. Admissions have doubled during the past week. Malnutrition levels are increasing, and there are indications that the 10 per cent global acute malnutrition threshold, at which an emergency response is required, is being breached. If the security situation in the north continues to deteriorate, there is a serious risk that the harvest will be looted by armed elements, thus further undermining the food security of the rural population.

46. The Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) has reported that refugees from Sierra Leone are continuing to flow into Faranah, Kissidougou and Guéckédou prefectures in eastern Guinea at a rate of 300 people per day. Many new arrivals, particularly children, suffer from malnutrition. UNHCR has documented the recent cases of at least 82 victims of rebel atrocities, including 28 who were mutilated. The refugees come mainly from the districts of Kailahun, Kono and Kenema. The influx is taking place despite reported attempts by the remnants of the junta to prevent people from leaving those areas. At the same time, about 40,000 internally displaced persons have flooded into the towns of Masingbi, Makeni, Kabala and Magburaka. Over the past three months, some 237,000 Sierra Leoneans have poured into Guinea and Liberia, bringing the total number of Sierra Leonean refugees in the two neighbouring countries to 530,000 people since the start of the conflict in 1991.

47. On 2 June 1998, UNHCR issued an urgent appeal for $7.3 million to help refugees who have fled from the rebel forces. The amount is designed to cover relief assistance to new arrivals in Guinea and Liberia until the end of the year. This followed a visit to Freetown from 2 to 3 June 1998 by the Assistant High Commissioner for Refugees, Mr. Soren Jessen-Petersen.

48. The humanitarian response to the crisis in the north has been severely constrained by the difficulty of access owing to security risks. Road travel from Freetown to Makeni and Koidu is restricted, since agencies are reluctant to travel by road for fear of attacks. Furthermore, many aid agency staff were threatened by AFRC/RUF elements during the period of the ECOMOG intervention and no relief agency has deployed international staff permanently up-country since then.

49. Nevertheless, the United Nations Children's Fund (UNICEF), the World Health Organization (WHO) and the non-governmental organization Médecins sans Frontières have sent medicines, bedding and plastic sheeting to the north. The International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) and Médecins sans Frontières have offered to coordinate the joint distribution of medical supplies to hospitals in Makeni, Magburaka and Kabala. UNICEF has delivered supplies to Kenema and supported efforts by the local authorities to immunize more than 400 children against measles, and the World Food Programme (WFP) is providing assistance to health institutions.

50. From 5 to 6 May 1998, the Humanitarian Assistance Coordination Unit also co-sponsored a workshop for community leaders in the Bo district concerning the code of conduct that governs the activities of relief workers. The workshop was planned in response to incidents of the commandeering of vehicles by Kamajors and ECOMOG in the area. Non-governmental organizations have since reported that the Kamajors have facilitated the safe passage of relief supplies and it is now intended to conduct similar workshops in other parts of the country, including Kenema.

51. An inter-agency mission led by the United Nations Humanitarian Coordinator on 19 May 1998 to Daru and Segbwema found the situation in the south-east of the country, which had been inaccessible for some months for security reasons, more favourable than expected in some respects. However, large numbers of unaccompanied children were identified who are in need of family-tracing services, feeding and health care.

52. Mr. Sergio Vieira de Mello, Under-Secretary-General for Humanitarian Affairs, will visit Sierra Leone from 10 to 12 June 1998 in order to observe at first hand the ongoing humanitarian programmes and the current difficulties faced by the humanitarian community.

V. DISARMAMENT AND DEMOBILIZATION

53. Both the Abidjan Agreement of 30 November 1996 between the Government of Sierra Leone and RUF and the Conakry Agreement of 23 October 1997 between ECOWAS and AFRC contain provisions for the disarmament and demobilization of Sierra Leonean fighters and their reintegration into society. In his statement at the State opening of Parliament, President Kabbah called on all remnants of the AFRC/RUF to surrender, offering them assurances that they would be treated humanely in accordance with the Geneva Convention and its additional Protocols. The President also indicated that elements of the Conakry Agreement and the Abidjan Agreement would be taken into consideration in the implementation of the disarmament and demobilization programme. The prompt implementation of such a programme is regarded as essential to the stability of Sierra Leone and of the subregion in general.

54. Following the removal of the junta by force by ECOMOG in February and the subsequent ECOMOG action throughout the rest of the country, the Abidjan Agreement and the Conakry Agreement are considered to have been effectively superseded. However, in the parts of the country that have now been brought under Government control, some aspects of those instruments that govern the disarmament and demobilization of former Sierra Leonean fighters might still be applicable. These include the following categories: members of the former Republic of Sierra Leone Military Forces (RSLMF), including members of AFRC, the country's former army, which has now effectively been dissolved; members of RUF; members of CDF; and child soldiers.

55. Both ECOMOG and the Government have developed plans for the disarmament and demobilization of former combatants and for their reintegration into society. Pursuant to the recommendations of the joint mission described in paragraph 8 above, the Government has adopted a comprehensive framework for the disarmament, demobilization, reinsertion and reintegration of ex-combatants and their families. The plan envisages the establishment of a Sierra Leone veterans assistance board to be chaired by President Kabbah, which would, in close cooperation with ECOMOG, the United Nations and donors, supervise the disarmament and demobilization of an estimated 32,000 former combatants in three phases, provisionally over the next 19 months. A small executive secretariat will be charged with the implementation of the policies of the Board in close coordination with ECOMOG and the United Nations.

56. The demobilization process will begin with a rigorous registration process to ensure that eligible ex-combatants receive identification documents. The first priority is the demobilization of some 5,000 to 7,000 former members of the Republic of Sierra Leone Military Forces already disarmed by ECOMOG and assembled in camps around Freetown, i.e., at Wilberforce Barracks, Benguema Training Centre and Lungi. ECOMOG has recently reported that the numbers of men at each camp have fallen, apparently because some of the men have been provisionally released. Units of CDF in parts of the country deemed secure by the Government and local authorities will also be demobilized in phase I and will undergo a similar and registration exercise. Some CDF units have already returned to their communities of origin in preparation for the disarmament process, though many CDF fighters have also recently been moved up to the Daru area, apparently to join the offensive against the former junta forces at Kailahun. On 25 March 1998, President Kabbah formally requested the international community to provide food for the maintenance of the 7,000 ex-combatants for a two-month period.

57. Preliminary estimates indicate that there are some 1,000 disabled soldiers, 500 female ex-combatants and about 2,500 children. Under the plan, all adult ex-combatants will receive the same reinsertion assistance, the level and nature of which will be determined by the Sierra Leone Veterans Assistance Board, in consultation with donors. The reinsertion assistance will be provided in instalments in order to provide a transitional safety net to ex-combatant families, to encourage them to remain in their areas of resettlement and to monitor their reintegration progress. Furthermore, the Government intends to provide a community-based social and economic reintegration assistance to assist ex-combatants to return to sustainable and productive lives in their communities. Particularly vulnerable groups of ex-combatants, such as child soldiers and the disabled, will receive specialized assistance.

58. The Government intends to proceed with the disarmament, demobilization, reinsertion and reintegration process as far as possible, notwithstanding continuing fighting in some parts of the country. The rapid demobilization of the encamped RSLMF will reduce the security and cost burden borne by the Government and ECOMOG in maintaining the camps. Insofar as adequate reinsertion and reintegration assistance and effective monitoring systems are put in place as planned, the Government is confident that this process will contribute to national reconciliation and reconstruction.

59. Though the plan envisages specific phases, provisionally scheduled to culminate in January 2000, these depend in part on the willingness of those who are still resisting ECOMOG's advance and terrorizing civilians in the north to surrender. It is not clear at this time whether these men, who appear to include the most violent and ruthless supporters of the former junta, intend to surrender or, if so, under what circumstances this might take place.

60. Another important aspect of the plan that remains to be clarified concerns the source of the funding. The plan is not accompanied by a cost estimate, but an earlier Government assessment of the likely costs arrived at a figure of some $14 million. Since that estimate was arrived at in respect of a more modest operation, the likely cost of the current exercise is likely to exceed it. No commitment has yet been made by donors for the funding of the exercise. However, the Government believes it has made some progress in identifying sufficient funds to continue to feed the surrendered soldiers for the next two months or so.

61. On 5 June 1998, my Special Envoy convened a meeting of United Nations agencies, non-governmental organizations and donor representatives to discuss the coordination of international support and contributions to the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration of the 7,000 ex-combatants.

62. On 12 June 1998, the World Bank, which participated in the multi-donor joint mission mentioned in paragraph 8 above, will send two consultants to Sierra Leone to discuss with all participants the further refinement of the plan, including practical arrangements to make it operationally effective. These arrangements are expected to include the provision of strong technical assistance to the executive secretariat of the Sierra Leone Veterans Assistance Board.

VI. PROPOSED ACTION TO BE TAKEN BY THE UNITED NATIONS

63. In the complex and volatile situation currently prevailing in Sierra Leone, the priority task is to promote stability and security by disarming and demobilizing as many former combatants as possible, as soon as possible. The plan adopted by the Government on the advice of the multi-donor joint mission provides a useful basis to accomplish this goal, though much remains to be done in terms of identifying sources of funding and determining the precise roles to be played by the international community. In general terms, I would envisage that, under the overall authority of the Government, my Special Envoy would ensure that the various donors continued to coordinate their activities closely. Within that framework the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP), working through the United Nations Office for Project Services, and in close cooperation with donors and implementing partners, would carry out the arrangements put in place for disarmament and demobilization prior to the May 1997 coup.

64. In this context, I intend to convene a high-level conference in the near future in order to mobilize assistance for the disarmament, demobilization and reintegration process, and for the reconstruction, rehabilitation of Sierra Leone. The conference would also address the need to provide logistical and other support to ECOMOG in order to improve its capacity to carry out its peacekeeping role, as well as for emergency and humanitarian needs.

65. Moreover, I believe the United Nations could render immediate assistance to Sierra Leone by deploying a limited number of unarmed military observers to assist in tasks of pressing importance. Such a deployment at this stage could lend much-needed impetus to a fragile but vital process, which deserves the support of the international community. It could also assist my Special Envoy to avert further bloodshed among civilians and combatants alike - both ECOMOG and Sierra Leonean - by helping to encourage the surrender of former junta elements in the event that this appeared to be possible. Finally, a more visible United Nations presence could serve to bolster the confidence of the Government and people of Sierra Leone in the commitment to their cause of the international community and encourage more substantial donor support for disarmament, demobilization and longer-term rehabilitation and development.

66. I have therefore developed a concept of operations for a United Nations peacekeeping observer mission, initially for a six-month period, whose immediate objectives would be the following:

(a) To monitor the military and security situation in the country as a whole with a view to assisting the Government and ECOMOG in the subsequent implementation of disarmament and demobilization phases as outlined in the Government's plan;

(b) To monitor the demobilization of former combatants already disarmed by ECOMOG and concentrated in secure areas of the country. This would involve collaboration with ECOMOG in its activities, including the provision of security and arms collection and destruction;

(c) To assist in monitoring respect for international humanitarian law at disarmament and demobilization sites;

(d) To monitor the voluntary disarmament and demobilization of members of CDF in their home regions and to monitor progress in the creation of a new national army;

(e) To observe, as security conditions permit, the situation in the north and east of the country, with a view to assisting in the disarmament and demobilization of surrendering former junta forces;

(f) To continue to provide my Special Envoy for Sierra Leone with regular information concerning the military and security situation in the country as a whole.

67. The mission would be known as the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone (UNOMSIL) and would be led by my Special Envoy, Mr. Francis G. Okelo, who would be designated Special Representative for Sierra Leone. The Chief Military Observer would be Brigadier-General Subhash C. Joshi (India), who is currently the team leader of the small military liaison cell deployed to Sierra Leone pursuant to resolution 1162 (1998). UNOMSIL would subsume the office of my Special Envoy and its staff and the related cost estimates will be issued shortly as an addendum to the present report.

68. The activities described above would require up to 70 officers, as well as a medical unit of up to 15 persons, with the necessary equipment and civilian administrative support staff.

69. In view of the volatile security situation outside the capital, the deployment would take place in phases, with the first group of approximately 40 military observers being deployed, starting during the month of July 1998, to Freetown, Hastings and Lungi. The timing of subsequent deployments would then depend on the security situation, the progress of implementation of the Government's disarmament and demobilization plan and the availability of the necessary logistical equipment and resources. In this connection, I would call on the Government of Sierra Leone to be prepared to make available to the mission such premises and services as they can. At this stage, I would provisionally anticipate that the second phase of deployment would then take place in August-September, with the final phase beginning in October.

70. The observers would be deployed at each of the three camps where former Republic of Sierra Leone Military Forces are now being detained, i.e.,

Wilberforce Barracks, Benguema Training Centre and Lungi; at the three ECOMOG Brigade headquarters at Hastings, Makeni and Bo; and at a headquarters location to support the Chief Military Observer. During the next phases, subject to the considerations identified above, observers could be deployed outside the immediate area of Freetown, including to the home regions of CDF members returning to undertake voluntary disarmament and demobilization as and when they considered their home communities sufficiently secure.

71. The mission would be provided with adequate air support in order to ensure mobility and security, as well as casualty and medical evacuations. A boat would also be required to facilitate travel and communications between Lungi and Freetown.

72. Should the Security Council agree to these measures, I will establish security arrangements for United Nations personnel with the Chairman of ECOWAS and conclude a status of mission agreement with the Government of Sierra Leone.

73. The deployment described above would require a commensurate expansion in the size of the office of the Special Representative, including information and political officers, as well as the necessary administrative and support staff.

74. I would also propose to increase to four the number of human rights officers attached to the office of my Special Envoy. These officers, under the direction of the Special Representative, and in close cooperation with the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights, would have a monitoring role and the task of addressing the country's long-term human rights institution building needs.

75. An increase in the number of civilian police advisers from two to five would also be required. These officers would advise the Government and local police officials on police practice, training and recruitment, in particular on the need to respect internationally accepted standards of policing in democratic societies. They would also monitor the progress of the restructuring of the Sierra Leonean police force.

76. At this point, it is difficult to assess whether an expansion of the mission might be needed six months from now and, if so, what form it might take. My recommendations on this matter will depend on ECOMOG's progress in restoring security throughout the country. If the presence of United Nations personnel in areas of continuing insecurity is considered desirable in order to reduce bloodshed by encouraging armed elements to surrender, or if areas of Sierra Leone now secure come under threat from hostile elements, thought must be given to ensuring the security of United Nations personnel. Although ECOMOG is a capable force and has indicated it would guarantee the security of the observers, it is also a potential target of attacks by the remnants of the junta. Unarmed military observers under its protection might not be regarded as neutral by hostile armed elements and their safety might therefore be jeopardized.

77. For those reasons, I could envisage the possibility, at a future stage, of recommending the deployment of a highly mobile unit of armed United Nations troops, operating in close cooperation with ECOMOG but independent of it, to protect observers in locations where their security might be at risk, but where their neutral presence may be helpful in encouraging armed elements to surrender. However, I do not believe that the time is ripe to make such a recommendation to the Council at this stage.

78. The deployment of ECOMOG troops at the border with Liberia could help lay to rest allegations of the influx of arms or the provision of armed assistance to the junta by foreign forces. I commend the Government of Liberia for its policy statement reaffirming that it will not permit its territory to be used to destabilize any neighbouring country. Verification that this was the case would, in my view, improve the security climate throughout the entire subregion and improve mutual confidence among its member countries. I hope there will be further discussions between the Heads of State of the subregion on these matters.

79. I therefore intend to pursue with President Taylor his proposal for the deployment of a small contingent of United Nations military observers at the border with Sierra Leone, in order to assist in verifying that Liberian territory is not being used to destabilize Sierra Leone and that foreign forces are not assisting the remnants of the former junta there. I will also discuss the matter with President Kabbah and with the Chairman of ECOWAS and revert to the Council in due course.

VII. OBSERVATIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

80. Since my last report, the situation in Sierra Leone has in some respects improved considerably. Since its restoration on 10 March 1998, the Government has moved rapidly to reassert its authority throughout much of the country. President Kabbah has nominated a compact Cabinet of acknowledged experts in their fields, all of whom have been confirmed by Parliament, as well as a Chief Justice.

81. However, in the eastern part of Sierra Leone and parts of the north, the remnants of the former junta continue to resist ECOMOG forces and attack Sierra Leonean civilians. I join with the Council in deploring the continued resistance to the legitimate Government, in calling on the supporters of the junta to lay down their arms, and in condemning the mutilations, rapes, looting and other atrocities carried out by junta elements against the civilian population. I also align myself with the commendation expressed for ECOWAS and ECOMOG in the presidential statement adopted on 20 May 1998 (S/PRST/1998/13) for the important role they are playing to restore peace and security in Sierra Leone, and support the call for Member States to provide technical and logistical support to assist ECOMOG to continue to enhance its ability to carry out its peacekeeping role and contribute to bringing an end to the atrocities being committed against the people of Sierra Leone. In this context, I welcome the logistical assistance provided by the United States. I am also grateful for the contribution made by the United Kingdom, and invite other Member States to make contributions to the Trust Fund to support peacekeeping and related activities in Sierra Leone.

82. It is clear that there are a significant number of victims of rebel atrocities who remain in the bush or who are otherwise unable to receive medical attention. I applaud the efforts of United Nations humanitarian personnel, ECOMOG and the non-governmental organizations in locating and aiding victims. However, more must be done as a matter of urgency, including the provision of additional medical and surgical capacity, including hospital beds. In the longer term, the agencies and the non-governmental organizations concerned will need to offer support in the form of prosthesis services for all amputees and psycho-social treatment of traumatized victims and their families. In this context, I welcome the intention of ICRC to dispatch a surgical team to Sierra Leone to augment local medical facilities.

83. I call on the Government of Sierra Leone to continue to show the necessary resolve to adhere to international human rights standards and its own distinguished legal traditions in ensuring that those accused of the gravest crimes against the State and its people receive fair trials. I am aware that the Government has held to this course so far in the face of strongly voiced public contempt for the accused.

84. I express my appreciation to those Member States and others who have contributed to the flash appeal for humanitarian assistance and for various humanitarian projects.

85. I recommend that the Security Council establish an observer mission in Sierra Leone, to be known as the United Nations Observer Mission in Sierra Leone (UNOMSIL), with the mandate and concept of operations described in paragraphs 66 to 71 above and with the necessary augmentation of civilian and civilian police staff as set out in paragraphs 73 to 75 above.

86. During the six-month period of the mandate, I would keep the situation closely under review and would make further recommendations to the Council concerning a possible extension or expansion of the mission as the circumstances permitted.

87. I support the recommendation of my Special Representative for Children in Armed Conflict that Sierra Leone be made one of the pilot projects for a more concerted and effective response in the context of post-conflict peace-building.

88. Finally, I wish to express my appreciation to my Special Envoy and to all United Nations staff in Sierra Leone for their efforts over the past several weeks.

REVOLUTIONARY UNITED FRONT OF SIERRA LEONE RUF S/L

DEFENCE HEAD QUARTERS 00009658

26TH SEPTEMBER 1999

TO -- THE LEADER OF THE REVOLUTION , RUF S/L.
FROM -- MAJOR GENERAL SAM BOCKARIE
SUBJECT -- SALUTE REPORT.

The Leader Sir,

Before leaving the ground in November 1996, you placed me in command as the Battlefield Commander of the RUF S/L and instructed me to take command in your absence and to maintain the ground by any means necessary.
In that light, I have acted in the capacity you saw fit to entrust me with and done all in my power and wisdom to maintain the ground until your return to Sierra Leone.

Upon your departure I initiated contact with ULIMO as per your instructions in a bid to buy materials to repel the vicious attacks of the Kamajohs at a time when there was a peace document in place and we were not expecting to fight. At first ULIMO arrested me thinking that I had come to them to surrender. Later I was able to convince them to release me and we commenced a mutually beneficial relationship. I used the $ 7,000 USD to purchase vitally needed materials that gave us the stance to fight and challenge the SLPP Government until they were ousted by the AFRC coup. The efforts of the civilians most be highlighted as they provided Agricultural Produce which I traded for materials during the same period.

It came as a surprise to learn that the Leader had been arrested in Nigeria and an even bigger surprise when Captain Philip Palmer and others announced a change in the Leadership of the RUF. I was able to lure them to the Sierra Leone and Guinea border crossing of Nongowa and pretending that i was in support of their actions, I was able to Lure them across the river into RUF zone. I arrested all of them and obtained statements from them implicating the Kabba Government in the arrest of the Leader and indicating a greater international conspiracy to change the leadership of the RUF. These statements will be presented to you as evidence.

Meanwhile in Bradford in the Western Area Jungle, Superman had killed two of Colonel Mohamed Tarawallie's bodyguards whilst others had run for fear of being killed. Commanders from all fronts were outraged by this act and were about to move to Bradford to arrest the situation when the AFRC overthrew the Government of Tejan Kabba on 25th May 1997 and called on us to join them a few days later.

On receiving instructions from the Leader calling on the RUF to join the AFRC I decided to put the Bradford issue to rest until the return of the Leader and instructed Superman to head the advance team to Freetown from the Western Area Jungle, later to be joined by Colonel Isaac and others from Kangari Hills. After insuring that our security was paramount, Brig. Issa and I entered the city to implement your instruction to join the AFRC and ensure that the security of the nation was paramount.

Thus began the marriage of uneven and unequal partners between the AFRC and the RUF.

The RUF was assigned the Ministries of Agriculture under MR SYB Rogers, the Ministry of Trade and Industry under Major Eldred Collins, the Ministry of Energy under Colonel Lawrence Wormandia, the Deputy Ministry of Education under Major Benda, the Deputy Ministry of lands and the Environment, under Brig. Peter Vandi and the Deputy Ministry of Health ,under Lt. Col. Fabai. I was offered the Ministry of Transport and Communication but declined the appointment as I had not received any instruction from the Leader to accept a political appointment and because I saw it necessary to concentrate on military issues.

Sir, within the marriage a diamond was sold by a Lebanese businessman with a commission given to the government, out of which an amount of nine million Leones (LE 9000000) was given to Colonel Superman for the entire RUF movement which he embezzled.
I decided to investigate him in my capacity as the commander you left in charge. Superman deliberately refused my order and went to the extent of challenging me. I was annoyed but was advised by the War Council Chairman Mr. SYB Rogers to wait for your return to the ground.

On the 2nd of June 1996, our forces led by Superman captured over three hundred Nigerian ECOMOG soldiers and held them under the terms and conditions of the Geneva Convention, as POW's.
It was the hope of every RUF officer and combatant that these POW's would be used to negotiate the release of the Leader from Nigeria. To our dismay all three hundred and some, POW's were released without our consultation. This followed meetings between the AFRC High Command and the Nigerian ECOMOG High Command. On one occasion I was unwittingly in an office in which a meeting between the above mentioned parties was to be held and I was asked to leave the room as nothing concerning me or the RUF were going to be discussed.

To make matters worse, no attention was paid by the AFRC to secure your release from Nigeria.

I as the Military High Command of the RUF was left floating without any military appointment as was the case of all RUF senior officers.
I advised that we attack and remove the enemy from Lungi and Jui but was instructed not to do so by J P Koroma.

In Freetown, I was met by MR Steve Bio and Gibril Massaquoi who informed me that MR Bio had been sent to me with instructions from the Leader and that he was to assume the office of Administrative Head of the RUF. This request was denied by me as I did not trust them and had began to suspect a clandestine bond between the two.
Soon after, I was summoned to the State House where J P Koroma showed me an Intelligence report alerting of a plot by certain members of the RUF and SLA to overthrow his Government. He instructed me to investigate and arrest the situation.
Meanwhile, unknown to either of us, Steve Bio and Gibril went to Kenema and tried to persuade Brig. Issa to back them in convincing me to support a coup led by Steve Bio. Colonel Issa kept them on hold and looked for a safe way of relaying this security information to me.

By this time, there had been three attempts on my life in Freetown, our men were being killed without any action taken by the authorities and the enemy were re-enforcing their positions around the Capital . In addition I had just been briefed by the Head of State that certain members of the RUF were planning to overthrow his Government. The last thing that I wanted was to be arrested by the AFRC as it would have caused serious problems for the RUF.
I left Freetown and went to Kenema. Upon my arrival in Kenema I was briefed by Brig. Issa on the intentions of Steve Bio and Gibril. I briefed Brig. Issa on the situation in Freetown and instructed him to effect the arrest of MR Steve Bio and Gibril and to turn them over to the AFRC for investigation. They remained in the custody of the AFRC when we retreated from Freetown .

Dr S S Banya had also met us with a view of convincing us to overthrow the AFRC Government in favor of the SLPP. They were arrested by me and turned over to the AFRC government on charges of Treason. Again without our consent they were released.

Brig. Issa was instructed to go to Freetown to ensure that security was paramount for the AFRC Government and civilians of Freetown.

On 31 January 1997 the Late Abu Sankoh (PLO1) and the Late Honorable Tamba Gborie looted the Iranian Embassy at Murray Town. They later called on Brig. Issa and offered him a set of chairs. Not being aware of the source of the chairs and the fact that it was indeed the Late Tamba Gborie who was instrumental in welcoming the RUF and meeting the demands of the RUF when the Government was doing every thing to discourage us, Brig. Issa accepted the gift in good faith.
Without any investigation into the issue, J P Koroma ordered that it be announced on National Radio that Brig. Issa had looted the Iranian Embassy and that as a result he was suspended from the Supreme Council of the AFRC. His arrest was ordered and it was announced that the RUF had planned a coup.
This situation led to the heightening of tension in Freetown between the RUF and the AFRC and an ultimate breakdown in its marriage.

The AFRC made available 50 Million Leones to the RUF monthly, though only for a couple of months. This and other monies received were used for providing rations to our troops and assisting all deployment areas. The civilian populace were not forgotten and special consignments were dispatched by me to Kailahun.
All financial reports and returns will be presented by Lt. Col. Kennedy who was in charge of all logistics. Kennedy you might recall Sir, is one of your senior bodyguards and served as G-SO1 (LOGISTICS) during our stay in Freetown.

Before Gibril was arrested he exposed to the AFRC, information on materials that the RUF held in stock. Unknown to me and the rest of the RUF High Command, Gibril and the AFRC made arrangements for the stock to be moved in place for their use. They then took control of the entire load leaving the bulk of it stashed away at the residence of J P Koroma and fled the city whilst our troops fought the enemy from house to house with nearly empty magazines and no support fire. In the end Freetown fell and the majority of soldiers, both RUF and SLA retreated safely from the Capital.
We also rescued J P Koroma and his family and under the escort of Brig. Issa and Brig. Mike he was brought to Kailahun as was advised by your brother. His mother-in-law had to be carried on a hammock the duration of the journey. On his arrival in Kailahun I gave-up my bedroom for J P Koroma and sought his permission to enter in order to go through my drawers.

The enemy had succeeding in demoralizing our troops and soldiers both RUF and SLA raced for the Moa River in retreat and with the intention of crossing as refugees into neighboring countries. Sensing that this would greatly deplete our fighting force, I instructed that strong gates be placed along the Moa crossings and threatened to open fire on anyone attempting to cross . I further instructed that defensives be set in Kono and ahead and to put an effective halt to the retreat.

I immediately set about establishing a Defence Headquarters in Kailahun. It was from this DHQ that I intended to organize a stance and a counter-offensive and from where command and control would be maintained. Later when J P Koroma arrived in Kailahun, he appointed me to take over command for both the RUF and the SLA as Chief of Defence Staff with the rank of Brigadier General. In order to motivate the most senior officers, I took it upon myself to appoint Brig. Issa as Battlefield Commander and Colonel Mingo as Battle Group Commander. All this was done especially to encourage Colonel Mingo and ensure smooth operation.
After our Freetown invasion in January 1999 I was again promoted by J P Koroma to the rank of Major General , Issa was promoted to Brigadier and Mike to the rank of Brigadier and other SLA officers were also promoted.

Sir, during this period I had been in contact with various diplomats and other international agencies such as the UN, Commonwealth, OAU, ECOWAS and even the Sierra Leone Government , with a view of effecting your release and a negotiated settlement of the Sierra Leonean crisis. These bodies lent deaf ears to my propositions as they thought that the Kabba government would be able to achieve military victory.

Back at headquarters I renewed my contact with ULIMO and tried to secure materials from them. It was out of these materials that I gave Superman a good quantity to attack and capture Kono. This move I thought would pressure the government into abandoning their mock trial against you and provide us with the ground necessary to move the war and the movement forward.
Superman used the materials to attack Kono and was able to control parts of Koidu Town. Though they were able to raise the ammo dump, they then concentrated on looting and later withdrew leaving the enemy to re-occupy the town. Even prior to that, all instructions to maintain the ground were not implemented.
With the captured materials from Kono, Superman went to the Kabala axis to join SAJ Musa.I instructed him to send some materials to which he agreed . Later he refused to dispatch the materials and refused to grant permission to the receiving officer to return to me.

A special forum of Vanguards was held to brief them of happenings since ~~the Freetown retreat and other important issues. It was in this forum~~ that I learnt that Superman had a mixed- Lebanese girl with him who was deterring his concentration on military issues. It was reported that she would sit on his lap during meetings with officers and publicly flirt with one another . This information concerned me greatly and in the presence of all Vanguards I instructed Superman to report for briefing. I told him that he should not be moving with his woman on a military operation such as the one he was on as it was obvious that his priority was not his military duties. In this light, I instructed him to prepare within 72hours and to report to DHQ . He agreed to report but later sent a long message denouncing my command and refusing to come to my call. He said that he would stay where he was and would take no instructions from me until the arrival of the leader.

The War Council Chairman and other senior officers joined me in trying to convince him to report but he refused, resorting to molesting Pa Rogers and Brigadier Isaac on set, whilst all stations were monitoring. Indeed he remained in his location, threatening any soldier attempting to comply with my instruction for all loyal forces to the RUF leadership and High Command to leave his location for the closest operational area.

Prior to this, diamonds mined from Kono were given to Brigadier Issa In order for him to make contact and delivery to a business associate of . yours. At his transit point, whilst awaiting General Ibrahim, Brigadier Issa reports that he had gone to a near by tea-shop and on his way back to the hotel he realized that the diamonds were missing from his pocket. His claims of the diamonds dropping from his pockets were substantiated by live broadcasts over radio announcing that diamonds had been found on the streets of the city.
Colonel Jungle was with Brig. Issa and are both in a position to better explain the events surrounding the loss of t e diamonds. I was discouraged at the loss as I had planned against revenues generated from the proceeds, however, in light of the confirmed radio broadcast on the loss of diamonds a short distance from where Brig. Issa's hotel was and the fact that the situation on the ground was such that a firm grip had to be taken of the situation and the Brig. Was a very able commander, in fact the most cooperative and effective in implementing military orders and duties, I decided to refer the matter to you on your arrival whilst assigning him to the front-line at a time when the enemy were bent on flushing us out of even our Kailahun base.

During your absence, many contacts were made to sympathizers to promote the image of the movement, details of which will be presented to you in a manner so as not to cause any breach of security. Out of these contacts I was able to get the basic needs and facilitate our military move to Kono and onwards past Machine.
The entire move was under the command of the Late Boston Flamoh (Rambo) and supervised by Brig. Issa. When Rambo captured Makeni, I Convinced Brig. Issa on set to call on Superman to join in operations in-order to ensure that the objectives of the RUF were placed in priority.

As usual Brig. Issa was supportive and I called Superman on set and instructed him to join in the operations. I told Superman that I had forgiven him and that the past was behind us and that we were all brothers in arms. Superman accepted the call and vowed to give his fullest cooperation. To have made this call was not an easy thing for me as Superman had been asked to provide manpower for the Kono - Makeni operations, yet another order that he defied and still I was forced to exercise maturity and instructed Rambo to go and receive Superman and to continue normal operations with him. Rambo willingly complied with the order and went to meet Superman, providing vehicles for all his men. They then returned to Makeni and put the barracks under control.
Whilst the Late Rambo was busy checking captured materials for proper accountability, Superman took the opportunity of diverting captured materials for his own use .
Brig. Issa who had taken supervised the Makeni and had given instructions for the barracks to be put under full Military control whilst he was informed of the fact that Superman had illegally taken materials from the barracks and was in possession of these materials. When approached on the issue, Superman claimed that I, General Mosquito and Brig. Issa were using Rambo against him with the aim of destroying him. Brig. Issa insisted that the materials be handed over as Superman had not only misused large amounts of ammo in his failed attempt to capture Kono but had also refused to give account of materials captured when the Koidu Town ammo dump of ECOMOG was captured.
Superman continued to refuse and Brig. Issa accompanied by Brig. Kallon entered his house and arrested all materials found. He invited Superman to the HQ in Makeni so as to make plans for moving the operation to Lunsar. Superman asked to enter his bedroom to prepare for the move and took that opportunity to escape. Superman later returned and again was allowed to join the operation.

At this point I instructed the Late Rambo to advance to Port Loko whilst Superman was to secure the Freetown highway. Rambo was successful in capturing part of the town and in capturing a large quantity of materials. Superman then suggested that as he knew the terrain well, he should take over that axis and move to capture Lungi. Thinking that he was sincere we agreed and Brig. Issa gave him the opportunity to equip himself from the ammo dump for the mission.
Upon taking over at Port Loko, Superman made no effective move to capture Lungi and also lost the valuable ground of Port Loko.

Meanwhile the troops that entered Freetown had been cut off from the rear and were being encircled leaving them no way out. I was able to coordinate their operations over set and got them to combine their forces and bulldoze from the side accessing them to the mountains through which they took a bye-pass to join our troops at Benguema and Waterloo as JOI was occupied by ECOMOG . This is how the troops that entered Freetown were able to retreat . Still they sustained heavy causalities including Steve Blo, the SLPP Chairman Manakpaka and many others.

On learning that Gibril Massaquoi had been rescued from prison and had joined in the operation, I contacted him 'on set' and gave him advice and encouragement for smooth operations. Another attack of Freetown was planned but was never implemented due to the actions of Gibril, Superman and some other SLA soldiers.
Later, I was to instruct Brig. Issa to get Gibril to report to DHQ for proper briefing as he had been with you in prison and had information as to your condition. I was also of the conviction that Gibril would collaborate with Superman to go against the command that you left on the ground. I instructed Brig. Issa to assure Gibril that all was forgiven and that I held no grudge for him.
Gibril refused to come to my call, saying that he was going to operate with Superman. Superman was asked to enforce the order for Gibril to report but he also was defiant and said that he Superman was not going to make Gibril do what he himself would not do. They went on with words of insult to me and the High Command and said that they were not taking orders from me or Kailahun.
I sent Brig. Issa to the ground to invite Gibril to report to DHQ. On arrival Gibril was invited to report and he complied by entering the vehicle. At this point Superman ordered his men to open fire on Brig. Issa which they did, thus affording Gibril with the opportunity to not only escape but to take up arm against his superior command in the person of Brig. Issa, who was able to escape unhurt. Gibril and Superman went with their men to the home of Brig. Issa and commanded all the materials that had been sent there by me for use in the planned re-attack of Freetown. They vandalized the house, looting all personal properties and government funds amounting to nine thousand U.S. Dollars (9000USD).
The two, together with their men then left and based themselves in Lunsar,with the threat that ant person, including me, that tried to get to them would be killed.
I dispatched a team headed by Colonel Isaac, Major Benda, Lt. Col. Moriba, Major Jackson your bodyguard commander and Lt. Col. Sam Kpulleh, with explicit instructions to go and investigate the issue and ensure that they contain the situation and report back to me at DHQ.
I was later informed that the delegation had not been given an opportunity to investigate and were under serious armed threat by both Gibril and Superman. In time, Lt. Col. Moriba and Lt. Col. Kpulleh returned to DHQ whilst the other three stayed behind and also began to put up acts of insubordination against the High Command.
The enemy had taken this moment of internal turmoil to make advances against our positions at Benguema, Waterloo and Mile 47. The enemy then moved for Gberay Bridge. Again Superman pleaded for the opportunity to move to repel the attack on Gberay Bridge. As enemy pressure was mounting, I gave the go-ahead to for him to take up the said operation. Superman failed to move to Gberay Bridge and instead attacked Makeni late at night with the aim of killing Brig. Issa and Rambo. The home of Rambo was attacked by Superman . The attack caught Rambo off guard as he was fast asleep. He was captured shot many times and it is reported that he was even stabbed to ensure that he did not survive the attack, remarking that he Rambo was the 'Iron Jacket' to me General Mosquito and Brig. Issa and that he would die that night in the hands of Superman.

After killing Rambo, they attacked the home of Brig. Issa, launching a RPG rocket at the house. They opened fire entering the house. Brig. Issa was able to escape through a door from his bedroom leading to the back of the house. He was spotted as he maneuvered towards the bushes and another RPG rocket was launched behind him. The explosion caused a small rock to enter the toe of Brig. Issa and against day-break was able to make his escape to Makali where he dialogued with you on set while you were still in the custody of the SLPP in Freetown.
In that attack, Gibril, Superman and their men killed and wounded many soldiers, both RUF and SLA who were performing various military duties on the ground.

The next morning Superman mobilized an armed force headed by Gibril, to re-attack Brig. Issa at Makali, having been alerted as to his location through his dialogue with the Leader. They also planned to attack Mile 91 with a view of taking command at both grounds. Again Brig. Issa was able to escape and moved to Kono. Gibril chased him as far as Makali, vowing to kill him as he had done Rambo and to display his head in Makeni .
I have as evidence, a video cassette recording of the public display of the Late Rambo's body. The same cassette will help to shed light on the death of Rambo and the conspiracy and action of Gibril and Superman to kill the High Command of the RUF and assume its offices and command.

After Makeni had been captured and raised by Superman and his troops, he called a meeting at the Town Hall and confidently told the people that he was acting in compliance with instructions received from the Leader and that he had taken effective command of the RUF and that I, Major General Sam Bockarie was no longer High Command of the RUF and that he Brig. Superman was taking over from Brig. Issa in Makeni.
Superman went on to accuse me on air of hijacking the Leadership of the RUF, sighting my call for all Signal Stations not to respond to your call, as proof of my betrayal. A charge that I not only deny but take particular offense to.
Superman later went 'on air' proclaiming that he was going to advance to Kono and further still to Kailahun where he would kill me and display my head. He went on to name his assignation list.

To contain the situation I issued materials to Brig. Kallon and instructed him to take command of Magboroka and to use the opportunity to search for Brig. Issa as he was MIA as a result of Superman's' ambush of him immediately after Issa had dialogued with you on air. Kallon took command of Magboroka and was soon under the attack of Superman and Gibril. This time they did not only use RPG's and GMG's but launched mortar bombs and fired Anti-Aircraft Guns against Magboroka. Kallon was however able to repel, only for Superman to re-attack, this time capturing the Town. Three days later Brig. Kallon launched a successful counter-offensive re-capturing Magboroka. Since then the ground has been under our control but has come under a series of attacks by Superman leading to loss of life and injury to numerous soldiers and civilians.

We attacked Makeni twice with a view of re-taking command of the said ground. This because of the strategic location of the Township and the fact that Makeni was under command and control and law and order was in effect when Brig Issa was in command. Civilians moved freely, knowing that their security was paramount. These same civilians were now crying to be rescued. We were in full occupation of the Township when you instructed us to withdraw and await your arrival upon which the issue would be settled. Your order was immediately enforced and troops loyal to the RUF High Command left on the ground by the Leader, were ordered by me to withdraw. The truth is Sir, that at that time the people of Makeni, including the soldiers needed to be rescued. Living conditions were dismal and it is reported that at the time Superman was getting married at a costly ceremony soldiers were suffering and in some cases dying as a result of inadequate drugs.
Till this day Superman and Gibril are contrary to my command and continue to flaunt the direct command of the Leader. They still do not submit all reports to me for my necessary information and action and onward movement to the attention of the Leader. They reserve the mandated line of command only for messages against me or to paint themselves pretty.

When we first retreated from Freetown I contacted the Government of The Ivory Coast and in particular the Foreign Minister, MR Amara Esse . I also contacted the guarantors of the Abidjan Peace Accord to impress on them the fact that our Leader was still illegally being held by the Nigerian Government and that a negotiated settlement was the only way in which peace and security could return to Sierra Leone. I even contacted the Government of Tejan Kabba in Freetown to convince them to release you and to threaten that if they continued to exercise the military option, we the RUF would push for total military victory and would escalate the war to a point beyond imagination. All this talk fell on deaf ears as even the international media refused our calls. With our capture of Kono and the raising of four mechanized battalions of the Nigerian ECOMOG force, our phones began to ring with calls from the worlds' elite press, and the very people who only a few weeks back were ignoring our calls, assuming that we were going to be flushed as Tejan Kabba had vowed, were now virtually begging to talk. I knew that the heat was on Kabba.

Our attack of Freetown put Kabba in a position where he was forced to talk, as I had earlier promised he would. He fled the city as did his Cabinet, the latter with a view of re-grouping in Conakry and launching a counter-offensive as they had done when ousted by the AFRC. On learning that his political strong-men such as Despond Luke and others were in Conakry, I obtained their various hotel-room numbers and systematically called each on the telephone claiming that I was also in Conakry with a squad of my best commandos and that we were on our way to the hotel. Within fifteen minutes of my first call the hotel had been sealed off by Guinean security forces, with tanks and armored-cars on every intersection. Desmond Luke and party beat a hasty retreat to secret 'safe-houses' and all boarded flights for different destinations the next day. This brought to a screeching halt the SLPP political stance during our Freetown attack and occupation.
We now had the edge over Kabba and his Government and asked for talks to take place under the auspices of the OAU Chairman , President Blais Cainpore. This on the grounds that it was in effect ECOWAS that had been fighting us and thus no troop contributing Member State could impartially host such talks. This basic premise for moving us to the table was eagerly accepted by MR Francis Okello , MR Moses Anafu of the Commonwealth Secretariat and even the Government of President Kabba.
After the initial joy of hearing your voice on set for the first time in a long time, military instincts alerted me that you were under duress and that slowly the Kabba Government would use you to diffuse the explosive state of affairs and move us from our position of strength and seek to move the Talks from our neutral ground of choice.
In my opinion this would not only cause us to loose our military edge but would have put your life in danger.
In view of this, I took the painful but necessary step of instructing all Signal Stations to monitor but not to respond to 'on air' calls from the Leader explaining to all the reasons for such an order.
In due cause, as a result of violations of this same order, the talks were moved from Bokina Fasso to Lome.

THE MILITARY FRONT

On the Military Front, the ground has not only remained intact but huge gains were made against the enemy.
As mentioned earlier in my report, four mechanized battalions of the Nigerian Army were raised at Kono resulting in the capture of a wide assortment of arms and ammunition as well as armored cars. War- tanks were also captured and burnt.

We successfully took the war from Kailahun to Freetown, putting military pressure on the SLPP Government and the International Community to effect your release.
Huge amounts of arms and ammunitions were also captured by Brigadier Issa from the Guineans including a 40 Barrel Missile and its bombs. The overall G-4 Commander is in place to report on all materials captured and on stock at hand.

Within the Military Structure of the RUF , promotions were encouraged as the only due reward for Military accomplishments.

There was widespread recruiting and training of combatants to provide a beefed-up fighting force.

The Medical unit has been enhanced with regular supply of drugs and dressing materials and the infusion of new talent has resulted in an efficient unit that now handles complex gynecological cases and performs Hernia and Appendix operations to both soldiers and civilians.

A Tanks and Armored Division has been established within the Artillery Unit to utilize captured equipment from the enemy.

Daru Barracks remains under siege with Iron-Gate defensives on all approaches to the Township.

NOTE See appendix 1 for Military Structure.

THE POLITICAL FRONT

Our move to capture Kono earned marked gains for the RUF in the political front. The International Press was effectively used to educate the world as to the aims and objectives of the RUF.

The Government of Tejan Kabba was forced to negotiate with us, a move they had consistently refused to make, vowing instead to execute the Leader and flush the RUF out of Sierra Leone.

The UN and other International Organizations were also forced to talk to us.

After much Military pressure from us and diplomatic pressure from the on-looking world, the Leader was released to Togo where along with a delegation from within the RUF on the ground in Sierre Leone a Peace Agreement was reached between the RUF and the SLPP Government.

CIVILIANS AND NON-MILITARY ISSUES 00009670

Knowing the love and respect that the Leader has for civilians, I have ensured that the status of civilians and in particular civilians behind RUF Lines has never been compromised.
They are still represented on the War Council and continue to enjoy full rights and privileges .
A Free Primary School System was launched in the Kailahun District to address the educational needs of our children. This program has been a huge success and has spread to other Districts.
The RUF and civilians behind its Lines have maintained a program of self-sufficiency and have recorded the highest production ever of rice, palm-oil and produce.

Proceeds from the sale of Agricultural Produce was used to provide much needed rations and materials for soldiers and civilians alike.
With the diamond rich ground of Kono under our control a mining unit was setup headed by Lt. Col. Kennedy who is in place to give account of all proceeds from mining operations.

Sir, I most respectfully ask you to look into the numerous complaints of both Gibril and Superman. From the execution of Vanguards in Pujehun to the killing of the bodyguards of Colonel Mohamed Tarawallie, on to the killing of Colonel Boston Flomoh (Rambo), this terrible duo have reeked havoc on the RUF. They continue to flaunt my orders and have extended the same acts of gross insubordination to the Leader.
I hasten to remind you Sir that whilst I along with Brig Issa and other loyal forces have always obeyed your orders to the letter, this duo have rejected your orders and challenged the authority of the Leader and his Military High Command.
The actions of Gibril and Superman has gone great lengths to worsen the relationship between the RUF and the SLA by the indiscriminate killing of SLA soldiers during their attacks on the RUF High Command and in their bids to capture ground, and by inciting SLA soldiers against my command. The setbacks resulting in the actions of this duo are magnanimous and have far reaching consequences.
I must also mention Sir, that all troops loyal to the Leader and the High Command of the RUF are in full readiness to take Military action against Gibril and Superman and have only halted their action to await your arrival and handling of this situation.
Sir, having obeyed all instructions given by you to me and after dillgently working to maintain the ground at all cost , I will not be pacified unless just and appropriate military action is taken by you. I along with a vast majority of our troops have borne the brunt of abuse and molestation, sabotage and cold-blooded murder, all in an effort to maintain the ground as per your instructions. Now that you are back and in full control of the RUF we anxiously await a speedy resolution of this problem.

Most Respectfully yours,

MAJOR GENERAL SAM BOCKARIE.

REVOLUTIONARY UNITED FRONT OF SIERRA LEONE

DEFENCE HEADQUARTERS

27TH SEPTEMBER 1999

TO: THE LEADER OF THE REVOLUTION

FROM: BRIGADIER ISSA H SESAY
BATTLEFIELD COMMANDER RUF S/L

SUBJECT: SALUTE REPORT

Sir,

After working on the Draft document of the Abidjan Peace Accord, you returned behind RUF Lines to consult with the Military High Command and all combatants on the Accord and its implications. While in the Kailahun District, we received reports that Colonel Mohamed Tarawallie had been destabilized by Kamajohs and SLA troops at your former base of Camp ZOGODA.
On hearing this news , I and other senior officers convoyed from Gaima to Buedu with the leader.
The next-day ,before returning to Abidjan to conclude documentation and signing of the Accord, you instructed that General Sam Bockarie (Mosquito) take over as Battle Group Commander of the RUF.

From Abidjan, the Leader instructed that men should be sent across the Moa River to receive those of our troops who were fortunate enough to have successfully retreated from ZOGODA and to actively go in search of Colonel Mohamed Tarawallie. The [illegible] implemented in full and though we were able to [illegible] soldiers and civilians that had retreated from ZOGO[illegible] were unable to locate Colonel Tarawallie.

From Abidjan, we received further instruc[illegible] General Mosquito was to take effective command on the ground in your absence and to assume the assignment of Battle Field Commander, RUF S/L.

I was to assume the duties and responsibilities of Battle Group Commander and together we were to work to maintain the ground, by any means necessary.

General Mosquito was able to make positive contact with ULIMO and make all necessary arrangements to buy materials from them. The money that you had left with us on the ground (7000USD) was utilized to buy materials from ULIMO and with these materials, we were able to resist enemy advances in the Kailahun District.

It became obvious to us on the ground that the Abidjan Accord was nothing but paper, as the Kamajohs were being used against us with vicious attacks on our positions.
It was not long before we heard that the Leader had been arrested in Nigeria, and as we were trying to understand the circumstances of your arrest and implications to the RUF, we learnt that Phillip Palmer, Faia Musa and other members of the External Delegation were now claiming leadership of the RUF.

General Mosquito contacted Palmer telling him that since this was the action that they had taken, it was necessary for them to come back behind our Lines and brief the Military High Command and combatants accordingly. Palmer and others eventually agreed to meet us at the Nongowa Crossing Point. There, amidst drumming and dancing to receive them, the General was able to persuade all of the Coup-plotters, including the Sierra Leone Ambassador to Guinea, Lt. Col. Djabi to cross-over into RUF zone. They were promptly arrested and their statements revealed an international conspiracy, to which they were party, aimed at changing the leadership of the RUF. They have since been in custody until your recent instruction to release them.

Soon after, we received information that Superman, who was operating as Battalion Commander for the Western Area Jungle, had arrested the bodyguards of Colonel Tarawallie and had executed two of them, namely Emanuelle and Victor without consulting with and obtaining such instructions from the Military High Command left on the ground by the Leader.
An investigation was launched and before action could be taken against Superman, the SLPP Government was overthrown by the AFRC on the 25th of May 1997.
A few days later General Mosquito was instructed to move and join our SLA brothers in Freetown,

In accordance with the Leaders instructions, General Mosquito postponed action against Superman and instructed him to lead the advance team from Bradford to Freetown, whilst Colonel Isaac and Brigadier Kallon were to move to join the SLA Forces in Makeni. After ensuring that the security of the High Command was paramount, the General and I moved to Freetown.

Once in place in Freetown we assessed the security situation and deployed our troops in all strategic areas of the Capital and indeed the entire country. In accordance with the instructions of the Leader we took all instructions from Chairman J P Koroma and maintained the same sense of discipline and loyalty that we had developed growing within the ranks of the RUF.

Lt. Col. Gibril Massaquoi arrived in Freetown from Nigeria where he had been under detention with the Leader. He briefed us informally that he had been arrested together with the Leader but that he had escaped, all with the knowledge and consent of the Leader. A few days later Gigril would present a document to Chairman J P Koroma that he, Gibril alleges, was given to him by the Leader.
In the document, it was instructed that no member of the RUF was to accept any Ministerial position or participate in politics in any way. It also endorsed the promotion of Gibril to the rank of a full colonel .
These events were reported to General Mosquito as he had not been in Freetown when Gibril arrived.

On the arrival of Steve Bio in Freetown, he became very closely associated with Lt. Col. Gibril and both seamed to be on their own agenda.

I left Freetown for Kenema in-order to distribute rations and morale boosters to the troops, as well as to organize the various deployments. Whilst waiting for my Jeep to be repaired, a vehicle pulled-up with Steve Bio and Lt. Col. Gibril within.
Gibril greeted me and introduced Steve Bio to me. Though I knew Steve from a brief meeting in Abidjan at the signing of the Peace Accord, I had never really talked to him or knew much about him.
They then began to discuss the AFRC and complained about the way in which the RUF was being marginalised and treated with disrespect. We were in a public place and I advised that such talk from them was not to be done around civilians. On this advise, we, including Major Eddie Bockarie (who was with me) walked to a point out of the earshot of others. Gibril went on to say that our meeting was not a coincidence and that they had searched the entire town for me as they had an important issue on which they had to brief me. Mr. Bio then stated that he had come with a special mission and was seeking my support in launching a coup. I listened as both he and Gibril went into details of the numerous grievances held against the AFRC. He said that the AFRC had refused to share power with us and had even marginalised us in the military. I told them that the instructions that we had received from the Leader called on us to join and take all orders from Chairman J P Koroma. Steve Bio responded saying that I should disregard all that as we were all young men and that this was an operation that was necessary for the four of us, Gibril, Steve, General Mosquito and myself to undertake and assume command of the Government and State. I asked them if they had already discussed this with General Mosquito as they had just left him in Freetown. Gibril replied that they had left the General in Freetown but that he was afraid of General Mosquito and could not summon the courage to approach him on such an issue. In fact it was this very reason that had made it necessary for them to search for me in Kenema. Knowing that if I could be convinced, they were close to getting General Mosquito's support.

The two of them left Kenema that night for Bo. At around 0400HRS the following morning General Mosquito arrived in Kenema. I immediately informed him of my previous day's discussions with Gibril and Steve Bio. I told the General that they were asking us to overthrow the very Government that the Leader had instructed us to join and secure. I told General Mosquito that since that dialogue I had been thinking of a secure way of informing him and was very relieved that he was in Kenema. The General was shocked to hear this and in turn informed me that he had been called to the State House in Freetown where he was informed by Chairman J P Koroma that some members of the RUF were planning a coup together with other SLA officers. The General informed me further that he had been given the instructions to investigate the situation and report back to him. That day I moved to Bo and Gibril and Steve joined my convoy to Freetown. On arrival in Freetown I asked them in the presence of Brig. Mike Lamin, Col. Isaac and other security personnel to repeat their statements made to me in Kenema. They repeated the same statements and they were detained and turned over to Army Headquarters at Cockerill.

On new- years- eve, I left home in search of a pharmacy that was still open for business as I was in poor health. I met the Late. Honorable Gborie who informed me that he had chairs for me and had been trying to get a hold of me for two days. I thanked him sincerely and accepted his gift. Despite all the allegations and testimonies against the character of this man, I say with no hesitation that he welcomed the RUF with all his heart. On numerous occasions he would provide rations and boosters to our troops and every RUF problem was his problem. I accepted his gift in good faith only to be notified on SLBS Radio the following day that I had looted the Iranian Embassy and as a result , I had been removed from the Supreme Council and that my arrest had been ordered.

Knowing that while we the RUF were securing the Government of the AFRC, they were killing our soldiers with no action being taken and that the RUF High Command had been targeted for elimination, and knowing that I was innocent and the measures taken against me, extreme, I refused arrest and maintained the integrity of the High Command of the RUF.

In general, we were not trusted or respected by the AFRC even though they had called on us to join them. Our troops were the only ones committed to their assignments whilst the AFRC High Command rejected our war plans and strategies referring to us as 'blood-thirsty, bush-colonels'.

It became apparent to us in Freetown, that Lt. Col. Gibril had leaked information to the AFRC pertaining to Military Equipment belonging to the RUF that the Leader had kept in a safe place. Before we could confront Gibril and arrest the situation, he and the AFRC had arranged for the equipment to be delivered to them. They took delivery of the equipment without the concern or consent of the RUF High Command and stored the equipment where we had no say or access to it. When we retreated from Freetown a large quantity of the said equipment was left in storage at the residence of Chairman J P Koroma.

Due to the lack of command and control, shortage of issued materials to our front-line troops and the total lack of support of the SLA soldiers, the enemy were able to move us from Freetown and ousted the AFRC Government.
I retreated first to Waterloo and then to Masiaka . By then, the ECOMOG Force had taken Bo and Kenema and it was agreed that I should attack Bo and begin to organize to move to attack Freetown. I was successful in capturing Bo but sustained an injury that forced me to retreat back to Mile 91 and then to Makeni in search of good medical treatment.
Whilst in Makeni, I went to visit J P Koroma who was in hiding in his village. J P Koroma asked me to arrange and supervise the movement of his entire family to Kailahun as ECOMOG were advancing and the Clandestine Radio 98.1 FM, had accounted that he was in hiding in his village.

I contacted General Mosquito and the order was given to escort the Former Head of State to our Kailahun base.
First, we had to open the road to Kono. This was done in conjunction with Superman and Brig. Mike Lamin. Having put Kono under our Control ,we attacked Gandohun with the intention of opening the road from Koidu-Geya to Sandialu but failed in our attempts. We were then ordered by General Mosquito to enter the Jungle and use the cover of the Jungle to secure J P Koroma and his family to the banks of the Moa River. Across the Moa, General Mosquito had sent vehicles ahead of us and we all reported to Buedu.
All hospitalities were extended to J P Koroma and his family and General turned over his bedroom to J P Koroma and his wife.

J P Koroma appointed General Mosquito as Chief of Defence Staff, with overall command over both the RUF and the SLA and promoted him to the rank of Brigadier General. General Mosquito called on me and informed me that since he had been made Chief of Defence Staff for both the RUF and the SLA by J P Koroma he wanted to turn over his assignment of Battle Field Commander to me and asked me to turn my assignment of Battle Group Commander over to Superman. The General said that he was doing this to draw Superman within the High Command structure of the RUF in a bid to encourage him. I accepted and assumed the assignment of Battle Field Commander and Superman assumed the assignment of Battle Group Commander.

One morning, the Chief Security Officer to the former AFRC Chairman J P Koroma informed me that his boss was planing to escape to Ghana along with his entire family. The CSO further told me that J P Koroma had a parcel of diamonds that he was planning on selling once out of the country.
This information came as a surprise to me and found it hard to believe that at a time when we were trying to put the fighting-men under command and control and provide the necessary logistics to halt our retreat and move forward, J P Koroma would keep diamonds for his own use and flee, leaving us with a problem that he had created.
Accompanied by Brig Mike Lamin and the CSO to J P Koroma I asked the latter to present the diamonds for the use of the Revolution. He complied and the matter was settled.

While in Buedu, Captain Michael Comber of the Mining Unit reported with a parcel of diamonds from Kono.
The parcel was placed in my care by General Mosquito with the instructions to move with it to a transit point where I would be met by General Ibrahim and together we were to travel to a business associate of the Leader for arrangements and procurement of Military Equipment.

I arrived at the transit point and booked into a hotel.
On the evening of my third day at the hotel, Colonel Jungle and I went across the street to a tea-shop. Whilst there, it started to rain and Jungle and I ran from the shop across the street to the hotel. As we climbed the steps to enter, I touched my pockets, as I had gotten accustomed to doing since the parcel was put in my care.
To my shock and dismay, my pockets were empty. I screamed and put my hands on my head and cried. Jungle and I then retraced our steps from the tea-shop to the hotel. We searched in the rain on our hands and knees. Staff from the hotel helped us in our search, all to no avail. For the first time in my life I contemplated suicide. I above all knew the importance attached to the materials that the diamonds were to facilitate for the movement. How could I ever look my commander in the eyes and tell him that I Issa, who could be trusted with the security of the Nation, could not secure a small parcel of diamonds. As the days went by, I grew frustrated and could not eat or sleep.
Four days after the loss, Jungle and I were sitting on his bed when we monitored National Radio announcing that diamonds had been discovered on the very same street that I had suffered my loss.
Jungle and I cried knowing that the mentioned diamonds were the property of the RUF. Till this day, people still prospect this area thinking that diamonds are underground.
General Mosquito dispatched Lt. Col. Moriba to meet me and escort me back to DHQ.
On arrival, I was met by an enraged General Mosquito who angrily chastised me for the loss. I was ordered to ' fall-out ' and for over a week, the General would not talk to me or even respond to my curtsies.
Finally one morning, I was summoned by the General and instructed that I should leave Buedu and make my base at Pendembu from where I was to coordinate all Front-Line Operations.
I complied with his order and stepped-up operations against the enemy at Daru. I also launched successful Jungle Missions to Joru and Niama.

General Mosquito left on a trip to secure materials for the Movement and on his return I was issued a liberal quantity of ammunition and instructed to cross the Moa River and re-capture Kono from the enemy. Prior to this, the same instructions had been given to Superman who misused the materials given to him and failed to capture the target.

On arrival in Kono I called the Brigade Commander, Rambo and other senior officers and together we arranged a forum in which general security issues were discussed and a war-plan was made for the attack of Koindu Town.

I instructed Brig. Kallon to move to Gold Town and 'cut-off' the enemy. I led the troops in the attack of Koidu Town, attacking the enemy at 0600HRS. They put up a strong resistance using their four Mechanized Battalions deployed to defend Kono and its diamonds. Our troops proved too aggressive for them and after fourteen hours of heated combat we captured Koindu Town. The Nigerians retreated to Bumpe. Very early the next morning we attacked their positions at Bumpe and raised them from the town. The enemy were forced to retreat through the road leading to Massingbi where they fell in Kallons ambush. All in all. The enemy lost four war-tanks, armored cars, and a multitude of heavy artillery pieces personal rifles and huge amounts of ammunition. They also suffered heavy casualties the likes of which they have never experienced in the history of ECOMOG. They were forced to retreat on foot with not even a bicycle being able to pass our defenses.

Our Forces moved for Massingbi, Rambo and Kallon moving with the advance team whilst I moved to repel a Kamajoh Attack at Nimikoro. Our forces had by then captured Massingbi and Magborolka and were advancing to attack Makeni.
I joined them, taking with me all needed Military Materials for the attack. We quickly put the Township under our Military Control.
General Mosquito called me 'on set' and instructed that we allow Superman to join in the operations. The General explained that though Superman had earlier refused his orders, he Mosquito was man enough to put it behind him and accept Superman back, referring to him as ' a brother in arms.'
Rambo proceeded to a village beyond Binkolo where Superman had been in hiding and brought him to Makeni.
That morning the two of us met and had polite discussions.
Together we attacked the Barracks and captured it .
At that point, I received information that the enemy were moving to attack Ijiama-Swafe and I moved to put the situation under control.
Upon my return to Makeni, Rambo and Kallon reported that all Military Equipment in their care had been reported to the G-4. They reported that Superman on the other hand had taken the Materials he collected to his house. Accompanied by Kallon, I went to Superman's house and confronted him with the issue. I informed, him that it was proper procedure to report all captured Military Materials to the G-4 who would then file a comprehensive report to DHQ and issue the said Materials upon instructions. I asked that Superman present the Materials so as to ensure proper accountability. Superman led Kallon and I into the house and showed us where he had kept the Materials. I instructed that it be moved and reported to the G-4.

Two days later General Mosquito again asked for understanding and allowed Superman to rejoin the operations.

* Rambo was instructed to advance and attack Port Loko which he did, deploying his forward defensive at the Port Loko turn-table, leading to Kambia. Rambo shared the town with the enemy for seven days.
Superman, pleaded that eventhough Rambo had done well, he as Battle Group Commander knew the ground well and should take over the ground . He said that he had received Intelligence that the Leader had been moved to Lungi and wanted to advance as far as Lungi and rescue the Leader.

* At this time our forces Freetown were under enemy ' cut-off ' from the rear and were in danger of being boxed-in and either captured alive or killed.
Rambo was withdrawn from his operation in Port Loko and instructed to open a through- way to connect with our men in Freetown.
Rambo then attacked and captured Masiaka, advanced and captured RDF, and attacked the Guineans at Waterloo, engaging them in combat for four days and four nights.
* The Guineans wrote us a letter asking for their safe passage back to Guinea, saying that they were taking their hands out of the war.
I replied, denying their request. I told them that if they wanted ' safe passage ' they should leave behind all their Military Equipment.
A few days later I monitored the sound of heavy bombardment from the direction of Port Loko. On inquiring, I was informed that our troops had dissolved the ground and that the enemy were advancing towards Gberay Junction. I asked for Superman and was informed that he was in Lunsar and not on the ground that he had asked for and been given.
The Guinean convoy bulldozed all the way to Masiaka where my position was also bulldozed. Their mission was to rescue the Guineans at Waterloo. Upon reaching Waterloo they joined forces and made a 'U-turn', bulldozing my ambush for a second time at RDF. The Guinean convoy consisted of over four war-tanks, eight armored vehicles, a Forty Barrel Missile , four Anti-Aircraft Guns and countless other mounted weapons and over eight trucks full of personnel. As they moved they bombarded and assaulted, clearing a path for themselves.

I was extremely annoyed at my position being bulldozed and issued strong orders for an ambush to be set ahead of them. They fell in the ambush and my Bodyguard commander led a team of less than a squad of men in the capture of the Forty Barrel Missile and a large quantity of its bombs.

I moved to Escort the Missile to our rear and on my return, Superman asked to join Rambo at Waterloo. He sighted the fact that as the SLA Commanders had operated with him before he would be able to consolidate them and exercise command and control over them . Taking into consideration his status as Battle Group and the logic behind his explanations, I gave the OK for Superman to join Rambo in Waterloo.
At Waterloo Superman incited SLA Commanders and soldiers against Rambo and generally did his best to cause a break-down in command on the ground.

A few days later` General Mosquito on hearing that Lt. Col. Gibril had been rescued and had joined operations at Waterloo, called me and asked me to inform Gibril that he was welcome back and that no ill-feelings were borne against him. Gibril was to also report to DHQ to brief the High Command and all on the condition of the Leader as they had been in prison together.
Superman , monitoring the dialogue on field-radio responded that He would not allow Gibril to come to the call of the High Command.
A few days later, I received information from the Waterloo Front-Line that Superman and Gibril had retreated to Lunsar and had moved with a good number of men. As a result, the enemy had advanced and were now at Yams Farm.
I informed Rambo who was at my location on a Medical Pass .
Rambo asked for ammunition to be given to him so that he could collect the Force from Lunsar and move to stop the enemy advance at Yams Farm. I arrived at Lunsar with only eight bodyguards and met Rambo and Gibril discussing. Gibril greeted me and we exchanged pleasantries. I told him that General Mosquito wanted him to report to DHQ not to face any charges but to give account of the state and condition of the Leader as they had been in prison together. Gibril complied and entered my vehicle. At that moment, Superman and his men came from the back of the building, opened suppressive fire and launched RPG rockets against my position. Gibril left my vehicle and joined Superman in attacking me. I managed to escape with my life but they had killed two RUF soldiers assigned to me as bodyguards.
I got in a vehicle with Major Kolo Mulba and escaped through Gberay Junction, Masiaka, Mile 91 to Magboroka.

Meanwhile, Superman and Gibril moved to Makeni and attacked my residence. They shot at my house, tied and beat up RUF soldiers and raised my compound. They entered my house, beating up my wife, undressing her and taunting her with rude and abusive remarks before she was able to escape under gun-fire.
Mr. E T Samara and others rescued from prison in Freetown, were staying with me in Makeni and were also molested and raised. RUF Military Materials given to me by the General for a planned re-attack of Freetown were looted along with 9,000 USD also RUF property.
That same day Superman and Gibril attacked the home of Brig. Kallon. The entire house was raised and his wife was stripped off all her clothing and made to sit on the ground. Her suckling- child was snatched from her and repeatedly banged against a wall. This resulted in serious injuries to the child.

I reported the incident to General Mosquito who asked me to exercise restraint and he dispatched a Delegation headed by Col. Isaac to calm the situation down and investigate the incident. The Delegation obtained statements from me and proceeded to Lunsar to get a statement from my attackers. Superman and Gibril refused to co-operate and issued threats against the Delegates.

During this impasse the enemy had advanced to Gberay Junction. General Mosquito instructed that in the interest of the Revolution, we should put our differences aside temporarily and act to repel the enemy. Along with Kallon, Rambo and Brig. Isaac, four trucks of armed men were mobilized and we joined the Force at Lunsar and moved for Gberay Junction. Four of Rambo's men were killed in that attack by ' friendly fire ' from the rear suggesting foul-play.

Again the enemy moved against our positions advancing towards Mile 91. I sent Rambo, equipping him with a Single Barrel BZT. He met and joined Col. Bai Bureh and they were able to push the enemy past Moyamba Junction to Tiama Junction where they deployed our troops.
Rambo proposed an attack of BO and it was arranged that Kallon would hit Yele.
Kallon was dispatched to DIIQ to receive logistics for the said mission. Two days later I made a day's trip to Matotoka as the area was under Kamajoh threat. On returning to Makeni, Rambo visited me to inform me that he had repaired the BZT Weapon and wanted to move to capture Bo the next morning. He left my house at around 2100HRS and I stayed up past mid-night. I stayed awake and at 0110HRS I heard heavy firing from outside. I entered my ' living-room ' and my bodyguards were running from the direction of the firing. Some of them had been shot. I exited the house through a back entrance and ran for cover. A RPG rocket was launched against me and I was hit in the toe by fragment from the blast. I ran as guns blazed behind me. I got to a safe place and spent the night. The next morning with the aid of civilians, I escaped to Makali. The hunt was on for me and I had to bye-pass major towns on my way. At Makali I was at the Signal Station monitoring the Network when the Leader called. I responded and reported that I was faced with a serious problem. Not wanting to let the enemy know that there was serious in-fighting going on within the RUF, I could not go into details. At the end of my dialogue with the Leader I was attacked again by Gibril. They took me by surprise as I had been very careful not to disclose my location. The people of Makali, including the Paramount Chief Pa Alimamy Kanu, will testify that Gibril led the attack. He raised the town shooting and wounding people on the ground. He swore that he would kill me and take my head to Makeni where he would put it on display.

Away from my ground at Makeni, Superman took the opportunity of calling a meeting at the Town Hall where he informed those assembled that General Mosquito and I had collaborated to hijack the leadership of the RUF and sighted the Generals advise not to respond to the call of the Leader on field-radio as proof. He informed the meeting that he had received instructions from the Leader to take full command of the RUF and to arrest and execute both General Mosquito and I, Brig. Issa.

By then I had maneuvered to Kono, after spending five days in the bush as a result of the attack on me in Makali.
Kallon moved to Magboroka to take command and was able to repel numerous attacks from Superman and Gibril.

Upon receiving instructions from the Leader, through the General, calling for Kallon to take command at Makeni. I mobilized Kallon and the said operation was undertaken. We were allmost in control of the entire Township when the General informed us that that the Leader wanted us to abort the operation and for Kallon to return to Makeni.
A Military Order was passed and we withdrew the force to await the arrival of the Leader on the ground.

Sir, if my Report is centered on the activities of Superman and Gibril it is not so merely because of their attacks on me but rather because of the negative results their ' out-law ' actions have brought to the Movement.

Superman sought the advise of ULIMO General Boplch and SLA Brig. Mannie. Both strong critics and self-confessed enemies of the RUF. Superman placed Former President J S Momoh in the hands of Mannie who arranged for Momoh to escape to Guinea. Mannie refused to hand Momoh over to me stating that Momoh is SLA property and not RUF.
He incited SLA soldiers to go against RUF Command and together with Gibril sought to sabotage the progress of the movement thus delaying the release of the Leader.
Superman killed Rambo in cold blood and made several attempts on my life in a bid to eliminate the RUF High Command left on the ground by the Leader.

Sir, it has not been easy controlling my emotions and harder still controlling the men who witnessed the cold-blooded killing of Rambo.
General Mosquito, I Brig. Issa and other senior officers have obediently taken all orders from you and at this time we await most anxiously your arrival when we look to have the matter resolved by you.

Lastly Sir, the vast majority of the men are in ' high spirit ' and remain loyal to the Leadership of the RUF. They have fought hard and longed for the return of the Leader.
As Battle Field Commander I pledge my loyalty to the Leader and ask that he moves earliest, to look into the internal-affairs of the RUF.
The High Command, officers, combatants and civilians of the RUF are on the ground and on full-alert awaiting the ' last-order ' of the Commander In Chief of the RUF S/L, Corporal Foday Saybana Sankoh.

Militarily Yours,

Brigadier Issa H Sesay

Sub: Brief comprehensive report on all salient activities that took place in the absence of the leader from the 24th. March, 1996 to the 31st, August, 1999.

The leader, Cpl. Foday Saybana Sankoh left Zogoda on the 24th. March, 1996 for the Abidjan (Ivory Coast) Peace Talk. Brigadier Moris now Kallon now, took over command at Zogoda in the absence of Lt. Col. Mohamed Tarawally. Seventy-two hours later, Lt. Col. Mohamed Tarawally arrived and took over command from Co. Moris Kallon as instructed by the leader before he left for Abidjan.

Lt. Col. Mohamed Tarawally started fine but later he was wrongly advised by his bodyguards and late Capt. Daniel Wankeh (Rambo, who was bodyguards commander to the leader). For instance, all kinds of civilians and standbys were now entering in and going out of Zogoda without proper security. The Camp Lion Training Base became a ground of revenge rather than for ideology. Lt. Titesu, Pujehun District I.D.U. Commander was killed in Balaka at the Camp Lion Training Base sometimes in July, 1996. All those who were involved including Major Junior Vandi, Major Muyepeh, late Capt. Cobra, etc. were all demoted and removed from the training base to other areas of assignments. The lethergic or delaying attitude of Lt. Col. Mohamed Tarawally in responding to instructions sent by the leader made the Kamajors to over-run our positions from the end of 1996 to early 1997.

While the peace talk was going on in Abidjan in 1996, Kamajors together with soldiers loyal to Tejan Kabba continued to attack our positions with flimsy excuses that they were returning to their villages, defend and harvest their agricultural produce. The instruction given to Lt. Col. Mohamed Tarawally by the leader to evacuate Zogoda and send some people to Pujehun and the rest to Kailahun was delayed until the enemies over-ran Koribondo Jungle, Bandawor, Zogoda, Kenema by-pass, Across Moa, etc. A good number of both civilians and soldiers including good brothers like Capt. Augustine Koroma, Capt. Papa, Capt. Long By-pass, Lt. Shalelow, Lt. A.B. Dundas, etc. died in this incident. All our positions were over-run by the enemies with the exception of the Kailahun axis, Western jungle, Peyama axis and Pujehun axis. Later on, Pujehun axis fell to the enemies. This was as a result of the lack of materials and disunity between the very citizens of this area - both civilians and soldiers. Thanks be to God and Major-General Sam Bockarie, because when he observed the cruel determination of the enemies to massacre us, he instructed that Peyama jungle must be dissolved. This was done, as everybody crossed over to Burkina to put effort together to defend the original land of the RUF/SL rebels in Sierra Leone. At this Juncture, the RUF/SL could only boast of the Western jungle and the Kailahun axis. A very big praise to Brigadier Denis Mingo and others who upheld this jungle upto the time the AFRC took over on the 25th. May, 1997.

Again, a very big thank you and praise to Major-General Sam Bockarie, Brigadier I. H. Sesay, Brigadier Peter B. Vandi, other devoted soldiers and civilians. If it were not the co-operation of these mentioned people under the commandership of Major-General Sam Bockarie, the enemies would have finally flushed us out of Sierra Leone. This was the time Capt. Palmer, Fayia Musa, Deen-Jalloh and Dr. Barrie had told the SLPP government alot about the RUF/SL They disclosed to the government that we are lack of ammunition, that we depend on the arms and ammunition we capture from the enemies. So they advised the Tejan Kabba government to concentrate on Kamajors wit with single barrels, knives and sticks to fight us, thinking that when we are suppressed, we would have accepted their government and betrayed the RUF/SL. Thanks to the Lord Almighty, with the help of Major-General Sam Bockarie, Brigadier I.H.Sesay and Brigadier Peter B. Vandi, these betrayers (coup plotters) were rounded up at the Sierra Leone-Guinea border somewhere around Koindu. tha The information previously given to the enemies about the RUF/SL by these coup plotters triggered the enemies to suppress us in Ngiema axis attacking our positions including Ngiema HQ. twice or thrice every week. They used single-barrels, sticks and knives with limited automatic rifles to fight us, and hence we captured nothing from them anytime they were ki killed or pushed back. Major-General Sam Bockarie who was gifted by God worked very hard to save the movement. He sacrificed his life, went to Foya, contacted the Liberian soldiers and established strong relationship between the RUF/SL and the Liberian soldiers. Devoted soldiers and civilians freely offered cocoa beans, coffee beans, pistols, single-barrels, X-Bass tape, presentable dressings, etc. to the movement to be exchanged for ammunition. This ammunition was what we used to fight the enemies and with-held the Burkina axis until the AFRC took over the reigns of government of Sierra Leone from Tejan Kabba on May 25th. 1997 (Sunday) and called upon the RUF/SL.

We joined the brothers on May 29th., 1997. The following key positions were offered to the RUF/SL. Vice president - Pa Foday Sankoh, Minister of Trade and Industry - Major Eldred Collins, Minister of agriculture and Forestry - Mr. A.A. Vandi, Minister of Energy and Power - Major Lawrence Moriandia, Minister of Lands and Mines - Mr. S.Y.B. Rogers, deputy Minister of Education - Major P.S. Beinda and deputy Minister of Lands and Mines - Brigadier Peter B. Vandi. Very minimal positions in the army were offered to the RUF/SL. Lt. Col. Johnny Paul Koroma was wrongly advised by prominent military men who were Kamajors and Tejan Kabba supporters. The RUF/SL was treated with infinitesimal dignity. Most advise given by our own authorities by them were not adhered to. Little attention was paid to security information from the RUF/SL securities. Recommendations were never attended to. On the whole, the brothers had no confidence in us. However, we accepted everything in good faith because we were instructed by our leader to take all orders and instructions from Lt. Col. Johnny Paul Koroma. This enabled the Tejan Kabba government supported by the Nigerian led ECOMOG and the Sandline International from Britain to overthrow the AFRC government in February, 1998. Tejan was to come together with the RUF/SL leader to Freetown on April 22nd. 1998 to regain presidency but the enemies did not wait for this time. The Nigerian led ECOMOG with British mercenaries attacked freetown in February 1998 and this extended to all the provinces and towns. Two displeasing incidents that took place while the we were in Freetown included the alleged misusing of nine million leones (le.9,000,000) by Brigadier Superman and the used of about forty-five million leones (le.45,000,000) on marriage ceremony by Major Eldred Collins.

Considering our military strength and the pressure that was put on us by the Nigerian led ECOMOG, we withdrew into the bush(parts of Kailahun and Kono districts) to re-organise ourselves and regain strength. We still continue to thank and praise Major-General Sam Bockarie, Brigadier I.H.Sesay, late Col. Boston Flomo(Rambo), Brigadier Superman, Brigadier Moris Kallon, Brigadier Peter B. Vandi and many others who stood firm and made sure that the enemies did not overcome us. The rampant promotion of soldiers served as incentives that motivated the combatants to double-up their efforts. The consultation, co-ordination and co-operation amongst senior officers and other ranks brought about the recapture of Joru jungle, Kono, Makeni, Magbeuraka, Segbwema, Tongo Field, Western Jungle, Freetown and many other places from the end of 1998 to early 1999. This drew the attention of the Western and Tejan Kabba to call for cease-fire, see the RUF/SL rebel leader and sign the Lome Peace Accord, will lead to every lasting peace in this country as we can see for ourselves now.

During our withw withdrawal into the bush, security divulged that some former SLA soldiers were in possession of diamonds and foreign currencies which they wanted to use only to satisfy their personal needs. Some of them even wanted to escape with these wealth and left us struggling. Infact a good number of them with or without wealth escaped to Liberia and Guinea. Since in RUF/SL diamonds and foreign currencies are government properties, authorities decided to collect diamonds and foreign currencies in possession of individuals so that they could be used in the interest of the movement with priority to arms and ammunition. Some important items like mini satellite, Radio Freedom, etc. were acquired for the used of the movement. Small-small diamonds which only the higher authorities and the miners will account for, were collected from the minings done in Kono and Tongo Field but the proceeds according to my understanding were all used in the interest of the movement. In the course of promoting the Movement, diamonds were also collected from Lt. Col. Johnny Paul Koroma himself. Rather unfortunate some of these diamonds and foreign currencies got missed in the hands of Brigadier I.H.Sesay in Liberia when he went to cater for ammunition for the movement. This is the number one grivance of Brigadier Superman, that Brigadier I.H.Sesay was not queried when he lost the diamonds and the foreign currencies but he missed the nine million leones in Freetown, he was brought to quarterdeck. To be frank enough, Brigadier I.H.Sesay was the only strong man under Major-General Sam Bockarie at that time who helped to put situation under control as the enemies were seriously pressing us. Taking Co. Issa off from whatever he was doing at that time and brought him for investigation would have done more harm than good because something worse than the lost of the diamonds and the foreign currencies would have occured. Moreover, the collection of diamonds from some former SLA soldiers, money and diamonds from people who were in Kono when the former SLA soldiers (some of them) broke the bank in Kono, the failure of the authorities to provide Lt. Col. J.P.Koroma with vehicle and communication set may be responsible for the indifferences that cropped-up between the men in the Western jungle and we on this side. Above all, they were expecting that we were going to subdue ourselves to them in our own territory like we did when we in Freetown which resulted to our retreat into the bush.If we have subdued ourselves to these guys, we would have moved from the "frying pot to the fire". The above points triggered the former SLA brothers presenting in the Western jungle to incite Superman to disobey Major-General Sam Bockarie with unwanted unwarranted excuse that Major-General Sam Bockarie insulted and condemned his Lebanese woman. This problem escalated to a point that Brigadier Superman either all by himself or through giving orders killed Col. Bosten Flomo(Rambo) by shooting him.

Although about 90-95% of the SLA brothers including Col. Akim Turay, Lt. Col. Soriba, Lt. Col. Dumbuya, Lt. Col. Bakarr, Major Leather Boot and many others are loyal to this movement but out of observations, the balance 5-10% are power conscious, materialistic and so can be incited by the politicians. Moreover, it will take some of them time to get get use to some of the rules and regulations(ideology) binding the RUF/SL movement.Since we joined together with the brothers, crimes rates have maximally have increased.

Hence as you have come as our leader to join us all to make Sierra Leone a better place to live, you have to set your eyes air, to wipe out all forms of corruptions and in the interim, you and all of us should be concerned about your security as the politicians would want to prevail on these power and material hungry men to do any thing to distort your good good intention for

ECONOMIC COMMUNITY OF WEST AFRICAN STATES

REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE OF FOUR ON THE SITUATION IN SIERRA LEONE

ABUJA, AUGUST 26, 1997

THE SITUATION IN SIERRA LEONE

On 25 May, 1997, a section of the military in Sierra Leone violently overthrew the legitimate government of President Tejan Kabbah. This was an unfortunate event for Sierra Leone. The coup d'etat was tragic in nature and consequence for, upon seizing power, the elements broke into prisons and threw open the gates thus releasing all sorts of criminals and convicts. The rebellious RUF members were invited by the coupists from their bases in the jungle into Freetown. In the general mayhem which ensued, massive looting of property, murder and rape became the order of the day. Vital national assets were not spared as they too were vandalised and looted.

This situation also threatened the stability and security of the neighbouring countries and indeed the entire sub-region. Hundreds of refugees fleeing from the situation in Sierra Leone constituted additional burden on the economies and societies of neighbouring countries, especially Guinea. This situation also posed a special threat to peace in Liberia for which our sub-region had laboured for several years.

REACTION OF THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY

The coup d'etat in Sierra Leone took place on Africa Day when the leaders of the continent were gathered in Harare, Zimbabwe on the eve of the 33rd Ordinary Summit of the OAU. The leaders roundly condemned the seizure of power and called for the immediate restoration of constitutional order to the country. They urged the international community not to recognise the illegal regime in Sierra Leone and called on the leaders of ECOWAS to take the lead in restoring constitutional order to the country. The Secretary-General of the UN who was in Harare endorsed the OAU position, including the restoration of the legitimate government. This was reinforced by a statement by the President of the UN Security Council, two days after the coup, which unequivocally condemned the coup d'etat.

Meanwhile, in our sub-region, the Chairman of ECOWAS had commenced measures aimed at resolving the Sierra Leone crisis. His consultations with the leaders of the sub-region resulted in the convening of a meeting of ECOWAS Foreign Ministers in Conakry on 26 June, 1997. The meeting reviewed the situation in Sierra Leone and recommended ways and means of achieving a speedy restoration of constitutional order to the country. It identified three objectives to be pursued by ECOWAS in Sierra Leone. These were:

(i) the early reinstatement of the legitimate government of President Tejan Kabbah;

(ii) the return of peace and security; and

(iii) the resolution of the issue of refugees and displaced persons.

The Foreign Ministers recommended a combination of three measures to be applied in the pursuit of these objectives. These were dialogue, imposition of sanctions/embargo; and the use of force. Furthermore, the Foreign Ministers established a Ministerial Committee of Four, comprising the Foreign Ministers of Nigeria, Guinea, Cote d'Ivoire and Ghana, to be joined by representatives of the OAU and ECOWAS Secretariats. This Committee was charged with implementing the recommendations and decisions on Sierra Leone.

BRIEFING OF THE CHAIRMAN OF ECOWAS

After the Conakry meeting, the newly established Committee of Four on Sierra Leone submitted a report to the Chairman of ECOWAS in Abuja on 6 July, 1997. The Chairman endorsed the recommendations of the Foreign Ministers and considered it appropriate that ECOWAS position should be conveyed to the Secretary-General of the UN and the UN Security Council, by the Committee of Four.

VISIT TO NEW YORK

On 11 July, 1997, members of the Committee visited New York and briefed the Secretary-General of the UN and the UN Security Council on ECOWAS perspectives on the gravity of the situation in Sierra Leone as well as the need for prompt and concerted action by the international community. The Foreign Ministers restated, in clear and unequivocal terms, the need for the illegal regime to comply fully with the demands of ECOWAS, the OAU and the international community and return power to the legitimate government of President Tejan Kabbah. Following the briefing of the Security Council, a meeting of the Council was convened, at the instance of the ECOWAS Ministers, on the situation in Sierra Leone. At the end of the Council's deliberations, a Presidential Statement was issued which expressed deep concern about the continuing crisis in Sierra Leone and reiterated its view that the attempt to overthrow the democratically elected government of President Kabbah was unacceptable. The Council also welcomed the mediation efforts of ECOWAS and expressed full support for the objectives of these efforts, as set out in the Final Communique of our meeting in Conakry on 26 June, 1997.

DIALOGUE AND NEGOTIATIONS WITH THE ILLEGAL REGIME IN SIERRA LEONE

In accordance with the mandate given to the Committee of Four, we established contact with the elements in Sierra Leone and invited the leader, Major Johnny Paul Koromah, for a meeting in Guinea. However, in their response, the regime in Freetown indicated a preference for Cote d'Ivoire rather than Guinea as venue for the proposed meeting. The Committee of Four had no difficulty with this proposal. They recognised that Cote d'Ivoire was not only a member of the sub-region but also of the Committee of Four on Sierra Leone. Indeed, Cote d'Ivoire had been actively engaged in the search for peace in Sierra Leone which culminated in signing of the Abidjan Peace Agreement of 30 November, 1996 between the Government of Sierra Leone and the Revolutionary United Front (RUF).

The first meeting with the illegal regime in Sierra Leone took place in Abidjan from 17-18 July, 1997. Major J.P. Koromah was not present but he was represented by a 12-member delegation led by Mr. Alimamy Pallo Bangura. The delegation included politicians such as Dr. Karefa Smart, Dr. Abbass Bundu, some RUF members and a section of the Sierra Leonean military. The Committee of Four presented to the Sierra Leonean delegation, the contents of its mandate, endorsed by the Chairman of ECOWAS, the OAU and the UN Security Council, including the early reinstatement of the legitimate government of President Kabbah. For their part, the Sierra Leonean delegation presented their views on the situation in their country. They expressed their readiness to work towards the early restoration of constitutional order.

Discussions were held in an atmosphere of cordiality and frankness. The representatives of the illegal regime agreed with the views expressed by the Ministers for the resolution of the Sierra Leone crisis. They were however concerned that any solution proffered, should be such that would preserve the dignity of all sides. Consequently, the meeting decided:

(i) to resolve all issues related to the Sierra Leone crisis peacefully, in the best interest of the people of Sierra Leone, the sub-region, Africa and the international community as a whole;

(ii) that all hostilities should cease and therefore a ceasefire be immediately established throughout Sierra Leone while all efforts are deployed towards the peaceful resolution of the crisis;

(iii) to work towards the early restoration of constitutional order including the reinstatement of the legitimate government of President Kabbah; and

(iv) to allow the Sierra Leone delegation sufficient time to return home and hold further consultations with the regime in Freetown in order to facilitate a consideration of the detailed modalities for the return of constitutional order to their country.

From 29-30 July, 1997, the second meeting between the Committee of Four and the representatives of Major J.P. Koromah was held again in Abidjan. This time, the composition of the delegation of the illegal regime, had changed substantially from what it was at the first meeting. Some of the politicians were dropped and the ranks included more RUF members. The Ministers requested the delegation to present their proposals on the modalities for the restoration of constitutional order in their country. Regrettably, the representatives of the regime reneged on the agreement reached at the first meeting on the question of the reinstatement of President Tejan Kabbah. Moreover, while the meeting was in progress, the Foreign Ministers were alerted to an announcement by the illegal regime in Freetown to suspend the constitution of Sierra Leone and remain in office illegally until the year 2001. The implication of this announcement was not lost on the Ministers. They therefore considered that further dialogue with the representatives of the illegal regime, at that point, would serve no useful purpose. Accordingly, the Ministers decided to recommend to the Chairman of ECOWAS the formal introduction of the regime of sanctions and embargo, which are a part of the measures earlier agreed, to ensure the early and full implementation of the mandate of the Committee of Four.

The Chairman of ECOWAS has since asked for a full-scale application of sanctions and embargo against Sierra Leone, while not foreclosing the option of returning to negotiations, as a way of resolving the crisis peacefully. The Chairman has also renewed his call for the support of the international community for the ECOWAS initiative in Sierra Leone.

ACCRA MEETING

The Foreign Ministers of the Committee of Four convened in Accra, Ghana from 14-15 August, 1997 to review the developments in Sierra Leone in the aftermath of the abortive meeting of 29-30 July, 1997 in Abidjan. At that meeting, they were informed of the new initiatives on Sierra Leone being undertaken by the President of Guinea, H.E. General Lansana Conte and which had the potential of facilitating the peaceful resolution of the crisis in line with the ECOWAS objectives. The initiatives involved a proposed meeting between President Lansana Conte and the leader of the illegal regime in ~~a Guinea~~ Sierra Leone. The facilitator of this process was the former Head of State of Sierra Leone, Major-General Joseph Momoh. Under the circumstances, the Ministers decided to adjourn for a few days and to reconvene in Abuja on 25 August, 1997, in order to allow time for the ~~final~~ initiative to take place.

Meanwhile, it was agreed that details of sanctions and embargo to be applied against the regime in Sierra Leone should be prepared in readiness for submission to the Chairman of ECOWAS, before the commencement of the Summit of the Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS scheduled for Abuja, from 28-29, August, 1997.

CONCLUSION

The situation in Sierra Leone remains a matter of serious concern to our sub-region and our organisation. However, in order to keep our efforts and interests focussed and productive, there is need to take appropriate measures to counter the various machinations of the regime in Sierra Leone who seem more interested in hanging on to power at all cost rather than seek a peaceful negotiated solution to the crisis.

In pursuit of our overall objectives in Sierra Leone, the support of the international community, including the OAU, the Commonwealth and the United Nations, remains important. It is necessary therefore that we keep in close contact with these organisations and institutions, in particular, the UN Security Council. It is noteworthy that the final communique of the meeting of the ECOWAS Foreign Ministers in Conakry and the declaration issued by the Committee of Four at the end of their first meeting in Abidjan with representatives of the illegal regime from 17-18 July, 1997, have been adopted as documents of the Security Council. The Security Council is actively seized with the matter. We express our profound appreciation to members of the international community which have all refrained from according recognition to the regime in Sierra Leone.

Furthermore, whilst the use of force remains an available option to ECOWAS in resolving the crisis in Sierra Leone, sanctions and embargo will first, have to be vigorously applied. The details of sanctions and embargo which were prepared in Accra from 14 to 15 August, 1997, have been prepared, taking into consideration the experiences in other countries where sanctions have been similarly applied. There can be no doubt that in the application of sanctions and embargo, some measures of force may be required. In consideration of this, together with the need to assure peace and security in Sierra Leone and the sub-region, consideration should be given immediately to the extension of the present mandate of ECOMOG, to cover the situation in Sierra Leone.

Nevertheless, in line with our original intention and position, we must keep the door open for the regime in Sierra Leone to carry out realistic negotiations if and when they decide to do so. The application of sanctions should be seen as part of the pacific measures to be taken by ECOWAS against the illegal regime. The main interest of ECOWAS in this case is mainly to ensure the return of peace and stability to Sierra Leone.

The sixteenth meeting of the ECOWAS Chiefs of Staff commenced with a welcome address by Major-General A.A. Abubakar, Chief of Defence Staff of the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria.

In his address, he conveyed to the meeting the sincere greetings and best wishes of the Head of State, Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, current Chairman of ECOWAS, General Sani Abacha for successful deliberations.

Major-General A.A. Abubakar recalled that at the occasion of the 19th Summit of the Authority of Heads of State and Government held in Abuja last year, where the state of collective security and stability in the sub-region was reviewed, the meeting's primary concern was with the slow progress in the realisation of durable peace in Liberia, particularly in the aftermath of the renewed violence of April 1996.

He however observed that despite of all obstacles placed on its way and by dint of total commitment, dedication and perseverance, ECOWAS has succeeded in putting in place a democratically elected civilian government under the presidency of Mr. Charles Ghankay TAYLOR, and has established peace, security and order throughout Liberia.

Major-General A.A. Abubakar, on behalf of ECOWAS Chiefs of Staff, congratulated President Charles Taylor on his election as the 21st President of Liberia wishing him divine guidance in the formidable task of building a virile and prosperous nation.

He stated that the ECOMOG experience has been hailed as a new initiative in sub-regional conflict resolution the world over.

He paid a well deserved tribute to the ECOMOG High Command and to all the brave men and women under the able leadership of the Force Commander, Major-General SVL Malu and his predecessors for their courage, sacrifice and professionalism in the face of difficulties.

At this juncture, a moment's silence was observed in honour and memory of all those who made the supreme sacrifice by laying down their lives in order that their Liberian brothers and sisters may live a fulfilling life.

The Chairman recalled the recommendation made at their 13th and 14th meetings for the restructuring and training of the Armed Forces of Liberia, Police and security agencies, as part of the revised schedule of the Abuja Agreement.

For this reason he stated,, an ad hoc committee had been set up to provide the necessary framework. He expressed the hope that the report of that committee which would be rendered in the course of the meeting would be considered frankly, to enable Chiefs of Staff to come up with resolute ideas on how to conduct the tasks set out.

The Chief of Defence Staff noted with regret the events in neighbouring Sierra Leone involving the violent overthrow of the legitimate government of President Tejan Kabbah on 25 May 1997 which poses a serious security threat to sub-regional peace and is capable of reversing the gains that have been made in Liberia.

He observed that with the intransigence of the illegal regime of Major J.P. Koromah who has not only reneged on an initial agreement to work towards early reinstatement of President Kabbah but has also announced the regime's intention to remain in office till the year 2001, it becomes necessary for the meeting to review the situation in Sierra Leone.

He stated that from all indications, peaceful resolution through dialogue had failed and the next option without recourse to the use of offensive action, was the enforcement of santions/embargo on the regime through an economic blockade.

He implored the meeting to proffer solutions on how best to conduct whatever mission might be assigned to ECOMOG to ensure the restoration of democracy in Sierra Leone and subsequent relative peace in the sub-region.

In conclusion, Major-General A.A. Abubakar stressed the need for closer ties, cooperation and consultations between the Armed Forces of the Member States, as the future and destiny of all within our sub-region are indeed interwoven.

The Chief of General Staff of the Armed Forces of Niger, Colonel Moussa Djermakoye, expressed his gratitude to His Excellency General Sani Abacha, current Chairman of ECOWAS and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces, and to the military authorities. He paid tribute to the Federal Republic of Nigeria for its commitment and leadership role, a testimony to the importance that country attaches to the ideals and solidarity of the sub-region. He thanked all the Chiefs of Staff of Member States for their peace initiatives in Liberia. The Chief of General Staff of the Armed Forces of Niger expressed his appreciation to the ECOMOG Force Commander, General Victor Malu, for the able manner in which the assignment was executed.

Colonel Djermakoye presented a brief background to the Liberian crisis and outlined the various actions undertaken by ECOWAS in that country. He recalled, in particular, the decision taken on 17 August 1996 by the Heads of State and Government to strengthen ECOMOG. In this connection, he informed the meeting that his country had dispatched a contingent of 320 (three hundred and twenty) men to Liberia.

The Chief of General Staff of the Armed Forces of Niger expressed the wish that the meeting would draw lessons from the joint deployment of the sub-region's armed forces in Liberia. He, specifically underscored the need to capitalise on the experience of ECOMOG in order to evolve a common strategy for effective action against the banes of society such as religious fundamentalism, ethnic strife and power struggles which were likely to cause conflicts.

Colonel Djemarkoye listed the factors which had paralysed the actions of ECOMOG and retarded the accomplishment of its mission. He was of the opinion that ECOMOG should consolidate peace before disengaging totally from Liberia where the newly-restored peace still appeared to be fragile.

Finally, he touched on the distressing situation in Sierra Leone following the military coup d'état of 25 May 1997 and appealed to the junta for a return to democratic rule.

Delivering a statement, His Excellency, Mr. Joe Blell, the Sierra Leone High Commissioner to Nigeria, representing the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone headed by Ahmad Tejan Kabbah, expressed his country's appreciation and gratitude to ECOMOG. He praised the efforts made by the ECOWAS Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Committee of Four on Sierra Leone to return his country to democracy and the rule of law. He reiterated his country's support for ECOWAS objectives in Sierra Leone and reminded the meeting that without peace in Sierra Leone, the recently-won peace in Liberia would continue to be threatened. He therefore called on ECOWAS to act decisively in Sierra Leone and put an end to the crisis.

LT-Gen. Prince C. Johnson II, the Chief of Staff of the Armed Forces of Liberia, in his statement expressed deep appreciation for the reception and hospitality accorded to his delegation since their arrival in Abuja.

He reflected on the genesis and the extent of the work done by the Chiefs of Staff; the financial, human and material resources invested in the Liberian crisis over the past seven years in the search for peace in Liberia and in the sub-region as a whole.

He also pledged the whole-hearted support of the Government and people of Liberia for all decisions taken, by the body.

On the issue of security in Liberia, Lt.-Gen. Prince C. Johnson II stated that Liberia depends largely upon ECOWAS through ECOMOG for its security until the Armed Forces of Liberia is restructured and re-armed to assume its constitutional role of protecting life and property.

He informed the meeting that the President and Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of Liberia had expressed concern about security in Liberia, largely because of intelligence reports received in Liberia which indicate that:

a) The Kamajors fighting the military junta in Sierra Leone have retreated along the Liberian border areas to launch their attack, with the threat of a possible spillover effect into Liberia;

b) Ex-combatants of the just-ended Liberian crisis are being armed to fight for the Kamajors. Furthermore, security is being undermined by the rising incidence of armed robbery in the city of Monrovia and its environs.

For all these reasons, he stated, it had become imperative that the Armed Forces of Liberia be restructured as soon as possible to enable the army join ECOMOG in its task of providing security in Liberia.

In conclusion, the Liberian Chief of Staff, pledged the support of the Armed Forces of Liberia to all decisions taken by ECOWAS, OAU and the UN to restore the elected Government of Sierra Leone to power.

CLOSED SESSION

Prior to the commencement of its deliberations behind closed doors, the meeting was briefed on the situation in Sierra Leone by Hon. Chief Tom IKIMI, Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Nigeria and Chairman of the Ministers of Foreign Affairs of the Committee of Four on Sierra Leone. Present at the briefing were other members of the Committee of Four, namely the Foreign Ministers of the Republics of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana and Guinea and the representatives of the ECOWAS Secretariat. Also present was H.E. Ambassador Kalomoh, the Special Representative of the Secretary-General of the United Nations in Liberia.

Chief Tom Ikimi began by thanking the Chiefs of Staff for permitting the Foreign Ministers of the Committee of Four to brief them on the situation in Sierra Leone. This, he said, was necessary in order to properly acquaint Chiefs of Staff to enable them make appropriate recommendations to the Heads of State.

Chief Ikimi observed that the coup d'état of 25 May 1997 had very peculiar characteristics. It was not only very bloody but was followed by massive looting and widespread vandalisation of public and private properties. The putschists opened up prisons and let out all categories of hardened criminals. They also invited the elements of the RUF into the city of Freetown, thereby disrupting the peace and tranquility of that city. These RUF elements had since assumed and taken over the role of the national army.

It was worth noting that the coup took place on OAU Day and on the eve of the OAU Summit. The OAU therefore wasted no time in condemning the coup. It called for the immediate reinstatement of the legitimate government of Ahmad Tejan Kabbah; urged on the world to support ECOWAS and declared that none of its Members should recognise the junta in Sierra Leone.

Thereafter, following consultations by the ECOWAS Chairman and his colleagues, a meeting of Foreign Ministers was held in Conakry on 26 June 1997. At the end of its deliberations, the meeting agreed to pursue the following objectives:

1) early reinstatement of the legitimate government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah;

2) the return of peace and security; and

3) the resolution of the issues of refugees and displaced persons.

These objectives were to be achieved by a combination of three measures, namely dialogue, imposition of sanctions and enforcement of an embargo, including the use of force. In order to increase the effectiveness of the above meansures, the Ministers recommended prior consultations at the highest level.

The Ministers also established an implementation committee comprising the Foreign Ministers of Côte d'Ivoire, Ghana, Guinea and Nigeria.

These proposals, Mr. Ikimi said, were endorsed by the ECOWAS Chairman and the UN Security Council. To date, no government had recognised the junta in Sierra Leone. The OAU, UN, Chief Ikimi said were in constant consultations with ECOWAS.

The Committee of Four immediately decided to implement the first option of dialogue. The first meeting with representatives of the junta was held in Abidjan where some modalities to achieve the objectives were agreed upon. A second meeting with the junta on 29 and 30 July 1996, also in Abidjan, however ended in failure following the announcement by the junta of its intention to stay in office until the year 2001.

Subsequent attempts at dialogue taken by some ECOWAS States also failed, leaving ECOWAS with no other option but to implement sanctions and total embargo.

Chief Ikimi ended by calling on Chiefs of Staff to make appropriate recommendations on modalities for the imposition of the embargo / blockade within international standards.

Upon the departure of the delegation of the Committee of Four on Sierra Leone, the meeting continued its deliberations behind closed doors.

Giving a situation update on ECOMOG operations, Major-General Victor Malu, the ECOMOG Force Commander provided the meeting with a progress report on the Liberian peace process, which had culminated in the holding of transparent, free and fair elections and the subsequent inauguration of His Excellency, Charles Ghankay Taylor as the 21st President of Liberia.

His report dwelt extensively on ECOMOG's contribution towards the successful conduct of the electoral process and its new role of creating an enabling security atmosphere to consolidate the peace process.

Since the completion of the disarmament exercice, ECOMOG had continued its efforts at creating the necessary environment for the return to normal political activities, social order and lasting peace and tranquility. Its cordon and search operations had led to retrieval of over 6000 weapons, most from obscure places such as graves and swamps. All in all, ECOMOG had recovered from the beginning of the disarmament exercise, about 35,000 weapons including: machine guns, assault rifles, bombs, artillery guns, anti-aircraft guns, anti-tank guns and rocket propelled guns. It had also recovered over 4 million assorted small ammunition.

Upon creation of a conducive environment, ECOMOG next switched its energies to assist in the electoral process. It provided the necessary security to IECOM, presidential aspirants, other party functionaries, ballot boxes during and after the elections, registration, voting and counting centres, as well as to others and electoral officials.

In the area of transportation, ECOMOG assisted in the movement by road and air of election materials, lifting of IECOM officials, international observers, ballot boxes etc...

ECOMOG also provided assistance in the area of communications. In the area of man-power and logistics support for ECOMOG, Major-General Malu reported that ECOMOG had received, after the disarmament exercise additional troops from Benin, Burkina Faso, Ghana, Mali and Niger, thereby increasing its total strength to about 11,000 all ranks. Côte d'Ivoire also provided a medical team, and certain members of the international community provided logistics support.

The Force Commander continued by defining the post election role of ECOMOG as:

i) aiding and supporting the Government to maintain and consolidate the peace by providing necessary security;
ii) conducting military operations to rid Liberia of arms;
iii) protecting VIPs and key installations
iv) restructuring and training of the armed forces, police and other security agencies.

To achieve these objectives ECOMOG personnel were redeployed in adequate numbers, all over the country and along the Liberia/Sierra Leone border to prevent any spill over effect. In addition, a National Security Council, with the President of Liberia, as Chairman was constituted. The Council, the meeting was informed, meets regularly and constantly monitors the security situation in the country. The ECOMOG Force Commander is a member of the Council.

The 20 miles embargo zone along the Liberian coast was lifted to allow ships to come in without hindrance and without the hitherto required war risk insurance.

On the important issue of the restructuring of the AFL, the Force Commander reminded delegates that the Liberian crisis had factionalised the Liberian army, necessitating its complete restructuring together with the police and other security agencies. He emphasised the need to have a disciplined, well equiped armed forces that would be capable of carrying out its functions. Major-General Malu called on the meeting to make appropriate recommendations that would successfully guide the conduct of this vital and important exercise.

The restructuring of the armed forces was behind schedule and so a decision should be taken on the matter without further delay. When formulating appropriate proposals, Major-General Malu said, the meeting should bear in mind that the presumption that ECOMOG troops would remain in Liberia for 6 months after the inauguration of the elected government was not correct; as contributing countries had different timetables for their troops. Whatever the case, Major-General Malu cautioned, it was unlikely that a trained National Army would be in place before the six-month period expired. He therefore called on the meeting to make appropriate recommendations so that an acceptable level of ECOMOG troops is kept in Monrovia for the training and restructuring exercise, and even beyond.

Major-General Malu proposed the training of an army of brigade strength. He also proposed that 4 ECOMOG battalions with a strength of about 600 men each would be ideal for a stay beyond the 6 months approved, in addition to 2 training battalions.

The Force Commander called for a gradual and programmed withdrawal of ECOMOG troops that would not threaten the security of the country and new government.

Although the Executive Secretariat's memorandum dwelt on Liberia and Sierra Leone, the Acting Executive Secretary, Mr. Mahamadou Ouhoumoudou presented issues relating only to Liberia as the situation in Sierra Leone had already been reported upon by H.E. Chief Tom Ikimi.

Mr. Ouhoumoudou reported on the successful end of the disarmament exercise which paved the way for the conduct of elections. Members of the Independent Elections Commission (IECOM) were appointed and conducted into office on 2nd April 1997. The Supreme Court was restructured.

IECOM prepared an electoral package consisting of the special elections law, an electoral package, and elections budget and a code of conduct for contending political parties.

The elections law provided for a single constituency for the whole of Liberia while a budget of $4.7m was approved for the elections.

Following extensive and detailed preparations, elections were held on 19 July, 1997 at which Liberians showed their eagerness and determination to put an end to their ugly past by turning out in large numbers to vote. The exercise was conducted under a peaceful atmosphere and at the end, it was declared by both local and international observers to have been free, fair and credible.

The elections results, as released, declared the NPP of Mr. Charles Taylor the overall winner.

Mr. Ouhoumoudou called for the articulation of appropriate modalities to ensure the conduct of free, fair and transparent elections in all Member States of the ECOWAS sub-region. The Liberian example, he said, should be a model and a lesson for all.

He concluded by stating that ECOWAS would continue to collaborate with the Government of Liberia to consolidate the peace as well as help in the reconstruction and rehabilitation of the Liberian society.

On his part, Major-General Sikandar Shami, the UNOMIL Chief Military Observer briefed the meeting on the post disarmament deployment of ECOMOG and UNOMIL personnel throughout Liberia. Additional troops for ECOMOG enabled it to deploy to 48 locations all over the country; thus necessitating an increase of UNOMIL's presence from 10 to 16 sites.

The strategic deployment of both ECOMOG and UNOMIL personnel provided the requisite atmosphere for elections.

Major-General Shami went on to inform the meeting of the relatively peaceful and voluntary disarmament exercise except for an incident in Kanweakehn where a group of ex-fighters had surrounded and threatened the UN compound there. However, as this first challenge to ECOMOG's authority since the end of official disarmament exercise was quickly controlled through prompt and effective action by the local ECOMOG commander, it sent the correct message throughout Liberia.

With the successful completion of the disarmament exercise, both ECOMOG and UNOMIL shifted focus to the conduct of the elections. While ECOMOG provided security and logistics support, the UN Military Observers (MILOB's) assisted in preparing grounds for the observation and verification of the electoral process. They provided necessary and vital information on the terrain Infrastructure, population shifting patterns, customs and other local conditions in the hinterland of Liberia. This information, which was shared with IECOM officials and ECOMOG became the basis for the planning of the 1997 elections.

He gave further concrete examples of the high degree of cooperation and collaboration between ECOMOG and the MILOBs during the preparations for the elections.

Major-General Shami paid tribute to officers and men of ECOMOG under the able command of General Malu.

The Chief Military Observer also reported on the very important issue of humanitarian assistance and the manner in which the various UN agencies, USAID and the EU coordinated their efforts to provide basic necessities of life to over 15,000 ex-combatants and civilian war victims. Food was provided, schools reopened and the agricultural sector assisted.

Major-General Shami concluded by expressing satisfaction of the success of the Liberian peace process. He emphasised that this has been the first ever joint operation by the United Nations and sub-regional organisation in which the sub-region had the primary responsibility for ensuring peace keeping. In spite of the fact that there were no guidelines to fall back on, with experience, a close-knit partnership had evolved that definititely enhanced the Liberian peace process. The elections were universally adjudged as having been free, fair and credible.

The leader of the delegation from Ghana representing the Chief of Staff of the Ghana Armed Forces who was said to be unavoidably absent, extended warm felicitations from the Chief of Defence Staff and from all the officers, men and women of the Ghana Armed Forces.

He stated that the Ghana Armed Forces were happy that after seven years of destruction of life and property, the Liberian crisis had come to an end adding that Ghana was indeed proud to be part and parcel of the Force that made possible the restoration of peace and security to Liberia, proving the skeptics wrong.

In this regard, he commended the Force Commander Major-Gen. Malu and all the officers and men of ECOMOG for the excellent job done and thanked the Chiefs of Staff of the ECOWAS Member States for their support for ECOMOG.

He thereafter stated that in furtherance of the Abuja II Accord, Ghana was committed to assist in the consolidation of peace and the restructuring and training of the Armed Forces in Liberia and other security services of Liberia and that Ghanbatt 13 which was launched in February this year in fulfillment of their pledge made at the last meeting will be retained, whilst Ghanbatt 12 will be rotated with Ghanbatt 14 between 22nd September and 10th October 1997.

Finally, he added that ECOMOG Ghanbatt is ever-prepared to undertake any tasks that would facilitate the consolidation of peace and the nurturing of the nascent democracy in Liberia.

OUTCOME OF DELIBERATIONS

In their consideration of the various reports before them, the Chiefs of Staff devoted particular attention to the following:

- evaluation of ECOMOG performance in Liberia
- restructuring and training of the Liberian Armed Forces
- extension of the ECOMOG mandate in Liberia
- sanctions and the Agreement between ECOWAS and Liberia on the status of ECOMOG Forces Agreement

The Chiefs of Staff held constructive discussions on each of these items. Below is a summary of their deliberations.

EVALUATION OF ECOMOG PERFORMANCE IN LIBERIA

The Chiefs of Staff expressed satisfaction at the achievements of ECOMOG Forces in Liberia. They declared that they had followed with pride the activities of the West African force and congratulated the Force Commander, General Victor Malu.

The meeting reiterated its gratitude to the Heads of State and Government of ECOWAS, to Member States and to international organisations whose support made it possible to implement the ECOWAS Peace Plan.

RESTRUCTURING AND TRAINING OF THE LIBERIAN ARMED FORCES

The Chiefs of Staff recalled the different agreements which had provided for the restructuring and training of the Liberian Armed Forces and defined the role ECOWAS was expected to play in that regard.

They noted, however, that it had not been possible to restructure and train the forces before the installation of the elected government, due to the large number of assignments given to ECOMOG as part of the preparation and organisaiton of the elections.

The Chiefs of Staff agreed that the aim of the restructuring exercise would be to establish a truly national army comprising Liberians from all ethnic groups in the country.

They were also of the opinion that the elements of the Liberian armed forces to be trained would include not only recruits but also future instructors. They felt that while the officers might need to go to neighbouring countries which have qualified instructors and adequate training facilities, the recruits could be trained locally. This is all the more feasible since, given its current situation, Liberia needs only a modest force about the size of a brigade. In that connection, the service chiefs observed that the team of instructors must come from anglophone countries, to facilitate communication with Liberians whose official language is English. However, any francophone country which so desired could provide support for the training programme.

The Chiefs of Staff were of the view that the restructuring and training of the Liberian armed forces would serve to ensure security and consolidate peace in Liberia, and would thus constitute the second part of ECOMOG's mission in that country.

EXTENSION OF THE ECOMOG MANDATE IN LIBERIA

The Chiefs of Staff recalled that the understanding up till now had been that ECOMOG would withdraw from Liberia six months after the swearing in of the elected President.

They acknowledged the delicate nature of a withdrawal which could not be assessed in all its ramification on account of the numerous problems which still need to be addressed within the framework of beefing up security and consolidating the peace in Liberia. The Chiefs of Staff agreed that following ECOMOG intervention during its first mission, extension of its mandate had become an imperative on account of recent political developments in Liberia. They were of the opinion that the length of ECOMOG continued stay should be determined bearing in mind its new duties of strengthening security and keeping the peace; the tasks devolving from these objectives and the resources available.

AGREEMENT ON ECOMOG STATUS OF FORCES

The Chiefs of Staff expressed the view that rather than signing the Status of Forces Agreement with the Government of Liberia, it is the Memorandum of Understanding that should be looked into.

EXTENSION OF ECOMOG'S MANDATE TO SIERRA LEONE

The Chiefs of Staff agreed that a final settlement of the Liberian conflict of necessity demanded a definitive solution to the Sierra Leonean crisis. Having being informed by the Chairman of the Committee of Four, the Honourable Minister of Foreign Affairs of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, Chief Ikimi, that the phase of dialogue with the junta in Sierra Leone had failed, the Chiefs of Staff concluded that implementation of the other measures envisaged for achieving ECOWAS objectives had become inevitable. In this regard, they noted that ECOMOG's mission in Sierra Leone would be possible and effetive only if its scope of operation and mandate were duly extended to cover that country.

SANCTIONS

The Chiefs of Staff took note of the two types of sanctions proposed by ECOWAS to force the junta to restore the legitimate government of President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah. They pointed out that no distinction could be made between an embargo and the use of force because both of these would give rise to closely inter-related problems. According to them, extreme poverty and other socio-economic factors would inevitably lead to the appearance of numerous factions, putting Sierra Leone at risk of disintegration. Under such conditions, the Chiefs of Staff stated, they were convinced that application of the embargo would inevitably lead to the use of force. Their conviction was corroborated by available reports which indicated that the illegal regime in Freetown would be unable to withstand an embargo, if effectively applied. For this reason, the Chiefs of Staff requested a full briefing on the status of forces in Sierra Leone. Having obtained this information, the Chiefs of Staff decided to recommended imposition of an enforced embargo for four weeks after which an evaluation would be carried out and appropriate recommendations made to the Heads of State and Government. The service chiefs recognised that Member States must show firmness, real cohesion and sincerity. These conditions must be fully met if the sanctions agreed jointly were to succeed.

RECOMMENDATIONS

At the end of their meeting, the Chiefs of Staff made the following recommendations to the Ministers of Foreign Affairs:

i) a) ECOMOG should be authorised to restructure and train the Liberian armed forces.

b) Funds and logistics for this exercise should be sought from ECOWAS Member States and friendly countries.

ii) a) ECOMOG's mandate in Liberia should be extended by at least one year.

b) The ECOMOG Force Commander should be instructed to prepare a detailed time table for the orderly withdrawal of ECOMOG forces from Liberia.

iii) ECOMOG's field of operation should be extended to Sierra Leone and its mandate expanded to include the strict enforcement of the sanctions recommended.

iv) a) ECOMOG should be mandated to enforce the embargo for a a period of four weeks initially.

b) At the end of that period, the Committee of Four should assess the level of application of the sanctions and, if necessary, make appropriate recommendations to the Heads of State and Government on further actions to be taken.

c) In order to ensure the effective and successful application of the embargo Member States should contribute troops and equipment as necessary.

ANY OTHER MATTERS

The Executive Secretariat submitted to the meeting a memorandum which it has received from the Liberian Government calling for the lifting of sanctions imposed on the parties to the Liberian conflict by ECOWAS and the United Nations Security Council.

Having considered this request, the Chiefs of Staff expressed the view that since Liberia's security was being ensured by ECOMOG, there was no immediate need for the country to import military hardware. They pointed out that since the embargo decided upon by ECOWAS and the United Nations concerned the supply of arms, amunition and military hardware, it was neither necessary nor expedient to recommend that this measure should be lifted.

The Executive Secretariat also submitted to the meeting a memorandum concerning an ECOWAS special documentation project on the peace process in Liberia. The project which involved the production of an authoritative report on the peace process in Liberia, was considered favourably by the Chiefs of Staff who expressed the desire to see it through and therefore recommended to the Community decision-making bodies to adopt the measures contained in it.

Finally, the representative of the legitimate Government of Sierra Leone, Ambassador Joe Blell, proposed the establishment by ECOWAS of a conflict prevention and resolution unit. The meeting called on the Executive Secretariat to examine the issue.

ADOPTION OF REPORT

This report was adopted after amendments.

CLOSING SESSION

In his closing remarks, General Abdulsalami Alhaji Abubakar expressed gratitude to the Chiefs of Staff and their representatives for the quality of their contributions to the discussions and for the frank manner in which they had addressed the issues. On behalf of His Excellency General Sani Abacha, Head of State, Commander-in-Chief of the Armed Forces of the Federal Republic of Nigeria, he commended all those who had contributed to the restoration of peace to Liberia, despite the limited resources at the disposal of their countries. He requested the Chiefs of Staff to convey the gratitude of the Chairman of the Authority to their troops and Heads of State for the invaluable contribution each had made to the peace process in Liberia.

The Chairman of the 16th meeting of the Chiefs of Staff prayed that peace would reign in Liberia and in the whole of the sub-region.

General Abubakar expressed the hope that the friendship which had existed between the Chiefs of Staff all through the Liberian crisis would continue to grow. He called on the Chiefs of Staff to reflect on ways of strengthening the solidarity and fraternal relations between the armed forces of Member States not only in the military field but also in the areas of sporting activities and the training of officers and men.

He thanked UNOMIL for the assistance which it had given to ECOMOG towards the effective implementation of the peace process in Liberia.

Finally, General Abubakar wished all participants a safe journey back to their respective homes.

FOURTH REPORT OF THE SECRETARY-GENERAL ON THE SITUATION IN SIERRA LEONE

I. INTRODUCTION

1. The present report is submitted pursuant to the presidential statement issued by the Security Council on 26 February 1998 (S/PRST/1998/5), by which the Council requested me to submit detailed proposals concerning the role of the United Nations and its future presence in Sierra Leone. It covers the developments in Sierra Leone since the issuance of my third report on 5 February 1998 (S/1998/103).

II. IMPLEMENTATION OF SECURITY COUNCIL RESOLUTION 1132 (1997)

Action taken by the Economic Community of West African States and the Economic Community of West African States Monitoring Group

2. On 5 February 1998, the Economic Community of West African States (ECOWAS) Committee of Five on Sierra Leone came to New York to brief the members of the Security Council and myself on the situation in Sierra Leone. The Chairman of the Committee of Five, the Foreign Minister of Nigeria, Chief Tom Ikimi, said an impasse had been reached in the implementation of the Conakry Agreement. He pointed out that the junta had raised three issues which, in its view, stood in the way of the implementation of the Agreement, namely, the release of Corporal Foday Sankoh, the proposed exemption of the Republic of Sierra Leone Military Forces from the disarmament process and the composition of the ECOWAS Monitoring Group (ECOMOG) which consisted primarily of Nigerian troops.

3. Minister Ikimi noted that because of this impasse, ECOMOG had been unable to deploy in Sierra Leone to carry out the disarmament and demobilization of the Sierra Leonean combatants, and it had therefore not been possible to deploy United Nations military observers alongside ECOMOG.

4. Minister Ikimi requested my support in launching a high-level effort to support ECOWAS through the establishment of a group of friends of Sierra Leone, and expressed the view that the Security Council should endorse the 22 April 1998 deadline for the restoration of constitutional authority and the full implementation of the Conakry Agreement of 23 October 1997.

5. I reaffirmed to the Committee of Five the desire of the United Nations for close cooperation between the United Nations and ECOWAS, and stated that ECOMOG needed to develop a concept of operations on the basis of which the United Nations could finalize its own deployment plan. ECOMOG should also compile a statement of its own logistical requirements in order to attract the necessary support from potential donors.

6. On the same day, responding to an attack by junta forces on their position at Lungi, ECOMOG launched a military attack on the junta, which culminated approximately one week later in the collapse of the junta and its expulsion by force from Freetown after heavy fighting. The fall of the city on 13 February, which was accompanied by widespread looting and some reprisal killings, led to the flight or capture of many soldiers and leaders of the junta. ECOWAS has assured me that the International Committee of the Red Cross (ICRC) has been allowed to visit prisoners detained by ECOMOG in Freetown. However, some of the former leaders of the Armed Forces Revolutionary Council (AFRC), including its Chairman, Johnny Paul Koroma, are believed to be still at large. Acting in concert with the local Kamajors and other traditional hunter militia (known as the Civil Defence Unit), ECOMOG has subsequently taken control of the towns of Bo, Kenema and Zimmi in the south of the country, and Lunsar, Makeni and Kabala in the north. ECOMOG has also reported the capture of Daru, which would mean that the remnants of the junta have now been dislodged from every major town except for Kailahun. Following scattered fighting in the latter part of February, the country now appears to be quiet. A number of foreign aid workers and missionaries taken hostage by armed elements in February were later released unharmed. However, press reports in mid-March indicated that Revolutionary United Front (RUF) members in Kono had murdered civilians and taken 200 hostages, reportedly including foreign nationals.

7. On 18 February, accompanied by the Executive Secretary of ECOWAS, Mr. Lansana Kouyaté, Minister Ikimi visited Sierra Leone to assess the situation on the ground. They interviewed some former junta soldiers now detained by ECOMOG and visited the State House complex and the Parliament buildings. Many of the government buildings were found to have been looted and were in poor condition, and a number of unexploded bombs were scattered about. However, the ECOWAS team, which was enthusiastically greeted by crowds, found that in many respects life had returned to normal in the capital. As noted below, my Special Envoy also visited Freetown on the same day.

8. From 25 to 27 February 1998, the Committee of Five met in the margins of the meeting of the Organization of African Unity (OAU) Council of Ministers held in Addis Ababa to review the situation in Sierra Leone. The Committee issued a communiqué, which was subsequently circulated as document S/1998/170.

9. On 4 March 1998, the members of the Committee of Five returned to New York and met again with members of the Security Council and with me. Chief Ikimi briefed me on his visit to Freetown on 18 February and his subsequent meeting with President Tejan Kabbah in Conakry. Following this meeting, it was announced that President Kabbah would return to his country on 10 March 1998.

10. ECOMOG has also prepared a detailed list of logistical requirements for its operations in Sierra Leone. During the visit to New York of the Committee of Five, Chief Ikimi requested the assistance of the United Nations and the international community in ensuring that these requirements could be met. That request was reaffirmed by the Chairman of ECOWAS, General Sani Abacha, in his statement at the ceremony held to mark the return of President Kabbah to Freetown on 10 March.

Action taken by the United Nations

11. On 18 February 1998, a few days after ECOMOG had established control over most of the city of Freetown, my Special Envoy, Mr. Francis G. Okelo, led a security and humanitarian assessment mission to the capital and to Lungi comprising United Nations and non-governmental organization officials. The mission determined the most immediate needs of the population. Mr. Okelo handed over a quantity of medicines donated by the World Health Organization (WHO) to local hospitals and began preparations for the re-establishment of a United Nations presence in Freetown. A few days later, the World Food Programme (WFP) delivered 857 metric tons of food to Freetown by ship.

12. Early in February, pursuant to a request by members of the Security Council for a technical assessment of the humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone since the coup d'état of 25 May 1997, an inter-agency mission travelled to the subregion. Its report is contained in document S/1998/155. Further information on the humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone can be found in section III of the present report.

13. Pursuant to the statement issued by the President of the Security Council on 26 February, I have initiated the necessary action to establish a Trust Fund for Sierra Leone. Contributions would help finance logistical assistance to ECOMOG, rehabilitation assistance to the Government of Sierra Leone and activities, including disarmament, demobilization and human rights.

14. On 7 March 1998, my Special Envoy reopened the United Nations office in Freetown, which had been closed shortly after the 25 May 1997 coup d'état and was temporarily relocated in Conakry, Guinea. The office is now being strengthened to comprise civilian political and humanitarian officers, a military adviser and, in due course, human rights and civilian police advisers and public information personnel. The function of the office is to liaise with the Government of Sierra Leone, ECOWAS, ECOMOG and the United Nations and its agencies, as well as non-governmental organizations, and to act as the overall authority for all United Nations activities in the country. My proposals for deploying military liaison personnel as part of the United Nations presence on the ground can be found in section IV of the present report. My Special Envoy will also temporarily retain a small office in Conakry, but he expects to be fully established in Freetown by the end of March, thus paving the way for the return of all United Nations agencies to Sierra Leone.

Action taken by the Government of Sierra Leone

15. On 13 February 1998, President Kabbah called a meeting in Conakry of potential donors, including the European Union, Germany, the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Northern Ireland and the United Nations, to discuss his Government's priorities; the nature of the assistance the international community could provide; and the urgent provision of humanitarian assistance. The President announced that he had created a task force to prepare the ground for the resumption of work by his Government, to assess damage to the infrastructure and to prepare for the resumption of education. President Kabbah identified the immediate priorities of his Government as the provision of humanitarian supplies and petroleum products, the reactivation of international aid programmes and the disarmament and demobilization of former combatants. Three other areas that required special attention have been identified as the training and restructuring of the police force, the creation of job opportunities for young people and the construction of low-cost housing. President Kabbah also indicated that he intended to streamline his administration and appoint technical experts to cabinet positions.

16. Following the removal by ECOMOG of the military junta from power, President Kabbah issued a statement announcing his intention to submit proposals to Parliament concerning the rebuilding of his country. The President also spoke out against the reprisal killings, which, in some cases, had accompanied the seizure of control from the junta.

17. On 10 March 1998, accompanied by General Sani Abacha, Chairman of ECOWAS and Head of State of Nigeria, as well as the Heads of State of Guinea, Mali and Niger, President Lansana Conteh, President Alpha Oumar Konare and President Ibrahim Bare Mainassara, and the Vice-President of Gambia, President Tejan Kabbah returned to Freetown to resume his office as Head of State of Sierra Leone. He was greeted by large and enthusiastic crowds. Mr. Ibrahima Fall, Assistant Secretary-General for Political Affairs, delivered on my behalf a message of congratulations to the President stating that his return represented the accomplishment of a major objective not only of the people of Sierra Leone, but also of ECOWAS, OAU, the United Nations and the entire international community. I expressed my deep regret at the violence, loss of life and property and immense suffering undergone by the people of Sierra Leone since the coup d'état and extended my condolences to the families of those who lost their lives in opposing it. Furthermore, I informed the President that the United Nations looked forward to working closely with him in helping his Government to reassert its authority and strengthen its capacity throughout the country.

18. In a statement made at the ceremony marking his return to Sierra Leone, President Kabbah declared his intention to embark on the process of national reconciliation and reconstruction of the country, to form a broad-based Government and to appoint a policy advisory committee. In his first meeting with my Special Envoy after his return, President Kabbah stressed the need for an early deployment of United Nations military personnel, the urgent provision of humanitarian assistance and the prompt establishment of the Trust Fund for Sierra Leone.

Military and security situation in Sierra Leone

19. Freetown is now fully under the control of ECOMOG and is increasingly secure. Some unexploded ordnance and landmines have been found, but these are not a threat to security. The peninsula on which the capital stands has also been secured. With the capture of almost every other major town in the country, and through its deployment further into the countryside in the north, south and east, ECOMOG has established itself successfully across most of the country.

20. Nevertheless, the fact that many of the senior junta leaders, including the former Chairman of the AFRC, Johnny Paul Koroma, have not thus far been apprehended, as well as the continuing violence inflicted on civilians during their retreat from ECOMOG forces by RUF and other armed elements, indicate that the security situation in Sierra Leone is still a source of concern. Though ECOMOG has begun to collect weapons in Freetown, a major disarmament, demobilization and reintegration exercise will be needed to ensure security.

21. ECOMOG has also developed a concept of operations for its deployment throughout Sierra Leone that sets out the preliminary planning for the disarmament and demobilization of Sierra Leonean combatants. In summary, the tasks ECOMOG has set for itself include:

(a) Deployment throughout Sierra Leone;

(b) Manning of selected entry points by land, sea or air in order to ensure that no arms, ammunition or war matériel are brought into the country;

(c) Disarmament of ex-combatants at designated sites;

(d) Establishment of road blocks to check the movement of arms and ammunition and to assist in extending protection to refugees and internally displaced persons;

(e) Conducting patrols to create an atmosphere conducive to freedom of movement and the restoration of established authority;

(f) Providing security for key individuals, United Nations personnel, including military personnel, and non-governmental organizations.

22. The plan calls for the deployment of 15,000 troops in four sectors: western, northern, southern and eastern. The western sector, comprising Freetown and the airports of Lungi and Hastings, is further subdivided, and would support the deployment of seven battalions, an air force detachment and an artillery brigade. This appears to be an ample level of force for the protection of the capital and its airport.

23. In the northern sector, ECOMOG would deploy a brigade headquartered at Makeni, with battalions located at Port Loko, Magburaka and Kabala. In the south, ECOMOG will locate its brigade headquarters at Bo and deploy battalions at Moyamba, Pujehun and Kenema. Naval assets would also be required. The eastern sector is described as strategic in view of its mineral resources, the presence of heavy RUF and Kamajor concentration, and the border with Liberia. ECOMOG therefore considers that operations in the east could prove difficult and risky and demand a robust approach, alertness and deployment in strength. Battalions would be located at Yengema, Zimmi and Kailahun.

24. ECOMOG would also establish a disarmament committee which would be charged, inter alia, with selecting disarmament sites; setting standards and guidelines for disarmament; conducting the disarmament, coordination of resources and cooperation with other organizations; classifying and transporting recovered weapons and ammunition; disseminating information about the process and providing security for all participants. A ceasefire violations committee and a humanitarian services committee would also be created.

25. My Special Envoy and his staff are actively discussing with the Government and with ECOMOG the further elaboration and implementation of its concept of operations, which provides a suitable basis for the possible subsequent deployment of United Nations military personnel, subject to the authorization of the Security Council. I will revert to the Council with further recommendations on such deployment following a further assessment by my Special Envoy.

Other action taken pursuant to resolution 1132 (1997)

26. Since my previous report, a number of States have written to me, in compliance with paragraph 13 of resolution 1132 (1997), concerning the steps they have taken to give effect to the provisions contained in paragraphs 5 and 6 of the resolution relating to the sanctions imposed by the Council on Sierra Leone. The latest list of those States can be found in a separate report to the Security Council contained in document S/1998/112.

27. In a letter dated 9 March 1998 addressed to the President of the Security Council (S/1998/215), the Chargé d'affaires a.i. of the Permanent Mission of Sierra Leone to the United Nations conveyed a request from his Government for the convening of an urgent meeting of the Security Council to consider the lifting of the sanctions imposed on the importation of petroleum and petroleum products into the country in paragraph 6 of resolution 1132 (1997). On 16 March, the Council adopted resolution 1156 (1998) terminating, with immediate effect, the prohibitions on the sale or supply to Sierra Leone of petroleum and petroleum products referred to in resolution 1132 (1997).

III. HUMANITARIAN SITUATION

28. A number of United Nations humanitarian assessment missions have now been undertaken to Freetown, Kambia, Bo, Kenema and Makeni. These missions determined that the current humanitarian situation in Sierra Leone remains serious. The primary health care system has been devastated by lack of supplies, looting and the exodus of medical personnel at all levels. Widespread neglect of water and sanitation facilities has increased the exposure of hundreds of thousands to disease. The normal distribution of food to vulnerable groups has been disrupted, affecting children in particular. Many children have also suffered exposure to acts of violence by being sent into battle as combatants. The public education system has collapsed; all schools have been closed since the coup d'état last May. The combination of fighting and looting has led to extensive damage to housing and infrastructure in the provincial towns. The number of internally displaced people has increased, and the welfare of some 14,000 Liberian refugees remains a matter of concern, as many fled from their camps during the recent fighting. The majority of Sierra Leoneans who took refuge in Conakry during the fighting in Freetown have returned. However, some 24,000 Sierra Leoneans have arrived in Liberia since mid-February and the influx continues, albeit at a reduced rate. A further influx of 3,000 refugees from the Kailahun area, still not under ECOMOG control, has been registered by the Office of the United Nations High Commissioner for Refugees (UNHCR) at its camp in Kissidougou, Guinea.

29. United Nations agencies prepared a consolidated inter-agency flash appeal, which was launched on 3 March 1998. Through this appeal, I am seeking financial contributions from Member States in the amount of $11.2 million to meet priority humanitarian needs in Sierra Leone over the next three months. Priority needs include support to agriculture through the provision of seeds and tools, the re-establishment of basic health and education services, the resumption of food aid distributions and the provision of assistance and protection to the most vulnerable groups affected by the current conflict. The flash appeal complements the 90-day programme of the Government of Sierra Leone, which serves as a framework for action following the restoration of democratic civilian rule in the country.

30. The full deployment of ECOMOG and the restoration of the legitimate Government is expected to provide increased opportunities for the humanitarian community to accelerate its activities in response to the humanitarian crisis in Sierra Leone, and will also encourage the return to their homes of internally displaced persons. It is hoped that the international community will contribute generously to the humanitarian programme outlined in the flash appeal, in order to provide the crucial assistance needed to sustain lives and to promote stability in Sierra Leone.

31. Medium-term tasks, such as the assisted repatriation of Sierra Leonean refugees and reintegration of ex-combatants, are not covered in the flash appeal. However, United Nations agencies are already re-establishing their offices in Freetown and are eager to restart their social and economic development programmes, important components of which must be the re-building of the capacity of the Government of Sierra Leone to deliver services, stimulate economic recovery and promote national reconciliation and reconstruction.

Commencement of the repatriation of refugees

32. At the request of President Kabbah, and with the help of a donation of $120,000 from the Government of Japan, UNHCR has begun to prepare for the repatriation from Conakry of up to 5,000 Sierra Leonean refugees, including 200 civil servants who fled Freetown after the May coup d'état and who will be engaged in the administration of the country.

33. ECOMOG control of major towns in southern Sierra Leone is also likely to encourage the early repatriation by road of Sierra Leonean refugees from Liberia. It is further expected that the removal of the junta could lead to the repatriation of the 400,000 Sierra Leonean refugees in the West African subregion.

34. Of the total caseload of Liberian refugees in Sierra Leone, some 2,800 have thus far been re-registered with UNHCR, about half of them requesting repatriation. UNHCR has begun making arrangements for them to be repatriated by sea.

United Nations Development Programme mission to Sierra Leone

35. A multi-unit mission to Sierra Leone dispatched by the United Nations Development Programme (UNDP) has proposed four projects for immediate implementation following their approval by the Government. These are:

(a) A start-up project for the demobilization of various categories of combatants;

(b) Support for national institutions to enable a rapid return to normal functioning;

(c) Resettlement with emphasis on quick-impact micro-projects, reconciliation and youth development;

(d) Awareness-raising in order to help the country come to terms with the problems it faces and to promote national reconciliation and peace-building.

36. The mission is also assisting the Government to prepare a document for a donors' consultation proposed to be held in Brussels on 31 March 1998. UNDP plans to close its Coordination Office in Conakry by the end of March if the security situation continues to stabilize, and to return the staff of its Country Office to Freetown.

IV. OBSERVATIONS AND RECOMMENDATIONS

37. The developments that have taken place in Sierra Leone since the submission of my last report should be seen as positive in the context of the wider situation in which they transpired. The removal of the junta by the action of ECOMOG has opened the way for the re-establishment not just of the legitimate Government, but also of civil order, the democratic process and the beginnings of economic and social development. The return of President Kabbah to Freetown on 10 March therefore presents the people of Sierra Leone and the international community with a challenge and an opportunity which must be grasped with a sense of urgency. We must not let slip the chance to restore Sierra Leone to the ranks of democratic nations and to help strengthen the stability of the subregion.

38. I commend the consistent diplomacy of ECOWAS and, in particular, its Committee of Five on Sierra Leone, and the contribution made by ECOMOG officers and men to the removal of the military junta. I call on ECOWAS and ECOMOG to continue their efforts to bring peace to Sierra Leone in accordance with the relevant provisions of resolution 1132 (1997) and of the Charter of the United Nations. Sierra Leoneans committed to the democratic system also played their part in maintaining a stubborn resistance to the illegal regime. These included not only the members of the Civil Defence Forces, but also countless unarmed civilians who persistently withheld their cooperation from the regime and denied it legitimacy. I salute the courage of the Sierra Leonean people and honour the memory of those who died opposing the junta.

39. I also congratulate President Ahmad Tejan Kabbah on his resumption of his responsibilities as Head of State of Sierra Leone following his return. The United Nations should give his Government every possible assistance in its efforts to promote national reconciliation among his people and to strengthen the authority and capacity of his Government.

40. As I stated in my message to the annual summit meeting of the Organization of African Unity at Harare, and in the special message which was delivered by my Special Envoy, Mr. Ibrahima Fall, on the occasion of President Kabbah's return, Africa can no longer tolerate or accept as faits accomplis coups d'état against elected Governments or the illegal seizure of power by military cliques.

Strengthening the office of the Special Envoy

41. In order to take full and prompt advantage of the changed situation, I wish to propose a comprehensive set of measures to assist the Government and people of Sierra Leone in both their immediate and longer-term needs. As a first step, I intend to strengthen the office of my Special Envoy in Freetown. In order to contribute to the restoration of respect for the rule of law, civil order and human rights in Sierra Leone, I have consulted with the United Nations High Commissioner for Human Rights concerning the possible deployment of human rights observers. In the meantime, a human rights officer will be attached to the office of my Special Envoy at an early date.

42. I am also considering attaching to the office two civilian police officials to advise the Government on police training and procedures in a democratic society. An additional political officer and a military adviser would assist my Special Envoy in his consultations with ECOMOG on the development of planning for disarmament and demobilization, while a humanitarian officer would facilitate the coordination of activities of the United Nations and non-governmental organizations in Sierra Leone and advise my Special Envoy on all issues involving non-governmental organizations. The office will also require a public information programme to disseminate information among the population about its activities, in particular in connection with the disarmament and demobilization of ex-combatants and their reintegration into society.

Deployment of military liaison personnel

43. I also recommend the deployment to Sierra Leone of up to 10 United Nations military liaison officers, whose functions would be as follows:

(a) To liaise closely with ECOMOG and to report on the military situation in the country;

(b) To ascertain the state of and to assist in the finalization of planning by ECOMOG for future tasks such as the identification of the former combatant elements to be disarmed and the design of a disarmament plan.

44. Should the Security Council decide to authorize the deployment of these military liaison officers, as well as the military and civilian police advisers, as indicated in my third report (S/1998/103, para. 35), the costs relating thereto should be considered an expense of the Organization to be borne by Member States in accordance with Article 17, paragraph 2, of the Charter of the United Nations and the assessments to be levied on Member States should be credited to the special account to be established for Sierra Leone. The related cost estimates will be issued shortly as an addendum to the present report.

45. The military liaison team would complement the role of the military advisers who will, under the authority of my Special Envoy, continue to assist the Government of Sierra Leone to resolve issues related to the disarmament process. The military advisers will also be instrumental in assisting the Government of Sierra Leone in the development of planning for bilateral programmes to restructure and rebuild appropriate security forces for Sierra Leone in the future. In view of the importance of such retraining, I appeal to potential donors to show generosity in providing bilateral assistance.

46. The presence of United Nations military liaison officers, perhaps later supplemented by human rights observers, could also assist in the process of national reconciliation in Sierra Leone. Their close cooperation with ECOMOG in the countryside and their impartial reporting to my Special Envoy would reassure former combatants that they can surrender their weapons in safety.

Provision of humanitarian assistance

47. The provision of humanitarian assistance must also proceed expeditiously. The plight of Sierra Leoneans deprived of food, medical care and shelter by the recent fighting and the abuses of junta rule is acute, and it must be addressed as a matter of urgency with all the resources available to the aid agencies. While I remain deeply concerned about the humanitarian situation in many parts of the country, I am encouraged by news that humanitarian needs are beginning to be addressed. Food aid and emergency medical supplies have entered the country through the port of Freetown and have been delivered to some provinces by plane, helicopter and overland in a prompt and coordinated manner.

Contributions to the Trust Fund

48. I call on Member States to display generosity in contributing to the Trust Fund for Sierra Leone which, with the encouragement of the Security Council, I have established. My appreciation goes to the Government of the United Kingdom, which has already announced its readiness to contribute £2 million, and has been actively assisting in the provision of aid to Sierra Leoneans. I also urge all Member States to provide generous assistance to ECOMOG to enable it to meet its logistical requirements and to fulfil its mandate in Sierra Leone.

49. The events that have taken place in Sierra Leone over the past year carry a warning that similar crises may arise and challenge the international community to consider how it should respond to them. Democracy in Sierra Leone may have deep roots, but it is a fragile plant and must be nurtured. The international community must maintain its vigilance and support, not least in the prompt provision of emergency bilateral and multilateral aid. Assistance for the laudable efforts of ECOWAS and the logistical requirements of ECOMOG as it continues its deployment through the countryside will also be required. I trust that such support will be forthcoming.

RAPP'S COMMENTS RAISE CONCERN WITHIN THE GOL

2. (C) Chief Prosecutor Stephen Rapp's ill considered announcement in the press February 24 that Charles Taylor may walk free because of a supposed budget shortfall for the Special Court for Sierra Leone, where Taylor is presently on trial, made headlines in the local press, and raised anxiety here about Taylor's imminent return. The GOL was alarmed enough that President Sirleaf called Ambassador on February 28 to raise her concerns. Sirleaf pointed out that Liberia's stability remains fragile, and such remarks reverberated throughout the country, as people are still traumatized by Taylor and the war.

3. (C) The press accounts out of The Hague have also emboldened the pro-Taylor factions here, including his extended family members, financiers and National Patriotic Party (NPP) loyalists, raising their hopes that Taylor might be acquitted soon. Despite their rhetoric about "moving on," they have thus far refused to appear before the Truth and Reconciliation Commission (TRC) to account for their activities, and those on the UN Sanctions lists continue to request delisting on the basis they have done nothing wrong rather than demonstrating what they have done to provide restitution for their activities.

GOL TREADING CAREFULLY WITH TAYLOR FACTIONS

4. (C) The government itself is caught in the middle. There is quite little the GOL can do legally to arrest, prosecute or freeze assets of those who were close to Taylor, even if the political will were there, which remains an open question. The TRC has recommended a domestic war crimes court be set up, but under statute an Independent National Commission on Human Rights (INHCR) would implement the recommendation, and the Legislature (some of whom had close ties to Taylor) has thus far failed to establish the INCHR. The Legislature has also refused to pass any law that would allow the GOL to freeze assets of those on the UN sanctions list, and the Supreme Court has ruled that any confiscation of property can be done only after a trial.

5. (C) The Accra Comprehensive Peace Agreement (CPA) of August 2003 that ended the 14-year civil war, did not require the NPP to disband and in fact permitted the NPP to participate in the transitional government and in the 2005 elections. The NPP now holds seven seats in the Legislature (which may be one reason the legislation is being blocked). As well, none of Taylor's properties have been seized by the government and they remain in good shape and remarkably free of squatters, as no one dares to take the risk of retribution.

COMMUNICATIONS AMONG TAYLOR SUPPORTERS REMAIN STRONG

---

6. (C) The pro-Taylor forces still have the ability to organize themselves. An NPP rally in December 2008 gathered a sizeable crowd, and Taylor supporters in June 2008 succeeded in preventing FBI investigators from entering Taylor's residence "White Flower" to obtain evidence for the Chucky Taylor trial in Florida. The most recent example was their effort on March 7 to disrupt the International Women's Colloquium. Taylor remains popular within many rural communities, especially in Bong, Lofa and Nimba counties, and is seen as someone who was able to unite Liberia's different ethnic groups. We also suspect there is some sympathy within the Americo-Liberian population who saw him as their deliverance from their losses following the 1979 coup. While we do not suggest they would want Taylor to return, we are sure that they do no want too many rocks to be turned over.

7. (C) Although we do not have any direct evidence to support the belief that pro-Taylor factions are behind much of the armed robbery on the premise that crime will keep the government weak and the country unstable, the GOL is certainly convinced of this, and has taken steps to counteract the threat. The most recent act was to put Taylor-era head of police Paul Mulbah into the LNP as an "advisor" that some accuse (and the government denies) was in order to placate the Taylor people in advance of the March 7-8 International Women's Colloquium. That the Taylor crowd can still motivate such a reaction in the government is a testament to their influence.

8. (C) Lines of communications within Taylor's faction, the National Patriotic Front of Liberia (NPFL) remain intact. To be sure, the disarmament of the factions following the CPA has been extremely successful, and we have thus far been unable to confirm the existence of any large weapons caches, despite the persistent rumors. But the reintegration of the ex-combatants is far from complete. Former NPFL commanders Roland Duo (the only senior Taylor supporter to have testified before the TRC), Christopher "General Mosquito" Vambo and Melvin Sogbandi (none of whom are on the sanctions lists) remain in contact with the ex-combatants, and would have the capability to organize an uprising or even criminal activity.

9. (C) Certainly, the same is true for the other factions, the Liberians United for Reconciliation and Democracy (LURD) and the Movement for Democracy in Liberia (MODEL). While apparently unarmed and not active in Liberia, we continue to receive reports that LURD is recruiting ex-combatants for militias in Guinea and MODEL is doing the same for Cote d'Ivoire.

THREAT OF TAYLOR'S RETURN ADVANCES THEIR CAUSE

10. (C) XXXXXXXXXXXX

11. (C) The threat of a return of Taylor strengthens their hand and for now they see no need to give in at all. However, if Taylor is put away for a long time, the government may feel a bit bolder in recovering assets and bringing Taylor backers who committed war crimes to justice.

12. (C) The international community has just a few tools to pressure the Taylor people into accepting the new reality. The UN sanctions appear to have the intended effect of keeping them somewhat marginalized and fearful of further attempts to strip them of their ill-gotten gains. However, we have regularly heard of travel outside Liberia of those on the travel ban list without prior approval.

NEXT STEPS FOR THE INTERNATIONAL COMMUNITY

13. (C) However, the best we can do for Liberia is to see to it that Taylor is put away for a long time and we cannot delay for the results of the present trial to consider next steps. All legal options should be studied to ensure that Taylor cannot return to destabilize Liberia. Building a case in the United States against Taylor for financial crimes such as wire fraud would probably be the best route. There may be other options, such as applying the new law criminalizing the use of child soldiers or terrorism statutes.

14. (C) The peace in Liberia remains fragile, and its only guarantee is the robust and adaptable UNMIL presence. The GOL does not have the ability to quell violence, monitor its borders or operate independently to fight crime. A free Taylor could tip the balance in the wrong direction. THOMAS-GREENFIELD

Summary
US officials wonder why a special court judge might be interested in slowing down the prosecution case against the former Sierra Leonean president. Key passages highlighted in yellow.

-- SUMMARY: SCSL MEETS A KEY MILESTONE, BUT FACES UNCERTAINTY IN TERMS OF TIMING, FINANCES, AND COMPLETION ISSUES --

1. (SBU) On February 27, 2009, the Special Court for Sierra Leone (SCSL or Court) took another step toward completing its work when the Prosecution rested its case against former Liberian President Charles Taylor -- the last SCSL case at the trial stage. The Court could potentially complete its work before the end of 2010. A number of open issues, however, may affect timing, including the start date and length of the Taylor Defense case. Timing may be particularly important given expected funding shortfalls and the possible loss of courtroom space this coming September. Additionally, the current Registrar, Herman von Hebel (Netherlands), has resigned effective June 1, and his successor will inherit a host of difficult issues and a complex transition during the final days of the Court,s operations.

--BACKGROUND: A SMALL COURT WITH SEVERAL FIRSTS --

2. (U) A Trailblazing Court. The hybrid SCSL, created in 2002 through an agreement between the United Nations and the Government of Sierra Leone (GOSL) and funded entirely by voluntary contributions, has jurisdiction over those who bear the greatest responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law and Sierra Leonean law committed in Sierra Leone after November 30, 1996. Although established almost ten years after the creation of the International Criminal Tribunals for the former Yugoslavia and Rwanda (ICTY and ICTR), the SCSL is poised to complete its work before these tribunals. The SCSL has also been the first internationalized criminal tribunal to: 1) issue an indictment for an African head of state (Liberian President Charles Taylor); 2) enter convictions for the crime of recruiting and using child soldiers; and 3) successfully prosecute forced marriage as a crime against humanity and intentional attacks on U.N. peacekeepers as a serious violation of international humanitarian law.

3. (U) Last Trial Standing. In 2003, the SCSL indicted Charles Taylor, the leader of the National Patriotic Front of Liberia from 1989 to 1997 and the President of Liberia from 1997 until the 2003 indictment. The indictment alleges Taylor,s deep involvement in the Sierra Leone conflict including his role in arming, training and acting in concert with the RUF and in trafficking the Sierra Leonean &blood diamonds8 that fueled and financed the fighting. The SCSL charged Taylor with eleven counts, including, inter alia, terrorizing the civilian population, unlawful killings, sexual violence, abductions and forced labor, and conscripting child soldiers.

))TIMING: TAYLOR TRIAL'S LINK TO CLOSING SCSL))

4. (SBU) Status of Trial. As the only ongoing SCSL trial, the Taylor trial is the linchpin to the SCSL completing its work. From April 6-9, 2009, the Court held the &judgment of acquittal8 hearing, with Defense arguing for acquittal on all of the charges. (Comment: In the &judgment of acquittal8 hearing, the Court considers whether Prosecution Qacquittal8 hearing, the Court considers whether Prosecution has presented any evidence that could sustain conviction on the charges, acquitting only if Prosecution has presented &no evidence8 to sustain the charge. End Comment.) In this hearing, Defense acknowledged that crimes had occurred in Sierra Leone but argued that the Prosecution had failed to 1) present evidence linking Taylor to those crimes and 2)establish that Taylor had been part of a joint criminal enterprise (JCE) because, if a JCE existed, it existed before November 30, 1996, the date at which the temporal jurisdiction of the SCSL begins. The Prosecution responded to these arguments by summarizing Taylor,s responsibility for the crimes and pointing to Taylor,s liability for JCE crimes committed after November 30, 1996, even if the planning of the JCE took place before that date. (Comment: The Court will most likely not issue its Rule 98 decision in April, especially since the Judges may recess through May. An acquittal does not seem likely. End Comment.)

5. (SBU) Next Up: Defense Case. A contact in the Registry has indicated that Defense will likely request three months to prepare for trial and four months to present its case. If the Court grants this request, the Defense case may start at the end of August. However, the same Registry source predicts that the Trial Chamber may order Defense to begin its case as early as June, working through July and August with a possible recess in September. One wild-card factor, however, is the Defense,s pending interlocutory appeal arguing that the Prosecution failed to properly plead the JCE theory of liability. The Trial Chamber may not schedule the Defense case before the appeals decision so the Defense knows which mode(s) of liability it must defend against. (Comment: Currently, the Registry,s budget milestone document projects an October 31 trial termination date, a March 2010 judgment, sentencing in April 2010, and the conclusion of appeals in October 2010. If, however, the Defense case starts in August, the timeline could be pushed back by approximately two months. End Comment.)

6. (U) Spill-Over Timing Effects. A delay in the timing for the Taylor trial may create additional challenges. First, the International Criminal Court (ICC), the location of the Taylor trial, has informed the SCSL that it will need its second courtroom as of September 2009. (The ICC scheduled its second trial to start September 24th, and will likely need the courtroom prior to September 24th for pre-trial work). Back-up options explored by the Registry include finding other space or working during gaps in the ICC schedule. Second, according to Registry sources, each additional month of trial time costs approximately one million dollars.

))THE JUDICIAL FACTOR))

7. (C) Judges Slowing Things Down? Further muddying timing predictions, Court employees have intimated that the Trial Chamber could work more expeditiously. The Taylor Chamber consists of three judges who take turns presiding: Justice Richard Lussick (Samoa), Justice Teresa Doherty (Northern Ireland) and Justice Julia Sebutinde (Uganda), along with an alternate judge, Justice El Hadji Malick Sow (Senegal). A couple of Court employees have grumbled that when the last Prosecution witness testified on January 30, 2009, the Court still had 11 outstanding motions, some over a year old. Additionally, one Chamber contact believes that the Trial Chamber could have accelerated the Court,s work by excluding extraneous material and arguments. Moreover, contacts in Prosecution and Registry speculate that Justice Sebutinde may have a timing agenda. They think she, as the only African judge, wants to hold the gavel as presiding judge when the Trial Chamber announces the Taylor judgment. Reportedly, her next stint as presiding judge begins in January.

8. (SBU) Expedited Appeals? The Appeals Chamber, with one empty seat, consists of President Renate Winter (Austria); Vice President Jon Kamanda (Sierra Leone); Justice George Gelaga King (Sierra Leone); and Justice Emmanuel Ayoola (Nigeria). President Winter reportedly has indicated that the Appeals Chamber intends to expedite any Taylor trial Qthe Appeals Chamber intends to expedite any Taylor trial appeals. Up for election in May, Winter may not, however, preside over the Appeals Chamber for any Taylor trial appeals, reportedly she will step down after the RUF appeal if she is not re-elected President.

))DEFENSE STRATEGY: WHO ME?))

1616

finds itself in the midst of identifying and proofing witnesses. All signs indicate that Taylor himself will take the stand as their first witness possibly staying in the box for 6 to 8 weeks, and based on Defense,s actions to date, the Defense team will likely argue that although the crimes may have occurred, Taylor has no link to the crimes.

))AN IMMINENT BUDGET CRISIS))

10. (C) Funding Shortfall. The Registry fears that the Court will run out of money as early as next month, although an expected Canadian USD 6 million contribution would keep the Court financed until early July 2009. In a marathon campaign, Registrar Von Hebel attended 250 meetings in 15 months to drum up funds from potential donor countries, but with, according Von Hebel, little traction, due to donor fatigue, the difficult economic situation, and contributions going to other tribunals (e.g., the Special Tribunal for Lebanon (STL) or the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia). Von Hebel wants to make another run at the Arab countries of Saudi Arabia, Qatar, Kuwait, and the United Arab Emirates. He also believes that a letter from U.N. Secretary General Ban Ki-Moon asking countries to contribute might help open wallets. According to Von Hebel, when Ban sent out a similar letter in 2007, a number of countries made first-time donations. In addition, a couple of traditional donor countries have advised him they may need a similar letter in order to donate this year.

11. (U) Cost-cutting Measures: Concerned about the looming financial crisis, the Registry has undertaken cost-saving measures, reducing staffing costs by downsizing, incorporating liquidation clauses in contracts, and encouraging The Hague staff to use leave during the break between prosecution and defense cases. The Registry also plans to hand over the Freetown facilities to the GOSL in July 2010, reserving some space for its own continued use. Finally, Registry may look to consolidate the Appeals Chamber and the Taylor trial operations in The Hague, after the Appeals Chamber finalizes the RUF appeal.

12. (SBU) Help from Washington. The Registry may also seek USG,s assistance on financial issues. First, it may press the USG not to reduce its FY2009 contribution by 2 million, but to stay at last year,s level of 9 million USD. (Comment: The extra sum would not solve the Court,s immediate financial problem, since the USG generally contributes in the fall. End Comment.) Second, the Registry may ask for USG political support in the form of demarches to Arab countries, impressing upon the targeted Arab countries the critical nature of the SCSL,s financial situation.

))COMPLETION HICCUPS AND ISSUES))

13. (SBU) Registrar Musical Chairs. On April 8, 2009, the Court announced Registrar von Hebel,s resignation, effective as of June 1, 2009. Von Hebel will assume the Deputy Registrar position at the newly established Hague-based STL. (According to Embassy contacts, STL offered Von Hebel the position at the insistence of and to placate the Dutch, who believe the Dutch ICTY Registrar had been treated unfairly when the ICTY President unexpectedly declined to renew his contract). Given that the STL Registrar Robin Vincent (U.K.) recently resigned, Von Hebel may eventually step into Vincent,s shoes. Von Hebel is also tying up as many SCSL loose ends as possible, including signing a sentence-enforcement agreement with the Government of Rwanda. In terms of a successor Registrar, a Registry contact believes that the current Deputy Registrar Binta Mansaray (Sierra Leone) will surface as a strong candidate.

))COMMENT: RESIDUAL ISSUES))

14. (SBU) A Larger Role for The Hague? Although currently headquartered in Freetown, Sierra Leone, the Registry has toyed with the possibility of locating any Residual Mechanism Qtoyed with the possibility of locating any Residual Mechanism) or parts thereof) in The Hague. For instance, Von Hebel believes that the Court may need to move its archives out of Sierra Leone in order to properly maintain and secure them. The City of The Hague has indicated its willingness to provide archiving facilities in connection with the ICTY,s closure. Some have also suggested combining some or part of the SCSL,s residual functions with those of The Hague-based ICTY and the Arusha-based ICTR. A combined residual mechanism might prevent duplication, but it would also face significant hurdles, given SCSL,s structural differences, e.g. funding, oversight mechanism and applicable legal framework. Furthermore, GOSL desires will be key, since a joint GOSL-UN agreement created the Court.

Decision on Sentence pursuant to Article 76 of the Statute

9. On 7 June 2012, the legal representatives filed their submissions on the defence request to introduce additional evidence.[16] The prosecution filed its submissions on this issue on 8 June 2012.[17]

10. The Chamber issued an Order on the defence request to provide the Chamber with additional evidence during the sentencing hearing on 11 June 2012,[18] granting leave to the defence to: (i) call two additional witnesses (D01-0039 and D01-0040) via a video-link with the DRC; (ii) rely on two documents when questioning witness D01-0040;[19] and (iii) introduce an additional document relevant to the time spent by Mr Lubanga in detention in the DRC.[20]

11. The sentencing hearing was held on 13 June 2012, during which the Chamber heard the evidence of witnesses D01-0039 and D01-0040. Thereafter the Prosecutor, the legal representatives of victims and the defence made their oral submissions. Following these submissions, Mr Lubanga made a statement to the Chamber.[21] The evidence of the two additional witnesses and all the oral submissions are considered below, where relevant.

II. The jurisprudence of other courts in relation to sentencing regarding child soldiers

12. Although the decisions of other international courts and tribunals are not part of the directly applicable law under Article 21 of the Statute, the ad hoc tribunals are in a comparable position to the Court in the context of sentencing. However, the should not exceed the factual circumstances identified in the Confirmation Decision supporting each of the legal elements of the crimes charged.[43]

29. The legal framework applicable to the sentencing stage of the proceedings, applying Article 21(1) of the Statute, is set out in Articles 23, 76, 77, 78 and 81(2)(a) of the Statute and Rules 143, 145 and 146 of the Rules, and it is to be noted that none of these provisions limit the factors that are properly to be considered during sentencing to those described in the Confirmation Decision. Instead, Article 76(1) of the Statute establishes that when considering the "appropriate" sentence, the Trial Chamber "shall take into account the evidence presented and submissions made during the trial that are relevant to the sentence". Pursuant to Article 76(2) of the Statute, the Chamber "may on its own motion, and shall, at the request of the Prosecutor or the accused, hold a further hearing to hear any additional evidence or submissions relevant to the sentence [...]". In the judgment of the Chamber, the evidence admitted at this stage can exceed the facts and circumstances set out in the Confirmation Decision, provided the defence has had a reasonable opportunity to address them.

30. As set out above, during the preparation stage of the trial, the Chamber indicated that it would hold a separate sentencing hearing in the event of a conviction and, for reasons of efficiency and economy, it ordered that evidence relating to sentence could be admitted during the trial.[44] The defence has had a sufficient opportunity to challenge the evidence and the allegations relevant to the sentence as advanced during the trial. In addition, the Chamber has provided the defence an opportunity to respond to all the submissions and evidence that have been relied on for the purposes of sentence following Mr Lubanga's conviction.[45] The Chamber requested written submissions on: (i) the procedure to be adopted for sentencing and the principles to be applied by the Chamber;[46] and (ii) the relevant evidence presented during trial, the aggravating and mitigating factors, and the sentence to be imposed on Mr Lubanga.[47] This has ensured that he has had adequate notice of the matters that may be taken into consideration by the Chamber at this stage of the proceedings.

31. Moreover, the defence has been provided with adequate time and facilities, including the opportunity to identify and introduce evidence relevant to sentence.

2) Standard of proof

32. The prosecution argues that the Chamber should not follow the jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals when they decided that the relevant aggravating factors need to be established by the prosecution beyond reasonable doubt and they must be directly related to the offences that resulted in a conviction.[48] The prosecution submits that it is open to the Chamber to make findings as to the aggravating and mitigating factors on the basis of a "balance of probabilities".[49] The defence argues that the aggravating factors must be proved beyond a reasonable doubt.[50]

33. It is for the Chamber to establish the standard of proof for the purposes of sentencing, given the Statute and the Rules do not provide any guidance. Since any aggravating factors established by the Chamber may have a significant effect in accordance with internationally recognized human rights; first and foremost, in the context of the Statute,[81] the right to a fair trial, a concept broadly perceived and applied, embracing the judicial process in its entirety.[82] The Statute itself makes evidence obtained in breach of internationally recognized human rights inadmissible in the circumstances specified by article 69 (7) of the Statute. Where fair trial becomes impossible because of breaches of the fundamental rights of the suspect or the accused by his/her accusers, it would be a contradiction in terms to put the person on trial. Justice could not be done. A fair trial is the only means to do justice. If no fair trial can be held, the object of the judicial process is frustrated and the process must be stopped.

38. The decision of the European Court of Human Rights in the Case of Teixeira de Castro v. Portugal[83], a case of entrapment by undercover agents, provides an example of serious breaches of the rights of the accused by the investigating authorities, rendering the holding of a fair trial impossible. The following passage from the judgment puts the matter in perspective as to the implications that such conduct may have on the holding of a fair trial. Improper conduct by the investigating authorities and the use of evidence resulting therefrom "in the impugned criminal proceedings meant that, right from the outset, the applicant was definitively deprived of a fair trial."[84] In another passage the European Court of Human Rights recorded: "The general requirements of fairness embodied in Article 6 apply to proceedings concerning all types of criminal offences, from the most straightforward to the most complex."[85]

39. Where the breaches of the rights of the accused are such as to make it impossible for him/her to make his/her defence within the framework of his rights, no fair trial can take place and the proceedings can be stayed. To borrow an expression from the decision of the English Court of Appeal in Huang v. Secretary of State[86], it is the duty of a court: "to see to the protection of individual fundamental rights which is the particular territory of the courts [...]" Unfairness in the treatment of the suspect or the accused may rupture the process to an extent making it impossible to piece together the constituent elements of a fair trial. In those circumstances, the interest of the world community to put persons accused of the most heinous crimes against humanity on trial, great as it is, is outweighed by the need to sustain the efficacy of the judicial process as the potent agent of justice.

D. The validity of the findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber

40. Two grounds of appeal are directed against the validity of the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber in that it adopted an unduly restrictive approach to the relinquishment of jurisdiction for violations of the fundamental rights of the accused.[87] To this, the Appeals Chamber cannot agree. As may be discerned from the principles identified in the decision of the Pre-Trial Chamber as relevant to stay of proceedings, a broader standard was adopted than the one warranted in law in that it failed to require the specific consideration of whether a fair trial remained possible in the particular circumstances of the case. The findings of the Pre-Trial Chamber to the effect that the appellant was not subjected to any ill-treatment in the process of his arrest and conveyance before the Court sidelines the importance of the precise ambit of the test applied as a guide to the resolution of this appeal.

41. The other complaint is that the Pre-Trial Chamber applied the wrong standard in reviewing the efficacy of the process leading to the arrest and surrender of the suspect, allegedly ignoring or paying inadequate attention to the supervisory role of the Pre-Trial Chamber under article 59 (2) of the Statute.[88] The appellant's argument is that the Pre-Trial Chamber is charged under this article to review the correctness of the decision of the Congolese authority to sanction the enforcement of the warrant of arrest. No such role is cast on the Court. The enforcement of a warrant of arrest is designed to ensure, as article 59 (2) of the Statute specifically directs, that there is identity between the person against whom the warrant is directed and the arrested person, secondly, that the process followed is the one envisaged by national law, and thirdly that the person's rights have criminal responsibility for group members making non-essential contributions in ways not intended by the Defence's primary supporting authority.[652]

274. Furthermore, the Defence argument, if accepted, would create results at odds with common sense in circumstances where persons who lack the intent to commit any crimes themselves contribute to group crimes with knowledge of the group's intention to commit those crimes. The Chamber notes that, unlike the jurisprudence of the ad hoc tribunals,[653] article 25(3)(c) of the Statute requires that the person act with the purpose to facilitate the crime; knowledge is not enough for responsibility under this article. Unless the requisite superior-subordinate relationship exists to charge responsibility under article 28 of the Statute, 25(3)(d) liability is the only other way a person can be held criminally responsible for acting merely with knowledge of the criminal intentions of others.[654] Therefore, if command responsibility does not apply and 25(3)(d) liability were limited only to persons outside the group, all such persons who knowingly make non-essential contributions to crimes could be convicted if they are outside the group, but could not be convicted when making identical contributions from inside the group. Such an outcome would create results which run contrary to any literal, systematic or teleological interpretation of the principles established in the Statute for individual criminal responsibility.

275. For these reasons, the Chamber finds that the correct interpretation of 25(3)(d) liability is that it must apply irrespective of whether the person is or is not a member of the group acting with a common purpose.

[652] The Chamber also notes that another respected commentator analysed Professor Cassese's position on 25(3)(d) liability and concluded that the "outside contributor" interpretation is ultimately unconvincing. COURT USHER: All rise. The International Criminal Court is now in session. Please be seated.

COURT OFFICER: Good morning, your Honours, Madam President. We are in open session.

PRESIDING JUDGE MONAGENG: Good morning, everybody.

Court Officer, please read the case out.

COURT OFFICER: Situation in the Democratic Republic of the Congo, in the case of the Prosecutor versus Callixte Mbarushimana, case reference ICC-01/04-01/10.

PRESIDING JUDGE MONAGENG: Thank you.

The composition of the Chamber remains the same, and I will now invite the Prosecution to inform us of any changes in their composition.

MR. STEYNBERG: Good morning, Madam President, your Honours. The Prosecution team is the same as it was yesterday.

PRESIDING JUDGE MONAGENG: Thank you very much.

Rome Statute. I also decided to intervene, since this is the first case, the first confirmation hearing, where this provision will be the object of analysis, i.e., in other words, the Court will set the precedent which is very important for the future international criminal law and it's very important, I shall add, for the legitimacy of this Court.

My presentation will be divided into three sections. First of all, I will make some general remarks on the genesis of this subparagraph (d). I will then try to delimitate subparagraph (d) from subparagraph (a) and subparagraph (c) of Article 25, para 3, in order to then - and that will be the most important part and the main part of my presentation - apply subparagraph (d) to the charges before us.

I will not talk about evidence here. I will make a strict legal analysis, taking into account the Prosecution case, i.e., the case as it was presented by the document of charges and as it was a little bit amended, I must say, in Friday's and yesterday's hearing. I have studied carefully the transcripts and I will explain to you why I think that this case has a little bit shifted.

So let me start with my introductory remarks. As you know, Article 25(3)(d) of the Rome Statute was a compromise when we negotiated this provision in Rome and I was part of the German delegation in Rome and I was participating in the working group of general principals which negotiated, among others, this provision. It represents a compromise between those States' delegations which tried to oppose or opposed any form of anticipated or organisational/collective responsibility and it tried to strike a compromise between this position and the position of chain of command.[79] The Prosecution submits that there is no indication that the Trial Chamber focused on the test of effective control.[80]

50. Under Article 6(3), a commander or superior is the one who possesses the power or authority in either a de jure or a de facto form to prevent a subordinate's crime or to punish the commission of a crime by a subordinate after the crime is committed".[81] The power or authority to prevent or to punish does not arise solely from a de jure authority conferred through official appointment.[82] Hence, "as long as a superior has effective control over subordinates, to the extent that he can prevent them from committing crimes or punish them after they committed the crimes, he would be held responsible for the commission of the crimes if he failed to exercise such abilities of control." [83] The effective control test applies to all superiors, whether de jure or de facto, military or civilian.[84]

51. Indeed, it emerges from international case-law that the doctrine of superior responsibility is not limited to military superiors, but also extends to civilian superiors. In the Čelebići case, it was held that:

> [...] the doctrine of superior responsibility extends to civilian superiors only to the extent that they exercise a degree of control over their subordinates which is similar to that of military commanders.[85]

In this respect, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Musema Trial Judgement, which took into consideration the Rwandan situation, pointed out that "it is appropriate to assess on a case-by-case basis the power of authority actually devolved on an accused to determine whether or not he possessed the power to take all necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the alleged crimes or to punish their perpetration."[86]

52. Hence, the establishment of civilian superior responsibility requires proof beyond reasonable doubt that the accused exercised effective control over his subordinates, in the sense that he exercised a degree of control over them which is similar to the degree of control of military commanders. It is not suggested that "effective control" will necessarily be exercised by a civilian superior and by a military commander in the same way, or that it may necessarily be established in the same way in relation to both a civilian superior and a military commander.

53. In the instant case, the Trial Chamber relied on the Čelebići Trial Judgement, which was affirmed by the ICTY Appeals Chamber, in holding that:

> [...] for a civilian superior's degree of control to be "similar to" that of a military commander, the control over subordinates must be "effective", and the superior must have the "material ability" to prevent and punish any offences. Furthermore, the exercise of de facto authority must be accompanied by the "the trappings of the exercise of de jure authority". The present Chamber concurs. The Chamber is of the view that these trappings of authority include, for example, awareness of a chain of command, the practice of issuing and obeying orders, and the expectation that insubordination may lead to disciplinary action. It is by these trappings that the law distinguishes civilian superiors from mere rabble-rousers or other persons of influence.[87]

punish the perpetrators. But the Chamber believes that the claim that Judith's murder was public knowledge in Mabanza commune lacks sufficient foundation. The record reveals only that Witness Z said that Judith was the wife of a "medical doctor" at the Rubengera medical centre.[1160] Witness Y testified that Judith and her husband were family friends. The husband helped the witness when his children became ill.[1161] In his statement to investigators the witness said that Judith's husband was a "medical assistant".[1162]

987. Moreover, Witness Y testified that "I did not speak with [the Accused] about this matter [the two killings] because his level was not the same as mine and there was no chain of communication between himself and myself."[1163]

988. In summary, the indicium of the Accused's contemporaneous presence in the vicinity of the crime in the case of Judith, together with the indicia of geographical location, time and modus operandi in relation to the killings of both Bigirimana and Judith, combined with the fact that no more than two people were killed in a period when attacks on civilians were alleged to be common – telling though these indicia may seem when taken in combination – are in the Chamber's assessment nevertheless not sufficient to prove that the Accused had the requisite mens rea. The findings in Celebici and Aleksovski were made on a much firmer foundation.

989. It follows that the Prosecution has failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused is responsible as a superior for killings committed in connection with the Trafipro roadblock by Rushimba and Witnesses Y and Z. Therefore the Accused is not liable under Article 6(3) for the murders of Bigirimana and Judith.

II. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

15. The Appeals Chamber recalls the applicable standards of appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber reviews only errors of law which have the potential to invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and errors of fact which have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[37]

16. Regarding errors of law, the Appeals Chamber has stated:

> Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[38]

17. Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, the Appeals Chamber will articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly.[39] In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but, when necessary, also applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the appellant before that finding may be confirmed on appeal.[40]

18. Regarding errors of fact, it is well established that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by the Trial Chamber:

> Where the Defence alleges an erroneous finding of fact, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial, and it will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. Furthermore, the erroneous finding will be revoked or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[41]

19. A party cannot merely repeat on appeal arguments that did not succeed at trial, unless it can demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's rejection of those arguments constituted an error warranting chosen because, as the only General in active service present in the Crisis Committee, Ndindiliyimana was the highest-ranking officer.[1224]

514. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber properly assessed the evidence before it.[1225] In particular, it submits that not only was the Trial Chamber entitled to rely on circumstantial evidence, but the totality of the evidence also included direct evidence and established beyond reasonable doubt Bagosora's de jure and de facto control over the Rwandan Armed Forces.[1226] In addition, it contends that Bagosora's propositions are irrelevant and unclear, and in no way support his claim that they establish another logical conclusion.[1227]

515. The Appeals Chamber recalls that a Trial Chamber may infer the existence of a particular fact upon which the guilt of the accused depends from circumstantial evidence only if it is the only reasonable conclusion that could be drawn from the evidence presented.[1228] If there is another conclusion which is also reasonably open from the evidence, and which is consistent with the non-existence of that fact, the conclusion of guilt beyond reasonable doubt cannot be drawn.[1229]

516. As such, the question is whether no reasonable trier of fact could have found that the only reasonable inference from the evidence was that Bagosora exercised effective control over the Rwandan Armed Forces.

517. With respect to his argument that the emergency nature of the situation could also imply a lack of effective control, the Appeals Chamber recalls its finding above that such an argument is flawed. To the contrary, it was specifically because of the emergency situation, which resulted from a temporary breakdown of the usual power structure in Rwanda and the absence of the Minister of Defence, that Bagosora had more power than he would normally have had in his role as directeur de cabinet.[1230] Furthermore, the fact that there were a series of meetings and that steps were quickly taken to address the emergency situation clearly refutes Bagosora's suggestion that there was no one in control. In the absence of any substantiation, the Appeals Chamber also dismisses convicted Bagosora for criminal conduct with which he was not charged.[1678] Thus, Bagosora's conviction based on the defilement of the Prime Minister's corpse must be reversed.[1679]

729. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber need not address the parties' remaining contentions. The Appeals Chamber underscores that the desecration of Prime Minister Uwilingiyimana's corpse constituted a profound assault on human dignity meriting unreserved condemnation under international law.[1680] Such crimes strike at the core of national and human [1678] The Appeals Chamber notes that even if the Bagosora Indictment were considered to be merely vague, no curing took place. The Prosecution's post-indictment communications generally referred to the insertion of a bottle into the Prime Minister's body, without indicating whether the act was perpetrated before or after the Prime Minister's death. See Prosecution Pre-Trial Brief, Appendix A, Witnesses DA and DDF pp. 33, 55. At no point during the trial did the Prosecution allege that its case concerned the treatment of the Prime Minister's body after her death. An examination of the trial transcripts shows that relevant witnesses reported viewing the Prime Minister's assaulted body without testifying to the timing of the sexual abuse on her body. See Witness AE, T. 16 December 2003 pp. 42, 43; Witness DA, T. 18 November 2003 p. 49. The Appeals Chamber further notes that, in its Closing Brief, the Prosecution generally referred to the Prime Minister's genital mutilation, without discussing the details of the incident, limiting itself to stating that the evidence of witnesses observing the Prime Minister's mutilated dead body or learning of the mutilation afterwards put Bagosora on notice of the propensity of soldiers to commit acts of sexual violence. See Prosecution Closing Brief, paras. 155, 156. The Appeals Chamber also underscores that the broad and indeterminate scope of "other inhumane acts" makes it particularly important that charges brought and convictions entered under this rubric be set out with the utmost clarity, in order to respect the due process rights of the accused.

[1679] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber's conviction was entered solely on the basis of mistreatment of the Prime Minister's corpse, and that no reference is made in the Trial Judgement to allegations of sexual or other assault on the Prime Minister prior to her death. In this circumstance, the Appeals Chamber will not address the Prosecution's submission regarding potential evidence related to events prior to the Prime Minister's death.

[1680] In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that, in 1994, many domestic criminal codes, including the Rwandan criminal code, explicitly criminalised acts degrading the dignity of the corpse or interfering with a corpse. Any review of customary international law regarding this issue would need to take into account the large number of jurisdictions that criminalise degrading the dignity of or interfering with corpses. See, e.g., Botswana, Penal Code (1964) Ch. 08:01, s. 138; Canada, Criminal Code, R.S., 1985, c.C-34, s. 182(b); Costa Rica, Codigo Penal (1971), art. 207; Ethiopia, Penal Code, (1957), art. 287(b); Germany, Strafgesetzbuch (StGB), 1998, s. 168 (this section was added in 1987); India, Penal Code (1860), s. 297; Kenya, Penal Code (1970) Ch. 63, s. 137; Japan, Penal Code (Act No. 45 of 1907), art. 190; Lithuania, Criminal Code as amended (1961), art. 335; New Zealand, Crimes Act 1961 No. 43, art. 150(b); Nigeria, Criminal Code Act (1990), (Ch. 77), s. 242; United States of America (Oregon State), (1971), ORS.166.087; Pakistan, Criminal Code (1860), s. 297; Rwanda, Décret-loi N°21/77 du 18 août 1977 instituant le Code pénal, art. 352; Switzerland, Code pénal suisse du 21 décembre 1937, art. 262; Uganda, Penal Code Act 1950 (Ch. 120), s. 120; Vietnam, Penal Code (1985), s. 246. identity. However, the Appeals Chamber finds, Judge Pocar dissenting, that Bagosora was not charged on this basis, and thus cannot be held legally responsible for this act.

730. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, concludes that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Bagosora was guilty of other inhumane acts as a crime against humanity based on the defilement of the Prime Minister's corpse. The Appeals Chamber therefore reverses, Judge Pocar dissenting, Bagosora's conviction for other inhumane acts as a crime against humanity entered under Count 9 of the Bagosora Indictment with respect to this incident. It will consider the impact, if any, of this finding in the appropriate section of this Judgement.

889. The Chamber finds beyond reasonable doubt that Rwandan soldiers killed 17 Rwandan nationals at Centre Christus in the Remera area of Kigali. However, the Prosecution has not established the specific unit that conducted the killings. The Chamber has found elsewhere that Bagosora had authority over the Rwandan army at the time of the attack (IV.1.2). He was also aware of the killings at Centre Christus, in particular of Father Mahame.

890. Witness ET heard that Father Mahame was on a list as early as 1992. His evidence on this point is hearsay and, furthermore, does not clearly demonstrate the basis and reliability of his source's information. However, it is clear that Mahame was identified on a list of suspected accomplices by the CDR party in September 1992.[1016] Furthermore, the circumstances of the attack, described above, indicate that this was a targeted killing. Bearing in mind the evidence of other such killings on the morning of 7 April (III.2.5.5; III.3.3; III.3.6.1; III.3.6.5) the Chamber is satisfied that Mahame was previously identified as a target for arrest or killing by the military as well. This conclusion is further bolstered by the fact that Bagosora was personally informed about Mahame's killing on the night of 7 April along with the victims of other political assassinations.

891. The Chamber is not persuaded that the Prosecution has shown a connection between the attack at Centre Christus and Kabiligi and Ntabakuze. Consequently, there is no need to revisit the Ntabakuze Defence arguments concerning alleged insufficient notice.

892. Turning to other killings in the Remera area, Prosecution and Defence evidence suggests that both parties to the conflict perpetrated killings there. While the evidence about RPF crimes is largely second-hand, the Prosecution has presented direct evidence from Witness CW that Bagosora personally incited the killings of Tutsis at dawn on 7 April. The witness claimed that he observed Bagosora address local Interahamwe leaders from a distance of 4.5 metres while hiding in a bush. Witness CW's basis of knowledge for identifying Bagosora was the witness's familiarity with his role as a military officer as well as Bagosora's previous visits to Remera. His evidence about Bagosora's previous participation in meetings with the Interahamwe in the area was vague and inconsistent.[1017] The Chamber, therefore, has doubt about his ability to identify Bagosora, in particular bearing in mind that he was hiding and afraid for his life.

893. Furthermore, Witness CW asserted that the alleged meeting occurred at dawn as it was becoming light. On the morning of 7 April, Bagosora held a number of meetings with MRND political officials at the Ministry of Defence, the United States Ambassador at his residence, and military officials at ESM, beginning at 7.00 a.m. (III.3.2). While the witness suggested that the meeting occurred around 5.00 a.m. in the morning, the Chamber notes that he placed it after the communiqué was broadcast urging the public to remain at home.[1018] Other evidence suggests that this communiqué was broadcast around 6.30 a.m.,[1019] placing [1017] See T. 8 October 2004 pp. 39-44. In particular, Witness CW said that he saw Bagosora "more than twice" (p. 40) , "regularly" (p. 40), "two or three times" (p. 42), "frequently" (p. 43). He confirmed that he told Tribunal investigators that Bagosora came "several times a week" (p. 42). The witness also then claimed that he did not mention the number of times per week that Bagosora came and that he did not say "several times per week" (p. 43).

would leave his troops in this tense situation. Witness DBN's indication that some persons had houses in the area appeared speculative. There is no indication that Nsengiyumva had a house there, and this was rejected by Witnesses OME-1 and DM-23.[1608] Neither is there any information that Nsengiyumva had to attend a meeting in Kigali-Rural, which was the other possible explanation suggested by Witness DBN.[1609]

1461. According to Witness DBN, the entire operation at Masaka hill, from the soldiers' departure until their return, took only 40 minutes, and in any event less than one hour. The soldiers returned to the same meeting at the Joli Bois before it had ended. This would have given limited time for the operation, in view of his testimony that it would take 15-20 minutes to travel the distance to Masaka hill, driving at a fast speed. The Chamber has taken into account that it would not require much time to throw grenades at refugees in a coffee field but still considers it noteworthy that the operation was purportedly so brief.[1610]

1462. Witness DBN was unable to name a single soldier who allegedly participated in the operation, except for the driver. His evidence about the involvement of soldiers in the killings at Masaka hill is uncorroborated hearsay. No-one actually observed Nsengiyumva or the operation at Masaka hill. This said, Witness ICC-1 testimony that he did not hear of Nsengiyumva's involvement in the attack carries limited weight. The witness did not see the event itself but heard that Interahamwe, called the "Zulus", had carried out the killings.

1463. Having assessed the totality of the evidence, and in particular the lack of corroboration of Witness DBN's testimony, the Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proven beyond reasonable doubt that Ntabakuze provided Nsengiyumva with 30 members of the Para Commando Battalion to kill Tutsi civilians at Masaka hill.

1464. The Chamber has previously held that Ntabakuze and Nsengiyumva had adequate notice of this allegation. In view of its finding it does not deem it necessary to reconsider the Defence submissions about lack of notice for this allegation.[1611]

4.1.7 Kiyovu Roadblock, April - June

Introduction

1465. The Bagosora Indictment alleges that, from the night of 6 to 7 April 1994, soldiers, including the Presidential Guard, set up roadblocks where militiamen joined them, or established their own where Tutsis were killed. The Nsengiyumva Indictment states that, between 8 April and mid-July 1994, Nsengiyumva ordered militiamen to eliminate Tutsis. It is also alleged that crimes of sexual violence were perpetrated at roadblocks. In support of [1608] The Chamber has taken into account that Witness OME-1 was related to Nsengiyumva.

[1609] It is also unusual that Ntabakuze would convene a meeting of significance, relating to the evacuation of the camp, without any of his company or platoon commanders present (who, according to the witness, was in combat positions). It is recalled that in the final event, Camp Kanombe did not fall until May 1994. See T. 6 April 2004 p. 1.

[1610] Witness DBN first said that the meeting ended around 9.20 a.m. He also indicated that the operation at Masaka hill lasted for 40 minutes from 8.50 or perhaps 9.00 a.m. and that the attackers came back just as the meeting concluded. The Chamber does not consider this discrepancy material, as the witness clearly gave estimates.

1, a Hutu Rwandan army officer, testified that he saw Kabiligi arrive in Kigali between 20 and 25 April.[2160]

Deliberations

1975. Kabiligi's alibi for the period of 28 March to 23 April 1994 can be divided into three distinct parts. The first part includes the period that he was in Cairo, Egypt from 28 March until his departure for Saudi Arabia on 8 April. The second part concerns the period from 9 to 13 April where the Kabiligi Defence has provided no indication as to Kabiligi's whereabouts, except to intimate that he remained outside of Rwanda. The third part relates to the period from 14 to 23 April when Kabiligi was allegedly in Nairobi, Kenya.

(i) 28 March to 8 April 1994

1976. With respect to the first part of the alibi, the Prosecution accepts that Kabiligi was in Cairo from 28 March until 8 April 1994 when he departed Egypt on a flight to Saudi Arabia.[2161] This is also confirmed by documentary evidence from the Egyptian government as well as the military training academy Kabiligi attended there.[2162] The Chamber notes that the testimony of Kanyarushoki suggests that Kabiligi might have been in Cairo as late as 10 April. However, Kanyarushoki acknowledged that he was not certain about the dates in particular when confronted with documentary evidence from the Egyptian government confirming Kabiligi's date of departure. In view of the evidence, the Chamber considers that Kabiligi has established the first part of his alibi.

(ii) 9 to 13 April 1994

1977. The Kabiligi Defence provided no indication of Kabiligi's whereabouts between 9 and 13 April 1994 in either its notice of alibi or its Closing Brief. Witnesses LAX-23 and DELTA, who attested to Kabiligi's arrival in Nairobi on 14 April, simply asserted that he was coming from Cairo, only implying that he had not yet returned to Rwanda. However, Witness LAX-23 clearly stated that he did not know where Kabiligi was in the days before arriving in Nairobi. Taking into account the time needed for return travel, the Prosecution also considers it "reasonable to conclude that Kabiligi first returned to Rwanda on or about [9 or 10 April]".[2163] The Chamber accepts that Kabiligi has a reasonable explanation of his activities until this time. However, the Defence did not provide one for his time between 10 and 13 April.

1978. This said, the Prosecution evidence of Kabiligi's activities in Rwanda during this period is limited. It refers primarily to the evidence of Prosecution Witnesses CE and Ruggiu who attested to Kabiligi's arrival at Camp Kigali after the death of President Habyarimana.[2164] Witness CE, a soldier, recalled seeing Kabiligi and hearing soldiers cheer his arrival at Camp Kigali in a military jeep "a few days" after the death of the President.[2165] Ruggiu, a journalist with the RTLM, recalled seeing Kabiligi arrive between 14 and 17 April by helicopter near the officers mess at Camp Kigali.[2166] Although the witnesses provided different dates for Kabiligi's arrival, the Prosecution contends in its Closing Brief that these two witnesses "materially" corroborate one other.[2167] There is, however, no convincing way to explain the significant discrepancy between their testimonies about Kabiligi's arrival, and it appears that they are referring to separate incidents at different times.

1979. The Prosecution also submits that, given Kabiligi's senior position in the G-3 office of the army staff, it is unreasonable to assume that he would delay his return to Rwanda by several weeks.[2168] In light of Kabiligi's authority over the aviation squadron as well as the existence of helicopter flights as early 7 April, the Prosecution argues that Kabiligi could have easily facilitated his return to Rwanda.[2169] It suggests that Kabiligi may have returned multiple times, implicitly arguing that Witness CE saw him during the second part of the alibi and that Ruggiu was referring to a later arrival during the third part of the alibi.[2170] These submission are more consistent with the witnesses' varying accounts of Kabiligi's arrival.

1980. The Prosecution did not present any other evidence of Kabiligi's presence in Rwanda between 9 and 13 April, which is surprising given the resumed hostilities and his role as G-3 on the army's general staff. Furthermore, the Chamber heard extensive evidence from a number of soldiers stationed at Camp Kigali in connection with the killing of the Belgian peacekeepers (III.3.4).[2171] Indeed, the sheer contrast between the limited evidence related to Kabiligi's whereabouts during this period – only Witness CE's testimony – and the overwhelming evidence of the activities of Bagosora, Ntabakuze and Nsengiyumva, discussed elsewhere in this judgement, is significant.[2172] In the Chamber's view, the exceedingly limited nature of the evidence of Kabiligi's presence in Rwanda between 9 and 13 April is important, in particular bearing in mind his rank and role in the army. It suggests [2164] Prosecution Closing Brief, paras. 668-672. As further corroboration, the Prosecution also suggests that Witness AAA saw Kabiligi and Prefect Tharcisse Renzaho at a prefecture security council meeting in mid-April 1994 (III.4.1.11). See Prosecution Closing Brief, para. 673, citing T. 14 June 2004 pp. 17-21; T. 15 June 2004 p. 85. However, as the Kabiligi Defence notes, leaving aside other credibility concerns, Witness AAA conceded in cross-examination that this meeting occurred after 25 April. See Kabiligi Closing Brief, paras. 519; T. 15 June 2004 p. 85 ("I cannot recall the dates. It was the end of April, so it's between the 27th and the 30th of April. But these are not specific dates. I would say that – I am giving you an approximation. I would say that it took place towards the end of April. Q. In any case, you are saying at the end of April. Can we agree that the meeting took place after the 25th of April? Would that be correct? A. Yes, we could agree on that. It was starting on the 25th and perhaps in the days that followed.").

[2172] Furthermore, there is evidence that Ntabakuze communicated with the G-3 office in connection with the arrival of refugees at Sonatube junction on 11 April 1994. However, it is notable that the office's deputy Lieutenant Colonel Kanyandekwe was involved in the radio exchange, not Kabiligi (III.4.1.1).

8. The Appeals Chamber heard oral arguments regarding these appeals on 30 September 2009. Having considered the written and oral submissions of the parties, the Appeals Chamber hereby renders its Judgement.

II. STANDARDS OF APPELLATE REVIEW

9. The Appeals Chamber recalls the applicable standards of appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber reviews only errors of law which invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and errors of fact which have occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[16]

10. Regarding errors of law, the Appeals Chamber has stated:

> Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[17]

11. Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, it will articulate the correct legal interpretation and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly. In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but, when necessary, also applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the appellant before that finding may be confirmed on appeal.[18]

12. Regarding errors of fact, it is well established that the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by a Trial Chamber:

> Where the Defence alleges an erroneous finding of fact, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the Trial Chamber that received the evidence at trial, and it will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. Furthermore, the erroneous finding will be revoked or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[19]

13. A party cannot merely repeat on appeal arguments that did not succeed at trial, unless it can demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's rejection of those arguments constituted an error warranting to security.[311] Mugiraneza Defence Witness RWQ, an MRND and Interahamwe member who Witness GJQ testified had received grenades, denied ever possessing grenades, other than as part of his duties as a member of the Rwandan military.[312]

202. Prosecution Witness GJQ was the sole witness to accuse Mugiraneza of weapons distribution in 1991. His evidence was hearsay. He only learned of Mugiraneza's alleged role in 1992 when he joined the Interahamwe. Further, he offered no further testimony or details as to when in 1991 the distribution occurred. While Witness GJW corroborated Witness GJQ that Colonel Rwagafilita distributed weapons, Witness GJW did not implicate Mugiraneza in this activity and his evidence was hearsay as well.[313] Last, Witness GJQ's testimony that Interahamwe would walk around public places with grenades[314] was undermined by Prosecution Witness GTF. This witness owned a shop close to the Kibungo roundabout in 1994 and testified he did not see any Interahamwe armed with rifles, grenades or pistols before the President's death in Kibungo.[315]

203. The Chamber considers the Defence evidence denying the allegation is self-serving.[316] However, it is of the view that the uncorroborated hearsay testimony of Witness GJQ, whose evidence implicating the Accused has been treated with caution (see II.6.1), is not an adequate basis upon which to base findings beyond reasonable doubt. As such, the Prosecution has not proven beyond reasonable doubt that Mugiraneza distributed grenades in 1991 that were used in 1994 to kill Tutsis.

2.3 Weapons Distribution at Hôtel Tourisme, Gitarama, 1993

204. The Prosecution led evidence through Witness GHU of an alleged weapons distribution at a joint MRND/MDR-Power meeting in Gitarama at the Hôtel Tourisme between November and December 1993. Nzabonimana introduced Bicamumpaka to the audience of around 500 persons as a prominent MDR member. Nzabonimana told the crowd to know its enemy, "none other than the Inyenzi, and the Inyenzi are the Tutsis". Subsequently, Nzabonimana and Bicamumpaka distributed rifles and grenades to those present, including to several Interahamwe.[317] It was the second time Witness GHU had seen Bicamumpaka.[318]

205. In contrast, Witness VF-1, who Witness GHU testified was present and received weapons, denied ever having possessed weapons or meeting Bicamumpaka or Nzabonimana.[319] Bicamumpaka also denied having ever distributed weapons to Interahamwe

[316] The Chamber considers Mugiraneza's denial to be self-interested. Furthermore, although Witness RWQ expressly contradicted Witness GJQ's evidence, the Chamber is mindful of Witness RWQ's possible interest in distancing himself and the Accused from the alleged distribution of weapons.

691. The Chamber has also considered evidence from Mugenzi, Bizimungu and former Minister André Ntagerura that telephone communication in Kigali had been disrupted.[1022] There is other evidence that travel between the two prefectures was also difficult. Specifically, the driving distance between Kigali and Rukara commune was significant.[1023] Additionally, there is evidence tending to suggest that roadblocks could have impeded travel and that some of the area was under RPF control.[1024] In the Chamber's view, this evidence raises further questions about whether Mugenzi was aware of what was occurring at Rukara Parish when he sent his car and driver to pick up his mother in Kigali on 7 April 1994.

692. It is also reasonable to conclude that, once in the company of Mugenzi's family, Mugenzi's security detail would have acted on their orders alone. Given all of the above, it is not unlikely that Mugenzi lacked knowledge about attacks on Rukara Parish or the details of what his security personnel were doing once having gone to assist his family.

693. Finally, the Chamber does not consider that Witness LEL's uncorroborated hearsay evidence provides a sufficient basis for it to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Mugenzi sent security personnel, whether they be soldiers or gendarmes, to rescue Vestine Ugiranyina and her husband's niece, Claudine, knowing that attacks on Tutsis had occurred or were going to occur at Rukara Parish. Furthermore, the evidence fails to establish that Mugenzi gave orders to any category of assailants participating in the attack, or that any were his subordinates. Based on the foregoing, the Chamber need not address notice challenges.

6.5 Killings at the Saint Joseph Economat, 15 April 1994

Introduction

694. The Indictment alleges that, from 7 April 1994, massacres of the Tutsi population were perpetrated by militiamen, military personnel and gendarmes on the directives or to the knowledge of authorities, including the four Accused. Specifically, the Prosecution alleges that Colonels Rwagafilita and Nkuriyekubona, who were in charge of the massacres in Kibungo, ordered Witness GJQ to kill people who were hiding at the Economat on 15 April. It submits that government officials, including Prosper Mugiraneza, were aware of this

[1022] For example, Mugenzi testified that there were no mobile phones in Rwanda in 1994. He also testified that telephones outside Kigali were broken down as the central system of Rwandan telephones had been blown up in the first week of the war and were only restored after the war. Mugenzi, T. 9 November 2005 pp. 53-54. Bizimungu testified that on 8 April 1994 most lines of communication from Kigali were cut and a couple of days later all lines of communication were out because the RPF had bombed telecommunication systems in Kigali. Bizimungu, T. 4 June 2007 pp. 44-45. Former Minister André Ntagerura testified that from 6 to 7 April 1994 the RPF destroyed the central telecommunications system in Kigali, cutting off all communication with other prefectures and the outside world. Ntagerura, T. 19 February 2007 p. 22. But see Makeli, T. 30 October 2007 p. 25 (agreed that by 23 April 1994, phone lines in Kacyiru and Remera were not working but those close to Radio Rwanda in Kigali were).

[1023] Former Minister André Ntagerura testified that, under normal conditions, travel from Kigali to Kigarama would take about 1 hour and 20 minutes. Ntagerura, T. 19 February 2007 p. 20. Paul Mujyambere testified that the drive from Kigarama to Rukara is about 30 kilometres. Mujyambere, T. 6 May 2008 p. 7; see also Exhibit 1D24 (Administrative and Roads Map of Rwanda); Exhibit 1D39(A) (Administrative and Roads Map of Rwanda).

[1024] Defence Witnesses WFQ1 and Antoine Nyetera testified that the Kigali-Kibungo road was impassable because of its location in a zone of combat controlled by the RPF. Witness WFQ1, T. 4 October 2006 pp. 48-49; Nyetera, T. 26 September 2006 p. 13.

testified that the last time he was in Kibungo was 3 April, which is corroborated by Witness GJQ's evidence.[1053]

712. Considering the uncorroborated hearsay evidence provided by Witness GJQ, as well as the Chamber's reservations about the witness generally, there is reasonable doubt that Mugiraneza was in contact with Rwagafilita during the planning and execution of the Economat massacre. Consequently, the Prosecution has failed to establish beyond reasonable doubt that Mugiraneza was involved in, or had knowledge of, the massacres occurring at the Economat in Kibungo on 15 April 1994 or the killing of injured persons on 18 April. In light of this finding, the Chamber need not consider objections related to insufficient notice.[1054]

7. KIGALI PREFECTURE, 6 – 12 APRIL 1994

7.1 Meeting and Distribution of Weapons in Kabuga, 6, 7 and 9 April 1994

Introduction

713. The Indictment alleges that from late 1990 to July 1994, all four Accused conspired amongst themselves and others to exterminate Tutsi civilians and eliminate members of the opposition. A component of this plan included the distribution of weapons to militiamen and certain civilians with the intent to exterminate the Tutsi population and its accomplices. More specifically, the Prosecution alleges that, on 6 April 1994, Bicamumpaka and others met at Joseph Sebisogo's house in Kabuga and Bicamumpaka ordered the Interahamwe to hunt down and kill Tutsis. Bicamumpaka returned to Kabuga on 9 April with weapons, which he gave to Interahamwe leaders to distribute. Following this, the massacres of Tutsis in Kabuga intensified once more. The Prosecution relies on the testimony of Witness GHY. The Prosecution, relying on the testimony of Witness GHT, further alleges that, on 7 April, Bicamumpaka brought weapons to Kabuga, distributed them to the Interahamwe after which massacres of Tutsis in Kabuga intensified.[1055]

714. Bicamumpaka's Defence argues that there was no notice for these allegations. Furthermore, it contends that Witnesses GHY and GHT are unreliable. Bicamumpaka was at home with his family in Kigali on 6 and 7 April 1994 and on 9 April he was present at the swearing-in ceremony of the Interim Government, held meetings with the diplomatic core in Kigali, and attended two cabinet meetings. He denies travelling to Kabuga at any point between 6 and 9 April. Bicamumpaka's Defence relies on the testimonies of Bicamumpaka, Witnesses Abubakar Nduwayezu, Jean Rwagatera, OK-3, TK-1, OG-3, TF-2 and LD-1, and Prosecution Witness DCH.[1056]

[1054] The Chamber recalls that evidence relating to events occurring in Kibungo prefecture was only admitted to be considered against Mugiraneza for the allegations of conspiracy to commit genocide and complicity in genocide. Reconsideration of the Trial Chamber's Decision of 5 February 2004 Pursuant to the Appeals Chamber's Decision of 15 July 2004 (TC), 4 October 2004, p. 14.

760. Turning to the merits of Witness GHY's testimony about this allegation, the Chamber first recalls that in contrast to what the Prosecution alleges, Witness GHY only testified to Bicamumpaka's presence at a meeting attended by Interahamwe. She did not give any evidence that Bicamumpaka ordered Tutsis to be killed at this meeting. Moreover, her testimony that Bicamumpaka was at the meeting is based entirely on her neighbour's out-of-court statements, which are second-hand and thus of limited probative value.

761. Turning to the Defence evidence, Bicamumpaka denied having attended the meeting at Sebisogo's house on 6 April 1994 testifying that he remained at home in Kigali with his family from late afternoon on 6 April to 2.00 a.m. on 9 April. Bicamumpaka's testimony is generally corroborated by Witness OG-3 who was working at his residence. Moreover, Witnesses DCH, TK-1, OK-3 and TF-2, who lived in Kabuga in April 1994, did not see or hear that Bicamumpaka was in Kabuga in April.

762. This evidence is far from dispositive. Bicamumpaka has an interest in denying that he was in Kabuga on 6 April 1994. Likewise, Defence Witness OG-3 was a former employee of the Accused and consequently may have a motive to testify in a manner favourable to him. Witnesses TK-1, TF-2 and OK-3's general evidence that they did not see or alternatively hear that Bicamumpaka was in Kabuga in April is not dispositive. Notably, they also denied knowing him. Moreover, Witness TK-1 is an alleged accomplice of Bicamumpaka and, therefore, has a clear motive to deny Bicamumpaka's presence at Sebisogo's home where he was staying from 6 April for three to four weeks.[1122] Witness DCH's evidence is likewise of limited probative value in light of his testimony that he went home when he heard the shots that brought the President's plane down.[1123]

763. Bicamumpaka also introduced UNAMIR cables, which he claims demonstrate that it was impossible for him to have travelled from Kigali to Kabuga from 6 to 9 April 1994. The UNAMIR communications indicate that the RPF had taken control over some parts of eastern Kigali, the most likely route to Kabuga.[1124] Witness TK-1 testified, however, that several roads besides the paved road between Kigali and Kabuga would allow one to travel between the two locations.

764. Notwithstanding the frailties in the Defence evidence, Witness GHY's uncorroborated hearsay evidence fails to provide a sufficient basis for the Chamber to make findings beyond reasonable doubt. The Prosecution has not proven that Bicamumpaka attended a meeting with Interahamwe at Joseph Sebisogo's house on 6 April 1994 at which he ordered that Tutsis be killed.

(iii) Distribution of Weapons, 7 April 1994

765. Witness GHT is the only Prosecution witness to provide evidence of Bicamumpaka's role in weapons distribution in Kabuga on 7 April 1994. Specifically, Witness GHT testified that around 12.00 p.m., she saw, through the window of her father-in-law's house, a white advising them not to take part in the massacres. Ndindabahizi was not aware of the cessation of killings by the Interahamwe after 9 April.[1213]

Mugenzi Defence Witness Agnès Ntamabyaliro

828. Agnès Ntamabyaliro, a Hutu, was appointed Minister of Trade and Industry in April 1992 and Minister of Justice in July 1993, a post which she retained in the Interim Government.[1214] After the swearing-in ceremony on 9 April 1994, Ntamabyaliro did not recall any other meetings that day. The first cabinet meeting took place on 10 April and she could not recall who was present, including whether Mugenzi attended. The cabinet was informed of the killings in Kigali, but not about other killings in the prefectures. The killings were committed by unruly soldiers and Interahamwe, which were denounced by the Interim Government. At the time, the ethnicity of the victims was unclear as people from all ethnic groups were being killed.[1215]

Deliberations

829. The parties do not dispute that there was a meeting among Mugenzi, Nzirorera, and Interahamwe, including Witness D, at which Witness D and the other Interahamwe were tasked with instructing the killers throughout Kigali to stop killing. Although Witness D places the meeting on 10 April 1994, the Chamber is satisfied that the meeting took place on 9 April, as Mugenzi testified.[1216] Further, the Interim Government, at the 9 April cabinet meeting, was advised that civilians were being killed by the Interahamwe. The only issues before the Chamber are the reasons for the pacification mission and whether Mugenzi expressed satisfaction that many Tutsis had been killed.

830. Witness D was the sole witness to testify for the Prosecution in relation to this event. Before turning to the merits of the Prosecution evidence, the Chamber looks at the general credibility of Witness D. His relationship with the Prosecution is extensive. He has provided information to the Prosecution and evidence on its behalf concerning the events of 1994 and assisted in the location of fugitives.[1217] Furthermore, he has received direct or indirect payments from the Prosecution between 1996 and May 2007 for his assistance and has been placed in a witness protection program. Many payments appear to be reasonable expenditures to cover travel, communication and other hardships related to assisting investigations or testifying before the Tribunal.[1218] Notwithstanding, the payments are significant.[1219]

At the time of her testimony, Agnès Ntamabyaliro was charged with genocide and a detainee in Kigali prison. Her trial had commenced but was postponed so that she could testify before the Tribunal. [1215] Ntamabyaliro, T. 21 August 2006 pp. 42-44; T. 28 August 2006 pp. 55-56.

[1216] During his testimony, Witness D stated that he believed that the Interim Government had been sworn in on the day of the meeting. The Chamber accepts that the Interim Government was sworn in on 9 April 1994 (II.7.2), and, thus, accepts that the meeting where Witness D and others were instructed to undertake the pacification tour took place on 9 April. The Chamber notes that the Indictment places the meeting on 9 April.

[1217] See Witness D, T. 15 June 2004 pp. 67-68; T. 17 June 2004 pp. 13-14, 67-70.

[1218] See, e.g., Witness D, T. 15 June 2004 pp. 68-69; T. 16 June 2004 pp. 8-9, 71; Exhibit P56 (Statement of Payments to Witness D, 15 February 2002).

831. Furthermore, in February 2002, the Prosecutor issued a statement that the Prosecution had decided not to open an investigation against Witness D given that the "evidence assessed" did not provide sufficient grounds to prosecute him. It further described his willingness to cooperate with the Office of the Prosecutor.[1220] Notably, this agreement was made in order to secure his testimony in the Nahimana et al. trial. While Witness D testified that this was done to allay suspicions about his involvement in the genocide and affirm his general credibility, it can also be seen as a concession made to obtain testimony.[1221] The record does not reflect that the Prosecution has acted improperly or sought to influence Witness D's testimony. Nonetheless, the possibility that Witness D is motivated to provide evidence favourable to the Prosecution in order to ensure continued benefits cannot be ignored.

832. In addition, aspects of Witness D's testimony regarding his position within the Interahamwe raise questions about his credibility. He testified that, by 1992, his position within the Interahamwe was by title only and that he held little influence within the organisation.[1222] However, he was a signatory to a January 1994 letter from the Interahamwe to UNAMIR that complained about the impartiality of its peacekeepers.[1223] After the formation of the Interim Government, Witness D was called upon to pacify Interahamwe killing Tutsis throughout Kigali and, during his tour, was able to move freely throughout Kigali. In the last week of April, he was part of a contingent of Interahamwe officials who met with General Roméo Dallaire to address the fact that Interahamwe were preventing UNAMIR-escorted refugees from the Hôtel des Mille Collines from reaching Kanombe airport.[1224] Finally, while in Butare, he was approached by Colonel Muvunyi to discourage Interahamwe arriving from Kigali to participate in looting.[1225]

833. Given his own admissions that Interahamwe participated in killings in 1994, his attempts to distance himself from the organisation, while understandable, are inconsistent with the contemporaneous recognition of his status by those in power in 1994 and his acts on the organisation's behalf.[1226] Under these circumstances, the Chamber does not consider Witness D to be an accomplice witness. However, the Chamber has some concerns that his evidence might be incomplete, particularly to the extent that it implicates him in criminal supported by documentary evidence.[1470] Notably, Bizimungu has presented evidence that he was in Zaire in the days before and possibly the very day this agreement was signed (II.14.2.2). Thus, evidence that Bagosora was sent to purchase weapons in Zaire and intended to disguise them as medical supplies could be consistent with the proposition that Bizimungu, the Minister of Health, was involved in or complicit in this purchase and possibly earlier ones. Further, Bizimungu was accompanied by a military officer, Setako, who conceivably could have assisted with a weapons purchase and it is a reasonable possibility that the funds given to Bizimungu was an initial payment, either related to Bagosora's purchase or a different weapons shipment.

In so finding, the Chamber has considered the Prosecution submissions about the nature of the compensation received by Witness D. See T. 16 June 2004 p. 15. It would be dishonest, in my view, to call this organisation as genocidaire, because as I explained to you, it is not only the Interahamwe who perpetrated the killings in Rwanda.").

1017. Notwithstanding, Witness WAE testified that Bizimungu was not present at the Rwandan Embassy when Bagosora signed the contract on 24 May 1994. Indeed, a contemporaneous radio broadcast indicates that Bizimungu was in Rwanda that day (II.14.2.2). Furthermore, Witness WAE did not believe that Bizimungu was aware of Bagosora's decision to disguise the weapons in this manner and Bizimungu testified that he did not learn of this until after his incarceration. The Prosecution did not cite to any direct evidence that Bizimungu would have known about this.[1471]

1018. The Chamber recalls that elsewhere in the Judgement it found that evidence implicating Bizimungu in the receipt and distribution of weapons in Gisenyi was insufficient to support findings beyond reasonable doubt (II.11.3). Under the circumstances, the Chamber is not satisfied that Uwizeye's uncorroborated hearsay evidence, which is contradicted by its source, provides a sufficient basis for it to conclude beyond reasonable doubt that Bizimungu was sent to Zaire on 12 April 1994 with $17,500 USD to buy weapons and did purchase them.

8.2 Kamonyi School, After 12 April 1994

Introduction

1019. The Prosecution contends that shortly after the Interim Government moved from Kigali to Gitarama prefecture, Prosper Mugiraneza and other Interim Government ministers, including Callixte Nzabonimana, were at Kamonyi parish school in the midst of an attack by armed Interahamwe. Reference is made to Fidèle Uwizeye.[1472]

1020. The Mugiraneza Defence argues that there was no attack as alleged by Uwizeye. Reference is made to the testimony of Witness RRJ and the Rule 92 bis statements of Witnesses RWY, BGK, BGL and BGD.[1473]

30 metres away from the locus in quo. In such circumstances, compounded by the enormous stress the witness experienced at the time of the events, his identification of the Accused and his account of the Accused's gestures and actions at the time he observed the Accused, have been examined with caution. Moreover, the Chamber has noted several inconsistencies and contradictions in Witness TAC's evidence. For example, the Witness gave differing accounts of the number and identity of the policemen who remained on the premises after the Accused had left. Besides, Witness TAC contradicted himself on several issues in his prior statements. In particular, Witness TAC testified that the Accused was not armed and had left the Catholic Centre before two policemen killed Mutunzi and Rukomeza, whereas in his prior statement of 8 April 1997, he alleged that the Accused was armed and had personally killed the two victims. The witness had allegedly stated to investigators that the Accused had extorted money from the two victims before killing them, whereas in court he testified that he did not know what the Accused had taken from the victims.[181] The witness further testified that he was hiding alone in the banana fields, whereas he had alleged in his prior statement that he was in the company of his wife and three sisters. The witness's explanations about such major inconsistencies and contradictions, which cannot be attributed to error on the part of the investigators, were not persuasive.

193. In conclusion, the Chamber finds that the Prosecutor has not proven the allegations contained in paragraph 34 of the Indictment beyond a reasonable doubt.

Paragraph 36 of the Indictment

194. The Chamber finds that paragraph 36 of the Indictment is vague as it fails to identify the victims precisely, and does not specify their killers. Paragraph 36 only alleges that the Accused ordered the killing of his former tenants. However, the Chamber further finds that the Pre-Trial Brief and its annexes, which provided further details on the allegation, cured the vagueness.

195. The Chamber finds the evidence of Witnesses TBC and TAS to be credible. Their accounts corroborate each other and are consistent with that of Witness TAW, whom the Chamber has already found to be credible. On the evidence of Witnesses TAW, TBC and TAS, the Chamber finds that on 12 April 1994, at Nyakarambi, the Accused ordered Marie and Béatrice, two Tutsi sisters, to vacate the premises which they were renting, stating that the said premises did not belong to CND, a reference to the RPF cantonment in Kigali. The Accused returned to the premises on 13 April 1994 and, with the assistance of the communal police, expelled the tenants.

196. On the evidence of Witness TBC and Defence Witnesses UPT, YCW and YEW, the Chamber finds that Marie and Béatrice were killed in the night of 13 April 1994. However, the hearsay evidence of Witness TAS is insufficient, failing corroboration, to establish that the Accused ordered the murder of Marie and Béatrice.

197. In the light of the Chamber's findings on the involvement of the Accused in preparing, inciting and perpetrating the massacres of Tutsi at Rusumo, the Chamber the Accused is charged in the Prosecutor's Pre-Trial Brief, under the heading "Genocide", with acts of planning.[254] The Chamber also notes that the Indictment contains factual allegations sustaining the charges of preparing, planning and organizing preferred against the Accused.[255] With regard to the form "aiding and abetting in the preparation and execution", it should be noted that aiding and abetting are pleaded at the planning and execution phases of the crime, in conformity with the Statute under which, alternatively, this form of responsibility covers three stages of the crime, namely planning, preparation and execution.

270. Pursuant to Article 6(1), the Prosecutor charges Sylvestre Gacumbitsi with planning, instigating, ordering, committing, and aiding and abetting in genocide. The Chamber will examine each of these forms of participation seriatim.

271. "Planning" presupposes that one or more persons contemplate the commission of a crime at both its preparatory and execution phases.[256] On 9 April 1994, Sylvestre Gacumbitsi, as bourgmestre of Rusumo commune, convened a meeting of conseillers de secteurs and instructed them to organize meetings at the secteur level between 9 and 12 April, without the knowledge of Tutsi, and to incite Hutu to kill Tutsi. On 10 April 1994, Sylvestre Gacumbitsi, together with communal policemen, received boxes of weapons at the Kibungo gendarmerie camp, and had the boxes delivered to various secteurs. On 11 April, Sylvestre Gacumbitsi met successively with Majors Ndekezi and Nsabimana, as well as with Interahamwe leader, Cyasa. Together, they travelled to several areas in Rusumo commune on 11 April 1994. The Accused then visited several secteurs in Rusumo on 12 April 1994 to check whether the conseillers had held such meetings with the local population. The same day, he met the local CDR leader, André, in Gasenyi and reiterated his request of 10 April, namely, not to let people flee to Tanzania.[257]

272. In the morning of 13 April 1994, at the Nyakarambi market, the Accused, using a megaphone, addressed a crowd of about one hundred people who had assembled at his request. He issued various instructions and asked the crowd not to let anyone escape. The instructions were directed at the Hutu majority and aimed at preventing Tutsi from escaping from the attacks, and preparing Hutu to eliminate Tutsi.

273. On 14 April 1994, at the Rwanteru trading centre, the Accused addressed about a hundred people and urged them to arm themselves with machetes and participate in the fight against the enemy, stressing that all the Tutsi had to be driven away. After his speech, the Accused drove towards Kigarama, followed by some of the people. In Kigarama, the attackers attacked the house and property of a Tutsi called Callixte, and also looted the property of other Tutsi. Led by Juvénal Ntamwemizi, who was identified as the Accused's representative, another group, composed of people who had also listened to the Accused's speech in Rwanteru, attacked the property of a Tutsi called Buhanda.

274. The Chamber finds that these attacks resulted from the instigation stirred up by the Accused at the Rwanteru trading centre: the Kigarama attack took place under his direct supervision, while Buhanda's house was attacked under the supervision of his representative.

275. In the afternoon of 14 April 1994, the Accused, together with some armed communal policemen, went to the Kanyinya trading centre, where he told a group of about ten people: "Others have already completed their work. Where do you stand?". Soon after he left, a group of attackers set up and led by two demobilized soldiers, Nkaka and Sendama, started attacking Tutsi targets.

276. On 14 April 1994, after addressing the crowd at the Kanyinya commercial centre, the Accused, still accompanied by communal policemen, went to the Gisenyi commercial centre, where he addressed about 40 people, mainly Hutu. The Accused urged them to kill the Tutsi and throw their bodies into the River Akagera. He also asked boatmen to remove their canoes from the river to prevent the Tutsi from using them to cross the river.

277. Furthermore, the Accused met with various political and military officials, notably Colonel Rwagafirita from whom he received boxes of weapons that he had unloaded in various areas of the commune.

278. All such facts amount to acts of preparation for the massacres of the Tutsi in Rusumo commune. Sylvestre Gacumbitsi's involvement leads the Chamber to find that he planned the murder of Tutsi in Rusumo commune in April 1994.

279. "Instigating" involves prompting another person to commit an offence.[258] Instigating need not be direct and public.[259] For it to be a punishable offence, proof[260] is required of a causal connection between the instigation and the actus reus of the crime. In this particular case, the Accused, at various locations, publicly instigated the population to kill the Tutsi. For example, the Accused made speeches at the Rwanteru commercial centre where, following his instigation, those who listened to his speeches participated, shortly after, in looting property belonging to the Tutsi and in killing the Tutsi.[261]

280. The Chamber finds that Sylvestre Gacumbitsi incited the killing of Tutsi in Rusumo commune in April 1994.

281. "Ordering" refers to a situation where an individual in a position of authority uses such authority to compel another individual to commit an offence.[262] On this issue, the two ad hoc Tribunals have ruled differently. One has held that ordering implies the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the individual

326. The Prosecutor submits that the Accused planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or perpetration of the rape of the above-mentioned victims.

327. The Chamber finds that the evidence adduced establishes that Sylvestre Gacumbitsi, through such utterances as were heard by Prosecution Witness TAQ, also instigated the rape of Tutsi women and girls. On her part, Prosecution Witness TAS also testified that she heard those who raped her say that the Accused had ordered them to rape Tutsi women and girls, but her uncorroborated hearsay evidence is not such as to prove the involvement of the Accused.

328. The Chamber recalls that, immediately after the utterances made by the Accused instigating the rape of Tutsi women and girls, while he was crossing the bridge between Kankobwa and Nyarubuye secteurs on his way to Nyarubuye, Prosecution Witness TAQ and seven other Tutsi women and girls were raped by young men who, being in the neigbourhood, heard the bourgmestre's instigation. The Chamber finds that these rapes, as recounted by Prosecution Witness TAQ, resulted directly from the instigation of the Accused.

329. On the contrary, the Chamber finds no evidence establishing a link between the rape of Prosecution Witness TAS and the possible utterances of the Accused and therefore the Accused cannot incur responsibility in that respect. The same applies to the rape of the wife of Prosecution Witness TAO, and the rape of the mother of Prosecution Witness TAP. However, the Chambers finds that these rapes are established as part of the widespread and systematic attack against Tutsi civilians in Rusumo.

330. Pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute, the Chamber finds Sylvestre Gacumbitsi criminally liable for instigating the rape of Witness TAQ and seven other Tutsi women and girls, thereby also committing a crime against humanity.

331. As to the other forms of criminal participation, the Prosecution has not adduced evidence to show that they are applicable to the Accused.

332. Having found the Accused criminally liable under Article 6(1) of the Statute for instigating others to commit rape in Rusumo commune in April 1994, the Chamber does not deem it necessary to enquire whether he is equally responsible pursuant to Article 6(3) of the Statute, given the similarity of the acts charged and the lack evidence of a superior-subordinate relationship between the Accused and the perpetrators of the rapes.

333. Thus, with regard to Count 5, the Chamber finds Sylvestre Gacumbitsi GUILTY OF RAPE AS A CRIME AGAINST HUMANITY.

CALLIXTE KALIMANZIRA

v.

THE PROSECUTOR

Case No. ICTR-05-88-A

JUDGEMENT

The Office of the Prosecutor:

Mr. Hassan Bubacar Jallow
Mr. Alphonse Van

Mr. François-Xavier Nsanzuwera

C. Alleged Errors in Assessing the Alibi (Ground 4)

52. The Trial Chamber convicted Kalimanzira for instigating and aiding and abetting genocide at the Butare-Gisagara roadblock around 22 April 1994, for aiding and abetting genocide at Kabuye hill on 23 April 1994, and for aiding and abetting genocide by his presence at the inauguration of Élie Ndayambaje as bourgmestre of Muganza Commune on 22 June 1994.[132] In addition, it convicted Kalimanzira for direct and public incitement to commit genocide at the Jaguar roadblock in middle to late April 1994, the Kajyanama roadblock in late April 1994, the Gisagara marketplace at the end of May 1994, and the Nyabisagara football field in late May or early June 1994.[133]

53. In respect of each of these allegations, Kalimanzira presented an alibi, placing him, for the most part, at his home in Kigali from 6 to 14 April 1994, working with the interim government in Murambi, Gitarama Prefecture, between 14 April and 30 May 1994, and at his home in Butare Prefecture from 31 May until 30 June 1994.[134] Kalimanzira submits that the Trial Chamber erred in rejecting his alibi.[135] In this section, the Appeals Chamber addresses two principal questions: (1) whether the Trial Chamber erred in taking into account the lack of his notice of alibi; and (2) whether the Trial Chamber erred in assessing the underlying alibi evidence.

1. Notice of Alibi

54. The Trial Chamber found that Kalimanzira did not provide adequate notice of his intent to rely on an alibi defence as prescribed in Rule 67(A)(ii)(a) of the Rules.[136] The Trial Chamber observed that the lack of notice "may suggest that the Defence has tailored the alibi evidence to fit the Prosecution's case."[137] It therefore decided to take this into consideration in assessing the alibi,[138] noting that this "may diminish its probative value as it raises the question of whether the alibi was recently invented to fit the [Prosecution case]."[139] In particular, the Trial Chamber ultimately concluded that the "sudden and belated introduction" of specific alibi evidence in

D. Alleged Errors Relating to the Inauguration of Élie Ndayambajye (Ground 5)

72. The Trial Chamber convicted Kalimanzira for aiding and abetting genocide, in part, based on his presence at the 22 June 1994 inauguration of Élie Ndayambaje as bourgmestre of Muganza Commune, Butare Prefecture, during which Ndayambaje instigated the killing of Tutsis.[194] The Trial Chamber found that, by his presence, Kalimanzira offered moral support to Ndayambaje's call to kill Tutsis during the ceremony and thereby aided and abetted subsequent killings.[195] In making these findings, the Trial Chamber relied on Witnesses BBB and BCA, who attended the ceremony, observed Kalimanzira's presence, and testified about subsequent killings.[196]

73. Kalimanzira submits that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting him in relation to this incident.[197] In this section, the Appeals Chamber will consider whether the Trial Chamber erred in the assessment of the evidence of the killings. In this respect, Kalimanzira contends that there is insufficient evidence demonstrating that killings in fact followed the ceremony.[198] The Prosecution responds generally that Kalimanzira's arguments lack merit, but does not address the sufficiency of the evidence relating to the killings.[199]

74. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "an aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime, which have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[200] The Appeals Chamber has explained that "[a]n accused can be convicted for aiding and abetting a crime when it is established that his conduct amounted to tacit approval and encouragement of the crime and that such conduct substantially contributed to the crime."[201] Where this form of aiding and abetting has been a basis of a conviction, "it has been the authority of the accused combined with his presence on (or very near to) the crime scene, especially if considered together with his prior conduct, which all together allow the conclusion that the accused's conduct amounts to official sanction of the crime and thus substantially contributes to it."[202]

75. In view of Kalimanzira's position as directeur de cabinet of the Ministry of Interior, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to determine that his silent presence during Ndayamabaje's inflammatory speech would have offered tacit approval of its message. The basis of Kalimanzira's conviction, however, rests on the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Kalimanzira's tacit approval not only sanctioned Ndayambaje's message, but in fact substantially contributed to killings which occurred after the ceremony.[203]

76. As the Trial Chamber noted, Witnesses BBB and BCA attest to killings occurring after the meeting.[204] Their accounts regarding these crimes are vague and devoid of any detail. In particular, the extent of Witness BBB's description of the killings is that "after the speech, people went to sweep their houses, that is to say, to kill those persons."[205] Witness BCA's account is similarly brief: "As was noticed later on, it meant that [Tutsis and Hutus who opposed the government] who had been hidden had to be taken out of their hiding so that they should be killed as well."[206]

77. The Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, considers that it is unclear from either account whether the witnesses had first-hand knowledge of the killings or whether their evidence was hearsay. They refer to no particular incident, provide no approximate time-frame for the killings, and do not give any identifying information concerning the assailants or victims. In such circumstances, the Appeals Chamber finds, Judge Pocar dissenting, that it is impossible to determine with any reasonable certainty whether any killings in fact occurred following the meeting and, if so, the degree to which they were related to the ceremony.

78. In the Muvunyi case, the Appeals Chamber reversed a conviction for genocide because the evidence of the killings which underpinned the finding of guilt were based on second- or third-hand testimony that "contain[ed] no detail on any specific incident or the frequency of the attacks."[207] The Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, can identify no material distinction between the quality of the evidence in the Muvunyi case and that provided by Witnesses BBB and BCA here with respect to the occurrence of killings.

79. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, is not persuaded that the Trial Chamber acted reasonably in relying on the evidence of Witnesses BBB and BCA about the subsequent killings. No reasonable trier of fact could have concluded that Tutsis were killed as a result of the ceremony in circumstances where it heard no evidence about even a single incident. Therefore, the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that the evidence showed that Kalimanzira's

JUDGEMENT and SENTENCE

Office of the Prosecutor:
Mr. Bernard Muna
Mr. Mohamed Othman
Mr. James Stewart
Mr. Udo Gehring

Counsel for the Defence:
Mr. Oliver Michael Inglis

I. The Proceedings

A. Background

1. Jean Kambanda was arrested by the Kenyan authorities, on the basis of a formal request submitted to them by the Prosecutor on 9 July 1997, in accordance with the provisions of Rule 40 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence (the "Rules"). On 16 July 1997, Judge Laïty Kama, ruling on the Prosecutor=s motion of 9 July 1997, ordered the transfer and provisional detention of the suspect Jean Kambanda at the Detention Facility

42. In the brief dated 10 August 1998 and in her closing argument at the hearing, the Prosecutor stressed the gravity of the crimes of genocide, and crimes against humanity. The heinous nature of the crime of genocide and its absolute prohibition makes its commission inherently aggravating. The magnitude of the crimes involving the killing of an estimated 500,000 civilians in Rwanda, in a short span of 100 days constitutes an aggravating fact.

43. Crimes against Humanity are as aforementioned conceived as offences of the gravest kind against the life and liberty of the human being.

44. The crimes were committed during the time when Jean Kambanda was Prime Minister and he and his government were responsible for maintenance of peace and security. Jean Kambanda abused his authority and the trust of the civilian population. He personally participated in the genocide by distributing arms, making incendiary speeches and presiding over cabinet and other meetings where the massacres were planned and discussed. He failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent his subordinates from committing crimes against the population. Abuse of positions of authority or trust is generally considered an aggravating factor.

(ii) Individual circumstances of Jean Kambanda

Personal particulars

45. Jean Kambanda was born on 10 October 1955 at Mubumbano in the Prefecture of Butare. He has a wife and two children. He holds a Diploma d=Ingenieur Commercial and from May 1989 to April 1994, he worked in the Union des Banques Populaires du Rwanda rising to the position of Director of the network of those banks. He was Vice President of the Butare Section of the MDR and member of its Political Bureau. On 9 April 1994, he became Prime Minister of the Interim Government. The Prosecutor has not proved previous criminal convictions, if any, of Jean Kambanda.

(iii) Mitigating Factors

46. Defence Counsel has proffered three factors in mitigation:- Plea of guilty; remorse; which he claims is evident from the act of pleading guilty; and co-operation with the Prosecutor=s office.

47. The Prosecutor confirms that Jean Kambanda has extended substantial co-operation and invaluable information to the Prosecutor. The Prosecutor requests the Trial Chamber to regard as a significant mitigating factor, not only the substantial co-operation so far extended, but also the future co-operation when Jean Kambanda testifies for the prosecution in the trials of other accused.

48. The Plea Agreement signed by the parties expressly records that no agreements, understandings or promises have been made between the parties with respect to sentence which, it is acknowledged, is at the discretion of the Trial Chamber.

189. Finally, based on Witness CBS's uncontradicted testimony, the Chamber finds that members of the witness's family, including his father, were killed on or about 11 April 1994 and that the witness sought refuge at the parish on 12 April 1994. The Chamber finds no evidence on the record regarding the perpetrators of these attacks but is again satisfied that the victims were killed by Hutu assailants.

190. According to the Prosecution, "[f]rom the very outset, the killing of Tutsis in Kivumu commune was not arbitrary or random, but was sanctioned and ordered by the persons of power, influence or authority in Kivumu commune."[447] The Prosecution relies on the evidence of Witnesses CNJ, CBR and CDL to support this allegation.

191. Witness CNJ testified that Hutus were publicly called upon to kill the Tutsi.[448] These calls were broadcast on Radio Rwanda and other radio stations.[449] He testified that, at the local level, Grégoire Ndahimana, IPJ Kayishema and other authorities asked Hutus to go to Nyange to attack the Tutsi who had taken refuge there.[450] Witnesses CBR and CDL both testified that Télesphore Ndungutse, a teacher and local vice-chair of the MRND Party, instigated the Hutu in his locality to launch attacks against Tutsi civilians.[451] Witness CDL testified that Ndungutse received permission for these attacks from IPJ Fulgence Kayishema and Canton Court President Joseph Habiyambere.[452] Finally, Witnesses CDL, CBR and CNJ suggested between them that, after Tutsi were attacked, IPJ Kayishema ordered that the bodies be buried without investigation.[453]

192. Based on this testimony, the Chamber is satisfied that Télesphore Ndungutse instigated attacks against Tutsi in his locality and, particularly, against the home of his neighbour Grégoire Ndakubana. Indeed, the Chamber recalls that Witness CBR was one of those instigated by Ndungutse to launch attacks against Tutsi civilians, including Ndakubana's family. The Chamber is further satisfied that, by declining to investigate the crimes committed at Ndakubana's house and elsewhere, IPJ Kayishema acquiesced to and encouraged the continuation of the attacks.

193. On the other hand, the Chamber attaches little weight to Witness CDL's testimony that Ndungutse received authorisation for these attacks from the IPJ and canton court president because it is both uncorroborated and double hearsay. Similarly, the Chamber notes that, while Witness CNJ testified that Ndahimana, Kayishema and other authorities "asked us to go to Nyange where thousands of Tutsis had sought refuge,"[454] he did not provide any information regarding his basis for knowledge. Moreover, when considered in context, this testimony appears to refer to the attacks on the Nyange Church between 13 and 16 April 1994 and not to the attacks against Tutsi homes in the days immediately following the death of the president.[455] For these reasons, the Chamber is not convinced that Ndahimana or Kayishema ordered attacks against Tutsi civilians prior to their arrival at the Nyange Parish.

office in Butare, eventually becoming the head prosecutor in Kigali. His work as a prosecutor continued until 1973.[5]

7. Beginning in 1967, Ngirumpatse was a member of the Rwandan delegation to the Organization of African Unity. In 1974, President Habyarimana appointed Ngirumpatse Ambassador to Ethiopia. He served in that capacity until 1979, when he was appointed Ambassador to Germany. While in Europe, Ngirumpatse completed his education with a PhD in law at Strasbourg University.[6]

8. Ngirumpatse returned to Rwanda in 1985 and was appointed diplomatic adviser to President Habyarimana in 1986. Four years later, Habyarimana appointed Ngirumpatse general manager of the Société Nationale des Assurances au Rwanda (SONARWA), Rwanda's national insurance corporation.[7]

9. In addition to his involvement in diplomacy and business, Ngirumpatse was an active participant in civil society organizations. In particular, he was interested in music and founded the Kigali Choir. Ngirumpatse was also a composer of Rwandan music and poetry, and his lyrics were included in a poetry anthology used in secondary schools in Rwanda.[8]

10. Ngirumpatse entered domestic politics in 1991, when he was appointed chairman of the MRND in Kigali-ville préfecture. He was elected National Secretary of the MRND in May 1992, and National Party Chairman and Chairman of the MRND Executive Bureau in July 1993,[9] positions he held during the events of 1994. Ngirumpatse was Minister of Justice from December 1991 to 7 April 1992.[10]

11. He was arrested in Bamako, Mali, on 5 June 1998 and transferred to the UNDF where he has remained throughout the course of this trial, apart from periods in a hospital or safe house for health reasons.[11]

PRELIMINARY ISSUES

1. INTRODUCTION

12. In their Closing Briefs, the Accused challenge various aspects of the fairness of the proceedings. The Prosecution did not address these issues in its Closing Brief or during its oral arguments. Many of them have been addressed by the Chamber at various stages of the trial. The Chamber will consider the following Defence submissions.

[11] Ngirumpatse, T. 18 February 2011, p. 5. According to the Commanding Officer of the UNDF, Ngirumpatse spent the following dates in a hospital: 4/4/03 – 16/4/03 (AICC); 17/8/08 – 18/8/08 (AAR); 18/8/08 – 5/9/08 (KCMC); 8/10/08 – 4/6/09; 12/5/10 – 15/5/10; 14/6/10 – 22/6/10; 6/7/11 – 9/7/11 (Nairobi Hospital). He spent the following period in a safe house: 4/6/09 – 25/6/10. See email sent by Saidou Guindo, Commanding Officer of the UNDF, to Amanda Grafstrom, Associate Legal Officer, on 23/9/11.

criminal acts as the accused. Therefore, as long as no special circumstances have been identified, it is reasonable for a Trial Chamber to employ a lesser degree of caution towards the testimony of witnesses charged with similar crimes as opposed to accomplices.[151]

109. The Appeals Chamber has explained that two testimonies corroborate each other when one prima facie credible testimony is compatible with another prima facie credible testimony regarding the same fact or a sequence of linked facts.[152] Further, corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony.[153]

110. It is well-established that a Trial Chamber has the discretion to consider a material fact proven by the uncorroborated testimony of a single witness if that testimony is otherwise credible.[154] However, such evidence must be assessed with appropriate caution.[155] Nevertheless, if the Trial Chamber finds that a witness's testimony is inconsistent or otherwise problematic, it may still accept the evidence if it is corroborated by other evidence.[156] Whether it is necessary to rely on several witnesses' evidence to establish proof of a material fact depends on various factors that must be assessed in light of the circumstances of each case.[157] Where there is conflicting testimony, it is the duty of the Trial Chamber to decide which evidence it deems more probative.[158]

12. PROTECTIVE MEASURES

111. Most Prosecution and Defence witnesses were granted protective measures in order to prevent public disclosure of their identities.[159] Accordingly, when a witness or exhibit refers to a protected witness by his or her real name, the Chamber will not assist the reader by cross-referencing the real name of the protected witness with his or her pseudonym. Notwithstanding, the Chamber seeks to set forth the basis of its reasoning as clearly as possible, while avoiding disclosure of any information that may reveal the identity of protected witnesses. It has been mindful in its deliberations of the information it cannot fully explain.

192. Ngirumpatse had nothing to do with the formation of the Interahamwe. Towards the end of 1991, the Provisional National Committee simply informed him that the Interahamwe had been created.[276] He refuted the testimony of multiple Prosecution witnesses who claimed that: he was involved with the creation of the Interahamwe; the Interahamwe was created to counter insults from other opposition political parties and was initially composed of the children of MRND members; he introduced members of the Interahamwe at meetings and chose them for the purpose of killing Tutsis and opposition leaders; he distributed weapons at Interahamwe meetings and prepared appointments to the Provisional National Committee; the Interahamwe recruited unemployed youth; the Steering Committee of the MRND controlled the Interahamwe; the Interahamwe protected the interests of the MRND; he urged the extension of the Interahamwe to other préfectures; and that the MRND provided venues for Interahamwe meetings.[277]

193. Ngirumpatse acknowledges that he played a role in recruiting youth into the MRND but claims he did so to strengthen the party and give it a future. He did not recruit youth so they could defend the country.[278] Rutaganda and Witnesses G and T were among those who independently created the Interahamwe without the intervention of any member of the MRND.[279]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

194. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH, ALG, and Defence Witness Rutaganda were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[280] Furthermore, at the time of his testimony, Prosecution Witness T was detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[281] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program[282] and that Rutaganda called Ngirumpatse as a Defence witness in his own trial.

195. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Undisputed Issues

196. It is undisputed that the Interahamwe was initially founded to counter the existing youth groups of other political parties, which harassed the MRND party, and to recruit new members for the MRND.

followed the assassination of the president. The Interahamwe was not created for the purpose of forming a militia.[341]

245. There was no integration between the Interahamwe and the MRND.[342] Regarding Rutaganda's testimony that the Interahamwe was an integral part of the MRND, Ngirumpatse asserted that Rutaganda had misinterpreted the constitution of the MRND.

246. Although the MRND encouraged the creators of the Interahamwe to continue with their project, this does not mean that Ngirumpatse was the one in charge of the Interahamwe. He could assist the founders of the Interahamwe as the National Secretary and, later, as the chairman of the MRND but he did not organise their activities. The MRND leadership would advise the Interahamwe regarding any demonstrations they wished to organise, which might have been prejudicial to the interests of the party, but the party did not have the power to authorise the Interahamwe to organise these demonstrations.[343]

247. Jean-Pierre Turatsinze may have sat in an office at the MRND headquarters, but he did not have his own small office and he was not in charge of the Interahamwe.[344] Turatsinze was merely a driver and staff member of the National Secretariat of the MRND. He was a member of the MRND and was recruited in 1992. Turatsinze was used to deliver messages and worked at the reception during a congress on 3 July 1993. He was not in charge of coordinating the activities of the Interahamwe, he was not Ngirumpatse's right-hand man, and he was not the liaison between Ngirumpatse and the Interahamwe. Turatsinze had a primary school education, did not speak French, was fired for embezzlement and barred from the premises of the MRND National Secretariat in November 1993.[345]

248. It is wrong to assume that Ngirumpatse controlled the Interahamwe simply because others contacted him first when they wanted to change the behavior of the Interahamwe. He was simply the liaison between the Interahamwe and the MRND.[346]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

249. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH, ALG, AXA, UB, and Defence Witnesses Rutaganda and Nahimana were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[347] Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution witnesses AWD and T were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[348] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program[349] and that Rutaganda called Ngirumpatse as a Defence witness in his own trial. The Chamber also takes into account that Witness Delphine Ngirumpatse is Ngirumpatse's daughter.[350]

250. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Expansion of the Interahamwe Throughout Rwanda

251. The Interahamwe was initially established in Kigali préfecture. Prosecution Witnesses HH, ALG and G, who lived in Kigali at the time, stated that the Interahamwe was established at all levels in that préfecture.

252. In April 1992, the MRND National Congress resolved that the Interahamwe should be set up throughout Rwanda. Witnesses ALG, HH, and G and Defence Witness Rutaganda testified that this actually happened. The evidence of Prosecution Witness AXA, and the transcript of the 7 November 1993 rally corroborate that the Interahamwe was established in Kibuye préfecture and Ngirumpatse confirmed that the Interahamwe was established in Gisenyi préfecture. It is also apparent that the Interahamwe existed in Kibungo préfecture.

253. Defence Witness Mpambara testified that the Interahamwe were attacked by youth groups of the PL party after an MRND rally in Kibungo in 1993. Although he stated that the Interahamwe was not an organised, structured group in Kibungo, he did not dispute that it existed in that préfecture. Furthermore, a report from General Augustin Ndindiliyimana[351] confirms that the Interahamwe existed in Kibungo in 1993 and were being trained in Mutara sector where Witness Mpambara commanded his troops.[352] Ngirumpatse, on the other hand, testified that apart from Kigali and Gisenyi préfectures there was no "development or organisation" of the Interahamwe nationwide. If by this, Ngirumpatse meant that there were préfectures where the Interahamwe did not exist, the Chamber finds the evidence that the Interahamwe existed in all préfectures in one form or another more probative.

254. The evidence of Prosecution Witness T that the Provisional National Committee sent members to Gisenyi préfecture in January 1994 and Butare préfecture from March to April 1994 to set up Interahamwe organisations is, with respect to Gisenyi, corroborated by Ngirumpatse's evidence. It is also generally supported by the evidence of Witness ALG that Ngirumpatse announced that Interahamwe were to be set up throughout the country at the Kigali-ville prefectural committee in January 1994.

Structure of the Interahamwe

255. It was decided during the April 1992 MRND congress that the Interahamwe should be established throughout the country at the prefectural and communal levels. It follows from the evidence of Witnesses HH and G that the Interahamwe was, in fact, organised at the prefectural level in all préfectures. This is consistent with the Chamber's findings with respect to Kigali préfecture (see para. 251), and with respect to Gisenyi préfecture it is

341. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses ALG, HH, UB, AWE, AXA, and Defence Witnesses Rutaganda, Renzaho, Nsengiyumva, and Kajelijeli were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[489] Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses AWD and T, and Defence Witness Ntamabyaliro were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[490] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program[491] and that Rutaganda called Ngirumpatse as a Defence witness in his own trial.

342. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Military Training of the Interahamwe

343. The Prosecution witnesses gave consistent evidence that Interahamwe were selected for military training and received military training.

344. Prosecution Witnesses HH and AWE testified that they selected Interahamwe for training. Witness HH stated that he and other Interahamwe secteur leaders from Kigali received training in weapons handling by an ex-soldier in the Kabuga building. Prosecution Witnesses GBU and AXA stated that they received training in Mukingo commune in Ruhengeri prefecture and in Bwakira commune in Kibuye prefecture, respectively. Prosecution Witness GOB claimed that he participated in selecting trainers and Prosecution Witness BDW asserted that he trained Interahamwe in Bwakira commune and witnessed training in Birambo. The evidence that military training of the Interahamwe took place was confirmed by Prosecution Witnesses T and G who held high positions in the Interahamwe movement and therefore were in a position to know of this activity.

345. The evidence was further corroborated by Prosecution witnesses who received the information from authorities and MRND leaders: Witness ALG from Renzaho; Witness AWD from Ngirumpatse and Karemera; Witness HH from Ngirumpatse; Witness AWE from Ngirumpatse and Nzirorera; and Witness BDW from Karemera.

346. The evidence was also corroborated by Prosecution Witnesses AWD, HH, and GAY who received the information from Interahamwe who had undergone training, and Prosecution Witness Claeys who had heard the information from Turatsinze.

347. Nonetheless, the Prosecution evidence was rebutted by a number of Defence witnesses who had not heard of any training and asserted that it could not have taken place without their knowledge. The Chamber notes that testimony from a witness who positively experienced or learned a matter is generally more probative than testimony from a witness who was unaware of that same matter.

348. With respect to the evidence of Defence Witnesses Rutaganda and Renzaho who held positions that would have enabled them to know about military training of the Interahamwe, the Chamber notes they are both convicted for genocide related to the

430. Joseph Nzirorera denied being aware of any distribution of weapons to the youth of Mukingo commune.[636] Nzirorera further denied being aware of the distribution of weapons to Robert Kajuga and Turatsinze by the Ministry of Defence.[637]

Matthieu Ngirumpatse

431. Ngirumpatse denied that he ordered, authorised, facilitated, or issued instructions for weapons to be distributed to the Interahamwe in 1993 or 1994. The only activity involving arms was related to the Provisional National Committee of the Interahamwe and the Minister of Defence. The purpose of the distribution was not to kill, but to provide personal protection to members of the Provisional National Committee.[638]

432. He denied participating in the clandestine importation of arms.[639] He further denied hiding any arms or issuing instructions for arms to be hidden at the MRND headquarters or at any other location under MRND supervision.[640] He was never informed of the distribution of arms by anyone to the youth of the MRND.[641]

433. He denied ever being aware that weapons were clandestinely imported using a Romanian plane in 1993 or 1994.[642]

434. With regard to Frank Claeys' testimony, Ngirumpatse explained that Turatsinze no longer had access to the MRND headquarters at that time and Claeys could not get inside because of the colour of his skin so neither of them could have seen anything.[643]

435. He agreed that he and Nzirorera met with General Dallaire and Claeys at the Amahoro hotel on 13 January 1994 and were questioned about hidden weapons. They spontaneously invited them to carry out a search but they refused.[644]

436. He met Booh-Booh in his capacity as chairman of the MRND to talk about the storage and distribution of weapons. The President of the republic had been told that there was an arms cache in the MRND building and that weapons were being distributed to the MRND youth; and that was the purpose of the discussion.[645] testimony, Prosecution Witness T was detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[647] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program[648] and that Rutaganda called Ngirumpatse as a Defence witness in his own trial.

438. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Stockpiling and Distribution of Weapons

439. Prosecution Witness Claeys recalled abundant information he received from Turatsinze regarding the stockpiling of weapons and their distribution to the Interahamwe. The information he related was corroborated in many ways, as follows.

440. Claeys stated that Turatsinze showed Captain Deme an arms cache in the MRND headquarters while he waited outside. He also mentioned that Turatsinze showed him and Deme three other arms caches. Prosecution Witness T mentioned that he saw weapons at Kajuga's house, and Prosecution Witness G claimed that he received a firearm from Turatsinze. Prosecution Witness HH asserted that he participated in the distribution of the firearms. Witnesses T, G, and HH testified that distributions began in 1993.

441. Furthermore, the information Claeys received from Turatsinze is corroborated by the testimony of Witnesses G and UB regarding what Kajuga and Turatsinze, respectively, told them about the distributions. It is also corroborated by Defence Witness Nzabanterura's evidence that Interahamwe members received weapons after undergoing training at a military camp.

442. Thus, the Chamber attaches no weight to Defence Witness Booh-Booh's doubt that weapons had been distributed, which appears to have been based on the meager results of UNAMIR weapons searches. Because of his position, he would have known about the arms caches Turatsinze showed Claeys and Deme because they were mentioned in the UNAMIR reports he was served with on a regular basis. Furthermore, his testimony as a whole seemed to reflect bitterness towards the publicity the UNAMIR Force Commander had received.

443. The Chamber is convinced that firearms were provided by military authorities and widely distributed to members of the Interahamwe. Unlike the testimony of Ngirumpatse and Rutaganda, they were not distributed solely for the protection of members of the Provisional National Committee. The Prosecution has also presented strong evidence that additional weapons were stockpiled for later distribution.

Conclusion

444. The Prosecution has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that, starting in 1993, weapons were provided to the Interahamwe and also stockpiled for later distribution to the Interahamwe.

[647] See para. 178.
[648] See paras. 175 (G) and 178 (T).

Matthieu Ngirumpatse

468. Ngirumpatse testified that he never attended a meeting to raise funds for the Interahamwe. He was not aware of money being handed to the Executive Bureau and then used in a clandestine manner. The buses hired to transport Interahamwe to rallies in other préfectures were not exclusively for Interahamwe but were for all party members who wanted to attend.[677]

469. Ngirumpatse also disputed Witness AWE's testimony that he chaired a meeting at the Hôtel L'Horizon Rebero on 28 March 1994. At that time, he was busy attending meetings for the establishment of institutions. He was not aware of any meeting that may have taken place at the Hôtel L'Horizon Rebero.[678]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

470. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses AWE and ALG, and Defence Witnesses Bizimungu and Rutaganda were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[679] Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution witnesses AWD and T were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[680] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program[681] and that Rutaganda called Ngirumpatse as a Defence witness in his own trial.

471. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Fundraising Activities

472. Based on the evidence of Prosecution Witnesses G, T, and AWD, and Defence Witnesses PR and Rutaganda, the Chamber is satisfied that fundraising activities for the Interahamwe took place in 1993 and 1994 at the Hôtel L'Horizon Rebero in Kigali. The evidence of these witnesses was broadly consistent on this point and the Chamber considers it to be credible.

473. The Chamber is also satisfied that Nzirorera and other senior officials, including Juvénal Habyarimana and Robert Kajuga, participated in these fundraising activities. Witnesses G, T, and Rutaganda provided consistent testimony on this point and the Chamber considers it to be credible.

474. The Chamber is not satisfied, however, that Ngirumpatse participated in these fundraising events at the Hôtel L'Horizon Rebero. Prosecution Witness AWE's evidence is example those whose children joined the RPF, people who were suspected to be propagandists of the RPF, people who collected financial support for the RPF, and Hutus who supported the RPF war. Those listed were to be killed at some point in the future, and most were killed within the first three days after 6 April 1994.[699]

492. Based on his observations in Kigali and Byumba between April and July 1994, he stated that the Interahamwe almost always assisted or aided the Rwandan Armed Forces in the killings. He testified that everybody knows one another in Rwanda so Hutus do not need to draw up lists if the purpose was to kill all Tutsis.[700]

Ngirumpatse Defence Witness André Nzabanterura

493. The witness[701] stated that there was no list of Tutsis to eliminate. The issue of lists was created to discredit the MRND and the Interahamwe. In Rugando cellule, the MRND vice-chair was a Tutsi named Kalisa Rutabingwa and he would not have remained a member of the MRND if they had drawn up such a list.[702]

Matthieu Ngirumpatse

494. Ngirumpatse testified that any allegations that he chaired meetings where lists of Tutsis and moderate Hutus to be killed were created are fabricated. The RPF collected all the records and archives after they took control of Rwanda so if the lists existed they would have been turned over to the Prosecutor and would be in evidence in this trial. Lists were not necessary in Rwanda because everyone's ethnicity was known.[703]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

495. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH and UB, and Defence Witness Nzabanterura were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[704] Furthermore, at the time of his testimony, Prosecution Witness T was detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[705] The Chamber also takes into account that Witness T has received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program.[706]

Matthieu Ngirumpatse

528. Ngirumpatse is unsure if Hutu Power was an ideology or slogan but learned that it was introduced on 23 October 1993 by Froudouald Karamira at the Nyamirambo stadium rally. He was not present at this rally, because it was an MDR party rally and he was never in any way associated with that slogan or idea.[739] He never made private or public statements to indoctrinate youth to hate Tutsis and never promoted hatred or division. Such statements would have subjected him to reprimands or sanctions.

529. He did not order Witness UB to attend the rally. If such an order would have been given, it would not have come from the national chairman of the MRND but from the prefectural chair. Ngirumptase listened to some excerpts of the rally on the radio, which did not conform to the allegations of Witness UB. The MRND was not present at the rally because it was organized by the MDR.[740]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

530. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses ALG and UB were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[741] Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses AWD and T were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[742] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witness T has received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program.[743]

531. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

The Speeches

532. In his speech, Karamira equated Tutsis with: "those who supported" Paul Kagame; "the enemy in their midst"; and "a traitor infiltrating their ranks and stealing their power". This corroborates the testimony of Prosecution Witnesses ALG and UB that speakers at the rally referred to Tutsis as accomplices of the enemy. The testimony of Witness UB that Tutsis were attacked immediately after the rally further corroborates the evidence that Tutsis were referred to in this way during the rally.

533. Therefore, the Chamber finds it proven beyond a reasonable doubt that speeches were made during the 23 October 1993 rally at Nyamirambo stadium, which characterized Tutsis as accomplices of the enemy.

Ngirumpatse Defence Witness PR

586. The witness[799] spoke at an MRND rally at Nyamirambo Stadium on 16 January 1994, but denied making a speech about the Interahamwe. The witness was shown Exhibit P229A, and commented that only an ill-intentioned observer could conclude that he was endorsing the Interahamwe.[800]

Édouard Karemera

587. Karemera's speech during the rally updated MRND militants on the reasons for the stalemate with the Arusha Accords. He touched on the responsibility of Agathe Uwilingiyimana and Faustin Twagiramungu in particular. He spoke of the dissent among opposition parties but never attacked Tutsis in his speech. Instead, he was denouncing the irresponsible conduct of the Prime Minister designate who insisted on making arrangements with the RPF without consulting with the President and MRND.[801]

Matthieu Ngirumpatse

588. Ngirumpatse testified that the purpose of the rally was to remind party members of the MRND's commitment to the Arusha Accords and the importance of participating in transitional institutions. It was also meant to update members on the security situation.[802] He did not threaten a repeat of the massacres that had happened before but was speaking against a perceived determination by some of the partners to the Arusha Accords to destabilise the transition process.

589. He did not mention plans to compile lists of persons to exterminate; instead, the lists he referred to in his speech were of RPF infiltrators.[803] His call for the UN to leave was simply a reference to the time when a referendum would put an end to the UN mission.[804]

590. He never made public or private statements in order to indoctrinate youth to hate Tutsis and never promoted hatred or division. He never called for the extermination of an entire part of a population or for violence. From 1990 to 1994 there is not a speech, call, radio programme, public statement, article, or mail in which he called for hatred. He did not engage in doublespeak because doublespeak would not be understood by a crowd with different levels of training and education.[805]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

591. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses ALG and UB were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[806]

Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution witnesses AWD and T were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[807] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witness T has received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program.[808]

592. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

The Rally

593. The broadcasts give a varied picture of the message conveyed by MRND leaders during the rally. On one hand, they attacked: the party's main opponents (RPF and Prime Minister Agathe Uwilingiyimana); the UN generally for suspecting the MRND of distributing weapons and preparing an armed conflict; and the Arusha Accords for giving the RPF a disproportionate role in power-sharing. The MRND leaders also warned that this could lead to a repeat of the events of 1959. On the other hand, the leaders blamed the other political parties for delaying the implementation of the Broad-Based Transitional Government.

594. Ngirumpatse's claim that the rally supported the Arusha Accords is not credible. It does not conform to the general themes addressed by the speakers or the aggressive criticism of delays in the implementation of the Broad-Based Transitional Government. The latter appears to have been more of a means for attacking the political opponents of the MRND than an expression of support for the Arusha Accords and its principles of power-sharing.

595. Thus, the Chamber finds Prosecution Witnesses T and ALG reliable to the extent that they asserted that, during the rally, the MRND criticized the Arusha Accords and opposed the envisaged power-sharing with the RPF. Consequently, the Chamber is convinced that Hutu Power was espoused at the rally. Moreover, considering the centralised structure of the MRND and the fact that the speakers did not object to each other's speeches, the Chamber finds that the MRND maintained a unified front during the rally.

596. Karemera's contention that his speech was restricted to updating the audience on the state of the Arusha Accords and criticizing Agathe Uwilingiyimana and Faustin Twagiramungu's behavior does not rebut the Prosecution evidence concerning the general tenor and purpose of the rally.

597. Nonetheless, the Chamber is not convinced by the testimony of Prosecution Witnesses AWD and ALG that the rally called for the killing of Tutsi civilians. The language Witness AWD claimed that Ngirumpatse used when referring to the events in 1959 does not appear in the broadcast. Nor does the broadcast show any chanting of "Tubatsembatsembe." The possibility that some militants may have chanted it as testified by Witness ALG does not show that it was part of the program for the rally.

Conclusion

[808] See para. 178 (T).

Cautionary Issues

623. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH and ALG, and Defence Witnesses Nsengiyumva and Nahimana were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[851] Furthermore, at the time of his testimony, Prosecution Witnesses FH was detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[852] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witness G has received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program.[853]

624. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

RTLM's Editorial Policy

625. The evidence shows beyond a reasonable doubt that the RTLM radio station served as a vehicle for the dissemination of extremist ideology, both before and after the commencement of the genocide. The evidence does not, however, show whether this was the case from the outset of RTLM's broadcasting activities or, if not, from which point in time its broadcasting policy may have changed.

Ngirumpatse's Involvement

626. There is no evidence before the Chamber to suggest that Ngirumpatse played any role in the creation or financing of RTLM beyond purchasing two shares in the station. Nor is there evidence that RTLM served as a vehicle for disseminating extremist ideology at the time he purchased the shares. Finally, no evidence was led that Ngirumpatse knew that RTLM had been created for this purpose.

Conclusion

627. The Prosecution has proved beyond a reasonable doubt that the RTLM served as a vehicle for disseminating extremist ideology. It has not proved beyond a reasonable doubt that Ngirumpatse participated in the creation and financing of RTLM as part of a campaign of propaganda to instigate and incite violence against Tutsis.

3. CIVIL DEFENCE

3.1 Meeting Called by Nsabimana on or about 29 March 1994

Allegation in the Indictment

628. On or about 29 March 1994, a meeting was held by Army Chief of Staff Déogratias Nsabimana with the préfet of Kigali and the commandant de secteur for the city of Kigali, to fine-tune the structure and organisation of a civil defence plan.[854]

700. Ephrem Nkezabera provided the report and stated that the message had been well received. Persons manning the roadblocks had asked for weapons because the RPF was firing on them.[927]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

701. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of his testimony, Prosecution Witnesses T was detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[928] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program.[929]

702. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Course of the Meeting

703. As a preliminary matter, the Chamber notes that Prosecution Witness G testified that he saw Interim President Sindikubwabo at the hotel, not that Sindikubwabo attended the first meeting with the Interahamwe leaders on 10 April 1994.

704. There are some discrepancies between the testimonies concerning the meeting, mainly with respect to the timing of the events and persons who attended.

705. Witness G testified that Nzirorera chaired the first meeting. The Chamber, however, is convinced by the testimony of Nzirorera and Ngirumpatse that the latter, as the senior leader, chaired the meeting.

706. Witness G also claimed that the first tour to the roadblocks took place on 10 April with the first feedback meeting with the political leaders taking place later that same day with Karemera, Nzirorera and Mugenzi in attendance. Prosecution Witness T, on the other hand, testified that the first tour to the roadblocks took place on 11 April with the feedback meeting occurring later that day attended by Ngirumpatse, Karemera, and Nzirorera.

707. The evidence of Witness G is corroborated by Nzirorera's testimony that the Interahamwe leaders reported to him, Ngirumpatse, and Mugenzi on 10 April that they had aborted the first tour and requested a military escort. It is also corroborated by Ngirumpatse's testimony that the Interahamwe leaders may have reported to Nzirorera on 10 April with the same information. Thus, Witness G could have been referring to the aborted tour and the subsequent feedback meeting on 10 April whereas Witness T could have referred to the tour that was executed the next day with a military escort and the subsequent feedback meeting with Ngirumpatse, Karemera and Nzirorera. With respect to the feedback meeting, the testimony of Witness T is corroborated by Ngirumpatse and Nzirorera, although Ngirumpatse testified that Mugenzi, not Karemera, was the third person who attended the feedback meeting.

requesting weapons. Nzirorera believed that people were worried for their security and wanted to be able to defend themselves. Nzirorera and Ngirumpatse could not promise anything to the population because the government had problems with weapons and ammunitions.[955]

732. The meeting ended at about 8.00 p.m. Nzirorera went back to where he was residing whereas Ngirumpatse stayed at the Hôtel des Diplomates. Nzirorera and Ngirumpatse had instructed the group of Interahamwe leaders to go around the remaining neighbourhoods the following day, 12 April 1994, very early in the morning, and provide another report by 11.00 a.m. at the Hôtel des Diplomates.[956]

Matthieu Ngirumpatse

733. Ngirumpatse testified that he did not cooperate with Théoneste Bagosora or others to obtain firearms from the Ministry of Defence to be distributed to youth of political parties in Kigali.[957] He did not give any instructions for the distribution of weapons to the Interahamwe following 6 April 1994.[958] He was not aware of any meeting held by Bagosora and MRND officials around 10 or 11 April 1994 at the Hôtel des Diplomates during which it was allegedly decided that conseillers should distribute weapons to trusted youths to be used to kill Tutsis.[959]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

734. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH, UB, and ALG were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[960] Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses AWD and T were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[961]

735. The Chamber also notes that Witnesses G and T received extensive benefits, financial and otherwise, from the Prosecution in exchange for their testimony and takes this into account when assessing their credibility.[962]

736. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Weapons Distribution on 10 April 1994

737. Prosecution Witness UB gave hearsay evidence about a meeting on 10 April 1994 attended by Ngirumpatse, Karemera and Nzirorera. Prosecution Witness AWD provided secteur, and the chief of communal police. Ruzindana was removed from his position around 17 or 18 April 1994.[1097]

Nzirorera Defence Witness Eliézer Niyitegeka

876. The witness[1098] stated that Godefroid Ruzindana was not removed on 17 April because he was opposed to the killings in Kibungo. He was already dead on 17 April 1994.[1099]

Édouard Karemera

877. Karemera stated that he proposed and appointed Alphonse Nteziryayo as the replacement préfet for Sylvain Nsabimana in Butare préfecture.[1100]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

878. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witness ALG and Defence Witness Niyitegeka were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[1101] Furthermore, at the time of his testimony, Prosecution Witness FH was detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[1102] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witness G has received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program.[1103]

879. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Fate of Préfets Habyalimana and Ruzindana

880. The Chamber is convinced by the testimony of Defence Witness ZNJ that Ruzindana was known to have opposed the attacks against the Tutsi population and by Prosecution Witness Uwizeye's testimony, which is corroborated by Prosecution Witness G, that the killings of Tutsis in Butare started only after Habyalimana was removed as préfet. This indicates that Habyalimana had resisted attacks against the Tutsi population. The Chamber, furthermore, relies on the undisputed testimony of Witness G that Habyalimana was a Tutsi. The Prosecution, however, did not present evidence that he was the only Tutsi préfet in Rwanda.

881. Concerning the reasons why the two préfets were replaced, Defence Witness Niyitegeka claimed that Ruzindana was replaced because he had died. This is inconsistent, however, with Niyitegeka's radio announcement and the evidence of Witness ZNJ that

Cautionary Issues

1281. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH, UB, AWE, ALG, and Defence Witnesses Rutaganda, Niyitegeka, Renzaho, Ndindabahizi, and Nzabanterura were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[1601] Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witness T, and Defence Witnesses Nyiramasuhuko and Ntamabyaliro were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[1602] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program,[1603] and that Rutaganda called Ngirumpatse as a Defence witness in his own trial. Moreover, it recalls that Witness Delphine Ngirumpatse is Ngirumpatse's daughter.[1604]

1282. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Erection and Manning of Roadblocks

1283. It is undisputed that roadblocks were set up in Kigali following the downing of the President's plane. This is evident from the testimony of nearly all witnesses, which is corroborated by the adjudicated facts and the UNAMIR situation report of 7 April 1994.

1284. According to adjudicated facts and the evidence of Prosecution Witnesses HH, AWE, BDX, and ALG, and Defence Witness Ntamabyaliro, which is corroborated by Niyitegeka's radio interview, the roadblocks were established and manned by Interahamwe.

1286. Many witnesses mentioned different groups as being responsible for at least partly establishing and manning roadblocks. Witnesses UB, BDX, Rutaganda and Ndindabahizi mentioned the population. Witness AWE named local authorities pursuant to an instruction of 9 April 1994 by Préfet Renzaho. Witnesses BDX and Rutaganda mentioned soldiers. Witness Ndindabahizi named farmers and inhabitants of Kigali. Witness Nzabanterura referred to the youth of all political parties who collectively referred to themselves as Interahamwe. Witness PTR mentioned young civilians, and Karemera named bandits.

1287. The Chamber does not discount the possibility that not all roadblocks in Kigali were set up and manned by MRND Interahamwe or that the MRND Interahamwe at some roadblocks were joined by non-MRND youths or that the term "Interahamwe" over time became diluted to mean all youths engaged in anti-Tutsi activities. Furthermore, the Chamber notes that the Indictment refers to militia and soldiers as the principal perpetrators

Ngirumpatse afforded her no benefits at the roadblocks because she was similarly treated at the next two roadblocks.[1666]

1327. Though her identity card had Ngirumpatse's name on it, those manning the roadblocks were not interested in who she or her father were.[1667] Because of her physical features, people often assume she is a Tutsi and this was why she was threatened at roadblocks.[1668]

Édouard Karemera

1328. Karemera testified that the radio address by President Sindikubwabo on 10 April 1994 ordering all unauthorised roadblocks to be dismantled was sincere.[1669]

Matthieu Ngirumpatse

1329. Ngirumpatse testified that his address on Radio Rwanda on 10 April, where he called for people to stop killing, stealing, and to leave the roads was meant and understood to mean that they should dismantle the roadblocks.[1670] The French and English translations of the transcript of the radio address are inaccurate because they do not include the part where he calle for the people to stop the killings and leave the roads.

1330. He never called for the Interahamwe Provisional National Committee to control its men, and never implied that the committee was in control of the men at the roadblocks. The youth who were causing trouble on the streets were not only from the MRND, they were people from the general population. There was no control over them by the Provisional National Committee or MRND, or really even the government. Those in control were those with weapons, but really there was no control.[1671]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

1331. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH, UB, AWE, ALG, and Defence Witnesses Rutaganda, Niyitegeka, Renzaho, and Ndindabahizi were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[1672] Furthermore, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witness T, and Defence Witnesses Nyiramasuhuko and Ntamabyaliro were detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[1673] The Chamber also takes into account that Prosecution Witnesses G and T have received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program[1674] and that

Rutaganda called Ngirumpatse as a Defence witness in his own trial. Moreover, it recalls that Witness Delphine Ngirumpatse is Ngirumpatse's daughter.[1675]

1332. None of the witnesses mentioned above were direct accomplices of the Accused. The Chamber will apply the requisite degree of caution to each when assessing their credibility and the weight of their evidence.

Awareness of the Killings

1333. It is undisputed that Karemera and Ngirumpatse were aware that widespread killing had commenced on 8 April 1994 as evidenced by: the initiatives they took on 10 April 1994 in the form of instructing the Provisional National Committee to tour the roadblocks; the radio broadcast of a communiqué drafted by Karemera; and Ngirumpatse's radio address.

Control Over the Interahamwe

1334. The Chamber recalls that the MRND Executive Bureau exercised control over the Interahamwe in areas where the Interahamwe was organized according to party structures, such as Kigali, and over the Provisional National Committee of the Interahamwe, which exercised control of the Interahamwe in at least Kigali (see IV.1.3).

1335. The evidence of Prosecution Witnesses BDX and GBY that Nzirorera and Ngirumpatse greeted and expressed support for the Interahamwe when their convoys passed roadblocks manned by Interahamwe would tend to corroborate the above finding. The Chamber is, however, doubtful as to what the witnesses would have been able to hear from their respective positions (inside a car somewhere behind Nzirorera's car and in a nearby building), and is mindful that expressing support and greeting Interahamwe when passing roadblocks could be opportunistic gestures to extract oneself and others from a potentially dangerous situation. Accordingly, the Chamber need not address the Defence's challenges to the testimony of BDX and GBY in this regard.

1336. The finding that Ngirumpatse and Karemera were generally in control of the Interahamwe does not discount that the genocide could have started as a response to the assassination of President Habyarimana. The Chamber will discuss whether this was the case or whether the genocide was planned in advance of Habyarimana's assassination in (VI.3.2).

8. RAPE AND SEXUAL ASSAULT OF TUTSI WOMEN AND GIRLS

Allegation in the Indictment

1337. Interahamwe and militiamen raped and sexually assaulted Tutsi women in Ruhengeri préfecture, during early-mid April 1994, Kigali-ville préfecture during April 1994, Butare préfecture during mid-late April 1994, Kibuye préfecture during May-June 1994, and Gitarama préfecture during April and May 1994, and elsewhere throughout Rwanda.[1676] The resulting serious bodily or mental harm occurred as part of widespread and [1676] Indictment paras. 66, 68.

Nyanza.[1704] At Nyanza, an attack took place on 11 April, in the later afternoon and into the evening. Many were killed in this attack.[1705] The Interahamwe then began killing people with clubs and other weapons. Some girls were selected, put aside, and raped before they were killed. Clothing had been removed from many of the women who were killed.[1706]

Deliberations

Cautionary Issues

1352. The Chamber recalls that, at the time of their testimony, Prosecution Witnesses HH, and UB were convicted and imprisoned for participating in the genocide.[1707] Furthermore, at the time of his testimony, Prosecution Witness T was detained and awaiting trial on genocide charges.[1708] The Chamber also takes into account that Witness T has received extensive benefits under the Prosecution's witness protection program.[1709]

Rapes

1354. The testimony and statements of Witnesses HH, UB, T, ATE, DBV, and Lavie together with the adjudicated facts from the Rutaganda trial provide consistent evidence that rapes of Tutsi women by Interahamwe and soldiers occurred on a large scale in Kigali-ville préfecture during the period when Tutsis were assaulted as a group. The Chamber notes that the Defence has not sought to rebut the Prosecution evidence.

8.2 Ruhengeri Préfecture

Oral Testimony

Prosecution Witness GAY

1355. The witness[1710] was 17 years old in April 1994.[1711] She was abducted and raped by Michel Niyigaba on 8 April 1994. She was raped by Nzamba shortly thereafter in the same house. The following night she was raped by Dusabe, a member of Nzirorera's family. On the third occasion, she was raped by Musafiri. She was never raped by Noel. She was raped by more than eight men, each taking their own turn, virtually every day.[1712]

1356. She saw the bodies of her younger sisters, Joyce and Denise on 7 April 1994. The breast of one of Denise's daughters was cut off, while the other one had a piece of wood skew the truth-finding process, and are prejudicial to him, because potential or actual Prosecution witnesses such as T and Michel Bagaragaza initially met freely with his Lead Counsel, and provided exculpatory information, but ceased to do so after they began to receive payments from the Prosecution.

5. The Chamber does not find that the payments were made for the purpose of "inducing" testimony against Joseph Nzirorera, as Nzirorera claims. Instead, these payments and benefits were made as part of a witness protection program, which aims to neutralize the risks that arise from cooperating with the Prosecution, and testifying against the accused. Moreover, Nzirorera has not demonstrated how these benefits have influenced Prosecution witnesses to align their testimony and behavior with the interests of the Prosecution.

6. The loose associations that Joseph Nzirorera draws between cooperation by Prosecution witnesses with him prior to benefits being paid, and their lack of cooperation during the time period after benefits were paid, fall short of proving pre-trial impropriety or misconduct that contravenes the court's sense of justice. The Prosecution witnesses' lack of cooperation with Nzirorera during the time period where they were paid benefits could have arisen for a host of reasons, which Nzirorera has not discounted. Therefore, Nzirorera has not demonstrated that he has suffered prejudice as a result of the payments, and the Chamber does not find that an abuse of process has occurred.

7. Nonetheless, the Chamber recognizes that an unfortunate side-effect of the necessary practice of providing benefits to witnesses who agree to testify for the Prosecution may be that their testimony is sometimes influenced to some degree by such payments. Because the Chamber understands the importance of the integrity of this Tribunal, and endeavours to maintain the fairness of the proceedings against the Accused, it has already recognized that the benefits paid to Witness T go beyond that which is reasonably required for the management of a witness, and that they may affect the credibility of his testimony.[9] The credibility issues that may be raised by the nature of these payments and benefits will be an integral part of the Chamber's assessment of the weight to be accorded to Witness T's testimony in light of all other relevant factors and other evidence, at the end of the trial.

other proceedings of the Tribunal relating to the matter at issue in the current proceedings."

Taking judicial notice of adjudicated facts under Rule 94(B) is a method of achieving judicial economy and harmonizing judgements of the Tribunal while ensuring the right of the Accused to a fair, public and expeditious trial.[69]

40. Although governed by some of the same principles, judicial notice under Rule 94(B) is different in nature from judicial notice under Rule 94(A). Adjudicated facts are different from facts of common knowledge (although there is some overlap in the categories). There is no requirement that adjudicated facts be beyond reasonable dispute. They are facts that have been established in a proceeding between other parties on the basis of the evidence the parties to that proceeding chose to introduce, in the particular context of that proceeding. For this reason, they cannot simply be accepted, by mere virtue of their acceptance in the first proceeding, as conclusive in proceedings involving different parties who have not had the chance to contest them.

41. Thus, there are two crucial differences between the two provisions. One is built into the Rule: whereas judicial notice under Rule 94(A) is mandatory, judicial notice under Rule 94(B) is discretionary, allowing the Trial Chamber to determine which adjudicated facts to recognize on the basis of a careful consideration of the accused's right to a fair and expeditious trial. The principles guiding and limiting the exercise of that discretion have been developed through jurisprudence and are discussed below.

42. The second difference is established by the Tribunal's jurisprudence, and concerns the consequences of judicial notice: whereas facts noticed under Rule 94(A) are established conclusively, those established under Rule 94(B) are merely presumptions that may be rebutted by the defence with evidence at trial.[70] The Appeals Chamber reiterates that judicial notice does not shift the ultimate burden of persuasion, which remains with the Prosecution. In the case of judicial notice under Rule 94(B), the effect is only to relieve the Prosecution of its initial burden to produce evidence on the point; the defence may then put the point into question by introducing reliable and credible evidence to the contrary. This approach is consistent with practice in national jurisdictions: whereas judicial notice of facts of common knowledge may be treated as conclusive,[71] the final adjudication of facts in judicial proceedings is treated as conclusively binding only, at most, on the parties to those proceedings (res judicata).[72]

43. The Prosecution sought judicial notice under Rule 94(B) of 153 adjudicated facts. The Trial Chamber rejected this request in full, and the Prosecution appeals with respect to 147 of the facts. The Prosecution, the Accused, and the Trial Chamber have not proceeded in their analysis one by one through these facts, and the Appeals Chamber will not do so either. It will instead address the two major reasons given by the Trial Chamber for refusing to take judicial notice and consider whether each constitutes a legitimate reason to so refuse under Rule 94(B). In doing so, the Appeals Chamber bears in mind that "a Trial Chamber's exercise of discretion will only be overturned if the challenged decision was (1) based on an incorrect interpretation of governing law; (2)

Kambanda and Witness GFA,[3] one can expect that the Prosecution has given financial compensation to a number of its other witnesses as well.

3. The Defence recalls this Chamber's Decision of 7 October 2003[4] and argues that the Prosecution has violated Rule 68 of the Rules as well as the Chamber's Order for disclosure by failing to disclose the records of payments to witnesses. The Defence states that making payments or gifts to a witness is unlawful and affects the integrity of the proceedings. It supports this statement by citing national jurisprudence of the United States and other civil law jurisdictions.[5]

4. The Prosecution opposes the Motion and acknowledges its obligations under Rule 68, giving its assurance that the disclosure of information which falls within Rule 68 will be made on a continuing basis. Regarding the request for an oral evidentiary hearing, the Prosecution submits that it is unnecessary, since the Defence may cross-examine witnesses concerning any allegation of benefits conferred upon them by the Prosecution. The Prosecution further submits that if such an allegation is proved by the Defence during the conduct of its cross-examination of a witness, it will be open to the Chamber to exclude the witness' testimony pursuant to Rule 95.

DISCUSSION

5. In its Decision of 7 October 2003, the Chamber said:

"Information and records relating to benefits and promises made to Prosecution Witnesses or their families would fall under Rule 68 of the Rules in that they may affect the credibility of prosecution evidence."[6]

6. Rule 68 of the Rules, which governs the disclosure of exculpatory evidence, compels the Prosecutor to disclose to the Defence evidence within its knowledge which may be of an exculpatory nature and provides a framework within which the Prosecutor should deal with any such material.

does not imply that the rules applied to assess the testimony of an accused are different from those applied with respect to the testimony of an "ordinary witness". A trier of fact shall decide which witness's testimony to prefer, without necessarily articulating every step of its reasoning in reaching this decision.[38] In so doing, as for any witness, a trier of fact is required to determine the overall credibility of an accused testifying at his own trial[39] and then assess the probative value of the accused's evidence in the context of the totality of the evidence.[40] There is no requirement in the Tribunal's jurisprudence that the accused's credibility be assessed first and in isolation from the rest of the evidence in the case.

20. Furthermore, it is settled jurisprudence that every accused has the right to a reasoned opinion under Article 22 of the Statute and Rule 88(C) of the Rules.[41] A reasoned opinion ensures that the accused can exercise his right of appeal and that the Appeals Chamber can carry out its statutory duty under Article 24 of the Statute.[42] However, the reasoned opinion requirement relates to the Trial Judgement as a whole rather than to each submission made at trial.[43] Indeed, > the Trial Chamber is not under the obligation to justify its findings in relation to every submission made during the trial. The Appeals Chamber recalls that it is in the discretion of the Trial Chamber as to which legal arguments to address. With regard to the factual findings, the Trial Chamber is required only to make findings of those facts which are essential to the determination of guilt on a particular count. It is not necessary to refer to the testimony of every witness or every piece of evidence on the trial record. It is to be presumed that the Trial Chamber evaluated all the evidence presented to it, as long as there is no indication that the Trial Chamber completely disregarded any particular piece of evidence. There may be an indication of disregard when evidence which is clearly relevant to the findings is not addressed by the Trial Chamber's reasoning, but not every inconsistency which the Trial Chamber failed to discuss renders its opinion defective. F...ğ If the Trial Chamber did not refer to the evidence given by a witness, even if it is in contradiction to the Trial Chamber's finding, it is to be presumed that the Trial Chamber assessed and weighed the evidence, but found that the evidence did not prevent it from arriving at its actual findings.[44]

Additionally, a Trial Chamber does not need to set out in detail why it accepted or rejected a particular testimony.[45] This is equally applicable to all evidence, including that tendered by the accused person.

Witness BMG's evidence corroborated that of Witness BMF about sparing the life of a Tutsi man named Callixte Kalisa.[341]

171. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber's assessment of the evidence of these witnesses and its finding that certain houses of Tutsis were spared on the Appellant's orders are erroneous.[342] The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber properly assessed the evidence concerning the order that certain houses of Tutsis be spared.[343]

172. The Appellant first contends that Prosecution Witnesses BMG, BMF, and BMH do not corroborate each other since none of them "gave the same reasons advanced by Fthe Appellantğ or by those persons who were quoting him, as to why the lives and houses of some Tutsi had to be spared."[344]

173. The Appeals Chamber recalls its holding in the Nahimana et al. Appeal Judgement that:

> two testimonies corroborate one another when one prima facie credible testimony is compatible with the other prima facie credible testimony regarding the same fact or a sequence of linked facts. It is not necessary that both testimonies be identical in all aspects or describe the same fact in the same way. Every witness presents what he has seen from his own point of view at the time of the events, or according to how he understood the events recounted by others. It follows that corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony.[345]

174. The Appeals Chamber further recalls that minor inconsistencies commonly occur in witness testimony without rendering it unreliable and that it is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to evaluate such inconsistencies and to consider whether the evidence as a whole is credible, without explaining its decision in every detail.[346]

175. While the Trial Chamber did not explicitly address this matter, the Appeals Chamber finds that the alleged inconsistency is minor and that it is not relevant to the material facts underlying the conviction. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber's failure to address this issue does not render its reliance on the witnesses erroneous.

event and the Trial Chamber decided to consider his testimony with caution,[408] since he might "have been influenced by a wish to positively affect the criminal proceedings against Fhimğ in Rwanda".[409]

204. Witness BMU testified that he saw the policemen guarding the Appellant's house arrest Ndingutse and that later they "took two vehicles Fbelonging to Ndingutseğ, a minibus and a Peugeot 504" to the Appellant's compound.[410] He also testified that he was told by a subordinate that Ndingutse was killed by "Karera's policemen" and Interahamwe.[411] The Appeals Chamber finds that no reasonable trier of fact could have accepted this witness's uncorroborated hearsay testimony that the policemen who killed Ndingutse were the policemen who guarded the Appellant's house. Furthermore, no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded on the basis of that circumstantial evidence that the only reasonable inference was that Ndingutse had been killed pursuant to the Appellant's orders to kill Tutsis.

205. In sum, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that Ndingutse had been killed pursuant to the Appellant's order. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber grants this sub-ground of appeal and reverses the Appellant's convictions for genocide and extermination and murder as crimes against humanity based on this event.

H. Alleged Errors relating to the Killing of Nyagatare on the Appellant's Orders

206. The Trial Chamber found that a Tutsi man named Palatin Nyagatare was killed at a roadblock by policeman Kalimba on 24 April 1994 and that this followed the Appellant's orders to kill Tutsis in Nyamirambo.[412] Partly on this basis, the Trial Chamber found the Appellant guilty for ordering genocide and extermination and murder as crimes against humanity.[413]

207. The Appellant submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that he was responsible for the killing of Palatin Nyagatare.[414] He contends that even assuming that he gave the order to kill Tutsis in Nyamirambo, the Trial Chamber committed a factual error in finding that this order resulted in Nyagatare's killing.[415] The Appellant recalls that the witnesses who claimed that he gave such an order pointed to the time period between 7 and 15 April 1994, whereas Nyagatare the accused; it is sufficient to demonstrate that the instigation was a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of another person committing the crime.[727]

318. Contrary to the Appellant's contention, the specific identification of the perpetrators, who were identified in the Trial Judgement as Interahamwe, was not required for a finding that the Appellant instigated the killing of Gakuru. In any event, the Trial Chamber did identify the perpetrators. It is implicit, but certain, in the Trial Judgement that the Trial Chamber found that Gakuru was killed by the Interahamwe who were informed by the Appellant that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi" and who received his order to arrest him. The Trial Chamber found that "[b]y doing so, Karera left him [Gakuru] in the hands of Interahamwe" and that "[u]nder the prevailing circumstances, he must have understood that Gakuru would be killed".[728] That the Trial Chamber made such a finding is implicit in its recollection of the evidence of Witnesses BMO and BMN.[729] While it would have been preferable for the Trial Chamber to explicitly state that it identified the perpetrators of Gakuru's murder as being the Interahamwe to whom the Appellant indicated that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi" and who received the order to arrest him, this omission does not amount to an error.

319. However, based on the Trial Chamber's factual findings, the Trial Chamber could not have reasonably concluded that the Appellant prompted the perpetrators to kill Gakuru. The Trial Chamber made no factual findings supporting such a conclusion. It merely concluded that the Appellant had informed the Interahamwe who later killed Gakuru that he was an "Inyenzi" and ordered them to arrest him. The Trial Chamber should have further explained how, on the basis of these factual findings, it inferred that the Appellant had prompted the Interahamwe to kill Gakuru. In the absence of such an explanation, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in convicting the Appellant for instigating Gakuru's murder.

320. The Appeals Chamber now turns to the Appellant's submission that the Trial Chamber erred in entering a conviction for aiding and abetting murder as a crime against humanity.

321. The actus reus of aiding and abetting is constituted by acts or omissions that assist, further, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which substantially contribute to the perpetration of the crime.[730] The mens rea for aiding and abetting is knowledge that acts performed by the aider and abettor assist in the commission of the crime by the principal.[731] It is well established that it is not necessary for an accused to know the precise crime which was intended and which in the event was committed, but he must be aware of its essential elements.[732] If an accused is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime.[733]

322. The Trial Chamber found that the Appellant told the Interahamwe that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi" and that he ordered his arrest by the Interahamwe, which he must have understood would result in his murder.[734] On the basis of these findings, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that the Appellant aided and abetted the murder of Gakuru.[735] By instructing the Interahamwe to arrest Gakuru and telling them that Gakuru was an "Inyenzi", it was reasonable to conclude that the Appellant substantially contributed to the commission of his murder through specifically assisting and providing moral support to the principal perpetrators. Furthermore, in light of the evidence adduced, the Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's finding that the Appellant had the requisite mens rea.

323. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber grants this sub-ground of appeal in part and reverses the Appellant's conviction for instigating murder as a crime against humanity based on this event. The Appellant's conviction for aiding and abetting murder as a crime against humanity based on the killing of Gakuru is upheld.

F. Conclusion

324. The Appeals Chamber grants the Appellant's First Ground of Appeal and reverses the Appellant's conviction for aiding and abetting genocide and extermination as a crime against humanity, based on the alleged weapons distribution in Rushashi commune.

325. The Appeals Chamber further grants the Seventh Ground of Appeal, in part, and reverses the Appellant's conviction for instigating murder as a crime against humanity based on the killing of Gakuru.

argues in an unclear manner, that the Chamber erred in equating failure to act with aiding and abetting.[302]

(ii) Discussion

198. In line with the relevant international case law, referred to in the foregoing analysis, a person may be held criminally liable for any conduct, where it is determined that he participated knowingly in the commission of a crime, if his participation directly and substantially contributed to the perpetration of the crime.[303] The intent to participate in the commission of a crime may thus be inferred from the accused's participation, particularly from his aiding and abetting. Ultimately, and as acknowledged by the Trial Chamber, there must on the part of the Accused be a clear awareness that this participation will lead to the commission of a crime."[304] That intention may be inferred from a number of facts,[305] the assessment of which falls to the Trial Chamber. The Trial Chamber properly exercised its discretion, and found beyond a reasonable doubt that the Accused had the requisite intent. The Trial Chamber also found, upon review of the evidence adduced, that it was clearly established that Kayishema was present at each of the massacre sites, and that he had the intent to participate in the crimes perpetrated at these sites.[306]

199. The Appeals Chamber notes that Kayishema's arguments on the Trial Chamber's erroneous interpretation of the concept of civil defence as well as the terms "ratisser" and "travailler" have been dealt with under the ground on genocide. Insofar as these arguments constitute, in the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, a question that goes beyond the issue of individual responsibility and falls under either the separate ground on civil defence (Ground 4), or the separate ground of genocide (Ground 6),[307] the Appeals Chamber refers to its analysis in the previous section on genocide.

[302] Kayishema's Brief, para. 95. Kayishema challenges the finding that by his presence at the site of the crime, he aided and abetted in the commission of the crimes perpetrated at the various massacre sites. In his submission, failure to act cannot be construed as a positive act and that "even passive presence at the scene does not constitute aiding and abetting".

[303] Tadić Trial Judgement, 1997, para. 674. The requirement of intent under Article 6 (1) thus includes knowledge of the act of participation and a conscious decision to participate by planning, instigating, ordering, committing or otherwise aiding and abetting in the preparation of a crime.

[307] The Appeals Chamber specifies that the Defence had moreover raised this issue in its Notice of Appeal under the ground on genocide and civil defence. See Kayishema's Notice of Appeal, pp. 7 and 8. See also T(A),

> ...the Chamber must reject the alibi of Musema as regards 13 May, 14 May and mid-May 1994, as it is not supported by evidence sufficient to cast any doubt on the overwhelming reliable evidence for this period presented by the Prosecutor.[387]

- In accepting the alibi in respect of Nyarutovu cellule on 22 June, the Trial Chamber stated that, > the Chamber finds that Musema's alibi for this date, heavily scrutinized by the Chamber, supported by documentary evidence and oral testimony, is such as to cast doubt on the allegation of the Prosecutor as to the involvement of Musema in the events alleged of 22 June 1994.[388]

- And finally, in rejecting the alibi with regard to Nyakavumu cave, the Trial Chamber noted that:

> [...] the alibi does not specifically refute the presence of Musema at the cave[...].[389]

209. In considering the manner in which the Trial Chamber applied the burden and standard of proof, the Appeals Chamber must start off by assuming that the words used in the Trial Judgement accurately describe the approach adopted by the Trial Chamber.

210. It is apparent from the above examples that, prima facie, the Trial Chamber appears to have used, on several occasions, different terms in relation to the question of alibi. The issue is whether, in doing so, the Trial Chamber applied a burden and/or standard of proof that was inconsistent with its own statement of the relevant law. The Appeals Chamber will therefore seek to discover the Trial Chamber's intention when it used such wording.

211. Hence, the Appeals Chamber will carry out below an in-depth analysis of the findings of the Trial Chamber with respect to each location. The consequences of any erroneous application of the law or unreasonable interpretation of a fact must be considered on a case-by-case basis.

(c) Errors in the assessment of the alibi with regard to specific locations

212. Having found that the Trial Chamber did not err in its findings as to the credibility of each of the witnesses on whose testimonies it relied to convict, the Appeals Chamber will now consider whether the Trial Chamber erred in rejecting Musema's alibi and, as a result, failed to acquit him.

213. However, before considering each of the locations in question, the Appeals Chamber notes that although, for reasons stated in the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber rejected the alibi raised by analysis the evidence of Witness MO38 in favour of Witness TQ who had been accused of genocide.[162]

78. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber correctly inferred that Muvunyi tacitly approved of the participation of ESO Camp soldiers in the attack at the Groupe scolaire from the order given to save the Bicunda family, his attempts to save a child of this family who was mistakenly taken, his refusal to come to the assistance of the other refugees, and his overall conduct in allowing a contingent of armed soldiers to leave the camp to participate in the attack.[163] The Prosecution contends that Muvunyi has not demonstrated that it was unreasonable to rely on the evidence of Witness TQ.[164] The Prosecution also notes that the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Muvunyi knew about the attack is reasonable in light of the proximity of the camp to the Groupe scolaire and the repeated nature of the attacks.[165]

79. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime, which have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[166] The requisite mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[167]

80. An accused may be convicted of aiding and abetting when it is established that his conduct amounted to tacit approval and encouragement of the crime and that such conduct substantially contributed to the crime.[168] In cases where tacit approval or encouragement has been found to be the basis for criminal responsibility, it has been the authority of the accused combined with his presence at or very near the crime scene, especially if considered together with his prior conduct, which allows the conclusion that the accused's conduct amounted to official sanction of the crime and thus substantially contributed to it.[169] The question of whether a given act constitutes substantial assistance to a crime requires a fact-based inquiry.[170]

81. The Trial Chamber refers only to limited circumstantial evidence suggesting that Muvunyi tacitly approved the criminal conduct of the principal perpetrators. It is well established that, as a facts which must be pleaded in the indictment are: (i) that the accused is the superior of sufficiently identified subordinates over whom he had effective control – in the sense of material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct – and for whose acts he is alleged to be responsible; (ii) the criminal acts committed by those others for whom the accused is alleged to be responsible; (iii) the conduct of the accused by which he may be found to have known or had reason to know that the crimes were about to be committed or had been committed by his subordinates; and (iv) the conduct of the accused by which he may be found to have failed to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the persons who committed them.[776] As regards this last element, it will be sufficient in many cases to plead that the accused did not take any necessary and reasonable measure to prevent or punish the commission of criminal acts.

324. An indictment may also be defective when the material facts that the Prosecutor invokes are pleaded without sufficient specificity.[777] In this regard, the Prosecutor's characterization of the alleged criminal conduct and the proximity between the accused and the crime charged are decisive factors in determining the degree of specificity with which the Prosecutor must plead the material facts of his case in the indictment.[778]

325. Where the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber tried the accused on the basis of a defective indictment, it must consider whether the accused has nevertheless been accorded a fair trial, in other words, whether the defect noted caused prejudice to the Defence.[779] In some cases, a defective indictment can indeed be "cured" and a conviction handed down if the Prosecutor provided the accused with timely, clear and consistent information detailing the factual basis underpinning the charges against him.[780] This information could, inter alia and depending on the circumstances, be supplied in the Prosecutor's pre-trial brief or opening statement.[781] The Appeals Chamber would nonetheless emphasize that the possibility of curing defects in the indictment is not unlimited. A clear distinction has to be drawn between vagueness or ambiguity in the indictment and an indictment which omits certain charges altogether. While it is possible to remedy ambiguity or vagueness in an indictment by providing the defendant with timely, clear and consistent information detailing the factual basis underpinning the charges, omitted charges can be incorporated into the indictment only by formal amendment under Rule 50 of the Rules.[782]

326. The Appeals Chamber reaffirms that a vague or imprecise indictment which is not cured of its defects by providing the accused with timely, clear and consistent information constitutes a prejudice to the accused. The defect can be deemed harmless only if it is established that the accused's ability to prepare his defence was not materially impaired.[783] Where the failure to give sufficient notice of the legal and factual reasons for the charges against him violated the right to a fair trial, no conviction can result.[784]

327. When the Appellant raises a defect in the indictment for the first time on appeal, then he bears the burden of showing that his ability to prepare his defence was materially impaired. When, however, an accused has previously raised the issue of lack of notice before the Trial Chamber, the burden rests on the Prosecutor to prove on appeal that the ability of the accused to prepare a defence was not materially impaired.[785] All of this is subject to the inherent jurisdiction of the Appeals Chamber to do justice in the case.[786]

C. Issues raised by Appellant Nahimana

1. RTLM editorials

328. Appellant Nahimana complains that the Trial Chamber relied on the fact that he "wrote editorials read by RTLM journalists" in order to establish that he exercised control over the journalists of Radio RTLM and was personally involved in the broadcasts.[787] He argues that, in relying on this evidence – which he characterises as a material fact – even though it did not appear in the Indictment or in the Prosecutor's Pre-trial Brief,[788] the Trial Chamber compromised the fairness of the trial.[789]

329. Having examined the evidence on RTLM brought before it, the Trial Chamber found, in paragraph 567 of the Judgement, that "Nahimana also played an active role in determining the content of RTLM broadcasts, writing editorials and giving journalists texts to read".[790] The Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber did not mention this specific fact in its legal findings, which relied on the Appellant's control over RTLM and his responsibility for the editorial line in order to convict him.[791] However, paragraph 970 of the Judgement refers explicitly to paragraph 567, and it appears logical to assume that the Trial Chamber intended to refer to all of its factual findings on control of RTLM, including the fact that the Appellant had written editorials and given journalists texts to read. Moreover, this fact falls squarely within the more general assertion that Appellants Nahimana and Barayagwiza were responsible for the editorial policy of RTLM. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that it must assumed that the Trial Chamber relied on the disputed fact in order to convict the Appellant.

> evidence other than hearsay that Ngeze was arrested at all. Their sources of information were vague, with the exception of three witnesses who learned of the arrest from Ngeze himself.

427. The Trial Chamber summarized the Defence witnesses' testimonies in support of the alibi as follows:

> A number of Defence witnesses testified to the date of Ngeze's arrest in April 1994. Witness BAZ2, Witness RM1, Witness RM5, Witness BAZ6, Witness RM19, Witness BAZ9 and Witness BAZ15 testified that Ngeze was arrested on 6 April 1994. Witnesses RM13 and Witness BAZ3 testified that Ngeze was arrested just after Habyarimana's death. Witness RM2 testified that Ngeze was arrested on 6-7 April 1994. Witness BAZ1 testified that Ngeze was arrested the day before 6 April 1994 and was detained for three days. Witness RM117 testified that Ngeze was arrested on 7 April 1994. Witness RM112 testified that he found out on 7 April 1994 that Ngeze had been arrested. As to the date of Ngeze's release from prison, Witness RM5 and Witness RM2 testified that Ngeze was released on 9 April 1994. Witness BAZ2, Witness RM112 and Witness RM1 testified that Ngeze was released on 10 April 1994. Witness BAZ15 testified that Ngeze was released after about six days in custody. Witness BAZ9 testified that she saw Ngeze on 10 April 1994. Witness BAZ31 testified that Ngeze went into hiding from 6 April 1994. All of these witnesses learned of Ngeze's arrest from other people. Witness RM112, Witness RM19 and Witness BAZ15 testified that they heard about the arrest from Ngeze himself. The other witnesses heard about the arrest from people on the street or other Muslims, or knew of it as a matter of common knowledge.[1000]

428. The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber could validly conclude that "none of the Defence witnesses had evidence other than hearsay that Ngeze was arrested at all" and that in most cases their sources of information were vague.[1001] However, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that an analysis of Defence witnesses testimonies relating to the alibi from 6 to 9 April 1994 does not demonstrate that those testimonies are "thoroughly inconsistent" (in the words of the authentic, English, text of the Judgement).[1002] From the outset, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that two testimonies corroborate one another when one prima facie credible testimony is compatible with the other prima facie credible testimony regarding the same fact or a sequence of linked facts. It is not necessary that both testimonies be identical in all aspects or describe the same fact in the same way. Every witness presents what he has seen from his own point of view at the time of the events, or according to how he understood the events recounted by others. It follows that corroboration may exist even when some details differ between testimonies, provided that no credible testimony describes the facts in question in a way which is not compatible with the description given in another credible testimony.

429. Here, the testimonies of Witnesses BAZ-2,[1003] RM-1,[1004] RM-5,[1005] BAZ-6,[1006] RM-19[1007] and BAZ-15[1008] are consistent regarding the allegation that the Appelant Ngeze was

478. The Appeals Chamber recalls that commission covers, primarily, the physical perpetration of a crime (with criminal intent) or a culpable omission of an act that is mandated by a rule of criminal law, but also participation in a joint criminal enterprise.[1153] However, it does not appear that the Prosecutor charged the Appellants at trial with responsibility for their participation in a joint criminal enterprise,[1154] and the Appeals Chamber does not deem it appropriate to discuss this mode of participation here.[1155]

479. The actus reus of "planning" requires that one or more persons design the criminal conduct constituting one or more statutory crimes that are later perpetrated.[1156] It is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct.[1157] The mens rea for this mode of responsibility entails the intent to plan the commission of a crime or, at a minimum, the awareness of substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of the acts or omissions planned.[1158]

480. The actus reus of "instigating" implies prompting another person to commit an offence.[1159] It is not necessary to prove that the crime would not have been perpetrated without the involvement of the accused; it is sufficient to demonstrate that the instigation was a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of another person committing the crime.[1160] The mens rea for this mode of responsibility is the intent to instigate another person to commit a crime or at a miminum the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of the act or omission instigated.[1161]

481. With respect to ordering, a person in a position of authority[1162] may incur responsibility for ordering another person to commit an offence,[1163] if the person who received the order actually proceeds to commit the offence subsequently. Responsibility is also incurred when an individual in a position of authority orders an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that order, and if that crime is effectively committed subsequently by the person who received the order.[1164]

482. The actus reus of aiding and abetting[1165] is constituted by acts or omissions[1166] aimed specifically at assisting, furthering or lending moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which substantially contributed to the perpetration of the crime.[1167] Contrary to the three modes of responsibility discussed above (which require that the conduct of the accused precede the perpetration of the crime itself), the actus reus of aiding and abetting may occur before, during or after the principal crime.[1168] The mens rea for aiding and abetting is knowledge that acts performed by the aider and abettor assist in the commission of the crime by the principal.[1169] It is not necessary for the accused to know the precise crime which was intended and which in the event was committed,[1170] but he must be aware of its essential elements.[1171]

483. The Appeals Chamber concludes by recalling that the modes of responsibility under Article 6(1) of the Statute are not mutually exclusive and that it is possible to charge more than one mode in relation to a crime if this is necessary in order to reflect the totality of the accused's conduct.[1172]

B. Responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute

484. The Appeals Chamber recalls that, for the liability of an accused to be established under Article 6(3) of the Statute, the Prosecutor has to show that: (1) a crime over which the Tribunal has jurisdiction was committed; (2) the accused was a de jure or de facto superior of the perpetrator of the crime and had effective control over this subordinate (i.e., he had the material ability to prevent or punish commission of the crime by his subordinate); (3) the accused knew or had reason to know that the crime was going to be committed or had been opinion that the Trial Chamber could admit this evidence, even if Dr. Blam himself did not testify at the hearing.[1230] However, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that a reasonable trier of fact could not rely solely on the short account by Doctor Blam in order to establish beyond reasonable doubt proof of the murder of the Medical Director of Cyangugu, of the circumstances surrounding it and of its date. In the absence of other evidence corroborating Doctor Blam's account, the Trial Chamber consequently erred in finding that the murder of the Medical Director of Cyangugu was proved. The paragraphs which follow will therefore not refer to this incident.

[1165] The French version of some Appeal and Trial Judgements of this Tribunal and of the ICTY mention the term "complicité" ("complicity") rather than "aide et encouragement" ("aiding and abetting"). The Appeals Chamber prefers "aide et encouragement" because these terms are the ones used in Article 6(1) of the Statute. Furthermore, the Statute uses the word "complicité" in a very specific context (see Article 2(3)(e) of the Statute); it should thus be reserved for that context.

511. With regard, lastly, to Appellant Nahimana's argument that Witness FY's testimony did not prove the existence of a causal link between RTLM broadcasts and the murder of Daniel Kabaka,[1231] the Appeals Chamber considers that the fact that Daniel Kabaka was allegedly arrested as a suspect in 1990 and that soldiers linked to a "crisis committee" were allegedly responsible for his murder, which was committed after 6 April 1994, does not suffice to demonstrate that it was unreasonable to find that the mention of this person on RTLM had substantially contributed to his murder. Moreover, the Appellant omits to indicate the specific references to the transcripts which mention these acts, and hence has not complied with the requirements for making submissions at the appeal stage. The appeal on this point is dismissed.

512. The Appeals Chamber will now determine whether it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to find that the RTLM broadcasts prior to 6 April 1994 which mentioned Charles Shamukiga and Daniel Kabaka substantially contributed to the commission of acts of genocide.

513. In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, evidence of a link between the broadcasts aired on RTLM before 6 April 1994 and the acts of genocide committed against the individuals so named seems, at the very least, tenuous, especially when the date of the broadcast in question is not provided or when the period between the broadcast denouncing a person and the killing of that person is relatively long. This applies notably to the killing of Par téléphone on avait déjà été mis au courant des massacres de Kamembe-Cyangugu, au cours desquels par exemple le médecin régional de Cyangugu que nous connaissons avait été brûlé vif devant sa maison. Sur la radio incendiaire RTLM du parti extrémiste CDR, juste trois jours plus tôt, le lundi (4 avril), il avait été insulté comme complice des rebelles, organisateur de réunions de rebelles à Cyangugu. Lors d'un entretien le mardi avant l'attentat, donc le 5 avril, je ne lui avais pas parlé de ces diffamations, parce que je connaissais son honnêteté et que je tenais ces accusations pour totalement absurdes.

[I'd already heard on the phone about the Kamembe-Cyangugu massacres, during which the Medical Director for Cyangugu Region, whom we knew, had been burned alive in front of his house. Just three days earlier, on the Monday (4 April), on RTLM, the inflammatory radio station of the extremist CDR party, he had been vilified as an accomplice of the rebels, accused of organising rebel meetings in Cyangugu. When I met him on the Tuesday before the murder, I didn't mention these libels, because I knew him as an honest man, and regarded the accusations as totally absurd.]

[1230] Dr. Blam's account could be admitted under Rule 89(C) of the Rules. This would also be the case today: since the account was not specifically written for proceedings in the instant case, it could be admitted without necessarily complying with the standards of Rule 92 bis of the Rules, which was added to the Rules on 6 July 2002: see Naletilić and Martinović Appeal Judgement, paras. 222-223; Prosecutor v. Stanislav Galić, Case No. IT-98-29-AR73.2, Decision on Interlocutory Appeal Concerning Rule 92 bis(C) of the Rules, 7 June 2002, paras. 28-31.

Charles Shamukiga[1232] and Daniel Kabaka.[1233] Thus the longer the lapse of time between a broadcast and the killing of a person, the greater the possibility that other events might be the real cause of such killing and that the broadcast might not have substantially contributed to it. Moreover, even though RTLM was widely listened to in Rwanda, there is no evidence that the unidentified persons responsible for killing Charles Shamukiga and Daniel Kabaka heard the RTLM broadcasts denouncing them. The Appeals Chamber is therefore of the opinion that it has not been sufficiently demonstrated that RTLM broadcasts before 6 April 1994 substantially contributed to the killing of these individuals. Therefore, the Trial Chamber committed an error which partially invalidates the verdict in finding in paragraph 949 of the Judgement that RTLM broadcasts prior to 6 April 1994 substantially contributed to the commission of acts of genocide.

b. Broadcasts after 6 April 1994

514. The Appeals Chamber observes that Appellant Nahimana does not appear to dispute that the broadcasts after 6 April 1994 contributed to the commission of acts of genocide.[1234] For his part, Appellant Barayagwiza contends, without elaborating, that no link was established between the RTLM broadcasts and the killings.[1235] In the absence of any arguments in support of this contention, it cannot suffice to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the RTLM broadcasts after 6 April 1994 substantially contributed to the commission of acts of genocide.

515. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber found that in several instances after 6 April 1994 the naming of persons of Tutsi origin on the airwaves contributed to the commission of acts of genocide. Such persons included the brother of Witness FS, who was named on RTLM on 7 April 1994 and was later killed with his wife and his seven children,[1236] and Désiré Nsunguyinka, who was killed at a roadblock with his wife, his sister and his brother-in-law after RTLM broadcast the licence number of the car they were travelling in, announcing that a vehicle with these plates was carrying Inkotanyi.[1237] The Appeals Chamber also notes the case of Father Muvaro, Father Ngoga and Father Ntagara, whose names were mentioned in a broadcast of 20 May 1994;[1238] the three of them were subsequently killed.[1239]

[1232] Charles Shamukiga "had been mentioned often on RTLM in the first few months of 1994" (Judgement, para. 366); he was killed on 7 April 1994 by Presidential Guard soldiers (Judgement, paras. 366 and 478).
[1233] Daniel Kabaka was named on RTLM "beginning in mid-March", and also after 7 April 1994 (Judgement, paras. 446, 447 and 467); he was killed a few days after the beginning of the genocide.
[1234] See Nahimana Appellant's Brief, paras. 233-241, 572-573. The Appellant only disputes that broadcasts before 6 April 1994 could have contributed to the commission of acts of genocide.

[1237] Idem; see also para. 444.
[1238] Idem; see also paras. 410-411. The Appeals Chamber notes that only Father Muvaro's Tutsi origin is specifically confirmed by the Trial Chamber on the basis of Appellant Nahimana's testimony: Judgement, paras. 411 and 482. The Appeals Chamber notes however that the remarks made in the broadcast – in particular the sentence "We could not imagine that a priest would ever dare take up a gun, begin to shoot or even distribute guns to people taking refuge in the church, the latter then begin launching sporadic attacks in order to eliminate the Hutus, and then retreat into the church … daring to desecrate God's house" – seems to indicate that the three priests were Tutsi: Judgement, para. 410, referring to Exhibit P103/132E.
[1239] Father Ngoga, who had earlier managed to escape, was killed in Butare 11 days after the broadcast: Judgement, para. 411.

518. Further, the Trial Chamber considered that, even though "the evidence does not establish a specific link between the publication and subsequent events, [...] a link was clearly perceived by many witnesses such as Witness AHI, Witness ABE and Nsanzuwera, suggesting that Kangura greatly contributed to the climate leading to these events, if not causing them directly".[1247] The Trial Chamber then adds that "[a]t times Kangura called explicitly on its readers to take action. More generally, its message of prejudice and fear paved the way for massacres of the Tutsi population".[1248] The Appeals Chamber emphasizes, however, that the specific examples given by Witness Nsanzuwera and Witness ABE of attacks on individuals following the publication of Kangura articles date back to 1990 and 1991 and do not fall within the temporal jurisdiction of the Tribunal. Moreover, none of the testimonies makes explicit reference to the impact of Kangura issues published after 1 January 1994.

519. While there is probably a link between the Appellant's acts, because of his role in Kangura, and the genocide, owing to the climate of violence to which the publication contributed and the incendiary discourse it contained,[1249] the Appeals Chamber considers that there was not enough evidence for a reasonable trier of fact to find beyond reasonable doubt that the Kangura publications in the first months of 1994 susbstantially contributed to the commission of acts of genocide between April and July 1994. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that the Trial Chamber erred in finding Appellant Ngeze guilty of the crime of genocide under Article 6(1) of the Statute for having "instigated" the killing of Tutsi civilians as founder, owner and editor of Kangura.[1250]

(iii) Link between CDR activities and the acts of genocide

520. Appellant Barayagwiza contends that no causal link was established between the activities of the CDR and the acts of genocide.[1251]

521. The Trial Chamber explained in paragraph 951 of the Judgement that:

> [t]he Hutu Power movement, spearheaded by CDR, created a political framework for the killing of Tutsi and Hutu political opponents. The CDR and its youth wing, the Impuzamugambi, convened meetings and demonstrations, established roadblocks, distributed weapons, and systematically organized and carried out the killing of Tutsi civilians. The genocidal cry of "tubatsembatsembe" or "let's exterminate them", referring to the Tutsi population, was chanted consistently at CDR meetings and demonstrations. As well as orchestrating particular acts of killing, the CDR promoted a Hutu mindset in which ethnic hatred was normalized as a political ideology. The division of Hutu and Tutsi entrenched fear and suspicion of the Tutsi and fabricated the perception that the Tutsi population had to be destroyed in order to safeguard the political gains that had been made by the Hutu majority.

785. The Appeals Chamber has already recalled the elements which must be proved in order to establish superior responsibility.[1832] It has also pointed out that civilian leaders need not be vested with prerogatives similar to those of military commanders in order to incur such responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute: it suffices that the superior had effective control of his subordinates, that is, that he had the material capacity to prevent or punish the criminal conduct of subordinates.[1833] For the same reasons, it does not have to be established that the civilian superior was vested with "excessive powers" similar to those of public authorities. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber cannot accept the argument that superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute requires a direct and individualized superior-subordinate relationship.[1834]

786. The Appeals Chamber is not convinced either by the Appellant's argument that the Trial Chamber failed to apply the effective control test. Although the Trial Chamber did not explicitly use the expression "effective control", the Appeals Chamber is of the view that it is clear from paragraphs 970 and 972 of the Judgement that it in fact applied that test.[1835]

787. The Appellant further contends that the Trial Chamber could not conclude that he possessed a de jure power, since neither the law of Rwanda, nor the RTLM Statutes or any other official document so provided. The Appeals Chamber recalls that a person possesses a de jure power when legally vested with such power.[1836] The Chamber is of the view that this power can derive from law, from a contract or from any other legal document; it may have been conferred orally or in writing and may be proved by documentary or any other type of evidence. The Appeals Chamber will examine below whether the Trial Chamber could conclude that the Appellant was vested with a de jure power over the RTLM staff, but considers that, in any event, this is not a decisive factor for the issue of effective control.[1837]

788. The Appeals Chamber further recalls that the authority enjoyed by a defendant must be assessed on a case-by-case basis, so as to determine whether he had the power to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the commission of the crimes charged or to punish their perpetrators. Consequently, while the Appeals Chamber concedes that mere membership of a collegiate board of directors does not suffice, per se, to establish the existence of effective control, it considers, nonetheless, that such membership may, taken together with other evidence, prove control.

789. With respect to the Appellant's argument that none of the evidence relied upon by the Trial Chamber supports the finding that he had superior status and effective control over RTLM staff, the Appeals Chamber would point out that these are matters which, along with [1836] See the definition of "de jure" in Bryan A. Garner (ed.), Black's Law Dictionary, 8th ed., Saint Paul, Minnesota, Thomson West Publishing Company, 2004, p. 458 ("Existing by right or according to law"). Thus, the jurisprudence describes a superior de jure as one whose power derives from an official appointment: Kajelijeli Appeal Judgement, para. 85; Bagilishema Appeal Judgement, para. 50 ; Čelebići Appeal Judgement, para. 193.

[1837] In this respect, see supra XII. D. 2. (a) (ii) b. i., where the Appeals Chamber explains that, even if the possession of de jure powers can certainly suggest a material capacity to prevent or punish criminal acts by subordinates, it is neither necessary nor sufficient to demonstrate such capacity.

exclusively on Expert Witness Des Forges' report and testimony, according to which the French Ambassador Yannick Gérard told the Appellant around the end of June or the beginning of July 1994 that the RTLM broadcasts attacking General Dallaire and UNAMIR must cease, that the Appellant promised to intervene with the RTLM journalists, and that the attacks ceased shortly thereafter.[1904]

830. The Appeals Chamber has already recalled that the role of expert witnesses is to assist the Trial Chamber in assessing the evidence before it and not to testify to facts in dispute as would ordinary witnesses.[1905] However, the Appellant does not appear to have objected at trial to this part of Expert Witness Des Forges' testimony.[1906] The Appeals Chamber recalls that, in principle, a party cannot refrain from raising an objection on an issue that was evident at trial, with a view to raising it on appeal if it has lost the case at first instance.[1907] In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Appellant waived his right to raise an objection to this portion of Expert Witness Des Forges' report and testimony.

831. Turning to the argument that the information received from Expert Witness Des Forges was secondary hearsay collected more than five years after the event, the Appeals Chamber recalls that trial chambers may admit and rely on hearsay testimony if they consider it to have probative value.[1908] In the instant case, the Trial Chamber noted that "Des Forges specifies in detail that her source of information about Nahimana's interaction with the French Government is a diplomat who was himself present in meetings between Nahimana and French Ambassador Yannick Gérard, who had a documentary record of the interaction in the form of a diplomatic telegram", and it considered that this piece of information was reliable.[1909] The Appeals Chamber finds that this conclusion was reasonable.

832. The Appellant further submits that, even if the matters reported by Expert Witness Des Forges were true, they could not constitute evidence that the Appellant effectively intervened with RTLM journalists to halt the attacks on UNAMIR and General Dallaire. The Appeals Chamber notes that, according to Expert Witness Des Forges' report and testimony, the said attacks ceased "immediately"[1910] or within two days[1911] after the Appellant met Ambassador Gérard. In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Trial Chamber could reasonably conclude that it was the Appellant's intervention that put an end to these attacks. The fact that the Appellant and Witness Bemeriki denied that there was However, contrary to what the Chamber appears to be saying in paragraph 543 of the Judgement, Expert Witness Des Forges did not rely solely on her conversation of 28 February 2000 with Jean-Christophe Belliard at the French Ministry of Foreign Affairs; in her report, she also cites a press report by Anne Chaon of 7 July 2002.

[1906] Nahimana Appellant's Brief does not refer to any specific objection raised at trial. The Appeals Chamber notes that Appellant Nahimana submitted a written motion objecting generally to the scope of Witness Des Forges' testimony (see Motion to Restrict the Testimony of Alison Desforges [sic] to Matters Requiring Expert Evidence, 10 May 2002), but this motion did not specifically object to that aspect of Expert Witness Des Forges' report. Moreover the Appellant's motion was submitted prior to Witness Des Forges' testimony on this issue.

plan".[2022] They contend that the Rutaganda Appeal Judgement rejected any form of responsibility "in application of 'guilt by association', including guilt from 'similarity of conduct'".[2023] They argue that the jurisprudence of the Nuremberg International Military Tribunal and of this Tribunal requires, in order for a defendant to be convicted of conspiracy, his or her direct and personal participation in meetings to plan crimes.[2024] Appellant Barayagwiza maintains that a tacit agreement cannot establish conspiracy to commit genocide, adding that "[t]he Prosecution could not prove any individual criminal act attributable to the Appellant Barayagwiza".[2025]

896. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide is a concerted agreement to act for the purpose of committing genocide. While such actus reus can be proved by evidence of meetings to plan genocide, it can also be inferred from other evidence.[2026] In particular, a concerted agreement to commit genocide may be inferred from the conduct of the conspirators.[2027] However, as in any case where the Prosecutor seeks, on the basis of circumstantial evidence, to prove a particular fact upon which the guilt of the accused depends,[2028] the existence of a conspiracy to commit genocide must be the only reasonable inference based on the totality of the evidence.

897. The Appeals Chamber takes the view that the concerted or coordinated action of a group of individuals can constitute evidence of an agreement. The qualifiers "concerted or coordinated" are important: as the Trial Chamber recognized, these words are "the central element that distinguishes conspiracy from 'conscious parallelism', the concept put forward

Appellant Nahimana adds that "the fact of sharing the same convictions or the same 'objective' does not presuppose any prior interaction, and does not of necessity lead to the conception of a concerted plan aimed at achieving these": Nahimana Appellant's Brief, para. 594 (emphasis in the original). In reply, Appellant Nahimana concedes that the conspirators' conduct could constitute circumstantial evidence of a criminal conspiracy, but he adds that such conduct must be reasonably explicable only by the existence of a conspiratorial agreement, which is not the present case: Nahimana Brief in Reply, paras. 28-30.

> The Prosecution has failed to prove that the conversations between Nahimana and Barayagwiza were part of an agreement to kill off Tutsi, nor were there any individual criminal acts from which such a conspiracy could be inferred. The theory of the Appellant being a lynchpin (§§ 1050 of the judgement) was not based on any evidence, nor was it ever alleged by the Prosecution, in the indictment or the later amendment.

[2026] See, in this respect, Kajelijeli Trial Judgement, para. 787 ("[t]he agreement in a conspiracy is one that may be established by the prosecutor in no particular manner, but the evidence must show that an agreement had indeed been reached"). In the Ntakirutimana, Niyitegeka and Kajelijeli cases, the Trial judges noted that the accused had attended meetings although they did not require meetings as elements of the crime of conspiracy to commit genocide: see Kajelijeli Trial Judgement, paras. 434-453, 787-788, 794; Niyitegeka Trial Judgement, paras. 423-429; Ntakirutimana Trial Judgement, paras. 799-800.

[2027] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber notes that a number of legal systems explicitly recognize that the agreement can be inferred from the conduct of the parties to the conspiracy: United States: Glasser v. United States, 315 U.S. 60, 80 (1942); United Kingdom: R. v. Anderson, [1986] A.C. 27, 38; Canada: R. v. Gagnon, [1956] S.C.R. 635, para. 12.

Trial Chamber's reasoning.[758] It submits that the Trial Chamber took into account Witness BRK's accomplice status, his confession, his possible motives for testifying, the deficiencies in his evidence, and the fact that aspects of his testimony were corroborated by other witnesses.[759] In light of this, the Prosecution asserts that the Trial Chamber exercised the appropriate caution in assessing Witness BRK's credibility.[760] The Prosecution further argues that the Appellant fails to show any error in the fact that the Trial Chamber did not consider evidence from the Ntagerura et al. case and Exhibit D71,[761] or the Trial Chamber's finding that Witness BRK's testimony was supported by other witnesses.[762]

305. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "accomplice evidence is not per se unreliable, especially where an accomplice may be thoroughly cross-examined".[763] However, when weighing the probative value of such evidence, a Chamber is bound to carefully consider the totality of the circumstances in which it was tendered.[764] In particular, consideration should be given to circumstances showing that accomplice witnesses may have motives or incentives to implicate the accused person before the Tribunal or to lie.[765]

306. The Trial Chamber acknowledged that Witness BRK was an accomplice witness and that therefore his testimony had to be viewed with caution.[766] The Trial Chamber recalled that the testimony of accomplices "may be tainted by motives or incentives to falsely implicate an accused to gain some benefit or advantage in regard to their own case or sentence."[767] However, the Trial Chamber concluded that the witness did not have "any motive or incentive to falsely incriminate [the Appellant]."[768]

307. The Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, considers that this finding is patently unreasonable in light of the Trial Chamber's other findings. In particular, in the paragraph immediately following the finding that Witness BRK did not have any motive or incentive to falsely incriminate the Appellant, the Trial Chamber stated that portions of Witness BRK's testimony "could have been exaggerated or invented to further implicate [the Appellant]" and that, as such, they could not be relied upon.[769] The Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, considers that in the absence of any explanation by the Trial Chamber, these apparently contradictory findings suggest that it was unsafe to conclude, as the Trial Chamber did, that the witness had no motive or incentive to falsely implicate the Appellant.

308. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber found that Witness BRK was still awaiting trial for charges as a Category I offender for crimes related to the attacks in Nyakanyinya, Mibilizi, and at Kamarampaka as well as for forging documents.[770] It also observed that Witness BRK believed that he might benefit from leniency if he gave evidence for the Prosecution.[771] These findings further undermine the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Witness BRK had no motive to falsely implicate the Appellant.

309. Additionally, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, notes that Witness BRK has demonstrated a willingness to tailor his evidence to serve his own interests. He acknowledged that he did not fully confess his crimes when he first confessed in 1999, and that it was only when confronted with further charges in 2005 that he confessed to his involvement in the attacks at Nyakanyinya, Mibilizi and Kamarampaka.[772] The Trial Chamber took this into account and accepted Witness BRK's explanation that he tailored his statements to conceal his role in the events.[773] It concluded that "[a]n initial failure for a witness to incriminate himself is not a reason to disbelieve a subsequent confession."[774] The Appeals Chamber considers that, on its own, it was not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to accept Witness BRK's explanation. Nevertheless, given the other troubling aspects of Witness BRK's credibility discussed above, his willingness to conceal relevant information when making official statements should have concerned the Trial Chamber.

310. The Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, also considers that the Trial Chamber's treatment of Witness BRK's evidence regarding the dates of the attacks at Kamarampaka, Mibilizi, and Nyakanyinya shows that the Trial Chamber failed to assess Witness BRK's evidence carefully.

311. More specifically, the Trial Chamber expressly noted that at the time of his testimony, Witness BRK could not recall the exact dates of the relevant events, but considered that this did not undermine his overall credibility.[775] While he had provided specific dates for the events at Kamarampaka stadium, Mibilizi parish and hospital, and Nyakanyinya school in his 8 March 2006 statement,[776] when testifying at trial he did not accept having provided the dates indicated in that statement.[777] Nonetheless, the Trial Chamber accepted the date of the Mibilizi attack provided in Witness BRK's 8 March 2006 witness statement despite the fact that he had specifically repudiated it.[778] While there is no absolute prohibition on accepting prior statements for the truth of their contents, the Appeals Chamber recalls that Tribunal jurisprudence discourages this practice.[779] In the instant case, the Trial Chamber should have considered more carefully the fact that Witness BRK's testimony at trial suggested that the date of the Mibilizi attack provided in his prior statement was incorrect.[780] The Trial Chamber's failure to explain its preference for Witness BRK's prior statement over his in-court testimony demonstrates a lack of care in considering pertinent evidence.

312. In sum, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, concludes that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to apply special caution in the assessment of Witness BRK's testimony that his status as an accomplice witness required. In particular, it failed to properly take into account its own finding that he may have exaggerated or invented evidence to further implicate the Appellant, his belief that his sentence would be reduced if he testified for the Prosecution, his late confession and his willingness to tailor his accounts of the events to serve his interests. The conclusion that the Trial Chamber's analysis was so flawed as to constitute an abuse of discretion is underscored by its lack of care in assessing Witness BRK's testimony regarding dates of particular attacks.

313. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, finds that no reasonable trier of fact could have found Witness BRK to be credible. The Appeals Chamber observes that while the Trial Chamber considered that other aspects of Witness BRK's account of

This difference in approach between the two cases can be understood in light of Rule 90(A) of the ICTR Rules, no equivalent of which exists in the ICTY Rules of Procedure and Evidence.
[780] Trial Judgement, para. 302. See also T. 22 January 2007 p. 23. Although Witness BRK was unable to provide dates for the attacks at Mibilizi, Nyakanyinya and Kamarampaka at trial, he was able to provide a chronology of the events which placed the attack on Mibilizi first, the attack on Nyakanyinya school second, and ended with the attack on the Kamarampaka stadium. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber accepted that the second attack, at Nyakanyina school occurred on 12 April 1994, and that there is no dispute that the third event, at Kamarampaka stadium, occurred on 16 April 1994. Accordingly, the attack on Mibilizi would have had to occur as much as a week the events at Kamarampaka stadium were corroborated,[781] Witness BRK was the only witness to provide a direct account of the killings at the gendarmerie, and specifically of the Appellant's role in the killings.[782] Accordingly, given the Trial Chamber's erroneous finding on Witness BRK's credibility, its findings on the Appellant's participation in the killings of the refugees taken from Kamarampaka stadium must be overturned.

314. For the foregoing reasons, the Appeals Chamber, Judge Pocar dissenting, grants the Appellant's Grounds of Appeal 24 to 26 relating to the assessment of Witness BRK's evidence and reverses the Appellant's conviction for genocide based on this event. Consequently, there is no need to address the Appellant's remaining arguments regarding the events at Kamarampaka stadium under this or any other ground of appeal.[783]

Case No. ICTR-01-63-T

JUDGEMENT AND SENTENCE

Office of the Prosecutor:
Alphonse Van
Lloyd Strickland
Madeleine Schwartz
Adama Niane

Defence Counsel:
Denis Turcotte

As such, a sole witness' testimony could suffice to justify a conviction if the Chamber is convinced beyond all reasonable doubt.

15. The jurisprudence on the recollection of details is also well formulated.[13] The events about which the witnesses testified occurred more than a decade before the trial. Discrepancies attributable to the lapse of time or the absence of record keeping, or other satisfactory explanation, do not necessarily affect the credibility or reliability of the witnesses. The Chamber will evaluate the testimony of each witness in the context of the testimony as a whole and determine to what extent it can believe and rely on the testimony. In making this assessment, the Chamber will consider whether the testimony was inconsistent with prior statements made by the witness and, if so, the cause of the inconsistency. The Chamber will also consider the internal consistency and integrity of the testimony and the context in which it was given. The Chamber will compare the testimony of each witness with the testimony of other witnesses and with the surrounding circumstances. The Chamber will explain the criteria on which it acts on a case-by-case basis.

16. The Defence has complained that the investigators were unreliable.[14] Two investigators testified in this case. The Chamber considers that the submissions with regard to Mamadou Koné do not warrant development, because he does not play a significant role in the case and the primary reason for his testimony was to admit a statement allegedly taken from Nchamihigo shortly after he was taken into custody. The Chamber has already ruled that as a matter of law the statement was inadmissible.[15] The second investigator, Jeannette Ebouea, put into evidence certain maps and gave evidence about various locations.[16] However, there was abundant evidence on these matters from other witnesses in the case. Her testimony was not critical to any finding of fact that the Chamber has to make. Still, the Defence complains about her responses to a series of questions about her investigative methods. In particular, the Defence submits that her admission that she did not take notes from the majority of persons she interviewed gives rise to the inference that her investigation was biased and that she only took notes of an incriminating nature thereby depriving Nchamihigo of an investigation which may have revealed exculpatory material.[17] The Chamber considers these submissions to be speculative. There was no evidence to support a conclusion that the Prosecution failed to disclose any exculpatory material in its possession, and the Defence did not make any such allegations. The submissions do not reveal any breach of duty, and the rules governing disclosure do not contain any obligation on the Prosecution to actively search for exculpatory material.[18]

17. In the present case, the Prosecution adduced evidence from many witnesses who admitted to participating in the crimes charged against Nchamihigo. These are accomplices. It is accepted both as a matter of law and common sense that the testimony of accomplices may be tainted by motives or incentives to falsely implicate an accused to gain some benefit or advantage in regard to their own case or sentence. A Chamber must therefore look at the testimony of accomplices, and the circumstances under which it has come to be delivered, with caution.[19] However, there is no rule requiring corroboration in the assessment of accomplice testimony. The Chamber may rely on the testimony of an accomplice who has not been corroborated if, after careful examination, the Chamber is convinced of the truthfulness and reliability of the witness. Testimony which supports the evidence adduced by an accomplice may bolster and strengthen the reliance that can be placed on it.[20]

18. Most of the witnesses who testified in this trial were granted protective measures for security reasons. An important element of these measures is the concealment of their identity from the public. In writing this Judgement, this circumstance will be observed. Witnesses, in most cases, will be referred to by pseudonym. In discussing their testimony, the Chamber will exercise care not to disclose any information which may identify the protected witness. Information of such a sensitive character, when adduced, is placed under seal and remains available to the Chamber during its deliberations.

19. In conclusion, the Chamber will guarantee that Nchamihigo benefits from the presumption of innocence and will only make findings against him where the evidence establishes his guilt beyond all reasonable doubt.

1.2. Alibi

20. Rule 67 (A)(ii)(a) of the Rules envisages that the Defence shall give notice of its intention to rely on an alibi before the commencement of the trial. In the present case, Nchamihigo filed an alibi notice on 19 April 2007, long after the close of the Prosecution case. Rule 67 (B) of the Rules specifies that failure of the Defence to provide such notice shall not limit the right of the accused to rely on an alibi defence. This provision is consistent with the principle of the presumption of innocence and the duty of the Prosecution to prove guilt beyond reasonable doubt. In the present case, compliance at such a late stage in the proceedings deprived the Prosecution of the opportunity to adduce evidence related to the alibi. It also raised the question whether the alibi was recently concocted to fit the evidence adduced against Nchamihigo.

1.2.1. Nchamihigo's Alleged Location before March 1994

21. Nchamihigo offered evidence to establish that it was impossible for him to have engaged in certain alleged activities because he did not reside in Cyangugu town before the end of February 1994. He explained that he was appointed Deputy Prosecutor in 1980 and served in various communities including Kigali, Gatsibo in the Mutara region, Byumba, Kibuye, and Cyangugu. In 1990, he was moved to the prosecutor's office in Rwesero sub-prefecture, and towards the end of 1990, up to 1992, he was at the prosecutor's office in Kigali. He said that he was then transferred to the prosecutor's office in Kibuye up to the end of February 1994. Defence Witness SNB testified that Nchamihigo joined the prosecutor's office in Cyangugu in March 1994.[21]

22. Several Prosecution witnesses testified that they saw and had dealings with Nchamihigo in Cyangugu in 1992, 1993 and early 1994. Witness LM, who worked in the involvement in the killing of his children and the mere omission of detail in the statement is not evidence of prevarication.

212. The Defence also suggested that LCR and LBB travelled together and may have worked out their respective testimonies together. No evidence was adduced to support this argument. The Chamber rejects the allegation that LCR and LBB concerted their testimony together. While it is true that LCR was rather belligerent during cross-examination and was intent on mentioning Nchamihigo even when it involved answering something that was not asked, the Chamber does not attribute a motive to falsely implicate Nchamihigo. The Defence neither disputed that LCR was at the stadium, nor that his name was on the list to be removed, nor that his sons were killed. The Chamber considers that those factors explained his hostility to Nchamihigo in the courtroom.

213. The Chamber found that LM, LBB and LCR were all credible and reliable witnesses. The Chamber believed their testimony. After considering the evidence as a whole, the Chamber finds beyond reasonable doubt that Nchamihigo participated in the removal of some 15 Tutsi from Kamarampaka Stadium.

214. BRK confessed to being one of the killers of the refugees removed from the stadium. He is an accomplice and his testimony must therefore be viewed with caution. Having cautiously considered the circumstances under which he is testifying in this case and his evidence, the Chamber has concluded that he does not have any motive or incentive to falsely incriminate Nchamihigo.

215. The Defence contends that BRK's description of events when he arrived at the stadium is not consistent with the testimony of other reliable Prosecution witnesses. The Chamber accepts that no one else testified that Nchamihigo had a megaphone and called out names from a list at the stadium. His evidence about this could have been exaggerated or invented to further implicate Nchamihigo. Several witnesses testified that Prefect Bagambiki and Lieutenant Imanishimwe had gone inside the stadium. The Chamber notes that even though this aspect of BRK's testimony could not be accepted, other aspects of his testimony were supported in many respects.

216. In his testimony, Nchamihigo denied knowing BRK, but confirmed that he was on the list of suspects, prepared by Commander Munyarugerero, for killing the people removed from the stadium. This supports BRK's admission that he was present and was one of the killers. In addition, although Nchamihigo denied going to the Mutongo commercial centre on that day, in his evidence he said that Sub-Prefect Munyangabe did go there to pacify the population. BRK testified that Sub-Prefect Munyagabe was there, but with Nchamihigo.[144]

217. BRK's testimony that Interahamwe were outside the stadium to attack those removed was supported by LM, who heard the shouting, as well as by Baziruwiha, who saw them. Several witnesses testified to the fact that the killings took place. SBA testified that Commander Munyarugerero reported the killings to the PSC. AOY testified that Prefect Bagambiki telephoned him to confirm that the killings had taken place as planned. Nchamihigo himself testified that Prosecutor Ndorimana informed him that the people

EMMANUEL NDINDABAHIZI
(Appellant)

v.

THE PROSECUTOR
(Respondent)

Case No. ICTR-01-71-A

JUDGEMENT

Counsel for the Appellant:

Mr. Michel Konitz
Ms. Magali Pirard

The Office of the Prosecutor:

Mr. Hassan Bubacar Jallow
Mr. James K. Stewart
Mr. George Mugwanya
Ms. Inge Onsea
Mr. Abdoulaye Seye
Mr. Alfred Orono Orono

> Q. I understand, Witness. I just want to know, based on what you were told, if the killing of the half-caste had anything to do with the visit of Emmanuel Ndindabahizi to the roadblock?
>
> A. I have already said that regarding Ndindabahizi and the killing of that person, the killing of this person occurred subsequent to Ndindabahizi's departure. I don't know if you understand me, Counsel.
>
> Q. Very well. But this killing occurred after, but was it after, in the course of the same day, in the course of the week? Do you have any further information on this?
>
> A. Well, Counsel, I don't know if you understand what I'm saying. There wasn't a long lapse of time. I don't know if you need someone else to explain what I'm telling you, but I believe it's clear.
>
> MR. PRESIDENT: What did you say now, Mr. Witness, can you repeat your answer?
>
> THE WITNESS: I said that it was not after a long time -- it was not a long time thereafter. I cannot even say hours, let alone days. It was soon after the departure of Ndindabahizi.[253]

And in response to questions asked by Judge Bossa:

> JUDGE BOSSA: You mentioned that you were taken to the roadblock at around 11 o'clock in the morning; is that correct?
>
> THE WITNESS: I cannot tell you that that is the absolute truth. It was not during the evening, but neither was it very early in the morning. I gave a period of time which was approximate.
>
> JUDGE BOSSA: In the morning; okay. How long after that did the Accused arrive?
>
> THE WITNESS: Just a little after my arrival at that place.
>
> JUDGE BOSSA: Okay. And how long after that was the half-caste killed? Because you said he was killed in the morning as well.
>
> THE WITNESS: Briefly, that happened about five minutes after I left the roadblock.[254]

115. Thus, Witness CGC never explained (nor was he asked to[255]) how he learned that Mr. Nors was killed at the roadblock about five minutes after he (Witness CGC) had left.[256] Thus, the Trial Chamber did not know how the person – or persons – who told Witness CGC about the killing knew about it; also, the Trial Chamber did not know on which basis the person – or persons –came to the conclusion that the killing happened some minutes after his departure. The finding that Mr. Nors was killed shortly after the Appellant's visit was thus based only on vague and [253] T. 29 September 2003, p. 48.

[254] T. 29 September 2003, p. 51.
[255] The fact that Defence counsel did not question Witness CGC as to how he could be sure that Nturusu had been killed five minutes after the witness had left the roadblock should not be held against the Appellant as it was the onus of the Prosecution to prove that the hearsay evidence was reliable and credible.
[256] Witness CGC testified that many people were killed at that roadblock both before and after the Appellant's visit. But Witness CGC did not explain why he recalled specifically that the murder of Nturusu (which murder he did not witness) happened shortly after the Appellant's visit. In fact, Witness CGC himself at first was not entirely certain that the murder of Nturusu occurred after the Appellant's departure: see T. 29 September 2003, p. 33 ("If my memory serves me right, that person was killed after Ndindabahizi's departure").

unverifiable hearsay. While hearsay evidence is not per se inadmissible, it is well established that a Trial Chamber must be cautious in considering such evidence.[257] Hence, the Appeals Chamber finds, by majority, Judge Shahabuddeen dissenting, that the Trial Chamber failed to adhere to this principle and that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion beyond reasonable doubt that Mr. Nors was killed shortly after the Appellant's visit on or about 20 May 1994.

116. In relation to the question whether the Appellant's actions on 20 May 1994 substantially contributed to the killing of Mr. Nors on 26 May 1994 – if Witness DB and Exh. D.34 were to be believed – the Appeals Chamber notes that Witness CGC testified that people were killed at the roadblock even before the Appellant's visit, that is, without his contribution.[258] Also, it is not established whether the persons who were instigated by the Appellant on 20 May 1994 were those who killed Mr. Nors on 26 May 1994. Thus, it is unclear whether the Appellant's acts substantially contributed to Mr. Nors's killing had it occurred six days after these acts or even later.

117. Also, the Trial Chamber did not make a finding on any criminal act of the Appellant during mid-April 1994 (see paragraph 25 of the Indictment) that could have substantially contributed to the murder of Mr. Nors in late May 1994 (see paragraph 11 of the Indictment). Thus, the Prosecution failed to establish a link between the murder of Mr. Nors at the Gaseke roadblock and a substantial contribution of the Appellant. Without that crime being committed, the Appellant cannot be held liable for instigating and aiding and abetting genocide for the murder of Mr. Nors pursuant to Article 6 of the Statute.[259] Instigating means prompting another person to commit an offence, thus requiring a subsequent criminal action.[260] Similarly, a conviction for aiding and abetting presupposes that the support of the aider and abetter has a substantial effect upon the perpetrated crime.[261] No reasonable trier of fact could have concluded beyond reasonable doubt that the killing of Mr. Nors was a result attributable to the Appellant's acts. In this context, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the Prosecution had withdrawn the charge of direct and public incitement to commit

This principle was recognized by the Trial Chamber in this case: see Trial Judgement, para. 23. In this context, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber held in para. 216 of the Trial Judgement that "Rwandans do not always express clearly the difference between what they have seen with their own eyes and what they have heard". The Appeals Chamber does not accept this characterization as being specific to Rwandans. Rather, it interprets the Trial Chamber's finding as a general reference to inaccuracies which often occur in the testimony of witnesses, regardless of their nationality.

[259] The modes of liability as regulated under Article 6(1) of the Statute are also applicable to the crime of genocide pursuant to Article 2 of the Statute, Ntakirutimana Appeal Judgement, para. 500. See also Krstić Appeal Judgement, para. 138.

genocide.[262] Hence, the Trial Chamber erroneously convicted the Appellant for instigating and aiding and abetting the murder of Mr. Nors as a crime against humanity.

118. In this context, the Appeals Chamber notes that the pleadings of the parties have to be clear and unambiguous. On the basis of ambiguous submissions made by the Prosecution during closing arguments, the Appeals Chamber might have come to the conclusion that the Prosecution had abandoned its case in relation to the killing of Mr. Nors.

2. Conclusion

In light of the above, the Appellant's eleventh ground of appeal is granted.

IX. ALLEGED VAGUENESS OF THE INDICTMENT (SUB-GROUND OF APPEAL 1 - GASEKE ROADBLOCK)

119. As the eleventh ground of appeal is granted on the basis of the reasoning set out above, it is not necessary for the Appeals Chamber to consider under the first sub-ground of appeal relating to the Gaseke roadblock whether the case concerning Mr. Nors was withdrawn by the Prosecution.[263] By the same token, it is not necessary to consider allegations of the vagueness of the Indictment relating to Mr. Nors[264] as both issues are rendered moot.

X. ALLEGED ERROR IN FINDING A LEGAL BASIS FOR THE GENOCIDE CONVICTION (GROUND OF APPEAL 7)

120. In addition, for the reasons set out above under the eleventh ground of appeal, it is not necessary for the Appeals Chamber to consider whether the Appellant was erroneously convicted of instigating and aiding and abetting genocide at the Gaseke roadblock on the basis of the killing of Mr. Nors. Consequently, the seventh ground of appeal has become moot.

[262] See supra note 4. As the offence of direct and public incitement to commit genocide is an inchoate offence, the legal assessment of such a charge may have been different.
[263] Appellant's Brief, paras 22, 172-77, referring to closing arguments, T. 1 March 2004, pp. 14-15, Appellant's Reply, paras 41-42.
[264] Appellant's Brief, paras 21-29. This argument was also raised during the appeal hearing: the Defence argued that ambiguity must be resolved in favour of the Appellant, at T. 6 July 2006, p. 18, see also T. 6 July 2006, pp. 26-27, 34, 64. The Prosecution argued that the act of instigation was not limited to Mr. Nors, T. 6 July 2006, p. 52.

a Minister, the Appellant supported and advocated a policy of genocide;[282] and second, the large number of victims at Gitwa Hill.[283] There is thus no double-counting of the same aggravating circumstance.

135. Also, the Trial Chamber did not err in considering the large number of victims at Gitwa Hill as an aggravating circumstance relevant to the sentence. As to the conviction for genocide, there need not be a large number of victims to enter a genocide conviction. As for extermination, the actus reus requires "killing on a large scale".[284] While this does not "suggest a numerical minimum",[285] a particularly large number of victims can be an aggravating circumstance in relation to the sentence for this crime if the extent of the killings exceeds that required for extermination. In the present case, there is no indication that, in considering aggravating circumstances, the Trial Chamber looked at only those killings required for extermination when it specifically cited the fact that "thousands" of people were killed.[286]

136. The Appellant also argues that his position in the Interim Government does not per se constitute an aggravating circumstance. The Appeals Chamber agrees, recalling that:

> [a] high rank in the military or political field does not, in itself, merit a harsher sentence. But a person who abuses or wrongly exercises power deserves a harsher sentence. Consequently, what matters is not the position of authority taken alone, but that position coupled with the manner in which the authority is exercised.[287]

Thus, the Trial Chamber was entitled to refer to the Appellant's position as a Minister in the Interim Government in sentencing, in accordance with the case law of the Tribunal which recognizes that the abuse of a position of influence and authority in society can be taken into account as an aggravating factor.[288] The Trial Chamber did not find that the Appellant's position in the Interim Government in itself called for a harsher sentence. Instead, it found that it was the wrongful exercise of his powers that constituted the aggravating circumstance. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in this.

137. As to the third challenged circumstance, the Appeals Chamber recalls that "where an aggravating factor for the purposes of sentencing is at the same time an element of the offence, it

(b) Aiding and abetting by tacit approval

337. The Prosecution submits that Bagambiki's "knowledge of such massive crimes and his inaction or silence amount to culpable omission or gross negligence or conduct that is tantamount to acquiescence in, tacit approval of, or aiding and abetting the crimes".[683] Citing the Aleksovski Trial Judgement, the Prosecution argues that when a superior was aware of crimes committed by his subordinates his silence could only be interpreted as a sign of approval, even when he was not present at the crime scene.[684]

338. In the view of the Appeals Chamber, criminal responsibility for an omission, which leads to a conviction as the principal perpetrator of the crime, has to be distinguished from aiding and abetting a crime by encouragement, tacit approval or omission, amounting to a substantial contribution to the crime. In the Notice of Appeal, the Prosecution's arguments are exclusively related to the issue of criminal responsibility for an omission. The issue of Bagambiki's responsibility for aiding and abetting the crimes by his tacit approval is raised only in the Appeal Brief, without the Prosecution having first sought leave to vary its grounds of appeal.[685] Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber declines to address this issue further.

2. Superior responsibility under Article 6(3) of the Statute

(a) Superior-subordinate relationship between Bagambiki and the gendarmes

339. The Prosecution challenges the Trial Chamber's finding that Bagambiki had neither de jure nor de facto authority over the gendarmes. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in its definition of a superior under Article 6(3) of the Statute.[686]

340. In its Notice of Appeal, the Prosecution submitted that the Trial Chamber erred in finding "that Bagambiki lacked effective control over the gendarmes and the military".[687] However, in the Appeal Brief, the Prosecution's arguments are focused on Bagambiki's effective control over the gendarmes, leading to the conclusion that Bagambiki had "the necessary material ability required to prevent or punish crimes by the gendarmes he requisitioned".[688] The Appeals Chamber will therefore concentrate on the issue of Bagambiki's responsibility for the crimes committed by the gendarmes.

341. The Prosecution asserts that the "Trial Chamber confined the definition of a superior to a military-style structure, where the superior can give orders or punish or prevent transgressions through issuing orders or taking disciplinary actions".[689] The paragraph of the Trial Judgement, to which the Prosecution refers, reads:

> After reviewing the relevant provisions of Rwandan law, the Chamber is not convinced that Bagambiki's ability to requisition gendarmes gave him de jure authority to give orders to them during the execution of an operation. [...] The law them to do so".[735] The Prosecution submits that the actus reus of aiding and abetting in this instance is established by Imanishimwe's omission to prevent his soldiers from going to Gashirabwoba, and that this omission had a decisive effect on their ability to participate in the attack.[736] It further contends that Imanishimwe possessed the requisite knowledge to be an aider and abettor in the Gashirabwoba massacre,[737] given that the Trial Chamber found that he knew or should have known about the participation of his soldiers in the attack.[738]

368. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not expressly rule on the issue as to whether Imanishimwe could have incurred criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting the crimes committed at the Gashirabwoba football field on 12 April 1994. This notwithstanding, the Appeals Chamber does not conclude that the Trial Chamber failed to consider this form of responsibility. It indeed transpires from the legal findings made by the Trial Chamber that this form of responsibility was considered and even accepted when the facts lent themselves to it. The Appeals Chamber understands the Trial Chamber's silence with respect to aiding and abetting as an indication that it was not established that the Accued's conduct could in this particular instance be characterized as aiding and abetting.[739]

369. Accordingly, the issue is for the Appeals Chamber to inquire into whether this finding is one which a reasonable trier of fact could have made.

370. To establish the material element (or actus reus) of aiding and abetting under Article 6(1) of the Statute, it must be proven that the aider and abettor committed acts specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, lending moral support[740] for the perpetration of a specific crime, and that the said support had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. The Appeals Chamber adds that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may, in certain circumstances, be perpetrated through an omission.[741] The requisite mens rea is the fact that the aider and abettor knows that his acts assist in the commission of the specific crime of the principal.[742]

371. In the instant case, the Trial Chamber considered that it was not established that the Accused had ordered or was present during the attack launched at Gashirabwoba on 12 April 1994.[743] On the other hand, it found that the soldiers responsible for the attack could not have

[735] Ibid., para. 407.
[736] Ibid., para. 408. In support of its line of reasoning, the Prosecution cites the Blaškić Trial Judgement, para. 284: "the actus reus of aiding and abetting may be perpetrated through an omission, provided this failure to act had a decisive effect on the commission of the crime and that it was coupled with the requisite mens rea." (footnote omitted).

[739] See supra, para. 359.
[740] The Appeals Chamber notes that the phrase "assist, encourage or lend no support" originally used by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadić (para. 229), Aleksovski (para. 163), Vasiljević (para. 102) and Blaškić (para. 45) Appeal Judgements has been translated as "aider, encourager ou fournir un soutien moral" in the French versions of the said Judgements. The Appeals Chamber considers that this translation may mislead the reader, given that "aided and abetted" is rendered in the French text of the Statute by "aidé et encourage".

10. The Prosecution presents six grounds for appeal.[8] The Prosecution asserts that the Trial Chamber erred (i) by failing to apply the "joint criminal enterprise" doctrine to determine Elizaphan Ntakirutimana's and Gérard Ntakirutimana's respective responsibility for the crime of genocide, (ii) in restricting Gérard Ntakirutimana's conviction for genocide to the acts of killing or serious bodily harm that he personally inflicted on Tutsis at the Mugonero Complex and in Bisesero, and (iii) in its definition of the mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting genocide. The Prosecution's fourth and fifth grounds of appeal address issues relating to crimes against humanity (extermination) and crimes against humanity (murder). As a sixth ground of appeal, the Prosecution challenges the sentences imposed by the Trial Chamber. Elizaphan Ntakirutimana and Gérard Ntakirutimana filed responses to the Prosecution appeal.[9]

D. Standards for Appellate Review

11. The Appeals Chamber recalls the requisite standards for appellate review pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute. Article 24 addresses errors of law which invalidate the decision and errors of fact which occasion a miscarriage of justice. Where a party alleges that there is an error of law, that party must advance arguments in support of the submission and explain how the error invalidates the decision. However, if the appellant's arguments do not support the contention, that party does not automatically lose its point since the Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.[10]

12. As regards errors of fact, as has been previously underscored by the Appeals Chamber of both this Tribunal and of the International Criminal Tribunal for the former Yugoslavia (ICTY), the Appeals Chamber will not lightly overturn findings of fact made by a trial chamber. Where an erroneous finding of fact is alleged, the Appeals Chamber must give deference to the trial chamber that received the evidence at trial as it is best placed to assess the evidence, including the demeanour of witnesses. The Appeals Chamber will only interfere in those findings where no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the same finding or where the finding is wholly erroneous. If the finding of fact is erroneous, it will be quashed or revised only if the error occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[11]

13. The Appeals Chamber emphasises that on appeal, a party cannot merely repeat arguments that did not succeed at trial, in the hope that the Appeals Chamber will consider them afresh. The appeals process is not a trial de novo and the Appeals Chamber is not a second trier of fact. It is incumbent on the party alleging the error to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's rejection of arguments constituted such an error as to warrant the intervention of the Appeals Chamber. Thus, arguments of a party which do not have the potential to cause the impugned decision to be reversed or revised may be immediately dismissed by the Appeals Chamber and need not be considered on the merits.[12]

14. Moreover, in its submissions, the appealing party must provide precise references to relevant transcript pages or paragraphs in the trial judgement to which the challenge is being made.[13] Failure to do so, or if the submissions are obscure, contradictory, vague or suffer from other formal and obvious insufficiencies, makes it difficult for the Appeals Chamber to assess fully the party's arguments on appeal.[14]

15. Finally, it is within the inherent jurisdiction of the Appeals Chamber to select those submissions which merit a reasoned opinion in writing. Arguments which are evidently unfounded may be dismissed without detailed reasoning.[15]

his prior good conduct is inconsistent with any possible moral support or encouragement, and that his presence at Kabuye hill would therefore have been of no consequence to the assailants.[529]

212. The Prosecution responds that the elements of aiding and abetting were clearly established beyond reasonable doubt, and that prior good conduct is not a relevant factor.[530]

213. In reply, Ntawukulilyayo contends that, contrary to the Trial Chamber's finding, Kabuye hill was not an isolated area, and that its conclusion that the transfer of refugees provided a "tactical advantage" was therefore purely speculative.[531]

214. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of aiding and abetting is constituted by acts or omissions specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, or lending moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[532] Whether a particular contribution qualifies as "substantial" is a "fact-based inquiry", and need not "serve as condition precedent for the commission of the crime."[533]

215. The Trial Chamber found beyond reasonable doubt that, in the early afternoon of Saturday, 23 April 1994, Ntawukulilyayo directed mostly Tutsi refugees at Gisagara market to go to Kabuye hill, promising them food and protection there, and that the refugees complied with his instructions.[534] The Trial Chamber further found that Ntawukulilyayo arrived at Kabuye hill later that day, and left shortly after dropping off soldiers who, along with others, subsequently attacked the civilian refugees at the hill.[535] As discussed above, the Appeals Chamber has found no error in the Trial Chamber's factual findings regarding Ntawukulilyayo's instructions to refugees at Gisagara market, and his arrival at Kabuye hill with soldiers.[536] Ntawukulilyayo has also failed to demonstrate error in the Trial Chamber's conclusion that the soldiers who accompanied him, along with others, attacked the refugees.[537] As regards the number of soldiers, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber did not rely on the specific number of soldiers who accompanied Ntawukulilyayo but on Ntawukulilyayo's contribution to the killings by bringing armed reinforcements.[538] Ntawukulilyayo's arguments that no reasonable trier of fact could determine with certainty the number and category of security personnel brought to the hill, and their effective participation in the crimes, are therefore rejected.

216. The Appeals Chamber considers that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that Ntawukulilyayo substantially contributed to the Kabuye hill killings by encouraging Tutsis to seek refuge there and then providing reinforcements to those attempting to kill them. These acts alone suffice to constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting. The Appeals Chamber is of the opinion that it is therefore unnecessary to assess whether the Trial Chamber erred in concluding that Kabuye hill was an isolated area and that the transfer of refugees thereby provided a "tactical advantage", or in concluding that his status and position lent moral support to the perpetrators. Ntawukulilyayo's prior good conduct is equally inconsequential to the Trial Chamber's finding that the actus reus of aiding and abetting had been fulfilled.

217. The Appeals Chamber concludes that Ntawukulilyayo has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the actus reus of aiding and abetting genocide was established.

B. Alleged Errors Relating to the Mens Rea

218. The Trial Chamber found that Ntawukulilyayo had knowledge both of the assailants' genocidal intent and that his acts would assist the killings, reasoning as follows:

> Given the systemic and extensive nature of the attack, the Majority has no doubt that its purpose was to eliminate the primarily Tutsi refugees gathered on Kabuye hill and that the assailants possessed genocidal intent. Furthermore, the range of assailants, including soldiers and communal police, who participated in the assault just hours after Ntawukulilyayo sent refugees to Kabuye hill evinces considerable coordination. Indeed, Ntawukulilyayo's arrival on Kabuye hill with soldiers would no doubt have required planning, given that they were not normally stationed within the sub-prefecture. Under the circumstances, there is no doubt that Ntawukulilyayo instructed refugees to go to Kabuye hill and transported soldiers there with the knowledge of the genocidal intent of the assailants and that his acts would assist the killings. The evidence firmly establishes that Ntawukulilyayo shared that genocidal intent.[539]

219. Ntawukulilyayo submits that the Trial Chamber erred in inferring that the only reasonable conclusion was that he intended to aid and abet genocide on Kabuye hill, as there were other reasonable inferences available from the evidence.[540] Specifically, he argues that it would have been reasonable to conclude that he acted in good faith in sending the refugees to Kabuye hill with the [539] Trial Judgement, para. 456 (internal citation omitted).

[540] Appeal Brief, paras. 203, 210. Under his Third Ground of Appeal, Ntawukulilyayo also submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he shared the perpetrators' genocidal intent. See Notice of Appeal, paras. 24-29; Appeal Brief, paras. 160-167. The Appeals Chamber will not entertain this allegation of error as it has found that the Trial Chamber erred in finding Ntawukulilyayo guilty pursuant to Article 6(1) of the Statute for ordering the Kabuye hill killings, and as genocidal intent is not a requisite element of aiding and abetting genocide. See supra, para. 206 and infra, para. 222. Any error on the part of the Trial Chamber in regard of Ntawukulilyayo's genocidal intent would therefore have no impact on his conviction for aiding and abetting genocide.

1452. Witness T133 asserted that he had no knowledge of the meeting held in Masango commune and that Witness CNAC did not inform him of the meeting.[1859] The Chamber observes, however, that the meeting at Masango commune could have been convened without Witness T133's knowledge. The Chamber further does not find as plausible Witness T133's evidence that because of his close friendship and daily contact with Witness CNAC, he would have necessarily been informed of the meeting. Moreover, the Chamber notes that Witness T133 had a family relationship with Nzabonimana, which in the Chamber's view may have motivated the witness to deny Nzabonimana's involvement in the events.

1453. Witness T134 did not know of any orders given by Nzabonimana to destroy Tutsi houses in Masango commune in May 1994, or that Mpamo held a meeting with MRND supporters urging them to implement Nzabonimana's orders.[1860] Again, however, the Chamber notes that the orders and the meeting could have occurred without the witness's knowledge. Furthermore, the Chamber finds that Witness T134 was not credible when he testified that he would go outside at night while he was hiding at Mpamo's, particularly as Witness T134's wife had informed him that he was being sought after. As Witness T134 was in hiding, he was therefore not necessarily aware of what was going on in the commune during the period in question.

1454. Nevertheless, the Chamber observes that the Prosecution relied on the uncorroborated hearsay evidence of a single witness to support this allegation. The Chamber recalls that it may find an allegation proven beyond a reasonable doubt on the basis of a single witness's testimony (2.7.4). However, in this instance, given the hearsay nature of the witness's evidence and the lack of corroborating evidence, the Chamber does not find this evidence sufficient to support this allegation. Having considered the totality of the evidence, the Chamber concludes that the Prosecution has failed to prove beyond a reasonable doubt the allegation contained in Paragraph 47 of the Indictment. In light of the foregoing, the Chamber need not address whether sufficient notice was provided for this event.

3.6.2 Destruction of Houses in Nyamabuye Commune

3.6.2.1 Introduction

1455. Paragraph 46 of the Indictment alleges that in April 1994, Callixte Nzabonimana visited the Nyamabuye commune office and told the Hutu civilians present to destroy the house of a dead Tutsi and to cover it up, so that in the event of an enquiry, the death of the Tutsi would not be known.[1861]

1456. The Prosecution submits that in May 1994, at the Nyamabuye commune office, Nzabonimana gave orders that Tutsi houses, including that of a man named Mpambara, should be destroyed and crops planted to cover any traces of the massacre of Tutsis. These orders were given to ensure that evidence of the massacre was destroyed in case a commission of enquiry carried out investigations. The Prosecution relies on Witness CNAA.[1862] role in the abduction and killing of Witness CNAQ's children.[2140] The Chamber further notes that at the time of his testimony Witness T31 had been convicted by a Gacaca court to a term of life imprisonment for his role in the Nyabikenke commune office attacks, and his appeal was pending.[2141] The Chamber will therefore treat the testimony of these witnesses with appropriate caution.

1686. The Defence asserts that Nzabonimana's name was not mentioned in connection with the killings during any Gacaca proceedings. Witness CNAQ testified at Witness T24's Gacaca trial and did not mention Nzabonimana. Her brother also did not mention Nzabonimana.[2142] However, the Chamber notes that Gacaca proceedings are separate and distinct legal proceedings which are not binding on this Chamber. The Chamber also notes that Witness T24 acknowledged that Gacaca records do not contain the full truth of what happened in Rwanda in 1994.[2143] Nevertheless, the Chamber considers the fact that Witness CNAQ omitted reference to Nzabonimana during Gacaca proceedings to negatively impact the credibility of her testimony.

1687. Having considered the totality of the evidence, the Chamber concludes that the testimony of Witnesses CNAQ and CNBU was insufficient to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Nzabonimana told the assailants to kill Witness CNAQ's children. The Chamber reiterates that it has doubts as to whether Witness CNAQ heard the conversation between Nzabonimana and Emmanuel and recalls the numerous inconsistencies and omissions in the accounts provided by Witnesses CNAQ and CNBU.

1688. Furthermore, the Chamber notes that even if the Prosecution had proven that Nzabonimana told Emmanuel that the children were to be killed, this evidence would not suffice to establish a link between Nzabonimana and the subsequent killings. The Chamber recalls that although the evidence suggested that Emmanuel was an Interahamwe, the evidence also established that Emmanuel was protecting Witness CNAQ's children by giving money to the assailants.[2144] There was no evidence that Emmanuel was involved in any of the attacks. Furthermore, although Witness CNAQ testified that the Interahamwe present during the ensuing attack on her children told her that they were acting on Nzabonimana's instructions,[2145] the Chamber concludes that this hearsay evidence is insufficient to prove beyond a reasonable doubt that Nzabonimana indeed issued instructions to Interahamwe to kill Witness CNAQ's children.

1689. Given the foregoing, the Chamber finds that the Prosecution has not proven beyond a reasonable doubt its allegation that Nzabonimana told Interahamwe, commune policemen and Hutu civilians to kill Witness CNAQ's children. Additionally, the Prosecution failed to establish that the killings occurred as a result of any orders, as alleged in Paragraph 30 of the Indictment.

IV. ALLEGED LACK OF NOTICE (GROUND OF APPEAL 1; GROUNDS OF APPEAL 5, 6, 10, 11, AND 12 IN PART)

51. At trial, Renzaho raised several objections regarding the form of and defects in the Indictment.[110] The Trial Chamber considered them and concluded that the Indictment was not defective, that Renzaho had reasonable notice of all material facts underpinning his convictions, and that the Defence's "conduct during the course of the trial and in their final submissions reflect that they have a complete understanding of the case."[111]

52. Renzaho submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in convicting him despite a number of defects, including vagueness, in the Indictment.[112] He argues that the Indictment was insufficiently precise in relation to his superior responsibility, and that he thus lacked notice of the events at Centre d'Étude de Langues Africaines ("CELA"), the events at Sainte Famille, the civil defence system, roadblocks, the distribution of weapons, rapes, and the killings which formed the basis for his conviction for murder as a serious violation of Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions and of Additional Protocol II.

A. Applicable Law

53. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the charges against an accused and the material facts supporting those charges must be pleaded with sufficient precision in an indictment in order to provide notice to an accused.[113] Whether a fact is "material" depends on the nature of the

The Trial Chamber also noted that the Defence did not point to any contemporaneous objections made at trial that it lacked notice of any of the evidence which was presented or that the evidence fell outside the scope of the Indictment, and the Trial Chamber was unable to identify any such objections with respect to the events which formed a basis of Renzaho's convictions. See Trial Judgement, para. 31.

other forms of responsibility pleaded in the Indictment. In the course of doing so, the Appeals Chamber will consider whether there was a sufficient nexus between Rukundo's acts, which he disputes under this ground of appeal, and the perpetration of the crimes as required by the relevant form of responsibility.

51. In determining Rukundo's role in the murder of Madame Rudahunga and the beating of the four others, the Trial Chamber noted that all four of the Prosecution witnesses who testified about this event connected him to the attacks.[107] It found that Rukundo was at the scene of the abduction and that he followed the vehicle carrying Madame Rudahunga and the soldiers who abducted her.[108] It further found that these same soldiers returned to Saint Joseph's College about 20 minutes later and abducted her children and two other Tutsi civilians.[109] Rukundo's car was also observed in the area of Madame Rudahunga's house after the killing and the beatings.[110] Furthermore, the Trial Chamber noted that Witness BLC attested to hearing him boast that "[w]e entered in Rudahunga's Inyenzi's house, we killed the wife and the children, but the idiot managed to get away",[111] while Witness CCH stated that Rukundo told her that Louis Rudahunga had to be killed.[112] The Appeals Chamber finds that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that this evidence was sufficient to support a finding that Rukundo was involved in the killing of Madame Rudahunga and the beatings of the four others.

52. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an "aider and abettor commitFsğ acts specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, or lending moral support for the perpetration of a specific crime, and that this support had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[113] It recalls that there is no requirement of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime nor that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime.[114] It is sufficient for the aider and abettor's assistance or encouragement to have had a substantial effect on the realisation of that crime,[115] the establishment of which is a "fact-based inquiry".[116] The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber's findings on Rukundo's role in the attacks, as set out above, demonstrate that his acts substantially contributed to the commission of the crimes.

53. With regard to the mens rea required for aiding and abetting, the Appeals Chamber has held that "Ftğhe requisite mental element F...ğ is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator."[117] Specific intent crimes such as genocide also require that "the aider and abettor must know of the principal perpetrator's specific intent."[118]

54. Bearing in mind the Trial Chamber's findings that these attacks formed part of a larger campaign of ethnic violence in the area and country,[119] the Appeals Chamber is convinced that the perpetrators acted with both genocidal intent and knowledge of the widespread and systematic attack against Tutsi civilians. In his consultation with the assailants prior to the crimes, his presence during the abduction of Madame Rudahunga, and his subsequent boasting of the killing, Rukundo would have been aware of his role in the crimes and the perpetrators' mens rea. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber finds that Rukundo's actions aided and abetted genocide and murder as a crime against humanity.

(c) Chapeau Elements of Crimes Against Humanity

55. Rukundo challenges his conviction for murder as a crime against humanity on the basis that Madame Rudahunga did not belong to a political group and it was not proven that he was aware of the existence of a widespread or systematic attack on a civilian population.[120]

56. Article 3 of the Statute requires that the crimes be committed "as part of a widespread or systematic attack against any civilian population on national, political, ethnic, racial or religious grounds." In the present case, the Trial Chamber found that the killing of Madame Rudahunga, a Tutsi, was part of a widespread and systematic attack against Tutsi civilians on ethnic grounds.[121]

Separate Opinion of Judges Meron and Jorda

We write this separate opinion to urge the Appeals Chamber to thoroughly examine the issue of entering new convictions at appellate level which, at this stage, can no longer be appealed. Pursuant to Article 24 of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from the Prosecution, including appeals based on errors of fact, and may "affirm, reverse or revise" the decisions of the Trial Chamber. Article 25 of the Statute of ICTY gives the same power to the Appeals Chamber of that Tribunal. On at least one occasion, the ICTY Appeals Chamber has interpreted that provision as permitting it to reverse an acquittal and enter a conviction in lieu thereof, although, in that case, the issue as to whether the Appeals Chamber was competent to do so was not expressly addressed by the majority of the judges.[1] Although the Statutes of both this Tribunal and ICTY prescribe certain limited forms of review of Appeals Chamber decisions, such as the review proceedings provided for under Article 25 of the Statute of this Tribunal, they do not provide a right of appeal from a conviction entered, for the first time, by the Appeals Chamber. In our opinion, the absence of any right whatsoever to appeal such a conviction, save in the case where the matter is remitted to the Trial Chamber, is likely to infringe upon the fundamental principle of fairness recognized both in international law and many national legal systems.

In the present case, it is not necessary to deal with this issue. Indeed, although the Appeals Chamber entered convictions on two counts, the underlying criminal conduct was already covered by convictions handed down by the Trial Chamber. Consequently, the new convictions do not attract a heavier penalty. Moreover, no party has raised the question of any further appeal. However, given the importance of the issue raised, it is absolutely necessary for the Appeals Chamber to deal with it in the future, in order to find solutions consistent with fundamental principles of fairness and due process.

transfer which occurred sometime between the completion of the case in June 2002 and the delivery of the Trial Judgement on 15 May 2003).[88]

56. The Appeals Chamber is not convinced that this leads to an apprehension of bias since Mr. Eboe-Osuji became Senior Legal Officer of Trial Chamber II and, as such, he could not have played any role in the deliberations of Trial Chamber III in this case. As explained by the Prosecution:

> Deliberations for judgments of the Tribunal are strictly privileged and confined to the staff of each Trial Chamber; staff of different Trial Chambers are thus prohibited from discussing the substance of any Judgments with any other person, including the staff of the other Trial Chambers.[89]

9. Language in Which Trial Judgement was Delivered

57. Under the title "Inadequate guarantees to be tried in language Accused understood," the Appellant argues that the Trial Judgement was delivered only in English on 15 May 2003, despite paragraph 594 stating that the Trial Judgement was done in English and French.[90] The Appeals Chamber notes that the fact that the French translation of the Trial Judgement might not have been ready at the time the Trial Judgement was rendered does not establish unfairness, apprehension of bias or any impropriety on the part of the Tribunal. What is important is that, throughout the proceedings, the Appellant had access to simultaneous translation in French or Kinyarwanda, and that, on 15 May 2003, a summary of the Trial Judgement was read in English, French and Kinyarwanda. This was done and, therefore, there was no apprehension of bias in this regard.

10. Conclusion

58. The Appeals Chamber finds that, on the basis of the foregoing, the Appellant has not rebutted the presumption of impartiality of the Trial Chamber.

B. The Indictment (Ground 2)

1. Initial Appearance, Disclosure, and Confirmation

59. The Appellant contends that the Indictment and initial appearance were flawed in a variety of respects. He begins with the argument that his initial arrest in Cameroon was not consistent with Rule 53 because he was served with the Decision confirming the Barayagwiza indictment rather by national law, it contends that the Trial Chamber did not sufficiently consider the sentencing practice of Rwanda in relation to the crimes for which the Appellant was convicted. The Prosecution adds that had the Trial Chamber properly considered the nature of the Appellant's conduct and crimes within the Rwandan framework, it would have imposed a much higher sentence.[787]

376. Article 23(1) of the Statute provides that, in determining the terms of imprisonment, "Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda." Similarly, Rule 101(B)(iii) of the Rules indicates that the Trial Chamber "shall take into account ... such factors as ... the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda." The question therefore, as raised in the Prosecution's appeal, is the extent to which the Trial Chamber is bound by the general practices in Rwanda.

377. Guidance on this issue is to be found in cases from both this Tribunal and the ICTY, where the trial chambers are likewise required to have recourse to the practices of the courts of the former Yugoslavia when determining a sentence. The Appeals Chamber clarified in Serushago that the command for Trial Chambers to "have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda' does not oblige the Trial Chambers to conform to that practice; it only obliges the Trial Chambers to take account of that practice."[788] The ICTY Appeals Chamber in Dragan Nikoli}, citing notably the Krstic Appeal Judgement and the Kunarac et al. Trial Judgement, held that "although a Trial Chamber should have 'recourse to' and should 'take into account' the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia, this 'does not oblige the Trial Chambers to conform to that practice; it only obliges the Trial Chambers to take account of that practice.'"[789] It further held that "Trial Chambers have to take into account the sentencing practices in the former Yugoslavia and, should they depart from the sentencing limits set in those practices, must give reasons for such departure."[790] Therefore, a Trial Chamber, whilst not bound by the sentencing practices of the former Yugoslavia or of Rwanda is obliged to explain the sentence imposed and any divergence from the sentencing limits of either the former Yugoslavia or of Rwanda.[791] Following the Krstic Appeal Judgement, the Trial Chamber in this case was therefore entitled to impose a greater or lesser sentence than that which would have been imposed by the Rwandan courts.[792]

378. The Trial Chamber, in its discussion on applicable sentencing ranges, reviewed the Rwandan Penal Code with respect to the recommended sentences for the crimes of murder and rape, the penalties to be imposed for accomplices, and aggravating factors in rape cases. It also noted that, for genocide and crimes against humanity, the Rwandan Organic Law[793] stipulated that sentences prescribed in the ordinary Penal Code shall apply "with certain modifications, including heightened penalties of death and life imprisonment, respectively, for Categories 1 and 2 perpetrators."[794] The Prosecution submits that despite these references the Trial Chamber did not appear to have properly considered the Appellant's sentence in the context of the Rwandan Organic Law, and that under Rwandan law the Appellant would have received at least life imprisonment.

379. The Trial Chamber also considered sentences imposed in other cases before the International Tribunal[795] and reviewed any mitigating and aggravating factors.[796]

380. The Trial Chamber thus carefully considered the relevant factors, general as well as individualised, in determining the appropriate sentence the Appellant should receive. Although his sentence may have been more severe in Rwandan courts, the Trial Chamber acted within its discretion when it imposed a lesser sentence. The Appeals Chamber is unable to find a discernible error in the reasoning of the Trial Chamber.

2. Disparity with the Tribunal's Sentencing Practice and Applying a Sentence which is Disproportionate to the Gravity of these Crimes

381. The Prosecution next argues that the Appellant's sentences for complicity in genocide and aiding and abetting extermination are in disparity with the Tribunal's sentencing practice. It contends that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in its sentencing discretion by imposing concurrent 15-year sentences for the massacres at Mwulire and Musha. The Prosecution submits that the sentences were manifestly insufficient given the gravity of the crimes, the level of participation of the Appellant, and his genocidal intent at the time of both massacres.

379. To satisfy Article 6(1), an individual's participation must have substantially contributed to, or have had a substantial effect on, the completion of a crime.[628]

a. Forms of Participation

(i) Planning

380. "Planning" envisions one or more persons formulating a method of design or action, procedure, or arrangement for the accomplishment of a particular crime.[629] The level of participation in the planning must be substantial such as actually formulating the criminal plan or endorsing a plan proposed by another.[630]

(ii) Instigating

381. "Instigating" refers to urging, encouraging, or prompting another person to commit a crime.[631] Instigation need not be direct and public.[632] Proof is required of a causal connection between the instigation and the commission of the crime.[633]

(iii) Ordering

382. "Ordering" refers to a situation where an individual has a position of authority and uses that authority to order – and thus compel – another individual, who is subject to that authority, to commit a crime.[634] Criminal responsibility for ordering the commission of a crime under the Statute implies the existence of a superior-

2. Alleged Errors regarding the Criminal Responsibility for Genocide

(a) Alleged Errors regarding the Causing of Serious Bodily or Mental Harm

41. Athanase Seromba submits that the Trial Chamber erred when making the "specious assertion" that his alleged prohibition of the Tutsi refugees seeking food in the banana plantation of the parish and his alleged order to gendarmes to shoot at refugees who were found there; his alleged refusal to celebrate mass for Tutsi refugees at Nyange church; and his alleged decision to expel the Tutsi employees from the parish, contributed towards the perpetration of acts causing serious bodily or mental harm to the Tutsi refugees in Nyange church.[102] He broadly claims that this finding by the Trial Chamber "does not stand up to scrutiny and is not justified in the instant case" and refers generally to his previous submissions in this respect.[103]

42. In this regard, under this ground of appeal, Athanase Seromba submits that the Trial Chamber's finding that his "alleged refusal [to celebrate mass for the refugees] was an element of genocide, which is a new criterion for the characterization of genocide, is not based on rigorous, logical and coherent legal reasoning that a reasonable trier of fact would reach".[104] He also submits that the Trial Chamber failed to state the legal consequence of his refusal to celebrate mass for the refugees in relation to his individual criminal responsibility within the meaning of Article 6(1) of the Statute.[105]

43. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber established that Athanase Seromba "carried out acts which specifically assisted, encouraged, and even lent moral support to the attackers and their leaders".[106] The Prosecution stresses that the relevant factual findings support the determination that Athanase Seromba "at the very least" aided and abetted the commission of genocide.[107]

44. The Appeals Chamber first recalls that the Trial Chamber found that Athanase Seromba could incur criminal responsibility only for his participation by aiding and abetting the crime of genocide and did not find him guilty of planning, instigating, ordering, or committing the crime of genocide.[108] The Appeals Chamber recalls that, to establish the actus reus of aiding and abetting under Article 6(1) of the Statute, it must be proven that the alleged aider and abettor committed acts specifically aimed at assisting, encouraging, or lending moral support for the perpetration of a specific crime, and that this support had a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[109]

45. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber considers that the issue at stake is not whether the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Athanase Seromba's refusal to celebrate mass for the Tutsi refugees,[110] either alone or in combination with his order prohibiting refugees from getting food at the banana plantation and his decision to expel Tutsi employees and Tutsi refugees "was an element of genocide",[111] nor whether these acts constituted the necessary actus reus for the crime of genocide. Rather, the Appeals Chamber must assess whether the Trial Chamber correctly established the actus reus of the principal perpetrators for causing serious bodily or mental harm to the Tutsi refugees in Nyange church such as to amount to genocide and whether the Trial Chamber, when assessing Athanase Seromba's criminal responsibility, erred in finding that his acts constituted the actus reus for aiding and abetting the perpetration of this crime.[112]

46. The Appeals Chamber recalls that "serious bodily or mental harm" is not defined in the Statute,[113] and that the Appeals Chamber has not squarely addressed the definition of such harm. The quintessential examples of serious bodily harm are torture, rape, and non-fatal physical violence that causes disfigurement or serious injury to the external or internal organs.[114] Relatedly, serious mental harm includes "more than minor or temporary impairment of mental faculties such as the infliction of strong fear or terror, intimidation or threat".[115] Indeed, nearly all convictions for [110] As specifically claimed in Seromba's Appellant's Brief, para. 95. However, the Appeals Chamber notes that, contrary to these submissions, the Trial Chamber did not find that his refusal to celebrate mass for the Tutsi refugees alone contributed to the commission of acts causing serious mental harm. Rather, it found that his "line of conduct", which comprised of his "order prohibiting refugees from getting food from the banana plantation, his refusal to celebrate mass in Nyange church, and his decision to expel employees and Tutsi refugees from the parish and the presbytery facilitated the perpetration of acts causing serious mental harm to the Tutsi refugees in Nyange church" (Trial Judgement, para. 326).

[111] Seromba's Appellant's Brief, para. 95.

[112] A similar approach was taken by the ICTY Appeals Chamber in the Krstić Appeal Judgement, paragraphs 135ff, where the Appeals Chamber assessed the issue of the level of Radislav Krstić's criminal responsibility "in the circumstances as properly established", i.e. after having established that genocide had been committed by the Bosnian Serb forces who had sought to eliminate a part of the Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica, a conclusion based on the killings of Muslim men of military age (see, in particular, Krstić Appeal Judgement, para. 37).

Seromba's contention to the contrary. Whether the Trial Chamber correctly characterized Athanase Seromba's acts as aiding and abetting will be addressed in greater detail in the context of the Prosecution's appeal.

(ii) Mens Rea

56. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber found Athanase Seromba guilty for his participation by aiding and abetting.[138] The requisite mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[139] In particular, as correctly outlined by the Trial Chamber,[140] in cases of crimes requiring specific intent, such as genocide, it is not necessary to prove that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea of the principal, but that he must have known of the principal perpetrator's specific intent.[141]

57. The Appeals Chamber considers Athanase Seromba's argument regarding the alleged failure of the Trial Chamber to establish that he had "conceived the above-mentioned plan before the arrival of the Tutsi at the church"[142] to be without merit. First, as detailed above, there is no requirement of a "plan" in order to establish an intent to aid and abet genocide. Second, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that the Prosecution was required to establish that Athanase Seromba had the requisite mens rea to aid and abet genocide prior to the arrival of the Tutsi refugees at the church. Rather, only at the time that he provided support to the principal perpetrators through his acts found to have formed the actus reus in question, must he have known the specific intent of the perpetrators.[143]

58. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that Athanase Seromba has failed to show any error in the Trial Chamber's analysis of the required mental element when finding that he had the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting genocide.

59. With regard to Athanase Seromba's submissions relating to the Trial Chamber's findings on his mens rea for aiding and abetting the killing of refugees in Nyange church, the Appeals Chamber

(c) Proof of the Actus Reus by Circumstantial Evidence

219. The Prosecution contends that, even in the absence of evidence of an express agreement, a reasonable trier of fact could have inferred the existence of conspiracy only on the basis of the evidence on the record.[514] It argues that Athanase Seromba's actions and the events that transpired at the parish between 11 and 16 April 1994, would have led a reasonable trier of fact to infer the existence of a concerted and coordinated plan of action.[515] To support its assertion that an agreement can be proven not only by establishing the existence of a formal and express agreement but also by circumstantial evidence, the Prosecution refers to the Nyiramasuhuko et al., Nahimana et al., Bagosora et al., and Niyitegeka cases.[516]

220. Athanase Seromba responds that none of these cases can be used to support the Prosecution's argument. He points out that the trial judgement in Nahimana et al. is pending appeal,[517] that the trial in the Bagosora et al. case is still in progress,[518] and that no similarity exists between the Niyitegeka case and his case.[519]

221. As stated above, the actus reus of conspiracy to commit genocide is the making of an agreement between two or more persons to commit genocide. This actus reus can be proven by establishing the existence of planning meetings for the genocide, but it can also be inferred, based on other evidence.[520] However, as in any case where the Prosecution intends to rely on circumstantial evidence to prove a particular fact upon which the guilt of the accused depends, the finding of the existence of a conspiracy to commit genocide must be the only reasonable inference based on the totality of the evidence.[521]

222. The Appeals Chamber will now consider whether the Prosecution has established that the only reasonable inference from the evidence adduced at trial was that Athanase Seromba participated in a conspiracy to commit genocide.

circumstances.[534] Trial Chambers are vested with a broad discretion in determining an appropriate sentence, due to their obligation to individualize the penalties to fit the circumstances of the convicted person and the gravity of the crime.[535]

229. Athanase Seromba submits that the Trial Chamber's consideration of the "breach of trust" was incorrect.[536] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber concluded that Athanase Seromba's "status" and his betrayal of the trust which was placed in him by the Tutsi refugees constituted aggravating circumstances.[537] In arriving at this conclusion, the Trial Chamber stated that:

> Athanase Seromba, a Catholic priest, was in charge of Nyange parish at the time of the events referred to in the Indictment. The Accused was known and respected in the Catholic community of Nyange. The Chamber recalls that it has been established that many Tutsi[s] from Kivumu commune sought refuge in Nyange church in order to escape attack. The Chamber considers as an aggravating circumstance the fact that the Accused took no concrete action whatsoever to earn the trust of those persons who believed they were safe by seeking refuge at Nyange parish.[538]

230. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the abuse of a position of influence and authority in society can be taken into account as an aggravating factor in sentencing.[539] In the present case, the Trial Chamber established that Athanase Seromba was acting as a priest at Nyange parish during April 1994[540] and that during this period Tutsi refugees sought refuge at the parish.[541] In this context, the Trial Chamber considered the Prosecution's averment that Athanase Seromba betrayed the trust of his parishioners[542] and found that his status and his "betrayal of trust" constituted aggravating circumstances.[543] This finding is not based on Athanase Seromba's position as a priest, as such, but rather on his abuse of a position of trust. The Appeals Chamber finds no error in this.

231. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in considering the individual circumstances of the case. It argues that the Trial Chamber relied on extraneous and irrelevant factors in mitigation of the sentence against Athanase Seromba, giving mitigating factors excessive

Appellant some clemency, and sentenced him to 'a single term of fifteen 15 years imprisonment for all the crimes of which he has been convicted.'

25. It is particularly noteworthy that the Appellant's counsel did not argue that the 15-year imprisonment imposed on the Appellant may be characterised as a miscarriage of justice within the meaning of Article 24 of the Statute. He conceded that his client's case, in terms of the length of the sentence, 'would be on weaker grounds, much weaker grounds' but for his other argument that the Trial Chamber had not paid due regard to the sentencing practice in Rwanda. That issue will be addressed shortly.

26. Before moving on, it is proper to address the Appellant's effort to rely on Prosecutor v. Erdemović. His counsel argued that there exists a disparity between the sentence imposed on his client and that imposed by the ICTY on Erdemović, even though both cases share the same elements of confession and guilty plea. He complained that Erdemović was sentenced to five years in prison, whereas his client was sentenced to fifteen.

27. In our view, the Erdemović case does not assist the Appellant. The facts of the two cases are materially different. In Erdemović, the defendant pleaded duress, and the Prosecution conceded the plea. The duress would have entailed his immediate execution had he refused to kill. By contrast, the case at bar is marked not only by the absence of any plea of duress, but also by evident indicia of volition to commit the crimes. Furthermore, this Appellant was a de facto leader in the Interahamwe, as well as an elite member of society who commanded respect, engendered fear and exerted power in his community. There was no evidence that Erdemović had a similar profile. Erdemović is distinguishable.

B. Whether Due Regard was Paid to Rwandan Sentencing Practice

28. The Appellant's case is further founded on the argument that the Trial Chamber had not paid due regard to the general sentencing practice in the courts of Rwanda.

29. Under the Rwanda Penal Code, the sentence in this case would be fully competent. It should, however, be noted that a special scheme has been instituted by a law adopted by Rwanda on 30 August 1996, which provides for sentences between 7-11 years' imprisonment in the case of certain crimes. The Appellant maintains that this provision would have applied to him had he been prosecuted in Rwanda. This law does not entirely displace the general law of Rwanda; it is limited in certain respects. These limitations raise the question whether or not the law is included in the reference in Article 23(1) of the Statute to 'the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda'. For purposes only of this decision, the Appeals Chamber will assume in the Appellant's favour that it does. On that basis, the Appeals Chamber considers that the submission of the Appellant should be overruled for the following reason.

30. It is the settled jurisprudence of the ICTR that the requirement that 'the Trial Chambers shall have recourse to the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of Rwanda' does not oblige the Trial Chambers to conform to that practice; it only obliges the Trial Chambers to take account of that practice. The Appeals Chamber construes paragraphs 17 and 18 of the decision of the Trial Chamber in this case to mean that that is the way in which the Trial Chamber regarded the operation of that requirement and that accordingly the Trial Chamber did have recourse to the relevant practice of the courts of Rwanda.

31. The conclusion reached by the Trial Chamber was that a sentence of 15 years' imprisonment should be imposed on the Appellant in respect of his conviction on one count of genocide and three counts of crimes against humanity. When all the circumstances are taken into account, the Appeals Chamber has difficulty in appreciating any basis for contending that the sentence of 15 years' imprisonment was erroneous.

V. CONCLUSIONS

32. Under Article 24 of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber has the power to 'affirm, reverse or revise' a sentence imposed by a Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber considers that it should not exercise that power except where it believes that the Trial Chamber has committed an error in exercising its discretion, or has failed to follow applicable law.

33. In the instant case, the Trial Chamber gave full consideration to all of the issues pertaining to sentencing, taking into account the nature of the offences in question and all those elements referred to in Article 23 of the Statute and in Rule 101 of the Rules. As long as the sentence imposed by the Trial Chamber thereafter is within the 'discretionary framework' provided to it by the Statute and the Rules, the Appeals Chamber would see no reason to depart from the Trial Chamber's sentence.

VI. DISPOSITION

34. For these reasons, THE APPEALS CHAMBER, on 14 February 2000;

1. DISMISSED the appeal;

2. AFFIRMED the Trial Chamber's Sentence of 5 February 1999.

17. An alibi does not constitute a defence in its proper sense.[34] By raising an alibi, an accused is simply denying that he was in a position to commit the crime with which he was charged.[35] An accused does not bear the burden of proving his alibi beyond reasonable doubt.[36] Rather, "[h]e must simply produce the evidence tending to show that he was not present at the time of the alleged crime"[37] or, otherwise stated, present evidence "likely to raise a reasonable doubt in the Prosecution case."[38] If the alibi is reasonably possibly true, it must be accepted.[39]

18. Where an alibi is properly raised, the Prosecution must establish beyond reasonable doubt that, despite the alibi, the facts alleged are nevertheless true.[40] The Prosecution may do so, for instance, by demonstrating that the alibi does not in fact reasonably account for the period when the accused is alleged to have committed the crime. Where the alibi evidence does prima facie account for the accused's activities at the relevant time of the commission of the crime, the Prosecution must "eliminate the reasonable possibility that the alibi is true,"[41] for example, by demonstrating that the alibi evidence is not credible.

19. The Appeals Chamber has considered on several occasions whether Trial Chambers have erroneously shifted the burden of proof to the accused with respect to their alibis. Appellants have frequently pointed to language in the assessment of alibi evidence intimating that they were required to disprove the Prosecution's evidence through their alibis. The Appeals Chamber has recognized that language which suggests, inter alia, that an accused must "negate" the Prosecution's evidence,[42] "exonerate" himself,[43] or "refute the possibility" that he participated in a crime[44] indicates that the Trial Chamber misapplied the burden of proof. Indeed, as stated in the Musema Appeal Judgement, "[i]n considering the manner in which the Trial Chamber applied the burden and standard of proof, the Appeals Chamber must start off by assuming that the words used in the Trial Judgement accurately describe the approach adopted by the Trial Chamber."[45]

The use of the phrase 'to negate

20. In assessing whether a Trial Chamber, when using this type of language, has in fact shifted the burden of proof, the Appeals Chamber carries out an in-depth analysis of the specific findings related to a given incident.[46] The Appeals Chamber has generally found that such language, while inappropriate, is not fatal when viewed in the broader context of a Trial Chamber's findings. This is especially the case where the Trial Chamber accurately refers elsewhere in the judgement to the appropriate burden of proof for the evaluation of alibi evidence, its overall approach evinces a careful assessment of the alibi evidence, and its conclusion that the alibi evidence is ultimately not credible is reasonable when weighed against the evidence of participation in a crime.[47]

2. Alleged Errors in Evaluating Exculpatory Evidence Related to Kesho Hill (Ground 6)

(a) Introduction

21. The Trial Chamber convicted Zigiranyirazo of genocide and extermination as a crime against humanity based on his participation in a joint criminal enterprise to kill Tutsi civilians at Kesho Hill in Gisenyi Prefecture.[48] The Trial Chamber found that he was present at Kesho Hill at some point on the morning of 8 April 1994 and that he addressed the assembled assailants before they launched an attack on the Tutsi refugees there.[49] As part of his defence, Zigiranyirazo presented evidence that he was not observed at Kesho Hill during the attack.[50] The Trial Chamber did not find this evidence to be credible or to have probative value.[51]

4. Conclusion

75. In reversing Zigiranyirazo's convictions for genocide and extermination as a crime against humanity, the Appeals Chamber again underscores the seriousness of the Trial Chamber's errors. The crimes Zigiranyirazo was accused of were very grave, meriting the most careful of analyses. Instead, the Trial Judgement misstated the principles of law governing the distribution of the burden of proof with regards to alibi and seriously erred in its handling of the evidence. Zigiranyirazo's resulting convictions relating to Kesho Hill and the Kiyovu Roadblock violated the most basic and fundamental principles of justice. In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber had no choice but to reverse Zigiranyirazo's convictions.

Tenth Ground of Appeal, he challenges his conviction based on the Trial Chamber's failure to address prior inconsistent statements of Witness BCW. See Zigiranyirazo Notice of Appeal, para. 10; Zigiranyirazo Appeal Brief, paras. 290-310. In the Eleventh Ground of Appeal, he challenges his conviction based on the Trial Chamber's acceptance of Witness ATO's testimony regarding the presence of General Gratien Kabiligi at the roadblock. See Zigiranyirazo Notice of Appeal, para. 11; Zigiranyirazo Appeal Brief, para. 311.

that during Kuradusenge's last visit to his house around 14 April 1994, he told Bagaragaza that the Interahamwe had "finished with the Tutsis in the area and that they were going to continue" elsewhere,[178] in Kigongo and "probably" in Bugoye.[179] As noted in the Kordić and Čerkez Trial Judgement:

> [...] it is essentially a matter of common sense that a witness with an interest to serve (particularly an interest to get his sentence reduced) may seek to inculpate others and exculpate himself. On the other hand, it does not follow that such a witness is incapable of telling the truth. In each case it is necessary to consider the witness's evidence and all the circumstances, particularly the extent to which evidence is confirmed.[180]

139. Moreover, the Chamber notes the perquisites provided by the Prosecution to Bagaragaza, including direct payments prior to his arrest, the payment of costs incurred in relocating and supporting his family, and promises made to Bagaragaza related to the venue of his own trial as well as his own relocation after trial.[181] While not inherently unreasonable, the Chamber considers such benefits warrant additional caution when considering Bagaragaza's evidence.

140. Under these circumstances, the Chamber considers it unsafe to accept Bagaragaza's uncorroborated hearsay testimony regarding the Accused's alleged support for the Interahamwe.

141. For these reasons, the Chamber concludes that the Prosecution has failed to prove beyond reasonable doubt that the Accused participated in and/or facilitated the arming, training and clothing of the Interahamwe and the local population in Gisenyi. Given this conclusion, the Chamber does not consider it necessary to assess the Defence Witness's evidence.[182]

4. Meetings where Attacks were Planned, Organised and Facilitated

4.1. Introduction

142. As discussed above in the section on Allegations on which No Evidence was Presented, the Prosecution failed to adduce any evidence of several meetings specifically pleaded in the Indictment.[183]

143. Additionally, the Chamber recalls that, during Closing Arguments, the Prosecution stated that it was not seeking a conviction on the basis of Witness ATO's evidence.[184] The Chamber may, however, also consider his evidence to the extent it is relevant to other allegations properly pleaded in the Indictment.

144. The Chamber notes that it may still consider the evidence of meetings for which the Prosecution failed to provide notice to the extent they are relevant to the

109. It is necessary to stress that the normal rule is that previous decisions are to be followed, and departure from them is the exception. The Appeals Chamber will only depart from a previous decision after the most careful consideration has been given to it, both as to the law, including the authorities cited, and the facts.

110. What is followed in previous decisions is the legal principle (ratio decidendi), and the obligation to follow that principle only applies in similar cases, or substantially similar cases. This means less that the facts are similar or substantially similar, than that the question raised by the facts in the subsequent case is the same as the question decided by the legal principle in the previous decision. There is no obligation to follow previous decisions which may be distinguished for one reason or another from the case before the court.

111. Where, in a case before it, the Appeals Chamber is faced with previous decisions that are conflicting, it is obliged to determine which decision it will follow, or whether to depart from both decisions for cogent reasons in the interests of justice.

2. Whether the Decisions of the Appeals Chamber are Binding on Trial Chambers

112. Generally, in common law jurisdictions, decisions of a higher court are binding on lower courts. In civil law jurisdictions there is no doctrine of binding precedent. However, as a matter of practice, lower courts tend to follow decisions of higher courts. As one commentator has stated:

> ... it is hardly an exaggeration to say that the doctrine of stare decisis in the Common Law and the practice of Continental courts generally lead to the same results... In fact, when a judge can find in one or more decisions of a supreme court a rule which seems to him relevant for the decision in the case before him, he will follow those decisions and the rules they contain as much in Germany as in England or France.[250]

113. The Appeals Chamber considers that a proper construction of the Statute requires that the ratio decidendi of its decisions is binding on Trial Chambers for the following reasons:

(i) the Statute establishes a hierarchical structure in which the Appeals Chamber is given the function of settling definitively certain questions of law and fact arising from

2. Appellant's Response

160. The Appellant did not contest the argument of the Prosecution that, in the indictment, it had alleged his individual responsibility by aiding and abetting the mistreatment of the prisoners by the HVO soldiers outside the prison. He asserted, however, that it had not been proved that he had any connection with, or the possibility to control, the HVO soldiers (as their military commander or otherwise) or that he knew that they were going to mistreat the prisoners.[290] He also sought to argue that it had not been proved that the prisoners had been used as human shields, only that there had merely been an attempt to do so.[291] However, the finding by the Trial Chamber that the prisoners had been used as human shields was not challenged by him in his appeal.

3. Cross-Appellant's Reply

161. The Prosecution interpreted the Appellant's Response as asserting that, in the case of aiding and abetting, the mens rea of the accessory has to be the same as that of the principal.[292] The Appellant, however, has asserted no more than that the accessory must have known all the essential ingredients of the crime to be committed.[293] The Prosecution also denied that it was necessary for it to establish the Appellant had any connection with, or form of control over, the HVO soldiers who mistreated the prisoners when demonstrating his individual responsibility under Article 7(1) for their acts.

B. Discussion

162. The liability of a person charged with aiding and abetting another person in the commission of a crime was extensively considered by Trial Chamber II in the Furundžija Judgement.[294] It stated the following conclusions:[295]

[288] See para. 168, infra.

[294] Furund`ija Judgement, paras. 190-249.
[295] Ibid., para. 249.

(i) It must be shown that the aider and abettor carried out acts which consisted of practical assistance, encouragement or moral support which had a substantial effect upon the commission by the principal of the crime for which the aider and abettor is sought to be made responsible.

(ii) It must be shown that the aider and abettor knew (in the sense of was aware) that his own acts assisted in the commission of that crime by the principal.

The Trial Chamber had earlier stated the conclusion that it is not necessary to show that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea of the principal, but it must be shown that the aider and abettor was aware of the relevant mens rea on the part of the principal.[296] It is clear that what must be shown is that the aider and abettor was aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal.

163. Subsequently, in the Tadic Judgement, the Appeals Chamber briefly considered the liability of one person for the acts of another person where the first person has been charged with aiding and abetting that other person in the commission of a crime.[297] This was in the context of contrasting that liability with the liability of a person charged with acting pursuant to a common purpose or design with another person to commit a crime, and for that reason that judgement does not purport to be a complete statement of the liability of the person charged with aiding and abetting. It made the following points in relation to the aider and abettor:[298]

(i) The aider and abettor is always an accessory to the crime committed by the other person, the principal.

(ii) It must be shown that the aider and abettor carried out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the specific crime committed by the principal, and that this support has a substantial effect upon the commission of the crime.

(iii) It must be shown that the aider and abettor knew that his own acts assisted the commission of that specific crime by the principal.

(iv) It is not necessary to show the existence of a common concerted plan between the principal and the accessory.

[298] Tadi} Judgement, para. 229.

D. Discussion

182. The nub of the Prosecutor's appeal is to be found in the third ground as summarised above, namely the weight to be given to the gravity of the Appellant's conduct. Consideration of the gravity of the conduct of the accused is normally the starting point for consideration of an appropriate sentence. The practice of the International Tribunal provides no exception. The Statute provides that in imposing sentence the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence.[348] This has been followed by Trial Chambers. Thus, in the ^elebi}i Judgement, the Trial Chamber said that "[t]he most important consideration, which may be regarded as the litmus test for the appropriate sentence, is the gravity of the offence".[349] In the Kupreški} Judgement, the Trial Chamber stated that "[t]he sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime".[350] The Appeals Chamber endorses these statements.

183. The Appeals Chamber accepts the Prosecution argument in this connection and holds that the Trial Chamber erred in not having sufficient regard to the gravity of the conduct of the Appellant. His offences were not trivial. As warden of a prison he took part in violence against the inmates. The Trial Chamber recognised the seriousness of these offences but stated that his participation was relatively limited. In fact, his superior responsibility as a warden seriously aggravated the Appellant's offences. Instead of preventing it, he involved himself in violence against those whom he should have been protecting, and allowed them to be subjected to psychological terror. He also failed to punish those responsible. Most seriously, the Appellant, by participating in the selection of detainees to be used as human shields and for trench digging, as he must have known, was putting at risk the lives of those entrusted to his custody. Thus, the instant case is one of a prison warden who personally participated in physical violence against detainees when, by virtue of his rank, he should have taken steps to prevent or punish it. The Appellant did more than merely tolerate the crimes as a commander; with his direct participation he provided additional encouragement to his subordinates to commit similar acts. The combination of these factors should, therefore, have resulted in a longer sentence and should certainly not have provided grounds for mitigation.

II. STANDARD OF APPELLATE REVIEW

6. On appeal, the parties must limit their arguments to errors of law that invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and to errors of fact that result in a miscarriage of justice. These criteria are set forth in Article 25 of the Statute and are well established.[14] The Appeals Chamber also exceptionally hears arguments where a party has raised a legal issue that would not lead to the invalidation of the judgement but that is of general significance to the International Tribunal's jurisprudence.[15]

7. Any party alleging an error of law must identify the alleged error, present arguments in support of its claim, and explain how the error invalidates the decision.[16] An allegation of an error of law which has no chance of changing the outcome of a decision may be rejected on that ground.[17] However, even if the party's arguments are insufficient to support the contention of an error, the Appeals Chamber may find, for other reasons, that there is an error of law.[18]

8. The Appeals Chamber reviews the Trial Chamber's impugned findings of law to determine whether or not they are correct.[19] Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the trial judgement arising from the application of an incorrect legal standard, the Appeals Chamber may articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly.[20] In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record, where necessary, and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual findings challenged by the appellant before affirming them.[21]

9. When considering an alleged error of fact with respect to a particular ground where no additional evidence has been admitted on appeal, the Appeals Chamber will apply a standard of

G. Alleged Errors relating to Aiding and Abetting (Ground 7)

125. The Trial Chamber determined that Blagojević permitted the use of the Bratunac Brigade's resources, including personnel, to facilitate the commission of the crimes for which he was convicted.[338] The Trial Chamber considered that aiding and abetting constituted the most appropriate form of participation under Article 7(1) of the Statute to describe his criminal responsibility.[339] Under this ground of appeal, Blagojević raises four errors of law and fact in connection with his conviction for aiding and abetting, including an alleged legal error in the definition of aiding and abetting and alleged factual errors related to his knowledge of the underlying crimes, whether he made Bratunac Brigade resources available, and whether this constituted substantial assistance.[340]

1. Alleged Error in Defining Aiding and Abetting

126. Initially, Blagojević submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in setting forth the elements of aiding and abetting.[341]

127. The Appeals Chamber has explained that an aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage, or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime, which have a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.[342] The actus reus need not serve as condition precedent for the crime and may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated.[343] The Appeals Chamber has also determined that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may be satisfied by a commander permitting the use of resources under his or her control, including personnel, to facilitate the perpetration of a crime.[344] The requisite mental element of aiding and abetting is knowledge that the acts performed assist the commission of the specific crime of the principal perpetrator.[345] In cases of specific intent crimes such as persecutions or genocide, the aider and abettor must know of the principal perpetrator's specific intent.[346]

VRS Main Staff.[354] He notes that his criminal liability is almost exclusively predicated on their conduct over which he claims to have had no control.[355] Blagojević further challenges the Trial Chamber's findings concerning the role played by elements of the Bratunac Brigade other than the military police by describing it as inconsequential, noting that only a few brigade members were spotted in Potočari and Bratunac town and that they were likely there of their own volition or functioning under a separate, civilian chain of command.[356]

131. A review of the Trial Judgement reveals that the Trial Chamber concluded that Blagojević permitted members of the Bratunac Brigade Military Police to participate in the separations of Bosnian Muslim men from the women, children, and elderly in Potočari on 12 and 13 July 1995 and in the subsequent transfer from the Srebrenica enclave of the women, children, and the elderly as well as in guarding the Bosnian Muslim men detained in Bratunac town from 12 to 14 July 1995.[357] The Appeals Chamber has already addressed and rejected Blagojević's arguments on the Trial Chamber's findings that he had authority over the Bratunac Brigade Military Police and has further noted that his liability is not predicated on the actions of Momir Nikolić.[358] Moreover, the Trial Chamber also concluded that members of the Bratunac Brigade's Second Battalion and Third Artillery Group played a role in shelling and shooting around civilians en route to Potočari on 11 July 1995, in patrolling the area in and around Potočari on 12 and 13 July 1995, and in assisting in the transfer operation.[359] The Trial Chamber further concluded that Blagojević had command and control over these elements.[360] Blagojević does not dispute in any detail the role played by these additional elements of the Bratunac Brigade other than offering an alternative basis for their participation which is unsupported by any reference to the trial record. This is insufficient to call into question the reasonableness of the Trial Chamber's findings that Blagojević permitted these brigade resources to facilitate the commission of the crimes.

4. Alleged Error in Finding that Blagojević and the Bratunac Brigade Substantially Contributed to the Crimes

132. Blagojević submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact in finding that any act of the Bratunac Brigade substantially contributed to the crimes.[361] A review of the Trial Judgement reveals that the Trial Chamber based Blagojević's criminal responsibility on permitting Bratunac referenced statement in relation to the aider and abettor carrying out acts which are specifically directed to assist.[492]

187. In the Blaškić Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber considered whether the actus reus of aiding and abetting requires causation between the act of the accused and the act of the principal, or in other words, whether the contribution "must have a direct and important impact on the commission of the crime."[493] The Appeals Chamber found that "proof of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime, or proof that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime, is not required."[494] However, the Appeals Chamber reiterated that one of the requirements for the actus reus of aiding and abetting is that the support of the aider and abettor have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[495]

188. In reaching this conclusion, in the Blaškić Appeal Judgement the Appeals Chamber referenced the definition of aiding and abetting in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement, which is identical to that set out in the Tadić Appeal Judgement, and which, in specifying that the assistance given by an aider and abettor must be specifically directed, also contrasted aiding and abetting liability with that of joint criminal enterprise.[496] However, in the Blaškić Appeal Judgement the Appeals Chamber also found that the Trial Chamber correctly held that the standard for the actus reus was that set out in the Furundžija Trial Judgement: "consist[ing] of practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[497]

189. The Appeals Chamber observes that while the Tadić definition has not been explicitly departed from, specific direction has not always been included as an element of the actus reus of aiding and abetting.[498] This may be explained by the fact that such a finding will often be implicit in the finding that the accused has provided practical assistance to the principal perpetrator which had a substantial effect on the commission of the crime. The Appeals Chamber also considers that, to the extent specific direction forms an implicit part of the actus reus of aiding and abetting, where the accused knowingly participated in the commission of an offence and his or her participation substantially affected the commission of that offence, the fact that his or her participation amounted to no more than his or her "routine duties" will not exculpate the accused.

190. Jokić seeks to rely on the statement of the Appeals Chamber in the Čelebići Appeal Judgement that it "would not accept that the circumstance alone of holding a position as a guard somewhere within a camp in which civilians are unlawfully detained suffices to render that guard responsible for the crime of unlawful confinement of civilians."[499] On this basis, Jokić argues that "while the work of camp guards directly contributed to the unlawful confinement of prisoners within the camp, the Appeals Chamber accepted, as a matter of law, that such contribution alone was too insignificant or insubstantial to constitute aiding and abetting that crime."[500] From this, Jokić extrapolates that "where a person holds a position within an organized structure to which certain lawful duties attach, the mere performance by that person of their routine duties will not of itself constitute aiding and abetting crimes that may be committed by others within that organized structure."[501]

191. The Appeals Chamber considers it unreasonable to compare Jokić's position within the Zvornik Brigade to that of a camp guard in the Čelebići case. At issue in the Čelebići case was the ability of the accused, Zejnil Delalić and Hazim Delić, to affect the continued detention of the civilians in the camp.[502] The Appeals Chamber considers that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber in this case to find, with respect to the three execution sites, that Jokić's role, whether as duty officer or Chief of Engineering, went beyond that of merely relaying orders up and down the chain of command.[503] The Trial Chamber's findings make it clear that Jokić's ability to affect the commission of the crime was substantial. In particular, the Trial Chamber found that, while Jokić did not directly issue orders in his capacity as Chief of Engineering, he assisted in carrying out the orders of the Brigade Commander which were based on his advice and proposals.[504]

192. Finally, Jokić's attempt to ground his argument in its apparent consistency with the principle that a person convicted of aiding and abetting "is convicted of the crime itself, in the same way as the principal perpetrator who actually commits the crime"[505] and thus must be specifically directed, is fundamentally misguided. The Appeals Chamber recalls that Article 7(1) of the Statute deals not only with individual responsibility by way of direct or personal participation in the criminal act but because he lacked the requisite mens rea, the Trial Chamber did not convict Blagojević of aiding and abetting the mass executions.

218. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Blagojević did not know about the mass killings which occurred between 12 and 14 July 1995 and, consequently, erred in finding that he lacked the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting these crimes.[570] The Prosecution requests the Appeals Chamber to enter convictions for aiding and abetting murder and extermination, and for complicity in genocide on the basis of the mass executions.[571] First, the Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law by not applying the correct definition of the mens rea for aiding and abetting.[572] Second, according to the Prosecution, the Trial Chamber further erred in law in its application of the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt.[573] Third, the Prosecution contests a number of factual findings and alleges that no reasonable Trial Chamber could have concluded that Blagojević did not have knowledge of the mass killings.[574]

1. Alleged Error of Law in the Definition of the Mens Rea for Aiding and Abetting

219. The Prosecution alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in law in its approach to the "knowledge" component of the mens rea for aiding and abetting.[575] The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber required proof that Blagojević knew, "in the sense of virtual certainty", that the mass killings would be committed.[576] According to the Prosecution, however, "the mens rea for aiding and abetting is awareness of a probability that the crime will be committed and that, if the crime will be committed, the acts of the accused assist the crime."[577] In the Prosecution's view, if the Trial Chamber would have applied this standard, it would have convicted Blagojević for aiding and abetting the mass killings.

220. In support of its position concerning the mens rea of aiding and abetting, the Prosecution refers to the Blaškić Appeal Judgement, three trial judgements, and several national jurisdictions.[578] The Prosecution also argues that the standard for aiding and abetting should be consistent with other forms of liability under Article 7(1) of the Statute, including ordering, instigating, and planning, which, in its view, require only an awareness of the substantial likelihood that the crime will be committed.[579]

[570] Prosecution Appeal Brief, para. 2.3. The Prosecution submits that, for the purposes of this appeal, the relevant period for ascertaining Blagojević's knowledge is 12-14 July 1995, the period when he rendered practical assistance to the murder operation, but that, if he is found to have the requisite knowledge when he rendered assistance at that time, the Appeals Chamber should hold him responsible for all mass killings from 12 July through 17 July 1995. Prosecution Appeal Brief, para. 2.62.

221. In describing the applicable law for aiding and abetting, the Trial Chamber restated the formulation of the mens rea for aiding and abetting found in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement:

> [I]t is not required that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea required for the crime; it is sufficient that the aider and abettor had knowledge that his or her own acts assisted in the commission of the specific crime by the principal offender. The aider and abettor must also be aware of the "essential elements" of the crime committed by the principal offender, including the state of mind of the principal offender.[580]

The Appeals Chamber has applied this formulation consistently in its judgements.[581] Consequently, the Appeals Chamber finds no legal error on the part of the Trial Chamber in this regard.

222. The Prosecution faults the Trial Chamber for not recalling the following additional language from the Blaškić Appeal Judgement and applying it in this case:

> The Trial Chamber agreed with the statement in the Furundžija Trial Judgement that "it is not necessary that the aider and abettor [...] know the precise crime that was intended and which in the event was committed. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor." The Appeals Chamber concurs with this conclusion.[582]

The Appeals Chamber, however, recalls its position from the Blaškić Appeal Judgement that there are no reasons to depart from the definition of mens rea of aiding and abetting found in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement.[583] The Blaškić Appeal Judgement did not extend the definition of mens rea of aiding and abetting.

223. The Prosecution also points to the Trial Chamber's statement that it had reasonable doubt that Blagojević "knew" that his acts furthered the mass killing operation,[584] suggesting that this indicates that the Trial Chamber examined the evidence to determine whether Blagojević knew that the mass killings were a virtual certainty. The Appeals Chamber, however, can identify no error on the part of the Trial Chamber based on the use of this formulation. The Appeals Chamber has employed the same formulation in its examination of the mens rea of aiding and abetting in other cases.[585] Moreover, the Appeals Chamber observes that the Trial Chamber's reasonable doubt as to Blagojević's knowledge of the impending murder operation arose out of the equally plausible inference that "he saw [the detention and capture of Bosnian Muslim men] as further steps in transporting the Bosnian Muslim population out of Serb-held territory".[586] In this respect, the Trial Chamber also noted throughout the Trial Judgement that Bosnian Muslim men, who were captured, were told that they would be exchanged.[587] It is also telling that the Trial Chamber accepted as credible testimony from a former Bratunac Brigade officer who stated that he did not assist a particular detainee who was taken to the Vuk Karadžić School and later killed because he thought that the detainee was going to be exchanged.[588] Thus, the Trial Chamber did not decline to find that Blagojević knew about the mass killing operation because he lacked certainty, but because it could not rule out the equally reasonable inference that he thought that his acts were directed towards another goal. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber did not err in its formulation of the mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting, and the Appeals Chamber dismisses this sub-ground of appeal.

2. Alleged Error of Law in the Application of the Standard of Proof Beyond Reasonable Doubt

224. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in its application of the standard of proof. Specifically, the Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber applied the standard of proof in a two-stage process, first to the individual strands of evidence and then to the issue of mens rea, rather than reserving the application of the standard to the ultimate conclusion of guilt.[589] The Prosecution argues that this approach led the Trial Chamber to consider the evidence "piecemeal", failing to consider all of the established facts as a coherent whole in assessing Blagojević's mens rea for the mass killings.[590]

225. In particular, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber failed to incorporate the following findings into its analysis of Blagojević's knowledge of the mass killings: (1) Blagojević's knowledge of the killings in Bratunac town on the nights of 12 and 13 July 1995 and the assistance provided by the Bratunac Brigade units in those killings;[591] (2) the vastness of the murder operation, involving many elements of VRS and MUP forces and occurring in many towns in a geographically small area, including Potočari, Jadar River, Kravica Warehouse, and Tišca;[592] (3) Blagojević's knowledge of his units' participation in the separation and transport of Muslims from Potočari, in

294. With respect to the executions at the Kravica Warehouse, the Trial Chamber found that on the evening of 13 July 1995, approximately 1,000 Bosnian Muslim men were executed in a warehouse in Kravica.[791] The Prosecution emphasizes the Trial Chamber's finding in paragraph 497 that some members of the Bratunac Brigade were "around the Kravica Warehouse around the time that the mass executions took place".[792] The Prosecution argues that these facts lead to only one reasonable conclusion: Blagojević's subordinates knew from this event forward that Bosnian Muslim men would be channelled into a murder operation.[793]

295. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber found the evidence insufficient to conclude that members of the Bratunac Brigade participated in the killing at Kravica Warehouse.[794] Moreover, the Trial Chamber noted that "evidence as to the presence of members of the Bratunac Brigade members [sic] at the Kravica Warehouse is limited"[795] and refused to conclusively determine that Bratunac Brigade members were present "when the mass executions were carried out".[796] Reading these findings together, the time-frame described in paragraph 497 of the Trial Judgement – "around the time the mass executions took place" – is properly interpreted to extend to periods beyond the precise moment the killings took place.[797] Such an interpretation, coupled with an absence of facts demonstrating that Bratunac Brigade members offered assistance to the executions as they occurred,[798] negates the finding that Bratunac Brigade members rendered practical assistance to these particular killings as they happened. Moreover, the Prosecution submissions fail to demonstrate that any assistance rendered by Bratunac Brigade members prior to or contemporaneously with the killings was done with knowledge that executions would occur at the Kravica Warehouse or elsewhere.[799] In light of the Trial Chamber's findings, the Appeals Chamber finds no error in the Trial Chamber's refusal to ground superior liability pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute on the Kravica Warehouse killings.[800]

724. As will be discussed below and recalling that joint criminal enterprise is a form of "commission", the Trial Chamber finds that the appropriate form of liability to describe Dragan Jokić's participation in these crimes is aiding and abetting.

725. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber finds that Dragan Jokić did not commit murder, extermination or persecutions as part of a joint criminal enterprise.

2. Aiding and Abetting

(a) Applicable Law

726. The Trial Chamber finds that the actus reus for 'aiding and abetting' is that the accused carried out an act which consisted of practical assistance, encouragement or moral support to the principal.[2175] The criminal act of the principal for which the aider and abettor is responsible must be established.[2176] The assistance need not have caused the act of the principal, but it must have had a "substantial effect" on the commission of the crime.[2177] The assistance may be provided by either an act or by an omission,[2178] and it may occur before, during or after the act of the principal.[2179]

727. For aiding and abetting, it is not required that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea required for the crime; it is sufficient that the aider and abettor had knowledge that his or her own acts assisted in the commission of the specific crime by the principal offender.[2180] The aider and abettor must also be aware of the "essential elements" of the crime committed by the principal offender, including the state of mind of the principal offender.[2181]

41. Having examined the approaches of national systems as well as International Tribunal precedents, the Appeals Chamber considers that none of the Trial Chamber's above articulations of the mens rea for ordering under Article 7(1) of the Statute, in relation to a culpable mental state that is lower than direct intent, is correct. The knowledge of any kind of risk, however low, does not suffice for the imposition of criminal responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law. The Trial Chamber does not specify what degree of risk must be proven. Indeed, it appears that under the Trial Chamber's standard, any military commander who issues an order would be criminally responsible, because there is always a possibility that violations could occur. The Appeals Chamber considers that an awareness of a higher likelihood of risk and a volitional element must be incorporated in the legal standard.

42. The Appeals Chamber therefore holds that a person who orders an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that order, has the requisite mens rea for establishing liability under Article 7(1) pursuant to ordering. Ordering with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting that crime.[76]

2. Aiding and Abetting

43. The Appellant submits that liability for aiding and abetting requires, at a minimum, actual knowledge.[77] He submits that not only must the aider and abettor know that his acts provide support to another person's offence, but he must also know the specifics of that offence. Recklessness or negligence on his part is not sufficient, he asserts, contrary to the Trial Chamber's alleged finding on that point.[78] Furthermore, the Appellant submits that the actus reus of aiding and abetting includes a causation requirement which the Trial Chamber failed to acknowledge and to apply.[79] In other words, the contribution must "have a direct and important impact on the commission of the crime."[80] Instead, the Appellant maintains, the Trial Chamber erroneously applied a strict liability standard to find the Appellant guilty as an aider and abettor and reiterates that the Trial Chamber's conclusion that "he could be found guilty if he accepted the possibility that some unspecified crime was a 'possible or foreseeable consequence' of military action effectively eliminates the 'actual knowledge' mens rea of aiding and abetting, and is thus erroneous as a matter

[76] The French translation of this legal standard reads as follows:
> Quiconque ordonne un acte ou une omission en ayant conscience de la réelle probabilité qu'un crime soit commis au cours de l'exécution de cet ordre possède la mens rea requise pour établir la responsabilité aux termes de l'article 7 alinéa 1 pour avoir ordonné. Le fait d'ordonner avec une telle conscience doit être considéré comme l'acceptation dudit crime.

of law."[81] He states that this standard was set out at the beginning of the Trial Judgement and pervades the entire analysis that followed.[82]

44. The Prosecution submits that the Appellant's claim that the mens rea adopted by the Trial Chamber in relation to aiding and abetting — "possible and foreseeable consequence of the conduct" — was too low is unsupported by any "standard" or authority. Nor did the Appellant, according to the Prosecution, indicate any instance where the application of such a standard would have impacted upon his conviction thereby possibly enabling him to claim prejudice.[83] The Prosecution further submits that the Trial Chamber did not apply a negligence standard in the instant case but that, if it had, it would have been completely appropriate to do so.[84] Finally, the Prosecution rejects the Appellant's unsupported assertion that aiding and abetting liability requires an element of causation between the act of the accused and the act of the principal.[85]

45. In Vasiljević, the Appeals Chamber set out the actus reus and mens rea of aiding and abetting. It stated:

> (i) The aider and abettor carries out acts specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a certain specific crime (murder, extermination, rape, torture, wanton destruction of civilian property, etc.), and this support has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. [...]
>
> (ii) In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist [in] the commission of the specific crime of the principal. [...][86]

The Appeals Chamber considers that there are no reasons to depart from this definition.

46. In this case, the Trial Chamber, following the standard set out in Furundžija, held that the actus reus of aiding and abetting "consists of practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime."[87] It further stated that the mens rea required is "the knowledge that these acts assist the commission of the offense."[88] The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber was correct in so holding.

47. The Trial Chamber further stated that the actus reus of aiding and abetting may be perpetrated through an omission, "provided this failure to act had a decisive effect on the commission of the crime and that it was coupled with the requisite mens rea."[89] It considered:

> In this respect, the mere presence at the crime scene of a person with superior authority, such as a military commander, is a probative indication for determining whether that person encouraged or supported the perpetrators of the crime.[90]

The Appeals Chamber leaves open the possibility that in the circumstances of a given case, an omission may constitute the actus reus of aiding and abetting.

48. The Trial Chamber in this case went on to state:

> Proof that the conduct of the aider and abettor had a causal effect on the act of the principal perpetrator is not required. Furthermore, participation may occur before, during or after the act is committed and be geographically separated therefrom.[91]

The Appeals Chamber reiterates that one of the requirements of the actus reus of aiding and abetting is that the support of the aider and abettor has a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime. In this regard, it agrees with the Trial Chamber that proof of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime, or proof that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime, is not required. It further agrees that the actus reus of aiding and abetting a crime may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated, and that the location at which the actus reus takes place may be removed from the location of the principal crime.

49. In relation to the mens rea of an aider and abettor, the Trial Chamber held that "in addition to knowledge that his acts assist the commission of the crime, the aider and abettor needs to have intended to provide assistance, or as a minimum, accepted that such assistance would be a possible and foreseeable consequence of his conduct."[92] However, as previously stated in the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement, knowledge on the part of the aider and abettor that his acts assist in the commission of the principal perpetrator's crime suffices for the mens rea requirement of this mode of participation.[93] In this respect, the Trial Chamber erred.

50. The Trial Chamber agreed with the statement in the Furundžija Trial Judgement that "it is not necessary that the aider and abettor...know the precise crime that was intended and which in the event was committed. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor."[94] The Appeals Chamber concurs with this conclusion.

51. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber was correct in part and erred in part in setting out the legal requirements of aiding and abetting.

52. The Appeals Chamber notes that in this case, the Trial Chamber did not hold the Appellant responsible for aiding and abetting the crimes at issue. In addition, the Appeals Chamber considers that this form of participation was insufficiently litigated on appeal.[95] Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that this form of participation was fairly encompassed by the Indictment.[96] In these circumstances, the Appeals Chamber declines to consider this form of participation any further.

B. Command Responsibilty under Article 7(3) of the Statute

53. In this section,[97] the Appeals Chamber will only address alleged legal errors concerning Article 7(3) of the Statute, and will leave contentions raised by the Appellant in his second ground of appeal, concerning whether the facts of the case support a finding that the Appellant had effective control in the Central Bosnia Operative Zone (CBOZ), to the parts of the Judgement where the factual grounds of appeal are considered.

1. Actual knowledge of a superior

54. The Appellant claims that the mens rea under Article 7(3) of the Statute is actual knowledge or "information which, if at hand, would oblige the commander to conduct further inquiry."[98] Regarding actual knowledge, the Appellant submits that it requires more than proof of a person's rank as a military commander, and that the Trial Chamber failed to look beyond the Appellant's status to establish his knowledge, thus relying "almost exclusively" on the Appellant's rank and status. This, the Appellant contends, is an unacceptable form of strict liability which in effect shifts the burden of proof.[99]

55. The Prosecution responds that the Appellant has failed to make a single reference to any paragraph of the Trial Judgement that would lend credence to this allegation. On the contrary, it

[95] It was discussed primarily as an error of law in the parties' briefs, and there was no discussion concerning aiding and abetting during the appeal hearing. Compare Krstić Appeal Judgement, p. 47, n. 228; Vasiljević Appeal Judgement, para. 133.
[96] See below Chapter VI (A); compare Krstić Appeal Judgement, para. 137.
[97] In this Judgement, the expressions "command responsibility" and "superior responsibility" are synonymous.
[98] Appellant's Brief, p. 136.

67. The Appeals Chamber takes note that the Trial Chamber concurred with the Čelebići Trial Judgement, which endorsed the view that a superior must have effective control over "the persons committing the underlying violations of international humanitarian law."[128] The Trial Chamber also stated that "a commander may incur criminal responsibility for crimes committed by persons who are not formally his (direct) subordinates, insofar as he exercises effective control over them."[129] Both conclusions of the Trial Chamber fall within the terms of Article 7(3) of the Statute, and both are not challenged by the Appellant.

68. With regard to the position of the Trial Chamber that superior responsibility "may entail" the submission of reports to the competent authorities,[130] the Appeals Chamber deems this to be correct. The Trial Chamber only referred to the action of submitting reports as an example of the exercise of the material ability possessed by a superior.

69. The Appeals Chamber also notes that the duty of commanders to report to competent authorities is specifically provided for under Article 87(1) of Additional Protocol I, and that the duty may also be deduced from the provision of Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I.[131] The Appeals Chamber also notes the Appellant's argument that to establish that effective control existed at the time of the commission of subordinates' crimes, proof is required that the accused was not only able to issue orders but that the orders were actually followed. The Appeals Chamber considers that this provides another example of effective control exercised by the commander. The indicators of effective control are more a matter of evidence than of substantive law,[132] and those indicators are limited to showing that the accused had the power to prevent, punish, or initiate measures leading to proceedings against the alleged perpetrators where appropriate.[133] The appeal in this regard is therefore rejected.

May and 1 June 1996.[561] The statement was admitted as Exhibit H1 during the evidentiary portion of the hearing.[562] After consulting with one of the investigators who took the statement, Counsel for the Prosecution clarified that a copy of his statement was never provided to Witness Watkins,[563] because it was the policy of the Office of the Prosecutor in 1996 not to provide any witnesses with any copies of any statements due to a concern at that time about the witnesses handing around their statements, primarily in the former Yugoslavia.[564]

278. The Prosecution stated that it intended to make submissions the week thereafter on whether an inference could be drawn from its refusal to provide a copy of his statement to Witness Watkins, that the Prosecution was deliberately trying to suppress exculpatory evidence.[565] Counsel for the Prosecution argued that evidence regarding the fact that, when allowing the Convoy of Joy to pass through a checkpoint, the Military Police would only respond to Kordić's orders, was also provided by Witness Duncan who testified at the Appellant's trial and was in the Convoy of Joy with Witness Watkins, and thus the same evidence contained in Exhibit H1 was before the Trial Chamber.[566]

279. In reply, Counsel for the Appellant submitted that the policy of the Office of the Prosecutor not to provide witness statements was an issue concerning which an oral stipulation could be entered.[567] However, he stressed that the real issue was not whether Witness Watkins got a copy of his statement, but rather that the Appellant "was never given information about Kordić controlling the Jokers...despite the obvious relevance that this would have had to [the Appellant's] case," and he added that he would litigate this issue in final argument.[568] Counsel for the Appellant further argued that since Witness Watkins is a military expert, his evidence is neutral and more relevant, and noted that Exhibit H1 contains information concerning command and control problems within the HVO, and the existence of isolated pockets.[569] With respect to the testimony of Witness Duncan, Counsel for the Appellant noted that the former did not identify the Military Police "as the problem with the Convoy of Joy," and did not testify that Kordić controlled the Jokers.[570]

280. The Appeals Chamber notes that contrary to the Prosecution's assertion, the evidence provided by Witness Watkins to the effect that the Military Police would only respond to Kordić's orders was not provided by Witness Duncan, and thus, the same evidence contained in Exhibit H1

C. The Appellant's Responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute

1. The Appellant's Role in the Prevention of Crimes

(a) The Appellant's orders to ensure compliance with humanitarian law

482. The Appellant submits that he issued dozens of humanitarian orders directing troops both within and outside his chain of command to respect civilians' rights and to protect their property, both prior to, and subsequent to, the hostilities in Vitez in April 1993.[987]

483. The Prosecution submits that the Appellant issued "preventive" orders after the 16 and 18 April attacks on Stari Vitez and that he never enforced the orders or punish anyone who violated them.[988]

484. The Appeals Chamber recalls that under Article 7(3) of the Statute, effective control means the possession by the superior or commander of the material ability to prevent and punish the commission of crimes subject to the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal.[989] The Appeals Chamber also recalls that to establish superior responsibility, three elements of that responsibility must be proved beyond reasonable doubt: the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship; the fact that the superior knew or had reason to know that the criminal act was about to be or had been committed; and the fact that the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or punish the perpetrator thereof.[990]

485. As the Appellant has conceded, he had de jure command over regular HVO units in the CBOZ,[991] sometimes with special units such as the Vitezovi attached to his command.[992] His authority entitled him to issue orders, including the humanitarian ones referred to above. However, the Appeals Chamber considers that the issuing of humanitarian orders does not by itself establish that the Appellant had effective control over the troops that received the orders.

486. While the humanitarian orders referred to by the Appellant may show that he was not a person prone to issuing illegal orders in the conflict in Central Bosnia in 1993, they are not relevant to the issue of his liability, if any, under Article 7(3) of the Statute, unless the reference to them is premised on the fact that he knew or had reason to know that his subordinates were about to commit crimes subject to the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal.

(b) The gravity of the offence

683. Article 24(2) of the Statute provides that the Trial Chambers shall consider the gravity of the offence when imposing sentences. The gravity of the offence is the primary consideration in imposing a sentence[1439] and is the "litmus test" in the determination of an appropriate sentence.[1440] The Appeals Chamber has ruled that sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity or totality of the criminal conduct of the accused, the determination of which requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime.[1441] Factors to be considered include the discriminatory nature of the crimes where this is not considered as an element of a conviction,[1442] and the vulnerability of the victims.[1443] The consequences of the crime upon the victim directly injured is always relevant to sentencing, that is, "the extent of the long-term physical, psychological and emotional suffering of the immediate victims is relevant to the gravity of the offences."[1444] Furthermore, the effects of the crime on relatives of the immediate victims may be considered as relevant to the culpability of the offender and in determining a sentence.[1445]

684. In this case, the Appellant has been found guilty of particular instances of ordering what amounted to cruel and inhuman treatment of persons who were not participating in the hostilities, and of failing to punish such conduct on the part of others. The crimes of which the Appellant has been convicted are serious violations of international humanitarian law, directed almost exclusively orders to support the action, to which Johan Tarčulovski replied that there would be orders from the President or "the persons around him".[525]

E. Were the events in Ljuboten justified by military necessity?

132. It is the position of the Defence that individuals from Ljuboten participated in placing the land mine that killed eight Macedonian soldiers on 10 August, that there was an NLA presence in Ljuboten on the weekend of 10-12 August,[526] and that Ljuboten was used as a logistics base by the NLA as early as February of 2001.[527] It is argued that there was a legitimate reason for the security forces to enter the village,[528] and that the purpose of the operation was to search for NLA members in the village to prevent further attacks.[529] It is further submitted that on 12 August, there were a number of NLA positions within Ljuboten from which the army and in some cases the police, received fire on 12 August 2001.[530] It is the position of the Defence that Ljuboten was a legitimate military target,[531] that the operation was limited to those areas and houses where members of the NLA were believed to be located,[532] and that fire upon these locations was justified by military necessity.[533]

133. The Prosecution argues that Ljuboten was not an NLA stronghold, and it was not used as an NLA logistics base.[534] It is argued that while the NLA may have enjoyed support in the village, it was not "full of NLA fighters" on 12 August.[535] The Chamber also notes in this context the assertion or admission in the Indictment that there were, on 12 August, about 10-15 "armed Albanian combatants" present in Ljuboten, armed with automatic weapons and at least one machine-gun.[536] Finally, the Prosecution submits that the destruction that occurred in Ljuboten was not justified by military necessity.[537]

134. The Chamber observes that the Defence has, in support of a number of its assertions on the issue of NLA membership of specific persons and NLA and logistical support, relied heavily and sometimes exclusively on Security and Counter-Intelligence Division (UBK) operative interviews and reports of which the sources are anonymous, and the content is unverified. A number of such interviews and reports came into existence months after the events in Ljuboten.[538] In the absence of independent confirmation, the Chamber is unable to rely on these documents for the truth of their content. Equally, in light of evidence to the contrary, the Chamber is not persuaded that it can attach significant weight to the suspiciously almost uniform evidence of Ljuboten residents that no individuals from Ljuboten participated in the land mine incident,[539] that none of the villagers were NLA members,[540] that there was no NLA presence in Ljuboten on the weekend of 10-12 August,[541] and denying that there was any form of logistical support to the NLA from within Ljuboten.[542] In these circumstances, while recognizing that a credible source is not ipso facto reliable, the Chamber has been assisted in many matters by the evidence provided by more neutral sources. However, in this respect the Chamber must observe that it approaches with care the evidence provided by Peter Bouckaert, a senior researcher for Human Rights Watch ("HRW"). His observations of the village were made 11 days after the events. Further, the HRW report on the relevant events in Ljuboten,[543] to which he was the main contributor, and which is a cornerstone of his evidence, is sourced primarily by unchallenged accounts of ethnic Albanian residents from Ljuboten which have not been tested against the other differing accounts which the Chamber has heard.[544]

135. It is also noted that the evidence regarding NLA presence in Ljuboten and the question of whether Ljuboten was a logistics base often refers to "terrorists", armed groups, or persons wearing black clothes, without using the term "NLA" as such.[545] In many cases this is merely a matter of terminology and no distinction is intended. However, this distinction in terminology touches upon an issue mentioned later in the Judgement, whether, during the situation in FYROM in 2001, there were a number of ethnic Albanian armed groups involved in fighting the police and army.[546] that the Brigade staff was formed in only two or three days, although the process of formation of the Brigade was much more prolonged and indeed continued throughout the conflict.[1126] He denied that the 114th Brigade carried out joint operations with the 113th NLA Brigade, but accepted that the two Brigades coordinated their activities as far as the front line was concerned,[1127] whereas other evidence indicates the 114th Brigade may have been under the command of the 113th Brigade while it was in the process of formation.[1128]

259. The Chamber has difficulty fully accepting the evidence of Mr Bushi in many respects. His evidence regarding the number of members in his Brigade is in sharp contrast with other evidence received in the trial,[1129] which the Chamber accepts as more reliable. Despite his role as the "commander of the 114th Brigade", Mr Bushi did not know how much ammunition and arms were required for this Brigade.[1130] He did not know the number of members the NLA had at the time and his estimates varied from 5,000 to 6,000 to 4,000.[1131] He repeatedly stated that his Brigade implemented NLA regulations[1132] (to be discussed in more detail below) whereas Gzim Ostreni testified that these were implemented only gradually according to the needs of each Brigade.[1133] Further, at the material time, the zone of responsibility of the 114th Brigade which Nazim Bushi said he commanded included Skopje and its outskirts,[1134] thus also the village of Ljuboten.[1135] Nazim Bushi's consistent denial of NLA presence and activities in and around Ljuboten during the material time, which contradicts other evidence received in the trial, left the Chamber with the view that Mr Bushi had been prepared to diminish any role that NLA members may have played in these events. Considering all these factors the Chamber will treat the evidence of Nazim Bushi with considerable circumspection.

260. Franz-Josef Hutsch also gave evidence regarding the structure and the level of organisation of the NLA. As explained elsewhere in this Judgement the Chamber has not been able to accept the truth of the evidence of Mr Hutsch that he was in Ljuboten on 12 August 2001 and about his purported observations on that and the surrounding days.[1136] In addition to this major issue of credibility, Franz-Josef Hutsch's evidence regarding the structure and organisation of the NLA was based on information provided to him by Gzim Ostreni,[1137] as well as information obtained at press briefings with Ali Ahmeti, information from undisclosed confidential sources, and meeting(s) with Ali Ahmeti and another NLA figure named Dreni Korabu.[1138] In view of these matters the Chamber is unable to rely on this evidence of Mr Hutsch.

261. To establish the level of organisation of the NLA the Prosecution also seeks to rely on the evidence of Viktor Bezruchenko. The Defence challenges the credibility of this witness and submits in particular that he was seriously involved in the investigation and prosecution of this case, that he was chosen as an expert witness for the Prosecution because of his views regarding the situation, and that large parts of his evidence amount to nothing more than advocacy for the Prosecution.[1139] Viktor Bezruchenko, as noted, a military analyst with the Office of the Prosecutor, testified as an expert witness for the Prosecution. He gave evidence that he was tasked by the Prosecution to cover in his report the issues related to the conflict in Macedonia in 2001, among other issues. The Chamber accepts, however, that it is more accurately expressed that he had been asked to prove the existence of an armed conflict in Macedonia in 2001 in relation to a case before this Tribunal.[1140] While simultaneously undertaking that task, he had been present during witness interviews by the Prosecution and in some cases asked questions during these interviews on behalf of the Prosecution.[1141] When, in the process of conducting his analysis, Mr Bezruchenko felt that he needed certain documents, he and colleagues from the Office of the Prosecutor prepared specific requests for assistance directed to the Macedonian authorities.[1142] He was assisted by members of the Prosecution team.[1143] While aspects of Mr Bezruchenko's report and evidence have been of value to the Chamber, because of the matters summarised above, the Chamber is unable to accept with full confidence that Mr Bezruchenko's judgement and conclusions are formed with the independence and impartiality appropriate for an expert witness. The Chamber will, therefore, focus instead on, and examine, the sources Mr Bezruchenko relied on in preparation of his report, as well as the other evidence, to reach its conclusion.

262. One of the documents relied on in Mr Bezruchenko's report is Exhibit P485.[1144] The document is unsigned and undated; there is no indication as to which authority prepared it. The document includes charts depicting the structure of the NLA Brigades, lists of weapons allegedly in possession of the NLA, estimates as to the number of members of the NLA Brigades, lists of NLA leaders, lists of locations of alleged NLA training camps, and describes the NLA's goals, strategies, capabilities and weaknesses. There is no indication what the sources relied on in this document were or how the information there was collected. Viktor Bezruchenko believed that this document was prepared by the analytical section of the FYROM military intelligence in September 2001 on the basis of information collected by it.[1145] However, there is nothing in the document that could attribute it to this institution. In the absence of any evidence as to the author, date, and the nature of the information relied on in the document, the Chamber is unable to rely on this document.

263. Reliance was also placed on a document entitled the "Macedonia Briefing Pack".[1146] The part of this document which provides information about the NLA structure and its political and military leadership was prepared by Franz-Josef Hutsch on the basis of information he says he obtained from Gzim Ostreni, Ali Ahmeti, and sources whose identity Mr Hutsch refused to provide.[1147] In light of the view the Chamber has already expressed with respect to the evidence of Franz-Josef Hutsch and its reservations concerning Gzim Ostreni and Ali Ahmeti, the Chamber is unable to rely on this document without independent confirmation of its relevant content.

264. The Prosecution expert's report further cites documents produced by the MoI which are dated and titled, but unsigned.[1148] These reports are not in evidence and little is known as to how they were produced. The Chamber will rely on statements in the Prosecution expert's report based on such documents only to the extent that they are confirmed by other evidence. Further, reliance is placed on a book entitled the "War in Macedonia in 2001" published in FYROM by three high-ranking Macedonian military officials in 2006.[1149] The authors of this book did not give evidence in this trial. Their sources and the methodology used are unknown. Moreover, considering the political context in which this book was written and in particular that its authors were senior members of an institution itself heavily involved in the events in FYROM in 2001, the Chamber is unable to accept this document as an accurate and unbiased account in the absence of independent confirmation in other evidence.

265. The Prosecution expert's report also cites a number of unsigned and undated documents, which are not attributed to a specific agency or institution.[1150] These documents have not been admitted into evidence. The Chamber cannot give weight to them or to statements in the report which are supported by such documents.

266. With these considerations in mind the Chamber has reviewed the evidence and has been able to reach the following conclusions.

267. In June 2001 the NLA had approximately 2,000 to 2,500 fighters[1151] with some non-military support (food, lodging, transport, etc.) being provided by another 1,000.[1152] By August 2001 the NLA had four functioning, though not fully manned, Brigades – the 112th, 113th, 114th, and 115th – and two (the 111th and 116th Brigades) still in the process of becoming operational.[1153] The 112th Brigade operated in the area of Tetovo, the 113th in the Kumanovo area, the 114th in the Skopje area, and the 115th in the Raduša area.[1154]

268. Ali Ahmeti was the leader of the NLA. Although the manner in which he assumed this position was not fully verified in evidence,[1155] members of the NLA regarded him as the leader,[1156] as did members of the international community, as indicated by the fact that communications to the

(Gzim Ostreni, Exhibit P497; para 2; Nazim Bushi, T 5928). The Chamber also does not accept Viktor Bezruchenko's evidence that the NLA numerical strength as of May was around 2000 people (Viktor Bezruchenko, T 7094-7095), nor the post-war estimates by FYROM security experts of 8,000 NLA members cited in his report. 397. The perpetrators carrying out the actus reus of the crimes set out in the indictment do not have to be members of the JCE. What matters in such cases is whether the crime in question forms part of the common purpose[1577] and whether at least one member of the JCE used the perpetrator acting in accordance with the common plan.[1578] In this respect, when a member of the JCE uses a person outside the JCE to carry out the actus reus of a crime, the fact that this person knows of the existence of the JCE, i.e. of the common purpose, may be a factor taken into consideration when determining whether the crime forms part of the common criminal purpose.[1579] When the direct perpetrator commits a crime beyond the common purpose of the JCE, but which is its natural and foreseeable consequence[1580] the accused may be found responsible if he participated in the common criminal purpose with the requisite intent and if, in the circumstances of the case, (i) it was foreseeable that such a crime might be perpetrated by one or more of the persons used by him (or by any other member of the JCE) in order to carry out the actus reus of the crimes forming part of the common purpose; and (ii) the accused willingly took that risk – that is the accused, with the awareness that such a crime was a possible consequence of the implementation of that enterprise, decided to participate in that enterprise.[1581]

(b) Planning

398. The actus reus of "planning" requires that one or more persons plan or design, at both the preparatory and execution phases, the criminal conduct constituting one or more crimes, provided for in the Statute, which are later perpetrated.[1582] Such planning need only be a feature which contributes substantially to the criminal conduct.[1583] As regards the mens rea, the accused must have acted with an intent that the crime be committed, or with an awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that plan.[1584]

(c) Instigating

399. The term "instigating" has been defined to mean "prompting another to commit an offence."[1585] Both acts and omissions may constitute instigating, which covers express and implied not established that the police responsible for this cruel treatment then intended his death, nor did they act realising that his death was a probable consequence of their actions. It was different police, not under the authority or direction of Johan Tarčulovski, who further mistreated Atulla Qaili later at Mirkovci police station and whose conduct constitutes his murder, as set out earlier in this Judgement. It has not been established that Johan Tarčulovski is criminally responsible for their actions in murdering Atulla Qaili.

576. The circumstances that have been discussed and, in particular, the presence of Johan Tarčulovski as the leader of the police when the acts of murder, cruel treatment and wanton destruction were committed during the operation demonstrates, in the Chamber's finding, that acts of murder, cruel treatment and wanton destruction were intended by Johan Tarčulovski at the times relevant respectively to ordering, planning and instigating, or, alternatively, that the commission of crimes of this nature were foreseen, at these times, to be a substantial likelihood of the execution of the operation.

577. The elements necessary to constitute ordering, planning and instigating, for the purposes of Article 7(1) of the Statute have been set out earlier in this Judgement.[2052] Having regard to the matters discussed above, the Chamber finds that it has been established that the Accused Johan Tarčulovski is criminally responsible for ordering, planning and instigating some of the offences charged against him in the Indictment. These offences are:

- the murder of Rami Jusufi, Sulejman Bajrami and Muharem Ramadani;

- the wanton destruction of the houses or other property of Alim Duraki, Agim Jusufi, Qenan Jusufi, Sabit Jusufi, Xhevxhet Jusufovski, Abdullah Luftiu, Harun Rexhepi (Redžepi), Ismet Rexhepi (Rexhepovski), Nazim Murtezani, Qani Jashari, Afet Jashari and Ramush Jashari;

- the cruel treatment at Adem Ametovski's house of M012, Hamdi Ahmedovski, Adem Ametovski, Aziz Bajrami, M017, Nevaip Bajrami, Vehbi Bajrami, Atulla Qaili, Beqir Ramadani, Ismail Ramadani, Muharem Ramadani, Osman Ramadani, and Sulejman Bajrami and at Braca's house of M012, Hamdi Ahmedovski, Adem Ametovski, M017, Nevaip Bajrami, Vehbi Bajrami, Atulla Qaili, Beqir Ramadani, Ismail Ramadani, and Osman Ramadani.

The Accused will be convicted of these offences pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute.

[2052] In addition to those elements which were discussed in this section, the Chamber is also satisfied that the actions taken by Johan Tarčulovski at both the preparatory and execution phases of the operation to enter the village of Ljuboten contributed substantially to the commission of the crimes with which he is charged and which have been proved.

findings in the Trial Judgement related to certain specific acts on which his conviction for torture is based (Alleged Errors 87-90), and he denies that he is responsible for having aided and abetted that crime (Alleged Errors 91, 93-94; 95-100).[465]

(b) Severity of pain inflicted

244. Br|anin submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law in its determination of what acts constitute torture. Br|anin asserts that current customary international law on the amount of harm that must have been caused by the act "is best exemplified by a pronouncement from the Office of Legal Counsel of the United States Justice Department."[466] He then quotes this "pronouncement", which is in fact a memorandum to the Counsel to the President of the United States ("Bybee Memorandum"), for the proposition that:

> [F]or an act to constitute torture ... it must inflict pain that is difficult to endure. Physical pain amounting to torture must be equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function, or even death.[467]

Asserting that the Trial Chamber erred by failing to apply this newly recognized standard, Br|anin asks that "all alleged acts of torture in this case should be reviewed in light of it."[468]

245. The Prosecution responds that Br|anin's argument is misleading and defective,[469] and points out that the above-mentioned memorandum is Br|anin's sole support for his assertion of customary international law.[470] The Prosecution also observes that Br|anin "makes no submissions on the customary international law-requirements of general state practice and opinio juris".[471] Additionally, the Prosecution notes that a second memorandum from the U.S. Office of Legal torture is an error of law (Brđanin Appeal Brief, para. 307). This assertion is inapposite, since the Trial Chamber found that executing some Bosnian Muslim non-combatants while forcing others to watch "was aimed at intimidating the victims", and not that this conduct "constituted torture", as Brđanin erroneously asserts. Alleged Error 150 is therefore dismissed as unfounded. In Alleged Error 151, Brđanin submits that the Trial Chamber's finding (Trial Judgement, para. 211) that forcing people to collect dead bodies constitutes torture is an error of law (Brđanin Appeal Brief, para. 307). The Appeals Chamber finds that, in this case, Brđanin mischaracterises the finding – which was a factual one, since the Trial Chamber stated that coercing Bosnian Muslim non-combatants in the Brđo area and the Ljubija football stadium in July 1992, as well as at Trnopolje between May and October 1992, "could not but cause severe pain and suffering." This alleged error is therefore also dismissed as unfounded.

Counsel ("Levin Memorandum") "takes back the very passage relied upon by Br|anin".[472] Br|anin makes no submissions in reply.

246. The Appeals Chamber has previously explained that the definition of the crime of torture, as set out in the Convention against Torture and Other Cruel, Inhumane or Degrading Treatment or Punishment ("Convention against Torture") "may be considered to reflect customary international law."[473] Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber has drawn verbatim from the Convention against Torture when explaining the amount of harm an act must cause in order to constitute torture: it must cause "severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental".[474] By examining if the acts charged in the indictment as torture caused "severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental" – and not if they caused some greater amount of pain or suffering – the Trial Chamber was not only applying clear Appeals Chamber jurisprudence, it was also properly determining whether a conviction would be consistent with customary international law. In the discussion that follows, the Appeals Chamber will focus on developments relating to the law of torture after the indictment period, considering whether the definition of torture has, as suggested by Brđanin, changed to his benefit. Therefore, this discussion should not be in any way construed as an application of ex post facto law that could be prejudicial to Brđanin.

247. To support his argument that the requisite amount of harm has increased, Br|anin cites only the 2002 Bybee Memorandum[475] – a memorandum in which the U.S. Department of Justice interpreted the criminal prohibition on torture found in U.S. federal law.[476] Yet even if the U.S. executive branch determined that, for an act causing physical pain or suffering to amount to torture, it must "inflict pain ... equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function, or even death",[477] this would not suffice to make pain of such intensity a requirement for conviction under customary international law. No matter how powerful or influential a country is, its practice does not automatically become customary international law.[478]

248. Not only does Br|anin merely cite one memorandum for the proposition that there is a new customary international law standard for the amount of harm required for a torture conviction: he cites a memorandum that was withdrawn.[479] The Levin memorandum, which superseded the Bybee memorandum,[480] did not endorse the view that physical torture consists only of those acts that "inflict pain ... equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function, or even death."[481] To the contrary, the Levin memorandum suggested that the criminal prohibition on torture found in U.S. federal law was not intended "to reach only conduct involving excruciating and agonizing pain or suffering."[482] Moreover, this memorandum concluded that the criminal prohibition on torture found in U.S. law covers some acts that cause severe physical suffering even if the acts do not also cause severe physical pain.[483]

249. The Convention against Torture's requirement of "severe" pain or suffering was not itself meant to require "pain ... equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function, or even death". Indeed, during negotiations over the text of the Convention against Torture, the United Kingdom (seeking to make the definition of torture more restrictive) proposed that the infliction of "extreme pain or suffering" should be required.[484] This wording was rejected.[485] Hence, the Convention against Torture's drafting history makes clear that "severe pain or suffering" is not synonymous with "extreme pain or suffering", and that the latter is a more intense level of pain and suffering – one that might come closer to "pain ... equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function, or even death" – not required by the Convention against Torture. As the Convention against Torture is recognized to be declarative of customary international law on torture,[486] it is therefore clear that, under customary international law, physical torture can include acts inflicting physical pain or suffering less severe than "extreme pain or suffering" or "pain ... equivalent in intensity to the pain accompanying serious physical injury, such as organ failure, impairment of bodily function, or even death".

250. Article 3 of the European Convention on Human Rights and Fundamental Freedoms ("ECHR") declares that torture is prohibited, without defining it. Nonetheless, cases decided by the European Court of Human Rights ("ECtHR") applying the ECHR have shed light on the degree of harm that Court considers is required for an act to amount to torture.[487] In a decision the ECtHR observed that "what might have been inhumane treatment in the past is now seen as torture in the light of the increasingly higher standard of human rights protections."[488] ECtHR's more recent judgements, moreover, have endorsed the definition of torture contained in the Convention against Torture.[489] This Court's approach thus confirms that no more than "severe" pain or suffering is required under customary international law.

251. The amount of harm required under customary international law for an act to constitute torture has not increased since 2000, when the Appeals Chamber endorsed the above-mentioned standards in Furundžija.[490] Acts inflicting physical pain may amount to torture even when they do not cause pain of the type accompanying serious injury. An act may give rise to a conviction for torture when it inflicts severe pain or suffering. Whether it does so is a fact-specific inquiry. As the Appeals Chamber explained in the Naletilić and Martinović Appeal Judgement:

> torture is constituted by an act or an omission giving rise to severe pain or suffering, whether physical or mental, but there are no more specific requirements which allow an exhaustive classification and enumeration of acts which may constitute torture. Existing case-law has not determined the absolute degree of pain required for an act to amount to torture. Thus, while the suffering inflicted by some acts may be so obvious that the acts amount per se to torture, in general allegations of torture must be considered on a case-by-case basis so as to determine whether, in light of the acts committed and their context, severe physical or mental pain or suffering was inflicted.[491]

252. Thus, in assessing whether the harm caused by the acts charged suffices to support a torture conviction, the Trial Chamber applied principles that the Appeals Chamber has endorsed and that reflect customary international law. Br|anin has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber made an error of law which invalidated the decision.

272. The Trial Judgement findings related to the responsibility of Brđanin for the crimes in the camps can be found in paragraph 537 of the Trial Judgement (footnote omitted):

> There is also ample evidence that throughout the entire period when the Accused was President of the ARK Crisis Staff, not only did the Accused not take a stand either in public or at the meetings of the ARK Crisis Staff but that he adopted a laissez-faire attitude. Although the Accused did not actively assist in the commission of any of the crimes committed in these camps and detention facilities, in the light of his position as the President of the ARK Crisis Staff, the Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that his inactivity as well as his public attitude with respect to the camps and detention facilities constituted encouragement and moral support to the members of the army and the police to continue running these camps and detention facilities in the way described to the Trial Chamber throughout the trial. This complete inactivity combined with the public attitude on the part of the Accused could only serve the purpose of leaving no doubt in the mind of those running the camps and detention facilities that they enjoyed the full support of the ARK Crisis Staff and its President. The Trial Chamber is satisfied that this fact had a substantial effect on the commission of torture in the camps and detention facilities throughout the ARK.

It is not entirely clear to which mode of responsibility the Trial Chamber refers in this paragraph. Two interpretations of the Trial Chamber's position are possible.

273. The Trial Chamber might have intended to apply in this case the theory of aiding and abetting by tacit approval and encouragement. An accused can be convicted for aiding and abetting a crime when it is established that his conduct amounted to tacit approval and encouragement of the crime and that such conduct substantially contributed to the crime.[551] This form of aiding and abetting is not, strictly speaking, criminal responsibility for omission.[552] In the cases where this category was applied, the accused held a position of authority, he was physically present on the scene of the crime, and his non-intervention was seen as tacit approval and encouragement.[553] The Trial Chamber in Kayishema and Ruzindana held that "individual responsibility pursuant to Article 6(1) [that is, individual criminal responsibility under 7(1) of the Tribunal's Statute] is based, in this instance, not on a duty to act, but from the encouragement and support that might be afforded to the principals of the crime from such an omission."[554] In such cases the combination of a position of authority and physical presence on the crime scene allowed the inference that non-interference by the accused actually amounted to tacit approval and encouragement.[555] encouragement or moral support for the camp personnel (actus reus), which had a substantial effect on the commission of torture.

(ii) Encouragement or moral support

277. It is recognized in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal that "encouragement" and "moral support" are two forms of conduct which may lead to criminal responsibility for aiding and abetting a crime.[561] As recalled above, the encouragement or support need not be explicit; under certain circumstances, even the act of being present on the crime scene (or in its vicinity) as a "silent spectator" can be construed as the tacit approval or encouragement of the crime.[562] In any case, the contribution to the crime of this encouragement or moral support must always be substantial.[563] As the Furundžija Trial Chamber put it, "[w]hile any spectator can be said to be encouraging a spectacle – an audience being a necessary element of a spectacle – the spectator in these cases was only found to be complicit if his status was such that his presence had a significant legitimising or encouraging effect on the principals".[564] In cases where tacit approval or encouragement has been found to be the basis for criminal responsibility, it has been the authority of the accused combined with his presence on (or very near to) the crime scene, especially if considered together with his prior conduct, which all together allow the conclusion that the accused's conduct amounts to official sanction of the crime and thus substantially contributes to it.[565] It follows that encouragement and moral support can only form a substantial contribution to a crime when the principal perpetrators are aware of it.[566] Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber finds that, in this case, encouragement and moral support could only have had a substantial effect if the camp personnel committing torture were aware that Brđanin made encouraging and supporting statements or encouraged and supported through his inaction.[567]

[566] In Simi}, the Appeals Chamber found with regard to Simi}'s alleged tacit encouragement of beatings in detention centres: "[t]he Appeals Chamber emphasises that the Trial Chamber's findings do not allow for a clear inference as to how the Appellant's conduct was construed by the principal perpetrators committing the beatings, or as to what effect his conduct may have had on their acts." Simi} Appeal Judgement, para. 130. See also Bagilishema Trial Judgement, para. 36; Semanza Trial Judgement, para. 389; Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgement, para. 374.

278. The Trial Chamber's examination of Br|anin's responsibility for torture in camps and detention facilities refers to no evidence indicating that the personnel running the camps and detention facilities were encouraged to commit torture by Br|anin's inactivity or public attitude, and the Prosecution does not contest this point.[568] Rather, the Prosecution contends in essence that it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to infer, from circumstantial evidence, that Br|anin's failure to intervene, together with his public attitude, had the effect of encouraging camp and detention facilities personnel to commit acts of torture.

279. The Trial Chamber also refers to no evidence showing that camp and detention facilities personnel were even aware of Br|anin's public attitude towards the camps and facilities, or that personnel believed that Br|anin supported (albeit passively) the torture of detainees.[569] Again, the Prosecution considers that this finding can reasonably be inferred.

280. The Appeals Chamber agrees that the awareness of the perpetrators can be inferred from the facts of the case. However, this must be the only reasonable inference from the evidence.

281. The evidence the Trial Chamber did consider included two statements by Brđanin. The first statement – that "[i]f Hitler, Stalin and Churchill could have working camps so can we" could have alerted the personnel running the camps to Br|anin's support for the camps, assuming the statement was actually heard by camp personnel.[570] Yet, even under this assumption,[571] it does not necessarily follow that such a statement would have been interpreted as a signal of acquiescence to the torture of detainees. It might alternatively have been taken as a signal of acquiescence to the maintenance of the camps and detention facilities.

[567] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber speaks of encouragement and moral support given to the persons running the camps and detention facilities (Trial Judgement, para. 537), and not to those actually committing the crime of torture. The Appeals Chamber understands that the Trial Chamber also meant to say that Brđanin's statements provided encouragement and moral support to the perpetrators committing the crime of torture.

[568] The Prosecution concedes that it did not present direct evidence from the people running the camps in the ARK to show that they were encouraged by Br|anin's lack of intervention or his public attitude. (Prosecution Response Brief, para. 6.264.) In its Response Brief, moreover, the Prosecution identifies no other evidence showing that people running camps and detention facilities were encouraged by this "lack of intervention" or this public attitude.

[569] See Trial Judgement, paras 536-538.

[570] See Prosecution Response Brief, para. 6.267.

[571] Br|anin suggests that the statement, which the Trial Chamber found he made in August 1992 (see Trial Judgement, para. 536, fn. 1368), could not have been heard by camp personnel since, according to him, it was made after "the offending camps had already been closed" (Br|anin Appeal Brief, para. 278). The Trial Chamber, however, found that "FTğrnopolje camp was officially closed down at the end of September 1992, but some of the detainees stayed there longer" (Trial Judgement, para. 450). The Trial Chamber also found Br|anin guilty for acts of torture committed there between May and October of 1992 (see Trial Judgement, paras 510, 513-514).

2. Principal perpetrator as a member of the JCE

(a) Post-World War II jurisprudence

393. In their respective submissions the parties discuss the import of two Control Council Law No. 10 cases, the Justice and RuSHA cases.[841] For the reasons that follow, the Appeals Chamber finds that, although these two cases do not use the expression "joint criminal enterprise", the discussion of several of the accused in these judgements is particularly apposite for the purpose of analysing the issues raised by the Grounds 1 and 2.

394. The Appeals Chamber finds that these cases provide strong support for the Prosecution's contention that post-World War II jurisprudence: (1) recognizes the imposition of liability upon an accused for his participation in a common criminal purpose, where the conduct that comprises the criminal actus reus is perpetrated by persons who do not share the common purpose; and (2) does not require proof that there was an understanding or an agreement to commit that particular crime between the accused and the principal perpetrator of the crime.

395. Under Control Council Law No. 10, both the principal perpetrator and a person "connected with plans or enterprises involving" the commission of a crime were considered to have "committed" that crime.[842]

396. In the Justice case, the indictment alleged that the "German criminal laws, through a series of expansions and perversions by the Ministry of Justice, finally embraced passive defeatism, petty misdemeanors and trivial private utterances as treasonable for the purpose of exterminating Jews or other nationals of the occupied countries. Indictments, trials and convictions were transparent devices for a system of murderous extermination, and death became the routine penalty ... Non-German nationals were convicted of and executed for 'high treason' allegedly committed against [841] The Appeals Chamber notes that the ICTR Appeals Chamber relied inter alia on these same sources to conclude that, as of 1992, customary international law permitted the imposition of criminal liability on a participant in a common plan to commit genocide. See Rwamakuba Appeal Decision, paras 14-31, in particular para. 24, according to which "post-World War II materials do not always fit neatly into the so-called 'three categories' of joint criminal enterprise discussed in Tadić, in part because the tribunals' judgements did not always dwell on the legal concepts of criminal responsibility, but simply concluded that, based on the evidence, the accused were 'connected with,' 'concerned in,' 'inculpated in,' or 'implicated in' war crimes and crimes against humanity". This ICTR Appeals Chamber decision cites, inter alia: Justice Judgement, pp. 1093 ("connected with the commission" of an offence), 1094 ("connected to some extent" with persecution), 1099 ("knowingly was connected" with an offence), 1120 (concluding that the evidence established the "connection of the defendant" to an illegal procedure), 1128 (stating that the Accused Lautz was "criminally implicated" in enforcing the law against Poles and Jews); RuSHA Judgement, p. 108 (stating that two Accused "are inculpated in crimes connected with the kidnapping of foreign children").

[842] See Control Council Law No. 10, art. II(2), in Official Gazette of the Control Council for Germany (1946), vol. 3, p. 50, according to which "[a]ny person ... is deemed to have committed a crime as defined in paragraph 1 of this Article, if he was (a) a principal or (b) was an accessory to the commission of any such crime or ordered or abetted the same or (c) took a consenting part therein or (d) was connected with plans or enterprises involving its commission."

the Reich. The above-described proceedings resulted in the murder, torture, unlawful imprisonment, and ill-treatment of thousands of persons."[843] It also alleged that "German criminal laws through a series of additions, expansions, and perversions by the defendants became a powerful weapon for the subjugation of the German people and for the extermination of certain nationals of the occupied countries. This program resulted in the murder, torture, illegal imprisonment, and ill-treatment of thousands of Germans and nationals of occupied countries."[844] Lautz, Chief Public Prosecutor of the People's Court, Rothaug, former Chief Justice of the Special Court in Nuremberg, and others were charged with responsibility for, and participation in, these crimes.[845]

397. The United States Military Tribunal stated that, pursuant to Article II(2) of Control Council Law No. 10, the prosecution had to show the following for an accused connected with a criminal plan or enterprise to be found liable:

> The material facts which must be proved in any case are (1) the fact of the great pattern or plan of racial persecution and extermination; and (2) specific conduct of the individual defendant in furtherance of the plan. This is but an application of general concepts of criminal law.[846]

It further required that the accused have "knowledge of an offense charged in the indictment and established by the evidence" and "consciously participated in the plan or took a consenting part therein."[847]

398. The Appeals Chamber has considered in particular Judge Bonomy's Separate Opinion in the case Prosecutor v. Milutinović et al.[848] and has found his discussion of the Justice case to be instructive:

> 18. The Military Tribunal found that the Prosecution had proved the existence of a "pattern and plan of racial [persecution]" to enforce the criminal laws against Poles and Jews.[849] After determining that the accused Lautz, the Chief Public Prosecutor of the People's Court, knew of this plan,[850] the Tribunal found that he had authorised indictments charging a number of Poles with high treason for "leaving their places of work and attempting to escape Germany by crossing the border into Switzerland".[851] The Poles were ultimately sentenced to death and executed. On the basis of this evidence, the Military Tribunal concluded that Lautz had consciously participated in the national plan of racial discrimination "by means of the perversion of the law of high treason",[852] and accordingly convicted him of war crimes and crimes against humanity.[853] The Tribunal concluded in relation to his responsibility:

> We have cited a few cases which are typical of the activities of the Prosecution before the People's Court in innumerable cases. The captured documents which are in evidence establish that the defendant Lautz was criminally implicated in enforcing the law against Poles and Jews which were deemed to be a part of the established governmental plan for the extermination of those races. He was an accessory to, and took a consenting part in, the crime of genocide.[854]

19. In similar fashion the Military Tribunal found that Rothaug, the former Chief Justice of the Special Court in Nuremberg, knew of the plan of racial discrimination.[855] The Tribunal convicted Rothaug of crimes against humanity for his role in convicting and sentencing to death three Poles and a Jew "in conformity with the policy of the Nazi State of persecution, torture, and extermination of [the Jewish and Polish] races."[856] The Tribunal opined that Rothaug had consciously participated in the plan in the following terms:

> The individual cases in which Rothaug applied the cruel and discriminatory law against Poles and Jews cannot be considered in isolation. It is of the essence of the charges against him that he participated in the national program of racial persecution. It is of the essence of the proof that he identified himself with this national program and gave himself utterly to its accomplishment. He participated in the crime of genocide.[857]

20. The Military Tribunal appears to have imposed criminal responsibility on both accused for their participation in the common criminal plan although they did not perpetrate the actus reus of the crimes of which they were convicted; the actus reus was instead perpetrated by executioners simply carrying out the orders of the court. Nowhere did the Tribunal discuss the mental state of the executioners who carried out the death sentences imposed as a result of the actions of Lautz, Rothaug, and their fellow participants in the common plan, or whether such persons even had knowledge that the death sentences formed part of a plan to pervert the law for the purpose of exterminating Jews and other "undesirables".

399. The second case of relevance is the RuSHA case. Once again, the Appeals Chamber refers to Judge Bonomy's apt description and analysis of this case:

> 21. In the RuSHA case, the United States Military Tribunal approached the question of the criminal responsibility of the accused Hofmann and Hildebrandt in a similar way [to the Justice case]. Several officials of the SS Race and Resettlement Main Office (known by the German acronym "RuSHA") were charged, along with other Nazi leaders, with war crimes and crimes against humanity brought about by means of murder, extermination, enslavement, deportation, imprisonment, torture, and persecutions. Hofmann was the Chief of RuSHA from July 1940 until April 1943. Hildebrandt was Higher SS and Police Leader at Danzig-West Prussia from October 1939 to February 1943, and at the same time Leader of the Administration District Danzig-West Prussia of the Allgemeine SS; thereafter, from 20 April 1943 to the end of the war, he was Chief of RuSHA. The indictment alleged the following common plan—known as the "Germanisation" plan—and steps taken to carry it through:

> The acts, conduct, plans and enterprises charged ... were carried out as part of a systematic Program of genocide, aimed at the destruction of foreign nationals and ethnic groups, ... in part by elimination and suppression of national characteristics. The object of this program was to strengthen the German nation and the so-called "Aryan" race at the expense of such other nations and groups by imposing Nazi and German characteristics upon individuals selected therefrom ... and by the elimination of "undesirable" racial elements. This program was carried out in part by (a) Kidnaping [sic] the children of foreign nationals in order to select for Germanization those who were considered of "racial value"; (b) Encouraging and compelling abortions on Eastern workers for the purposes of preserving their working capacity as slave labor and of weakening Eastern nations; (c) Taking away, for the purpose of extermination or Germanization, infants born to Eastern workers in Germany; (d) Executing, imprisoning in concentration camps, or Germanizing Eastern workers and prisoners of war who had had sexual intercourse with Germans, and imprisoning the Germans involved; (e) Preventing marriages and hampering reproduction of enemy nationals; ... and (i) Participating in the persecution and extermination of Jews.[858]

22. The Military Tribunal found that the Prosecution had established that there existed among Hitler, Himmler—the leader of the SS—and other Nazi officials a "two-fold objective of weakening and eventually destroying other nations while at the same time strengthening Germany, territorially and biologically, at the expense of conquered nations."[859] It found additionally that the leadership of RuSHA—and particularly the accused Hofmann and Hildebrandt—adhered to and enthusiastically participated in the execution of this "Germanisation" plan by effecting, through RuSHA agents, abortions on foreigners impregnated by Germans, punishment for sexual intercourse between Germans and non-Germans, the slave labour of Poles and other Easterners, the persecution of Jews and Poles, and the kidnapping of foreign children.[860] In response to contentions by the accused that they did not themselves physically perpetrate any crimes, the Tribunal held that > [i]t is no defense for a defendant to insist, for instance, that he never evacuated populations when orders exist, signed by him, in which he directed that the evacuation should take place. While in such a case the defendant might not have actually carried out the physical evacuation in the sense that he did not personally evacuate the population, he nevertheless is responsible for the action, and his participation by instigating the action is more pronounced than that of those who actually performed the deed.[861]

400. The Appeals Chamber also notes that the Military Tribunal found that Hofmann and Hildebrandt formulated plans of action with respect to the kidnapping programme in response to decrees and memoranda issued by Himmler. In accordance with these plans of action, RuSHA racial examiners determined which Polish children had sufficiently "good" racial characteristics to be "Germanized"; these children were then wrested from their families and sent to Germany to be placed in special institutions.[862] In the words of the Military Tribunal, "[t]hese examiners were working directly at different intervals under the control and supervision of Hofmann and Hildebrandt respectively, who had knowledge of their activities".[863] Based on their participation in the kidnapping programme and their knowledge of the deeds of the RuSHA examiners acting at their direction, the Military Tribunal concluded that Hofmann and Hildebrand bore "full responsibility" for the kidnappings.[864] No mention is made of the examiners' state of mind, or whether they adhered to or were even aware of the broader Germanization plan pursuant to which their conduct occurred, or whether an agreement existed between Hofmann, Hildebrandt, and any of the examiners.

401. Similarly, with respect to the abortions programme, the Military Tribunal found that RuSHA officials, including the accused Hofmann and Hildebrandt, had participated in that programme, and that Hofmann and Hildebrandt had issued directives detailing how it was to be put into effect.[865] The Military Tribunal summarized RuSHA's role in the following terms:

> The role played by RuSHA was principally in conducting racial examinations of the pregnant worker as well as the suspected father to determine whether a racially inferior or satisfactory child might be expected; and upon the basis of this examination it was determined whether an abortion should or could be performed—orders being to the effect that no abortion could be performed where a child of good racial characteristics might be expected, and that an abortion should be performed where such a child was improbable.[866]

On the basis of their participation in the programme and their knowledge of the conduct of the RuSHA racial examiners, the Military Tribunal concluded that Hofmann and Hildebrand were responsible for the forcible abortions.[867] Here again, however, the Tribunal did not discuss the examiners' state of mind, or whether they adhered to, or knew of, the broader Germanization plan, or whether an agreement existed between Hofmann, Hildebrandt and any of the racial examiners.[868]

[867] RuSHA Judgement, pp. 111-112, 160-161. In a secret memorandum, Hildebrandt described the ultimate objective of the abortions programme: "to ... further all valuable racial strains for the strengthening of our people, and to accomplish a complete elimination of everything racially inferior" (quoted text at pp. 111-112).
[868] The evidence with respect to the abortion programme included the decree issued by Himmler in March 1943 based on which the policy of abortions on Eastern workers began. This decree even provided that "[t]he Russian physicians or the Russian Medical Association, which must not be informed of this order, are to be told in individual cases that the pregnancy is being interrupted for reasons of social distress. It must be explained in such a way that no conclusions to the existence of a definite order may be drawn." (RuSHA Judgement, p. 109).

402. The Military Tribunal thus concluded that, "[j]udged by any standard of proof, the record in this case clearly establishes crimes against humanity and war crimes, substantially as alleged in the indictment".[869] It found that "[t]he evidence establishes beyond any reasonable doubt [the accused's] guilt and criminal responsibility for the ... criminal activities", including the kidnapping of children, forcible abortions, child-stealing, punishment for sexual intercourse with Germans, and the hampering of enemy nationals' reproduction.[870]

403. The Appeals Chamber notes that it is clear from the Military Tribunal's discussion of the various aspects of the Germanization plan that Hofmann and Hildebrandt, as the leaders of RuSHA, worked closely and interactively with Himmler, Kaltenbrunner, and other high SS officials in planning the details of how the plan was to be executed, especially with respect to the abortions and abduction programmes. On the basis of their active participation in this plan and their knowledge of the activities carried out pursuant to it, both accused were held responsible for the conduct of the RuSHA agents who carried out the crimes, without any discussion of whether the principal perpetrators had knowledge that their actions formed part of the Germanization plan, or of whether an agreement existed between the accused and these agents.

404. Both the Justice case and the RuSHA case thus support the Prosecution's contention that post-World War II jurisprudence: (1) recognizes the imposition of liability upon an accused for his participation in a common criminal purpose, where the conduct that comprises the criminal actus reus is perpetrated by persons who do not share the common purpose; and (2) does not require proof that there was an understanding or an agreement between the accused and the principal perpetrator of the crime to commit that particular crime. The Appeals Chamber will now turn to the Prosecution's submission as to the Tribunal's jurisprudence.

(b) The Tribunal's jurisprudence

405. The Appeals Chamber in Tadić held that participation in a JCE existed as a form of responsibility in customary international law at the time of the events in the former Yugoslavia.[871] According to the same judgement, the rationale behind JCE liability is to reflect the exact degree of responsibility of those who in some way made it possible for the perpetrators physically to carry out the criminal acts.[872]

406. Nonetheless, as noted by Judge Bonomy in his Separate Opinion cited above,[873] Tadić does not clearly resolve whether the principal perpetrators must have participated in the common purpose. In some places, the Appeals Chamber does not mention a requirement that principal perpetrators belong to the JCE. [874] Elsewhere, however, it uses language – at least as regards the first and third categories – which may imply such a requirement.[875] In this respect, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the factual scenario in Tadić, contrary to the one in case at hand, involved a small group of participants operating in one municipality, and that the principal perpetrators were clearly participants in the JCE.[876] It is therefore not surprising that the Appeals Chamber in that case essentially focused on post-World War II cases where this was also the case, even though not

It would seem that in these cases the required actus reus was the active participation in the enforcement of a system of repression, as it could be inferred from the position of authority and the specific functions held by each accused. The mens rea element comprised: (i) knowledge of the nature of the system and (ii) the intent to further the common concerted design to ill-treat inmates ..."; and para. 227, which provides as follows (emphases in original): "... the objective elements (actus reus) of this mode of participation in one of the crimes provided for in the Statute (with regard to each of the three categories of cases) are as follows: (i) A plurality of persons. They need not be organised in a military, political or administrative structure ... (ii) The existence of a common plan, design or purpose which amounts to or involves the commission of a crime provided for in the Statute. There is no necessity for this plan, design or purpose to have been previously arranged or formulated. The common plan or purpose may materialise extemporaneously and be inferred from the fact that a plurality of persons acts in unison to put into effect a joint criminal enterprise. (iii) Participation of the accused in the common design involving the perpetration of one of the crimes provided for in the Statute. This participation need not involve commission of a specific crime under one of those provisions (for example, murder, extermination, torture, rape, etc.), but may take the form of assistance in, or contribution to, the execution of the common plan or purpose."
[875] Tadić Appeal Judgement, para. 204 ("The third category [or extended form of JCE] concerns cases involving a common design to pursue one course of conduct where one of the perpetrators commits an act which, while outside the common design, was nevertheless a natural and foreseeable consequence of the effecting of that common purpose.") (emphasis added). See also: para. 220, providing, in relevant part, as follows (emphases added): "As for the objective and subjective elements of the crime, the case law shows that the notion has been applied to three distinct categories of cases. First, in [the first category or basic form of JCE], where all participants in the common design possess the same criminal intent to commit a crime (and one or more of them actually perpetrate the crime, with intent). Secondly, in the [second category or systemic form of JCE], where the requisite mens rea comprises knowledge of the nature of the system of ill-treatment and intent to further the common design of ill-treatment. Such intent may be proved either directly or as a matter of inference from the nature of the accused's authority within the camp or organisational hierarchy. With regard to the third category of cases [extended form of JCE], it is appropriate to apply the notion of 'common purpose' only where the following requirements concerning mens rea are fulfilled: (i) the intention to take part in a joint criminal enterprise and to further—individually and jointly—the criminal purposes of that enterprise; and (ii) the foreseeability of the possible commission by other members of the group of offences that do not constitute the object of the common criminal purpose"; and para. 228 ("In addition, responsibility for a crime other than the one agreed upon in the common plan arises only if, under the circumstances of the case, ... it was foreseeable that such a crime might be perpetrated by one or other members of the group[.]").

every case cited by Tadić required participation of the principal perpetrator in the JCE as the sine qua non for ascribing of liability to the accused.[877] In light of the above, the Appeals Chamber judgement in Tadić cannot be considered conclusive as to whether principal perpetrators must be members of the JCE.

407. While "many subsequent Judgements have employed the Tadić language in setting out the elements of JCE, and therefore appear to restrict JCE liability—at least in the third category—to crimes physically perpetrated by JCE participants, in almost all of these Judgements the JCE was, like the enterprise in Tadić, relatively small. The fact that some of the physical perpetrators may not have been JCE participants does not appear to have been much of an issue."[878] The Appeals Chamber finds that cases such as the Vasiljević Appeal Judgement and the Krnojelac Appeal Judgement do not conclusively resolve whether principal perpetrators must be members of the JCE.

408. However, two cases already decided on appeal – Krstić and Stakić – provide exceptions to this general trend of inconclusiveness. In Krstić, the Trial Chamber did not explicitly require principal perpetrators to be members of the JCE.[879] The Chamber found that there existed two JCEs, one with the objective of "forcibly transfer[ring] the Bosnian Muslim women, children and elderly from Potočari on 12 and 13 July" and "creat[ing] a humanitarian crisis in support of this endeavor",[880] the other with the objective of "killing the military-aged Bosnian Muslim men of Srebrenica".[881] It accordingly found the accused guilty of inhumane acts and persecution as crimes against humanity for his participation in the first JCE[882] and genocide for his participation in the second JCE.[883] The members of these JCEs included only high-ranking Bosnian Serb political and military leaders, not the principal perpetrators. The principal perpetrators, though not mentioned explicitly, were probably privates and other low-ranking members of the Drina Corps of the VRS.[884] In the Krstić Appeal Judgement, which predates the Brđanin Trial Judgement, the Appeals

Chamber decided not to disturb the Trial Chamber's findings regarding the existence of a JCE. It even used the expression "genocidal enterprise".[885]

409. In Stakić, the Appeals Chamber, relying on the Trial Chamber's findings, treated a JCE operating in the municipality of Prijedor in 1992 as composed only of the leaders of political bodies, the military and the police.[886] Its common purpose was however clearly carried out by a larger number of individuals, including Bosnian Serb police, military, and paramilitary forces.[887] It is particularly noteworthy that Stakić was convicted of certain crimes (murder and extermination) committed by non-members under the third (also "extended") form of joint criminal enterprise.[888] This is precedent not to be lightly dismissed by the Appeals Chamber.

(c) Conclusion

410. In light of the above discussion of relevant jurisprudence, persuasive as to the ascertainment of the contours of joint criminal enterprise liability in customary international law, the Appeals Chamber is of the view that what matters in a first category JCE is not whether the person who carried out the actus reus of a particular crime is a member of the JCE, but whether the crime in question forms part of the common purpose.[889] In cases where the principal perpetrator of a particular crime is not a member of the JCE, this essential requirement may be inferred from various circumstances, including the fact that the accused or any other member of the JCE closely cooperated with the principal perpetrator in order to further the common criminal purpose. In this respect, when a member of the JCE uses a person outside the JCE to carry out the actus reus of a crime, the fact that the person in question knows of the existence of the JCE – without it being established that he or she shares the mens rea necessary to become a member of the JCE – may be a factor to be taken into account when determining whether the crime forms part of the common criminal purpose. However, this is not a sine qua non for imputing liability for the crime to that member of the JCE.

[885] Krstić Appeal Judgement, paras 134, 143-144. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber recalls that, in the Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgement, while Zoran Žigić was found not to be "responsible as a participant in this joint criminal enterprise" (para. 599), the Appeals Chamber confirmed the conviction of Miroslav Kvočka under JCE for crimes physically perpetrated by, among others, Žigić (e.g. the murder of Be}ir Medunjanin, paras 277, 487). This lends further support to the contention of the Prosecution that, under the Tribunal's law, a member of a joint criminal enterprise can be found responsible for crimes perpetrated by a non-member.

PROSECUTOR

v.

RADOSLAV BRĐANIN

JUDGEMENT

The Office of the Prosecutor:

Ms. Joanna Korner
Ms. Anna Richterova
Ms. Ann Sutherland
Mr. Julian Nicholls

Counsel for the Accused:

Mr. John Ackerman
Mr. David Cunningham

23. In determining whether the guilt of the Accused has been established to this standard with respect to each particular count in the Indictment, the Trial Chamber has been careful to consider whether there is any reasonable explanation of the evidence accepted by it other than the guilt of the Accused.[17] This is so because any ambiguity must accrue to the Accused's advantage. As stated by the Appeals Chamber, if there is another conclusion which is also reasonably open from that evidence, and which is as consistent with the innocence of an accused as with his or her guilt, he or she must be acquitted.[18]

24. The fact that the Defence has not challenged certain factual allegations contained in the Indictment does not imply that the Trial Chamber has accepted these alleged facts to be proved. For each individual fact alleged by the Prosecution the burden of proof remains with it.[19] Article 21(4)(g) of the Statute provides that no accused shall be compelled to testify against himself. In this case, the Accused made use of his right to remain silent and did not give evidence or any statement. No unfavourable inference was drawn therefrom. The Trial Chamber acknowledges that silence by the Accused may not be used as evidence to prove guilt and may not be interpreted as an admission.

25. In evaluating the evidence of the witnesses that gave evidence viva voce, the Trial Chamber has considered their demeanour, conduct and character as far as this was possible. With regard to all witnesses, it has also considered the probability, consistency and other features of their evidence, including the corroboration which may be forthcoming from other evidence and the circumstances of the case. The Trial Chamber has been conscious throughout that the credibility of witnesses depends upon their knowledge of the facts upon which they give evidence, their disinterestedness, their integrity, their veracity and the fact that they are bound to speak the truth in terms of the solemn declaration taken by them. The Trial Chamber has also kept in mind that the fact that a witness gives evidence honestly is not in itself sufficient to establish the reliability of that evidence. The issue is not merely whether the evidence of a witness is honest; it is also whether the evidence is objectively reliable.[20] The Trial Chamber has been conscious, throughout, that evidence about facts that occurred ten or more years prior to giving evidence, involves inherent uncertainties due to the vagaries of human perception and recollection. The lack of detail in relation to peripheral matters was in general not regarded as necessarily discrediting their evidence.[21]

26. The Trial Chamber has also taken into account the extent of any inconsistency between the oral evidence of the witnesses at trial and their respective statements given prior to trial, if such statements, or parts thereof were admitted into evidence. The Trial Chamber accepts that in some instances a witness' oral evidence will not be identical to the information given in such statement. The reason for this is that a witness may be asked questions at trial not previously asked or may, through questioning, remember details previously forgotten. In general, the Trial Chamber has not treated minor discrepancies between the evidence of various witnesses, or between the evidence of a particular witness and a statement previously made by that witness, as discrediting their evidence where that witness had nevertheless recounted the essence of the incident charged in acceptable detail.[22]

27. In some cases, only one witness has given evidence of an incident with which the Accused is charged or otherwise involving the Accused. The Appeals Chamber has held that the testimony of a single witness on a material fact does not, as a matter of law, require corroboration.[23] Still, in such a situation, the Trial Chamber has scrutinised the evidence of such witnesses with circumspection and in some instances decided not to rely on such evidence.[24]

28. As regards hearsay evidence, the Trial Chamber reiterates that it is well settled in the practice and jurisprudence of this Tribunal that hearsay evidence is admissible. The approach taken by the Trial Chamber has been that, since such evidence is admitted to prove the truth of its contents,[25] it ought to be satisfied that such evidence is reliable for that purpose, in the sense of being voluntary, truthful and trustworthy, as appropriate. For this purpose, the Trial Chamber has considered both the content of the hearsay statement and the circumstances under which the evidence arose,[26] or, as Judge Stephen described it, considered that the probative value of a hearsay statement will depend upon the context and character of the evidence in question.[27] The absence of remain within Yugoslavia. On 9 and 10 December 1991, the Bosnian Serbs voted overwhelmingly to remain a part of the SFRY.[119]

63. In early 1992, the SDA increased the pressure to secure independence of the SRBH from the SFRY.[120] A referendum on the question of independence was held on 29 February and 1 March 1992. It was largely boycotted by the Bosnian Serbs and yielded an overwhelming majority of votes in favour of the independence of BiH.[121] In view of the result of the referendum, on 6 April 1992, the European Community recognised BiH as an independent state. Recognition by the US followed on 7 April 1992.[122]

64. The referendum and subsequent recognition by the international community of BiH as an independent state increased the tension between Bosnian Serbs on the one hand and Bosnian Muslims and Bosnian Croats on the other hand. The armed conflict in BiH broke out shortly after.[123]

B. The political agenda of the Bosnian Serb leadership

65. During the second half of 1991, it already appeared increasingly unlikely that the SRBH would remain within the SFRY. The Trial Chamber is satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that during this period, the Bosnian Serb leadership, including the members of the Main Board of the SDS and other members of the SDS, as well as Bosnian Serb representatives of the armed forces, formed a

On 17 December 1991, the foreign ministers of the European Community approved the procedure for allowing the SFRY's republics to apply for independence, and created a commission to assess any applications received. The Badinter Advisory Commission to the European Community thereafter invited applications from these republics in order to evaluate their applications based on adherence to certain guidelines such as the existing legal provisions in place for the respect of individual and minority rights: ex. P53, "Expert Report of Robert Donia", p. 62. The idea of a referendum was energetically opposed by the SDS, which called all Serbs to boycott the referendum, while the SDA and the HDZ leaders urged a vote in favour of Bosnian independence: Robert Donia, T. 1237-1239; ex. plan to link Serb-populated areas in BiH together, to gain control over these areas and to create a separate Bosnian Serb state, from which most non-Serbs would be permanently removed ("Strategic Plan"). The Bosnian Serb leadership knew that the Strategic Plan could only be implemented by the use of force and fear.

66. On 15 October 1991, the SDS Party Council discussed strategies on how to set up a Serbian government, which included establishing parallel government bodies, the regionalisation of BiH and organising militarily.[124]

67. During the first session of the SerBiH Assembly, held on 24 October 1991, Radovan Karadžić made it clear that the Bosnian Serbs were prepared to use force and fear to achieve their ends if they were otherwise unsuccessful.[125]

68. In a speech given on the occasion of the "Plebiscite of the Serb People" in Sarajevo in November 1991, Radovan Karadžić instructed SDS members representing the municipalities to impose complete Bosnian Serb authority in their respective municipalities, regions and local communities.[126] On 11 December 1991, the SerBiH Assembly voted to recommend the establishment of separate Serbian municipalities. The declared aim of this decision was "to break up the existing municipalities where Serbs are not in a majority".[127]

69. On 19 December 1991, the Main Board of the SDS issued a document entitled "Instructions for the Organisation and Activity of Organs of the Serbian People in Bosnia and Herzegovina in Extraordinary Circumstances" ("Variant A and B Instructions"). These instructions provided for the conduct of specified activities in all municipalities in which Serbs lived, and essentially mapped out the take-over of power by Bosnian Serbs in municipalities where they constituted a majority of the population ("Variant A") and where they were in a minority ("Variant B").[128] The stated purpose of Articles 2 to 5 of the Statute, proof is required that the crime in question has actually been committed by the principal offender(s).[705]

(a) Planning

268. Planning implies that one or several persons contemplate designing the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases.[706] Moreover, it needs to be established that the accused, directly or indirectly, intended the crime in question to be committed.[707] Where an accused is found guilty of having committed a crime, he or she cannot at the same time be convicted of having planned the same crime.[708] Involvement in the planning may however be considered an aggravating factor.[709]

(b) Instigating

269. Instigating means prompting another to commit an offence.[710] Both acts and omissions may constitute instigating, which covers express as well as implied conduct.[711] The nexus between instigation and perpetration requires proof.[712] It is not necessary to demonstrate that the crime would not have been perpetrated without the accused's involvement;[713] it is sufficient to prove that

356. For the foregoing reasons, the Trial Chamber, considering all the circumstances, dismisses JCE as a possible mode of liability to describe the Accused's individual criminal responsibility.

2. Planning

357. As contended by the Prosecution, the Accused in the present case did not physically perpetrate any of the crimes established.[891] Responsibility for 'planning' a crime could thus, according to the above definition, only incur if it was demonstrated that the Accused was substantially involved at the preparatory stage of that crime in the concrete form it took, which implies that he possessed sufficient knowledge thereof in advance. This knowledge requirement should not, however, be understood to mean that the Accused would have to be intimate with every detail of the acts committed by the physical perpetrators.

358. Although the Accused espoused the Strategic Plan, it has not been established that he personally devised it.[892] The Accused participated in its implementation mainly by virtue of his authority as President of the ARK Crisis Staff and through his public utterances. Although these acts may have set the wider framework in which crimes were committed, the Trial Chamber finds the evidence before it insufficient to conclude that the Accused was involved in the immediate preparation of the concrete crimes. This requirement of specificity distinguishes 'planning' from other modes of liability. In view of the remaining heads of criminal responsibility, some of which more appropriately characterise the acts and the conduct of the Accused, the Trial Chamber dismisses 'planning' as a mode of liability to describe the individual criminal responsibility of the Accused.

3. Instigating

359. Many of the decisions of the ARK Crisis Staff for which the Accused bears responsibility requested that certain acts amounting to crimes be carried out. Most of the decisions did not take immediate effect and required implementation by, e.g., municipal organs. In this context, it is immaterial whether the physical perpetrators were subordinate to the instigator, or whether a number of other persons would necessarily have to be involved before the crime was actually committed, as long as it can be shown that there was a causal link between an act of instigation and placed on formal legal bonds, which could also be altered by governments to shield their nationals from prosecution based on the grave breaches provisions of the Geneva Conventions. A more purposive and realistic approach is particularly apposite in circumstances of the dissolution of Yugoslavia, and in the emerging State of Bosnia and Herzegovina where various parties were engaged in fighting, and the government was opposed to a partition based on ethnicity, which would have resulted in movements of population, and where, ultimately, the issue at stake was the final shape of the State and of the new emerging entities.

82. In Tadi}, the Appeals Chamber, relying on a teleological approach, concluded that formal nationality may not be regarded as determinative in this context, whereas ethnicity may reflect more appropriately the reality of the bonds:

> This legal approach, hinging on substantial relations more than on formal bonds, becomes all the more important in present-day international armed conflicts. While previously wars were primarily between well-established States, in modern inter-ethnic armed conflicts such as that in the former Yugoslavia, new States are often created during the conflict and ethnicity rather than nationality may become the grounds for allegiance. Or, put another way, ethnicity may become determinative of national allegiance.[104]

83. As found in previous Appeals Chamber jurisprudence, Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV is to be interpreted as intending to protect civilians who find themselves in the midst of an international, or internationalised, conflict to the maximum extent possible. The nationality requirement of Article 4 should therefore be ascertained upon a review of "the substance of relations"[105] and not based on the legal characterisation under domestic legislation. In today's ethnic conflicts, the victims may be "assimilated" to the external State involved in the conflict, even if they formally have the same nationality as their captors, for the purposes of the application of humanitarian law, and of Article 4 of Geneva Convention IV specifically. The Appeals Chamber thus agrees with the Tadi} Appeal Judgement that "even if in the circumstances of the case the perpetrators and the victims were to be regarded as possessing the same nationality, Article 4 would still be applicable".[106]

84. Applying the principle enunciated in Aleksovski, the Appeals Chamber sees no cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from the Tadi} Appeal Judgement. The nationality of the victims for the purpose of the application of Geneva Convention IV should not be determined on the basis of formal national characterisations, but rather upon an analysis of the substantial relations, taking into consideration the different ethnicity of the victims and the perpetrators, and their bonds with the foreign intervening State.

fundamental standards appearing in both bodies of law is the protection of the human person from certain heinous acts considered as unacceptable by all civilised nations in all circumstances.[196]

150. It is both legally and morally untenable that the rules contained in common Article 3, which constitute mandatory minimum rules applicable to internal conflicts, in which rules are less developed than in respect of international conflicts, would not be applicable to conflicts of an international character. The rules of common Article 3 are encompassed and further developed in the body of rules applicable to international conflicts. It is logical that this minimum be applicable to international conflicts as the substance of these core rules is identical. In the Appeals Chamber's view, something which is prohibited in internal conflicts is necessarily outlawed in an international conflict where the scope of the rules is broader. The Appeals Chamber is thus not convinced by the arguments raised by the appellants and finds no cogent reasons to depart from its previous conclusions.

2. Did the Trial Chamber Follow the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision?

151. The Trial Chamber found:

> While common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions was formulated to apply to internal armed conflicts, it is also clear from the above discussion that its substantive prohibitions apply equally in situations of international armed conflicts. Similarly, and as stated by the Appeals Chamber, the crimes falling under Article 3 of the Statute of the International Tribunal may be committed in either kind of conflicts. The Trial Chamber's finding that the conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina in 1992 was of an international nature does not, therefore, impact upon the application of Article 3.[197]

152. The Trial Chamber therefore clearly followed the Appeals Chamber jurisprudence.

C. Whether Common Article 3 Imposes Individual Criminal Responsibility

1. What is the Applicable Law?

153. The Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, in analysing whether common Article 3 attracts individual criminal responsibility first noted that "common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions contains no explicit reference to criminal liability for violation of its provisions".[198] Referring however to the findings of the International Military Tribunal at [198] Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, para 128.

Nuremberg[199] that a finding of individual criminal responsibility is not barred by the absence of treaty provisions on punishment of breaches, provided certain conditions are fulfilled, it found:

> Applying the foregoing criteria to the violations at issue here, we have no doubt that they entail individual criminal responsibility, regardless of whether they are committed in internal or international conflicts. Principles and rules of humanitarian law reflect "elementary considerations of humanity" widely recognised as the mandatory minimum for conduct in armed conflict of any kind. No one can doubt the gravity of the acts at issue, nor the interest of the international community in their prohibition.[200]

154. In the Appeals Chamber's opinion, this conclusion was also supported by "many elements of international practice (which) show that States intend to criminalise serious breaches of customary rules and principles on internal conflicts".[201] Specific reference was made to prosecutions before Nigerian courts,[202] national military manuals,[203] national legislation (including the law of the former Yugoslavia adopted by Bosnia and Herzegovina after its independence),[204] and resolutions adopted unanimously by the Security Council.[205]

155. The Appeals Chamber found further support for its conclusion in the law of the former Yugoslavia as it stood at the time of the offences alleged in the Indictment:

> Nationals of the former Yugoslavia as well as, at present, those of Bosnia-Herzegovina were therefore aware, or should have been aware, that they were amenable to the jurisdiction of their national criminal courts in cases of violation of international humanitarian law.[206]

156. Reliance was also placed by the Appeals Chamber on the agreement reached under the auspices of the ICRC on 22 May 1992, in order to conclude that the breaches of international law occurring within the context of the conflict, regarded as internal by the agreement, could be criminally sanctioned.[207]

157. The appellants contend that the evidence presented in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision does not establish that common Article 3 is customary international law that creates individual criminal responsibility because there is no showing of State practice and opinio juris.[208] Additionally, the appellants submit that at the time of the adoption of the Geneva Conventions in 1949, common Article 3 was excluded from the grave breaches system and thus did not fall within the scheme providing for individual criminal responsibility.[209] In their view, the position had not changed at the time of the adoption of Additional Protocol II in 1977. It is further argued that common Article 3 imposes duties on States only and is meant to be enforced by domestic legal systems.[210]

158. In addition, the appellants argue that solid evidence exists which demonstrates that common Article 3 is not a rule of customary law which imposes liability on natural persons.[211] Particular emphasis is placed on the ICTR Statute and the Secretary-General's Report which states that common Article 3 was criminalised for the first time in the ICTR Statute.[212]

159. The Prosecution argues that the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision previously disposed of the issue and should be followed. The Prosecution submits that, if violations of the international laws of war have traditionally been regarded as criminal under international law, there is no reason of principle why once those laws came to be extended to the context of internal armed conflicts, their violation in that context should not have been criminal, at least in the absence of clear indications to the contrary.[213] It is further submitted that since 1949, customary law and international humanitarian law have developed to such an extent that today universal jurisdiction does not only exist in relation to the grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions but also in relation to other types of serious violations of international humanitarian law.[214] The Prosecution contends that this conclusion is not contrary to the principle of legality, which does not preclude development of criminal law, so long as those developments do not criminalise conduct which at the time it was committed could reasonably have been regarded as legitimate.[215]

160. Whereas, as a matter of strict treaty law, provision is made only for the prosecution of grave breaches committed within the context of an international conflict, the Appeals Chamber in Tadi} found that as a matter of customary law, breaches of international humanitarian law

[211] The appellants rely on the ICRC practice; Nicaragua; the conclusions of the UN Expert Commission; the ILC draft codes; comments made in the Security Council; the ICC Statute. In relation to Nicaragua, Delali} submits that the finding that common Article 3 constitute customary international law is dicta and therefore not an authoritative holding. It is also argued that the ICC Statute constitutes evidence that common Article 3 does not reflect customary law: Delalic Brief, pp 32-40.

[212] The report stated that Article 4 "for the first time criminalizes common article 3 of the four Geneva Conventions". Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 5 of Security Council resolution 955 (1994), S/1995/134, 13 February 1995, para 12.

committed in internal conflicts, including violations of common Article 3, could also attract individual criminal responsibility.

161. Following the appellants' argument, two different regimes of criminal responsibility would exist based on the different legal characterisation of an armed conflict. As a consequence, the same horrendous conduct committed in an internal conflict could not be punished. The Appeals Chamber finds that the arguments put forward by the appellants do not withstand scrutiny.

162. As concluded by the Appeals Chamber in Tadi}, the fact that common Article 3 does not contain an explicit reference to individual criminal liability does not necessarily bear the consequence that there is no possibility to sanction criminally a violation of this rule. The IMT indeed followed a similar approach, as recalled in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision when the Appeals Chamber found that a finding of individual criminal responsibility is not barred by the absence of treaty provisions on punishment of breaches.[216] The Nuremberg Tribunal clearly established that individual acts prohibited by international law constitute criminal offences even though there was no provision regarding the jurisdiction to try violations: "Crimes against international law are committed by men, not by abstract entities, and only by punishing individuals who commit such crimes can the provisions of international law be enforced".[217]

163. The appellants argue that the exclusion of common Article 3 from the Geneva Conventions grave breaches system, which provides for universal jurisdiction, has the necessary consequence that common Article 3 attracts no individual criminal responsibility. This is misconceived. In the Appeals Chamber's view, the appellants' argument fails to make a distinction between two separate issues, the issue of criminalisation on the one hand, and the issue of jurisdiction on the other. Criminalisation may be defined as the act of outlawing or making illegal certain behaviour.[218] Jurisdiction relates more to the judicial authority to prosecute those criminal acts. These two concepts do not necessarily always correspond. The Appeals Chamber is in no doubt that the acts enumerated in common Article 3 were intended to be criminalised in 1949, as they were clearly intended to be illegal within the international legal order. The language of common Article 3 clearly prohibits fundamental offences such as murder and torture. However, no jurisdictional or enforcement mechanism was provided for in the Geneva Conventions at the time.

[217] As referred to in para 128 of Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision.
[218] Black's Law Dictionary, 6th ed (1990).

164. This interpretation is supported by the provisions of the Geneva Conventions themselves, which impose on State parties the duty "to respect and ensure respect for the present Conventions in all circumstances".[219] Common Article 1 thus imposes upon State parties, upon ratification, an obligation to implement the provisions of the Geneva Conventions in their domestic legislation. This obligation clearly covers the Conventions in their entirety and this obligation thus includes common Article 3. The ICJ in the Nicaragua case found that common Article 1 also applies to internal conflicts.[220]

165. In addition, the third paragraph of Article 146 of Geneva Convention IV, after setting out the universal jurisdiction mechanism applicable to grave breaches, provides:

> Each High Contracting Party shall take measures necessary for the suppression of all acts contrary to the provisions of the present Convention other than the grave breaches defined in the following Article.

166. The ICRC Commentary (GC IV) stated in relation to this provision that "there is no doubt that what is primarily meant is the repression of breaches other than the grave breaches listed and only in the second place administrative measures to ensure respect for the provisions of the Convention".[221] It then concluded:

> This shows that all breaches of the Convention should be repressed by national legislation. The Contracting Parties who have taken measures to repress the various grave breaches of the Convention and have fixed an appropriate penalty in each case should at least insert in their legislation a general clause providing for the punishment of other breaches. Furthermore, under the terms of this paragraph, the authorities of the Contracting Parties should give all those subordinate to them instructions in conformity with the Convention and should institute judicial or disciplinary punishment for breaches of the Convention.[222]

167. This, in the Appeals Chamber's view, clearly demonstrates that, as these provisions do not provide for exceptions, the Geneva Conventions envisaged that violations of common Article 3 could entail individual criminal responsibility under domestic law, which is accepted by the appellants. The absence of such legislation providing for the repression of such violations would, arguably, be inconsistent with the general obligation contained in common Article 1 of the Conventions.

168. As referred to by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision, States have adopted domestic legislation providing for the prosecution of violations of common Article 3. Since 1995, several more States have adopted legislation criminalising violations of common

Article 3,[223] thus further confirming the conclusion that States regard violations of common Article 3 as constituting crimes. Prosecutions based on common Article 3 under domestic legislation have also taken place.[224]

169. The Appeals Chamber is also not convinced by the appellants' submission that sanctions for violations of common Article 3 are intended to be enforced at the national level only. In this regard, the Appeals Chambers refers to its previous conclusion on the customary nature of common Article 3 and its incorporation in Article 3 of the Statute.

170. The argument that the ICTR Statute, which is concerned with an internal conflict, made violations of common Article 3 subject to prosecution at the international level, in the Appeals Chamber's opinion, reinforces this interpretation. The Secretary-General's statement that violations of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions were criminalised for the first time, meant that provisions for international jurisdiction over such violations were expressly made for the first time. This is so because the Security Council when it established the ICTR was not creating new law but was inter alia codifying existing customary rules for the purposes of the jurisdiction of the ICTR. In the Appeals Chamber's view, in establishing this Tribunal, the Security Council simply created an international mechanism for the prosecution of crimes which were already the subject of individual criminal responsibility.

171. The Appeals Chamber is unable to find any reason of principle why, once the application of rules of international humanitarian law came to be extended (albeit in an attenuated form) to the context of internal armed conflicts, their violation in that context could not be criminally enforced at the international level. This is especially true in relation to prosecution conducted by an international tribunal created by the UN Security Council, in a situation where it specifically called for the prosecution of persons responsible for violations of humanitarian law in an armed conflict regarded as constituting a threat to international peace and security pursuant to Chapter VII of the UN Charter.

172. In light of the fact that the majority of the conflicts in the contemporary world are internal, to maintain a distinction between the two legal regimes and their criminal consequences in respect of similarly egregious acts because of the difference in nature of the conflicts would ignore the very purpose of the Geneva Conventions, which is to protect the dignity of the human person.[225]

173. The Appeals Chamber is similarly unconvinced by the appellants' argument that such an interpretation of common Article 3 violates the principle of legality. The scope of this principle was discussed in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, which held that the principle of nullem crimen sine lege does not prevent a court from interpreting and clarifying the elements of a particular crime.[226] It is universally acknowledged that the acts enumerated in common Article 3 are wrongful and shock the conscience of civilised people, and thus are, in the language of Article 15(2) of the ICCPR, "criminal according to the general principles of law recognised by civilised nations."

174. The Appeals Chamber is unable to find any cogent reasons in the interests of justice to depart from the conclusions on this issue in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision.

2. Did the Trial Chamber Apply the Correct Legal Principles?

175. The Appeals Chamber notes that the appellants raised before the Trial Chamber the same arguments now raised in this appeal. The Trial Chamber held:

> Once again, this is a matter which has been addressed by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} Jurisdiction Decision and the Trial Chamber sees no reason to depart from its findings. In its Decision, the Appeals Chamber examines various national laws as well as practice, to illustrate that there are many instances of penal provisions for violations of the laws applicable in internal armed conflicts. From these sources, the Appeals Chamber extrapolates that there is nothing inherently contrary to the concept of individual criminal responsibility for violations of common Article 3 of the Geneva Conventions and that, indeed, such responsibility does ensue.[227]

176. It then concluded:

> The fact that the Geneva Conventions themselves do not expressly mention that there shall be criminal liability for violations of common Article 3 clearly does not in itself preclude such liability. Furthermore, identification of the violation of certain provisions of the Conventions as constituting "grave breaches" and thus subject to mandatory universal jurisdiction, certainly cannot be interpreted as rendering all of the remaining provisions of the Conventions as without criminal sanction. While "grave breaches" must be prosecuted and punished by all States, "other" breaches of the Geneva Conventions may be so. Consequently, an international tribunal such as this must also be permitted to prosecute and punish such violations of the Conventions.[228] [225] The Appeals Chamber also notes that in human rights law the violation of rights which have reached the level of jus cogens, such as torture, may constitute international crimes.

---

[226] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 126.
[227] Trial Judgement, para 307.
[228] Trial Judgement, para 308.

189. It is necessary to consider first the notion of command or superior authority within the meaning of Article 7(3) of the Statute before examining the specific issue of de facto authority. Article 87(3) of Additional Protocol I to the 1949 Geneva Conventions provides:

> The High Contracting Parties and Parties to the conflict shall require any commander who is aware that subordinates or other persons under his control are going to commit or have committed a breach of the Conventions or of his Protocol, to initiate such steps as are necessary to prevent such violations of the Conventions or this Protocol, and, where appropriate, to initiate disciplinary or penal action against violators thereof.[245]

190. The Blaski} Judgement, referring to the Trial Judgement and to Additional Protocol I, construed control in terms of the material ability of a commander to punish:

> What counts is his material ability, which instead of issuing orders or taking disciplinary action may entail, for instance, submitting reports to the competent authorities in order for proper measures to be taken.[246]

191. In respect of the meaning of a commander or superior as laid down in Article 7(3) of the Statute, the Appeals Chamber held in Aleksovski:

> Article 7(3) provides the legal criteria for command responsibility, thus giving the word "commander" a juridical meaning, in that the provision becomes applicable only where a superior with the required mental element failed to exercise his powers to prevent subordinates from committing offences or to punish them afterwards. This necessarily implies that a superior must have such powers prior to his failure to exercise them. If the facts of a case meet the criteria for the authority of a superior as laid down in Article 7(3), the legal finding would be that an accused is a superior within the meaning of that provision.[247]

192. Under Article 7(3), a commander or superior is thus the one who possesses the power or authority in either a de jure or a de facto form to prevent a subordinate's crime or to punish the perpetrators of the crime after the crime is committed.

193. The power or authority to prevent or to punish does not solely arise from de jure authority conferred through official appointment. In many contemporary conflicts, there may be only de facto, self-proclaimed governments and therefore de facto armies and paramilitary groups subordinate thereto. Command structure, organised hastily, may well be in disorder and primitive. To enforce the law in these circumstances requires a determination of accountability not only of individual offenders but of their commanders or other superiors who were, based on evidence, in control of them without, however, a formal commission or appointment. A tribunal could find itself powerless to enforce humanitarian law against de facto superiors if it only accepted as proof of command authority a formal letter of authority, despite the fact that the superiors acted at the relevant time with all the powers that would attach to an officially appointed superior or commander.

[246] Blaški} Judgement, para 302.
[247] Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, para 76.

194. In relation to Muci}'s responsibility, the Trial Chamber held:

> [...] whereas formal appointment is an important aspect of the exercise of command authority or superior authority, the actual exercise of authority in the absence of a formal appointment is sufficient for the purpose of incurring criminal responsibility. Accordingly, the factor critical to the exercise of command responsibility is the actual possession, or non-possession, of powers of control over the actions of the subordinates.[248]

195. The Trial Chamber, prior to making this statement in relation to the case of Muci}, had already considered the origin and meaning of de facto authority with reference to existing practice.[249] Based on an analysis of World War II jurisprudence, the Trial Chamber also concluded that the principle of superior responsibility reflected in Article 7(3) of the Statute encompasses political leaders and other civilian superiors in positions of authority.[250] The Appeals Chamber finds no reason to disagree with the Trial Chamber's analysis of this jurisprudence. The principle that military and other superiors may be held criminally responsible for the acts of their subordinates is well-established in conventional and customary law. The standard of control reflected in Article 87(3) of Additional Protocol I may be considered as customary in nature.[251] In relying upon the wording of Articles 86 and 87 of Additional Protocol I to conclude that "it is clear that the term 'superior' is sufficiently broad to encompass a position of authority based on the existence of de facto powers of control", the Trial Chamber properly considered the issue in finding the applicable law.[252]

196. "Command", a term which does not seem to present particular controversy in interpretation, normally means powers that attach to a military superior, whilst the term "control", which has a wider meaning, may encompass powers wielded by civilian leaders. In this respect, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that the rule is controversial that civilian leaders may incur responsibility in relation to acts committed by their subordinates or other persons under their effective control.[253] Effective control has been accepted, including in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, as a standard for the purposes of determining superior responsibility. The Bla{ki} Trial Chamber for instance endorsed the finding of the Trial

219. Delić agrees with the Prosecution's position that Articles 86 and 87 of Additional Protocol I reflect customary law as established through the post Second World War cases. A commander has a duty to be informed, but not every failure in this duty gives rise to command responsibility.[302]

220. The issues raised by this ground of appeal of the Prosecution include:

(i) whether in international law, the duty of a superior to control his subordinates includes a duty to be apprised of their action, i.e. a duty to know of their action and whether neglect of such duty will always result in criminal liability;

(ii) whether the standard of "had reason to know" means either the commander had information indicating that subordinates were about to commit or had committed offences or he did not have this information due to dereliction of his duty; and

(iii) whether international law acknowledges any distinction between military and civil leaders in relation to the duty to be informed.

221. The Appeals Chamber takes note of the fact that this ground of appeal is raised by the Prosecution for its general importance to the "jurisprudence of the Tribunal".[303] Considering that this ground concerns an important element of command responsibility, that the Prosecution alleges an error on the part of the Trial Chamber in respect of a finding as to the applicable law,[304] that the parties have made extensive submissions on it, and that it is indeed an issue of general importance to the proceedings before the Tribunal,[305] the Appeals Chamber will consider it by reference to Article 7(3) of the Statute and customary law at the time of the offences alleged in the Indictment.[306]

(i) The Mental Element Articulated by the Statute

222. Article 7(3) of the Statute provides that a superior may incur criminal responsibility for criminal acts of subordinates "if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so" but fails to prevent such acts or punish those subordinates.

223. The Trial Chamber held that a superior:

> [...] may possess the mens rea for command responsibility where: (1) he had actual knowledge, established through direct or circumstantial evidence, that his subordinates were committing or about to commit crimes referred to under Articles 2 through 5 of the Statute, or (2) where he had in his possession information of a nature, which at the least, would put him on notice of the risk of such offences by indicating the need for additional investigation in order to ascertain whether such crimes were committed or were about to be committed by his subordinates.[307]

224. The Prosecution position is essentially that the reference to "had reason to know" in Article 7(3) of the Statute, refers to two possible situations. First, a superior had information which put him on notice or which suggested to him that subordinates were about to commit or had committed crimes. Secondly, a superior lacked such information as a result of a serious dereliction of his duty to obtain the information within his reasonable access.[308] As acknowledged by the Prosecution, only the second situation is not encompassed by the Trial Chamber's findings.[309] Delali} argues to the effect that the Trial Chamber was correct in its statement of the law in this regard, and that the second situation envisaged by the Prosecution was in effect an argument based on strict liability.[310] Deli} agrees with the Prosecution's assessment of customary law that "the commander has an international duty to be informed", but argues that the Statute was designed by the UN Security Council in such a way that the jurisdiction of the Tribunal was limited to cases where the commander had actual knowledge or such knowledge that it gave him reason to know of subordinate offences, which was a rule inconsistent with customary law laid down in the military trials conducted after the Second World War.[311]

225. The literal meaning of Article 7(3) is not difficult to ascertain. A commander may be held criminally liable in respect of the acts of his subordinates in violation of Articles 2 to 5 of the Statute. Both the subordinates and the commander are individually responsible in relation to the impugned acts. The commander would be tried for failure to act in respect of the offences of his subordinates in the perpetration of which he did not directly participate.

226. Article 7(3) of the Statute is concerned with superior liability arising from failure to act in spite of knowledge. Neglect of a duty to acquire such knowledge, however, does not feature in the provision as a separate offence, and a superior is not therefore liable under the provision for such failures but only for failing to take necessary and reasonable measures to prevent or to punish. The Appeals Chamber takes it that the Prosecution seeks a finding that "reason to know" exists on the part of a commander if the latter is seriously negligent in his duty to obtain the relevant information. The point here should not be that knowledge may be presumed if a person fails in his duty to obtain the relevant information of a crime, but that it may be presumed if he had the means to obtain the knowledge but deliberately refrained from doing so. The Prosecution's argument that a breach of the duty of a superior to remain constantly informed of his subordinates actions will necessarily result in criminal liability comes close to the imposition of criminal liability on a strict or negligence basis. It is however noted that although a commander's failure to remain apprised of his subordinates' action, or to set up a monitoring system may constitute a neglect of duty which results in liability within the military disciplinary framework, it will not necessarily result in criminal liability.

227. As the Tribunal is charged with the application of customary law,[312] the Appeals Chamber will briefly consider the case-law in relation to whether there is a duty in customary law to know of all subordinate activity, breach of which will give rise to criminal responsibility in the context of command or superior responsibility.

(ii) Duty to Know In Customary Law

228. In the Yamashita case, the United States Military Commission found that:

> Clearly, assignment to command military troops is accompanied by broad authority and heavy responsibility [...]. It is absurd, however, to consider a commander a murderer or rapist because one of his soldiers commits a murder or a rape. Nevertheless, where murder and rape and vicious, revengeful actions are widespread offences, and there is no effective attempt by a commander to discover and control the criminal acts, such a commander may be held responsible, even criminally liable, for the lawless acts of his troops, depending upon their nature and the circumstances surrounding them.[313]

The Military Commission concluded that proof of widespread offences, and secondly of the failure of the commander to act in spite of the offences, may give rise to liability. The second factor suggests that the commander needs to discover and control. But it is the first factor that is of primary importance, in that it gives the commander a reason or a basis to discover the scope of the offences. In the Yamashita case, the fact stood out that the atrocities took place between 9 October 1944 to 3 September 1945, during which General Yamashita was the commander-in-chief of the 14th Army Group including the Military Police.[314] This length of time begs the question as to how the commander and his staff could be ignorant of large-scale atrocities spreading over this long period. The statement of the commission implied that it had found that the circumstances demonstrated that he had enough notice of the atrocities to require him to proceed to investigate further and control the offences. The fact that widespread offences were committed over a long period of time should have put him on notice that crimes were being or had been committed by his subordinates.

[312] Secretary–General's Report, para 34.

[314] Ibid, p 19.

229. On the same case, the United Nations War Crimes Commission commented:

> [...] the crimes which were shown to have been committed by Yamashita's troops were so widespread, both in space and in time, that they could be regarded as providing either prima facie evidence that the accused knew of their perpetration, or evidence that he must have failed to fulfil a duty to discover the standard of conduct of his troops.[315]

This last sentence deserves attention. However, having considered several cases decided by other military tribunals, it went on to qualify the above statement:

> Short of maintaining that a Commander has a duty to discover the state of discipline prevailing among his troops, Courts dealing with cases such as those at present under discussion may in suitable instances have regarded means of knowledge as being the same as knowledge itself.[316]

In summary, it pointedly stated that "the law on this point awaits further elucidation and consolidation".[317] Contrary to the Trial Chamber's conclusion, other cases discussed in the Judgement do not show a consistent trend in the decisions that emerged out of the military trials conducted after the Second World War.[318] The citation from the Judgement in the case of United States v Wilhelm List[319] ("Hostage case") indicates that List failed to acquire "supplementary reports to apprise him of all the pertinent facts".[320] The tribunal in the case found that if a commander of occupied territory "fails to require and obtain complete information" he is guilty of a dereliction of his duty.[321] List was found to be charged with notice of the relevant crimes because of reports which had been made to him.[322] Therefore, List had in his possession information that should have prompted him to investigate further the situation under his command. The Trial Chamber also quoted from the Pohl case.[323] The phrase quoted is also meant to state a different point than that suggested by the Trial Chamber. In that case, the accused Mummenthey pleaded ignorance of fact in respect of certain aspects of the running of his business which employed concentration camp prisoners.[324] Having refuted this plea by invoking evidence showing that the accused knew fully of those aspects, the tribunal stated:

> Mummenthey's assertions that he did not know what was happening in the labor camps and enterprises under his jurisdiction does not exonerate him. It was his duty to know.[325]

That statement, when read in the context of that part of the judgement, means that the accused was under a duty arising from his position as an SS officer and business manager in charge of a war-time enterprise to know what was happening in his business, including the conditions of the labour force who worked in that business. Any suggestion that the tribunal used that statement to express that the accused had a duty under international law to know would be obiter in light of the finding that he had knowledge. In the Roechling case, which was also referred to by the Trial Chamber, the court concluded that Roechling had a "duty to keep himself informed about the treatment of the deportees."[326] However, it also noted that "Roechling [...] had repeated opportunities during the inspection of his concerns to ascertain the fate meted out to his personnel, since he could not fail to notice the prisoner's uniform on those occasions".[327] This was information which would put him on notice. It is to be noted that the courts which referred to the existence of a "duty to know" at the same time found that the accused were put on notice of subordinates' acts.

230. Further, the Field Manual of the US Department of Army 1956 (No. 27-10, Law of Land Warfare) provides:

> The commander is...responsible, if he had actual knowledge, or should have had knowledge, through reports received by him or through other means, that troops or other persons subject to his control are about to commit or have committed a war crime and he fails to use the means at his disposal to insure compliance with the law of war.[328]

The italicised clause is clear that the commander should be presumed to have had knowledge if he had reports or other means of communication; in other words, he had already information as contained in reports or through other means, which put him on notice. On the basis of this analysis, the Appeals Chamber must conclude, in the same way as did the United Nations War Crimes Commission,[329] that the then customary law did not impose in the criminal context a general duty to know upon commanders or superiors, breach of which would be sufficient to render him responsible for subordinates' crimes.

231. The anticipated elucidation and consolidation of the law on the question as to whether there was a duty under customary law for the commander to obtain the necessary information came with Additional Protocol I. Article 86(2) of the protocol provides:

> The fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach.[330]

232. The phrase, "had reason to know", is not as clear in meaning as that of "had information enabling them to conclude", although it may be taken as effectively having a similar meaning. The latter standard is more explicit, and its rationale is plain: failure to conclude, or conduct additional inquiry, in spite of alarming information constitutes knowledge of subordinate offences. Failure to act when required to act with such knowledge is the basis for attributing liability in this category of case.

233. The phrase "had information", as used in Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I, presents little difficulty for interpretation. It means that, at the critical time, the commander had in his possession such information that should have put him on notice of the fact that an unlawful act was being, or about to be, committed by a subordinate. As observed by the Trial Chamber, the apparent discrepancy between the French version, which reads "des informations leur permettant de conclure" (literally: information enabling them to conclude), and the English version of Article 86(2) does not undermine this interpretation.[331] This is a reference to information, which, if at hand, would oblige the commander to obtain more information (i.e. conduct further inquiry), and he therefore "had reason to know".

234. As noted by the Trial Chamber, the formulation of the principle of superior responsibility in the ILC Draft Code is very similar to that in Article 7(3) of the Statute.[332] Further, as the ILC comments on the draft articles drew from existing practice, they deserve close attention.[333] The ILC comments on the mens rea for command responsibility run as follows:

> Article 6 provides two criteria for determining whether a superior is to be held criminally responsible for the wrongful conduct of a subordinate. First, a superior must have known or > had reason to know in the circumstances at the time that a subordinate was committing or was going to commit a crime. This criterion indicates that a superior may have the mens rea required to incur criminal responsibility in two different situations. In the first situation, a superior has actual knowledge that his subordinate is committing or is about to commit a crime...In the second situation, he has sufficient relevant information to enable him to conclude under the circumstances at the time that his subordinates are committing or are about to commit a crime.[334]

The ILC further explains that "[t]he phrase 'had reason to know' is taken from the statutes of the ad hoc tribunals and should be understood as having the same meaning as the phrase 'had information enabling them to conclude' which is used in the Additional Protocol I. The Commission decided to use the former phrase to ensure an objective rather than a subjective interpretation of this element of the first criterion."[335]

235. The consistency in the language used by Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I, and the ILC Report and the attendant commentary, is evidence of a consensus as to the standard of the mens rea of command responsibility. If "had reason to know" is interpreted to mean that a commander has a duty to inquire further, on the basis of information of a general nature he has in hand, there is no material difference between the standard of Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I and the standard of "should have known" as upheld by certain cases decided after the Second World War.[336]

236. After surveying customary law and especially the drafting history of Article 86 of Additional Protocol I,[337] the Trial Chamber concluded that:

> An interpretation of the terms of this provision [Article 86 of Additional Protocol I] in accordance with their ordinary meaning thus leads to the conclusion, confirmed by the travaux préparatoires, that a superior can be held criminally responsible only if some specific information was in fact available to him which would provide notice of offences committed by his subordinates. This information need not be such that it by itself was sufficient to compel the conclusion of the existence of such crimes. It is sufficient that the superior was put on further inquiry by the information, or, in other words, that it indicated the need for additional investigation in order to ascertain whether offences were being committed or about to be committed by his subordinates. This standard, which must be considered to reflect the position of customary law at the time of the offences alleged in the Indictment, is accordingly controlling for the construction of the mens rea standard established in Article 7(3). The Trial Chamber thus makes no finding as to the present content of customary law on this point.[338] [334] Ibid, pp 37-38 (emphasis added).

[335] Ibid, p 38. Article 28(a) of the ICC Statute provides for the responsibility of a military commander or a person effectively acting as a military commander. To establish the responsibility, proof is required that the commander or person "either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes".

[336] Trial Judgement, para 389, where the trial of Admiral Toyoda was cited. Also, the Tokyo Trial Judgement, International Military Tribunal for the Far East (29 April 1946-12 November 1948), Vol.1, p 30, cited in the Prosecution Brief, para 2.9.

[337] The Trial Chamber, in particular, correctly observed to the effect that an overly broad "should have known" standard was rejected at the conference which adopted Additional Protocol I. Trial Judgement, para 391.

[338] Ibid, para 393.

237. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber relied improperly upon reference to the object and purpose of Additional Protocol I.[339] The ordinary meaning of the language of Article 86(2) regarding the knowledge element of command responsibility is clear. Though adding little to the interpretation of the language of the provision, the context of the provision as provided by Additional Protocol I simply confirms an interpretation based on the natural meaning of its provisions. Article 87 requires parties to a conflict to impose certain duties on commanders, including the duty in Article 87(3) to "initiate disciplinary or penal action" against subordinates or other persons under their control who have committed a breach of the Geneva Conventions or of the Protocol. That duty is limited by the terms of Article 87(3) to circumstances where the commander "is aware" that his subordinates are going to commit or have committed such breaches. Article 87 therefore interprets Article 86(2) as far as the duties of the commander or superior are concerned, but the criminal offence based on command responsibility is defined in Article 86(2) only.

238. Contrary to the Prosecution's submission, the Trial Chamber did not hold that a superior needs to have information on subordinate offences in his actual possession for the purpose of ascribing criminal liability under the principle of command responsibility. A showing that a superior had some general information in his possession, which would put him on notice of possible unlawful acts by his subordinates would be sufficient to prove that he "had reason to know". The ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocol I) refers to "reports addressed to (the superior), [...] the tactical situation, the level of training and instruction of subordinate officers and their troops, and their character traits" as potentially constituting the information referred to in Article 86(2) of Additional Protocol I.[340] As to the form of the information available to him, it may be written or oral, and does not need to have the form of specific reports submitted pursuant to a monitoring system. This information does not need to provide specific information about unlawful acts committed or about to be committed. For instance, a military commander who has received information that some of the soldiers under his command have a violent or unstable character, or have been drinking prior to being sent on a mission, may be considered as having the required knowledge.

239. Finally, the relevant information only needs to have been provided or available to the superior, or in the Trial Chamber's words, "in the possession of". It is not required that he actually acquainted himself with the information. In the Appeals Chamber's view, an assessment of the mental element required by Article 7(3) of the Statute should be conducted in the specific circumstances of each case, taking into account the specific situation of the superior concerned at the time in question. Thus, as correctly held by the Trial Chamber,[341] as the element of knowledge has to be proved in this type of cases, command responsibility is not a form of strict liability. A superior may only be held liable for the acts of his subordinates if it is shown that he "knew or had reason to know" about them. The Appeals Chamber would not describe superior responsibility as a vicarious liability doctrine, insofar as vicarious liability may suggest a form of strict imputed liability.

(iii) Civilian Superiors

240. The Prosecution submits that civilian superiors are under the same duty to know as military commanders.[342] If, as found by the Appeals Chamber, there is no such "duty" to know in customary law as far as military commanders are concerned, this submission lacks the necessary premise. Civilian superiors undoubtedly bear responsibility for subordinate offences under certain conditions, but whether their responsibility contains identical elements to that of military commanders is not clear in customary law. As the Trial Chamber made a factual determination that Delali} was not in a position of superior authority over the ^elebi}i camp in any capacity, there is no need for the Appeals Chamber to resolve this question.

(iv) Conclusion

241. For the foregoing reasons, this ground of appeal is dismissed. The Appeals Chamber upholds the interpretation given by the Trial Chamber to the standard "had reason to know", that is, a superior will be criminally responsible through the principles of superior responsibility only if information was available to him which would have put him on notice of offences committed by subordinates.[343] This is consistent with the customary law standard of mens rea as existing at the time of the offences charged in the Indictment.

2. Whether Delali} Exercised Superior Responsibility

242. The Prosecution's second ground of appeal alleges an error of law in the Trial Chamber's interpretation of the nature of the superior-subordinate relationship which must be established to prove liability under Article 7(3) of the Statute. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber wrongly "held that the doctrine of superior responsibility requires the

[341] Trial Judgement, para 383.
[342] Prosecution Brief, para 2.11.

255. It is clear that the Trial Chamber drew a considerable measure of assistance from the ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocols) on Article 86 of Additional Protocol I (which refers to the circumstances in which a superior will be responsible for breaches of the Conventions or the Protocol committed by his subordinate) in finding that actual control of the subordinate is a necessary requirement of the superior-subordinate relationship.[372] The Commentary on Article 86 of Additional Protocol I states that:

> [...] we are concerned only with the superior who has a personal responsibility with regard to the perpetrator of the acts concerned because the latter, being his subordinate, is under his control. The direct link which must exist between the superior and the subordinate clearly follows from the duty to act laid down in paragraph 1 [of Article 86]. Furthermore only that superior is normally in the position of having information enabling him to conclude in the circumstances at the time that the subordinate has committed or is going to commit a breach. However it should not be concluded from this that the provision only concerns the commander under whose direct orders the subordinate is placed. The concept of the superior is broader and should be seen in terms of a hierarchy encompassing the concept of control.[373]

The point which the commentary emphasises is the concept of control, which results in a relationship of superior and subordinate.

256. The Appeals Chamber agrees that this supports the Trial Chamber's interpretation of the law on this point. The concept of effective control over a subordinate - in the sense of a material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct, however that control is exercised - is the threshold to be reached in establishing a superior-subordinate relationship for the purpose of Article 7(3) of the Statute.[374]

257. In considering the Prosecution submissions relating to "substantial influence", it can be noted that they are not easily reconcilable with other Prosecution submissions in relation to command responsibility. The Prosecution expressly endorses the requirement that the superior have effective control over the perpetrator,[375] but then espouses, apparently as a matter of general application, a theory that in fact "substantial influence" alone may suffice, in that "where a person's powers of influence amount to a sufficient degree of authority or control in the circumstances to put that person in a position to take preventative action, a failure to do so

[372] Trial Judgement, paras 354, 371 and 647, referring to para 3544 of the ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocols). Article 86(2) provides: "The fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach."

[373] ICRC Commentary (Additional Protocols), para 3544.

[374] It has been elsewhere accepted in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal that, where there is no effective control, there is no superior responsibility: Aleksovski Trial Judgement, para 108 (HVO soldiers with arms forced their way into the prison without the guards being able to stop them) and para 111 (no finding was made on any existence of control by Aleksovski over the HVO soldiers).

war crimes."[642] In the Trial of Josef Altstötter and Others (The Justice Trial), the tribunal found numerous defendants guilty of war crimes as well as crimes against humanity based on exactly the same acts,[643] thus appearing to uphold the possibility of cumulative convictions, at least when war crimes and crimes against humanity are involved.

412. Having considered the different approaches expressed on this issue both within this Tribunal and other jurisdictions, this Appeals Chamber holds that reasons of fairness to the accused and the consideration that only distinct crimes may justify multiple convictions, lead to the conclusion that multiple criminal convictions entered under different statutory provisions but based on the same conduct are permissible only if each statutory provision involved has a materially distinct element not contained in the other. An element is materially distinct from another if it requires proof of a fact not required by the other.

413. Where this test is not met, the Chamber must decide in relation to which offence it will enter a conviction. This should be done on the basis of the principle that the conviction under the more specific provision should be upheld. Thus, if a set of facts is regulated by two provisions, one of which contains an additional materially distinct element, then a conviction should be entered only under that provision.

414. In this case, defendants Mucic and Delic have been convicted of numerous crimes under Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute, which crimes arise out of the same acts. The chart below summarises their convictions.

without identifying who was involved in it.[693] He said that he thought that the second beating occurred the next evening, and said:

> He was called out again outside, at night fall. I remember Zenga, Esad Landžo. He came in. He came into the hangar. I think that Delic was near the door, outside. He didn't want to go out. He was – and then two other prisoners were ordered to help him get up and push him out, outside the door. This was right next to me in the hangar. They started beating him and by the number of blows, the movements and everything we could hear, there must have been a large group of people, several people.[694]

The "he" who did not want to go out was clearly Gotovac. Witness B was not asked to identify who "they" were who started beating Gotovac. He later described the threat by Landžo concerning the badge on Gotovac's forehead.[695]

452. The Prosecution argued that the sentence "I think that Delic was near the door, outside" should be interpreted as expressing doubt not as to whether Delic was there at the time of the second beating, but only as to where he was standing.[696] Such an argument would have greater force if Witness B had elsewhere in his evidence identified Delic as having been present, but he did not do so. The presence of Delic during the second beating was a vital piece of evidence linking him to that beating. It is the obligation of the Prosecution to ensure that its vital evidence is clear and unambiguous. An accused person should not be convicted upon the basis of a verbal ambiguity in that vital evidence. This sentence of Witness B's evidence, read literally, expresses some doubt as to whether Delic was present, not merely as to where he was standing. Where a Prosecution witness whose evidence is vital is able to clarify any ambiguity in that evidence, and where the Prosecution does not seek to have the witness do so, the inference is available that it did not do so because the evidence would not have assisted the Prosecution case. That is not to say that such an inference ought always to be drawn against the Prosecution, but its mere availability tends to render unsafe any resolution of the ambiguity in favour of the Prosecution.

453. Rajko Draganic described Delic and Landžo as beating Gotovac on the first occasion.[697] In relation to what may have been either the first or the second beating (the evidence is ambiguous), he said:[698]

> [...] and that Delic said, Zenga [Landžo], I do not know exactly, he said two people should come and carry him inside.

therefore not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to regard the totality of the evidence, when taken as a whole, as establishing beyond reasonable doubt Delic's guilt.

487. Deli}'s grounds of appeal relating to Counts 3 and 4 must accordingly be dismissed.

D. Issues 13 and 14: Convictions Under Counts 18 and 19

488. In Counts 18 and 19, Delic was found guilty of torture for the rape of Grozdana Cecez (for the purposes of this section, "the victim").[744] It was found that the victim was taken to the Celebici camp on 27 May 1992 and on her arrival was brought to a room in which Delic was waiting. She was interrogated by Delic, during the course of which he slapped her. She was then taken to another room with three men including Delic. Delic subsequently raped her.[745] It was found that these rapes constituted the offence of torture.[746]

489. Delic's principal argument centres on the victim's testimony, submitting that it was so weak and contradicted, that the Trial Chamber's conclusions were clearly wrong.[747] In particular, he refers to elements of her testimony which illustrate her unreliability because: (1) she failed to identify Delic properly;[748] (2) her own evidence was weak and contradictory when given in relation to certain issues;[749] (3) her evidence contradicted evidence given by other witnesses, in particular Milojka Antic;[750] and (4) she was unable to recall certain events,[751] illustrating what he describes as her "selective memory".[752]

490. As to the reliability of the testimony presented in relation to these counts, the Trial Chamber in general found:

> the testimony of Ms. Cecez, and the supporting testimony of Witness D and Dr. Grubac, credible and compelling, and thus concludes that Ms. Cecez was raped by Delic, and others, in the ^elebici prison-camp.[753]

491. The argument made under these grounds attacks the credibility and reliability of the main witness on whom the Trial Chamber relied to convict. The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Trial Chamber was in the best position to hear, assess and weigh this testimony. It was accordingly for the Trial Chamber to consider whether the witness was reliable and her evidence credible. In such circumstances, the Appeals Chamber must always give a margin of deference to a Trial Chamber's evaluation of the evidence and findings of fact.[754] It is for Delic in these circumstances to demonstrate that this evidence could not reasonably have been accepted by any reasonable person, that the Trial Chamber's evaluation was wholly erroneous and that therefore the Appeals Chamber should substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber.[755]

492. Delic does not dispute the fact that the Rules do not require corroboration of a victim's testimony.[756] However, although the Trial Chamber also relied on additional testimony to support the principal account, the only direct evidence (and that disputed) in relation to the rapes carried out by Delic was that of the victim. Delic states that this testimony was not worthy of belief, due primarily to inconsistencies in the evidence which he claims illustrate its unreliability.

493. As to these alleged inconsistencies, Delic firstly alleges that the victim's identification of him as the person who raped him was suspect, as she could not identify him in a photograph array and was not asked to identify him directly in court.[757] The Trial Chamber found that: "Upon her arrival at the prison-camp she was taken [...] to a room where a man with a crutch was waiting, whom she subsequently identified as Delic".[758] The Appeals Chamber notes that the victim, having identified Delic at the start of her testimony as "the man with a crutch", confirmed this identification throughout her testimony,[759] while also referring to him by name.[760] The Appeals Chamber sees no reason to question the evaluation of this identification by the Trial Chamber.

759 In testimony, she stated: "When I entered that room, it was a very small room. I saw a man with a crutch. There was a crutch next to him. His leg was bandaged". Trial Transcript p 491. She continued to refer to him as the "the man with the crutch", (e.g., Trial Transcript p 492, when asked who slapped her) and "[t]he one with the crutch" (e.g., Trial Transcript p 494, when asked who raped her). She then stated: "At that time I still did not know who he was but later I found out. Soon after that I found out who and what he was Hazim Delic" (Trial Transcript p 494).
760 In particular, when asked again to confirm the identification, Grozdana Cecez stated that although she did not know who Delic was when he raped her, she "learned shortly [after]. [ ] The women from Bradina had come, and somebody from the entrance was looking for Hazim Delic and he appeared, so I realised that he was the man. He was carrying a crutch and he was limping, so I knew straight away who he was". She further testified in some domestic jurisdictions, the testimony of victims of sexual assault is not, as a general rule, less reliable than the testimony of any other witness. The appellant's argument that the Trial Chamber shifted the burden of proof to the Defence is thus misconceived, as the Trial Chamber did not rely on any "presumption of reliability" to assess the evidence before it. In the paragraph following the one just quoted the Trial Chamber assessed the evidence of Ms Anti} as follows:

> Despite the contentions of the Defence, the Trial Chamber accepts Ms. Anti}'s testimony, and finds, on this basis, and the supporting evidence of Ms.]e}ez, Witness P and Dr. Petko Gruba~, that she was subjected to three rapes by Hazim Deli}. The Trial Chamber finds Ms. Anti}'s testimony as a whole compelling and truthful, particularly in light of her detailed recollection of the circumstances of each rape and her demeanour in the court room in general and, particularly, under cross-examination. The alleged inconsistencies between her evidence at trial and prior statements are immaterial and were sufficiently explained by Ms. Anti}. She consistently stated under cross-examination that, when she made those prior statements, she was experiencing the shock of reliving the rapes that she had "kept inside for so many years". Further, the probative value of these prior statements is considerably less than that of direct sworn testimony which has been subjected to cross-examination.[785]

506. As already stated, there is no legal requirement that the testimony of a single witness on a material fact be corroborated before it can be accepted as evidence.[786] What matters is the reliability and credibility accorded to the testimony. Contrary to Deli}'s assertion, the Trial Chamber did not presume that the testimony of Ms Anti} was reliable and credible as it discussed it carefully, and identified particular reasons why it considered her credible. Clearly, the testimony of Ms Anti} was ascertained on its individual merit, and treated as the testimony of any other witness, and the Trial Chamber was careful to discuss the inconsistencies between prior and live testimony.[787] Moreover, as held above and also in this Judgment, the hearing, assessing and weighing of the evidence presented at trial is primarily vested with the Trial Chamber, which is best placed to ascertain whether a witness is reliable in the circumstances of the case.[788]

507. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the appellant has failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber erred in its evaluation of the evidence, and reached a conclusion that no reasonable tribunal could have reached. Accordingly, these grounds of appeal must fail.

XII. JUDGE ODIO BENITO AND VICE-PRESIDENCY OF COSTA RICA

651. Three of the appellants – Delic, Mucic and Landžo – filed grounds of appeal based upon the facts that, whilst still a judge of the Tribunal and engaged in hearing this case, Judge Odio Benito was elected as a Vice-President of Costa Rica and took an oath of office as such. The grounds were in the following terms:

> Delic Issue 1
>
> Whether the Trial Chamber was properly constituted after 8 May 1998 in that Judge Elizabeth Odio Benito was no longer qualified to serve as a judge of the Tribunal in that she did not meet the qualifications in Article 13(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal.[1100]
>
> Mucic Ground 1
>
> Whether Judge Odio Benito was disqualified as a judge of the Tribunal by reason of her election as Vice-President of the Republic of Costa Rica.[1101]
>
> Landžo Ground 2
> The Participation at Trial as a Member of the Trial Chamber of a Judge Ineligible to Sit as a Judge of the Tribunal Violated Articles 13 and 21 of the Statute of the ICTY, the Rules of Natural Justice and International Law and Rendered the Trial a Nullity.[1102]

These grounds raise two distinct issues:

(1) Was Judge Odio Benito no longer qualified as a judge of the Tribunal by reason of those facts?

(2) Should Judge Odio Benito have disqualified herself as a judge by reason of those facts because she was no longer independent?

A. Background

652. Judge Odio Benito was elected as a judge of the Tribunal in September 1993, and she was installed as such on 17 November 1993 for a term of four years.[1103] In the elections held on 20 May 1997, neither she nor the other two judges hearing this case were re-elected. On 27 August 1997, the UN Security Council passed a resolution endorsing a recommendation by the Secretary-General that these three judges, "once replaced as members of the Tribunal, finish the Celebici case which they have begun before expiry of their terms of office [...]".[1104]

653. On 1 February 1998, and during the course of the trial in this case, Judge Odio Benito was elected as the Second Vice-President of the Republic of Costa Rica, and she took an oath of office as such on 8 May 1998. On 25 May 1998, the four accused jointly filed a "Motion on Judicial Independence", addressed to Judge Karibi-White, the Presiding Judge of the Trial Chamber. The four accused submitted that Judge Odio Benito should cease to take any further part in the trial, upon the grounds that, by having taken that oath of office and thereby become a member of the executive branch of the Government of Costa Rica:

(1) she had ceased to meet (a) the qualifications for a judge of the Tribunal, and (b) the criteria required for an independent judge in international law, and

(2) she had acquired an association which may affect her impartiality.[1105]

Pursuant to Rule 15(B) of the Tribunal's Rules, Judge Karibi-White conferred with Judge Odio Benito and then referred the Motion to the Bureau for its determination.[1106]

654. On 4 September 1998, the Bureau determined that Judge Odio Benito was not disqualified from sitting in the trial on the grounds referred to in Rule 15(A).[1107] Although the Bureau acknowledged that its competence conferred by the Rules did not extend to those aspects of the Motion on Judicial Independence which went beyond the scope of Rule 15(A),[1108] it did consider, and it rejected, the claim that Judge Odio Benito had ceased to possess the qualifications required for appointment to the highest judicial offices of her country (and therefore to be a judge of the Tribunal).[1109] There was no challenge at the time to either of these determinations.[1110]

[1106] Decision of the Bureau on Motion for Judicial Independence, 4 Sept 1998 ("Bureau Decision"), p 4. The four accused, apparently in ignorance of that referral, subsequently filed a request for a hearing of their joint motion or, alternatively, a request that the Presiding Judge refer the matter to the Bureau. This application was disposed of informally (Trial Transcript, pp 14930-14933).
[1107] Bureau Decision, p 11. Rule 15(A) provides: "A judge may not sit on a trial or appeal in any case in which the judge has a personal interest or concerning which the judge has or has had any association which might affect his or her impartiality".
[1108] Bureau Decision, p 11.
[1109] Ibid, p 6.
[1110] It was suggested during the hearing of the appeal that this was because the Bureau Decision of Sept 1998 "was not rendered until after the trial had been concluded" (Appeal Transcript, p 724). That is not so. The final submissions concluded on 15 October 1998 (Trial Transcript, p 16372), and Judgement in the trial was delivered on 16 November 1998.

B. Was Judge Odio Benito No Longer Qualified as a Judge of the Tribunal?

655. The qualifications for judges of the Tribunal are stated in Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute:

> Article 13
>
> Qualifications and election of judges
>
> The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. In the overall composition of the Chambers due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law.[1111]

This provision is not stated in terms of qualification for election as judges, but rather in terms of continuous application ("The judges shall be [...]"). If, for example, a judge of the Tribunal were to be found guilty of some offence committed during his or her term of office which demonstrated a lack of high moral character or integrity, it could hardly be suggested that such a judge remained qualified within the terms of Article 13 simply because he or she was qualified at the time of election. The Appeals Chamber accepts that a judge must remain qualified within the meaning of Article 13 throughout his or her term of office.

656. The appellants have directed their arguments to the requirement of Article 13 that the judges of the Tribunal "possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices". Judge Odio Benito was elected as a judge of the Tribunal on the nomination of her country, the Republic of Costa Rica. The highest judicial office in that country is that of a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice of Costa Rica.[1112] The appellants argue that, by reason of her assumption of office as Vice-President of Costa Rica, Judge Odio Benito was constitutionally rendered disqualified for election as such a magistrate and therefore lost her qualifications as a judge of the Tribunal.

[1111] This was the form of Article 13(1) of the Statute at the relevant time. It has since been amended by Security Council Resolution 1329, 30 Nov 2000, so that the opening sentence commences: "The permanent and ad litem judges shall be persons of high moral character [...]".

[1112] Constitution of the Republic of Costa Rica ("Constitution"), Article 156. The Constitution was adopted in 1949. The parties (the Prosecution and Landžo, representing all three convicted appellants) have agreed upon an accurate English language translation of the Constitution (which is written in the Spanish language) as it was in force between 17 Nov 1997 (the date upon which Judge Odio Benito's original term expired) and 16 Nov 1998 (the date upon which the Judgement was delivered): Agreement Between the Prosecution and Appellant, Esad Landžo, Regarding the Constitution of Costa Rica, 28 Jul 2000, para 7. Article 156 provides: "The Supreme Court of Justice is the highest court of the judicial branch [...]".

657. On the other hand, the Prosecution, in addition to disputing the appellants' interpretation of Article 13,[1113] argues that, by reason of the Security Council's resolution permitting Judge Odio Benito (and the other two members of the Trial Chamber) to finish this case notwithstanding that they had been replaced as members of the Tribunal, the provisions of Article 13 no longer applied to them.[1114]

658. For reasons which will be given later in this Judgement, the Appeals Chamber does not accept either of these arguments, but it believes that it is important to state first its interpretation of Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute.

659. In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, any interpretation of Article 13 must take into account the restriction imposed by Article 12 of the Statute, that no two judges may be nationals of the same State. The Statute envisages that judges from a wide variety of legal systems would be elected to the Tribunal, and that the qualifications for appointment to the highest judicial offices in those systems would similarly be widely varied. The intention of Article 13 must therefore be to ensure, so far as possible, that the essential qualifications do not differ from judge to judge. Those essential qualifications are character (encompassing impartiality and integrity), legal qualifications (as required for appointment to the highest judicial office) and experience (in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law). Article 13 was not intended to include every local qualification for the highest judicial office such as nationality by birth or religion, or disqualification for such high judicial office such as age. Nor was Article 13 intended to include constitutional disqualifications peculiar to any particular country for reasons unrelated to those essential qualifications.

660. This is certainly the way the Security Council has interpreted Article 13 to date. Article 13(2) provides that, before the judges of the Tribunal are elected by the UN General Assembly, the Security Council must submit for consideration by the General Assembly a list of candidates reducing those nominated by the States to a lesser number which takes into due account the need for adequate representation of the principal legal systems of the world. It may safely be assumed that the Security Council would not include within that reduced list any candidate who did not satisfy the requirements of Article 13. Indeed there are concrete examples where the Security Council has interpreted Article 13 in the way set forth by this Chamber.

[1113] Prosecution Response, para 13.42.
[1114] Prosecution Supplementary Brief, para 4.

661. When Judge Odio Benito was included in the list of candidates for election in 1993, she was still (according to her curriculum vitae which accompanied her nomination)[1115] the Minister of Justice of the Republic of Costa Rica – which, if the appellants's argument were to be accepted, would have constitutionally rendered her disqualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice and as a judge of this Tribunal.[1116] Judge Sir Ninian Stephen was already seventy years of age when elected as a judge of the Tribunal in 1993,[1117] and thus was to be seventy four years of age at the conclusion of his term. The highest compulsory retirement age for any high judicial office in his country (Australia) is seventy-two – being for the Supreme Court of New South Wales. In neither of these cases was the judge thought by the Security Council not to be qualified as a judge of the Tribunal for a four year term.

662. It was accepted by the appellants that Judge Odio Benito at all times remained qualified as a judge of the Tribunal in relation to her character, legal qualifications and experience. The Appeals Chamber is accordingly satisfied that Judge Odio Benito did not lose her qualifications as a judge of the Tribunal by reason of her assumption of office as Vice-President of Costa Rica.

663. In any event, the Appeals Chamber does not accept the argument of the appellants that her assumption of office as a Vice-President of Costa Rica rendered Judge Odio Benito constitutionally disqualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice under the Constitution of that country. It expresses this opinion as a matter of interpretation of the Constitution of Costa Rica, consistently with the jurisprudence of that country as identified by expert evidence during the appeal.

664. The Constitution states:

> The government of the Republic [...] is exercised by three distinct and independent branches: legislative, executive and judicial.[1118]

665. The Constitution has separate sections dealing with the legislative power,[1119] the executive power[1120] and the judicial power.[1121] It makes separate provisions as to the qualifications and disqualifications for election to a position within each of these three branches (or powers):

(1) Those qualified for election as deputies to the Legislative Assembly must be citizens of Costa Rica, Costa Rican by birth (or naturalised with ten years' residence after naturalisation), and twenty one years of age.[1122] Those disqualified as candidates for election as deputies include anyone occupying within six months prior to the date of the election the positions of President of the Republic, or a cabinet minister or a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice, or relatives of the existing President to the second degree of consanguinity or affinity inclusive.[1123]

(2) Those qualified for election as the President or a Vice-President must be citizens of Costa Rica, Costa Rican by birth, laymen and over thirty years of age.[1124] Those disqualified for election as President or Vice-President include anyone occupying within twelve months prior to the date for election the positions of President, or a Vice-President, or magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice or a cabinet minister, or certain relatives of the existing President by consanguinity or affinity.[1125]

(3) Those qualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice must be citizens of Costa Rica, Costa Rican by birth (or naturalised with ten years' residence after naturalisation), laymen, over thirty five years of age and legally qualified as defined.[1126] The only persons disqualified for election as a magistrate are persons who are related by consanguinity or affinity to the third degree inclusive to a member of the Supreme Court of Justice.[1127]

666. It is significant that, whilst persons holding positions in both the administrative and the judicial supreme powers at the time of the election (or within six months prior thereto) are expressly disqualified as a candidate for election as a deputy to the Legislative Assembly, and persons holding positions in the judicial supreme power at the time of the election (or within twelve months prior thereto) are expressly disqualified as a candidate for election as the President or a Vice-President, no person holding positions with either the executive or the administrative supreme powers at the time of the election is expressly disqualified as a candidate for election as a magistrate. In particular, a Vice-President at the time of the election is not expressly disqualified for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court.

667. In support of their argument, however, the appellants rely upon Article 161 which provides:

> The position of magistrate is incompatible with that of an official of the other supreme powers.

The expression "supreme powers" is not defined in the Constitution, but it may be accepted that the reference is to the three "distinct and independent branches" which exercise the government of the Republic through the "powers" already identified.

668. Article 161 is one of similar but not identical provisions which relate to each of the three supreme powers:

> [Legislative power]
>
> Article 111 After taking the oath of office no deputy may accept a position or employment with the other powers of the State or the autonomous institutions, under penalty of losing his credentials, except as a cabinet minister. In the latter event, he will be reinstated in the Assembly when the position terminates. [...]
>
> Article 112 The legislative function is also incompatible with the holding of any other elective public office. [...]
>
> [Executive power]
>
> Article 143 The position of minister is incompatible with the exercise of any other public [charge, elective] or otherwise, except where special laws confer functions upon them. [...].[1128]
>
> The vice-presidents of the Republic may hold the position of minister.
>
> [Judicial power]
> Article 161 The position of magistrate is incompatible with that of an official of the other supreme powers.

The object of these provisions appears clearly to be to prevent the one person holding more than one of these positions at the one time. If a Vice-President at the time of the election of magistrates, who is otherwise qualified in accordance with Article 159 but not disqualified by [1127] Ibid, Article 160.

Article 160, wishes to stand for that election, he or she is permitted to do so, but must, if elected as a magistrate, resign as Vice-President. Such an interpretation of the Constitution itself is consistent with the jurisprudence revealed in the expert opinion of Mr Alejandro Batalla,[1129] although it would appear to be inconsistent with his final conclusion.

669. Citing as authority a decision of the Costa Rican Constitutional Court,[1130] Mr Batalla says:

> [...] the intention of the Constitutional Assembly was to provide the Magistrates with a special level of independence from the other branches to prevent any mixing of their political activity with the justice in order to guarantee impartiality.[1131]
>
> The Constitutional Court argues that holding both positions simultaneously might subordinate the Magistrate psychologically to a certain ideology that can affect and reduce his criteria in such a way.
>
> The body of laws of Costa Rica stipulates, in general terms, the incompatibility of the positions of magistrate and judge[1132] with those positions elected by popular vote such as the position of Vice-President, and the justification lies on the demand of the independence of the judge. In other of its precedents, the Constitutional Court has stated that:
>
> "The position of Judge or Magistrate is incompatible with any other position elected by popular vote or political designation. What is intended is to keep the officials administering justice away from the passions inherent to the political activity which, due to its nature, is very polemical. In this way, this prevents the possibility of establishing a link of psychological subordination of the judge, offering said circumstance, the temptation of adjusting his behaviour to a certain ideology or way of thinking detached from his self, since the freedom of opinion of the judge may be reduced by the influence of an ideological tendency. The system of incompatibilities and the system of prohibitions are guarantees that tend to prevent the creation of links – either of public or private nature – that may lead to the union of two simultaneous qualities in one person; that is, that the status of the Judge may be joined by another quality that may place him, in a submission relationship of any kind. It is possible to prevent the judge from performing any paid job in order to prevent him from establishing links that may restrict his independence".[1133]

670. Mr Batalla then concludes:

> In conclusion, the position of Magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice has an express restriction on a Constitutional level to be elected if he holds another position in any other Supreme Power of Costa Rica.[1134]

[1128] The Spanish translator retained by the Tribunal's Conference and Languages Section prefers the phrase "post, publicly elected" to "charge, elective".

[1132] [Mr Batalla's footnote] The Judge and the Magistrate are the only officials that may administer justice.
[1133] [Mr Batalla's footnote] Constitutional Court, Decision N 2883-96.
[1134] The emphasis has been added.

If Mr Batalla's ultimate conclusion be correct, the Constitution would have expressed the disqualifications upon candidates for election as a magistrate in substantially different terms. Article 160 would have disqualified as candidates for such election those persons holding positions in both the executive and the administrative supreme powers, in the same way as Articles 109 and 132 have disqualified magistrates as candidates for election, respectively, as deputy of the Legislative Assembly and as President or Vice-President. Significantly, the Constitution has not done so.[1135]

671. Article 161 does not therefore disqualify a Vice-President as a candidate for election as a magistrate of the Supreme Court of Costa Rica. It merely requires that such a Vice-President resign that position if elected as a magistrate and before assuming office as such.

672. The Prosecution's argument which the Appeals Chamber has not accepted was that the requirements of Article 13(1) of the Statute apply by their terms only to "the judges" of the Tribunal, which means the judges referred to in Article 12 who are elected pursuant to Article 13(2) or appointed pursuant to Article 13(3).[1136] The Prosecution contended that, when the term of office of Judge Odio Benito expired on 17 November 1997, she ceased to be one of "the judges" of the Tribunal, and that the Security Council Resolution 1126 which enabled the judges of the Celebici Trial Chamber to finish hearing the case did not affect this.[1137] The terms of Resolution 1126, which authorised the three judges "once replaced as members of the Tribunal, to finish the Celebici case which had begun before the expiry of their terms of office", was interpreted by the Prosecution as emphasising that the judges' terms of office had expired and that they had been replaced. Although the judges continued to exercise the functions of a judge, it was said, they no longer held the office of judges of the Tribunal.[1138] The source of Judge Odio Benito's authority after 17 November 1997 was not the Statute, but Resolution 1126. The resolution was said to prevail over the Statute in the event of inconsistency, as the Statute itself derives from a Security Council resolution and can be expressly or impliedly amended by a subsequent resolution.[1139]

[1135] An expert opinion by Francisco Villalobos Brenes (a member of the Bar of Costa Rica and Adjunct Professor in the Faculty of Law of the University of Costa Rica) was also tendered. None of the interpretative resources relied upon by Mr Brenes suggest a contrary interpretation of Article 161. Indeed, he expressly concludes (at para 5C) that Article 161 is one of various rules which specifically prohibit the possibility of a person exercising the judicial function at the same time as holding a post in the Executive or Legislative Branches (the emphasis has been added).

[1137] Ibid, paras 6-9.
[1138] Ibid, paras 10-12.
[1139] Ibid, paras 13-16.

673. However, if the submission that Judge Odio Benito was no longer a "judge" within the meaning of Article 13(1) after the expiry of her initial term of office be correct, it would follow that she was also not a "judge" for the purposes of other articles of the Statute. In that case, since Article 12 provides that the Trial Chambers consist of three "judges", the Trial Chamber would not have been validly composed. Moreover, since it is the "Trial Chambers" which are to pronounce judgements and impose sentences and penalties,[1140] it would follow that the Trial Judgement in this case was not delivered by the body authorised by the Statute to do so. The Appeals Chamber does not accept that this was the intention of the Security Council in adopting Resolution 1126. The Prosecution indeed denied that its interpretation of the resolution has the result that the Trial Chamber was not properly constituted,[1141] and it submitted at the oral hearing that the three judges continued to be judges of the Tribunal with limited functions but that Resolution 1126 nevertheless had the effect that the requirements of Article 13(1) did not apply to them.[1142] This submission is entirely without merit.

674. The words from Resolution 1126 relied upon by the Prosecution must be read in the context of the circumstances in which the resolution was passed. The then President of the Tribunal had written to the Secretary-General seeking from him "an extension of the three judges sitting in the Celebici case", and had requested him to submit his letter to the members of the Security Council "for their consideration and approval of the extension of tenure of the three aforementioned judges for 12 months as from 17 November 1997".[1143] The Secretary-General had submitted the letter as requested, describing it in his letters to the Presidents of the Security Council and the General Assembly as requesting "an extension of the terms of office of the non-elected judges of the International Tribunal in order to allow them to dispose of ongoing cases".[1144] His letters continued:

> [...] in the absence of an explicit statutory provision providing for the extension of the term of office of Tribunal judges to complete ongoing cases, an approval of the Security Council, as the parent organ, and of the General Assembly, as the electing organ, would be desirable to preclude any question about the legality of such an extension.

[1140] Statute, Article 23.
[1141] Prosecution Supplementary Brief, para 19.
[1142] Counsel for the Prosecution told the Appeals Chamber that the judges had a "qualified qualification" (Appeal Transcript, p 714). The meaning of that phrase was not explained.
[1143] Letter of 18 June 1997, annexed to Document A/51/958 S/1997/605.
[1144] Letter of 1 Aug 1997, annexed to Document A/51/958 S/1997/605.

Resolution 1126, having noted this correspondence, endorsed the recommendation of the Secretary-General in the terms already partly quoted.[1145]

675. A reading of Resolution 1126 in this context necessarily indicates that its effect was to extend the terms of the judges for the particular purpose of concluding the Celebici trial. The terms of office of the judges as extended, although limited in their defined purpose, were otherwise left subject to the relevant provisions of the Statute. Any implied effect on the Statute was not to render Article 13(1) and those other provisions which refer to "judges" of the Tribunal inapplicable to the three judges, as argued by the Prosecution. It was limited to making a narrowly qualified exception to the four year term of office referred to in Article 13(4). The resolution indicates no intention to amend, modify or suspend any other provisions of the Statute, including Article 13(1), in any way.

676. The challenge to Judge Odio Benito's qualifications under Article 13 accordingly fails.

C. Should Judge Odio Benito Have Disqualified Herself as a Judge of the Tribunal?

677. The second issue raised by the appellants based upon the election of Judge Odio Benito as a Vice-President of Costa Rica and her assumption of that office was whether she was thereby disqualified as a judge of the Tribunal because she no longer possessed the necessary judicial independence required by international law.[1146] The appellants relied upon additional material and arguments in relation to this issue.

678. Appointment as Minister of Environment and Energy: After she took the oath of office as Second Vice-President, Judge Odio Benito was also appointed as Minister of Environment and Energy in the Government of Costa Rica.[1147]

679. Membership of Board of Mediators: A decree issued by the President of Costa Rica on 15 June 1998, dealing with a "Process of National Consensus", provided for a Board of Mediators to be composed of, inter alia, the two Vice-Presidents of the Republic. The functions and powers of that Board were to "judge, mediate and propose alternative solutions in those cases where the members of the Consensus Forum [another of the bodies in the Process of National Consensus] have such disagreements that they are unable to reach decisions by consensus".[1148]

680. Exercise of Executive Functions: Reliance was placed upon two media reports, the accuracy of which was not disputed,[1149] to claim that Judge Odio Benito exercised executive functions in Costa Rica whilst still a judge of the Tribunal:

(i) Meeting in April 1998

The first report, dated 28 April 1998, referred to a meeting of the President-elect of Costa Rica and "a group of former Costa Rican legal representatives and high officials" which had been held in order "to evaluate the process of a united national effort before the change in power the following week". The report focused on the release by the group of a communiqué which expressed "profound consternation" at the recent assassination of the Auxiliary Bishop of Guatemala.[1150] The report observed that "Vice-Presidents-elect, Astrid Fischel and Elizabeth Odio, who will assume office this coming May 8", also participated in the meeting.

(ii) Letter of protest

The second report, dated 1 June 1998, stated that an environmental and humanitarian organisation, Foro Emaus, had written to "the vice president of Costa Rica [...] who is furthermore the head of the Department of Environment and Energy" to protest at the deficient labour conditions in which women worked in banana packing plants.[1151]

681. Separation of Powers: The appellants assert that Judge Odio Benito exercised an executive function merely by holding the position of Second Vice-President as required by the Constitution of Costa Rica.[1152] They rely upon the doctrine of separation of powers, which is said to prevent a judge of the Tribunal from holding an executive position in a domestic government.[1153] The appellants rely upon the status of Costa Rica as a non-permanent member of the Security Council for a two year period from 1 January 1997 to submit that Costa Rica had [1148] Landžo Reply, para 6.13; Agreement on Evidence, p 1, and annexed extract from the official gazette.

[1152] Appeal Transcript, p 721.
[1153] Ibid, p 654. The submissions made by the appellants in relation to Judge Odio Benito and her position as Vice-President did not always make a clear distinction between the first and second of these issues. This particular submission was described as being relevant to her qualification under Article 13 (the first issue),

"direct political and administrative control over the affairs of this Tribunal",[1154] and that Judge Odio Benito, as a Vice-President of Costa Rica, had the power to give instructions to Costa Rica's representative on the Security Council, placing her "in an executive capacity vis-à-vis this very Tribunal".[1155]

682. Impartiality: The requirement of a judge's impartiality is stated in Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute, which has already been quoted. That requirement is reflected in Rule 15(A), which is in these terms:

> A Judge may not sit on a trial or appeal in any case in which the Judge has a personal interest or concerning which the Judge has or has had any association which might affect his or her impartiality. The Judge shall in any such circumstance withdraw, and the President shall assign another Judge to the case.

This Rule has been interpreted by the Tribunal as encompassing circumstances establishing both actual bias and an appearance or a reasonable apprehension of bias.[1156] No suggestion of actual bias has been made in the present case; the suggestion made is that the contemporaneous holding by Judge Odio Benito of the offices of a judge of the Tribunal and of Vice-President and government minister of Costa Rica carried the appearance of a lack of impartiality.[1157]

683. The relevant question to be determined by the Appeals Chamber is whether the reaction of the hypothetical fair-minded observer (with sufficient knowledge of the circumstances to make a reasonable judgement) would be that Judge Odio Benito might not bring an impartial and unprejudiced mind to the issues arising in the case.[1158] The apprehension of bias must be a reasonable one.[1159] Such circumstances within the knowledge of the fair-minded observer would include the traditions of integrity and impartiality which a judge undertakes to uphold.[1160] A judge of the Tribunal makes a solemn declaration that he or she will perform the duties and exercise the powers of such an office "honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously".[1161] but the Appeals Chamber regards it as logically more relevant to her disqualification under Rule 15(A) (the second issue), and it has considered the submission upon that basis.

684. The fair-minded observer would also know of the circumstances surrounding Judge Odio Benito's election as Vice-President of Costa Rica. Prior to accepting a nomination as Vice-President, Judge Odio Benito wrote to the then President of the Tribunal (Judge Cassese) undertaking that, if elected, she would not assume any Vice-Presidential functions until the completion of her duties as a member of the Trial Chamber hearing the Celebici case ("the Undertaking"). President Cassese submitted that letter to the judges in a Plenary meeting, who unanimously determined, upon the basis of the Undertaking, that her proposed action would not be incompatible with her judicial duties. When she was elected as Vice-President, Judge Odio Benito informed the then President of the Tribunal (Judge McDonald), who submitted the matter again to the judges in a Plenary meeting, where approval was given for her to take the oath of office. The Undertaking given by Judge Odio Benito to the Tribunal was supported by the President of Costa Rica, who wrote to President McDonald to confirm that Judge Odio Benito would continue to discharge her functions as a judge of the Tribunal until the completion of the Celebici case[1162] and that she would not assume any functions in the government of Costa Rica before 17 November 1998.[1163] These facts were set out by the Bureau in its decision of 4 September 1998,[1164] and their substance has not been contested by the appellants.[1165]

D. Conclusion

685. The Appeals Chamber does not accept that Judge Odio Benito exercised any executive functions in Costa Rica during the time she was also a judge of the Tribunal. Taking the matters upon which reliance was placed by the appellants by reference to the categories already referred to:

686. Appointment as Minister of Environment and Energy: At the same time as Judge Odio Benito was appointed as Minister of Environment and Energy, a substitute minister was appointed to be in charge of that ministry during her absence.[1166] No evidence was produced by

The Appeals Chamber has not dealt with this matter as an appeal from the decision of the Bureau. The question whether a judge should have been disqualified from hearing a case is relevant to the fairness of the trial: Prosecutor v Furundžija, IT-95-17/1, Decision on Post-Trial Application by Anto Furundžija to the Bureau of the Tribunal for the Disqualification of Presiding Judge Mumba, Motion to Vacate Conviction and Sentence, and Motion for a New Trial, 11 Mar 1999, p 2; and it is therefore a valid ground of appeal from a conviction. The Furundžija Appeal Judgement proceeded upon the basis that this was a valid ground.

concurrently.[1237] As a result, the overall sentence imposed was a period of not more than seven years.

729. The Prosecution contends that the Trial Chamber's approach in sentencing Mucic "involved errors of basic principle, and that the sentence it imposed on Mucic was so low that it fell outside the proper limits of the Trial Chamber's discretion".[1238] The errors alleged by the Prosecution were identified separately in relation to those convictions based solely on Article 7(3), the conviction based on Article 7(1) alone, and the convictions based on both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) liability. The primary argument relates to the Trial Chamber's alleged failure to take into account the gravity of the crimes for which Mucic was convicted. It is also alleged that the Trial Chamber should have taken into account crimes not specifically alleged in the indictment in sentencing Mucic.[1239] Finally, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber erred in determining that all of the sentences imposed on Mucic should be served concurrently.[1240] Mucic argued in relation to his own ground of appeal against sentence that his sentence was too high and did not take into account certain matters in mitigation, including the absence of his direct participation in acts of violence.[1241]

1. Failure to take into account the gravity of the offences

730. Article 24(2) of the Statute of the Tribunal provides:

> In imposing the sentences, the Trial Chambers should take into account such factors as the gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the convicted person.

731. The Trial Chamber found, in its general considerations before addressing the factors relevant to each individual accused, that "[b]y far the most important consideration, which may be regarded as the litmus test for the appropriate sentence, is the gravity of the offence".[1242] In the subsequent Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber expressly endorsed this statement of the Celebici Trial Chamber, and also expressed its agreement with the following statement of the Trial Chamber in the Kupreškic proceedings:

[1237] Trial Judgement, para 1286.
[1238] Prosecution Brief, para 5.6.
[1239] Prosecution Brief, paras 5.34-5.43.
[1240] Prosecution Brief, paras 5.54-5.75.
[1241] Mucic Brief, Appeal Against Sentence, pp 1-2. This submission in respect of the absence of findings as to his direct participation is effectively incorporated in the Appeals Chambers' consideration of the Prosecution ground

> The sentence to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime.[1243]

The Appeals Chamber reiterates this endorsement of those statements and confirms its acceptance of the principle that the gravity of the offence is the primary consideration in imposing sentence. It is therefore necessary to consider whether the Trial Chamber in fact gave due weight to the gravity of the offences for which Mucic was convicted in the sentence it imposed.

(a) Convictions under Article 7(3) alone

732. The Prosecution first submitted that there are two aspects to an assessment of the gravity of offences committed under Article 7(3) of the Statute:

> (1) the gravity of the underlying crime committed by the convicted person's subordinate; and
> (2) the gravity of the convicted person's own conduct in failing to prevent or punish the underlying crimes.[1244]

The Appeals Chamber agrees that these two matters must be taken into account. As a practical matter, the seriousness of a superior's conduct in failing to prevent or punish crimes must be measured to some degree by the nature of the crimes to which this failure relates. A failure to prevent or punish murder or torture committed by a subordinate must be regarded as being of greater gravity than a failure to prevent or punish an act of plunder, for example.[1245]

733. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber failed to make the gravity of Mucic's offences the starting point in its determination of his sentence. It suggests first that this is demonstrated by the point at which the Trial Chamber referred to "gravity" in its of appeal but in relation to other matters in mitigation is considered further below in relation to Mucic's ground of appeal.

[1242] Trial Judgement, para 1225.

[1243] Kupreškic Judgement, para 852, cited in the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement at para 182.

[1244] Prosecution Brief, para 5.13.

[1245] Mucic contends that the Prosecution's approach indicates that it mischaracterises the offences of a superior as being the "same crime" as that of the subordinate upon which the superior's offence is based: Mucic Response, para 10. The Prosecution Brief does contain some references which could be understood in this way: e.g., para 5.24. The Appeals Chamber's conclusion, however, is not based on any such reasoning but simply recognises the inevitable relationship between the gravity of the superior's failure to prevent or punish criminal conduct and the criminal conduct to which that failure relates.

DECISION OF THE BUREAU ON MOTION TO DISQUALIFY JUDGES PURSUANT TO RULE 15 OR IN THE ALTERNATIVE THAT CERTAIN JUDGES RECUSE THEMSELVES

THE BUREAU of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, comprising President McDonald, Vice-President Shahabuddeen, Judge Cassese, Presiding Judge of Trial Chamber II, Judge Jorda, Presiding Judge of Trial Chamber I and Judge May, Presiding Judge of Trial Chamber III,

DECIDES as follows:

11. In this case, as stated above, the three appellants against conviction claim that Judges Riad, Wang and Nieto-Navia should be disqualified from hearing the appeal against conviction. The basis for their disqualification is said to be as follows: One of the grounds of appeal relates to the proper constitution of the Trial Chamber in Celebici; in the appellants' view the Chamber was not properly constituted because Judge Odio Benito, by her election as Vice-President of Costa Rica, became disqualified from serving as a Judge and sitting in Celebici and her impartiality could be apprehended as having been compromised. As in Plenary meetings of the Tribunal the three aforementioned Judges pronounced on the question of whether Judge Odio Benito could serve as a Judge after her election to the position of Vice-President of Costa Rica, they have allegedly formed a prejudgement upon one of the issues to be determined in the appeal.

12. It must be noted that the question of whether the position of Vice-President of Costa Rica was compatible with the discharge of the judicial functions by Judge Odio Benito was raised, at the administrative level, by the then President Cassese on 23 May 1997, in a meeting with Judge Odio Benito, when it became known that she was running as a candidate for that position. Judge Odio Benito responded to President Cassese in a letter of 16 October 1997 in which she specified that, if elected, she would not take office before the end of her functions as a Judge sitting in Celebici and in addition undertook, if elected, to fulfil her judicial functions on a full time basis. In the light of this commitment, the then President Cassese decided that Judge Odio Benito was entitled to run as a candidate for the position of Vice-President. Nevertheless, he felt that it was advisable to submit the matter to the Plenary. This was done in October 1997. The Fourteenth Plenary assembly of all Judges, in the discharge of administrative functions, endorsed the decision of the President.
The matter arose again in March 1998, after the election, on 1 February 1998, of Judge Odio Benito to the position of Second Vice-President of Costa Rica. President McDonald noted the renewed commitment of Judge Odio Benito not to assume the functions of Second Vice-President nor, in case of permanent or temporary absence of the President or the First Vice-President, the functions of President of Costa Rica, prior to the termination of her tenure as a Judge. Judge Odio Benito further undertook not to be diverted by anything from the fulfilment of her mandate as a Judge until November 1998. In light of these commitments, President McDonald decided that there was no incompatibility between Judge Odio Benito's judicial duties and her new status of Second Vice-President of Costa Rica. President McDonald too felt it was advisable to submit the matter to the Seventeenth Plenary. This was done on 11 March 1998. The Plenary assembly of Judges, again exercising its administrative functions, unanimously endorsed President McDonald's decision.

13. It should be emphasised that (i) the Judges assembled at the Fourteenth and Seventeenth Plenary Meetings only passed on the administrative issue of whether or not the election of Judge Odio Benito to the position of Second Vice-President of Costa Rica amounted to a circumstance incompatible with her judicial functions and (ii) this decision was not made with reference to any specific question as to whether Judge Odio Benito was disqualified from sitting in Celebici. Actually, it was only on 25 May 1998, namely more than two months after the administrative decision by the Seventeenth Plenary, that a motion was filed by defence counsel in Celebici asking that Judge Odio Benito take no further part in the proceedings in that case.

JUDGEMENT

The Office of the Prosecutor:

Counsel for the Accused:

Ms. Edina Rešidović, Mr. Eugene O'Sullivan, for Zejnil Delalić

Ms. Cynthia McMurrey, Ms. Nancy Boler, for Esad Landžo

(e) Unlawful Confinement of Civilians

27. Zejnil Delalić and Zdravko Mucić, along with Hazim Delić are charged under count 48 of the Indictment (paragraph 36) with the unlawful confinement of civilians, a grave breach punishable under Article 2(g) of the Statute, for their alleged acts and omissions as superiors with respect to the unlawful confinement of numerous civilians in the Čelebići prison-camp between May and October 1992. Zdravko Mucić and Zejnil Delalić are also charged with direct responsibility in relation to the foregoing charge.

(f) Plunder of Private Property

28. Zdravko Mucić, along with Hazim Delić, is charged under count 49 of the Indictment with plunder, a violation of the laws or customs of war punishable under Article 3(e) of the Statute, for their alleged acts and omissions as superiors with respect to the following events alleged to have been perpetrated by themselves and their subordinates in the Čelebići prison-camp:

> The plunder of money, watches and other valuable property belonging to persons detained at the Čelebići camp between May and September 1992. (Indictment at paragraph 37 paraphrased.)

Zdravko Mucić is also charged with direct responsibility in relation to the foregoing charge.

29. Having outlined the offences charged in the Indictment and the alleged role of the accused therein, it is appropriate to set out the procedural history of the present case, both prior to trial and during the trial itself.

C. Procedural History

30. Towards the close of investigations into the events which occurred in the Čelebići prison-camp during the recent conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina, the Prosecutor, acting on information regarding the whereabouts of several individuals deemed to be suspects in relation to these events, made two separate requests to Germany and Austria for the provisional arrest of Zejnil Delalić and Zdravko Mucić, respectively, under Rule 40 of the Rules. Pursuant to these requests, both suspects powers of influence not amounting to formal powers of command to provide a sufficient basis for the imposition of command responsibility.[401]

376. The cases imposing responsibility for failure to act on civilians occupying positions of authority, also indicate that such persons may be held liable for crimes committed by persons over whom their formal authority under national law is limited or non-existent. Thus, it has been noted that the Tokyo Tribunal convicted Foreign Minister Koki Hirota on the basis of command responsibility for war crimes although he lacked the domestic legal authority to repress the crimes in question.[402] The tribunal found Hirota derelict in his duty in not "insisting" before the cabinet that immediate action be taken to put an end to the crimes, language indicating powers of persuasion rather than formal authority to order action to be taken.[403] Moreover, the Roechling case is best construed as an example of the imposition of superior responsibility on the basis of de facto powers of control possessed by civilian industrial leaders. While the accused in this case were found guilty, inter alia, of failing to take action against the abuse of forced labourers committed by the members of the Gestapo, it is nowhere suggested that the accused had any formal authority to issue orders to personnel under Gestapo command. Instead, the judgement employs the wording "sufficient" authority, a term not normally used in relation to formal powers of command, but rather one used to describe a degree of (informal) influence. This view is further supported by the reasoning employed in the judgement of the court of first instance in this case, which, in response to the claim of one of the accused that he could not give orders to the plant police and the personnel of a punishment camp, as these were under the orders of the Gestapo, makes reference to his status as Herman Roechling's son-in-law - clearly a source of no more than de facto influence - as a factor affecting his authority to obtain an alleviation in the treatment of workers by the plant police.[404]

377. While it is, therefore, the Trial Chamber's conclusion that a superior, whether military or civilian, may be held liable under the principle of superior responsibility on the basis of his de facto position of authority, the fundamental considerations underlying the imposition of such responsibility must be borne in mind. The doctrine of command responsibility is ultimately predicated upon the power of the superior to control the acts of his subordinates. A duty is placed upon the superior to exercise this power so as to prevent and repress the crimes committed by his subordinates, and a failure by him to do so in a diligent manner is sanctioned by the imposition of individual criminal responsibility in accordance with the doctrine. It follows that there is a threshold at which persons cease to possess the necessary powers of control over the actual perpetrators of offences and, accordingly, cannot properly be considered their "superiors" within the meaning of Article 7(3) of the Statute. While the Trial Chamber must at all times be alive to the realities of any given situation and be prepared to pierce such veils of formalism that may shield those individuals carrying the greatest responsibility for heinous acts, great care must be taken lest an injustice be committed in holding individuals responsible for the acts of others in situations where the link of control is absent or too remote.

378. Accordingly, it is the Trial Chamber's view that, in order for the principle of superior responsibility to be applicable, it is necessary that the superior have effective control over the persons committing the underlying violations of international humanitarian law, in the sense of having the material ability to prevent and punish the commission of these offences. With the caveat that such authority can have a de facto as well as a de jure character, the Trial Chamber accordingly shares the view expressed by the International Law Commission that the doctrine of superior responsibility extends to civilian superiors only to the extent that they exercise a degree of control over their subordinates which is similar to that of military commanders.[405]

(c) The Mental Element: "Knew or had reason to know"

(i) Arguments of the Parties

379. The Prosecution asserts that the requisite mens rea under Article 7(3) may be established as follows:

> (1) actual knowledge established through direct evidence; or
> (2) actual knowledge established through circumstantial evidence, with a presumption of knowledge where the crimes of subordinates are a matter of public notoriety, are numerous, occur over a prolonged period, or in a wide geographical area; or > (3) wanton disregard of, or failure to obtain, information of a general nature within the reasonable access of a commander indicating the likelihood of actual or prospective criminal conduct on the part of his subordinates.[406]

[405] ILC Draft Code, p. 37.
[406] Prosecution Response to the Motion to Dismiss, RP D5810; Prosecution's Pre-Trial Brief, RP D2836.

597. The Trial Chamber has considered the oral testimony before it in the light of these considerations. Accordingly, inconsistencies or inaccuracies between the prior statements and oral testimony of a witness, or between different witnesses, are relevant factors in judging weight but need not be, of themselves, a basis to find the whole of a witness' testimony unreliable. The Trial Chamber has attached probative value to testimony primarily on the basis of the oral testimony given in the courtroom, as opposed to prior statements, where the demeanour of the relevant witnesses could be observed first hand by the Trial Chamber and placed in the context of all the other evidence before it.

598. However, before proceeding with the facts of the present case, it is necessary to make brief reference to the operation of the appropriate burdens of proof.

B. Burdens of Proof

599. The provisions of Article 21(3), of the Statute presume the innocence of the accused until he or she is proven guilty. The Rules do not, however, anywhere expressly prescribe the burden of proof on any party in the proceedings. In accordance with the procedure for the presentation of evidence contained in Rule 85, when a trial commences on an indictment filed by the Prosecution, alleging offences committed by the accused, it would seem clear that the burden of proving the allegations in the indictment rests on the Prosecution. However, there are situations in a case where the accused himself makes allegations or denies the accepted situation, for example, that he is a person of sound mind. Where the obligation of either party at trial is to satisfy the requirement of a rule of law that a fact in issue be proved or disproved, either by a preponderance of evidence or beyond reasonable doubt, there is a legal burden on such party. It is a fundamental requirement of any judicial system that the person who has invoked its jurisdiction and desires the tribunal or court to take action on his behalf must prove his case to its satisfaction. As a matter of common sense, therefore, the legal burden of proving all facts essential to their claims normally rests upon the plaintiff in a civil suit or the prosecutor in criminal proceedings.

ordinating activities even though he had just become a rank and file soldier. Mr. Delalić continued to communicate with the town of Konjic in relation to logistics. According to Šefkija Kevrić,[699] Mr. Delalić did not take part in combat activities and was not in a position of superior authority during this period. He was without command functions and could not issue any orders.[700] Midhat Cerovac also testified that Mr. Delalić had no military command, since he was not within the structure of command and control. His military task was simply to provide logistic support from the area of Vranske Stijene. Mr. Delalić did not take part in the military or technical planning of the Borći operation, nor did he issue orders in relation to it. In the preparation for the operation, Mr. Delalić made arrangements for the relevant needs for first aid equipment, transport conveyance and such supplies and facilities as could be provided by the civilian authorities, all consistent with his assignment as a co-ordinator.

d. Superior of the Čelebići Prison-Camp

669. The Prosecution is strongly of the view that the participation of Zejnil Delalić in the administrative processes of the Čelebići prison-camp per se makes him a superior of that institution and renders him responsible for the crimes of those working in that institution. The Prosecution evidence before the Trial Chamber attempts to show that Mr. Delalić was, on occasion, influential in the release of persons detained therein, and in suggesting the criteria for the release of persons detained. There is no evidence that the Čelebići prison-camp came under Mr. Delalić's authority by virtue of his appointment as co-ordinator. Analysis of the relevant evidence further demonstrates conclusively the failure of the Prosecution to show that Mr. Delalić was in a position of command authority or superiority in relation to the Čelebići prison-camp and in a superior-subordinate relationship with those who have been alleged to have committed offences therein. The Trial Chamber does not consider the acts of Mr. Delalić, as relied upon by the Prosecution, as an unequivocal exercise of superior authority.

1222. Whilst the proposition in theory appears to be unimpeachable, in practice there are factual situations rendering the charging and convicting of the same person under both Articles 7(1) and 7(3) perfectly appropriate. For instance, consider the situation where the commander or person exercising superior authority personally gives orders to his subordinates to beat the victim to death, and joins them in beating the victim to death. There is here criminal liability under Article 7(1) as a participant in the perpetration of the offence, and under Article 7(3) as a superior. Liability in this case is not mutually exclusive, since the exercise of superior authority in this case is not only the result of an omission to prevent the commission of the crime. It is a positive act of knowledge of the crime and participation in its commission.

1223. The question is whether the crime attracts only one sentence in respect of a superior who participates in the offence charged. Ideally a superior who participates in the actual commission of a crime should be found guilty both as a superior and also as a direct participant as any of the other participants who did so in obedience to his orders. However, to avoid the imposition of double sentencing for the same conduct, it should be sufficient to regard his conduct as an aggravating circumstance attracting enhanced punishment.

1224. A convicted person may be sentenced to imprisonment for a term up to and including the remainder of his or her life. In determining sentence, the Trial Chamber shall take into account the factors mentioned in Article 24(2) of the Statute and sub-Rule 101(B) of the Rules, as well as such factors as the age of the accused, his antecedents including his general reputation, and such other matters as would enable the Trial Chamber to determine the appropriate sentence consistent with the gravity of the offence. The Trial Chamber shall indicate whether multiple sentences shall be served consecutively or concurrently. Furthermore, credit shall be given to the convicted person for the period, if any, during which he was detained in custody pending surrender to the International Tribunal or pending trial or appeal.

1225. Article 24(2) and sub-Rule 101(B) by themselves contain all the indicia necessary for the determination of the appropriate sentence after a finding of guilt. By far the most important consideration, which may be regarded as the litmus test for the appropriate sentence, is the gravity of the offence. It is necessary to reiterate the fact that the Tribunal is vested with jurisdiction over serious violations of international humanitarian law committed in the territory of the former Yugoslavia since 1991. In the present case, the offences committed include several acts of murder, torture, sexual assaults of the most revolting types, multiple rapes, severe beatings, cruel treatment and inhumane conditions. In the Tadić Sentencing Judgment, Trial Chamber II appears to have taken into account the specific harm caused to the victims (and their families) by the accused.[1087] Similarly, Trial Chamber I, in the Erdemović Sentencing Judgement, 29 November 1996, recognised that the suffering of the victims may be considered in determining the appropriate penalty to impose.[1088] The Prosecution has urged the Trial Chamber, in evaluating the gravity of the relevant offences, to take into consideration the suffering of the victims who ultimately died in the Čelebići prison-camp.

1226. The gravity of the offences of the kind charged has always been determined by the effect on the victim or, at the most, on persons associated with the crime and nearest relations. Gravity is determined in personam and is not one of a universal effect. Whereas the guilt of the accused may be related to the specific and general harm of the victim and his relations, it would be too remote to ascribe every woe of the surrounding neighbourhood to the guilty accused. However, in the situation of the Čelebiči prison-camp it is possible that the conduct of the guilty accused may have resulted in the deaths of, or injury to, other detainees in the prison-camp other than those in relation to whom specific findings have been made above. The Trial Chamber is, however, not to engage in speculation and should be bound by the evidence before it. The Trial Chamber adopts the same view in respect of detained persons who survived but suffer from the effects of prolonged incarceration.

1227. The gravity of the offence and the individual circumstances of the accused are typically to be considered with respect to the particular and, if need be, the peculiar circumstances of each case. Thus, the circumstances of the accused would determine the factors the Trial Chamber will take into account as matters of aggravation or mitigation. In the Tadić Sentencing Judgment, the willing involvement of the accused in violent ethnic cleansing was regarded as an aggravating circumstance.[1089] In the Erdemović Sentencing Judgement, 29 November 1996, after observing that express consideration of aggravating circumstances in crimes against humanity was not necessary, since these crimes are per se of extreme gravity, the Trial Chamber went on to suggest possible circumstances surrounding the commission of the offence which might preclude leniency.

1228. Sub-Rule 101(B)(ii) provides that the Trial Chamber, in determining the sentence, shall take into account mitigating factors "including the substantial cooperation with the Prosecutor by the convicted person before or after conviction". The use of the term "including", which is an

DECISION OF THE BUREAU ON MOTION ON JUDICIAL INDEPENDENCE (President McDonald, Vice-President Shahabuddeen, Judge Cassese and Judge Jorda)

THE BUREAU of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991, comprising President McDonald, Vice-President Shahabuddeen, Judge Cassese, Presiding Judge of Trial Chamber II, and Judge Jorda, Presiding Judge of Trial Chamber I,

DECIDES as follows:

On 25 May 1998, the Trial Chamber in the matter of the Prosecutor v. Zejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic and Esad Landzo (IT-96-21-T, hereinafter referred to as 'the Celebici case') received a motion from all four of the accused entitled "Motion on Judicial Independence" ('the motion'). The Prosecutor filed no response.

In the motion, the applicants request that Judge Odio Benito cease to take any further part in the proceedings of the Celebici case on two grounds, set out by the applicants as follows:

1. "That on the 8th. Day of May 1998 the Learned Judge, Her Honour Judge Odio Benito, ceased to meet the qualifications for a Judge of the International Criminal Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia by virtue of her having taken the oath of office of a Vice-President of the Republic of Costa Rica in accordance with Articles 136 and 137 of the Constitucion Politica de la Republica de Costa Rica 1949 (as amended).
2. Further and/or in the alternative, that the Learned Judge, having now become a member of the executive branch of the Government of the Republic of Costa Rica, has ceased to possess the criteria required for independent judge in international law and has acquired an association which may affect her impartiality."

I. Factual and Legal Background

1. The Facts

On 17 September 1993, Judge Odio Benito was elected as a Judge of this Tribunal. She took up office in November 1993 and her term was due to end in November 1997. Judge Odio Benito, Presiding Judge Karibi-Whyte and Judge Jan (making up the entire Trial Chamber in the Celebici case) were not re-elected.

This raised the problem that, with effect from 17 November 1997, the three Judges sitting on the Celebici case would cease to be Judges of the Tribunal and therefore could not continue to hear the case to its conclusion.

On 27 August 1997, the Security Council dealt with that situation by passing Resolution 1126 (1997), by which it -

> "...endorse[d] the recommendation of the Secretary-General that Judges Karibi-Whyte, Odio-Benito and Jan, once replaced as members of the Tribunal, finish the Celebici case which they have begun before expiry of their term of office; and [took] note of the intention of the International Tribunal to finish the case before November 1998." [1]

On 1 February 1998, Judge Odio Benito was elected as one of two Vice-Presidents of the Republic of Costa Rica, and on 8 May 1998 she took the oath of office as Second Vice-President.

Before seeking the nomination for Second Vice-President of Costa Rica, Judge Odio Benito explained, in writing, her intentions to the then President of the Tribunal, Judge Antonio Cassese, and sought his approval. Her letter was submitted to the Judges of the Tribunal, meeting in Plenary. In this letter, Judge Odio Benito stated that, if elected, she would not assume any of the functions of that office until the completion of her duties as a member of the Trial Chamber hearing the Celebici case. It was unanimously decided by the Plenary that, based on this commitment by Judge Odio Benito, such action would not be incompatible with her duties as a Judge of this Tribunal. After she was elected, Judge Odio Benito again informed Judge Cassese, in writing. This letter was likewise submitted to the Plenary, which granted approval for her to take the oath of office.

The President of Costa Rica also wrote to the Tribunal confirming that Judge Odio Benito would continue to discharge her functions as Judge of the Tribunal until the completion of the Celebici case[2] and that she would not be assuming any functions in the Costa Rican Government before 17 November 1998.[3]

2. The Law

Article 13(1) of the Statute of the Tribunal and Rule 15 of the Rules of Evidence and Procedure are the relevant provisions under which the motion is made. Article 13(1)[4] reads as follows -

> "The judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. In the overall composition of the Chambers due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law."

Sub-rule 15(A) and Sub-rule 15(B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence read as follows -

> "(A) A Judge may not sit on a trial or appeal in any case in which the Judge has a personal interest or concerning which the Judge has or has had any association which might affect his or her impartiality. The Judge shall in any such circumstance withdraw, and the President shall assign another Judge to the case.
>
> (B) Any party may apply to the Presiding Judge of a Chamber for the disqualification and withdrawal of a Judge of that Chamber from a trial or appeal on the above grounds. The Presiding Judge shall confer with the Judge in question, and if necessary the Bureau shall determine the matter. If the Bureau upholds the application, the President shall assign another Judge to sit in place of the disqualified Judge."

The Presiding Judge in the trial, Judge Karibi-Whyte, has conferred with Judge Odio Benito and has, pursuant to Sub-rule 15(B), referred the matter to the Bureau for determination.

II. Discussion

1. Qualification of Judges of the International Tribunal for the Former Yugoslavia

In the motion the applicants contend that Judge Odio Benito ceased to meet the qualifications necessary to be a Judge of this Tribunal.

Pursuant to Article 13(1) of the Statute, in addition to the possession of high moral character, impartiality and integrity, the only prerequisite for appointment as a Judge of the Tribunal is "qualification for appointment to the highest judicial office" of the country from which the Judge comes. Judge Odio Benito's "high moral character" and "integrity" are not in question. In fact, the applicants state in their motion that they "in no way seek to suggest that the Learned Judge has done any act which might be construed as being impartial." It is assumed from the context of the motion that the applicants intended to say that Judge Odio Benito has not done any act which may be construed as being partial. What is being questioned is whether, having regard to the holding of the office of Second Vice-President of Costa Rica, the requirements of impartiality and possession of the qualifications for appointment to the highest judicial offices in Costa Rica are now being met.

Article 159 of the Constitution of Costa Rica, relating to judicial qualifications, provides as follows-

"To be a magistrate it is necessary to be:

1. A Costa Rican by birth, or by naturalization with residence in the country not less than ten years after naturalization. However, the President of the Supreme Court must be a Costa Rican by birth;
2. A citizen in the exercise of his rights;
3. A layman;
4. Over thirty-five years of age;
5. Holder of a lawyer's degree issued or legally recognised in Costa Rica, and must have engaged in the profession for at least ten years, except in the case of judicial officials with not less than five years of judicial experience."

In the circumstances before the Bureau, it has not been shown that Judge Odio Benito has ceased to possess the qualifications required by Article 159 of the Constitution of Costa Rica.

The applicants rely on Article 161, which provides -

"The position of magistrate is incompatible with that of an official of the other supreme powers."

This relates to the subject of incompatibility of functions, a question dealt with under the topic of judicial independence, discussed below.

2. Judicial Independence

In the motion, the applicants state -

> "...we in no way seek to suggest that the Learned Judge has done any act which might be construed as being impartial [sic]. Rather, we respectfully suggest that as a matter of general principle, the Learned Judge ought to be disqualified from the office of Judge of the International Tribunal because the elective political office which she now holds in addition to the office of Judge of the International Tribunal is one which 'might affect' the Learned Judge's impartiality." [5]

In effect, the motion is grounded on a general principle relating to incompatibility of functions giving rise, in the particular circumstances, to an "appearance of partiality".

The question of impartiality has been dealt with by the European Court of Human Rights ('the Court').

Article 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights ('ECHR') provides that - > "in the determination of . . . any criminal charge against him, everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law."

The ECHR organs have established a two-fold test for assessing the impartiality of a tribunal:

> "The existence of impartiality for the purposes of article 6(1) must be determined according to a subjective test, that is on the basis of the personal conviction that a particular judge has in a given case, and also according to an objective test, that is ascertaining whether the judge offered guarantees sufficient to exclude any legitimate doubt in this respect."[6] (emphasis supplied).

Under the objective component of this test, the court must assess relevant circumstances that may give rise to an "appearance" of partiality. If there is "legitimate reason to fear" a lack of impartiality in a judge, he or she must withdraw from the case.[7]

The challenge to the Judge's impartiality in this case is linked to the question of her independence as a judge. The test for measuring independence has been set forth thus by the Court in Campbell and Fell v. United Kingdom:

> "In determining whether a body can be considered to be independent - notably of the executive and the parties in the case - the Court has had regard to the manner of appointment of its members and the duration of their term of office, the existence of guarantees against outside pressures and the question whether the body presents an appearance of independence."[8] (emphasis supplied).

In Sramek v. Austria[9] the Court was faced with a complaint regarding the "independence" of a tribunal composed of, among others, a person who was the mayor of a municipality. The mayor in fact acted as chairman of the Tribunal. Holding that there was no breach of Article 6(1) of the ECHR by reason of the fact that "the person who . . . acted as chairman of the [tribunal] happened to be a mayor"[10], the Court held:

> "It is true that the municipalities in Austria exercise their powers. . . subject to the supervision of the Land [Government] . . . ; however, it cannot be concluded from this that their mayors do not act independently in matters which - like those involved here - fall outside the ambit of those powers."[11]

These cases, though deriving from different systems, are useful in showing that the mere fact that a person who exercises judicial functions is to some extent subject, in another capacity, to executive supervision, is not by itself enough to impair judicial independence.

The applicants contend that, although there is no explicit provision in the Statute of the Tribunal stating that judicial and political offices are incompatible, Article 13 of the Tribunal's Statute and Rule 15 of its Rules of Procedure and Evidence, taken together, have the same effect as Article 16(1) of the Statute of the International Court of Justice, which provides that -

"No member of the Court may exercise any political or administrative function..."

The applicants also refer also to Article 7 of the Statute of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea which contains the same wording as the above, except that the word 'Court' is replaced with the word 'Tribunal'.

The question, however, is not whether there is a prohibition against the exercise of any political or administrative function, but whether such a function is being exercised by Judge Odio Benito. In the circumstances of this case, she is not exercising any such function.

The applicants contend that the fact that Judge Odio Benito holds political office as a Vice-President of the Republic of Costa Rica is sufficient to create the appearance of lack of impartiality within the meaning of Rule 15(A) of the Tribunal's Rules of Procedure and Evidence. They state that –

1. Costa Rica is a member of the General Assembly

> 2. Costa Rica is a non-permanent member of the Security Council, having been elected for a two year term from 1 January 1997.
>
> 3. As Vice-President, pursuant to Title X of the Constitution of Costa Rica, the Judge may be designated to take the President's place in the latter's absence, and that the duties of the President include the conduct of international relations and the making of treaties.

On the basis of these matters, the applicants contend that Judge Odio Benito's impartiality as a Judge of the Tribunal is affected, their argument being as follows -

> 'the Vice-President may be expected to participate in policy decisions affecting, for example, how votes are cast in the Security Council or the General Assembly by Costa Rica (which may include matters relating to the conflict and continuing peace-making process in the countries of the Former Yugoslavia) as well as international relations with the nations which emerged from the collapse of the Former Yugoslavia.
> It will also be noted that the Republic of Costa Rica as a member of the Security Council is a member of the very body that created the International Tribunal by its resolution of 25th. May 1993. That body is the one which has the power to alter the Statute, as it has recently done by increasing the establishment of judges. It also extended the term of office for the Celebici judges to enable them to complete this case.'[12]

In fact, Judge Odio Benito has been holding the position of Vice-President in name only from the date she took the oath of office. She has committed herself not to take up the duties of her post until she has completed her judicial duties. The contention that in the event of the President's absence she may have to assume his role is not one of substance. Under the Constitution of the Republic of Costa Rica there are two other officials who can also undertake such a role - the first Vice-President and the President of the Legislative Assembly.[13] She has undertaken not to assume the functions or duties of the President of Costa Rica in his temporary or permanent absence prior to the termination of her tenure as Judge. Furthermore, the President of the Republic of Costa Rica has agreed that she will not assume her duties as Second Vice-President until such time.

For these reasons, the Bureau concludes that Judge Odio Benito is not disqualified under Sub-rule 15(A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence from sitting on the trial of the applicants. The competence conferred on the Bureau under Sub-rule 15(B) of the said Rules does not extend to aspects of the applicants' motion raising matters going beyond the scope of Sub-rule 15(A).

3. Disposition

The Bureau, having considered all the arguments and supporting material, decides, under Sub-rule 15(B) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence of the Tribunal, that Judge Odio Benito is not disqualified to sit in the trial of the four accused on the grounds referred to in Sub-rule 15(A) of the Rules.

The position of magistrate is incompatible with that of an official of the other supreme powers.

The constitution of Costa Rica refers to the "Legislative Power" and the "Executive Power" in Titles IX and X and may be taken, we submit, to be those to which Article 161 refers. Title X Chapter 1 sets out the process for election as President and Vice-president of the Republic.

The effect of this is that with effect from 8th. May 1998 the Learned Judge ceased to be qualified to be elected as a Magistrate of the Supreme Court of Justice in her own country.

We respectfully submit therefore that the requirement of qualification to the highest judicial office in Costa Rica is one which operates upon the Learned Judge's being a Judge. Being a member of one of the other "supreme powers" would not disqualify her from election to the office of Judge, provided she resigned such office prior to taking up the office of Judge of this Tribunal. The failure to possess the requisite qualifications affects the ability to serve, not the ability to be elected.

For all the foregoing reasons we respectfully submit that the Learned Judge, no longer holding the requisite qualifications for the "highest judicial offices" in Costa Rica can no longer sit as a judge of the International Tribunal.

Judicial Independence

In the alternative, we respectfully assert that the Learned Judge, by virtue of her having assumed the elective political office of a Vice-President of the Republic of Costa Rica, may fall to be disqualified under Rule 15 (A) of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence, set out supra. In an annexe hereto [7] we set out what we assert is the nature of the concept of "judicial independence" in international law.

In making the this assertion, we in no way seek to suggest that the Learned Judge has done any act which might be construed as being impartial. Rather, we respectfully suggest that as a matter of general principle, the Learned Judge ought to be disqualified from the office of Judge of the International Tribunal because the elective political office which she now holds

I. INTRODUCTION AND PROCEDURAL BACKGROUND

On 10 March 1997, the trial commenced before this Trial Chamber of the International Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of the Former Yugoslavia since 1991 ("International Tribunal") of the four accused person, Zejnil Delalic, Zdravko Mucic, Hazim Delic and Esad Landzo, for crimes within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal, namely, grave breaches of the Geneva Conventions of 1949 and violations of the laws or customs of war, which were allegedly committed in 1992 hearing enshrined in Articles 20(4) and 21(2). Rule 75(A) enacted pursuant to Article 22 provides.

> A Judge or a Chamber may proprio motu or at the request of either party, or of the victim or witness concerned, or of the Victims and Witnesses Unit, order appropriate measures for the privacy and protection of victims and witnesses provided that the measures are consistent with the rights of the accused.

Accordingly the measures formulated by virtue of Article 22 must be consistent with the rights of the accused. The Statute of the International Tribunal emphasises the public nature of a trial as an essential feature of the proceedings (Articles 20(4), 21(2)).

34. The principal advantage of permitting the public and the press access to a hearing is that their presence contributes to ensuring a fair trial. In Pretto & Ors v Italy, (Series A, No. 71 (1984) 6 EHRR 182) the ECHR stated that "[p]ublicity is seen as one guarantee of fairness of trial; it offers protection against arbitrary decisions and builds confidence by allowing the public to see justice administered". Thus, a public hearing is mainly for the benefit of the accused and not necessarily of the public. The following dictum of Chief Justice Warren in Estes v Texas, a case decided by the United States Supreme Court, supports this view.

> There can be no blinking the fact that there is a strong societal interest in public trials. Openness in court proceedings may improve the quality of testimony, induce unknown witnesses to come forward with relevant testimony, cause all trial participants to perform their duties more conscientiously. . . .

381 U.S. 532 at 583 (1965)

35. The two interests requiring attention in the trial which ought to be maintained, are the right of the accused to a public hearing, and the right of the witness to protection in the interests of justice. Accordingly, the Trial Chamber in considering the motion must balance these two interests. This is clearly provided by Rule 79 which enables the exclusion of the press and public from the proceedings for various reasons including safety by the non-disclosure of the identity of a victim or witness. Thus, in certain circumstances, the right to a public hearing may be qualified and curtailed to accommodate other interests.

36. Several of the Rules relate to maintaining a balance between the right of the accused to a public hearing and the protection of victims and witnesses. Rule 69 allows for non-disclosure at the pre-trial stage of the identity of a victim or witness who may be in danger until the witness is brought under the protection of the International Tribunal. This non-disclosure applies to the press, public and the accused. Under Rule 75 appropriate measures consistent with the rights of the accused may be taken to protect victims and witnesses. Rule 79 enables the exclusion of the press and public from the proceedings on the grounds of public order or morality, the safety or non-disclosure of the identity of a victim or witness or the protection of the interest of justice.

37. It is clear from the construction of the provisions of the relevant Articles of the Statute of the International Tribunal, namely Article 20(4), 21(2) and 22, and the enabling Rules, namely, Rules 69, 75 and 79, that the Statute which is the legal framework for the application of the Rules, provides that the protection of victims and witnesses, is an acceptable reason to limit the accused's right to a public trial. Article 14(1) of the ICCPR and Article 6(1) of the ECHR state that everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing. Nevertheless both Articles provide that the press and the public may be excluded in the interest of morals, public order or national security, where the interests of juveniles or the protection of the private life of the parties so require, or where publicity would prejudice the interest of justice.

38. The satisfaction of the public interest in this case is of crucial importance. This trial, apart from being the first multiple-defendant international criminal trial since the Nürnberg and Tokyo trials involving crucial issues relating to command responsibility, is also the second trial before the International Tribunal.

39. After considering all the rights and interests in issue, the Trial Chamber is not persuaded that the arguments presented by the Prosecution have shown that all the twelve witnesses indicated must be heard in closed sessions in order to guarantee their protection. The Trial Chamber notes the submissions of the Defence that granting the prayers of the Prosecution will result in too much evidence being heard in closed sessions. The Trial Chamber is aware of its statutory duty to protect witnesses and cannot lightly abdicate the same. It is encouraging that none of the parties has suggested the

21. In its Judgement of Acquittal of 26 February 2008, the Trial Chamber held that Rasim Delić had no case to answer in respect of rape (Count 3) as a violation of the laws or customs of war.[47] In relation to the events involving the three women, Rasim Delić remains only charged with individual criminal responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute for cruel treatment (Count 4) as a violation of the laws or customs of war pursuant to Article 3 of the Statute.[48]

C. General Considerations Regarding the Evaluation of Evidence

22. General Principles. The Trial Chamber has assessed the evidence in this case in light of the entire trial record, in accordance with the Tribunal's Statute and its Rules of Procedure and Evidence ("Rules"). The Trial Chamber emphasises that it has duly considered and given appropriate weight to all the evidence adduced at trial, even if not expressly referred to in this Judgement.[49]

23. Burden and Standard of Proof. Rasim Delić is presumed innocent until proven guilty, as enshrined in Article 21(3) of the Statute. It follows that the Prosecution bears the burden of proof for the guilt of Rasim Delić and must establish each and every element of the offences charged against him beyond reasonable doubt.[50]

24. In determining whether the Prosecution has done so, the Trial Chamber has resolved any reasonable doubt in favour of Rasim Delić, in accordance with the principle of in dubio pro reo.

25. Silence of the Accused. Article 21(4)(g) of the Statute provides that no accused shall be compelled to testify against himself. In the present case, Rasim Delić exercised his right to remain silent. No adverse inference has been drawn from his choice not to testify.

26. The "Guidelines" on the Admission of Evidence. At the outset of the trial, the Trial Chamber adopted a decision regulating the conduct of counsel in court and governing the presentation and standard of admission of evidence at trial.[51] These "Guidelines" were amended on one occasion.[52] The Trial Chamber underlines that the mere admission of evidence in the course of the trial has no bearing on the weight subsequently attached to it.

position of authority".[783] The Appeals Chamber accepts that an order does not necessarily need to be explicit in relation to the consequences it will have.[784] However, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the Trial Chamber established beyond reasonable doubt that Milošević instructed his troops to perform a campaign of sniping and shelling of the civilian population in Sarajevo as such.

268. Although Milošević does not explicitly challenge his responsibility for planning the crimes under this ground of appeal, the Appeals Chamber takes note of his relevant submissions under other grounds[785] and decides to address the issue within the present Section of the Judgement. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of "planning" requires that one or more persons design the criminal conduct constituting one or more statutory crimes that are later perpetrated.[786] It is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct.[787] The mens rea for this mode of responsibility entails the intent to plan the commission of a crime or, at a minimum, the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of the acts or omissions planned.[788]

269. The Appeals Chamber reiterates that the campaign of sniping and shelling civilians in Sarajevo was already in place when Milošević took the SRK command over from Galić.[789] Although this cannot be determinative in the present case, the Appeals Chamber finds it instructive to note that Galić was held responsible for ordering the indicted crimes, but not for planning them. Conversely, Milošević, although found not having "devise[d] a strategy for Sarajevo on his own"[790]

XIV. PARTLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE LIU DAQUN

A. The "crime of terror"

1. I respectfully disagree with the majority of the bench in affirming Milošević's conviction under Count 1 for the "crime of terror".[1] In my view, there is no basis to find that this prohibition was criminalised beyond any doubt under customary international law at the time relevant to the Indictment.[2] Rather, I would have adopted the approach proposed by Judge Schomburg in his Separate and Partially Dissenting Opinion in the Galić Appeal Judgement, overturning Milošević's conviction under Count 1 and convicting him under Counts 4 and 7 for unlawful attacks against civilians, taking into account the terrorisation of the civilian population as an aggravating factor.

1. Jurisdiction

2. It is settled jurisprudence that the Tribunal has jurisdiction to prosecute violations of international humanitarian law under Article 3 of the Statute where four conditions are met:

> (i) the violation must constitute an infringement of a rule of international humanitarian law;
>
> (ii) the rule must be customary in nature or, if it belongs to treaty law, the required conditions must be met [...];
>
> (iii) the violation must be serious, that is to say, it must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values, and the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim. [...];
> (iv) the violation of the rule must entail, under customary or conventional law, the individual criminal responsibility of the person breaching the rule.[3]

3. The principle of nullum crimen sine lege requires the Tribunal to apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of conventional or customary international law at the time relevant to the commission of the alleged offence.[4]

[1] The majority upholds the findings of the majority in the Galić Appeal Judgement, namely that the crime of terror existed under customary international law. Judgement, para. 30. See also Trial Judgement, para. 874.

[2] See Report of the Secretary-General Pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808 (1993), U.N. Doc. S/25704, 3 May 1993 ("Report of the Secretary-General"), para. 34: "In the view of the Secretary-General, the application of the principle nullum crimen sine lege requires that the international tribunal should apply rules of international humanitarian law which are beyond any doubt part of customary law [...]." (Emphasis in original.)

[3] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para. 94.

4. The prohibition of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population is part of customary international law, in accordance with Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II. However, this prohibition has not been criminalised by any treaty or convention.[5]

5. It is insufficient for criminalisation to be inferred from the seriousness of the offence but must be established independently.[6] As noted by Justice Robertson: "it is precisely when the acts are abhorrent and deeply shocking that the principle of legality must be most stridently applied, to ensure that a defendant is not convicted out of disgust rather than evidence, or of a non-existent crime."[7] Consequently, criminalisation must be ascertained from the body of customary international law in order to satisfy the fourth Tadić condition.

2. State practice

6. It is generally accepted that customary international law may be inferred from state practice and opinio juris.[8] To establish a rule of customary international law, state practice has to be virtually uniform, extensive and representative.[9]

---

[4] Report of the Secretary-General, para. 34. According to Cassese, "the principle of non-retroactivity of criminal rules is now solidly embedded in international law. It follows that courts may only apply substantive criminal rules that existed at the time of commission of the alleged crime." (Emphasis in original.) A. [8] See Galić Appeal Judgement, para. 92: "Individual criminal responsibility under the fourth Tadić condition can be inferred from, inter alia, state practice indicating an intention to criminalise the prohibition, including statements by government officials and international organisations, as well as punishment of violations by national courts and military tribunals." II. STANDARD OF REVIEW ON APPEAL

A. Submissions of the Parties

1. The Appellant

27. The Appellant submits that the standard of review in the Appeals Chamber "necessarily takes into account the standard of proof in the Trial Chamber."[16] The Appellant further submits that "[i]f a reasonable person could have reasonable doubt about his guilt, the conviction must be reversed."[17]

28. The Appellant argues that to satisfy the test of proof beyond reasonable doubt, "[t]he evidence must be so overwhelming that it excludes every fair or rational hypothesis except that of guilt."[18] He contends that he "appeals on the basis that the Trial Chamber was unreasonable in concluding that the only fair or rational hypothesis that could be derived from the evidence is that Mr. Furund`ija is guilty."[19] He concludes that the Appeals Chamber must acquit him because the evidence may be read to support a fair or rational inference of innocence.[20]

2. The Respondent

29. The Respondent submits that the appealing party bears the burden of establishing an error within the terms of Article 25(1) of the Statute.[21] The Respondent further contends that the appropriate standard of review on appeal depends on the classification of the alleged error as one of fact or law.[22]

30. The Respondent submits that two categories of error fall within Article 25(1)(a) of the Statute, which provides for an appeal from "an error on a question of law invalidating the decision". The first relates to an error in the substantive law applied by the Trial Chamber and the second to an error in the exercise of the Trial Chamber's discretion.[23] Where the error alleged is one of substantive law, the Respondent says that the nature of the burden on the appealing party is that of persuasion rather than proof.[24] Where the appeal is based on an error in the exercise of the Trial

Chamber's discretion, the Respondent contends that the Appeals Chamber should review the impugned decision under an abuse of discretion standard.[25] The Respondent submits that "absent a showing that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion, the Appeals Chamber should not substitute its own view for that of the Trial Chamber."[26]

31. As regards the standard of review under Article 25(1)(b) of the Statute, which provides for an appeal on the basis of "an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice," the Respondent identifies two types of error which may be the subject of an appeal under this provision. The first is an error based on the submission of additional evidence that was not available at trial, and the second is an error in the factual conclusions the Trial Chamber reached based upon the evidence submitted at trial.[27]

32. The Respondent contends that the standard of review on appeal proposed by the Appellant is erroneous, and that the Appeals Chamber should not disturb the Trial Chamber's findings of fact, unless no reasonable person could have so concluded on the evidence presented.[28] The Respondent finds equally mistaken the Appellant's proposed standards as regards the burden placed on the Appellant.[29]

33. The Respondent further submits that in order to appeal a decision under Article 25(1), a party has to object at trial in a timely and proper manner to an error of the Trial Chamber or to a Trial Chamber's abuse of discretion, or the issue of waiver must be considered.[30]

B. Discussion

34. Article 25 of the Statute sets forth the circumstances in which a party may appeal from a final decision of the Trial Chamber. A party invoking a specific ground of appeal must establish an error within the scope of this provision, which provides:

> 1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chambers or from the Prosecutor on the following grounds:
>
> (a) an error on a question of law invalidating the decision; or
>
> (b) an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.
>
> 2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chambers.

[29] T. 111 – 112 (2 March 2000).
[30] Prosecutor's Response, para. 2.11.

35. Errors of law do not raise a question as to the standard of review as directly as errors of fact. Where a party contends that a Trial Chamber made an error of law, the Appeals Chamber, as the final arbiter of the law of the Tribunal, must determine whether there was such a mistake. A party alleging that there was an error of law must be prepared to advance arguments in support of the contention; but, if the arguments do not support the contention, that party has not failed to discharge a burden in the sense that a person who fails to discharge a burden automatically loses his point. The Appeals Chamber may step in and, for other reasons, find in favour of the contention that there is an error of law.

36. Furthermore, this Chamber is only empowered to reverse or revise a decision of the Trial Chamber on the basis of Article 25(1)(a) when there is an error of law that invalidates that decision. It is not any error of law that leads to a reversal or revision of the Trial Chamber's decision; rather, the appealing party alleging an error of law must also demonstrate that the error renders the decision invalid.

37. As to an allegation that there was an error of fact, this Chamber agrees with the following principle set forth by the Appeals Chamber for the International Criminal Tribunal for Rwanda ("the ICTR")[31] in Serushago:

> Under the Statute and the Rules of the Tribunal, a Trial Chamber is required as a matter of law to take account of mitigating circumstances. But the question of whether a Trial Chamber gave due weight to any mitigating circumstance is a question of fact. In putting forward this question as a ground of appeal, the Appellant must discharge two burdens. He must show that the Trial Chamber did indeed commit the error, and, if it did, he must go on to show that the error resulted in a miscarriage of justice.[32]

Similarly, under Article 25(1)(b) of the ICTY Statute, it is not any and every error of fact which will cause the Appeals Chamber to overturn a decision of the Trial Chamber, but one which has led to a miscarriage of justice. A miscarriage of justice is defined in Black's Law Dictionary as "a grossly unfair outcome in judicial proceedings, as when a defendant is convicted despite a lack of evidence on an essential element of the crime."[33] This Chamber adopts the following approach taken by the Appeals Chamber in the Tadi} case[34] in dealing with challenges to factual findings by Trial Chambers:

[31] International Criminal Tribunal for the Prosecution of Persons Responsible for Genocide and Other Serious Violations of International Humanitarian Law Committed in the Territory of Rwanda and Rwandan Citizens Responsible for Genocide and Other Such Violations Committed in the Neighbouring States between 1 January and 31 December 1994 ("the ICTR").

[34] Prosecutor v. Du{ko Tadi}, Case No. IT-94-1-A, Judgement, 15 July 1999 ("the Tadi} Appeals Judgement").

> [t]he task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial is left to the judges sitting in a Trial Chamber. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber must give a margin of deference to a finding of fact reached by a Trial Chamber. It is only where the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber could not reasonably have been accepted by any reasonable person that the Appeals Chamber can substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber. It is important to note that two judges, both acting reasonably, can come to different conclusions on the basis of the same evidence.[35]

The position taken by this Chamber in the Tadi} Appeals Judgement has been reaffirmed in the Aleksovski Appeals Judgement.[36] The reason the Appeals Chamber will not lightly disturb findings of fact by a Trial Chamber is well known; the Trial Chamber has the advantage of observing witness testimony first-hand, and is, therefore, better positioned than this Chamber to assess the reliability and credibility of the evidence.

38. The Appeals Chamber now turns to consider the Appellant's submissions in relation to the appropriate standard of review where the sufficiency of the evidence in support of a conviction is challenged on appeal. The Appellant submits that the Tadi} Appeals Judgement demonstrates that, in evaluating the sufficiency of the evidence in support of a conviction, the Appeals Chamber must determine whether the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt was correctly applied by the Trial Chamber.[37] The Appellant further invites the Appeals Chamber to: 1) conduct an independent assessment of the evidence, both as to its sufficiency and its quality; and 2) inquire whether a reasonable trier of fact could have found that an inference or hypothesis consistent with innocence of the offence charged was open on the evidence.[38] The Appellant further contends that, as to the application of the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt, the Appeals Chamber must find that guilt was not merely a reasonable conclusion based on the evidence, but rather the only "fair and rational hypothesis which may be derived from the evidence".[39]

39. The Appellant's reliance on the Tadi} Appeals Judgement is misplaced. In Tadi}, the Appeals Chamber held that the Trial Chamber had erred in law in its application of the legal standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt to its factual findings in respect of certain charges in the indictment. The application of the correct legal standard did not support the inferences which the Trial Chamber had drawn from the facts. On a true interpretation, the Tadi} Appeals Chamber did not disturb the finding of facts by the Trial Chamber.

40. The Appeals Chamber finds no merit in the Appellant's submission which it understands to mean that the scope of the appellate function should be expanded to include de novo review. This which there is no corresponding material fact in the indictment, the defence may challenge the admission of the evidence or request an adjournment.

1. Evidence Concerning Other Acts in the Large Room and the Pantry

148. Trial Chambers have been consistently mindful of the primary function of the International Tribunal, which is to ensure that justice is done and that the accused receives a fair trial. It is, no doubt, in light of this preoccupation that in evaluating the testimony of Witness A, the Trial Chamber limited its consideration to that part of the testimony relating to the Amended Indictment. This exercise by the Trial Chamber is indicative of its sensitivity to any prejudice to the fairness of the trial that could result from Witness A's testimony. Consistent with this concern, the Trial Chamber acknowledged that "[t]he witness has testified that rapes and sexual abuse took place in the large room in the presence of the accused", and that the relevant "evidence falls outside the facts alleged in paragraphs 25 and 26 of the Amended Indictment, and is contrary to earlier submissions by the Prosecutor."[198] The Trial Chamber also remarked that during the proceedings the Prosecutor did not seek to modify the Amended Indictment to charge the Accused with participation in the rapes and sexual abuse.

149. It is on the basis of the aforementioned grounds that the Trial Chamber decided that "the Trial Chamber will not consider evidence relating to rapes and sexual assault of Witness A in the presence of the accused, other than those alleged in paragraph 25 and 26 of the Amended Indictment."[199]

150. The factual allegations contained in paragraphs 25 and 26 of the Amended Indictment and pertaining to Counts 13 and 14 are as follows:

> 25. On or about 15 May 1993, at the Jokers Headquarters in Nadioci (the "Bungalow"), Anto FURUND@IJA the local commander of the Jokers, [REDACTED] and another soldier interrogated Witness A. While being questioned by FURUND@IJA, [REDACTED] rubbed his knife against Witness A's inner thigh and lower stomach and threatened to put his knife inside Witness A's vagina should she not tell the truth.
> 26. Then Witness A and Victim B, a Bosnian Croat who had previously assisted Witness A's family, were taken to another room in the "Bungalow". Victim B had been badly beaten prior to this time. While FURUND@IJA continued to interrogate Witness A and Victim B, [REDACTED] beat Witness A and Victim B on the feet with a baton. Then [REDACTED] forced Witness A to have oral and vaginal sexual intercourse with him. FURUND@IJA was present during this entire incident and did nothing to stop or curtail [REDACTED] actions.

176. The second observation is concerned with the additional material annexed to the Appellant's Amended Brief. It is to be recalled that, in an order dated 2 September 1999, the Appeals Chamber granted leave to the Appellant to amend his Appellate Brief, although not specifically admitting the material referred to in the "Defendant's Motion to Supplement Record on Appeal".[237] The Appeals Chamber confirms that, by granting leave to file an amended Appellate Brief, it granted leave to file the annexed documents, which the Appeals Chamber will take into account in considering the Appellant's submissions.

1. Statutory Requirement of Impartiality

177. The fundamental human right of an accused to be tried before an independent and impartial tribunal is generally recognised as being an integral component of the requirement that an accused should have a fair trial. Article 13(1) of the Statute reflects this, by expressly providing that Judges of the International Tribunal "shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity".[238] This fundamental human right is similarly reflected in Article 21 of the Statute, dealing generally with the rights of the accused and the right to a fair trial.[239] As a result, the Appeals Chamber need look no further than Article 13(1) of the Statute for the source of that requirement.

[237] Filed on 28 June 1999.

[238] (Emphasis added). Article 13(1) provides: "The Judges shall be persons of high moral character, impartiality and integrity who possess the qualifications required in their respective countries for appointment to the highest judicial offices. In the overall composition of the Chambers due account shall be taken of the experience of the judges in criminal law, international law, including international humanitarian law and human rights law." See also Arts. 2 and 11 of Statute of the International Tribunal for the Law of the Sea (Annex VI of United Nations Convention on the Law of the Sea of 10 December 1982); Art. 19 of Statute of the Inter-American Court of Human Rights (adopted by Resolution 448 by the General Assembly of the Organisation of American States at its ninth regular session held in La Paz, Bolivia, October 1979); Arts. 36(3)(a), 40 and 41 of the Rome Statute.

[239] Under Article 21(2) of the Statute, the accused is entitled to "a fair and public hearing" in the determination of the charges against him. Paragraph 106 of the Report of the Secretary General provides that "[i]t is axiomatic that the International Tribunal must fully respect internationally recognised standards regarding the rights of the accused at all stages of its proceedings. In the view of the Secretary-General, such internationally recognised standards are, in particular, contained in Article 14 of the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights." (Report of the Secretary-General pursuant to Paragraph 2 of Security Council Resolution 808(1993)). Article 14(1) of the ICCPR provides in relevant part: "In the determination of any criminal charge against him, or of his rights and obligations in a suit at law, everyone shall be entitled to a fair and public hearing by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal established by law." The fundamental human right of an accused to be tried before an independent and impartial tribunal is also recognised in other major human rights treaties. The Universal Declaration of Human Rights provides in Art. 10 that "[e]veryone is entitled in full equality to a fair and public hearing by an independent and impartial tribunal in the full determination of his rights and obligations of any criminal charge against him". Art. 6(1) of the European Convention on Human Rights protects the right to a fair trial and provides inter alia that "everyone is entitled to a fair and public hearing within a reasonable time by an independent and impartial tribunal established by law." Art. 8(1) of the American Convention provides that "[e]very person has the right to a hearing, with due guarantees and within a reasonable time, by a competent, independent and impartial tribunal, previously established by law". Art. 7(1)(d) of the African Charter on Human and Peoples' Rights provides that every person shall have the right to have his case tried "within a reasonable time by an impartial court or tribunal."

submits that the Erdemovi} case[320] cannot serve as an appropriate guideline, as the circumstances surrounding that case were unique. The accused in that case pleaded guilty to the charges against him, and duress was treated as a significant mitigating factor. Therefore, the Respondent argues, Erdemovi} is clearly distinguishable from the instant case.[321]

224. Contrary to the Appellant's submission that the Appeals Chamber be guided by the sentences passed by the Trial Chambers to date, the Respondent submits that it would be desirable for the Appeals Chamber to establish appropriate sentencing principles in order to achieve consistency and even-handedness.[322]

225. The Respondent further argues that deterrence and retribution should be the primary goals of sentencing. In the Respondent's view, deterrence has two aspects, one "suppressive" and the other "educative". The Respondent submits that both of these aspects of deterrence and the aim of retribution would be defeated were the sentences imposed by the Tribunal generally lower than those typically imposed in national systems.[323]

226. As to the suppressive aspect, the Respondent contends that a prospective violator of international humanitarian law would not be dissuaded by the sanctions imposed by an international tribunal if they were lower than those imposed under national law. As to the educative aspect, the Respondent argues that lower sentences imposed by the International Tribunal would signal that genocide, crimes against humanity and war crimes are less serious than ordinary crimes under national law. Finally, the imposition by the International Tribunal of sentences lower than those prevailing in national jurisdictions would undermine the Tribunal's aim of contributing to the restoration of peace and security in the former Yugoslavia.[324]

227. The Respondent submits that the gravity of the crime must form the starting point for any determination of sentence. Rather than subscribing to some form of hierarchy between the offences generally, a Trial Chamber should impose a sentence which reflects the inherent gravity of the accused's criminal conduct.[325] The gravity of the crimes must ultimately be determined with regard to the particular circumstances of the case; the degree of the accused's participation should be considered and, generally, the closer a person is to actual participation in the crime, the more serious the nature of his crime.[326] However, an individual who orders or plans a course of criminal conduct will be responsible for his role in having ordered all of the crimes committed by the perpetrators and his responsibility may, therefore, be greater.[327]

228. As a general proposition, the Respondent agrees with the Appellant that a crime that results in the death of the victim is more serious than a crime not involving the loss of human life. However, this principle may not apply in the circumstances of every case. The Respondent rejects the Appellant's argument that six years' imprisonment has been established as the "appropriate benchmark" for violations of the laws or customs of war when the accused is convicted of particularly cruel and terrorising treatment that did not result in the death of a victim.[328] The Respondent also highlights other factors which are to be considered, such as the personal circumstances of the accused, aggravating and mitigating factors, and the general practice regarding prison sentences in the courts of the former Yugoslavia.[329]

229. The Respondent submits that the Appellant has not demonstrated that his sentence of ten years for torture was manifestly disproportionate to the gravity of the criminal conduct in question. The Trial Chamber found the Appellant guilty as a co-perpetrator of the act of torture, suggesting that the criminal conduct of the Appellant and that of Accused B were equally serious. Therefore, the sentence imposed cannot be regarded as disproportionate.[330] The Respondent adds that the sentence for outrages upon personal dignity reflects the Appellant's diminished role in this crime, although the conduct underlying this count was the same as that underlying the torture count.[331] The Prosecutor concludes that the Defence has failed to establish that the Trial Chamber abused its discretion in imposing the sentences.[332]

230. The Respondent further submits that, even if any weight is given to sentences imposed by Trial Chambers in other cases, the sentences do not appear to be inconsistent. The Respondent highlights as an example the accused Hazim Deli}, in the ^elebi}i case, who received a sentence of fifteen years for rape. The Respondent contends that this sentence is probably the one most

From this the Appellant deduces that violations which do not result in death should receive a sentence three years less than for those from which death results. In view of the above, the Appellant submits that an appropriate benchmark sentence for a violation of the laws or customs of war that does not result in the death of the victim is six years.

246. The reasoning behind this proposed benchmark of six years depends in part on the view that crimes resulting in loss of life are to be punished more severely than those not leading to the loss of life. The Appeals Chamber considers this approach to be too rigid and mechanistic.

247. Since the Tadi} Sentencing Appeals Judgement, the position of the Appeals Chamber has been that there is no distinction in law between crimes against humanity and war crimes that would require, in respect of the same acts, that the former be sentenced more harshly than the latter. It follows that the length of sentences imposed for crimes against humanity does not necessarily limit the length of sentences imposed for war crimes.

248. The argument implicitly advanced by the Appellant in support of a six-year benchmark sentence is that all war crimes should attract similar sentences. The reasoning may be summarised as follows: because war crimes not resulting in death received sentences of six years in Tadic, it stands to reason that war crimes not resulting in death in this case should receive the same or a similar sentence. The Appeals Chamber does not agree with this logic, or with the imposition of a restriction on sentencing which does not have any basis in the Statute or the Rules.

249. In deciding to impose different sentences for the same type of crime, a Trial Chamber may consider such factors as the circumstances in which the offence was committed and its seriousness. While acts of cruelty that fall within the meaning of Article 3 of the Statute will, by definition, be serious, some will be more serious than others. The Prosecutor submits that sentences must be individualised according to the circumstances and gravity of the particular offence. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the statement of the Prosecutor that "the sentence imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the accused's criminal conduct",[362] which conforms to the statement of the Trial Chamber in the Kupreškic Judgement:

> The sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime.[363]

[362] Prosecutor's Response, para. 7.32.
[363] Kupreškic Judgement, para. 852.

This statement has been endorsed by the Appeals Chamber in the Aleksovski Appeals Judgement,[364] and there is no reason for this Chamber to depart from it.

250. The sentencing provisions in the Statute and the Rules provide Trial Chambers with the discretion to take into account the circumstances of each crime in assessing the sentence to be given. A previous decision on sentence may indeed provide guidance if it relates to the same offence and was committed in substantially similar circumstances; otherwise, a Trial Chamber is limited only by the provisions of the Statute and the Rules. It may impose a sentence of imprisonment for a term up to and including the remainder of the convicted person's life.[365] As a result, an individual convicted of a war crime could be sentenced to imprisonment for a term up to and including the remainder of his life, depending on the circumstances.

251. The Appellant's submission regarding the appropriate length of benchmark sentences is contradicted by recent Appeals Chamber practice. In the Tadic Sentencing Appeals Judgement, the Appeals Chamber pronounced sentences of twenty years for wilful killings under Article 2 of the Statute and for murders under Article 3 of the Statute,[366] both of which surpass the nine-year benchmark which the Appellant argues is appropriate for war crimes resulting in death.

252. The Appellant further relies upon the judgement of the Trial Chamber in the Aleksovski case in order to establish a benchmark for sentencing. In that case, the convicted person was sentenced to two and a half years in prison for outrages upon personal dignity. However, in the recent Aleksovski Appeals Judgement, the Appeals Chamber found that there was a discernible error on the part of the Trial Chamber in the exercise of its discretion, namely:

> giving insufficient weight to the gravity of the conduct of the Appellant and failing to treat his position as commander as an aggravating feature in relation to his responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute.[367]

The Appeals Chamber went on to sentence Zlatko Aleksovski to seven years, stating that, had it not been for an element of double jeopardy involved in the process, "the sentence would have been considerably longer."[368]

3. Additional arguments

253. The Appellant submits that "there are substantive issues that hang over the case" that suggest innocence is a possibility and that this should be considered in sentencing.[369] The Appeals as a spectator in civilian dress, a SA (Stürmabteilung) "parade" in which two political opponents of the NSDAP (Nationalsozialistische Deutsche Arbeiterpartei) were exposed to public humiliation. P had followed the "parade" without taking any active part. The court found that P, > followed the parade only as a spectator in civilian clothes, although he was following a service order by the SA for a purpose yet unknown . . . His conduct cannot even with certainty be evaluated as objective or subjective approval. Furthermore, silent approval that does not contribute to causing the offence in no way meets the requirements for criminal liability.[230]

P was found not guilty. He may have lacked the necessary mens rea. But in any event, his insignificant status brought the effect of his "silent approval" below the threshold necessary for the actus reus.

209. It appears from the Synagogue and Pig-cart parade cases that presence, when combined with authority, can constitute assistance in the form of moral support, that is, the actus reus of the offence. The supporter must be of a certain status for this to be sufficient for criminal responsibility. This emphasis on the accused's authority was also affirmed in Akayesu. Jean-Paul Akayesu was the bourgmestre, or mayor, of the Commune in which atrocities, including rape and sexual violence, occurred. That Trial Chamber considered this position of authority highly significant for his criminal liability for aiding and abetting: "The Tribunal finds, under Article 6(1) of its Statute, that the Accused, having had reason to know that sexual violence was occurring, aided and abetted the following acts of sexual violence, by allowing them to take place on or near the premises of the bureau communal and by facilitating the commission of such sexual violence through his words of encouragement in other acts of sexual violence which, by virtue of his authority, sent a clear signal of official tolerance for sexual violence, without which these acts would not have taken place: [. . .]".[231] Furthermore, it can be inferred from this finding that assistance need not be tangible. In addition, assistance need not constitute an indispensable element, that is, a conditio sine qua non for the acts of the principal.

210. Mention should also be made of several cases which enable us to distinguish aiding and abetting from the case of co-perpetration involving a group of persons pursuing a common design to commit crimes.

211. The Dachau Concentration Camp case was held before a US Tribunal under Control Council Law No. 10.[232] All the accused held some position in the hierarchy running the Dachau concentration camp. While allegations of direct participation in instances of ill-treatment were made against certain accused, and allegations of command responsibility against others, the real basis of the charges was that all the accused had "acted in pursuance of a common design" to kill and mistreat prisoners, and hence to commit war crimes.

212. The organised and official nature of the system by which war crimes were perpetrated in this case adds a specific element to the "complicity" of the accused. The report of the case by the United Nations War Crimes Commission isolates three elements necessary to establish guilt in each case. The first was the existence of a system to ill-treat the prisoners and commit the various crimes alleged; the second was the accused's knowledge of the nature of this system; and the third was that the accused "encouraged, aided and abetted or participated" in enforcing the system. Once the existence of the system had been established, a given accused was potentially liable for his participation in this system. The roles of the accused ranged from camp commanders to guards and prisoner functionaries and all were found guilty, with the difference in the levels of participation reflected in the sentences. It would seem that the holding of any role in the administration of the camps was sufficient to constitute encouraging, aiding and abetting or participating in the enforcement of the system.

Chamber held that the accused "intentionally assisted directly and substantially in the common purpose of the group" to commit the offence.[253]

(b) International Instruments

227. The two international instruments useful for these purposes are the 1996 Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind adopted by the International Law Commission, and the Rome Statute. Neither instrument is legally binding internationally. The Draft Code was adopted in 1996 by the United Nations International Law Commission, a body consisting of outstanding experts in international law, including governmental legal advisers, elected by the United Nations General Assembly. The Draft Code was taken into account by the General Assembly: in its resolution 51 (160) of 30 January 1997 it expressed its "appreciation" for the completion of the Draft Code and among other things drew the attention of the States participating in the Preparatory Committee on the Establishment of an International Criminal Court to the relevance of the Draft Code to their work.[254] In the light of the above the Trial Chamber considers that the Draft Code is an authoritative international instrument which, depending upon the specific question at issue, may (i) constitute evidence of customary law, or (ii) shed light on customary rules which are of uncertain contents or are in the process of formation, or, at the very least, (iii) be indicative of the legal views of eminently qualified publicists representing the major legal systems of the world. As for the Rome Statute, at present it is still a non-binding international treaty (it has not yet entered into force). It was adopted by an overwhelming majority of the States attending the Rome Diplomatic Conference and was substantially endorsed by the General Assembly's Sixth Committee on 26 November 1998.[255] In many areas the Statute may be regarded as indicative of the legal views, i.e. opinio juris of a great number of States. Notwithstanding article 10 of the Statute, the purpose of which is to ensure that existing [253] Ibid., paras. 730 and 738.

[254] See operative para. 2 of the resolution.
[255] The significance of the Rome Statute has also been acknowledged by the Sixth Committee of the United Nations in a resolution entitled "Establishment of an international criminal court", dated 18 Nov. 1998 (A/C. 6/53/L. 9/Rev. 1), in which it "note[s] that a significant number of States have signed the Rome Statute"; "acknowledges the historic significance of the adoption of the Rome Statute", and; "calls upon or developing law is not "limited" or "prejudiced" by the Statute's provisions, resort may be had cum grano salis to these provisions to help elucidate customary international law. Depending on the matter at issue, the Rome Statute may be taken to restate, reflect or clarify customary rules or crystallise them, whereas in some areas it creates new law or modifies existing law. At any event, the Rome Statute by and large may be taken as constituting an authoritative expression of the legal views of a great number of States.

228. The Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind deals with aiding and abetting in article 2(3)(d), which would impose criminal responsibility upon an individual who "knowingly aids, abets or otherwise assists, directly and substantially, in the commission of such a crime, including providing the means for its commission".[256]

229. In the absence of specification, it appears that assistance can be either physical or in the form of moral support. Encouragement given to the perpetrators may be punishable, even if the abettor did not take any tangible action, provided it "directly and substantially" assists in the commission of a crime. This proposition is also supported by a passage from the International Law Commission's Commentary concerning ex post facto assistance:

> The Commission concluded that complicity could include aiding, abetting or assisting ex post facto, if this assistance had been agreed upon by the perpetrator and the accomplice prior to the perpetration of the crime.[257]

230. This conclusion implies that action which decisively encourages the perpetrator is sufficient to amount to assistance: the knowledge that he will receive assistance during or after the event encourages the perpetrator in the commission of the crime. From this perspective, willingness to provide assistance, when made known to the perpetrator, would also suffice, if the offer of help in fact encouraged or facilitated the commission of the crime by the main perpetrator.[258]

all States to consider signing and ratifying the Rome Statute, and encourages efforts aimed at promoting awareness of the results of the Conference and of the provisions of the Rome Statute".

[257] Ibid., p. 24.

[258] See the Rohde case.

231. The International Law Commission's Commentary also states that "participation of an accomplice must entail assistance which facilitates the commission of a crime in some significant way".[259] The word "facilitates" suggests that it is not necessary for the conduct of the aider and abettor to cause the commission of the crime; it need not be a conditio sine qua non of the crime. The "directly and substantially" requirement in article 2, and the word "significant" used in the International Law Commission Commentary, however, clearly exclude any marginal participation. Article 25(3), in particular paragraphs (c) and (d), of the Rome Statute deals with aiding and abetting:

> 3. In accordance with this Statute, a person shall be criminally responsible and liable for punishment for a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court if that person:
>
> [. . .]
>
> (c) For the purpose of facilitating the commission of such a crime, aids, abets or otherwise assists in its commission or its attempted commission, including providing the means for its commission;
>
> (d) In any other way contributes to the commission or attempted commission of such a crime by a group of persons acting with a common purpose. Such contribution shall be intentional and shall either:
>
> (i) Be made with the aim of furthering the criminal activity or criminal purpose of the group, where such activity or purpose involves the commission of a crime within the jurisdiction of the Court; or
>
> (ii)Be made in the knowledge of the intention of the group to commit the crime;
> [. . .].

This wording is less restrictive than the Draft Code, which limits aiding and abetting to assistance which "facilitate[s] in some significant way", or "directly and substantially" assists, the perpetrator. Article 25 of the Rome Statute, like the Draft Code, also clearly contemplates assistance in either physical form or in the form of moral support. Indeed, the word "abet" includes mere exhortation or encouragement.

[259] Report of the I.L.C., p. 24 (emphasis added).

(c) Conclusion

232. On the issue of the nature of assistance rendered, the German cases suggest that the assistance given by an accomplice need not be tangible and can consist of moral support in certain circumstances. While any spectator can be said to be encouraging a spectacle - an audience being a necessary element of a spectacle - the spectator in these cases was only found to be complicit if his status was such that his presence had a significant legitimising or encouraging effect on the principals. This is supported by the provisions of the International Law Commission Draft Code. In view of this, the Trial Chamber believes the use of the term "direct" in qualifying the proximity of the assistance and the principal act to be misleading as it may imply that assistance needs to be tangible, or to have a causal effect on the crime. This may explain why the word "direct" was not used in the Rome Statute 's provision on aiding and abetting.

233. On the effect of the assistance given to the principal, none of the cases above suggests that the acts of the accomplice need bear a causal relationship to, or be a conditio sine qua non for, those of the principal. The suggestion made in the Einsatzgruppen and Zyklon B cases is that the relationship between the acts of the accomplice and of the principal must be such that the acts of the accomplice make a significant difference to the commission of the criminal act by the principal. Having a role in a system without influence would not be enough to attract criminal responsibility, as demonstrated by the case of the defendant Ruehl in the Einsatzgruppen case. This interpretation is supported by the German cases cited.

234. The position under customary international law seems therefore to be best reflected in the proposition that the assistance must have a substantial effect on the commission of the crime. This is the position adopted by the Trial Chamber.

235. In sum, the Trial Chamber holds that the actus reus of aiding and abetting in international criminal law requires practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime.

have known that the purpose of the trip was an unlawful execution, he would be acquitted.

246. Moreover, it is not necessary that the aider and abettor should know the precise crime that was intended and which in the event was committed. If he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor.

247. Knowledge is also the requirement in the International Law Commission Draft Code, which may well reflect the requirement of mens rea in customary international law. This is the standard adopted by this Tribunal in the Tadi} Judgement, although sometimes somewhat misleadingly expressed as "intent".[267]

248. One exception to this requirement of knowledge is the Rohde case, which appears to require no mens rea at all. However, this case is based on English law and procedure under the Royal Warrant. Furthermore, it is out of line with the other British cases, which do require knowledge. At the other end of the scale is the appeal court decision in the Hechingen Deportation case, which required that the accomplice share the mens rea of the perpetrator. However, the high standard proposed by this case is not reflected in the other cases.

249. In sum, the Trial Chamber holds the legal ingredients of aiding and abetting in international criminal law to be the following: the actus reus consists of practical assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime. The mens rea required is the knowledge that these acts assist the commission of the offence. This notion of aiding and abetting is to be distinguished from the notion of common design, where the actus reus consists of participation in a joint criminal enterprise and the mens rea required is intent to participate.

3. For the purposes of this article, "knowledge" means awareness that a circumstance exists or a consequence will occur in the ordinary course of events. "Know" and "knowingly" shall be construed accordingly."

[267] Case No. IT-94-1-T, paras. 675-677.

273. The position of the accused has already been discussed. He did not personally rape Witness A, nor can he be considered, under the circumstances of this case, to be a co-perpetrator. The accused's presence and continued interrogation of Witness A encouraged Accused B and substantially contributed to the criminal acts committed by him.

274. On the evidence on record, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that the Prosecution has proved its case against the accused beyond reasonable doubt. In accordance with Article 7(1) and the findings of the Trial Chamber that the actus reus of aiding and abetting consists of assistance, encouragement, or moral support which has a substantial effect on the perpetration of the crime and that the mens rea required is the knowledge that these acts assist the commission of the offence, the Trial Chamber holds that the presence of the accused and his continued interrogation aided and abetted the crimes committed by Accused B. He is individually responsible for outrages upon personal dignity including rape, a violation of the laws or customs of war under Article 3 of the Statute.

275. The Trial Chamber therefore finds the accused, for aiding and abetting, guilty of a Violation of the Laws or Customs of War (outrages upon personal dignity including rape) on Count 14.

II. STANDARD FOR APPELLATE REVIEW

6. On appeal, the Parties must limit their arguments to legal errors that invalidate the decision of the Trial Chamber and to factual errors that result in a miscarriage of justice within the scope of Article 25 of the Statute. These criteria are well established by the Appeals Chambers of both the International Tribunal[11] and the ICTR.[12] In exceptional circumstances, the Appeals Chamber will also hear appeals where a party has raised a legal issue that would not lead to the invalidation of the judgement but is nevertheless of general significance to the International Tribunal's jurisprudence.[13]

7. A party alleging an error of law must identify the alleged error, present arguments in support of its claim and explain how the error invalidates the decision. An allegation of an error of law which has no chance of changing the outcome of a decision may be rejected on that ground.[14] Even if the party's arguments are insufficient to support the contention of an error, however, the Appeals Chamber may conclude for other reasons that there is an error of law.[15]

8. The Appeals Chamber reviews the Trial Chamber's findings of law to determine whether or not they are correct.[16] Where the Appeals Chamber finds an error of law in the Trial Judgement arising from the application of the wrong legal standard by the Trial Chamber, the Appeals Chamber will articulate the correct legal standard and review the relevant factual findings of the Trial Chamber accordingly.[17] In so doing, the Appeals Chamber not only corrects the legal error, but applies the correct legal standard to the evidence contained in the trial record, where necessary, and determines whether it is itself convinced beyond reasonable doubt as to the factual finding challenged by the Defence before that finding is confirmed on appeal.[18] The Appeals Chamber will not review the entire trial record de novo; rather, it will in principle only take into account evidence referred to by the Trial Chamber in the body of the Judgement or in a related footnote; evidence

1. Whether the Trial Chamber impermissibly departed from the charge stated in the Indictment

71. Article 19(1) of the Statute and Rules 47(E) and (F) of the Rules provide that, on receipt of an indictment for review from the Prosecutor, the confirming Judge must determine whether there is a prima facie case against the subject of the indictment in relation to each count alleged in that indictment. The review of an indictment by a Judge involves two steps: (1) the Judge makes an assessment whether, on the face of the indictment, it is alleged that the suspect committed acts which, if proven beyond reasonable doubt, are crimes within the subject matter jurisdiction of the International Tribunal; and (2) the Judge determines whether the evidence accompanying the indictment, viewed in its totality, establishes a prima facie case against the suspect in relation to each count alleged.[206] While the Judge reviewing an indictment must assess whether the crimes charged fall within the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal, the Judge does not have to make a final determination as to the precise elements of those crimes. Similarily, while the Prosecution may identify the elements of offences in the indictment it presents to the Judge for confirmation, the only obligation set forth in Article 18(4) of the Statute and Rule 47(C) of the Rules is that the indictment contain a concise statement of the facts of the case and of the crimes with which the suspect is charged. The determination of the legal elements of the crimes charged in an indictment is, as noted by the Prosecution,[207] not a duty of the confirming Judge but the responsibility of the Trial Chamber, which must ensure that, pursuant to the nullum crimen sine lege principle, an accused is only found guilty of a crime with respect to acts which constituted a violation of international humanitarian law at the time of their commission.[208] In so ensuring, the Trial Chamber is not bound to accept the elements of an offence as proposed by the parties but is responsible for determining those elements for itself.[209] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber's holding that infliction of terror is not an element of the crime of terror against the civilian population[210] was perfectly within its authority. Indeed, as the Prosecution correctly noted, there are several cases before the International Tribunal in which a Trial Chamber or the Appeals Chamber decided not to adopt the elements of the crimes charged proposed by the Prosecution.[211] In the Čelebići case, for example, the Appeals Chamber upheld the interpretation given by the Trial Chamber of the standard "had reason to know" and found that a superior will be criminally responsible as a superior only if information was available to him which would have put him on notice of offences committed by subordinates.[212] Similarly, in the Kunarac case, the Trial Chamber found, contrary to the Prosecution's submission,[213] that "the presence of a state official or of any other authority-wielding person in the torture process is not necessary for the offence to be regarded as torture under international humanitarian law".[214]

72. In the present case, Galić was charged under Count 1 with "unlawfully inflicting terror upon civilians as set forth in Article 51 of Additional Protocol I and Article 13 of Additional Protocol II to the Geneva Conventions of 1949 [as a violation of the laws or customs of war pursuant to] Article 3 of the Statute".[215] The Trial Chamber noted in the Trial Judgement that the introductory paragraph to the Indictment reads "[i]nfliction of terror" upon the civilian population of Sarajevo, but it decided that "[i]nfliction of terror" was "not an appropriate designation of the offence [...] because infliction of terror is not a required element of the offence".[216] The Trial Chamber found that proof of the offence required establishing that Galić committed "acts of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population, as set forth in Article 51 of Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions of 1949".[217] Under that definition, infliction of terror on the civilian population was not an element of the crime charged. In this circumstance, it cannot be said that the Trial Chamber re-qualified the offence "in order to make the facts allegedly fit with an alleged crime".[218] Rather, the Trial Chamber merely identified the elements that needed to be established for the crime to be made out.

73. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that while the Prosecution initially envisaged in its description of the charges in the Indictment that the crime of terror among the civilian population comprised actual infliction of terror, the Trial Chamber was acting within the confines of its jurisdiction in determining that the elements of this crime do not comprise the actual infliction of terror on that population.

74. The core issue remains, however, that the accused has to be properly informed of the nature and cause of the charges against him so that he can adequately prepare his defence.[219] Indeed, Galić

[219] The obligation of the Prosecution to set out concisely the facts of its case in the indictment must be interpreted in conjunction with Articles 21(2) and 21(4)(a) and (b) of the Statute, which state that, in the determination of the charges against him, an accused is entitled to a fair hearing and, more particularly, has to be informed of the nature and cause of the charges against him and to have adequate facilities for the preparation of his defence. See Prosecutor v. Ivan Čermak and Mladen Markac., Case No. IT-03-73-PT, Decision on Ivan Čermak and Mladen Markač's Motion on Form favour of the accused".[227] He contends that, the existence of terror against the civilian population not having been proved beyond reasonable doubt at the end of the trial, the Trial Chamber should have acquitted him of Count 1 of the Indictment.[228] The Prosecution reiterates that there was no "re-qualification" of the offence but "simply a permissible clarification of its elements".[229] It says that the fact that the Trial Chamber decided that infliction of terror on the civilian population is not an element of the offence implies that "whether terror was inflicted has no determinative bearing on [Galić]'s criminal responsibility under Count 1 and in dubio pro reo has no application".[230]

77. The principle of in dubio pro reo dictates that any doubt should be resolved in favour of the accused and encompasses doubts as to whether an offence has been proved at the conclusion of a case.[231] In the present case, the question whether there could have been doubt as to the culpability of Galić is dependent on whether the actual infliction of terror is an element of the offence charged under Count 1 or not. As will be shown below, actual infliction of terror is not an element of the crime of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population as charged under Count 1 of the Indictment.[232] Therefore, Galić's argument that the principle of in dubio pro reo was violated is moot.

78. In his Appeal Brief, Galić contends that the Trial Chamber "failed to proceed" in accordance with the principle of in dubio pro reo "in all the counts pronouncing [him] guilty"[233] and argues that "[r]egarding Counts 2, 3, 5 and 6 the same reasoning [as the one regarding Count 1] applies, mutatis mutandis".[234] In his Reply Brief, Galić asserts that the Trial Chamber reached conclusions based on "assumptions" or on facts "not supported by firm proof",[235] and argues that the Trial Chamber, in its assessment of "all the so-called scheduled incidents", violated the principle of in dubio pro reo.[236] The Appeals Chamber notes that those arguments go beyond the scope of the Defence Notice of Appeal[237] and therefore the Appeals Chamber is not required to consider them. Further, the Appeals Chamber recalls that, in filing an appeal, appellants have an obligation to set out their grounds of appeal clearly, and to provide the Appeals Chamber with specific references to the elements of the crimes of extermination[258] and deportation.[259] In Naletilić and Martinović, the Appeals Chamber relied on customary international law for its finding that the existence of an armed conflict is an element of crimes under Articles 2 and 3 of the Statute.[260]

85. The Appeals Chamber rejects Galić's argument that the International Tribunal's jurisdiction for crimes under Article 3 of the Statute can only be based on customary international law. However, while binding conventional law that prohibits conduct and provides for individual criminal responsibility could provide the basis for the International Tribunal's jurisdiction, in practice the International Tribunal always ascertains that the treaty provision in question is also declaratory of custom.

2. The crime of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population

86. On appeal, Galić argued that the 22 May 1992 Agreement was not binding on the parties[261] and even if binding did not give rise to individual criminal responsibility on the part of the parties.[262] The Appeals Chamber does not consider it necessary to address this argument on the ground that, as will be demonstrated below, it is satisfied that the prohibition of terror against the civilian population as enshrined in Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II, was a part of customary international law from the time of its inclusion in those treaties. The Appeals Chamber, by majority, Judge Schomburg dissenting, is further satisfied that a breach of the prohibition of terror against the civilian population gave rise to individual criminal responsibility pursuant to customary international law at the time of the commission of the offences for which Galic was convicted.

(a) The prohibition of terror against the civilian population in customary international law

87. In the present case, the crime of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population was charged under Article 3 of the Statute, on the basis of Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II, both of which state:

> The civilian population as such, as well as individual civilians, shall not be the object of attack. Acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population are prohibited.

Article 51 of Additional Protocol I was adopted with 77 votes in favour, one against and 16 abstentions.[263] Neither France, which voted against, nor the States that abstained from voting, expressed any concern as to the content of the prohibition contained in Article 51(2). The only concerns expressed were confined to paragraphs 4, 5, 7 and 8 of this Article.[264] Article 13 of Additional Protocol II, which incorporates the first three paragraphs of Article 51 of Additional Protocol I, was adopted by consensus.[265] The purposes of Additional Protocols I and II, as expressly stated by the High Contracting Parties in the preambles to those treaties, were to "reaffirm and develop the provisions protecting the victims of armed conflicts"[266] and "to ensure a better protection for the victims" of armed conflicts.[267] Additional Protocol II, further, is considered to embody the "fundamental principles on protection for the civilian population".[268] Articles 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and 13(2) of Additional Protocol II, in essence, contribute to the purpose of those treaties. They do not contain new principles but rather codify in a unified manner[269] the prohibition of attacks on the civilian population. The principles underlying the prohibition of attacks on civilians, namely the principles of distinction and protection, have a long-standing history in international humanitarian law.[270] These principles incontrovertibly form the basic foundation of international humanitarian law[271] and constitute "intransgressible principles of international customary law".[272] As the Appeals Chamber has held in previous decisions, the conventional prohibition on attack on civilians contained in Articles 51 of Additional Protocol I and [270] The necessary distinction between civilians and combatants was made as early as three-and-a-half centuries ago by Grotius, in De Jure Belli Ac Pacis (1625). It was later maintained in the Lieber Code of 24 April 1863 at Articles 23 and 25.

[271] In its Advisory Opinion on the Legality of Nuclear Weapons, the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") described the principle of distinction and the principle of protection of the civilian population as "the cardinal principles contained in the texts constituting the fabric of humanitarian law" and stated that "States must never make civilians the object of attack." Nuclear Weapons Case, para. 78.
[272] Nuclear Weapons Case, para. 78. The principle of distinction is further set out, among other places, in Article 48 of Additional Protocol I, which states that the warring parties must "at all times distinguish between the civilian population and combatants and between civilian objects and military objectives and accordingly shall direct their operations only against military objectives". See also Kordić and Čerkez Appeal Judgement, para. 54.

13 of Additional Protocol II constitutes customary international law.[273] In so holding, the Appeals Chamber has made no distinction within those articles as to the customary nature of each of their respective paragraphs. In light of the above, and considering that none of the States involved in the Diplomatic Conference leading to the adoption of both Protocols expressed any concern as to the first three paragraphs of Article 51 of Additional Protocol I, and as Article 13 of Additional Protocol II was adopted by consensus, the Appeals Chamber considers that, at a minimum, Article 51(1), (2) and (3) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13 of Additional Protocol II in its entirety constituted an affirmation of existing customary international law at the time of their adoption. The Appeals Chamber therefore affirms the finding of the Trial Chamber that the prohibition of terror, as contained in the second sentences of both Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II, amounts to "a specific prohibition within the general (customary) prohibition of attack on civilians".[274]

88. The Appeals Chamber found further evidence that the prohibition of terror among the civilian population was part of customary international law from at least its inclusion in the second sentences of both Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II. The 1923 Hague Rules on Warfare prohibited "[a]ny air bombardment for the purpose of terrorizing the civil population or destroying or damaging private property without military character or injuring non-combatants".[275] Similarly, the 1938 Draft Convention for the Protection of Civilian Populations against New Engines of War expressly prohibited "[a]erial bombardment for the purpose of terrorising the civilian population".[276] Even more importantly, Article 33 of Geneva Convention IV, an expression of customary international law,[277] prohibits in clear terms "measures of intimidation or of terrorism"[278] as a form of collective punishment, as they are "opposed to all principles based on humanity and justice".[279] Further, Article 6 of the 1956 New Delhi Draft Rules for protection of civilians states that "[a]ttacks directed against the civilian population, as such,

89. Another indication of the customary international law nature of the prohibition of terror at the time of the events alleged in this case can be found in the number of States parties to Additional Protocols I and II by 1992.[282] Also, references to official pronouncements of States and their military manuals further confirm the customary international nature of the prohibition.[283] With respect to official pronouncements, the Appeals Chamber notes that the United States, a non-party to Additional Protocol I, expressed in 1987 through the deputy Legal Adviser to the US Department of State its support for the "principle that the civilian population as such, as well as individual citizens, not be the objects of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror amongst them".[284] Similarly, in 1991, in response to an inquiry of the ICRC as to the application of international humanitarian law in the Gulf region, the US Department of the Army pointed out that its troops were acting in respect of the prohibition of acts or threats of violence the main purpose of which was to spread terror among the civilian population.[285] With respect to military manuals, the Appeals Chamber notes that a large number of countries have incorporated provisions prohibiting terror as a method of warfare,[286] some of them in language similar to the prohibition set out in the Additional Protocols,[287] or even verbatim.[288]

90. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that the prohibition of terror against the civilian population as enshrined in Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II clearly belonged to customary international law from at least the time of its inclusion in those treaties.

(b) The criminalisation of the prohibition of terror against the civilian population

91. The crime of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population was charged under Article 3 of the Statute. The conditions that must be fulfilled for a violation of international humanitarian law to be subject to Article 3 of the Statute are ("Tadić conditions"):

> i) the violation must constitute an infringement of a rule of international humanitarian law;
>
> ii) the rule must be customary in nature or, if it belongs to treaty law, the required conditions must be met [...];
>
> iii) the violation must be "serious", that is to say, it must constitute a breach of a rule protecting important values, and the breach must involve grave consequences for the victim. Thus, for instance, the fact of a combatant simply appropriating a loaf of bread in an occupied village would not amount to a "serious violation of international humanitarian law" although it may be regarded as falling foul of the basic principle laid down in Article 46, paragraph 1, of the Hague Regulations (and the corresponding rule of customary international law) whereby "private property must be respected" by any army occupying an enemy territory;
> iv) the violation of the rule must entail, under customary or conventional law, the individual criminal responsibility of the person breaching the rule.[289]

92. Individual criminal responsibility under the fourth Tadić condition can be inferred from, inter alia, state practice indicating an intention to criminalise the prohibition, including statements by government officials and international organisations, as well as punishment of violations by national courts and military tribunals.[290] purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population" (para. 423) and also specifically states the following under "Terrorizing the civilian population": "Acts or threats of violence, the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population, are prohibited. The protection of civilians is a fundamental principle of the [Law of Armed Conflict]. A campaign of threats or violence designed to terrorize the civilian population is simply not acceptable under any circumstances, even when the civilian population exhibits a hostile attitude toward the presence of the [Canadian Forces]."

[290] Tadić Jurisdiction Decision, para. 128.

93. The first reference to terror against the civilian population as a war crime, as correctly noted by the Trial Chamber,[291] is found in the 1919 Report of the Commission on Responsibilities, created by the Peace Conference of Paris to inquire into breaches of the laws and customs of war committed by Germany and its allies in World War I.[292] The Commission found evidence of the existence of "a system of terrorism carefully planned and carried out to the end", stated that the belligerents employed "systematic terrorism", and listed among the list of war crimes "systematic terrorism".[293] Although the few trials organised on that basis in Leipzig did not elaborate on the concept of "systematic terrorism", this is nonetheless an indication that, in 1919, there was an intention to criminalise the deliberate infliction of terror upon the civilian population. Further, in 1945, Australia's War Crimes Act referred to the work of the 1919 Commission on Responsibilities and included "systematic terrorism" in its list of war crimes.[294]

94. With respect to national legislation, the Appeals Chamber notes that numerous States criminalise violations of international humanitarian law – encompassing the crime of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population– within their jurisdiction. The Norwegian Military Penal Code of 1902, as amended, provides that "[a]nyone who contravenes or is accessory to the contravention of provisions relating to the protection of persons or property laid down in [the four Geneva Conventions and the two Additional Protocols of 1977] is liable to imprisonment."[295] The 1962 Geneva Conventions Act of Ireland, for example, provides that any "minor breach" of the Geneva Conventions, including violations of Article 33 of Geneva Convention IV, is a punishable offence.[296]

95. The Appeals Chamber also notes that numerous States have incorporated provisions as to the criminalisation of terror against the civilian population as a method of warfare in a language similar to the prohibition set out in the Additional Protocols. The Criminal Codes of the Czech Republic and the Slovak Republic, for example, criminalise "terroris[ing] defenceless civilians with violence or the threat of violence".[297] Further, numerous States have incorporated provisions that criminalise terrorisation of civilians in time of war. The Penal Code of Côte d'Ivoire, for example, provides that measures of terror in time of war or occupation amount to a "crime against the civilian population".[298] The Penal Code of Ethiopia punishes anyone who organises, orders or engages in "measures of intimidation or terror" against the civilian population in time of war, armed conflict or occupation.[299] During the relevant period, the Netherlands included "systematic terrorism" in its list of war crimes that carried criminal penalties.[300]

96. The Appeals Chamber also notes the references by the Trial Chamber to the laws in force in the former Yugoslavia at the time of the commission of the offences charged,[301] particularly Article 125 ("War Crime Against the Civilian Population") in Chapter XI ("Criminal Offences Against Humanity and International Law") of the 1960 Criminal Code of the Republic of Yugoslavia[302] and the superseding Article 142 ("War Crime Against the Civilian Population") in Chapter XVI ("Criminal Offences Against Humanity and International Law") of the 1976 Criminal Code,[303] both of which criminalise terror against the civilian population, and provisions of Yugoslavia's 1988 "[Armed Forces] Regulations on the Application of International Laws of War",[304] which incorporated the provisions of Additional Protocol I, following Yugoslavia's ratification of that treaty on 11 March 1977. Those provisions not only amount to further evidence of the customary nature of terror against the civilian population as a crime, but are also relevant to the assessment of the foreseeability and accessibility of that law to Galić.[305]

97. In addition to national legislation, the Appeals Chamber notes the conviction in 1997 by the Split County Court in Croatia for acts that occurred between March 1991 and January 1993, under, inter alia, Article 51 of Additional Protocol I and Article 13 of Additional Protocol II, including "a plan of terrorising and mistreating the civilians", "open[ing] fire from infantry arms [...] with only one goal to terrorise and expel the remaining civilians", "open[ing] fire from howitzers, machine guns, automatic rifles, anti-aircraft missiles only to create the atmosphere of fear among the [302] Yugoslavia, Criminal Code of 1951, as amended June 30, 1959, entered into force January 1, 1960, in Collection of Yugoslav Laws, Volume XI, Institute of Comparative Law, Belgrade (1964). Art. 125 states, in relevant part: "Whoever, in violation of the rules of international law at the time of war, armed conflict or occupation, orders or executes wilful killings, tortures, or inhuman treatment of the civilian population, including [...] use of measures of intimidation and terror [...] shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than five years or by the death penalty".

[303] Krivični zakon SFRJ (Criminal Code of the SFRY), adopted on September 28, 1976, published in the Official Gazette SFRJ No. 44 of October 8 1976. Article 142 reads, in relevant part: "Whosoever, in violation of the rules of the international law effective at the time of war, armed conflict or occupation, orders that the civilian population be subject to [...] the application of measures of intimidation and terror [...] shall be punished by imprisonment for not less than five years or by the death penalty".

remaining farmers", and "carrying out the orders of their commanders with the goal to terrorise and threaten with the demolishing of the Peruča dam".[306]

98. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds, by majority, Judge Schomburg dissenting, that customary international law imposed individual criminal liability for violations of the prohibition of terror against the civilian population as enshrined in Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I and Article 13(2) of Additional Protocol II, from at least the period relevant to the Indictment.

3. The elements of the crime of acts or threats of violence the primary purpose of which is to spread terror among the civilian population

99. Galić argues under his fifth ground of appeal that although he stood trial under Count 1 for terror against the civilian population including as one of its elements the infliction of terror against the civilian population, he was convicted and sentenced for a different offence which did not require the infliction of terror against the civilian population, but merely the intent to spread terror among the civilian population. He argues that the Trial Chamber thereby impermissibly departed from the Indictment.[307] He also contends in his sixteenth ground of appeal that, the existence of terrorisation of the civilian population not being proved beyond reasonable doubt at the end of the trial, the Trial Chamber should have acquitted him of Count 1 of the Indictment, by virtue of the principle of in dubio pro reo.[308] The Appeals Chamber has already found that, in principle, the Trial Chamber was acting within the confines of its jurisdiction when it found that actual infliction of terror on the civilian population was not an element of the crime of terror against the civilian population, and rejected both arguments.[309] Under the present ground of appeal, Galić again argues that it was not proven that "terror as such was inflicted upon the civilian population",[310] an argument that the Appeals Chamber understands to address the substantive content of the crime rather than the Trial Chamber's ability to exercise jurisdiction over the crime. He argues in his Notice of Appeal that the Trial Chamber erred both specifically when it found that infliction of however, discriminatory intent can be used as an aggravating circumstance for the other offences enumerated in Article 5 of the Statute.[1225]

(a) Gravity of the offence

409. The Appeals Chamber notes Galić's argument, in reference to the factors set out in paragraph 764 of the Trial Judgement, that "[i]t appears that the Majority appraised all of these circumstances as aggravating factors".[1226] However, Galić overlooks the fact that that paragraph does not address aggravating circumstances but rather the gravity of the offence.[1227] When assessing the gravity of the offence, a Trial Chamber must take into account the inherent gravity of the crime and the criminal conduct of the accused, the determination of which requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case and the crimes for which the accused was convicted, as well as the form and degree of participation of the accused in those crimes.[1228]

410. The Trial Chamber held that the gravity of the offence for which Galić was found guilty encompasses the suffering of the victims, the frequency of illegal actions by the SRK, and the anguishing environment, in which hundreds of people were killed and thousands wounded and terrorised.[1229] These factors are particular circumstances of the crimes for which Galić were convicted and clearly play a role when assessing his sentence. Galić failed to demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed an error when it took these factors into account in its assessment of the gravity of the offence.

(b) Galić's superior position as an aggravating circumstance

411. The Trial Chamber considered as an aggravating factor "the fact that General Galić occupied the position of VRS Corps Commander, and repeatedly breached his public duty from this very senior position".[1230] Galić argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law as his position as a [1227] It is clear that the Trial Chamber, in the section in which it addresses the applicable law on sentencing, distinguished between the concept of the gravity of the offence and that of aggravating circumstances. See Trial Judgement, paras 758, 760. Also, when applying the law on the facts of the case, it first addressed the gravity of the offence (Trial Judgement, para. 764) and then Galić's position as commander as an aggravating circumstance (Trial Judgement, para. 765).

[1229] The Appeals Chamber notes that the actual infliction of terror on the civilians of Sarajevo, taken into account by the Trial Chamber as an aspect of the gravity of the offence, could also have been considered as a separate aggravating circumstance, since it is, as shown above, not an element of the crime of terror. The Appeals Chamber also recalls, however, that a factor can only be taken into account once in sentencing, that is, either in the gravity of the offence or as an aggravating circumstance. See Deronjić Sentencing Appeal Judgement, para. 106: "The Appeals Chamber considers that factors which a Trial Chamber takes into account as aspects of the gravity of the crime cannot additionally be taken into account as separate aggravating circumstances, and vice versa."

166. Article 7 of the Statute provides for imposition of individual and superior responsibility on persons on the following basis:

> 1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.
>
>
> 3. The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superior of criminal responsibility if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.

1. Individual Responsibility under Article 7 (1) of the Statute

167. The Indictment, in describing the Accused's responsibility, makes reference to each head of responsibility in Article 7(1).[275] In the Prosecution's Final Trial Brief reference is made to "ordering" as the basis of responsibility. It is within the Trial Chamber's discretion to convict, if at all, the Accused under the appropriate head of responsibility within the limits set by the Indictment and insofar as the evidence permits.[276]

168. The Trial Chamber considers, briefly, the case-law of the International Tribunals which elaborates the elements of the various heads of individual criminal responsibility in Article 7(1) of the Statute.[277] Considering them in the order in which they appear in the Statute, "planning" has been defined to mean that one or more persons designed the commission of a crime, at both the preparatory and execution phases,[278] and the crime was actually committed within the framework of that design[279] by others.[280] "Instigating" means prompting another to commit an offence, which is actually committed.[281] It is sufficient to demonstrate that the instigation was "a clear contributing factor to the conduct of other person(s)".[282] It is not necessary to demonstrate that the crime would not have occurred without the accused's involvement.[283] "Ordering" means a person in a position of authority using that authority to instruct another to commit an offence. The order does not need to be given in any particular form.[284] "Committing" means that an "accused participated, physically or otherwise directly, in the material elements of a crime under the Tribunal's Statute".[285] Thus, it "covers first and foremost the physical perpetration of a crime by the offender himself."[286] "Aiding and abetting" means rendering a substantial contribution to the commission of a crime.[287] These forms of participation in a crime may be performed through positive acts or through culpable omission.[288] It has been held in relation to "instigating" that omissions amount to instigation in circumstances where a commander has created an environment permissive of criminal behaviour by subordinates.[289] The Defence contests the applicability of that case-law and considers that "in all the cases [under Article 7(1)] a person must undertake an action that would contribute to the commission of a crime".[290]

169. In the Majority's opinion, a superior may be found responsible under Article 7(1) where the superior's conduct had a positive effect in bringing about the commission of crimes by his or her subordinates, provided the mens rea requirements for Article 7(1) responsibility are met. Under Article 7(3) (see further below) the subordinate perpetrator is not required to be supported in his conduct, or to be aware that the superior officer knew of the criminal conduct in question or that the superior did not intend to investigate or punish the conduct. More generally, there is no requirement of any form of active contribution or positive encouragement, explicit or implicit, as between superior and subordinate, and no requirement of awareness by the subordinate of the superior's disposition, for superior liability to arise under Article 7(3). Where, however, the conduct of the superior supports the commission of crimes by subordinates through any form of active contribution or passive encouragement (stretching from forms of ordering through instigation to aiding and abetting, by action or inaction amounting to facilitation), the superior's liability may be brought under Article 7(1) if the necessary mens rea is a part of the superior's conduct. In such cases the subordinate will most likely be aware of the superior's support or encouragement, although that is not strictly necessary. In the Majority's view, the key point in all of this is that a superior with a guilty mind may not avoid Article 7(1) responsibility by relying on his or her silence or omissions or apparent omissions or understated participation or any mixture of overt and non-overt actions, where the effect of such conduct is to commission crimes by subordinates.

Brioni meeting.[83] The Prosecution opposed the Gotovina Defence's proposed revised transcript, with the exception of four minor corrections.[84] The Trial Chamber then directed the Gotovina Defence to send a number of passages from the original audio recording of exhibit P461 to the CLSS to verify their accuracy.[85] After CLSS's verification and in the absence of any objections from the parties, the old version of exhibit P461 was replaced by a revised version.

43. In addition to direct evidence, the Trial Chamber has admitted hearsay and circumstantial evidence. In evaluating the probative value of hearsay evidence, the Trial Chamber carefully considered all indicia of its reliability, including whether the evidence stemmed from a source that gave it voluntarily, whether it was first-hand or further removed, the absence of an opportunity to cross-examine the person who made the statement, and the circumstances under which the hearsay evidence arose.[86] The Trial Chamber clarified that its primary interest in hearing a witness's testimony was to establish facts which were observed by the witness, and that hearsay evidence which is obscure, in the context of all the evidence, may be given no weight.[87] It further clarified that hearsay evidence may also be used as corroborative evidence.[88] The Trial Chamber used as a standard that it would not enter a conviction where the evidence supporting that conviction was based solely on hearsay evidence. Similarly, with regard to written, non-cross-examined evidence such as Rule 92 bis or 92 quater statements, the Trial Chamber required corroboration by other evidence before entering a conviction.[89] As for circumstantial evidence, the Trial Chamber considered that such evidence alone may be sufficient for a conviction or a finding of fact beyond a reasonable doubt.[90] However the conclusion drawn from the circumstantial evidence had to be the only reasonable conclusion available.[91]

49. This is the Trial Chamber's position with regard to a number of exhibits.

50. Exhibit P2402 is a report entitled "Military Operation Storm and its Aftermath," published by the Croatian Helsinki Committee and edited by Žarko Puhovski.[110] The report contains un-sourced statements and double entries.[111] Furthermore, during examination of Puhovski in court it became apparent that there were errors in the book.[112] For these reasons, the Trial Chamber decided not to rely on exhibit P2402 in relation to information described therein if uncorroborated by other evidence.

51. Exhibit P744 is a human rights report listing various events which was compiled by Robert Williams from a variety of sources, including Philip Berikoff.[113] The report contains un-sourced hearsay information, and neither Berikoff nor Williams specified the sources in their testimonies. The report was furthermore inconsistent with other evidence from Berikoff, notably with regard to timing.[114] For these reasons, the Trial Chamber decided not to rely on the report in relation to information described therein if uncorroborated by other evidence.

52. Exhibit P541 is a list of alleged human rights violations from UNMO Team Gračac. Steenbergen had no knowledge of its preparation or the information contained therein.[115] The Gotovina Defence objected to its admission, and urged the Chamber to give it the appropriate weight considering that Steenbergen did not establish its origins.[116] For these reasons, the Trial Chamber decided not to rely on the report in relation to information described therein if uncorroborated by other evidence.

53. Exhibit P2417 is a map allegedly signed by Gotovina, apparently depicting troop movements between 4 and 8 August 1995. The Defence did not object to its admission into evidence.[117] It is unclear whether the map depicts actual or planned troop movements, nor are all parts of the map legible. Considering this, the Trial Chamber decided not to rely on exhibit P2417 on its own to establish presence of troops.

1995,[900] testified that on 6 September 1995, she patrolled the village of Palanka, Gračac municipality, and was told by Boško Brkić and Kata Čuk that Dušan Brkić (born 1926), who had been dressed in military uniform but was unarmed, had been shot by Croatian soldiers who later burned his body.[901] In addition to this evidence, the Trial Chamber has considered evidence of Bogdan Brkić (reviewed in chapter 4.3.7) in relation to this incident.

240. According to the forensic documentation, decomposing body number 395 was retrieved on 15 September 1995 from the village of Palanka, Gračac municipality, and was identified by Bogdan Brkić from Palanka as Dušan Brkić born in Palanka on 19 August 1926, and buried in the City cemetery in Gračac.[902] Body G07/022B exhumed from a cemetery in Gračac on 29 May 2002 with a metal tag numbered 395, was an approximately 1.79-metre-tall male between 40 and 55 years old, wearing a partially burned and shredded olive-green shirt with epaulettes and blue-orange striped nylon shorts, whom the forensic pathologist found most likely died from explosive injuries.[903] On 29 September 2003, at the Zagreb Institute for Forensic Medicine and Criminology, body G07/022B was identified as Dušan Brkić, born in 1926.[904] According to a report of the Zagreb Forensic Institute, dated 29 September 2003 and based on details provided by his daughter, Dušan Brkić, a Serb of SFRY citizenship born in Palanka on 20 August 1926, died on 13 August 1995 in Palanka, probably due to explosive injuries.[905]

241. The evidence indicates that the body of Dušan Brkić, born in 1926, was found in the morning of 9 August 1995 with a bullet mark on his left side. The Trial Chamber also received evidence that a person referred to as a Croatian soldier had told Bogdan Brkić that he had killed Brkić's neighbour. The Trial Chamber considers that there is insufficient evidence to connect the soldier's comment specifically to the murder of Dušan Brkić. Further, the hearsay evidence from Boško Brkić and Kata Čuk insufficiently establishes their source of knowledge in relation to the incident. The Trial

Chamber considers their evidence regarding the perpetrator to be uncorroborated, and as the date of the incident is unclear, this hearsay evidence cannot be corroborated by evidence of troop presence in or near Palanka at any specific time. In addition, the forensic evidence indicates explosive injuries as the probable cause of death. Therefore, although the evidence indicates that Dušan Brkić was killed, there is insufficient evidence showing when, by whom, and the circumstances under which he was killed. Under these circumstances, the Trial Chamber will not further consider this incident in relation to Counts 1, 6, and 7 of the Indictment.

Vlado Milanović and Đurad Čanak (Further Clarification nos 25-26)

242. The Trial Chamber has received relevant evidence with regard to the alleged murder of Vlado Milanović and Đurad Čanak primarily through the testimony of Pero Perković and documentation related to the Croatian criminal investigation into the matter.

243. Pero Perković, a Croat from the village of Vodice and a member of the HV 15th Home Guards Regiment prior to, during, and after Operation Storm,[906] testified that one day, when he and others were mopping up the terrain in the Zrmanja area, Gračac municipality, Nikola Rašić tied an old man, named Đurad Čanak, to a railing and set some rags around him on fire.[907] When Čanak confessed that he had a rifle, he was untied and took the group to the forest where he handed over the weapon.[908] When they returned from the forest to go back to their unit, the group encountered Milenko Hrstić as well as Ivica Petrić, who was furious when he heard that the man had given a weapon to them.[909] Perković stated that he subsequently heard that an old man got killed, which he presumed was this old man because he was the only one in their close proximity, and that his battalion commander, Ante Belak, was furious when he heard about the incident.[910] Hrstić and Petrić were both charged with this offence and Petrić was prevent crime, or any operational role or command in the prevention of crime.[2963] As such, any failure to prevent crime through the more effective deployment of police resources could not reasonably be attributed to him.[2964] Albiston testified that Čermak, as garrison commander, had no legal authority to punish criminal behaviour, including that of the civilian police.[2965] Čermak did not have the means at his disposal to prevent or punish crimes that took place during his term as garrison commander.[2966]

2448. On the basis of the evidence reviewed above, the Trial Chamber finds that Čermak had a varying number of subordinates at the Knin garrison. The evidence is unclear as to the identity of some of those subordinates. With regard to certain identifiable persons, the evidence is unclear as to whether they were Čermak's subordinates. The Trial Chamber further finds that Čermak had disciplinary authority over his subordinates. The evidence, notably D766 and D1029, further indicates that other persons were attached to the garrison at times. The extent of Čermak's disciplinary powers over the latter persons is less clear. The Trial Chamber has received little evidence indicating that subordinates of Čermak, or anyone otherwise temporarily attached to the garrison, committed any crimes charged in the Indictment. A reasonable interpretation of the uncorroborated evidence of Witness 84 according to which a person described as a soldier was breaking into a bank and explaining that he was just taking some furniture for Čermak, is that the person was using the name of Čermak to further his criminal activities for personal gain, and that he may well not have been a subordinate of Čermak. Even if he was, there is no evidence that Čermak intended the act, should have known about it or learned about it at any time before or after the act. Nor can the Trial Chamber rely on the uncorroborated hearsay evidence of Gojanović that a member of the 142nd Home Guard Brigade told him that equipment and machinery from a factory in Kistanje was taken by some men working for Čermak. The Trial Chamber recalls in this regard its statement in chapter 2 regarding the reliability of Gojanović's evidence. As for any powers Čermak may have had to initiate disciplinary proceedings against other persons by providing information to the competent commander, there is no evidence that Čermak knew of any specific individuals committing acts falling within such disciplinary powers. In light of the preceding considerations, there is no need for the Trial Chamber to further consider who among the persons working for Čermak could be considered his subordinates, nor what precise powers he had to discipline or inititate disciplinary proceedings against those or other persons. In conclusion, the Trial Chamber finds that the allegations in paragraph 17 (e) of the Indictment have not been proven with regard to Čermak. In chapter 6.4.7, the Trial Chamber will further consider the acts and omissions of Čermak regarding crimes committed.

6.4.4 Disseminating information intended to cause the departure of Serbs

2449. According to the Indictment, Ivan Čermak contributed to the JCE by supporting and/or participating in the dissemination of (false) information and propaganda to Krajina Serbs that was intended to cause them to leave the area.[2967]

2450. As far as Čermak is concerned, the Trial Chamber has received no, or insufficient, evidence supporting the allegations in paragraph 17 (c) of the Indictment. The Trial Chamber therefore finds that they have not been proven.

6.4.5 Furthering violence against Serbs and a climate of fear among Serbs

2451. According to the Indictment, Ivan Čermak contributed to the JCE by futhering the perpetration of violent acts against Serbs, and the creation of a climate of fear among Serbs.[2968] There is relevant evidence in chapters 4.5.4, 6.4.2 (Oton Bender incident, passes issued to Serbs), and 6.4.7.

Chamber".[31] The Appeals Chamber recalls, as a general principle, the approach adopted by the Appeals Chamber in the Kupreškić et al. case, according to which:

> Pursuant to the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, the task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial is left primarily to the Trial Chamber. Thus, the Appeals Chamber must give a margin of deference to a finding of fact reached by a Trial Chamber. Only where the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber could not have been accepted by any reasonable tribunal of fact or where the evaluation of the evidence is "wholly erroneous" may the Appeals Chamber substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber.[32]

12. The same standard of reasonableness and the same deference to factual findings of the Trial Chamber apply when the Prosecution appeals against an acquittal. Thus, when considering an appeal by the Prosecution, the Appeals Chamber will only hold that an error of fact was committed when it determines that no reasonable trier of fact could have made the impugned finding.[33] However, since the Prosecution must establish the guilt of the accused at trial, the significance of an error of fact occasioning a miscarriage of justice takes on a specific character when alleged by the Prosecution.[34] An accused must show that the Trial Chamber's factual errors create a reasonable doubt as to his guilt. The Prosecution must show that, when account is taken of the errors of fact committed by the Trial Chamber, all reasonable doubt of the accused's guilt has been eliminated.[35]

13. Pursuant to Article 23(2) of the Statute and Rule 98*ter*(C) of the Rules, Trial Chambers have an obligation to set out a reasoned opinion in writing.[36] This right is one of the elements of the fair trial requirement embodied in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute. In the Furundzija Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber held that Article 23 of the Statute treats the right of an accused to a reasoned opinion as one of the elements of the fair trial requirement embodied in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute.[37] With regard to legal findings, this obligation does not require a Trial

Chamber to discuss at length all of the case-law of the International Tribunal on a given legal issue but only to identify the precedents upon which its findings are based. With regard to factual findings, a Trial Chamber is required only to make findings on those facts which are essential to the determination of guilt on a particular count. It is not necessary to refer to the testimony of every witness or every piece of evidence on the trial record.[38] In short, a Trial Chamber should limit itself to indicating in a clear and articulate, yet concise manner, which, among the wealth of jurisprudence available on a given issue and the myriad of facts that emerged at trial, are the legal and factual findings on the basis of which it reached the decision either to convict or acquit an individual. A reasoned opinion consistent with the guidelines provided here allows for a useful exercise of the right of appeal by the Parties and enables the Appeals Chamber to understand and review the Trial Chamber's findings as well as its evaluation of the evidence.[39] While the Appeals Chamber appreciates the care with which the Trial Chamber has expressed itself in the Trial Judgement, the Appeals Chamber is constrained to observe that the Trial Chamber might have been more sparing in its efforts in this respect.

14. On appeal, a party may not merely repeat arguments that did not succeed at trial, unless the party can demonstrate that the Trial Chamber's rejection of them constituted such an error as to warrant the intervention of the Appeals Chamber.[40] Arguments of a party which do not have the potential to cause the impugned judgement to be reversed or revised may be immediately dismissed by the Appeals Chamber and need not be considered on the merits.[41]

15. In order for the Appeals Chamber to assess a party's arguments on appeal, the appealing party is expected to provide precise references to relevant transcript pages or paragraphs in the Trial Judgement to which the challenges are being made.[42] Further, "the Appeals Chamber cannot be

20. In Čelebići, the Appeals Chamber underscored that effective control is the ultimate standard and that a showing of effective control is required in cases involving both de jure and de facto superiors.[53] The Appeals Chamber further noted:

> In determining questions of responsibility it is necessary to look to effective exercise of power or control and not to formal titles. [...] In general, the possession of de jure power in itself may not suffice for the finding of command responsibility if it does not manifest in effective control, although a court may presume that possession of such power prima facie results in effective control unless proof to the contrary is produced.[54]

21. Even when a superior is found to have de jure authority over his subordinates, the Prosecution still has to prove beyond reasonable doubt that this superior exercised effective control over his subordinates, unless the accused does not challenge having exercised such control.[55] By holding that "a court may presume that possession of [de jure] power prima facie results in effective control",[56] the Appeals Chamber in Čelebići did not reverse the burden of proof. It simply acknowledged that the possession of de jure authority constitutes prima facie a reasonable basis for assuming that an accused has effective control over his subordinates. Thus, the burden of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the accused had effective control over his subordinates ultimately rests with the Prosecution.

22. The Appeals Chamber will examine, under Hadžihasanović's fifth ground of appeal regarding the Trial Chamber's analysis of his superior-subordinate relationship with the El Mujahedin detachment as of 13 August 1993, whether the Trial Chamber applied the correct legal standard.

[53] Čelebići Appeal Judgement, para. 196. See also para. 256 ("[t]he concept of effective control over a subordinate – in the sense of a material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct, however that control is exercised – is the threshold to be reached in establishing a superior-subordinate relationship for the purpose of Article 7(3) of the Statute"); para. 266 ("[C]ustomary law has specified a standard of effective control"); Halilović Appeal Judgement, para. 59.

[54] Čelebići Appeal Judgement, para. 197.

[55] Depending on the circumstances of the case, a finding that an accused had de jure authority will not necessarily lead to the conclusion that he had effective control over his subordinates. In Blagojević, for example, the Trial Chamber found that Vidoje Blagojević was in command and control of all units of the Brutanac Brigade. This conclusion reflected its assessment of his de jure authority over all the members of the brigade, including Momir Nikolić (Blagojević and Jokić Trial Judgement, para. 419). The Trial Chamber however concluded that, in light of the actual facts on the ground, Vidoje Blagojević lacked effective control over Momir Nikolić (Blagojević and Jokić Trial Judgement, para. 795). The Appeals Chamber in Blagojević found that it did not consider the conclusions regarding the scope of Vidoje Blagojević's authority irreconcilable with the finding that he did not exercise effective control over Momir Nikolić (Blagojević Appeal Judgement, para. 302). See also Halilović Appeal Judgement, para. 85 (the Appeals Chamber held that "de jure power is not synonymous with effective control" and that "the former may not in itself amount to the latter").

to activities of plunder and the need to prevent them [but] does not mention acts of destruction".[863] The Appeals Chamber concurs with the Trial Chamber that, given the evidence taken as a whole, the inference that the 7th Brigade "must have received" orders from the 3rd Corps Command on 4 November 1993 does not establish, by itself, Kubura's knowledge of his subordinates' acts of wanton destruction.

295. Second, the Appeals Chamber considers that Kubura's knowledge of the acts of wanton destruction cannot automatically be inferred from his awareness of the plunder in Vareš on 4 November 1993. Indeed, the Trial Chamber's finding regarding Kubura's knowledge of the plunder in Vareš on 4 November 1993 rests on a much broader evidentiary basis. The Trial Chamber reached this conclusion on the basis of the aforementioned 4 November 1993 Order from the OG Istok, which specifically referred to acts of plunder but not of wanton destruction being committed in Vareš.[864] The Trial Chamber also relied on a 7th Brigade 2nd Battalion 11 November 1993 Report, which noted the 7th Brigade's collection of war booty in Vareš but did not mention acts of wanton destruction.[865] Furthermore, the Trial Chamber relied on Kubura's knowledge of and failure to punish his subordinates' past acts of plunder.[866] The Trial Chamber made no such findings with respect to any past acts of wanton destruction by Kubura's subordinates. Thus, while there was a sufficient evidentiary basis for the Trial Chamber to conclude that Kubura had knowledge of the acts of plunder in Vareš, it was reasonable for it to conclude that his knowledge as regards the acts of wanton destruction was not established beyond reasonable doubt.

296. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Prosecution failed to establish that no reasonable trier of fact could have concluded, on the basis of all the admitted evidence, that Kubura's knowledge of wanton destruction in Vareš on 4 November 1993 was not established beyond reasonable doubt. The Prosecution's second ground of appeal is dismissed and Kubura's acquittal under Count 5 of the Indictment is confirmed.

159. First, and in view of the case law established by the Appeals Chamber in Krnojelac, the Chamber agrees with the Prosecution's position which limits to similar acts a superior's duty to punish unlawful acts in order to prevent their recurrence. In Krnojelac, the Appeals Chamber relied on the repetitive nature of the mistreatment inflicted on a discriminatory basis to define a superior's responsibility to prevent unlawful acts from recurring. That same reasoning is applied later in that Judgement as regards the murders committed by the guards at the KP Dom.[289] Furthermore, post-World War II case law supports that position.[290]

160. Conversely, the Chamber is of the opinion that an extension of a superior's duty to include preventing the recurrence of unlawful acts by all of his subordinates would be inconsistent with the Krnojelac Appeal Judgement and previously-established Appeals Chamber case law.

161. To respond to the Prosecution position, the Chamber would first note the lack of consistency in its interpretation of the Krnojelac Appeal Judgement. The Prosecution acknowledges the limitations on the duty to prevent the recurrence of unlawful acts as set out in the Krnojelac Appeal Judgement, in that it is triggered only when acts of the same nature are committed again. The Prosecution, however, neither analyses nor takes a position on the fact that, in the Krnojelac Appeal Judgement, the duty to prevent the recurrence of similar unlawful acts concerned only those committed by the guards at the KP Dom in Foča, who had already committed prior abuse.

162. As such, the Prosecution's approach does not limit the Accused Hadžihasanović's duty to punish the recurrence of subsequent acts committed by a same identifiable group of subordinates as did Krnojelac, but extends his duty instead to acts of a similar nature committed by all of his subordinates, who were members of the 3rd Corps.

163. Nevertheless, the reasoning of the Appeals Chamber in Krnojelac concerns a situation where a same identifiable group of subordinates, that is the guards at the KP Dom in Foča, repeatedly committed acts of abuse. Krnojelac's "prior" knowledge arose from a context where the modus operandi of his subordinates was known.

164. It follows that the duty to prevent the recurrence of similar acts must be limited to the acts of subordinates who form part of an "identifiable group", some members of which have already committed similar acts. That limitation bears a relationship to the very nature of the duty to prevent, which is based on the risk of a recurrence of similar acts. In fact, such responsibility can be [289] Krnojelac Appeal Judgement, paras. 178-180.

[290] See for example the Trial of Major Karl Rauer and Six Others; Law Reports of Trials of War Criminals [1947] (London: Published for the United Nations War Crimes Commission by His Majesty's stationary office) 1947, vol. 4, established only when the recurrence is foreseeable, since it is premised on the fact that the failure to punish encourages soldiers – who have already committed unlawful acts – to commit those acts once again. The failure to intervene results in the foreseeable consequence of such conduct being repeated.

165. The Trial of Major Karl Rauer and Six Others is a good illustration of that issue. The case concerned Major Rauer, the commander of an aerodrome, and his responsibility for the summary executions of prisoners of war on three occasions, namely on 22, 24, and 25 March 1945, by the same group of subordinates. On 22 March 1945, four prisoners from the group captured the day before were shot in cold blood. Rauer received a report explaining that they had been killed while attempting to escape. During his trial, the accused pleaded that he did not have the time to order an investigation into the incident. On 24 March 1945, a second group of prisoners was sent out to fill holes on the aerodrome runway; seven or eight of them were shot by Rauer's subordinates. Regarding that second element, Rauer could not find the time to question the soldier who had escorted the prisoners. Another report justifying the executions and stating that the prisoners had been shot while trying to escape was sent to the high command. On 25 March 1945, a wounded prisoner of war was taken out of the aerodrome in a motorcycle side-car and shot by the same subordinates. The Accused was acquitted of the first executions of 22 March 1945 but convicted of the two others. Commentary on the case suggests that the accused should have taken measures after the first wave of executions in order to prevent further executions from occurring.[291]

166. This case clearly supports the argument that a superior's failure to intervene makes it possible to foresee a recurrence of unlawful acts. This case also supports the proposition that by failing to punish crimes of which he has knowledge, the superior has reason to know that there is a real and reasonable risk that the unlawful acts will be committed again. The case also backs the argument that punishing for the purpose of preventing other unlawful acts presupposes that the subordinates draw conclusions from the superior's intervention and, in so doing, are aware of the measures taken.

167. By attempting to extend Hadžihasanović's duty to prevent the recurrence of unlawful acts committed by all his subordinates, regardless of their position in the 3rd Corps zone of responsibility, the Prosecution is attempting to reintroduce a criterion already dismissed by the Appeals Chamber in Čelebići, namely "a general duty to know upon commanders or superiors," the

III. EVIDENCE

270. The Chamber considers it appropriate to explain the approach it adopted to assess evidence and determine its probative value, whether such evidence was supported by documentary or visual aids, or if it came in the form of testimony of witnesses called by the Prosecution, Defence, or even the Chamber.

A. Scope of Direct and Cross-Examination

1. Broad Scope of Cross-Examination

271. From the day the trial began, the Chamber adopted a broad approach with regard to the scope of direct examinations and especially cross-examinations. Accordingly, in its Decision on the Defence Motion for Clarification of the Oral Decision of 17 December [...], the Chamber recalled that, pursuant to Rule 90(H), cross-examinations are not limited to issues raised in direct examination, and that questions going to the credibility of witnesses and to the case of the cross-examining party are permitted.[443] On that basis, the Chamber exercised its control and admitted questions intended to establish the historical, political, and military context at the time of the events, provided that the cross-examining party explain the objective and relevance of such questions to the Chamber before putting them to the witness.[444]

272. Mindful that these contextual questions could result in testimony being described as "hearsay" or "indirect", the Chamber recalled that Rule 89(C) applies equally to direct and indirect evidence. In cases where testimony was based on hearsay, the Chamber noted that to assess its probative value, it wished to know the source of the information, that is, insofar as possible, the identity of the initial source, how he might have learned of the facts, and the number of intermediaries through which the testimony had passed.

2. Restrictions

(a) Decision on Defence Motion regarding Cross-Examination of Witnesses by the Prosecution

273. The Chamber placed some restrictions on its flexible approach to questions that could be raised in cross-examination, in view of the stage of the trial and the content of the Indictment. Accordingly, in its Decision on Defence Motion regarding Cross-Examination of Witnesses by the [443] Decision on Defence Motion for Clarification of the Oral Decision of 17 December 2003 Regarding the Scope of Cross-Examination Pursuant to Rule 90(H) of the Rules, 28 January 2004, p. 3.

[444] Ibid., p. 4.

456. The exhibits from the HVO impart the same confusion. They frequently use the term "mujahedin", "MOS", "ABiH" and "7th Brigade" interchangeably. While Croatian sources seem to have had information on the structure of the ABiH, at times they seemed unwilling to give a faithful description of the facts. Documents from the HVO must be evaluated in view of the tension that existed between the HVO and ABiH at the time. The documents show a propensity for propaganda and thus depict the ABiH in a poor light.[874]As shown by Exhibit DH 1175, the HVO made a conscious decision to characterise the ABiH as "Muslim forces".

457. The documents from the ABiH provide a varied and contradictory picture of the degree of cooperation that existed between the mujahedin and the ABiH. Without going into the difficulties of interpreting these exhibits at this point, the Chamber considers them to be a reliable source of information, particularly since they were written at the material time. The Defence called many witnesses who were former members of the ABiH in order to explain the contents of these exhibits to the Chamber. Their testimony helped the Chamber to better understand the relations between the ABiH and the mujahedin. Nevertheless, on more than one occasion the Chamber was confronted with the situation of witnesses maintaining the opposite of what was indicated in an exhibit.[875]

458. Finally, the Prosecution and the Defence for the Accused Hadžihasanović both called international observers to testify, particularly members of UNPROFOR and ECMM. Additionally, the Chamber admitted into evidence reports from international organisations. The scope and probative value of this evidence will be discussed later.[876]

B. Mujahedin and the ABiH - Arguments of the Parties

459. The arguments of the Parties have guided the Chamber in analysing the evidence. Given the large number of submissions presented by the Parties, however, the Chamber will not systematically discuss each one in detail, but will limit itself to recalling the main arguments.

1. Arguments of the Prosecution

460. The Prosecution claims that mujahedin provided support to the ABiH from their arrival in Central Bosnia in mid-1992 and throughout the period covered by the Indictment.[877] It asserts that mujahedin were incorporated into and subordinated to 3rd Corps units, particularly the 7th Brigade, after its creation on 19 November 1992, and that mujahedin were finally brought together in a

DECISION ON MOTIONS FOR ACQUITTAL PURSUANT TO RULE 98 BIS OF THE RULES OF PROCEDURE AND EVIDENCE

(b) Discussion

163. The Chamber considers that the constituent elements of criminal responsibility within the meaning of Article 7(3) of the Statute are well established in the Tribunal's case-law: i) a superior-subordinate relationship between the Accused and the alleged perpetrator or perpetrators of crimes falling within the jurisprudence of the Tribunal; ii) the fact that the Accused knew or had reason to know that the perpetrator was about to commit the criminal act or had already done so (knowledge); and iii) the fact that the Accused did not take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act from being committed or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[290]

164. The decisive criterion for establishing the superior-subordinate link is "effective control" of the superior over his subordinates, in other words, the material capacity to prevent or punish the acts.[291] The criterion of "effective control" applies to both de jure and de facto superiors.[292] According to the Appeals Chamber in the Čelebići case, effective control can be exercised only when the superior has a higher rank than the alleged perpetrator of the crimes. In this respect, it referred to "the necessity to prove that the perpetrator was the 'subordinate' of the accused".[293] The Appeals Chamber in the Blaškić case found that effective control is more a matter of evidence than of law and that "those indicators [of effective control] are limited to showing that the accused had the power to prevent, punish, or initiate measures leading to proceedings against the alleged perpetrators where appropriate".[294]

165. With regard to the knowledge of the superior, the principle of command responsibility does not establish a strict form of liability for a superior who did not prevent his subordinates from committing crimes or did not punish the perpetrators of those crimes.[295] Consequently, a superior could not be held criminally responsible for not making sure that he was informed of the acts of his subordinates.[296] However, the case-law of the Tribunal states that mens rea "had reason to know" is established if the superior had specific information alerting him to offences committed by his subordinates.[297] As an example, it held that mens rea was established "[when] a military commander [...] has received information that some of the soldiers under his command have a violent or unstable character, or have been drinking prior to being sent on a mission".[298]

I. PRELIMINARY

Bosnia and Herzegovina.

7. The amended indictment does not describe the "armed conflict" to which it refers as international or internal. The Prosecution has since stated that it has pleaded the existence of an "unclassified" armed conflict in Bosnia and Herzegovina.[7] The Appeals Chamber takes no position on whether the amended indictment should be treated as pleading only an internal armed conflict; it will proceed on the assumption that it can relate to such a conflict. Further, the amended indictment charges the Appellants with superior responsibility pursuant to Article 7(3) only.

8. In the interlocutory appeal, the Appellants request an oral hearing.[8] On 12 December 2002, Mr. Ilias Bantekas of the School of Law, University of Westminster, England, filed an application for leave to submit to the Appeals Chamber an amicus brief on the issue of the application of Article 7(3) of the Statute to internal armed conflicts. The Appeals Chamber, in view of the extensive submissions filed by the parties before both the Trial Chamber and the Appeals Chamber (18 briefs in total) and the substantial discussion in the impugned decision of the issues now under appeal, does not consider it necessary to hold a hearing on the appeal or to call any amicus pursuant to Rule 74 of the Rules.[9]

9. The Appeals Chamber will now consider the two points on which the bench of three appellate Judges has found that the interlocutory appeal is valid. In doing so, it desires to affirm its conception that its decision has to bear a reasoned relationship to those points, that its reasoning has to take account of relevant arguments of the parties, but that it is not obliged to deal seriatim with each and every argument raised by either side.

II. COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY IN INTERNAL ARMED CONFLICTS

10. As regards the first point on which the bench of three appellate Judges found that the interlocutory appeal raised a valid issue, the Appellants make many arguments but submit in substance that the Trial Chamber erred in two respects, in that:[10]

a) it wrongly found that there was a basis in customary international law for the applicability of the doctrine of command responsibility in internal armed conflicts at the time material to the indictment; and

b) it failed to respect the principle of legality in reaching its conclusion that it had jurisdiction in the present case.

The Appeals Chamber will consider these issues in the order above-mentioned.

(a) Whether customary international law provides for command responsibility in internal armed conflicts

11. As to this issue, there are two uncontested points of law. The first is the principle that serious violations of international humanitarian law in an internal armed conflict incur individual criminal responsibility under customary international law;[11] the finding of the Appeals Chamber to this effect in the Tadic Jurisdiction Decision remains a leading authority.[12] The second point is that, at all times relevant to this case, the doctrine of command responsibility was part of customary international law relating to international armed conflict.[13] Where the parties disagree is on the question whether the doctrine applies, as part of customary international law, in an internal armed conflict.[14]

12. In considering this question, the Appeals Chamber is aware that it is incorrect to assume that, under customary international law, all the rules applicable to an international armed conflict automatically apply to an internal armed conflict. More particularly, it appreciates that to hold that a principle was part of customary international law, it has to be satisfied that State practice recognized the principle on the basis of supporting opinio juris. However, it also considers that, where a principle can be shown to have been so established, it is not an objection to the application of the principle to a particular situation to say that the situation is new if it reasonably falls within the application of the principle. Also, in determining whether a principle is part of customary international law and, if so, what are its parameters, the Appeals Chamber may follow in the usual way what the Tribunal has held in its previous decisions.

13. Prohibitions on the doing of certain acts in the course of an internal armed conflict are imposed by Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions of 1949, which has long been accepted as having customary status.[15] In the Tadic Jurisdiction Decision, the Appeals Chamber found that "customary international law imposes criminal responsibility for serious violations of common Article 3, as supplemented by other general principles and rules on the protection of victims of internal armed conflict, and for breaching certain fundamental principles and rules regarding means and methods of combat in civil strife".[16] Likewise, at all times material to this case, customary international law included the concept of command responsibility in relation to war crimes committed in the course of an international armed conflict.[17] Thus, the concept would have applied to war crimes corresponding to the prohibitions listed in common Article 3 when committed in the course of an international armed conflict. It is difficult to see why the concept would not equally apply to breaches of the same prohibitions when committed in the course of an internal armed conflict.

14. In the view of the Appeals Chamber, the matter rests on the dual principle of responsible command and its corollary command responsibility.[18] The origin and interrelationship of these ideas merit much discussion. Here, however, it is sufficient to note that the principle of responsible command was incorporated by the provision in Article 1 of the Regulations Respecting the Laws and Customs of War on Land annexed to the Fourth Hague Convention of 1907 reading:

> The laws, rights and duties of war apply not only to armies, but also to militia and volunteer corps fulfilling the following conditions:
> 1. To be commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates ...

Article 43(1) of the 1977 Additional Protocol I to the Geneva Conventions likewise provided that the "armed forces of a Party to a conflict consist of all organized armed forces, groups and units which are under a command responsible to that Party for the conduct of its subordinates, ..."

15. The position is no different as regards internal armed conflicts. Responsible command was an integral notion of the prohibition imposed by Article 3 common to the 1949 Geneva Conventions against the doing of certain things in the course of an internal armed conflict. Referring to the criteria for determining whether there was an "armed conflict not of an international character" within the meaning of that provision, the ICRC Commentary spoke, authoritatively, of a revolting party possessing "an organized military force, an authority responsible for its acts, acting within a determinate territory and having the means of respecting and ensuring respect for the" convention.[19] Article 1(1) of Protocol II Additional to the Geneva Conventions likewise spoke of a Contracting Party's "armed forces and dissident armed forces or other organized armed groups which, under responsible command, exercise such control over a part of its territory as to enable them to carry out sustained and concerted military operations ...".

16. Thus, whether Article 3 of the Statute is referring to war crimes committed in the course of international armed conflict or to war crimes committed in the course of internal armed conflict under Article 3 common to the Geneva Conventions, it assumes that there is an organized military force. It is evident that there cannot be an organized military force save on the basis of responsible command. It is also reasonable to hold that it is responsible command which leads to command responsibility. Command responsibility is the most effective method by which international criminal law can enforce responsible command.

17. It is true that, domestically, most States have not legislated for command responsibility to be the counterpart of responsible command in internal conflict. This, however, does not affect the fact that, at the international level, they have accepted that, as a matter of customary international law, relevant aspects of international law (including the concept of command responsibility) govern the conduct of an internal armed conflict, though of course not all aspects of international law apply. The relevant aspects of international law unquestionably regard a military force engaged in an internal armed conflict as organized and therefore as being under responsible command. In the absence of anything to the contrary, it is the task of a court to interpret the underlying State practice and opinio juris (relating to the requirement that such a military force be organized) as bearing its normal meaning that military organization implies responsible command and that responsible command in turn implies command responsibility.

18. In short, wherever customary international law recognizes that a war crime can be committed by a member of an organised military force, it also recognizes that a commander can be penally sanctioned if he knew or had reason to know that his subordinate was about to commit a prohibited act or had done so and the commander failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such an act or to punish the subordinate. Customary international law recognizes that some war crimes can be committed by a member of an organised military force in the course of an internal armed conflict; it therefore also recognizes that there can be command responsibility in respect of such crimes.

19. The Appellants argue that international law developed to regulate the relations between States on the basis of reciprocity and that command responsibility for acts committed in the course of an internal conflict does not raise any questions of reciprocity.[20] The Appeals Chamber does not consider that the matter depends on notions of reciprocity. In the course of development, States have come to consider that they have a common interest in the observance of certain minimum standards of conduct in certain matters;[21] this includes certain aspects of conduct in an internal armed conflict. To that extent, internal armed conflict is now the concern of international law without any question of reciprocity.

20. Thus, the fact that it was in the course of an internal armed conflict that a war crime was about to be committed or was committed is not relevant to the responsibility of the commander; that only goes to the characteristics of the particular crime and not to the responsibility of the commander. The basis of the commander's responsibility lies in his obligations as commander of troops making up an organised military force under his command, and not in the particular theatre in which the act was committed by a member of that military force.

21. As against the foregoing, the Appellants argue that "a clear distinction must also be made between the principle of 'responsible command' and 'command responsibility'."[22] They contend that the Trial Chamber confused the two concepts when it concluded that the inclusion of the principle of responsible command in Additional Protocol II connoted command responsibility.[23] The Prosecution responds that "the doctrine of command responsibility is a logical consequence of the imposition of individual criminal responsibility for serious violations of international humanitarian law committed by members of forces acting under a responsible command."[24]

22. The Appeals Chamber recognizes that there is a difference between the concepts of responsible command and command responsibility. The difference is due to the fact that the concept of responsible command looks to the duties comprised in the idea of command, whereas that of command responsibility looks at liability flowing from breach of those duties. But, as the foregoing shows, the elements of command responsibility are derived from the elements of responsible command.

23. The Appeals Chamber recalls the United States Supreme Court's decision in the matter of Yamashita v. Styer, which, delivered by Chief Justice Stone, states :

> The question is whether the law of war imposes on an army commander a duty to take such appropriate measures as are within his power to control the troops under his command for the prevention of the specified acts which are violations of the law of war....
>
> It is evident that the conduct of military operations by troops whose excesses are unrestrained by the orders or efforts of the commander would almost certainly result in violations which it is the purpose of the law of war to prevent....Hence the law of war presupposes that its violation is to be avoided through the control of the operations of war by commanders who are to some extent responsible for their subordinates.

> This is recognized by the Annex to the Fourth Hague Convention of 1907, respecting the laws and customs of war on land...Similarly Article 19 of the Tenth Hague Convention ... provides that commanders in chief of the belligerent vessels "must see that the above Articles are properly carried out"...And Article 26 of the Geneva Red Cross Convention of 1929...for the amelioration of the condition of the wounded and sick in armies in the field, makes it "the duty of the commander-in-chief of the belligerent armies to provide for the details of execution of the foregoing Articles, (of the convention(as well as for the unforeseen cases."[25]

The court then concluded that these provisions imposed on a commander an affirmative duty to take appropriate measures to protect prisoners of war and the civilian population, and that the duty of a commander "has heretofore been recognized, and its breach penalized by our own military tribunals".[26] Thus, the duties comprised in responsible command are generally enforced through command responsibility. The latter flows from the former.

24. This view is consistent with Article 7(3) of the Statute in its application to Article 3 thereof. Article 7 (3) provides:

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in Article 2 to 5 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superior of criminal responsibility if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[27]

The Appellants accept that a "plain reading of Article 7(3) may lead to the inference that it could apply in internal conflict, since it appears to cover all violations in the Statute, some of which may be committed in internal conflict."[28] That is right; the provision does cover violations in internal armed conflict. The effect of the Appellant's submissions is that, to the extent that it does so, the provision is ultra vires; in their view, "internationality is required."[29]

25. For the reasons given, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that Article 7(3) is ultra vires to the extent that it applies to internal armed conflicts . It will merely emphasise that, if the doctrine of command responsibility is inapplicable to the case of an internal armed conflict, Article 7(3) of the Statute, which clearly assumes such a hypothesis, is pro tanto defeated.

26. The applicability of command responsibility to internal armed conflict is not disputed in the cases of the tribunals established for Rwanda, Sierra Leone and East Timor. It is said that these tribunals were established after the ICTY. However, in the view of the Appeals Chamber, the establishment of these bodies was consistent with the proposition that customary international law previously included the principle that command responsibility applied in respect of an internal armed conflict.

27. Taken as a whole, the Appeals Chamber agrees with the survey and analysis made by the Trial Chamber of various sources (including decided cases) concerning the development of State practice and opinio juris on the question whether command responsibility forms part of customary international law in relation to war crimes committed in the course of an internal armed conflict, and rejects the submissions of the Appellants on these points. The Appeals Chamber will not therefore enter into such matters. It will diverge from this position only for the purpose of dealing with one argument.

28. The Appellants have placed reliance on the fact that the doctrine of command responsibility was referred to in Articles 86 and 87 of the 1977 Protocol I Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 1949[30] but was not referred to in Protocol II. The former being directed to international armed conflicts while the latter is directed to internal armed conflicts, the Appellants contend that the difference tends to support the view that State practice regarded command responsibility as part of customary international law relating to international armed conflicts and did not regard command responsibility as part of customary international law relating to internal armed conflicts.

29. The Appeals Chamber affirms the view of the Trial Chamber that command responsibility was part of customary international law relating to international armed conflicts before the adoption of Protocol I. Therefore, as the Trial Chamber considered, Articles 86 and 87 of Protocol I were in this respect only declaring the existing position, and not constituting it. In like manner, the non-reference in Protocol II to command responsibility in relation to internal armed conflicts did not necessarily affect the question whether command responsibility previously existed as part of customary international law relating to internal armed conflicts. The Appeals Chamber considers that, at the time relevant to this indictment, it was, and that this conclusion is not overthrown by the play of factors responsible for the silence which, for any of a number of reasons, sometimes occurs over the codification of an accepted point in the drafting of an international instrument.

30. Were it otherwise, the Appeals Chamber would have to uphold that, "as argued by the Defence, it is not a crime for a commander in an internal conflict to fail to prevent or punish the killings committed by his subordinates,"[31] i.e., even if the commander knows or has reason to know of the killings. The Appeals Chamber does not consider that it is required to sustain so improbable a view in contemporary international law; more particularly, it finds that such a view is not consistent with its reasoning in the Tadic Jurisdiction Decision [32] and in the Celebici Appeal Judgment,[33] or with the reasoning of the Trial Chamber in Aleksovski. (footnote 34)

31. In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, the Trial Chamber was correct in holding, after a thorough examination of the matter, that command responsibility was at all times material to this case a part of customary international law in its application to war crimes committed in the course of an internal armed conflict.

(b) The principle of legality

32. As to this issue, the Appellants contend that, if command responsibility for war crimes committed in the course of an internal armed conflict was not part of customary international law at the time when the acts were allegedly done by the Appellants, the principle of legality was necessarily breached.[35] It being clear from the Secretary-General's Report that the Statute was restricted to customary international law, it would follow that the Appellants were indicted for something that was not a crime under customary international law at the time when the relevant acts were allegedly committed.

33. It does not appear to the Appeals Chamber that this argument can stand if it is held, as the Appeals Chamber holds, that at all material times it was part of customary international law that there could be command responsibility in respect of war crimes committed in the course of an internal armed conflict. The argument assumes that such responsibility did not form part of customary international law at the material times. If the assumption goes, so does the argument which is based on it.

34. The Appellants argued before the Trial Chamber, and they seem to have retained the argument before the Appeals Chamber[36], that the principle of legality requires that the crime charged be set out in a law that is accessible and that it be foreseeable that the conduct in question may be criminally sanctioned at the time when the crime was allegedly committed. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the answers given by the Trial Chamber. As to foreseeability, the conduct in question is the concrete conduct of the accused; he must be able to appreciate that the conduct is criminal in the sense generally understood, without reference to any specific provision. As to accessibility, in the case of an international tribunal such as this, accessibility does not exclude reliance being placed on a law which is based on custom.[37] The Tadic Jurisdiction Decision shows that individual criminal responsibility can attach to a breach of a customary prohibition of certain conduct.[38]

35. The Appellants further argue that the principle of legality requires the existence of a conventional as well as a customary basis for an incrimination.[39] The Appeals Chamber also agrees with the Trial Chamber's rejection of this argument. The obligation of the Tribunal to rely on customary international law excludes any necessity to cite conventional law where customary international law is relied on.[40] Contrary to the arguments of the Appellants, there is nothing in the Secretary-General's Report, to which the Statute of the Tribunal was attached in draft, which requires both a customary basis and a conventional one for an incrimination.

36. Lastly, the Appellants argue that the Trial Chamber confused responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute with responsibility under Article 7(3).[41] In the opinion of the Appeals Chamber, there is no basis for such a contention: the Trial Chamber was clear about the difference.

III. COMMAND RESPONSIBILITY FOR CRIMES COMMITTED BEFORE THE SUPERIOR-SUBORDINATE RELATIONSHIP EXISTS

37. The Appeals Chamber will now consider the second point on which the interlocutory appeal has been found to be valid by the bench of three appellate Judges, namely, the responsibility of a superior for acts which were committed before he became the superior of the persons who committed them.

38. The amended indictment alleges that Amir Kubura took up his position as acting commander of the Bosnian Army, 3rd Corps, 7th Muslim Mountain Brigade on 1 April 1993. Paragraph 58 charges him with being "criminally responsible in relation to those crimes that were committed by troops of the ABiH 3rd Corps 7th Muslim Mountain Brigade prior to his assignment on 1 April 1993 (...) Amir Kubura knew or had reason to know about these crimes. After he assumed command, he was under the duty to punish the perpetrators."[42] In effect, he is charged with command responsibility in connection with offences committed or started more than two months before he became the commander of the troops on 1 April 1993.[43]

39. Under count 1, he is charged with command responsibility for, among other events, the Dusina killings in the Zenica Municipality on 26 January 1993.[44] On count 4, he is charged with command responsibility in connection with cruel treatment of prisoners by his subordinates at the Zenica Music School between about 26 January 1993 to at least January 1994. Counts 5 and 6 charge him with command responsibility in connection with wanton destruction and plunder of property allegedly committed at, among others, Dusina in January 1993. With the exception of count 4, the rest of the charges concern events that started and ended before Kubura became the commander of the troops allegedly involved in those events. Count 4 includes a period of time commencing before but continuing after Kubura became the commander.

40. So, the issue is whether command responsibility extends to acts committed by subordinates prior to the assumption of command by the commander.

41. The Appellants argue that, as a matter of principle, there is no basis in conventional or customary law for holding a commander criminally responsible for the acts of persons who were not his subordinates when they committed the acts.[45] In their submission, the express terms of Article 7(3) of the Statute require that an accused be the superior when the subordinate commits the offence.[46] They submit that a finding to the contrary of what the practice shows would have far-reaching consequences, in that any superior who had effective control over the perpetrators months or years after the offences were committed could be held criminally liable for not punishing the perpetrators.[47] The proper person to be prosecuted is the commander who had effective control over the perpetrator at the time the offences were committed, and who failed to prevent or to punish the crimes.[48]

42. The appellant Kubura also argues, first, that, if the liability of superiors for acts of perpetrators who subsequently become their subordinates had been envisaged, the Statute would have specifically provided for such liability in Article 7(3).[49] Secondly, Article 86 (2) of Additional Protocol I (as well as the Commentary of the International Committee of the Red Cross on that provision) does not provide for liability for offences committed before command was assumed; emphasis is placed on the coincidence of the superior-subordinate relationship and the commission of the offences.[50] Thirdly, the case law of the International Tribunal, as embodied in the ^elebi ci Trial and Appeal Judgements as well as in the Kordic Trial Judgement, supports the contention that the superior-subordinate relationship must exist at the time of the offence.[51] Fourthly, Article 28 (a) of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal

Court limits the responsibility of superiors to the time when the offences were committed.[52] Lastly, there are no provisions in national legislation or military codes that hold a superior in internal armed conflicts criminally responsible for offences committed by persons who subsequently came under the superior's command.[53]

43. In its brief filed before the Trial Chamber, the Prosecution cites the Kordic Trial Judgement, which states:

> The duty to punish naturally arises after a crime has been committed. Persons who assume command after the commission are under the same duty to punish. This duty includes at least an obligation to investigate the crimes to establish the facts and to report them to the competent authorities, if the superior does not have the power to sanction himself.[54]

The Prosecution later submits that "the material fact for determination is therefore not who was in command at the time of the crime, but when a commander became aware of the crime, yet failed to take the 'reasonable and necessary measures' to punish the violation".[55] Further, "the Prosecution case is that the troops commanded by Alagi (sic(from April 1993 had a history of unpunished criminality".[56] The cruel treatment alleged in counts 3 and 4 of the amended indictment started before but continued after the appellant Kubura assumed command.[57] The Prosecution also submits that "the lack of a known precedent for a finding of guilt for failing to punish subordinates for offences committed before assuming command cannot prevent charging an accused in this manner".[58]

44. In considering the issue of whether command responsibility exists in relation to crimes committed by a subordinate prior to an accused's assumption of command over that subordinate, the Appeals Chamber observes that it has always been the approach of this Tribunal not to rely merely on a construction of the Statute to establish the applicable law on criminal responsibility, but to ascertain the state of customary law in force at the time the crimes were committed.[59]

45. In this particular case, no practice can be found, nor is there any evidence of opinio juris that would sustain the proposition that a commander can be held responsible for crimes committed by a subordinate prior to the commander's assumption of command over that subordinate.

46. In fact, there are indications that militate against the existence of a customary rule establishing such criminal responsibility. For example, Article 28 of the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court provides that:

> (a) A military commander or person effectively acting as a military commander shall be criminally responsible for crimes within the jurisdiction of the Court committed by forces under his or her effective command and control, or effective authority and control as the case may be, as a result of his or her failure to exercise control properly over such forces, where:

A605

> (i) That military commander or person either knew or, owing to the circumstances at the time, should have known that the forces were committing or about to commit such crimes; and
>
> (ii) That military commander or person failed to take all necessary and reasonable measures within his or her power to prevent or repress their commission or to submit the matter to the competent authorities for investigation and prosecution.[60]

Under the Rome Statute, therefore, command responsibility can only exist if a commander knew or should have known that his subordinates were committing crimes, or were about to do so. This language necessarily excludes criminal liability on the basis of crimes committed by a subordinate prior to an individual's assumption of command over that subordinate.

47. Another example can be found in the Protocol Additional to the Geneva Conventions of 12 August 1949 (Protocol I). Article 86(2) of the Protocol states that "[t]he fact that a breach of the Conventions or of this Protocol was committed by a subordinate does not absolve his superiors from penal or disciplinary responsibility, as the case may be, if they knew, or had information which should have enabled them to conclude in the circumstances at the time, that he was committing or was going to commit such a breach and if they did not take all feasible measures within their power to prevent or repress the breach." Again, the language of this article envisions a situation in which a breach was in the process of being committed, or was going to be committed; breaches committed before the superior assumed command over the perpetrator are not included within its scope.

48. The International Law Commission, in its Report on the work of its forty-eighth session (6 May–26 July 1996)[61], stated that "[t]he principle of individual criminal responsibility under which a military commander is held responsible for his failure to prevent or repress the unlawful conduct of his subordinates is elaborated in article 86 of Protocol I." Similarly, in the Celebici Appeal Judgment, the Appeals Chamber stated that the "criminal offence based on command responsibility is defined in Article 86(2) only."[62]

49. It should also be mentioned that Article 6 of the Draft Code of Crimes Against the Peace and Security of Mankind, adopted by the International Law Commission at its forty-eighth session, reads as follows:

> The fact that a crime against the peace and security of mankind was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superiors of criminal responsibility, if they knew or had reason to know, in the circumstances at the time, that the subordinate was committing or was going to commit such a crime and if they did not take all necessary measures within their power to prevent or repress the crime.[63]

Once again, the emphasis is on the superior-subordinate relationship existing at the time the subordinate was committing or was going to commit a crime. Crimes committed by a subordinate in the past, prior to his superior's assumption of command, are clearly excluded.

50. Consideration can also be given to the Kuntze case[64], before the Nuernberg Military Tribunals. The Appeals Chamber considers that this case also constitutes an indication that would run contrary to the existence of a customary rule establishing command responsibility for crimes committed before a superior's assumption of command over the perpetrator,[65] and that it could certainly not be brought to support the opposite view.

51. Having examined the above authorities, the Appeals Chamber holds that an accused cannot be charged under Article 7(3) of the Statute for crimes committed by a subordinate before the said accused assumed command over that subordinate. The Appeals Chamber is aware that views on this issue may differ. However, the Appeals Chamber holds the view that this Tribunal can impose criminal responsibility only if the crime charged was clearly established under customary law at the time the events in issue occurred.[66] In case of doubt, criminal responsibility cannot be found to exist, thereby preserving full respect for the principle of legality.

52. The Appeals Chamber has carefully considered the thoughtful dissenting opinions of Judges Shahabuddeen and Hunt. Several of the general points Judge Hunt makes at the outset of his dissent about the nature of customary law rules – for example, that customary international law, like the common law, may change over time and that clearly established rules may be applied to new factual situations clearly falling within their ambit – are common ground between the Appeals Chamber and the dissenting Judges.[67] It is quite a different matter, however, to stretch an existing customary principle to establish criminal responsibility for conduct falling beyond the established principle. Whether the principle of command responsibility extends to crimes committed prior to the assumption of command is a difficult legal question, and reasonable minds may certainly debate the point. To assert, as the dissenting Judges do, that such a dereliction clearly carries individual criminal liability under existing principle seems indefensible. It is trite to observe that in international criminal law, imposition of criminal liability must rest on a positive and solid foundation of a customary law principle. It falls to the distinguished dissenting Judges to show that such a foundation exists; it does not fall to the Appeals Chamber to demonstrate that it does not.

53. It is telling that the dissenting opinions do not mention a single direct and explicit statement in a military manual, or in a commentary to a military manual, or in the case law, or in the abundant literature on command responsibility, suggesting that the customary law principle of command responsibility imposes on a military commander criminal responsibility for crimes committed by his subordinates before he has assumed command. In this respect, the dissents thus give added strength to the Appeals Chamber's view. Though, as the dissents note, some manuals contain language which is broad enough to encompass responsibility for punishing both command and pre-command crimes, there is no textual support confirming direct support for the latter. And, of course, other manuals and other texts, especially Article 86 of Additional Protocol I and the Rome Statute of the ICC, go the other way. For example, the Canadian Defence Ministry's Manual on the Law of Armed Conflict provides that "[s] evidence concerning his high-ranking position in the ABiH and his position as Team Leader of the Inspection Team.[153]

59. As a preliminary matter, the Appeals Chamber notes that, in paragraph 56 of the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber correctly set out the elements that must be satisfied to hold a superior responsible under Article 7(3) of the Statute:

> i. The existence of a superior-subordinate relationship;
>
> ii. the superior knew or had reason to know that the criminal act was about to be or had been committed; and
> iii. the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent the criminal act or punish the perpetrator thereof.

Regarding the first of these elements, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the concept of effective control over a subordinate – in the sense of a material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct, however that control is exercised – is the threshold to be reached in establishing a superior-subordinate relationship for the purpose of Article 7(3) of the Statute.[154] Against this backdrop, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the necessity of proving that the perpetrator was the "subordinate" of the accused (against whom charges have been brought under Article 7(3) of the Statute) does not require direct or formal subordination. Rather, the accused has to be, by virtue of his position, senior in some sort of formal or informal hierarchy to the perpetrator. The ability to exercise effective control in the sense of a material power to prevent or punish, which the Appeals Chamber considers to be a minimum requirement for the recognition of a superior-subordinate relationship for the purpose of superior responsibility, will almost invariably not be satisfied unless such a relationship of subordination exists.[155] The Appeals Chamber considers that a material ability to prevent and punish may also exist outside a superior-subordinate relationship relevant for Article 7(3) of the Statute. For example, a police officer may be able to "prevent and punish" crimes under his jurisdiction, but this would not as such make him a superior (in the sense of Article 7(3) of the Statute) vis-à-vis any perpetrator within that jurisdiction. The Trial Chamber's analysis of the law on the first element of superior responsibility is consistent with this approach.[156]

60. At paragraph 57 of the Trial Judgement, the Trial Chamber stated that "[i]t is the position of command over the perpetrator which forms the legal basis for the superior's duty to act, and for his Staff, one of [ABiH Commander] Rasim Delić's deputies and was the most senior ranking Commander [as opposed to officer] in Herzegovina at that time for the Operation". A plain reading of this sentence leads to the conclusion that this paragraph may not be read as an alternative basis for the allegation that Halilović had effective control over the units subordinated to him (the allegation expressed in paragraph 38 of the Indictment), but rather as a mere argument in support of this allegation. The same is true for paragraph 37 of the Indictment.

85. Paragraph 39 of the Indictment further elaborates on paragraph 38 and sets out examples of how Halilović "demonstrated both formal de jure and de facto power, by his command and control in military matters". There is no clear indication in this paragraph that Halilović's role as Team Leader of the Inspection Team constitutes an alternative basis for a finding of effective control. In fact, paragraph 39 of the Indictment does not even refer to his role as Team Leader of the Inspection Team. Moreover, the exercise of effective control by reason of Halilović's position as the most senior ranking officer in Herzegovina cannot be said to have been pleaded implicitly in this paragraph either, mainly because, for the purposes of criminal responsibility as a superior, de jure power is not synonymous with effective control. In fact, the former may not in itself amount to the latter. The same applies with respect to de facto power: a de facto superior must be found to wield substantially similar powers of control as de jure superiors who exercise effective control over subordinates to be held criminally responsible for their acts. It therefore cannot be said that pleading the exercise of both de jure and de facto power amounts to pleading effective control.[233]

86. A decisive factor in determining the degree of specificity with which the Prosecution is required to particularise the facts of its case in an indictment is the nature of the alleged criminal conduct charged.[234] In this respect, in line with the principles of pleading recognised by the Appeals Chambers of the International Tribunal and the ICTR set out above, the Indictment pleads that Halilović had effective control over the units subordinated to him. The manner in which such control was exercised might encompass facts which are not required to be alleged as long as there is a clear indication that he possessed effective control at the time of the crimes.[235] With respect to the degree of specificity with which the material facts must be pleaded, Chambers of the International Tribunal have held that each of the material facts must usually be pleaded expressly, although in that none of these arguments warrant the summary dismissal of sub-ground 5, and, as a result, denies Halilović's request.

(c) The Trial Chamber's interpretation of the in dubio pro reo principle

107. The Prosecution first avers that the Trial Chamber erred in law in stating, at paragraph 12 of the Trial Judgement, that "[a]ny ambiguity or doubt has been resolved in favour of the Accused in accordance with the principle of in dubio pro reo",[289] rather than referring to any reasonable ambiguity or doubt.[290] Since this error, the Prosecution argues, calls into question all of the findings of the Trial Chamber,[291] the Appeals Chamber should re-evaluate all of the evidence at trial applying the correct standard of proof.[292] Halilović responds that, when read in its full context (including footnotes 24 and 25, to which the Prosecution fails to refer), the passage in paragraph 12 of the Trial Judgement clarifies that it is only reasonable doubts that will be considered in determining whether the Prosecution has proven its case.[293] Moreover, even if a legal error had been established, the Prosecution identified no instance where this standard was applied by the Trial Chamber. In practice, Halilović argues, in assessing whether he had effective control over the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Grabovica, the Trial Chamber did explicitly – at paragraph 747 of the Trial Judgement – set out the appropriate standard.[294]

108. Paragraph 12 of the Trial Judgement in its entirety reads as follows:

> Article 21(3) of the Statute provides that the Accused shall be presumed innocent until proven guilty. The Prosecution therefore bears the burden of establishing the guilt of the Accused, and, in accordance with Rule 87(A) of the Rules, the Prosecution must do so beyond reasonable doubt. In determining whether the Prosecution has done so with respect to the Count in the Indictment, the Trial Chamber has carefully considered whether there is any reasonable interpretation of the evidence admitted other than the guilt of the Accused Any [sic] ambiguity or doubt has been resolved in favour of the Accused in accordance with the principle of in dubio pro reo.[295]

109. When the portion of the Trial Judgement identified by the Prosecution as a basis for its allegation is read in context with the rest of the paragraph as a whole, including the footnote references to the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal and that of the ICTR,[296] it is clear that the Trial Chamber considered only reasonable doubts as relevant in determining whether the Prosecution had proven its case. The reference to "[a]ny ambiguity or doubt" should be read in light of the caveat that "the Trial Chamber has carefully considered whether there is any reasonable interpretation of the evidence admitted other than the guilt of the Accused", which is a way to express the appropriate standard. In light of the foregoing, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber did not err in law at paragraph 12 of the Trial Judgement.

[296] The Appeals Chamber notes the following statement in fn. 24 of the Trial Judgement: "The Trial Chamber interprets the standard 'beyond reasonable doubt' to mean a high degree of probability; it does not mean certainty or proof beyond the shadow of doubt". The Appeals Chamber further notes that the references in fn. 25, related to the last sentence in paragraph 12 of the Trial Judgement, include: Prosecutor v. Duško Tadić, Case No. IT-94-1-A, Decision on Appellant's Motion for the Extension of the Time-Limit and Admission of Additional Evidence, 15 October 1998 (filed 16 October 1998), para. 73; Čelebići Trial Judgement, para. 601; Akayesu Trial Judgement, para. 319.

110. The fact that the Trial Chamber properly expressed the standard of proof in the section of the Trial Judgement containing its general considerations on the evaluation of evidence does not in principle prevent the Prosecution from raising this allegation of error of law with regard to specific factual findings. However, since in its submissions under sub-ground 5 the Prosecution does not provide specific reference to factual findings where the Trial Chamber allegedly misapplied the in dubio pro reo principle, the Appeals Chamber will address this allegation only insofar as it has been raised with regard to specific factual findings under other sub-grounds of appeal.

(d) The Trial Chamber's application of the "beyond reasonable doubt" standard

111. The second error alleged by the Prosecution under sub-ground 5 relates to the principle, enshrined in Rule 87(A) of the Rules, that guilt must be proven beyond reasonable doubt. According to the Prosecution, in application of this principle, all elements of the crime as well as all requirements for a specific mode of responsibility must be proven beyond reasonable doubt in order for an accused to be convicted.[297] The Prosecution explicitly refers to the Ntagerura et al. Appeal Judgement in this respect, which states that the beyond reasonable doubt standard is applicable to all facts "indispensable for entering a conviction".[298] However, the Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber wrongly applied the standard of proof beyond reasonable doubt to "predicate facts".[299]

112. As a preliminary matter, the Appeals Chamber makes the following terminological observations. A predicate fact is a fact from which a presumption or inference arises, and it is also termed "foundational fact" or "evidentiary fact".[300] However, for the purposes of the present judgement and in light of the Prosecution's submissions,[301] the Appeals Chamber understands the expression "predicate facts" to encompass those factual allegations that are not essential to prove the elements of the crime or the mode of responsibility alleged.

209. When submitting that Halilović exercised effective control over the perpetrators, the Prosecution relied specifically on Halilović's material ability to punish as "the most important discussion ... because it focuses directly on the effective control test".[588] In its analysis of sub-ground 4, the Appeals Chamber has found that it was not unreasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that Halilović lacked the material ability to punish the persons who committed the crimes in Grabovica.[589]

210. In any event, even assuming that Halilović had the ability to contribute to an investigation or to the punishment of the perpetrators of the crimes committed in Grabovica, these abilities can only amount to effective control relevant for Article 7(3) of the Statute if they are the consequence of a relationship of subordination between Halilović and these perpetrators.[590] Indeed, the Appeals Chamber recalls that the material ability to punish and its corresponding duty to punish can only amount to effective control over the perpetrators if they are premised upon a pre-existing superior-subordinate relationship between the accused and the perpetrators. In this regard, the ability to exercise effective control in the sense of a material power to prevent or punish necessitates a pre-existing relationship of subordination, hierarchy or chain of command.[591] Of course, the concepts of subordination, hierarchy and chains of command need not be established in the sense of formal organisational structures so long as the fundamental requirement of effective control over the subordinate, in the sense of material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct, is satisfied.[592]

211. In the present case, the Prosecution has failed to show how Halilović's alleged position as de facto commander of Operation Neretva established a chain of command or a hierarchical relationship between him and the perpetrators amounting to a superior-subordinate relationship in which he could have exercised effective control over the perpetrators, in the sense of material ability to prevent or punish crimes. In particular, the Prosecution has failed to show how Halilović's [591] Čelebići Appeal Judgement, para. 303, where the Appeals Chamber explained that the doctrine of command responsibility "developed with an emphasis on persons who, by virtue of the position which they occupy, have authority over others". This approach also underlies the reasoning in the Blaškić Appeal Judgement, paras 372ff: the Appeals Chamber first ascertained whether Blaškić had "command authority" over the Military Police (an authority it found he could have for ad hoc missions pursuant to specific requests, paras 375-381), before assessing whether he had effective control over said Military Police (paras 382 ff). In the Kajelijeli Appeal Judgement (paras 85-86), the ICTR Appeals Chamber first recalled that "a superior is one who possesses power or authority over subordinates either de jure or de facto" (para. 85), before outlining the threshold to be reached in establishing a superior-subordinate relationship, namely "that it be found beyond reasonable doubt that the accused was able to exercise effective control over his or her subordinates" (para. 86). See also Blagojević and Jokić Appeal Judgement, paras 301-303.

role as Chief of Staff of the Main Staff of the Supreme Command of the ABiH[593] (and allegedly the most senior ABiH officer in Herzegovina) or his functions within the Inspection Team created such a chain of command.[594]

212. In fact, the most relevant issue in relation to these two positions is the authority and responsibility broadly associated with the functions of Chief-of-Staff.[595] In this context, the Appeals Chamber refers to the findings of the Military Tribunal in United States v. Wilhelm von Leeb et al.[596] As a commander-in-chief of an Army group, "the duties imposed upon [von Leeb] were exclusively operational and his headquarters and staff were strictly operational in their functions".[597] Therefore, "his authority in th[e] field [of executive power] was more in the nature of a right to intervene than a direct responsibility".[598] The Military Tribunal found that, under the circumstances of the case, "it [was] not considered [...] that criminal responsibility attache[d] to him merely on the theory of subordination and over-all command".[599]

213. In the present case, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Prosecution has failed to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion that the order establishing the Inspection Team did not create any type of subordination, hierarchy or chain of command between Halilović and the perpetrators going beyond Halilović's authority as Chief of Staff, or that Halilović had duties and responsibilities which were "exclusively operational".[600]

214. In particular, considering that criminal responsibility does not attach to a military official merely on the basis of his "over-all command", the Appeals Chamber finds that, even assuming Halilović was a de facto superior of the perpetrators of the murders in Grabovica, the Prosecution has failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the mandate of the Inspection Team did not include duties or obligations related to the effective prevention or punishment of crimes (which would form the required basis for Halilović's effective control over the perpetrators).[601] The Appeals Chamber considers that, while it is true that the Inspection Team suggested the initiation of

---

[593] The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber discussed extensively Halilović's role within the structure of the Main Staff, but made no ultimate finding as to his de jure or de facto position therein (Trial Judgement, paras 105 to 111). The Trial Chamber only held that Halilović's position "within the structure of the Main Staff was circumscribed as a result of the 8 June and 18 July Decisions" (Trial Judgement, para. 369).
[594] Cf. supra, para. 70, regarding the alleged subordination of the 9th Brigade and its commander Ališpago to Halilović.
[595] The Prosecution argued that the Inspection Team was appointed to perform a role of "central control" over the planned combat operation (AT. 30).

[600] See Trial Judgement, paras 198-205, assessing Delić's order of 30 August 1993 to form an Inspection Team.
[601] The Appeals Chamber notes that, of course, the distinction outlined above between a pre-existing de facto superior position, on the one side, and effective control, on the other, does not necessarily mean that findings on both these some criminal proceedings in its Final Report,[602] a reasonable trier of fact could reach the conclusion that these mere "suggestions", in the context of an "estimate of the overall situation in the Neretva valley",[603] did not establish beyond reasonable doubt even a "very limited degree" of effective control of Halilović over the perpetrators.[604]

215. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that, even assuming that (i) a de facto IKM was established, (ii) the name of the military operation in question was "Neretva", and (iii) the participants at the Zenica meeting discussed who would be commander of this operation and planned a specific and detailed operation to liberate Mostar,[605] the Prosecution has not shown that the Trial Chamber erred in concluding that the Prosecution did not prove beyond reasonable doubt that Halilović had the material ability to prevent or punish the crimes committed in Grabovica.

216. Therefore, the Prosecution failed to show that no reasonable trier of fact could have reached the conclusion that Halilović, as a commander of Operation Neretva, did not have the required degree of "effective control" over the perpetrators to establish his superior responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute. For the foregoing reasons, the first ground of appeal is dismissed.

217. Consequently, considering that the Prosecution has failed to show that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that the first element of superior responsibility had not been met, the Appeals Chamber need not address the Prosecution's arguments advanced under the remaining grounds of appeal.[606] These grounds, which concern the other two elements required to establish superior responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute, intrinsically hinge upon the outcome of the first ground of appeal.[607] requirements will not be based in whole or in part, in certain cases, on the same evidence related to the ability to prevent and punish.

[604] Cf. Blaškić Appeal Judgement, para. 499.

[605] See supra, para. 125, sub (ii) and (iii).

[606] Likewise, the Trial Chamber was not required to enter a finding to the effect that Halilović had failed to punish the perpetrators of the crimes, since it had found that Halilović had no effective control based on a superior-subordinate relationship over the troops which committed the crimes in Grabovica.

[607] The Appeals Chamber recalls that the Prosecution's second and third grounds of appeal concern the other two requirements of superior responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute, namely whether Halilović knew or had reason to know that a criminal act was about to be or had been committed and whether Halilović failed to prevent or punish the criminal conduct (Prosecution Notice of Appeal, paras 5-8). The fourth ground of appeal relates to the admission into evidence of a report by a military expert witness. The Prosecution Notice of Appeal, para. 9, argued under the fourth ground of appeal that the admission of the military expert's report and his proposed testimony would have affected the findings of the Trial Chamber on the existence of a superior-subordinate relationship (Trial Judgement, paras 363-372, 736-747 and 752) and on whether Halilović knew or had reason to know that the criminal act was about to be or had been committed (Trial Judgement, paras 485-525). These parts of the fourth ground of appeal were withdrawn in the Prosecution Appeal Brief, fn. 344. Consequently, according to the Prosecution, the admission of this evidence would only have affected the third element of superior responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute (Prosecution Notice of Appeal, para. 9, citing Trial Judgement, paras 97-100, 660-701 and 743-747).

> The doctrine of superior responsibility makes a superior responsible not for his acts sanctioned by Article 7(1) of the Statute but for his failure to act. A superior is held responsible for the acts of his subordinates if he did not prevent the perpetration of the crimes of his subordinates or punish them for the crimes.[128]

The Trial Chamber also recalls the Partially Dissenting Opinion of Judge Shahabuddeen in the Hadžihasanović Appeals Chamber Decision, stating:

> The position of the appellants seems to be influenced by their belief that Article 7(3) of the Statute has the effect, as they say, of making the commander "guilty of an offence committed by others even though he neither possessed the applicable mens rea nor had any involvement whatsoever in the actus reus." No doubt, arguments can be made in support of that reading of the provision, but I prefer to interpret the provision as making the commander guilty for failing in his supervisory capacity to take the necessary corrective action after he knows or has reason to know that his subordinate was about to commit the act or had done so.[129]

54. The Trial Chamber finds that under Article 7(3) command responsibility is responsibility for an omission. The commander is responsible for the failure to perform an act required by international law. This omission is culpable because international law imposes an affirmative duty on superiors to prevent and punish crimes committed by their subordinates. Thus "for the acts of his subordinates" as generally referred to in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal does not mean that the commander shares the same responsibility as the subordinates who committed the crimes, but rather that because of[130] the crimes committed by his subordinates, the commander should bear responsibility for his failure to act. The imposition of responsibility upon a commander for breach of his duty is to be weighed against the crimes of his subordinates; a commander is responsible not as though he had committed the crime himself, but his responsibility is considered in proportion to the gravity of the offences committed. The Trial Chamber considers that this is still in keeping with the logic of the weight which international humanitarian law places on protection values.

3. The Elements of Command Responsibility

55. The principle of individual criminal responsibility of commanders for failure to prevent or to punish crimes committed by their subordinates is an established principle of customary international law.[131] Article 7(3) of the Statute is applicable to all acts referred to in Articles 2 to 5 thereof and applies to both international and non-international armed conflicts.[132]

129 Hadžihasanović Appeals Chamber Decision, para. 32.

26 of the Indictment. The Appeals Chamber therefore orders that Ramush Haradinaj, Idriz Balaj, and Lahi Brahimaj be retried on these counts.[159]

51. The Appeals Chamber, however, will not construe the Prosecution's Appeal as a request to quash the convictions of Lahi Brahimaj on two of the above counts for which he was convicted, namely Counts 28 and 32. Lahi Brahimaj will therefore not be re-tried in relation to those two counts.

B. Alleged Errors Relating to the Murders of Sister "S", the Mother of Witness 4, and Sister "M" (Ground 2)

52. The Trial Chamber found that: (a) KLA soldiers murdered sister "S", the mother of Witness 4, and sister "M"; (b) these murders were closely related to the armed conflict in Kosovo/Kosova; and (c) the victims were not taking active part in hostilities at the time the murders were committed.[160] The Trial Chamber further found that Idriz Balaj's actions were "a link in the chain of events" leading to their murders, given that he "brought and kept them in the vicinity of the perpetrators".[161] However, the Trial Chamber, by majority, acquitted Idriz Balaj of aiding and abetting the commission of the murders of sister "S", the mother of Witness 4, and sister "M"[162] and accordingly found him not guilty under Count 14 of the Indictment.[163] The Trial Chamber reasoned that there was a lack of sufficient evidence regarding the events that occurred after the three women ended up in KLA custody and therefore that the Trial Chamber lacked "a sufficient basis to assess the relevance and importance of Idriz Balaj's acts". The Trial Chamber further reasoned that "there is no evidence that Idriz Balaj knowingly contributed to or facilitated the commission of any of these murders, especially as there is no evidence that Idriz Balaj was aware at the time that these murders were or would be committed."[164]

53. The Prosecution challenges this verdict, arguing that the Trial Chamber erred when it held that the mens rea and actus reus requirements of aiding and abetting were not satisfied.[165]

54. In relation to the mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting, the Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber erred by applying an incorrect legal standard when it concluded that this requirement was not established.[166] The Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber required it to prove that Idriz Balaj was "aware [...] of a certainty" that the principal crime would be committed, when it should have only required a showing that Idriz Balaj was aware of a probability.[167] The Prosecution argues that this awareness of a probability test was confirmed by the ICTR Appeals Chamber in the Ndindabahizi case.[168] It submits that, because the mens rea required for planning, instigating, and ordering liability is "awareness of a substantial likelihood" and because aiding and abetting liability is not more serious than these other forms of liability, it would not make sense to "require a higher mens rea for aiding and abetting".[169] Moreover, the Prosecution argues that the awareness of a probability test must logically be the "test for both elements of the mens rea for aiding and abetting: awareness regarding the occurrence of the crime and awareness regarding the assisting conduct."[170] Finally, the Prosecution avers that, "[h]ad the Trial Chamber used the correct awareness of a probability standard, it would have concluded that [Idriz] Balaj had the required mens rea for aiding and abetting."[171]

55. In support of its argument, the Prosecution points to evidence that Idriz Balaj, as head of the Black Eagles, must have been aware that the Black Eagles and the KLA generally had a "reputation for violence."[172] In particular, the Prosecution argues that Idriz Balaj, a person with authority in the KLA, was involved in harassing the family about its connections to the Serbian police.[173] The Prosecution further argues that "[m]urder was a considered option for [Idriz] Balaj", as demonstrated by the fact that he had threatened to kill sister "S" if she did not kill someone else and that another KLA soldier told the mother of Witness 4 that she would be killed if she attempted to travel.[174] Finally, the Prosecution points to evidence that it describes as demonstrating that Idriz Balaj was aware of the vulnerability of the victims, given that he was in command of the KLA soldiers who targeted the family at night, and that the victims were unarmed females who did not have a husband or father in the house.[175]

56. Idriz Balaj responds that the Prosecution "has failed to establish [that] the Trial Chamber applied an incorrect legal standard and [has] also failed to demonstrate beyond a reasonable doubt that the evidence proved Mr. Balaj had the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting."[176] He argues that the Trial Chamber applied the correct legal standard of "knowledge or awareness that his or her conduct assisted or facilitated the commission of the crime",[177] and properly concluded that this standard could not be met where there was no evidence that Idriz Balaj was aware that these murders were "even contemplated" at the time that he acted.[178]

57. The Appeals Chamber notes that, in relation to the mens rea element of aiding and abetting, the Trial Chamber articulated the legal standard as follows:

> The aider and abettor must have knowledge that his or her acts assist in the commission of the crime of the principal perpetrator. The aider and abettor must also be aware of the principal perpetrator's criminal acts, although not their legal characterization, and his or her criminal state of mind. The aider and abettor does not, however, need to know either the precise crime that was intended or the one that was actually committed; it is sufficient that he or she be aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, if one of those crimes is in fact committed.[179]

The Appeals Chamber further notes that the Trial Chamber, by majority, found that "there is no evidence that Idriz Balaj knowingly contributed to or facilitated the commission of any of these murders, especially as there is no evidence that Idriz Balaj was aware at that time that these murders were or would be committed."[180]

58. The Appeals Chamber considers it firmly established that, to satisfy the mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting, "[i]t must be shown that the aider and abettor knew that his own acts assisted the commission of that specific crime by the principal" (for example, murder, extermination, rape, torture)[181] and that the aider and abettor was "aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal".[182] Where the mens rea of the principal perpetrator is an element of the principal crime, the aider and abettor need not share the intent of the principal perpetrator,[183] but he or she must be aware of the intent of the principal perpetrator.[184] Mens rea can be established if the aider and abettor is not certain which of a number of crimes will ultimately be committed.[185] In this regard, where an accused "is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is in fact committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abettor."[186] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber correctly set out the legal standard for the mens rea of aiding and abetting.[187]

59. Furthermore, the Appeals Chamber can identify no error on the part of the Trial Chamber in its application of the legal standard for the mens rea of aiding and abetting.[188] The requirement of knowledge that a crime would be committed by the principal perpetrator is in line with the jurisprudence of the Tribunal as set forth above. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber did not reach its conclusion because Idriz Balaj "lacked certainty" that a crime would be committed but rather because it found that there was no evidence at all to establish that he was aware to any standard that by his actions he was assisting in the commission of a crime against the sisters.[189]

60. The Appeals Chamber considers that the evidence referred to by the Prosecution, at best, shows that Idriz Balaj put vulnerable women in contact with KLA soldiers who had a reputation for violence. The Prosecution does not point to any evidence as to what happened to the women between the time that they were last seen alive and the time that they were killed, in particular which KLA soldiers killed them or under what circumstances they were killed. As the Trial Chamber correctly noted, none of the evidence shows that Idriz Balaj was aware that a crime would be committed against the women at the relevant time.[190]

61. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber did not err in finding that Idriz Balaj lacked the requisite mens rea for aiding and abetting the murder of sister "S", sister "M", and the mother of Witness 4. In view of this conclusion, the Appeals Chamber will not consider the Prosecution's contention in relation to the actus reus requirement.

62. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber dismisses this ground of appeal and the Trial Chamber's acquittal of Idriz Balaj for Count 14 stands.

handed over to the relatives and the commission issued a death certificate.[920] Body R-17 was wearing a blue dress with purple and white patterns over a hand-knitted vest.[921] Body R-17 was a female between 55 and 65 years old and between 156 and 161 centimetres tall.[922] The autopsy revealed a hand-gun bullet entry and exit wound on the left half of the pelvic bone, which, if inflicted in life, could have caused a haemorrhage and led to death.[923] On 19 September 1998, Vera Kovačević identified the body as Darinka Kovać (born Vujošević), based on clothing, the ossification of the spinal column and signs of a chronic, degenerative bone disease suffered in life, which caused severe ossification of the spinal column.[924] Vera Kovačević told the team that Vukosava Marković and her sister Darinka Kovać went missing on 21 April 1998.[925] Bodies R-10 and R-17 were handed over to the relatives and a death certificate was issued.[926] The witness did not take a DNA sample from R-17, because of the specific nature of the traditional identification.[927]

196. As referred to above, the Trial Chamber has heard hearsay evidence from Vera Kovačević that Vukosava Marković and Darinka Kovać went missing on 21 April 1998. In September 1998, two sets of remains were identified by traditional means as belonging to these two women. Both sets of remains had been found near the concrete wall at the Radonjić/Radoniq canal. In addition to general physical characteristics, the identification of Vukosava Marković was based in part on traces of bone injuries found on the remains that matched injuries sustained in life in a car crash. Likewise, in addition to general physical characteristics, the identification of Darinka Kovać was based in part on the symptoms of a bone disease, present in the remains, that she had suffered in life. The identification further considered a set of upper dentures found with the remains, that Darinka Kovać was known to wear. Also, for both sets of remains, Vera Kovačević identified pieces of clothing as ones that she had made herself. There are some discrepancies between the accounts of Vera Kovačević and Dušan Dunjić, concerning the identification of the clothing of Vukosava Marković. Although the accounts differ, they are not necessarily contradictory and certain discrepancies concern ambiguous details such as the exact colour of clothing. Therefore, the Trial Chamber does not consider these discrepancies significant and notes that the identification of clothing was only one of the factors considered in the identification of the remains. As the remains could not be retrieved, they could not have been identified by DNA analysis. The Trial Chamber has heard evidence of traditional identification of other sets of remains which was later contradicted by DNA analysis. Nevertheless, considering the strong grounds for the traditional identification and the fact that the two sets of remains were discovered in close proximity to each other, the Trial Chamber finds that the remains labelled R-10 belong to Vukosava Marković, and the remains labelled R-17 belong to Darinka Kovać. The forensic medical evidence suggests that Vukosava Marković and Darinka Kovać were murdered. In section 6.1, above, the Trial Chamber has explained that the fact that a body was found in the Radonjić/Radoniq canal area is not in itself conclusive as to who committed the killing or with which group, if any, the perpetrator was affiliated. The Trial Chamber has not received any evidence about either of the women being in KLA custody. By late April 1998, Vukosava Marković and Darinka Kovać were among the last remaining Serbs in the village of Gornji Ratiš/Ratishë ë Eperm, which had fallen under KLA control on or around 21 April 1998. Further, Miloica Vlahović testified that she had heard from a man named Muhamet that Vukosava Marković and Darinka Kovać were killed in July 1998. Miloica Vlahović did not clarify the basis of Muhamet's information. Thus, the evidence is unsourced, and possibly multiple hearsay. Even if the two women went missing in KLA controlled territory and were among the last Serbs remaining in their village in late April 1998, this fact alone could not reasonably exclude the possibility that other forces or persons, unaffiliated with the KLA, committed the killing.

197. For these reasons, even assuming that Vukosava Marković and Darinka Kovać were murdered, the Trial Chamber finds that the evidence before it does not allow for a conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt as to who committed the murders of the two women, with which group, if any, the perpetrator was affiliated, or whether the murders occurred in KLA custody. The Trial Chamber has heard no evidence concerning Idriz Balaj's involvement in the death of either of the two women. The Trial Chamber concludes that all three Accused should be acquitted of this charge.

Đakovica/Gjakovë municipality.[1547] In September 1998, officials at the MUP in Đakovica/Gjakovë told the witness that they had arrested Lëk and Krist Pervorfi, two KLA members from Dujak/Dujakë who had abducted Zdravko Radunović in Dujak/Dujakë.[1548] The officials further informed the witness that the two men had handed Zdravko Radunović over to their commander named "Vuk", and that Zdravko Radunović had subsequently been taken to Glođane/Gllogjan, in Dečani/Deçan municipality, where Ramush Haradinaj was in charge.[1549] In January 1999, the MUP in Peć/Pejë told the witness that Lëk and Krist Pervorfi had stated that Zdravko Radunović had been killed and that his remains had had been disposed of at Lake Radonjić/Radoniq.[1550]

316. The Trial Chamber has also received forensic medical evidence with regard to Zdravko Radunović (remains labelled "R-8/1"). ICMP DNA analysis identified the remains labelled R-8/1 as those of Zdravko Radunović.[1551] An autopsy conducted on 5 December 2003 described totally skeletonized, disarticulated and largely incomplete human remains.[1552] The cause of death could not be ascertained.[1553] Dušan Dunjić[1554] testified that remains R-8/1 were incomplete, with many bones missing.[1555] The remains had mistakenly been placed in the same body bag as body R-8.[1556] The part of the skull that was found showed a trace of a bullet exit wound.[1557]

317. As referred to above, the Trial Chamber received direct evidence that Zdravko Radunović was last seen on the morning of 16 July 1998 when he left for work, and last heard from during a telephone conversation at 1:30 p.m. on the same day, when he indicated that he was leaving Đakovica/Gjakovë for Dobrić/Dobriq. The MUP subsequently informed Witness 68 that Zdravko Radunović was abducted by KLA soldiers in Dujak/Dujakë, transferred to Glođane/Gllogjan, killed, and disposed of at Lake Radonjić/Radoniq. This hearsay account of Witness 68 is the only evidence before the Trial Chamber about the alleged abduction and subsequent events. It does not spell out the circumstances under which the MUP learned about the abduction. Moreover, it is multiple hearsay and Witness 68 does not specify her source. For these reasons the Trial Chamber will not rely on Witness 68's hearsay account of the alleged abduction and subsequent events. In September 1998, Zdravko Radunović's body was found at the Radonjić/Radoniq canal.

318. While at one autopsy, conducted on 5 December 2003, the cause of death of Zdravko Radunović could not be ascertained, Dunjić's autopsy report in 1998 noticed a trace of a bullet exit wound on the part of the skull that was found. Even assuming that Zdravko Radunović was murdered, KLA involvement has to be ascertained to prove the charges of this Count. In section 6.1, above, the Trial Chamber has explained that the fact that a body was found in the Radonjić/Radoniq canal area is not in itself conclusive as to who committed the killing or with which group, if any, the perpetrator was affiliated. The fact that Zdravko Radunović went to visit relatives in Dobrić/Dobriq, because they were under KLA attack a few days before, cannot establish a sufficient link between his disappearance and the KLA. As explained above, the Trial Chamber will not rely on Witness 68's hearsay account on the alleged abduction and subsequent events. For these reasons, the Trial Chamber finds that the evidence before it does not allow for a conclusion beyond a reasonable doubt as to who committed the murder, with which group, if any, the perpetrator was affiliated, or whether the murder occurred in KLA custody. The Trial Chamber therefore concludes that all three Accused should be acquitted of this charge.

6.12.8 Murder of Velizar Stošić

319. All three Accused are charged, as participants in a joint criminal enterprise, with the murder of Velizar Stošić in violation of the laws or customs of war. The Trial Chamber has heard relevant evidence from Miomir Stošić, as well as forensic medical evidence.

26. However, as indicated above, the Trial Chamber also decided against the right of the prosecution to be heard on the substantive question of whether its evidence was insufficient to sustain a conviction. The Trial Chamber's decision was rendered orally on 19 October 1999, and then put in writing on 14 December 1999. Taking the two together, it is clear that the Trial Chamber considered that, where it was acting proprio motu, the prosecution had no right to be heard at all; such a right was not accorded by the Rules and could not be based upon the principle audi alteram partem.[52] Was this decision correct?

27. In the view of the Appeals Chamber, the fact that a Trial Chamber has a right to decide proprio motu entitles it to make a decision whether or not invited to do so by a party; but the fact that it can do so does not relieve it of the normal duty of a judicial body first to hear a party whose rights can be affected by the decision to be made.[53] Failure to hear a party against whom the Trial Chamber is provisionally inclined is not consistent with the requirement to hold a fair trial.[54] The Rules must be read on this basis, that is to say, that they include a right of the parties to be heard in accordance with the judicial character of the Trial Chamber. The availability of this right to the prosecution and its exercise of the right can be of importance to the making of a correct decision by the Trial Chamber: the latter could benefit in substantial ways from the analysis of the evidence made by the prosecution and from its argument on the applicable law.[55]

28. The prosecution therefore had a right to be heard on the question of whether the evidence was sufficient to sustain a conviction;[56] it was denied that right. Counsel for the respondent rightly concedes this.[57]

29. The prosecution's first ground of appeal succeeds. The question of remedy is discussed under the prosecution's third ground of appeal.

III. APPLICABLE LAW

A. Planning, instigating and ordering pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute

25. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber convicted Kordić for planning, instigating, and ordering crimes pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute.[18] The Trial Chamber's legal definitions of these modes of responsibility have not been appealed by any of the Parties. However, the Appeals Chamber deems it necessary to set out and clarify the applicable law in relation to these modes of responsibility insofar as it is necessary for its own decision.

26. The actus reus of "planning" requires that one or more persons design the criminal conduct constituting one or more statutory crimes that are later perpetrated.[19] It is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct.

27. The actus reus of "instigating" means to prompt another person to commit an offence.[20] While it is not necessary to prove that the crime would not have been perpetrated without the involvement of the accused, it is sufficient to demonstrate that the instigation was a factor substantially contributing to the conduct of another person committing the crime.[21]

28. The actus reus of "ordering" means that a person in a position of authority instructs another person to commit an offence.[22] A formal superior-subordinate relationship between the accused and the perpetrator is not required.[23]

29. The mens rea for these modes of responsibility is established if the perpetrator acted with direct intent in relation to his own planning, instigating, or ordering.

30. In addition, the Appeals Chamber has held that a standard of mens rea that is lower than direct intent may apply in relation to ordering under Article 7(1) of the Statute. The Appeals Chamber held that a person who orders an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that order, has the requisite mens rea for establishing responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute pursuant to ordering. Ordering with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting that crime.[24]

[22] Trial Judgement, para. 388.
[23] Trial Judgement, para. 388.

31. The Appeals Chamber similarly holds that in relation to "planning", a person who plans an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that plan, has the requisite mens rea for establishing responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute pursuant to planning. Planning with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting that crime.

32. With respect to "instigating", a person who instigates another person to commit an act or omission with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that instigation, has the requisite mens rea for establishing responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute pursuant to instigating. Instigating with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting that crime.

B. The responsibility under Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) of the Statute

33. In the Aleksovski Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber observed that the accused's "superior responsibility as a warden seriously aggravated [his] offences"[25] in relation to those offences of which he was convicted for his direct participation.[26] While the finding of superior responsibility in that case resulted in an aggravation of sentence, there was no entry of conviction under both heads of responsibility in relation to the count in question. In the Čelebići Appeal Judgement, the Appeals Chamber stated:

> Where criminal responsibility for an offence is alleged under one count pursuant to both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3), and where the Trial Chamber finds that both direct responsibility and responsibility as a superior are proved, even though only one conviction is entered, the Trial Chamber must take into account the fact that both types of responsibility were proved in its consideration of sentence. This may most appropriately be considered in terms of imposing punishment on the accused for two separate offences encompassed in the one count. Alternatively, it may be considered in terms of the direct participation aggravating the Article 7(3) responsibility (as discussed above) or the accused's seniority or position of authority aggravating his direct responsibility under Article 7(1).[27]

34. The provisions of Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) of the Statute connote distinct categories of criminal responsibility. However, the Appeals Chamber considers that, in relation to a particular count, it is not appropriate to convict under both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) of the Statute.[28] Where both Article 7(1) and Article 7(3) responsibility are alleged under the same count, and where the legal requirements pertaining to both of these heads of responsibility are met, a Trial Chamber

4. Elements of the crimes of unlawful attack against civilians and civilian objects under treaty law

(a) Attack

47. The term attack is defined in Article 49 of Additional Protocol I as "acts of violence against the adversary, whether in offence or in defence".[49] Therefore, in determining whether an unlawful attack on civilians occurred, the issue of who first made use of force is irrelevant.

(b) Prohibited attacks

48. The civilian population as such shall not be the object of attack.[50] This fundamental principle of international customary law is specified in Articles 51(2), and 51(3) of Additional Protocol I. Article 50(1) of Additional Protocol I states that

> [a] civilian is any person who does not belong to one of the categories of persons referred to in Article 4A(1), (2), (3) and (6) of the Third Geneva Convention and in Article 43 of this Protocol. In case of doubt whether a person is a civilian, that person shall be considered to be a civilian.

The Appeals Chamber notes that the imperative "in case of doubt" is limited to the expected conduct of a member of the military. However, when the latter's criminal responsibility is at issue, the burden of proof as to whether a person is a civilian rests on the Prosecution.[51]

49. Article 4A(1), (2), (3) and (6) of Geneva Convention III reads:

> (1) Members of the armed forces of a Party to the conflict, as well as members of militias or volunteer corps forming part of such armed forces.
>
> (2) Members of other militias and members of other volunteer corps, including those of organized resistance movements, belonging to a Party to the conflict and operating in or outside their own territory, even if this territory is occupied, provided that such militias or volunteer corps, including such organized resistance movements, fulfil the following conditions:
> (a) that of being commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates ;
> (b) that of having a fixed distinctive sign recognizable at a distance;
> (c) that of carrying arms openly;
> (d) that of conducting their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war.
>
> (3) Members of regular armed forces who profess allegiance to a government or an authority not recognized by the Detaining Power.
>
> (6) Inhabitants of a non-occupied territory, who on the approach of the enemy spontaneously take up arms to resist the invading forces, without having had time to form themselves into regular armed units, provided they carry arms openly and respect the laws and customs of war.

50. Article 43 of Additional Protocol I sets out a definition of armed forces covering the different categories of the above-mentioned Article 4 of Geneva Convention III.[52] Read together, [49] This definition applies to the crime of unlawful attacks against civilian objects as well.

[50] See in particular, G.A. Res. 2444 and 2675.

Articles 43 and 50 of Additional Protocol I and Article 4A of Geneva Convention III establish that members of armed forces (other than medical personnel and chaplains) and members of militias or volunteer corps forming part of such armed forces are "combatants" and cannot claim civilian status. Neither can members of organized resistance groups, provided that they are commanded by a person responsible for his subordinates, that they have a fixed distinctive sign recognizable at a distance, that they carry arms openly, and that they conduct their operations in accordance with the laws and customs of war. Furthermore, according to Article 51(3) of Additional Protocol I, civilians are protected against attacks, unless and for the time they take part directly in hostilities. The civilian population comprises all persons who are civilians and the presence within the civilian population of individuals who do not come within the definition of civilians does not deprive the population of its civilian character.

51. Particular attention has to be paid to the situation of members of a Territorial Defence (TO) and as to whether they are to be considered as combatants at all times during the conflict or only when they directly take part in hostilities, that is, when they participate in acts of war which by nature or purpose are likely to cause actual harm to the personnel and equipment of the enemy's armed forces. The Commentary on the Additional Protocols is instructive on this point and states:

> The Conference considered that all ambiguity should be removed and that it should be explicitly stated that all members of the armed forces (with the two above-mentioned exceptions [medical and religious personnel]) can participate directly in hostilities, i.e., attack and be attacked. The general distinction made in Article 3 of the Hague Regulations, when it provides that armed forces consist of combatants and non-combatants, is therefore no longer used. In fact, in any army there are numerous important categories of soldiers whose foremost or normal task has little to do with firing weapons. These include auxiliary services, administrative services, the military legal service and others. Whether they actually engage in firing weapons is not important. They are entitled to do so, which does not apply to either medical or religious personnel, despite their status as members of the armed forces, or to civilians, as they are not members of the armed forces. All members of the armed forces are combatants, and only members of the armed forces are combatants. This should therefore dispense with the concept of quasi-combatants, which has sometimes been used on the basis of activities related more or less directly with the war effort. Similarly, any concept of a part-time status, a semi-civilian, semi-military status, a soldier by night and peaceful citizen by day, also disappears. A civilian who is incorporated in an armed organization such as that mentioned in paragraph 1, becomes a member of the military and a combatant throughout the duration of the hostilities (or in any case, until he is permanently demobilized by the responsible command referred to in paragraph 1), whether or not he is in combat, or for the time being armed. If he is wounded, sick or shipwrecked, he is entitled to the protection of the First and Second Conventions (Article 44, paragraph 8), and, if he is captured, he is entitled to the protection of the Third Convention (Article 44, paragraph 1).[53]

In light of the above the Appeals Chamber considers that members of the armed forces resting in their homes in the area of the conflict, as well as members of the TO residing in their homes, remain combatants whether or not they are in combat, or for the time being armed.

[53] Commentary on the Additional Protocols, p. 515, para. 1677.

52. It is, however, accepted that attacks aimed at military objectives, including objects and combatants, may cause "collateral civilian damage". International customary law recognises that in the conduct of military operations during armed conflicts a distinction must be drawn at all times between persons actively taking part in the hostilities and civilian population and provides that

- the civilian populations as such shall not be the object of military operations, and

- every effort be made to spare the civilian populations from the ravages of war, and

- all necessary precautions should be taken to avoid injury, loss or damage to the civilian population.[54]

Nevertheless, international customary law recognises that this does not imply that collateral damage is unlawful per se.

53. Article 52(1) of Additional Protocol I prohibits explicitly attacks or reprisals on civilian objects. It defines civilian objects as "all objects which are not military objectives". Further, Article 52(1) defines military objectives as "limited to those objects which by their nature, location, purpose or use make an effective contribution to military action and whose total or partial destruction, capture or neutralization, in the circumstances ruling at the time, offers a definite military advantage". Moreover, Article 52(3) of Additional Protocol I provides that in case of doubt as to whether an object which is normally dedicated to civilian purposes, such as a place of worship, a house or other dwelling or a school, is being used to make an effective contribution to military action, it shall be presumed not to be so used. The Appeals Chamber notes that the imperative "in case of doubt" is limited to the expected conduct of a member of the military. However, when the latter's criminal responsibility is at issue, the burden of proof as to whether an object is a civilian one rests on the Prosecution.

54. The Appeals Chamber clarifies that the prohibition against attacking civilians and civilian objects would not be a crime when justified by military necessity. The prohibition against attacking civilians stems from a fundamental principle of international humanitarian law, the principle of distinction, which obliges warring parties to distinguish at all times between the civilian population and combatants, between civilian objects and military objectives and accordingly to direct military operations only against military objectives. Article 48 of Additional Protocol I enunciates the principle of distinction as a basic rule. In its Advisory Opinion on the Legality of Nuclear Weapons, the International Court of Justice ("ICJ") described the principle of distinction, along with the principle of protection of the civilian population, as "the cardinal principles contained in the texts constituting the fabric of humanitarian law" and stated that "States must never make civilians the object of attack."[55] As the ICJ held: "These fundamental rules are to be observed by all States whether or not they have ratified the conventions that contain them, because they constitute intransgressible principles of international customary law".[56]

(c) Is a particular result of the attack required?

55. The Trial Chamber stated that an element of the conviction for the crime of unlawful attack directed against civilians or civilian objects under Article 3 of the Statute is that the attacks must be shown to have caused deaths and/or serious bodily injuries or extensive damage to civilian objects.[57]

56. The Appeals Chamber notes that some uncertainty has arisen in the jurisprudence of the International Tribunal as to whether a perpetrator incurs criminal responsibility under the Statute for such unlawful attack prohibited under Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I, if the attacks result in non-serious civilian casualties or damage, or none at all.[58]

57. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber was correct to state that, at the times the acts of unlawful attack were committed in this case, they must be shown to have resulted in serious injury to body or health to incur criminal responsibility, for the reasons that follow.

(i) Preliminary considerations

58. The plain language of Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I states that "the civilian population as such, as well as individual civilians, shall not be the object of attack" and makes no reference to any requirement of a demonstration of actual injury for a finding of a breach under Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I. Likewise, Article 52(1) of Additional Protocol I merely provides without elaboration that "civilian objects shall not be the object of attack [...]." However, under Article 85(3) of Additional Protocol I, "making the civilian population or individual civilians the object of attack" becomes a grave breach if it results in death or serious injury to body or health.

(ii) State of customary international law during the Indictment period

[54] See in particular G.A. Res. 2675.
[55] Nuclear Weapons Case, para. 78. The International Court of Justice further asserted that "these fundamental rules are to be observed by all States whether or not they have ratified the conventions that contain them, because they constitute intransgressible principles of international customary law".
[56] Nuclear Weapons Case, para. 78.
[57] Trial Judgement, para. 328.
[58] Cf. Galić Trial Judgement, para. 43; Blaškić Trial Judgement, para. 180. In the Jokić Sentencing Judgement, the Trial Chamber held that attacks directed against cultural property are as such, regardless of the result, prohibited under Additional Protocols I and II, para. 50.

59. It is well-established that when promulgated, the prohibition in Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I of attacks on civilians and civilian objects reflected the current status of customary international law[59] embodying the customary international law principle of protection of civilians in situations of conflict.[60] That principle is rooted in Article 25 of the Hague Regulations, which states that "the attack or bombardment, by whatever means, of towns, villages, dwellings, or buildings which are undefended is prohibited."[61] In Resolution 2444 (1968), the General Assembly unanimously stated that "it is prohibited to launch attacks against the civilian populations as such" and that all governmental and other authorities responsible for action in armed conflicts are to observe this rule.[62] In 1970, the General Assembly re-affirmed this fundamental principle stating that "civilian populations as such should not be the object of military operations."[63] The Appeals Chamber notes that in none of these declarations of customary international law reflected in Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I is the prohibition of attacks on civilians and civilian objects explicitly combined with statements regarding a finding of actual injury to civilians or damage to civilian objects.

60. Similarly, an examination of international instruments prior to Additional Protocol I, shows that neither the Nuremberg Charter (1945),[64] the Tokyo Charter (1946),[65] the Control Council Law No. 10 (1945),[66] nor the Nuremberg Principles (1950)[67] explicitly referred to unlawful attack on civilians or civilian objects as war crimes, let alone made any reference to a result requirement; instead, they generally referred to violations of the laws or customs of war as found in the Hague Conventions as a punishable war crime.

61. Furthermore, the ILC's Draft Code of Offences against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1954) referred generally to acts in violation of the laws or customs of war.[68] Its successor, the Draft Code of Crimes against the Peace and Security of Mankind (1991)[69] was slightly more explicit, noting that "exceptionally serious war crimes" include wilful attacks on property of exceptional religious, historical or cultural value without making reference to a result requirement.[70]

However, nothing was said with regard to unlawful attack on civilians or other civilian objects or, for that matter, a result requirement.

62. Thus, it could be argued that the drafters of Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I intended that one did not have to show a particular result in order for a breach (not a grave breach) to be found, when considered in the context of other separate offences proscribed under Additional Protocol I such as wilful killing, causing serious bodily injury, and wanton destruction. Such reading of Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I could no doubt be reconciled with the underlying humanitarian purpose of Geneva Convention IV, which is to ensure the protection of civilians when and wherever possible. In that case, punishment of an unlawful attack on civilians or civilian objects itself, regardless of the result, would be based on the concrete endangerment of civilian life and/or property, as the perpetrator can no longer control the result of an unlawful attack once launched; thus the mere undertaking of such an in concreto or in abstracto extremely dangerous attack would be penalized for good reasons.

63. However, the Appeals Chamber notes that the omission of a result element for a violation of Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I appears to be deliberate in light of the language later found in Article 85 of Additional Protocol I, which highlights the elements required where a breach of Article 51(2) of Additional Protocol I amounts to another category of breach labelled a "grave breach". Article 85(3)(a) of Additional Protocol I states in relevant part, that "acts shall be regarded as grave breaches of this Protocol, when committed wilfully, in violation of the relevant provisions of this Protocol, and causing death or serious injury to body or health: making the civilian population or individual civilians the object of attack." Thus, under Article 85(3)(a) of Additional Protocol I, the drafters expressly included the requirement of a showing of actual injury as an element of the crime of "making the civilian population or individual civilians the object of attack" when considering it to be a grave breach and not merely "a breach" of Additional Protocol I. Similarly, under Article 85(4)(d) of Additional Protocol I, deliberate attacks on civilian objects such as historic monuments, works of art and places of worship are considered to be grave breaches of the Additional Protocol only insofar as the attack results in extensive destruction.

64. The Appeals Chamber also takes into consideration Article 85(1) of Additional Protocol I which refers to Article 146 of Geneva Convention IV, the provision that distinguishes breaches from grave breaches, requiring that grave breaches must be repressed, which implies the obligation to enact legislation laying down effective penal sanctions for perpetrators of such breaches.[71] For other than grave breaches of Geneva Convention IV or Additional Protocol I, the Contracting Parties merely undertake to "suppress" them, meaning that "such conduct can and should lead to administrative, disciplinary or even penal sanctions – in accordance with the general principle that every punishment should be proportional to the severity of the breach".[72] In light of the option given to Contracting Parties as to the means for suppressing "other" breaches of Additional Protocol I, the Appeals Chamber finds that it is not clear from the plain language of Additional Protocol I whether violations of Articles 51 and 52 would constitute crimes under international humanitarian law.

65. For the reasons set out above, the Appeals Chamber finds that attacks in violation of Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I are clearly unlawful even without causing serious harm as provided for in Article 85 of Additional Protocol I. Under the language of these articles, their criminalisation as a matter of international law depends on the practice of the Contracting States under Article 85 of Additional Protocol I.

66. The Appeals Chamber finds that at the time the unlawful attack occurred in this case, there was no basis for finding that, as a matter of customary international law, State practice or opinio iuris translated the prohibitions under Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I into international crimes, such that unlawful attacks were largely penalized regardless of the showing of a serious result. State practice was not settled as some required the showing of serious injury, death or damage as a result under their national penal legislation, while others did not.[73]

(iii) Conclusion

67. For the above-mentioned reasons, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that at the relevant time, a violation of Articles 51 and 52 of Additional Protocol I incurred individual criminal responsibility under Article 3 of the Statute without causing death, serious injury to body or health, or results listed in Article 3 of the Statute, or being of the same gravity. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber will consider in the Judgement that criminal responsibility for unlawful attack on civilians or civilian objects does require the proof of such a result emanating from an unlawful attack.

68. For this reason, the Appeals Chamber will adequately consider whether the attacks on civilians and civilian objects caused death, serious injury, or any other criminal act listed in Article 3 of the Statute, or any consequence being of the same gravity, to civilians.

5. Unlawful confinement of civilians

69. As the Appeals Chamber noted in Čelebići, the offence of unlawful confinement of a civilian, a grave breach of the Geneva Conventions which is recognised under Article 2(g) of the Statute, is not further defined in the Statute, but clear guidance can be found in the provisions of Geneva Convention IV.[74] The confinement of civilians during armed conflict may be permissible in limited cases, but will be unlawful if the detaining party does not comply with the provisions of Article 42 of Geneva Convention IV, which states:

District Court of Croatia, 26 May 1997, K. 15/95 (unpublished) (sentencing 39 soldiers and commanders, 27 of whom were sentenced in absentia to 5-20 years imprisonment under Art. 120 of the Basic Penal Code for unlawful attacks on civilians and civilian objects resulting in inter alia ill-treatment, killing, and destruction). See also the Kappler case, Military Court of Rome, 20 July 1948, Il Foro Italiano, 1949 (11), pp 160-168, aff'd by the Supreme Military Court, 25 October 1952 (available at <<http://www.difesa.it/NR/exeres/8A30B849-DBEF-4C29-820D-33ABBFD9B12D.htm>>, last visited in December 2004), and the Haas and Priebke case, Military Court of Appeal of Rome, 7 March 1998, (available at << http://www.difesa.it/NR/exeres/3F2713E5-EF43-494E-B294-EAD39B317AA2.htm>> , last visited in December 2004), aff'd by Court of Cassation, First Criminal Section, 16 November 1998 (available at <<http://www.difesa.it/NR/exeres/B3D0BAC9-9D01-4679-8BCF-A6CE37AF4E48.htm>>, last visited in December 2004).

Further evidence of the unsettled nature of State opinio juris and practice as to whether or not there is a result element required for the prosecution of the crimes of unlawful attack on civilians and civilian objects (at the time the crimes were committed in this case) is evidenced by the controversial negotiations as late as 1999 by State delegates to the Working Group on the Elements of Crimes for the Rome Statute for the International Criminal Court (see PCNICC/1999/DP.4/Add.2; PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.12; PCNICC/1999/DP.20; and PCNICC/1999/WGEC/DP.9). Initially, the United States and Japan proposed a result element for the crime of unlawful attack on civilians, while Switzerland and Spain proposed no such requirement. Following the ensuing debates, the State delegates eventually unanimously agreed that no result element is required for a finding of unlawful attack on civilians under Art. 8(2)(b)(i) of the Rome Statute. Similarly, with regard to the crime of unlawful attacks on civilian objects, the Japanese delegation initially proposed a requirement of resulting damage as an element. However, the United States and Switzerland did not propose such an element. In the end, the Working Group unanimously agreed that there should be no resulting damage requirement under Art. 8(2)(b)(ii) of the Rome Statute for the crime of unlawful attacks on civilian objects (see Lee, Roy S., ed., The International Criminal Court, (Transnational Publishers, 2001), pp 140-144). The Appeals Chamber considers that these unanimous agreements on the elements for the crimes of unlawful attack on civilians and civilian objects by the State delegates to the 1999 Preparatory Commission for the ICC may be indicative of a progressive development of international law on this issue.

trial.[261] The basis of Čerkez's argument is that there was no reason in this case to depart from the procedural practice of the International Tribunal, which would have allowed Čerkez more time.[262]

188. Regarding the general allegations of the Prosecution's late and new disclosure of evidence, the Prosecution submits that where this occurred, it was not through fault of the Prosecution, but due to objective reasons[263], and that where Čerkez sought access to materials not subject to the disclosure obligations of the Prosecution, he could have employed the solution available to him under Rule 66(B) but decided not to do so.[264] As to the "Zagreb Materials", the Prosecution explained at trial the reasons for the late disclosure, stating that they had only recently been received from the Republic of Croatia, and had been provided to the defence as soon as possible.[265]

189. The Prosecution responds further that, as regards Čerkez's claim of an unfair trial for lack of time to prepare, Čerkez has failed to prove that the Trial Chamber erred in law in not granting him an extension of time.[266]

190. In a decision of 1 December 2000, the Trial Chamber considered the arguments of the parties regarding the admission of the Zagreb Materials. The Trial Chamber correctly stated the relevant test for the admission of new evidence[267], and proceeded to exclude a large number of exhibits from admissibility for various reasons, inter alia: (1) the document(s) had already been admitted; (2) the material had already been produced in other proceedings before the International Tribunal and therefore had been available to the Prosecution when it presented its case; (3) the material was not sufficiently significant to warrant admission at so late a stage of the proceedings; (4) the material was cumulative and did not add to the voluminous material already in evidence; or (5) the material was based on anonymous sources or hearsay statements that were incapable of then being tested by cross-examination. Furthermore, the probative value of some of the evidence was found to be so reduced that it is substantially outweighed by the need to ensure a fair trial; "to admit it at this stage of the proceedings would violate the accused's right to a fair trial" as the Defence would have had no opportunity to cross-examine witness.[268] The Trial Chamber voiced its disapproval of any conduct of the Prosecution threatening the defence's ability to prepare its case.[269] Yet, in considering its duty to ensure that a trial be fair and at the same time expeditious, the Trial Chamber declined to grant an adjournment and effectively refused to admit the majority of the evidence, thereby expressing that the interests of the defence could thus be safeguarded.

191. In connection with Čerkez's general allegations of the Prosecution's late and new disclosure of evidence, the Appeals Chamber does not find that the Prosecution disclosed evidence late so as to ambush the Accused. The Prosecution has amply demonstrated that circumstances beyond its control were at play in securing evidence from the Republic of Croatia.

192. The Appeals Chamber considers, however, that Rule 127(A) of the Rules requires the moving party to show good cause for an extension of time. Already in its decision of 11 September 2001, the Appeals Chamber considered Čerkez's motion and identified the misapprehension in this approach:

> It cannot be "good cause" for an extension of time to be granted to Čerkez to file his Respondent's Brief to the prosecution's Appellant's Brief simply because the prosecution has shown "good cause" for an extension of time to file its Respondent's Brief to the Appellant's Briefs filed by Čerkez and Kordić. That is to read into the right to equality of arms a right to equality of relief, even when the circumstances are quite different in each case and provide no basis whatsoever for granting equal relief.[270]

193. For this argument to succeed, Čerkez must prove that by not granting him an extension of time which would have enabled him to testify, the Trial Chamber committed an error of law. He has failed to do so. This argument is dismissed.

(b) Did alleged late and new disclosure preclude Čerkez from preparing his final trial brief?

194. Čerkez submits that the Trial Chamber erred by not allowing him the delay he requested in order to prepare his Final Trial Brief properly.[271] According to Čerkez, the Trial Chamber's decision[272] to deny an extension of time to prepare his Final Trial Brief or testimony was "flagrantly in contrario to the present practice of the Tribunal", especially in the context of the Prosecution's "almost continuous disclosure process".[273] Because his right to an expeditious trial is secondary to his right to adequate time, and in light of new evidence constantly being disclosed by the Prosecution, Čerkez argues that he was deprived adequate time and facilities for the preparation of his Final Trial Brief.

Prosecution highlights the Trial Chamber's conclusion at paragraph 630 of the Trial Judgement that there was indeed "confirmation" of Witness AT's testimony[416] and that Kordić's submission implying that only direct evidence actually placing Kordić at the meetings can constitute corroboration of Witness AT's testimony is simply incorrect.[417]

273. As to Kordić's interpretation of the 18 September 2000 Decision, the Prosecution avers that corroborative evidence is not limited to that which mirrors the primary testimony specifically; rather, it is evidence which tends to convince the trier of fact that a witness is telling the truth.[418]

274. The Appeals Chamber has consistently held that the corroboration of evidence is not a legal requirement, but rather concerns the weight to be attached to evidence.[419] In Kupreškić et al., the Appeals Chamber emphasized that a Trial Chamber is required to provide a fully reasoned opinion, and that where a finding of guilt was made in a case on the basis of identification evidence given by a single witness under difficult circumstances, the Trial Chamber must be especially rigorous in the discharge of that obligation.[420] A Trial Chamber may thus convict an accused on the basis of a single witness, although such evidence must be assessed with the appropriate caution, and care must be taken to guard against the exercise of an underlying motive on the part of the witness. Any appeal based on the absence of corroboration must therefore necessarily be against the weight attached by a Trial Chamber to the evidence in question.

275. As regards the decision of 18 September 2000, the Appeals Chamber recalls that in Kupreškić et al., it held that "[i]t follows from the jurisprudence of the Appeals Chambers of both the ICTY and ICTR that the testimony of a single witness, even as to a material fact, may be accepted without the need for corroboration."[421]

276. It is incorrect to suggest that circumstantial evidence cannot be regarded as corroborative. In this case, the Trial Chamber specifically determined to what extent Witness AT's testimony was confirmed by other evidence.[422] The Appeals Chamber notes that Witness AT's testimony was given live and under solemn declaration, and was subject to cross-examination.

was based on his role in a campaign and not on his involvement in the day-to-day operations of the attacks.[1399]

973. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber did not make an explicit finding that Kordić had the requisite mens rea. The Trial Chamber only found "that in those cases where Kordić participated in the HVO attacks, he intended to commit the crimes associated with them and did so. His role was a political leader and his responsibility under Article 7(1) was to plan, instigate and order the crimes."[1400]

974. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber held in relation to persecutions that > there was a campaign of persecution throughout the Indictment period in Central Bosnia (and beyond) aimed at the Bosnian Muslims. This campaign was led by the HDZ-BiH and conducted through the instruments of the HZ H-B and the HVO and orchestrated from Zagreb.[1401]

The Appeals Chamber concluded that there was persecutions in Busovača in January 1993, in the Lašva Valley in April 1993, and in Kiseljak in June 1993, and deemed it not to be necessary to identify the main orchestrators of this campaign. Only the responsibility of Kordić is relevant for the Appeals Chamber. It considers that following the meeting on 15 April 1993, a general plan existed to expel the Muslim civilians and to destroy civilian houses, a plan which had no military justification, but was aimed at the civilian population.

975. At the meeting on 15 April 1993, the order to attack at 05:30 a.m. and the order that "all Muslim men of military age were to be killed while the civilians were not to be killed, but expelled and the houses set on fire" were discussed, and the Trial Chamber found at paragraph 631 of the Trial Judgement that Kordić was present at the meeting of politicians which authorised the 16 April 1993 attack; that he thus participated as the senior regional politician in the planning of the military operation and attack against Ahmići (and other Lašva Valley villages), an operation which was aimed at "cleansing" these areas of Muslims.

976. The Appeals Chamber considers that this general plan included the whole of the Lašva Valley and that the crimes explicitly discussed were to kill military aged men, expel civilians, and destroy houses. For these crimes Kordić had direct intent. Kordić approved the general plan knowing that these crimes would be committed, and with the awareness of the substantial likelihood that other crimes such as killings of civilians, unlawful detention of civilians, and plunder would be committed in the execution of this general plan.[1402] Planning with such awareness has to be regarded as accepting these crimes.

[1399] Prosecution Response, paras 5.24-5.26.
[1400] Trial Judgement, para. 834.

5. Kiseljak municipality

(a) April 1993

977. Kordić argues that he was not convicted in relation to Stupni Do because the Trial Chamber concluded that he did not have control of Kiseljak, and since he did not have control in October 1993 over a specific limited operation, he could not have had control over the municipality during the April attack and the June offensives. He also relies on the testimony of Brigadier Wingfield-Heyes that Kiseljak was cut off from the Lašva Valley.

978. The Prosecution responds that there is a clear difference with the Stupni Do case: Kordić's conviction for the attacks on Kiseljak arose from his active participation in the common design to cleanse the Lašva Valley of Muslims.[1403]

979. The Appeals Chamber finds that the fact that Kordić was acquitted for Stupni Do does not affect his conviction for the attacks in Kiseljak municipality in April 1993 and dismisses Kordić's arguments in this part.

980. With regard to the April 1993 attacks in Kiseljak municipality, the Trial Chamber found that "Blaškić would not have launched the attacks without political approval which the Trial Chamber accepts meant the approval of the local leadership in the person of Dario Kordić. The clear inference is that the latter was thus associated with the giving of orders to attack the villages, including Rotilj."[1404]

981. The Appeals Chamber is of the view that the Trial Chamber's presumption that the reference to the fact that "we have informed the leadership of the HZ H-B of everything"[1405] leads to the conclusion that Kordić must have approved the order, is in itself insufficient for a reasonable trier of fact to find that Kordić is criminally responsible. Kordić's responsibility for the crimes committed in Kiseljak municipality in connection with the HVO military attack on 18 April 1993 emanates from the Trial Chamber finding that Kordić was at the meeting of politicians which authorised the 16 April 1993 attacks, and that he thus participated as the senior regional politician in

406. In other words, not only persons in formal positions of command but also persons found to be "effectively" in command of more informal structures, with the power to prevent and punish the commission of crimes of persons in fact under their control, may be held criminally responsible on the basis of their superior authority.[568] In the absence of a formal appointment, it is the actual exercise of authority which is fundamental for the purpose of incurring criminal responsibility,[569] and in particular a showing of effective control:

> Effective control has been accepted, including in the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, as a standard for the purposes of determining superior responsibility. ... The showing of effective control is required in cases involving both de jure and de facto superiors.[570]

Moreover, the Appeals Chamber defined effective control as "a material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct, however that control is exercised".[571]

407. Analysing "command" as referring to "powers that attach to a military superior", and control as having a "wider meaning", which also includes the reference to the "powers wielded by civilian leaders",[572] the Appeals Chamber held that the rule that civilian leaders may incur responsibility in relation to acts committed by their subordinates or other persons under their effective control is not controversial.[573]

408. That a superior-subordinate relationship is needed before a person in a position of superior authority may be held liable under the doctrine of command responsibility may seem self-evident. The Trial Chamber in ^elebi}i held that the "law does not know of a universal superior without a corresponding subordinate. The doctrine of command responsibility is clearly articulated and anchored on the relationship between superior and subordinate, and the responsibility of the commander for actions of members of his troops."[574] The type of relationship required, however, may vary. The Appeals Chamber in ^elebi}i agreed with the Trial Chamber that the relationship of subordination may be direct or indirect. The ^elebi}i Trial Chamber held:

> The requirement of the existence of a "superior-subordinate relationship" which, in the words of the Commentary to Additional Protocol I, should be seen "in terms of a hierarchy encompassing the concept of control", is particularly problematic in situations such as that of the former [570] ^elebi}i Appeal Judgement, para. 196. The Appeals Chamber referred to Article 28 of the ICC Statute which "reaffirmed" the standard of effective control.

[571] ^elebi}i Appeal Judgement, para. 256; see also ^elebi}i Trial Judgement, paras. 378 and 395, and Bla{ki} Trial Judgement, para. 302 (referred to in ^elebi}i Appeal Judgement, para. 190).

[574] ^elebi}i Trial Judgement, para. 647. The Trial Chamber went on to state in the same paragraph that "actual control of the subordinate is a necessary requirement of the superior-subordinate relationship."

the basis of the command responsibility doctrine.[582] It did not disturb the Trial Chamber's conclusion that Zejnil Delali}'s role at the municipal level in the defence effort and in the release of prisoners of war allowed him to be characterised as a highly influential individual but did not render him a superior.[583]

414. While civilians occupying positions of authority in relation to a portion of a territory may be held responsible under the principle of superior responsibility, they will incur criminal responsibility only if they are found to possess the necessary powers of control over the actual perpetrators. The ^elebi}i Trial Chamber persuasively held:

> While the Trial Chamber must at all times be alive to the realities of any given situation and be prepared to pierce such veils of formalism that may shield those individuals carrying the greatest responsibility for heinous acts, great care must be taken lest an injustice be committed in holding individuals responsible for the acts of others in situations where the link of control is absent or too remote.[584]

415. It follows that a government official will only be held liable under the doctrine of command responsibility if he was part of a superior-subordinate relationship, even if that relationship is an indirect one. Even though arguably effective control may be achieved through substantial influence, a demonstration of such powers of influence will not be sufficient in the absence of a showing that he had effective control over subordinates, in the sense of possessing the material ability to prevent subordinate offences or punish subordinate offenders after the commission of the crimes. For instance, a government official who knows that civilians are used to perform forced labour or as human shields will be held liable only if it is demonstrated that he has effective control over the persons who are subjecting the civilians to such treatment. A showing that the official merely was generally an influential person will not be sufficient. In contrast, a government official specifically in charge of the treatment of prisoners used for forced labour or as human shields, as well as a military commander in command of formations which are holding the prisoners, may be held liable on the basis of superior responsibility because of the existence of a chain of command.

416. In sum, only those superiors, either de jure or de facto, military or civilian, who are clearly part of a chain of command, either directly or indirectly, with the actual power to control or punish the acts of subordinates may incur criminal responsibility. The Appeals Chamber found that the [582] The Appeals Chamber referred to a number of cases in the course of its analysis of the Prosecution's argument on "substantial influence". ^elebi}i Appeal Judgement, paras. 258- 66.

[583] The Trial Chamber found that Delali} merely provided logistical support: he was a "well-placed influential individual, clearly involved in the local effort to contribute to the defence of the Bosnian State. This effort and the recognition which accompanied it did not create a relationship of superior and subordinate between him and those who interacted with him." ^elebi}i Trial Judgement, para. 658. See also ^elebi}i Appeal Judgement, paras. 267-68.

difficulties involved in the assessment of its reliability; the defence had been given full opportunity to challenge the evidence; and, it was not the exclusive basis for the court's decision.[1202]

629. Moreover, it is essentially a matter of common sense that a witness with an interest to serve (particularly an interest to get his sentence reduced) may seek to inculpate others and exculpate himself. On the other hand, it does not follow that such a witness is incapable of telling the truth. In each case it is necessary to consider the witness's evidence and all the circumstances, particularly the extent to which evidence is confirmed.

630. Thus, in deciding whether to accept the evidence of Witness AT the Trial Chamber must determine to what extent his evidence is confirmed by other evidence. In fact, there is no direct evidence supporting his account of the meeting. However, there is circumstantial evidence which does so. First, as will be seen, the events of the day in Ahmi}i followed the plan which he described. Secondly, no such plan could have been put into operation without prior meetings and without political approval. Next, no meeting of this importance of politicians in the La{va Valley would have taken place without Dario Kordi} being present. These matters, by themselves, would not be sufficient to lead the Trial Chamber to accept the witness's evidence. However, the account which he gave was a coherent one which was given fluently (in the manner of a person recalling incidents rather than one making them up) and was not shaken in cross-examination. Such inconsistencies as are relied on by the Defence are not of such significance as to make his evidence unbelievable. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber saw and heard the witness giving his evidence and thus had the opportunity of observing his demeanour. Although he could not bring himself to tell the full truth of his own involvement in the attack, and the Trial Chamber finds that he was mistaken in his evidence about the use of the mosque for defence purposes (which is not supported by the evidence of other witnesses) the Trial Chamber is satisfied that he did tell the truth about the preparations for the Ahmi}i attack, including the meetings at Hotel Vitez and the subsequent briefings.

631. In those circumstances, and in the absence of evidence to the contrary, the Trial Chamber is satisfied that Dario Kordi} was present at the meetings of politicians which authorised the 16 April 1993 attack. He thus participated as the senior regional politician in the planning of the military operation and attack against Ahmi}i (and the other La{va Valley villages), an operation which was aimed at 'cleansing' these areas of Muslims. The Chamber is satisfied that the meeting would have approved of Bla{ki}'s order to kill all the military-age men, expel the civilians and set the houses on fire: such an order would not have been given without political approval. Kordi} was thus associated with the giving of that order. (However, the Chamber cannot be sure that the second order, that there be no living witnesses, was not Ljubi~i}'s own order, made without reference to any prior order.) The Chamber is also satisfied that Mario ^erkez, as Commander of the Vite{ka Brigade, was present at the military meeting which followed the politicians' meeting.

632. Witness AT stated that the entry in the CBOZ Duty Officer's log for the morning of 16 April 1993 to the effect that the Muslims attacked the Croats was a fabrication.[1203] The witness reiterated that the Croats carried out a planned attack on the Muslims on 16 April in the territory of Vitez municipality.[1204] On the other hand, the Defence contends that the attack was instigated by the Muslims. The Prosecution called evidence from survivors, UNPROFOR officers and international observers which tends to confirm the evidence of Witness AT about the Croat plan of attack and the order to shoot all Muslim men of military age:

(i) When Witness AQ's husband went to the front door on hearing shots outside he himself was shot dead.[1205]

(ii) The house of Nura Pezer and her family came under attack and was set on fire. Her son went outside, raised his hands in the air, but was shot and killed. She had to leave her husband behind in the house because he was wounded. She later found out that he had been shot in the head.[1206]

(iii) Witness U's father surrendered and told the soldier not to shoot: he took his wallet with a large sum of German marks in it from the safe. The soldier took the wallet but then the father and the witness's brother were shot dead.[1207]

(iv) Abdulah Ahmi}'s brother was killed outside the family house in an explosion and shooting. When the witness and his father went out his father was shot dead and the witness himself was shot in the head. (The witness survived, as he also did a hand grenade attack the following day.)[1208] While hiding the witness could see military

666. International observers saw the destruction in the villages in the next few days. An officer of the Canadian battalion of UNPROFOR, Captain Lanthier, drove through the Kiseljak pocket and saw many looted and burned houses. The villages were deserted. His impression was that the attack on Rotilj had been carried out according to infantry platoon tactics for fighting in built-up areas.[1331] When ECMM Monitors visited the villages they found almost all the Muslims had left and their houses had been burned[1332] and they concluded that ethnic cleansing had taken place in the area.[1333] (It should be noted in this connection that the CBOZ Duty Officer recorded Colonel Bla{ki} as saying on 20 April, with reference to Gominonica, that the police would be used for "cleansing".)[1334]

667. No defence evidence was called about this HVO offensive. The Trial Chamber concludes that it was part of the general offensive launched by the HVO against the Muslims in this area and in relation to Rotilj the underlying offences in Counts 3-4 and 7-13 are made out.

668. In connecting Dario Kordi} with these attacks the Prosecution relies on an order sent by Colonel Bla{ki} to the Ban Jela~i} Brigade in Kiseljak on 18 April 1993, instructing the Brigade to take Gomionica that night and stating that the situation is generally under control and "we have informed the leadership of the HZ H-B of everything. We are in constant contact with the leadership".[1335] The Prosecution comments that there was limited possibility of contact with Mate Boban given the communications difficulties relied on by the Defence and there is no document before the Trial Chamber on such a topic: therefore, the only leadership to whom Bla{ki} could have been referring was the local leadership, i.e., Kordi}, and the CBOZ Duty Officer's log confirms this.[1336]

669. The Trial Chamber finds that Dario Kordi} was involved in these attacks in a municipality about 25 kilometers from Busova~a. The attacks occurred two days after the attacks on the Muslim villages of the La{va Valley and were part of the pattern of attacks on the Muslims of Central Bosnia. Bla{ki} would not have launched the attacks without political approval which the Trial Chamber accepts meant the approval of the local leadership in the person of Dario Kordi}. The clear inference is that the latter was thus associated with the giving of orders to attack the villages, including Rotilj.

9. The Shelling of Zenica

670. On 19 April 1993 the market-place in Zenica was shelled, killing 15 people and injuring another 50. The prosecution case is that the HVO were responsible for the shelling and, hence, the unlawful attack on the town. Their case is that the purpose of the attack was to demonstrate the military capability of the HVO and to threaten the ABiH and force it to stop its counter-attacks.[1337] The prosecution evidence was as follows.

671. Six artillery shells were fired into Vitez between 12 noon and 12.30 p.m. on 19 April 1993. They landed in the area of the market-place, which was described by one witness, who went to the scene, as a busy market and pedestrian street area with shops, stalls and coffee bars, where, at about midday, there would be many people, pedestrians, shoppers and people going to the mosque.[1338] Another witness described the area as containing 30-40 cafes in it and a department store and estimated that there could have been 2-3,000 people there at the time.[1339] It appears, however, that the intended target of the shelling may have been the radio station, Radio Zenica. A technician from the radio station gave evidence that on 19 April he received a telephone call from a person wanting directions to Radio Zenica. When asked why, the man said they were going to shell the station in 10 minutes and told the witness to take shelter. Sometime later the witness saw smoke coming from not far away. People were stampeding in a panic and dragging wounded people away. The witness heard three or four shells: one landed close by the radio station. After the shelling the witness received a phone call from a man who said: "Balija, you haven't been hit yet. We are going to shell you again".[1340]

672. Two Danish members of the ECMM, Major Baggesen and Mr. Laustsen, were in Zenica at the time of the shelling. They visited the scene shortly after the shelling and took photographs.[1341] These photographs show scenes of devastation in the market area, bodies lying on the ground, destroyed cars, a demolished bus shelter and damaged buildings. One witness identified 13 corpses

B. Counts 3 – 44: Unlawful Attacks, Wilful Killing, Inhuman Treatment, Detention and Destruction

832. The prosecution case on these counts is that Kordi} was responsible for planning and ordering the crimes which were committed by HVO units implementing his commands and instructions. The coordinated fashion and number of crimes is an indication of the existence of an organised scheme. Kordi} had the necessary mens rea since he intended the crimes or accepted the risk that they would be committed.[1771] On the other hand the Kordi} Final Brief begins by asserting that the case deals with crimes committed by soldiers whereas Dario Kordi} was a local political leader who helped his community organise itself for defence: the core issue is the "lack of linkage" of any credible evidence that the accused had any criminal responsibility for crimes by soldiers.[1772]

833. The prosecution case against ^erkez is that he planned and ordered these crimes, intending that they should be committed or instigated them by failing to prevent or punish them; alternatively, he was an aider and abetter.[1773] The defence case is that there is no evidence implicating the accused in any of these offences.[1774]

834. The Trial Chamber finds that in those cases where Kordi} participated in the HVO attacks he intended to commit the crimes associated with them and did so. His role was as political leader and his responsibility under Article 7(1) was to plan, instigate and order the crimes. In making this finding the Trial Chamber relies on the evidence already referred to in relation to persecution. As a result the Trial Chamber finds the accused Dario Kordi} liable under Article 7(1) on the following counts:

(a) Count 3 (unlawful attacks on civilians) and Count 4 (unlawful attacks on civilian objects), Count 7 (murder) and Count 8 (wilful killing), Count 10 (inhumane acts) and Count 12 (inhuman treatment) in relation to the following locations and dates as set out in the Indictment: Busova~a (January 1993); Vitez, Stari Vitez, Ve~eriska-Donja Ve~eriska, Ahmi}i, Nadioci, Piri}i, [anti}i, and Rotilj (April 1993); Tulica[1775] and Han Plo~a-Grahovci (June 1993).[1776]

offices, Chess Club, Dubravica Elementary School, Kiseljak municipal buildings and barracks and Rotilj village.

(c) On Count 38 (wanton destruction not justified by military necessity) and Count 39 (plunder of public or private property) in relation to the following locations: Novi Travnik (October 1992); Busova~a (January 1993); Kiseljak, Svinjarevo, Gomionica, Polje Vi{njica, Rotilj (April 1993); Tulica, Han Plo~a-Grahovci (June 1993); and Vitez, Stari Vitez, Ahmi}i and Ve~eriska-Donja Ve~eriska (April 1993). And on Count 38, alone, in the following locations: Merdani (January 1993); and O~ehni}i, Vi{nijca, Behri}i, Gromiljak, Nadioci, Piri}i, [anti}i and Ga}ice (April 1993). And on Count 39, alone, in Lon~ari (April 1993).

(d) On Count 43 (destruction or wilful damage to institutions dedicated to religion or education) in the following locations: Ahmi}i and Stari Vitez (April 1993) and Han Plo~a (June 1993).

835. In relation to the remaining locations in which offences are alleged to have been committed in the above Counts and on Counts 9, 11, 13, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28 and 37, the Trial Chamber finds Dario Kordi} not liable under Article 7(1).

836. The Trial Chamber finds that in those cases where ^erkez participated in attacks as Commander of the Vite{ka Brigade, he committed the crimes associated with them, intending to commit the crimes. His responsibility as Commander of the Brigade was as a co-perpetrator in crimes which he committed. As a result the Trial Chamber finds the accused, Mario ^erkez, liable under Article 7(1) on the following counts:

(a) Count 5 (unlawful attacks on civilians) and Count 6 (unlawful attacks on civilian objects), Count 14 (murder), and Count 15 (wilful killing), Count 17 (inhumane acts), Count 19 (inhuman treatment) in relation to the following locations Vitez, Stari Vitez, Stari Vitez and Ve~eriska-Donja Ve~eriska; and Count 41 (wanton destruction not justified by military necessity) and Count 42 (plunder of public or private property) in relation to the following locations: Vitez, Stari Vitez and Donja Ve~eriska;

(b) on Count 29 (imprisonment), Count 30 (unlawful confinement of civilians), Count 31 (inhuman treatment), Count 33 (taking civilians as hostages) and Count 35 (inhuman treatment) in relation to the following locations: Vitez Cinema Complex, Veterinary Station, SDK offices and Chess Club);

III. FINDINGS AS TO RESPONSIBILITY UNDER ARTICLE 7(3) OF THE STATUTE

A. Dario Kordi}

838. Dario Kordi} was a civilian and a politician with tremendous influence and power in Central Bosnia. He occupied an important position in the leadership of the HZ H-B, but was not in the top echelon, being answerable to Mate Boban.

839. While he played an important role in military matters, even at times issuing orders, and exercising authority over HVO forces, he was, and remained throughout the Indictment period, a civilian, who was not part of the formal command structure of the HVO.

840. Although liability under Article 7(3) may attach to civilians as well as military personnel, once it is established that the requisite power to prevent or punish exists, the Chamber holds that great care must be taken in assessing the evidence to determine command responsibility in respect of civilians, lest an injustice is done. In the first place, it is established that substantial influence (such as Kordi} had), by itself, is not indicative of a sufficient degree of control for liability under Article 7(3).[1777] Secondly, while liability under Article 7(3) may attach not only to persons in formal positions of command, but also to those who are effectively in command of more informal structures,[1778] the Chamber finds that Kordi} lacked effective control, which the Appeals Chamber in the Celebi}i case defined as "a material ability to prevent or punish criminal conduct, however that control is exercised".[1779]

841. In sum, the Chamber finds that Kordi} was neither a commander nor a superior in respect of the HVO, since he possessed neither the authority to prevent the crimes that were committed, nor to punish the perpetrators of those crimes,[1780] and as such, he is not liable under Article 7(3) of the Statute.

impossible that the three Judges of the Trial Chamber were able to deliberate carefully on the voluminous evidence and produce such a comprehensive Trial Judgement in less than a month.[343]

131. The Prosecution responds that there is no objective evidence to establish bias or error in the Trial Chamber's fact finding based solely on the number of days of deliberation. The Prosecution submits that Amicus Curiae does not demonstrate how preparatory work has overreached into the area of deliberation, he simply asserts that the period of time was "self-evidently insufficient".[344] However, general comments on the length of deliberation do not support a valid ground of appeal; instead, "the alleging party must show some manifest error on the face of the findings demonstrating where the chamber has erred, or giving rise to a reasonable inference that the deliberative process was compromised as alleged".[345] The Prosecution concludes:

> Amicus curiae does not show any failure to take relevant materials into account, or where account has been taken of irrelevant material. He does not show objective bias by pointing to manifestly unreasonable findings of fact or law which show a concluded view was reached prior to the close of the case.[346]

132. Amicus Curiae replies that "[t]he permissible period of non-delegable deliberation here is so short that the reasonable observer might well apprehend that significant conclusions on the evidence had either been reached prior to the close of the parties' cases or were made by people other than the Trial Judges."[347]

(b) Analysis

133. The Appeals Chamber recalls that before taking up duties, every Judge of the Tribunal solemnly declares that he will perform his or her duties and exercise his or her powers honourably, faithfully, impartially and conscientiously.[348] There is a strong presumption that the Judges act in accordance with this oath.[349] A party must adduce sufficient evidence to rebut this presumption.[350] The Appeals Chamber is not convinced that Amicus Curiae has done so here.

> assessments and conclusions in respect of earlier evidence would already have been reached. Not only does this give an appearance of bias, it might also result in actual bias.

[344] Prosecution's Response to Amicus Curiae, paras 48-49.
[345] Prosecution's Response to Amicus Curiae, para. 49. See also ibid., para. 50, quoting para. 19 of SZHNE v. Minister of Immigration and Multicultural & Indigenous Affairs, [2006] FCA 597, 22 May 2006 (Australia):

> The fact that a judgement is delivered ex tempore is not itself an appealable error. The proper question is whether the evidence and submissions of a party were properly considered and not how long the evidence and submissions were under consideration.

[350] Ibid.

134. Just as general observations on the length of the Trial Judgement, or of particular parts of the Trial Judgement, usually do not suffice to show an error of law because of a lack of reasoned opinion,[351] general comments on the length of the deliberations are insufficient to show improprieties in the deliberative process. Here, Amicus Curiae claims that it was impossible to deliberate properly on such a complex case in only 18 working days, but he brings no evidence to substantiate this claim. In particular, he fails to show that conclusions were reached by other persons than the Judges or that preparatory work overreached into the area of deliberation. In this connection, the Appeals Chamber considers that in cases of the size and complexity of the case at stake, given that as a matter of fairness judgements must be issued in a reasonable time, preparatory work can and should be done as the case goes. This is not to suggest that decisions should be taken by others than the Judges or that any improper decisions should be taken by the Judges in advance of hearing all the evidence. However, there are numerous steps than can and should be taken which will place the Bench in the best situation possible following closing arguments to prepare a reasoned, clear and concise judgement within a reasonable time frame. Against this background, the Appeals Chamber cannot infer that the deliberation process was corrupted. This sub-ground is dismissed.

8. Concluding remark

135. The Appeals Chamber has dismissed Amicus Curiae's assertion that Krajišnik's trial was unfair. That said, the Appeals Chamber notes that certain aspects of the conduct of the trial were not free from defects and may have created an appearance of unfairness. However, based on a holistic assessment of the trial record and the additional evidence on appeal, the Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that Amicus Curiae has shown that these defects amount to a miscarriage of justice which would undermine the fairness of the trial received by Krajišnik. This ground of appeal is therefore dismissed in its entirety.

B. Alleged failure to provide a reasoned opinion (Ground 2)

1. Submissions

136. Amicus Curiae submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law by failing to provide a sufficiently reasoned judgement,[352] opting for an "illustrative approach" instead of giving reasons as to why certain witnesses or exhibits were found credible and others not.[353] He argues in particular [351] Kvočka et al. Appeal Judgement, para. 25.

[352] Amicus Curiae's Notice of Appeal, paras 25-28; Amicus Curiae's Appeal Brief, paras 125-138.
[353] Amicus Curiae's Appeal Brief, paras 129-132. In this connection, Amicus Curiae refers specifically to paragraphs 292 and 889 of the Trial Judgement.

175. In light of these scarce – or entirely absent – findings, the Appeals Chamber is not able to conclude with the necessary preciseness how and at which point in time the common objective of the JCE expanded to include other crimes that originally were not included in it, and, consequently, on what basis the Trial Chamber imputed those expanded crimes to Krajišnik.

176. Neither the Appeals Chamber nor the Parties can be required to engage in speculation on the meaning of the Trial Chamber's findings – or lack thereof – in relation to such a central element of Krajišnik's individual criminal responsibility as the scope of the common objective of the JCE. Aside from merely stating that the common objective was "fluid",[440] the Trial Chamber was required to precisely find how and when the scope of the common objective broadened in order to impute individual criminal responsibility to Krajišnik for those crimes that were not included in the original plan, i.e the expanded crimes.

177. In conclusion, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber committed a legal error[441] in failing to make the findings necessary for Krajišnik's conviction in relation to the following expanded crimes, which were not included in the original common objective of the JCE:

- persecution (count 3) with the underlying acts of the imposition and maintenance of restrictive and discriminatory measures; killings during and after attacks; cruel or inhumane treatment during and after attacks; unlawful detention; killings related to detention facilities; cruel or inhumane treatment in detention facilities; inhumane living conditions in detention facilities; forced labour at front lines; use of human shields; appropriation or plunder of property; and destruction of private property, cultural monuments, and sacred sites;
- extermination (count 4); and
- murder (count 5).[442]

178. Consequently, the Appeals Chamber grants sub-ground 3(B) submitted by Amicus Curiae to the extent that Krajišnik cannot be held liable for the above-mentioned expanded crimes that fell outside the original common objective of the JCE, which only encompassed the crimes of deportation and forcible transfer under Counts 7 and 8 of the Indictment as well as their incorporation as underlying acts of persecution under Count 3 of the Indictment. Thus, Krajišnik's convictions for expanded crimes under Counts 3, 4 and 5 are quashed. The remainder of this part of sub-ground 3 (B) is dismissed.

[442] Trial Judgement, paras 1095-1119. The "original" crimes of the JCE are: persecution (Count 3) with the underlying acts of deportation or forced transfer; deportation (Count 7); and inhumane acts (forced transfer, Count 8) (ibid., para. 1097).

3. Conclusion of the JCE (further sub-ground 3(B))

(a) Submissions

179. Amicus Curiae argues that the Trial Chamber erred in law "by failing to specify when the final crimes occurred which were committed pursuant to the JCE".[443] The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber did not have to make an explicit finding as to when the JCE ended because

> [w]hether members of the JCE (or others on their behalf) continued to act after the expiry of the indictment period is irrelevant. What matters is that the Chamber found that a JCE existed when the crimes were committed and that all of the crimes for which Krajišnik was convicted were committed pursuant to the common criminal objective.[444]

(b) Analysis

180. It is not entirely clear what Amicus Curiae seeks to argue here. To the extent that he asserts that the Trial Chamber had to specify when the JCE ended, this contention must be rejected. Indeed, all that the Trial Chamber had to find is that the crimes for which Krajišnik was convicted were committed pursuant to the JCE; this it did.[445] To the extent that Amicus Curiae avers that the Trial Judgement does not clearly state the crimes for which Krajišnik is being held liable because it does not explicitly identify the final crimes for which Krajišnik is being held responsible, this contention must also be rejected. Indeed, the Trial Chamber specified that Krajišnik was being held liable for the "crimes mentioned in part 5" of the Trial Judgement.[446] The Appeals Chamber notes that this part of the Trial Judgement details a number of crimes which occurred between April 1992 and 30 December 1992.[447] Therefore, the Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the Trial Chamber sufficiently specified the crimes for which Krajišnik was being held liable. Therefore, this part of sub-ground 3(B) is dismissed.

4. Type of JCE (sub-ground 3(C))

181. In sub-ground 3(C), Amicus Curiae contends that the Trial Chamber erred in law in convicting Krajišnik for the crimes referred to in Counts 3 (persecution as a crime against the bases for its inference as to the intent of Krajišnik and other JCE members with respect to the expanded crimes. This does not constitute an error of law.

201. Amicus Curiae also submits that the Trial Chamber erred in law and fact by basing its conclusion on Krajišnik's mens rea directly on findings of knowledge and substantial assistance, and in concluding that Krajišnik possessed the requisite mens rea to commit the JCE crimes – both the original crimes and the expanded crimes.[502]

202. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber was cautious in drawing inferences on Krajišnik's intent. The Trial Chamber was plainly aware that, before entering a factual finding on the basis of circumstantial evidence, it had to determine whether other reasonable inferences were possible.[503] It stressed that "knowledge combined with continuing participation can be conclusive as to a person's intent" and stated that therefore the "information the Accused received during this period is an important element for the determination of his responsibility".[504]

203. As set out above,[505] the Trial Chamber did not make the necessary findings with respect to the JCE members' mens rea in relation to the expanded crimes. The Trial Chamber found that these crimes became encompassed by the common objective when leading members of the JCE were informed about them, took no effective measures to prevent their recurrence, and persisted in the implementation of the common objective of the JCE.[506] The Trial Chamber did not find, however, at which point in time the leading members of the JCE became aware of each of the various expanded crimes. Similarly, there are no findings as to when the members of the local component became aware of the expanded crimes. In the absence of such findings, the Appeals Chamber has found that the Trial Chamber committed a legal error by convicting Krajišnik for the expanded crimes.[507] elsewhere.[1748] In remaining parts, insofar as it is developed, this argument appears to be simply another attempt by JCE counsel to distance Krajišnik from the crimes and thereby show the inappropriateness of qualifying his liability as "commission". For reasons stated above, that argument fails. This sub-ground is dismissed.

(d) JCE and the nullum crimen sine lege principle (sub-ground 1(D))

(i) Submissions

667. Given the "flaws" of JCE described in his previous sub-grounds, JCE counsel submit that Krajišnik lacked proper notice that he faced JCE liability.[1749] They argue that the acts or omissions underlying his conviction took place in 1992, while the concept of JCE liability did not arise until the Tadić Appeal Judgement in 1999,[1750] and that the concept has expanded beyond the low-level mob violence in Tadić, to include high-level officials with only tenuous connections to the crimes.[1751] Therefore, JCE counsel argue, the imposition of JCE liability conflicts with the nullum crimen sine lege principle and is vulnerable to political influence.[1752]

668. The Prosecution responds that the egregious nature of Krajišnik's crimes, Article 26 of the Criminal Code of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, the extensive state practice noted in Tadić and the many domestic jurisdictions providing for such a form of liability under various names running parallel to custom, provided Krajišnik with notice that he would have incurred JCE liability.[1753]

(ii) Analysis

669. As a preliminary matter, the Appeals Chamber notes that Krajišnik did not challenge but, in fact, expressly recognised at trial that the fact that Tadić was rendered after his alleged acts took place does not lead to a conflict between JCE and the nullum crimen sine lege principle.[1754] Therefore, as far as JCE counsel now argue that the Tadić Appeal Judgement violated that principle, Krajišnik may be deemed to have waived his right to bring this challenge on appeal.[1755] In any event, JCE counsel fail to address the jurisprudence holding that the notion of JCE as established in Tadić does not violate the nullum crimen sine lege principle.[1756]

670. Regarding JCE counsel's challenge that the alleged "expansion" of JCE after Tadić violates the principle, which challenge Krajišnik did raise at trial,[1757] the Appeals Chamber first recalls that when it interprets the JCE doctrine, it does not create new law. Instead, similarly to other provisions under the Statute, it merely identifies what the proper interpretation of that doctrine has always been, even though not previously expressed that way.[1758] This does not contravene the nullum crimen sine lege principle, which > "does not prevent a court from interpreting and clarifying the elements of a particular crime." Nor does it preclude the progressive development of the law by the court. But it does prevent a court from creating new law or from interpreting existing law beyond the reasonable limits of acceptable clarification.[1759]

671. Turning to the present case, the Appeals Chamber notes that, although Tadić concerned a relatively low-level accused, the legal elements of JCE set out in that case remain the same in a case where JCE is applied to a high-level accused. Therefore, JCE counsel are wrong to speak about an "expansion" of JCE to cases such as the one of Krajišnik. Moreover, the Appeals Chamber considers that, while pronounced in relation to acts allegedly committed in 1999, its holding in the Ojdanić Decision on Joint Criminal Enterprise applies also to Krajišnik in this case:

> Article 26 of the Criminal Law of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, coupled with the extensive state practice noted in Tadić, the many domestic jurisdictions which provide for such a form of liability under various names and which forms of liability run parallel to custom, and the egregious nature of the crimes charged would have provided notice to anyone that the acts committed by the accused [...] would have engaged criminal responsibility on the basis of participation in a joint criminal enterprise.[1760]

672. JCE counsel's additional argument that the imposition of JCE liability is vulnerable to political influence is unsupported and dismissed. This sub-ground is dismissed.

1190. Hearsay. Evidence of events occurring outside the testifying witness's own direct experience constitutes hearsay. The jurisprudence of the Tribunal is that hearsay evidence is not inadmissible per se. A variety of documents – for example, witness statements admitted pursuant to Rule 92 bis – have been admitted on the footing that their content is generally accurate. The Chamber has carefully examined whether the proffered hearsay evidence is relevant, reliable, and has probative value.[2293] For example, in those cases where a witness did not specify the source of the hearsay, the Chamber has generally not relied on the hearsay.

1191. Corroboration. The testimony of a single witness on a material fact does not, as a matter of law, require corroboration.[2294] Sometimes, however, the lack of corroboration allows the Chamber not to consider the evidence.

1192. Inconsistencies/discrepancies. The time elapsed between the events of 1991/92 and the dates on which witnesses in this case gave statements or testimony naturally has led to an erosion of memory, which in turn is the cause of occasional discrepancies between viva voce testimonies and prior written statements.[2295] The Chamber is aware that other causes might also explain such discrepancies. Where discrepancies were minor, the Chamber generally did not treat them as diminishing a witness's credibility or reliability.[2296] The Chamber took into account the effects of the passage of time also when faced with minor imprecisions in the testimony of witnesses. In the course of questioning, a witness would sometimes recall details previously forgotten, or provide reasonable explanations of what had appeared to be a discrepancy or inconsistency in his or her evidence.[2297] But some discrepancies were serious enough to necessitate caution, or to discredit a witness's testimony, at least in part.

1193. Expert versus fact witnesses. Expert witnesses are distinguished from witnesses of fact. The testimony of a witness of fact is generally limited to matters about which the witness had personal knowledge, although this does not always exclude certain opinions and conclusions, especially if they could be developed on the basis of experience. An expert is a person who, by virtue of specialized knowledge or skill, can assist the Chamber to understand or determine an issue in dispute.[2298] Expert witnesses are afforded leeway to give opinions and draw conclusions within their field of expertise. According to the Chamber's practice, the central item of evidence, is the expert's report. On 17 May 2005, the Chamber instructed the party calling an expert witness to limit its examination to matters of central importance to the case which are likely to be controversial and which require further explanation, clarification, or illustration in terms of how the opinion was arrived at by the expert.[2299] Documentation utilized in this process may be admitted into evidence, but not all documentation underlying the expert report will be admitted into

(i) it is distinct, concrete and identifiable;

(ii) it is restricted to factual findings and does not include legal characterizations;

(iii) it was contested at trial and forms part of a judgement which has either not been appealed or has been finally settled on appeal; or

(iv) it was contested at trial and now forms part of a judgement which is under appeal, but falls within issues which are not in dispute during the appeal;

(v) it does not attest to criminal responsibility of the Accused;

(vi) it is not the subject of (reasonable) dispute between the Parties in the present case;

(vii) it is not based on plea agreements in previous cases; and

(viii) it does not impact on the right of the Accused to a fair trial.

16. Turning then to the second question of the legal consequences of taking judicial notice of certain facts, the Chamber notes that Rule 94 does not itself establish the procedural legal implications of judicial notice of such facts. Judicial notice of "facts of common knowledge" under Rule 94(A) normally implies that such facts cannot be challenged during trial. Rule 94(B), however, allows for judicial notice of information based on sources which are substantially different in character from the facts contemplated in Rule 94(A). By taking judicial notice of an adjudicated fact, thus, the Chamber establishes a well-founded presumption for the accuracy of this fact, which therefore does not have to be proven again at trial – unless the other party brings out new evidence and successfully challenges and disproves the fact at trial.[13] In other words, the procedural legal impact of taking judicial notice of an adjudicated fact is not that the fact cannot be challenged or refuted at trial, but rather that the burden of proof to disqualify the fact is shifted to the disputing party. The general principle of criminal law that it is always for the Prosecutor to prove the criminal responsibility of the Accused is not, to be sure, affected by this particular Rule-based exception in relation to judicial notice of adjudicated facts; these facts have already been subject to judicial review, and both parties are still allowed – in order to safeguard the fairness of the trial – to challenge the fact during trial by submitting evidence that calls into question the veracity of the adjudicated facts.

17. If, during trial, a Party wishes to dispute an adjudicated fact of which the Trial Chamber has taken judicial notice, accordingly, that Party must then bring out the evidence in support of its contest and request the Chamber to entertain the challenge. If the Chamber admits the challenge, the other Party will be provided with an opportunity to respond within a short time frame set out by the Chamber and the Chamber will then decide on the matter.

admitted to habitually meeting with detainees and confirmed that, during these conversations, the detainees discussed the living conditions at the KP Dom.[67] The Appeals Chamber reiterates that the Judgment contains many findings of fact detailing the living conditions imposed upon the non-Serb detainees. The Appeals Chamber also observes that the Trial Chamber expressly held that it was obvious to Krnojelac, as it would have been to anyone at the KP Dom, that the disparity between the treatment of the non-Serb and Serb detainees was deliberate and was effected by the intention of the principal offenders to discriminate against the non-Serb detainees on religious and political grounds.[68] The Appeals Chamber points out that Krnojelac does not try to show that the Trial Chamber's findings were unreasonable and therefore dismisses the arguments on this point.

3. Third sub-ground: the mens rea of the aider and abettor in an act of persecution

49. The Appeals Chamber will now turn to examine the third sub-ground of Krnojelac's second ground of appeal. Krnojelac alleges an error of law which raises the issue of whether, in order to establish the mens rea of the aider and abettor in an act of persecution, it is enough to show that the individual concerned voluntarily aided or encouraged the principal offender in the knowledge that the latter was acting with discriminatory intent or whether it must also be shown that the aider and abettor too had that intent.

50. Krnojelac argues that, for the crime of persecution, the aider and abettor must have the same guilty discriminatory intent as the principal offenders[69] and that it was not established that he had this intent.[70] The Prosecution disputes the merits of this test and argues that the test identified by the Trial Chamber should be applied, that is, that the aider and abettor must know that the principal offender has the intent to commit the crimes and, in so doing, to discriminate.[71] In the alternative, the Prosecution submits that, should the ground raised by Krnojelac be upheld, the Appeals Chamber should substitute the conviction on count 1 of the Indictment (persecution based on imprisonment) with another on count 11 (imprisonment as a crime against humanity).[72]

51. The Appeals Chamber draws attention to the distinction between the mental element required for aiding and abetting and that required for co-perpetration. In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts committed by the aider and abettor further the perpetration of a specific crime by the principal offender. In the case of co-perpetration, the intent to perpetrate the crime or to pursue the joint criminal purpose must be shown.[73] The Appeals Chamber also recalls that in the Aleksovski Appeals Judgement it followed the Furundžija Judgement and held that "it is not necessary to show that the aider and abettor shared the mens rea of the principal, but it must be shown that [...] the aider and abettor was aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal."[74] The Appeals Chamber also stated that "the aider and abettor [must be aware] of the essential elements of the crime committed by the principal (including his relevant mens rea)." The Appeals Chamber notes that no cogent reason was given which would justify this case-law being amended.[75]

52. The Appeals Chamber considers that the aider and abettor in persecution, an offence with a specific intent, must be aware not only of the crime whose perpetration he is facilitating but also of the discriminatory intent of the perpetrators of that crime. He need not share the intent but he must be aware of the discriminatory context in which the crime is to be committed and know that his support or encouragement has a substantial effect on its perpetration. The Appeals Chamber points out that this is the very criterion applied by the Trial Chamber in this case in paragraphs 489 and 490 of the Judgment. The Appeals Chamber states that the third sub-ground of Krnojelac's second ground of appeal is also therefore ill-founded.

53. Accordingly, the Appeals Chamber dismisses the second ground of appeal.

B. Krnojelac's fifth ground of appeal: superior responsibility for the beatings inflicted on detainees

54. Krnojelac submits that the Trial Chamber erred in finding him guilty of inhumane acts and cruel treatment based on beatings as a superior within the meaning of Article 7(3) of the Statute.[76] He asks the Appeals Chamber to overturn the convictions on counts 5 and 7 of the Indictment.[77]

55. Generally, Krnojelac argues that the Trial Chamber erred in concluding that he knew that beatings were being inflicted on the detainees. He challenges the three main parts of the evidence discussed below on which the Trial Chamber relied in determining whether he had the requisite

[75] Ibid., para. 107. See also para. 109: "It is necessary to stress that the normal rule is that previous decisions are to be followed, and departure from them is the exception. The Appeals Chamber will only depart from a previous decision after the most careful consideration has been given to it, both as to the law, including the authorities cited, and the facts."
[76] Defence Brief, para. 188.
[77] Ibid., para. 207.

torture and murders might be committed (as knowledge of the beatings constitutes sufficient information to alert him to the risk of acts of torture and murders being committed) and that, since he did not open any investigation in order to ascertain whether such crimes had been or were about to be committed, Krnojelac had the requisite mens rea to incur liability pursuant to Article 7(3) of the Statute for torture and murders.[183] On this point, the Appeals Chamber considers it appropriate to provide the following clarification.

154. The Čelebići Appeals Judgement defines the "had reason to know" standard by setting out that "[a] showing that a superior had some general information in his possession, which would put him on notice of possible unlawful acts by his subordinates would be sufficient to prove that he 'had reason to know' [...] This information does not need to provide specific information about unlawful acts committed or about to be committed. For instance, a military commander who has received information that some of the soldiers under his command have a violent or unstable character, or have been drinking prior to being sent on a mission, may be considered as having the required knowledge."[184]

155. The Appeals Chamber finds that this case-law shows only that, with regard to a specific offence (torture for example), the information available to the superior need not contain specific details on the unlawful acts which have been or are about to be committed. It may not be inferred from this case-law that, where one offence (the "first offence") has a material element in common with another (the "second offence") but the second offence contains an additional element not present in the first, it suffices that the superior has alarming information regarding the first offence in order to be held responsible for the second on the basis of Article 7(3) of the Statute (such as for example, in the case of offences of cruel treatment and torture where torture subsumes the lesser offence of cruel treatment).[185] Such an inference is not admissible with regard to the principles

[183] Without it being very explicit, the Prosecution sometimes seems to support this argument. As for the alleged error regarding torture, the Prosecution made the following submissions at the appeal hearing: "Our proposition is a very simple one. Applying Čelebići to the facts of this case can lead to only one reasonable conclusion, and that is that by actually knowing of the beatings going on within KP Dom, he was on notice of the risk that at least some of them may have resulted in torture. His knowledge of the beatings in this KP Dom environment was enough to alert him to the need for additional information or to conduct an investigation to ascertain whether torture by beatings was being committed by his subordinates." (T(A), 14 May 2003, p. 72). Regarding the murders, the Prosecution stated at the appeal hearing: "when one looks at the peculiarities of these beatings, the peculiarities of the harsh treatment meted out against these individuals, the only difference between the beatings as found and the murders has to do in terms of what was the inevitable effect. In one case it was a case of beatings that resulted in incapacitation. In another, it was a case of certain beatings that resulted in death. In other words, a level of behaviour, a level of deportment, if I may so describe it, that is of the same genus and of the same type. And significantly, one would consider that when one looks at what in fact is the definition of murder, isn't murder dealing with in fact acts with intent to cause grievous bodily harm? Isn't that what murder is? So does it mean that because, for example, that final step is not reached, that you are not put on inquiry [...]" (T(A), 14 May 2003, pp. 116 and 117).
[184] Čelebići Appeals Judgement, para. 238.
[185] Judgment, para. 314.

governing individual criminal responsibility. In other words, and again using the above example of the crime of torture, in order to determine whether an accused "had reason to know" that his subordinates had committed or were about to commit acts of torture, the court must ascertain whether he had sufficiently alarming information (bearing in mind that, as set out above, such information need not be specific) to alert him to the risk of acts of torture being committed, that is of beatings being inflicted not arbitrarily but for one of the prohibited purposes of torture. Thus, it is not enough that an accused has sufficient information about beatings inflicted by his subordinates; he must also have information – albeit general – which alerts him to the risk of beatings being inflicted for one of the purposes provided for in the prohibition against torture.

156. The Appeals Chamber reiterates that an assessment of the mental element required by Article 7(3) of the Statute should, in any event, be conducted in the specific circumstances of each case, taking into account the specific situation of the superior concerned at the time in question.[186]

157. Having provided this clarification, the Appeals Chamber will now analyse the Prosecution's submissions in support of each ground of appeal.

1. Third ground of appeal: error in the Trial Chamber's findings of fact regarding the acts of torture committed at the KP Dom

158. Apart from the finding that Krnojelac held a position of superior authority in the KP Dom,[187] the Prosecution restates some of the Trial Chamber's other findings of fact in support of this ground of appeal,[188] in particular:

- that Krnojelac's subordinates tortured some of the detainees;[189]
- that Krnojelac knew or had reason to know that Muslim detainees were being beaten or otherwise generally mistreated;[190]
- that Krnojelac knew that a detainee by the name of Ekrem Zeković had been tortured.[191]

159. In essence, the Prosecution challenges the Trial Chamber's findings in paragraph 313 of the Judgment which reads as follows:

(f) The Appeals Chamber's preliminary conclusion regarding the Trial Chamber's finding of Radislav Krstić's genocidal intent

134. As has been demonstrated, all that the evidence can establish is that Krstić was aware of the intent to commit genocide on the part of some members of the VRS Main Staff, and with that knowledge, he did nothing to prevent the use of Drina Corps personnel and resources to facilitate those killings. This knowledge on his part alone cannot support an inference of genocidal intent. Genocide is one of the worst crimes known to humankind, and its gravity is reflected in the stringent requirement of specific intent. Convictions for genocide can be entered only where that intent has been unequivocally established. There was a demonstrable failure by the Trial Chamber to supply adequate proof that Radislav Krstić possessed the genocidal intent. Krstić, therefore, is not guilty of genocide as a principal perpetrator.

E. The Criminal Responsibility of Radislav Krstić: Aiding and Abetting Genocide

135. The issue that arises now is the level of Radislav Krstić's criminal responsibility in the circumstances as properly established. All of the crimes that followed the fall of Srebrenica occurred in the Drina Corps zone of responsibility. There was no evidence that the Drina Corps devised or instigated any of the atrocities, and the evidence strongly suggested that the criminal activity was being directed by some members of the VRS Main Staff under the direction of General Mladić.[221] At the time the executions commenced Krstić was engaged in preparing for combat activities at Žepa and, from 14 July 1995 onwards, directing the attack itself.[222]

136. At trial the Defence had argued that, given the involvement of General Mladić, Radislav Krstić could do nothing to prevail upon General Mladić and stop the executions.[223] The Trial Chamber however found evidence of General Mladić's orders being challenged by the Drina Corps Command, and in particular, evidence of Krstić countering an order issued by the Main Staff.[224] The Trial Chamber also found evidence of Radislav Krstić's continued loyalty to General Mladić despite his knowledge of General Mladić's role in the genocide at Srebrenica.[225]

137. As has been found above, it was reasonable for the Trial Chamber to conclude that, at least from 15 July 1995, Radislav Krstić had knowledge of the genocidal intent of some of the Members of the VRS Main Staff. Radislav Krstić was aware that the Main Staff had insufficient resources of its own to carry out the executions and that, without the use of Drina Corps resources, the Main

Staff would not have been able to implement its genocidal plan. Krstić knew that by allowing Drina Corps resources to be used he was making a substantial contribution to the execution of the Bosnian Muslim prisoners. Although the evidence suggests that Radislav Krstić was not a supporter of that plan, as Commander of the Drina Corps he permitted the Main Staff to call upon Drina Corps resources and to employ those resources. The criminal liability of Krstić is therefore more properly expressed as that of an aider and abettor to genocide, and not as that of a perpetrator.[226] This charge is fairly encompassed by the indictment, which alleged that Radislav Krstić aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of genocide against the Bosnian Muslims in Srebrenica.[227]

138. Krstić's responsibility is accurately characterized as aiding and abetting genocide under Article 7(1) of the Statute, not as complicity in genocide under Article 4(3)(e). The charge of complicity was also alleged in the indictment, as Count 2.[228] The Trial Chamber did not enter a conviction on this count, concluding that Radislav Krstić's responsibility was that of a principal perpetrator.[229] As the Trial Chamber observed, there is an overlap between Article 4(3) as the general provision enumerating punishable forms of participation in genocide and Article 7(1) as the general provision for criminal liability which applies to all the offences punishable under the Statute, including the offence of genocide.[230] There is support for a position that Article 4(3) may be the more specific provision (lex specialis) in relation to Article 7(1).[231] There is, however, also authority indicating that modes of participation enumerated in Article 7(1) should be read, as the Tribunal's Statute directs, into Article 4(3), and so the proper characterization of such individual's criminal liability would be that of aiding and abetting genocide.[232]

139. The Appeals Chamber concludes that the latter approach is the correct one in this case. Article 7(1) of the Statute, which allows liability to attach to an aider and abettor, expressly applies that mode of liability to any "crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute," including the offence of genocide prohibited by Article 4. Because the Statute must be interpreted with the utmost respect to the language used by the legislator, the Appeals Chamber may not conclude that the consequent overlap between Article 7(1) and Article 4(3)(e) is a result of an inadvertence on the part of the legislator where another explanation, consonant with the language used by the Statute, is possible. In this case, the two provisions can be reconciled, because the terms "complicity" and "accomplice" may encompass conduct broader than that of aiding and abetting.[233] Given the Statute's express statement in Article 7(1) that liability for genocide under Article 4 may attach through the mode of aiding and abetting, Radislav Krstić's responsibility is properly characterized as that of aiding and abetting genocide.[234]

140. This, however, raises the question of whether, for liability of aiding and abetting to attach, the individual charged need only possess knowledge of the principal perpetrator's specific genocidal intent, or whether he must share that intent. The Appeals Chamber has previously explained, on several occasions, that an individual who aids and abets a specific intent offense may be held responsible if he assists the commission of the crime knowing the intent behind the crime.[235] This principle applies to the Statute's prohibition of genocide, which is also an offence requiring a showing of specific intent. The conviction for aiding and abetting genocide upon proof that the defendant knew about the principal perpetrator's genocidal intent is permitted by the Statute and case-law of the Tribunal.

141. Many domestic jurisdictions, both common and civil law, take the same approach with respect to the mens rea for aiding and abetting, and often expressly apply it to the prohibition of genocide. Under French law, for example, an aider and abettor need only be aware that he is aiding the principal perpetrator by his contribution,[236] and this general requirement is applied to the specific prohibition of the crime of genocide.[237] German law similarly requires that, in offences mandating a showing of a specific intent (dolus specialis), an aider and abettor need not possess the same degree of mens rea as the principal perpetrator, but only to be aware of the perpetrator's intent.[238] This general principle is applied to the prohibition of genocide in Section 6 of the German [233] See Krnojelac Appeal Judgement, para. 70 ("The Appeals Chamber notes first of all that, in the case-law of the Tribunal ... this term [accomplice] has different meanings depending on the context and may refer to a co-perpetrator or an aider and abettor.") (citing Tadić Appeal Judgement, paras. 220, 229).

[234] In this Appeal, the Appeals Chamber is concerned solely with the application to Article 4(3) of only one mode of liability deriving from Article 7(1), that of aiding and abetting. The Appeals Chamber expresses no opinion regarding other modes of liability listed in Article 7(1).

[235] See Krnojelac Appeal Judgement, para. 52 ("the aider and abettor in persecution, an offence with a specific intent, must be aware . . . of the discriminatory intent of the perpetrators of that crime," but "need not share th[at] intent"); Vasiljević Appeal Judgement, para. 142 ("In order to convict [the accused] for aiding and abetting the crime of persecution, the Appeals Chamber must establish that [he] had knowledge that the principal perpetrators of the joint criminal enterprise intended to commit the underlying crimes, and by their acts they intended to discriminate . . . ."); see also Tadić Appeal Judgement, para. 229 ("In the case of aiding and abetting, the requisite mental element is knowledge that the acts performed by the aider and abettor assist the commission of a specific crime by the principal.").

[238] See section 27(1) of the German Penal Code (Strafgesetzbuch). According to section 2 of the German Code of Crimes Against International Law (CCIL), section 27(1) of the German Penal Code is applicable to crimes of genocide.

because there existed some systems where complicity required intent, and others where it did not. Several delegates [representing Luxembourg, Egypt, Soviet Union, Yugoslavia] said that this was unnecessary, because there had never been any doubt that complicity in genocide must be intentional. The United Kingdom eventually withdrew its amendment, 'since it was understood that, to be punishable, complicity in genocide must be deliberate.'"[246] The texts of the Tribunal's Statute and of the Genocide Convention, combined with the evidence in the Convention's travaux préparatoires, provide additional support to the conclusion that the drafters of the Statute opted for applying the notion of aiding and abetting to the prohibition of genocide under Article 4.[247]

143. The fact that the Trial Chamber did not identify individual members of the Main Staff of the VRS as the principal participants in the genocidal enterprise does not negate the finding that Radislav Krstić was aware of their genocidal intent. A defendant may be convicted for having aided and abetted a crime which requires specific intent even where the principal perpetrators have not been tried or identified.[248] In Vasiljević, the Appeals Chamber found the accused guilty as an aider and abettor to persecution without having had the alleged principal perpetrator on trial and without having identified two other alleged co-perpetrators.[249] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber's conviction of Krstić as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to commit genocide is set aside and a conviction for aiding and abetting genocide is entered instead.[250]

144. The Appeals Chamber's examination of Radislav Krstić's participation in the crime of genocide has implications for his criminal responsibility for the murders of the Bosnian Muslim [246] William Schabas, Genocide in International Law, at 289 (2000) (quoting UN Doc. A/C.6/236 & Corr. 1; UN Doc. A/C.6/SR.87).

[247] As it is not at issue in this case, the Appeals Chamber takes no position on the mens rea requirement for the conviction for the offence of complicity in genocide under Article 4(3) of the Statute where this offense strikes broader than the prohibition of aiding and abetting.

[248] See, e.g., Krnojelac Trial Judgement, paras. 489-490 (finding a defendant liable for having aided and abetted the crime of persecution, which requires the specific intent to discriminate, where the principal perpetrators of the crime were not identified). Although the Appeals Chamber, on unrelated grounds, increased the defendant's level of responsibility to that of a co-perpetrator, it rejected the defendant's appeal against his conviction as an aider and abettor. See Krnojelac Appeal Judgement, paras. 35-53. See also Stakić Trial Judgement, para. 534 (stating that "an individual can be prosecuted for complicity even where the perpetrator has not been tried or even identified") (citing Musema Trial Judgement, para. 174); Akayesu Trial Judgement, para. 531 (same).

[249] See Vasiljević Trial Judgement, para. 143.

[250] In entering a conviction against General Krstić as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to commit genocide under Article 7(1) the Trial Chamber stated that he could also bear responsibility as a Commander pursuant to Article 7(3). The Trial Chamber concluded, however, that a conviction under Article 7(1) sufficiently expressed General Krstić's criminality. Trial Judgement, para. 652. The Appeals Chamber's determination that General Krstić is responsible as an aider and abettor is also based on Article 7(1). Even if General Krstić is also found to be responsible as a Commander, the Appeals Chamber concludes, as did the Trial Chamber, that the mode of liability under Article 7(1) best encapsulates General Krstić's criminality. This is because the most he could have done as a Commander was to report the use of his personnel and assets, in facilitating the killings, to the VRS Main Staff and to his superior, General Mladić, the very people who ordered the executions and were active participants in them. Further, although General Krstić could have tried to punish his subordinates for their participation in facilitating the executions, it is unlikely that he would have had the support of his superiors in doing so. See Krnojelac Trial Judgement, para. 127; not disturbed on appeal, see Krnojelac Appeal Judgement.

civilians under Article 3, violations of the laws or customs of war, and for extermination and persecution under Article 5, all of which arise from the executions of the Bosnian Muslims of Srebrenica between 13 and 19 July 1995. As the preceding factual examination has established, there was no evidence that Krstić ordered any of these murders, or that he directly participated in them. All the evidence can establish is that he knew that those murders were occurring and that he permitted the Main Staff to use personnel and resources under his command to facilitate them. In these circumstances the criminal responsibility of Radislav Krstić is that of an aider and abettor to the murders, extermination and persecution, and not of a principal co-perpetrator.

F. Radislav Krstić's Criminal Responsibility for the Opportunistic Crimes Committed at Potočari

145. The Defence also contests the findings of the Trial Chamber in relation to Krstić's criminal responsibility for the crimes committed on 12 and 13 July 1995 at Potočari. The Trial Chamber found that Radislav Krstić was a participant in a joint criminal enterprise to forcibly remove the Bosnian Muslim civilians from Potočari, and so incurred criminal responsibility for the murders, beatings and abuses committed there as natural and foreseeable consequences of that joint criminal enterprise. The Defence argues that these crimes were not natural and foreseeable consequences of the ethnic cleansing campaign, and that the Trial Chamber's finding that Krstić was aware of them is contrary to the presumption of innocence.

146. According to the Defence, the evidence established that he was at Potočari on 12 July 1995 for at most two hours. There was no evidence to support the conclusion of the Trial Chamber that he had "first-hand knowledge that the refugees were being mistreated by VRS or other armed forces," or that he witnessed the inhumane conditions of the White House and the killing of civilians there. The Defence argues that, to the contrary, the evidence establishes that there were orders from the military authorities to treat the civilians humanely.[251] The Defence refers to an order of 9 July 1995 issued by Mr. Karadžić as Supreme Commander of the Serb forces, which expressly provided that the civilian population was to be treated in accordance with the Geneva Conventions,[252] the evidence of Drazen Erdemović that soldiers entering the town of Srebrenica were explicitly told not to fire at civilians,[253] the intercept of 12 July 1995 in which Radislav Krstić stated that nothing must happen to the civilians transported from

H. Criminal Responsibility of General Krsti}

1. Introduction

600. The Prosecution alleges that General Krsti} is criminally responsible for his participation in the crimes charged in the indictment, pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute,[1339] which states that:

> A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

601. The Trial Chambers of the ICTY and the ICTR and the Appeals Chamber of the ICTY have identified the elements of the various heads of individual criminal responsibility in Article 7(1) of the Statute.[1340] The essential findings in the jurisprudence may be briefly summarised as follows:

- "Planning" means that one or more persons design the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases;[1341]
- "Instigating" means prompting another to commit an offence;[1342]
- "Ordering" entails a person in a position of authority using that position to convince another to commit an offence;[1343]
- "Committing" covers physically perpetrating a crime or engendering a culpable omission in violation of criminal law;[1344]
- "Aiding and abetting" means rendering a substantial contribution to the commission of a crime;[1345] and
- "Joint criminal enterprise" liability is a form of criminal responsibility which the Appeals Chamber found to be implicitly included in Article 7(1) of the Statute. It entails individual responsibility for participation in a joint criminal enterprise to commit a crime;[1346]

[1339] Para. 18 of the Indictment. In its Final Trial Brief (para. 27), the Prosecution makes reference to each head - except "committing" - mentioned in Article 7(1) as well as the "common purpose doctrine" (discussed below) as a basis for General Krsti}'s guilt.
[1340] Cf. Article 6(1) of the Statute of the ICTR. In its Final Trial Brief (para. 3), the Prosecution incorporates by reference its submissions on Article 7 in its Pre-Trial Brief (paras 13-86). Likewise, the Defence's submissions on Article 7 in its Pre-Trial Brief (paras 13-29) are incorporated in its Final Trial Brief (para. 2).

19. Accepting the testimony of Witness EE, the Trial Chamber concluded that [anti}, on 16 April 1993, participated in the attack on and the burning of Musafer Pu{}ul's house, which resulted, inter alia, in the murder of Musafer Pu{}ul.[26] The Trial Chamber held that [anti} "played an active role in the killing of Bosnian Muslim civilians in Ahmi}i, the destruction of Bosnian Muslim homes and property and the expulsion of Bosnian Muslims from the Ahmi}i-[anti}i region."[27]

20. The Trial Chamber found [anti} guilty of persecution as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(h) of the Statute (count 1); murder as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(a) of the Statute (count 16); and inhumane acts as a crime against humanity pursuant to Article 5(i) of the Statute (count 18). [anti} was sentenced to 25 years of imprisonment on count 1, 15 years of imprisonment on count 16, and 10 years of imprisonment on count 18, to be served concurrently.

III. GENERAL ISSUES

A. Appropriate grounds of appeal

21. In view of the nature of the arguments advanced by some of the parties to this appeal, the Appeals Chamber considers it appropriate to discuss initially the issue of the grounds of appeal that an appellant can legitimately raise. Such a discussion begins with Article 25 of the Statute, which provides the authority for the Appeals Chamber's function to hear appeals. This provision states:

> 1. The Appeals Chamber shall hear appeals from persons convicted by the Trial Chambers or from the Prosecutor on the following two grounds:
>
> (a) an error on a question of law invalidating the decision; or
>
> (b) an error of fact which has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.
> 2. The Appeals Chamber may affirm, reverse or revise the decisions taken by the Trial Chambers.

22. As has been held by the Appeals Chamber on numerous occasions, an appeal is not an opportunity for the parties to reargue their cases. It does not involve a trial de novo.[28] On appeal, parties must limit their arguments to matters that fall within the scope of Article 25 of the Statute. The general rule is that the Appeals Chamber will not entertain arguments that do not allege legal errors invalidating the judgement, or factual errors occasioning a miscarriage of justice, apart from the exceptional situation where a party has raised a legal issue that is of general significance to the Tribunal's jurisprudence.[29] Only in such a rare case may the Appeals Chamber consider it appropriate to make an exception to the general rule.

23. Some of the parties in the instant case have advanced arguments that do not fall within the scope of Article 25 of the Statute and to which the exception to the general rule does not apply. For example, Zoran Kupre{ki} appears to take issue with certain general allegations set out in paragraph 9 of the Amended Indictment, such as the accusations that he helped prepare the April attack on Ahmi}i- [anti}i by participating in military training; evacuating Bosnian Croat civilians the night before the attack; organising HVO soldiers, weapons and ammunition in and around the village; and concealing from the other residents that the attack was imminent.[30] A review of the factual and legal findings pertaining to Zoran Kupre{ki} demonstrate that these allegations did not play a part in his conviction on count 1 (persecution). In such a situation, the argument does not have the potential to affect the outcome of this appeal and, therefore, does not constitute an appropriate ground of appeal. Zoran Kupre{ki} further complains that the Trial Chamber failed to establish whether he was a perpetrator or a co-perpetrator of the crime for which he was convicted.[31] The Appeals Chamber considers this argument to be misconceived. The Trial Chamber found in paragraph 782 of the Trial Judgement that he, in the commission of persecution, "acted as a co-perpetrator...within the meaning of Article 7(1) of the Statute".

24. The Appeals Chamber finds that these arguments made by Zoran Kupre{ki} illustrate grounds of appeal that cannot appropriately be argued on appeal since they fail to raise errors of law or fact that invalidate the judgement or that have occasioned a miscarriage of justice. Accordingly, they are dismissed.

25. In a similar vein, the Appeals Chamber dismisses Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki}'s common argument that the Trial Chamber incorrectly attributed the defence of reciprocity (tu quoque) to them. The Trial Chamber rejected this as a legitimate defence. The Trial Judgement stated that "[d]efence counsel have indirectly or implicitly relied upon the tu quoque principle".[32] Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} have both emphatically denied that they raised such a defence before the Trial Chamber. It may well have been that neither Zoran nor Mirjan Kupre{ki} intended to raise this particular defence, but that the Trial Chamber interpreted their arguments to fall under the tu

[30] Zoran Kupre{ki} Appeal Brief, para. 10. Zoran Kupre{ki} also takes issue with the allegation that he helped prepare the onslaught on Ahmi}i by preparing his home and the homes of his relatives as staging areas and firing locations for the attack. Due to the fact that this allegation did play a part in his conviction it is dealt with in substance infra paras. 233-241.

B. Reconsideration of factual findings made by the Trial Chamber

1. General principles

28. Under this heading, the Appeals Chamber will discuss the standard that applies with respect to the reconsideration of factual findings by the Trial Chamber. The vast majority of the grounds of appeal raised by the Defendants in this case concerns alleged errors of fact. Several of the parties to the present appeal have also raised questions of a more general nature relating to the Appeals Chamber's review of errors of fact under Article 25(1)(b) of the Statute.[36] In light thereof, the Appeals Chamber considers it appropriate to elaborate upon this matter.

29. In order for the Appeals Chamber to overturn a factual finding by the Trial Chamber, an appellant must demonstrate that the Trial Chamber committed a factual error and the error resulted in a miscarriage of justice.[37] The appellant must establish that the error of fact was critical to the verdict reached by the Trial Chamber, thereby resulting in a "grossly unfair outcome in judicial proceedings, as when a defendant is convicted despite a lack of evidence on an essential element of the crime."[38] Consequently, it is not each and every error of fact that will cause the Appeals Chamber to overturn a decision of the Trial Chamber, but only one that has occasioned a miscarriage of justice.[39]

30. Pursuant to the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, the task of hearing, assessing and weighing the evidence presented at trial is left primarily to the Trial Chamber. Thus, the Appeals Chamber must give a margin of deference to a finding of fact reached by a Trial Chamber. Only where the evidence relied on by the Trial Chamber could not have been accepted by any reasonable tribunal of fact or where the evaluation of the evidence is "wholly erroneous" may the Appeals Chamber substitute its own finding for that of the Trial Chamber. It must be borne in mind that two judges, both acting reasonably, can come to different conclusions on the basis of the same evidence.[40]

31. As stated above, it is initially the Trial Chamber's task to assess and weigh the evidence presented at trial. In that exercise, it has the discretion to "admit any relevant evidence which it to find that Vlatko Kupreškic's employment with the police continued until the time of the Ahmici attack in April 1993. Therefore, in the light of the additional evidence, the Appeals Chamber finds that no reasonable tribunal of fact could conclude that Vlatko Kupreškic was an active operations officer at the time of the attack. That finding therefore cannot be sustained.

2. Unloading weapons from a car in front of his house in October 1992

275. At trial, Witness T testified that in October 1992, just before dusk, she saw Vlatko Kupreškic, his wife and a man unload weapons from a Yugo car and take them into Vlatko Kupreškic's house.[442]

276. Vlatko Kupre{ki} alleges that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting, beyond reasonable doubt, the correctness of Witness T's allegation that weapons were being taken into the house. There was, he argues, no evidence as to what type of weapons the witness saw, the sighting was made at dusk and, furthermore, the distance between Witness T and Vlatko Kupreškic was some 50 metres. In combination, maintains Vlatko Kupre{ki}, these factors raise a significant risk that the observation was inaccurate. Moreover, during cross-examination of Witness T at trial, defence counsel failed to challenge her purported observation of Vlatko Kupreškic.[443] However, the Defendant does rely upon Witness T's acceptance, under cross-examination, that in October 1992 there was tension in the Vitez area of Bosnia-Herzegovina between Croats and Serbs, rather than Croats and Muslims.[444] Consequently, according to Vlatko Kupre{ki}, Witness T's testimony cannot be used to support a finding that he was involved in the Muslim attack in April 1993.[445] The Prosecution counters that Witness T's evidence is "cogent and compelling".[446] No new evidence was admitted on appeal in relation to this issue. Rather, Vlatko Kupre{ki} asks the Appeals Chamber to find that the Trial Chamber erred in reaching this conclusion on the basis of the original trial record.

277. As to the complaint that the witness was not cross-examined on her observation, responsibility for the failure to challenge Witness T's purported observation must rest with defence counsel. However, so far as the witness' vague reference to "weapons" is concerned, responsibility must rest with the Prosecution, which failed to elicit, from its own witness, any clarification of what the term "weapons" meant. The Appeals Chamber finds that the probative value of this vague testimony as evidence of an act specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of persecutory acts is very low indeed. This is particularly so considering that an act of aiding and abetting must have had a substantial effect on the commission of persecutory acts. There was no evidence that the "weapons", whatever they were, were ever used during the Ahmici attack. Also, the length of time between Witness T's observations and the attack on Ahmici the following April (some six months), diminishes the likelihood that the weapons were intended to be used for attacking the local Muslim population. In sum, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in using the evidence of Witness T that she saw Vlatko Kupreškic unloading weapons from his car in October 1992 in order to support an inference that he thereby assisted with the April 1993 attack on Ahmici.

3. Vlatko Kupreškic was in front of the Hotel Vitez on 15 April 1993

278. Evidence as to Vlatko Kupreškic's presence in front of the Hotel Vitez on 15 April 1993 came from a single witness: Witness B.[447] He testified that he saw Vlatko Kupreškic at the Hotel Vitez three to five times between October 1992 and April 1993. Further, on 15 April, while travelling past the hotel in a car at around 2 or 3 p.m., he saw Vlatko Kupreškic standing in civilian clothes with two or three men in uniform. He specified that Vlatko Kupreškic was not more than 30 metres away from the front door of the entrance to the hotel.

(a) The additional evidence

279. The evidence of Witness AT casts additional light on the events at the Hotel Vitez on 15 April 1993. According to Witness AT, General Blaškic held two meetings at the Hotel Vitez during which the plan to attack Ahmici on 16 April was announced. One meeting involved the civilian leaders of the HVO and at the other, the military leaders were in attendance. Witness AT notes that Mirko Samija, Chief of Police of Vitez Police Station, was present at both meetings.

(b) Discussion

280. Vlatko Kupre{ki} argues that Witness B's observations were made in difficult circumstances. He was in a moving car and the distance between his vehicle and the person observed was some 30 metres. In such circumstance, the Defendant suggests, there was "an even chance of mistaken identification".[448] Further, the sighting could only have been fleeting, and the image obscured.[449] evidence of Witness H, Josipovic has not demonstrated any such omission on the Trial Chamber's part relevant to the testimony of Witness EE. Rather, it is obvious from the paragraph just cited that the Trial Chamber was fully aware that Witness EE was mistaken in her identification of two of the six attackers and, indeed, made a specific finding to that effect. The Trial Chamber, nonetheless, accepted that Witness EE was accurate in her identification of two of the other attackers: Josipovic and [antic. Thus, in essence, Josipovic simply asks the Appeals Chamber to re-examine the same issue addressed by the Trial Chamber and reach a different conclusion, namely, that Witness EE was mistaken in her identification of him because she was mistaken in her identification of two other men.

332. It is of course open to a Trial Chamber, and indeed any tribunal of fact, to reject part of a witness' testimony and accept the rest. It is clearly possible for a witness to be correct in her assessment of certain facts and incorrect about others. In the present case, the Trial Chamber heard evidence from Witness EE as to who had attacked her home and killed her husband on 16 April 1993. It found her a "trustworthy and careful witness who identified the two accused in a statement made within three weeks of these offences and has not, in any way, retracted it."[511] The Trial Chamber did not accept Witness EE's evidence as to the presence of Alilovi} and Katava in Ahmici that morning. This does not, however, preclude the Trial Chamber from relying on the evidence of Witness EE to find that Josipovi} and [antic did attack her house on 16 April 1993. Indeed, the Trial Chamber's finding that [antic was present during the attack, despite his assertion of alibi at trial, has subsequently been borne out by Witness AT's testimony.

333. The jurisprudence of this Tribunal confirms that it is not unreasonable for a tribunal of fact to accept some, but reject other, parts of a witness' testimony.[512] The situation before the Appeals Chamber in the present case is akin to those cases within the jury system where a jury returns different verdicts on different counts even though the evidence for all counts comes from one witness. In the instant case, had Alilovi} and Katava been on trial with Josipovi} they would, based on the alibi evidence, have most certainly been acquitted.

334. During its analysis of the complaints raised by Zoran and Mirjan Kupreškic about the Trial Chamber's assessment of Witness H's evidence, the Appeals Chamber emphasised the importance of assessing the credibility of a witness in light of the trial record as a whole. The Appeals [512] Prosecutor v Tadi}, Case No.: IT-94-1-T, Opinion and Judgement, 7 May 1997, paras 296-302. The same applies in domestic courts. For example, in England and Wales, in cases where different counts depend on the uncorroborated evidence of the same witness and the credibility of the witness is put in issue, different verdicts on the different counts would not render the convictions unsafe. See Archbold: Criminal Pleadings, Evidence and Practice 2000, § 7-70 (P.J. sentences of imprisonment received were less than his.[703] He argues similarly, with regard to certain cases before the ICTY.[704]

441. The Prosecution responds that the Trial Chamber's discussion of Šantic's sentence clearly illustrates that it followed its standard sentencing policy and that the principles enunciated by it, have been repeatedly confirmed by the Appeals Chamber.[705] It submits that Šantic "does not even offer the minimum elements that would justify a comparison" between his case and those cited.[706] It maintains that, as for comparison with cases before the Tribunal, there is no identifiable penal regime in the Tribunal and, as long as they stay within boundaries established by the Statute and the Rules, "Trial Chambers have unfettered discretion to apply the sentence they deem most appropriate for the case before them."[707]

442. The Appeals Chamber notes Šantic's submission that "the gravity of the offence is the decisive factor in imposing the sentence...The gravity of the crime includes the discussion of the consequences of the crime when imposing the sentence."[708] The Appeals Chamber concurs. In sentencing, a Trial Chamber must start from the position that "the gravity of the offence is the primary consideration in imposing sentence."[709] In this case, the Trial Chamber acted no differently. Indeed, the following principle in the Trial Judgement has now been endorsed in several decisions by the Appeals Chamber:

> The sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime.[710]

443. In considering the inherent gravity of a crime, a Trial Chamber is under no obligation to expressly compare the case of one accused to that of another. Counsel on behalf of all the Defendants submitted that "[i]t must be fundamentally fair for people who have committed like crimes in like circumstances to receive like sentences."[711] The Appeals Chamber again does not dispute this assertion. However, although it has expressly found in a previous case that it "does not

Although this paragraph is contained within the section devoted to Zoran and Mirjan Kupreškic, the Appeals Chamber considers that it is a principle that must have been applied by the Trial Chamber in its consideration of the sentences of the Defendants collectively, being general in nature.

3. Findings of the Trial Chamber

333. The Trial Chamber considers that the Prosecution has adduced convincing evidence to show that the attack on Ahmici on 16 April 1993 was planned by HVO forces and the special unit of the Croatian Military Police called the Jokers. The Croatian inhabitants of Ahmici, or at least those of them who belonged to the HVO or were in contact with Croatian armed forces, knew that in the early morning of the 16 April 1993, Croatian forces would initiate a massive military attack. It is plausible to maintain that they acquired the conviction that an attack would be carried out at least on the occasion of the meeting that was held around 2.30 a.m., on 16 April, in Jozo Livancic's house. The Trial Chamber regards as credible the evidence led by the Prosecution to the effect that by 15 April many signs already indicated that a military operation was in the offing, and that many Croats were aware of this.

334. The Trial Chamber finds that the attack was carried out by military units of the HVO and members of the Jokers. The able-bodied Croatian inhabitants of Ahmici provided assistance and support in various forms. Some of them took part in the military operations against the Muslims. It is also true, however, that a few Croatian inhabitants of Ahmici endeavoured to save Muslim friends or neighbours by prompting them to escape and helping them in such attempts, or at any rate by providing them with suggestions as to how to avoid being killed.

335. The attackers targeted Muslim civilians and their houses. The Trial Chamber considers it to have been proved that there were no Muslim military forces in Ahmici nor any military establishment belonging to the BiH army. In addition to the men not of military age, the elderly, women and children, there were also able-bodied Muslims who were members on leave from the BiH army, or reservists who participated in the village guards. When the Croatian forces initiated the attack, not more than 10-15 Muslims in in order to strengthen the resolve of all involved not to allow crimes against international humanitarian law to be committed as well as to create trust in and respect for the developing system of international criminal justice.

849. The Trial Chamber also supports the purpose of rehabilitation for persons convicted in the hope that in future, if faced with similar circumstances, they will uphold the rule of law.

3. Factors Relevant to Sentencing in Respect of Each Accused

850. The Trial Chamber will next consider the various factors which influence the determination of appropriate sentences for each accused convicted, in accordance with the provisions of Article 24 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules of Procedure and Evidence.

(a) Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki}

851. Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} have been found guilty on Count 1 (persecution as a crime against humanity under Article 5(h) of the Statute).

852. The sentences to be imposed must reflect the inherent gravity of the criminal conduct of the accused. The determination of the gravity of the crime requires a consideration of the particular circumstances of the case, as well as the form and degree of the participation of the accused in the crime. Zoran and Mirjan Kupre{ki} have been found guilty of persecution in the form of the expulsion of Muslim civilians, including women and children from Ahmi}i-[anti}i and its environs, the destruction of Bosnian Muslim homes and property and their active presence in the area whilst armed. In particular, they entered the house and expelled the family of Suhret Ahmi}. This is in spite of the fact that even as late as March 1993 both attended Muslim holiday celebrations. Of the two accused, Zoran Kupre{ki} played a more leading role as the local commander.

853. The fact that Zoran Kupre{ki} and Mirjan Kupre{ki} voluntarily surrendered to the International Tribunal on 6 October 1997 is a factor in mitigation of their sentence.

JUDGEMENT

The Office of the Prosecutor:

Mr. David Re
Ms. Kelly Howick

Mr. Krstan Simić for Miroslav Kvočka
Mr. Toma Fila for Mlado Radić opinion will not be defective as a result of a failure to refer to a witness, even one whose evidence contradicts the findings of the Trial Chamber.[72] In the Prosecution's view, the Trial Chamber is only required to make findings of those facts which are essential to a determination of guilt on a particular point, and is not required to make findings in relation to other facts which are not essential, even if they were expressly alleged in the indictment.[73]

23. The Appeals Chamber recalls that every accused has the right to a reasoned opinion under Article 23 of the Statute and Rule 98*ter*(C) of the Rules.[74] However, this requirement relates to the Trial Chamber's Judgement; the Trial Chamber is not under the obligation to justify its findings in relation to every submission made during the trial. The Appeals Chamber recalls that it is in the discretion of the Trial Chamber as to which legal arguments to address. With regard to the factual findings, the Trial Chamber is required only to make findings of those facts which are essential to the determination of guilt on a particular count. It is not necessary to refer to the testimony of every witness or every piece of evidence on the trial record.[75] It is to be presumed that the Trial Chamber evaluated all the evidence presented to it, as long as there is no indication that the Trial Chamber completely disregarded any particular piece of evidence. There may be an indication of disregard when evidence which is clearly relevant to the findings is not addressed by the Trial Chamber's reasoning, but not every inconsistency which the Trial Chamber failed to discuss renders its opinion defective. Considering the fact that minor inconsistencies commonly occur in witness testimony without rendering it unreliable, it is within the discretion of the Trial Chamber to evaluate it and to consider whether the evidence as a whole is credible, without explaining its decision in every detail.[76] If the Trial Chamber did not refer to the evidence given by a witness, even if it is in contradiction to the Trial Chamber's finding, it is to be presumed that the Trial Chamber assessed and weighed the evidence, but found that the evidence did not prevent it from arriving at its actual findings. It is therefore not possible to draw any inferences about the quality of a judgement from the length of particular parts of a judgement in relation to other judgements or parts of the same judgement.

24. The Appeals Chamber notes that, in certain cases, the requirements to be met by the Trial Chamber are higher. As an example of a complex issue, the Appeals Chamber considered the appraisal of witness testimony with regard to the identity of the accused:

the accused knows that his assistance is supporting the crimes of a group of persons involved in a joint criminal enterprise and shares that intent, then he may be found criminally responsible for the crimes committed in furtherance of that common purpose as a co-perpetrator.

91. The Appeals Chamber emphasizes that joint criminal enterprise is simply a means of committing a crime; it is not a crime in itself.[203] Therefore, it would be inaccurate to refer to aiding and abetting a joint criminal enterprise. The aider and abettor assists the principal perpetrator or perpetrators in committing the crime.

92. The Appeals Chamber notes that the distinction between these two forms of participation is important, both to accurately describe the crime and to fix an appropriate sentence. Aiding and abetting generally involves a lesser degree of individual criminal responsibility than co-perpetration in a joint criminal enterprise.[204]

3. What level of contribution is required to show participation in a joint criminal enterprise?

93. Each of the Appellants raises questions concerning the level of contribution required to be a participant in a joint criminal enterprise.[205]

94. The Prosecution responds that the determination of what types of conduct amount to a significant contribution is, as stated in the Trial Judgement, to be based on the facts.[206] It further states that "any participation which enables the system to run more smoothly or without disruption would constitute a case of significant contribution".[207]

95. The Trial Chamber held that:

> [P]ersons who work in a job or participate in a system in which crimes are committed on such a large scale and systematic basis incur individual criminal responsibility if they knowingly participate in the criminal endeavor, and their acts or omissions significantly assist or facilitate the commission of crimes.[208]

It stressed that not everyone working in a detention camp where conditions are abusive automatically becomes liable as a participant in a joint criminal enterprise:

respect, like a superior. She saw Kvočka going round the camp, positioning the guards. She had never heard anyone refuse to act upon Kvočka's word. Kvočka shared an office with Željko Meakić, and when Željko Meakić was off duty, Kvočka would take his place.[337]

153. The Appeals Chamber finds that Kvočka did not advance relevant objections to Witness J's testimony. She admitted freely that she was not certain about the exact dates of her observations,[338] but such uncertainty is understandable when a witness gives evidence about events after several years. The alleged personal motive for a false accusation remains vague and is not supported by any evidence. Even if such a motive existed, the mere existence of a personal conflict between a witness and an accused does not render the witness' evidence per se unreliable. The fact that the witness, after testifying before the Trial Chamber, chose to appear in public, does not have an impact on the reliability of her testimony; Kvočka does not claim that she applied for protective measures under false pretences. The Appeals Chamber, therefore, finds that Kvočka's arguments with regard to Witness J are without merit.

(b) Witness Azedin Oklopčić

154. Kvočka submits that the testimony of Azedin Oklopčić, that Kvočka and Meakić had a particular status because they took 24-hour shifts, whereas other guards and shift leaders took 12-hour shifts, should not have been accepted. He argues that this statement was not confirmed by any other witness.[339] The Prosecution replies that although the witness was incorrect on this detail of Kvočka's and Meakić's shifts, the Trial Chamber relied on other sufficiently compelling evidence to find that Kvočka occupied a position of influence and authority.[340]

155. The Appeals Chamber acknowledges that Azedin Oklopčić stated that Željko Meakić and Kvočka took turns every 24 hours, as opposed to the shift leaders and the guards.[341] However, even if this statement is incorrect, this would not raise any doubts as to the reliability of Azedin Oklopčić's evidence. Kvočka had stated that he had no fixed schedule, and that his working times in the camp were irregular.[342] It was, therefore, easy for an observer to be mistaken about Kvočka's working schedule. Moreover, Azedin Oklopčić did not rely on this particular observation for his conclusion that Kvočka was the deputy commander of the camp. He stated that he believed that Kvočka was the deputy commander because the guards and shift leaders treated him respectfully.

[342] Miroslav Kvočka, T. 8154.

He observed that the guard leaders would go to see him and Željko Meakić for consultations, and that he distributed food and cigarettes among the guards. Finally, Azedin Oklopčić remarked that the shift changeover would always take place in the presence of the commander or the deputy commander, and that he had seen Kvočka on several of these occasions.[343] The reasoning that Kvočka distributed food and cigarettes among the guards may not be conclusive, if assessed on its own. However, viewed in their entirety, Azedin Oklopčić's reasons for his assumption that Kvočka held the position of deputy commander are not unreasonable. The Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber could reasonably rely on the evidence given by Azedin Oklopčić to support its findings.

(c) Witness AJ

156. Kvočka argues that the Trial Chamber erred in accepting the testimony of Witness AJ that Kvočka was a deputy commander of the camp, because he approved the change of the witness's location. He submits that this conclusion is erroneous, because any guard had the authority to assign a detainee to a specific location, as shown by the testimony of Witness AN and Nusret Sivac.[344] The Prosecution responds that Witness AJ testified that he was informed by a guard that Kvočka was in a position to decide if he could be detained in another location, which was not inconsistent with Witness AN's evidence that guards could send detainees to various places of detention after interrogation.[345]

157. The relevant part of Witness AJ's testimony reads as follows:

> I got this from Miroslav Kvocka, because he [an unknown guard] said, "Interrogation and then to the pista." And I said, "Well, I'd like to go where I was before." And he said, "You have to ask Kvocka about that." Then it happened by chance that Kvocka happened to be there, and I asked him, and he gave me a piece of paper. He wrote -- what he wrote on it, I don't remember. But I gave this piece of paper to the man over there on guard. Who it was, I can't really remember now, but I gave him the piece of paper, and then I went to Mujo's rooms.[346]

From this statement it becomes clear that the guard, who had been asked by Witness AJ first, did not have the competence to allow Witness AJ to change his place, whereas Kvočka did. The witness called Kvočka explicitly a commander, even if he was unsure about the exact command structure in the camp.[347] The Appeals Chamber finds that a reasonable Trial Chamber could infer from this testimony that Kvočka had more authority than a simple guard.

perpetrator in a joint criminal enterprise had been satisfied. He requests the Appeals Chamber to set aside the Trial Chamber's finding on this point.

179. The Appeals Chamber finds that Kvočka's arguments in support of this ground need to be somewhat restructured in order to be more clearly assessed. To this end, the Appeals Chamber decided not to follow the order in which Kvočka presented his arguments in his Appeal Brief but rather favoured a methodical approach, first, to the issues relating to the actus reus, and then to those relating to the mens rea.

180. The Appeals Chamber proposes to rule at the outset on one of the arguments put forward by Kvočka in this ground of appeal. In his Brief in Reply, Kvočka submits that the present case does not involve concentration camps, and that consequently, his responsibility must fall under the first category of joint criminal enterprise.[391] He also argues that the Prosecution did not prove beyond reasonable doubt the existence of such an enterprise, nor the existence of a common plan shared by him and others.[392]

181. A close analysis of the Trial Judgement shows that the Trial Chamber contemplated Kvočka's responsibility under the second category of joint criminal enterprise:

> Although the first two categories enunciated by Tadic are quite similar, and all three are applicable to this case to some degree, the second category, which embraces the post war "concentration camp" cases, best resonates with the facts of this case and is the one upon which the Trial Chamber will focus most of its attention. The Trial Chamber will examine and elaborate upon the standards to be applied in assessing criminal liability of participants in a detention facility which operates as a joint criminal enterprise.[393]

182. The Appeals Chamber wishes to point out that, although commonly referred to as the "category known as concentration camps", the second category of joint criminal enterprise, known as systemic, covers all cases relating to an organised system with a common criminal purpose perpetrated against the detainees. This concept of criminal responsibility has been shaped by the case-law derived from concentration camp cases from the Second World War, but reference to the concentration camps is circumstantial and in no way limits the application of this mode of responsibility to those detention camps similar to concentration camps.[394]

183. The Trial Chamber found that Omarska camp was a joint criminal enterprise the purpose of which was to persecute and subjugate non-Serb detainees.[395] Kvočka did not succeed in

748. The extreme gravity of the crimes committed by @igi} has already been noted by the Trial Chamber. The Defense asserts that many of the crimes were committed when Zigic was intoxicated. The Trial Chamber rejects @igi}'s claim that intoxication should be a mitigating factor and instead finds it an aggravating factor. However, because the issue was not raised by the Prosecution, it declines to treat it as an aggravating factor in this case.

749. @igi} was transferred to the Tribunal on 16 April 1998 and thus he has been in the custody of the Tribunal for just over 3½ years.

(a) Whether the applicability of in dubio pro reo is limited to ultimate conclusions of guilt

21. The Appeals Chamber is satisfied that the principle of in dubio pro reo, as a corollary to the presumption of innocence, and the burden of proof beyond a reasonable doubt,[43] applies to findings required for conviction, such as those which make up the elements of the crime charged. This approach is consistent with the case-law of the International Tribunal and is a logical approach, given that, in the context of issues of fact, the principle is essentially just one aspect of the requirement that guilt must be found beyond a reasonable doubt.[44] In Naletilić and Martinović, the Appeals Chamber recognized the applicability of this principle to the mens rea requirement of knowledge of the existence of an armed conflict.[45] Similarly, the Naletilić and Martinović Trial Chamber applied the principle in the context of the crime of torture: It held that the evidence did not allow the Trial Chamber to distinguish between beatings that were inflicted with a specific purpose – which is required to establish the crime of torture - and beatings that may have been inflicted for reasons of pure cruelty, but not with a specific purpose. Consequently, the Trial Chamber found in dubio pro reo that the specific purpose necessary for torture had not been established beyond reasonable doubt.[46] Further, the principle of in dubio pro reo is not applied to individual pieces of evidence and findings of fact on which the judgement does not rely. For example, in Kvočka et al., the Appeals Chamber dismissed Prcać's argument that the Trial Chamber failed to apply the principle when it found that Prcać was an administrative assistant at the Omarska camp.[47] The Appeals Chamber held that the finding that Prcać was an administrative assistant was not a fact aimed at conviction or an element of the crime charged, and thus the in dubio pro reo inquiry did not apply.

(b) Application of the in dubio pro reo principle

22. The Appeals Chamber is not satisified that Haradin Bala has established that the Trial Chamber misapplied the principle of in dubio pro reo to his identification as the guard known as Shala. The Trial Chamber reasonably assessed all of the evidence, including the failure of three eye-witnesses to identify Haradin Bala,[48] his alibi and his health at the relevant time,[49] and concluded

3. Whether the Trial Chamber failed to provide a reasoned opinion for the rejection of Haradin Bala's alibi

80. Haradin Bala submits that the Trial Chamber failed to provide a reasoned opinion for its rejection of his alibi that he was not in Llapushnik/Lapušnik in June and July of 1998.[195] The Prosecution claims this assertion should be summarily rejected as unsubstantiated.[196]

81. The fair trial requirements of the Statute include the right of each accused to a reasoned opinion by the Trial Chamber under Article 23 of the Statute and Rule 98*ter*(C) of the Rules.[197] A reasoned opinion ensures that the accused can exercise his or her right of appeal and that the Appeals Chamber can carry out its statutory duty under Article 25 to review these appeals.[198] The reasoned opinion requirement, however, relates to a Trial Chamber's judgement rather than to each and every submission made at trial.[199]

82. The Trial Chamber, in a nine-page section of the Trial Judgement entitled "Haradin Bala's alibi", thoroughly considered Haradin Bala's alibi evidence, first addressing the alibi that he was not in the crime area when the crimes were committed[200] and then addressing the alibi that he was physically incapable of committing these crimes.[201] It described his submissions;[202] assessed the evidence presented by witnesses Kadri Dugolli, Elmi Sopi, Shefki Bala, Skender Bylykbaski, Avdullah Puka, Dr. Zequir Gashi, Ferat Sopi, and Ruzhdi Karpuzi; explained whether it found the witnesses' testimony credible and persuasive and, if not, why not; and pointed out inconsistencies.[203] Thus, the Trial Judgement offers a reasoned opinion for its rejection of Haradin Bala's alibi.

83. Consequently, Haradin Bala's sixth ground of appeal is dismissed.

E. Haradin Bala's eighth ground of appeal: alleged error in finding Witnesses L04 and L06 credible

84. Haradin Bala submits that the Trial Chamber erred in fact when it found Witnesses L04 and L06 to be credible as there were obvious inconsistencies between their 9 January 2005 post-

121. In the alternative to Haradin Bala's criminal responsibility as a member of the systemic joint criminal enterprise, the Prosecution submits that he aided and abetted the cruel treatment and torture of detainees in the prison camp.[315]

122. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Indictment charges Haradin Bala with criminal responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute for having, inter alia, aided and abetted in the commission of these crimes.[316] This form of participation has been litigated at trial and the Trial Chamber found Haradin Bala guilty of having aided and abetted the torture of Witness L12 and an incident of cruel treatment of Witness L04. However, the Trial Chamber did not find him criminally responsible for having aided and abetted any other incident of cruel treatment or torture.[317]

123. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied, however, that it is the only reasonable inference from the evidence that, in addition to the convictions for aiding and abetting already entered by the Trial Chamber, Haradin Bala incurs criminal responsibility for having aided and abetted the other instances of cruel treatment and torture of detainees in the Llapushnik/Lapušnik prison camp. While the findings of the Trial Chamber show that Haradin Bala played a pivotal role in the functioning of the prison camp,[318] it was open for a trier of fact to conclude that the evidence did not show beyond a reasonable doubt that Haradin Bala knowingly provided substantial assistance as an aider and abettor to each act of cruel treatment or torture in the prison camp. Apart from the evidence in relation to Haradin Bala's participation as a committer or an aider and abettor in specific incidents of cruel treatment and torture, which the Trial Chamber duly considered in paragraphs 654 through 663 of the Trial Judgement, it is a reasonable inference from the evidence to find that Haradin Bala did not provide substantial assistance with respect to other crimes.

2. Conclusion

124. Consequently, the Prosecution's first ground of appeal is rejected in its entirety.

B. Second ground of appeal: Sentence

125. In the alternative to its first ground of appeal, the Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber erred in exercising its sentencing discretion by sentencing Haradin Bala to the manifestly inadequate sentence of 13 years of imprisonment.[319] The Prosecution argues that the Trial Chamber's error was three-fold. First, the sentence does not reflect the gravity of Haradin Bala's of the JCE were "a natural and foreseeable consequence thereof" must be assessed in relation to the knowledge of a particular accused.[1680]

(c) Planning

513. It has been said that "planning" implies that one or several persons plan or design the commission of a crime at both the preparatory and execution phases.[1681] The actus reus of "planning" requires that one or more persons plan or design the criminal conduct constituting one or more crimes provided for in the Statute, which are later perpetrated.[1682] It is sufficient to demonstrate that the planning was a factor substantially contributing to such criminal conduct.[1683] A person who plans an act or omission with an intent that the crime be committed, or with an awareness of the substantial likelihood that a crime will be committed in the execution of that plan, has the requisite mens rea for establishing responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute for planning.[1684]

(d) Instigating

514. In the jurisprudence of the Tribunal, the term "instigating" has been defined to mean "prompting another to commit an offence."[1685] Both acts and omissions may constitute instigating, which covers express and implied conduct.[1686] A nexus between the instigation and the perpetration must be demonstrated;[1687] but it need not be shown that the crime would not have occurred without the accused's involvement.[1688] The actus reus is satisfied if it is shown that the conduct of the accused was a factor substantially contributing to the perpetrator's conduct.[1689] The requisite mens rea for "instigating" is that the accused intended to provoke or induce the commission of the crime, or was aware of the substantial likelihood that a crime would be committed in the execution of that instigation.[1690] to improve the conditions. It was a case of too little, too rarely. Occasionally, and irregularly, he would supervise the emptying of the bucket in each of the storage room and cowshed which served as a toilet for all detainees.[2228] In the beginning there was not even a bucket. However, this was not done frequently enough and the buckets overflowed. In the cowshed, at least, chained detainees and those tied to each other were left with no option but to soil themselves in their clothing. Haradin Bala did nothing to enable medical care for the many who were in need of it, even though he knew that a clinic was nearby.[2229] Haradin Bala personally participated thus, through his omissions, in the maintenance and enforcement of the conditions of detention to which the prisoners were subjected, a material element of the crime of cruel treatment. As those conditions were maintained over many weeks, during which Haradin Bala frequently entered the rooms where prisoners were kept and at times provided assistance to them, his failure to do so on numerous other occasions leaves the Chamber persuaded that he had an intent to maintain those conditions of detention. Accordingly, in the Chamber's finding, it has been established that Haradin Bala committed, together with other persons, the crime of cruel treatment.

653. The Chamber has found, in respect of some of the acts of mistreatment and killing charged in the Indictment, that the elements of the crimes of cruel treatment, torture and murder, as violations of the laws or customs of war under Article 3 of the Statute, have been established. In some of these cases there is no evidence of Haradin Bala's direct involvement in the commission of the crime. The evidence demonstrates, however, that Haradin Bala took action which was to some extent related to the commission of others of those crimes.

654. The first incident relates to the mistreatment of L06 which the Chamber has found to constitute cruel treatment and torture.[2230] In the testimony of L10, L06 was taken out of the room by Shala, who in the finding of the Chamber was the Accused Haradin Bala, and, when L06 was brought back, he said he had been beaten. L06 himself stated that Haradin Bala only untied his chains on the day preceding the night when he was beaten and that he was taken out of the room and back by other persons.[2231] The accounts given by L06 and L10 differ as far as the role played by Haradin Bala is concerned. Because of L06's direct involvement in the incident, the Chamber is not prepared to prefer L10's account as more reliable in this particular respect. The Chamber proceeds, therefore, on the basis that the only action of Haradin Bala that might relate to the beating of L06 was untying L06's chains a few hours before the mistreatment. However, the link between his action and the actual mistreatment is far from clear. Even though the name of Shala was mentioned by L06 in the context of the particular incident of beating, it has not been established whether the untying of L06's chains was in any way related to the subsequent beating. For these reasons, the Prosecution has not established that Haradin Bala participated in any way in the actual beating of L06.

655. L10 testified to being mistreated by Shala, who was identified as Haradin Bala. As found earlier in this decision, Haradin Bala pointed a gun at L10's head and threatened him.[2232] The incident has been found to constitute the offence of cruel treatment. The direct participation of Haradin Bala in the commission of this crime has been established. He can only have acted with the intent of inflicting mental suffering upon L10. Accordingly, the Chamber finds Haradin Bala responsible for having perpetrated the crime of cruel treatment in this instance.

656. A further incident involving Haradin Bala relates to the mistreatment of L04 which the Chamber has found constituted cruel treatment.[2233] L04 stated that Shala was told by Tamuli to untie L04. As established earlier, L04 was then blindfolded, taken out of the room and beaten by individuals L04 believed to be Tamuli and Qerqiz.[2234] Shala had an automatic weapon and was guarding the door. He, however, did not personally join in the beating of L04.[2235] The Chamber accepts the evidence of L04 on the circumstances of his mistreatment. It finds that Haradin Bala did not inflict physical suffering on L04. He did, however, provide practical assistance to the direct perpetrators of the offence of cruel treatment. He better ensured there was no prospect of L04 escaping from the beating, or of the beating being seen or disrupted by third persons. In the Chamber's finding, Haradin Bala's involvement had thus a "substantial effect on the commission"[2236] of the crime of cruel treatment. In the circumstances, Haradin Bala could not have been ignorant of the intentions of the direct perpetrators. He certainly knew that a crime was being committed. Nonetheless, he remained and so he facilitated its commission. He is therefore responsible for aiding the crime of cruel treatment in respect of L04.[2237]

657. As indicated earlier in this decision, Shala, identified in the evidence as Haradin Bala, participated directly in another incident regarding L04 and L10. Haradin Bala forced L04 and L10, as well as another individual, to bury the bodies of three persons including Agim Ademi. There are some differences between the detail of the accounts of that event given by L10 and L04. They are nonetheless consistent with respect to the essential features of what occurred, especially the conduct of Haradin Bala, to whom both witnesses referred as Shala. Shala blindfolded them and took them in a car to the place where they were required to dig a grave. L04 and L10 and another individual received a pickaxe and shovels, with which they carried out the task given to them by Shala. They buried three bodies in the hole.[2238] Shala warned them that if they said anything about it, they would be shot.[2239] As discussed earlier, this incident caused psychological suffering of L04 and L10, which, in the Chamber's finding, in the circumstances amounted to cruel treatment. The physical perpetration of the crime by Haradin Bala has been established. Haradin Bala must have been aware of the substantial likelihood that psychological suffering would be inflicted as a result of forcing L04 and L10 to bury the bodies of fellow detainees, especially given the apparent injuries to and condition of the bodies. Haradin Bala is accordingly responsible for having directly perpetrated that crime.

658. Two incidents of mistreatment of L12 have been established. The first one occurred upon his arrival at the prison camp. In the Chamber's finding, Haradin Bala, referred to in L12's evidence as Shala, chained L12 to the wall and beat him with a stick until L12 lost consciousness. As has been established, even though the evidence does not reveal that Haradin Bala was unable to engage in strenuous activities, such as a prolonged beating of a person, it is of relevance that his ability to do so was adversely affected.[2240] The evidence concerning the role Haradin Bala played in this incident is, however, consistent and persuasive. The evidence of L12 as the victim of the incident is consistent with that of L04, who witnessed the incident, and confirmed the length and effect of the beating. Haradin Bala thus physically perpetrated the offence of cruel treatment in this case, despite his state of health. The circumstances of the incident and, in particular, the severity and duration of the beating, leave the Chamber satisfied that Haradin Bala acted with the intent to inflict physical suffering on L12. Haradin Bala is therefore, in the finding of the Chamber, responsible for having committed the offence of cruel treatment in connection with this incident. In the other case of mistreatment of L12 established earlier in this decision, L12 was beaten in a barn. Haradin Bala blindfolded L12 and brought him to a barn, where the beating took place.[2241] L12 testified that Shala was present during the incident.[2242] The Chamber accepts L12's evidence, however, that Haradin Bala's involvement in the incident was limited to bringing L12 to the perpetrators and being present while the beating was taking place. The Chamber finds that by bringing L12 to the barn and being present throughout the beating by others, Haradin Bala did contribute to the commission of the crime substantially enough to regard his participation as aiding the offence committed by the direct perpetrators. In the circumstances, Haradin Bala must have become aware, at least at the time of the beating, that the assailants were committing a crime and of their state of mind. Accordingly, he possessed the mens rea required for aiding and abetting. As established earlier, this incident constitutes the elements of both cruel treatment and torture. However, as will be discussed shortly, the Chamber can enter a conviction only in respect of the charge of torture (Count 4).

659. Reference to Haradin Bala has been made in the evidence concerning the mistreatment of Emin Emini. L10 testified that Shala, together with two other men, took Emin Emini out of the storage room for the purpose of beating him. However, for reasons discussed earlier, despite this evidence, it is not possible to determine the identity of the individuals who took Emin Emini out of the storage room.[2243] Nor does the evidence suggest that Haradin Bala himself beat Emini.

660. As has been indicated, the evidence concerning the mistreatment and death of Fehmi Xhema is affected by a number of discrepancies. In particular, it is not established whether Haradin Bala was among those who took Fehmi Xhema out of the storage room and brought him back after the beating. As discussed earlier, the Chamber assessed that both L06 and L10, who gave differing accounts of mistreatment of Fehmi Xhema, were honest witnesses.[2244] In the absence of other evidence on the matter, there are no grounds for giving preference to either of these accounts. The Chamber therefore finds, in favour of the Accused Haradin Bala, that he did not participate in the mistreatment of Fehmi Xhema, either directly or by providing assistance.

661. The accounts given by L06 and L10 identify the involvement of Haradin Bala in the removal of, what they believed, was the dead body of Fehmi Xhema. Both L06 and L10 stated that Shala and two other soldiers came to the storage room to take away the body of Fehmi Xhema.[2245] The accounts differ, however, as to the time of that event. L06 testified that Fehmi Xhema, whom he believed to be dead at that time, remained in the room for three days before he was taken away.[2246] L10 stated that the body was removed on the day following day after the critical beating.[2247] The Chamber is persuaded, despite these differences, that one of the three soldiers who removed the near dead Fehmi Xhema from the storage room was Haradin Bala. As indicated earlier, Fehmi Xhema was subsequently shot.[2248] The evidence, however, does not make it possible to establish the identity of those who shot Fehmi Xhema. It has not been established that those were the same people who removed Fehmi Xhema from the storage room for the last time. Moreover, the time of the death of Fehmi Xhema cannot be determined. It is therefore unclear whether the purpose of removing Fehmi Xhema from the storage room by the three soldiers, including Haradin Bala, was his immediate execution. In view of the absence of evidence on these issues, the Chamber is not persuaded that Haradin Bala participated in the shooting of Fehmi Xhema. Nor has it been established that he provided assistance to the murderers.

662. As discussed earlier, Haradin Bala ordered three detainees, including L04 and L10, to bury three bodies, including the body of Agim Ademi. There is no evidence, however, indicating that he directly participated in the killing of any one of the three. It could be inferred from the established circumstances of the incident that Haradin Bala was aware that Agim Ademi he had been shot. It is the evidence that a gunshot injury was visible. As a prison guard, he must also have known that Agim Ademi had been detained in the prison camp. There is nothing to suggest, however, that Haradin Bala had agreed to provide assistance at the time of the planning, preparation or execution of the crime,[2249] or in respect of the other two detainees. Even though the probability of such a prior agreement is clear, it could also be reasonably inferred from the evidence that Haradin Bala learned about the killings afterwards and was only ordered to remove the bodies from the prison camp. In the Chamber's finding, the evidence does not establish that Haradin Bala aided the commission of murder of Agim Ademi, or of the other two detainees.

663. As indicated earlier, the Prosecution suggested that the bodies L04 and L10 were forced to bury, together with the body of Agim Ademi, were those of Jefta Petković and Žvonko Marinković.[2250] The Chamber has found earlier that the evidence does not support the contention that the body of Jefta Petković, whose murder was established, was one of those L04 and L10 buried on the order of Haradin Bala. Accordingly, no link has been established between the murder of Jefta Petković and the Accused Haradin Bala.

b. Murder in the Berishe/Berisa Mountains (Count 10)

664. The Chamber has held that Haradin Bala and Murrizi, and possibly a third KLA soldier, were directly involved in shooting at the remaining small group of prisoners, who were among those they had forced to march into the Berishe/Berisa Mountains on 25 or 26 July 1998 and who remained after the first group was released.[2251] It has been established that nine of those prisoners although he neither possesses expertise in this area nor personal knowledge of the information.[49] Accordingly, the Trial Chamber has attached no weight whatsoever to such views, conclusions and analyses of Ari Kerkkanen.

36. Witness MM-003 testified from 8 to 10 March 2006. In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution accepted that the evidence of Witness MM-003 should be examined "with care" since "he sought and received assistance from the OTP in order to remain in the country where he is now living".[50] The Defence submitted that this would be a factor negating the credibility of his testimony.[51] On 9 April 2007, the Prosecution sent a letter to the Defence disclosing details of its assistance provided to Witness MM-003 in his asylum case.[52]

37. Witness MM-079 testified on 31 March, 3 and 4 April 2006. In its Final Trial Brief, the Prosecution acknowledged that the evidence of Witness MM-079 should be "scrutinized with care" since "he said that he hoped to receive the assistance of the OTP to remain in the country where he is relocated."[53] Witness MM-079 testified that after his lawyer had suggested that he contact the Tribunal to seek assistance with his asylum, he was interviewed by the Prosecution, and that he was subsequently informed that the Prosecution had written a letter to the authorities of the state where he currently lives to ask that he be allowed to stay there until he finishes testifying at the Tribunal.[54] The Trial Chamber notes that the Defence did not raise objections as to the credibility of this witness.

38. The Trial Chamber notes that both Witness MM-003 and Witness MM-079 sought assistance from the Prosecution, which also provided such assistance to both witnesses. The Trial Chamber therefore considers that there is significant doubt as to the credibility of both witnesses and has consequently given weight only to the parts of their respective evidence which are corroborated by other evidence.

but stated that only the minaret from which the army had been fired upon was destroyed. Delić explained that on that same day in Landovica two soldiers had been killed and one wounded. It was not possible to help the wounded and retrieve the bodies due to the gun-fire that came from the mosque.[718]

264. The fact of significant damage to the mosque in Landovica was also confirmed by the testimony of Prosecution expert witness András Riedlmayer.[719] Riedlmayer viewed the mosque in the course of visits to Kosovo between October 1999 and March 2001, and classified it as "heavily damaged." His report also stated that the damage to the mosque had been caused by partial burning on 27 March 1999, and the mining and shelling of the minaret.[720] However, his information as to how and when the damage to the mosque was inflicted appears to have come from members of the local "Islamic community". The Chamber notes that he was not even asked for his opinion whether the damage he saw was consistent with that account.

265. The Trial Chamber considers that anonymous hearsay from members of the "Islamic community", is not an adequate basis on which to say that Morina's evidence of the circumstances in which the damage was inflicted was corroborated. The Chamber therefore finds that the allegations in relation to the destruction of the mosque in Landovica have not been proven.

5. Srbica/Sërbica, Donji Retimlje/Retia e Ulët, Retimlje/Retia, and Randubrava/Randobrava

266. Latifi, who had fled to Srbica/Sërbica from Pirane/Pirana along with other Kosovo Albanians, testified that on 26 March 1999 a group of policemen came to Srbica/Sërbica and started shooting at the tractors belonging to them. No one was hurt.[721] He stayed in Srbica/Sërbica for a month, during which time the police often came but did not harm or threaten anyone. After three weeks Latifi was told by others that the chief of police from Prizren had come and ordered that all persons who were not from Srbica/Sërbica should leave for Albania. The local Serbs organised buses to transport them, but Latifi and his family stayed in Srbica/Sërbica for another ten days because there was no room for them on the buses.[722] Halil Morina's evidence corroborates Latifi's

K54 testified that his unit expelled people from a settlement near Prizren called Petrovo Selo/Petrovasella, following the bombing of the Prizren barracks and so that the settlement could be occupied by the VJ.[2843]

1173. Goran Stoparić, a former member of the paramilitary group known as the Scorpions, described how in late March 1999 his unit was incorporated into the ranks of the SAJ and sent to Kosovo. There members of the unit killed at least a dozen civilians in the town of Podujevo/Podujeva.[2844] Witnesses K54 and K82 recounted an operation in which they participated in the village of Trnje/Tërm (Suva Reka/Suhareka municipality), also in late March 1999, during which their unit burned houses and killed a group of around 15 Kosovo Albanian men, women, and children.[2845] Both witnesses gave evidence that this killing was not an isolated incident, but that other killings occurred throughout the village as it was cleared out by the VJ and MUP.[2846] K54 also described his own participation in the stealing of cars in Kosovo,[2847] and in setting civilian property on fire, on the orders of his superior officer.[2848]

1174. Former chief of the Kosovska Mitrovica SUP, Ljubinko Cvetić, also acknowledged that in the early days of the NATO air campaign members of the police, particularly police reservists, engaged in the expulsion of Kosovo Albanians from their homes. He testified, however, that such expulsions were not part of a policy or plan, and that there were other reasons for the mass movement of the Kosovo Albanian population at this time, such as the NATO bombing and pressure from the KLA.[2849]

1175. The Trial Chamber is mindful of the fact that in some parts of Kosovo, both within the 13 municipalities discussed in this Judgement and elsewhere, people may have left their homes for different reasons, such as instructions from the KLA, the desire to avoid being present while combat between the KLA and forces of the FRY and Serbia was taking place, or indeed the fact that NATO was bombing targets close to where they lived. However, despite the arguments by the Defence that these were the primary reasons for the massive movement of people within Kosovo and across the borders with Albania and Macedonia, none of the Kosovo Albanians who testified cited the NATO bombing as among the reasons for their departure, and in only one area of Vučitrn/Vushtrria municipality and another area of Suva Reka/Suhareka municipality discussed above has the Chamber found that people were moving as a consequence of the actions of the KLA. The Chamber gives little weight to anonymous hearsay from VJ and MUP officers about the reasons for the departure of Kosovo Albanians from their homes, and notes in addition that such officers would have been in uniform at the time of any conversations with displaced Kosovo Albanians who might have been reluctant to give these officers the real reasons for their flight. The Kosovo Albanian witnesses, who testified about their own expulsion and that of many others from Kosovo, came from a broad cross-section of that community, generally with no connection to one another beyond their victimisation, and it is inconceivable that they could or would all have concocted such detailed and consistent accounts of the events that they experienced and witnessed.

1176. Furthermore, NATO bombs struck targets across the FRY, with Belgrade suffering the most destruction, according to Spasoje Smiljanić, former Commander of the VJ Air Force and Air Defence, and yet people did not leave Belgrade, or other parts of the FRY, in the massive numbers which fled Kosovo.[2850] The Chamber finds, therefore, that the NATO bombing was not the primary reason for the mass displacement of Kosovo Albanians from Kosovo.

1177. While there was a continuing armed conflict between the KLA and the forces of the FRY and Serbia, at the same time as the NATO air campaign, the Chamber also does not consider that this conflict was the primary cause of the flight of hundreds of thousands of Kosovo Albanians from late March to early June 1999. Indeed, as discussed elsewhere in this Judgement, the conflict between the KLA and the VJ and MUP commenced in mid-1998 and intensified through July, August, and September of that year. While many Kosovo Albanians were displaced at that time, most stayed within the boundaries of Kosovo, and there was not the massive flood of people across the borders that began on 24 March 1999. The Chamber further recalls that, while the KLA was, at various times and in various locations, a force to be reckoned with, its numbers were small in comparison to the quantity of VJ and MUP personnel deployed to Kosovo in March to June 1999, nor did it have the kinds of heavy equipment that the state forces had access to.[2851]

v

MILAN MILUTINOVIĆ, NIKOLA ŠAINOVIĆ & DRAGOLJUB OJDANIĆ

DECISION ON DRAGOLJUB OJDANIĆ'S MOTION CHALLENGING JURISDICTION – JOINT CRIMINAL ENTERPRISE

Counsel for the Prosecutor
Mr Norman Farrell

Counsel for Dragoljub Ojdanić
Mr Tomislav Višnjić, Mr Vojislav Seležan and Mr Peter Robinson

- Finally, if this form of liability were to apply to Ojdanić, it would infringe the principle nullum crimen sine lege.

Each point will be addressed in turn, but the Appeals Chamber will first consider the scope of its jurisdiction as far as individual criminal liability is concerned.

Scope of the jurisdiction ratione personae of the International Tribunal

9. In his Report to the Security Council, the Secretary-General of the United Nations proposed that the International Tribunal shall apply, as far as crimes within its jurisdiction are concerned, rules of international humanitarian law which are "beyond any doubt part of customary international law".[26] The fact that an offence is listed in the Statute does not therefore create new law and the Tribunal only has jurisdiction over a listed crime if that crime was recognised as such under customary international law at the time it was allegedly committed.[27] The scope of the Tribunal's jurisdiction ratione materiae may therefore be said to be determined both by the Statute, insofar as it sets out the jurisdictional framework of the International Tribunal, and by customary international law, insofar as the Tribunal's power to convict an accused of any crime listed in the Statute depends on its existence qua custom at the time this crime was allegedly committed.[28]

10. As far as the jurisdiction ratione personae of the Tribunal is concerned, the Secretary-General's Report does not contain any explicit limitation as to the nature of the law which the Tribunal may apply, other than a statement apparently of general application to the effect that "the International Tribunal would have the task of applying existing international humanitarian law".[29] Contrary to the Defence submission on that point,[30] there is no reference in the Report of the Secretary-General limiting the jurisdiction ratione personae of the International Tribunal to forms of liability as provided by customary law.[31] However, the principle of legality demands that the Tribunal shall apply the law which was binding upon individuals at the time of the acts charged. And, just as is the case in respect of the Tribunal's jurisdiction ratione materiae, that body of law must be reflected in customary international law.

11. What must therefore be established in the present case is whether, at the time the acts were allegedly committed (from "on or about 1 January 1999 [...] until 20 June 1999"[32]), joint criminal enterprise as a form of liability existed under customary international law.

Does the Statute provide for joint criminal enterprise liability ?

12. Article 7(1) of the Statute contemplates various forms of individual criminal responsibility which apply to all crimes which are within the Tribunal's jurisdiction. It provides as follows:

> Article 7
> Individual criminal responsibility
>
> 1. A person who planned, instigated, ordered, committed or otherwise aided and abetted in the planning, preparation or execution of a crime referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute, shall be individually responsible for the crime.

13. This provision contains a list of forms of criminal participation which, all other conditions being met, could entail the criminal responsibility of the accused if he or she were to commit any of the crimes provided for in the Statute in any of the ways contemplated by that article. Article 7(1) does not contain an explicit reference to "joint criminal enterprise". Whether or not that list is exhaustive was not addressed specifically by the Defence. The Defence only claims that that provision does not provide for joint criminal enterprise as a form of criminal liability[33] and that other international instruments, such as the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, provided for joint criminal enterprise explicitly when it was intended to be included.[34] Had the drafters intended to include such a form of liability for all crimes within the Tribunal's Statute, the Defence says, the drafters would have done so explicitly.[35]

14. In addition, the Defence claims that this specific form of liability was not contemplated by the drafters of the Tribunal's Statute. The Defence submits that the suggestions made by several member states of the Security Council at the time of the adoption of the Tribunal's Statute that it should include "conspiracy" as a form of criminal liability was rejected.[36] "Conspiracy", the Defence claims, "is precisely the basis of liability for joint criminal enterprise".[37] The Defence says that, where they intended to include "conspiracy" as a form of liability, the drafters did so expressly, as for instance in Article 4(3)(b) of the Statute concerning "conspiracy to commit genocide".[38]

15. In response, the Prosecution submits that joint criminal enterprise is provided for both in the Statute and under customary international law.[39] It also says that joint criminal liability is different from both "conspiracy" and membership in a criminal organization and, contrary to both of them, it is a punishable mode of participation in the actual commission of crimes.[40] Conspiracy, the Prosecution says, is a mere agreement or understanding between two or more persons to commit a crime, whilst membership in a criminal organization implies the existence of a stable organizational structure directed at the commission of crimes, irrespective of the actual commission of any such crime.[41] The Prosecution submits further that, individual liability for participation in a joint criminal enterprise arises from "a significant contribution to the execution of a common plan that either entails the commission of a crime, or leads to the commission of a crime, as its natural and foreseeable consequence".[42]

16. As pointed out by the Prosecution, the Appeals Chamber has already had an opportunity to consider this matter in other cases. In the Tadić case, the Prosecution had argued on appeal that the Trial Chamber had misdirected itself in the application of the common purpose doctrine.[43] The Prosecution submitted then that the gist of this doctrine is that if a person knowingly participates in a criminal activity with others, he or she will be liable for all illegal acts that are natural and probable consequences of that common purpose.[44] In view of the evidence, the Prosecution claimed that the only conclusion reasonably open to the Trial Chamber was that the killing of the five victims was a natural and probable consequence of the attack on the villages of Sivci and Jaskići in which the accused had taken part.[45]

17. In response, the Defence for the accused Duško Tadić did not challenge the existence of this form of liability or its presence under Article 7(1) of the Statute. It submitted, however, that a conviction on that basis would require the Prosecution to establish that the common purpose in which the Appellant is said to have taken part included killing as opposed to ethnic cleansing by other means.[46] Having considered the matter, the Appeals Chamber came to the conclusion that joint criminal enterprise or the common purpose doctrine, as it called it, was provided for in the Statute as a form of liability and that it existed under customary international law at the relevant time (i.e., 1992).[47] The submission by the Defence in the present case that the Appeals Chamber's statement on that point was obiter dicta insofar as it went "far beyond that which was necessary to reinstate Tadić's conviction"[48] is incorrect, as it is every Chamber's duty to ascertain that a crime or a form of liability charged in the indictment is both provided for under the Statute and that it existed at the relevant time under customary international law.[49] In the Tadić appeal, as pointed out above, the meaning and scope of joint criminal enterprise under the Statute and under customary law was litigated by the parties and joint criminal enterprise in fact formed the sole legal basis upon which the Appeals Chamber convicted Tadić.

17. In the Čelebići case, the Appeals Chamber interpreted the Prosecution's submissions as suggesting that the Trial Chamber's findings concerning the actions of Hazim Delić should have led to his being convicted under the doctrine of common criminal purpose or joint criminal enterprise.[50] The Appeals Chamber held that it was not satisfied, in that case, that the elements required by that form of criminal liability had been established by the Prosecution beyond reasonable doubt.[51] Finally, in Furundžija, the accused Anto Furundžija claimed in his appeal that in order to sustain his conviction as a co-perpetrator of torture, it should have been proved that there was a "direct connection" between his questioning of the victim and the infliction on her of severe pain or suffering.[52] He also submitted that "[w]hat is missing in this case is any allegation or proof that [his participation] in any crime, i.e., intentionally acted in concert with Accused B in questioning Witness A", and that there was no such allegation contained in the indictment against him, nor was proof offered at the trial in this regard.[53] The Appeals Chamber said that it had identified in the Tadić Appeal Judgment the legal elements of co-perpetration in a joint criminal enterprise, and it referred to the definitions of these elements, in particular to the requirement that there must exist a plan, design or purpose underlying the joint criminal enterprise.[54] The conviction based on the joint criminal enterprise charges stood.

18. The appellant in this case has advanced no cogent reason why the Appeals Chamber should come to a different conclusion than the one it reached in the Tadić case, namely, that joint criminal enterprise was provided for in the Statute of the Tribunal and that it existed under customary international law at the relevant time. The Defence's first contention is that the Appeals Chamber misinterpreted the drafters' intention as, it claims, they would have referred to joint criminal enterprise explicitly had they intended to include such a form of liability within the Tribunal's jurisdiction. As pointed out above, the Statute of the International Tribunal sets the framework within which the Tribunal may exercise its jurisdiction. A crime or a form of liability which is not provided for in the Statute could not form the basis of a conviction before this Tribunal.[55] The reference to that crime or to that form of liability does not need, however, to be explicit to come within the purview of the Tribunal's jurisdiction.[56] The Statute of the ICTY is not and does not purport to be, unlike for instance the Rome Statute of the International Criminal Court, a meticulously detailed code providing explicitly for every possible scenario and every solution thereto. It sets out in somewhat general terms the jurisdictional framework within which the Tribunal has been mandated to operate.

19. As noted in the Tadić Appeal Judgment, the Secretary-General's Report provided that "all persons" who participate in the planning, preparation or execution of serious violations of international humanitarian law contribute to the commission of the violation and are therefore individually responsible.[57] Also, and on its face, the list in Article 7(1) appears to be non-exhaustive in nature as the use of the phrase "or otherwise aided and abetted" suggests. But the Appeals Chamber does not need to consider whether, outside those forms of liability expressly mentioned in the Statute, other forms of liability could come within Article 7(1). It is indeed satisfied that joint criminal enterprise comes within the terms of that provision.

20. In the present case, Ojdanić is charged as a co-perpetrator in a joint criminal enterprise the purpose of which was, inter alia, the expulsion of a substantial portion of the Kosovo Albanian population from the territory of the province of Kosovo in an effort to ensure continued Serbian control over the province.[58] The Prosecution pointed out in its indictment against Ojdanić that its use of the word "committed" was not intended to suggest that any of the accused physically perpetrated any of the crimes charged, personally. "Committing", the Prosecution wrote, "refers to [55] The defence correctly refers to the example of the crime of piracy (Ojdanić's Appeal, par 43).

[56] The Tribunal has accepted, for instance, that Article 3 of the Statute was a residual clause and that crimes which are not explicitly listed in Article 3 of the Statute could nevertheless form part of the Tribunal's jurisdiction (ref to Tadić).

[58] Indictment, par 16.

participation in a joint criminal enterprise as a co-perpetrator".[59] Leaving aside the appropriateness of the use of the expression "co-perpetration" in such a context, it would seem therefore that the Prosecution charges co-perpetration in a joint criminal enterprise as a form of "commission" pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute, rather than as a form of accomplice liability. The Prosecution's approach is correct to the extent that, insofar as a participant shares the purpose of the joint criminal enterprise (as he or she must do) as opposed to merely knowing about it, he or she cannot be regarded as a mere aider and abettor to the crime which is contemplated. The Appeals Chamber therefore regards joint criminal enterprise as a form of "commission" pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute.

21. The Defence suggests that the Tadić interpretation of Article 7(1) means that all modes of liability not specifically excluded by the Statute are included therein.[60] It is not necessary to deal with so wide an argument. The Appeals Chamber was satisfied then, and is still satisfied now, that the Statute provides, albeit not explicitly, for joint criminal enterprise as a form of criminal liability and that its elements are based on customary law. In order to come within the Tribunal's jurisdiction ratione personae, any form of liability must satisfy three pre-conditions: (i) it must be provided for in the Statute, explicitly or implicitly; (ii) it must have existed under customary international law at the relevant time; (iii) the law providing for that form of liability must have been sufficiently accessible at the relevant time to anyone who acted in such a way; and (iv) such person must have been able to foresee that he could be held criminally liable for his actions if apprehended.

22. The analogy made by the Defence between the present situation and the rejection by the International Military Tribunal ("IMT") in Nuremberg of the common plan or conspiracy doctrine in relation to war crimes and crimes against humanity is indeed relevant to this case, although not for the reason suggested by the Defence.[61] The IMT noted that the indictment charged not only conspiracy to commit aggressive war, but also to commit war crimes and crimes against humanity.[62] The IMT pointed out that the Charter did not define as a separate crime any conspiracy except the one to commit acts of aggressive war and it therefore disregarded the charges in Count One of the indictment that the defendants had conspired to commit war crimes and crimes against humanity.[63] As pointed out above, the same logic applies in the context of this Tribunal. One Trial Chamber, for instance, correctly noted that, if it were not satisfied that a given crime was provided for in its Statute, as the IMT had been in relation to conspiracy to commit war crimes and crimes against humanity, this Tribunal would have no choice but to decline to exercise its jurisdiction over such a crime.[64] Unless it is satisfied that a principle of liability is included in the Statute, the Tribunal would not exercise its jurisdiction on the basis of that principle.

23. The Defence's argument that the drafters' exclusion of "conspiracy" from the Statute is evidence that joint criminal enterprise has also been excluded is likewise misguided. Joint criminal enterprise and "conspiracy" are two different forms of liability. Whilst conspiracy requires a showing that several individuals have agreed to commit a certain crime or set of crimes, a joint criminal enterprise requires, in addition to such a showing, that the parties to that agreement took action in furtherance of that agreement.[65] In other words, while mere agreement is sufficient in the case of conspiracy, the liability of a member of a joint criminal enterprise will depend on the commission of criminal acts in furtherance of that enterprise. Thus, even if it were conceded that conspiracy was excluded from the realm of the Tribunal's Statute, that would have no impact on the presence of joint criminal enterprise as a form of "commission" pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute.

24. The Defence also claims that joint criminal enterprise is akin to a form of criminal liability for membership and that it has become a "vehicle for organizational liability", whereby mere membership in a criminal organization would by itself entail the individual criminal responsibility of the accused.[66] Under such a form of liability, Ojdanić is exposed to being held liable for his membership in an organisation some members of which may have committed crimes he should have foreseen, the Defence suggests.[67] The Defence says that this is precisely the form of organizational – as opposed to individual – liability that the Security Council eschewed when adopting the Tribunal's Statute.[68]

25. Joint criminal enterprise is different from membership of a criminal enterprise which was criminalised as a separate criminal offence in Nuremberg and in subsequent trials held under Control Council Law No 10.[69] As pointed out by the United Nations War Crimes Commission, (ibid, pp 97-98).

[69] Article 10 of the Nuremberg Charter provided for this possibility: "In cases where a group or organization is declared criminal by the Tribunal, the competent national authority of any Signatory shall have the right to bring what was to be punished in relation to the latter was "no mere conspiracy to commit crimes but a knowing and voluntary membership of organisations which did in fact commit crimes, and those on a wide scale".[70] No such offence was included in the Tribunal's Statute. The Secretary-General made it clear that only natural persons (as opposed to juridical entities) were liable under the Tribunal's Statute,[71] and that mere membership in a given criminal organization would not be sufficient to establish individual criminal responsibility:

> The question arises, however, whether a juridical person, such as an association or organization, may be considered criminal as such and thus its members, for that reason alone, be made subject to the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal. The Secretary-General believes that this concept should not be retained in regard to the International Tribunal. The criminal acts set out in this Statute are carried out by natural persons; such persons would be subject to the jurisdiction of the International Tribunal irrespective of membership in groups.[72]

26. Criminal liability pursuant to a joint criminal enterprise is not a liability for mere membership or for conspiring to commit crimes, but a form of liability concerned with the participation in the commission of a crime as part of a joint criminal enterprise, a different matter. The Prosecution in the present case made that point clear when it said that Ojdanić was being charged not for his membership in a joint criminal enterprise but for his part in carrying it out.[73] The indictment talks of his "having significantly contributed" to the execution of the joint criminal enterprise by "using the de jure and de facto powers available to him".[74]

27. The Defence claims further that, if the Tribunal were to read joint criminal enterprise liability into the Statute, it would thereby be violating the principle in dubio pro reo, which provides that, in case of doubt as to the content or meaning of a rule, the interpretation most favourable to the accused should be adopted.[75] Ojdanić contends that the application of that principle "would result in restricting the statute to the plain meaning of its terms, and requires that the indictment based upon joint criminal enterprise liability be dismissed".[76] In response, the Prosecution says that this

In any such case the criminal nature of the group or organization is considered proved and shall not be questioned." Article 6(1) of the Nuremberg Charter stated that "[t]he Tribunal . . . shall have the power to try and punish persons who, acting in the interest of the European Axis countries, whether as individuals or as members of organizations, committed any of the following crimes" (emphasis added). Article II(1)(d) of Control Council Law No 10 provided that "1. Each of the following acts is recognized as a crime: [...] (d) membership in categories of a criminal group or organization declared criminal by the International Military Tribunal".

principle (in dubio pro reo) only applies "where the canons of construction fail to resolve a reasonable doubt in the meaning of a criminal statute".[77]

28. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the present matter mandates the application of this principle of interpretation. The interpretation of Article 7(1) given by the Appeals Chamber in Tadić, and the comments made above, simply leave no room for it.[78] Insofar as concerns the question whether joint criminal enterprise is recognised in customary international law, the Appeals Chamber has no doubt that the application of the principle in dubio pro reo could help to resolve.

29. Finally, the Defence claims that the Appeals Chamber's finding is, in any case, inconsistent with existing customary law, as existing state practice is too weak to give rise to such a rule.[79] The Appeals Chamber does not propose to revisit its finding in Tadić concerning the customary status of ~~this form~~ of liability. It is satisfied that the state practice and opinio juris reviewed in that decision was sufficient to permit the conclusion that such a norm existed under customary international law in 1992 when Tadić committed the crimes for which he had been charged and for which he was eventually convicted.

30. In sum, the Defence has failed to show that there are cogent reasons in the interests of justice[80] for the Appeals Chamber to depart from its finding in the Tadić case, that joint criminal enterprise was both provided for in the Statute and that it existed under customary international law was in any way unreasonable at the relevant time. This part of the appeal is therefore rejected.

Meaning and scope of joint criminal enterprise liability charged against Ojdanić

31. The Defence next submits that the Trial Chamber in this case should not have considered itself to be bound by decisions rendered on this issue by the Appeals Chamber in three successive cases – Tadić, Delalić and Furundžija – as, it claims, these decisions do not provide much guidance on this matter.[81] According to the Defence, the pronouncements in both Delalić and Furundžija constitute an "unremarkable holding of accomplice liability" which does not support joint criminal enterprise liability by virtue of membership in an organisation with a criminal purpose as alleged in the indictment against him.[82] The Appeals Chamber has already pointed out above that joint criminal enterprise is to be regarded, not as a form of accomplice liability, but as a form of "commission" and that liability stems not, as claimed by the Defence, from mere membership of an organisation, but from participating in the commission of a crime as part of a criminal enterprise. And, as far as they provided guidance upon matters relevant to the Trial Chamber's decision, the ratio decidendi of the Appeals Chamber's judgments was in fact binding upon the Trial Chamber.[83]

32. Even if the Appeals Chamber in this case declines to revisit the Tadić decision, the Defence submits, it should hold that the concept of joint criminal enterprise as developed by later Trial Chambers and the Prosecutor in the present case, expands liability beyond the permitted scope of common purpose doctrine and "into the forbidden realm of organizational liability".[84]

33. As pointed out by the Bench of the Appeals Chamber, this indictment alleges that the crimes mentioned above and charged against Ojdanić were within the object of the joint criminal enterprise or, alternatively, that the offences of murder and persecutions were natural and foreseeable consequences of the joint criminal enterprise and that Ojdanić was aware that such crimes were the likely outcome of the joint criminal enterprise.[85] This description of Ojdanić's actions, as alleged in the indictment, falls squarely within the definition of joint criminal enterprise given by the Appeals Chamber in Tadić.[86] The Prosecution may not be said to have gone beyond the realm of the Tadić decision and the Defence's submission on that point is rejected.

Does the inclusion of joint criminal liability in the Statute of the International Tribunal infringe the principle nullum crimen sine lege ?

34. Ojdanić finally submits that the doctrine of joint criminal enterprise should not be applied in his case for yet another reason. Applying this doctrine to him, he says, would infringe the principle nullum crimen sine lege, insofar as it would mean applying law which was created after the acts for which he is charged.[87] The Defence claims that the common purpose doctrine as laid down in the Tadić Judgment was only created on 15 July 1999 – after the acts charged in the indictment – and that the concept of joint criminal enterprise did not enter the Tribunal's jurisprudence until the Krstić Trial Judgment.[88]

35. In response, the Prosecution submits that "common purpose" and "joint criminal enterprise" are interchangeable terms which apply to a form of liability recognised under Article 7(1) of the Statute, the application of which would not infringe the above-mentioned principle.[89] The Prosecution points out that other Chambers of the International Tribunal, including the Appeals Chamber, have applied this doctrine in relation to events which took place years before Ojdanić's conduct as described in the indictment.[90]

36. First, concerning the terminological matter raised by the Defence, the phrases "common purpose" doctrine on the one hand, and "joint criminal enterprise" on the other, have been used interchangeably and they refer to one and the same thing. The latter term – joint criminal enterprise – is preferred, but it refers to the same form of liability as that known as the common purpose doctrine or liability.

37. Secondly, the principle nullum crimen sine lege is, as noted by the International Military Tribunal in Nuremberg, first and foremost, a "principle of justice".[91] It follows from this principle that a criminal conviction can only be based on a norm which existed at the time the acts or omission with which the accused is charged were committed. The Tribunal must further be satisfied that the criminal liability in question was sufficiently foreseeable and that the law providing for such liability must be sufficiently accessible at the relevant time for it to warrant a criminal conviction and sentencing under the head of responsibility selected by the Prosecution.

38. This fundamental principle "does not prevent a court from interpreting and clarifying the elements of a particular crime".[92] Nor does it preclude the progressive development of the law by the court.[93] But it does prevent a court from creating new law or from interpreting existing law beyond the reasonable limits of acceptable clarification. This Tribunal must therefore be satisfied that the crime or the form of liability with which an accused is charged was sufficiently foreseeable and that the law providing for such liability must be sufficiently accessible at the relevant time, taking into account the specificity of international law when making that assessment.

See also C.R v United Kingdom, Judgment, 22 Nov 1995, Ser A 335-C (1995), par 34 (ECHR): "However clearly drafted a legal provision may be, in any system of law, including criminal law, there is an inevitable element of judicial interpretation. There will always be a need for elucidation of doubtful points and for adaptation to changing circumstances. Indeed, in the United Kingdom, as in the other Convention States, the progressive development of the criminal law through judicial law-making is a well entrenched and necessary part of legal tradition. Article 7 (art. 7) of the Convention cannot be read as outlawing the gradual clarification of the rules of criminal liability through judicial interpretation from case to case, provided that the resultant development is consistent with the essence of the offence and could reasonably be foreseen."

39. The meaning and scope of the concepts of "foreseeability" and "accessibility" of a norm will, as noted by the European Court of Human Rights,[94] depend a great deal on "the content of the instrument in issue, the field it is designed to cover and the number and status of those to whom it is addressed".[95] The specificity of international criminal law in that respect has been eloquently noted by one American Military Tribunal in Nuremberg in the Justice case:

> Under written constitutions the ex post facto rule condemns statutes which define as criminal, acts committed before the law was passed, but the ex post facto rule cannot apply in the international field as it does under constitutional mandate in the domestic field. [...] International law is not the product of statute for the simple reason that there is yet no world authority empowered to enact statutes of universal application. International law is the product of multipartite treaties, conventions, judicial decisions and customs which have received international acceptance or acquiescence. It would be sheer absurdity to suggest that the ex post facto rule, as known to constitutional states, could be applied to a treaty, a custom, or a common law decision of an international tribunal, or to the international acquiescence which follows the events. To have attempted to apply the ex post facto principle to judicial decisions of common international law would have been to strangle that law at birth.[96]

40. Has Ojdanić had sufficient notice that if, as claimed in the indictment, he took part in the commission of very serious criminal offences as part of a joint criminal enterprise he could be found criminally liable on that basis? This Tribunal does not apply the law of the former Yugoslavia to the definition of the crimes and forms of liability within its jurisdiction. It does, as pointed out above, apply customary international law in relation to its jurisdiction ratione materiae. It may, however, have recourse to domestic law for the purpose of establishing that the accused could reasonably have known that the offence in question or the offence committed in the way charged in the indictment was prohibited and punishable. In the present instance, and contrary to the Defence contention,[97] the law of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia in force at the time did provide for criminal liability for the foreseeable acts of others in terms strikingly similar to those used to define joint criminal enterprise.[98] Article 26 of the Criminal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia provides that:

[98] Articles 253 of the Criminal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Articles 226 of the Criminal Law of the Republic of Serbia to which the Defence refers are irrelevant insofar as they related, not to a form of joint criminal enterprise, but to a form of liability akin to "conspiracy" which, as pointed above, is a different form of liability. As to Article 254 of the Criminal Code of the Socialist Federal Republic of Yugoslavia and Article 227 of the Criminal Law of the Republic of Serbia, they are likewise irrelevant to the extent that they deal with the

> Anybody creating or making use of an organisation, gang, cabal, group or any other association for the purpose of committing criminal acts is criminally responsible for all criminal acts resulting from the criminal design of these associations and shall be punished as if he himself has committed them, irrespective of whether and in what manner he himself directly participated in the commission of any of those acts.[99]

41. Although domestic law (in particular the law of the country of the accused) may provide some notice to the effect that a given act is regarded as criminal under international law, it may not necessarily provide sufficient notice of that fact. Customary law is not always represented by written law and its accessibility may not be as straightforward as would be the case had there been an international criminal code. But rules of customary law may provide sufficient guidance as to the standard the violation of which could entail criminal liability.[100] In the present case, and even if such a domestic provision had not existed, there is a long and consistent stream of judicial decisions, international instruments and domestic legislation[101] which would have permitted any individual to regulate his conduct accordingly and would have given him reasonable notice that, if infringed, that standard could entail his criminal responsibility.[102]

42. Also, due to the lack of any written norms or standards, war crimes courts have often relied upon the atrocious nature of the crimes charged to conclude that the perpetrator of such an act must have known that he was committing a crime. In the Tadić Judgment, for instance, the Appeals Chamber noted "the moral gravity" of secondary participants in a joint criminal enterprise to commit serious violations of humanitarian law to justify the criminalisation of their actions.[103] Although the immorality or appalling character of an act is not a sufficient factor to warrant its criminalisation under customary international law, it may in fact play a role in that respect, insofar as it may refute any claim by the Defence that it did not know of the criminal nature of the acts.[104]

[101] Contrary to the Defence submission on that point, the Appeals Chamber has not relied upon domestic legislation and domestic case law to identify custom (Ojdanić's Appeal, par 51). The Appeals Chamber referred to those "only [...] to show that the notion of common purpose upheld in international criminal law has an underpinning in many national systems" (Tadić Appeal Judgment, par 225). It added that "[i]n the area under discussion, domestic law does not originate from the implementation of international law but, rather, to a large extent runs parallel to, and precedes, international regulation" (ibid).

43. Article 26 of the Criminal Law of the Federal Republic of Yugoslavia, coupled with the extensive state practice noted in Tadić, the many domestic jurisdictions which provide for such a form of liability under various names and which forms of liability run parallel to custom,[105] and the egregious nature of the crimes charged would have provided notice to anyone that the acts committed by the accused in 1999 would have engaged criminal responsibility on the basis of participation in a joint criminal enterprise.

44. In sum, the Appeals Chamber does not view the concept of joint criminal enterprise as a separate offence in itself, but only as a mode of committing one of the offences prescribed by articles 2 to 5 of the Statute. This part of Ojdanić's appeal is therefore dismissed.

Disposition

45. The Appeals Chamber therefore dismisses the appeal.

FOURTH DECISION ON PROSECUTION MOTION FOR JUDICIAL NOTICE OF ADJUDICATED FACTS CONCERNING THE REBUTTAL EVIDENCE PROCEDURE

Office of the Prosecutor
Mr Dermot Groome
Mr Peter McCloskey

Counsel for Ratko Mladić
Mr Branko Lukić
Mr Miodrag Stojanović

10. Rule 94 (B) of the Rules provides that:

> At the request of a party or proprio motu, a Trial Chamber, after hearing the parties, may decide to take judicial notice of adjudicated facts or of the authenticity of documentary evidence from other proceedings of the Tribunal relating to matters at issue in the current proceedings.

11. The Appeals Chamber has held that "by taking judicial notice of an adjudicated fact, a Chamber establishes a well-founded presumption for the accuracy of this fact, which therefore does not have to be proven again at trial, but which, subject to that presumption, may be challenged at that trial".[19] Judicial notice does not shift the ultimate burden of persuasion, which remains with the Prosecution.[20] Rule 94 (B) of the Rules fosters judicial economy by avoiding the need for evidence in chief to be presented in support of a fact already previously adjudicated.[21] In the case of a Trial Chamber taking judicial notice under this Rule, the legal effect is only to relieve the Prosecution of its initial burden to produce evidence on the point; the Defence may then put the point into question by introducing reliable and credible evidence to the contrary.[22]

IV. DISCUSSION

12. Before discussing the merits of the Motion, the Chamber wishes to spend a few words on what seems to be at the heart of the issue.

13. Taking judicial notice of adjudicated facts aims at avoiding presentation of evidence in relation to facts, which a previous Chamber established on the basis of evidence which left no reasonable doubt in the mind of the judges of that Chamber when adjudicating those facts ("previous Chamber"). According to the Tribunal's jurisprudence with regard to the concept of judicial notice of adjudicated facts, a party to the proceedings can propose a fact that has been adjudicated by a previous Chamber ("proposing party"). A Trial Chamber taking judicial notice of such a fact establishes a rebuttable presumption of its accuracy and relieves the proposing party of its initial burden to produce evidence on that fact, on the basis of the previous Chamber's factual findings and evaluation of the evidence presented in that case.

14. The other party to the proceedings ("challenging party") may introduce evidence which contradicts a judicially noticed fact, and such evidence may rebut the presumed accuracy of that fact. If such evidence is heard, the proposing party has an interest in seeking to present evidence which rebuts the contradicting evidence, and which supports the accuracy of the fact that was taken judicial notice of.

15. The core issue is that, in taking judicial notice of an adjudicated fact, a Trial Chamber does not take notice of the evidence underlying this fact on which the previous Chamber established that fact. The presentation of contradicting evidence, if sufficiently relevant and probative to be considered pursuant to the criteria of Rule 89 (C),[23] is to be understood as a step to reopen the evidentiary debate on the fact the Chamber took judicial notice of. Therefore, if contradicting evidence is presented, and the proposing party still wishes to meet its burden of persuasion in relation to that fact, the Trial Chamber is invited to strike a balance between a judicially noticed fact and evidence. As facts in themselves cannot be weighed against contradicting evidence, in order to strike such a balance, the obvious way is to allow the proposing party to submit evidence in relation to the now challenged fact, which can then be weighed against the contradicting evidence. This restores a situation in which the Trial Chamber weighs evidence pro and contra the judicially noticed fact at issue and makes its own finding.[24]

16. There appears to be no uniform case law on eliciting rebuttal evidence with respect to judicially noticed facts.[25] The Chamber considers, however, that the sequencing order of the presentation of evidence, provided by Rule 85 (A) of the Rules, and the Appeal Chamber's

[23] See Karemera Rebuttal Decision, para. 14.

[24] In this respect, the Chamber considers, in accordance with the Appeals Chamber's jurisprudence, that evidence underlying a challenged judicially noticed fact cannot be found inadmissible on the ground that it has already been considered and rejected by the previous Trial Chamber in making a finding on that fact. See Karemera Rebuttal Decision, para. 22.

[25] In the Lukić Reconsideration Decision, the Prosecution's request to lead rebuttal evidence on a challenged judicially noticed fact was denied because the Prosecution was considered to have been on notice of the Defence's intention to challenge a fact, since it related to a significant issue, and the Defence opposed the list of adjudicated facts relating to the challenged facts. See para. 18. The Karadžić Trial Chamber, on the other hand, held that when the Defence challenges adjudicated facts which were judicially noticed, the Prosecution may still choose to present additional evidence on that point during its rebuttal case. That Trial Chamber held that the Defence's argument, that judicially noticed facts that are not further substantiated with other evidence by the Prosecution will "disappear" once the fact is successfully challenged by the Defence, was "misguided". Further, the Trial Chamber reasoned that accepting this argument would effectively render Rule 94 (B) ineffectual, as the Prosecution would never be able to rely on adjudicated facts if it had notice that the Defence would challenge them. See Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić, Case No. IT-95-5/18-T, Decision on the Accused's Motion to Strike Scheduled Sarajevo Shelling and Sniping Incidents, 27 January 2012 ("Karadžić Decision"), para. 11.

jurisprudence on rebuttal evidence, appropriately adjusted for the significant differences at issue in relation to judicially noticed facts, give an answer to the Prosecution's query on the matter.[26]

17. The Trial Chamber in Prosecutor v. Radovan Karadžić and Judge Van den Wyngaert in her dissenting opinion appended to the Lukić Reconsideration Decision, observed that the purpose of Rule 94 (B) of the Rules would be defeated if the Prosecution could not rely on judicially noticed facts merely because the Defence had notified its intent to challenge them. The Rule would be at risk to become a "dead letter".[27] The Chamber shares this view and considers that even if the challenging party notifies the proposing party of its intention to challenge certain judicially noticed facts, the proposing party may still rely on the legal effect of being relieved of its initial burden to produce evidence on the point, until the moment that the challenging party puts the adjudicated fact into question by introducing evidence to the contrary.[28] A requirement that the proposing party, in its case-in chief, must present evidence on judicially noticed facts on the basis of a notification of a future challenge to those facts, would run counter to the very concept of judicial notice of adjudicated facts. Further, the legal effect of judicial notice would not serve its purpose if, when the challenging party presents contradicting evidence, such presentation results in the eradication of the proposing party's possibility to then present its evidence in support of this fact. The proposing party can meaningfully determine what evidence it should present to meet its burden of proof in relation to that fact once that contradicting evidence has been introduced.

18. Prior to the Chamber taking a decision on a motion for judicial notice of adjudicated facts, the challenging party can object to the taking of judicial notice in its response to the proposed facts through a clear identification of a specific challenge that would be brought against these facts during trial. In this respect, the Chamber observes that in its Response, the Defence raised a specific objection to a number of proposed facts, arguing that the interests of justice and the right to a fair and public trial support leading evidence on these facts during trial.[29] Having this specific information enables the Chamber to determine whether, in this case, taking judicial notice would indeed serve judicial economy.[30] By denying to take judicial notice of a number of these facts, the Chamber restored a situation where the Prosecution would need to bring evidence in chief to establish these facts.

[26] See Prosecutor v. Milan Lukić and Sredoje Lukić, Case No. IT-98-32/1-AR73.1, Decision on the Prosecution's Appeal Against the Trial Chamber's Order to Call Alibi Rebuttal Evidence During the Prosecution's Case in Chief, 16 October 2008, paras 13-14, 22, 24.

[28] See Karemera Rebuttal Decision, para. 13; Milošević Appeal Decision, para. 16; Karemera Decision, para. 42.

[29] See First Decision, para. 11.

[30] Thus, the Chamber did not take judicial notice of, for example, proposed fact no. 322; see First Decision, para. 11.

19. Once the Chamber has taken judicial notice of an adjudicated fact, there are, in line with the order of presentation of evidence provided in Rule 85 of the Rules, two stages prior to an envisaged presentation of prosecution evidence in rebuttal, during which the Defence may challenge that judicially noticed fact. First, a judicially noticed fact may be challenged during the presentation of the Prosecution's case, for example during cross-examination of a witness. The Prosecution may then adduce evidence through re-examination of that witness, or by expanding the scope of examination of other Prosecution witnesses or it may move for an amendment to its 65 ter (E) lists to add additional witnesses or exhibits. Second, the Defence may lead evidence during the presentation of its case, clearly contradicting a judicially noticed fact. The Prosecution may then introduce evidence through cross-examination of this or other Defence witnesses, or seek leave to present evidence in support of the challenged fact, notifying the Chamber of this intent in due time.

20. The above examples are not to be regarded as an exhaustive list of manners in which the proposing party can introduce evidence in support of the challenged judicially noticed fact. As a matter of principle, at any stage where the challenging party presents evidence contradicting a judicially noticed fact, the proposing party should have an opportunity to elicit evidence addressing the challenge or otherwise supporting the establishment of the fact by the means described above. Such an opportunity may also be given to the proposing party by allowing it to present evidence in rebuttal pursuant to Rule 85 (A) (iii).

21. The Chamber considers that in view of its discussion above, there is no need to discuss the Prosecution's Rebuttal Evidence Procedure.[31]

[31] With regard to part iv) of the Rebuttal Evidence Procedure, the Chamber considers that Rule 65 ter (G) of the Rules does not require the Defence to state which judicially noticed facts it intends to challenge or to identify the evidence it will lead to specifically challenge such facts. The Tribunal's case law permits the Defence to challenge judicially noticed facts at any time during the presentation of its case. A clear identification by the Defence in its Rule 65 ter (G) Filing, if any, of the judicially noticed facts it intends to challenge and the evidence it will present to this effect, would indeed be in the interests of judicial economy. The Chamber encourages the Defence to contribute to such expediency, but declines to add any additional requirements to those contained in the Rules.

imprisonment is to be served" and that "particular consideration shall be given to the proximity to the convicted person's relations."

109. Nevertheless, the fact remains that Darko Mrđa will serve his sentence in a state different from his country of origin and at some distance from his wife and children. This is however a common aspect of the prison sentences imposed by the Tribunal. The Trial Chamber takes into account this factor in determining the length of imprisonment, but it does not consider it to be a mitigating circumstance.

8. Conclusions

110. In light of the above, the Trial Chamber finds that the following are relevant mitigating circumstances to which appropriate weight must be attached:

- Cooperation with the Prosecution;
- Guilty Plea;
- Remorse; and
- Personal circumstances of Darko Mrđa.

111. The Trial Chamber rejects the submissions of the Defence concerning duress, compliance with superior orders and the length of time between the commission of the crimes and the trial. However, the Trial Chamber takes into consideration the fact that Darko Mrđa must serve his sentence in a foreign country in determining his sentence.

D. The General Practice Regarding Prison Sentences in the Courts of the Former Yugoslavia

112. Article 24 of the Statute and Rule 101 of the Rules require the Trial Chamber, when determining sentence, to take into account the general practice regarding prison sentences in the former Yugoslavia.[148]

1. Arguments of the Parties

113. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber should consider the factors set out in Article 41(1) of the SFRY Criminal Code[149] (the "Code") in determining sentence and that these are equivalent to aggravating and mitigating factors, evaluated by the Tribunal.[150] humanity) of which Darko Mrđa was convicted further to his plea of guilty. It then examined the aggravating and mitigating circumstances. Finally, in accordance with the Statute and the Rules, the Trial Chamber took into account of the general sentencing practice of the courts of the former Yugoslavia.

123. In determining the seriousness of the crimes, the Trial Chamber examined the nature of the offences committed, their scale, the role played by Darko Mrđa, and the impact of the crimes upon the victims and their families. It concluded that the sentence should reflect all of the cruelty and inhumanity which characterizes Darko Mrđa's direct participation in the shooting of around 200 civilians, of which all but 12 were killed.

124. Moreover, the Trial Chamber deemed that the civilian status of the victims could not be taken into account as an aggravating factor, as it is already an element of the crimes charged. However, it accepted that a considerable number of victims were in a situation of special vulnerability and found this to be an aggravating factor. Furthermore, the Trial Chamber considered that Darko Mrđa's position of authority was a relevant aggravating circumstance, but did not attach much weight to it. Finally, the Trial Chamber admitted that most of the victims were subjected to such a level of suffering that it should be qualified as an aggravating circumstance.

125. The Trial Chamber gave consideration to a number of mitigating circumstances. It observed that, since his arrest, Darko Mrđa entered a plea of guilty, made a public expression of remorse and actively cooperated with the Prosecution. Moreover, it accorded limited weight in the mitigation of sentence to Darko Mrđa's personal circumstances.

126. The Trial Chamber also took into consideration the fact that Darko Mrđa must serve his sentence in a foreign country in determining the appropriate sentence, but it did not consider it to be a mitigating circumstance.

127. Finally, the Trial Chamber rejected the submissions of the Defence concerning duress, compliance with superior orders and the lapse of time since the commission of the crimes.

B. Credit for Time Served

128. Darko Mrđa has been detained in the UNDU since his arrest and transfer on 13 June 2002. Pursuant to Rule 101 (C) of the Rules, he is entitled to credit for the time spent in detention, which amounts to 658 days.

JUDGEMENT

The Office of the Prosecutor:

20 November 1991.[276] In light of these findings the Appeals Chamber turns to consider whether Šljivančanin's failure to act upon learning of the order to withdraw the JNA troops from Ovčara substantially contributed to the murder of the prisoners of war by the TOs and paramilitaries.

81. Bearing in mind that the basic elements of the mode of liability of aiding and abetting apply regardless of whether this form of liability is charged as "omission",[277] the Appeals Chamber recalls that the actus reus of aiding and abetting consists of acts or omissions[278] which assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a specific crime, and which have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime.[279] There is no requirement of a cause-effect relationship between the conduct of the aider and abettor and the commission of the crime or that such conduct served as a condition precedent to the commission of the crime.[280] The actus reus of aiding and abetting a crime may occur before, during, or after the principal crime has been perpetrated, and the location at which the actus reus takes place may be removed from the location of the principal crime.[281] Accordingly, in order to determine whether Šljivančanin possessed the requisite actus reus for aiding and abetting murder, the Appeals Chamber must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Prosecution has demonstrated that Šljivančanin substantially contributed to their killing by his inaction[282] and that, when account is taken of the errors committed by the Trial Chamber, all reasonable doubt concerning Šljivančanin's guilt has been eliminated.[283]

(a) Šljivančanin's ability to act

82. The Appeals Chamber further recalls that aiding and abetting by omission implicitly requires that the accused had the ability to act but failed to do so.[284] In order to determine whether Šljivančanin had the ability to act but failed to do so, the Appeals Chamber must be satisfied beyond reasonable doubt that the Prosecution has provided sufficient evidence concerning which means were available to Šljivančanin to fulfil his continuing duty towards the prisoners of war.[285]

(e) The mens rea of aiding and abetting by omission

157. Šljivančanin submits that "aiding and abetting requires an intentional act on the part of the [a]ccused, which can only be matched by a culpable omission, a concept that goes beyond the basic elements of aiding and abetting as defined by the Appeals Chamber".[556] He argues that since the omission would have to be "specifically directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support"[557] to the perpetration of the crime, "only the wilful failure to discharge a duty, which implies the culpable intent of the accused, can lead to individual criminal responsibility, pursuant to Article 7(1) of the Statute".[558] In this regard, Šljivančanin submits that "mere knowledge" that the conduct facilitates the commission of the crime is insufficient to establish aiding and abetting by omission[559] and that the applicable mens rea standard must include, at a minimum, proof beyond reasonable doubt that he consciously decided not to act, which amounts to consent.[560] He argues that failure on the part of the Trial Chamber to establish that his omission was intentional and deliberate amounts to a finding of strict liability.[561]

158. The Prosecution responds that Šljivančanin attempts to elevate the mental element of aiding and abetting to a kind of special intent, which has already been specifically rejected by the Appeals Chamber.[562] It submits that the correct test is knowledge in the sense of "awareness of a probability" that the crime will be committed and that the acts or omissions will assist or facilitate in the commission of the crime,[563] and that, in any event, the facts as found by the Trial Chamber would fulfil his proposed criteria.[564]

159. The Appeals Chamber considers that Šljivančanin misapprehends the mens rea standard applicable to aiding and abetting. The fact that an "omission must be directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a crime" forms part of the actus reus not the mens rea of aiding and abetting.[565] In addition, the Appeals Chamber has confirmed that "specific direction" is [560] See Šljivančanin Supplemental Brief in Reply, para. 53. Šljivančanin further contends that the Trial Chamber should have applied the following additional criteria: (i) that he had knowledge of his ability to act; (ii) that he was aware of the essential elements of the crime ultimately committed by the principal; and (iii) that he had knowledge that taking action would obstruct the commission of the crime (see Šljivančanin Appeal Brief, para. 247(e)).

not an essential ingredient of the actus reus of aiding and abetting.[566] It reiterates its finding that the required mens rea for aiding and abetting by omission is that: (1) the aider and abettor must know that his omission assists in the commission of the crime of the principal perpetrator; and (2) he must be aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal.[567] While it is not necessary that the aider and abettor know the precise crime that was intended and was in fact committed, if he is aware that one of a number of crimes will probably be committed, and one of those crimes is committed, he has intended to facilitate the commission of that crime, and is guilty as an aider and abetter.[568] The Appeals Chamber further recalls that it has previously rejected an elevated mens rea requirement for aiding and abetting, namely, the proposition that the aider and abettor needs to have intended to provide assistance, or as a minimum, accepted that such assistance would be a possible and foreseeable consequence of his conduct.[569] Accordingly, Šljivančanin's arguments are dismissed.

4. Conclusion

160. In light of the foregoing, Šljivančanin's second ground of appeal is dismissed in its entirety.

C. Third Ground of Appeal: Šljivančanin's Legal Duty to Protect the Prisoners of War at Ovčara by Virtue of his Responsibility for the Evacuation of the Vukovar Hospital

161. The Trial Chamber convicted Šljivančanin for aiding and abetting the torture of over 200 prisoners of war held at Ovčara on 20 November 1991.[570] In reaching this conclusion, the Trial Chamber found that Šljivančanin was under a duty to protect the prisoners of war by reason of his responsibility for the evacuation of the Vukovar hospital, and his failure to prevent the commission of crimes against the prisoners of war amounted to a breach of that duty.[571]

162. Šljivančanin argues that the Trial Chamber erred in finding that Mrkšić put him in charge of the evacuation of the Vukovar hospital and thereby entrusted him with a legal duty to protect the prisoners of war at Ovčara.[572] He avers that the Trial Chamber committed the following errors: (1) the Trial Chamber erred in finding that he testified that Mrkšić ordered him to ensure the

VIII. PARTIALLY DISSENTING OPINION OF JUDGE POCAR

1. In this Judgement, the Appeals Chamber allows the Prosecution's second ground of appeal and the Prosecution's appeal on Šljivančanin's sentence.[1] I agree with the Majority's reasoning and conclusion that the Trial Chamber committed an error of law in finding that Šljivančanin's duty to protect the prisoners of war pursuant to the laws and customs of war came to an end upon Mrkšić's order to withdraw.[2] I am also in agreement with the Majority that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in the exercise of its discretion when it found that a sentence of five years' imprisonment adequately reflected the gravity of the crimes committed by Šljivančanin, and in particular, the consequences of the torture upon the victims and their families, the especial vulnerability of the prisoners, and the very large number of victims.[3] However, for the reasons detailed below, I am unable to agree with the rest of the reasoning developed by the Majority in the discussion of the Prosecution's second ground of appeal or with the consequent conviction of Šljivančanin for aiding and abetting murder.[4] I also disagree with the Majority's decision to increase the sentence imposed on Šljivančanin by the Trial Chamber.[5]

2. For the reasons already expressed in my dissenting opinions in Prosecutor v. Galić,[6] Prosecutor v. Semanza[7] and Prosecutor v. Rutaganda,[8] I do not believe that the Appeals Chamber has the power to remedy an error of the Trial Chamber by subsequently entering new or more serious convictions on appeal. Similarly, I do not believe that the Appeals Chamber has the power to impose a new sentence on the accused that is higher than that which was imposed by the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber is bound to apply Article 25(2) of the Statute of the International Tribunal ("ICTY Statute") in such a manner as to comply with fundamental principles of human rights as enshrined in, inter alia, the International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights ("ICCPR").[9] Article 14(5) of the ICCPR provides that "[e]veryone convicted of a crime shall have the right to his conviction and sentence being reviewed by a higher tribunal according to law". Accordingly, the right to appeal convictions, not excluding convictions entered for the first time on appeal, should be granted to an accused before the International Tribunal.

[9] International Covenant on Civil and Political Rights, 999 U.N.T.S. 171, entered into force 23 March 1976.

11. In addition, I observe that the International Tribunal and the ICTR, established by the Security Council on behalf of the international community to deal with the most serious crimes, stand as examples of best practice for the prosecution of international crimes. These bodies do so at a time of great importance in the history of international criminal law, as evident through the development of the International Criminal Court, currently engaging in its first prosecutions, and the establishment of ad hoc and mixed tribunals such as the Special Tribunal for Lebanon and the Extraordinary Chambers in the Courts of Cambodia. Accordingly, it is incumbent on the International Tribunal and the ICTR to apply the highest standard of human rights.

12. In conclusion, I consider that, after having found that the Trial Chamber committed an error of law in affirming that Šljivančanin did not have a duty to protect the prisoners of war following Mrkšić's order to withdraw, the Appeal Chambers should have taken a different course in this Judgement. It should have remitted the matter to the Judges of first instance for them to address whether the available evidence would show, beyond reasonable doubt, Šljivančanin's guilt for aiding and abetting murder. This approach was especially compelling in the circumstances of the present case as, in light of its finding that it was not incumbent on Šljivančanin to ensure the safety of prisoners of war, many circumstances of fact were completely unexplored by the Trial Chamber. The Appeals Chamber engages itself in highly fact-intensive evaluations of whether Šljivančanin was aware of Mrkšić's order to withdraw the JNA troops,[22] whether Šljivančanin's failure to act contributed to the murders of the prisoners of war,[23] and whether he realised that the killing of the prisoners of war at Ovčara had become a likely occurrence.[24] The Appeals Chamber enteres a conviction based on the trial record without having observed the witness testimony or the presentation of evidence, factors which may be particularly important in assessing witness credibility. In so doing, the Appeals Chamber enters, for the first time in this case, findings on matters which are primarily within the responsibility of the Trial Chamber, such as finding on issues of fact that are crucial to a verdict of guilt. Such findings are now destined to remain unchallenged, in clear violation of Šljivančanin's right to appeal against convictions.

13. Likewise, remitting the determination of sentence to the Trial Chamber in order to ensure that the right to appeal against sentence is upheld is especially important in the circumstances of this case. In this case, the Appeals Chamber does not consider that the Trial Chamber merely erred by improperly taking into account one of the sentencing factors at issue, or made an error as to some of the facts upon which it exercised its discretion, or failed to correctly note one or more of the legal principles governing sentencing. Rather, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial

[customary international] law, Article 2 of the Statute only applies to offences committed within the context of international armed conflicts".[255]

113. Tadić did not directly address the further question posed by this case: whether the mental state element of Article 2 crimes encompasses knowledge of the international character of the armed conflict. In Kordić and Čerkez, the Appeals Chamber provided an affirmative answer to that question, stating that although the accused need not "make a correct legal evaluation as to the international character of the armed conflict", he must be "aware of the factual circumstances, e.g., that a foreign state was involved in the armed conflict".[256] The Appeals Chamber considers it necessary to elucidate the matter further. In the Appeals Chamber's view, the conclusion of Kordić and Čerkez was correct, and follows logically from the principles established in Tadić.

114. The principle of individual guilt requires that an accused can only be convicted for a crime if his mens rea comprises the actus reus of the crime. To convict him without proving that he knew of the facts that were necessary to make his conduct a crime is to deny him his entitlement to the presumption of innocence. The specific required mental state will vary, of course, depending on the crime and the mode of liability. But the core principle is the same: for a conduct to entail criminal liability, it must be possible for an individual to determine ex ante, based on the facts available to him, that the conduct is criminal. At a minimum, then, to convict an accused of a crime, he must have had knowledge of the facts that made his or her conduct criminal.[257]

115. The critical question before the Appeals Chamber is therefore this: what conduct constitutes a crime amounting to a "grave breach" of the Geneva Conventions? Is it the mere commission of acts listed in Article 2(a) to (h) of the Statute, such as "wilful killing"? Or is it the commission of such acts on the basis that they were committed in the course of an international armed conflict?

116. The Appeals Chamber concludes that the existence and international character of an armed conflict are both jurisdictional prerequisites (as established in Tadić) and substantive elements of crimes pursuant to Article 2 of the Statute. The fact that something is a jurisdictional prerequisite does not mean that it does not at the same time constitute an element of a crime. If certain conduct becomes a crime under the Statute only if it occurs in the context of an international armed conflict, the existence of such a conflict is not merely a jurisdictional prerequisite: it is a substantive element of the crime charged. Thus, the Prosecution's obligation to prove intent also encompasses the accused's knowledge of the facts pertinent to the internationality of an armed conflict.

to the Tribunal cannot be considered in mitigation of sentence."[1303] However, given that Martinović was involved in criminal proceedings at the time of his transfer,[1304] and that there is some indication that the time saved by facilitating transfer would have been approximately one month,[1305] the Appeals Chamber does not consider that this mitigating circumstance would have been given significant weight. The Trial Chamber thus did not commit an error affecting the judgement.

2. Alleged error regarding assistance and general attitude to others

602. Martinović submits that despite noting his claims that he helped his BH Muslim neighbours, that his general attitude is the same towards BH Muslims and BH Croats, and that BH Muslim detainees were helped by him and wanted to stay with him rather than in other units, the Trial Chamber failed to address them in mitigation when determining his sentence.[1306] Martinović refers to the right of an accused to a reasoned opinion under Article 23 of the Statute as an aspect of the fair trial requirement in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute and argues that the Trial Chamber cannot simply ignore his submissions.[1307]

603. The Appeals Chamber recalls that every accused has the right to a reasoned opinion under Article 23 of the Statute and Rule 98 ter(C).[1308] This right is one of the elements of the fair trial requirement embodied in Articles 20 and 21 of the Statute.[1309] It makes it possible for an individual to exercise their right of appeal[1310] and allows the Appeals Chamber to understand and review the findings of the Trial Chamber as well as its evaluation of the evidence.[1311] The Appeals Chamber further recalls that the requirement of a reasoned opinion relates to a Trial Chamber's judgement; a Trial Chamber is under no obligation to justify its findings in relation to each and every submission made during trial.[1312]

604. The Appeals Chamber notes that in an earlier section of the Trial Judgement before the Trial Chamber made its findings on sentencing, the Trial Chamber accepted that Martinović rendered assistance to some, but not the vast majority of BH Muslim prisoners.[1313] This finding has been

MOMIR NIKOLIĆ

JUDGEMENT ON SENTENCING APPEAL

Counsel for the Prosecution:

Mr. Peter McCloskey
Ms. Marie-Ursula Kind

Counsel for the Appellant:

Mr. Rock Tansey
Mr. R J. Livingston

The Trial Chamber additionally found the following to be elements of a separate aggravating circumstance:

> The Trial Chamber finds that Momir Nikolić was in a position of authority as Assistant Commander and Chief of Security and Intelligence. While his tasks largely consisted of implementing rather than giving orders, Momir Nikolić directed the military police of the Bratunac Brigade, as well as co-ordinated other units; this was of significance to the implementation and completion of the underlying criminal acts committed following the attack on Srebrenica. The role that Nikolić played and the functions that he performed, while not in the capacity of a commander, were of significant importance to the overall "murder operation" that was ongoing. Therefore, the Trial Chamber finds his position and role to be aggravating factors.[163]

61. The Appeals Chamber agrees with the Appellant that the Trial Chamber used the word "role" when considering both the gravity of the offence and the aggravating circumstance. Upon a review of the above cited paragraphs of the Sentencing Judgement,[164] the Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber took into account the Appellant's active role in the crime in its assessment of the gravity of the offence, and his position of authority and the role he played in the crime as a separate aggravating circumstance. The Appeals Chamber is not satisfied that the Appellant's role taken into account by the Trial Chamber when considering the gravity of the offence and his "role" taken into account in addition to his position of authority as an aggravating factor correspond to different aspects of the role in question. There is no identifiable difference in the facts cited that would lead to such a conclusion; both paragraphs address as a general matter the Appellant's role in the murder operation. Double-counting the Appellant's role in the crimes is impermissible as doing so allows the same factor to detrimentally influence the Appellant's sentence twice. However, although the Trial Chamber therefore erred in its double-counting of the Appellant's "role" in the offence, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber's reference to the Appellant's "position of authority" in paragraph 135 of the Sentencing Judgement did not amount to double counting. The Appellant's abuse of his position of authority is distinct from his role in the crimes, and the Trial Chamber referred to the former only as an aggravating factor.

62. The Appeals Chamber concludes that the Trial Chamber committed a discernible error in taking into account twice in sentencing the role the Appellant played in the commission of the crimes. As it impacted on the Trial Chamber's determination of the sentence, the Appeals Chamber will take this error into account when revising the Appellant's sentence.

63. The Appellant's third ground of appeal is accordingly upheld.

The Appeals Chamber further notes that the Trial Chamber explicitly stated again in paragraph 139 of the Sentencing Judgement that it considered not only his position of authority but also his role as an aggravating circumstance: "In summary, the Trial Chamber finds that the following aggravating circumstances have been proven beyond reasonable doubt: the position of authority and role of Momir Nikolić [...]".

superior could possibly be held responsible under Article 7(3) in relation to his subordinate's criminal responsibility under the same article.[90]

40. The Trial Chamber did consider, however, that an accused may be held responsible under Article 7(3) of the Statute for a subordinate's commission by omission[91] and aiding and abetting.[92] With respect to aiding and abetting, the Trial Chamber further held that this mode of liability may take the form of encouragement or approval, as well as omission.[93]

41. The Appeals Chamber considers that the Trial Chamber did not hold Atif Krdžić criminally responsible for commission by omission. At a minimum, the actus reus of commission by omission requires an elevated degree of "concrete influence".[94] Such was not the case here, where the Trial Chamber merely found that Atif Krdžić's absence from the detention facilities "coincide[d] with more killings and more maltreatment".[95] Furthermore, the Trial Chamber clearly distinguished Atif Krdžić from the principal perpetrators who physically committed the crimes.[96]

42. Turning to whether the Trial Chamber applied the theory of aiding and abetting by tacit approval and encouragement, the Appeals Chamber notes that in cases where this theory has been applied, the combination of a position of authority and physical presence at the crime scene allowed the inference that non-interference by the accused actually amounted to tacit approval and encouragement.[97] Here, the Trial Chamber did not find that Atif Krdžić was present at the scene of the crimes. Rather, it focused on his "conspicuous absence" from the detention facilities, and how it "coincide[d] with more killings and more maltreatment."[98] Similarly, the Trial Chamber emphasised the absence of evidence "of any supervision over the guards, of any disciplinary measures against them, or of any visit by Atif Krdžić, or a person assigned by him, for that matter at any time."[99] The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the Trial Chamber did not hold Atif Krdžić criminally responsible for aiding and abetting by tacit approval and encouragement.

43. The Prosecution submits that the Trial Chamber found Atif Krdžić responsible for aiding and abetting by omission.[100] The Appeals Chamber recalls that omission proper may lead to individual criminal responsibility under Article 7(1) of the Statute where there is a legal duty to act.[101] The Appeals Chamber has never set out the requirements for a conviction for omission in detail.[102] However, at a minimum, the offender's conduct would have to meet the basic elements of aiding and abetting. Thus, his omission must be directed to assist, encourage or lend moral support to the perpetration of a crime and have a substantial effect upon the perpetration of the crime (actus reus).[103] The aider and abettor must know that his omission assists in the commission of the crime of the principal perpetrator[104] and must be aware of the essential elements of the crime which was ultimately committed by the principal (mens rea).[105]

44. The Trial Chamber found a legal duty to act on the part of Atif Krdžić as Commander of the Military Police, and that his omissions "coincide[d] with more killings and more mistreatment".[106] However, it does not follow from the fact that Atif Krdžić's omissions "coincided" with an increase in crimes that his omissions had a "substantial effect" thereupon, as required for liability for aiding and abetting to incur. The Trial Chamber remained silent on the issue.

45. Regarding Atif Krdžić's mens rea, the Trial Chamber found that "there is no reason why Atif Krdžić [...] should not have become aware of the crimes committed, except for wilful blindness".[107] Atif Krdžić was thus found to have been aware of the crimes committed by the principal perpetrators. However, the Trial Chamber made no finding on whether Atif Krdžić knew that his omissions assisted in the crimes. In this regard, the Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber's finding regarding Atif Krdžić's "conspicuous absence" from the detention facilities[108] refers not to his mens rea, but to his failure to comply with his duty to care for the prisoners.[109] The Prosecution understands this finding in the same way.[110]

46. The Appeals Chamber therefore finds that the Trial Chamber did not hold Atif Krdžić criminally responsible for aiding and abetting by omission.

47. Having considered the Trial Judgement as a whole, the Appeals Chamber is left with only a small number of general findings – for instance, that Atif Krdžić might have been "wilfully blind" to the crimes and that he was "conspicuously absent" from the detention facilities – without any indication of whether and how they relate to any form of criminal liability under the International Tribunal's Statute. These scattered fragments do not allow the Appeals Chamber to conclude on what basis the Trial Chamber found Orić's only identified culpable subordinate criminally responsible. Such finding would have been required to determine Orić's guilt. For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber erred in failing to resolve the issue of whether Orić's subordinate incurred criminal responsibility.

48. In the absence of a finding on the basis on which Orić's only identified culpable subordinate was found criminally responsible, Orić's convictions under Article 7(3) of the Statute cannot stand. The Trial Chamber's error therefore invalidates the decision.

49. Having granted Orić's appeal in this part, the Appeals Chamber would not necessarily need to address Orić's arguments pertaining to his knowledge or reason to know of his subordinate's alleged criminal conduct. However, the Appeals Chamber deems it necessary to give full consideration of the issue of Orić's mens rea raised under his sub-ground of appeal 1(F)(2).

5. Orić's knowledge or reason to know of his subordinate's alleged criminal conduct (Orić's Ground 1(F)(2))

50. Under his ground of appeal 1(F)(2), Orić submits that there was no evidence that he knew that the Military Police was criminally responsible for the commission of the crimes committed in the detention facilities.[111] Before it can turn to Orić's submissions, the Appeals Chamber must first consider whether the Trial Chamber actually made the challenged finding.

51. The Appeals Chamber recalls that to hold a superior criminally liable under Article 7(3) of the Statute it must be found that he knew or had reason to know of his subordinate's criminal conduct:

> The fact that any of the acts referred to in articles 2 to 5 of the present Statute was committed by a subordinate does not relieve his superior of criminal responsibility if he knew or had reason to know that the subordinate was about to commit such acts or had done so and the superior failed to take the necessary and reasonable measures to prevent such acts or to punish the perpetrators thereof.[112]

[111] Orić Appeal Brief, paras. 129(e), 130-137. See also Prosecution Response Brief, paras. 50 and 53.
[112] Article 7(3) of the Statute.

52. The Appeals Chamber notes that the Trial Chamber made no explicit finding as to whether Orić knew or had reason to know of his subordinate's alleged criminal responsibility for the mistreatment of Serb detainees.[113] As such a pivotal finding was required, the Appeals Chamber will examine whether a holistic reading of the Trial Judgement reveals that the Trial Chamber was satisfied that Orić had the required mens rea under Article 7(3) of the Statute.

53. In its analysis of Orić's "imputed knowledge", the Trial Chamber found that Orić "appears to have had no doubt that the killing of a detainee was a matter that concerned him as he discussed it with Hamed Salihović and Ramiz Bećirović with a view to prevent reoccurrence."[114] The Trial Chamber further found that Orić was "instrumental in promoting an investigation of this incident, which ultimately resulted in the removal of Mirzet Halilović, a decision in which the Accused took an active part."[115] The Appeals Chamber considers that these findings imply that the Trial Chamber was satisfied that Orić had knowledge of Mirzet Halilović's criminal conduct, but notes that the latter was not found to be Orić's subordinate.[116]

54. Regarding Orić's only identified culpable subordinate, Atif Krdžić, the Trial Chamber held that Orić "was aware that, responding to problems with the Srebrenica military police, Mirzet Halilović had been replaced by Atif Krdžić as its commander."[117] It also found that Orić knew that his deputy, Zulfo Tursunović, was visiting the Serb detainees at the detention facilities.[118] The Trial Chamber continued: "The reality of the situation is that more Serb detainees were killed and cruelly treated after Atif Krdžić was appointed commander of the Srebrenica military police than before. In addition, this occurred at a time when the Srebrenica military police was assigned a new commander, and was undergoing structural changes, supposedly to resolve previous problems."[119] The Trial Chamber concluded by holding that "[a]gainst the backdrop of the Accused's prior notice, it appears that the Accused did not deem it necessary to verify if further Serb detainees were killed or cruelly treated and acted on that assumption."[120]

55. Read in isolation, these findings might be understood to mean that the Trial Chamber was satisfied that Orić had "prior notice" – in other words, reason to know – that Atif Krdžić would continue his predecessor's failure to ensure that the Serb detainees were not subjected to murder and cruel treatment. However, the Appeals Chamber considers that, read in context, the finding on

Orić's "prior notice" relates to his knowledge that "Serb detainees kept at the Srebrenica Police Station were cruelly treated, and that one of them had been killed."[121] Thus, the finding did not concern Orić's reason to know of his subordinate's conduct, but, instead, his notice of the crimes committed by others at the Srebrenica Police Station.

56. On such a crucial element of the accused's criminal responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute as his knowledge or reason to know of his subordinate's criminal conduct, the Appeals Chamber emphasises that neither the Parties nor the Appeals Chamber can be required to engage in this sort of speculative exercise to discern findings from vague statements by the Trial Chamber.

57. The difficulty in detecting the necessary Trial Chamber findings on this issue appears to arise from the approach taken in the Trial Judgement. Rather than examining Orić's knowledge or reason to know of his own subordinate's alleged criminal conduct, the Trial Chamber concentrated its entire analysis on Orić's knowledge of the crimes themselves,[122] which were not physically committed by Atif Krdžić, his only identified culpable subordinate:[123]

> Having established that subsequent to 27 November 1992, a superior-subordinate relationship existed between the Accused and the head of the Srebrenica military police ultimately responsible for the murder and cruel treatment, the Trial Chamber must now examine to what extent, if any, the Accused had knowledge or should have been aware of the occurrence of murder and cruel treatment at the Srebrenica Police Station and the Building between December 1992 and March 1993.[124]

This approach was ultimately reflected in the Trial Chamber's conclusion as to Orić's mens rea, which was squarely limited to the question of whether he knew or had reason to know of the actual crimes committed at the two detention facilities, to the exclusion of any finding on his knowledge of the alleged criminal conduct of his subordinate, Atif Krdžić.[125]

58. The Prosecution submits that, in the context of crimes such as those at issue which occur in a prison setting, knowledge of the crimes and knowledge of the subordinates' criminal conduct "are one and the same."[126] It argues that "[a]s soon as Orić knew or had reason to know that prisoners were being mistreated and killed, he must also be considered to have known that his subordinates in charge of the prisoners were criminally responsible for that mistreatment."[127]

59. The Appeals Chamber stresses that knowledge of a crime and knowledge of a person's criminal conduct are, in law and in fact, distinct matters. Although the latter may, depending on the circumstances, be inferred from the former, the Appeals Chamber notes that such an inference was not made by the Trial Chamber.[128] Its enquiry was limited to Orić's knowledge or reason to know of the crimes committed in the detention facilities, and so was its conclusion. Therefore, the Appeals Chamber need not consider the Prosecution's assertion that Orić knew or had reason to know of the crimes themselves.[129]

60. In conclusion, the Appeals Chamber finds that, in order to establish Orić's responsibility under Article 7(3) of the Statute, the Trial Chamber was under the obligation to make a finding on whether he knew or had reason to know that Atif Krdžić, the only identified culpable subordinate, was about to or had engaged in criminal activity. The Trial Chamber's failure to do so constitutes an error of law.

6. Conclusion

61. The Appeals Chamber grants Orić's grounds 1(E)(1) and 5 insofar as he alleges therein that the Trial Chamber failed to resolve the issue of his subordinate's criminal responsibility. In relation to Orić's sub-ground of appeal 1(F)(2), the Appeals Chamber finds that the Trial Chamber also failed to resolve the issue of whether Orić knew or had reason to know that his subordinate was about to or had committed crimes. These errors invalidate the Trial Chamber's decision to find Orić criminally responsible for failing to prevent the crimes of murder and cruel treatment committed against Serb detainees between 27 December 1992 and 20 March 1993.

[128] Regarding the possibility of making such an inference in the circumstances of the case, the Appeals Chamber refers to its analysis of the Prosecution's appeal, infra paras. 172-174.
[129] See AT. 1 April 2008, pp. 19-22, 24-25.

90. The Trial Chamber made no express finding that Orić had de jure control over the Military Police between 24 September and 16 October 1992. At this juncture, however, the Appeals Chamber need not determine whether the Trial Chamber erred in failing so to find because, for reasons stated below, it considers the Prosecution's argument to be incorrect in law.

91. It is well established that the Prosecution must prove effective control beyond reasonable doubt in establishing a superior-subordinate relationship within the meaning of Article 7(3) of the Statute.[187] For that purpose, de jure authority is not synonymous with effective control.[188] Whereas the possession of de jure powers may certainly suggest a material ability to prevent or punish criminal acts of subordinates, it may be neither necessary nor sufficient to prove such ability.[189] If de jure power always results in a presumption of effective control, then the Prosecution would be exempted from its burden to prove effective control beyond reasonable doubt.[190] The Appeals Chamber is therefore unable to agree with the Prosecution's proposed legal presumption.

92. The Appeals Chamber acknowledges that its jurisprudence might have suggested otherwise, using the terms "presume" or "prima facie evidence of effective control".[191] The import of such language has not always been clear. Although in some common law jurisdictions "prima facie evidence" leads by definition to a burden-shifting presumption,[192] the Appeals Chamber underscores that before the International Tribunal the Prosecution still bears the burden of proving beyond reasonable doubt that the accused had effective control over his subordinates.[193] The possession of de jure authority, without more, provides only some evidence of such effective control. Before the International Tribunal there is no such presumption to the detriment of an accused.

93. For these reasons, the Appeals Chamber dismisses this part of the Prosecution's appeal.

704. Finally, his speech on the occasion of the second anniversary of the Bajramovići Decision[1992] as well as the description of himself and his role in his book[1993] supports the conclusion that he was significantly more than the commander of the Potočari group only.

705. All of these factors, however, including a certain pattern of destruction and burning of property,[1994] do not necessarily lead to the conclusion that the Accused exercised effective control over the various participating groups of fighters, not to speak of the civilians, who followed the fighters.

706. The evidence on the possible influence of the Accused on the local fighting groups and their respective leaders demonstrates that there may have been some instances where some groups and/or leaders were more amenable than others to put themselves under control and command of the Accused.[1995] Generally speaking, however, until 8 January 1993, in spite of efforts to bring them together under an effective sole command,[1996] the local groups remained relatively independent and voluntary.[1997] The conduct of such leaders as Hakija Meholjić, Akif Ustić, Ejub Golić and Nurif Rizvanović explains how unrealistic and unworkable it was for the Accused to exercise effective control over their respective groups.[1998] The Trial Chamber finds the Accused credible when he stated during his Interview that although he was elected commander, fighters were primarily loyal to their respective commanders, and he was thus unable to command all of the fighting groups in the field,[1999] especially since he was not always present during all the attacks.

707. The picture that emerges from the evidence is not one of an organised army with a fully functioning command structure, but one of pockets of desperate men willing to fight, mainly to defend themselves, that grouped together around trusted leaders, who could provide them with a
